I say that those wise words in which the position was so aptly expressed are equally true to-day as they were then, and if we wish to come to some reasonable compromise upon this matter, our only safe position is to take up the position which was taken up by Sir Samuel Griffith and a majority of those who voted with him in 1891. I appeal to those hon. members who represent the smaller States here to recognise that, notwithstanding the opinions which have been expressed to the contrary, the majority of this Convention have been willing to give them the utmost equality of representation and power which are consistent with the working of this Federation; and although Mr. Higgins may think that perhaps we have gone a little too far, we are all willing to admit that equality of representation is absolutely necessary as a condition to the entry of any State into this union. When that is granted, and these larger powers are asked for, then arise those other considerations which I have endeavored to put before the Convention. I ask those hon. members who wish to see this Senate endowed with stronger powers than were given in 1891, to remember that we are now giving them in this Senate a much stronger body than was proposed in 1891. That which is now to be constituted is a body which will be more directly in touch with the people, and that is a reason why the powers which they have in all other respects are powers which will be exercised with the assent and concurrence of the people of the different States, the Senate being in accord with the opinions of the majority in those States. I trust that at least we, who are here representing our different colonies, and who only wish to see Federation brought about in that form in which it can only be brought about, will not object simply because we have stated actual facts, and stated our opinions plainly. There is a time for straightforward statement; there is a time for coming to the really plain matter at issue, and, in my opinion, that time has come. Although I should deplore any hasty arrival at a conclusion, the conclusion we now come to is a matter of such importance that the utmost consideration should be given to every phase of it. Although I would not bind this Convention, at the same time the decision come to now will have an immense influence upon public opinion all through Australia, and if it were to appear in the public prints tomorrow morning that the representatives of the smaller States, because they happen to be in the majority here, have gone back from the compromise of 1891, and have asked the larger States to give them larger powers than they gave them in 1891, then I think a very hopeless note in the cause of Federation will have been struck. I hope that will not be so, and I hope that the careful and deep consideration of this matter, with the full responsibility it involves, will result at least in our coming back to the reasonable compromise which the men of 1891 were able to take back to those who sent them to the Sydney Convention.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

One feature, and a very striking feature, of the discussion now proceeding is this, that the representatives of the more populous colonies are very capable of seeing one particular line of argument as applicable to themselves, and are entirely blind to that argument as it applies to those who represent the smaller States. They say to us in effect "Ask for this thing, which is a mere nothing in reality, and we shall not be able to go back to our colonies and ask the people to support this Constitution." But we can say the same. We cannot go back to our colonies and ask the people to accept anything less than that full but not excessive measure of power which has been conceded to the Senate by the Constitutional Committee. Speaking at any rate for Tasmania, which I imagine is much in the same position as the other Smaller States, I can say, with a very great degree of certainty, that she will not accept this Bill unless the Senate is provided with ample powers to protect the smaller States.

Mr. ISAACS:

Nobody denies that.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

We hear a great deal of any action of ours imperilling Federation by the exclusion of the two more populous States. I think the representatives of Victoria will admit that with them Federation is more popular than in many other colonies.

Mr. DEAKIN:

It will not be now.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Of course not when in the slightest way things go against them. At any rate, Federation had been more popular in Victoria than in any other
Mr. DEAKIN:
Because they were too slow in Tasmania.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
We go more slowly, perhaps, but more surely, and we know what we are about. I venture to say Federation is more important to the interests of Victoria than to those of any of the other colonies.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Then you will find out your mistake.

Mr. ISAACS:
Do not make any mistake about that.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
That is as events will prove. We hear to-day, as we did in 1891, threats, whether veiled or open, directed at the opponents of certain political principles, such threats as in 1891 did more than anything else to damage the cause of Federation.

Mr. BARTON:
There were no threats then.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
We hear a great deal about the compromise which is offered now as something to be conceded. It is a large concession to give us, what was given in 1891 under very peculiar circumstances and in the face of a vote which, but for an accident, would have been absolutely equal. Members who were present then will remember that, owing to the fact that the Senate was to be largely a nominee body, three of those who would have voted for the larger powers of the Senate gave in their adhesion to the opponents of these powers simply on these grounds: that they declined to commit to the Senate as a nominee body that large power they would have conceded to it as a representative House. Those three members voted against the other three of their own colony, and by that means gave a majority of six—the voting being twenty-two to sixteen instead of being nineteen on either side. That compromise, which was after all a compromise forced upon what one can hardly term a minority, is now dangled before us as something that should tempt us into conceding a great deal more than we have already conceded. The hon. representative Mr. Holder has said so well all that, can be said upon the question.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
That it is not necessary to repeat his argument. He has shown how large our concessions have been; how we have conceded on all points everything that could fairly or justly be asked on the part of the representatives of the smaller States. I do hope that in this matter of compromise and negotiation it will not be a question always of the smaller States yielding, but sometimes of the larger States making some concessions on their part.

Mr. ISAACS:
They have been doing nothing else.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It seems to me that the fact that this debate was, if possible, to close tonight, has intruded at this early period a spirit which had better have been put aside. Hon. members, probably feeling that we had to come to a decision almost immediately, have tried to give a position of prominence to the feelings of their colonies. At the same time, we are not here altogether to interpret every feeling or every passing phase of feeling in our respective colonies.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
We are here to frame a Constitution for all Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
And I think it would have been better for the spirit of our debate and deliberations if we had first gone as far as we could to the root of this matter, and deliberated upon its merits.

Mr. GLYNN:
Before threatening.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It seems to me that the matter may be very calmly discussed, and that a great deal of the difference of opinion is merely the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. I take it for granted that what is involved in this controversy is the necessity for the domination more or less of one House over another on financial matters under responsible government. I quite agree with this position, although I may not have expressed it exactly in the best language. But to dominate does not mean to override.

Sir JAMES LEE STEERE:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
If you get your dominancy up to a certain point, it does not follow that you should override, and after you have fixed that dominancy you have everything that you can reasonably expect under a responsible form of Government. Some hon. members ask, are 650,000 people to dominate two and a half millions? You give in this particular Bill—and you have never presumed to do otherwise an absolute power of veto, and surely that power of veto over financial measures is not an absolutely dead thing.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
But let us see where the dominancy rests. I call the great power of dominancy in finance the power to initiate.

Mr. DOBSON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You have in this Bill, and in every Bill proposed, the power to initiate all money matters. Now just look at the relative difference between the position of a House that can initiate and a House that cannot.

Mr. DOBSON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Take an illustration on the floor of our own Legislative Assemblies, and take the difference between a private member and a Minister of the Crown.
Is there not an awful gap of difference of influence between those two individuals?

Mr. HOWE:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The private members cannot bring in a sixpenny proposal for expenditure. It is only a Minister of the Crown that can get a message from the Crown, and therefore it is idle to say that, because you introduce what is the rational and sensible proposal of amendment, instead of a comparatively newfangled idea of suggestion, you are taking away that dominancy of the House that initiates financial legislation. It does seem to me that we have some higher object here to a certain extent than even to bring before this Convention the ignorant ideas of our respective populations.

Mr. GORDON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The whole object of the Enabling Bill was to allow us to frame a Constitution, not to be passed at once, but which would go through the crucible of public opinion, and which we ourselves in our respective colonies would be able to illustrate, to elucidate, and, if necessary, to educate the people upon. Surely we have some educative power as the chosen men of all Australia to tell our respective peoples the sort of Federation we think is best for every possible purpose. We talk about not daring to go back to our colonies, but are we going to dare to go back to our respective colonies and tell them that Federation is to be wrecked upon a mere choice of words?

Several HON. MEMBERS:
A choice of words?
Mr. MCMILLAN:
Yes; a mere chance choice of words concerning which some of the best authorities in this House, from their positions as occupants in the Chairs of other Houses, tell us there is no difference whatever. Are we going to wreck Federation on this? We are making a Constitution for all time, and we ought to make a Constitution, therefore, that will not look foolish in the time to come.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
Surely it will be no excuse for us if we introduce a foolish and ignominious proposal as a substitute for the ordinary course taken under ordinary British legislation. If we introduce that into an indissoluble union it will be no excuse for us to tell the people in time to come that there was an ignorant feeling throughout the different communities that we had to satisfy. I want to know what the object of giving the veto to another House is, because it seems to me that if finance is, after all, the foundation stone of government, those who desire to carry their views like some gentlemen opposite must simply be in favor of one House of Legislature. Now, we have heard a great deal about giving equal representation in the Senate. But what is the good of giving equal representation in the Senate if you rob it of all its dignity and power? To return to my argument, what is the object of another Chamber? Is it not to revise, to reconsider, and to advise? Now, how can you advise if you have not got the power to amend? For I throw away as idle, puerile, and childish the idea that this matter of suggestion is any different from amendment, except in this, that you practically give the Chamber to whom you send the suggestions the opportunity of treating them with absolute contempt. I must honestly confess that I do not know what course I would take if I were now addressing the final sitting of this Convention. I think when that final sitting takes place everything must give way to compromise, and I would not stand for one moment upon any mere scientific rule or any constitutional formula. But the time has not come yet; and it seems to me that, no matter what may be the views even of the people of New South Wales, I am sent here for the purpose of framing a Constitution which will stand the test of time. Therefore I feel, and I have often had to feel, that I stand out in my views from an apparent majority. I do not feel that I can compromise my own feelings and my own judgment for an idea with regard to the current opinion of the people of my country which, when the matter is thoroughly explained to them, may be completely altered I take that responsibility. It is a very grave responsibility, and is rendered all the graver because I do not pretend to be an authority on constitutional law and procedure. At the same time I have to bring to bear whatever common sense I have got, together with my experience of Parliamentary law and practice. I do not hold with those who say that if you give these powers to this House they will be exercised unworthily. I hold that if you grant them those powers you will get a better class of men in the Senate than if you withhold them. I always look to men to do things, and not to institutions. believe that you will get more judgment, more discretion, more wisdom, more patriotism under a system which gives practically co-ordinate power. I deny that by doing this you do not give financial supremacy to the House of Representatives, where, I hold, you have great power, because you have given them the initiation of financial legislation, which demands there the presence of all the principal executive officers of the State. Where you have all the machinery of Government, and where it depends upon a majority of that House as to what party shall rule, and where you have got all the initiation of financial legislation there must be the real power. That being acknowledged, why refuse to give those who occupy the dual position, from my point of view, in a second Chamber and who are the representatives of State interests why forbid to give them the right in a proper, dignified, and legal way to tell you that you have gone too far, and how far you can go. According to the other proposal they can only act in a dog-in-the-manger way, and say:

You have gone too far. You in the Lower Chamber want to know how far you can go, and yet you will not give us an opportunity of telling you.

At this stage of the proceedings we had better argue upon the merits of the case in regard to what our respective people under different conditions might have. There can be no analogy drawn between the position of the House of Commons in its relation to an hereditary Chamber or to the position of one of these colonies in its relation to a nominee Chamber. In fact, none of the relations which exist in the British Empire are at all analogous to the position we intend to take up. It is reasonable for us to go to our people and tell them that, under Federation and not unification, certain principles must be allowed, and that we have introduced into the Lower House by the principle of the initiation of financial legislation, all the main elements of the sovereignty of that House, which sovereignty would be sufficient for all practical purposes.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I feel myself at a great loss in replying to the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, because, though like him, I put forward no claim to any special qualifications for dealing with questions of constitutional law, yet, with all respect, I am bound to say that as far as the proposal contained in the Bill of 1891 is concerned, which gave the Senate the power to make suggestions to the House of Representatives, he appears to me to have entirely misunderstood it. He has just told us that the power of amendment by the Senate would enable it to indicate to its brother Chamber the particulars wherein it differed from it and how far it should go. Then he proceeded to make a contrast between that procedure and the other of suggestions by the Senate in which he stated that this could not be accomplished by the latter method.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I was not at that time contrasting those two things. I was only contrasting the Veto without amendment.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Well, if he puts it in that way surely the power proposed in the Bill of 1891 for making suggestions is a power which gives the Senate identically the same opportunities of indicating where it considers the other Chamber has gone too far and how much it has gone too far, precisely in the same way as amendments would. Then compare his strong condemnation of suggestions with his assertion that he sees little or no difference between the methods of procedure. I take it that his arguments, as I understand them, answer one another. When he says that mere suggestions give an opportunity to the House of Representatives to treat the Senate with contempt, I say that exactly the same opportunity is presented when amendments are sent down from one Chamber to the other. If the House of Representatives is inclined to treat a proposal of the Senate with contempt, it will not be deterred by the fact that it is called an amendment in one case or a suggestion in the other. Then, again, the hon. member maintains that if the power of suggestion be the only power conceded to the Senate in these matters, its dignity will be destroyed, and Mr. Holder, too, has said that the hands of the Senate are to be tied behind its back if it be limited to suggestions; and, again I ask, how do they reconcile the two statements with the declaration that there is no real difference between the powers to amend and to suggest? I for one disagree with those who regard this issue as a mere question of procedure. I think the difference between the two procedures is real and vital I do not think the feeling of the people of Australia, which I believe to be wholly averse to the power of amendment in detail being conferred upon the Senate, arises from a misunderstanding of the question. I do not think it arises from a feeling which has been fostered by their own bitter experience of Second Chambers, but I think it arises from a clear conception that this proposal to permit amendments in Tax Bills not only, as Mr. O'Connor has lucidly put it, gives opportunities for disastrous deadlocks, but chiefly because it will lead to a division of political responsibility in connection with a class of questions upon which responsibility should not be divided. If you permit the Appropriation Bill with its multifarious details based upon its pages of estimates to pass into the hands of another Chamber, and, after having been criticised, and if necessary altered in the First Chamber, to be again altered and revised in another Chamber, you render the responsibility of the Representative Chamber a pretence.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I did not say anything about revising.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I have before me a succession of notes taken as speakers have addressed the Convention, but have not taken the precaution to put the names against them. The point I am coming to is one which a number of speakers have taken. They have asked if we can give any reason, other than the excellent reasons offered by the preceding speakers, why it is advisable that the power of amendment in this particular class of measures should be denied to a Chamber as important, powerful, and as entitled to respect as the Senate will, must, and ought to be?

An HON. MEMBER:
When you also grant the power to reject?

Mr. DEAKIN:
When you also grant the power of rejection. I, for one, grant freely the power of rejection, and admit the right and title of the Senate to exercise that power of rejection on certain specific occasions under certain specific circumstances. Under this Constitution that right is given without qualification; and the certain special circumstances and certain special occasions are left to the Senate themselves to determine. This power of veto may be exercised absolutely. I am not now disputing their right to exercise that power, but I am challenging the right of amendment of Tax Bills, because on this particular question it must imply a division of responsibility on matters which I think should be deprecated. Tax Bills and Appropriation Bills must go together, as the one implies the other. The illustration chosen by Sir John Forrest with regard to a Tariff Bill suits my purpose equally well. I ask the representatives of the less populous States, and in fact all the representatives, whether they consider it to be possible to administer a responsible government such as must be formed under this measure, when what may be the Bill of the Session, the Bill of the year, or perhaps it may be the greatest Bill of a series of years. A Tariff Bill is always introduced in obedience to the popular mandate based upon a certain fiscal policy, in it certain adjustments with regard to the duties on one article and the duties on another have been made, and consideration has been given to the conflicting interests of different industries when an article is the raw material of one and the manufactured product of another. When all this has been taken into consideration, perhaps after months of labor, and the Bill has been passed-I would ask the representatives of the less populous States if they have realised what it means if such a measure has again to be subjected to the same minute and detailed treatment in another Chamber, elected not on the same basis, not at the same time and not with the same mandate, so far as one half at least or it may be as far as the whole Chamber is concerned? Is the tariff, which after months of labor has been shaped to a form which bears some relation to the popular mandate, to be reshaped and recast in the Senate for months more and then returned to the First Chamber with amendments for their consideration with some of the duties granted, some refused, others partly granted, and others partly refused? How often is it to pass from one Chamber to another-and remember, this is a Money Bill, a Bill which cannot wait? Where is the work to end? What sort of tariff do you think you would have, and what relation would it bear to the mandate of the people of this country? I ask you to look at it as a matter of principle as to how far you would be justified in having on matters of this kind the mandate of the people defeated by a minority Chamber? There are hon. members who declare that, as far as the Appropriation Bill is concerned, they would be no party to allow the Senate to amend; but the same argument applies with equal force to a Tariff Bill.

Mr. WISE:
Pardon me for interrupting you, but will there not be just the same debate, just the same amount of work, the second time if the Senate has the power to make suggestions? They will not make suggestions without consideration.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The Senate then will occupy a different position: I take it that under this form of government there must inevitably be by the process of events a division of labor, so that the Legislature may get the best results from its labor. A Senate limited to suggestions, with any regard to its own dignity, will realise that its attitude towards a Tariff Bill should be very different to that taken by the House of Representatives. Instead of criticising every item and every figure, and weighing the question as to whether a duty should be 10 or 121/2 per cent., I take it that the Senate would look broadly through the tariff. Their first question would be: Is this a tariff in accordance with the mandate of the people? If they in their wisdom considered that the House of Representatives had departed from the mandate of the people, and had given a protective tariff instead of one for freetrade, or a high protective tariff instead of a low one, they would have the power to reject the whole measure. After this I I should take it that their next duty would be to glance through the measure for any glaring inequalities that might have crept in through lack of knowledge, or factious opposition, or oversights, and that they would send it back to the House of Representatives with a message pointing out such glaring inconsistencies. They would be either cured, or amended, or persisted in, according to the will of the House of Representatives, who would then take the whole of the responsibility for the fiscal system. If, however, the Senate made amendments, there would have to begin a process of compromise and balancing between Chamber and Chamber, the final effect of which would be that the practical responsibility for the tariff as a tariff could not be placed on either House in particular. It would be divided between the two Chambers, one of which is elected for six years, and retires half at a time. Accordingly the responsibility would never be sheeted home its it ought to be. The Senate could not, for a long time and the representatives probably would not, be effectively brought to account for their action. It would be, in a sense, the tariff of neither and of no one in particular. This is where the broad distinction arises. Were the responsibility with the House of Representatives the public could then lay its finger on the records of the House where the disputable points arose, and could drive home responsibility where it ought to rest. Every member of the House of Representatives has to retire every three years, and may at any moment be made answerable by dissolution for the tariff to the people. You can thus place on the shoulders of the House of Representatives the credit or discredit and the sole responsibility for the system of taxation.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There is power to insist on an amendment, but not on a suggestion.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The Senate can lay aside any Bill, and, although it cannot be brought to book, because it is not liable to dissolution at the time, if it take a step contrary to the public will, yet the other Chamber, if it be sent to the country, returns with a specific instruction as to this or any similar issue.
With such a clear direction before it the Senate would, in all probability, bow, with judgment and discrimination, to the verdict of the people on the question in dispute, not because it was over-awed, but because it would recognise that upon those questions the taxpayers were entitled to have their will. I differ from Mr. Wise when he says that these money questions between the Houses are drifting into desuetude, and are no longer matters of popular concern. Money questions and questions of taxation will of all others ever be of supreme interest to all the people of the colonies; with many they are almost the only interest. Following that argument up, if there is a matter upon which the people of the smaller colonies should be well content to trust their own fortunes in common with the fortunes of the greater communities, it should be upon questions of taxation and Money Bills generally. It has been stated by Sir John Forrest, Mr. Holder, and others that the smaller colonies will pay the same per head of taxation.
Well, that is a guarantee to the less populous States that the representatives of the greatest number will never assent to any proposal that would be unjust to the taxpayers, for as taxpayers the interests of the whole people will be identical,

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Some colonies will in reality pay more per head.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I can imagine a condition of things in which the duty on spirits would yield more in one colony than another. Broadly speaking, however, there would be the same burden of taxation everywhere, and surely the proposal that the majority of the people, who find the bulk of the funds, should be able to take the absolute responsibility of shaping the details of taxation, always with the reserve power of the right of rejection of the Bill by the Senate, commends itself as being wise and just. It Seems to me, with all respect, that the distinction between suggestion and amendment in these matters is a broad distinction, and one which requires to be kept well in view. Yet, if the less populous States accept suggestion instead of amendment on Tax Bills if it be a concession, it is one that is already balanced by a considerable diminution of the authorities and powers which under the Bill of 1891 were proposed to be given to the more popular House. I am afraid my remarks are very rambling, but I wish to say a word or two here as to Mr. Holder's contention that because some of the less populous states had "conceded" the right of representation in proportion to population in the First Chamber, something should be conceded to them as to the Senate. This is the first time I have heard that the granting of representation on a population basis is a concession. It is a right; any other basis implies a concession, but not this. I should say that none of the States represented were under any obligation to anyone, because, as is natural, and I may say universal, the representation is on a population basis. The concession lies in the creation of a Second Chamber based upon other than population basis. That is an undeniable concession; and yet we are now asked to make the further concession that, instead of the majority of the nation ruling its taxation, the minority of the nation should decide as to its burdens.

Mr. HOLDER:
The representation of the States as entities is necessary to true Federation.

Mr. DEAKIN:
There I agree, but what is the sacrifice which the majority is making? Here is the majority of the whole nation, which in all other affairs is accustomed to rule absolutely, without any obstacle except those provisions of check and balance which ensure deliberation. Take up this Bill, read its list of thirty-five or thirty-six powers proposed to be given to the Federal Government, and remember that upon everyone of those provisions the majority parts with its control by giving the right of an absolute veto to the House which may, in its majority, represent a small minority of the people.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is a mistaken principle of rule.

Mr. DEAKIN:
That I am not concerned with at present. Whether for well or ill, equal representation has been conceded, and with it the power of the minority to rule for an indefinite time. Hon. members representing the less populous States will recall the fact that this Constitution makes no provision for the cure of deadlocks by the rule of the majority, it leaves the minority in absolute command for all time. When I heard an hon. member-and I apologise to the Hon. Sir John Forrest for an improperly-phased interjection while he was speaking—when I heard an hon. gentleman of his experience, who is the leader of a Parliament and the Premier of a colony, protesting that if the Senate were to be refused the right of amendment it would be deprived of all power and rendered a body not worthy of notice—when, I say, I heard that reckless remark I was led into making the interjection. The power that is being entrusted to the Senate is an enormous power, and the majority have no other security than the good judgment and conscience of the minority. It is all very well to say that the people will elect both Houses, but in one case they will elect a Chamber which will deal with their interests as they have been dealt with always, that is according to the will of the majority. In the other Chamber they are now handing over this long list of powers, one and all of them, for an indefinite time to the will of a minority. If this Senate strain its power to the utmost it can of course render government impossible, and all arguments against us are based upon imaginary extraordinary instances in which two populous States unite to oppress their fellows, a contingency which will never, in my opinion, occur. Since all their arguments are based upon the assumption that one Chamber and the millions of constituents behind its majority will place in the Senate—a body of dignity and power and authority, would not desire to be placed in such a position—nor would it be necessary that it should be so placed under this Constitution. It should tend rather to deal with measures upon broad principles, in accordance with broad lines of policy. Even in regard to this long list of thirty-five classes of Bills in connection with which the Senate has the same power and authority to make amendments as the House of Representatives—that is, it can amend nine-tenths of the measures that go before it a Senate, jealous of its dignity, conscious of its high office, and sure of its hold on the people, would not seek to make minor amendments in them. The toil and burden of the day in regard to details and to administration must always rest upon the House of Representatives. If, as Sir John Downer says—and I cordially agree with him—we are now simply making a mask and form of government into which life has yet to be breathed, and which the great force of national will will hereafter shape into its own form and expression, how is it we find so eloquent an advocate of Federation prepared to risk all for the sake of securing the right to amend Bills rarely introduced and often of minor importance, in regard to which justice is guaranteed not only by the absolute veto of the Senate, but also by the fact that every man in the Commonwealth must contribute his quota to every tax, in accordance with the Constitution? The forces of national life are not to be confined by artificial forms. The power of ideas is the true power behind the people and behind the throne. How is it that my friend doubts the future of those unseen potencies to which he alluded? Why should he ask us to depart from those wellgrounded principles of Constitutional Government with which he is familiar. Why is an analogy not to be drawn between the working relations of the Legislative Councils and the Houses of Assembly in the States and the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth, when so many points of resemblance must exist between them in these respects. No matter how different in their origin and power, the method of working responsible government in the two Chambers must present many points of analogy. Surely the hon. gentleman is putting behind him the experience of a lifetime, when he says that with two co-ordinate Chambers responsible government as we know it can be carried on. It may be wrecked unless it confesses the authority of a House, one half of which may be five years and the other half two years old, while endeavoring to give effect to a mandate of the electors returning an overwhelming majority to their own Chamber. It appears to me that, in this Constitution, the Government will be responsible, in one sense of the term, to both Chambers. Even in a colony with a Government solely responsible to one House, that Government cannot disregard the treatment of its measures in another Chamber. If it fails to legislate it is not the Second Chamber, but the Government of the day, whom the people hold responsible. If proper means of taxation are not provided, it is not the Second Chamber but the Government whom the people hold responsible. They are placed in a position of immediate relation to the electors which makes their position entirely different to that to which Sir John Forrest referred by interjection- that of the United States, where the Government sits outside Congress, where there is co-ordinate power in the treatment of Money Bills, and where the Government is not answerable for their fate or character. The Government will be held responsible here, and therefore in this Constitution you will have a certain responsibility of the Executive to both Chambers. Direct and immediate responsibility to the one Chamber, which makes it and ends its existence; indirect, but none the less actual, to the other Chamber, which, with its permanent tenure and staying power, is able by a merely negative attitude to mould or defeat the policy to which it objects. This Senate within the four corners of this Constitution will take rank even with the Senate of America in the future, even if this power of suggestion is granted and the power to amend Money Bills withdrawn. It will stand beside the Senate of the United States of America as the next most powerful Second Chamber in the civilized world. With its power to attract to it the intellect, character, and experience of the nation, it will be able to press on any House of Representatives, however recalcitrant, a due and proper consideration of its will. Disputes as to States rights or interests are the least likely to occur. I have read over again and again the long list of powers with which this Commonwealth is to be invested; and on each one of those, thirty-five in the fiftieth clause and four in the next, have asked myself in how many are State interests likely to be involved, and how often? Members who read them will see that scarcely one of the provisions, neither those with regard to tariff or navigation and shipping, or quarantine, or currency and coinage and legal tender, are likely to be at all affected by the question whether an elector resides in a large or a small State. The United States of America were recently shaken to their very foundation by a tremendous struggle for the presidential chair-a contest to which a determination as to coinage, currency, and legal tender gave the cue. It may be said that was a question in which State rights or State interests were affected, because the silver producing part of the States was interested in one kind of coinage and the commercial east in the other. But the interests there affected were not those of States, but of the whole Union, which was all practically equally affected by the determination arrived at. It might be that on one determination the silver kings would personally realise large fortunes, or that on the other the commerce and influence of New York would be rendered more secure; but, broadly speaking, even that great difference disappeared, and the question was one that came home to every individual taxpayer, whether a citizen of Missouri, or Arkansas, of New York, or California. His State was indifferent to him when his interest, his fortune, his labor were at stake. The questions dividing the Commonwealth are capable of being settled, and certain to be settled on other grounds than those of State interests. And yet the only plea that even Mr. Holder can urge for giving the House of the minority an indefinitely large power to rule and control the House of majority is for the protection of these State interests which will form the most insignificant feature in the business of the future Commonwealth. The one recommendation of the Senate to many of its present advocates is that it is a Chamber in which the majority will not generally rule. was going to call attention in reply to Sir John Forrest that this measure as now presented to us has been re-shaped since 1891, greatly to the advantage of the smaller States. For the first time a fixed proportion between the membership of the House of Representatives and of the Senate has been introduced-a proportion not known in the United States, in Switzerland, or elsewhere. It is a new guarantee that the Senate is not to be overshadowed by the mere bulk and number of the House of Representatives. In addition, it has been agreed that the Senate shall derive its authority direct from the whole people. That is no concession by or to the less populous States. It is claimed by the people. When hon. members speak so lightly of returning to our constituents, and inviting them to concede the power to amend Money Bills, I may remind them that the only means by which the electors in Victoria have been induced to accept the proposed compromise of 1891, with regard to suggestions as to Money Bills, was because it was coupled in each instance with the statement that the Senate was to be, by common consent, elected on the basis of the popular franchise in the whole of the States.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

How was their mandate delivered?

Mr. DEAKIN:

They delivered their mandate at my meetings, where they asked to be reassured as to what was the proposed basis of the Senate, and what were its powers in regard to Money Bills. I had the privilege, and some thousands had the infliction, of hearing me during the campaign, and one and all fastened upon the questions of the money powers of the Senate and its basis in preference to any other. I could have addressed many audiences on the Senate alone, and hardly have been questioned about another matter in connection with Federation, so keen was their sense of the fact that if they let this power of control of taxation and expenditure slip out of their hands, although it might not go into the hands of a class, it would go into the hands of a minority, and out of the hands and control of the majority. By the Bill of 1891 the power of the House of Representatives has already been cabined, cribbed, and confined. It has been deprived of the inalienable power to tack, which even the House of Commons has not hesitated to use on some occasions. It has been deprived of the power to conjoin its taxes, which every colonial Assembly up till now has been able to exercise. It is to be strictly limited as to the contents of its Appropriation Bill, as no Appropriation Bill has ever been limited in these colonies, while it gives that power of suggestion to the Senate which is only possessed in South Australia, though the power to amend is possessed in Tasmania. In answer to my friend Mr. Holder, who put it that a concession has been made today, which I do not regard as a concession-the replacing of Loan Bills among the measures requiring to be originated in the House of Representatives - and asked what concession was proposed to be made in return, I would say that, though I do not consider any concession has been made, yet I would be prepared individually to make a concession on the same lines. I would give what I would not be prepared to give to any local Upper House, the power of amending by reducing the items of any Loan Bill in accordance with the suggestion of Mr. Wise. So that if there was any concession in regard to the origination of Loan Bills it may be fairly taken as balanced by this other concession on our side, the power of striking out any items to which the Senate objected in the loan schedule. But the tariff cannot be dealt with by the Senate except upon broad lines. In regard to these lines, if the Senate's suggestions are accepted, well and good, and if not the Bill if passed would leave on the shoulders of the representatives the responsibility of having framed a tariff which was unsatisfactory. The Senate would be studying its own dignity by taking its firm stand not on detail but upon the grounds of principle and public policy. The remarks which fell to-day from the Premiers of the three colonies are surely worthy of most careful attention, delivered as they were without the slightest attempt to lend them any adventitious aid from arguments which might readily have been employed. We had the Premier of New South Wales, the leading colony of the group; the Premier of South Australia, another of the leading colonies of the group - one of those intermediate between the smallest and the largest population; and the Premier of Victoria, which colony at present ranks second in population - three gentlemen who have proved their devotion to the cause of Federation in this Convention and out of it, and to whom this Convention owes its birth,

These hon. members have simply stated a fact which was impressed upon us in 1891 no less emphatically, no less clearly, by the three gentlemen who then occupied self-same positions - Sir Henry Parkes, Premier of New South Wales; Mr. Playford, Premier of South Australia; and Mr. Munro, Premier of Victoria. These three gentlemen in 1891 repeated what the present Premiers have reiterated now, that this question of the money powers was a matter of substance and not of form. They then said if this power were pushed beyond the power of suggestion they would not answer for its reception by their people, except that the reception would be adverse. Surely it is striking that after a lapse of six or seven years the three Premiers of the same three great colonies have repeated that warning. I do not quote it as one to which the representatives of other States should bow their judgment or reason, but I submit this to them as a suggestive fact, which all practical men will take into account, and endeavor to surmount if possible. It is not, as the hon. member Mr. Holder supposed, merely a question as to whether the representatives of Victoria or the representatives of New South Wales will or will not endeavor to persuade their constituents to adopt this power of amendment by the Senate. None of them can do that, except so far as the principles upon which they were elected will permit. As to my hon. and revered friend on the other side of the House, who once more chided Tasmania’s precocious offspring, Victoria, for having ventured to set up house for itself and prospered, and who then with unparental feeling seemed to rejoice in th

Mr. PEACOCK:
Is that the whole truth?

Mr. DEAKIN:
Between us there is peace, and I wish that the same peace existed between us and our friends from Western Australia. My friend Sir John Forrest occupies many positions of advantage which are denied to the rest of us, and which the Premiers of the other colonies covet. He is a Minister without an opposition, a Minister to whom a general election is a passing incident, who showers benefits on a country which gratefully and freely acknowledges them. The hon. member objects to what was conceded in 1891 being called a compromise. As a member of the Constitutional Committee himself, he knows that it was emphatically a compromise which drew over to its support a large body of men who previously had been opposed to limiting the money powers of the Senate. It was no compromise for Sir John Forrest, for as I know that gentleman here, and elsewhere, I think compromise is not a word which frequently finds favor in his eyes. He is in a position of vantage over many of us here, because he does not move or speak under the same conditions. If this Constitution does not suit him he can put it in a pigeonhole in his office, and never look at it again. He has not adopted the machinery to which we are subject, which obliges us to submit the outcome of this Convention to the electors, and after the vote of the people has been taken to pass it through both Chambers in each of the colonies. As I understand it, his Bill is such that it not only relieved him of the necessity of facing an election, as we had to do, but that it also leaves him perfectly free as to whether or not he submits the measure we produce to his electors. Is it not so?

Sir JOHN FORREST:
We must submit to Parliament, but we need not send it to the people unless Parliament likes.

Mr. DEAKIN:
We are not in that position. The hon. member will recollect that he and I were across the seas about ten years ago, where the Premiers of the present day are about to betake themselves, and that we had an opportunity of seeing one of the most striking exhibitions of mimicry and deeds of daring by Buffalo Bill in his Wild West show. We were delighted with the performances, and yet no harm was done and no risk run. Sir John Forrest and his colleagues appear to me to be in the same position—he is the hero of this arena, he is engaging in desperate deeds of daring, but the risks are all on our side, whilst there are none on his. Sir John Forrest has already indicated to us that he saw little to be gained at present for Western Australia by her joining this union. He was not under any immediate compulsion to come here, but, as he says, he has been magnanimous enough to come and assist us in shaping this Constitution, which he is under no obligation to submit to his people. He may not join the union, or he may come under it in three, four, five, or six years hence, whenever he pleases.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

That will be a matter for the Parliament.

Mr. DEAKIN:

That is the difference between us. We are compelled to make the best Constitution we can now and to send it at once to the people; and if we are compelled to send a Constitution to the people which we know will be rejected we shall be throwing back Federation ten or fifteen years. Sir John Forrest runs no risk. He will only accept the Constitution which pleases him, when he pleases, and how he pleases, and he is placed in no peril. I have done nothing unfair in calling attention to the fact, that he is in a position of vantage over us, and we are entitled to ask for some slight concession at his hands. He is seeking to bind us while not bound himself. I would like Sir John Forrest who has used the words compromise" and "conciliation" so often to set us a good example by not, at the present time, pressing this matter to a decision, because it may check and chill the enthusiasm of tens of thousands of people in these great colonies. I shall say nothing as to the enthusiasm for union of the people of Victoria, either in the past or at present. Their enthusiasm is governed by the attitude of the other colonies, by the consideration of their own circumstances, of the circumstances surrounding them, and the kind of Federation offered. Certainly, if this clause remains in the Bill, it is certain, whatever the enthusiasm in Victoria may be to-day, that when tomorrow's telegraphic messages are circulated amongst its people - even the enthusiastic federationists there, those who have sacrificed most, and are prepared to sacrifice more for this high cause, will be profoundly discouraged and disappointed should this amendment be defeated.

Mr. SYMON:

I feel in the few observations which I propose to offer to the Committee as though I were addressing hon. members with a kind of sword of Damocles suspended over my head. After listening to the excellent, vigorous, and picturesque speech of Mr. Deakin, in which he referred to the effect a telegram to Victoria, stating that this clause had been agreed to, would have in that colony, one ought naturally to feel appalled. But I do not think he should despair of the people of Victoria; they are capable of enlightenment. I feel quite sure that the people of Victoria; however they may be disposed as to the advantage or otherwise of this clause, will be susceptible to the eloquence of Mr. Deakin, who I am confident will be able to persuade them to a just conclusion. I do not wish to enter into the controversy between Mr. Deakin and Sir John Forrest. as I will leave them to settle their little difference between themselves. I had no special opportunity of being acquainted with that eminent American, Buffalo Bill, but I have heard of another distinguished American, known as Artemus Ward, and some of the representatives of the other colonies remind me of the enthusiasm of Artemus as a patriot. He declared that he was perfectly ready on the altar of patriotism to sacrifice all his relations, beginning with his mother-in-law.

Mr. ISAACS:

All his wife's relations.

Mr. SYMON:

His wife's, was it? Then that makes it much stronger. Some members of the other colonies, I say, seem to emulate Artemus Ward, and are prepared to sacrifice the smaller colonies on their own little altar of Federation, because when we hear these intimations-I will not call them threats, because I would not like to use a word of that description—as to what is likely to follow the carrying of this clause, it seems to me that the interests of the smaller colonies are to be measured not by what is just and right in the consciences of members who are here to frame a Constitution, but what may be considered so by-I will not say ignorant—but uninstructed sections of the community. I would say with all deference that the Enabling Bill provides for the difficulties which have arisen. This is a kind of preliminary meeting. We are assembled to reason with each other, and to arrive at what we consider in our minds, in our judgments, and in our consciences is right. That is what I feel I am here for. I do not say that I am careless of the opinion of the electors who sent me here, but, on the contrary, I feel that I should be betraying their trust if I did not exercise my independent judgment. I am prepared to meet my electors and reason with them on any point, even in favor of the larger colonies, before I am willing to abandon the position which I think is right. I have said, and in that respect I have differed from you, Sir, and from some other of my colleagues, that I am in favor of responsible government. I want responsible government, but am not at all sure whether a great number of the people of this country would not prefer to take the view you have delivered with so much effect in this hall. I am not prepared to say whether the people would not prefer the restraints a different system would give them. The position I take up with regard to responsible government, and which I hope this Convention will give effect to, is my own view, and I shall hold it until I see the majority of the people of this country are against it. That is the view which I respectfully and humbly commend to my colleagues on this Convention with regard to this question of Money Bills. Now it was not the least powerful part of the very eloquent and forcible speech of my hon. friend, Mr. Deakin, when he said that the Senate would be a body of dignity and power, that in all probability they would not deal with small things, and that they would not stoop to minor amendments and petty alterations. Now, it does seem to me that that argument to which I entirely assent cuts the ground absolutely from under the feet of those who are resisting this extended power of dealing with Money Bills being given to the Senate. In the Senate you are constituting a body of great dignity, which will not stoop to minor amendments, but you are doing more than that. You are constituting a body of eminent men who will not readily or wantonly put difficulties in the way of the government of the country, and therefore I appeal to my honorable friend on the basis of his own argument. If your Senate is a body as you described it, and as we believe it will be, pervaded with a high patriotism, then you have nothing to fear by giving it this power of amendment. My honorable friend said also, appealing to us, that there will be good judgment and conscience in the House of Representatives. We all assent to that. I believe in the good sense of the people of the colonies as they will be represented there, and I have no fear for the difficulties of responsible government. Although I belong to a small colony that will be overshadowed in its representation in the Assembly, if you ask us to trust to the good judgment and conscience of the House of Representatives, then I say we may equally ask you to trust to the good judgment and conscience of the Senate, who

by the alterations made in this Bill are elected by the same constituency, and on the same suffrage as the House of Representatives. If it is a question of give and take, let us apply the argument both ways and all round. I do not ask you to adopt it in favor of the view that I and others represent any more than I ask you to reject it upon Mr. Deakin's view. I say: let us put it both ways and trust to the patriotism of the Senate, and I for myself trust to their good judgment and conscience to conduct the affairs with which they are entrusted honestly and fairly for the people of this union. I have been curious, as have other members, to know what concession we were to have in place of what we asked. My hon. friend says the concession is—and he grants it with the utmost freedom—that we are to have the power of rejection. I say to that, "Thank you for nothing. We have that already. That is inherent in us."

Mr. DEAKIN:

I did not put it as a concession. I was only replying to an interjection.

Mr. SYMON:

It struck me at the moment that this was bringing us under the guise of a gift something which was our own property. If this power of rejection is what we already possess, what control has the Senate got—what power? Some hon. members are willing that we should be satisfied with what appears in the Bill of 1891 as a compromise, but some of us here, who were not there, do not know if at the 1891 Convention it was treated as a compromise or not. There seems to be a difference of opinion on that. I decline to recognise any compromise. What is essential for the protection of the smaller States? What is essential to maintain the high power and dignity of the Senate? If you say the power of amendment is giving an additional control, you reduce them to the level of the existing Upper Houses, although you insist upon them being elected by the same body of the people. That is unfair. It has been said that the power of suggestion is identically the same thing. If it is identically the same thing why not have it in the form we like it best? At any rate it would be a graceful thing to concede that to us. They are identical in result.

Mr. HIGGINS:

In what way?

Mr. SYMON:

I shall show you in one moment. One of them wears the aspect of a favor; the other wears the aspect, upon which we insist, of a right. That is the difference between them in our eyes. We want no concessions. We want the Senate to be in a position to amend without going under the cover of a roundabout method, cap in hand, to bow humbly and ask something or other as a favor. Even asking it as a favor it comes to identically the same thing. I hold in my hand a very able paper, to which I may perhaps be permitted to refer. It is compiled by our Chairman of Committees, dealing with the relative powers of the two Houses in this colony in relation to Money Bills. Here, as we all know, there is the power of suggestion, mark you, in a House not at all elected upon the broad principle of the Senate, but on a property qualification. In the event of the suggestions of the Upper House not being agreed to by the House of Assembly the Bills can be returned by the House of Assembly for reconsideration, and by the Upper House in turn to the House of Assembly, and if the suggestions are not assented to by the House of Assembly the only result is that the Council can assent to or reject the Bill. That is precisely what happens under the system of amendment.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Except that another place would take the responsibility of rejection.

Mr. SYMON:
If it is up to the Senate, it will be in the power of the Senate to say, "Well, as you do not agree to our amendment we will reject the Bill." But the same result would follow in the case of suggestion as in the case of amendment. The only difference is as to the form in which it should be adopted, and if there is to be a concession, or if there is to be an attempt made to lend dignity and importance to this Senate which we are about to create under the Constitution, it had better be done by giving a straightout power of amendment instead of inviting them to amend in a roundabout way. One word more as to the power of amendment. My hon. friend Mr. Deakin pointed out the inconveniences which might result in the case of a Tariff Bill. I admit those inconveniences, but they exist in the case of any other Bill as well. A Tariff Bill is the best that can be selected to show the maximum of inconvenience.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It was selected for me.

Mr. SYMON:
It is a good selection, but exactly the same difficulties, though less in degree, will happen in every Bill. You may have the same wrangling, the same trouble, and the same amendments upon any Bill which comes before the Upper House, and if you have an Upper House desirous of embarrassing the Executive Government they have ample opportunities to do that on any Bill submitted to them. Does that apply to the Tariff Bill under the existing system of suggestion? Would the same difficulty arise? Undoubtedly it would. It has actually happened in this colony. When the subject was under discussion in 1891 it was pointed out that this system of suggestion would not be effective in regard to a Tariff Bill. "Oh, no," said Sir John Bray, supported by the Hon. Thomas Playford, then Premier of South Australia; "nothing of the kind." Why, the Upper House, it was said, have made suggestions upon Tariff Bills-twenty-five of them in one Bill-and not only in large matters, but in small matters, such as the amount of duty on boots and shoes. The suggestion was not as to the whole line of goods of that description, but as to boots and shoes No. 6 and upwards. That is such articles as boots at 3s. per dozen, glass bottles at certain rates, bags, sacks, and so on. I am putting this to my honorable friend Mr. Deakin in view of the shadow that-

Mr. DEAKIN:
I remembered all that.

Mr. SYMON:
I am sure you did. You did not mention it, but that does not matter.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It applies all in favor of my argument.

Mr. SYMON:
All I am showing is that you are fighting a shadow. You are seeking to sacrifice what we think are our rights, and upon which we lay stress, and upon which, to use the words of Mr. McMillan, you say there is only the difference between tweedledee and tweedledum.

Mr. BARTON:
Do you agree with Mr. McMillan?

Mr. SYMON:
I do not agree with his expression, nor was that what he meant; he was simply summarising the arguments to which he was addressing himself. My view is this: rightly or wrongly the people of this colony—we hope that, however this is carried, we shall do our best to endeavor to remove the impression from their minds—and the people of the other smaller colonies have undoubtedly a fear of entering this Federation in view of what the larger colonies may do.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Look at your Premier.

Mr. SYMON:
Our Premier is entitled to express his views. I agree with Mr. Holder, that there is a fear existing in the minds of many in this country that we are going to be harnessed to the car of the larger colonies, that that time may be long in arriving when we shall be equal in population, and when we shall be able to meet them on an equal footing in the House of Representatives. At present we are not. We would have to meet you with seventeen members to forty-nine, I am willing to meet you in that way. I believe in your fairness and judgment, but at the same time I agree with the framers of the American Constitution as to original sin. We do not ask under color of a favor what we think we should have as a right. Sir George Turner says you are inclined to treat the smaller colonies with kindness. It is not kindness we want, but justice.

Mr. REID:
If we add a provision that the States with the smaller populations should have spent within their boundaries what they actually contribute would that ease your mind?

Mr. SYMON:
No; it would not.

Mr. DEAKIN:
They want some of your money, too.

Mr. SYMON:
There is another fallacy as to the basis of the control of the Senate being measured by the aggregate contribution of the different colonies to the taxation. That is an entire mistake.

Mr. REID:
It has a lot to do with it.

Mr. SYMON:
That is looking at the matter as though the Upper House is the principal House which now exists. That is not so. The Senate, if we deal with it on what we call federal lines, will not be in the same position as the Upper Houses as they now exist. It is not in the same position in its relation to the House of Representatives as the House of Lords is in relations to the Commons. There will be in the Federal Parliament a representation of the whole people of Australia. That representation is given in two ways by the representation of individuals in the House of Representatives and by the representation of individuals also in the Senate, but on a different basis without regard to the number of representatives, simply owing to the federal principle that you must protect the State. But the men in the Senate will equally represent the aggregate taxpayers of the community, as they do in the Lower House. I confess I can see no difference between the two. But to refer to the matter of the tariff. If you are willing to give us what is in the Bill of 1891, then the tariff argument is deprived of all force in regard to the amendment we seek—the power of amendment—because exactly the same results have followed in regard to suggestion in this colony where the method of suggestion prevails, and they will follow, according to my hon. friend's argument, from the method of amendment that we wish to prevail of amendment in the Senate of the new Federation. If you take this power away, what power do you give to the Senate that is not possessed by an ordinary Upper House? I have been unable to discover anything. How are you to maintain that dignity and that attractiveness which is to invite into it the most eminent men in all the colonies? I have been unable to discover any power which will raise this Senate to the level which my hon. friend so eloquently portrayed, that it would stand beside the United States Senate, and that it would insist upon or secure from the House of Representatives obedience to its will.

Mr. TRENWITH:
He did not say that. He said it would stand beside the United States Senate as the most powerful Second Chamber in the civilised world.

Mr. SYMON:
Oh, yes, and he said much more than that, He said it would secure the obedience of the House of Representatives to its will.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I did not say "obedience."

Mr. SYMON:
I beg the hon. member's pardon if I misrepresent him, but that is the word I took down on my notes. After all it is a good phrase, for if we are to establish such a Second Chamber as we wish to see, it must have a will, and some power of securing obedience to it in some form or another.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Not obedience so much as recognition, was what I meant.

Mr. SYMON:
Well then, the recognition in some form or other of its will. How is it to be gained? The United States Senate has secured its position, first, because it has the power of amending Money Bills, and second, because it has executive functions -the power of joining with the President in making State appointments, and in ratifying or rejecting treaties. If you are going to place this Senate on anything like the same level as is occupied by that of the United States, how are you going to do it? But for my part I should be sorry to see this Senate placed upon anything like the level occupied by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
That Senate is the dominant governing factor in the Parliamentary state of things there-if I can use the word Parliament in reference to their congress. Such a Senate here would be utterly destructive of the principle of responsible government.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Hear, hear.
Mr. SYMON:

I do not want such a body. I want to be fair and moderate, and to secure even justice in the interests of Federation all round. Give the Senate the power of amending Money Bills. We have conceded that we shall not have the power to amend the Appropriation Bill, so far as it deals with the annual supplies. I do not use the word "conceded" in the sense in which some members have used it. I think it would be monstrous to say that we are going to have responsible government and to deprive the Lower House of the power of originating Money Bills, or to give the Upper House power to strike out the ordinary supplies necessary for the services of the country. It sets a limit of concession beyond which I think we ought not to go. In these Taxation Bills, Loan Bills, and so on, the Senate ought to have power to amend.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:

We are only giving them by the name of amendment that which we in this colony have in the name of suggestion. In the one case it comes in the garb of a favor, in the other we shall present it to our people as a right, but it is undoubtedly one of the very greatest importance to these smaller colonies, and it may make all the difference between presenting to the people an acceptable or unacceptable Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I thought it was tweedledum, and tweedledee.

Mr. SYMON:

But my hon. friend does not understand the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee, though he will have an opportunity of analysing and understanding it before he addresses the Convention again. I am disposed to think with my hon. friend Mr. McMillan, who took up the position that the Appropriation Bill should be omitted, but I always agreed with him that the power of originating is ample to secure that system of responsible government which we all in common wish to see. I need not go over the illustration he gave regarding the difference between a private member and a Minister. I have listened with the utmost attention to-day, because I have been anxious—not having been on the Constitutional Committee—to hear all the arguments that could possibly be urged to show that this power of amendment was inconsistent with responsible government, because if I had been convinced of that I should have considered whether I ought not to give way. If I could have been convinced that this power of amending Money Bills to be conferred on the Senate could not have been worked with responsible government I should have almost given way.

Mr. WISE:
Does it not necessarily divide responsibility?

Mr. SYMON:
No; it does not divide responsibility one atom.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
No; not more than any other Bill.

Mr. SYMON:
Not more than any other Bill. There can be no doubt that he who gives quickly gives twice, but he who gives generously conciliates him to whom he gives, and I implore representatives of the larger colonies to consider whether they will not concede this, which they say is identically the same in result as the power of suggestion,

Mr. HIGGINS:
Who said that?

Mr. SYMON:
I really must ask the hon. member not to interrupt. He is a past master in the art of interjection. I ask hon. members to reconsider the point, and say whether they may not generously concede this in order to disarm any possible irritation which may exist in these no doubt smaller colonies, but smaller colonies whom you desire to see with you in this Federation. The only other word I should like to say about it is this: that when you have adopted the system to which the Convention is very generally agreed, that the members of the Senate should be elected upon a broad suffrage-on the same suffrage as the Lower House -why are you not to trust the people? They are equally the people who send these gentlemen to the Senate, and the only difference is that, instead of having unequal representation, you have equal representation, because of the essential necessities of Federal Government. The Senate is established for the purpose of having the States represented, and as a check in that way, but for no other reason. Therefore it does seem to me that, having that representation on the basis of popular suffrage as wide as you can possibly have it, every argument is cut from under you in resisting this claim which we put forward. Take the case of the Upper House in this colony. There has been an agitation for a broader suffrage to be granted for that House, and possibly it may come to pass that the Upper House in this colony, and it may be in some of the other colonies, may be elected upon the same franchise as the Lower House. Do you mean to tell me that when that time arrives the Upper House in this or any other colony will not claim to interfere a good deal more than it has done already, that it will not claim to represent the people just as much as the Lower House? If you say to the men in the Upper House "You do not represent the people; you have no right to take up this or that position," they will reply, "We do represent the people as much as you do." When that time comes—when in this or any other colony you have the two Houses elected on the same franchise—you will have practically Houses of co-ordinate powers.

Mr. ISAACS:

Their constituents, then, will give all the money.

Mr. SYMON:

It does not seem to me to depend upon money at all. I appeal to my hon. friend, who is a Liberal, or, to use an expression of the hon. member Mr. Douglas, a "true blue," to say how he would like the principle of representation according to money to be applied anywhere else. The difference between the Houses is that one represents the whole of the people as one nation, while the other represents them in sections. There are many other considerations which from the point of view of the less populous States it is important should be borne in mind. Many of them have been referred to already. It is the very essence of Federation that we should have a strong and powerful Senate. We have been told during the debate that this is the time for plain language, and I say that we should have a powerful Senate possessed of a will and having the means to exercise and enforce it, sitting as one of the most invulnerable parts of the State in relation to money. I feel satisfied that the hon. member Mr. Holder has given expression to the great bulk of the feeling as it exists in our colony. I am not going to say what the result will be eventually. We ought to have this Bill framed in a fashion which each of us, quite irrespective of election pledges, thinks to be fair and just, and if this power of amendment is substantially the same in result and effect as the so-called compromise in the Bill of 1891 I do ask the representatives of the larger colonies to give it to us, and to give it graciously. We will thank them for their considerations. We will think it is a right, but still we will feel that they have met us fairly. Whether or no I should be very sorry to think for myself or on behalf of those in this country that we should declare that the cause of Federation was to be imperilled thereby. We shall have other opportunities. We shall have the Bill before the Parliaments and before the people before it reaches us again. When it reaches us again we shall be able to reconsider the matter and the views of the people. We shall have the views of the people in the most effectual shape, and if any of my hon. friends find that they are hampered by what they consider their pledges they will be in the position which I may call-to use a legal phrase-a locus penitentiae. When the Bill comes before us we shall have ascertained the views of the people by the debates in the various Parliaments and by the discussions which will have taken place in the press and amongst the people throughout the length and breadth of the country. We shall then have material for rubbing off all of the angularities of the scheme, and for making it as perfect an instrument of Federation as we possibly can, and one upon which my honest belief is we shall be able to federate not merely by means of a majority vote, but upon the unanimous vote of the people of the country.

Mr. LEAKE:

If the rejection of this amendment should lead to the wrecking of Federation, it is certainly to be regretted. Equally so should we regret the fact that Sir George Turner would feel obliged to return to Victoria and inform his constituents that Federation was an impossibility. To go to that extent you must say that this clause affirms a principle which is necessarily vital to Federation. Should he go to that extent, I for one should join issue with him, and affirm, or strive to affirm, that there is no more than a question of detail involved, and not one real and honest federal principle. If it is a question of federal principle you must place it in the same category with those principles which section 50 affirms; for instance, defence, freetrade, and Customs. These, I am prepared to admit, are principles which must precede Federation, and we may fairly regard each as a sine qua non, but that does not apply to the question before the House. Whether the consideration of this amendment involves a question of democracy or conservatism I am not for the moment concerned to inquire, but I ask myself whether or not it is fair and just. If we can happily agree upon several principles, few perhaps in number, but principles which must precede Federation, principles which we can all adopt, it will be to the greatest possible advantage, for thereby we might get the thin end of the federal wedge into Australian thought and trust to time and circumstances driving it home. Therefore, if by chance we can agree to a few principles, no matter how few, on which it is possible to federate three or four colonies may come in and ultimately be able to induce the neighboring States to follow suit. In my view we should guard against following too slavishly the practice rather than the principles of responsible government. All legislative power, I submit, including financial legislation, is vested in the Parliament, whether it consists of one Chamber or of two, but as a matter of fact I think members will agree that in practice it has been found convenient to allow certain powers to be acquired by one House, and by degrees that one House has alone voiced the opinion of Parliament. I agree with my friend Mr. Wise when he says that the alarm of either side with regard to this great question is more or less unfounded, but the alarm, at any rate, may be avoided, and I think we can avoid it if we regard principles rather than details. Difficulties, no doubt, have arisen between legislative bodies under responsible government, and those difficulties it is our duty to avoid. We, who are in favor of the clause, have argued that by granting the Senate co-ordinate powers with the House of Representatives we will minimise the possibility of difficulties, because, we say, clothed with these powers, we will find the Senate co-equal in dignity, and co-equal in popularity and administrative force. It is our ambition to make that Senate as firm and as popular an administrative body as possible. It does not, however, follow that, because there are certain inherent powers in the Senate, those powers will always be called into play, but they are useful as a controlling influence. I submit that with that co-equal power, and the knowledge that the other Chamber must possess of that fact, there will be less chance of friction and trouble, or even deadlocks. It is the fact of unequal power which has led to trouble, and this unequal power has led to the creation of a dominant force in the Lower Houses, which regard most jealously anything which they may consider encroachments on their rights. Those who oppose the clause argue that it is an element of importance that the finances should be dealt with by the Lower House alone, and shall not be interfered with in detail by the Upper House, and we find that the Senate, as an Upper House, is proposed to be placed in that relation. After all, if we regard the political history of Australia, how seldom is it that these difficult questions have arisen? When they have arisen invariably the good sense of the people has come to the assistance of the legislators to enable them to settle the difficulty. It is very easy, no doubt, to give extreme illustrations of the application of these principles, and my friend Mr. Deakin has ably argued and suggested as an illustration possibilities of difficulties under the tariff law, but we may also argue from my point of view that in regard to that very tariff, if something distasteful to the people were put in in the enactments of the Bill, it would be unjust to prevent representatives of a State from raising possibly valid and good objections to such enactments. It is impossible for us to say which House, if we pass the clause as it stands, may become the dominant factor in the government of the country. I am inclined to leave it to circumstances-political circumstances or evolution, if you like-to determine which of these two Houses will be the more powerful. Ultimately it must come to this: one House must be stronger than the other. We cannot shut our eyes to this fact. One House or other must be the stronger. If developments happen and cause one section of Parliament to be stronger than the other, we should not object so long as we all through maintain the dignity and force of Parliament—the Parliament acting as a whole. We have heard, and it has been interesting to myself, at any rate, to listen to the inferences and deductions which have been drawn from existing Constitutions. References have frequently been made to the constitutions of the United States, Switzerland, and other places, but I am happy to think there has not been a great desire to follow one or other of those constitutions. My own view of it is that these constitutions should be regarded in the light of directory propositions, and not necessarily to be followed as precedents, but we should, if possible, cull from those constitutions the principles which apply to our own circumstances. I have thought it right to speak on this question, because I think it of great and paramount importance. It is of paramount importance from my point of view, for the reasons I have stated. I think we should have a Senate clothed with equal power, and equal rights, and equal dignity, and, with that in view I intend to vote against the amendment.

Mr. TRENWITH:

The strongest argument that has been produced in favor of the amendment was presented by the hon. member for South Australia, Mr. Symon, and the fact that a gentleman who has undoubted ability and is recognised as an able controversialist and advocate could make no better case than he did, proved that the side on which he argued was the wrong side. He commenced by declaring that there was a danger of Federation being wrecked if the larger States were not prepared to make concessions, and make them gracefully, and he concluded by saying that the concession that we are asking for was altogether unimportant

Mr. HOWE:

He said nothing of the sort.

Mr. TRENWITH:

And that the effect would be exactly the same, whether the power of amendment or suggestion were conceded.

Mr. GLYNN:

Hear, hear. He did say that.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I ventured to suggest that it would throw the responsibility upon a different House. He even contested that, and he said it might be that the responsibility of suggestion might rest upon the same Chamber. He further deprecated the language of my hon. friend Mr. Deakin when he referred to the necessity for appealing to the people of the larger States in endeavoring to frame a Constitution that would meet with their approval, and near the end of his own speech he implored the larger States to make concessions that would meet with the views of the people of the smaller States. Now, if it is only a difference between tweedledum and tweedledee that we are asked to make, there is at any rate a very vast difference between the number of persons who are asking. As has been pointed out, in the less populous States there is something less than three-quarters of a million of people.

Mr. GORDON:

We have heard that forty times.

Mr. TRENWITH:

That is true, and we cannot hear it too often. In the more populous States the people are nearly two and a half millions.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

We shall soon catch you up.

I shall be only too glad when Sir John Forrest's colony catches up to the most populous State, but we must deal with things not as they are in the imagination of my hon. friend but as they are in fact. If we legislate for anything it is for the interests of the people. Clearly if any persons in this controversy have the right to ask that the concession should be made gracefully they are those who represent the two and a half millions of people. They may, without incurring the charge of selfishness or unreasonableness, ask that the people who represent the smaller number may gracefully make this concession. But my hon. friend Mr. Symon in his argument, towards the close of it, gives a different reason why this concession should be asked for the Senate: because it represents the people in the same degree as the House of Representatives. He clearly could not have meant that, because the basis of representation is altogether different. In the one House the representation of the people is in proportion to the number of people represented; that is to say, a vote in the House of Representatives represents exactly as many persons, or as nearly as may be, as any other vote, but in the Senate a vote in one instance may represent one individual, and in another instance it may represent ten individuals, that is to say, in the States House ten persons in one of the States can have as much political power as one person in any one of the States. How, then, can it be said that they are both the people's Houses in exactly the same degree. Why should we refuse to trust the smaller States? If there is a danger that the smaller States will overpower in legislative matters the larger States through their representatives in the Senate, is there not the same like likelihood that the larger States may overpower the smaller ones in their representative House. Let us apply the argument both ways, as Mr. Symon very properly says.
It is true that possibly the larger States might, in a House of equal representation, overpower the smaller States and seriously injure their interests. That is conceded if proportionate representation were the only basis of legislation. Then if that be conceded the argument must work both ways, but with the representation that we have it is possible that the smaller, States, smaller numerically and immensely smaller, might overpower the larger States. If it is wrong in one instance it is wrong in the other, but there is this great difference: that if the smaller States secure such legislative power under the machinery which is created that they can subjugate the larger States it means that a few people in the conservation and maintenance of their own interests can prejudice the interests of a very large number of people. If we are to select between the two it is better that the interests of the larger number should be conserved than those of the smaller number. According to the well known political axiom, it should be the greatest good for the greatest number. If either of these two possibilities were to occur it would be a lesser evil, having in view all the people for whom we are legislating, that the smaller States should be dominated by the large than that the larger States should be dominated by the smaller. In the last two speeches that we heard there was an amount of candor that had not characterised the discussion on this question before. Mr. Symon said that the States House must have power sufficient to command obedience, and Mr. Leake said that the Second Chamber may be the more powerful Chamber. Now, I ask hon. members' consideration of these two propositions. The Second Chamber must be so powerful as to command obedience, and the Constitution must be such that the States House may be the more powerful. I ask if that is what the representatives of the smaller States mean?

Dr. COCKBURN:

No.

Mr. CLARKE:

No one said that,

Mr. HOLDER:

Mr. Symon said that Mr. Deakin said it.

Mr. TRENWITH:

And Mr. Clarke said something like it. I am glad, however, to hear hon. members say that that is not what they mean, because if they did, and they were endeavoring to frame the Constitution to that end, I would have no hesitation in saying that they were not showing the federal spirit. They say that is not what they want, and if it can be shown that the powers they seek will produce that result then it produces a result they do not desire, and they should be prepared to make such alterations as will remove that power. Then if the Second Chamber, which may by a majority in it represent a minority of the people of the entire Commonwealth, has power to initiate or to materially alter Taxation Bills-

Mr. DOBSON:
It has no power to initiate.

Mr. TRENWITH:
If it has those powers it will have the power of controlling legislation. Mr. Symon said if it could be shown that the powers proposed to be given were in any way subversive of responsible government he would be prepared to depart from his position. Responsible government must mean responsibility to some person, and if it is to be responsible in the proper sense it must be responsible to all the people as nearly as may be. The closest approach to responsibility to all the people that we can hope to obtain is responsibility to a majority of the people. Clearly any person who is in accord with the genius of our Constitution - that the people must govern themselves-will admit that responsible government to be properly responsible must be responsible to a majority of the people. As the two Houses for which we are providing are representative of the people in different degrees, responsible government to be properly effective must be responsible to the most directly representative House. The House of Representatives we are providing should go upon the principle of representing the people in proportion to their numbers, although even in that respect we are making a departure in the interests of the smaller States, because we prescribe a minimum of five representatives-

Mr. WALKER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Without regard to the number of States, and thus two of the States that we contemplate may come into this Federation will have representation in the House of Representatives altogether out of proportion to their population. In addition to that they will have representation in the States House without any regard to their population. Let us assume that the Government responsible for the carrying on of the nation, having a substantial majority in the people's House, and consequently properly exercising authority, proposes a Taxation Bill which provides for a necessary expenditure of, say, two millions of money. Supposing the States House, exercising the right which it is proposed here to give it, undertakes to amend, it may reduce, but not increase, the taxation of the people.
Supposing it reduces the two million pounds of revenue to one million, clearly the Government that requires two millions for carrying on the business of the Commonwealth would be rendered incapable of doing so.

Mr. DOBSON:
Give us credit for common sense.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Are you referring to loan money?

Mr. TRENWITH:
I am referring to taxation.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
You must give us credit for reasonable conduct.

Mr. TRENWITH:
If that hon. member is prepared to give everybody credit for reasonable conduct he does away with all cause for equal representation in the Senate. It is because we thought that the majority may be unreasonable that we have provided for that equal representation in the Upper House.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You allow the Senate to reject altogether the Bill providing for £2,000,000 taxation.

Mr. TRENWITH:
That is so; but you would allow them to take the responsibility in a modified manner by passing the Bill with an amendment. They take a much greater responsibility by rejecting it altogether. But the effect so far as the work of the Commonwealth is concerned, even if they elect to exercise their power to only half that possible extent, will be to make the Government responsible to the Senate instead of to the people's House.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Will not that apply to any Bill that is altered in the Senate materially?

Mr. TRENWITH:
There is this very great difference—that legislation with reference to money is always urgent, whilst legislation with reference to other questions, though always important—because legislation ought not to be introduced that is not important—is not always urgent, and there may be time to wait to educate public opinion in reference to matters of legislation, apart from questions of taxation when there is not that time in connection with the urgent necessities of carrying on the machinery of the government for the whole Commonwealth. Then I think I have shown in some measure that these proposals are subversive of responsible government. Now it has been urged as a reason by Mr. Symon—

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Would the hon. member answer one question: Would not the same state of affairs result exactly under the system of suggestion?

Mr. TRENWITH:

I think not, and I do not approve of suggestion. Although I am willing to accept suggestion as a compromise, it is a very distinct departure from what I conceive to be sound principles of responsible government.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

That was an essential part of the compromise of 1891.

Mr. TRENWITH:

There is a very marked difference between suggestion and amendment. A suggestion which might or might not be accepted by the people's House would be made with careful consideration and accompanied by the fullest and weightiest possible reasons. If after such suggestion has been made the representatives of the people as people still felt the reasons were not sufficiently weighty, they would send the Bill back for passage by the Second Chamber without adopting the amendments suggested. Then the responsibility would rest for rejecting the whole Bill, because of the failure to accept these amendments, upon the States Assembly and they would be justified in rejecting it only under the gravest possible circumstances-only in fact if it appeared to them very evident that State rights were being menaced, and that the object for which they were constituted was being threatened. But even then there would not be the danger of materially and banefully altering legislation that there would be if you give them the power of amendment. However, if my hon. friend thinks that suggestion will have the same result as amendment I say that in view of the feeling that has grown up around the British Constitution everywhere, if there is no difference in result it would be wise to adopt the compromise we are in favor of. If, as has been said, it is a case of tweedledum and tweedledee then I say in in the interests of the Federation-and we all know there is a strong prejudice in the minds of British people everywhere in favor of this phrase-that the people's House must have control of the people's purse. Mr. Symon argued that we should concede this point because of the peculiar franchise of this Second chamber, and he said:

What one of your Upper Houses, if you made their franchise exactly the same as that of the Lower Houses, would not demand very much greater powers than they now possess?

The answer to that is that with their present franchise they are continually demanding greater powers, and, however elected or constituted, they will continually ask for greater powers. The question we have to consider is not whether they would ask if it were a fair and proper thing that any increased power should be given. Now, it is a right, Mr. Symon contends, that the Senate should have the power to command obedience. If that is contended, and it is contended in this open way, it is a right I for one would never dream of conceding, and that the people of this continent will never dream of conceding, to give a small minority of the people the power of compelling the enforcement of legislation of a character to which a large majority objected. That is a right that never should be conceded in a democratically-governed community. What powers are essential for the protection of the States are suggested very clearly by Mr. Symon in his concluding remarks? That is the question we have to consider. What power is essential to protect the interests of the peoples of the respective States? I think the hon. member Mr. Isaacs put that matter in the very best language in which it could be clothed when he said that you are asking for a shield and you are demanding a sword.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

We are

Mr. TRENWITH:

That language has been criticised during this debate, and it is contended that it is not applicable to the situation. What is the position? The smaller States declare that there is a danger of their being overpowered by numbers in the larger States, and thus they want a shield to protect them from that danger. If they have a sufficient shield to protect them from that danger they have all they can reasonably ask, for we have the right to believe, in the language of my hon. friend, that the persons elected under this Commonwealth will be largely reasonable men, and so there will be no necessity for the use of a shield. Men in the representative House will proceed to work on reasonable lines, and if there should be a momentary fit of unreasonableness on the part of those entrusted with the duty of looking after the State's interests all that can be asked for in that instance is a sufficiently effective shield to prevent any excessive action on the part of the minority. They want in addition to a shield a Maxim gun. They want something with which they could bombard the other fellow. If the power to amend Money Bills is given we will have great difficulty in securing Federation within any reasonable period, because people who must be the ultimate arbiters in this question will not adopt such Federation. My hon. friend Mr. Symon said we had no right to consider the opinions of, he would not say ignorant people, but uninformed people.

Mr. SYMON:

I did not say we had no right to consider them.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I understood the hon. member to say that our duty was not to consider the opinions, he would not say, of ignorant, but uninformed, people, but that our duty was to frame a Constitution based upon our own opinions.

Mr. SYMON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Then I take it that the hon. member wishes it to become our duty that after we have formed the Constitution we are to educate the people subsequently. That sounds very noble, but the fact is that the people are forming their opinion as this debate goes on, and it will be a very difficult thing indeed to alter their opinions. Therefore, even if we think it is not the most scientifically correct plan, we have a right to adopt whatever can be adopted without danger and with a considerable view to studying the opinions of the people to whom this Constitution must subsequently be submitted. But the hon. member proved that he did not believe in the argument he first urged by, in his concluding remarks, appealing to us, the representatives of the larger States, not to force upon the Convention a Constitution which would not be accepted by the people—the uninformed people of the smaller States. What I desire to urge is that the Constitution should be just. If it gives an undue power to any section it is unjust, and the proposal to give a possible minority power to tax the majority would be unjust.

Mr. HOLDER:
They cannot do it.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Mr. Holder says they cannot do it. I have no hesitation in saying they can under the proposal in this Bill. They can amend, they can reduce, or they can render insufficient any taxation proposal. They can render insufficient the return from any scheme proposed. Supposing it is proposed to make up an amount of £2,000,000 by Customs duties, they can reduce it to £1,000,000, and so render it necessary to introduce another Bill in order to carry on the government of the country. Therefore they can by their power of reduction practically initiate by compelling some other form of taxation. That would be unjust to the majority of the people. Mr. Holder put it very forcibly from his point of view:

What is the use of giving us a House with equal representation of the States if you tie both of its hands behind its back?

I respectfully submit that the House so constituted has no use with the hands or anything else except for resistance, and if it is able to resist undue aggression with its hands tied behind its back it will be a good thing to so tie its hands. The question we have to consider is whether the States will be powerful enough to defend their interests in the Senate if they have equal representation with the power to amend or in any way alter Money Bills. If that be so, that is a sufficient answer for refusing to give more power. If more power is given to them, we have it on the authority of those best able to speak, that all the Premiers, or nearly all of them, at the 1891 Conference declared that if the power to amend Money Bills were conceded there would be no hope of Federation. It is six years since then, and there may be a very material alteration, and therefore the declaration of the Premiers at that time would not be a material argument now, but we have to-day exactly the same thing.

Mr. HOLDER:

But a different sort of Senate now.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It is a different Senate, but its functions are the same. The right for its existence in the form provided is that it must be strong enough to resist aggression, and there is no other claim for equal representation of the States in the Senate. If it is aggressive, initiatory, and amending it has a right to proportional representation; but if it is in the danger of aggression it should be strong enough to resist it and no stronger, and anyone who seeks to make it stronger is not seeking to advance the cause of Federation, but only desiring to make a good bargain for his colony.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

I am only seeking that which I am entitled to.

Mr. TRENWITH:

If that is so he is entitled to the most perfect protection from aggression at the hands of the larger States, and if he wants more he wants the power to be aggressive towards the larger ones. If it is unjust that the larger States should have the power of treating him unfairly it is equally unjust that the smaller ones should have the power to treat the larger unfairly. This must be so if we are to produce a Constitution that will be effective in securing that which we are sent here to secure - that is the unification of the colonies for certain purposes. I use the word "unification" because we have been charged with securing unification under the Constitution we are proposing. Federation, if it is anything, is unification within certain limits, and the more complete that unification is within the prescribed limits the more effective will be Federation. If members desire Confederation, a combination in connection with which the respective States can withdraw at will, then they are going the best way of getting it by demanding the power they do in connection with this clause, and that is the power to accept whatever is agreeable, and to reject whatever is disagreeable, without regard to the number of people in the various States. If that is what is desired, our labors are being wasted. I implore the representatives of the smaller States not to further consider how best they can bargain for the people they represent, but to give attention to how best they can obtain Federation which is fair and equitable, and sufficiently strong to shield every State at the hands of the majority. If they do that our labors will do us credit, and secure the object for which we were sent here, and will conduce to the well-being of the entire people of Australia.

Mr. DOBSON:

As I was not a member of the Constitutional Committee, I would like to give my reasons as shortly as possible, consistent with explicitness, why I think the amendment before the Committee should be rejected. It seems to me that the clause as it stands should remain part of the Bill, it being required as a matter of simple justice, and not least as an essential part of the Bill, in order to make it a consistent and well-framed Constitution. We have had it said, more than once, I think, that our friends from Western Australia were not elected by the people, but I hope, sir, we have heard that objection stated for the last time, and I believe that during the next few weeks Sir John Forrest and his colleagues will have been returned at the genral election, and that the people of Western Australia will then have endorsed the action of the Parliament in sending them here, and then we shall have the whole Australian people fully represented at this Convention by their own act. The first remark I wish to make is that our democratic friends are shrinking from the very democratic principle they assert, namely, that the people must govern. The people have

[P.530] starts here

sent us here as fifty agents to frame a Bill for them, and the first time we attempt to do so the representatives are expressing their fears as to what the people may do to them when they get back. There are five different points which have been either altogether overlooked or not sufficiently taken into account, and my first point is this: that, while we each represent our own colony, we have a higher duty, and it is that we represent the people of Australia as a whole, and have to frame the Constitution for them and them alone. My second point is that honorable members have regarded what this Convention is doing as the last and final act in framing the Constitution. It is exactly the contrary. This is only the initial step, and others have to take place which they have entirely ignored. This point has struck me because of the remarks of hon. members, so let us look at the sentences they have uttered at the initial stage of our work. Mr. O'Connor said: No extension of the powers of the Senate beyond the Bill of 1891, can be expected from the people of New South Wales." How can the hon. member speak for his colony? The discussions in this Convention, and the provisions of the Bill we frame will be published by every paper in Australia, and they will be criticised by people all over Australia: then they will be considered by twelve Houses of Legislature, and the representatives here will point out to those Houses what points they agreed with and what they disagreed with, and the Parliaments will support or reject the principles of the Bill as they are supporters of Radicalism, Liberalism, or Conservatism. Then at the second meeting of the Convention will be the time for compromise and for considering the criticisms we have heard and putting the final touches to the Bill, so that it will represent the true convictions of the people of this continent. Therefore I was astonished when I heard Mr. Reid say that the attempt to provide that the Senate should play "an active part in finance would be disastrous." He said also he would give us a strong Senate, and yet he said if its activity interfered with finance it would end in disastrous consequences. Sometimes I have great difficulty in finding out what the hon. gentleman does mean. When I think he is coming down on my side of the fence, and I open my arms to receive him, he pops down on the other side. At other times he resorts to such an adroit straddle that I do not know what he means. If Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor intend to follow their Premier in this view I say emphatically but most deferentially I cannot follow them. We want a Senate and must have a Senate which will take an "active part" in the financial operations of this Commonwealth, but the real control will still rest with the people's House-although the Senate is also the people's House-with the Lower House. Then Sir George Turner astonished me by saying "that the people of Victoria would not accept the clause as it stands, and if it was carried Federation would be impracticable." What right has any member of this Convention to use such emphatic and, with all humility I say it, such exaggerated language as that at a time when we are framing a Constitution which has to go forth for public criticism?

Mr. ISAACS:
Why should he not use it if he believes it?

Mr. DOBSON:
He should not use such emphatic language, because the very Act under which we are here is an Enabling Act in order that a Constitution may be framed, and this is only the first stage of the proceeding. The gentlemen opposite twit us with not wanting discussion. We are governed by discussion, and we are to frame a Constitution by discussion, and yet they say their people will not take the Constitution if we do not do a certain thing, and that discussion on the point is useless. The very Bill under which we sit here enables the people to speak directly through the press, in meeting assembled, and in the Parliaments. Therefore I submit, with all deference, no member has a right to speak for the people now. If we have to frame a Bill by discussion and take the people into our confidence, and ample time is to be given them to consider it in every possible way, why cannot we withhold our judgment of what their verdict will be. They are our masters, and we are anticipating the people's decision in this matter, and we have no right to do it. Then one gentleman, I think it was Mr. Wise, told us-'That, because the people of Victoria had been troubled by a dispute between the two Houses, they had such a prejudice against an Upper Chamber having any but the mildest power, that they could not accept even a fair and equitable proposal on this point." Are we to give way to Victoria, Tasmania, or any one colony? We are to frame a Bill in the best possible way, so that as few holes as possible may be picked in it. We have three examples before us—America, Germany, and Switzerland—and every one has the power we are contending for.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Not one has responsible government.

Mr. DOBSON:
The first step we take in building the Federal edifice, the Victorian architects Say-"If you do not construct your foundation on our model the house will tumble about your ears." Then New South Wales joins in and says-The federal foundation must be built according to the plans of our architects."

Mr. GORDON:
Except Mr. McMillan.

Mr. DOBSON:
Yes. Every colony has a right to have something to say as to how the Federal house shall be built. Hon. members must not forget the enormous concession which is the effect of the compromise we have made in allowing the Senate to be elected upon manhood suffrage in each colony as one electorate. We have made the greatest concession in the whole Bill. Put all the concessions together which have been given by the democrats and they do not amount to the concession we have given them in allowing the Senate to be elected on manhood suffrage. Most of the speakers compare the Senate with an Upper House. Is that not a mistake, a false analogy, which will make us very bad builders of our scheme? With all deference, I submit it is. We ought to recollect that the Senate is not similar to the Upper House. It should be a stronger body, and it must, be a stronger body, because it is to be based upon the will of the people, and is also the protector of States rights. Then hon. members again seem to have taken it for granted that we are going on for all time with just exactly the same phase of responsible government with which we are carrying on our administration at present. I believe in no such thing. I believe most emphatically in what Sir Richard Baker said in the opening debate of our Convention, that very likely responsible government, if carried out as our democratic friends wish to carry it out, will mar the Federal Government and detract from its dignity and usefulness. As to the quotation which Mr. O'Connor gave on this point from Sir Samuel Griffith, I think it is overruled by what Sir Samuel Griffith said five years later. I will read the whole paragraph, because I think it bears upon an important point, and because the members who support this amendment seem to think that the present form of responsible government, without any development, without any evolution, and without any adaptation to meet the federal needs, will go on for generations. I do not think it will. Sir Samuel Griffith said:

What would be in practice the relation of the two Houses of the Federal Legislature to one another and to the Ministers of State? And how would the system of what is called responsible government work under such a Constitution? Would each House insist upon exercising its powers of veto, in order to compel the retirement or dismissal of Ministers of whom it did not approve? These are interesting questions, which can only be answered by experience. But I think it is safe to predict that the British genius for government will find a practical modus vivendi; and it should not be forgotten that under any form of Constitution except a despotism there must be checks and counter-checks, and that the working of the machinery might at any time be brought to a stop if any one of the several authorities were to insist on exercising its utmost rights. My own opinion is that the practical result would be that it would come to be recognised that the Federal Government must command the general confidence of both Houses of the Legislature, and that less importance would be attached to defeats on minor matters in either House.

That is the opinion of Sir Samuel Griffith. I have quoted it before, and I quote it again, because every single member who supports this amendment ignores it. What happened in the French Senate two years ago? They passed a resolution which I can well imagine the Senate of Australia would pass if democracy were to run mad and run riot, as some think it will:—"That this Chamber is prepared to consider a certain Bill when it is sent up by Ministers in whom it has confidence," and the Premier of the Chamber of Deputies sent in his resignation and the Upper House in France absolutely then dominated the politics of the country, not by virtue of any powers to amend Money Bills, but simply because they said to the people's Chamber-"When you have Ministers in whom we have confidence we will consider your legislation, take it back until you appoint Ministers whom we can respect and admire."

Mr. DEAKIN:
That is what you want here.

Mr. DOBSON:
No. I am talking about responsible government which is, I think, not adapted to our Federal Government. Mr. Deakin, and others with him, have such deep-rooted belief in responsible government that they will not consider any other form of government. I believe we shall see another form of government, and one better adapted to our Federal Constitution. I have shown hon. members that there is a possibility of the Senate insisting upon having the right men to govern the country without any reference to Money Bills at all. Then surely that is a very strong argument to show that Sir Samuel Griffith was right, and that we shall soon get out of this rut of responsible government, with its many blots and defects, which, I must say, I cannot admire. Passing to my fifth point, I would like to ask the hon. members Messrs. Trenwith, Deakin, and Isaacs if they desire that the will of the people shall prevail subject to reasonable control by the Senate?

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
We want what is reasonable.

Mr. DOBSON:
This clause as it stands is reasonable. I am giving my opinions now, and, though I may appear to be dogmatic, no man is more humble than I am, because I am simply appalled by the magnitude of the work we are doing, and I fear lest by some blunder, we may render the work not acceptable to the people. I am willing to modify my views on this question if it can be shown that I am constitutionally wrong. Members who support the amendment have altogether forgotten the enormous power which is given to the House which has the sole right to initiate financial measures. It means that while the Senate are powerless in such matters, the members in the Lower House can alone decide what policy they will introduce, and what tax they will put on if they want taxation over and above the Customs. They can decide whether they shall have a land tax, an income tax, or a poll tax, a progressive tax, or a uniform tax. What can the Senate do? It can never do anything of that sort. It can reject a taxing Bill, as you all admit, but cannot even amend. Supposing a Bill comes to the Senate from the Lower House proposing a progressive, land tax, which if it were carried would drive squatters out of the country so soon as they could get away, and supposing that tax was so unfair as to take money out of a man's pocket simply because he had it, and the exemptions were so high as to leave out many men who could well afford to pay something, though the Senate might approve of a progressive tax if the steps of graduation were moderate, and if the higher grades were cut down, and though it might approve of exemptions if they were somewhat lower, yet they must not touch a line of the Bill. In a Federal Government, with State rights to protect, is it wise to compel the Senate to put the whole of a Bill into the waste paper basket when they might send it back to the Lower House if they could only amend it? Hon. members are inviting collision between the Houses when they say that the Senate shall not have this power. Now, let us come to the question of a Customs Bill. I consider the uniform tariff should be part of our Constitution. It is revenue which is to bring in about £7,000,000 per annum. It is the revenue which is to pay the cost of Customs houses, posts and telegraphs, and defences, and it is to pay, practically, the interest on the whole of the public debts of Australia; but as we cannot tell our merchants and traders the exact amount of duty which is to be charged on goods, the rates cannot be placed as a schedule in the Bill.
Then our democratic friends say that, even in the Customs Bill, with its 300 items, the Senate should not have power to reduce, or alter, or strike out one single item. Such a state of affairs, to my mind, is making a Constitution inconsistent with itself, doing a gross injustice to the people, leaving our work absolutely ill-done and open to criticism that is utterly unanswerable, and I hope we shall never frame a Constitution of that kind.
Two hon. members have supposed that the mandate of the people-Mr.
Deakin's phrase- will require Ministers to bring in a protective tariff. The m mandate of the people, I take it, will have nothing to do with the matter.
The Governor-General will call to his Council six or seven gentlemen whom he thinks capable of being the first Ministers in the Commonwealth.
He will certainly not choose all protectionists or all freetraders, but strong, capable, and able politicians, representative of the views of all classes of the community, and there will be no mandate of the people about it. Those men will have to sit down to frame a tariff to give the States all the revenue they require, and more or less protective, according to the views of the first Parliament. But our friends from Victoria desire that the Lower House-dominated perhaps by the labor party or the protectionists-should send up a thoroughly protective tariff to the Senate, and that the Senate should not have power to alter one line of it. Is it fair, is it just? Is it in accordance with constitutional practice in dealing with a Federal, as distinguished from a Provincial, Government? It is not. All the authorities are upon our side of the question. We all know perfectly well that it will be a very great question to one or two colonies whether they can afford to enter the Federal Government. If the expenses of that Government will cost Tasmania £18,000 a year, besides loss of revenue, it will be a very grave question with her, even if she is most anxious to enter the Federation, whether she can afford to do so. But the democrats from Victoria and the protectionists from New South Wales may join together in the first Federal Government, if they can manage to get into it, and send up a protective tariff, in which they choose for the purposes of taxation several items of which their colonies' consumption is great and that of Tasmania but small, and so adjust the tariff as to lose to Tasmania £5,000 a year. That is not an exaggerated case. In many cases one country uses more of certain articles than another country. For instance, Tasmanians perhaps drink more tea than do Victorians, and Victorians more beer than Tasmanians. The Tasmanian people may absolutely lose £3,000, or £4,000, or £5,000, or £6,000 a year because you have omitted from your list of items protected certain items required to give that State the same revenue as it has now. Under these circumstances is the Senate to have its hands tied behind its back-to be unable to prevent what may be a financial injustice? Are we to be told that to make a mere suggestion is quite sufficient without having the power to amend? That appears to me to be a lopsided kind of constitutional machine. Supposing we amend one, or even one hundred, items out of the three hundred, when the Bill goes to the House of Representatives they have control of the whole matter; they can put it in the waste paper basket and begin de novo, or accept some of the amendments and then send it back to the Senate, but in the end the people's House will prevail. But the democrats of Victoria want the people's will to prevail without those proper checks and counterchecks which Sir Samuel Griffith says should be prescribed, and every writer on democracy tells us are necessary. It would, I think, be a lamentable business if at the start of our Commonwealth any Ministers got hold of the first portfolios who were determined to engraft any one system on the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN:
You want this Convention to frame a tariff, then?

Mr. DOBSON:
This Convention cannot frame a tariff.

Mr. DEAKIN:
You want a House constituted in exactly the same way to frame it.

Mr. BARTON:
A duty on boots from No. 6 up.
Mr. DOBSON:
   It is idle to talk about this Convention framing a tariff, but the Senate should have a voice in framing it. Mr. Trenwith used a very apt and simple illustration, but it appears to me to cut absolutely against himself. He said:

   Suppose the Lower House sent up a Taxation Bill asking for two millions of money, and the Senate cut it down to one-half, what would happen?

   This is, to some extent, an anachronism, or else his argument tells against himself. If the Lower House asks for two millions, it is to be presumed they want it; but if the Senate cut it down to one million it is to be supposed there would be a vital struggle between those who want extravagance and those who want to proceed cautiously. Is it in the interests of the people of Australia, after the experience of the boom and the reaction during the last five years, to have a Constitution Bill so framed that the Lower House, backed up by the people, can go in for extravagance unchecked by the Senate? Would it not be wiser to give the Senate power to check this reckless extravagance that has nearly proved disastrous to the colonies once before?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   The Senate could reject the Bill.

Mr. DOBSON:
   Yes; but it might approve in the main of the policy of the Lower House if initiate

Mr. GLYNN:
   The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has said that the fixing of the Customs tariff might be one of the chief points of the Constitution. I confess that if I was at all doubtful that the Customs tariff would not be fixed in the Constitution I would never accept Federation. Any Federation we might frame must be sufficiently flexible to allow of an evolution to a better fiscal system, and I am certain there is a body of opinion in South Australia which would be diametrically opposed to Federation if so essential a condition were omitted. I think that Mr. Dobson made too much of the terms "democracy" and "aristocracy," or "oligarchy," or whatever he pleased to term it. He used the word "democracy" in rather too strong a sense in connection with the relation of the Federal Houses of Parliament. It seems to me that the question is not one of democracy as against aristocracy or oligarchy, but one bearing upon the relative powers of the Upper and Lower Houses. In this Bill there is a provision that the suffrage of the Upper House is to be identical with that of the Lower House, that the age of electors is to be the same, and that presumably the sex is to be the same; therefore I cannot see on what grounds democracy is to find a hold in the House of Representatives, and how aristocracy is to find its buttress against the so-called encroachments of democracy in the Senate. The point we ought to consider is what ought to be the measure of power vested in the Upper House, and at the same time to consider what would be the most acceptable Constitution for the people of these colonies. My hon. friend Mr. Symon pointed out with a considerable degree of truth that it would be inadvisable to stick too closely to election pledges on this point. I may as well say at once that I have not given any, but I did give expression to prima facie opinions on this point as on others. I said on the platform that I would not have my opinions too tightly tied by anything I said there, and that I would await the result of mature opinions and deliberation. I understood that we were to assemble in this Convention to interchange ideas, and by the collation of knowledge help to mould the opinions of some or remove the prejudice of others, ultimately arriving at an inevitable conclusion that would, result in the harmonious working of the whole. I confess I had a prejudice not deeply rooted in favor of giving the Senate this power of amendment, but in connection with the expression of that opinion I distinctly laid down that I would have my right to freedom of choice under the influence of mature judgment. I have come to the conclusion that if we, who represent the smaller colonies, stick too closely to our prejudice in reference to the equal powers of the Senate with the House of Representatives on financial matters, the cause of Federation will be wrecked. I have had the opportunity of listening to what the delegates from New South Wales and Victoria have said, I have read what has passed in the press during the last fortnight or three weeks, and conversation here has strengthened me in this conclusion, which has been emphasised by the speeches made in this House, that if we do not give way within reasonable limits to the demands of the larger colonies upon this point at issue we will not have in the Federation those two colonies which ought to be the heart of it. My duty, then, is that of a representative, and not a delegate; and as a representative I have come to the conclusion that we can, without any loss of dignity, or without surrender of real, as opposed to apparent, interests give way upon this point. Mr. Holder seems to put his finger upon the pulse of South Australia, and to indicate from this diagnosis the fixed opinion of the province on this point. South Australia has offered no opinion, or at all events has reached no decision, on the point up to the present. It has made its choice of representatives presumably on the ground of experience and presumed special training. There are divergences of opinion applicable to the ten members who represent South Australia, but I do say this, that in the Convention of 1891, when the representatives of South Australia, or of the Parliament of South Australia, came home with the Constitution and offered it for acceptance there was no uproar against the compromise in reference to financial matters. It was never mentioned. When you have silence on a matter and when the Bill is before the House it is taken to indicate consent.

Mr. SOLOMON:

The Bill was never seriously considered.

Mr. GLYNN:

Mr. Solomon says it was not seriously considered. It was considered by Parliament, and would have been pushed forward and made part of the statute law had the other colonies exhibited a similar desire to bring Federation about by that means. As to the opinion of South Australia—and I think it is important that we should give expression to our opinions on this question—I think we are raising what is not an important issue, but nevertheless the issue has been raised, and unless we point out to the public that the matter is not of such significance as some members seem to assume, we may be defeating Federation by raising an empty, but nevertheless dangerous, feeling of antagonism in the public mind. Knowing this would be a comparatively strong basis of argument, and not having mentioned the matter in more than a few sentences before, I have looked up the history of America, and found what really historical precedents we have to guide us. I have come to the conclusion that Bryce and other writers are perfectly right in thinking that the question of State rights is rather an academic than a concrete matter.

Mr. ISAACS:

It caused a civil war.

Mr. GLYNN:

I will come to that in a minute. What really were the principal matters of divergence of opinion or the principal matters which agitated American politics after the establishment of the Union? The first matter was one that all hon. members will agree with me was of academic rather than real operation. It was the matter of State rights as to secession.

The CHAIRMAN:

Does the hon. member think this has any relation to the question before the Committee?

Mr. GLYNN:

I think it has upon the question we are now considering. The trend of the debate has been largely in the direction of the danger of fencing in the Upper House with powers equal with those of the Lower, and which may give such a power as to enable the smaller States to crush out the larger ones. I shall shortly refer to it. My argument is this: that from the beginning of the operation of Federation in America down even to the present time the system of politics there has not turned upon the question of State rights. The question of secession, I need not more than mention, was one as regards the interpretation of the Constitution. It was not a question of State against State, not, at all events, a point of dispute between the large and the small States. Let me refer to the next question now, and that is the question of the capital, which may rise here.

The CHAIRMAN:

The hon. member will see that the question before the Committee is the power proposed to be given the Senate to amend Money Bills, and has that anything to do with the capital?

Mr. GLYNN:

Well, let me pass to the question of the tariff. I wish to point out that in 1824 the point in dispute in America, the tariff, was not a question between the larger and the smaller States, or more than by an accident, in appearance, between State and State. The Northern States were thickly populated, and had manufactures started, while the slave States were agricultural and pastoral, so that lines of demarcation were strongly drawn on the question of the tariff. Here in Australia there is not likely to be the same difference of State opinion.

Mr. SOLOMON:

What about Victoria?

Mr. GLYNN:

If we enter into Federation we are not likely to have differences of opinion between the smaller and the larger colonies on the question of the tariff. Returning to my argument referring to America, the question of slavery, of course, gave origin to the war, but again I would point out that the fight was not between the smaller and the larger States, but between the States in which the practice of slavery existed and those in which it did not. On the financial relations between the two Houses might I refer hon. members to an American authority who has recently written, showing that really the antagonism is not between the Senate and the House of Representatives, as the States House and the popular House, but between them as the Senate as the House of supervision, and the House of Representatives as the one which originates. Bryce says:

The House of Representatives has never been the organ of the large States, nor prone to act in their interest, so neither has the Senate been the standfast of the small States, yet American politics have never turned upon an antagonism between these two sets of Commonwealths. Questions relating to States rights and greater or less extension of the powers of the national Government have played a leading part in the history of the Union. But, although small States might be supposed to be specially zealous for States rights, the tendency to uphold them has been no stronger in the Senate than in the House. In one phase of the slavery struggle the Senate happened to be under the control of the slaveholders, while the House was not; and then, of course, the Senate championed the sovereignty of the States. But this attitude was purely accidental, and disappeared with the transitory cause.

There is another authority on this point, but as I do not wish to overburden myself with quotations from authorities I will pass it by. Mr. Solomon interjected just now about Victoria in regard to the question of the tariff, and I would ask hon. members as they seem to stick to it, what combinations are possible on the question? Is it likely that you will see a combination of South Australia and Victoria, of a larger and smaller, against New South Wales on the question of the tariff? The first two are protectionist, while New South Wales holds to what, in my humble opinion, is the best policy—that of allowing the stream of the life blood of a State to flow as freely as possible. If a Tariff Bill were introduced into the Federal Parliament there would not be a combination of South Australia, Queensland, and Tasmania against Victoria and New South Wales, but Victoria would rather lead the antagonism against New South Wales on the question of freetrade. I think I am entitled to ask whether the real difference on the fiscal question would not be between the cities and the country within the limitation of the Federation, and not between State and State? Agriculture, as represented in the country, might be expected to take one side, and manufactures, as represented in the cities, the other. Then with regard to the question of the rivers would there be a combination of the smaller States against the larger? I think you would rather find Victoria and South Australia engaged in the fight against New South Wales. But really, when you ask yourselves what are the matters that would be likely to arise on the States rights question I look to history for an example. We have heard that the dispute as to the fiscal relations between England and Ireland is one that might arise. but I would point out that the dispute has arisen there under the terms of a contract—the Act of Union—terms similar to which we have absolutely nothing in our proposed Federal Act. The contributions to the general expenditure of Ireland and England were fixed in the relation of 1 to 7 and it was provided that if the indebtedness of the countries should reach the same proportion, there should be an amalgamation of their exchequers. A consolidated fund was to arise. If you had a federal system there you might point to it as an analogy. Then there are several other matters in relation to England and Ireland from which we might have an example. Until 1864 there was no income tax in Ireland, but there was in England; but this example cannot apply here, because we have a provision that taxation must be uniform. If you go to America and ask yourselves this question-how the Houses behave towards one another on the question if Money Bills? I think we will be driven to the conclusion that there will be very little possibility of deadlocks. They do not stick to the separate lines of power and action fixed by the constitution at all. It is provided in the American Constitution that the Upper House has the power of initiating expenditure. Bryce tells us that all appropriations of expenditure begin in the Lower House. Again the Senate in the United States has, in practice, the greater power in relation to taxation. They can amend Taxation Bills. Their amendments are invariably negatived by the House of Representatives, and then they are considered by a Committee of both Houses. This Committee makes recommendations to the two Houses, and these are generally acted on. The outcome of that is that the Senate has

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I have listened to the speeches advocating both sides of this question with a considerable amount of disappointment; not but that they have been eloquent addresses, but that to a large extent those who were in sympathy with the principle I hold are prepared to emasculate their opinions. I take my hon. friend Mr. Deakin, who this afternoon addressed this Convention at very considerable length and with very considerable force and eloquence. That hon. member was of opinion that the powers which our friends from the smaller colonies had conceded to them in the Senate were too large. What does that hon. member propose to do, and with him others who have spoken representing the larger colonies? They propose to give the Senate power to make suggestions as to Money Bills which to my mind are equal to amendments.

Mr. REID:

I was always against it.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

We have heard from Sir Joseph Abbott (for years Speaker of the New South Wales Assembly), and an authority second to none, that to allow the Senate to make suggestions and forward them by message is equivalent to allowing it to make them in the form of amendments. What is the form of the message from House to House on amendments? The message asks the concurrence of the other Chamber, and that is simply a suggestion made in one way. An amendment has no force or effect until it receives the concurrence of the other Chamber. Mr. McMillan has well said that the whole thing is a dispute over the choice of words, and that position, to my mind, is absolutely incontestable. I am not surprised at Mr. Glynn recommending the acceptance of this amendment by those who represent the smaller colonies. I should be very sorry to see them reject it. No man has a right to speak as to what his constituents would do, but if I take back the Bill with the 1891 compromise I shall strain every effort to reject that compromise. We have not had any popular expression of feeling in New South Wales, or through the advocacy of its press in favor of the acceptance of the compromise of 1891. I consider that the proposal now made to take away the right, of amendment and leave this right of suggestion is really running away from one's creed. If you want to debar the Senate as representing a minority of the people of Australia from having coordinate powers in regard to taxation and other Bills, you will not do so by depriving it of the right of amendment, and leaving the still larger power of veto and rejection. Mr. O'Connor pretends to support this amendment, because if we do not carry it, the Senate will be allowed the opportunity to frustrate the financial policy of a Government. The Senate can frustrate and destroy the financial policy of the Government so long as it can have an unrestricted power of veto and rejection. We see the financial policy of Government after Government in these colonies frustrated by the exercise of the power of veto and rejection. We have experience of that in our own colony. The strongest power conferred upon any assembly is the power of rejection. The power of amendment is the smallest power, and when you give the larger power with the power of suggestion, you give practically all that is to be given, and we shall have to go back to our constituents with empty hands. I am sorry that there has been so much contention over the use of these words. I want to justify my vote right through as to the question of the powers of the Senate, because I shall change my ground in Committee to that which I took up in the Convention. I then intimated that I was in favor of granting equal representation to all the States, with the proviso: so long as we had secured in some shape or form the ultimate triumph of the will of the people. But I can see in this Bill brought before us, no possible power of the people in case of dispute to rule: that power has been absolutely taken away from the people, and there is no means for the ultimate will of the people becoming law. I retrace my steps and am therefore not prepared to concede this principle of equal representation.
But if you have a properly constituted representation of the people of Australia I do not object to give the Senate the most absolute coordinate powers with the Lower Chamber, for I cannot see any force in the contention that where people derive their authority equally they should have unequal powers. If you constitute a Senate in such a fashion that it will derive equal authority from equal sources, I say let it have equal powers and results. But if you do not constitute it in that way, then I say that there must be some restriction. I should even accept the proposals in this Bill, if, with the fruitful creation of deadlocks, which are sure to ensue, there were some power to settle these deadlocks in accordance with the will of the majority of the people. I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. member for South Australia, Mr. Symon, and he will excuse me if I take up and still further pursue the analogy that he adduced. I will ask him to place himself in my position, and accept the analogy to its legitimate conclusion. He instances the gradual reform—at least I call it reform—of the Legislative Council in South Australia, and how demands were made for the broadening of the franchise of that House. The hon. gentleman said that undoubtedly, or possibly, there would be still farther demands until we should have the Legislative Council practically elected upon the same franchise and the same suffrage as the Lower House the Legislative Assembly—and if that were so, he said, who would deny to that Chamber equal rights with the Lower Chamber in dealing with questions of finance and taxation? Now, I take the hon. member's analogy. Supposing accompanying that reform there were a proposal that with equal franchise with the same suffrage, the city of Adelaide should return one member and some paltry, petty municipality should return another member.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   That is the point.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
   Or supposing we had the colony of South Australia divided into three portions—the Northern Territory as one, that arid desert land in the interior, which we have heard so much about, as another, and the fertile land around Adelaide, with all its manufactories and large population, as the third. Perhaps seven-tenths of the population would be in the seaboard constituency, and the other three-tenths in the two northern constituencies combined. Supposing each of these constituencies returned one member, would the hon. member be prepared to say they were returned on equal suffrage and that the representation was equal.

Mr. SYMON:
   You could not have such a case.
Mr. CARRUTHERS:
But it is actually proposed to have it in regard to Federated Australia.

Mr. SYMON:
Not at all.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
What is too monstrous to consider for one moment in regard to South Australia is not at all monstrous when you come to apply it to Australia, with its State boundaries created by accidents, when you have a parallel of latitude or longitude—about which, too, there may be some doubt—when you have a physical feature of the country, such as a mountain chain or a river as the boundary of States. You propose to take the States according to these accidental boundaries, and to constitute a Chamber of Representatives from these States. Then it is not by any means monstrous.

Mr. SYMON:
That is not an analogy at all.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I have pursued Mr. Symon's analogy, applying it to South Australia.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
You have absorbed every other State in the process.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
The other day we had a petition from Queensland which asked that if Queensland was brought into the Federation it should be introduced as three States. Well, probably there was logic on the side of the Queenslanders, and we may have conceded the three States' position there. That would mean three more sets of members. Is there any greater logical reason why they should have three sets of members because of such accidental occurrences as the sun shining a little hotter on one part than another, or one place being east of a river and another west, and another place being on the seaboard?

Mr. PEACOCK:
You ought to have brought ten members from Norfolk Island.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
We might indeed ask to have two of our dependencies created into States—Lord Howe Island and Norfolk Island. In Norfolk Island we have about 1,000 inhabitants, and in Lord Howe Island there are a considerable number. With just as much logic as Mr. Symon has shown, we might ask that these places should be created into States, and without lack of consideration ask that they should be entitled to send representatives to the Senate; and when you would cry out that the population is so unequal, we would begin to ask where the limits begin and where they end.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Do you know?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
If we can get some idea of the limit line of population, I ask how many men in New South Wales it takes to make one solid vote equal to one man's vote in South Australia?

Mr. REID:
Take six.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
If Mr. Symon will permit me to further refer to his very able and interesting address, he adjured this Committee to trust the Senate. He echoed the sentiments of my friend Mr. Deakin, that the Senate was to be a body practically composed of men of culture, judgment, and experience from all Australia, a dignified assembly that would not demean itself by undertaking small and petty work. My friend took advantage of these expressions, and said, that being so, and he believed it was so, he wanted us to trust the Senate. I asked him to go a little further. Trust the people. That is better than trusting the Senate.

Mr. SYMON:
Hear, Hear. Trust all sections of the people.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
If my friend will follow to its logical conclusion the argument be proposed himself, then in case of conflict between those who directly derive their authority from the people, on the principle of equality of voting, in case of a dispute between the members of the House of Representatives and the Senate, is he prepared to vote for some provision by which the people themselves can be invited to settle the dispute, and by which the ultimate decision may be according to their will? If he is willing to go that far, I will go as far as even Sir John Forrest, and vote to give ample and full powers to the Senate.

Mr. SYMON:
How do you suggest to get the will of the people?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I cannot see any reason why we should not go to that full extent.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not want more than is in the Bill.

Mr. BARTON:
You will find it a long dated Bill if you want it that way.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
There should be ultimate rule by the people, not by broad acres, or arbitrary boundaries, or other accidental occurrences in our Australian civilisation; there should be a Constitution "broad-based upon the people's will," and I suggest that we arrive at a compromise either by electing the Senate on a suffrage so distributed that each member will derive an equal authority from the people; or, failing that, that if we are to have a Senate so constituted as directly or indirectly to conserve the interests of States according to their physical boundaries, then in case of inevitable disputes that must arise between bodies deriving their authority on totally different bases, let the ultimate decision rest with the people themselves, either by referendum or by adopting some modification of the Norwegian system, which I am surprised Mr. O'Connor has not proposed.

Mr. BARTON:
Plenty of time.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I did not because it was not brought on in the Constitutional Committee.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
Let the two Houses sit and vote together. In ninety-nine out of 100 cases where the two Houses vote together the will of the people will prevail; and I am quite willing to risk the hundredth case. We have now no provision whatever to meet deadlocks. Mr. Wise, in the course of his remarks, with which I mainly agree, pointed out that it was not merely on matters of finance that differences of opinion were most likely to arise, but on questions of social reform, industrial questions, and many others. In that I quite agree with him. We may be too careful in regard to the powers of the Senate in money matters, Taxation Bills, etc., and too careless of their powers in other more vital questions.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The Senate has no power over social questions under this Constitution.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I am not going to quote tomes of records, but if members will trace the history of the Civil War in America they will find that that war was caused wholly as the result of the persistent action of the Senate in trying to impose slavery as the law on the majority of the States in America. Year after year the Senate refused to admit new States into the Union unless it practically imposed on those States a system of slavery. It was the result of the action of the Senate, not in Money Bills, but in matters affecting the liberties of the people, that we had as an eventual result the growth of this feeling in favor of slavery, and ultimately the Civil war. I say that there are other questions within the scope and purview of this Bill of greater importance perhaps than the mere question of land tax. We have here the question of the exclusion of aliens-
The CHAIRMAN:

I must ask the hon. member as far as he can to confine himself to the matter at issue.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I am proceeding to argue and to give reasons why, if we give co-ordinate powers to the Senate on other matters, we should also give them coordinate powers in regard to money matters. If you are going to give the Senate equal power in regard to the admission of new States, equal powers in regard to these important matters mentioned in the clauses of this Bill, there is no reason to deprive it of equal power in regard to money matters. My objection goes to the granting of equal powers unless you have some method for an ultimate decision being arrived at by the will of the people. I do not intend to detain this Committee, but my vote will be given throughout on every clause of this Bill in order to force some compromise being arrived at which will at all times affect this—whether the Senate has co-ordinate powers or limited powers, or is constituted on this basis or on that basis—that there should be the will of the people running supreme throughout the whole Bill, and that there should be no compromise made which should rob the people of rights which are given to them by the union not merely of the States, but of the people within the States. I would suggest, therefore, instead of fighting a paltry amendment such as this, that we should go at the whole of the amendments of the 1891 compromise. If we find our constituents behind us are willing to make the compromise they will give us instructions to that effect, but at the present time it will be far better to see that within the four corners of the Bill there is no mere trusting to the generosity or sense of justice of the House of Representatives or of the Senate, but that throughout the Bill there is the one question of trusting the people, and that the authority of the people shall remain supreme in regard to the Constitution of the Senate, in regard to the constitution of the House of Representatives and as a Final Court of Appeal.

Mr. ISAACS:

I share entirely the feeling that has been expressed by various hon. members in this Committee, of anxiety for the outcome of this discussion. I feel that we have arrived at a point where the tension is of the greatest, and I feel that within the next hour or so the fate, for the present at all events, of the Federation question in Australia will be determined. I do not share the opinion of my hon. friend Mr. Dobson when he says that we ought not to express the opinions we entertain as to the reception that this decision is likely to be accorded in our various colonies. I think it is our duty now or never to be frank with each other and, speaking for myself—and I believe I am in a position to speak for my colleagues also—I say that there is no shadow of doubt that anything less than the compromise of 1891 would be utterly and absolutely rejected by the colony we represent. I desire to endorse the observations made by those who preceded me from the colony of Victoria, that it is difficult enough—it has been difficult enough in the past—to induce the people to consider favorably the compromise arrived at six years ago. I desire to press it with all the good feeling that it is possible to infuse into my words upon my fellow delegates.

An HON. MEMBER:

Representatives.

Mr. ISAACS:

Well, whatever you please. I would impress upon them the necessity of endeavoring here to consider, if they desire to have Federation at all, the desirability of not withdrawing from the compromise of 1891; because it cannot be concealed, that what is proposed by those who are adverse to this amendment is withdrawal from the compromise previously arrived at—a going back from the understanding reached already by the colonies. We cannot forget, with the great Federation which stands as a model before us, what was said by one of the greatest men America has ever had, "that it was extorted from the grinding necessities of a reluctant people." We are, fortunately, not in that position. The people of Victoria, and indeed of all Australia, desire that there should be Federation. They see that amongst the various powers, authorities, and rights that their several governments wield and exercise there are some that concern them, and this is the root of the matter which interests them, not as individuals of different States, but as the people of the whole continent of Australia. They see the disadvantages, the folly, the expense, and the danger of remaining separated on certain questions, and with that before them, and uniting with their material considerations a public sentiment of the highest possible nature, they desire that their separate existences as States with regard to those collective interests should cease now and for ever, and that they should henceforth be regarded as one united people. I was very much surprised to hear my hon. friend Mr. McMillan refer to what he called the ignorant feeling on the part of the people of Australia; but so far as I have had the privilege of coming into contact with the people on this question, I find that the feeling, so far from being ignorant, has been of slow growth; it is deep rooted, clear, and is the result of a long and careful education. I believe there is nothing they would prize more at the present moment than to see these arbitrary marks and divisions that now exist in regard to certain matters entirely obliterated. When we are asked to make what are termed concessions, I ask have we not already made more concessions than the justice of the case warrants? Let us ask ourselves what is the meaning of this Federation. My hon. friends Sir John Downer and Mr. Symon asked us to acknowledge gracefully and quickly the right and justice of the claim that is made on behalf of the less populous colonies as to co-ordinate powers in regard to finance. Let us consider for a moment what it seems to me has been entirely lost sight of: the reason of this Federation and the meaning of it. We possess as separate and distinct colonies a host of powers and authorities. Most of these are purely of local concern. Most of these can be best worked out by us as we now stand as different and distinct identities. With most of these things no one State is concerned with the management of the other, but there are certain matters-such as defence, quarantine, and various other things—we generally agree upon, in which we as a people say we are concerned, not as residents of Victoria, Tasmania, or any other colony, but because our interests and our desires are united. We say there is henceforth to be no distinction between us; let us blot out of our future history and out of our future politics the arbitrary fact that we are residents of different colonies, and if we start with that and we select these subjects, it is on the distinct basis that our interests are identical. If our interests are identical why do we have it continually thrown in our face that the diversity of State interests in these matters is to be protected? We select these subjects on which we are agreed; there is by this very hypothesis no diversity of interests in these matters, and the residuary powers are retained by the States. As to these they have their State rights, and the federal authority cannot enter into the sphere one single inch. It is outside the sphere of Federation altogether, but when we have selected these subjects on which our interests are presumably identical the States, as such, have equally little claim to enter. It is because we assume as a starting point that there is no divergence of interest that we attempt to federate at all, and we are doing something self-contradictory when we say in one breath that we federate on these subjects as one united people with regard to State distinctions because our interests are identical in these matters, and in the next breath turn round and say we must have equal representation in the Senate because we must protect the diversity of our interests in these matters. If our interests are not identical, do not federate. If they are diverse and repugnant let us remain as we are, but do not let us be inconsistent and illogical with ourselves by saying one moment: We federate in these matters, and select them from the mass of our present possessions—we place on one side all those subjects that concern us as one people, as Australians, not as residents of separate colonies, and we deal with these under a Federal Government—that as to these questions we regard ourselves as a nation, and yet the next instant, with forgetfulness of the true position, that in the very collective interests we must still protect our State rights.

Mr. SOLOMON:

We might as well pool our revenue.

Mr. ISAACS:

Perhaps it is my misfortune in not being able to convey to the hon. member what I mean.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

You are quite clear.

Mr. ISAACS:

This is the starting point of the matter. The State rights are conserved by the exclusion of the subjects which are still retained for State government. Such interest in the matters that are appropriated to the Federation are admitted to be identical, or else we would not federate. If they are not identical, if they do not concern us generally, why do we federate upon them at all? Therefore it is because we say: Henceforth let us be one nation in those regards, let us contribute man for man throughout Australasia with regard to them, let us regulate them as one people—that we have determined to enter upon this scheme. For that reason we have the House of Representatives on the basis of proportional representation, and we have a Second Chamber as they have in America for the purpose of what has been called the sober second thought of the people, elected in a different manner for a different term, and without the power of dissolution; but it is only the fear, the ill-grounded fear, of the smaller American States that led them after that was determined on to say "We must have equal representation." It was denied by the Federalists, insisted upon by the Particularists, and here we have the same fight 100 years afterwards. This principle is foreign to Federation. The only units in a true Federation are the people. Outside the sphere of the Federation we have the States, and their people owe allegiance to them, but the allegiance of the peoples to the States can only be in regard to the matters which are not conferred upon the federal authority. The allegiance of the people to the federal authority is beyond all question free of the allegiance of the people to the States in that connection. We have here a great authority, Mr. Freeman, who tells us that:

The State administration within its own range will be carried on as freely as if there was no such thing as an Union. The federal administration within its own range will be carried on as freely as if there was no such thing as a separate State.

That is the key of the whole position. A State is not a unit in a true Federation. That is an important principle, and to my mind it is the vital question when we are considering the question of equal representation. It is because the people have come to the conclusion that certain matters heretofore carried on by the States as such should no longer be so, but should be massed together and worked in the interests of the people as a whole, that we have determined to federate at all.

Once we have arrived at that conclusion we exclude State interference in their particular range. We are told—never mind the logic of the position—that equal representation is essential. I believed, and within certain limitations I believe it still, that equal representation is right to protect the smaller States from fears which are groundless, but, as I have said before, and I hope may repeat without presumption, are not unreasonable in certain minds. But I am not willing that that equal representation shall be coupled with co-ordinate powers. If you have co-ordinate powers, or what are tantamount to co-ordinate powers, you have no need for equal representation. Take the position of a Senate based in some respects on the principle that it is an Upper House. It is elected in a different way, its members are elected for different terms, and it is free from dissolution, all because it is regarded as an Upper House, not because it is an Assembly of the States, because there is no more reason for those characteristics than in the case of an Assembly of the people, but because it possesses to some extent all the functions of an Upper House. Admittedly it has those characteristics. Having those characteristics it is contended it must be equal in representation. That has been pointed out by Sir Henry Maine to be really inequality and not equality of representation—in name equality, in substance inequality. To say that the State of Nevada, where 21,000 men return a senator is to be equal with the State of New York, where 3,000,000 return one, is, I say, a travesty on the word, and to say that Western Australia with 138,000 people—

Sir JOHN FORREST:

153,000 people.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Do not quarrel over a few thousand, Sir John.

Mr. ISAACS:

They are increasing by leaps and bounds every day. To say that Western Australia with that population is to have the same representation in the Senate with New South Wales with its 1,300,000 people is equally ridiculous. To say that three-fifths of the Senate representing one-fifth of the population of Australia and representing one-fourth of the federal revenue should be able to dominate the remaining four-fifths of the population and the remaining three-fourths of the revenue, is equally absurd, and therefore when I am asked, as we are all asked, to supply the reason in logic and injustice for not making this concession, I think when these facts are stated, the reason, the logic, and the justice are self-evident. Remembering that as we are to be one Federation, one people, contributing expenditure equally per head, as my honorable friend Mr. Moore interjected to-day, I would like to remind him that though the expenditure is equal per head, in the Senate the representation is not equal per head, and, as I put it before, and it has been repeated over and over again, he would have an absolute minority of the people in this Federation dominating the majority of the people and the greater part of their money. "Trust the Senate," says my honorable friend Mr. Symon. Yes; I would trust the Senate, but it must be remembered that the majority of the members of that Senate are not dealing with their own money. They are dealing with other people's money. That is the vital flaw. In one country, with a unitary Government, there is no such serious difficulty if you have the Senate or the equivalent House elected upon as broad a basis as we are prepared to make it here. There is no such objection, at all events as exists in the present case, to trusting them, because they are dealing with their own money, but here you are basing the Senate on an inequality. You are basing it not upon representation of individuals, but upon distinctions that by the very essence of the problem, upon the very hypothesis upon which we federate, ought to be obliterated. Let me put one more case. The House of Representatives is to be subject to dissolution. Why is that so? Suppose the two Houses came into conflict, and the main thing they are likely to come into conflict about is finance, what is the only remedy? Dissolution - an appeal to the whole people. Why is the power put there? Has the Senate to accept the verdict of the people or not? If it has, what becomes of this question of the equality of the Senate? Surely when that provision for dissolution of the House of Representatives is looked at, it must either be nothing but a gratuitous penalty on the people's House, or the result must be accepted as the verdict of the people by the whole Federal Parliament. Which is it to be? I recognise that the time is very short. Other members wish to speak, and I do not desire to delay their opportunity. I only desire to add that the arguments of hon. members who have preceded me have not, in my humble judgment, affected the most cogent reasons that, while the power of rejection should be retained, the power of amendment should be refused. I desire that the Constitution shall contain the assurance of stability, that will enable the people to have security and safety, and above all allow the administration to be conducted with energy. The course proposed by my hon. friends opposite is a course which in my humble judgment will render the Constitution unstable, and the people dissatisfied, and which will produce not confidence but jealousy, in the conduct of affairs, and above all, in the most urgent moment of their need, will be likely to strike the Government and administration with paralysis. We cannot afford in these latter days to halt for a generation for the fructification of ideas, as we used to. In these days of social and industrial development, we must not forget that political thought and political action must travel quicker, and therefore it is not an antiquarian matter of research that, there must be predominance and supremacy somewhere. We must remember that the question of responsible government is not antiquarian but of recent origin, and has arisen and flourished side by side and contemporaneously with the doctrine that one House must be supreme in finance; and as long as that lasts, and as long as responsible government lasts, we must expect to develop in the course we have been pursuing. If we accept this clause in the Bill, then I say that Federation will be put off longer than I anticipated or hoped for, because the people will recognise that responsible government is impossible under it. As we sow others must reap, and in taking our stand upon this all-important and indeed vital question we are discharging a duty, not merely to ourselves and those around us, but to millions in Australia now and to come.

Mr. JAMES:

The difficulty of the smaller States in this discussion is that the eloquent members representing the larger States wrap up their fallacies in such beautiful language that it is difficult to tear away those, beautiful petals and expose the error that underlies their arguments. I understood—and I speak with the utmost diffidence, subject to correction by members of this Convention—that the essential principle of Federation is that you require to all your laws the assent of a body representing the States as States and the assent of a body representing the people as people. I am not aware that any Federation exists to-day based on any other principle than that. I was not aware indeed that any Federation had been proposed on any other principles until we met in Adelaide to frame a Federal Constitution for Australia in the year 1897. I have very great respect for modern days. I am said in my own colony to be a democrat, but great though my respect for the present be, I think we would be overstepping the limit placed upon us if we struck out in an altogether new line, and I venture to say to our democratic friends from Victoria that they are asking us to go too far if they ask us to adopt a Constitution which we find recognised in no other part of the world.

Mr. HIGGINS:

What about the proportions of representation?

Mr. JAMES:

We are not now dealing with representation. We are now dealing with the question of the powers to be conferred upon the Upper House or Senate. It may be a question for later consideration as to what ought to be the proportion of representation, and how we shall face that question. I enter my emphatic protest against there being woven round this question matters entirely foreign to it. We have to say now what are the powers to be conferred upon the Senate. In due time we may determine how the Senate is to be elected. If it is true-and I have not heard any contradiction of it in this Convention-that the essential principle of a safe Federation is that a law shall be approved by a body representing the States as States, and by a body representing the individuals as individuals, surely the Senate is entitled to have co-ordinate powers and co-ordinate jurisdictions. It is suggested that there should be some limitation upon these powers, because we must introduce into our Constitution a recognition of the existence of responsible government. Now, if that be so-and I am not going to question it—surely the onus is upon those who say there should be modifications to prove that the modifications they require are essential, and to prove that responsible government cannot exist unless those modifications appear in the Constitution. I have not yet heard any one address himself to that particular point. We have heard a great many high sounding platitudes about the will of the people. I have yet to learn that one man representing 10,000 any more represents the will of the people than one man representing 5,000. I have yet to learn that six men representing the whole of Western Australia represent that colony less accurately than thirty-six men representing the whole of Western Australia. In each case the, men elected by the people represent the people, and the introduction of these platitudes does not, I think, conduce to clearness. We want to realise what powers the Senate is entitled to. Those who think it is entitled to coordinate powers base their claims upon a principle which no member of this Convention dare controvert—and if you want to limit those powers we say the onus of proof is upon you to establish your right to have those limitations placed upon us. How has that onus been discharged? What does it amount to to say what were the objects of the framers of the American Constitution? We are not concerned as to what their objects were. We are looking at the completed work. It is the work in this case that reflects credit upon the men, and not the men who reflect credit upon the work. We know that whatever the influences were impelling the construction of that work as we find it there to-day, that Constitution stands, with the recognition that the Senate really has more than coordinate power, whatever may have been the intention. With all respect to those who advanced that argument, it seems to me to be beside the mark to consider the reason that impelled the framers of that Constitution to their conclusions. There are instances in which interests of the smaller States in respect of those matters conferred upon the federal authority in the proposed Bill, might conflict with the interests of the more populous States. I decline to accept the proposition that, even in respect of those matters which we hand over to the federal authority, there would not be a conflict of interests. The arguments that we have heard members on behalf of the more populous States use show that, if they could, they would go to this extent: that the Upper House should have no power at all. It would be simply put there to a large extent to appease the feelings of the smaller States, to give them something they could toy with, to give them something which would make them believe they had been given protection for their State interests. I take it that the federal authority would deal with powers surrendered to them as rights of the States and not as rights of the people. I am one of those who say that those who surrender rights shall have the right to say how those rights shall be disposed of. It is beside the question for the more populous States to say that they are surrendering that which is the more valuable. I have yet to learn that the rights Western Australia surrenders are less valuable than the rights surrendered by New South Wales or Victoria. We surrender rights which are just as valuable to us, and which we regard as being just as important, and we claim all equal voice in that government which shall determine how those rights are to be disposed of. The great evil we fear is the very strong tendency there is towards centralisation. Will that not be increased if we are to have a federal system of government? In Western Australia -and it is probably the same in other colonies-where we are developing our resources, we might have serious injury inflicted upon us by a Customs Bill, an injury which might not extend to the more populous States. We, in Western Australia, have just now a very large demand for mining machinery; in the more populous States they make mining machinery. Such States as Western Australia, which are in process of vigorous development, essentially require not only some vote but a strong vote for the purpose of protecting their interests against the centralising influences of the larger States. In that case I say smaller States, taking Western Australia as an instance, have a distinct right to say if they are handing over the powers for future development, that you shall have no right to take those powers and develop them and use them, not for their use, not for the development of those States, but for the development of the more prosperous communities. At present I am not prepared to vote for the amendment. I think that on principle—and I have not heard it controverted—the smaller States are entitled to more powers than are given by this section as it stands. If this matter comes before us at the adjourned meeting, rather than see Federation wrecked, I should be prepared to make some concession; but until I have some assurance from those who speak on behalf of the more populous States, and from the discussions and decisions upon this matter in the Parliaments of those States, I decline—using the word in no offensive manner—to accept any authority less than e to any serious extent with the growth of responsible government.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Hear, hear.

Mr. JAMES:

It amuses me almost to hear some members of this Convention endeavoring to wetnurse responsible government. That institution is of such a vigorous growth that if we in this Convention dared to place undue restriction on it, it would sweep us away like cobwebs. Let us adopt the true principle, being assured that responsible government is so much a part of us, and of the atmosphere we have always breathed in our political life, that no Constitution we can frame can interfere with the essential principles of its growth. Let us look after the principle of Federation, being assured that it does not require the wetnursing of members of this Convention to protect a principle so vital and so important as the principle of responsible government.

Mr. GORDON:

I move that the Committee do now divide.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not wish to speak to-night, because—

Mr. GORDON:

Oh, I beg your pardon; I withdraw,

Mr. BARTON:

I am scarcely in a condition to speak to-night, because I am suffering from a bronchial cold. I do not wish to delay the Committee, but I feel that this is a question on which I have some right to be heard. Sir John Forrest knows there is no intention on my part to delay a division. I should like to be able to speak to-morrow, if progress can be reported to-night.

Mr. HENRY:
I should not have ventured to occupy the time of the Committee on this question, because I feel that nothing I can say will influence a single vote, and I doubt whether any of the eloquent speeches we have heard to-day have influenced votes at all, but in the vote I am going to give on this question I shall be in a decided minority in my own delegation, and I desire to justify that vote from my own point of view.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HENRY:

That is the sole object I have in rising to address myself to this question. It has been said and suggested by members of my own delegation that we shall imperil State rights if we adopt the compromise of 1891. I fail to see where State rights are imperilled by refusing to pass this clause as it now stands and adopting that compromise instead. I have listened carefully to all the arguments pro and con on this matter, and have been confirmed by what I have heard in the opinion I formed when I first gave the subject any consideration, that the difference between power of suggestion and power of amendment of Money Bills is practically nothing. I have failed to distinguish in the debate to-night that hon. members recognise any practical difference in the two proposals. And if there is no difference I naturally ask why members on one side or the other so contend for their respective positions. If I felt that the interests of the colony which I share in representing at this Convention were imperilled in any way by voting in favor of the 1891 compromise I certainly should be the last man to join-in imperilling those interests. But I fail to see in what respect this proposal imperils State interests. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the eloquent speeches that have been made on this subject. I listened with very great interest to the speech of Mr. Symon. That hon. member led me to believe that if we had equal representation, which to my mind is the primary thing we require in protecting our State interests, to refuse the Senate the power to amend Money Bills would be to tie their hands in such a way that equal representation would be practically a mockery. I fail to see in what respect the refusal to grant the Senate power to amend Money Bills, at the same time granting them the power to make suggestions, ties their hands. I desire to address myself to all these questions in a practical spirit, and I fail to recognise in what respect the hands of the Senate are tied in this way. That hon. gentleman further said as an objection that the granting of the power to the Senate of making suggestions by way of amendment of Money Bills was in some way derogatory and that it came as a favor. I fail to see that either, because it is a specific power to be granted to the Senate under the Constitution Bill, and that power is as much a right as though we granted them the power of amendment of Money Bills. The distinction to my mind has no force. While the Senate has the supreme power to veto any taxation or other Money Bill, there is no doubt that that is the real power which protects State interests. In all the debates we have had up to the present time there has been constant allusion to the probable difference that will arise between the Senate and the House of Representatives. But it has occurred to me that there may be a danger in too much uniformity, and that if the two Houses are to be elected on the same franchise the colony of Tasmania may be in danger through too much uniformity or agreement between the Houses rather than through any conflict between them. In Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia no doubt there is a growing opinion in particular directions on subjects of taxation which we are not sharing in Tasmania. And if these three colonies join in any particular taxing scheme, the result of a particular growth of opinion, I can see a danger of too much uniformity of opinion, and to my mind if the larger States or colonies would only grant a concession in the direction of a little conservatism in the election of members of the Senate it would be much more of a protection to the smaller States or to certain States than this mere power of amending Money Bills. I now come to an important question, and I ask myself what is the course to be adopted in this matter? On the one hand I see that the difference between making suggestions and amendments is not of vital importance, and on the other hand I see that the feeling which has grown up and which exists to a large extent in Victoria and New South Wales on this point is very strong, though it may be the result of ignorance! I think it must be admitted that the objection to the power to amend Money Bills on the part of Victoria, as well as a large section of New South Wales, is founded on ignorance of the difference between the power of amending and making suggestions to amend. It is enough for me, looking at the matter from a practical point of view, to ask myself this question: If I at this time vote against New South Wales and Victorian delegates will I not retard the great cause of Federation? I think I would, and therefore am not going to join with others in throwing a bucket of cold water on the question of Federation when the issue to my mind is not of sufficient importance to warrant me in jeopardising the greater question of Federation, and that will in my opinion result if the smaller colonies use their strength and their voting power to carry this point against the wish and feeling of the colonies of Victoria and New South Wales. I can readily understand that if the representatives of these two colonies are beaten on this point by thirty votes to twenty they will return to their colonies disheartened, and in detailing what has been done at the Convention to their people, to the Parliament, and through the press, it might lead to Victoria withdrawing altogether from the next Convention. I see the danger, and I will act on it in recording my vote against the rest of my fellow-delegates from Tasmania for the reasons I have just given. My hon. friend Mr. McMillan indicated that the time might come for compromise later on. I think if there is to be any compromise, now is the time for it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Hear, hear; and save all the trouble and turmoil that may come later on.

Mr. HENRY:
We have had a lot of nice sermons preached about compromise, but now is the time to practise it, and not send back the delegates to their colonies disheartened. That is the strong conviction that is agitating my mind, and it causes me to reluctantly differ from my colleagues on it. The Hon. Mr. Dobson asks what is the good of the Parliament? These Bills have to be discussed in Parliament, and I have no doubt that the respective Parliaments of the various colonies will do useful work in suggesting amendments to them. I like to be practical, and it is not part of my intention to waste the time of this Convention, but I should like to say before I sit down that Sir Joseph Abbott, in making one of his humorous allusions to Tasmania, in reply to my friend Mr. Douglas, said that a fleet coming to Australia would miss Tasmania altogether, because it is so small. I should like to remind him that Tasmania is just as large probably as the land from which he sprung, and about as large as the land from which the Premier of New South Wales boasts of having come. However, that is not the point, but I would like to say that Major-General Edwards did not share Sir Joseph Abbott's opinion, because, he said, if I recollect right, that a hostile fleet visiting Australia would make for Tasmania first, that Tasmania would form the base of operations against Australia, that Tasmania was the strategic key to the position, and that it was important from a defence point of view that Tasmania should form a portion of the Federation. I hope that I may not be considered boastful, but I will say that our sea-girt island is just as independent and self-reliant as any portion of Australia. We have great resources, we have an unmatched climate, and our people are as well able to go alone as are the people of any part of the continent, yet still we are desirous of sharing the national life of Australia, and I hope nothing Tasmania may do will in any way impede the great cause of Federation.

POST AND TELEGRAPH RECEIPTS.
Mr. HOLDER:
I beg to lay on the table to the order of the House, on the motion of Dr. Quick, March 23rd, a paper showing the receipts of each of the colonies during the last ten years from post offices and telegraphs, and I move:
That the Paper be printed.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
ADJOURNMENT.
Convention adjourned at 9.34 p.m.
Wednesday April 14, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

LOCAL LEGISLATURES AND THE DRAFT BILL.

Adjourned consideration of the motion:

That, in the opinion of this Convention, the interval for consideration of the Draft Bill by the local Legislatures should be extended to not less than 120 days nor more than 180 days.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

I claim the indulgence of the Convention to say, with regard to this motion, that I do not intend to proceed with it. There seems to be great difficulty in the way of the motion being adopted. I have conferred with the Premiers of the other colonies, and while I think they would not have been unwilling to have had the time extended under ordinary circumstances, still, under existing conditions, they were not able to concur with my proposal. Although it seems almost impossible for me to be able to deal with the Bill which will be framed by the Convention, and be in my place in 120 days' time, still I know my colleagues, the Premiers of the other colonies, are unable to agree to my suggestion; and therefore Western Australia must do the best she can under the circumstances. I move:

That the Order of the Day be read and discharged.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee (consideration resumed from April 13).

CHAPTER I.-THE LEGISLATURE.

Part V.-Powers of the Parliament.

Clause 53.- (1) The States Assembly shall have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of all proposed laws, except laws appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the Government, which the States Assembly may affirm or reject, but may not amend. But the States Assembly may not amend any proposed law in such a manner as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people.

(2) Laws imposing taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only.

(3) Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of Customs on imports, shall deal with one subject of taxation only.
(4) The expenditure for services other than the ordinary annual services of the Government shall not be authorised by the same law as that which appropriates the supplies for the ordinary annual services, but shall be authorised by a separate law or laws.

(5) In the case of a proposed law which the States Assembly may not amend, the States Assembly may at any stage return it to the House of Representatives with a menage requesting the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein. And the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make such omissions or amendments, or any of them, with or without modifications.

Upon which Mr. Reid had moved, by way of amendment:

After the word "I except," in line 2, to insert the words "laws imposing taxation and."

Mr. BARTON:

One or two members have intimated their desire to speak, and I would like to dispel an impression which seems to prevail that my rising to continue the debate is in effect a speech in reply. That is not so, as it is open to those who desire to debate this question to do so without regard to any speech which has been made. While I say this I will be as brief as possible, as I think we should meet the desire of the Western Australian members to have this matter decided before they leave. I hope that I shall not say anything which will be regarded as in the least degree heated by the warmth of debate. My desire is to put this matter before this Convention in a practical way.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear; hear.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not intend to take the same view that my hon. friend Mr. Carruthers has done, nor do I admit his statement that those who have spoken on the side he espouses are ready to emasculate their principles; nor do I quite see how in the way indicated one can be emasculating his principles, if Mr. Carruthers is ready to agree with Mr. McMillan in saying that this is a debate about a choice of words. How taking one side or the other can, in that case, be said to be a process of emasculating one's principles, I do not know. I am not prepared to subscribe to the charge of doing that even if I am not so emphatic as Mr. Carruthers was in the speech he made. I cannot accept as an analogy that which Mr. Carruthers put as regards the case of South Australia. He put the case of there being three members for South Australia—one for the Northern Territory, one for the desert portion of the country, and the other for Adelaide and adjacent portions which are so fertile and so populous. I do not see any analogy between that, nor between the Lord Howe and Norfolk Islands, and the present case. Here we are debating not only what are the rights, but what are the interests amongst themselves of what are already competent, and, to a certain extent, populous States, the smallest of them in area possibly the most fertile, and I do not see that when we are considering a matter of this kind where we are dealing with States which are now in themselves autonomous and entitled to be compared as regards their own interests with other States, we can rely upon such places as Lord Howe and Norfolk Islands, even with all the threatenings of New South Wales to bring them into the condition of separate States, nor trouble about an imaginary case as regards South Australia. The question before us is more practical than that, and in a large degree it is whether we shall come to a decision which will promote, or to a decision which will retard, and make impossible, the Federation we have been sent here to accomplish; and while we remember, as Sir John Downer and others do, that our duty is to our colony, it should also be remembered that the colony of every one of us has sent us here to perform a duty on its behalf, and that duty is to work out a practical scheme of Federation, and a scheme which can be accepted by every one of the colonies. That is our mission, and we cannot by taking one side or the other get away from the performance of our duty, for notwithstanding that we have been sent here in the interests of sundry colonies, the distinct command from those colonies is that their interests require that we should federate. But how are we to federate if the amendment is not carried? I quite admit the position laid down, that we should consider the interests of the smaller States, and with as much care as those of the more populous States. No one can get away from that position, but that does not relieve us of the difficulty; for if our mission is to make Federation possible to all the colonies, we must consider what kind of Federation there must be, to meet certain potentialities. We have been told by Sir Edward Braddon something about threats. No threats shall pass from my lips. I only wish to indicate what will be the result in certain contingencies. My whole attitude in this Convention has been opposed to any such expressions, I mean as to making threats, but I am not only entitled but called upon to express what I think will be the results in certain contingencies, provided I adhere to the question under debate. Now I do believe, and I cannot get away from the belief, that the decision which Sir John Forrest and those who vote with him would ask us to come to will be one which would seriously retard the chances of Federation, and not only seriously retard them, but have the effect, in certain colonies, at any rate, of putting back the movement indefinitely. We are told we are now simply in a preliminary stage. If we are in a preliminary stage, we are also in a precarious stage, and a very precarious one. The view that we are in a preliminary stage, because there is to be a second Convention, does not relieve us of the performance of that duty which we were sent here to perform, the construction of some workable scheme under which we believe the colonies would federate. If in taking this as a preliminary stage, we stick to our differences to the extreme points, and say that, because the stage is preliminary, our views can be altered afterwards, we are not carrying out the duty we were sent here to perform, if we do not, after mature consideration and with fairness on both sides—and without sacrifices there can be no Federation—agree to that which will be a groundwork for Federation. Recollecting that there can be a revision of our vote, still I say those who sent us here intended that we should mark out what we consider the best lines on which Federation can be based. I think it was Mr. Dobson who said that the time for conciliation would be after the Houses of Parliament had dealt with this question. I venture, respectfully, to differ entirely from that proposition. That is not the view to take, because it would operate against the purpose for which we were sent here—to frame a Constitution—a Constitution which from the outset might be found acceptable to the views of our electors, and not one which after being backed by the various Parliaments and handled by us subsequently would have to be moulded in another way because owing to the conditions of the people it was unacceptable as we first passed it.

Mr. DEAKIN:
That would be a Constitution moulded by the Parliaments and the Press, and not by this Convention.

Mr. BARTON:
Just so; not by this Convention, and the ability and experience of the men who are here.

Mr. HIGGINS:
We want to be able to go back and support the Bill.

Mr. BARTON:
Precisely. Suppose you come to a decision which you will have to adhere to—and we have no right to come to a decision in this Convention which we say we can easily alter as time goes on—we should do the best we can at the earlier stages, though there may be differences amongst us. If there come as the result of the proceedings of this Convention a Bill which is unacceptable, which is totally alien to the popular feeling of the larger States, then let us look the position in the face. This is not said in the way of threat, but in the way of justice. Without those States, how would Federation be possible to the other States? The more populous States, which are contiguous, could, I think, form a Federation in which they could get along very well. I am consistent in saying they could form a Federation, because every movement like this should be left to the particular States, but I might point out the disadvantages if a Federation remained to be made by South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania. The very geographical differences between those colonies would make their Federation a farce, not because there is not ability, power, and wealth in those colonies; but take the distance there is between South Australia and Western Australia, and between Tasmania and the other colonies, with the intervention of those parts which now go to make up one homogeneous whole, and the difficulties of such a Federation would be so great as to put it out of the question. That is the problem we have to face here. We must consider matters of this kind before we come to a decision, not regarding them as threats for a moment, because our duty is to consider what form of Federation the five colonies will accept. If the result of the labors of this Convention is, that the feeling with reference to Federation becomes so altered in some colonies as to cause them to abandon all practical interest in it, how could a Federation formed of those colonies which are constituted under the most divergent conditions as to their position, geographically and otherwise, with regard to one another, be entitled to be called a Federation of Australia, or its history be looked forward to as a history of success?

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Do you expect to have everything your own way?

Mr. BARTON:
I am not saying that: I am saying the very contrary. I am not going largely into the practical conditions which may arise if the States Assembly or Senate is allowed the power to amend Tax Bills. I hold rather strongly that if we are to have two Houses, and intend to act upon the principles of responsible government, and conserve those principles, we ought not to put in the hands of one House the ability to utterly destroy the financial policy of the Government. The expenditure depends upon the taxation, and if the taxation is so altered in its passage through a Second Chamber that the expenditure, which is perhaps sanctioned upon the Estimates, or about to be sanctioned upon the Estimates, proposed by the government is lessened, that right to amend the Taxation Bill practically means the right to cut down the Appropriation Bill, too.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Hear, hear.
Mr. BARTON:

Supposing that with the raising of £300,000 of taxation the Government will be enabled to make ends meet for certain items of expenditure by the Commonwealth, and supposing that they cannot get a Bill providing for that taxation through the Senate, but that the amount is cut down by £100,000, that must mean a corresponding reduction in the expenditure embodied in the Appropriation Bill. One hinges upon the other. It may be subtle enough for some of our friends to say they do not claim the right to amend the Appropriation Bill, but they really want the right to do so without saying a word about it. They may say "We will take your Appropriation Bill with its provision for so much expenditure," and leave you in the lurch to find some means of taxation to make that amount up. That makes them masters of the situation. It is not like the right of veto, because in exercising that right and taking the extreme course of vetoing such a measure right out, a House takes on itself the whole responsibility. If, however, it is merely a question of amendment, that House can say, "Oh, it is merely a matter of arrangement." But all the same the question is whether the policy of the Government shall proceed or not. If we come to that pass, such an alteration in the policy of the Government means that there is a divided responsibility. Because what is the position? If those who are in the House of Representatives—Ministers and members—have to accept these amendments, and then say to the people who sent them there, and who must according to their numbers pay the taxation—"Oh, well, we wanted to carry out our policy, but the strong Senate which exists has cut it down, and we thought we had better take all we could rather than get none"—where is the principle of responsibility? Instead of Ministers being responsible to the people through the House of Representatives they are responsible, some may say, to the people through both Houses. That is a divided responsibility; that is not carrying out the principle of responsible government with responsibility to one House. Although some may argue that the ultimate responsibility is to the people, we are not here to consider the process to be arrived at at very long last. A machine that will only work with a very much larger expenditure for oil than the machine itself originally cost is not an effective machine in the work-a-day sense of the term. And that is the difficulty that is in front of us, and which I submit, if we do not adopt this amendment, we cannot get over. Look at the position of this matter. We are told by Sir Edward Braddon that we who are not agreed with him are capable of seeing a thing applicable to ourselves, but are entirely blind to it when urged on behalf of the smaller States. There is not, however, and has not been, a difficulty in getting the smaller States to accept the Bill in the light of the compromise of 1891. I believe before this debate closes there will be evidence produced that there has not been a difficulty either in South Australia or Tasmania in getting the clauses passed in the shape of the compromise of 1891. That is the answer to my friend Sir Edward Braddon, because his people have been able to see this matter in the light of the honest compromise of 1891. They have shown they are able to accept a Bill in that shape, but in New South Wales there has been the very greatest difficulty in obtaining from meetings of electors any approval of the 1891 compromise, and if matters are to be taken further than that I only put to my fellow members the difficulty that will arise in endeavoring to get the electors to go that one step further.
Certainly, as has been pointed out, the Parliament can suggest an amendment, but if that comes to the Convention the latter will say, "That is only a suggestion from the Parliament of New South Wales. We are not going to abide by that." If the evidence at the mouths of men who cannot be disbelieved is of any practical value—and I take it that the experience of the large majority of representatives from New South Wales will outweigh the view of my friend Mr. McMillan, much as I respect him—then I say it has been a difficulty of the greatest character from the first to obtain an approval of this form of compromise which was made in 1891 from the electors of a colony such as New South Wales. I will not speak about Victoria, because I am not so conversant with the circumstances of Victoria, and I will leave members of that colony to speak for themselves.
How, then, when this compromise has been arrived at, after much argument, after much exhaustion of practical effort by experienced men on both sides—how, then, if there is a colony entitled to be considered here which is not like other colonies that have signified their approval, but which has by criticism in the press and in various other ways manifested some repugnance to the scheme—how can it be said that to drag that colony over the line will be a step towards Federation? If you alienate the public feeling of those who are entitled largely to be considered, how can you say that you are moving towards Federation? If you alienate colonies which are difficult to move from certain principles of settled government how can you minimise the difficulty which we, who belong to those colonies, must have in endeavoring to obtain approval of the work of this Convention if it is marked by what they consider is an indelible stain upon it? That is a matter which relates to the whole of the processes under this Convention, because if you alienate the public feeling at this early stage, just fancy the Herculean task afterwards in pulling back that feeling into its proper place.
How can we underrate the difficulties that beset us in a matter of this kind? Are we not entitled to plead for such a course of action as will not lead to disastrous results? That is the position I take up in reference to this matter in arguing strongly one way or the other as to the effect of this amendment on constitutional government. I have placed on record before this morning what I think about that. I have been one of the first, as the records of 1891 and since will show, to lay down that there is a measure of justice which must be conceded to the less populous States. I have faced public opinion as far as any man can face it for the purpose of ensuring that there shall be justice done, so long as we preserve the principles of responsible government. Now, what was done in the Convention of 1891? And let it be recollected that there were extremists on both sides. Let us take the argument of Sir Edward Braddon, who stated that:

They are capable of seeing a thing as applicable to themselves, but entirely blind to it when urged on behalf of the smaller States.

The argument is endless if used on both sides, and simply amounts to a turn-about and turn-about. In 1891 there were those who upheld the ultimo ratio of responsible government, and there were those who upheld the ultimo ratio of State dominance. One side claimed entirely co-ordinate powers of the Senate, while the other side stipulated that the Senate should have practically none. There was a long debate, out of which the middle line of demarcation was arrived at.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

By voting only.

Mr. BARTON:

All we ask of you is not to depart from that solid line, which was, marked out with so much care and thought, and in which there has been great difficulty in obtaining any acquiescence or toleration from, at least, two of the large States. That is the point. Those concessions have been made after much thought and debate; a solid line, which is a middle line, has been decided upon, and we are ready to say that, as far as we are concerned in this Convention, we accept that middle line, and will endeavor to persuade our people to adhere to it. If amendments are made that take the whole question into other regions, is that departure from the compromise of 1891 one that moves towards Federation? I submit, in all calmness, not. After once arriving at a line of demarcation, which has satisfied the experts of the 1891 Convention, as they are entitled to be called, and after having accustomed the public mind to it and overcome many scruples about it, and having acquired in two of the colonies at least, not an acquiescence, but a somewhat less alienated view of such a position-after having got that far, how is it to be supposed that if we are pulled over that line, if it develops merely into a question of "pull devil, pull baker," we can advance in the direction of Federation? It must be rather a movement away from Federation, and I submit that the position which my hon. friend Sir John Forrest and some of those who agree with him take up is, whether they believe it or not, a retrograde movement from the progress made towards Federation. There is the old cry that Victoria must federate; but I do not think that we ought to look at the matter in that way. The reverses of Victoria have been alluded to. What State has not had its reverses? Some of us are beginning to see a tardy revival of prosperity. It is the potentialities of the State that must be viewed; and as we view with hope and sympathy the vast resources which are developing in Western Australia, so ought we to extend some consideration to the position of Victoria in its magnificent resources and energetic people. We ought not to raise this cry that Victoria must federate, because she will emerge from, these reverses and keep step with the other colonies in the march of civilisation, progress, and prosperity. This is a threat. You say to Victoria:
"You must take what we put upon you, otherwise we shall not federate." I say it with all respect that that is not the standpoint from which we ought to view the matter, simply because all these colonies are strong in their resources. You must not look at the day you are asking for Federation, but at the potentialities of history with regard to each State of the Federation. So I will leave that matter, because if I dwell upon it much longer I may be taking some step which would cause some friction, which I wish to prevent in this debate. Let us come to another argument that has been used with a good deal of effect by some members. We are told this is a question of a mere choice of words, that is to say, that the power of amending taxation is practically the same as the power to make suggestions. The question of responsibility arises again. if the Second Chamber makes suggestions such as are enabled to be made in this colony under the Compact of 1857, which is not a matter of law but a matter of agreement; if the Second Chamber makes suggestions under an agreement of that sort, and if the suggestions are not adopted, that House must face the responsibility of deciding whether it will veto the Bill or not. If the procedure is to be by way of amendment, and the amendments are disagreed with by the House of Representatives, and are still insisted upon by the Second Chamber, then it is upon the House of Representatives that the responsibility must rest of destroying its own measure. The responsibility for the loss of the measure under the first set of circumstances must attach to the Second Chamber. But, in the second case, suppose it is freed upon the very Chamber which has affirmed the measure.
Can there be a greater difference between the two positions than that? In the first case the responsibility rests where it should, with those who wish to negative the policy of finance upon which the entire Government of the country hangs; because without money you cannot govern. If the policy of the Ministry according to their desires in the main is not carried out there must be another Ministry, and those who lead to the formation of that Ministry should take the responsibility. If the procedure is by way of suggestion, which is insisted upon, the Senate must take the responsibility of the veto. If it is by way of amendment, and that amendment is disagreed with, it is the Lower House that must take the responsibility of the destruction of its own work. There cannot be a greater difference than there is between the two positions. This is not a mere "choice of words." It embodies in it a grave situation, which may arise from time to time. I have been always willing that this power of suggestion should be given - a power which will enable one House to express itself in a perfectly dignified way - for it would not belittle any Chamber to take this course any more than it does in this colony, where the Legislative Council, which is a strong body, has the power of making suggestions which it exercises. I am perfectly willing that that course should be taken by leave of law, not because I do not believe it is an effective course - because it has a power in it - but because, if wrongly taken, the displacement of the financial policy of the country by those who oppose it can be placed at the doors of those who make themselves responsible. We are told by Mr. McMillan that we are to argue on the merits here and not on the views of our respective peoples. I differ from him if he means this, that the ascertained opinion of the colony from which each one of us comes is to be disregarded. In New South Wales, as I have explained, and as can be confirmed by the whole of the delegates from that colony, with perhaps one exception, a settled and very strong view has obtained during the six years that have elapsed since the Conference of 1891, and if we disregard that view, or if any one of us disregards it, no matter from what colony we come, we are not performing the work we were sent here to do.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

Of course, while the hon. member Sir John Forrest has his rights, which must be respected in this Convention, we must be entitled to criticise his position and the position of those with him. We have it from his statement that

Sir JOHN FORREST:
That shows how magnanimous we are.

Mr. BARTON:
My friend says there is no way in which they can gain from Federation, and that in most respects the work which is done in Western Australia is done as well by the local Parliament as it could be by a federal government.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Better.

Mr. BARTON:
Then let us view the position. If that is his view does he not think that he will be in a difficulty in getting his colony to come in a scheme of Federation?

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Yes.

Mr. BARTON:
Well, then, let us view Western Australia as a more or less improbable federating colony, and I ask why should Sir John Forrest force on us a position which will make it much more difficult for the other colonies to federate? If Western Australia is a colony not likely to federate or not very likely to do so, then the position resolves itself into this: that we should not at the suggestion of those who come from that colony take a course which, while they stand aloof, will make federation impossible to those who sincerely desire it.

Mr. PEACOCK:
That is the position.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Not if you treat us liberally.

Mr. BARTON:
That is truthfully the position, and I would point out that the great difficulty of Western Australia is not in respect to these clauses, but in respect to the financial clauses. Why, therefore, the Western Australian representatives should desire to consider these clauses. until they know the decision arrived at regarding the financial powers of the Federal Parliament, I am at a loss to conceive, and therefore I say no decision should be come to by the Convention which, in respect to a colony which has not ascertained its own position in regard to the rest of the Bill, must mean that it will go away having achieved a victory in this matter, although it evidently does not care about Federation until it knows more about it. Why is that position to be forced on us, and how is it to affect the future prospects of Federation as far as the other colonies are concerned?

Sir JOHN FORREST; We do not wish to influence your vote.
Mr. BARTON:
The hon. member wishes to influence the cause of Federation, and I ask him before he does that which may prove in the result to be a most ill-considered interference with Federation, to consider the position of others who are more interested and more willing than his own colony is. I ask him to consider that, and surely, I think, they have as strong a right to take up that position as he has to take up his.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
What is the position I am taking up?

Mr. BARTON:
He knows what his position is. He has forced on us, of course obtaining a majority, the consideration of certain clauses out of their ordinary order in the Bill.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Only three voted against it.

Mr. BARTON:
The hon. member knows that it was not that division that settled the matter. Let him look at the first division, where there was only a difference of four. With regard to granting Sir John Forrest power to do this, when members saw there would be a majority, even though a narrow one, they gave way to save a division, and, with the exception of three, sat on this side of the House. The vote did not represent the opinion of the Convention, and nobody truthfully can say that it did, and therefore where is the relevancy of the interjection?

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Had I not a right to call for a division?

Mr. BARTON:
I am not saying that. We are brought back to an incident related to Artemus Ward. Mr. Symon quoted that portion of Artemus Ward which referred to his perfect willingness to sacrifice his mother-in-law and all his wife's relatives. Perhaps he may remember another portion (if that book where, when Artemus Ward was about to display his show, he was confronted with a tall gaunt person-I am not now making any reference to any hon. gentleman-with a large umbrella in her hand, and who wanted to get in by saying, "you air my affinity!" I want to know where that umbrella and that gaunt figure are. The attitude of Western Australia towards the other colonies in respect to Federation should be to say, "You air my affinity." If she cannot say that, then this course should not find fruition in success in this Convention. The course which my honorable friend takes up is, for that reason alone, one which we ought not to agree to. Mr.
McMillan's argument was supported by Mr. Symon in something like these terms: that the real argument is what is just or right, and not what a people more or less ignorant may think. But we have also to consider all those who sent us here to consider what they may think is just and right. We are not to separate these, and to run counter to their opinions, but we should endeavor to consider what might result to prevent the acceptance of Federation by colonies in that condition of thought which has been seen. We regard public opinion as our master, and the public have to consider what is right and proper, and it is not meeting the argument to say that we must not consider what a people more or less ignorant may think. The people are being educated on this question of Federation. They know more in New South Wales than they did six years ago, and they have not gone any further in wishing to see a stronger Senate than their representatives accepted in 1891. We are also told by Mr. Symon that we must trust the people. What is the initial argument as to Federation? It is Federation that presents the two distinct units of the people as individuals and of the States as States. However much you may give popular representation for the purpose of creating a quota for a State in the Senate, that State is only represented as an entity there. Yet the people are to be represented as units, and the theory of Federation is that the States as entities are to have certain powers irrespective of the question whether their representatives are sent there by popular election or are chosen by the Parliaments, or otherwise, because on the federal principle those who are sent there by the State may, as in Switzerland, be chosen by each State in the way which it prefers; but we have not come to any determination on that point. It may be that when sent they do not represent the people in any sense by popular election at all, and, after all, in the federal theory the unit represented in the one House is the individual, and the unit represented in the other House is the State as an entity. This trusting of the people, then, becomes a question of entity—a question of the unit found in the citizen of the Commonwealth and the unit found in the entity of the State government. Then, if my friend uses the argument of trusting the people, I submit that is an argument which recoils on him and defeats him. We should trust the people of the Commonwealth, and I do not know any other way in which trusting the people can be managed. We were told by Mr. Leake that he agreed with Mr. McMillan, in saying that there was more a question of detail involved than one of honest federal principle. If this is a question of detail and not one of honest federal principle, I would ask why our friends wanted to consider these three clauses before dealing with the rest of the Bill? Where was the consistency in doing that?
I think they had the prior clauses postponed because they thought this was a matter of direct principle. What is the use of postponing clauses to get a vote, and when you get that vote saying you are not voting as to a principle, but as to a choice of words? The two things stand apart.

Mr. LEAKE:

You say it will kill Federation?

Mr. BARTON:

I say it will be dangerous to Federation, and I think it is more than a question of detail. Surely the thing becomes too palpable for argument. When it is not a question of detail but one of principle involving the existence of Federation, my hon. friend said we should guard against following too closely the practices rather than the principles of responsible government. If this is a matter rather of practice than of principle, was it a matter of sufficient importance to have fifty-one clauses of the Bill postponed? The argument is conflicting, and even an interruption or two will not pull my friends out of their difficulty. My friend Mr. Dobson told us to refer to the enormous compromise that he and his friends had made by allowing the Upper Chamber to be elected by the whole State. I never heard before that that was a compromise. I always understood it was a means adopted by those in this Convention representing the less populous States, for the purpose of what? For the purpose of raising the argument that the Senate was elected directly by the people, and therefore ought to have larger powers than were given in 1891. Whether you elect the members of the Senate by popular representation, or by any other means the State may adopt, nothing more is represented than the entity of that State, and so the compromise comes to nothing. It is at the mere choice of the States represented here whether they should elect their members for the Federal Senate on the popular suffrage. I say it is a choice with which for my own colony I should agree, but this Constitution may say "No; you shall elect your senators in whatever way you choose." if that be so, what becomes of this enormous compromise? This enormous compromise, so called, means nothing. The answer to it is, that "Oliver Twist asked for more."

Sir JOHN FORREST:

I was not in favor of it.

Mr. BARTON:

I cannot say-what took place in committee. If, however, I was challenged, I might say what I should not like to say. I will simply ask Sir John Forrest if there was a division in Committee. I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the House on this question. I have put before the Convention what is the real position. I admit New South Wales is divided on this point. I admit that Mr. McMillan, and perhaps some other gentlemen I do not know of, may be about to vote with Sir John and his friends, but we know one or two of our friends of South Australia will vote against the position the Western Australians take up. I am simply expressing myself by inference from the speeches made. recognise, of course, the right of any hon. member in a consultative body like this to change his mind. We have had speeches which might indicate that one or two of the members for New South Wales will vote against Mr. Reid's amendment. We have had speeches indicating that one or two gentlemen from South Australia may vote in favor of it. We have had speeches indicating other things in regard to other colonies-indicating, too, that our friends from Tasmania will not vote entirely in a body on the subject. But we have had no speech indicating a like generosity from our friends from Western Australia.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Or Victoria.

Mr. BARTON:

While they remain solid, or if they remain solid, they must carry away with them the uncomfortable reflection that they are going back to a colony more or less apathetic about Federation, while their voting has adversely influenced the destiny of those who strongly wish for Federation.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear. That is the point.

Mr. BARTON:

I should like to see some exception from the ranks of Western Australia equaling in generosity the exceptions already made.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

Generosity!

Mr. BARTON:

Yes, generosity; or in fairness of feeling and openness to argument. There is a sense of justice in that fairness of feeling which leaves itself open to argument. There is no feeling of justice in those who call out early in the discussion, "Oh, we have a majority."

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

I hope that I have not said one word personally unfriendly to any member. I
I think it is a very reasonable compromise, and that all those in this Convention who really desire to see a Federation of Australia brought about might fairly accept it, or something like it.

I put that to those in this gathering who really desire to see Federation brought about. He goes on:

It is of no use for hon. members to profess to want Federation, while they refuse to accept the means necessary to obtain it.

Then, at the end of his speech, he adds:

I am perfectly satisfied that under this Constitution there will be no unification, because State rights will be perfectly preserved.

That is the deliberate opinion of the greatest authority upon this question in Australia. If members of this Convention really desire Federation, they will not vote against the only possible means of obtaining it. Is it not to the advantage of members of this Convention to come to a reasonable compromise between their views now rather than afterwards?

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

What satisfaction will there be to members to be in time to come dragged back from the position they have taken up by the force of public opinion, as expressed by the press, by public men, and by the Parliaments? Without successes gained under the influence of public opinion there cannot be a successful Federation, because Federation must depend on the goodwill of the people. You cannot make a Federation under which the people can live and prosper unless it has their goodwill. Is it a position to look forward to with any prospect of satisfaction that the course to be taken now may be one which will be reversed by the expression and operation of forces which not one in this Chamber or elsewhere is able to resist? These forces are irresistible, because it is the people who govern these colonies, and if you are to obey at long last the forces of public opinion—because you cannot have Federation without the sanction of that guiding force—then now is the time, and not hereafter, to make that concession which makes Federation possible, and which at the same time will enable those who make it to look back afterwards and say, "I am rather lucky that I did not put myself in a somewhat humiliating position from which I should have had to extricate myself by the best explanation I could." I have spoken about the financial clauses. Someone may say This is not the time for compromise, because we have not discussed the financial clauses. But since these clauses about Money Bills were singled out of the Bill, were taken out of their place for the purpose of being discussed, why now is the time for compromise upon them; because it could not be the intention of any hon. member so to single out portions of the Bill as to obviate the possibility of compromise, and so defeat the purposes of this Convention. It is now that compromise should be, and I appeal to hon. members not to allow any vote to be taken at this stage which will have the effect of prejudicially and disastrously influencing the union which—if there was any truth in our utterances as candidates the other day—must have been the desire of every one of us.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I would hardly seek the privilege, sir, of addressing you twice on the same point were it not that, except for the assistance of my hon. and eloquent friend Mr. Glynn, I feel myself almost alone as a representative of South Australia, in the advocacy of the views which have been so admirably placed before this Convention by the last speaker, and by others who have preceded me. But I would like to answer a good deal that has been said on the subject of the improbability of South Australia agreeing to the amendment just now before the Convention, and which involves the re-affirmation of the compromise of 1891. I use that work advisedly. I know that my friend, Sir John Forrest, takes exception to it. No doubt, in the Convention of 1891, there was a division, but the arrangement which was then carried by a majority of twenty-two to sixteen represented a compromise effected in the Constitutional Committee for which Sir Samuel Griffith was chiefly responsible, and in which representatives of nearly all the Australian Governments then present concurred.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

Oh, no.

Mr. KINGSTON:

As to the probability of that being re-affirmed, there are one or two points which are put for the consideration of this Convention. We are told amongst other things that co-ordinate Houses in a Federation render responsible government, impossible. Then I take it upon myself to say that if the issue is put—as is attempted to be put by some, of the opponents of the amendment moved by my friend Mr. Reid—that we should reject the amendment and forfeit responsible government, if you put that question to the people of South Australia I make bold to predict there will be but one answer, and that will be unanimous throughout the length and breadth of the land, namely, "We will have responsible government, and away with the suggestion with reference to co-ordinate Houses." I would like to pursue the same line of thought as my honorable friend Mr. Glynn. He has said that when we returned from Sydney in 1891 there was no clamor against the compromise which had been entered into at the Sydney Convention. I endorse that to the fullest. Not only was there no clamor, but there was the fullest affirmation of the compromise then effected in the only way in which it was possible.

Mr. LYNE:
That was not done in New South Wales.

Mr. REID:
He is dealing with South Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am talking of the affairs of the colony of which I know most. The matter was brought up for the consideration of both Houses. In our Legislative Council it was not advanced to any very considerable stage, and, so far as I can find from a perusal of the records, there was no substantial exception taken then to the Sydney compromise; but, on the contrary, those who represented South Australia urged its adoption. Even though they had been found voting at the Sydney Convention in 1891, they looked at the position in this way:

either we are to take Federation in the way it was agreed to at the Sydney Convention, or we are to postpone its accomplishment for an indefinite period. They wisely decided upon the acceptance of the scheme rather than the postponement of the cause. In the House of Assembly the matter was advanced to a considerable stage, and those particular clauses, to which such exception has been taken, were brought under the notice of the Chamber in the presence of six gentlemen who now have the honor to represent South Australia in this Convention, not including my friend Mr. Glynn, who unfortunately at that time was not a member. The result was that not a solitary exception was taken in the slightest particular to any of these clauses.

Mr. SOLOMON:
They were never considered seriously.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Why, Mr. Solomon was there, and I know of no gentleman more consistent in the diligent discharge of his important duties than my hon. friend. In the presence of six gentlemen, including myself, who now occupy seats on the floor of this Assembly as representatives of South Australia, this matter came on for debate, and not a solitary objection was raised. The contest had taken place only a few months previously, and the matter was still fresh in the memories of the members. Every one of these clauses we adopted unanimously, without a murmur and without protest. Therefore, under these circumstances, I ask how does it lie in the mouths of my friend's to say that these clauses would not be acceptable to South Australia? If they were acceptable in 1891 they would be even more now, because since then greater emphasis has been laid on the point at issue. You must choose between these clauses and the forfeiture of responsible government, and as regards the possibility of the people of South Australia recording their votes in favor of anything approaching the forfeiture of responsible government not one word can be said. So I take the opportunity of pointing to what was the position of the matter in 1891 so far as South Australian sentiment was declared by the resolutions of both of its Houses, and I go a little further and ask my friends of Tasmania to give us a little information on a similar point. I have endeavored to ascertain for myself what happened when the Tasmanian representatives returned, to use the phraseology of my friend the Premier of New South Wales, to the tight little Island, after their exertions at the Sydney Convention of 1891. No doubt my friend Sir Philip Fysh will correct me if I am wrong, but so far as I can gather-and it is highly probable in view of the attitude taken by a gentleman whose absence we all deplore, Mr. Inglis Clark-I ask if I am overstating the case when I say that the action of the Tasmanian Assembly in regard to these particular clauses was precisely similar to the action of the South Australian Assembly. They were passed without a murmur of objection or a division.

Mr. SOLOMON:

Have you been raking up old "Hansards?"

Mr. KINGSTON:

I do not think hon. members will accuse me of any desire to rake up old "Hansards" unnecessarily, but in a question of this sort as to what is likely to be the attitude of particular colonies in particular matters, I think it is only fair that what was the action of those colonies at the time when the matter was fresh upon their minds, and when they were called upon to give their votes in the temporary seclusion of the Legislative Assembly, should be referred to. They confirmed the Sydney resolutions, and I simply refer to this matter as a justification of the interpretation which I now place upon South Australian feeling, and which I think is precisely similar to the interpretation very properly placed upon the matter six years ago by the Tasmanian and South Australian Assemblies, practically unanimously, and when the matter was fresh in the memory of those most concerned.

Mr. BROWN:

I should like first to confirm to some extent the statement made by Mr. Kingston as to the attitude taken by the Tasmanian Parliament with regard to the Bill of 1891. It is perfectly true, as Mr. Kingston said, that the Bill passed through the Assembly on that occasion with, as far as I can remember, very little exception being taken to it, and it went up to the legislative Council, where it was shelved mainly, I believe, on the ground that it was not thought proper for a small colony like Tasmania to take the lead in the matter, and that it was desirable she should wait until the larger colonies showed some earnestness in the matter. Some of my hon. friends here take strong exception to the clause which it is proposed to reinsert in the Bill, and I cannot help feeling that there were strong objections to it, but still I feel on this occasion the grave responsibility which rests upon each one of us as to how we should vote. Ever since the Constitutional Committee agreed to this clause I have found great difficulty, in fact I have almost found it impossible, to picture to myself how under the clause as it comes to the Convention from the Committee, responsible government could be carried on. I want two things. I want Federation, and I want responsible government as nearly as possible as we have it in our local Parliaments. Wanting Federation as earnestly as I do, I cannot fail to be impressed with the statements which have been made here by hon. members who certainly can be relied upon. I must also be influenced to a large extent by the statements made publicly here in the Convention, and also privately by many members from the larger colonies, upon whose sincerity I can rely, as to what will probably be the effect on the cause of Federation, supposing we reject the amendment proposed by Mr. Reid. I cannot reconcile my-self to give a vote on this occasion which will perhaps hereafter be pointed at as an act on my part which imperilled, if it did not altogether destroy, the opportunity of securing Federation for many years to come. At the same time, while I am about to support Mr. Reid's amendment, I wish to hold myself free to a certain extent. If I find later on that a considerable body of public opinion in the smaller States is on the side of retaining the clause as it came from the Committee, I hold myself free to reconsider my position. I intend to vote, as I shall now, for the purpose of not retarding by any action of mine the cause which we have all at heart; and if it is shown hereafter that the course we are now adopting is not acceptable to the great bulk of the people of the smaller States I shall take the opportunity of re-considering my decision. I take this occasion to deprecate the views that have been expressed by some members that there is likely to be a combination of the larger States as against the smaller ones. I think it is extremely possible, if we can judge from human nature and political history, that exactly the reverse will happen. I have not the same fear that some of my friends have, that the interests of the smaller States will be destroyed, and I am willing to trust to the justice of those who at the time may be the more powerful. On the grounds I have stated, and without delaying the proceedings further, I may state that I intend to support the amendment.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I recognise the rights of those who have not spoken to address the Convention as early as possible, but I rise to correct two misapprehensions, and not for the purpose of addressing myself to the subject matter before the Convention. The first is in connection with Mr. Barton's remarks, and it is an instance of how even the most just of men can make mistakes, and in cases where they least wish to. He referred to my position as being purely provincial, and represented me as having said that my duty was to my own colony rather than to the cause of Australia generally. I said precisely the opposite, and I am sure my friend will be delighted to be reminded of it. What I did say was:

It may be that Sir George Turner may have a difficulty in persuading the people he represents that what is suggested is fair and right; but our duty, after all, is to our own colony as well as to the colony he represents, and we have to say honestly what we think to be fair and right. Put the cause of Federation first of all, as being the great national cause, still we cannot make sacrifices unjust to the people we represent.

I say that is federal and not provincial. The next matter I am impelled to allude to—and I do so reluctantly—is the singular speech made just now by the Premier of South Australia. It is perfectly true that on my return from New South Wales, believing Federation to be the best possible thing in the interests of the colonies, I loyally supported the Commonwealth Bill just as it stood, putting aside all the strong feelings which I had at the Sydney Convention as to details and all matters of contest—putting the great cause first, and trusting that the question would work itself out properly and justly. Whether or not the hon. gentleman took the same course, he knows without my reminding him of it. But I do not stand here in the same position now. The hon. gentleman refused to accept that Bill.

Mr. KINGSTON:

When did we refuse?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Altered it most materially. The other colonies, too, refused to accept it.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Victoria passed it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Take the people of Australia as a whole, they refused to accept it, and, that being so, we have this Convention, the idea of which came from Dr. Quick, not for the purpose of swallowing the agreement of 1891, but because the people would not take that agreement, but wanted to consider a new basis, if possible. So I come here in quite a different position from that which I formerly occupied. I stood loyally to my colors on the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, because I thought it was wise to do so. We had the chance of not getting the best thing in the world, but still something very good.

Mr. PEACOCK:
The position is similar now.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
It is not the same now. We are sent here with a sacred trust to reconsider the whole matter, and do what is fair. It has been suggested that we should take the Commonwealth Bill as it stands now. Of course that could not be done. Everyone wants to pick out parts of the Commonwealth Bill to please himself, and say to everyone who does not agree with him, "You are going back on what was done in 1891."

Mr. DEAKIN:
That is not so with all of us.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
No; but it is with a good many: Everyone has a part that we do not like. I consider myself not only free, but that it is my bounden duty to treat the matter afresh and express and adhere to the opinions which I believe to be right; but I do not think my position now can be regarded as being inconsistent with the stand I took before.

Mr. BARTON:
Might I make an apology to my hon. friend Sir John Downer? It is true, I find by reference, as he says, that he said:

Our duty is to our own colony as well as to the colony he represents.

I am very sorry if unintentionally I have misrepresented my hon. friend. I would, however, point out that by what he expresses he puts himself in the position of considering the interests of the larger colonies, and in the circumstances I have some confidence in expecting his vote.

Mr. LEWIS:
I am aware that hon. members are anxious to proceed to a division as soon as possible, and I will not delay them more than a few minutes by expressing my views on this important question as concisely as I possibly can consistently with clearness. The question has been brought back this morning by the Leader of the Convention to its true issue. Last night it was clouded over by many extraneous subjects, especially the question of the equal representation of the States in the Senate. Mr. Carruthers and Mr. Isaacs seem to contend for proportionate representation in the Senate, but that to my mind has nothing to do with the question at issue, while it certainly departs from the principle which has been generally admitted in the Convention of equal representation of the States in one House and equal representation of the people in the other House. I do not claim that the smaller States are making any concession to the larger States in allowing proportionate representation in the House of Representatives, and I deny that the larger or more populous States are giving to the less populous States any concession in giving them equal representation in the Senate, but I do claim that as believers in States rights we have made several important concessions. We have allowed Money Bills—whether Appropriation, Loan, or Taxation—to originate in the House of Representatives. We have also agreed that the annual Appropriation Bill shall not be amended by the Senate, and we have now got to this point: Shall we allow Taxation Bills to be amended in the Senate, or shall we give, the Senate merely the right to suggest or request amendments? That is really the only point between us. We have made concessions, and we ask the other side to concede this to us. They do not say they are not willing, but that they cannot, in the interests of their constituents, and in view of the strong opinion that will be held by them, ask them to concede what we ask. Well, are we to split upon this point? It is more than a matter of procedure, but at the same time it is not one of the vital principles on which the life and death of Federation should depend. My friend Sir Joseph Abbott has kindly supplied me with the form of the message which is sent down by the Legislative Council to the Legislative Assembly with an ordinary Bill containing amendments made by the Council. The form is:

Mr. Speaker—The Legislative Council returns to the Legislative Assembly a Bill to, &c., with the amendments indicated in the schedule, in which amendments the Legislative Council requests the concurrence of the Legislative Assembly.

I am speaking of ordinary Bills, not of Money Bills. This Bill provides that in case of a proposed law which the Senate may not amend the Senate may at any stage return it to the House of Representatives with a message requesting the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein. The distinction is not very great. The question whether the amendment is made and the concurrence of the other House is requested in it, or whether that other House is requested to make that amendment, seems to me not a matter of such vital importance as to endanger the very existence of Federation.

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS:
We have been sent here with a mandate to frame a Constitution, and we have to frame one which will be in the end acceptable to the people. The question is at what time are we to make concessions, which I believe will ultimately have to be made?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS:

Are we to make them now, or to wait until the adjourned Convention?

Mr. TRENWITH:

Whenever you are ripe, it ought to be done.

Mr. LEWIS:

I have given this question serious and anxious consideration—greater consideration than I have given to any question since I entered political life—and I have come to the conclusion that now is the time to make concessions, and to do so as gracefully as we can, feeling that the House of Assembly of Tasmania, like every other House, can, if it dislikes this proposal, send back to the adjourned Convention this Bill with such amendments as it sees fit to make, and then the matter can be fully thrashed out again. I, like Mr. Brown, desire to keep an open mind for the future, but in the best interests of federal movement I think we should now gracefully give way, and if we find that we have to retrace our steps, we shall be able to do it at the adjourned Convention. I do not look on this as such a vital point. We shall have many vital points to thrash out. If our friends from New South Wales and Victoria deny us the right to have equal representation in the Senate, they will find we are strong and firm, and we will fight to the end. I am ready rather to see Federation wrecked than give way upon a point like that. But upon a point that is not of vital moment, I do not think that, in the best interests of the federal movement, we should, at this stage at any rate, do anything which will have the effect—and I am sure my hon. friends from New South Wales and Victoria are sincere in what they say—of postponing the cause of Federation indefinitely.

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. LEWIS:

I intend to vote for the amendment moved by the New South Wales Premier.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I wish to make a personal explanation. Since I sat down I have had placed in my hands a telegram with regard to the course adopted in Tasmania. I had previously, as Sir Philip Fysh and other Tasmanian delegates well know, taken all pains to be sure of what I was going to say, but I was not correctly informed. The information which is now before me from the Clerk of the House shows that in Tasmania the clauses were altered by giving to the Senate the power to amend the Appropriation Act.

Mr. MOORE:

The feeling in Tasmania is unquestionably in favor of investing the Senate with certain powers. During my own candidature for a place on this Convention the question was put to me over and over again: "Will you agree that the Senate should have the power of amendment"? and of course I answered in the affirmative. I am perfectly sure that the great majority of the people of Tasmania are in favor of the action taken by our friend from Western Australia, and up to the present time by all those who have addressed themselves to the question from Tasmania. I feel that we are simply expressing the wish of our constituents just as much as the representatives of New South Wales and Victoria are expressing the wish of their constituents. There is no doubt that compromise must be effected in order to carry out Federation on this great essential principle in the question of Federation, namely, that the Senate should be given equal powers. What is the value of equal representation if the Senate is emasculated of all power? When we look at the powers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, we see that already we are giving the most absolute power to the House of Representatives. We are giving them the power of initiation in every shape and form. While the House of Representatives possessing the power of initiation as far as all Money Bills are concerned, what more could it possibly want? All that we claim for the Senate is that it should exercise its right in amending Money Bills. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I must support the people of Tasmania, because I say the people of Tasmania are nearly unanimous on that point. The people of Tasmania do not accept the compromise of 1891, and when one gentleman was addressing his constituents only lately in Launceston, the question I have indicated was put to him, and I believe the reason why he was not sent to this Convention was because he was found to be one of those who deserted the interests of Tasmania in the Convention of 1891. Of course the matter which we have here to consider is one of great importance. I have been advocating Federation for the last twenty-five ye introduction of a Bill in the British Parliament authorising any of the colonies to make arrangements one between the other concerning intercolonial reciprocity. We have over and over again approached Victoria with a view to the carrying out of measures that would be advantageous, fair, equitable, and right with regard to intercolonial freetrade, and never been met in any shape or form. What are we doing now? They tell us:

[P.568] starts here

Unless you take our terms, and give the Senate emasculated powers, we will not go into the Federation at all.

I think there are two sides to this question. Tasmania, which is not very populous, is looked down upon to a certain extent, and when a member representing that colony speaks he is viewed as one who is there as a delegate only for a few individuals. That has been said over and over again, and therefore when a Tasmanian member rises to speak he feels his position acutely. We in Tasmania are anxious to join in a Federation with the whole of the colonies, and to work heart and hand with them in advancing the best interests of Australasia. We think it can do no harm, in fact that it is a right to give the Senate the power of amending Money Bills. That appears to be the crucial point at the present time. When I was in Victoria the other day, and read leader after leader in the Argus I was supported in this view. The Argus pointed out how desirable it was that the Council should have the right to amend Money Bills, and that that was the way to prevent deadlocks between the Senate and the House of Representatives. Perhaps the Victorians here are acting in a dual capacity by representing the Age and the people of that colony.

Mr. ISAACS:

That shows that the people and the Age are in accord.

Mr. MOORE:

The Age has become a powerful instrument in these matters, and let me say that I do not always dissent from the opinions of the Age, and I believe in the policy it advocates very often. I should like very much if I could bring my Victorian friends to believe that Tasmania should have a place in this Federation, for I am sure we would work harmoniously together. When we look at the powers which the House of Representatives possess in the way of Federation we wonder what more do they want. We, in Tasmania, want nothing more from the larger colonies. Two things are expected to be carried out by this Federation—one is intercolonial freetrade, which forms the commercial aspect of the question, and the other, and greater question, is the elevation of the people to a higher platform of national life. In the discharge of those higher duties in connection with national life we ought to be pulling together and to be helping each other. I am sure that had we Federation we would have possessed such influence and power as would have prevented, for instance, New Guinea falling into the hands of the Germans. As far as the question of money powers is concerned, we must draw a line between the exercise of those powers in a Parliament in Australasia, and a legislature in the old country. There is no analogy between them. In this country Ministers are created and put out of office on the question of Money Bills. Everything, almost, depends upon the question of Money Bills. One member has said that "finance is government and government finance"; but in the old country the larger questions overshadow the question of Money Bills. The question of foreign and domestic policy and questions of larger import overshadow them. But here in these colonies a great deal depends upon Money Bills, and I hope we will see the necessity of vesting in the Senate the power of amending Money Bills. I do not think that is too much to ask from Victoria and New South Wales. I am not going to take up much time, because I feel that my friends from West Australia wish to leave for their colony to-day, and I have consequently refrained from addressing myself to the question as I could have done; but when I look round and see so many eminent men, who have already addressed themselves to the question in a clear and lucid way, and have laid almost every fact before this Convention, I hope it will not break up without arriving at a satisfactory result by doing that work for which we have been brought together.

Mr. SOLOMON:

I have refrained during the time this Bill has been before this Committee from speaking, because I anticipated the early departure of our West Australian friends, and not because I in any way desire to give a silent vote upon a question of so much importance to the colony I have the honor to represent. This question as to the powers of the Senate is not a new question to South Australia by any means, and although perhaps one representative, the Premier, who was returned to represent South Australia, has not distinctly given his allegiance upon this point before the electors, the bulk of the other gentlemen elected, and the bulk of the candidates who came before the electors for their selection, all gave their adhesion to the idea that no Federation would be acceptable to South Australia, unless the Senate had first of all equal powers, next equal States representation, and above all an equal voice in reference to Money Bills. We have already conceded a considerable amount in exempting Loan Bills from these particular clauses, but beyond this I do not think it is possible for the South Australian representatives to go. It is all very well for the representatives of the two more populous colonies to, perhaps not threaten exactly, but to tell us in language that is tantamount to a threat, that unless the Senate is restricted in its powers and unless the whole power of dealing with the purse is left in the hands of the House of Representatives, the Victorian and New South Wales representatives will be unable to recommend the Bill to their constituents. This is not a new question. This matter of the powers of the Senate has been one of the real live questions since 1891, and, as the Premier of South Australia has alluded to the attitude taken in 1891 by members of the Convention, then sitting with the local Legislature, I should like to remind him that the Bill was considered in 1891 with very little interest. The Bill was introduced by the Playford Government as a stopgap, and the present Premier used it for political purposes, and little else; and his attitude now in regard to this question of Money Bills is distinctly in contradiction to his attitude when the Bill was before the South Australian Parliament in 1891. He prides himself on having stuck to the concession, or the agreement of 1891, when he said he would give only the power of suggestion to the Senate, because it was not representative of the people. At that time the Senate, was to be chosen by the two Houses of the Legislature, and consequently he deemed it wise to restrict their power. He has probably forgotten the attitude he then took up, although he has twitted others with having allowed that Bill to pass. He said then

Mr. DEAKIN:
We do not want local politics.

Mr. SOLOMON:
It is a question of local politics connected with this Bill and the attitude then taken by members.

Mr. PEACOCK:
It is a narrow question of local politics.

Mr. SOLOMON:
I say that it is not a question of local politics, when I wish to show that one gentleman has deserted the smaller colonies and has distinctly changed his attitude since 1891.

Mr. ISAACS:
We have nothing to do with that. It is a matter between him and his constituents.

Mr. SOLOMON:
I have a perfect right to discuss this point and to show the attitude of any member, especially if that member has alluded to the attitude of his fellow members here. I will not inflict on the Convention the whole of his speech, but simply the portion where he says:

With regard to Money Bills and the power of the Senate, he was quite content to abide by the provisions of the Bill, because it was quite enough to give that House the power of making suggestions as long as the people were denied the privilege of electing the senators by direct vote.

Is that his position to-day? How does he justify his attitude in regard to his colleagues here? The position is that the Senate is to be elected by the direct vote of the people, and will have as much right to represent them, as the guardians of the States, as the House of Representatives, on all questions. Would any of the gentlemen who represent the larger colonies consent to a similar course in their local Legislature? Would they agree that the members who represented 10,000 electors should have a greater control over taxation proposals than those who only represented 2,000?
Would they agree to their colonies being divided into constituencies on the basis of population, and that on the one hand Melbourne and its suburbs should have perhaps four times as much proportional representation as the country districts? Would the representatives of New South Wales agree to this population basis in their local Legislatures? I venture to say, that as far as the people of South Australia are concerned, that they would not agree to it. I have only to point out that in the House of Representatives, where Money Bills of all kinds are to originate, the two colonies with the larger populations will be represented according to their people, in round numbers by about forty-eight or fifty members, while, even supposing Queensland comes in, the four smaller colonies will be represented by only twenty-six members. If this is not a reason for giving the States in the Senate, the House where they have equal representation, some means of exercising a wholesome check in regard to Money Bills, I do not know what more cogent reason could be given. One honorable gentleman—I think it was the honorable member, Mr. Barton—pointed out that this is the form of responsible government we must have, if we are to have responsible government, and the Executive responsible to one House. Undoubtedly, our desire is for a form of responsible government, and those who represent the smaller States want the Executive to be responsible, but we do not want this to mean responsibility to the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria. Willing as we are to come into the Federation, with the miserably small number of members in the Lower House, we have the mandate from the people who elected us to this Convention, in no uncertain sound, that all the colonies wish for Federation and not absorption. But, according to the views expressed in this Convention, it means that the smaller colonies will be absorbed by New South Wales and Victoria, not that these two colonies will in any way combine, but we have to consider that, in the event of these two colonies sinking their differences in regard to any questions of finance, they would absolutely rule the whole of Federated Australia, and handle the money contributed by the taxpayers as they pleased. As to the power given to the Senate to veto Money Bills,.
those gentlemen who are older politicians than myself know perfectly well that this is a power that really amounts to having no power at all. What advantage is it for the Upper House, to have the right of suggestion, when they know that they have no power to enforce? The power of veto is merely an empty one. But what the States want as regards dealing with questions of taxation, in which all are interested, is that they should have the power, not only of veto, but that they should have the power of amendment. We know perfectly well that instances may occur, and do occur very frequently in our own local Parliaments, where a scheme of taxation would be partly accepted by the upper branch of the Legislature, and, although I recognise that the upper branch of the Legislature and the Senate are not on all fours, it is known that that scheme which might partly be viewed with favor, must either be rejected as a whole or swallowed. What would be the position in which the smaller States would be placed if we agree to this amendment? What will be the privileges of the smaller States? They will have the privilege of being taxed at the hands of the larger States. They will have the privilege of being represented by about twenty-five members as against fifty members on the other side. The smaller States will contribute at per head of their population as much to the defences, to quarantine, and to all other departments which will be handed over to the Central Parliament for control—and how else could they fairly contribute—but they only have a very small voice in the control of how this money should be spent. I do not say for a moment that New South Wales and Victoria would combine to bring about the expenditure of large sums of money within their own territories, to the detriment of the other colonies, but at the same time we have a serious position to consider here. Those representing the smaller colonies have not to consider how much they are to trust to the generosity of the larger colonies, but they have to consider what safeguard they have against there being such a combination to their detriment. What safeguard can we have, when the larger colonies have a two-to-one majority in the House of Representatives, and in the Senate the whole of our powers are completely clipped by this amendment. hope those representatives who have considered so little the immense responsibility to South Australia and the other smaller States, of giving way on this question, will reconsider their position. We have been told that no harm can be done by reconsidering a position from day to day, or even from hour to hour, but if these votes, which have been influenced to some extent, by the fear that the representatives of Victoria and New South Wales would not be able to recommend the Bill without

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I think, perhaps, in the peculiar position I find myself, the Convention will bear with me in obtruding a few remarks before the vote is taken. I must say I dissent from what, I think, was the rather ungenerous treatment of Mr. Barton with regard to a remark I made, and it was also referred to by another member. When I referred to the ignorance of popular opinion on this question, I simply said what I believed—that this question with regard to "suggestion" and "amendment" is not thoroughly understood in the two colonies. I believe myself that many of those who are seized of the great strength of this opinion in the two larger colonies are also seized of the fact that it is an unreasonable feeling. All I wished to convey was that we had to be very careful before we placed in this Constitution, which creates an indissoluble union, any principle or any factor which may be the result of a momentary current opinion. With regard to the debate itself, and the arguments used, I have not heard any single argument that alters my opinion on this question. I have heard the argument, which I do not think will stand investigation, that the introduction of "amendment" instead of "suggestion" would strike a blow at responsible government.

Mr. SYMON:
   It is nonsense.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
   I look upon it as absolutely absurd.

Mr. SYMON:
   Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
   I have heard it stated by a great refinement of argument—and there has been a great deal of, what is called technically, special pleading in this matter—

Mr. LYNE:
   Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
   That if you attempt to amend you destroy the responsibility of the popular branch of the Legislature to the people. But all that applies to any piece of legislation as well as to financial legislation. And if you have a bicameral government at all, under a federal system or otherwise, the whole principle of legislation is the responsibility to both Houses with regard to all acts of legislation. I am not going to enter any further upon that argument. I have now done as I think I have a right to, because—as I told my constituents I would when appealing to them for election—I have given my own views, my own conscientious opinions, without any regard to current opinions elsewhere, and in doing that I think I have only acted like an honest man.
Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Now, I come to the question of vote. I also told my constituents that, while I would not conceal from my fellow delegates, if elected, the opinions of which I was seized, at the same time I felt that we were entering into no ordinary conference. I think I have, fairly, the courage always of my opinions. If I were a Responsible Minister of the Crown, and found my policy was not accepted, I would retire at once from the position. But that is not the position of hon. members in this Convention. Our position, after giving our opinions, and after deliberating on every matter, is to decide what, on all points, is best in order to secure Australian Federation. I am free to admit that there was one very strong point brought out by Mr. Barton, and I repeat it without want of respect to my fellow citizens in West Australia. There is no doubt that if the attitude of West Australia is lukewarm, if it has come here-and I am glad it has-to note our proceedings and take an active part in them, still, if it is to be an outside factor in this Federation, their vote to day, if successful, will preclude a Federation of the other four colonies. I think that is an immensely strong argument.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
It is only an assumption.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Any man regarding his vote on this question must carefully consider that point. Now, I come to another point: I Spoke, as I often find myself speaking, probably on the weaker side, and when I was speaking, to a great extent, there were practically unbroken phalanxes. But since this debate commenced we have had two gentlemen receding from the extreme position in South Australia, and two gentlemen receding from the extreme position in Tasmania. Where do I find myself now? I find myself in the position that I must look at the whole situation, and I must, if necessary, sink my own views on what I believe, on the whole, are the views likely to bring about Federation. I did think when I spoke, that it would be better to leave the elucidation of this matter for the play of public opinion between the first meeting of the Convention and the second. Now, I find that some members representing the smaller States say it is far better if there is to be a compromise to have it at once. And I am told-I think it is the opinion of several of those who are now voting with the smaller States against this amendment-that if it does come to a question of Federation or no Federation on this point they will agree to give way afterwards. I find myself in this absolute difficulty: that, with the votes as they can be counted after the expression of opinion this morning, if I voted against this amendment the numbers will be twenty-four to twenty-four, and the onus will be thrown on the Chairman to give a casting-vote.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not think so.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I ask myself therefore "Have I a right, under these circumstances, with the large majority in my own colony, and the absolute unanimity in another colony, to take upon myself the responsibility of giving that vote?" Now, I think, as a rule, I am not in any way affected by the opinions that others may have of me, if I think I am doing my duty. I do not think that any absolute desire to be consistent, or any fear of being blamed for want of courage ought to affect any man on an occasion like this. I think I am sufficiently known that if I thought this was an absolutely vital matter, I would stand alone. But I have to take the views of others. I myself agreed ultimately to the Bill of 1891, and, therefore, I think from every possible view, and looking at it, after a great deal of painful and careful consideration, I find it now-in spite of the speech I made in this Convention-absolutely necessary, for the sake of compromise, and for the sake of Australian union, which I put above every other subject at the present moment, to give my vote in favor of the amendment.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I trust we will record our votes against the amendment.

Mr. FRASER:
Many of us have not spoken at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I am anxious to have their votes recorded. As I understand it, Mr. McMillan is giving a sort of magnanimous vote, instead of a real bona fide vote, on one side or the other. It is deplorable the way in which the game of bluff has been conducted.

Mr. LYNE:
Where are all your true merinos now?

Mr. DOUGLAS:
It is to be hoped that we shall get a record of this vote, so that when some honorable members get back to Tasmania they will be treated as they ought to be. It is deplorable to see the way in which this business is done. The general opinion in Tasmania was that the Senate should be supported to the fullest extent. I was very glad to hear Mr. Kingston make the explanation he did, and I have no doubt that had he got up before he did it would have had a great effect upon the votes of some of the gentlemen who have spoken, and instead of being against the motion they would be in favor of it. It is difficult to know the reason which has actuated this game of bluff which Victoria has carried on from the beginning.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Poor Victoria!

Mr. DOUGLAS:

It was done in the Convention of 1891, and the delegates carried the amendment. Mr. Kingston on that occasion distinctly stated that if the Senate were elected in a different form he would have voted differently, and that, inasmuch as the Senate was not to be elected upon the broad principle we have now, he said he would vote against it. To be consistent, therefore, the hon. member ought to have supported the original proposition. We find also that the Premier of New South Wales condemned it in every particular, but what was the position he assumed to-day? If the smaller colonies are to have no power what becomes of the Convention? Its labors will be nought. Mr. Moore has pointed out the endeavor that was made by Tasmania to carry out freetrade with the colony of Victoria, and at that time Sir Graham Berry was the one deputed to bring about this desideratum, but when the time arrived for it to be done it was postponed, and eventually it ended in nothing. We have tried to do the same thing with South Australia. Is it likely that Tasmania, laboring under the disabilities I have pointed out, will come into a Federation of this sort? I do not think so.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

She has everything to gain by it.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

The ship of State cannot steer straight without a rudder. Victoria fancies she is the one who has got the rudder, but in that she is mistaken, for it is Tasmania who will take the helm and guide the ship into deep water. You say it makes no difference as regards the power of amendment and the power of suggestion in the Senate concerning Money Bills, and if that is so why not agree to give us that power? I trust that those who favor that view will record their votes accordingly, and we can thus see exactly what the position is.

Mr. BRUNKER:

It was my intention to have spoken very fully, and perhaps very freely, upon this subject, which I believe affects very materially the progression or retrogression of these great colonies, but I am speaking under most trying circumstances, and it not my intention to detain the Committee by offering remarks which might simply be confirmatory of what has been so well and so ably said. My object is rather to give a vote than detain the Committee, and I think it has been so well and ably discussed that we may well come to a division now. I hope, as I shall be compelled to leave the Convention this afternoon, that its deliberations may in the future be free from conflict and irritation, that the smaller colonies may not recognise themselves as smaller colonies, but that they may treat themselves as part of the whole of Australia. It is only by putting aside these strong feelings of jealousy and these parochial feelings that exist that we can hope to establish this system of Federation we all so heartily desire. I must apologise for not being able to express my opinions to-day, but there is no more ardent federationist than I am, because I have thorough knowledge of the position of the colonies generally, and I feel sure that if we place ourselves in the position of an artist who is endeavoring to put the finishing touches to his work, and we try to put a finishing touch to that which will tend to the prosperity of the people of the colonies, the result of our labors will enable us to submit to the people a Bill which will not only prove acceptable to members, but which will tend to the future happiness and contentment of the people.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

I do not rise to prolong the debate, but merely to make an explanation.
My friends Mr. Barton and Mr. McMillan have informed us that Western Australia is here not in earnest, but just to take a part in the debate in a playful manner and to interfere as much as possible with the work that is going on. I do not know where this idea came from. At the time I interrupted that it was an unwarrantable assertion. If I and my colleagues are to be judged it is by something we have said, and I find in the speech I addressed to the House a few days ago I made use of these remarks:

I am at

Again, later on, I referred to the size and great extent of the colony I represent, and said:

We are all one people. We all belong to the same nation, and we do not want to live under different laws and be separated by hostile tariffs and imaginary lines drawn across a map, separating one colony from another, but we should form one great Commonwealth, and all federate together.

I do not know whether I have on other occasions during this Convention expressed myself in contrary terms, but I certainly do take exception, and strong exception, to Mr. Barton, who, from my point of view, did not take up a judicial position in regard to this matter, nor has he done so all through. In speaking he has taken up the position of an ordinary member, and he has criticised, and I think somewhat unfairly, the position of Western Australia in regard to this matter. I do not wish to say anything more, as I have made my explanation.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Sub-section 1 as amended agreed to.
Sub-section 2.

Mr. GLYNN:
I would again draw the attention of the Committee to what, I submit, is a difference between "laws" and "Acts." This word "law" is more abstract and may be applicable to a single section in an Act, and if that is so it is very material whether we leave the word "law," because the single section may deal only with the imposition of taxation, but the restriction on the power of amendment may be applicable to other sections in the same Act which do not deal with taxation only. I merely mention the point because I should like it cleared up by hon. members.

Mr. BARTON:
Do I understand the hon. member to refer to the use of the words "proposed laws"? If so, "proposed laws," I may say, is an expression used in other parts in regard to "Bills," while "laws" covers the expression "Acts." If the hon. member will refer to the Bill he will find that the words "proposed laws" relate to Bills. With regard to "Bills," the provisions of the sections will be left to be carried out by the House, that is, by the President or Speaker. So far as the expression "laws" or "Acts" is concerned, that deals with the law when it is passed, and such an expression to my mind clearly means that even after that which is a Bill has become law, if it deals with anything more than the imposition of taxation, it will be unconstitutional, and the Federal High Court can decide that it is unconstitutional and void; so when an Act affecting to deal with more than taxation, and yet is a Tax Bill, happens to be carried through both Houses and assented to in contravention of this provision, that would be an unconstitutional and therefore a void Act. I think that that is the point upon which my hon. friend wished for information.

Mr. GLYNN:
What I was pointing out was that it may be suggested that the word "law" might mean a section or a whole Act. If it be contended that it means a section it might be quite competent under this clause 53 to point to other sections in one Bill, others not dealing with taxation only, but dealing with other and general matters. I raise the point because it seems to my mind that the sub-section opens the way to a difficulty in the way of limiting the power of the Senate through sending up mixed Bills such as one dealing with appropriations and general matters.

Mr. BARTON:
Of course in one sense every clause in an Act is a law, because it is a distinct enactment; and if the hon. member will refer to the Statute Book in reference to old Acts he will find each clause beginning with "and be it further enacted," and every clause is therefore an enactment, and in that case it is a law. In this case, however, the meaning is clear. It is this: that the Bill, afterwards becoming a law imposing taxation, shall deal with the imposition of taxation only; that means, of course, shall contain such provisions as are necessary for carrying the taxation into effect. You cannot pass a taxation law by simply enacting that there shall be laid on certain property, or on certain subjects of importation, a duty. You will have to pass into law other enactments to carry that into effect. These are clauses dealing with taxation only, because they are the necessary machinery clauses for carrying the object of the Bill into effect. To that extent a law having been a Bill which dealt with taxation only, so long as it has clauses dealing with that subject only, would all be constitutional under this section. That is to say, where there were clauses in the Bill which did not themselves impose the tax, but provided for what was necessary or incidental to the carrying into effect of the tax law, they would be proper parts of the Bill, and therefore could not be ruled to be unconstitutional as being outside its scope.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I do not know whether I quite understand the effect of these sections. Do I understand Mr. Barton rightly as saying that the effect of it will be, if we pass the clause in this shape, that if the law should be assented to by the two Houses, and receive also the Queen's assent, and if it deals with the imposition of taxation and some other matters, that that law would be unconstitutional, and liable to be set aside by the High Court? If that is so I think we are going a great deal too far. I think these provisions are chiefly intended for the regulation of business between the two Houses, and the maintenance of the rights of each. If an infringement of these provisions, however concurred in, takes place, and notwithstanding the infringement in question, both Houses assent to the proposed measure, yet it is in afterwards to be held invalid. I am inclined to think it is too serious a consequence, and I ask Mr. Barton to say precisely what is the intention of the Drafting Committee on the subject. I ask him also to consider the point whether it would not be sufficient to leave it as a matter between the two Houses without going to the extent of passing the Bill in such a shape that any relaxation of any of these provisions, however unimportant, and concurred in by both Chambers, would invalidate an Act of Parliament.

Mr. BARTON:

My own opinion is distinctly that in the form in which this and the preceding sub-section, and probably the fourth sub-section, stand, they involve that protection which must be given under a Federal Commonwealth by leaving to the supreme arbiter of the Commonwealth—that is to say, to the High Court—the determination whether substantial infractions of constitutional law have taken place. To put it in another way: If the hon. member will compare this with the 52nd clause, that the hon. member will see deals with "proposed laws," and not with "enacted laws." "Laws" means "enacted laws." "Proposed" laws are to originate in the House of Representatives. It is not intended, as of course he sees from the form of the section, that the High Court of the Commonwealth should have under review such a question as whether a Bill originated in one House or another if passed into law. That is a question for the Houses to settle between themselves. But the question whether a law on the face of it exceeds the constitutional power as dealing with more than the imposition of taxation, dealing with more than the laying on of a tax and the machinery necessary for it, or whether it deals with two subjects of taxation at once, unless it is a Customs law, that question, and also the question whether the annual Appropriation Act deals with more than the ordinary annual services of the year, seem to me to be deeply rooted in the Constitution, and depend not merely upon the questions of relations of the Houses inter se, but on much larger considerations. For that reason, the word used has been "laws," so that the Federal High Court may deal with them, and if they infringe those principles, declare them unconstitutional. But where the words "Proposed laws" have been used, those sections deal with the position which would arise where, as between the two Houses, a House as a matter of procedure originated, or otherwise dealt with, or amended a bill which by this Constitution it is desired that that House should not originate or amend. These are questions that must be settled between the Houses, because no court in the world has ever yet dealt with the question whether, as between the two Houses in their own relations, one or other House has exceeded its powers in originating or amending Bills. But it is a safeguard-an integral part of a Federal Constitution-that, if we once say that a law shall not deal with more than one subject of taxation-unless it is a Customs law-or that it shall in no way deal with anything more than the imposition of taxation and the necessary machinery, then that is a question which relates to the whole basic principle of Federation whether that law shall be deemed to be constitutional, even if passed.

Mr. ISAACS:
Would you consider the repeal of an Act to be imposing taxation?

Mr. BARTON:
The repeal of a Taxation Act could not be for the imposition of taxation.

Mr. ISAACS:
I should think it would not be.

Mr. BARTON:
Unless it was accompanied with alternative provisions for taxation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS:
Suppose you repeal one land tax and put on another, are you clear that that is not dealing with the imposition of taxation?

Mr. BARTON:

If you place in any subsequent Act of Parliament provisions which are irreconcilably at variance with the provisions of a prior Taxation Act, there will be an implied repeal. If this be so, then it is no violation of the provisions of the Constitution if you turn an implied repeal into an express repeal. If there is a replacement of prior taxation by a later taxation Act, the mere addition of a repealing clause would certainly not be an infringement of constitutional provisions. What can be done by implication can always be done by express statement. This set

Mr. REID:

The remarks of my hon. friend Mr. Barton raise very serious considerations. Let us suppose that a policy of taxation—we will say a Customs tariff—is passed by both Houses. Let us suppose that both Houses are emphatically in favor of it, and there is some provision in that long Bill—one short clause—which may raise a point of law; then any person affected by that taxation in some insignificant way might upset the whole tariff and throw an entire community into the greatest state of uncertainty. We do not wish anything of that kind. I look upon these provisions, not as inserted for the protection of the taxpayers, but as provisions inserted to define the relations between the two Houses, and it is a matter entirely between the two Houses. If, for instance, the Senate by an oversight or by agreement chooses to pass a Bill which is not in strict accordance with these provisions that ought to be a matter entirely between the two Houses. It is not likely that the Senate would allow anything of the kind to happen, and I have a very strong opinion that if a Bill contained say a land tax and also the machinery necessary for collecting that tax it would be a clear violation of this provision.

Mr. BARTON:

Oh, no.

Mr. REID:

I venture to say so, because I remember the way in which these taxes are imposed in the mother-country and in most of the colonies. The tax is put in one short Bill and the machinery clauses in another Bill.

Mr. BARTON:

Not because of provisions of this sort.

Mr. REID:

No, because they do not exist, of course, but for another good reason, namely, that whilst under our Constitutions the Upper House is not allowed freedom in modifying taxes it should be allowed the most perfect freedom in dealing with the machinery necessary for collecting those taxes. If the two were put together the Upper House would be very much embarrassed in exercising a discretion upon the machinery clauses. I think this is so serious a matter in the light put on it by Mr. Barton that we ought to copy the term in the margin of the clause. I propose therefore:

That in sub-section 2 the words "laws imposing taxation" shall be omitted with a view of inserting the words "Tax Bills."

I think that would be infinitely better. It would be far better that any Acts of the Federation should not be open to review in the law courts upon a mere matter of procedure, because the essence of authority to impose a tax on a subject is the concurrence of the Legislature, and if that concurrence is affixed to the tax it would be an absurdity that on some technical point the whole law should be upset. We do not wish to appeal to our higher court on matters of this sort. The more Parliament is self-contained the better, and the more it is the master of its own powers the better. Viewing these clauses as provisions to safeguard the other branch of Legislature, and with no reference to the ultimate effect of the laws themselves, I propose the amendment I have submitted. I will follow this amendment up by proposing a similar amendment in sub-section 3.

The CHAIRMAN then put the amendment.

Mr. REID:
In deference to the suggestion, which I think is a proper one, of Mr. Barton—that we should follow as much as possible the structure of the Bill—I with the leave of the Committee, will alter my amendment by Putting the word proposed "before "laws"

Leave granted to Mr. Reid to alter his amendment.

Mr. SYMON:
There cannot be any doubt that this involves very serious consequences, and the underlying principle to which we have to get seems to me to be only indicated by my hon. friend Mr. Reid, rather than agreed upon by him. This amendment is not quite logical, and will not really accomplish his purpose. Undoubtedly it seems to me that clause 53 is intended to regulate the proceedings between the two Houses, to prescribe the basis upon which the relative power of the Houses in regard to Money Bills is fixed, and the exercise of their limitation and condition. If that is the governing sense of clause 53 and its various sub-sections, then we do not want an amendment at all. I am not saying that absolutely or dogmatically, but as indicating the opinion I hold on what Mr. Reid has said, that the whole purview of clause 53 is to deal with the relations of the two Houses regarding Money Bills. It was not intended by that section to create conditions which before a higher court might possibly lead to some Act being declared invalid, whereby endless confusion would arise throughout the Federal States. If that is the construction of the clause, and its object is ascertained by reading subsection 1, does that interpretation govern the whole of the sub-sections, and would that be simply limiting their effect to the relation between the two Houses? At the same time, if there is the shadow of a doubt upon that point, I am sure that the Convention will feel that it ought to be set at rest. It would never do to have the whole of the finances of the Federal States as well as their constituent States disturbed by an interpretation which might, if the law had been passed and brought into operation, be declared invalid after the lapse of time by some suitor who objected to pay a two-penny tax. I would point out that by introducing the words "proposed law," if you do not exactly limit the scope of the whole section you will not prevent that result, because if the High Court will have jurisdiction under section 2 to declare an Act invalid which did not comply with that provision it would equally have the power to declare an Act invalid if a Bill upon which an Act was founded did not comply with that condition. It occurs to me that if you condemn a tree because the branches and fruit are bad, the tree is equally bad if the root fails in its strength. So if your law is bad as being in conflict with the Constitution, it must be equally bad if the Bill upon which it is founded violates the Constitution. If we attach a condition to the introduction of a Bill that is questionable, and open to debate, we would lay the foundation upon something which might also be bad. What I suggest, in order to overcome the difficulty, which is obvious to all, is that we should introduce a general clause providing that non-compliance with any of the conditions imposed in this section with regard to the introduction of Money Bills should not invalidate them or lead to their being called into question after they have been assented to by the Governor. It would be comprehensive and safe, and no doubt would reach a constitutional point that would satisfy everybody.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I may say with regard to the point the Premier of New South Wales has referred to, that it is the very point to which I referred yesterday in discussing the matter. I think it is right that "Bills" should be used so long as we are speaking of that which is not an Act. It is the proper expression to use when the measure has not been passed by both Houses. I am not going to go back upon our decision. I understand that the Committee has resolved that the phrase unheard of hitherto, "proposed laws," is to be adopted. If the phrase is to be adopted, I think there is a danger of private suitors being able to show in the court on twopenny-halfpenny litigation that the whole of the Act is void. Yesterday it was suggested by the President that the best course under the circumstances, to avoid all doubt, was to have a special clause stating that, notwithstanding these provisions, if the Federal Parliament has once assented to a Bill it is to be regarded as law, even though the exact terms of the section have not been complied with. During the debate I have put down these words, which will answer the purpose if put in after sub-section 4.

Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing provisions, any proposed law to which the Federal Parliament has assented shall be deemed to be valid as a law.

When I say - the Federal Parliament I am using it strictly with regard to the definition in clause 1, chapter 1. The Federal Parliament is defined as Her Majesty and the two Houses, and I think this will answer the purpose. Of course I have drafted this in the haste of debate, but it seems to answer the purpose to which the President called attention yesterday, and I will put it as an amendment to clause 4.

Mr. ISAACS:

There are two classes of matters in this relation that I think we must have regard to. The first is this: Wherever the Constitution sets forth a condition of the validity of a law, and that condition is intended to protect the people as against the Acts of the Parliament, there I think the court should be the ultimate tribunal to decide the constitutionality or otherwise of the enactment; but wherever it is introduced for the purpose of merely regulating the procedure between the branches of the Legislature, there I think, after the two Houses agree to any enactment, that no court should afterwards question it. This section is intended to protect the Senate as against the House of Representatives, and I think that we should be careful, while affording the fullest protection to the Senate, that if the Senate saw it was a case in which public interest or public urgency demanded that they should not stick too closely to their privileges, that no individual should be able by litigation to challenge their conjoint and voluntary act. I do think there is the strongest danger, and I ventured to draw attention to it yesterday, that the Federal Treasurer might, after having a Tax Bill passed or an Appropriation Bill, passed by both Houses willingly and with their eyes open, find himself in this position: that some individual might challenge the Act through a court of law, which would be compelled to declare it invalid. The Treasurer might have expended the money, or might be desirous of obtaining money under the authority of the Act, and the position I have indicated is one we should not drift into. I think that the general modes of expression used by my friends
Mr. Symon and Mr. Higgins are very good, but I think that the form of the proviso, or rather another sub-section, should be:

No law shall be deemed to be invalid by reason only of any non-compliance with or contravention of this sub-section.

Mr. BARTON:

That is what has been suggested to me in conversation with Mr. Reid.

Mr. REID:

Any remarks made on this point may be made in better form if I withdraw my amendment and move it in the following form:—

Money Bills shall not be liable to be called in question in respect to any breach of the provisions of this section after the same have become law.

Mr. WISE:

I am glad that the Hon. Premier of New South Wales has moved his amendment in the form he has now suggested, because it brings us face to face with what, I venture to think, is an important matter, the importance of which hardly appears to have been recognised, and which it is rather difficult to deal with at this stage. I regard the clause as drawn, and particularly having regard to the deliberate choice of the word "laws" in distinction to the words "proposed laws," as a most important constitutional safeguard, and I doubt very much whether the representatives from the smaller States realise what an important protection is going to be taken from them by the adoption of this amendment. Stated in two sentences, it comes to this: The Bill as framed provides that although the ultimate power, whether because it has public opinion behind it or on account of the adoption of any machinery for meeting deadlocks, shall rest with the House of Representatives and the people of Australia as a whole, so that the numerical majority of the people shall ultimately in some way prevail, yet, in order to prevent that numerical majority overriding the views of any particular State, certain methods of coercion with which we have become familiar in our local Houses-methods of coercion of one House by the other-shall no longer be employed. One of the methods of coercion would be to include an obnoxious measure of taxation-obnoxious to the Senate-in a measure extremely popular and desired by the Senate.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Is not that provided for?

Mr. WISE:

No; tacking on to the Appropriation Bill is provided for, but not tacking on to ordinary Bills. Sub-clause 2 is necessary to give full effect to subclauses 3 and 4.

Mr. BARTON:
Two and 3 give as far as possible the right to the Senate in detail, and sub-clause 4 gives the right for the prevention of tacking.

Mr. WISE:

I am speaking more to get instruction from the Committee. As I understand clause 2, it is designed to prevent the tacking on of a tax on any other measure than the Appropriation Bill. Subclause 4 deals with tacking a tax on to the Appropriation Bill. Sub-clause 3 says, each tax must be in a separate Bill; subclause 2 shuts up another method of coercion.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

And away goes the Constitution.

Mr. WISE:

As Sir John Downer says, away goes the Constitution. These are measures deliberately designed for the protection of every individual citizen, and every citizen who votes for the Constitution is entitled to know what are the terms on which he will be liable to pay taxes. If the tax is imposed illegally there is no reason why the illegality should not be exposed by the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth just like any other illegal measure. No Government has a right to raise money illegally.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It might be raised in the belief that the Act was invalid.

Mr. WISE:

I admit the risk, but it only becomes great if you attribute gross stupidity or ignorance to the Government of the colony. I cordially assent to the distinction drawn by the Attorney-General of Victoria between Acts of a political character which the Supreme Court would never investigate, but this is something more. This is one of the fundamental conditions which must be observed before any taxation can be legally imposed. It is no less fundamental than that in the Constitution of the United States, under which the Supreme Court recently declared a certain tax illegal. It may be inconvenient, but are not the inconveniences greater of having the whole power of taxation placed in one House, putting it in the power of their members to override the other in any way they please, without having their action investigated or controlled by any judicial body? Is that not a greater risk than that of having a little inconvenience by some accidental omission through not observing the provisions of this clause? If it is really desired there should be no limit whatever upon the power of the House—and no one is a stronger advocate than I of keeping the control in the House of Representatives—

Mr. REID:
Both Houses must concur.

Mr. WISE:
No; that would not follow. We have yet to deal with clauses to prevent deadlocks.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There are none.

Mr. BARTON:
These are clauses to prevent deadlocks, and the best there could be.

Mr. WISE:
Certain clauses have been circulated in draft which make certain suggestions for overcoming deadlocks. But supposing the two Houses have had a difficulty, and that the numerical majority must prevail. Now assume that, in order to overcome this provision, if the amendment of Mr. Reid is carried, a Taxation Bill has been tacked on, say, to a Factory Act or some other Act. I am taking an extreme case, and it is only in extreme cases that this would operate. Supposing it were tacked on to an Act of imperative necessity, like a Defence Acts it could not be thrown out by any Chamber without menace to the public safety. If a case of that sort were attempted, and the Senate should choose to throw that measure out, the two Houses could meet, and the House of Representatives, by its more numerous majority, would carry the day, although there would not be the shadow of a doubt that the Tax Bill which had been carried in defiance of Constitution would be illegal. And yet no power on earth would be sufficient to aid the reluctant taxpayer, who would be robbed as surely as if the money were taken out of his pocket.

Mr. REID:
You are assuming a case in which the Government, having ultimately the appeal to the people, would begin by a breach of the Constitution. That is a big handicap.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
If you do not wish to break the Constitution, you will recognise the right of appeal to the High Court.

Mr. REID:
We do not want our taxes bandied about in courts of law.

Mr. WISE:
All this is designed to prevent the use of a weapon with which we are now familiar, the use of the weapon of coercion in times of excitement, where there may be a large, active, and passionate majority, a majority which, under these circumstances, we say shall not be allowed to act at once, because we provide that there shall be certain checks put upon it by the action of the Senate. But in order to prevent that position being rudely, ruthlessly, and recklessly overborne, it is said that the measure shall go up by itself as a single measure, and not tacked on to anything else. If we agree, we can go further. Mr. Reid is willing to put that in the Constitution. If we want to do that, let us do it with our eyes open, and not treat it as a matter of small importance. It is a matter of very great importance, and the distinction ought to be observed.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

What we are discussing now, and are endeavouring to fritter away, is what has been called the compromise of 1891, and this represents the whole bone and sinew of the compromise. The whole effect was this, when it came into the House, whether the Senate should have the right only to reject a Bill absolutely in globo, or whether they should veto in detail. We, who fought that, were in turn defeated, but in substance were successful, a majority of them refusing to put in words giving the right of veto in detail; and this provision, which was carefully drawn and considered, was put into the Bill for the purpose of giving the Senate the right substantially in another form. Now it is suggested that this right would in course of time be of little use, that these relative rights of the two Houses would in course of time be of little authority, unless at the back of it all there is a vindicatory authority, some authority that is to be the guardian of the Constitution and which will take care that the Constitution is observed, and that is to be the Supreme Court, therefore the draftsmen used different words-"proposed law" and "laws,"-the one to mark the stages of a Bill as between the Houses. and the other to mark what it has to be When in the condition of completion.

Mr. REID:

I will say at once that I have no desire to raise an interminable debate on this question of States' rights. I would rather not say another word-it is not worth the discussion. We might have the debate going on for another two days at this rate. I will not move my amendment at all.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I desire to congratulate the hon. member upon the step he has taken, but would now repeat, in a sentence or two, a suggestion which has been discussed favorably by Bryce and Bourinot, and which appears to me to offer a way out of this difficulty. It might be acceptable. It is not an amendment to move now, but one which, if thought over and approved, might be submitted at a later stage. I realise the force of the case put by the Premier of New South Wales as to the possible dislocation of machinery, the difficulty and loss liable to be occasioned by the discovery that a measure of the kind to which he referred—a Tax Bill—had been informally passed, and consequently that all that had been done required afterwards to be undone. That would be a serious catastrophe, and if we could prevent it, while conserving and protecting State privileges such as the hon. member Mr. Wise has very properly called attention to, we should be glad to provide against. I would ask, then, is it not possible to provide against this by enabling the representatives of any State in the Senate, after such a Bill has passed both Houses, to challenge it, and suspend its operation until the opinion of the Supreme Court can be taken on the matter?

An HON. MEMBER:
That would never do.

An HON. MEMBER:
It is very simple.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The Premier of New South Wales has called attention to an evident risk, though not a great risk, but certainly a serious one when it occurs, and if it is possible to provide against it, why not do so. If there were a power in the Constitution by which the representatives of any State could challenge the coming into force of a measure before it was given effect to, and before a tax was imposed, and the Supreme Court were required to take into consideration the question of its constitutionality, that would secure the safe-guard which the less populous States require, while you would not involve any suffering on the individuals intended to be affected by the legislation.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That would place us in a humiliating position.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I understand that the position put by Mr. Reid is that—

Mr. REID:
If this discussion is going on, I shall not withdraw my amendment. I withdrew it to stop the debate. But I shall insist on moving the amendment if the talk is to go on.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I hope the hon. member will not withdraw it.

Mr. BARTON:
The discussion I would point out, Sir, can only be upon the clause.
There is no amendment before the chair. The Hon. Mr. Reid intimated that he was going to move an amendment.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I hope that the Premier of New South Wales will adhere to the course that he indicated earlier in the debate that he would pursue. I understood the position put by the hon. member, Mr. Barton, was that if the clause is passed as at present, under clause 52 non-compliance will not be fatal to the validity of any law, and non-compliance with section 53 will be fatal, and that any law passed under that section will be invalidated by the High Court of Australia.

Mr. BARTON:
I might put it this way. The matter appearing on the face of the Bill—in respect of these matters which I submit are charters to the States—can be dealt with by the Court, but matters which are matters of procedure between the two Houses are not to be dealt with by the Court.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I understand my hon. friend puts it this way: Non-compliance with the section guarding the rights of the House of Representatives will not be fatal, but non-compliance with section 53, providing for the recognition of the privileges of the Senate, will be. I object to that most strongly; and as to what has been said about words being used here to emphasise the distinction, I remind hon. members of this—that these words were not used in the Commonwealth Bill as it left the Sydney Convention in 1891, but the same words were employed as to the infringement of the rights of the House of Representatives as were used with regard to the infringement of the rights of the Senate. The words we find here, "proposed laws," on which the whole distinction is based, are introduced for the first time before this Convention. There was a proposition to strike them out, which I then supported, and I trust something of the sort will be moved again in order that we may decide whether or not we are going to draw this distinction—that neither Sir Samuel Griffith, nor any other member of the Sydney Convention suggested—that, as regards the House of Representatives, if they infringe the law, so good, but, on the other hand, as regards the senatorial rights, if they are once touched, the aid of the High Court of Australia can be invoked, and the law declared invalid. I ask members to consider which of the two is the more important. Look at section 52, declaring in which House laws appropriating revenue, or imposing burdens on the people should originate. Surely there is no more important principle in constitutional Government, than a principle of that sort. Yet we are told, or the distinction is now attempted to be drawn, that it can be infringed—that a [start law can originate in the Senate in direct defiance of that, and, so long as the House of Representatives concurs, it passes to the Statute book as a valid measure. Compare a provision of that sort with the matters in clause 53, matters of pure convenience in regard to which we are to give powers to the Senate to enable them to veto in detail, by requiring that the laws should deal with one subject only. Sub-section 3 of clause 53 says:—

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of Customs on imports, shall deal with one subject of taxation only.

Compare these two things as matters of importance. Can any hon. member doubt for a moment which should be placed first in point of importance, clause 53 or 54? Yet hereby the introduction of words which were unknown to the Sydney Convention—"proposed laws"—in the first part of section 52, as opposed to the word "laws" in clause 54 of the 1891 Bill, it is proposed as regards the rights of the people to say to the House of Representatives as regards the initiation of Bills for the appropriation of the public revenue, "You can do what you like with them and no court shall stop you." As regards these other matters, priority of importance is to be given to them, and though the Senate may well wish to waive them, if they are infringed in the minutest particular the High Court of Australia may interfere and say, "Your work shall be held as nought, and the Act shall be declared void." It seems to me such a thing is utterly indefensible, and I trust Mr. Reid will adhere to the course he originally indicated his intention to take.

Mr. BARTON:

As the hon. member who has just sat down has referred so fully to what I have said, I should like to put myself in the right position. I lay down two principles. The one is that a question of mere procedure, where rights are given by our Constitutional law, is to be settled between the Houses themselves, and that there never was a Constitution in the world which gave any judiciary the power to inquire into the manner in which the Houses settled their procedure in those matters; but where it is a question of the presentation of a law, when passed, in such a shape, on the face of it, that one House is deprived of its fundamental rights as a component part of the Constitution, that should be settled by the arbiter of the Constitution. Was it ever attempted in this world, on a question whether a Bill originated in this House or that, or whether that House amended it or not, which is a question of fact, to allow a Supreme Court to be the arbiter of its validity? That has never occurred, and never can. No Court should be allowed to inquire into the manner in which two Houses adjust relations between themselves. If we give these two Houses the privileges which, according to the decision of the Committees in 1891, according to the decision of the Convention of 1891, and according to the decision of the Committee now, it is intended to give the powers, privileges, and immunities of the House of Commons—they will stand, as the House of Commons has ever stood, against any encroachment or infringement by any Court whatever inquiring into its method of regulating its procedure.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
It is not within the power of the judiciary to do so.

Mr. BARTON:
It is not in the judiciary's power, as given in this Bill. But the question whether, what appears on the face of a law is within the provisions of the Constitution or not, is a totally different one, and that question alone the arbiter of the Constitution has a right to decide. I desire to adhere to the compromise of 1891. I have been endeavoring to do so against some delegates, who, however, will now find me faithful in adhering to it on their behalf. Where there are matters not matters of procedure—where the effective rights of a component part of the Constitution are involved—the Constitutional principle is that the arbiter of the Constitution must be allowed to protect those rights. You have not it so in England because the Parliament there is Sovereign, but you have it in the Federal Constitution, because you have a Parliament that is only a part of the Constitution, and that Constitution must protect those provisions of the Constitution which are threatened with infringement. I shall resist all amendments in these respects because I consider the principles, which are altogether principles of justice, ought to protect Parliament in the exercise of its internal powers, and protect the people as to what is on the face of a law a breach of the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS:
Would the hon. member mind looking at clause 54 with regard to that?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
My hon. friend, Mr. Barton, forgets that he has already consented to a departure from the principle of the 1891 Bill. If he looks at clause 52 he will find we have amended that clause in the very direction that he objects to amend clause 53. The Bill of 1891 uses the words:

Laws appropriating any part of the public revenue

An amendment has been carried which effects the very purpose which Mr. Barton is contending against now. So that if there is any strength in the contention of the wisdom of the 1891 proviso, the hon. member has given his case away. For the sake of consistency, he should either support the proposal now made or else go back and have clause 52 brought into harmony with clause 53. Mr. Barton speaks of the English Constitution. That is an unwritten Constitution, and no court of law has, therefore, any statute to guide it in its interpretation of that Constitution. But here we have a written Constitution. In clause 71 I see that-

The judicial power shall extend to all matters arising under this Constitution or involving its interpretation.

My hon. friend, Sir John Downer, smiles, but if these words had not this meaning: that the Federal Judiciary should have the power of construing, I am at a loss to understand what they mean. It says so, and I take the words in cold type rather than listen to arguments based on a Constitution which is unwritten. Mr. Wise says that we may have the case of a minority overriding a majority, coercing the Senate, and passing laws despite of this regulation. Does not the hon. member know this, and I appeal to this Constitution to support my argument, that any solitary member, either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives, can immediately wreck a Bill infringing these provisions by drawing the attention of the presiding officer to it. It is in the hands of any one representative in either Chamber at any stage up to the final stage of that Bill to call attention to the infringement of the Constitution, and to have the Bill ruled out of order. I may be told that you may have a corrupt Speaker or a corrupt President, who will not rule it out of order, but you are just as likely to have a corrupt Judge. So far as regards this matter, any one solitary member of a minority—and it would be a very small minority that could not number one—can, by drawing attention to the infringement of the Constitution, have the Bill ruled out of order. Where can there be the coercion of a minority then, when it will be in the hands of the minority to protect themselves by this simple appeal to the Chair? In such a case, I say the Bill will have to pass unanimously, and where it passes unanimously why leave it to the judiciary to wreck that which is the opinion of both Houses of the Legislature?

Mr. WISE:

Why have a judiciary at all?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

If it is the sole argument for a Judiciary that we should have such a tribunal to wreck laws made with the approval of both Houses of Legislature, then let us have no judiciary at all. If my hon. friend Mr. Wise wants a judiciary to wreck the work of the Legislature, I do not think the people of Australia will support him in that contention. This clause was never intended, as far as the people have read it, to give effect to the arguments of either Mr. Wise or Mr. Barton. I hope that Mr. Reid will stand to his amendment, and that if he does not move it others will do it. We shall have this point decided by a test division.

Mr. WISE:

I would suggest to Mr. Carruthers that the amendment should be rather in this form: instead of saying that no law passed under this section should be inquired into by the Supreme Court say:

No law passed by the Federal Parliament shall ever be inquired into by the Supreme Court.

Mr. REID:

The question just put by Mr. Wise shows the very strange position he occupies. He does not seem to draw any distinction between the case he referred to in America, where the Supreme Court of the United States ruled a Bill out of order on the grounds that it was a violation of the principle of the Constitution as to a principle on which taxation should be imposed, and not a mere case of procedure between the two Houses. It seems to me that too much has been made of this point, which is represented as an attempt to take away from the smaller States their protection. That is a very good catch cry for, an argument, especially from New South Wales, when a speaker is hard up for one. There is absolutely nothing whatever in it, as the Hon. Mr. Carruthers has pointed out, and any member in either House can surely put a simple question to the Speaker to decide the fate of a Bill that is contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. My hon. friend Mr. Barton put a view just now which would wreck any Taxation Bill in the world. He said that by the words "Laws imposing taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only" in a Bill you can put any number of clauses in there which would have nothing to do with the actual imposition of taxation. If that were so it would mean a rich harvest for the lawyers of the Federation, and I hold the view with others that our finances might be brought into serious confusion thereby. Lately some taxation was imposed in a colony and it was done in two ways-by a Machinery Bill and by a Taxation Bill. Under provisions of that kind you would have the courts of the Federation flooded with applicants for litigation. We do not want the legislation of the Commonwealth to be degraded to that level. If we put in the Constitution a safeguard for the Senate that the Bill shall not be more than is specified here, is the Senate going to be such a decrepit, helpless creature, that, having a constitutional safeguard for its protection, it will be absolutely too blind to see it? Not only that, but they say that every senator from all the States will be so absolutely incapable as to give away one of the safeguards of the rights of the Senate. Unless this Senate that we are about to create is going to be such a despicable object such arguments as those used by Mr. Wise would have no weight. While Parliament is legislating for the people, and when the two Houses have come to an agreement that a certain thing should be law we do not want the High Courts to come into the Parliaments of the country and shipwreck that which both Houses have deliberately passed. With reference to the bogey raised about the referendum, there are provisions in this amendment, which dispose of that argument, because in the amendment I proposed to submit Money Bills should be liable to be questioned until they become law, so that at any time when the referendum is going on, a Bill could be easily questioned on a point of law in the courts. The absurdity of the contention of some is shown in the fact that in America in neither of the two Houses would a glaring violation of the Constitution be called attention to. I say further, if there is so much importance attached to this we must go back and put the clause which safeguards the other House in absolutely the same position. I have no feeling in this matter except a desire that Acts of Parliament, when they become law, should have the force of law and should not merely become food for lawyers. That is my only desire. Anyone who has occupied the position of Treasurer can tell of the loss that might be brought about if, after a policy had been brought into force, perhaps four or five years afterwards, a point is taken on some innocent formal words of the Bill, and the judges are compelled to declare that all of the money collected under the Act during those years had been improperly collected.

Mr. BARTON: Would that justify a sweeping amendment?

Mr. REID: My object was such a simple one that I did not apprehend so much importance would be attached to it. At first blush I thought everyone would be as anxious as I was to prevent the possibility of such difficulties, but I see now that there is a great deal more importance attached to it than I thought. The importance, I think, disappears when we remember that any member of the House of Representatives, upon calling the attention of the chair to the breach of the provisions, would kill the Bill there, and any one senator, upon drawing attention to the same clause in the Upper House, could kill the Bill there too.

Mr. WISE: Have you considered the position in America with regard to the Speaker, who happens to bear the same name as yourself?

Mr. REID:
The Speaker of the House of Representatives in America is really the leader of a political party sitting in the

Mr. BARTON:
Would you let the Constitution rest upon this matter?

Mr. REID:
Clearly no Ministry would bring in a Taxation Bill and allow it to be so amended. In America they move under a different set of circumstances altogether. As I pointed out, there is a great difference between the procedure as to whether a Bill contains clauses too many or not, and taxation itself in clear violation of the principle of taxation put in the Constitution. I was pointing out that I look upon this merely as a matter of procedure.

Mr. WISE:
It is not a matter of procedure.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Is not the amendment to be limited to procedure?

Mr. REID:
Entirely as between the two Houses, and that is my only desire.

Mr. WISE:
Would not the defect, if there was a defect, under this sub-section appear on the face of the Bill?

Mr. REID:
If it appeared on the face of the Bill, we have to assume first that the Government would bring in a Bill which on the face of it was illegal, and that there would not be one pure soul in the House to call attention to it, and that even the immaculate Senate would not contain an angelic mind that would do its duty to the Constitution. Heaven help the Constitution if it is to be run on these lines! The Upper House will not allow its rights to be violated if they are put in the Constitution, and the object of the amendment is simply to prevent an unfortunate accident, which would happen over and over again in Acts of Parliament, from rendering an Act after it has received the Royal assent, and which might be, perhaps, the deliberate policy of the country, accepted by vast majorities in both Houses, invalid. I would not have proposed this amendment in face of the serious debate it has provoked. I proposed, if no member of the Convention has a previous amendment:
To insert at the end of sub-section 4: "Money Bills shall not be liable to be called in question in respect to any breach of the provisions of this section after the same have become law."
That would allow any exception to be taken to a Money Bill till it has received the Royal assent, after which no such question shall be raised.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We have devoted considerably over an hour to this discussion.

Mr. REID:

Perhaps Sir George Turner will allow me, and in order to get this matter tested, I will apply the very same test which was applied to clause 52. I propose:

Before the word "laws," in sub-section 2, to insert the word "proposed."

I shall thus challenge the sense of the Convention in exactly the same manner as in the previous instance.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We have been discussing this matter for considerably over an hour, and if we take as long over all questions we shall be here for some weeks, and it seems the more we discuss it the more confused members will undoubtedly become in connection with it. I do not propose to add to that confusion to any great extent. I think there is some misapprehension with regard to the defects which might arise under this subsection. It may be that if the Parliament did not follow out the course here laid down the Federal Court would have the right to declare the whole law to be void. Well, that would never do. It would never do after a law had been passed voluntarily, without any compulsion such as Mr. Wise speaks of, the Parliament fully believing that they were doing everything right, and the Treasurer had acted on it, and collected a large amount of revenue, for him to find, because some small slip had been made, that the law was absolutely void. At the same time we do not want it to appear that in making any alteration we desire to, take away from the smaller States any protection which they may think they have under this. No one desires to give any ground for it, and I do not think any alteration we could make would take away the protection, because the protection is undoubtedly with the Senate. The only difficulty which might arise would be that the point in question might be overlooked. Therefore if we would lay on somebody the duty of certifying before the law passes that it was in compliance with this section we could give all the protection required.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Then you would leave it to the person who certifies to interpret the law.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No; when the law has once passed the court should not have the liberty to interfere, and say on some small question of procedure that the law should be upset I would leave it to the Senate.

Mr. REID:
They will take care of themselves.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Let it be the duty of the President for the time being to certify that the proposed law was in compliance with this section. It will then be his duty before putting in such law-

Mr. REID:

The Senate could make a Standing Order to meet that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No; in order to prevent any doubt arising among the representatives of the smaller colonies that they might be injured, I would suggest to Mr. Barton to adopt that mode, and make it appear that, while the Court had no right to interfere with the Act when it was once law, yet before it became law every opportunity should be taken to see that that section is not infringed. I would leave it to the President of the Senate to certify, either by himself or on a resolution of the Senate, that the proposed law was in accordance with this section, so that there would be a statutory duty on him to consider before the law was passed that there was no infringement of it.

Mr. GORDON:

It might be passed in one, sitting.

Mr. BARTON:

Would you prevent the Governor giving his consent without the certificate?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Something like that. I quite agree with the smaller States that there should be some provision by which they could not be injured, but I feel very loth to go the full length of giving the court power to interfere with the Bill when it is passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Perhaps a bewildered layman might mention what I understand to be the exact position. I understand if we add the word "proposed" before "laws" it would then be really a matter of procedure, and that the introduction of the word "proposed" before "laws" would make it practically a Bill, and that otherwise the question of whether the measure is constitutional could not be dealt with.

Mr. BARTON:

It will prevent the High Court from inquiring into it.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

According to the amendment proposed, it would prevent any mere slip of procedure from making invalid an Act which may affect the whole country and its financial operations, but nothing which we may enact with regard to procedure will prevent any suitor from going to the High Court if the Act is essentially unconstitutional. That is the way I look at it, and it seems to me that either putting in "proposed" before "laws," or adding an amendment somewhere or other making it clear that no mere slip of procedure can invalidate the law, would meet all the difficulties.

Mr. BARTON:
This is not proposed to cover mere slips, but everything.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I do not think that could be the intention. We are attempting to legislate for a very limited possibility. You will get disputes so long as there are lawyers in the world. I do not know whether Federation will do away with lawyers.

Mr. BARTON:
Not until merchants will cease to quarrel.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
If so it would simplify our arrangements very much. At the same time it does seem that there ought to be something introduced to prevent the law being put into operation for a mere breach of procedure, if there is such a chance.

Mr. SYMON:
There is no chance.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I do not suppose that any ordinary moral layman would do it, unless he were instructed by a less moral lawyer.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There seems to have been infused in this debate an amount of spirit, and I am going to incur the risk of the ordinary peacemaker. There has been no reference to the common-sense provisions which are put into all articles of association with regard to digressions from the prescribed routine. On the one hand, there is no doubt that there is no covert design to injure the smaller States and their representatives, by attempting to impose upon them laws which are not in the ordinary course as prescribed. I think the members for the minor States will accept that assurance. But, on the other hand, there is no desire on the part of the minor States advocates to give the lawyers more work than they can possibly help. But there is no doubt that these sub-sections 2 and 3 of section 53 are calculated to lead to questions in the courts which ought to be avoided if possible. Take sub-section 3:

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties Customs on imports, shall deal with one subject of taxation only.

What is meant by one subject of taxation? Suppose a land tax is imposed, you tax posts and rails. That may be argued not to be a law dealing with one subject. There are questions which will certainly arise which will be fruitful in litigation unless we take great care. Therefore, I am in thorough accord with the desire of the Premier of New South Wales to have some clause which will obviate the bringing of these trivial matters into the court, and under which a great wrong will be done on the ground of some trifling breach of the Act. What is done in the case of articles of association? There are in articles of association provisions for meetings to be held, for the holding of meetings in a certain manner, and for a number of directors, and so forth. But there is always a clause for any accidental omissions; to comply with the articles is not to invalidate the resolutions of the meeting. I would suggest this should be done here. All we want to provide against is accident, mere accidental omissions. I would suggest the following:

Any accidental failure to comply with the foregoing provisions of this section shall not invalidate any proposed law to which the Federal Parliament has assented.

Mr. REID:

That would make it worse.

Mr. HIGGINS:

But I would provide that the failure shall be treated as accidental, in this way. I would go on to add:

The failure shall be treated as accidental if it has not been brought to the attention of the President of the Senate or of the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARTON:

This procedure is to be brought before the court by way of affidavit, then.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is a simple matter. The mere fact that you define the accident in this form - that is to say, when no one has brought it before the Speaker or President is quite sufficient. Even if the word "accidental" were not defined, it is a regular expression used in articles of companies, and there has never been any question of difficulty raised with regard to it. It would be very easy to say that it should be treated as accidental unless some member of either House brings it before the Speaker of the House of Representatives or the President of the Senate. I feel sure that the experience of companies for many years past is the best experience we can have for dealing with any irregularity of this sort. I do not want to move this as an amendment, but if the honorable the Premier of New South Wales would accept it I would be very glad. It might be better for us to leave it to the Drafting Committee, with instructions that some form of words to carry out this idea should be adopted. I am not prepared to move anything on the spur of the moment, but I feel sure something of the kind I have suggested would be the correct way of getting over the difficulty.

Mr. O’CONNOR:

I think it is a misapprehension on this question to say that it is a matter for lawyers, and not of sufficient importance to be considered worthy of a full discussion. But I think it is a matter of the utmost importance, because it is one of the guarantees in this Constitution to the people represented in the Senate. I wish to put it as shortly as possible from that point of view. The Senate, by section 53, have certain limitations upon their powers. They are not allowed to deal with an Appropriation Bill appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the year; they are not allowed to amend a Tax Bill; and they are not allowed to amend any Appropriation Bill so as to increase any charges upon the people. That is the limitation which is put upon the power, not only of the members of the Senate, but it indirectly affects the rights of the people of the different States they represent, inasmuch as you have your States represented in the Senate. That is a limitation on the power of the States, and therefore in that limitation not only the members who represent the States at a particular time, but every member of the States interested has a direct interest in that portion of the Constitution. Now, in order that that right shall be exercised only in the strictest possible way you must surround it with some safeguards, and these safeguards become necessary for this reason, that it is well known where legislation is carried on by two Houses it is a common practice to evade laws of this kind, which are merely laws of procedure, and it is very easy to evade them. For instance, it is very easy to evade a law imposing taxation by inserting some provision in the Bill which it will be very difficult for the Senate to reject, and which would put the Senate in a very awkward position in the public eye if it did reject it, but which at the same time make it necessary if they pass it to pass an obnoxious system of taxation. A proposal of that kind is not unknown. Take the next sub-section—

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties customs on imports, shall deal with one subject of taxation only.

It is not an uncommon thing to introduce a Tax Bill containing a tax on land which might or might not be objectionable, or a tax on income which might or might not be objectionable.

Mr. REID:

Where is there a law against it?
Mr. O'CONNOR:

I will deal with that by-and-by. I point out that in the absence of a law, and the very absence of a sanction which will enforce the law, provisions for getting over the procedure of the House are very common. The next provision is:

The expenditure for services other than the ordinary annual services of the Government shall not be authorised by the same law as that which appropriates the supplies for the ordinary annual services, but shall be authorised by a separate law or laws.

That is meant to be directed to the provision of tacking which is very often met with in the process between the two Houses. Tacking to the Appropriation Bill is not a device that is unknown in these colonies.

Mr. REID:

Is it forbidden in this section?

Mr. GLYNN:

It is not prevented by this section.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

It is not excepted in the way which I will point out now, by making an infringement of this Act a penalty, that is to say, a penalty that the Act which infringes shall be of no validity. It is only in that way that you can ensure compliance with these provisions, or if you make it so obligatory that if they are not complied with the Act shall be void. I point out, in regard to these three different matters, that these are ways in which proposals of this kind between the two Houses are affected. It is said that is only between the two Houses. In any question between two Houses you will always be brought face to face with the condition of things which exists between the two Houses now. A law which may be introduced in violation of one of these sub-sections maybe believed to be a violation by the Senate, and thrown out on that ground, and be sent back. It may be sent up again by the House of Representatives, and so by that way you have a question which, instead of being settled, becomes a matter of contest between the two Houses. Another matter of difference between the two Houses we know. It is where one House happens to take an unpopular view of a question—a view which for the time being is not the view of the majority of the people. We know it is easy to bring the pressure of the majority of public opinion on one House for the purpose of obtaining a violation of the law. This is not intended to be a protection to the House or the Representatives of the House, but to the States represented in the House; that no matters of tactics between the Houses, or no playing off of public opinion by one House against another, shall ever take away the protection embedded in the Constitution for the States. I have heard of the argument of the inconvenience of laws being upset on account of some invalidity being discovered—some trifling invalidity, perhaps. I say you must submit to that inconvenience if you wish to enter a Federal Constitution. The very principle of the Federal Constitution is this: that the Constitution is above both Houses of Parliament. That is the difference between it and our Houses of Parliament now. The Federal Parliament must be above both Houses of Parliament, and they must conform to it, because it is in the charter under which union takes place, and the guarantee of rights under which union takes place; and, unless you have some authority for them to interpret that, what guarantee have you for preserving their rights at all. It is very necessary to insert this provision in the Constitution, because if you do not do that then these questions are questions of procedure between the two Houses in which undue pressure may be brought to bear at any time on one House or other for the purpose of vetoing a law and doing injustice to the States represented in that House in the different ways in which the States are represented. As to the inconvenience, there are thirty-two different subjects of legislation here which may be dealt with by the federal authority, and in regard to any one of these if an error is made which takes the law outside the authority which is given to the federal power it is invalid—absolutely void—no matter what inconvenience may follow.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is not a rule of procedure; that is jurisdiction.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
With every respect, that is begging the question to put that as an argument.

Mr. ISAACS:
That touches on State rights.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I admit that. In fact the whole thing is founded on State rights because if your amendment, using the word "proposed," is carried it is a matter of procedure; but if the word "laws" remains it is not a matter of procedure.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is what you have done on clause 62.

Mr. REID:
Why did the Drafting Committee alter that from the Bill of 1891?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
With all respect to that hon. member, the Drafting Committee did not alter that. It was altered by the Constitutional Committee, and I think very properly, because the initiation of a Bill is a different thing altogether from any of these questions. The initiation of a Bill is a matter which does not limit the powers which are given under section 53 to the States.

Mr. ISAACS:

Surely the initiation of Money Bills gives much more to the liberties and rights of the people.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

That goes really into a legal question. The difficulty of dealing with a matter of that kind is the manner in which it has to be raised before a court.

Mr. ISAACS:

Same principle.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

So long as you have a principle that if a law, on the face of it, is invalid, it is a matter which the Court can decide, the matter of initiation is not a matter of that kind. The principle involved here is exactly the same principle involved in the question decided in America as to the uniformity of taxation laws. The populations of the States had a right to insist that no tax which was not uniform should be imposed. And no matter what the rights of the Senate, for the time being, that was the protection in the Constitution against any action which might be taken, whether with the consent of the Senate or without. I ask the Committee to adhere to the proposal in its present form, not because it is a matter of protection to the Senate or the other House, but because it is a matter of protection to the States that have entered into this union that that limitation which is placed upon their power of amending a certain class of Bills cannot be infringed or enlarged by the adoption of any ordinary tactics which may be used under our present Constitution between the two Houses.

Mr. SYMON:

I do not wish to detain the Committee more than a moment or two, but I feel I ought to set myself right in regard to this proposed amendment. In doing so I wish, as I have already done personally, to express my regret that perhaps it was owing to a suggestion of mine that Mr. Reid's amendment assumed the shape it did. I accept any responsibility on that score, but I hope he will forgive me if I am unable to follow it up by voting for the amendment. I am, in this instance, an illustration of the value of discussions of this sort, and I desire to express my indebtedness to Mr. Wise and Mr. Reid for their arguments, which have satisfied me it would be exceedingly unwise and dangerous for us to introduce this amendment in this clause. I rather come back to my original view that, substantially at least, the provisions of this section are intended as provisions of procedure. So far as they are provisions of procedure, Mr.
Reid has shown conclusively that we have absolutely nothing to fear, because the House of Representatives may be relied upon, and the Senate may be relied upon to see that the ordinary preliminaries and the ordinary technical provisions are observed before the Bills are finally dealt with. I was led away by a consideration of the inconveniences that might flow from a taxation or some other Bill being declared invalid by the High Court some time after it became law. But exactly the same inconveniences may possibly arise from any single Bill passed under the thirty-five heads of legislation with which the Federal Parliament will have to deal. Therefore it seems to me that, whilst undoubtedly inconveniences may arise, still these inconveniences do not militate against a very salutary power which as a Federation we propose to vest in the High Court of the Commonwealth. I will only add this—without going into the details applied in so masterly a way by my hon. friend Mr. O'Connor, when he pointed out the real safeguard in relation to these sections which the High Court might be at the instance of a suitor—that we must remember if we seek to derogate from the power we vest in the High Court of dealing with all laws which any citizen of the Federation may claim to be unconstitutional, we are not invading State rights, because it is not a question of small States or large States, but it is a question of the liberty and rights of every subject throughout Australia. It is the subject that is concerned in this; it is not the body politic, but every taxpayer—every individual who may be assailed either in his liberty—

Mr. REID:
But if both Houses are favorable to the taxes, is there anything in that?

Mr. SYMON:
That does not matter. The moment you override or coerce the Senate—

Mr. REID:
Coerce! Why, one man has only to get up and point out that

Mr. SYMON:
Suppose you have a majority in the Senate willing to override the law, how is the minority to be protected, how is the State represented by that minority to be protected, and every dissentient citizen in any of the other States, large or small? But the point I wish to call the particular attention of the Committee to is that if we seek to prevent redress being obtained in the High Court with regard to the constitutional position of any law, we are invading one of the first principles underlying any system of Federation. My hon. friend Mr. Carruthers seems to forget that we are dealing with Federation when he talks about a High Court to wreck the work of legislation. First of all, that is an inappropriate expression. If he means we are constituting a High Court to decide whether the laws are constitutional or not, undoubtedly we are. If not we had better sweep this Federation away at once— we are here on a wild goose chase. Were we to adopt the amendment, I do not see that it would have the effect which Mr. Carruthers urged, if it were hedged round with such limitations as Mr. Higgins alluded to; but if we pass this amendment in its present form we run the risk of making Parliament, in regard to Money Bills, the judge of whether it is acting within the Constitution or not. If we do that we are striking at the root of a just Federation, and it is from that point of view, which was brought very clearly before the committee by my hon. friend Mr. Wise, that I feel it impossible to vote for an amendment which at the first blush seemed to get over some practical difficulty. I think we had better omit it altogether. If we omit it we shall be acting consistently in this: that we shall be making no exception to the power of the High Court to interpret the law of the Constitution, and declaring whether an Act of Parliament is contrary to that or not. Parliament is not supreme, and the very essence of the Federation is that it should not be so. Parliament, as far as constitutional questions are concerned, is under the law, and it must obey the law. If we make an exception in regard to Money Bills we had better make an exception in the case of all other Bills which may arise under the provisions of clause 51, and thus sweep away the High Court. I thought that we were all agreed that the reason for the establishment of the High Court was a salutary one, and that it would determine constitutional law and practice. We must all remember that at one portion of the history of England a question of liberty was raised by a humble individual named John Hampden, who put forward a point on the subject of taxation. We do not know but that we may have John Hampdens in Australia raising questions of liberty; it would be well to leave the High Court of Australia to deal with such matters as that.

Mr. Reid's amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Sub-section 2 as read, agreed to.

Sub-section 3.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I desire to draw Mr. Barton's attention to these words in the subsection:

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of Customs on imports, shall deal with one subject only.

That would require that every time you desire to deal with the duty of excise it should be done by a separate measure. That cannot be the intention. It would very often happen that the question of duty of Customs and the duty of excise would have to be discussed together, and that it would be impossible to decide what ought to be done with regard to the one unless you know what you will do with reference to the other. If we are to deal with the large number of items included in a Customs Bill, I fail to see why we should not be able to include in the same measure all duties of excise. I would ask the hon. member to consider the matter, and either make an amendment or give us a reason for the retention of the words as they stand.

Mr. BARTON:

The reason why it has not been done so far is this: Sub-sections 2 and 3, in consideration of the fact that laws imposing taxation are not subject to amendment by the Senate, have been put in the form of protecting the Senate from the coercion which might be involved in a taxation measure having added to it something which was not a taxation measure, or a taxation measure having two distinct subjects of taxation brought into the measure together. That protection is of course a counterpoise to preventing the Senate from amending such measures. If what I might call the other side, in a genial way, had their way this morning, it would be a question whether protection of this kind remains in the compromise of 1891. The hon. member raises an important point, and that is whether there is to be permission in the Customs Bill to have a corresponding excise. That is a matter I must leave in the hands of the Convention entirely. For myself, I have no strong feeling about it, except that we ought to keep as strong and inviolate as possible those protections which are afforded not only to the Senate, but to the people themselves to consider what under the Federal Government is involved in so separating the subjects of taxation, and, as the next sub-section shows, the subject of appropriation, as to enable the Senate to deal with them separately. The object of this, of course, is that inasmuch as amendment is prevented the subjects should be so divided that no two subjects could come before the Parliament together as matters of taxation, so that where the Senate cannot amend they have the right of veto, and veto as far as possible in detail. Of course they cannot have Customs or excise law in respect of so many items so that there could be veto in regard to each, because veto in detail with all of these would mean interference with the financial policy of the whole Government. But it has been unanimously agreed in respect of taxation that the Senate should have a veto, and the object of this clause is to divide into their proper categories all laws imposing taxation, so that that veto may be exercised without interference and as a protection to the smaller States and a protection of those rights which every Second Chamber ought to have, whether it is the Senate of a Federation or a House made under the ordinary Constitution. That is my object, and I am sure that the object would be infringed if the provision were to allow the question to be considered in the same Bill. My position is this: that until I see very strong reasons for doing otherwise it is my intention to adhere to the terms - I do not want to bind anyone else—but I desire to adhere individually to the conclusions of 1891, because I think they are the best basis upon which Federation can be secured. I think very strong reasons should be adduced to allow the two subjects of taxation to be introduced into the one Bill, and we should adhere as nearly possible to the Bill of 1891. Most of us contend that the compromise or the conclusions of 1891 should be adhered to, and as we have succeeded in our argument in showing that they should be adhered to in respect of one portion of the clauses I think we should stick to them in regard to the other.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Although I entirely agree with the object of the clause in one respect, I think it fails in the object intended to be given to it, and that is in the exception as to laws for imposing duties of Customs. I question whether that exception is sufficiently and carefully safeguarded. There is no doubt as an ordinary layman reads it that under the laws imposing duties of Customs or on imports they can go on and impose taxation in any other form. There is nothing to prevent the imposition of excise duties, and there is nothing to prevent the law seeking to impose land or income taxes or anything else, and therefore I hope, when the clause comes to be finally accepted, as I trust it will be, that some limitation will be placed upon the exception in regard to duties. I think we all understand what is meant, that a Bill imposing duties may necessarily have to deal with any number of subjects liable to such duties, but as the subsection is worded it will go much further.

Mr. ISAACS:

An instant before Sir Edward Braddon called attention to this matter I was directing Sir George Turner's attention to the same point. The intention is perfectly plain to us at all events, but what may be done and what in future times may be contended is not quite so clear. The sub-section reads:

Laws imposing taxation shall deal with one subject of taxation only.

Bills which impose duties of Customs on imports are entirely excepted from that provision.

Mr. GLYNN:

We can amend it.

Mr. ISAACS:

Yes; and I think it should be made to read:

Laws imposing taxation shall deal with one subject of taxation only, provided laws imposing duties of Customs on imports and of excise may deal with more than one item.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I suggest that the best plan would be to postpone the clause afterwards, and recommit it in order that the draughtsmen may re-cast it. We have now been discussing the clause for a couple of hours, and have made little progress.

Mr. REID:
I assure my friend Sir William Zeal that the matter raised by Sir George Turner is very important.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Refer it to the draughtsmen.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is not a question of drafting.

Mr. REID:
I would point out to Sir William Zeal that recommitting the clause might mean fighting the matter all over again, and we want to get rid of it altogether. The point raised by Sir George Turner is an important one. There may be a Customs Bill introduced, and it may involve duties of excise on a large number of goods, and at present each excise duty would have to be included in a separate Bill, and then a most unfair thing might be done. Ten duties might be proposed, and eight, because they were popular, might be agreed to, and the remaining two thrown out because they were less popular. If you have the Customs as a whole you must have the excise as a whole.

Mr. FRASER:
Surely duties of Customs on imports should be dealt with at the same time as excise. That is only common sense, and might be agreed to at once, as we have been wasting a tremendous lot of time

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I hope Mr. Barton will not mind me proposing to alter the sub-section, as I know the difficulty of interfering with drafting, and I do not like to have my own drafting interfered with. I will move:
That after the words "Customs on imports" there shall be added the words "and excise."

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Do you mean that they should be in one Bill or two Bills?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I think that they should be in one Bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Then you are making it necessary that there should be one Bill of
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   I would not go that length.
Mr. WISE:
   I think the sub-section might be made to read:
   Laws imposing taxation shall deal with one subject of taxation, and laws imposing duties on imports shall deal only with duties of Customs and excise.
   The difficulty my friend Sir George Turner suggests is that if you add laws imposing duties on exports and laws imposing duties on excise you leave it this way: that you would have to have as one Bill a Bill imposing duties on exports, and you would have to have another separate Bill imposing duties on excise. I understand my friend may do this where a Customs tariff is introduced and there are a number of balances in the same tariff at the same time—Customs duties with excise duties.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   If necessary.
Mr. BARTON:
   Do we do that in our ordinary legislation? We bring in a separate Bill.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   We do not.
Mr. BARTON:
   I do not think it is the practice in New South Wales to go into Committee of Ways and Means, both for Customs and excise, at the one, time; I think that is the Flame in South Australia. It may m that excise on beer, without assenting to that on tobacco, inasmuch as the power of amendment is taken from it. It would not have an opportunity of declaring itself on this, inasmuch as these were placed in a sort of balance. So it remains a question whether these duties of excise should not be in one Bill and Customs in another, and also whether—
Mr. REID:
   Why Customs in this way?
Mr. MCMILLAN:
   I would suggest as an amendment the insertion of the words:
   Except laws imposing duties of Customs and excise, whether in one or separate Bills.
Mr. BARTON:
   If you did that you would have both Customs and excise in one measure.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
Why not?

Mr. BARTON:

Mr. McMillan says, "Why not?" I think that is a question to be debated by the Convention. I have not considered the matter much myself. If you are to accept Bills proposing duties of Customs and duties of excise, whether in one or separate Bills, you still leave it open to have forced upon the Senate a Bill which contains duties on imports, and also widely different duties on excise, and the question is whether that is within the intention of the compromise of 1891, which was, as far as it was possible, to separate the subjects in detail. Whether that power should be preserved, I think is a very important question. It is, however, very easily overcome in the way of drafting. The suggestion of Mr. Wise or a modification, of it might be put in. But inasmuch as I regard it as a question of substance I will not say anything about it till the Convention has had an opportunity of fully expressing itself. I would like to defer my opinion, only saying that it is my intention, as far as possible, to adhere to the compromise of 1891.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I would like to omit the words:
Except laws imposing duties of customs on imports,
and add at the end of the clause:
Providing that laws imposing duties of customs on imports, and also imposing duties of excise, and may deal with any number of articles.

I do not desire to take away an item of the compromise, but I do desire to prevent deadlocks occurring hereafter. From my experience I say that if you leave it in this position you may have serious difficulties hereafter. You perhaps would have a duty of so much on spirits, and an excise of so much on tobacco, and unless you deal with it in this way you will get into a state of confusion.

Mr. BARTON:

You might provide that no excise shall be imposed on any item which is not also subject to taxation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I do not know. We have an excise duty on colonial beer. I am perfectly prepared in this way, as suggested to me by Mr. Deakin, that where you have items of Customs on imposts, and you desire to have an excise on similar articles they could go in one Bill. But if the question applies to something on which you have no Customs duty it might be put in a separate Bill. If you are going to impose a Customs and you desire a duty of excise, these two questions ought to be considered and passed at one time, for if you impose a duty of excise on a certain article and reject the duty of excise you might destroy a large industry.
Mr. FRASER:
I think that the amendment would be perfect provided that the duties in the shape of excise would only deal with the subjects on which are imposed import duties, but it does not say so. If duties are proposed on spirits or wines, and these articles have an increase of duties proposed, then undoubtedly the Treasurer of the day should have the liberty to propose duties of excise on similar articles but not to ring changes upon any number of outside articles. If that is attended to the amendment will be in perfect order.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think it is absolutely necessary in making a comprehensive financial policy that a Bill introduced with Customs should also, as a rule, contain details of the excise; but, at the same time, I think it would be a mistake to make it compulsory in the Constitution that there should be one Bill. We ought to make it so that the excise and Customs could be dealt with together, but that they could be introduced as separate Bills if necessary.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There is nothing to prevent that.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
I am only pointing out now as a financier that I agree with Sir George Turner that if you have a broad financial policy such as that which would usher in the arrangements of a new Federation it would be better that the financial proposals should hang together. There is no greater injustice to the Upper House in dealing with the Excise Bill in globo than there is in the Upper House dealing with a Customs Bill in globo.
Mr. SYMON:
We might adopt what Sir George Turner proposed if we struck out the last few words, and inserted:
Upon any article upon which it is proposed to impose duties of Customs.
That would enable a financial proposal to be submitted, and would not be open to the objections pointed out by the hon. member Mr. Barton, that it would be dealing separately and independently with excise duties which in the interests of the States might be dealt with separately, because in one State it might be to its interest to do so, though it might not be in another State. It might be to the interest of South Australia to have excise duties on tobacco, but it may not be on other articles.
Mr. REID:
They should be taken together because we want to do away with these local combinations causing strifes over one impost as against another, and deal with the question in a broad national spirit.

Mr. SYMON:
We want to prevent unpatriotic combinations.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
In this matter we are fighting over again the question as to whether the Senate shall have power to deal with Money Bills or not. Here is the first attempt to fritter away the right of the Senate in this matter. There will be cases in which the subjects of import and excise must be very largely mixed up, and it may be highly proper to consider the two things together. Where is the difficulty in having two Bills before the Senate, where is the difficulty in their internal arrangements which prevents them from dealing with them?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
They might reject one and accept the other.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
If we are to force the Government to bring up its financial resolutions piecemeal instead of in one Bill it would be a highly inconvenient thing to the Government. I can understand every gentleman present who is a Minister in office now, and who has these things brought more immediately before his mind at the moment, taking this view. We ought not, however, to sacrifice a great constitutional principle on questions like this. A great struggle took place over the power of amendment. That was reduced to the power of veto, and that was again brought down to the question of whether veto, instead of being general, should be in detail; and I understand that we have settled that it should be in detail. Are we going to depart from that? So far as practical difficulty is concerned, there can be none in a Customs Bill and an Excise Bill going up at the same time for consideration by the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It is not worth while fighting about.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I do not know whether it is worth while fighting about it. We want to find that out. We want to provide for this question of tacking, and for one Bill being put on to another, and so compelling the Senate to pass Bills some parts of which they like and with some of which they disagree. It is, I think, better to leave the clause as it is.

Mr. BARTON:
I understand it is proposed to strike out:
Except laws imposing duties of Customs on imports
And to insert at the end of the clause:
Providing that laws imposing duties of Customs on imports and also imposing duties of excise, may deal with any number of articles.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I am not particular as to the wording so long as I got the principle.

Mr. GLYNN:
Leave out "excise."

Mr. BARTON:
I think still the game difficulty arises, as the intention of the principle in the conclusions of 1891 was, wherever it was reasonably possible, to separate matters so that they remained separate matters of principle to be dealt with by the Senate separately. This would be a departure from that principle, and would curtail those rights of the Senate which are given to it in consideration of the fact that it may not amend Money Bills. It is clear by the decision of to-day that the Senate may not amend Tax Bills, and I want to stand to that principle of justice which, in lieu of the right to amend Money Bills, gives it the right to deal in detail with and veto separate subjects of taxation. I think the course which is adopted in some other colonies, as in this one and New South Wales, might well be adopted by the Commonwealth, to pass a separate law for every such subject of excise duty, to pass a separate resolution in ways and means for every such subject, and having carried those resolutions to embody them in a Bill. There have been departures in all the colonies, but that has been the prevailing rule, and I think it is the best plan. If that view is adopted I do not think we should leave out these words, but should leave the clause as it stands and insert some words to meet Sir Edward Braddon's objections. His objection is an important one. It is that the words:

Except laws imposing duties Customs on imports may impliedly give leave when passing a Customs Bill to add other subjects of duties other than Customs duties; so that a Customs Bill might include a Land and Income Tax Bill.

Mr. SYMON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:
That clearly was never the intention of the clause. While I wish to stick to the substance of the compromise of 1891, I am perfectly ready that any amendment should be made which can carry out and effectuate the intention of that compromise. I think it might be better if we retain the clause as it stands, and then add to the sub-section the words:

And laws imposing duties of Customs shall deal with duties of Customs only.

I will move that as an amendment.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I only seek Mr. Barton's advice as to whether the words he has just indicated will cover the ground we wish to cover as completely as a draft of an amendment which I have shown him, and which proposes to add at the end of the sub-section the following:

Provided that laws imposing duties or Customs on imports may deal with several duties or Customs, but shall not deal with any other subject than such duties or Customs.

Mr. BARTON:

I have already proposed an amendment to that effect.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Then I am satisfied.

Question-That the words, "Except laws imposing duties on Customs on imports," proposed to be struck out, stand part of the sub-section-put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON:

I move my amendment.
Mr. DEAKIN:

The suggestion made by my hon. friend Sir George Turner was the matter upon which I myself voted on the last division. He indicated that, instead of pressing the amendment as he originally moved it, he was quite prepared to accept a variation which would permit of those items upon which the duty of Customs and the duty of excise were both proposed being submitted together in one Bill. I take it that every member present who has had any experience of dealing with a Customs tariff will recognise how absolutely essential that is. If you have your duties of Customs submitted in one measure, and your duties of excise on the same articles submitted in another measure, the rejection of either of these Bills not only absolutely defeats the intention of the Chamber charged with the duty of framing an excise and Customs tariff, but absolutely distorts it in a most indefensible manner. Under the circumstances which would then occur it would be possible, either by defeating the Customs Bill, to put a burdensome tax upon the local industries of the country without any justification whatever, which would mean their annihilation, or, on the other hand, by the rejection of the excise duties, to increase the protection afforded by the Customs to an inordinate extent. Surely it is fair, when it is proposed that Customs and excise duties are sought to be imposed on the same articles, that the choice left to the Senate should be either to accept or reject the scheme as a whole. Surely it is unfair to place in the hands of the Senate the power not only to defeat the financial policy of the House of Representatives, but absolutely of reversing it and rendering it ridiculous.

Mr. LYNE:

It gives the Senate power to burst up the policy of the Government.

Mr. DEAKIN:

If excise duties alone were proposed, or Customs duties alone were proposed, it is perfectly reasonable to ask that they should be dealt with in separate Bills. All those articles upon which Customs only were proposed might well go up in one Bill, those articles upon which excise only were proposed might go up in another Bill, and then those articles upon which both Customs and excise were proposed might go up in a third Bill. This cannot be done because the amendment submitted by my hon. and learned friend Mr. Barton distinctly lays it down that a measure containing Customs duties shall not contain anything else.

An HON. MEMBER:

Cannot you move an amendment?

Mr. MOORE:

That amendment does not touch your point at all.
Mr. DEAKIN:

It does to this extent, because it is submitted that it ought to be possible to join Customs and excise duties in one Bill.

Mr. REID:

Under the words of this sub-section each subject must be in a separate Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I would prefer leaving the question of the expression of this idea to the Drafting Committee. The proposal I now submit is that the duties of Customs and excise should be dealt with by three Bills—all duties of Customs to come under one Bill, all duties of excise to be in another Bill, and all other articles upon which both Customs and excise duties are imposed to be embodied in a third Bill. I therefore wish to move—

The insertion of the words "or Customs and and excise" after "Customs."

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I quite agree in the main with the opinion of my hon. friend Mr. Deakin, but I do not agree with the amendment he proposes. I think what we want to do is to secure that each Excise Bill should be taken as a whole, and not set out in separate Bills according to the amount of its items. I do not think we should differentiate at all with regard to the particular character of one Excise Bill from another. It would be better to create two classes of Bills—one of Customs and one of excise, and make it clear that they can have any number of items that are necessary, and that they must be accepted or rejected as a whole. I think he will find that by introducing the other class of Bills to which he has alluded he will complicate matters. I do not think this amendment is any infringement of State rights, or the rights of the Senate, because Excise Bills are practically on all fours with a Customs Bill. I should have an amendment that would embody the right of sending up Bills of Customs and Excise to the Senate with the full enumerated items in each.

Mr. BARTON:

Does not this involve a question of policy as to whether the Customs duties should not be balanced by a corresponding excise duty? If it does involve such a question, is it not part of the intention of this amendment that the Senate should be prevented from considering those as separate matters of policy? If questions of excise are submitted as separate matters, then they may be dealt with by both Houses as such, except that the Senate cannot make amendments. It may take an extreme step in regard to such a Bill, but if it does not do that it must pass it. Is it not better that the subjects of excise and Customs should be kept separate, as hitherto? Have we ever had a tariff Bill -we have not in New South Wales-which made some goods the subject of both Customs and excise duties? If we have not, why give permission to have such a thing done under the Federal Constitution?

Mr. DEAKIN:
We have.

Mr. BARTON:
Is there any other colony where that obtains?

Mr. HOLDER:
Yes, South Australia.

Mr. BARTON:
I was told differently.

An HON. MEMBER:
That is not what is proposed now.

Mr. BARTON:
Yes, it is. As the amendment stands, you can include duties of excise and Customs duties within one Bill.
As it stands, it reads:
And laws imposing duties of Customs shall deal with duties of Customs and duties of excise only.
That means that you can have a Bill not dealing with any subject but excise, and that you can have another Bill dealing with the subject of Customs, balancing this with the subject of excise. The whole question of the difference between free trade and protection may be involved.

An HON. MEMBER:
Why?

Mr. BARTON:
If you balance this one with the other there can be no amendment, and the whole thing must be vetoed or the whole thing passed. When we consider that, is it our intention to put the Senate in such a position with regard to matters of that sort? In the original intention embodied in this clause there is no doubt the motive was that all laws imposing taxation should deal with one subject of taxation only, and that laws imposing duties of Customs on imports should deal with Customs on imports only. That intention took no account, and intentionally no account, of the subject of excise, and what we are now asked to do is to depart from this conclusion and say Bills of Customs must deal with Customs duty only, or if they go further they must deal with duties of excise. If we substitute for what seems to be the more regular method-that is dealing with excise separately-if we substitute for that the ability to lump into one Bill subjects of Customs and subjects of excise, then I think we are taking away from the Senate a degree of power intended to be given to it by the Bill of 1891.
As I have expressed my intention to stand by this conclusion, I shall be obliged to vote against Mr. Deakin's amendment. If the amendment is to stand in this form, one House must swallow everything or reject everything. This is not the conclusion of 1891, and I have expressed my intention to be loyal to that conclusion, so I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. Reid:
While I am willing to agree with Customs and excise being in separate Bills, unless the whole excise policy be in one Bill side by side with the whole Customs policy we are put in an anomalous position. If the Senate is not to be allowed to amend one line of the Customs policy, which involves thousands of lines, is there any use hanging on to the chance of throwing out one Excise Bill out of probably a dozen. Such a system will give rise to a war of local interests which should not be dealt with except as a whole. If the Constitution is to deal with the question of Customs as a whole, surely it should deal with the question of excise as a whole. Is there any sense in the opposite course? It seems to me a lamentable thing that the Bill should be going through in such an inconsistent state. Combinations may arise, and perhaps a combination may pass a tremendously heavy Customs tariff.
The Government in all fairness brings in an excise policy-not up to the Customs, but bearing some sort of proportion to it-and if they are compelled to introduce it in detail, that is to say, twelve different Bills for twelve different duties, do not we know the logrolling that will go on in connection with these Bills? Surely the Senate does not want to be landed in such an ignoble position. I am quite willing that the Customs and excise, although I would prefer it the other way, should be in separate Bills, but I do not think that Mr. Barton seriously proposes that when a Government submits its financial policy it should not be permitted to introduce its excise duties in a single Bill. I think Mr. Deakin should withdraw his amendment and propose one to enable all excise duties to be dealt with in one Bill.

Mr. Deakin:
We will accept that.

Mr. Reid:
There is a general feeling in

Mr. Deakin:
With the permission of the Convention, I will withdraw my amendment and support one, in the direction indicated by Mr. Reid, since that is the best we appear able to obtain.
Mr. Deakin's amendment withdrawn.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Perhaps Mr. Barton, who has the drafting of the Bill, will put the amendment in his own words.

Mr. BARTON:
I think the sub-section should be made to read:
And laws imposing duties of Customs shall deal with duties of Customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.

Mr. ISAACS:
Why not insert "or of excise" after "Customs on imports"?

Mr. BARTON:
That is not so complete an irruption on the conclusion arrived at in 1891.

The CHAIRMAN:
We have the original amendment before us, and we have to dispose of that before we can deal with another amendment.

Mr. BARTON:
That will require withdrawal, and in order to make room for any amendment which may be proposed I ask leave to withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I understood that Mr. Barton would move the amendment.

Mr. BARTON:
I think the Convention is generally of opinion that the words "or of excise" should be inserted. I therefore move:
That there should be inserted after the words "Customs imports" the words "or of excise."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
Now I shall content myself with proposing my own amendment:
That the following words be added to the subsection: "but laws imposing duties of Customs shall deal with duties of Customs only."
I propose to stop there, and the sense of the Convention may be taken on my hon. friend's addition.

The CHAIRMAN:
The question is that the words:
But laws imposing duties of Customs shall deal with duties of Customs only be added.
Amendment agreed to.
Mr. DEAKIN:

I beg to move at the end of the clause the addition of the words-
And laws imposing duties on excise shall deal with duties on excise only.
Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN:

That sub-section 3 as amended stand part of the clause.

Mr. GORDON:

How does it read?

The CHAIRMAN:

I will read it:

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of Customs on imports, shall deal with one subject of taxation only, but laws imposing duties of Customs shall deal with duties of Customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.
Sub-section 3, as amended, agreed to.

DEPARTURE OF WESTERN AUSTRALIAN REPRESENTATIVES.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

Mr. Chairman-I desire to wish, on behalf of myself and my colleagues, hon. members good-bye. We have to leave to catch the Ophir, and I can assure you that we all leave with very much regret. We would like to have stayed to have completed the work we are engaged on. I thank hon. members, particularly the Premier and Government of South Australia, on behalf of my colleagues and myself for the kind consideration they have shown us. Whatever differences of opinion have existed between hon. members and ourselves we will consider as a passing event, and we will carry with us nothing but good feelings.

Mr. BARTON:

May I say, Sir, we all extremely regret the departure so early of Sir John Forrest and his colleagues for West Australia. It is always a pleasure to deal in parliamentary battles with men who fight fairly, and it is impossible to meet a man and have the misfortune to differ with him under circumstances marked by less unpleasantness than in the case of Sir John Forrest. We agreed happily on many matters, and it is a great pleasure to be agreed with him. But when he fights, strongly as he does it, he fights fairly, and there is no loss of good temper in a fight which is conducted by a man who never hits below the belt, and one who is so genial and kindly. We wish good fortune to him, and also that circumstances could have left him and his colleagues a little longer with us.
Mr. KINGSTON:

I would like to take this opportunity of acknowledging the kind remarks that have been made about the Government of South Australia. It is a pleasure indeed to receive the representatives of Western Australia, and also of the other colonies, and the only regret is that moments such as these arrive when we have to say good-bye.

COMMONWEALTH BILL.

Consideration of clause 53 resumed.

Sub-section 4-The expenditure for services other than the ordinary annual services of the Government shall not be authorised by the same law as that which appropriates the supplies for the ordinary annual services, but shall be authorised by a separate law or laws.

Mr. HOLDER:

This sub-section is intended to prevent tacking, and I want to make it a little more effective in this same direction. I want not only to prevent tacks in one branch of the Legislature, but also what might be considered such in the opinion of the other.

Mr. BARTON:

So many of us want to see Sir John Forrest and his friends off that I move:

That the Committee suspend its sitting till 7 o'clock.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

The Committee resumed at 7 p.m.

Mr. HOLDER:

I desire to amend subsection 4, by inserting after the word "Government" words the purpose of which will be to make a still further safeguard against tacks. It is evident that the object of the subsection is to prevent tacks, and it is possible that that might be attempted not only in the ordinary way by including in a Bill for the ordinary services of the year some payment to some officer, but it might be done in some way which would be injurious to the interests of one colony. I move to insert:

After the word "Government," the words, "or for any services which the Senate may, by an address to the Governor-General, declare to be inimical to the interests of any State."

So that two things may be prohibited from appearing in the Appropriation Bill-first the expenditure for services other than the ordinary annual services of the Government, and next anything which the Senate might, by address to the Governor-General, declare to be inimical to the interests of any State. This would not work any in justice, because the Senate would never by a majority of its members adopt such an address to the Governor-General unless the case were one of urgency and importance, and if it did adopt such an address I think the item should be omitted from the ordinary Appropriation Bill, so that both Houses may have an opportunity of considering it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
This is a clause which relates to some extent to the annual services of the Government. It provides:

The expenditure for services other than the ordinary annual services of the Government shall not be authorised by the same law as that which appropriates the supplies for the ordinary annual services.

I understand that the Hon. the Treasurer of South Australia desires to give the Senate practically a power to amend an Appropriation Bill.

Mr. HOLDER:
No.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
To take something out.

Mr. HOLDER:
To simply require an objectionable item to come out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Is that not power to amend it? You can do it in two ways. Here the Government are going to authorise certain expenditure. Before the Appropriation Bill comes to them the Senate are at liberty to pass an address, that it is to be sent up in a distinct Bill, or after the Appropriation Bill is sent up, or when they have the Bill before them they may pass a similar address. The Treasurer of South Australia proposes to give the extraordinary power of passing an address to the Governor-General, and as soon as that address is passed the Government, whether they like it or not, may have to take the Bill back and recast it. I trust that this Convention, whatever it may do, will do it directly, and not in any indirect way; that they will not do it by anything like this, which is, to say the least of it, an extraordinary mode. There is no question in my mind what the result of this would be. It is the most novel proceeding I ever heard of. Let us stand by the compromise of 1891.

Mr. BARTON:
This is not standing by it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I hope my hon. friend will not proceed with such a motion as he has proposed, and if he does, I hope the Convention will not pass it.

Mr. HOLDER:
What I understand by the amendment is this: that if the Government should be found at any time putting in the Appropriation Act some power or service which would be injurious to any State, the Senate would have power to say it is injurious, and on that being pointed out it would drop.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That could be pointed out in the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLDER:
Some pressure might be brought to bear on the Senate to pass an Act containing an injurious provision.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It would only be in the ordinary service of the year.

Mr. HOLDER:
Some item might be included which would provide some work or service injurious to some colony, and I want the Senate to be able to declare that fact, so that the line may be excised.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I would rather give them the power to amend direct.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That is giving with one hand and taking away with another.

Question-That after the word "Government" the following words be inserted, "or for any service which the Senate may, by address to the Governor-General, be declared to be inimical to the interests of any State"-put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Mr. GLYNN:
Before this sub-section is put I would like to be sure on this point, I do not know whether it is intended to allow matters of general legislation to be included in the Appropriation Bill. If it is not intended, then we should notice that the section allows it to be done. The position seems to be that you cannot amend an Appropriation Bill, but there is nothing in the section to say you cannot join with the Appropriation Bill any number of matters of general legislation.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Section 53 states at the beginning:
The Senate shall have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of all proposed laws, except laws appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the Government, which the States Assembly may affirm or reject, but may not amend.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Look at sub-section 4 of that section.

Mr. GLYNN:
That states:
The expenditure for services other than the ordinary annual services of the Government shall not lie authorised by the same law as that which appropriates the supplies for the ordinary annual services, but shall be authorised by a separate law or laws.
All that seems to do is to prevent extraordinary supplies being included in the same Bill as ordinary supplies, but there is nothing to say you may not put in fifty matters of contentious legislation.

Mr. BARTON:
How can you?

Mr. GLYNN:
At any rate this is a matter open to considerable doubt. If it is not intended that this power is to be granted it ought to be specifically stated. You might include for instance in an Appropriation Bill several clauses widening the franchise.

Mr. BARTON:
Surely the hon. member does not state that seriously?

Mr. GLYNN:
Yes. The clause is open to that construction. Look at section 52; it is there provided that you cannot originate a Bill in the Senate whose main object is the appropriation of supplies; but supposing you have a Bill whose main object is something else, but whose collateral or minor object is appropriation, what is to prevent you from originating that in the Senate?

Mr. BARTON:

I do not quite follow my hon. friend's objection, but I take it to be this the sub-section only forbids expenditure for services other than the ordinary services of the Government in the Appropriation Act, and that inasmuch as those extra services are the only ones forbidden, things which are not extra services, but independent matters of legislation may be included in the Appropriation Act. The answer to that is that the Appropriation Act can only include appropriation.

Mr. GLYNN:

Where is that provided for?

Mr. BARTON:

It need not be provided for, as far as I can understand. I think there are understandings about these matters. When we speak of Bills of this kind, and that to which the Convention has so long been accustomed, it would be idle and endless if we endeavored to give definitions to all these matters, which would preclude the possibility of any objection being raised.

[P.606] starts here

The things which are ordinarily understood are defined by an Act of this kind, and inasmuch as the Appropriation Act is a law for the appropriation of the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the Government, and inasmuch as that is a proposal of legislation which is thoroughly understood, it would be perfectly beside the question to contend that that Act could include services beyond the ordinary annual services of the Government. It is conceded that it cannot include money services beyond the ordinary services of the year, and inasmuch as it is a Money Bill it would be perfectly absurd if it were attempted to be reasoned before a Court of Justice-if it ever came there-that, as the only prohibition upon the extension of the Appropriation Act is that it cannot go beyond the ordinary annual services, therefore there is an implied permission given to include in the Appropriation Act matters of legislation which have nothing to do with monetary matters at all. If the hon. member will look at section 53 he will see that, after providing that the Senate shall have equal power with the House of Representatives, there is a preclusion of amendment against the interests of the people in the way of increased taxes or appropriation. The Appropriation Act is fairly defined in the clause. One must read the first part of clause 53 with the sub-section to which the hon. member refers. It is clear, therefore, if you read the two together, that the one Bill is to provide for the ordinary annual services of the Government, and that beyond the ordinary annual services of the Government, which are all matters of expenditure, there must be another Bill.

Mr. GLYNN:

The way I read this section-and I think if hon. members look into it closely they will agree with me-is that in the light of clause 52 you can introduce into the Senate an Appropriation Bill, as long as you put in the same Bill matters of general legislation whose importance overbalances the importance of the Appropriation portion of the Bill. I would ask hon. members to read section 52. It says:

Proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or the imposition of any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Representatives.

I take the rule of construction to be this that you cannot have an affirmation without an opposite-an implied exception without something not excepted-and in these clauses mentioning certain things for their main object there must be something the opposite of that. You may have Bills with appropriation for their main object, and Bills with appropriation for their minor object, and something else for the main object. It would, therefore, be possible to initiate in the Senate appropriations which are joined with matters of big general legislation. That was never intended, but it is possible. Further, under section 53, you confer a power upon the House of Representatives of introducing matters obnoxious to the Senate in conjunction with an Appropriation Bill, and of sending up at the latter end of the Session the Appropriation Bill with this obnoxious matter in it for acceptance or rejection by the Senate. You can, under the necessity of passing the general supplies, force the hands of the Senate to accept a policy they do not believe in. This is the history of legislation in the colonies, particularly in Victoria, but I am sure it was never intended by the Committee that anything of the sort should be done. I would ask the Leader of the House, Mr. Barton, if there is anything in this section to get rid of the implied effect of section 52? He says that in the Appropriation Bill matters appertaining to the annual supplies only can be dealt with. Section 52 speaks of-I will read it again:

Proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or the imposition of any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Representatives.

You may therefore have a Bill which is an Appropriation Bill in a subsidiary or secondary sense, and dealing as its main object with matters of general legislation, If that is so you may force the hands of the senators into accepting a matter of general policy, or rejecting through incapacity to amend the Bill altogether.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Is there not set out practically a definition of the Appropriation Bill in the several sub-sections of clause 53?

Mr. GLYNN:

I think there is no implied limitation of its application to Bills appropriating revenue, or which excludes the power of joining other matters.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Does it not speak of appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the Government?

Mr. GLYNN:

That is not a definition limiting its general purport, but excludes the joining to two classes of supplies.

Mr. BARTON:

Did you ever hear of the House passing a resolution after the Committee of Ways and Means has sanctioned the expenditure, taking upon itself the responsibility of amplifying that resolution to put other matters into the measure except-

Mr. GLYNN:

I think the resolutions generally apply to supplies, but do not exclude inclusion in a Bill with other matters.

Mr. BARTON:

I think the hon. member is right in one sense and not in another. The Committee of Ways and Means carries certain resolutions, which are received and read a second and third time, and upon which the Bill is founded. Did the hon. member ever hear of a Bill founded upon these resolutions that went beyond them?

Mr. GLYNN:

Whether I did or not, my knowledge does not limit the possibility of things. I know it would be possible after these resolutions were passed to introduce a Bill dealing with the matter of the resolution and general legislation as well. No resolution would be required to the latter. Is that not possible? I move to cure this by adding to the end of sub-section 4 the words:

And no law appropriating any part of the public revenue shall have anything but such appropriation for this object.

Mr. BARTON:

What is the ordinary parliamentary process in these matters? I cannot conceive of the Parliament of the Commonwealth doing other than accepting the ordinary process, and if we do not conceive of this we had better not have these clauses at all.

Mr. ISAACS:

We would have to make a code.

Mr. BARTON:

As my hon. friend puts it, we should have to make a code. How is the Appropriation Act brought about? After a message from the Governor recommending that provision be made for the ordinary annual supplies the House resolves itself into a Committee of Supply, and then it passes its estimates, and after these estimates are covered by the ordinary resolutions, at a later stage of the session the Appropriation Bill is brought in. That Act cannot cover anything but these matters which have in the ordinary estimates been passed. How can the hon. member's argument apply in such a case. If the ordinary process is observed, and which we agree must be observed, or else this machine which we are constructing will not work, then you will have the estimates passed in a more or less mutilated form and covered by the Appropriation Bill, which covers nothing more nor less than these estimates. If that Appropriation Bill is brought in framed on the estimates, how can the question arise. It cannot possibly arise, and I do not think we need waste our words in discussing it. The question is so unsubstantial, I say it with respect, and of so remote a character, that I think we had better leave the matter as one of ordinary common sense.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Question, question!

Question-To insert at the end of subsection 4: "And no law appropriating any part of the public revenue shall have anything but such appropriation for this object"—put and negatived.

Sub-section 4 as read agreed to.

Sub-section 5-In the case of a proposed law which the Senate may not amend, the Senate may at any stage return it to the House of Representatives with a message requesting the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein. And the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make such omissions or amendments, or any of them, with or without modifications.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

There is one matter which I should like to draw attention to with regard to suggestions. It seems to me we might add something to it to make the subsection more complete. It says:

And the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make such omissions or amendments, or any of them, with or without modification.
If we were to add:
And the House of Representatives shall take into consideration such suggestions and, it would be rendered imperative that these amendments sent down as suggestions should be taken into consideration. Under the ordinary circumstances they would be, but we do not know what kind of tension may come about between these two Houses, and it is possible that there would be absolutely no notice taken of the suggestions. I am not very strong on the question, and I simply point out the possibility of providing this greater security.

Mr. ISAACS:
You cannot enforce it, but it will do no harm.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I submit it to Mr. Barton, as I do not like to touch the drafting.

Mr. BARTON:
If you will look at clause 49, you will see what the powers given to the two Houses are in respect to the consideration of each others business and their Own.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
If Mr. Barton says it is unnecessary, I will bow to his decision, but it just struck me, and I thought I would bring the matter before the Committee. I shall make no amendment, but leave it to someone else if it is thought it would make the section more complete. If any other member cares to take it up he can do so.

Mr. BARTON:
I am not concerned here in respect to the position of the Drafting Committee. We had a duty to perform to bring a Bill into Committee, and we should be very strange federationists if we allowed any feeling of our own to interfere with the consideration of the measure and the passing of a proper Bill. I should like to point out to Mr. McMillan that in clause 49 there is a provision by which the Senate and the House of Representatives may from time to time adopt standing rules and orders as to:
The mode in which the Senate and the House of Representatives shall confer, correspond, and communicate with each other relative to vote on proposed laws.
I think we may trust to the common sense of both Houses to frame such standing orders as will govern the matter. I am of opinion that we should not overload this business with minor provisions which are really within the competence of the two Houses to deal with between themselves.

Mr. DOBSON:
The hon. member has to some extent called attention to a question which I am about to raise. This subsection gives the Senate the power of making suggestions, and we have to be content with that, as we have been beaten, on the clause which sought to give them the power to amend Money Bills. I would put it to the Committee whether the House of Representatives is bound to send back the Bill to the Senate with an answer as to whether they accept or reject any of the suggestions. They may place the Bill in the waste paper basket, when the Senate may have been quite prepared to have passed the Bill, if the House of Representatives had given them an opportunity to reconsider it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Surely they would give them the opportunity, seeing that it is their own Bill.

Mr. DOBSON:
It is the only chance that the Senate will have of making itself heard on financial matters, and I should like to be assured that when the Senate make suggestions they will have the opportunity of getting the Bill back, and of seeing how generously or the reverse the House of Representatives has treated its suggestions. The Senate could then pass or reject the Bill. Does the Bill give them that power?

Mr. BARTON:
If the hon. member will follow me I think I can speedily answer that question. If the hon. member will turn to sub-section 5 he will find the words:

The Senate may at any stage return it to the House of Representatives, with a message requesting the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein.

It means that the Bill must go back with a message from the House of Representatives, and from the whole framing of the clause it is clear that the power of suggestion is only proposed to be granted in respect to those matters which the House of Representatives, must originate, so that the Bill is the Bill of the House of Representatives. The measure is sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives, and they can then deal with the suggestions as they think fit, modifying them as they think right. The Bill is then sent back to the Senate with a message saying that the House of Representatives agrees to certain suggestions, or on the other hand, they may fail to agree to them. A either case the House of Representatives will decline to put in jeopardy their own measure.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is the point I wished to emphasise yesterday.

Mr. REID:
I have always opposed this compromise of 1891, as I can see that it will raise the very danger which we have all been anxious to guard against, that is collisions between the two Houses on financial matters. I am very much afraid that with a clause of this kind the Senate will look upon it, not exactly as an equivalent absolutely, but as conferring a certain degree of right on their part to exercise control in financial matters, and in this way collisions may be brought about. The Lower House—that is to say, the House of Representatives—will probably take up a very firm attitude on matters of this kind, and probably will not see its way to act on the suggestion sent down from the Senate. If that happens two or three times running there may be developed a state of great tension. This brings us back to the evil which we have all been trying to guard against. If we are to work the Federation in harmony the financial business must be under the control of one House, and that the House of Representatives, there being the power in the Senate in a case of any gross wrong or injustice which may be involved, to step in and say, "No; we will not allow this Bill to pass." But the effect of this is to put upon the Senate the duty of going over these appropriations to see if there is any part of them which, in the opinion of the Senate, ought to be amended or omitted; and therefore the Senate would take it to be its duty to go through the Bills in that way. And feeling it to be a duty cast upon it, I think it alters the relations of the two Houses to such a serious extent that we practically would find the two Houses in collision.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Would they not go through a Bill in any case?

Mr. REID:
An Appropriation Bill I have never known them to go through.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Still they go through it.

Mr. REID:
We have all had experience as to where there is a doubt as to the powers of one House, and we all know the feeling that would be engendered if one House found its amendments continuously negatived, continuously discarded, and continuously put under the table by the other.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
They would not dare to do that. They would be reasonable men.

Mr. REID:
But we are casting upon reasonable men—whom we do not give sufficient control to—the duty of going through financial measures, and criticising them and suggesting alterations in them. What a lame and impotent position the Senate is put in if it simply has the power that any outside writer to a newspaper has. Any person in a letter to a newspaper might suggest to the House of Representatives that certain items might be omitted in the Appropriation Bill. That is the only power the Senate has in this, the power that any outside person.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

It has the power of rejection.

Mr. REID:

Now, that is exactly the point. My friend Sir Joseph Abbott has pointed to the very thing I am anxious to bring under the notice of this Convention. The honorable gentleman says, "But, oh, the Senate is not in the position of a writer to a newspaper. It has the power of rejection." That shows the gravity of this proposal, that although the law says it is only to have the power of a person who writes to a newspaper, in point of fact, because it has got another power—the power of total rejection—it can put the financial House in such a position that there is an implied threat.

A MEMBER:

Oh, no.

Mr. REID:

According to the argument which has been suggested to me, there is an implied threat that the Bill will be thrown out, and "if you go on neglecting these suggestions, it may be our duty to assert that power." Now I want this matter looked straight in the face. If there is to be any sort of financial control in the Senate, it should be put in the proper form. I do not wish to go into this matter at any length, because I do admit that this matter has been put into this shape because there are a good many gentlemen who have given up their principles almost, to the extent of consenting to this modification. While I have all along spoken in the strongest way against this I am perfectly sure, from what I know of the opinions of hon. members, that there are a majority who hold the opposite opinion, and as this matter has been before us for six years there is not the slightest necessity of taking up any further time. I wish to place on record my individual objection to this position. That is all.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I think to alter this sub-section would be to violate the compact entered into to-day. I say what is implied is a violation of the compact made with the smaller States to-day; and it would be a breach of the compact with that large number of representatives who are absent. The proposition of Mr. Reid I did all in my power to get inserted. I used the strongest argument in favor of inserting these words, and which had some influence in getting the representatives of smaller States to accept the right to offer suggestions: and is it not better to offer suggestions than reject a Bill right off?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Why not give the power to make amendments?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I cannot see where there is very much difference. I have heard some very strong speeches against the Senate having the right of suggestion, and it is so very much easier for the House of Representatives to strike a Bill out.

Mr. REID:
You said the exact opposite before.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I do not think I said the exact opposite. If I did perhaps his arguments would convince me that I was wrong. I say that that body will be in no sense similar to the existing Legislative Council. We will have an enormous constituency returning representatives to the Senate. What are Legislative Councils at the present time? Some are nominee Houses, and in no case is there manhood suffrage. The Senate would be returned on the basis of one man one vote. I certainly say stand by this subsection 5, and I hope that no amendment whatever will be made.

Mr. WALKER:
I went with those who supported the majority this afternoon on the distinct understanding that the Senate should have the right of suggestion, and I cannot understand the Premier of New South Wales ignoring what I consider the compact he entered into.

An HON. MEMBER:
He is not going to divide the Committee.

Mr. REID:
I only wanted to put my opinion on record.

Mr. WALKER:
If the Senate takes the responsibility of making suggestions, and the House of Representatives does not accept them, the Senate of course assumes the responsibility on its own shoulders, should it throw out the Bill. My sympathies are very largely with those who wish to make the Senate a strong House.

Sub-section agreed to.
Clause passed.

Clause 54.-It shall not be lawful for the States Assembly or the House of Representatives to pass any vote, resolution, or law for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of the produce of any tax or impost, to any purpose which has not been first recommended to that House by message of the Governor-General in the Session in which the vote, resolution, or law is proposed.

Mr. REID:

I think we should make it quite clear if it is really to be provided that Money Bills, Bills appropriating revenue, or the produce of any tax or impost, are to be introduced in the Senate.

Mr. BARTON:

Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to explain this clause. This was inserted in consequence of the carriage of an amendment in the Constitutional Committee, as you will no doubt remember, sir. Instead of the clause relating to Bills appropriating public money, it was altered so as to refer to Bills having for their main object the appropriation of public money. The result was that, as a different class of Bills would be introduced into the Senate, it was thought necessary that a message must also be addressed to the Senate. It is desirable that these words should be retained; otherwise it would be possible for the Senate, or any members of the Senate, to initiate Bills dealing in a very large measure with the financial policy of the Government, notwithstanding that they might deal first with matters of policy, and incidentally only with matters of appropriation. It would be possible for them to deal with them without any message, and to my mind it is necessary that there should be a conservation of the powers of the Executive in this matter, and therefore it should rest with the Executive alone to bring down a message. For that reason I am quite sure hon. members will agree that this provision should be retained.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Would it not be well to alter this section to make it correspond with section 52 in its altered form Clause 52 we have extended to apply to the appropriation of public money from whatever source derived, including loan funds. I think that a similar extension should be made in the provisions of section 54, so as to harmonise the two. As one section has been extended I suggest that the other should be extended.

Mr. ISAACS:

I would draw hon. members' attention to that and one or two other things in connection with this clause. The insertion of the word "moneys" has occurred since we have been sitting in this Committee. I would like to call attention to the necessity of making the language uniform throughout these sections. In clause 52 undoubtedly it will be public revenue or moneys, but it does not add the expression "or of the produce of any tax or impost." While that is being done I would also draw attention to clause 79. The expression there is "one consolidated revenue fund." Now that seems to be the term which is most in consonance with our colonial Constitutions, and Mr. Barton might consider the advisability of having one uniform expression which would comprehend the necessary term in all these clauses. I would also draw attention to the position of the word "law" in the second line of clause 54. That should be "proposed law," or something of that kind. I observe that the Drafting Committee have to a large extent taken advantage of the criticism of Mr. Bourinot in his pamphlet commenting on the inexactness in the language of the Bill of 1891 in certain clauses. I refer particularly to the next clause, in which we find the expression - "proposed law passed." Mr. Bourinot made some keen observations on that, and the Drafting Committee have to some extent followed that, but they have not in all their conclusions, and this clause is one case in which they have not. He has pointed out the obvious fact that one House does not pass a law, and that it is not law until it has received the Royal assent, and to speak of it as a law until it has is wrong.

Mr. BARTON:

The best place to put it in would be to say:

To pass any proposed vote, resolution, or law. That would be almost the best English.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No.

Mr. BARTON:

The word "proposed" would be the governing word.

Mr. ISAACS:

They can pass a vote, and they can pass a resolution, but a House cannot pass a law by itself. That same observation would apply to various other sections - in both portions of clause 55. In the last line of the first sub-section the word "law" is wrong.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not think it is wrong there, because "the law," means "the proposed law."

Mr. ISAACS:

It has been altered in other portions.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not think we need trouble about legal verbiage. "The law" means the law which has been mentioned before.

Mr. ISAACS:

The alteration has been made in some sections; but there are some portions in which it has not been made.

Mr. BROWN:

Perhaps one of the observations of Mr. Isaacs might be met by using the word "consider" instead of the word "pass." That part of the clause would
It shall not be lawful for the Senate or the House of Representatives to consider any vote, resolution, or law, for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue.

Mr. ISAACS:
That would not meet it.

Mr. BROWN:
I make the suggestion because, if I recollect rightly, it is provided in the Standing Orders of the Tasmanian Parliament. No one can there propose a vote for a sum of money or for expenditure of any kind unless it has been first recommended by the Governor. They not only cannot pass, but they cannot consider it.

Mr. BARTON:
I am not quite sure, upon such consideration as I have been able to give it, whether that would be an improvement. I think there would be many cases in which the proposed vote, or resolution, or law would thus fail of accomplishment, simply because of the want of a message, which message might be sent at a late stage of the consideration of a question. I understand that in the House of Commons the ordinary practice is for a Minister to state that the resolution or vote is with Her Majesty's consent, but that the ordinary message from the Crown can be brought down at any time before the question "that the Bill do now pass" is put.

Mr. KINGSTON:
The same thing obtains here.

Mr. HIGGINS:
In Victoria, too.

Mr. BARTON:
In New South Wales the practice is more strict; but I have always thought that the strictness of that practice is not really a compliance with our Constitution Act.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
In New South Wales the Act says "to originate."

Mr. BARTON:
That is quite true; I had forgotten that. I have always thought that the practice in New South Wales has been a perplexing and hampering one. I think it is very much better to make the law read as it is, that the passage shall not occur until there has been a message. There are many circumstances under which a message might not be obtained by a Government, although they might find it necessary in an emergency to propose a vote or resolution. So long as the Queen's assent is given to that proposed procedure by message before the final act is taken of carrying it into law, the prerogative of the Crown is sufficiently guarded. And if we try to apply restrictions of this kind, so as to hamper the very origination of matters, we are extending the application of the prerogative of the Crown, instead of really exercising the popular right, and then applying that prerogative to the effectuation of the popular right.

Mr. REID:
You will have to knock out one word in this clause, or else the same trouble will exist.

Mr. BARTON:
I will give an instance. It does happen, and it has happened within my Parliamentary experience several times, that a point has been taken in Committee of the whole during the passage of a Bill, where it has been discovered before anybody bad thought much about it that an expenditure was involved. Under our practice, where we have the word "originate" instead of the word "pass," the Bill has been ruled out of order, the Order of the Day discharged, and the Bill thrown under the table. Under the words we have here such a contingency could not occur, because until the very passage of the Bill it would be within the competence of the Ministry of the day to bring down a message which would authorise it.

Mr. REID:
The clause says:
Which has not been first recommended.
You will have to leave out one word there.

Mr. BARTON:
I have that word clearly in my mind, but the word "first" relates to the word "pass." You cannot pass a thing which has not been first recommended; that is first recommended before you pass it.

Mr. SYMON:
Precisely.

Mr. BARTON:
With regard to a vote or resolution, it would be necessary to have a message before you pass such vote or resolution; with regard to a Bill, you must have a message before you pass the Bill. This clause gives greater liberty to Parliament than the restrictive application proposed, and I am therefore entirely in favor of retaining the words of the clause. Mr. Isaacs has raised a question with reference to "proposed law."

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not like the words "proposed laws," because it has a technical meaning in other parts of the bill. The word "Bill" ought to be there.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not propose to alter without very good reason the phraseology of this Constitution Bill to which we are accustomed. A Bill is a proposed law until it becomes an Act.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is not a law until both Houses have passed it and it has been assented to by the Queen.

Mr. BARTON:
The hon. member has raised the question in line 38, that the word "Proposed" should be put before the word "law." I am not very curious about that, and I have no particular objection to it. The words used in the beginning of the section are "a proposed law." The word "the," if I must be very particular, which occurs in the fifth line of clause 55 is generally known as the "definite article," and specifies the thing related to. Therefore, "the law" means "the proposed law." But I have not the least objection to it, if my hon. friend thinks there may be the least technical difficulty about it, if he will move in the direction indicated.

Mr. ISAACS:
We have not come to that yet.

Mr. BARTON:
I have not the least objection to the insertion of the word proposed "before" law."

Mr. ISAACS:
We want this Bill to pass in a form that we shall not have any objection to it.

Mr. BARTON:
To meet my hon. friend's view, I would like to insert the word "proposed" before "law" in the second line of the clause,

Mr. ISAACS:
That is better than "law."

Mr. BARTON:
I think the point is really unsubstantial, but I am perfectly content to put in the word "proposed" before "vote" or "law" and I leave it to some honorable member to move one or the other.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
It seems to me this difficulty would be met if the words, "or law" were struck out and the word "or" placed before "resolution." I move:
That the words "or law" be struck out.

Mr. SYMON:
I would ask the hon. member Mr. Barton whether it is really worth while to alter it. We know perfectly well what "law" means. You must interpret the words by the context, and if you read the whole section there is no doubt that it applies to a "proposed law," a "Bill," or anything which has for its object the appropriation of public money.

Mr. BARTON:
That is to say the thing is inchoate until a message is obtained.

Mr. SYMON:
Exactly. There can be no misapprehension of the meaning. It does not mean a law after it has become a completed Act-after the assent of Her Majesty—it is something short of that.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is quite immaterial to me what words are used, so long as we understand them, but I do like to see words referring to the same things consistently employed. We have heard a great deal even from Mr. Symon of the necessity of preserving a distinction between the expression "law" and "proposed law." Here we are using the word "law" when it is understood that it is to be a proposed law.

Mr. REID:
Will any human being have any difficulty with it to the end of the world?

Mr. BARTON:
My friend is right to this extent, that he says it is not a "law" till there has been a message, and it has received the assent of the Governor.

Mr. ISAACS:
Well, what objection to put it in? I move:
To insert the word "proposed" before "law" in the second line of the clause.

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out that Sir William Zeal has moved a prior amendment.

Mr. BARTON:
I will ask Sir William Zeal to withdraw his amendment to make room for a prior amendment by Mr. Isaacs.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I agree.
Leave given.
Mr. Isaacs' amendment agreed to.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I ask the Committee to consider the propriety of altering the phraseology of section 53 to correspond with the phraseology of section 52, which we made to apply to all public moneys, but here we have limited it to revenue or tax or impost.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not see that there is any serious necessity for making the amendment.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Will the Chairman kindly inform me the alteration made in section 52?

The CHAIRMAN:

The words "or moneys" was inserted after "revenue."

Mr. BARTON:

I beg the hon. member's pardon. I thought he was referring to another clause altogether. I quite agree with him that it is essential to bring the two things into conformity with one another. I move:

To add the words "I or moneys" after "revenue" in the third line of the clause.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I do not think it is necessary. I do not see that there is any necessity for a message in relation to loan money. I ask the House whether they wish to extend the ministerial authority of the Senate more than is necessary to preserve the legitimate prerogative of the Crown. I venture to submit that it does not.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. REID:

I was going to suggest that it would be very inconvenient to have different sets of things in the two Houses with regard to these messages. As to the procedure of the Senate perhaps it would not be contrary to this provision if a message were introduced before the Act left that Chamber. Under this language, if the message came down after the first resolution had been passed the whole measure would be ruled out of order, because it is provided that in the case of any vote or resolution, &c., it shall not be lawful for the House of Representatives to pass any vote or resolution which has not been first recommended to that House. Under these words I remember the Speaker of the Assembly of New South Wales ruling a Bill out of order for the reason that the message had not been presented to the Assembly before the stage of going into Committee was reached. What does "first" mean? If it means "afterwards," then it is all right, and there need be no trouble about it.

Mr. BARTON:

I am not going to make a speech about it. It seems to me whether you retain "first" or take it out it does not matter much. It seems to me to be just the same thing, because it appears to be quite clear that a message must be there before anything final is done.
Mr. KINGSTON:

We have got some words there that appear to me to be unnecessary. They may raise a doubt. The words I refer to are:

Or of the produce of any tax or impost.

They are not wanted. They do not occur in any previous clause, and when we use such large expressions as "public revenue," or "public moneys," we catch all that it is desired to catch, I think. It would make the clause clearer if we struck these words out, but I am not going to move if Mr. Barton will not.

Mr. BARTON:

I am a little chary about this sort of thing, and I hope it is not in a conservative spirit. We have in all Constitution Acts the provision relating to the appropriation of the revenue or of the produce of any tax or impost. There is an unfortunate misprint in the New South Wales Act, which provides for the appropriation of:

Any part of the revenue or funds or of any tax or impost.

But we know what it means, and it has been corrected in practice. If Mr. Kingston will convince me that the alteration will be safer, then I shall be prepared to accept it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think to avoid any ambiguity in clause 52 we should not have these words in clause 54, as they cover the same thing exactly. I mean to say they have no object, and we refer to the same thing exactly in clause 52. In clause 52 we have only got:

Public revenue or moneys,

and we should have:

Public revenue or moneys

here. Obviously they cover the same object.

Mr. SYMON:

That amendment has been carried.

Mr. HIGGINS:

My point is this—that in addition to the words:

Or moneys

you are keeping in the words:

Or of the produce of any tax or impost.

They ought to be out, and I will move:

To strike out "or of the produce of any tax or impost."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
There is a necessary amendment in the fifth line. The words used are:
To that House.
As it stands it would mean the House of Representatives only, but the section intends to apply to both Houses. I move:
To strike out "That," with a view of inserting "The."

Mr. ISAACS:
"Such House" would distinguish it.
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I move:
After the word "House" in the fifth line of the clause to insert the word "concerned" in lieu thereof.

Mr. REID:
Both Houses are concerned.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That will never do.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is a poor word.
Amendment agreed to.

Dr. QUICK:
I would call attention to the fact that by leaving the word "House" in it will give a new name to the Senate. The word "House" as it originally stood applied to the House of Representatives, but as it now stands it gives a new name to the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN:
We cannot alter it now, as we have inserted a word after the word "House."

Mr. BARTON:
The hon. member will find right through the Bill that the two Houses are referred to under the name House,

The CHAIRMAN:
I would call Mr. Barton's attention to the word "law" in the last line of the clause, and ask whether it is not necessary to insert the word "proposed" prior to it.

Mr. BARTON:
It is quite unnecessary, as it reads "or law is proposed."

The CHAIRMAN:
I see it would be tautological.
Mr. HIGGINS:
I might state that the question will arise-Is there to be a Governor's message to each House before it makes any vote or any appropriation?

Mr. BARTON:
To the House concerned.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The clause reads:

It shall not be lawful for the Senate or the House of Representatives to pass any vote, resolution or law, for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of the produce of any tax or impost, to any purpose which has not been first recommended to the House concerned by message of the Governor-General in the Session in which the vote, resolution, or law is proposed.

I think that according to that, a message will have to be sent to each House.

Mr. BARTON:
I think my hon. friend knows what the apices juris are.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think I understand English, and I think it means that.

Mr. REID:
I advise you to put it off till to-morrow.

Mr. PEACOCK:
It will be soon a combination of Scotch mixture and Irish stew.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There is no doubt that Mr. Barton cannot pass the matter off in this way. What does it now exactly mean? It means that before the House of Representatives can pass any Appropriation Bill they will have to get a message from the Governor, and before the Senate can pass it they will have to do so also.

Mr. BARTON:
Yes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Is that intended?

Mr. BARTON:
Yes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You are very fond of messages.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 1, "this Act may be cited as 'The Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia.'"

Mr. SYMON:
I have an amendment to move in this clause. My friend Mr. Barton, in introducing the Bill said that in giving the name to the new political entity we are creating there was none better or statelier than the Commonwealth of Australasia. Now I think there is one better and one statelier, and that is the simple name of Australia. I cannot see myself why we want any prefix, or suffix, or any handle at all to the name to which we have all been accustomed, and which is the name of the continent over which the jurisdiction and power of the Commonwealth is to extend.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
It extends beyond the continent.

Mr. SYMON:
Including, of course the flourishing island of Tasmania, and any portion of territory in the Southern seas that may come into the Federation. The name Australia is a simple one. It is a grand name in itself, and I think we ought to uphold and maintain it as far as we can. Of course I do not want to reopen the discussion that has taken place before, as to the word "Commonwealth," or any other. My point is that we ought to declare that the name of this Commonwealth, to use the expression in this Bill, should simply be Australia. The United States, when they were established, did not in their Constitution attach any expression like republic or commonwealth, or any other name of that kind.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
The name was "The United States of America."

Mr. SYMON:
No, my hon. friend will pardon me. The Constitution of the United States is simply the United States:
"We the people of the United States" and "shall be vested in a congress of the United States."

We want no expression such as Commonwealth or United Australia or Dominion or any term of that kind. Australia is the name by which this federal union ought to be known. It is the name of our country and it is the name that is attached to the word "Commonwealth."

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Not geographically.

Mr. SYMON:
Throughout you speak of Australia. It is a geographical expression which is to include all parts of this southern dominion which is to come under this Commonwealth.

Mr. WISE:
Stick to the compromise of 1891.
Mr. SYMON:
That is a barrier which has to be got over. Why should we have the word "Commonwealth"?

Mr. REID:
Why have the word "Australia"?

Mr. SYMON:
Because we want the name of the country over which this constitution is to extend. The word "Commonwealth" is not an expression of any form of Government. If it is, it is utterly inapplicable. The word "Commonwealth is associated with "Republic."

HON. MEMBERS:
No.

Mr. SYMON:
Will any hon. member point to me any form of government that is not a republic and is called a Commonwealth?

Mr. BARTON:
England has over and over again been called by her best writers a Commonwealth.

Mr. WALKER:
Here it is a Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON:
Is it a book by my hon. friend Mr. Reid that Mr. Walker quotes from?

Mr. REID:
Henry IV.

Mr. SYMON:
I accept that authority. The word "Commonwealth" expresses common weal, but it is equally applicable in that sense to an empire and to a republic, and equally applicable to any form of government you may create. It is objectionable in this way: If it refers to a form of government then it has no application to Australia, because if we are anything at all we are part of a monarchy. Hon. members know that the word "Commonwealth" was adopted in England 200 years ago. It was done by Act of Parliament, which used the expression "Commonwealth" because they had beheaded their king.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
They could not call it a kingdom, because they had not a king.

Mr. SYMON:
The Act used the word Commonwealth" because they had no king. But we are not in that position. We are part of a monarchy, and the expression "Commonwealth" is intended to mean a form of governing control. You call it an empire, a nation, or anything you please; but the simple name "Australia" seems to me the best, and therefore I move:
That the word "Commonwealth" be omitted in clause 1.

Mr. WALKER:
There was a certain English gentleman known as Shakespeare.

Mr. REID:
What was his Christian name?

Mr. WALKER:
A quotation from "Henry the Fifth" seems applicable—
Hear him debate of Commonwealth affairs,
You would say it hath been all in all as stated.
I shall support the word "Commonwealth," but I would like to suggest that the word "Australasia" should take the place of "Australia" I look upon it that the day is not far distant—when Australasia will include New Zealand, Fiji, and New Guinea. We should have a name with a wide signification. If I were a Tasmanian I would prefer "Australasia" to "Australia." I shall support the inclusion of the word "Commonwealth."

Mr. GRANT:
I have pleasure in supporting the amendment of Mr. Symon. I would greatly prefer a name that would commend itself to the general public. I happened to be in Canada at the time of the evolution of the Dominion, and some time after the Constitution came into operation, and found that throughout the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the great and general unpopularity of the Dominion Government, when its functions commenced, was due in a large measure, to its unfamiliar name. It was by no means popular in Canada. I think the word "Commonwealth" is one we are not accustomed to. It grates on our ears, and I would prefer "United Australia" or "Australia." The words "United Australia" are the most expressive.

Mr. BARTON:
I would like to say that I think this is a very short matter. It has taken the people some time to get accustomed to the word "Commonwealth," but they are now accustomed to it. In Canada it took them some time to get accustomed to the word "Dominion." Commonwealth is the greatest and most stately name by which a great association of self-governing people can be characterised. I have no objection to the name, although at one time or another the name has been are accustomed to England as representing England, Scotland, and Ireland.

Mr. WALKER:
That is not a legal title.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear. I am very glad that a layman has scored against a lawyer.

Mr. BARTON:
There is a ready answer to my hon. friend's remark, and that is that the title we choose for ourselves will become the legal title, and that is the answer to every objection. When you consider the relative taste in the mouth of the words "Australia" and "Australasia," you will see that it is not well to make the change. We do not want to have anything to do with the idea that we are an Austral or southern portion of Asia. We want a name which will by common consent apply to the whole of the Commonwealth, and we cannot select for ourselves, leaving aside all old world prejudices, any finer designation than Australia.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. WALKER:
I move:
To strike out "Australia," and insert "Australasia" in lieu thereof.
The latter is sufficiently comprehensive to include New Zealand, Fiji, and New Guinea, should they ultimately join the Commonwealth, and surely that is a weighty consideration. There is one bank whose name we all envy for its comprehensiveness, and that is the Bank of Australasia.

Mr. BARTON:
Because the Bank of Australia failed, and the Bank of Australasia did not.

Amendment negatived; clause as read agreed to.

Clause 2.-This Act shall bind the Crown and the Executive Officers of the Commonwealth, and its provisions referring to Her Majesty the Queen shall extend to Her heirs and successors in the Sovereignty of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I cannot quite understand what is the meaning of the words:
Binding the Crown and the Executive Officers of the Commonwealth.
I should think the object was to show that the Act was to bind the Crown in its prerogative. I object to having the executive officers treated under different laws to those to which ordinary people are treated. Ordinary people are bound by any Act under the Imperial Parliament, and why should the executive officers not be bound? All we want to say is to bind the Crown. I would suggest that the words:
The Executive Officers of the Commonwealth be left out.

Mr. REID:
   It is for the impeachment of Ministers.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   You would get put on the roost then.

The CHAIRMAN:
   Does the hon. member for Victoria suggest any amendment?

Mr. HIGGINS:
   No, but I decline as one of Her Majesty's subjects to have the executive officers of the Commonwealth treated as some higher class of beings than other persons. Executive officers are bound by the law, no matter what is said.

Mr. BARTON:
   May I ask my hon. friend whom, he takes to be indicated by the executive officers of the Commonwealth? Does he take it to be Ministers or those who act in execution of the laws of the Commonwealth?

Mr. HIGGINS:
   I want to find out.

Mr. BARTON:
   What is intended is this. That the Act shall extend to bind the Crown, that is to the extent to which it affects the prerogative it shall be effectual. Then it extends to the executive officers of the Commonwealth, so far as I understand the expression, in this way, that wherever, by any provision in this Act, an ordinary executive officer is affected as to the performance of a duty, he may not be enabled to escape from the performance of that duty by setting Up the prerogative of the Crown.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   I might mention that one of the matters which foreign writers have admired most of all in our English Constitution is that there is no distinction in the Constitution between any executive officer and any ordinary subject. DeLolme, Montesquieu, and all of them have pointed out that there has never been any distinction made between persons who hold high distinctions and those who do not. I only wish to prevent the inference that that strong principle of constitutional law is being forgotten in Australia. We should not use words which are not required. This Act is binding in the ordinary way on all persons, and all that we have to express is that it should be binding on the Crown. I move:
   That the words "and the Executive Officers of the Commonwealth" be left out.

Mr. SYMON:
I think the hon. member is perfectly right. If the object is to bind the prerogative of the Crown that is done by the earlier words of the section.

Mr. ISAACS:

I think there can be very little doubt but that the hon. member is right. The clause would lead one to think there was some doubt whether an Act declared to be binding on the Crown would be binding on Ministers of the Crown. I think there can be no doubt as to that; but the clause, as framed, might have the very effect of raising a doubt whether it would bind other officers. If you specially name executive officers, one might be justified in asking, "Well, is it not to bind judicial officers?" I do not know why any particular officers should be mentioned. The question is whether it binds the Crown, and if we say it does there is an end of the matter.

Mr. BARTON:

If hon. members wish these words left out I am quite willing to consent, because I believe other parts of the Act will cover it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Section 7 covers it.

Amendment agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 3.-It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, to declare by Proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being later than six months after the passing of this Act [here name the colonies which have adopted the Constitution] (hereinafter severally included in the expression "the said colonies"), shall be united in a Federal Constitution under the name of "The Commonwealth of Australia"; and on and after that day the Commonwealth shall be established under that name.

Mr. ISAACS:

I move:

To insert after "Act" the words "the people of;"

The Commonwealth I understand to be a Commonwealth of the people of Australia, not merely of the colonies. My amendment is only to bring the clause into accord with the preamble. I do not think there will be any objection to that.

Mr. BARTON:

I consent to the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS:

I observe a departure in the words of the section from the words in the corresponding clause of the Bill of 1891. The Bill of 1891 provides:
That the colonies shall be united in one Federal Commonwealth under the Constitution hereby provided.

In this Bill it is that the people shall unite "in a Federal Constitution."

Mr. SYMON:
It must be a mistake.

Mr. BARTON:
No; it is not.

Mr. ISAACS:
I think there must be a mistake. It does seem somewhat awkward to say that people shall be united in a Constitution, a document. I think the wording of the Bill of 1891 could scarcely have been purposely departed from. The preamble sets out:

The people have agreed to form one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth.

Nowhere in the Bill does it say they form the Commonwealth, but awkwardly enough we read of a People united in a Constitution.

The truth is that they unite in a Commonwealth under a Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:
How are we to do our work if we debate matters of this kind?

Mr. ISAACS:
It is a work which is to stand for all time, and we ought to do it properly.

Mr. BARTON:
If the hon. member will propose the word "by" instead of "in" I will accept it.

Mr. ISAACS:
They are united in a federal Commonwealth, not by a federal Constitution. I want to make the wording of the Act consistent with itself.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Then you must alter the whole construction of the clause.

Mr. ISAACS:
The wording of the Bill of 1891 was clear, and why should it be departed from?

Mr. BARTON:
Because clearness and brevity combined to authorise the departure. As the clause stands now it is shorter and clearer. We have made no wanton departures from the Bill of 1891, because members will see that its whole spirit has been followed.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Why not say-"Shall be federally united?"

Mr. BARTON:
If you put "by" for "in," the legal effect of the Bill will not be altered. If the hon. member will propose "by"-

Mr. SYMON:

Why not-"By the name of"?

Mr. BARTON:

That is too colloquial. If we are united, we are united in one Constitution, or else we are not united at all. I do not want to quarrel about words, but it had better remain as it is.

Mr. ISAACS:

How would it do to strike out the words "in a Federal Constitution" altogether.

Mr. BARTON:

I think the words had better remain.

Mr. ISAACS:

I will make the best I can of it, and move that "in" be omitted for the purpose of inserting "by."

Mr. BARTON:

I will ask the Committee to put a stop to these verbal alterations. Amendments of this sort have no sense, or meaning, or effect on the legal force of the Bill, and are no improvement on its draughtsmanship.

Amendment negatived; clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 4-Unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, this Act shall commence and have effect on and from the day so appointed in the Queen's Proclamation: and the name "The Commonwealth of Australia" or "The Commonwealth" shall be taken to mean the Commonwealth of Australia as constituted under this Act.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

That day is to be not less than six months after the proclamation has been issued. I should like the attention of the Leader of the Convention, because I do not wish to propose a mere verbal amendment.

Mr. BARTON:

Oh, I always attend.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

It seems to me that the Queen's proclamation ought not to be issued until the Act is in force. The Queen's Proclamation can have no force or effect until after the Act itself comes into force. The hon. member's answer to me will be at once "It is one of the things implied." The proclamation is the great foundation of the whole Commonwealth, and it ought not to be carried into effect by a mere matter of implication. What is really required is not that this Act shall commence and have effect on the date of the proclamation, but that the Constitution of the Commonwealth, the whole of the clauses after clause 8, shall commence and have effect from the day so appointed in the Queen's proclamation. It is a most material point that there should be no question whatever with regard to the legality of this proclamation, which is the foundation of the Constitution. If it is to be left to a matter of implication, then I say it is leaving the foundation of the Constitution to a very unstable basis. Do hon. members see the point? The Act is not to commence till six months after the proclamation is issued, although the proclamation has to be issued under section 3 of the Act itself. My hon. friend is too good a draughtsman to leave this most material point to a mere matter of implication. I suggest amending the clause by leaving out "this Act" and inserting the words "the Constitution of the Commonwealth,"

Mr. BARTON:

I am not inclined to adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend at all. It must be common knowledge that Acts are very frequently passed and yet do not become law till a later date. This Bill provides in clause 3 that the Queen in Council may declare by proclamation on a date, not later than six months after the passing of the Act, that the people of the colonies shall be united in a Federal Constitution. The next clause goes on to say that this Act shall commence, and have effect on and from the day appointed in the Queen's proclamation. Why, it is an everyday practice to pass an Act at a particular time and say it shall take effect, say, from the first of January next.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

It is not an everyday occurrence to issue these proclamations that an Act shall come into force on a certain date. Suppose a proclamation be issued to-morrow to unite these colonies in a federal Constitution, the proclamation will not be worth a snap of the fingers. The validity of the proclamation consists in clause 3, and clause 4 says that the Act shall not come into force till six months after the issue of the proclamation. The only warrant for issuing the proclamation is the Act itself. The proclamation is to be issued, and yet the right to issue the proclamation is not to be granted under this law till six months after. The real object of the clause is to let the Constitution of Australia come into force six months after the proclamation. This is an Act within an Act. The first framers of the draft Constitution of 1891 had that point in their minds. It is too great a matter to let the foundation of the Constitution itself remain on a mere matter of implication.

Mr. BARTON:
One would think the judges of the realm were forbidden to read two clauses of an Act of Parliament together.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

My learned friend Mr. Carruthers is quite mistaken in the position. It is necessary to fix the establishment of the Commonwealth at some date to be left to the Queen to choose. That is done in clause 3. The date named in the proclamation is the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I beg your pardon. Read the clause.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

The next clause states-

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

What, do you mean to say that the Constitution takes effect from the date of the proclamation?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

The day named in the proclamation. I understand the hon. member's difficulty is this, that the clause says the Act shall not have effect until the day named in the proclamation, and that, inasmuch as the proclamation has to be made under the Act, that therefore there cannot be any valid proclamation because there is no Act to give life to it. In reply to my hon. friend I should say that there is nothing in it because the Act itself says that directly the Act is passed and assented to it becomes law. When that proclamation is issued the Commonwealth is established, We know it is a very common practice to pass an Act and to fix the commencement of its operation at a later date than on which it is passed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Can you do anything under the Act in the meantime?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

If the Act provides for it you can do it. It is quite clear that the Queen fixes the date of the proclamation, and, as I have said before, it is quite a common thing in Acts of Parliament to name the date of the commencement of the operation of the Statute later than the date it is assented to.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

Only sections of it.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

No, the whole Act. It appears to me that the whole thing is so clear that it is not necessary to make any amendment.

Mr. ISAACS:

I am not quite so clear as my hon. friend Mr. O'Connor that Mr. Carruthers is wrong. I am inclined to think that he is right. Clause 3 inter alia, says:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, to declare by Proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being later than six months after the passing of this Act.

The next clause states:

Unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, this Act shall commence and have effect on and from the day so appointed in the Queen's Proclamation; and the name "The Commonwealth of Australia," or "The Commonwealth," shall be taken to mean the Commonwealth of Australia its constituted under this Act.

When the Canadian Act was passed this contingency was foreseen, and in clause 3 of that Statute it was provided:

It shall be lawful for the Queen by and with the advice of Her Majesty's Most Honorable Privy Council, to declare by proclamation that, on and after a day therein appointed, not being more than six months after the passing of this Act, the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall form and be one Dominion under the name of Canada; and on and after that day these three Provinces shall form and be one Dominion under that name accordingly.

The next clause provides:

The subsequent provisions of this Act shall, unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, commence and have effect on and after the Union, that is to say, on and after the day appointed for the Union taking effect in the Queen's proclamation; and in the same provisions, unless it is otherwise expressed or implied, the name Canada shall be taken to mean Canada as constituted under this Act.

Therefore the previous section allowing the proclamation is not one of those sections the operation of which is deferred.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not see that there is any necessity for an alteration in a single syllable of the clause. I do not want to see time, ink, or paper wasted.

Mr. ISAACS:

Well, we might waste precious time and paper and much more afterwards, if we do not make the necessary alteration now, and it is only right that we should turn out this Bill as creditably as we can. As has been stated, we need not stand upon a punctilio with regard to the drafting, but follow Lord Thring, who framed the Canadian Act so as to leave no doubt, and so frame a Bill about which there will be no misconception.

Mr. REID:
He was not a member of the Drafting Committee.

Mr. ISAACS:

We should not run any risk. I suggest to Mr. Carruthers that he should move these words in the Canadian Act. No man should object to insert these words, in order to place the matter beyond all doubt, as they did in Canada.

Mr. PEACOCK:

I think the Convention will agree with me that no member has occupied less time than I and my friend Sir Graham Berry.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

Not in speaking.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Not in speaking; and I confess if we are going to spend as much time as we have done yesterday and to-day in connection with verbiage, we will probably be here for six months. What I would like to suggest to members of the legal profession, irrespective of what colony they represent, is that they should be sufficiently courteous to the gentleman whom we have made leader of the Convention, to submit any points they may have to him privately, as is done in connection with the various legislative Chambers, and I am certain they will save much time by so doing. We have been delayed over little points of a legal character, and we laymen have been sent here to deal with big principles. I do not intend to speak and repeat arguments that have been put ever so much better than I could put them, but I say we will not be able to proceed with the public business if we are going to discuss and deal with verbiage and words, conjunctions and prepositions, as we have been doing yesterday and today. We have really affirmed only one great principle since we have been in the Convention. I urge upon the Committee that if members have any such points as I referred to it will be the least courtesy that can be paid to the Drafting Committee for them to see the members, Mr. Barton, Mr. O'Connor, and Sir John Downer, and bring under their notice any suggestions. Probably five or six words exchanged in this way will save the legal members discussing the pros and cons of various matters.

Mr. BARTON:

I think that suggestion a good one; if it meets with the approval of the members it may lead to an expediting of the work of the Convention. I would point out that it is a common thing for the coming into effect of an Act to be fixed by proclamation. In 18 Victoria, Chapter 66, which repeals an Act of Parliament with regard to the waste lands of the Crown it is indicated that the repeal was to take effect from the date of the proclamation of the Act. It may, it expressly states, take effect from the date of the proclamation. Let us look at this measure. We are told in this Bill that it shall be lawful for the Queen to declare by proclamation that after a day appointed by the proclamation:

Not being later than six months after the passing of the Act:
the people of the colonies shall be united in the Federal Constitution established, that on and after the date named in the Act the colonies shall be united in one Commonwealth, and that:

Unless it is otherwise expressed or implied this Act shall commence on and have effect from the day so appointed in the Queen's proclamation.

What is meant is clearly this: that the Queen issues a proclamation within the date limited for that purpose, and in that proclamation names a date on which this Act shall come into effect, and the Constitution comes into effect on the date named in that proclamation. If there is any clearer way of expressing it I must admit that I do not know it, and I cannot see why we should waste any more time.

Mr. LEWIS:
I see great force in the point raised, and I will move:
To insert after the word "implied" the following words: "the subsequent provisions of"

Mr. KINGSTON:
I think we can gather the meaning of the clause as it stands, but at the same time I think it can be made clearer. I would suggest that we should.

Strike out the words "unless it is otherwise expressed or implied," and insert "except as to section 3, which shall come into operation on the passing of this Act."

If you adopt that "he who runs may read."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
How will it affect the next clause about the Governor-General? You could not appoint him until after the expiration of three months.

Mr. KINGSTON:
You will bring the whole Act into operation.

Mr. REID:
You move it.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I will ask Mr. Barton to do so.

The CHAIRMAN:
Mr. Lewis has already an amendment before the chair.

Mr. LEWIS:
I will ask leave to withdraw my amendment in favor of that suggested by
Mr. Kingston.
Leave given.
Mr. BARTON:
The words "unless it is otherwise expressed or implied" are simply for the purpose of covering any case in which there may be ambiguity in the following clauses.
Mr. KINGSTON:
You are guarding against nothing beyond section 3.
Mr. BARTON:
I may put it in this way: that if there is nothing else I can think of it is a good saving clause, and I do not see why the hon. member or anyone else should be so certain in his anticipation that every portion of this Act is so free from possible ambiguity that the saving clause is not fit to be placed in it. But if the amendment-and this is where I complain of my hon. friends-is one fit to be made it should be to strike out the words "unless otherwise expressed or implied," but they do not take them in that way.
Mr. KINGSTON:
Yes, we do.
Mr. BARTON:
And now the peculiarity arises in this way. Supposing we inserted such words, do not you see that the implication is that the subsequent words used have more force than the former?

HONORABLE MEMBERS:
Question.
Mr. BARTON:
If any honorable member says he cannot see the meaning of these clauses I am not here to answer questions of mere hair-splitting.
Mr. KINGSTON:
Sir-
Mr. BARTON:
I may say that I am not alluding to Mr. Kingston. The Drafting Committee has been charged with being punctilious. We were twitted and told that our actions were not consistent. It is one thing to stand on punctilios, and it is another thing not to yield to every punctilious question.
Mr. KINGSTON:
I thought the only clause that was intended to be brought under the operation of this exception was section 3. I ask Mr. Barton to point to any other clause, and he does not. He is a member of the Drafting Committee, and if he assures us these words were required to meet some case which he cannot now point out I will not move an amendment.
Mr. DOUGLAS:

The hon. member Mr. Kingston was one of the Drafting Committee of the Bill of 1891. Will he explain why the words were put in in 1891

Mr. KINGSTON:

No doubt they were put in for some good reason, but six years have elapsed since then, and some men as they grow older grow wiser.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I do not wish to occupy the time of this Convention, but at the same time when I propose an amendment it is with the view of improving the Bill, and I hope it will be accepted in that sense by the Leader of the Convention. I am satisfied a lot of time would be saved if some of our amendments were accepted trusting to the correction of mere verbiage when the Bill goes before the Imperial Parliament. In this matter the hon. member has not convinced me. He has shown me how it will operate on clause 3, and that if it operates at all it is to operate by multiplication. I take it that it is no mere trifle of a word here and a word there. It is the very foundation of our constitution, and for all time we shall have to refer to that proclamation as being the foundation of our Constitution. If there is any doubt in the minds of hon. members we have a right to remove it, and they are not standing on punctilios. The matter should be put beyond doubt. I beg to propose, in order that the matter may be put beyond doubt:

That the words, "Except in regard to section 3, which shall come into operation at the passing of this Act," be inserted.

Mr. BARTON:

A very pretty piece of drafting.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

It will be a certainty, at any rate. It will remove doubt and do no harm, especially as doubts will arise in the most material part of our Constitution, the proclamation which will give vitality to the Federation.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

In 1891 a Constitutional Committee was appointed. That committee delegated certain duties to three draughtsmen, including Mr. Barton and Mr. Kingston. I forget who the other member was.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Sir Samuel Griffith.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I am told that Mr. Kingston is one of the best draughtsmen in the world. Mr. Kingston has given us no reason why words which were good to use in 1891 are not good to-day. And I would very much sooner accept the drafting of six men appointed specially for the purpose than I would accept the drafting of a committee such as this, and I do not care what amendments are proposed. Having regard to those drafting the Bill I shall vote for the clause as it stands.

Mr. ISAACS:

We are here to use our judgment.

Amendment negatived; clause as read agreed to.

Clause 5.- The term "the States" shall be taken to mean such of the colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the Province of South Australia, as for the time being form part of the Commonwealth, and such other States as may hereafter be admitted into the Commonwealth, and each of such Colonies so forming part of the Commonwealth shall be hereafter designated a "State."

Mr. GORDON:

I rise with much fear and trembling, and beg to suggest-

Mr. REID:

Are you an eminent draughtsman?

Mr. GORDON:

The preamble makes provision for admission into the Commonwealth of other Australasian colonies and possessions of Her Majesty, scarcely making a proper distinction between "colonies" and "possessions." A colony may be a possession but a possession may not be a colony. Clause 5 runs as follows:

The term "The States" shall be taken to mean such of the Colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the Province of South Australia, as for the time being form part of the Commonwealth, and such other States-

Now, in the first place these are not States although they are admitted. But let that pass:

As may hereafter be admitted into the Commonwealth, and each of such colonies so forming part of the Commonwealth shall be hereafter designated a State.

I propose: To strike out the word "States," with the view of inserting "colonies and possessions of Her Majesty."

It will make the clause more clear.

Mr. BARTON:

This is a matter on which I think but little explanation will satisfy my hon. friend. It is proposed to enact that the term States shall mean such of the colonies which are named, and which for the time being form part of the Commonwealth; that is, such colonies as may unite in the Federation, and such other colonies as may hereafter be admitted into the Commonwealth.

Mr. GORDON:
May State be other than a colony?

Mr. BARTON:
The use of the word "State" there arises out of the provisions relating to new States. The first clause of the chapter relating to "New States" says that any of the existing colonies which have not adopted the Constitution may upon adopting it:
Be admitted to the Commonwealth, and shall thereupon become and be a State of the Commonwealth.

The next section is more important still. It states:
The Parliament may from time to time establish and admit to the Commonwealth new States, and may upon such establishment and admission make and impose such conditions, as to the extent of representation in either House of The Parliament or otherwise, as it thinks fit.

The object of the clause under discussion being in this form is very plain. It refers to States admitted into the Commonwealth, not being colonies which originally adopted the union, but those which come in afterwards are at the moment of their entrance entitled to be called States.

Mr. GORDON:
I admit all the hon. member says, but will the hon. member follow the rest of the clause:
And such other States as may hereafter be admitted into the Commonwealth, and each of such colonies so forming part of the Commonwealth shall be hereafter designated a "State."

Mr. BARTON:
The importation of the word "such" before the word "States" shows that those colonies previously named are to be designated States, and as to those not yet States, they are to be called States on admission into the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID:
Accept my assurance; it is all right.

Clause 6-"Repeal of 48 & 49 Vict., chap. 60"-agreed to.
Clause 7.-The Constitution established by this Act, and all laws made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth in pursuance of the powers conferred by the Constitution, and all treaties made by the Commonwealth, shall, according to their tenor, be binding on the Courts, Judges, and people of every State, and of every part of the Commonwealth, anything in the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding; and the laws and treaties of the Commonwealth shall be in force on board of all British ships whose last port of clearance or whose port of destination is in the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I desire to ask the hon. member, who has had the drafting of this Bill, whether he has taken note of the full effect of the words at the end of the clause:

And the laws and treaties of the Commonwealth shall be in force on board of all British ships whose last port of clearance or whose port of destination is in the Commonwealth.

Does he expect the Imperial Government will pass that?

Mr. BARTON:
This is a matter which caused some discussion in the Constitutional Committee, and, without being charged with divulging anything which I should not do, I think my hon. friend Mr. Isaacs will recollect with what care it was discussed in that Committee. It is no doubt a very difficult matter, but I think the difficulty disappears when we consider one point.
This was a provision imported into the Federal Council of Australasia Act of 1885, and has been in it ever since it has been in operation without question. It was a concession made by the Imperial Parliament, that is to say, as to the validity of colonial Acts on certain vessels trading to and from the Commonwealth. It was well suggested by my hon. friend Mr. Isaacs during the Committee that the probable meaning of these words was that "or" should be "and."

Mr. ISAACS:
Yes, that the word "or" should be "and."

Mr. BARTON:
That was well suggested, but no distinct motion was pressed on the Committee. Inasmuch as the clause was obviously intended to be a concession to the Australian colonies, and inasmuch as it had been for twelve years in an Act which the Imperial Parliament had passed relating to the colonies, and in favor of the colonies, the best thing to do with the clause was to do what we are doing now, let it stand in the Bill, let it go to the authority that made it, and if they wish to restrict it in any way let them do so, but in the meantime let it stand. Sir Samuel Griffith took this view in 1891, and what he said might commend itself to some of us.

I agree that these words appear rather startling They are taken from the Federal Council Act of Australasia, and were inserted by the Imperial authorities after consideration and in substitution for more limited words that were proposed by the Convention that met here in 1883.

That was the Convention which had, I think, to be called in consequence of the New Guinea affair. Sir Samuel went on:

Finding those words there, and considering that the powers of the Federal Parliament are only to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth, it was thought perfectly safe to adopt them.

Then you, Sir Richard, interjected:

Do I understand that if a ship leaves one of the Australian Colonies for a British port, say London, having a British register, until she actually arrives in Great Britain, the laws of the Commonwealth are binding upon her, and not the laws of Great Britain?

Sir Samuel Griffith's reply to that interjection was;

No; but laws of the Commonwealth, limited to laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth, will apply to her on her voyage. For instance, if it was necessary to send a prisoner to England, only such provisions as are essential for the laws of the Commonwealth outside the three-mile limit could possibly apply.

That is to say, that the laws of the Commonwealth in respect of the matter cannot possibly affect any law of the Imperial Parliament with which they may be in conflict, but so far as they are not in conflict they will be applicable to a ship on her voyage for the preservation of those laws of the Commonwealth which it is necessary to have enforced. That is the only explanation I can give. It is the explanation Sir Samuel Griffith gave. I suggest that we follow what the Constitutional Committee did, and what the Drafting committee have not departed from; that is, that the authority which made this concession might have it again brought under their notice, so that they may say what they mean, and whether they mean to restrict it. If they leave it as it is the effect would be to increase, not to decrease, the power of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID:

I quite agree with what Mr. Barton has said, but at the same time the words are sheer nonsense; they cannot have the slightest effect. It is ridiculous to suppose that the laws and treaties of the Commonwealth can begin to operate on some British ship the moment she steers from an English port for Sydney or Melbourne-

Mr. BARTON:

It does not say that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Yes.
Mr. REID:

Or to say that the moment a vessel leaves Sydney or Melbourne for other parts of the globe she carries with her these laws. It is sheer nonsense to suppose that our laws and treaties can go with a British ship from here to Japan, or from London to Sydney, but three eminent draughtsmen in 1891, three eminent draughtsmen in 1897, and some draughtsmen in the United Kingdom have put the words in, and in these circumstances I think we are bound to stick to them.

Mr. HOWE:

It appears to me from a layman's point of view that the intention of the Imperial Parliament was very plain.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HOWE:

And in fear and trembling also I submit that the laws of the Commonwealth simply apply to British ships trading within the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear. That is why they did not say so.

Mr. HOWE:

Every practical man in South Australia will think so, and I wish there were more practical men here and less of the legal element, which takes up a lot of time and occupies the attention of the Committee unnecessarily.

Mr. DOBSON:

May I ask Mr. Barton if the understanding of the matter is this: while the ships are within any portion of the Commonwealth our laws will apply, but the moment the ship goes out of the Commonwealth waters on to the High Seas, the Merchant Shipping Act will apply?

Mr. REID:

No, no. This will be an Imperial Act.

Mr. DOBSON:

If the Merchant Shipping Act of England is in force throughout the colonies, ought we not to be content with that rather than run the risk of passing laws inconsistent with the Imperial Act?

Mr. BARTON:

This appears to be a concession to Australia, and the best thing to do is to let the Imperial authorities deal with it.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8-"Division of Constitution"-agreed to.

CHAPTER 1.-THE PARLIAMENT.
Part I.-General.

Clause 1.-The Legislative powers of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament, which shall consist of Her Majesty, a Senate, and a House of Representatives, and which is hereinafter called "The Parliament," or "The Parliament of the Commonwealth."

Mr. HIGGINS:
On this clause I think it is time to ask that the Houses shall be called by the names of States Assembly and National Assembly.

The CHAIRMAN:
We have already decided to call one House the Senate.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If it is too late at this stage I apprehend it would have to be recommitted.

The CHAIRMAN:
It is a matter in which the hon. member will have to ask for reconsideration after we have gone through the Bill. We cannot arrive at inconsistent conclusions in going through the Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS:
As it has been decided to have the word Senate, I can hardly ask to have "National Assembly" substituted for House of Representatives. I shall have to ask for re-committal of both at the same time.

Mr. SYMON:
We have decided to have the name Senate instead of States Assembly and we might now substitute "House of Commons" for "House of Representatives," adopting the same name as is used in Canada.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We do not want Commons."

Mr. SYMON:
The term is perfectly appropriate to the house of the Federation we are dealing with, and it would not be quite so much Americanising our institutions as if we used the American expression House of Representatives. The term House of Commons is an improvement.

Mr. GLYNN:
It raises a class distinction.

Mr. SYMON:
Does not my hon. friend know the meaning of the term? Surely he does not say it is to distinguish between the common people and the "nobs."

Mr. REID:
What, Mr. Symon, nobs?

Mr. BARTON:
Are there any Lords here to distinguish?

Mr. SYMON:

We mean the Common of Australia. At any rate it does seem to me it is a much better expression, it is more dignified and a more English one and as we are following English methods as closely as we can, I would suggest the substitution of "House of Commons" in place of "House of Representatives." I therefore move:

To strike out the word "Representatives" with a view of inserting "Commons" in lieu thereof.

Amendment negatived; clause as read agreed to.

Clause 2. -The Queen may, from time to time, appoint a Governor-General, who shall be Her Majesty's representative in the Commonwealth, and who shall have and may exercise in the Commonwealth during the Queen's pleasure, and subject to the provisions of this Constitution, such powers and functions of the Queen as Her Majesty may think fit to assign to him.

Mr. GLYNN:

Does not this section go a little too far? It seems to me to be making active in the Governor-General a prerogative which is practically dormant or dead in the Queen. We know at present that there are many prerogatives of the Crown which

To add to the end of the clause the words: "And capable of being constitutionally exercised as part of the prerogatives of the Crown."

Amendment negatived; clause as read agreed to.

Clause 3.-The annual salary of the Governor-General shall be ten thousand pounds, and shall be payable to the Queen out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have given notice of an amendment here which will prevent the laying down of a rigid rule in regard to the salary of £10,000 to be paid to the Governor-General, which cannot be altered, unless in such a way as to amend the Constitution. I think we might trust the Federal Parliament with fixing the amount, and then, of course, there will be an after-clause that the salary of no Governor-General is to be changed during his term of office. That is only fair. But we might trust the Federal Parliament with saying from time to time how much salary should be paid to the Governor-General. There may be fluctuations in the value of money which even Mr. Walker, of New South Wales, may not foresee, and I would suggest in place of the words "ten thousand" we should insert "fixed by the Parliament from time to time."
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
You will have to appoint your Governor before you fix the salary.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think the criticism of Sir Joseph Abbott is quite right. You must first catch your hare, and he must know how much he is to get. I had omitted the fact that you must first provide for the first Governor-General. I think it will be the best way to say:
The annual salary of the Governor-General, until the Parliament otherwise provides, shall be ten thousand pounds, &c.

Mr. SYMON:
Put the words
Until the Parliament otherwise provides at the beginning of the clause.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes; I move that.

Mr. REID:
I beg to say that the object of the Constitutional Committee was to lift this question of the salary of the Governor-General above that incessant nagging and criticism which has given rise to some of the most discreditable episodes in our political life, We have had in our various Parliaments all sorts of questions as to the value of a Governor or the value of our connection with the British Crown, with a view to diminish his salary. The Governor-General is the only constitutional link we have between the mother-country and ourselves, and £10,000 is not too small a sum; indeed everyone will admit that it is a fair salary. That is the salary of the President of the United States, and the object of the Constitutional Committee was to lift the office of the Governor-General and the person himself above the attacks to which I have referred-attacks which are made by persons who either despise the British Crown or wish to subvert the position of the Governor-General. Under cover of these arguments attacks are made upon the individuals who represent the Queen in the different colonies. As the Governor-General is to be a visible link between the British Empire and ourselves we should place him beyond the possibility of any trafficking being indulged in about the question of salary. On behalf of the Constitutional Committee I have taken the liberty to make these few remarks, and having had my say I think we might divide on the question at once.

Mr. WALKER:
I would suggest to the leader of the House, the Hon. Edmund Barton, that he should adopt the clause of the 1891 Bill, which stated:

The annual salary of the Governor-General shall be fixed by the Parliament from time to time, but; shall be not less than ten thousand pounds, and shall be payable to the Queen out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the Commonwealth. The salary of a Governor-General shall not be diminished during his continuance in office.

I believe my hon. friend is willing to accept this.

Mr. ISAACS:

I strongly support the amendment of Mr. Higgins. We must fix some salary for the first Governor-General. Then the next question is, is that to be so permanently established in the Constitution that it cannot be altered either way without going through the enormous, cumbrous, and expensive machinery of an amendment of the Constitution. That seems to me an intolerable state of things. I think members of Parliament may well be trusted to do nothing improper or disgraceful in commenting upon the act of a Governor, and to put forward the danger of their doing so as a reason for subjecting the people of the country to this enormous and expensive procedure for the alteration of the Governor's salary, is more than I can well understand. I think we are entrusting to the Federal Parliament matters which are much more important than that. I have heard it said by an authority—Mr. Reid, and everything he says, deserves an receives the greatest consideration an weight—and I think we should be doing well, while fixing the £10,000, or any other sum, to include the words Suggested by Mr. Higgins, and that we should leave it to the Federal Parliament to determine, according to the exigencies of the States afterwards, whether it should remain at the same fixed sum, or be increased or lessened.

Mr. SYMON:

I feel as strongly as Mr. Reid does the undesirability of frequent attacks upon the Governor, or his salary, or his perquisites, or anything else that belongs to him; but I am afraid that liability to attack would not be at all lessened if people were disposed to make it, by inserting this provision for a fixed salary. My own inclination is that the very reverse would be the case, because if people were disposed to cast unpleasant aspersions upon the Governor-General they would be more likely to do so if they could not relieve any antagonistic feeling they bad by reducing his salary or that of his successor. There is a great deal of human nature in man, and if people, however fair they might wish to be, felt they could not gratify in any other way the criticism they may wish to indulge in, they would indulge in it with a great deal more acerbity if they could not touch the salary of the Governor-General or his successor. We may very fairly leave it with the Federal Parliament we are going to constitute, and the men who will compose this Senate and House of Representatives to deal fairly and honorably with the Governor-General and his salary. If Mr. Higgins carries his amendment there should be a provision to prevent a diminution of the salary during a Governor-General's tenure of office.

AN HON. MEMBER:

It is in this Bill.

Mr. SYMON:

It is not in this Bill. I will support the amendment at the beginning of the clause on the understanding that the other words are added.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

It is not very often that I find myself in the position of being able to support my friend Mr. Reid.

Mr. REID:

I will give in. I will not have a long discussion on it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

We have adopted a fixed salary which is an ample and not an insufficient one, and for the reason put forward by Mr. Reid, that the Governor's salary should not be a matter brought up for discussion at any time, and made the vehicle for nasty remarks—I think that it is better that it should be fixed. I would remind Mr. Symon that the fact that the salary was open to amendment would supply the opportunity to have those nasty things said.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I hope that the clause will not be carried in its present form. It is after all more a matter of good sense and logic than of principle. It is purely a matter for the Parliament concerned, and not one for referendum, and if we cannot trust the Parliament in this connection we cannot trust them at all.

Mr. BARTON:

Mr. Walker said I was in favor of restoring the original clause, and, as a matter of fact, I should like to say that the clause as embodied in the Bill of 1891 was more acceptable to my mind than the present one. I prefer that the salary should be fixed by the Parliament from time to time, with the proviso that it should not be less than £10,000, as that would afford a sure guarantee under which any Governor-General could accept office. The matter appeared in a different light to the Constitutional Committee, and that is the reason why the clause stands in its present form. If the proposal is made that the old form of the clause should be reverted to I should be found supporting it, with a reservation that it specifies a minimum amount. If we cannot trust the future Parliament more than that we have no right to constitute them, and, failing the substitution of the old clause, I shall support Mr. Higgins' amendment, and trust to the people of the Commonwealth to know their own business.

Mr. HOWE:

I shall support the amendment, which will give the power into the hands of the people, with whom it should be, and we do not know whether it may not occur at some distant date when it may be necessary to reduce the salary of the Governor.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Say £500 a year.

Mr. HOWE:

I would say to the conventionists from the more populous colonies that £10,000, £20,000, or £30,000 may seem insignificant sums to them, but I can assure them that the first question we were asked was "What is this Federation to cost us?" The consensus of opinion was that £10,000 was too much to pay the Governor-General. They pointed out that in the United States of America, with an almost uncrowned king, with far greater functions, powers, and duties than are ever likely to be exercised by a Governor-General of United Australia, they only paid £10,000 a year, and had 70,000,000 people to contribute towards it. I will move to strike out "ten," with the view of inserting "seven."

Mr. LYNE:

It appears to me the amendment proposed by the representative Mr. Higgins would place the British Government in a dilemma at the first instance, because the appointment of the first Governor-General will have to be made almost immediately, as soon as the Constitution is created.

An HON. MEMBER:

He will get £10,000.

Mr. LYNE:

I take it that he will get that if that is the amount fixed.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I will alter that, and the clause will read:

Until Parliament otherwise provides the annual salary of the Governor-General shall not be less than ten thousand pounds.

That will remain until the Parliament makes further provision.

Mr. LYNE:

I was not aware that you had altered it, and it struck me there was a flaw there. I will support the amendment, and leave the salary of all future Governors to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament. It seems to me we should leave to the Federal Parliament something to say on this question.
Amendment to insert the words "until Parliament otherwise provides" at the beginning of clause 3 agreed to.

Mr. Howe:
I will move:
That in the first line of the clause the word "ten" be struck out, and the word seven inserted in lieu thereof.

An Hon. Member:
Make it eight.

Mr. Barton:
Make it £2,000.

? Make it £500.

Mr. Barton:
The chief executive officer of Canada receives £15,000 a year and the Viceroy of India £20,000. I do not know how it strikes hon. members, but I think that our affairs will require as considerable, as acute and as well informed an amount of attention as any other part of the dominions of the British Crown. And we do not need to consider this proposal when the difference bears such a trifling comparison to what you would vote for a bridge or a road.

Mr. Howe:
The Governor usually entertains his friends at social functions, and it is only a few high class individuals who can partake of this entertainment.

Mr. Reid:
Do you think he can entertain the whole community?

Mr. Howe:
The people, as a people, pay the whole of his salary, and who are the people? The great mass of the people, they scarcely, if ever, participate in any of these social pleasures which wealthy governors or highly salaried officials bestow on their acquaintances. And I consider that a Governor-General should not be appointed to these colonies simply for the purpose of drawing a large salary. I have no doubt, Sir, the position will be one of honor, and people of fortune in the old country will be only too glad to accept a position like this, and the matter of salary will not weigh with them.

Mr. Barton:
That is to say you would fine them for accepting.

Mr. Howe:
I know in South Australia we used to pay a larger salary than we do now, but I have no hesitation in saying that with a lower salary we have the duties performed quite as efficiently as we ever had before. We will get quite as able a man to administer his department with a salary of £7,000 as if we paid a salary of £15,000. In moving this amendment I am simply carrying out the views of the people whom I represent.

Mr. WALKER:

May I inform the hon. gentleman that I am speaking absolute truth when I say that in New South Wales the Governor gets £7,000 a year, including allowances, and it is a notorious fact that for several terms of office the occupant has been out of pocket. Is it fair to ask a gentleman to accept such a position in such circumstances, and put him on a salary not equal to the professional income of some of our leading counsel?

Mr. KINGSTON:

I thank my friend Mr. Howe for bringing this matter forward. We have just decided that this is a proper matter for the decision of the Federal Parliament in future, but in the meantime it is within our privileges to deal with it. In a matter of this sort I do not see why we should not exercise economy in connection with the viceregal establishment. It is as fair a subject of economy as anything else, and we ought to economise at every opportunity. The reduction in the provisions of this Bill of the salaries previously proposed to be given to members of Parliament, is another justification for the course the hon. member proposes. I have been a party myself to economy in these establishments. At the same time in connection with an establishment of this character, having regard to the high and important duties which will require to be discharged by the Governor-General, we are not overstepping the amount if we fix it at £10,000 in the first instance. I should object strongly to fix it once and for all at £10,000, but when we fix it simply in the first instance and give the Federal Parliament power to alter when it pleases we, will be doing wisely in fixing it at £10,000.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BARTON:

If we are agreed upon it I think we ought to provide that the salary of the Governor-General shall not be diminished during his term of office. We cannot tolerate the idea of a salary in such a case being altered during the term of the contract.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Why not say increase as well as diminish?

Mr. BARTON:

I do not say so. I propose

That these words be added: The salary of a Governor-General shall not be diminished during his continuance in office.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I would ask the Premier of Victoria if he will not move in the direction he indicated just now, because I think it would be an improvement. In the relations of the Governor-General with his advisers there should be nothing either to fear or hope for. If he does his duty conscientiously he need not fear anything, neither should he be driven from the strict course of duty by the hope of reward. There should be no fear of punishment by diminution of his salary, while, at the same time, no relations should exist between himself and his advisers to induce a Ministerial proposal to Parliament for an increase of his salary. Neither should be.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You move the amendment.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I will move then:

To strike out the word "diminished," and insert "altered" in lieu thereof.

Mr. BARTON:

I accept that.

Amendment agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 4.-The provisions of this Constitution relating to the Governor-General extend and apply to the Governor-General for the time being, or such person as the Queen may appoint to be the Chief Executive Officer or Administrator of the Government of the Commonwealth, by whatever title he is designated; but no such person shall be entitled to receive any salary in respect of any other office under the Crown during his administration of the Government of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS:

I would like to ask the hon. member Mr. Barton the real meaning of the last phrase:

But no such person shall be entitled to receive any salary in respect of any other office under the Crown during his administration of the Government of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:

I will explain the object. There have been cases in which, for instance, gentlemen, holding the position of Chief Justice have been appointed Lieutenant-Governors, and under that commission have been the chief executive officers of the Government of the colony during the absence of the Governor. In those cases it has sometimes happened that they have received not only the salary of Chief Justice, but the salary of the Governor, and, although there have been cases where provision has been made for acting judges to act when they could not, it has been generally a matter of public opinion throughout the colonies that in those cases these officers should be content with the salaries they receive as Acting Governors, and forego in the meantime the salaries of judges. The object of the clause is to make that clear.

Mr. ISAACS:
It would not apply in Queensland. For instance, there the President of the Legislative Council was appointed Acting-Governor.

Mr. BARTON:
Of course there is the exception that it is not under the Crown. It may be advisable perhaps to make some addendum in that way.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear; that is what I wished to be made clear.

Mr. BARTON:
The difficulty would be this, if you omit the words "under the Crown" this office, which he might hold, might be that of director or anything of that sort, and then you would be interfering with private business.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Say, "receiving from the Crown."

Mr. BARTON:
I would not say "from the Crown"; but "out of the consolidated revenue."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Then he might be an officer of one of the States.

Mr. BARTON:
That would not be a probable thing under a Federal Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Why not say "out of the Federal revenue?"

Mr. BARTON:
True, he might be an officer of one of the States. Now, it is one of the basic principles of this Bill not to interfere with the affairs of the States any more than we can manage.

Mr. ISAACS:
I only want to carry out this principle.

Mr. BARTON:
The object of the Government is not to look after the revenues of the States, but the revenues of the Commonwealth. The States have their own Government, and they can take care of themselves, and we must not interfere with them.

Mr. GLYNN:
But you do interfere.
Mr. DOBSON:
Suppose the Federal Government appoints a Chief Justice of a colony to a position under be Commonwealth and the States do not object to him taking the position.

Mr. BARTON:
We do not interfere. The object of this clause is to prevent the revenues of the Commonwealth paying the same officer another salary. If the State happens to have an officer who is appointed Administrator of the Government for the Commonwealth it would be for the State itself to say whether it would allow him to continue to draw a salary in addition to what the Commonwealth paid him.

Mr. REID:
It would have to say whether it would allow him to keep his State office.

Mr. BARTON:
Just so, and if they did on what terms. The interests of the States are not interfered with, but conserved. I move:
To insert after the word "salary" in the six line of the clause the words "from the Commonwealth."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
Now I move:
To strike out "under the Crown" in the next line.
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. SYMON:
I do not suppose we can very well interfere, but I should like to direct attention to what I conceive to be undesirable: the disadvantage of a judge occupying the position of administrator or Deputy or Lieutenant-Governor under the Federal Government. It is a serious question whether the judiciary should be brought into that position, particularly in relation to the Governor-General of Australia-involving a Chief Justice acting as Governor-General. I have a strong repugnance to judicial officers being mixed up with the Executive. It is exceedingly undesirable in many respects, and particularly, as my hon. friend says, in a Federation. I do not know whether the Constitutional Committee or Drafting Committee have considered the subject at all, but I should be very glad to see some provision inserted in the Constitution to prevent the appointment of any Judge of the Federation to what is really an executive position. It is inconsistent with the High Court we are going to establish, and, if it is not done earlier, I shall be very glad to discuss it with my friend Mr. Barton to see if we can propose some amendment which will exclude Judges of the High Court, at any rate, from holding that executive position which will be inconsistent with th
Mr. BARTON:
   It will give me the greatest pleasure to discuss that question with my learned friend. I think we are somewhat in sympathy on the matter.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Talk it over after the Committee adjourns.
Clause as read agreed to.
Clause, 5-Oath of allegiance; schedule -agreed to.
Clause 6-The Governor-General may appoint such times for holding the first and every other season of the Parliament as he may think fit, giving sufficient notice thereof, and may also from time to time, by Proclamation or otherwise, prorogue the Parliament, and may in like manner dissolve the House of Representatives.
The Parliament shall be called together not later than six months after the establishment of the Commonwealth.
Mr. HOLDER:
   I move:
   to insert after the words "Governor-General" the words "in Council."
Mr. REID:
   I propose to raise that question on the chapter on Executive Government.
Mr. HOLDER:
   Then I will not press it now.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   On the first part or this clause I have given notice of an amendment which raises rather a big question. That is whether the Governor-General may have power in certain emergencies to dissolve the Senate as well as as well as the Lower House.
Mr. SYMON:
   In view of the lateness of the hour, and as this is an amendment upon which there may be considerable debate, as it involves a very serious question upon the working of the Constitution, I ask the leader of the House whether he will not now move the chairman to report progress.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Adjourn.
Mr. REID:
   We are just getting into form.
Mr. BARTON:
   All the matters up to clause 9 are simple.
Mr. SYMON:
An amendment is to be moved by Mr. Higgins that will cause very serious discussion.

Mr. BARTON:
I ask Mr. Higgins not to persevere with it at this stage, but if the constitution of the Senate, when it is discussed later on in the main clauses is brought into a form that in his judgment will necessitate a dissolution, I shall have no objection to re-committing this clause if he so desires. We do not want to report progress for a few minutes, but all I propose to do tonight is to go on with a few clauses which are comparatively unimportant, and leave those which are more serious till to-morrow's sitting.

Mr. HIGGINS:
On that understanding I will not press my amendment.
Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 - Yearly Sessions of Parliaments-agreed to.
Clause 8.-The privileges, immunities, and powers of the Senate and of the House of of Representatives respectively, and of the Committees and the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time declared by the Parliament, and until declared shall be those of the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom, and of the Committees and the members thereof respectively, at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I have given notice of an amendment on this clause more by way of enquiry than anything else. The question is whether those privileges, &c., ought not to be declared by Act of Parliament. I know the Parliament has oftentimes resolved that it has privileges and immunities without an Act, but I think it is meant to have an Act.

Mr. GLYNN:
The Parliament consists of the Queen and the two Houses.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
The only way to make a declaration is by an Act.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think there is a good deal of force in what Mr. Glynn has suggested to me, that Parliament means Her Majesty and two Houses. In view of that I shall not further press my amendment.
Clause as read agreed to.

Part 2.-Senate.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Report progress.

Mr. BARTON:
I propose to postpone; at the end of the part there are one or two important clauses. I begin by proposing:
  That clauses 9 and 10 be postponed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
  Oh, no. I assure my hon. friend they will run through more rapidly after.

Mr. BARTON:
  I give my hon. friend the assurance that I am not going to take any clauses that look likely to create debate.

Mr. SYMON:
  I ask my hon. friend not to adopt this irregular method of proceeding. We are getting on very well, and we had a great protest about the Western Australian delegates adopting a similar course the other day. I think that these unimportant clauses will be got through quite as rapidly if we take them in order.

Mr. BARTON:
  There are some clauses which we might have to the credit of our record to-night, and which involve no discussion. Take clause 11-

Mr. SYMON:
  We have not had time to read them.

Mr. BARTON:
  If my hon. friend will lose a little of his youthful impatience I will point out the clauses to which I refer, and I ask hon. members to put their fingers on them. There are clauses 11, 15, 16, 17, 18, and 19, which are purely machinery clauses. I defy any hon. member to find any reason why-

Mr. SYMON:
  Will you give us till tomorrow to take up your challenge of defiance?

Mr. BARTON:
  The hon. member looks so pleasant that I think I must.

  Progress reported.

SITTINGS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. SYMON:
  I wish to ask my hon. friend Mr. Barton what he proposes in regard to the sitting of the Convention to-morrow? The following day is Good Friday, and it might be convenient for hon. members to know till what hour he proposes to sit to-morrow. I know he not only wants sleep, but he also wants a rest, and if I had my way I would give him a rest to-morrow afternoon and Friday.

Mr. REID:
  So would I if this Convention were sitting in Sydney.

Mr. BARTON:
  The position seems to me to entirely depend upon the will of the Convention. This is a body of very distinguished men, and I am sure it is not a body that is to be driven. There has been some suggestion to which I did yield that we should sit on Saturday and Easter Monday, and if the zeal as distinguished from the piety of Mr. Peacock had prevailed, we should have been sitting on Good Friday also. I hope we are not going to do that. I should like, however, to take the sense of the Convention the moment it sits to-morrow morning, and I shall be guided by the general opinion of the Convention, of course, in any proposition I have to make. I really do think we should make good progress, and better progress, if we had a day or two's rest. That is the way I think myself, and there are others, I am sure, who have been quite as hard-worked as I have been. My own idea was that by sitting every night we might gain that little compensation that would be afforded to us by a rest at Easter, and if that is not the opinion of the Convention I will stick to my work the same as anyone else. If my hon. friend Mr. Symon will wait till tomorrow morning I will find out what the view of the Convention is.

Mr. FRASER:
I would like to point out that the Western Australian delegates as well as others have left while more are leaving. Therefore we should get through our work without delay.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO MR. BRUNKER.

Mr. HOLDER:
I have to move:
That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable me to table a motion without notice:
The notice is:
That one week's leave of absence be granted to the Hon. Mr. Brunker.
All I need say is that we all deeply regret the cause of his absence, and every one in the Convention will readily grant him leave.

Motion resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. HOLDER:
I now move:
That one week's leave of absence be granted to the Hon. Mr. Brunker.
Motion resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.
Convention adjourned at 10.23 p.m.
Thursday April 15, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I have two petitions to present. They are respectfully worded and contain prayers. One in favor of adult suffrage bears 513 signatures, and the other, bearing ninety-six signatures, is against it. I think the latter petition is one that has not till now been presented, and I move:

That it be received and read:

And that the other one:

Be received.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

The CLERK read the petition, which was as follows:

To the Hon. the President and the Members of the Federal Convention of Australia.

The petition of the undersigned citizens of Tasmania humbly showeth-

(1) That as Tasmanian inhabitants as a whole are represented at the Federal Convention solely by men, in this both sexes heartily concur; and that as the majority of the Tasmanian women do not desire political responsibility to be thrust upon them, we consider it unadvisable that Federated Australia should force adult suffrage upon this colony, but that each colony should frame its own franchise,

(2) That as the interests of the female portion of the inhabitants of Tasmania are guarded both by men in our local Houses of Parliament and at the Federal Convention, we are of the opinion that they are and can be equally well represented by relations and male friends at the ballot box.

(3) We therefore respectfully pray that in your deliberations you will favorably consider this our petition; and we ask that the blessing of Him who gave to man the sole right to rule may rest upon you in your great work, and that this and all matters appertaining to the constitution of Federated Australia may be framed in accordance with the righteous law of God. Righteousness alone can exalt our young nation.

Dr. QUICK:

How many signatures has it?
The CLERK:
   Ninety-six.

Dr. QUICK:
   From the whole of Tasmania!

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HOLDER:
   I give notice that on the next day of sitting I will move:
   That ten days' leave of absence be granted to the representatives of Western Australia on account of urgent public business.

INFLUENCING MEMBERS.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   In this morning's press I am represented as having by my diplomacy secured the adhesion of three of the representatives of Tasmania on behalf of Mr. Reid's proposition yesterday; there is no justification for the statement, except that those gentlemen have had the intelligence to give effect to my arguments. With regard to Mr. Henry and Mr. Lewis, I do not think I uttered one word to them in reference to the proposed vote. Staying at the same hotel as Mr. Brown, the matter has been talked over by us, but I do not remember having said a word to induce him to support the proposition of Mr. Reid. I think it is unjust to these gentlemen to be singled out as being outwitted by myself and induced to give a vote which some people think was against the interests of the country. I may say, in reference to the President of the Legislative Council of Tasmania, that I did approach him, and have not felt well since, (Laughter.)

Mr. DOUGLAS:
   I know that some members were approached by members from Victoria and New South Wales.

HON. MEMBERS:
   Name!

Mr. DOUGLAS:
   I would name Mr. Walker as one.

DAYS OF SITTING.

Mr. BARTON:
   A considerable number of hon. members have spoken to me with reference to the question of adjournment. Now, there is very great difficulty in this matter. Many members are tired of the long sittings, and of course there are some of us who can plead that they are nearly worn out;
   but there are gentlemen here, such as the Premier of New South Wales, who feel that if the business is not continued on Saturday and Monday they will not be able to stay until the discussion on the financial clauses takes place. I feel a difficulty in proposing anything myself, as it is my duty to carry on the work of the Convention, and I am sure I will have the hearty co-operation of members if it becomes necessary to sit on both days. Whilst I should like an adjournment, I cannot presume to stand in the way of the gentlemen who feel that they will be unable to take part in the debate on important parts of the Bill if the adjournment takes place. I, therefore, do not feel justified in proposing anything, but if any member does so, members can express their views.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

The other morning I brought this matter up so that we might obtain the views of members to enable those who desired to leave to make the necessary arrangements. The Convention then practically came to the unanimous conclusion that we should sit on. What has occurred in the meanwhile to change our opinions? Nothing. I should have been glad to have been able to have gone back to my own colony for the purpose of settling public and private business matters before I leave for England, but I have given up all hope of doing so after the position of the other day, and, having decided that we would sit, it is our duty to do so. I wish it to be distinctly understood that we are not simply to come here on Saturday, and then adjourn because it is Saturday and we want to get away for the afternoon. If we determine to sit on Monday it would be very unfair if members absented themselves. If we do this, by Tuesday or Wednesday we should have so far completed our work as to enable Mr. Reid, who is anxious to get back to the opening of the New South Wales Parliament, a ceremony he cannot be absent from, to leave. He is of valuable assistance to us, and it would be unfair to him and the colony he represents, if we do not do all we can to get through the business.

The PRESIDENT:

I would like to point out that the resolution which at present guides our meetings provides for meeting every day, except on Saturdays. I presume it is not intended to sit on Friday, and if it is proposed to sit on Saturday, a resolution to that effect will have to be carried.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable me to move a resolution without notice.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

That the Convention, at its rising to-day, do adjourn until Saturday, at 10.30 o'clock.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I am as willing as anybody to sit, but I feel that we ought to adjourn from this afternoon until Tuesday.

HON. MEMBERS:

No!

Mr. TRENWITH:

Well, I will state a few reasons why I think we should. The festive season is now on—it is a religious as well as a festive season, of course—and so far as I understand Easter Monday is looked upon by South Australian people as their principal holiday of the year.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

No.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I understand it is so, that many South Australians will be keeping it, and that they will be making some arrangements to entertain the delegates at this Convention. They desire, I believe, that the delegates should be present at some of their festivities. They have been extremely kind and gracious since we have been in the colony.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Why not let them come and listen to the debates at the Convention instead?

Mr. TRENWITH:

I do not think that that would be any enjoyment to them. The South Australians, I say, have been very kind and gracious to us, and if we could, we should endeavor to repay them a compliment. But I shall not urge that we should adjourn. I would urge, though, that if there are any hon. members who Contemplate being absent on Monday, they should let us know now, so that we in our actions may be guided by their intentions. If it is decided to sit, and the members of the Convention vote in that direction, there ought to be as full a meeting on Monday as there has been during any other day of the session. We have had some experience of fits of virtue in advance when in other places. We have resolved to sit over the period during which an adjournment is usual, and I have known myself that when a resolution was carried to sit on an important fete day, members who were anxious not to sit, and have urged that we should not sit, have turned up in accordance with the resolutions, and persons who urged that we should sit have been absent. If we decide to sit I shall be here, and I think it is incumbent upon every member of the Convention to be here.

Dr. QUICK:

As one who has not taken up much time, either in the House or in this Committee, I think I might fairly appeal to hon. members to say that this motion should be carried. I have been absent from my home for upwards of four weeks, and have suffered considerable inconvenience through being away from my duties. We should arrange to complete our work by this day week at the very latest, but we shall not be able to do that unless we sit on Saturday and Monday.

Mr. REID:

In ordinary circumstances a request for adjournment would be very reasonable, but, in existing circumstances, I cannot be oblivious of the fact that if these two days are lost I shall have to leave the Convention before some very important business has been dealt with. We have come here with one supreme duty to discharge, and as I would not like to put other members of the Convention in the position of going away from it before their work has been completed, so I feel sure that hon. members of the Convention will take the same view as myself and others do.

Mr. SYMON:

As one of the members of South Australia I naturally feel some delicacy in saying anything on this subject, but I do wish to say a word or two about it, and to this effect. I am not in the habit of frequenting the racecourse, and therefore perhaps I ought to premise by deprecating any suggestion that I desire to avail myself of the gala or festivities on Monday. There is another point of view I wish to put, and it seems to me to be very important. I thoroughly agree that it would be very undesirable indeed that we should proceed with our task in relation to the framing of this Constitution in the absence of so distinguished a member as Mr. Reid, or any hon. member who may ho

Mr. BARTON:

That was the Premier of Western Australia.

Mr. SYMON:

If we proceed with our labors from dewy morn, and sit till late hours at night, there will be nothing left of me by-and-bye. I would like to have some little relaxation, so that I may be able to come to work with the freshness and vigor which relaxation would give. During the past four weeks we have done very hard work indeed. I am able to say for my friends on the Judiciary Committee that we were industrious and constant in our application.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Especially at Auldana.

Mr. SYMON:

If it had not been for the little relaxation we had there, I do not know where we should have been by now. I do also put it on the ground of consideration for my friend Mr. Barton that we are exacting too much from him-

Mr. REID:

Very ingenious!

Mr. SYMON:

To expect him to continue like this. I do not want to make use of Mr. Barton for my purpose. Then there is Mr. Reid. We have noticed the haggard, emaciated condition to which he has been reduced by the labors of this Convention. (Laughter.)

Mr. REID:

There is some ulterior motive here. You want to get rid of me.

Mr. SYMON:

It is because I want to preserve to him that mental and physical health for which he is so eminent, that I think he should have some relaxation forced upon him.

Mr. REID:

I saved my life by not going down the cellar.

Mr. SYMON:

He has had one little period of relaxation. We lost him for four days, and when he came back we noticed his kindly and benignant expression which did us all good. I submit it would be well, instead of squeezing in Saturday that we should have that day and Monday as well for relaxation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

If I considered my own personal convenience I should certainly suggest that we make this adjournment from this evening until Tuesday, inasmuch as whenever our labors here may finish, they will not finish at a sufficiently early date to give me an opportunity of returning to my colony before I have to set out for England. But we have the convenience of others to think of, and that, I think, will be best met by continuing our labors and sitting on Saturday and Monday. As regards the question of rest to Mr. Barton, he at any rate will secure that during two days-Friday and Sunday-out of the four next succeeding days, I hope he will have nothing to employ him to-morrow or next Sunday.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I sympathise with my friend Mr. Reid, and, in fact, with everybody who does not belong to South Australia; and I am certainly not going to actively oppose their views, but it does seem to be a little hard that because of the interposition of the Easter holidays we have to work harder than if the Easter holidays had not come in at all. Ordinarily we adjourn from Friday to Monday, but now we will have to sit on Saturday.

Mr. REID:
You have Friday.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We have Friday, certainly, but we have to go on again on Saturday, and so spoil the continuity of the rest by having to take it in bits.

Mr. REID:
Do you not think it a matter in which the convenience of the visitors should be studied?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is what I am saying. But there are those who have had no rest for a very long while. I refer, without any ingeniousness, to my friend Mr. Barton; it is a little hard that the convenience of visitors—a courtesy we are bound to consider—should throw a continuous amount of toil on him which human nature can scarcely endure. It would have been better if we had adjourned from to-day till Monday, at all events. It would not have made a great deal of difference. We might sit till twelve o'clock to-night, and then adjourn, at all events till Monday. We should have made up, I think, in the two or three extra hours perhaps for the days we had lost, and given those who have been continuously at very hard work an opportunity of getting a little more rest.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You would have gained nothing by it.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ABSENCE OF THE LEADER.

Mr. BARTON:
I should like to mention that it will be necessary for me to be away for a short while, but the Bill will be in equally good, indeed in better, hands, as my hon. friends Sir John Downer and Mr. O'Connor, the other members of the Drafting Committee, will take charge of matters.

Mr. SYMON:
I should like to ask Mr. Barton before he goes whether, as we are to sit on Saturday and no doubt also on Monday, it will be necessary to sit late to-night? I ask that we should not do so.

Mr. BARTON:
Let us see how far we get to-night. If there is good reason for an adjournment we shall be able to consider it. If we sit late to-night we may clear away many of our difficulties. The requisites are short speeches and not many questions, except large ones, raised.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee (consideration resumed from April 14th).

Part II.-Senate

Clause 9.-The Senate shall be composed of six members for such State, and each member shall have one vote.

The members for each State shall be directly chosen by the people of the State as one electorate.

The members shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the members chosen by each State shall be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General.

The Parliament shall have power, from time to time, to increase or diminish the number of members for each State, but so that the equal representation of the several States shall be maintained and that no State shall have less than six members.

The qualification of electors of members of the Senate shall be in each State that which is prescribed by this Constitution or by the Parliament as the qualification for electors of members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think my amendments come first in this clause. The proposal is to omit the word "six" before "members," and then to make an incidental alteration in the clause, with a view of giving in the Senate to the different States a certain advantage in representation, but not equal representation. Of course I recognise that, in this matter, my views in this Convention will be in a minority. I recognise also that having regard to the anxiety to get on with business, I should be as short as I can possibly be. But, having regard to the great and growing body of opinion which is founded against this principle of equal representation, I feel that it would be well, in the interests of Federation and of achieving Federation during this year, that voice should be given in some manner to the strong minority who at present are against the granting of equal representation, and who look upon equal representation with great suspicion and great apprehension. If the argument for equal representation is right, it will be well for those hon. members who are in favor of it to show how it is right. It will lead to the acceptance of this Bill much more readily if the people of the different States can be convinced that equal representation is good in principle. But if it is not good in principle it will lead eventually to a modification of the proposal, before what I regard as a profound and irreparable injury and injustice is done to the future Commonwealth of Australia. I might state that this question of equal representation has nothing to do with the compromise which was accepted yesterday. The compromise then was between those who were in favor of giving equal powers to both Houses in matters of Money Bills and those who were not in favor of giving equal powers.

Mr. LYNE:
Do not include the whole Convention in the matter of the compromise, because I have not compromised at all.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I am putting it in the strongest possible way against myself. There is a great deal in the words of the Premier of New South Wales yesterday, in regard to the danger of the power of suggestion. I think that Mr. Lyne is right in saying that a great many view that power of suggestion with apprehension.

Mr. LYNE:
A majority.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That may be; but this question of equal representation I want to say has nothing to do with the question of suggestion and amendment which will have to be fought out, no matter what may be the constitution of the Senate. Now, after all, let us see what we mean by Federation, because we must go down to the root of this thing. A number of people belonging to different States come to the conclusion that there are certain interests which can be better dealt with by the people of those States as a whole than they can be dealt with by each State acting by itself. Therefore they say, "For the purposes of what can be best dealt with as a whole let us be one people-let us obliterate State rights. For purposes which can be beat dealt with by each State individually, let the State have the sole voice; but for the purposes of what can be best dealt with by the people as a whole let the Commonwealth have the sole voice." It is the obliteration of State lines for certain purposes that Federation means in essence. Now it is true, and you put it very clearly in your pamphlet, Sir Richard, that there is a dual citizenship. There is a citizenship of the State, and as to that the majority in the State must rule. There is also a citizenship in the Federation, and as to that the majority in the Federation ought to rule. The only objects of Federation are the people. If the people are divided in opinion in the State the only course open is for you to proceed to count heads. Our parliamentary procedure is simply based upon the principle of counting heads; you first deposit the club on the table-we have not a mace here to signify that-and say: "Now, instead of having a fight, let us proceed to count heads and see who would win. "I cannot see why the same principle of majority rule should not apply in the case of Federation for federal purposes as in the case of a State for State purposes.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It would not be Federation, that is all.

Mr. HIGGINS:

If you adopt the language of theorists, this Federation is simply another application of differentiation and integration—differentiation of State interests and federal interests, and integration of the people for federal subjects. You have integration of interests for federal purposes, and you have also differentiation of interests, and there is a tendency against centralization except for interests which are central—a tendency to, as far as possible, let the people manage their own affairs in their own way. It is said that Federation is not unification. That is quite correct, but Federation is unification for certain purposes. the only object of Federation is to become one people for certain purposes, and in the language of the great Chief Justice Marshall, who is, perhaps, the principal expounder of the great Constitution of the United States:

We are one people for war; we are one people for peace; we are one people for the purpose of commercial regulation, referring, of course, to Customs and excise. The position, then, is that if you treat all the Australians as one people for certain specified and limited purposes the majority ought to rule just as you say the majority ought to rule in South Australia for South Australian purposes. The ridiculous position is this, that, although you treat the Australians as one people, you find in such places as Burns and Cockburn a fence between New South Wales and South Australia, and if it be Federation with equal representation the effect will be that the man who lives in Burns, in New South Wales, will only have one-fourth of the voting power which that man over the fence in Cockburn has got.

Mr. LYNE:

How many is one-fourth?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I am speaking of the present relation between New South Wale and South Australia in population. understand South Australia has between 300,000 and 350,000 people.

Mr. KINGSTON:

There are 360,000.

Mr. HIGGINS:

While New South Wales has 1,250,000. I am only speaking roughly. I need not go into exact figures, but I think substantially I may say that, although they are supposed for Federation purposes to be one people, the man over the fence in Burns has got only a quarter of the voting effect upon the representation in the Senate that the man in Cockburn has got. Then, also, if you go further, and take two mining centres, Coolgardie and Broken Hill. Broken Hill is, according to the lines of latitude and longitude-arbitrarily drawn-in New South Wales and Coolgardie is in Western Australia. The present ratio of the population of Western Australia to New South Wales is about one to nine. There are about nine times as many people in New South Wales, and what is the result? A miner in Coolgardie has nine times the voting power possessed by a miner in Broken Hill. I think that really it is time for us to consider the question. I intend to proceed to a division, no matter how few may go with me. I feel, in the interests of Federation, that it is advisable to have this brought forward, to have the voices given and the different opinions also. There has been a good deal of emphasis laid on a preamble to the resolutions passed by the House that the object of the Federation is to enlarge the self-governing powers of the people of Australia.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Will you answer a question? What proportion would you give, or what number would you act oh if you did not give equal representation? You would not go on the purely population basis?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I would not. I shall explain afterwards that I hope to have a sliding scale which would give a certain advantage to the small States, but not by any means equal representation. "To enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australia." I concur in that phrase, but we must see that we do enlarge the powers of the people, and that we do not simply enlarge the powers of the minority of the people not only to govern themselves in their own affairs, but also to govern the majority of the people of Australia. There are a number of phrases current which, I am sorry to say, seem to have attracted the approval of a number of delegates, and if I may speak frankly I must say that when I commenced the election campaign for this Convention I assumed that equal representation in the Senate must be accepted as of course; but I have become more and more convinced that the system of equal representation has no foundation in theory or utility.

Mr. LYNE:

Or in equity.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It has been said, amongst other things, that you must have the consent of the people as well as the consent of the States in Federation. The theory is that we are one people in the Federation for federal purposes. What has the State got to do with this purpose which we declare to be federal? As soon as you arrange that there is to be one people for this purpose, the States have nothing to do with it; and supposing you work it out logically, is it supposed that in this States House or Senate the members for each State shall vote en bloc? No one suggests it, but the true corollary is that each State should vote en bloc. Another phrase has got current: "You have one man one vote, and why not have one State one vote." The answer is as simple as anything could be. The objects of our legislation are men, human beings, and not States. States are organizations designed for a specific purpose, and the position is that the true corollary to one man one vote is many men many votes, and not one State one vote. There is another phrase that it is the people right through who will have the control as to both Houses, because you have a broad franchise, because in the one case you have merely the people grouped as a population, and in the other case you have them grouped in States. This is very nice, but the grouping is everything. You may have the most liberal franchise, and yet by grouping the people you may defeat the object of the franchise. Supposing in this province of South Australia you had the rule that for every ten square miles you returned one member. Give the most liberal franchise you like-adult suffrage—but within these ten miles you would have Adelaide and its suburbs, and in other places you would have a squatter or a blackfellow with the same voting power as Adelaide. Grouping is everything, as Mr. Eldridge Gerry found in working the State of North Carolina, as he managed to so work the State for election purposes that the whole body of those who were against slavery were so grouped as to be unable to return one member against the slave owners.

Mr. Howe:
That is the origin of "gerrymandering."

Mr. Higgins:
I perfectly admit that the foundation for this extraordinary claim is that the minority will be swamped by the majority. Now, I wish to face that. Every minority is swamped by every majority. Supposing you take the constituency of Port Augusta, if there is such a one in this province, and it returns one member. At Port Augusta some people vote one way and some another, and the minority are swamped by the majority. Why should they not be?

Sir William Zeal:
Hang them at once!

Mr. Higgins:
Sir William Zeal is a good example. He represents a minority in Victoria, and yet he has not been hanged, and I would be sorry to see him. The minority must trust to the sense of justice on the part of the majority, and no one can say that there has been any glaring injustice done wantonly by the majority. A familiar instance put before us in this argument is the case of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. There is no doubt that the three smaller countries are swamped by the majority in England.

Mr. SYMON:
That is unification.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The hon. member has hit on the very point.

Mr. HOWE:
That is what you want here.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I am glad that this instance has affected my friend Mr. Howe. I would point out that last year the Scotch County Councils Bill was brought forward. The Scotch members were, however, swamped by the huge majority of England, and they could not have their own way in a purely Scotch matter. The distinction is this—and I hope my honorable friend will bear it in mind—that the Scotch people have not got control of their own local affairs, but in a Federation local affairs will be governed and controlled by the local Parliaments.

Mr. HOWE:
That is why the Scotch are going for Home Rule.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think they will be able to find means to get out of the difficulty, but I shall not add home politics to Australian politics just at present. The proposal is not to swamp any one of the States. Each small State will still have sole control of its own affairs. It cannot be said that if there is a movement in South Australia for county councils, or in New South Wales for local government, the proposal is in danger of being swamped by the opinion of the other colonies. It is also said that there is a great danger of the Federal Parliament encroaching gradually and steadily upon State functions unless the Federal Parliament is restrained by the people who represent the small States. That is a matter requiring the closest attention. I want to disavow from myself the fact that I represent at present a colony which is one of the more populous. It is unfortunate in that sense that I have to bring forward this motion. Supposing that the Federal Parliament should encroach in the slightest upon State functions, if it does deviate and go beyond the boundary which the Constitution sets it in this matter, the law in which they do that is void. But there is no danger of encroachment, because encroachment can be resisted by the meanest subject in any of the courts, and the courts are bound to show that it is void. I quite agree that a thing which is wrong in theory may be good in practice, and may work substantially well, and I should be the last person to carry a just theory to its extreme if I saw that it worked ill. When we look at the different federations of the world we find that in Canada they have not equal representation. The three maritime provinces, having less populations, have only the same number of members in the Senate as Ontario or Quebec, and Manitoba, British Columbia, and the great North-West territory have one or two members each. In Switzerland it is quite true that they have approached to very nearly equal representation. The reason is that they had to deal with cantons which had been historically different countries for centuries, and in Switzerland they framed the Constitution as far as they could upon the lines of the United States; but even in Switzerland there are some of the cantons or half cantons which return only one member, whilst other cantons return two. But if you take Germany, Bavaria returns six members to the States House, whereas Prussia returns seventeen, and different small States, like Mecklenburg-Strelitz, return only one. My hon. friend Mr. Barton interjected when I referred to this fact before, that Federation in Germany was owing to domination. If it was owing to domination why should Bavaria have six and Bremen have one? Bavaria certainly did not dominate. The fact is in that States House they give to the different States not equal representation, but to make a distinction from the other House they give to the different States and free cities a certain advantage on a certain sliding scale. The last and the great instance is the United States. I apprehend most members have read the debates on which equal representation was founded. It will be remembered that it was carried by a very narrow majority. They will remember that the strongest and the best men voted against it, such men as Benjamin Franklin, Madison, King, Wilson, Morris, and Alexander Hammond. The strongest and best men said, "Let us not have equal representation" Let me read from Bancroft how the thing was. They only submitted to equal representation because Delaware, Rhode Island, and some of the smaller States said this:

We have the British at our gates. They still have forts, and unless you give us equal representation we will go over to the British.

Mr. Bedford, according to Bancroft:

Defied them to dissolve the Confederation, for rain would then stare them in the face.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

How has it worked for 100 years?

Mr. TRENWITH:
Very badly.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I may also read the words of Wilson:

A citizen of America is a citizen of the general Government, and is a citizen of the particular State in which he may reside. The general Government is meant for them in the first capacity; the State Governments in the second. Both Governments are derived from the people, both meant for the people; both therefore ought to be regulated on the same principles. In forming the general Government we must forget our local habits and attachments, lay aside our State connections, and act for the general good of the whole. The general government is not an assemblage of States, but of individuals, for certain political purposes; it is not meant for the States, but for the individuals composing them; the individuals therefore, not the States, ought to be represented.

Then we pass to Mr. Madison's views:

If there was real danger to the smaller States, I would give them defensive weapons. But there is none. They start from their difference of size, but from climate, and principally from the effects of having or not having slaves. Look to the votes in Congress; most of them stand divided by the geography of the country, not by the size of the States.

Then again Mr. King says:

The difference of interests lies not between the great and small States, but between the Southern and Eastern. For this reason I have been ready to yield something in the proportion of representatives for the security of the Southern. I am not averse to yielding more, but do not see how it can be done. They are brought as near an equality as is possible; no principle will justify giving them a majority.

Although it was carried by a majority of one only, and although Madison and his comrades objected to it most strongly, and determined on the morning to divide upon the matter, they said:

No, let us yield this. Our supreme interests are Concerned; we must settle this point in order that we may not preserve the British enemy at our gates.

They simply yielded to equal representation in terror, under domination; and we are asked now, after the experience of 100 years, to yield the same thing when in no terror and under no domination.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

There is another story called the Connecticut compromise.

Mr. HIGGINS:

With all respect, I do not think that is another story. That Connecticut compromise was to give equal representation to the small and large States in the Senate, and to give representation according to population in the other House; but Madison, and King, and Franklin, and Hamilton, and Morris, and all the strong men were against that compromise. Franklin submitted to it simply because he felt that in order to prevent the breaking up of this Confederation at a most critical time when the enemy was at their gates, he had to submit. Let us see if there hits been any advantage gained by the small States under the protection of the system that has been adopted. I have read, and Mr. Glynn read yesterday certain passages from Dr. Bryce's work, which showed that this equal representation has been absolutely futile in achieving its objects. He says, in substance, that there has never been any difference of interests between the large States and small States as such.

Mr. GLYNN:
That is, they exercised with discretion their various constitutional powers. They did not push them to extremes.

Mr. HIGGINS:
What my hon. friend seems to mean is that it is in consequence of equal representation that there have been no conflicts of interest.

Mr. GORDON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is about the most amusing way of turning it that I can possibly conceive. You might as well say that because I put a brake upon my buggy there is no need to use it. The answer is that there are no steep hills. It is not that there have been no contests, but that there has been no difference of interests. How can the mere mode of adjusting differences of interests affect the principle that there have been no differences of interests?

Dr. COCKBURN:
Because the presence of certain checks has prevented attempts being made to infringe State interests.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is not a question of there having been no contests, and that the larger States have refrained from the contest because they feared the power of the smaller States, but it is that there have been no steep hills on which to use the brake.

Mr. GORDON:
We have more steep hills here in variety of interests and differences than in America. Railways, for instance.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I have tried persistently to get hon. members to give a single instance in which there was any probability of the smaller States having different interests from the larger ones. One after another has tried, and the nearest thing to it has been the locking of the Darling. It is paid New South Wales may lock the Darling, and thereby injure South Australian interests.

Mr. GORDON:

Preferential railway rates.

Dr. COCKBURN:

Tariff.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I can only deal with one thing at a time. As to the locking of the Darling, why, if the South Australians are being injuriously treated, they would be backed up, you may be sure, by the people of Victoria, as well as by the people of Western Australia, who at least would have a sense of justice—if they had no interests—and by the people of Tasmania, who until lately have been regarded as having a sense of justice. If hon. members take one instance after another of those put forward, they will find there is no probability of any difference of interests arising between the small States and the large States. May I indicate that because of the possibility in one case out of 10,000 of an injustice being attempted by the majority upon the minority—the great States upon the small—you are giving to the minor States full power in the other 9,999 cases of equal control. For the mere possibility of a difference of interest, you are giving a power—not only in that legislation which deals with differences of State interests, but in all legislation—to the minority to sway the majority. In the discussions of the Convention in 1787, Benjamin Franklin, seeing this, proposed a compromise, which unfortunately was hardly workable, and he said:

Let the small States have equal representation in those matters in which the interests of the small States come into conflict with the interests of the large States; but in all other matters let then be representation according to population.

Of course he found it practically impossible to work out the distinction. Not only has it been shown in the United States that this equal representation has been absolutely futile, and that it has not served its purpose, but if you apply it to Australia you will raise great dangers which did not exist in America. When the United States started its Confederation they had thirteen States. They had a huge territory, yet uninhabited by white men and yet unused. On the other hand, every inch of Australia is under the control of some State. We cannot get new States except by sub-division. In America they were able to get States aggregation, by addition, by the formation of new States. The natural tendency of events in Australia is towards the sub-division of some of the greater colonies. We have Central Queensland and Northern Queensland crying out for that. No doubt, eventually, we shall have a cry for separation between North Australia and South Australia. No doubt, eventually, we shall have-it is to be hoped-a sub-division of Western Australia. That is the natural tendency of the course of things.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
Will not all that alter the anomaly you complain of?
Mr. HIGGINS:
The effect is this: that although we ought to have sub-division as time progresses, though I agree that subdivision for the purposes of local government and for the purposes of State interest is expedient, I say that every proposal to sub-divide any of the huge existing colonies will be met with opposition from the States which are not to be sub-divided, inasmuch as it means, with equal representation, the addition of a larger number of senators to that State which is being sub-divided. Take Queensland, for instance. If Queensland were divided into three States-it would start in this Federation with six-that colony would be entitled to eighteen members.
Victoria, a small country in size, and Tasmania a small country in size, comparatively, will, as well as Western Australia and South Australia, say:
"Oh, Queensland, which has six members to represent her in the Senate will now have eighteen. We will stop this." The tendency of equal representation will be to induce all the other States which are not being sub-divided to oppose sub-division as far as they can. That will interfere with the natural and normal development of this country.
Mr. GLYNN:
Do you remember Texas being taken over and sub-divided?
Mr. HIGGINS:
I recollect that it was the Senate of the United States, in which all the States were equally represented, that opposed the addition of new States from the outlying territory, for fear of the slavery States being outvoted in the Senate. Equal representation has worked ill there, and it was the means of preventing the development of the great western territory for some time, and also prohibited the sub-division of that territory into States. Our proper destiny is the sub-division of these huge artificial areas, and if we give equal representation that destiny will be seriously checked. If we once commit ourselves to equal representation it is final, and we cannot get out of it. We cannot even amend the Constitution to put it right. Let me give an illustration. Supposing Tasmania were to get 20,000,000 of people, and by some accident all Australia were turned into a sheep-walk, and the Tasmanian interests would be the interests really of a great number of people in the Australian States, let us look at how clause 121 deals with that. The section states:

But an alteration, by which the proportionate representation of any State in either House of the Parliament or the minimum number of representatives of a State in the House of Representatives is diminished shall not become law without the consent of the electors of that State.

If you commit yourself to equal representation now you cannot by any amendment of the Constitution, no matter how much the people feel it is expedient, put it right again.

Mr. KINGSTON:

You can alter the Constitution in that particular; there is no difficulty in law.

Mr. HIGGINS:

With all respect, I say it cannot be done, because you must first have the consent of the electors of the State The hon. the President means that it would be possible for you first to have an alteration of the Constitution by taking out the words:

Shall not become law.

It would be bowled down as a gross breach of faith if the Parliament were first to alter the Constitution which said that each State must consent to its representation being reduced, and then say, "We want to alter the representation." Perhaps that may be possible, if you speak technically and legally. We have clause 121 stating that:

The provisions of the Constitution shall not be altered except in the following manner:—Any proposed law for the alteration thereof must be passed by an absolute majority of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and shall thereupon be submitted to the electors of the several States qualified to vote for the election of members of the House of Representatives, not lose than two nor more than three calendar months after the passage through both Houses of the proposed law.

I quite agree that the Constitution ought not to be altered except with the consent of the majority of the States. The clause goes on to say:

But an alteration by which the proportionate representation of any State in either House of The Parliament or the minimum number of representatives of a State in the House of Representatives, is diminished, shall not become law without the consent of the electors of that State.

I understand the President's view, but I confess this that, even supposing for the sake of argument that it is technically right that by two amendments of the Constitution you might achieve the object, still I say it would be howled down.

Mr. KINGSTON:

It should be prevented in the four corners of the Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think the members of the Convention, if against me upon this question of equal representation, ought, at least, to leave posterity free to make any alteration they may think fit. I do not think it is unreasonable to ask that. You may surround it by as many safeguards as you like, but if you have to get the consent of every State for a reduction of the number that there must be a distinction in some way between the two Houses. As to these two Houses, I am glad we are to have a departure from the obsolete principle of having a House to represent property Separately. There is no doubt that property is as safe in America as it is in any other country in the world. In all the States of America there is hardly a vestige left of any property qualification for voting; and my aristocratic friend, Mr. Dobson, will find that, as time goes on, it will be less and less easy to get any property qualification for any Parliament. Having regard to the fact that you must have a distinction between the two Houses, I do not see why we should not allow the less populous States a certain advantage, as in Germany, Switzerland, and Canada, in the representation in the Second Chamber. I say, of course, supposing you were to give no distinction of that sort. the ultimate tendency would be to say, the Senate elected on a broad franchise ought to have the same rights as you give to the House of Representatives, elected upon a broad franchise and population; and the ultimate result may be that they may be able morally to claim a power of control in Money Bills absolutely, and the end would be that you could not carry on responsible government; and I feel really that responsible government works better that any system I know of in the world. I am perfectly willing to leave posterity to evolve something better, but as things at present stand I would rather take the thing I have and use it

Make what is absolutely new I can't,
Mar what is made already well enough,
I won't; but turn to best account the thing
That's half made-that I can.

The proposal therefore that I have to make is to strike out all the words after "of," in the first line of clause 9, and to insert:

So many members for each State as that State shall be entitled to on the sliding scale hereinafter mentioned.

It will then read

The Senate shall be composed of so many members for each State as that State shall be entitled to on the sliding scale hereinafter mentioned.

I have not drawn up that sliding scale, because I know I shall be defeated.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Indicate it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I should propose a sliding scale something like this: For the first 100,000 people, a State should return three members; and for every extra 200,000, one member. The result would be that it would not be representation according to population, nor equal representation, but you would give a substantial concession to the smaller States. That is merely an indication, and I am not going to make any final proposal, because I will not labor final proposals, as I know I shall be beaten. I feel more strongly, having regard to this discussion, that it is important for those of us who have a clear idea in their own minds as to the fallacy of equal representation to indicate it by our views and by our votes. Inasmuch as there is no prospect of it being carried, I will simply appeal to those who see the fallacy clearly, and who know that equal representation will be carried, to give me their votes, and show to the people who object to it that their views have been sufficiently weighed, and that there has been no desire on our part to rob, as I must call it, the people of the right of governing their own affairs in Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN:
One of the many misfortunes which have followed the dislocation of this debate by the prior consideration of the part relating to the financial powers of the Senate is that the discussion which Mr. Higgins has raised in his scholarly and able speech comes at a period when it appears to me the time has passed even for its consideration. We have concluded a discussion as to the monetary powers of the two Houses, which has been based on the assumption that the remaining proposals in the Bill with regard to the Houses should not be varied in essence.

Mr. LYNE:
Nothing of the kind,

Mr. DEAKIN:
In my opinion a number of votes were cast in favor of what is termed the compromise of 1891 on that assumption, and there were grounds for that assumption, and though, as far as members are concerned, I believe they are all perfectly free to vote on the matter as they think right, I should not feel myself justified even if the hon. member's arguments had absolutely convinced me, to vote at this stage of the proceedings for his amendment. In consequence of the tacit understanding we received the gallant and generous support of several members who put aside their personal views in order to arrive at a fair compromise. We should not be dealing with them fairly and justly if we now endeavored to depart from it. I know my learned friend Mr. Higgins too well to indulge in the mere parade of asking him to withdraw his motion, which he has made deliberately. I know that any such appeal must be idle.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If any appeal could persuade me it would be yours.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I am glad to have that fresh indication of the friendly relations which have always existed between us. Nevertheless, I wish to make an appeal, and trust that the arguments of others may induce him not to press it to a division. I do not propose for the reasons I have given, even to attempt, if I were capable of doing so, to follow the hon. member through the line of argument he has pursued, which is logical as his arguments invariably are. Unless I mistake the attitude of those who differ from him and also my own attitude, the consideration that decides the question of equal representation will not be found within the line of argument the hon. member has followed. In dealing with sovereign States—each perfectly and absolutely independent of its neighbor, each endowed with the same complete authority in legislation and administration, each having the power of self-government—you cannot place before them simply the outlines of a theoretical edifice and command their acceptance of it, even supposing their judgment is with the hon. member in all the considerations he suggests. In dealing with equals, and it must be recognised that we meet as equals, that is to say, as States endowed with equal powers—not necessarily equal in area, not necessarily equal in population, and not necessarily equal in wealth, but equal in all the rights of citizenship and powers of self-government, and therefore equal in the highest sense as separate States—the question of the form of the Federal Government is not merely a question between us as to which form can be most logically deduced from certain premises which may or may not be generally accepted; it is a question between equal contracting parties, as to the terms and conditions on which they will enter the Federation. All federal issues require to be regarded from two standpoints. The practical issue is upon what terms; the theoretical is under what form. All the illustrations of the honorable member are fruitful and suggestive and invaluable in the consideration of the theoretical problems that confront us, but they offer no sufficient solution alone, because the burden lies upon us of first settling the terms. The very first step in establishing a Federation is that it shall be on lines so just that the majority of the people in each State will consent to come into it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I only want justice.

Mr. DEAKIN:

We have not only to obtain a scheme which will satisfy my hon. friend's sense of justice, but one that will satisfy the sense of justice of the neighboring States with whom he is in treaty. He cannot federate by himself, and he must therefore appeal to and satisfy those who exercise a perfectly free, unbiased, and independent judgment in determining whether they will agree to join him. As he tells us, we are not under the domination of the less populous States. Neither are the less populous States under the domination of the more populous. They have the same freedom, and the first question for them is whether the Federation you suggest is one which will command the consent of the majority of the people of their colony. That is the proposition we submitted to them on the question of Money Bills. It was a statement of a fact rather than an argument to which a number of them most generously gave consideration. When they turn the same argument on ourselves and say, "It would be idle for us to ask the people of our colony to accept a scheme in which there is not equal representation in the Senate. For the purposes of this Federation, we are uniting for national ends, but in uniting we sacrifice many advantages, sacrifice our State powers within certain limits, and also part of our self-government in order to receive back in the Federal State only that proportion of their control which our population bears to the population of the whole body." It is not a case in which my aristocratic friend Mr. Dobson would say:

You give everything and take back all.

They are surely entitled to tell us their people would not consent to such a proposal. If we are faced by that fact, we are compelled to consider it at the very outset -before we go on to consider how we can beat shape a federal government. When we are debating the after question of shaping a federal government, then all the arguments of the hon. gentleman will be of value subject to the preliminary terms. This question of equal representation is not open to a merely political or theoretical treatment; it is a question of contract between the free and equal contracting parties. When we come to the scheme of Federation, and its provision for giving effect to the will of a majority of the people or of the States, there are many principles and illustrations and facts and methods which will require to be kept in view. But even those considerations are subordinated to another, and that is: What are the political circumstances, the political knowledge, and the political tendencies of these colonies? Having those in view, what we require is not a theoretically ideal or legally symmetrical Constitution for the people, but one which shall represent their aspirations, give the fullest play to their powers, and allow for their ingrained prepossessions born of long-inherited political experience. Having arranged in a general way a fair basis of union, we must proceed to make not a mechanically ideal Constitution, but a workable Constitution, appropriate to our people and our time. No doubt it must comply with those general considerations which the hon. gentleman has laid down. It must be a democratic Constitution having a proper system of checks and balances, so as to elicit the deliberate will of the people. It must have, in fine, the general characteristics of the governments which we now enjoy. Every federal theory must be subordinate in the first place to the terms of a fair and equal contract, and in the second place to the consideration of what, having regard to the circumstances of our people, will be the most workable Constitution that can be devised. I did not purpose when I rose to detain the Convention at such length, but it seemed perhaps desirable that a Victorian Should follow a Victorian in this matter, to indicate that the hon. gentleman is exercising the equal privileges he enjoys of expressing his individual ideas, and that at the same time some of the rest of us who would prefer that this question had not been raised at this stage are exercising our equal privileges in expressing the hope that he may yet see him way to withdraw an amendment which, at all events, as regards some of the members of this Convention, is extending to them a less generous consideration than they yesterday extended to us.

Mr. LYNE:
I would like to say-

HON. MEMBERS:
Question!

HON. MEMBERS:
No.

Mr. HOWE:
I thought you wanted to go home.

Mr. TRENWITH:
We want to do good work, at any rate.

Mr. LYNE:
I am surprised to hear the speech to which we have just listened. If I remember rightly, the hon. member, Mr. Deakin, made a speech some years ago exactly opposite in effect to that which he has delivered now.

Mr. DEAKIN:

No; I never spoke against equal representation in my life. have indicated its difficulties.

Mr. LYNE:

As far as my memory serves, the speech he delivered on that occasion was one of the best opposed to it that I ever listened to, and before I sit down I wil---

Hon. MEMBERS:

No, no!

Mr. LYNE:

— At any rate, that contract is not going to bind me.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Nor me.

Mr. LYNE:

I had nothing to do with such a contract. I was opposed to the minority; I was opposed to the clause as it was passed afterwards, and I was much surprised that there was not a division over the fifth sub-section of that money clause yesterday. Now, the hon. gentleman proposes to place Victoria with the other larger States in this position that, no matter what laws they may pass, no matter what money proposals they may make, no matter what time they may take up in discussing them, those proposals may go to the Senate, and they may be absolutely stopped and destroyed, and destroyed too by the smaller States. That is what it is proposed to do

Mr. DEAKIN:

Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE:

Thus the whole work of the larger States, the representatives of the majority of the people, may be absolutely destroyed. I am not prepared to do that.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Would it not be exactly the converse?

Mr. LYNE:

No; it would not. If there was a provision in the Bill providing a safety-valve by which the Senate could not absolutely stop the will of the people, then I would be prepared to consider this; but we have a Bill submitted to us at present, and I presume it will be carried in that respect, in which there is no proposal for the Senate and the House of Representatives to come together in any way.

Mr. DEAKIN:
There is an amendment submitted.

Mr. LYNE:

If the hon. member is going to vote away his rights, as he has said, we know what the amendment he refers to is worth. There is no power to bring the two Houses together to deal with a crisis of this kind, or with any other crisis that may arise. There is no referendum and there is no method such as the Swiss Constitution gives, yet we are asked to give equal representation in the Senate, so that three small colonies representing three-quarters of a million of people can absolutely dominate nearly three millions of people. Mr. Higgins has ably put this question, and shown in comparison that a man in South Australia would have four times the voting power of a man in New South Wales.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

That has been repeated again and again.

Mr. LYNE:

And it is worth repeating again. I feel almost as strongly on this question as on any part of the Bill. I do not care how far certain representatives from New South Wales are prepared to give the rights of the State away, for I undertake to say that if they do, they will never carry the Bill in New South Wales, not with my support. I will consent to nothing that provides that legislation passed by the Lower House can be upset by the representatives of a minority of the people in the Senate. It absolutely drags down responsible government, and I am surprised that any representatives from Victoria or New South Wales can say they are in favor of such a proposal.

Mr. FRASER:

Then they will not come into Federation at all.

Mr. LYNE:

I am not prepared to give away all the rights. We are asked in this Bill to give away rights of government which will stagger the people of the larger colonies when they hear of it. We are asked to give away their rights to deal with the whole of the rivers and the railways which should be used for the States' development, and we are now proposing to put smaller States in a position, without asking the will of the larger colonies, to throw out legislation and override the Government on these questions. While I am prepared to federate on reasonable terms, I am not prepared to federate on unreasonable terms, or to ask or solicit the people of New South Wales to give up their reasonable rights. At the present time we have the power to deal with all the immense questions affecting our valuable territory. And so they have in Victoria, and in South Australia, and Tasmania and Western Australia; but you are asking us to give away these rights of dealing with the development of the country to a minority of the people. Some hon. member has suggested unification. I say: far better go for unification than for a Federation which is going to tie our bands behind our backs for all time to come. For this thing is not for to-day or to-morrow, but for all time; for if you insert this provision, together with clause 121, you will never get it altered. You will be placed in the same position regarding your Senate as the United States is now placed in, contrary to what was intended originally. It was never intended that that Senate should take the position of a Second Chamber. At the time it, was constituted it was intended that it should be an advisory chamber to the Government of the day and the President. Now it has grown into the position that it can do as it did the other day, when against the will of the people it threw the arbitration treaty proposed by the British Government into the waste-paper basket. Do you want something of that kind to take place in United Australia in the future? If you are prepared to give us anything fair and just, you must guard against one of two things in the Senate. You must either take away its absolute dominating power, or else you must not give equal representation.

Mr. MOORE:
Take it away altogether.

Mr. LYNE:
It would not be a bad thing.

Mr. MOORE:
For you.

Mr. LYNE:
I am not prepared to allow Tasmania, with 150,000 or 160,000 inhabitants, to govern New South Wales with its 1,400,000. And on that point I might ask Mr. Douglas, who twitted me the other day with being a renegade, where are his renegades now? He has got a few renegades whom he has brought over with him.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That is most unfair, most ungenerous.

The CHAIRMAN:
Order. Will the hon. member take his seat. I do not think the hon. member is in order in referring to any member of this Convention as a renegade.

Mr. LYNE:
I do not wish to dispute your ruling; but I will draw your attention to the fact that when the hon. member called me a renegade, you did not call his attention to it.
The CHAIRMAN:
I did not catch any such expression.

Mr. REID:
It was in the Convention, not in Committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I should not have made mention of it unless Mr. Lyne had interjected, and he only got his deserts.

Mr. LYNE:
I do not wish in any way to use any hard phrases in reference to any delegates, but the hon. member, Mr. Douglas, has been rather twitting me in various ways ever since I have been here on this occasion, and I like to have a little pleasant repartee with him.

Mr. DEAKIN:
But you turn round and slate Somebody else.

Mr. LYNE:
When I was speaking on this question in the Convention, before we went into Committee, I said if we were going to give the States equal representation in the Senate the minority of the people in the Senate must not be given the power to intercept the will of the majority. Mr. Deakin, according to his speech, is now proposing to give them that absolute power. Then I say: no Federation for me if they are going to have that absolute power. It is quite enough to prevent any Federation if you are going to give up your rights as they exist at the present time to a minority of the people. The majority of people, I have always believed, should have the greatest say in connection with a matter of this kind. What is the use of having in the House of Representatives a majority of ten times or a hundred times, if a minority of people through the Senate can knock in the head everything they do? As far as I am personally concerned, I shall vote in favor of the hon. member's amendment, and I am prepared to stand by that vote in the colony I represent. I am prepared to meet any of those gentlemen who oppose it anywhere in that colony, and to stand by the verdict of the people on it. I should like to see, if it were possible, the State of Tasmania come in, also the State of West Australia, and likewise South Australia. Does Mr. Deakin say that when a man is making a bargain he makes an equal compact? Supposing Mr. Deakin had £50,000, would he enter into a compact on equal terms with a man with only £10,000? Does he not expect greater rights?

Mr. SYMON:
No.

Mr. LYNE:
The hon. member would not advise a client to enter into a bargain under such circumstances. That is just the position we are in at the present time. The hon. member Mr. Deakin wants New South Wales and Victoria to enter into an arrangement when they have their £50,000 with other colonies that have their £5,000 or £10,000. I do not wish to delay the debate, but I could not let it pass without entering my protest against such a proposal as that made at the present time—a proposal which cannot, and I presume will not, be accepted by the larger States, unless there is some loophole by which when the Senate attempts to prevent the will of the people from being carried out, they should not be allowed to carry out their design ultimately. I hear it said that we are going to accept the arrangement in the Bill of 1891—

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Evil be to him who evil thinks.

Mr. LYNE:
Well, that has been said.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Well, it is not true.

Mr. LYNE:
Then the hon. member is casting an aspersion on some here.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
No, I am not, but you are.

Mr. LYNE:
The hon. member is making a statement that is not in accordance with fact, because three or four hon. members have said it was an agreement to come to the arrangement of 1891, and not to go behind it.

Mr. TRENWITH:
An agreement with whom?

Mr. LYNE:
That is what I want to know.

Mr. FRASER:
Nothing of the kind.

Mr. LYNE:
It was understood, as Mr. Deakin said a few minutes ago, and the vote yesterday was obtained on the understanding that this equal representation should be granted.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Mr. Deakin did not say that.

Mr. LYNE:
If other hon. members made that compact to obtain the votes they did yesterday, I am not prepared to agree to it. I shall vote against and oppose any equal representation until such time as we have a provision in the law by which the Senate shall not for any length of time be able to stop the will of the people.

This matter is one of vital interest, not only to the representatives of the smaller States, but to all hon. members who represent the States of Australasia. Yesterday, by a narrow majority, a vote was passed depriving the Senate of some of its powers, which we would otherwise see it enjoy, thus inflicting a wound on Federation which may be healed or may be mortal, as time will show. It is now proposed to do that which will strike a deathblow at Federation, and there will be no Federation if this proposal is carried, for the smaller States will be entirely severed from the movement if it is agreed to. If a majority of the Convention were of the mind to see an injustice done, if they desire to see the compact honestly entered into violated in this way, we should have to do what has been done before—to pack up our carpet bags and leave. I trust to the good sense of a majority of the Convention to say that the compromise of 1891 shall be justly carried out.

Dr. QUICK:

At the Bathurst Federal Convention, which was held last year, I had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Lyne deliver an admirable speech in favor of Federation, and on that occasion he promised to do nothing which would obstruct, injure, or impede the progress of Federation. Not only did Mr. Lyne say he would do his best to promote it, but he would abstain from taking any action which would prejudice its advancement. The hon. member was also present during the sitting of the Bathurst Convention, at which the principle of equal representation of the States in the Senate was almost unanimously affirmed.

Mr. LYNE:

And I opposed it.

Dr. QUICK:

I did not hear the hon. member say anything publicly to that effect. If he did feel that way I am surprised he did not give expression to his views.

Mr. LYNE:

So I did.

Dr. QUICK:

I doubt the sincerity of any gentleman who comes here and says that he is in favor of Federation and then tries to impose impossible conditions. It is all very well to say you are in favor of Federation, but any man who acts like that cannot be in earnest; it is a mere pretence. For my part, though recognising this to be one of the most difficult questions in connection with the federal movement, I, at the outset of my candidature, boldly and candidly placed at the head of my address to the people of Victoria the fact that I was in favor of the equal representation of the States in the Senate, because I saw clearly that until that was recognised we could not hope to carry Federation. It is a farce to hold this Convention, and to invite the minor States to join in such a union, unless we are prepared to concede this principle. There may be a reasonable difference of opinion on a large number of the details of the federal scheme, but there can be no conciliation and no chance of success unless we recognise equal representation in the Senate; and unless that is conceded we might as well close the sittings of this Convention as go on. I am prepared to recognise the honesty and sincerity of the views put forward by my hon. friend Mr. Higgins, but it requires a great strain to accept his assurance that he has brought his proposal in the interests of Federation. I ask him candidly to say, has he one solitary hope of success in framing a Federal Constitution if he carried his amendment? Would not all of the minor States immediately withdraw from the Convention if he succeeded in carrying that? Undoubtedly they would, and they would be quite justified in so doing. It is quite true the hon. member has given a learned, scholarly, and eloquent theoretical address today, but I think we have got beyond the stage of theoretical discussion of this subject. I am not here to discuss theories, but to discuss the terms of a political compact; and in arriving at a political compact we have to consider the views of our opponents. We have to consider the interests and views of the other States. If we were here as an assembly of philosophers we might enter into abstract discussions, but this is not a convention of philosophers. It is a convention of practical politicians, whose duty is to try and reconcile and harmonise the conflicting views of the various States. And I consider the principle, as affirmed in the Connecticut compromise over 100 years ago, and time after time since, of the equality of the representation of the States in the Senate can be justified, when the States are in the compact, on the ground that they are sovereign entities, and that as equal contracting parties they surrender to this federal union a certain quota of their sovereign powers. Mr. Higgins need not have spent half the morning in endeavoring to formulate a theoretical principle which has been discussed till it is threadbare. We have not come-some of us hundreds of miles-to discuss theories, but to do practical business. We cannot have our own way according to our own fanciful and philosophical ideas. Mr. Higgins has aired his eloquence and his own philosophical, fanciful ideas for upwards of an hour, but it only injures the cause of Federation in this Convention and in the country, and it is absolutely wasting time to do so. For my part I was elected by the people of Victoria on the full assurance that I would vote straight in favor of equal representation of the States in the Senate, and I intend to do so.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

The hon. member who has just resumed his seat is, perhaps, like myself, unfortunate in speaking too earnestly at times. He has earnestly rebuked Mr. Lyne and myself, and says, because we choose to support this proposal we are inimical to Federation. We are all inclined to be charitable towards one another, and I hope members will take a charitable view of the affair in regard to Mr. Lyne and myself. We are not opposed to Federation, but are exercising our undoubted right to vote according to our own judgment and conscience. Mr. Lyne, in New South Wales, advocated exactly these views which he has advocated on the floor of this chamber to-day, and he was elected with the knowledge possessed by the people that he held these views. My position is this, that in the chief debate of the Convention I intimated that, although illogical, I could not approve of equal representation, but was prepared to concede it as the only basis upon which we could have Federation. But I then said, that was provided, the constitution was so framed that the ultimate will of the people in case of a conflict should prevail. That is exactly the position I take up to-day. I do not wish to jeopardise Federation by opposing equal representation; but I would sooner wreck Federation than thwart the will of the people, who should rule in their own way. I believe that a Federation of a character that imposes on the majority of the people the rule of the minority, will be a curse and not a blessing; and I think we can well afford if we have to wait until we have a Federation which is in accord with the will of the majority. I say that it is nothing more or less than provincialism under the cover of another name, which seeks to impose on the majority doctrines, principles, and legislations which they hate. If this Convention shows a disposition to allow a safety-valve to exist in our Constitution which will give free play to the opinion of the majority, I will not dispute on this important matter, but if members will sit on the safety-valve, then I am not going to help them in any shape or form. If the intention of this Convention is to adopt a deadlock provision such as Mr. O'Connor, and almost every member from New South Wales, supported, then I am with them.

Mr. LYNE:

Every one of them supported it.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

Why have members gone back on that proposal? If the proposal is carried we will have the Norwegian system or the referendum, and I will keep silence and vote for equal representation, but if the majority are placed under the heels of the minority you jeopardise Federation as far as New South Wales is concerned. It is done in the cause of provincialism, although you call it by a new name-States rights. The liberty and lives of the 3,000,000 people in New South Wales and Victoria are placed in the hands of the 750,000 people of the smaller States, and that is handing over the question of peace and war, because we have to look to the time when we are independent, and that means placing the liberty, the lives, the homes, and the freedom of the majority of the people of Australia in the hands of the minority. Mr. Deakin spoke about breaking a compact entered into, but he cannot accuse me of it, because I was clear in my language.

Mr. DEAKIN:
There was no actual compact. I said it was generally understood.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
The Premier of Tasmania, Sir Edward Braddon, says there has been a breach of faith in this matter, having regard to the decision arrived at yesterday. I said yesterday that the victory would be one which would be dearly bought-a victory worse than defeat. My views were clearly expressed, and I have been consistent. My aim at this Convention is to have some ultimate provision by which Federation will be based on the will of the people, that in cases of deadlocks the people shall be the final court of appeal. Why should I be so anxious about the people of New South Wales in this particular matter? I am not here for the purpose of having a major regard for the people of the other States who are already well represented, and I do not look after their interests. This is the only chance for us, as the agents of the people, to voice their interests and make claims on their behalf. What makes me more anxious than ever is that I have seen an instance of how a majority from the smaller States can barter away the rights and interests of the larger States. I have seen how a majority of the smaller States were prepared to barter away the rights of the people in New South Wales to the water in their rivers, without which two-thirds of our colony would be almost rendered a desert. As Minister of Lands in that colony, I know, in regard to that question, that the handing over to a Senate composed-

Mr. BARTON:
There is nothing final about it.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
It may be there is nothing final in the whole Bill. There may be amendments that may cause me to modify my opinions on this point. I want to make that clear. My vote, I know, will be in the minority; but if a majority support the amendments I will recall that vote— if we eliminate certain matters and if we also provide this safety-valve. I was mentioning that, having regard to the custody of the public lands here, we have a Bill to hand over the waters, without which these lands are worthless, and I am not prepared to give my vote in support of it. I am not prepared to hand over the control of our waters to a minority of the people who will have a majority of votes in the Senate; people who have no concern with our waters; I understand the Convention deals with national subjects, and if we limit it to that, I will not fear this interference; but, in dealing with such questions as parental control and the custody of children, you are dealing with great national rights—the rights of human beings. Can there be any question, any more vital question, than parental control and the guardianship of children? These are handed over by this proposal, and you are going to make it a question of the States concerned, irrespective of people, to be the ruling power in this matter. Mistakes have been made, and we must retrace our steps and not attempt such a wide scheme on these matters, which can be well regulated by the people. My hon. friend showed clearly that a true Federation Will leave local concerns to be governed by the local Parliaments. That being so, there is no need for having this question in the Federal Parliament. My vote will be in direct antagonism to the views I formerly expressed, taken at the first blush, but it is consistent with what I then said, that I would seek to have imprinted on this Constitution the right of the people to rule as the chief factor of the Federation, and the people most affected by it.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

I rise to say a few words, although I have a very bad cold, and fear I will have difficulty in making myself heard. I think there are some features in this discussion which have not been sufficiently considered. I admit that there was in the preliminary work of the Convention, and even at the elections some general consensus of opinion that in the Senate there would be equal representation with the House of Representatives, but there were no clearly defined views as to what the powers of the Senate then would be. It was thought it would be on the model of our Legislative Council, that it would be a check on hasty legislation, and have the right of rejecting financial measures; but in the wisdom of this Convention larger powers have been given to the Senate than it was thought to endow it with when the election took place. We have given them the right to initiate Money Bills. We have swept away all the safeguards created by the British Constitution where there were precedents to be referred to as to the corresponding rights of the two Chambers. We have, as it were, taken a leap in the dark, and we have endowed a second Chamber with large financial powers which, in certain cases, will override the powers of the House of Representatives. We have in their Constitution given them the whole State for a single electorate on manhood suffrage. That will be an immense power if used aright, but, in connection with the other conditions that we have imposed upon them, it may be a great danger. We have not provided that the Senate can be dissolved. It is a Chamber which will have continuity of existence.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

Whereas the House of Representatives can be dissolved. The House of Representatives will be returned by districts, and that in the controversies between the two Houses will throw a large amount of advantage in the hands of the members of the Senate. Every member of the Senate can say,
"I represent the whole State; each of your members only represents a section. The lot of you altogether only represent a State, whereas each of us represents our State as a whole, and consequently our claim to represent the people is greater than yours." Is that, I ask, a position in which the House of Representatives should be placed?

Mr. LYNE:

No.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

Does it not to a large extent and in certain circumstances altogether take away the predominance which I think all admit theoretically should vest in the House of Representatives? I submit that it does. In addition to the power of rejecting Money Bills we have given over financial powers to the Senate which will place them in a position to almost override the House of Representatives.

Mr. LYNE:

Hear, hear.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

I dwell upon the near approach to co-ordinate power on the part of the Senate, and in some respects to excess of powers over the House of Representatives, in justification of the proposition that representation in the Senate comes up afresh. It is totally different to granting equal representation to a body that would only represent for a time a check upon hasty legislation of the more popular House. That is one thing. It is another thing to grant equal representation in a Chamber which in many cases-and not infrequently-as the last resort, can altogether dominate the decision of the people's House, and it is because we have granted such large financial powers—powers that will lead us we do not know where-
Mr. LYNE:
    Hear, hear.
Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
    That takes us altogether out of the British Constitution and away from the procedure of responsible government.
Mr. LYNE:
    Hear, hear.
Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
    And we do it on the plea that we are conserving State rights. In how many instances would the Senate have to defend State rights? Would it not from its position, from the continuity of its existence, be the conservative House, notwithstanding that it is elected under manhood suffrage. Would it not be the nucleus for all tactics and all endeavors to subvert the national representative government in the House of Representatives?
Mr. LYNE:
    Hear, hear.
Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
    If that is so, and if hon. members cannot deny that, they have made a powerful Senate, one that can in many ways dominate the House of Representatives. Then how can they justify those who are representatives of the larger colonies conceding the right of the rule of the minority over the rule of the majority of the people of Australia?
Mr. LYNE:
    Hear, hear.
Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
    I do not think we have altogether seen what we are doing and where we are drifting. This Senate is a power, and may become a power that will override altogether the rights of the people as represented in the House of Representatives. It is quite true that the House of Representatives will nominally control the Executive, which will owe its life to the will of the majority of the people's representatives, but how frequently do we know Governments and majorities that have been obliged to resist the action of the Second Chamber and are then faced with the difficulties of a deadlock and the inconvenience of a penal dissolution? If that dissolution is difficult and dangerous and little resorted to in a single State, bow much larger is the risk, how much greater the danger, how much more the difficulty, when the whole of Australia will be appealed to in a general election, which, after all, will settle nothing. Gentlemen in the Senate can sit there and smile at you while you are going as the House of Representatives, to the country. Then, again, they may again reject a measure which the country by the majority of its representatives has endorsed because they are safe for three years longer, by which time they believe the whole matter will be forgotten through other issues having arisen. They will become, by continuity of existence, really the governing power of Australia. It is unfortunate that so great a question should be hampered by what is considered to be a compact.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I used no such word.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
That was the inference to be drawn from your remarks.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I say there is an honorable obligation on our part to recognise the sacrifice these gentlemen made yesterday.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
I recognise no sacrifice.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I do.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
I deeply regret if it was to be such an overruling issue that we decided yesterday, as we did. After all, the power of making amendments or suggestions in this Parliament is not in itself important. The Senate by suggestions could indicate its will. It could do no more by an amendment. The House of Representatives could decline to accept the suggestion as it might reject an amendment of the Senate, and it was only as to which house shall be responsible for the rejection of a measure that that discussion was of any vitality. If the issue is to have such far reaching consequences as Mr. Deakin and Mr. Quick seem to indicate, it was a very unfortunate discussion for us, because if we take the full meaning of their language it ties our hands on this and other important principles which we should fully discuss—which change their meaning, their importance, and their bearing on the constitutional questions from day to day—as we deal with other questions. I think also it has been now proved by the result that it was unfortunate that our mode of procedure was by secret committees, because hon. members feel that when majorities have been ascertained and views expressed by colonies, and the result known, it largely kills debate and prevents that fair expression of opinion and that fair result which would have come had we had these discussions open to the public in open practical debate before there was any foregone conclusion as to what views would be taken. Members would have been freer to have expressed their opinions; we should have had divisions recorded which would at least have instructed the people of Australia as to the views held, the reasons for those views, and those who held with one side or the other. But I only rose for the one purpose of saying how largely the question had been altered by the way in which we had dealt with the financial powers of the Senate. And if we were able and willing to have conceded equal representation to a Senate that could only check for a time financial legislation, we might have freely said we would continue by that understanding; yet, when the powers are so much enlarged, so different from those we are acquainted with as the powers of a Second Chamber, and depart so largely from the precedents established by the British Constitution, to which we could refer for any difference between the two Houses in a matter of procedure, then it becomes a vital question as to the representation in that body.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Hear, hear.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
We have conferred large powers which ought to be shared, not equally by representation of colony and colony, but equally by representation by population.

Mr. LYNE:
Hear, hear.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
There should be a larger representation of the people in the Senate now endued with these large financial powers than there need have been in the Senate as proposed to be constituted at first. I thank hon. members for the kind attention with which they have listened to me.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is not very often that I find myself compelled to vote differently from my hon. friends Sir Graham Berry and Mr. Higgins. Our views on most political subjects are alike, and on this, as I have endeavored on more than one occasion to indicate and emphasise as strongly as I could, my reason goes absolutely with the doctrine they have endeavored to lay down—that the idea of equal representation of States in a Federation is neither necessary nor logical.

Mr. LYNE:
Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS:
It, in that respect, resembles, in my judgment, the question that we were debating yesterday so closely, namely, the co-ordinate powers of the Senate with regard to Money Bills. In neither instance, in my opinion, is there a logical foundation for the contention, but there is this difference between the two, that in one case there is neither a logical nor a political justification, while in the other—the question we are now considering—although there is no logical justification, there is an intensely strong and, in my opinion, overpowering political justification.

Dr. QUICK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS:

I cannot say of this question, as I said of the other, and as some of my hon. colleagues have said, that it is vital. With certain reservations, and under certain conditions that we hope to embody in the Bill, it is in my judgment not vital to the people of Victoria, and I should be doing wrong if I endeavored to express my opinion in another direction or failed to express it in this. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe to insist upon excising the doctrine of equal representation of States in the Senate would be tantamount to abandoning the question of Federation altogether. I have no shadow of doubt in my mind that not a single one of the less populous colonies would come into the matter at all. Then I have to ask myself "Will Victoria or New South Wales stand out if we have equal representation?" In my opinion, the presence of it will not of itself afford any complete reason for their standing out. I quite give in my adhesion to the observations which have been made that the principle of equal representation must not be accompanied by such excessive powers as will allow the smaller States to dominate the larger ones, I believe if it were accompanied with such dominating powers that Federation would become impossible because I conceive, as was said at a somewhat similar Convention a century ago, "We are not called upon to commit suicide in the vain endeavor to live happily ever afterwards." Now, if we concede this question of equal representation to the States, as I think we are bound to concede it if we are to have Federation at all, then on the other hand we must take care that the will of the majority of the people on national questions—which is in effect the very hypothesis on which we federate—the will of the whole of the Federation collectively and proportionately, shall be done. I certainly strongly hold to the view that there should be some power of ascertaining in a definite and decisive way the will of the people if the two branches of the Legislature differ.

Mr. LYNE:

It you do that I shall vote for equal representation.
Mr. ISAACS:

The hon. member should do as I intend to do—vote now for equal representation, and endeavor to carry out the other point afterwards. I or my hon. friend Sir George Turner will endeavor to have embodied in this Constitution some provision against deadlocks. We shall endeavor to have embodied in it, on a basis which will be fair to the small States, some means—preferably by the referendum—of ascertaining definitely and decisively the will of the majority of the people. If that is done I see no reason whatever to fear this matter. But whether we fear

Mr. TRENWITH:

I wish to say a few words on this question, and some hon. gentleman interjects, "Whenever are we going to get home?" That is a comparatively unimportant question. The important question is, "When are we going to provide a Constitution that will be effective for the purposes of these colonies?" The other question is altogether unimportant. The question that has been raised by my hon. friend Mr. Higgins is extremely important, and one the discussion of which at this stage involves one in serious perplexities. It has been urged that without equal representation in the Senate Federation is impossible. My hon. friend Dr. Quick has argued that with considerable heat, but I venture to say that is altogether a false assumption for which there is no warrant either in history or by the circumstances by which we are surrounded. The warrant only exists in the imagination of gentlemen who say that the smaller States will not come in unless they receive equal representation. I have no doubt that the smaller States will try all they can to make the very best bargain for their people, but if it is a fact that there are any States that will not come in until they get some advantage over other States that justifies the assertion that they are not yet ripe for Federation.

Mr. LYNE:

Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH:

If they are ripe for Federation, and if it is desirable and necessary, the States will come in upon conditions which are equitable and just to all; and clearly—the provision to give representation in proportion to the interests involved is an equitable and just one. When my hon. friend Mr. Higgins was speaking of a partnership, I think Mr. Barton interjected:

Equal contracting parties would require equal representation.

I will submit a possible case. There are two companies desirous of associating for common purposes—one having 1,000 shareholders and £1,000 capital, the other having 100 shareholders with £100 capital. Does
Mr. Barton believes that these two associations would come together having a joint board of directors equally representing both associations? All our experience gives the lie to that supposition.

Mr. Howe:
The case is just the reverse of what you say.

Mr. Trenwith:
It is not, but my hon. friend may have some knowledge to the contrary.

Mr. Deakin:
It all depends upon how you work it.

Mr. Trenwith:
There are some who, like myself, would be prepared to advocate Federation with equal representation of the States in the Senate if certain other conditions are provided.

Mr. Lyne:
So would a good many of us.

Mr. Trenwith:
I have been a federationist ever since I have taken any part in public life. I am an Australian native, and I have a patriotic desire to see the nation with which I am associated assume a position of importance amongst the nations of the world. At the same time I have felt that there is a grave danger in making States as States equal, unless the power that the States House has to exercise is to be restricted. But what it ought to be, and what it can only be, can only be decided if the claim on behalf of equal representation is a fair thing. Then, if that be so, the only justification for equal representation is that it may become an effective shield. I was endeavoring before the adjournment for luncheon to show that in connection with the institutions of which we have knowledge unequal institutions do not associate on equal terms, and I instanced two imaginary Companies. We have also in the experience of these colonies very large, numerically strong, and popular institutions known as friendly societies throughout the whole of Australia that have a sort of federal government. They have for the purpose of their local government within the lodge a considerable amount of autonomy, but they have for the purposes of their corporate government a sort of federal parliament called by some annual movable committees, by others boards of directories, for the purposes of the whole society, and they furnish a sort of illustration of the kind of representation that Mr. Higgins suggested might with propriety and equity be conceded, in connection with this Federal Government. They provide that every lodge in the central parliament shall have representation without regard to its numbers, but having gone beyond that initial primary representation they proceed then upon the proportionate lines.
Mr. PEACOCK:

Not in all cases.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Very nearly so; in all that I have knowledge of. These are in their own way model federations, and we find in connection with this system that it works without injustice to any. However. I do not purpose covering or attempting to cover all the ground, or even much of it, that might properly be covered in this connection, because I recognise the futility of this discussion so far as the Convention is concerned. Still, I think we owe a debt of gratitude to Mr. Higgins for bringing up the question. It is a question that is now, and has been ever since Federation was first talked of, exercising the minds of the people who are to be the parties to it. When this matter is settled here to-day, if pressed to a division, because my views are in accord with those of Mr. Higgins, because I have expressed those views outside, and in this Convention when I spoke on the main question I expressed similar views, and suggested something like the proposal my hon. friend has submitted, I shall be compelled to vote for the resolution; but if the opposite is carried, that the States shall be equally represented, I shall cheerfully fall in, and feel it to be my duty to urge upon the people with whom I am associated in the colony I am connected with, the acceptance of the Constitution with that equal representation, providing there are sufficient safeguards against the injury that may possibly come from equal representation. There is a very grave danger, if the powers of the States House are not carefully guarded, that more than the States ask for may be achieved. While they ask for protection, and only get protection from undue domination by the larger States, I am prepared to fall in, and would advise those associated with me to fall in, with such a proposal. I submit that they must give serious consideration at a later stage to the question of providing some safety-valve - some means by which, if a conflict should arise between the interests of the vast majority and those of the minority, after reasonable delay has taken place, after the fullest ventilation has been given to the subject in dispute and after every opportunity has been presented to the people of appreciating the dangers on each side-the will of the largest number of people may be ultimately given legislative effect to. If that is done I shall cheerfully fall in with the illogical and unnecessary provision, if it will expedite the adoption of Federation by these colonies, which is so important, so desirable and so necessary that I shall be prepared-and I think the people should be prepared-to give way upon some matters which are not of great importance, for the sake of the great advantage which will be gained by Federation. I hope that members, if they have a majority, will not exercise it without regard to the strong and earnest objections which a number of people have to the proposal which places in the hands of the minority the power to overrule the clearly expressed wishes of the majority.

Mr. GLYNN:

Before the hon. member replies—as I know whatever he states to this Convention is the result of considerable thought, and he invariably supports the exposition of his thoughts by keen argument—I should like to call his attention to one or two points in his speech which I consider exhibit the weaknesses of his position. I quite agree with Mr. Higgins that, to a very large extent, Federation is consolidation; that is, that to the extent of the delegated powers there is in effect consolidation. There is direct power of executive and legislative control over the citizens, and I think also, if the matter of equal representation in the Second Chamber was to be sustained on a logical basis, it would be rather hard on the smaller States to justify it in the principle; but I would ask the hon. member to, consider the matter from this point of view: Is it not a fact that consolidation is a principle of government which is only applicable to certain limited areas, that you cannot push consolidation beyond a certain reasonable geographical and population limit; and is it not, on the other hand, a fact also that the system of small governments or communities has its evils? I think in the early times, as Mr. Freeman says, the great strength lay in centralisation in the smaller States, and Mr. Higgins will remember that where the towns were bound together, as in the case of old Greece, which was a quasifederation, equal representation was nearly always a condition precedent to their union. It was the principle out of which the modern system of Federation has sprung, because if you go back 100 years you will not find a Federation. The only true type which we have as yet seen is the Federation of the United States of America; and that is one which, of course, is based upon a principle the direct opposite of which he advocates by his amendment. The idea of most scientific historians is that strength in the future lies in large States. That is the principle of Mr. Seeley in his work "The Expansion of England." You cannot have, larger States on the consolidation principle, and you cannot amalgamate on the unitarian principle, and if you have a compound system it is not defensible in logic; but you cannot apply logic to political matters. One of the greatest statesmen said we must not be deceived by the delusive plausibilities of moral or scientific politicians. It is the necessary result of compromise between two scientific systems of government, having, as Freeman says, its advantages and disadvantages; capable of being despised as a compromise, or extolled as a golden mean. I look on the Second House having a function different even from representing the States as units. Mr. Higgins has looked upon it from the point of view of States rights. I agree with him that if you look into that question there are very few issues on which disputes may take place on the question of States and States. A large consolidation is not workable, because there will be a subordination of certain local opinions to the will of the minority. Mr. Higgins mentioned the case of England and Ireland. I ask that, considering the consolidation principle is working out there to the alleged subordination of local interests, have we not another purpose subserved by federation with a second House, the principle of election upon an equality of the States? Have we not the power of the majority to oversway the opinions of the minority in the Lower Chamber checked by equal representation in the other House? But if that check were not in existence to influence opinion in the Lower House, matters of local politics, that residuum of such, which would be in the Federation, and which under the consolidation through the Lower House would be dealt with by the majority, would be beyond the control of the minority representing the smaller States in the popular House. The States House is thus an effective though an illogical addition. Now, my learned friend has referred to the debates which took place in the Convention of 1787. I think it was after the Convention had framed it that the Constitution was particularly unpopular. One writer—I think it was Adams—stated that the union was wrung from the grinding necessities of a reluctant people. They started a series of papers advocating the adoption of the Act of Union. Hamilton, one of the authors referred to by Mr. Higgins in one of his arguments in the Federalist, justifies it as a compromise. He justifies equal representation in the Upper House. I am putting it from the point of view of a compromise, because my learned friend says there is no logic for it. In the Seventy-second article of the Federalist, the authorship of which is assigned to Hamilton or Madison, with the preference to Hamilton, it is stated:

The equality of representation in the Senate in another point which, being evidently the result of compromise between the opposite pretensions of the large and small States, does not call for much discussion. If indeed it be right that among a people thoroughly incorporated into one nation every district ought to have a proportional share in the Government, and that among in. dependent and sovereign States bound together by a simple league, the parties, however unequal in size, ought to have an equal share in the common councils, it does not appear to be without some reason that in a compound republic, partaking both of the national and federal character, the government ought to be founded on a mixture of the principles of proportional and equal representation. But it is superfluous to try by the standard of theory a part of the Constitution which is allowed on all hand

Mr. HIGGINS:
Hear, hear; that is the point.

Mr. GLYNN:
But you cannot draw a strict line of demarcation in politics; you must take what is feasible and what is workable and in a balance of advantage preferable. If you apply the principle in the matter of consolidation, the same spirit of amity referred to as mutual concession must apply there also.
He goes on to say:

But as the larger States will always be able by their power over the supplies to defeat unreasonable exertions of this prerogative of the lesser States, and as the facility and excess of law-making seem to be the diseases to which our Governments are most liable, it is not impossible that this part of the Constitution may be more convenient in practice than it appears to many in contemplation.

So much for what Hamilton said more than a hundred years ago. Now let us see how it worked out. We have the evidence of Bryce, in 1893:

In the House the large States are predominant; ten out of forty-four (less than one-fourth) return an absolute majority of the 332 representatives. In the Senate these same ten States have only twenty members out of eighty-eight-less then one-fourth of the whole. In other words, these ten States are more than sixteen times as powerful in the House as they are in the Senate.
But as the House has never been the organ of the large States, nor prone to act in their interest, so neither has the Senate been the stronghold of the small States. for American politics have never turned upon an antagonism between these two sets of commonwealths.

Then later on he says:

The two bodies are not hostile elements in the nation, striving for supremacy, but servants of the same master, whose word of rebuke will quiet them.

These are matters which to a large extent discount the effect of the very learned argument of my hon. friend Mr. Higgins. As opinion outside this Convention will settle whether the Constitution shall be adopted or not, and the arguments used here will have considerable force upon public opinion, I hope in his reply the hon. gentleman will devote his attention to this matter.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I ask the indulgence of the Committee for a few moments. Hon. members will, I think, agree that the time has not been wasted. There is no doubt that we have some important admissions from those who are going to vote against me that this principle is wrong, and there has not been throughout the debate anyone except Mr. Glynn who has ventured to justify equal representation on its merits. The only argument used in favor of it seems to be that for the purpose of getting Federation under this Bill we should allow equal representation. Mr. Barton said:

Equal contracting parties ought to have equal representation.

Yes, in forming a partnership agreement. If several men of different degrees of wealth, with different assets, form a partnership agreement, they stand equal until it is formed; but when it is formed they have a clause which provides for the majority of partners ruling. Until the time this Constitution has been formed and accepted there should be equality, but once in the Federation for federal purposes you should have the majority ruling. As to what Mr. Glynn has said, I agree thoroughly that we are not to follow out logically exactly what we think to be correct. You cannot do that in politics. You cannot have everything you want in principle. What was the compromise in the United States that has been referred to? One party wanted to leave the separate States absolutely with full separate powers, and the other to have one unitary State having absolute control over all the States. The compromise lay in giving the State absolute power over purely State affairs, and giving to the Federation power over federal affairs. Equal representation was not a compromise in a matter of principle, but, as is shown by Hamilton in the Federalist, the result of pressure in circumstances of extreme danger. They felt the danger of an enemy at their own doors. The British had forts on their boundaries, and they felt the fear of Delaware and Rhode Island making terms with them. That equal representation was formed on the basis of terror, and after 100 years we are asked to accept a system which the people of the States repent of at the present day. The only painful passage during this debate was with my friend Dr. Quick. I was angry at the time, but I feel sure it was his desire to have a good result that led him to an extravagance of expression which he will regret. He would never have accused me of being insincere to the cause of Federation if he had known me a little better, and if he had allowed me credit for as good intentions as I have no doubt he has himself. But speaking of the effect on Federation, I think the greatest danger to the adoption of a good Federal Bill arising in the course of this debate has been the course of conduct taken by those who have accepted equal representation as being a correct principle, and by accepting this as a correct principle have shifted the area on which compromise ought to proceed. They have given those who hold for extreme States rights a principle which it is very hard to limit logically, because it is said if you grant equal representation you must have equal representation on all questions which affect the States.

Mr. ISAACs:

It was admitted as a principle instead of a compromise.

Mr. HIGGINS:

That is just it. I see that Sir George Turner very candidly—as he always does—put it the other day, that even as a matter of pure tactics it has been a gross mistake on his part to treat this as being a good principle in place of treating it as a mere matter of ultimate concession. It comes to a mere matter of judgment between Dr. Quick and myself. I thought, and I still think, I have been helping the cause of Federation in taking upon myself as a private unofficial member the brunt of bringing up the question of equal representation, knowing as I do it is absolutely a forlorn hope owing to the extent to which our position has been given away by those who hold official positions.

Mr. LYNE:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:

With a view to Federation it was my business to put before the Convention the view of the great bulk of the people throughout the colonies, and I am therefore glad to see that a representative from South Australia, which is at present a minor colony in population, has admitted that at least logically we are right. I did not press the logic of our position, but I did ask members to look at history and see whether equal representation has done any good in America. No one has been able to show a single instance in which it has been of the remotest good in America. I have to thank members for listening so patiently to me, and I appeal to them to recognise that I have not wasted the time of the House.

Mr. REID:

I am very sorry we cannot get out of these academical disputes. There has been a flavor of that sort about the whole of this discussion which we have had once or twice too often. We have now come down to the business part of this compact. We cannot do business without equal representation in the Senate; therefore I vote for it. But, on the other hand, I hope not to leave this city before making a resolute effort to guard against an evil which would undoubtedly arise from this equal representation, unless there is something more in the Constitution. I have no hesitation in saying that unless something of the kind is in the Constitution I should feel very great difficulty in advocating it; but the proper time for that will come later.

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

This is not the time for it. All through this matter I have declined to indulge in any diplomacy or strategy, or threatening this or that. I said at once how far I could go. This equal representation in the Senate is a thing we can talk about for hours, but it is a necessity for Federation, therefore I say no more about it; but I also think there is another necessity in this Federation, and that is that we must put in this Constitution some guarantee that if the two Houses fall out, and cannot perform those functions for which they are constituted, there must be some reserve power in the Constitution to enable the Commonwealth to be saved from the horrors and losses of deadlocks and confusion.

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

I do not put that as a question between the smaller and the larger States.

Mr. SYMON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

I put it simply as a question affecting the character of the machine we are constructing.

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

Without the slightest hesitation I vote for this equal representation; but later on I will endeavor to give effect to my views upon that other matter, which I consider to be a corollary. I have no hesitation in saying that if the Constitution is left as it is now the Senate will be the predominant power in it.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

I agree with every word of Sir Graham Berry and Mr. Carruthers on that point. If there is to be a predominant power in the Constitution, it should be the majority of the taxpayers of the country. But there is plenty of time to talk about what we can or cannot accept. Let us do our best with this Constitution, and go right through with it, and then be able to put it before our respective populations, and come back to the adjourned meeting with clearer perception of the wishes of the people. I am very sanguine that we will get over all our difficulties. I have no hesitation in saying that I have now a very much brighter view of the prospects of Federation than I had when I came to this Convention. The more we look upon this as a machine which we are anxious to construct in a perfect form, the better for the success of our work.

Mr. LYNE:

It seems to me that a great many of the representatives are practically shirking this question, and the Premier of New South Wales, who has just spoken, is doing the same thing. Is he prepared if this equal representation is carried, and no safety-valve introduced, to accept equal representation? I ask Mr. Isaacs the same question.

Mr. ISAACS:

I shall have full opportunity of expressing my views by and by.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

You are introducing local politics.

Mr. LYNE:

With all due respect to Sir Edward, I am not introducing local politics.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

It sounds like it.

Mr. LYNE:

Then your hearing must be very faulty. I am putting one of the most essential and important matters connected with Federation, and I am going to vote with Mr. Higgins to prevent equal representation in the Senate. And I also say this, with Mr. Carruthers, that if there is a safety-valve introduced later on in the shape of one or two things, either a modified referendum or else the Norwegian system, I shall then be prepared to give equal representation, because I know it cannot then ultimately prevent the will of the people being observed. A majority of those who have spoken are against equal representation with the powers given at the present time, and the able speech of Sir Graham Berry should have some weight. It showed that the powers given at the present time were greater than under the Bill of 1891. It is a dangerous thing indeed to allow the Senate the power of overriding the will of the House of Representatives. Just one word with reference to the very inflamed speech of Dr. Quick. He accused me of two or three things in very few words and in a very short time. One was in not saying what I thought of equal representation when I was at Bathurst. I tell him that I have made this one of the most stable planks in all my addresses throughout New South Wales, and also at Bathurst, and if he was listening he would have heard me there.
It ill becomes him to accuse members of this Convention with not desiring Federation, because he happens to be an enthusiast himself. On reasonable and equitable grounds I am prepared and anxious for Federation, just as anxious as he is, though perhaps I am not so demonstrative. I hope that before this Bill is passed that there will be a safety-valve introduced. I do not think I am justified, nor any other member of this Convention who believes that the Bill is not what it should be, in voting against the motion of Mr. Higgins.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Sub-section as read agreed to.

Mr. LYNE:
I want to express my views on this sub-section, which reads:
The members for each State shall be directly chosen by the people of the State as one electorate.
I think a great and grave objection will be taken throughout the colonies to the election of the Senate by each State as one electorate, and, as I said a week or two ago, each State will return its six representatives, the whole State voting as one electorate. I think this is about the most conservative proposal ever imported into any Bill. I have only to refer to what occurred in South Australia some years ago, when the Legislative Council was elected in the same way. So dissatisfied were the people with this mode of election that they had the colony divided into different electorates. I am satisfied that if this passes the Senate will be a most conservative body, and once men of means have obtained positions in the Upper Chamber it will be absolutely impossible to displace them because of the inability of any ordinary individual to canvass the whole colony as one electorate. I intend to oppose this as strongly as I can, not only now, but when the measure is submitted to the Parliament of New South Wales. This Bill cannot go before the people until it filters through the various Parliaments.

Mr. ISAACS:
The same as the House of Representatives.

Mr. LYNE:
No, it would not be; and I will give you an example. For the House of Representatives New South Wales would return twenty-six members, I think it is. There would be four or more of the large electorates of the House of Representatives in each electorate of the Senate.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
What about Tasmania?

Mr. LYNE:
I put Tasmania out of the question.

HON. MEMBERS:
No, no. Nonsense.

Mr. LYNE:
Yes; because it cannot be compared in a division of this kind with any other colony. I simply put it out of the question as a division, and I think Tasmanians will find it is a very arduous thing once a man gets his seat established in the Senate to remove him if he is wealthy. That is what will take place in all of the States. It has taken place in the past and will take place in the future. Unless a man is of great means he will be unable to get a seat with the unduly large electorate proposed in this clause. Mr. Isaacs says it will be equal to the House of Representatives. If I could import my ideas into this Bill I should raise the age of the electors for the Senate from 21 to 25. That would make a great difference, and it would give a more mature vote than you will get with the age fixed at 21.

Mr. ISAACS:
I thought you wanted the whole of the people to vote.

Mr. LYNE:

That will give a more mature vote, I say. I am only giving my ideas as to what I would like the franchise of the Senate to provide for. Take one electorate in New South Wales constituted for the Senate. It would comprise the whole of New South Wales, bordered on the south by the Murray, on the west by the South Australian border, on the north by the railway from Bourke down to the mountains, and from there round the mountains to Mount Kosciusko, and I ask any member if he does not think that is a kingdom quite enough to return one representative. The next one would be the whole of north New South Wales, and there would be two members, one for the north, and one for the west coast. There would be this kingdom which is larger than Tasmania, and it is large enough to return one member, instead of having the whole lumped into one, which would make it impossible for an ordinary individual to obtain a seat in the Senate.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Would they have an equal number of people voting for the Senate under that way?

Mr. LYNE:

As nearly as possible an equal division of people. I presume the same would take place, though not to so large an extent, in Victoria. I do not wish to talk in an academic manner in reference to this question, and I am not going to make any proposition which is a foregone conclusion, but I shall, when it comes before our Parliament, try to get it altered there, and I shall also try to get the feeling of the people strongly expressed. When the final Convention comes, that is the time to alleviate the conservative notion imported into this Bill.

Mr. BARTON:

Does the hon. member intend to move an amendment?

Mr. LYNE:

No.

Mr. BARTON:

Then I take it there will be no amendment; but I wish to put this on record that, if you are to divide each State into electorates, knowing as we do that this Convention will probably impose some qualifications for the electors to each House and the members of each House, and if you have locality as the guiding principle of election to both Houses, you destroy from its very base the purpose for which the Senate is established. The purpose is that each State shall be represented as one whole, as one entity, and that will be destroyed by the proposal, although Mr. Lyne does not make it as an amendment. You will have this further evil. Although we must speak with some delicacy of the process which sent us here, we are able to see that it is a process calculated to relieve the minds of the electors of all local, petty, and parochial interests in the representation of the States, and it is a process highly calculated to lead to the election of the best men, as the minds of the electors are not disturbed by such influences as I have just adverted to. I do not wish to go any further than to place this much on record, that I think a proposal of this kind, if carried into effect, would simply tend to destroy the Federation from the very root.

Sub-section, as read, agreed to.

Sub-section 3-Term of service.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I shall move:
That the word "six" in the seventeenth line be struck out with the view of inserting the word "four."

My object is to place the senators more in touch with the people, so that they may not have six years before they are called to account for voting against that on which the people may have expressed their will.

Amendment negatived; sub-section, as read, agreed to.

Sub-section 4, as read, agreed to.

Sub-section 5-Qualifications of senators.

Mr. BARTON:
I agree with Mr. Higgins, and if he has no objection I will propose his amendment at the end of the clause. I have reconsidered the clause, and the objection raised by Mr. Higgins that there may not be sufficient provision for doing away with plural voting. The Drafting Committee are still inclined to the opinion that the point will not arise, but they agree that the matter may as well be made clear at once. I move therefore:

To add at the end of the clause the words: "But in the choosing of senators each elector shall have only one vote."

Mr. KINGSTON:
I would suggest to Mr. Barton that it would be infinitely preferable to state the qualification when first we come to it instead of referring to a later clause. I put it to the strong consideration of the hon. member whether that would not be the better course.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think it necessary to take the course Mr. Kingston suggests. It was decided by the Constitutional Committee, and now by the Convention, that the senators shall be elected on the same franchise as the House of Representatives. The object of the Drafting Committee has been to carry that out in the most effective way possible. We provide here that the qualifications of members and electors shall be the same as for the House of Representatives, and then we provide in respect to the House of Representatives what those qualifications shall be, and provide also that the qualifications shall remain so until the Parliament shall otherwise provide.

Mr. KINGSTON:

The definition should be put in in the first instance.

Mr. BARTON:

No, I do not think so. It is not because the Senate clauses come first in the Bill that we ought necessarily to provide first in definite terms the qualifications of the senators and then that those of the members of the House of Representatives should be the same. One is to hinge on the other, and I think hon. members would prefer to have it drawn in that way. I see no reason for any change. If we did change it the effect would no doubt be the same, but at the same time the argument that the provisions with regard to the Senate should come first in the Bill is not an argument which we need attach much weight to, except that every suggestion from the hon. member deserves much consideration. I think that the best way to provide for it is as we have provided.

Amendment agreed to; sub-section, as amended, passed.

Mr. DOBSON:

I am exceedingly loth to mention the subject uppermost in my mind, because in this assembly old federalists will know a great deal more about it than I do. But no one has called attention to the drastic change made in the Bill of 1891 as regards the election of the Senate. When several hon. members referred this morning to the historic division of yesterday and to the compromise of 1891, they seem to have forgotten

Mr. REID:

Do you think this makes it weak?

Mr. DOBSON:

I am in favor of a Senate elected by the people, but not of a Senate elected by the people on the same broad, manhood suffrage as the House of Representatives, and I am not prepared to depart absolutely and entirely from that Constitution and system of responsible government of which we have heard so much. On one hand hon. members hold up Colonial Constitutions as a model and here they depart from them. I can find no parallel, and I will ask my democratic friends if they can show one.

Mr. REID:

Oh, do not stir them up.

Mr. DOBSON:

Where have you an Upper House elected upon the same franchise as the Lower House.

Mr. ISAACS:

Is it an Upper House?

Mr. TRENWITH:

It would be a bar to every reform if you always have to find a precedent.

Mr. DOBSON:

Although this is not an Upper House it is something stronger than an Upper House, and it ought to be stronger; that fact has been admitted by practically every hon. member present.

Mr. REID:

How long is this discussion to go on?

Mr. DOBSON:

This clause dealing with the powers of the Senate will be the one clause which will be discussed and criticised most widely throughout the Australian continent. Therefore I must confess my great disappointment at none of the able and intelligent federalists pointing out why we should depart from the British Constitution. Here is to be a Constitution in which we are absolutely giving property no representation of any description. We are actually giving to men who have nothing, the absolute right to tax all those who have, and you are not giving to those who have any single direct voice except what they get by election on manhood suffrage. You must have some regard to the fact that there are two classes of people, men who have something to pay their debts, and something in the way of security to offer to the English money lender; and on the other hand there are those-to some extent the bone and sinew of the Commonwealth-who have nothing, men who can take up their swag and go away, men who have no property of any description.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Does not bone and sinew represent wealth?

Mr. DEAKIN:

The mass of the people with us have a good deal of property.

Mr. DOBSON:

In these circumstances I should like to know-

Mr. TRENWITH:

Surely if they have nothing else you might give them a vote.

Mr. DOBSON:

They have a vote. I have understood it to be an absolute fact that this Senate should be a stronger body, with more powers than the ordinary Upper House.

Mr. REID:

It will be under this franchise.
Mr. DOBSON:

Nothing of the kind. You are absolutely seeking to make it a less powerful body than any Upper Chamber I know of.

Mr. TRENWITH:

There is, then, no strength in anything except property.

Mr. DOBSON:

For once my hon. friend is unfair. I do not want to be told that money-bags and property rule the world; it is brains, intelligence, and character which rule it.

Mr. REID:

A most inflammatory speech!

Mr. DOBSON:

I cannot understand why we should pass this section without one member of the Constitutional Committee telling us the reason we are departing from the compromise of 1891. Here is the vital part with which the Convention has to deal, and I should like to know from the hon. member Mr. Barton what justification there is for departing from it.

Mr. BARTON:

I am too tired.

An HON. MEMBER:

This is wasting time.

Mr. DOBSON:

I hold the right to criticise this clause. I believe it is the blot in the Constitution that will make the machinery exceedingly lopsided. But having entered my protest I will say no more.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 10.-The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the members of the Senate. Subject to such laws (if any), the Parliament of each State may determine the time, place, and manner of choosing the members for that State.

Until such determination, and unless the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the laws in force in the several States for the time being, relating to the following matters, namely: The manner of conducting elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, the proceedings at such elections, Returning Officers, the periods during which elections may be continued, and offences against the laws regulating such elections, shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the several States of members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ISAACS:
I want to call attention to what I think is a little danger about this clause. It is provided in the clause we have just passed that:—

The members for each State shall be directly chosen by the people of the State as one electorate.

I am a little apprehensive that the wording of this section 10 may be construed more widely than it is intended, because if it is provided here, without any guarding words, that:

The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the members of the Senate, the previous section might be departed from. I think some such words as we find in section 27:

Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, might be inserted; or we might, instead of the words:

Prescribing a uniform manner of choosing, have these words:

Make provision for election of.

In any event it would be well to have something of that sort. In America the power prescribing the plan of choosing the senators is given to the State only. Congress has no power to make laws relating to the election of senators, except as regards times and manner. Great differences have arisen there as to modes of electing, whether by two Houses separately or conjointly; and various expedients have been resorted to, which I have referred to previously. I think clause 10 is too wide as it stands, because it might be contended hereafter, with a certain amount of force, that because Parliament has the power of making the laws prescribing the manner of choosing the members of the Senate, they might say that it should be done by the people as one electorate, or in any other way. This clause deals with the manner of choosing the senators, and I think, on the whole, it is too widely expressed.

Mr. BARTON:

I scarcely think there is any real difficulty in what Mr. Isaacs has suggested. We might possibly say:

Subject to the provisions of this Constitution.

In doing so we must be careful.

Mr. ISAACS:

It is in clause 27.

Mr. BARTON:

Yes. for a special reason. We must be careful, because the insertion of such words in some places may lead to an undesirably wide construction in some cases where they do not occur. We must not overlook the principle of construction that, in any statute or document, effect must be given to every word of the document. Where there appears a repugnance which cannot be overcome there is a difficulty. There appears here no repugnance which cannot be overcome. In clause 9 we provide:

The members for each State shall be directly chosen by the people of the State as one electorate.

And in clause 10 we provide:

The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the members of the Senate.

If the choosing by the people as one electorate is a uniform manner, then the Constitution provides a uniform manner. Altogether, therefore, one would not read clause 10 as being in entire opposition to that.

Mr. ISAACS:

I do not think it is in opposition to it.

Mr. BARTON:

Therefore it must be read as an exception to it. I take it this deals more with the manner in which you carry out your elections, and that the provision in a Constitution that a State shall be one electorate in voting as an entity of the Constitution is not a matter of minor degree as are these summed up in the phrase "manner of choosing." If these matters come before the courts the courts cannot have any difficulty. When we read these two clauses in one way they are in direct opposition; but we are told by the uniform canons of construction that we must give due effect to every word in this Bill. If we do that we cannot give opposite effects to these clauses; one refers to the great power conferred upon a State of acting as one electorate, and the other to its mode of conducting elections. While it is very wise and right of the hon. member to point out what may be a difficulty, there is really nothing that may be called a difficulty in substance about it.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The definition which Mr. Barton has rather implied than given of the word "manner," while ample enough as an answer to the criticisms of Mr. Isaacs, raises a doubt in my mind as to whether the word "manner" is also wide enough to cover an alteration in the system of voting if so desired. If "manner" relates rather to the conduct of an election and the general provisions made for taking votes, is it wide enough to cover also, and to a certainty, a variety of systems of voting which might perhaps be indicated by the word "method"? Would it not be desirable to take care that those States which think fit to adopt a system of proportional voting for the representation of minorities shall have power to do so, and that the Parliament of the Federal Commonwealth shall also be able to adopt such a system if it thinks desirable?

1099

Mr. O'CONNOR:

There are only two limitations to the Subjects which may come under the head of "manner of choosing." One is that the member is to be chosen by the people of the States as one elector. That cannot be altered. The other is that the qualification shall be as stated for the House of Representatives, and one man shall have one vote. Those two things are expressly provided for, and therefore the "manner" cannot touch them. They really put the very basis upon which the Senate is elected.

Mr. BARTON:

That is the clause that calls the Senate into being.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

But the manner of conducting elections must embrace everything else, and the manner of choosing, surely, would include the method in which the votes are to be recorded. The method in which votes are recorded must allow for representation of minorities, alternative votes, or any other system.

Mr. BARTON:

It would be perfectly open, for instance, for every Parliament to provide for the Hare system of election. The tenth - clause provides that the Parliament may, in the first instance, prescribe an uniform manner applicable to every State, of choosing members for the Senate; but, subject, to such provision, the Parliament of each State may decide how to choose members of that body. It reserves such a power to the Parliaments of the States. But there is reserved to the Federal Parliament a power of control, which might well be exercised, in the case of certain difficulties or misdeeds arising, to take the matter into its hands.

Mr. SYMON:

I quite agree with Mr. Barton, that if a power is not taken away from the State it remains with it. But I doubt very much whether this provision in the first part of clause 10 would cover such an alteration as is implied in the introduction of the Hare system of voting. The other name for it is proportional representation, and I doubt whether the manner of choosing the members of the Senate would cover the alteration, either for a Federal Parliament or a State Parliament. My idea is that section is a limita-

[P.674] starts here
Therefore, if there were to be an alteration in the way of introducing proportional representation, that power would remain with the States and be exercised by them. There is nothing in this clause which enables the Parliament of the Federation to alter the qualification of electors to the Senate unless by an alteration of the Constitution. Proportional representation may or may not-I do not know whether it would or not-alter the principle of representation. If it would, it would, therefore, be untouched by a provision merely dealing with the manner of choosing the members of the Senate. I think, therefore, that the clause had better be left as it is, the result being, in my view, that, whilst the Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws which would dominate as to the manner of choosing the members of the Senate, it would be for the States to deal with such a matter as is involved in the Hare system of voting. It establishes a different system of representation under the name of proportional representation.

Mr. GLYNN:

I think one should look at clause 20 in connection with this, because, I submit, we are not in a position to obtain the advantages of the Hare-Spence system with half the Senate going out every three years. There would be only three members to be elected in each district, and the principle of the Hare-Spence system is not effective where there are only three seats to be filled. I intend to move that clause 12 be rejected altogether. It completely ties the hands of the Federal Parliament against the introduction of any such system as the Hare-Spence. This system necessitates four, five, or six vacancies to make it practically useful. The principle of it is based on transferable votes, and it would be quite impossible to get the benefit of this transferring with only three seats to be filled.

Mr. SYMON:

But there are other systems.

Mr. GLYNN:

Yes; but that system is becoming popular. It is getting liberal Press advocacy, and is being taken up by many politicians. But unless you make provision for a sufficient number of vacancies, you will not have the essential difference, the transferable vote of the system, which is its highest recommendation. You cannot have any such system of representation under this provision.

Mr. HIGGINS:

With regard to another part of the clause, there is an intimation in my amendments of a matter I just wish to call the attention of Mr. Barton to. It is a practical matter. I am afraid that the first election for the Senate will not be workable upon the provision made here. It says:

Until such determination, and unless the Parliament or the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the laws in force in the several States for the time being, relating to the following matters, namely: The manner of conducting elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, the proceedings at such elections, returning officers, the periods during which elections may be continued, and offences against the laws regulating such elections shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the several States of members of the House of Representatives.

Of course, we know that in the different States—at all events in Victoria—you have one returning officer for each place, and deputy returning officers. Now, as you want to elect for the whole State as one constituency, I do not see how the regulations relating to the return of members to the Lower House will do. I would suggest that, as we have just elected this Convention on the principle of the whole colony constituency—one constituency—there might be some arrangement made by which the same system should, until Parliament otherwise provide, be adopted for the purpose of electing senators. I do not wish to formally move this, but, as a matter of practical working, it is very important to look into. I do not see how officials are going to work out the proposed plan. However, it is a matter for the draftsman, and I feel sure it will be better left in the hands of the draftsman than in the hands of the House.

Mr. BARTON:

I quite see the effect of the suggestion my hon. friend makes, but I would like to remind him of this—that the Federal Enabling Act of 1895 will be expired and spent before this Act can ever come into operation. All the purposes of this Convention will have been done away with, and the Act will have become a dead letter. If the suggestion of the hon. member refers to this, that we should apply what we find in that Act, really what we are doing here is applying what we find in the Act; and for this reason, that the Federal Enabling Act says with regard to the manner of conducting elections that the electoral law of the colony should apply. mutatis mutandis. That is really what we are enacting here, so that there is no difference between the two things. If we refer to the Enabling Act, we find that the ordinary electoral law of any State is mutatis mutandis adopted. That is the effect of my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. HIGGINS:

There is a provision in our Act for one returning officer. Here you have several reporting for several districts.
Mr. BARTON:

First we prescribe that there is only one electorate; then we say that the proceedings in reference to returning officers should, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections for the Senate. That means that there is only one returning officer. What is a matter of irresistible inference is just as plain as if it were expressed.

Mr. ISAACS:

Would the hon. member mind informing me whether the Governor-General or the Governor of the State or who else is to issue the writs for the first election? For the House of Representatives, under clause 40, the Governor-General is to do it, but I do not see anything in connection with the elections for the Senate.

Mr. BARTON:

I will answer that in a minute.

Dr. QUICK:

I invite the attention of Mr. Barton to a point of some importance under the heading of-

Offences against the laws relating to elections.

We make provision for single voting in connection with the Senate, but there is no expressed provision for offences against the law in that respect. It may be suggested that these words: "and offences against the laws regulating such elections shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the several States of members of the House of Representatives," make sufficient provision for this contingency; but I do not think that would suffice in the case of a breach of the law of single voting in Victoria or Tasmania. No doubt the local laws in New South Wales and South Australia would be sufficient, because there is a penalty provided for offences against the system of single voting. In Victoria, Tasmania, and West Australia, however, there is no local machinery, and I suggest to Mr. Barton the propriety of drafting a new section which could be put at the end of the Bill under the heading of "Miscellaneous." That section might be made to embody the principle in the Victorian Federal Enabling Act, which prescribes the particular questions to be put to each elector as well as provides for offences against the law. This ought to be provided for in this Bill, because it would be doubtful whether the local machinery would be made applicable to a Federal election.

Mr. BARTON:

I understand the point raised by the hon. member is this-in the case of voting twice, if there is no provision in the local Act making that punishable, there would be no provision under this Act. That is a suggestion that might well be taken into consideration, and, as two or three clauses will most likely be recommitted, I will look into it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We had a similar provision in our Federal Enabling Bill.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I would point out that in the Federal Enabling Bill agreed to at the Hobart Conference we provided for the adoption of the electoral procedure of this colony, and we gave the Governor power to make regulations, and also to provide penalties for a breach of these regulations. In South Australia, in connection with our elections, we found it necessary to exercise our powers under this section, and the same thing was done in Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We ask every man whether he has voted before.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I suggest to Mr. Barton whether it would not be a wise course to adopt the plan I have suggested?

Mr. BARTON:

Both of the suggestions are quite worthy of consideration. There is a great deal in the suggestion of Mr. Isaacs that provision should be made for the issue of the writs for the first election to the Senate now that the mode of election has been changed. As regards the power to make regulations, I shall take that into consideration at the same time. I move:

To strike out the words "House of Representatives" in the last line, and to insert in lieu thereof Senate.

Mr. DOBSON:

I should like to mention one thing. The phrase used is:

The manner of conducting elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State.

There are two colonies in which they have nominee Upper Houses, and in one of them there is no limit to the number of gentlemen who may be nominated. If the leader of the Lower House was determined to give effect to what he considered the will of the people, he might appoint a number of new members of the Upper House, and so give that House more numbers than the Lower. Apart from that is the phrase:

for the more numerous House, a happy one? Would it not be better to say:

The House constituted on the wider suffrage?

Mr. BARTON:

That would never do, because some of the Houses are nominee Houses, and there would be no distinction of suffrage. In 1891-I remember well how this was a subject of discussion in drafting the clause—the words "Legislative Assembly" were suggested, but it was taken into consideration that there are some States which do not have a Legislative Assembly. In New Zealand, for instance, it is the House of Representatives, and in Tasmania a member of the Lower House is "M.H.A.,” or "Member of the House of Assembly," is used. With such a difference in nomenclature, we c

Amendment agreed to; clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 11 - Failure of a State to choose members not to prevent business-agreed to.

Clause 12.-As soon as practicable after the Senate first meets the members chosen for each State shall be divided by lot into two classes. The places of the members of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the third year, and the places of those of the second class at the expiration of the sixth year, from the commencement of their term of service as herein declared, so that one-half may be chosen every third year. For the purposes of this section the term of service of a member shall begin on and be reckoned from the first day of January next succeeding the day of his election, except in the case of the first election, when it shall be reckoned from the first day of January preceding the day of his election. The election to fill the places of members retiring by rotation shall be made in the year preceding the day on which they are to retire.

Mr. HIGGINS:

There is an amendment on the paper which I was going to move, to alter "three" in the fourth line to "two." I tabled that in view of the House altering the term from six years to four, but as I understand the House is so strongly against me on that point, I shall not press this amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

The second sub-section provides—

For the purposes of this section the second term of service of a member shall begin on and be reckoned from the first day of January next succeeding the day of his election.

I have no doubt that the Drafting Committee had some very good reason for inserting these words by which a man may act for nearly seven years instead of six.

Mr. BARTON:

The fact is, some date had to be fixed, and between the 365 days in the year we thought New Year's Day was the best. It is the point of commencement of many things.

Mr. HOLDER:
Under this provision the States every now and then would have, instead of six senators, nine. The elections have to take place before the vacancies actually occur.

Mr. BARTON:
They could not sit.

Mr. HOLDER:
I would like to know why the ordinary course, has been departed from by which vacancies are filled up at the earliest possible moment after they occur. Is there any special reason for adopting this new system?

Mr. BARTON:
There is a very strong reason indeed. In the United States it is provided that the States shall have their full representation insured in the Senate. If a lapse is allowed to occur, and the Parliament happens to be in session, the States will only have half their representatives present. It is, therefore, necessary to provide beforehand for the election of the succeeding half who have to be elected, and it is patent that the persons so elected cannot take their seats until the vacancies occur.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
Would it not reduce the prestige of the retiring members?

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think so. All that the clause provides, is-
The election to fill the places of members retiring by rotation shall be made in the year preceding the day on which they are to retire.

As the time and place to be appointed are in the hands of the States Parliament, they may be trusted not to provide for the election to take place too early.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The practice of electing succeeding members, while the existing members are yet in the full discharge of their duties, is in vogue at all elections for the House of Representatives in America, where, if I remember rightly, they are elected six or eight months before their predecessors terminate their work. The point to which I wish to call attention is the objectionable method by which the mode of retirement is fixed—that is, by lot.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It is only for the first election.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Why not adopt a system under which members would retire according to their position on the poll? The three who receive the fullest measure of popular support should remain six years in office and the remaining three for three years.
Mr. TURNER:
I think it should be altered.

Mr. GLYNN:
It would be well, I would again say, to consider whether this clause gives a sufficient opening for the application of the principle of proportional representation. To work that effectively, in say the Hare-Spence system, a greater number of members than there ought to be sent to each State for election, while the clause provides for three only. The essential merit of this system is to widen the area of the electors' choice, while now we are fixing in the Constitution an obstacle to its effectiveness. Then there is very little reason for adopting the municipal principle of half the House retiring at any particular time. It is the transition from the old principle of long tenure. I can see absolutely no objection to making all the senators go out every six years. There will be this objection also: by sending them out every three years you have a body less united, because you have one-half more in touch with public opinion, and the other half representing the opinions of five or six years before that. I am not giving my own opinion only, for I have in my hand a letter which all South Australians, and even Americans, would respect. No man or woman has taken as deep an interest in the matter of proportional representation as Miss Spence has, and no one can tell the effect of the American system better than she can. I would like to mention to the Leader of the Convention, Mr. Barton, that Miss Spence has made this question of proportional representation a life study. Referring to the twelfth clause, she says-

As a proportionalist I object to the twelfth clause of Chapter I., which provides that half the Senate shall go out every three years, the sort of municipal retirement which Mr. Kingston likes.

Mr. BARTON:
Why is it called municipal retirement?

Mr. GLYNN:
It is the name I have borrowed from the Government of South Australia. It is the name given in the Government policy of this country.

When six are elected at once we can have a fair representation of minorities; when three, as in the State of Illinois at present, the two main parties are fairly represented, but the new thought of America is as thoroughly excluded as in the one member districts.

I submit that that opinion, the opinion of an expert, ought to weigh with hon. members, and it is a question whether we Should fix the number at three, because by doing so you will weaken the very principle of proportional representation.

Mr. BARTON:
There is no fixed number of three. If there are six States and six members for each there would be thirty-six, and eighteen would retire.

An HON. MEMBER:
What if there are Seven from each State?

Mr. BARTON:
You are not going to have an election because there is an odd number. If we tried to make an arbitrary division for each State, and the lot fell on the hon. member, he would have to cut himself in half.

Mr. REID:
He might be half himself.

Mr. BARTON:
You cannot divide an odd number by two.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
How do you arrive at it?

Mr. BARTON:
By lot.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It Says:
The number chosen by each State.

Mr. BARTON:
Not the total number.

Mr. ISAACS:
Look at the last words in the first paragraph.

Mr. BARTON:
There will and must come a time when each State may have seven or eight, or nine or ten members to represent it; so that the sum total, inasmuch as it may be multiplied by six, supposing there are so many States, will come to an equal number. On the other hand if there be an odd number of States there will be an odd number of representatives.

Mr. GORDON:
In what class would you put the odd man?

Mr. BARTON:
There is no provision here, though the members of each State will be divided into two classes. The places of the members of the first class will be vacated at the expiration of the third year, and the places of those of the second class at the expiration of the sixth year. This is a Constitution Act, and it should be remembered that a Constitution Act does not provide for every contingency which arises. This clause provides that as soon as practicable after the Senate first meets the members chosen for each State shall be divided by lot. We may get out of the difficulty by saying "as nearly as may be practicable," and then that will involve the liberation of the Senate from the charge of murder in carrying out this act of cutting someone into two.

Mr. REID:

The difficulty would never arise, because when they altered the numbers that would alter the division.

Mr. BARTON:

Just so. We are providing a Constitution which presumably, sane men will deal with, and we are endeavoring to provide that the number of members of the Senate shall be an even one and so that an even body shall go out.

Mr. HOLDER:

There may be an odd number of States and yet an even number of men.

Mr. BARTON:

There is another matter to which I have not directed hon. members' attention. This division by lot takes place only in the first instance.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

There is one three-year lot, and one six-year lot.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

It is only for the purpose of getting a Start.

Mr. BARTON:

As my hon. friend says, it is only for the purpose of getting a start. You divide them into two classes. They are then absolutely fixed. Those in the first class go out at the end of the third year, and those in the second class go out at the end of the sixth year, and then it works automatically, because once you get the classes into work one class goes out and the other comes in.

Mr. KINGSTON:

There is n

Mr. BARTON:

There is no chance of it.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I like the proposal of the clause much better than that suggested by Mr. Glynn, because, if his plan was carried out, it would be possible to have the whole Senate composed of men who have no practical knowledge of the business of Parliament; whereas under the proposal one-half of the members of the Senate will be acquainted with parliamentary procedure, and business will not be delayed as it might be if all the members were newly elected. The plan proposed has worked well in Victoria. The only difference there is that one-third of the members retire every two years, so, that there are three sectional vacancies during the term of the election to the House.

Clause as read agreed to.

Clause 13—How vacancies filled.

Mr. BARTON:
I think it will be well to postpone this clause. It proposes a convenient mode of filling up vacancies, but there have been other suggestions, by Mr. Reid and Mr. Isaacs, which we are working out, and if we postpone the clause we may consider it and the alternative suggestions at the same time.

I propose
That the clause be postponed.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Might I also suggest for consideration that when a vacancy occurs the other delegates might, as is done by directors of companies, suggest a man to act until the next election?

Mr. BARTON:
That was suggested in the Constitutional Committee, but it did not seem to find as much favor as the method suggested in the Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is worth considering. It works well with companies. Here the delegates would be representatives of the people, and it is fair to assume that they would select a man who would find favor with the people.

Mr. HOWE:
I have an amendment which I will move at the proper time. I have great objection to the power which this clause gives to an executive body.

Mr. BARTON:
Only during recess.

Mr. HOWE:
It would lead to the system of nominees.

Mr. BARTON:
The appointment would have to be confirmed when the House met.

Mr. HOWE:
They would be appointed for five years.

Mr. BARTON:
Not necessarily.

Mr. HOWE:
When the House met they would probably be appointed for the remainder of the term, which might be for a period of over five years, I wish the people to have this power instead of the Parliament, and that the member appointed by both Houses should hold office only until the first general election in the State

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is the point.

Mr. HOWE:
The people should say who should fill the vacancy.
Clause postponed.
Clause 14-Qualifications of Member. Agreed to.
Clause 15-Election of President of the Senate. Agreed to.
Clause 16 - Absence of President provided for. Agreed to.
Clause 17 - Resignation of place in Senate. Agreed to.
Clause 18.-The place of a member shall become vacant if for one whole Session of The Parliament he, without the permission of the Senate entered on its Journals, fails to attend the Senate.

Mr. GORDON:
I move:
To Strike out the words "one whole," in the first line, and insert in lieu thereof "two consecutive months of any."

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON:
I moved the same amendment in the Convention of 1891. It seems monstrous that a paid officer of the public-what a member will be under this Act-should be allowed to remain away for one whole session. Then it requires a resolution of the House, and then an election while the House is sitting during the next ensuing Session, so that he may really be absent without the permission of the House for a Session and a half. It is very easy, if a member has a legitimate ground for being, away more than two months, to get leave from the House.

Mr. SYMON:
Is not two consecutive months too long?

Mr. GORDON:
It might be too long, but I have taken the provision from the best Constitution in the world-that of South Australia.

Mr. SYMON:
Sometimes.

Mr. GORDON:
Subject, of course, to a few criticisms from very able and acute gentlemen.
Amendment agreed to; clause, as amended, agreed to.
Clause 19.—Upon the happening of a vacancy in the Senate the President, or if there is no President, or if the President is absent from the Commonwealth, the Governor-General, shall forthwith notify the same to the Governor of the States in the representation of which the vacancy has happened.

Mr. GORDON:
There is a literal error to be corrected.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That will be done. It is a printer's error.

The CHAIRMAN:
"States" ought to be State. I shall correct that.
Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 20.—Until The Parliament otherwise provides, any question respecting the qualification of a member, or a vacancy in the Senate, or a disputed return, shall be determined by the Senate.

Mr. BARTON:
My hon. friend Mr. Carruthers has suggested an amendment to this clause, which certainly should be made. I shall move:
To strike out in line 8, the word "return" and insert in lieu thereof "election."
That is a wider term. It covers more ground and increases the necessary jurisdiction of the House over such questions.

Mr. HOWE:
Supposing a vacancy occurs in the House of Representatives, is it likely that a State will be put to the expense of an election for one representative?

Mr. BARTON:
The matter of vacancies in the House of Representatives is a subsequent matter. This clause deals with the Senate,

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
It is almost essential, to my mind, that these questions, more especially the question of disputed returns, should be determined by the Supreme Court, and not by the Senate. We have found out from practical experience the necessity of making this change, and submitting these questions to the Supreme Court, and I hope that in making this great and high departure and forming a Federal Parliament we shall not run into any errors which will necessitate any changes whatever in the early stages of our Federal Government. I shall move:—

That the words "High Court" be substituted for "Senate."

Mr. BARTON:
I would ask Sir Edward Braddon not to have his amendment formally put. This matter was also a subject of very considerable discussion in the Constitutional Committee, and the clause now represents the result of that discussion. It amounted to this: There were a good many of us who thought that matters of this kind should be decided by the Judges, instead of what we have found to be a fallacious tribunal, a Committee of the Houses of Parliament. At the same time, it was thought better to leave the matter as it stands in the Constitution, only you must put a proviso in the beginning. That is to say, the words will be placed in the section, "until The Parliament otherwise provides." It seems to me that it is a matter for the Parliament of the Commonwealth to determine whether the Houses, after they are called together, shall determine this question, or whether the Judges should do it. It is a matter for the Federal Parliament to deal with. It increases the freedom of action of the Parliament of the Federation, and for that reason it is also desirable to leave it in the hands of the Parliament.

Mr. SYMON:
It is quite open to the Parliament to decide.

Mr. BARTON:
It is quite open to it, and if the Parliament will not undertake the matter itself, it will delegate it to the High Court. But that is a matter of internal arrangement.

Mr. REID:
I do not intend to propose an amendment, but I express my very great regret that the Drafting Committee have not seen fit to place in the Constitution the power of determining these disputed returns by some judicial authority.

Mr. BARTON:
We followed the instructions of the Constitutional Committee.

Mr. REID:
I understood that the feeling was strongly the other way.

Mr. BARTON:
It was carried this way.

Mr. REID:
I feel very strongly, looking at the constant scandals and outrages which have occurred in the United States over this very question, when the existence of a party has been at stake, that it is infinitely advisable that we should put in this Constitution provision which shall protect the electors from frauds upon their rights, which might be made to suit the interests of political party. It might happen that some great struggle might be determined in the Senate of thirty-six members, according to the decision of a political committee, as to whether a certain return was valid or not. I think the time has come when we should alter this clause. I am perfectly sure that if it is left to the Federal Parliament, that Parliament will never do it.

Mr. BARTON:

It is done in England.

Mr. REID:

But how long did it take? We all know how many years it took—an enormous time, and an enormous struggle—before the power was taken out of the hands of Parliament. Do we not remember the tremendous scandals which disfigured the election tribunals of England when they were within the power of the House of Commons? I really think that I ought to test the opinion of the Committee upon this, as I look upon it as a matter that might at some future time affect the destinies of the whole of the Commonwealth, because it is a very small body, and one vote might make all the difference.

Mr. BARTON:

Substitute "High Court of Justice thereof."

Mr. REID:

I would make it more elastic than that. I would prefer not to move an amendment yet, but I hope we will settle it very soon.

Mr. WISE:

I would suggest before the amendment is moved that there are two questions involved here, which ought to be kept distinct. There is the qualification of a member or the question as to vacancies on the one side, and the question of a disputed return, which is a matter of altogether a different character. I apprehend that only questions of disputed returns should be dealt with by the Supreme Court, but that the Senate should have all control over all questions of order or decency over its own body which might lead it to expel a member. I move:

To strike out the words, "or a disputed return."

Then we can deal with disputed returns in a subsequent section. I entirely concur with what has fallen from my hon. friend Mr. Reid with regard to the power of the Election and Qualification Committee to deal with disputed returns. I have had the advantage of appearing before that body in every capacity. I have been there as counsel, I have been there as member, and I have been there as the accused party, and I do not know in which capacity I found them the least satisfactory.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I will put this question to the test by moving:

That the first words of the clause "Until the Parliament otherwise provides" be struck out.

Mr. REID:

They had better be left in. If my hon. friend will allow me, I am just drafting an amendment which I think will meet the case. I think we might pass on with the amendment proposed by Mr. Wise, namely, to leave out the words "or a disputed return." Then let the clause stand as it is, and by and bye I would suggest a new clause to follow that clause. I will ask my hon. friend Mr. Barton to draw up some clause that will meet the difficulty.

Mr. BARTON:

I am tired of drafting clauses.

Mr. REID:

Well, will my hon. friend allow me to draft one?

Mr. BARTON:

Certainly.

Sir Edward Braddon's amendment withdrawn; Mr. Wise's amendment agreed to clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 21.-The presence of at least one-third of the whole number of members of the Senate as provided by this Constitution shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers.

Mr. GORDON:

I move:

To strike out in line 2 the words "as provided by this Constitution."

These words are not in clause 37, which relates to the Senate, and they are mere surplus, verbiage.

Mr. BARTON:

I consent.

Amendment agreed to; clause, a amended, agreed to.

Clause 22:-Questions arising in the Senate shall be determined by a majority of votes, and the President shall in all cases be entitled to a vote; and who the votes are equal the question shall pass in negative.

Mr. HIGGINS:

As to this clause the appears to be a peculiar difference between the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate. Apparently under this clause the President is in all cases to be entitled to vote, and not merely to a casting vote.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

It is only to secure that the State should always have full representation.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I suppose this is another question of State rights, about which we have heard so much.

Mr. BARTON:
How can it be a question of State rights? If the votes are equal the question is negatived.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Under clause 38, the Speaker of the House of Representative cannot vote except to give a casting vote whereas the President has a vote, and casting vote.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

The President has always his vote, and no more.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is a curious distinction.

Mr. REID:

And a very substantial one too.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The President is entitled to a vote, but why should a man because he represents a State, be entitled to vote in two instances.

Mr. LEWIS:

It seems to me that it would come to the same thing if, the President were to have a casting vote an no more. In the future, party politics may run very high in the Senate as well as the House of Representatives. This clause states that the President shall in all cases be entitled to a vote, implying that the President being in the House must vote. His vote must be recorded on all party questions, and that is an invidious position in which to place a man who is supposed to be above anything of that kind. The President, being within the four walls of the Chamber, must vote on one side or the other, that being the practice in most Legislatures.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

The subject of the clause is to ensure the State having its full representation.

Mr. ISAACS:

The provision in the Bill is right, then.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Yes; but as to the objection that it may put the President in an invidious position to vote in a party division when he desires not to do so, this clause says nothing of the sort. These are matters for the internal regulations of the House, and no obligation in this respect is imposed on the President.

Clause as read agreed to.

Part III.-The House of Representatives.

Clause 23.-The House of Representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the several States, according to their respective numbers; as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the House of Representatives for every one member of the Senate.

Until the Parliament otherwise provides each State, shown have one member for each quota of its people. The quota shall, whenever necessary, be ascertained by dividing the population of the Commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by twice the number of the members of the Senate, and the number of members to which each State is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the State as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by the quota.

But each of the existing colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the Province of South Australia shall be entitled to live Representatives at the least.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

As this is a very radical change from the proposals in the Commonwealth Bill, although Mr. Barton- was good enough to explain it at some length before, I think it would be wise if he would kindly explain it again.

Mr. BARTON:

I will ask Mr. O'Connor to add to the explanation which I made.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

The difference between this and the Bill of 1891 consist in the fixing of the quota of representation. In the Bill of 1891 the number of 50,000 was fixed as the quota There was no limit to the number the number of electors.

Mr. ISAACS:

It was 30,000.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

It was altered, I think, in Committee to 50,000, but the principle was an automatic process by which, as the population increased, for every unit amounting to 30,000 an additional member became necessary for the House of Representatives. There was no provision made for any maximum number of members, and as the Bill stood the population increasing would automatically increase the representation, and I have had some figures prepared showing how this would operate. Taking the populations as they appear in Coghlan, and the increase shown therefor the ten years' averages, we find that in the first year, 1897, approximately the House of Representatives would consist of seventy-one members, that is, taking the numbers only with the minimum to which the House is entitled. Under that Bill New South Wales would have twenty six, Victoria twenty-four, Queensland nine South Australia seven, and Western Australia and Tasmania, according to calculations, Would have two and three; but according to this Bill they would have five each. In the next decennial period, 1901 New South Wales would have thirty-two, Victoria twenty-seven, Queensland thirteen, South Australia nine, Western Australia four, and Tasmania three, and so on until 1941, when we would have a total in the House of Representatives of 446 members.

Mr. GLYNN:

On which of the tables?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

On the 50,000 table. There are two objections to that. The first is that the House of Representatives would go on increasing inordinately in size, and the only way to stop its increase would be by bringing about an amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS:

Give power as in the case of the Senate to increase or diminish.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I am speaking of the Bill as it was. Under the Bill as it was the only way of doing that was by bringing about an amendment of the Constitution. There was another way of dealing with it, by giving Parliament from time to time power to diminish the number of members, but we know it is a most difficult thing to get any House to cut down the number of its members. So it appeared that these objections had to be got rid of in some way. There was another objection to this increase in the automatic way in accordance with the population, and that was that there would be a continually growing disparity between the number of members of the Senate and the House of Representatives. It appeared to the Constitutional Committee that it was very desirable that we should keep up the strength and the power of the Senate in the way in which it should be kept up, and that there should be no undue disparity between the numbers of the two bodies, and the plan of the Constitutional Committee obviates both these difficulties. It provides a mode by which there shall always be a limitation upon the number of members of the House of Representatives, and also by which an equal ratio shall be kept up between the members of the Senate and the members of the House of Representatives. It is done in this way. In the first place, under the head of "Senate," clause 9, we provide:

The Parliament shall have power, from time to time, to increase or diminish the number of members for each State, but so that the equal representation of the several States shall be maintained, and that no State shall have less than six members.

Then, in clause 23, it is set out:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the several States, according to their respective numbers; as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the House of Representatives for every one member of the Senate.
That ensur

Mr. HIGGINS:

Unless you in-crease the number of Senators of each State you will never be able to increase the members of the House of Representatives, even though the populations may increase by millions.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Undoubtedly that is so. I am giving an illustration of how it will work out at the beginning. By this system it will give you a quota of 50,000, which is provided for in the Bill. Now I come to the increase in the number of members of the House of Representatives. It may happen in two ways. If you increase the number of senators there must be a corresponding increase in the number of the members of the House of Representatives. The Senate will be increased probably only by the introduction of a new State. Supposing we have one State added it will increase the number of senators from thirty-six to forty-two. A corresponding increase must then be made in the House of Representatives. Consequently you take forty-two, multiply it by two, and it gives you eighty-four. Divide that number into the then population and you get the number to which each State is entitled in the House of Representatives. That is one way in which the number of members of the House of Representatives may be increased, and must be increased if there is an increase in the number of the members of the Senate. But take the other way. Supposing there is no increase in the number of members of the Senate, but population goes on increasing very largely, and it is found desirable to increase the number of members in the House of Representatives, before you can do that you must put additional members into the Senate, and in order to bring about the equality of representation you cannot of course give less than one member to each of the States; that is to say, taking the six States as at present you must add six to the Senate, one for each State. Then we have, with the additional number, forty-two, which gives you your equality in the way described before. Mr. Higgins says you cannot increase the members of the House of Representatives without increasing the number of members of the Senate. That is so, but in the first place, you leave it in the control of Parliament to increase the number of representatives at any time and in any way so long as they preserve this proportion. They always have that in their own hands. I think it may be taken that while it is difficult to cut down the number of members in the House of Representatives - the existing House - it is an easy thing if there is justification for it to increase the number of members, especially in a House that is paid. You may be sure that public opinion will not allow an enlargement of the House except on very good grounds. It will be considered on business principles as well as political principles, and there will be no danger in giving that power to the Parliament because it will not be exercised unless additional representation is necessary. It may be said: why should not some automatic system of increase be allowed as in the case of the Assemblies of the Colonies? There is a great difference. In local Assemblies the duties very largely of the representative are to represent localities, local interests, and local matters which the State Parliaments have to deal with. But there are very often matters of local interest which the Federal Parliament will have to deal with. It occurs to me there is the question of post and telegraph services, and I do not know of any other matters of general concernment in which localities as localities will have an interest.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Expenditure on defence works.

Mr. O’CONNOR:
That is a matter which may affect a particular locality at a particular time. I am speaking of the operation of laws generally, and there are very few such localities. The increase of population does not bring about an increase in the Senate until there is the same reason for increasing the number of members in the House of Representatives as in the local Parliaments; and so it appears to me that as long as you place in the hands of the Parliament the power to increase this number as it is necessary you have done all that is requisite, and when you restrict that power by a limitation that if that increase is made at any time it must be made subject to a corresponding increase being made in the Senate, it appears to me that in that way you give the proper power to the House of Representatives to increase its members, and you also insure that the Senate should have its due ratio of representation in the Parliament of the Commonwealth. I have worked out some examples here, and will state shortly one of them so that hon. members may be able to follow the figures in the printed document, which gives the probable populations of the different States in the future. Taking the year 1901 and supposing that, by the sub-division of Queensland into three States, there are eight States with six senators to each State, that would make a total of forty-eight senators according to the probable figures of population at that time as worked out in the table before hon. members. The population will be 4,446,700, and if you divide that number by ninety-six the representatives in the House of Representatives being double, you will get 46,320, the quota of representation. Divided by that quota the New South Wales population, being 1,618,000 in 1891, that... colony would have six senators and thirty-five representatives; Victoria, with a population of 1,361,000, would have six senators and twenty-nine representatives; Queensland-south, central, and north-would have a population of 657,700, and assuming that there would be six senators to each of those divisions, that would give a representation in the House of Representatives of fourteen. There would thus be a Senate of forty-eight members, and a House of Representative of ninety-seven members. You cannot always have a proportion exactly of two to one, because first of all you will have the difficulty at least as to the quota, which will be sometimes under and sometimes over the half; if over the half it is entitled to an additional member. It is very essential, in order to preserve the proper weight of influence in Parliament and the Senate, that there should not be any undue proportion between the numbers of members of the two Houses. That is, shortly, the method which has been agreed to by the committee, and which appears to me to carry out the objects aimed at. If any difficulties are suggested I shall only be too glad to answer them.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I feel inclined to object somewhat strongly to this proposed alteration for many reasons. First of all, my honorable friend has not attempted to show any precedent for it anywhere. It seems to be a new idea, and altogether working on scientific lines, and we have been told by members of the Convention it is impossible to apply scientific lines for a Federation. He also states that unless we have some system like this the Senate will not have due weight; but we have been told in America that the Senate is a strong body.

Mr. O’CONNOR:

The Senate has executive powers, powers to deal with treaties.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

As for the objection as to limiting the increase of members, I agree that there should be some limit in the number. That might be dealt with by saying that there should be a fixed number, which might be one for every 50,000 of the population, leaving it to the Parliament in years to come to make an increase. But I fail to see any reason why the number of representatives should depend either upon the number of the States which might be represented in the Parliament or the number of members which might represent each particular State. The great disparity which he refers to is, I think, reasonably necessary. We represent in the Senate the States as States, and, to my mind, it is immaterial whether the number they have is six, eight, or ten each. It really makes no difference. Each State has a similar number, and while it is wise that that body should not be too small, there is no reason and no justification on that ground that we should make the number representing the people turn upon the number in the Senate. It the people were to double in number, unless the States had increased, or unless the Senate chose to consent to an increase in the number, there would be no extra representation for the people in the House of Representatives. In that House, I take it, the people are represented as individuals, and if it is wise to say 50,000 should be represented by one member, surely as that number increases it is reasonable that the people should have full representation. Then we are told we are to have seventy-two members to start with, and my friend seems to forget that out of that seventy-two you have to deduct ten, which it is proposed to give the two States, Western Australia and Tasmania, so that really leaves sixty-two to be distributed among the others, and instead of having one member for, 50,000 it would be one for every 53,000 or 54,000.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

The hon. member will find the quota is 50,000.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

There is no provision that there is to be one for every 50,000. The clause reads:

As nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the House of Representatives for every one member of the Senate.

We start with thirty-six in the Senate, and if the number is to be doubled that gives us seventy-two. We are to start then with seventy-two in the House of Representatives. From the seventy-two you have to deduct ten, because it is provided that two States must each have a minimum number of five, and therefore you leave only sixty-two to be distributed amongst the other-States according to the quota. On this proposal you are giving those two States more than they are entitled to. I do not object to that, but I do object to give them more than they are entitled to and take the extra number away from the other States.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

The hon. member is not correct in saying that the number at first will be seventy-two. I take that as being double the number in the Senate. If you are to ascertain what the numbers are to be at first, you would take seventy-two-double the number of members in the Senate- and divide the seventy-two into the population for the time being, which would give more than seventy-two members of the House of Representatives, probably seventy-four or seventy-five.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I do not follow that.
Mr. O'CONNOR:
I understand he is assuming seventy-two would be the number of members of the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I am taking the words of the Bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
There is nothing there saying the number shall be seventy-two. The clause says:

As nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the House of Representatives for every one member of the Senate.

The next clause explains how that is to be done. You will find, if you take thirty-six as the basis of your calculations, that you will get a quota according to the present population of somewhere about 50,000, which will give the first House of Representatives over seventy-two members. It will be seventy-three, seventy-four, or seventy-five.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The Bill provides that you are to have, as nearly as practicable, twice the number in the House of Representatives as you have in the Senate. I fail to see the necessity for the words:

As nearly as practicable.

I know it is very scientific, and that, being a matter of figures, I am not supposed to understand it, as no lawyer knows anything about figures. So far as I understand the proposal-you start with thirty-six, and you double it; that gives seventy-two. Then all the second paragraph tells us is that you are to divide that seventy-two into the total population of the Commonwealth, and that gives you the number of people who are to be represented by a member in the House of Representatives. You then divide that number into the population of each State, and that gives you the number of members of each State. But that does not increase the total number. You cannot increase the total number, because you start off with the total number as the standard on which you act. You now start off by taking ten away, and whatever extra number you give to the smaller States, you, by that means, deprive the larger States of a certain amount of representation.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You reduce the number of your House.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You reduce the number of your House, but you give the smaller States a certain fixed number; you say, whatever the total number may be, whether it is sixty or thirty, the smaller States must still have ten.
Mr. O'CONNOR:
You give the smaller States greater representation than they would be entitled to according to the quota.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
And you take it away from the larger States because you say that as nearly as practicable the total number must be twice the number of senators.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You do take it away, because you have a maximum for certain purposes, and all that you give above the average to the smaller States you must take away from the others.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Supposing we start with only four States. That will give twenty-four senators, and forty-eight members in the House of Representatives. From that forty-eight you first of all take away ten, and thus leave only thirty-eight to be divided among the larger States. If you follow that out, you are certainly not giving the latter a fair representation. What happens as the population increases? You are compelled to have fresh divisions, and the result of it will be that if the population in one colony increases more rapidly than the population in another, that colony will be entitled to an extra number, but that extra number will be at the expense of the colony which has not increased so rapidly. The latter may have increased to a certain extent, yet, although it has increased above the number it originally started with, it will have to have fewer representatives in the popular House. Any colony having, say, twenty representatives to start with, may thus, in ten years' time, because some other State has increased more in its numbers, have to give up two or three of its representatives.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
For the mere object of having this relation, are we to put up with all these inconsistencies?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The provision is a preparation for the Norwegian system.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It seems to be simply a groundwork on which to base a proposal, that, in case of disputes between the two Houses, they may meet together as one body.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
No; nothing of the sort.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Well, that seems to me really the groundwork on which the whole matter has to rest. I think it is far better that we should fall back on the old proposal of the Commonwealth Bill. My hon. friend says it would not reduce the number of members, but he must know that frequently in America they have reduced the quota so as not to increase the number of their members in accordance with the increase of population.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I say it is a difficult matter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I have no objection whatever to limiting the number at the start to a certain fixed number, and then leaving it to the House of Representatives and the Senate to say that because the population has increased to a certain extent it is fair that there should be a larger number of members in the House of Representatives. Then it would be a question of bargain between the two Houses whether the House of Representatives should bear a larger proportion to the Senate. If you do that you will do away with the inconsistency which would arise where the population in one State would increase and in another would diminish. The smaller States will have to lose some of its members for the benefit of the larger. In a case where there is an increase of population in two States that increase will be relatively taken into consideration. The only one object seems to be to form a basis for these two Houses to meet. I think we will be making a grave mistake if we attempt to deal with it in any scientific manner. Let us take the old plan and fix it at one in 50,000. If you like, give to these smaller States their extra representation and you injure nobody. Adopt the plan of my hon. friend and you injure the larger States. Unless I hear some more satisfactory explanation, I will have to ask the House to fall back on the plan of the Commonwealth Bill.

Mr. GLYNN:
I think Mr. O'Connor is deserving of credit for having hit on a suggestion of this sort. But I do not think that the table is of much value because the alleged lesson of the figures is altogether wrong. As a matter of figures you cannot rely upon them, as the ratio of increase of population is geometrical, which as a matter of fact never occurs. As to the propriety of preventing an increase of membership proportionately to population, I agree with the principle of the Bill, which prevents that taking place without an Act of Parliament. Take the case of America as to the evil following unlimited increase. At the time of the union of the thirteen States the population was small, and they started with a ratio of one to 30,000. Had that ratio remained there the population of these thirteen States, which is now 24,000,000 would have a representation of about 800; that is, if you do not check the increase of members proportionately to population. The total population of America is 63,000,000, and the total representation in the House of Representatives is 357.

Mr. HIGGINS:
How was the increase checked?

Mr. GLYNN:
By periodically fixing the quota There is no automatic adjustment of quota. At all events we find from American experience; that we cannot rely on allowing an increased number of members with an increasing population, because, if you do that, you will certainly have a House which will be unwieldy and unmanageable. How would this quota system operate with regard to the smaller States? The quota would vary, and with it the relative representation of the States. Let us take the figures presented by Mr. O'Connor, which I presume are taken from Coghlan's statistics. Accepting his estimates of the rate of increase of the population, the position would be this, unless you had a minimum fixed, that in the year 1941-assuming you allowed the population to determine the number of members in the House-there would be a House of 446 members.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Whose figures are those?

Mr. GLYNN:
They are presented by Mr. O'Connor as explanatory of his suggestions. I am going to show in a moment or two how you cannot rely on them.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is on the basis of one member for every 50,000 of population.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
If the quota of 50,000 remained.

Mr. GLYNN:
You would have in 1941 a House of 446 members, of which number New South Wales would have 164 and South Australia only thirteen representatives. Of course that would not be tolerated for a moment. But I would point out this fact to Mr. O'Connor. Has he not estimated that population will increase in a geometrical ratio?-and of course it does not. According to these figures New South Wales in 1901 will have a population of 1,618,000, and in 1911 her population will be 2,427,000. There there is an increase of about 50 per cent., but when you come to 1921 you have an increase of 75 per cent. Population, however, does not increase in geometrical ratio, as far as in population matters you can call it such, at all-it increases more, as one, writer suggests, like the length of a dog's tail. If you followed out that principle here you would come to the conclusion that by the end of a comparatively few years that dog's tail would be about a mile long. in 1911 as I have said, New South Wales, according to these figures, would have a population of 2,427,000, and South Australia - which has now about 350,000 - is assumed to increase only to 482,000. What is there to justify that assumption? Why should we assume that the geometrical rate of increase will go on at all? South Australia's rate has diminished for the last ten years for reasons which we all know of, namely, the shrinkage of the prices of her staple products-wool and wheat; but there is nothing to show that within the next twenty years the rate may not outstrip Victoria's. You cannot possibly rely on the figures put before us upon which the proportion of the representation in the House of Representatives is based. But supposing these figures are correct-and they are put before us by the Constitutional Committee for our guidance the position of South Australia would be then that it would only have a representation in 1941 of such a number as thirteen in a House of 446, which the relation of thirteen to 446 and seventy-two determines. The position would really be this: As 446 is to thirteen, so would seventy-two be to the number of members South Australia would have in the House with a minimum of five. If I am wrong, perhaps Mr. O'Connor will explain. Would not the operation of the adjustment of the quota be that according to the figures put before us the number of members South Australia would be entitled to would be on this basis: As 446 is to thirteen so is seventy-two to the number of members we would have? If that is so, the representation of South Australia would be practically nothing.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

What difference does it make whether you take a fixed quota of 50,000 or a quota which is reckoned by multiplication and division of the population of the Commonwealth and the particular State to get the number of representatives?

Mr. GLYNN:

Say, for instance, that there were five members for the first 100,000 of the population, you might afterwards make the quota system apply to the surplus population to make the minimum increase proportionately to the increase in the number of members of the House. You deduct 600,000 from the total population of the six colonies, and then when you would get your quota-making the population upon which you strike your quota the whole population of the colony-you have the number of members of your House reckoned at a minimum of five. The effect of that will be that if you double the number of members in the House you would get ten for 200,000 of the population, and that would give a reasonable minimum of representation to the smaller States. If you follow the operation of the quota as fixed by the lines of the Bill now, you may have the representation of South Australia practically brought down to five in a House of seventy-two. That is not fair, and the minimum representation is too small.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That must always happen if you adopt the population basis.

Mr. GLYNN:
Something like it must happen, no doubt. I suggest that we should lessen the disparity by adopting the principle of giving a reasonable minimum representation, which would give five for the first 100,000, and then strike a general quota by deduction.

Mr. REID:
You are getting all you want.

Mr. GLYNN:
With five as the minimum, but it is not a minimum that varies with the increase of the House.

Mr. REID:
You want more than your proportion on the basis of five.

Mr. GLYNN:
No, I do not want more than my proportion in a House of seventy-two, but I want my proportion in accordance with the increase of the House. The ratio of the increase of the minimum would be determined by the ratio of the increase of the members of the House.

An HON. MEMBER:
You want a sliding scale.

Mr. GLYNN:
It is not a sliding scale, it is fixed by the ratio of the increase. I submit that that would be a much fairer system than having a minimum of five. If we had a House of 144 instead of having a minimum of five, it would be.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Do I understand Sir George Turner's difficulty to be because we give arbitrarily five to Western Australia and five to Tasmania that we thereby reduce the total number of members who shall represent the people in the House of Representatives?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Yes; reduce the number for the other House.

Mr. SYMON:
You increase it.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

By giving that arbitrary number to those two States we reduce the number to which the quota would entitle the other States. I presume Sir George Turner is starting off from that error, and that there shall be absolutely only seventy-two members of the House of Representatives to start with.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

That is the meaning of what Sir George said. Does he recognise the fact that we are not to start off with only seventy-two but seventy-six?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

That is not provided for here.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

There are three parts of section 23. In the first part and in a part of 25 there are provisions which govern this question. In the first place we see that "as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the Senate for every member of the Senate." Then in section 23 we find:

The number of members to which each State is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the State as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by the quota.

We have had it explained to us that the quota of 3,609,000 is 50,000 divided by seventy-two, and that if you have a fraction over 25,000 that gives another member. This will leave us in this position: that we shall have New South Wales, on its population or December 31st, 1896, of 1,297,640, with twenty-six members; Victoria, with 1,174,888, and twenty-four members because it has twenty-three and a sufficient fraction to entitle it to the twenty-fourth; Queensland, 472,179, nine members; South Australia, 360,220, seven members; and Western Australia and Tasmania, which, according to the quota, are only entitled to three each, would arbitrarily have five each. As a consequence you have four representatives for these two States more than the quota, and therefore there will be to start with seventy-six members. I understand that disposes of Sir George Turner's difficulty.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

One of them, but it is a peculiar way of reading the section.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

I think that is quite right if you read these lines in the clause:

And the number of members to which each State is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the State as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by the quota.

That gives us a total of seventy-six, although the quota divided over the whole of the population would only give seventy-two.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The difficulty which Sir George Turner foresees is that the population of these colonies may increase so largely as to necessitate a larger House of Representatives than would be one represented by double the numbers of the Senate, because if these States remain for ever without being subdivided there is no doubt that while this proportion would be reasonable now it would not be so in the future, but according to this section the Parliament must keep the proportion between the two Houses of two to one. On the other hand, as the population increases you would have enormous constituencies, and yet you could not increase the numbers of your House of Representatives. When this matter first came before me I had in view the proposal of one of two things. In the first place I thought of the Norwegian principle of having the two Houses sitting together in case of a deadlock, and if you had any proposal of that kind you would have to keep some relative numbers between the two Houses, but I am rather inclined to believe now that this hard and fast rule of having double the number in the House of Representatives as in the Senate may lead to considerable inconvenience in the future, So long as you keep a reasonable number for debate and consultation it is all that you want in the Senate, and therefore I would put it to Mr. O'Connor, who I believe is the author of this clause, whether there might not be some scheme introduced by which the Parliament would have the power of amending the Constitution under certain circumstances so as not to keep absolutely to that proportion.

Mr. HIGGINS:

In addition to the objection raised by Sir George Turner regarding the ambiguity in the construction of this clause, I have another, and that is the extra representation given to the less populous States, which involves a proportionate reduction in the strength of the representation of the larger States. I have a strong objection to this system altogether. I cannot see what connection there is between the number of members who represent the States and the number of members who are to represent population in the House that represents population. What connection is there between the number of the States and the number of the population? If Australia be divided into six States you will have a certain number of members in the House of Representatives, and if divided into ten States, you will have an increased number of members. The whole thing is quite arbitrary. There is no possible connection between the two things, and what object, may I ask, in addition can be suggested for this principle of making the number of members of the House of Representatives exactly double the number of the Senate! What ratio is there between them? The only object I can see is to introduce a clause under the Norwegian system, in which both Houses would be sitting together. As far as regards that it should never have my vote or any influence that I can give, because, I say it is simply a device for the purpose of enabling votes of members elected by the people to be defeated by the votes of members whom the people have not elected. I am always against any system which will bring in those who represent the minority on an equal footing with those who represent the majority. It is not democratic, it is against those who say the people ought to rule, and I would suggest to Mr. O'Connor, who has so lucidly explained this clause, that now, as we have apprehended the clause, as we see its effect, it would be better to revert to the provision-substantially the provision which was in the Bill of 1891—that there shall be one member in the Senate for a certain number of the population, I do not care whether it is 30,000, 40,000, or 50,000. Fifty thousand might do for a start. Then you may say, until Parliament otherwise provides, it will be 50,000. It is said it is very, hard to reduce the number of members, but I say, supposing the population of Australia should increase to a huge extent during the next fifty years—it is quite possible, if there should be a great discovery—we should not be hampered by the number of members that should happen to be, in the Senate, and I think the simplest method is that, until Parliament otherwise provides, there shall be one member for every 50,000. That is substantially what was done in the 1891 Bill. I do not want to move this. Others before me have suggested the same thing, but unless someone else moves it, I will. That would be to strike out the words from "as nearly as practicable."

Mr. REID:

I have all along wished to limit the number of members of the House of Representatives. I have no wish to see it growing to an inordinate size, as would be the case under the Commonwealth Bill, and as long as the House of Representatives is twice as numerous as the Senate I think that is a sufficient difference. I believe the smaller number would work better than the larger one. As a matter of economy I think the difference is worth considering, and besides I think we may look upon this principle as laying a fair foundation for the application of the Norwegian system.

Mr. ISAACS:

That is the idea.
Mr. O'CONNOR:
Not necessarily.

Mr. REID:
Not necessarily. Apart from any such consideration, I look upon it on its merits as a solution of the matter, but it has the additional recommendation that it makes application to the Norwegian system a reasonable thing, if it should be decided to apply it. I do not like the provision in the Commonwealth Bill, which would start the number of representatives with 120 members. The number is fixed in Canada, and the quota differs according to the population. It is well to fix the number. There is a provision to enable both Houses, if they come to an agreement, to alter it.

Mr. ISAACS:
I have no hesitation in saying that Victoria would take this proposal as a usurpation of power, and we have only to take the figures of Mr. O'Connor to demonstrate that. The hon. gent eman's figures show us that Victoria, with a population at present of about 1,200,000, would be entitled to twenty-four members in the House of Representatives, and with a population of 4,000,000 she would be entitled to thirteen.

Mr. REID:
How do you make that out?

Mr. ISAACS:
It suits New South Wales perhaps, assuming these figure are right.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Where do you find thirteen?

Mr. BARTON:
It comes to eighty.

Mr. ISAACS:
Not according to the system proposed. You have to take seventy two members of the House of Representatives, and divide that number amongst the different States according to their relative and not their actual populations. Therefore a colony increasing fast in population may find at the next election, or when the new arrangements are made, that it has fewer members than when its population was smaller.

Mr. REID:
Will you tell us where you get thirteen under any conceivable arrangement?

Mr. SYMON:
It is increasing backwards.

Mr. ISAACS:
Precisely; but the quot is relative.
It is the total population, I think, that is meant.

Mr. ISAACS:
Get the quota and apply the principle advocated by this clause, and you get the relative proportion of the members.

Mr. SOLOMON:
It is a roundabout method of getting at it instead of by the ordinary rule of three.

Mr. WISE:
Tasmania would have to take Victoria then as a kind of small State.

Mr. ISAACS:
South Australia at present would get seven members according to these figures. This colony now has a population of 350,000 or 360,000 people. In 1941 she gets 670,000, according to the figures supplied, and under that she would only get five. She would only be entitled as of right to two; but the provision as to minimum would give her five.

Mr. WALKER:
Are you going to keep the Senate the same till the time?

Mr. ISAACS:
I am assuming, for the sake of argument, that it is kept at that. The question of what this Federation is going to cost, on the assumption that it i

Mr. WALKER:
I think you would have three colonies in Queensland to agree to it in the first place.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I thought I made myself clear.

Mr. ISAACS:
Yes, the hon. member made it clear. I will verify my figures in a moment.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That is the Bill as it stood when it left the Constitutional Committee.

Mr. ISAACS:
I am not blaming the hon. member. Regarding the proposal from a democratic standpoint, let us take it that twenty-four members have to contest seats among 1,200,000 people. It is difficult enough even in that case for liberals to make sure of having a fair representation; but if thirteen members have to contest seats among 4,000,000, where is the protection to democracy? How is that liberalising the representation? I have no hesitation in saying Victoria would not accept it.

Mr. LEWIS:
Will not every Victorian have the same share in a representative as every man in New South Wales?

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear; exactly.

Mr. ISAACS:

That is not the whole question. I think myself that the argument as regards the illiberal character of the representation through the majority of constituencies has just as much force in regard to New South Wales as to Victoria; but New South Wales can say, according to the figures furnished they will have twenty-six members either way, and will be in no worse position. But Victoria and South Australia will say, why should our representation be cut down by half? South Australia may say, why should we, instead of having seven members for 360,000 people, have only five members for 670,000 people?

Mr. REID:

Let me put this: Suppose we had the old Commonwealth basis of one member for every 30,000 people. Fifty years hence, applying that 80,000 basis to those enormous figures of eight millions for New South Wales and four millions for Victoria, then under the system of one member for every 30,000 people, you would be relatively in exactly the same position, except that your number would not be thirteen representatives against twenty-four for New South Wales, but under the old system 133 for Victoria against 273 for New South Wales. So relatively your position would be exactly the same, except that you would have an enormous House instead of a smaller one.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

There are two ways in which you would get an increase. If the number of members of the Senate should increase by the admission of new States, then you must have an increase in the Houses of Representatives. But suppose you have not an increase in the number of States, but you have a very large increase in the population, and you want to increase the number of members in the House of Representatives, then you will have to add to your members in the Senate as many members as you think necessary to meet what would be the representation in the House of Representatives.

Mr. ISAACS:

Precisely, but New South Wales may progress by leaps and bounds—and I hope we all will—and some other colony which does not go ahead quite so fast may not want any further representation. New South Wales says:

We have increased our population by so many millions and we want more representation, but we cannot have it without more representation in the Senate, and if we have more representation in the Senate every colony must have more representation.
And so it goes round; and the burden of the expenditure becomes intolerable. I will proceed to show that my figures are correct as the data supplied. I am assuming that the Senate is kept as it is with thirty-six representatives, and the number in the House of Representatives is say the minimum of seventy-two, though I am accepting that number against myself. You divide seventy-two into 22,322,000—the total population for 1941—according to the paper circulated.

Mr. MCMLLAN:
I presume the point you are trying to prove is that it would be to the advantage of the larger colonies that progress more rapidly to keep the present representation in the Senate, so as to relatively decrease the power of the others.

Mr. ISAACS:
It might or might not. They gain at the expense of the colonies that progress, but relatively not so fast. Now divide seventy-two into 22,322,000 and you get, roughly speaking, 310,000 as the quota. With that quota New South Wales would in 1941, with its population of 8,198,000, have twenty-six members; Victoria, with its 4,000,000, would have about thirteen.

Mr. BARTON:
Is not that representation according to numbers?

Mr. ISAACS:
Of course it is as to the numbers at the time.

Mr. BARTON:
I think you are making a mistake.

Mr. ISAACS:
I hope I am, but I am assuming the correctness of the figures, and on that assumption the result is that "The more people you have the less actual representation you are to get."

Mr. REID:
Apparently you do not get less, but exactly the same.

Mr. ISAACS:
Then I come to Queensland, which with 7,500,000 people would, roughly speaking, have about twenty-four representatives; South Australia with its 670,000 people would be entitled to two, strictly speaking, but of course she would have the minimum of five. Western Australia, roughly speaking, would be entitled to the minimum number, and Tasmania would be entitled to one and a half, but would get the minimum of five. Tasmania would thus get no more for her 420,000 people than she has now with her
Mr. O'CONNOR:
Do you take as the basis the present Senate?

Mr. ISAACS:
Of course.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
If you want to increase the representation in the House of Representatives you must increase the numbers in the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS:
What does the honorable gentleman think the federal expenditure would be if we are continually to increase the number in the Senate?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
your objection is that you do not get a large enough increase.

Mr. ISAACS:
My objection is that Victoria will say, when we go back—"On the present basis of population, with a quota of one representative for every 50,000, we would have twenty-four members as against New South Wales twenty-six, but when we have increased to 4,000,000 of people, how many members would we have?" We would have to reply, "Just one-half." Roughly, subject to correction, I work it out like this:—In 1901 New South Wales would have twenty-six, in 1911 twenty-six, in 1921 twenty-seven, in 1931 twenty-seven, and in 1941 twenty-six. Victoria would have at present twenty-four, in 1901 twenty-two, in 1911 twenty, in 1921 seventeen, in 1931 fifteen, and in 1941 thirteen.

Mr. REID:
That is all right.

Mr. ISAACS:
The question is whether the Victorians will think it all right.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That is on the assumption that the rate of increase for the past ten years will be continued.

Mr. ISAACS:
I am using the figures which my hon. friend has been good enough to furnish.

Mr. BARTON:
And it is on the assumption also that the representation in the House of Representatives is kept at seventy-two for fifty years.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is on the assumption that the Senate remains the same-on the assumption that the Senate is not doubled. You would require the Senate to be doubled to allow Victoria to retain for a population of 4,000,000 the same number of representatives as she has for a population of 1,200,000.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   It is only important as to the relations of the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS:
   My hon. friend is quite right in regard to that, but when he is asking a colony to say "Yes" or "No" to it they will look at it broadly in this way, and say, "We will have to have larger and much more expensive districts we think it is not fair, and we cannot agree to it. We should have large constituencies for the House of Representatives, and instead of having one member for each 50,000 of population we should have only one for every 310,000."

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   Supposing Victoria increases in a much greater proportion to the other colonies, would it be so objectionable?

Mr. ISAACS:
   Equally objectionable from an Australian point of view.

Mr. BARTON:
   Not from a Victorian.

Mr. ISAACS:
   It would be objectionable also equally from a Victorian point of view, from this aspect, that the constituencies would be so much larger. This process of course retains one democratic principle of having representation according to population, but it increases the size of the constituencies so greatly that it is a long step in a conservative direction for all the colonies.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
   That is always in the hands of the Parliament. They can increase the number.

Mr. ISAACS:
   They can, but they can not increase the numbers without also increasing the Senate.

Mr. BARTON:
   Supposing that is so?

Mr. ISAACS:
   That makes a very expensive Federation. If you increase the Senate so as to give Victoria the same representation as she would have to-day under this scheme you not only double the cost of the Federal Parliament, but you also double the size of the constituencies. In fact, you treble them, so that it would be one member to 150,000 instead of to 50,000. I should like to point out one or two other reasons why I do not think this is a proper scheme. My hon. friend seems to think it is essential that there should be this proportion between the Senate and the House of Representatives. But it does not exist in America, and if it does not exist there, on what principle can it be argued that it is essential? My hon. friend replied to that that the Senate has extra powers. I would like to seriously ask what that has to do with the question? Whether you invest the Senate with executive powers or not, what has that to do with the question as to whether it ought to bear a certain proportion to the House of Representatives or not?

Mr. DOUGLAS:
What has the other thing got to do with it? We are going upon a system of our own.

Mr. ISAACS:
The hon. member is perfectly right, and no doubt every

Mr. FRASER:
You could give up some proportion

Mr. ISAACS:
If you should give up some proportion is that not a matter afterwards for the Federal Parliament? What is the reason of this proposal? The only reason is to prevent one House outstripping the interests of the Federation in numbers and expense, and to prevent its becoming too expensive and unwieldy. Why should we in this Constitution pronounce for all time the proportion those two Houses should bear to one another? The hon. member Mr. O'Connor said in effect that this was the only practical way to effect it. He will see at once that if we adopt his system you make the Senate once and for ever the arbiter of whether the House of Representatives shall ever be increased at all. The Senate can say, "No; we will never consent to any increase in the House of Representative" and that House would be inclined to do it under many circumstances, and therefore we say: "that although the overwhelming bulk of the population might desire to have better representation and more liberal and complete legislation, they could be blocked by colonies which desire that there should not be any increase in the House of Representatives, while they do not wish for any increase in their own ranks." If you do what the Americans have done and say that there shall be one for a certain number - one for 30,000-to start with, and that the quota might be increased according as both Houses agree, you have done all that is necessary to solve the problem, because, on the one hand, the people will never be favorable to a House becoming unwieldy, and they will demand from their representatives that a proper and economical basis shall be preserved in regard to the House of Representatives. If the people desire that, you may be quite sure that the Senate will never object, because it is always in the direction of limiting the size of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Does not this put into the hands of the people the same power?

Mr. ISAACS:

It puts, into the hands of the people the right to decrease their own members. They can never increase them, because that is fixed by the Constitution, without the consent of the Senate. Besides the people will be always ready, and willing, and anxious to cut down the number of their representatives, just as the people to-day are desirous of seeing the number of their representatives reduced.

Mr. FRASER:

They never can do it.

Mr. ISAACS:

I will read a passage from a book I have here dealing with

Mr. FRASER:

Let us keep to what we know ourselves.

Mr. ISAACS:

I am going to draw attention to something the hon. member does not know. I have a book here entitled Sheppard's "Constitutional Text Book." Its date is 1863, and I will bring actual figures down to the present time from a later book.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

Would it not be much better for Sir George Turner and the hon. member to meet Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor and try to arrange this matter.

Mr. BARTON:

There is not the slightest occasion for any such thing.

Mr. ISAACS:

Referring to the clause, about the number of representatives, he says:

The clause under consideration provides that there shall be one representative for every 30,000 inhabitants. If the population of the State does not reach that number it is, nevertheless, entitled to one representative. The first apportionment of representatives among the several States was merely temporary, and intended to exist only until the first census. An the population of the country has increased the number of representatives has been increased by various Acts of Congress. The first House of Representatives consisted of sixty-five members, which was one for every 30,000 inhabitants. By the census of 1790 there were constituted 106 representatives. One for every 33,000 inhabitants. By that of 1810, 183 representatives-one for every 35,000 inhabitants. By that of 1820, 213 representatives -one for every 35,000 inhabitants. By that of 1820, 213 representatives - one for every 40,000 inhabitants. By that of 1830, 242 representatives - one for every 47,700 inhabitants. By that of 1840, 223 representatives - one for every 70,680 inhabitants. By the Act of May 23, 1850, the number of representatives was increased to 233 members from the States, which was one for every 93,423 inhabitants. Subsequently an additional number was allowed to California, making the whole number of representatives 234.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
A gradually increased quota, just as this is, we give.

Mr. ISAACS:
They gradually increased the quota according to the circumstances of the country, but, at the same time, the number, of their representatives were also increased. The author goes on to say:

Thus, by dividing the aggregate representative population of the States, which by the last census (1863) was ascertained to be 21,767,673, by 233, the number of representatives established, as we have seen, by law, a quotient of 93,423 is obtained as the ratio of representation.

Mr. GLYNN:
One hundred and eighty thousand.

Mr. ISAACS:
It may be. This was in 1863, and they have gradually amounted up from 30,000.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
The present quota is 154,000; 325 members.

Mr. ISAACS:
I am glad to know hon. members are noticing this. He goes on to say they have gradually gone up to 93,000, so they have not hesitated to reduce the proportion of members. The latest book I have is dated 1889, and it is the celebrated work of Dr. Woodrow Wilson, and called "The State." In section 1,066 he has this passage:

Apportionment of representatives. - Congress itself decides by law how many representatives there shall be; it then divides the number decided upon among the States according to population; after which each State is divided by its own Legislature into as many districts as it is to have representatives, and the people of each of these districts are entitled to elect one member to the House. The only limitation put by the Constitution itself upon the number of representatives is that there shall never be more than one for every 30,000 inhabitants. The first House of Representatives had by direction of the Constitution itself sixty-five members, upon the proportion of one for every 33,000 inhabitants. The number has of course grown, and the proportion decreased with the growth of population. A census is taken every ten years, and the rule is to effect readjustments and a redistribution of representation after every census. At present there are 330 members in the House, and the States are given one member for every 154,325 of their inhabitants. In cases where a State has many thousands more than an even number of times that many inhabitants it is given an additional member to represent the balance. Thus, if it have four times 154,325 inhabitants and a very large fraction over, it is given five members instead of four only. If any State have less than 154,325 it is given one member notwithstanding, being entitled to one by constitutional provision.

I am anxious to show that the American Legislature, faced with exactly the same difficulty as exists amongst ourselves, has not hesitated to lay down a rule—faithfully followed at every decennial period—to increase the number of members according as the population required, and at the same time to take care that the proportion of representatives is decreased.

Mr. BARTON:
Is not that done by the Congress?

Mr. ISAACS:
Yes.

Mr. BARTON:
Is not the point of your argument that the Senate would refuse to do the same in these colonies?

Mr. ISAACS:
My point is that the Senate may refuse to increase the numbers, but if it is asked by the people to reduce the proportion it will do it. Where it is asked to increase the members and preserve the proportion between themselves and the others it is a different question. In America they do not have to increase the Senate, and if they had to do so at the same time that they give the people the necessary representation to enable their members to look after their interests, they would have a machinery which would break down of its own weight. If you load this Federation with conditions from which there is no escape unless by an amendment of the Constitution, which is very difficult, you will turn a great many people against it who are wavering at the present time. Sir George Turner had the candor and frankness to tell the people of Victoria what this Federation would cost them in the loss of actual revenue, and he was blamed for it, because it was said that it might determine waverers against Federation, and that owing to the great preponderating advantages—some of them advantages of sentiment—he had no right to refer to these difficulties.
If we were to go back and tell them that we could not ensure them having increased representation without increasing the other House as well, which is not intended according to the arguments of some hon. members, and that combined with that fact Victoria would be a continually diminishing quantity, we would have to encounter more difficulties than we would be able to surmount. I wish to say again, as forcibly as I can, that we shall have difficulties enough without this extra one in order to induce people to accept in the necessary numbers this Constitution. I feel little doubt that if we add this one we will have added one too many.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I have listened to the very able speech that we have just heard, and it appears to me that the whole of the honorable member's argument has proceeded, if I may say so, from a provincial point of view, and from an assumption that his great colony is not in the future to be as great as it is at present. I prefer to go on the contrary assumption, that whatever difficulties Victoria has had in the past are being overcome, that she will go on by leaps and bounds in the future, and that instead of the disparity which the honorable member anticipates at the moment there will be abundant cause for joy.

Mr. PEACOCK:
All owing to the present Government in power in Victoria.

Mr. ISAACS:
I hope also owing to the Federation we shall have.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
It appears to me quite unnecessary to go into the calculations from the short formula set up in the Bill by my honorable friend who suggested it.
That formula is clear and has been enough in itself, and the address of my honorable friend Mr. Isaacs has not been directed to show that it is not correct, but to show that it will work out badly. My honorable friend told me that South Australia would be in a worse position, and Victoria would be also. I said in reply that would be all right. So far as the House of Representatives is concerned, we must understand that the House of Representatives is the House of the federated people of Australia, and has nothing to do with the localisation of them. We care not whether they are in Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, or Queensland, or anywhere else, for they are to be represented according to their numbers.
The only point which my honorable friend had in preparing this scheme was to have some specific method by which the principle for the representation in the Lower House being doubled in the Senate should be carried out immediately, and preserved in the future. He had no other object. What we have to consider is the simple question-can we agree that we begin with a ratio of two to one, and
Mr. ISAACS:

Not is it wise, but is it necessary?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I think our Constitution might be founded as much on wisdom as necessity. My honorable friend destroyed his argument to a large extent, but not altogether. He said the matter ought to be left with Parliament. He first complained that it was left to a certain extent with Parliament, and that Parliament would be reluctant to increase the number. Then he complained it was not left altogether to Parliament, because they had to keep this two-to-one ratio, and he said Parliament would not make an increase. How will the Parliament be in both Houses? In the House of Representatives it will represent the people of Australia, and in the other House, which has the power of veto, it will represent the people of each State. Does the hon. member think that the people in each State will consent to be not adequately represented? It is a fact that the Senate represents the people, and the same people in each State, as much as it is that the House of Representatives represents the people of Australia. It would therefore not only agree to every reasonable increase in the House of Representatives, but insist upon it. Does my hon. friend think that if populations increase, as we are sure they will increase, the people will not exercise their power, both in the colonies and in the Federation, over their representatives to compel them, when they deem it necessary, to make their districts smaller and their representatives more. My hon. friend forgets that it is the same suffrage running all through the election of both Houses, and the same power going through the Commonwealth will insist upon representation in accordance with the advanced condition of the Commonwealth as that running through the electors of the States makes them insist upon representation there as well. The hon. member asks, why make any condition at all? Why admit it from the beginning, and insist upon continuing it? He says they did not do it in America. Truly enough. My hon. friend was frank enough to give us the answer while he made the objection; but the American Senate did not find it necessary to provide for an increase in its numbers. Its position is one of such proud, dignified, pre-eminent authority, so far above that in which we can place the Senate here, that the relations of numbers come to it in many particulars as a matter of second moment. There the Senate had handed over to it the control of foreign affairs—it is the arbiter of peace or war—and executive powers. But we are establishing a Senate with altogether different powers, and which are to be in accord with the powers of the States, not for to-day only, but for all time, so that they may be adequately protected; and being unable to give it that great power which was given to the American Senate, we try with these precautions not to make it quite as important as the other House.

Mr. ISAACS:

Much more.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

It is impossible to make it as powerful a House as that which can originate Bills, and it is quite impossible to put upon this House such powers as would give them the preeminent authority which the American Senate possesses; and so the Constitutional Committee, or a majority of them - I do not know that there was any division -

Mr. ISAACS:

Oh, yes!

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Well, a large majority, at all events, and a large majority of those representing the larger colonies who were not cabined and confined by the narrow limits of their own populations at the present moment, but looked to the bigger time ahead when the results of the whole would be greater, though the incidence of some might be smaller-sought to put the Constitution on a basis that would ensure the preservation of the power of each House without the human probability of abrogation of either. The question, after all, is a very narrow one. We are all agreed that at present the relation shall be two to one. As a matter of constitutional enactment, shall we say that it shall be continued in the future? The question is in a small compass. We agree on the basis on which we are to start. Is it wise to put into the Constitution the basis, or is it wiser, having fixed on that initial relation, to leave it to the Parliament of the future to say what it shall be? I say, so far from this alteration which Mr. Isaacs suggests, increasing the numbers as occasion required, it would diminish it. The power of veto would be more likely to be exercised, but when we have fixed a certain basis on which the increase in the two Houses shall go—we have no possibility of a conflict between them—each House would have a disposition to aggrandise itself by increasing its members, but neither House would fear that in thrusting an increase on the other House it would diminish its own power.

Mr. GORDON:

If I understand the argument it is this, that we are faced by two possible disadvantages, on the one hand the danger from a liberal point of view of a small number of candidates having to canvass a huge electorate, and on the other hand the point put by Mr. O'Connor, of an unwieldy House. We concede the proposition that the ratio between the Houses shall always be maintained. Then we have the two disadvantages, which are admitted disadvantages, and we can conceive of no scheme which will not involve some disadvantages. We have the point so strongly argued by Mr. Isaacs, that we shall have a small number of candidates canvassing a huge electorate. That will mean conservatism. Then we have the point of an unwieldy House. But these disadvantages are only:

Till the Parliament otherwise provides.

That saves the position. It must be conceded that the proportion between the two Houses must be maintained.

Mr. ISAACS:
Oh, no.

Mr. GORDON:
Then the hon. members should have attacked it on that ground. Disturb the basic proposition, and we have something we can go upon, but if it is conceded that we must have the constant relative strength between the two Houses, the thing resolves itself into a narrow proposition, and there is always the saving salt of the will of the Parliament coming in to do away with, any preponderating disadvantage which might ensue by the present quota being always the factor in the calculation,

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

To put the matter in order I move:

That the, words "as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the House of Representatives for every one member of the Senate" be struck out, and "and until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides each State shall have one representative for every 50,000 Of its people" inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The view I take is somewhat different from that of Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs, yet it is affected by the arguments they have adduced. It seemed, and it still seems to me, that the proposition of Mr. O'Connor is extremely ingenious, and I agree myself, although I doubt if my colleagues do, with the statement of Sir John Downer that it forms an excellent commencement for this Constitution. I think we all feel that, while the Assembly should start with a sufficient number of members to transact its business, the Senate should also commence with a sufficient membership to command respect, and to be able to discharge the functions with which it is entrusted. I have seen no ground to alter my opinion in regard to the merits of the proposition of Mr. O'Connor so far as it is concerned with the launching of the Commonwealth. But we Should not stereotype that proposal in the Constitution instead of leaving it to the two Chambers themselves-the Parliament of the Commonwealth- to afterwards determine whether it shall follow exactly on these lines or amend them. Of course, by an amendment of the Constitution this principle can hereafter be altered. But it is undesirable in this instance to require an amendment of the Constitution, because it is one of the matters in which, whatever may happen, it is absolutely certain there will be great changes. We cannot possibly foresee the future, whether as to the gathering together or the dispersal of population in these colonies, or the division of colonies as they at present exist, nor define where the great and perhaps overwhelming accretions of population will be. Under these circumstances, why lay down an iron rule for changing conditions that will, involve great expenditure and great difficulty in order that it may be altered. We are, as it seems to me, justified, and, well justified, in embodying in this Constitution general principles which will relate to the permanent conditions of the Commonwealth, those which will obtain for all time, but this is distinctly a changing condition.

Mr. BARTON:
That is why the words

Until the parliament otherwise provides are placed at the head of the paragraph.

Mr. DEAKIN:
They are placed only at the head of the second paragraph, and, as I read it, that means until the Parliament otherwise provides in regard to the quota of its people.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear. That is it, exactly.

Mr. DEAKIN:
If those words commenced the clause, and the whole clause were governed by the words, my objection would be removed. There is no occasion for fear on the part of the less populous States, inasmuch as the Senate will be certainly strong enough to protect itself and its own interest and the interests of its States in this and every other respect. It will be as free as the House of Representatives, it will derive its authority as directly from the people; and if it desires an increase of members it can obtain it just as readily as the House, of Representatives, and can insist upon it. If the Senate of the United States had at any time desired an increase of its numbers it could have obtained it. That appears to me not only to answer a great deal of my friend's argument, but to throw a good deal of light on his position and upon the position of Sir George Turner. If the United States Senate could have enlarged its numbers why cannot this Senate do the same once you have started it on a fair basis, and fixed, say the first decade... as the time for which the principle shall be in operation? After a longer time I would point out that serious practical difficulties may arise. Mr.

Isaacs has referred to them; I will do no more than enumerate them. First the progressive enlargement of the size of the constituencies for the House of Representatives is decidedly illiberal in its tendency. We all know that while the reduction of numbers is possible, it has rarely or never been popular, and would not be at all events when the number of members is so small as in this case. Then you have to remember that the States to suffer are not the small States with their minimum fixed, and not the greatest with their increasing membership. I am not arguing this question from a Victorian point of view. Personally, I do not think the position of Victoria in regard to population is likely to be much altered. The minor colonies will only suffer in this way: they will be kept to the minimum of their representation for all time; and being kept to their minimum the colonies between them and the greatest colonies, which will increase their representation, are the colonies which will be pinched out until their number is reduced to the minimum. What the minor colonies have to look at is that before they can get an increase in their numbers they must increase in a greater ratio than the population of the nation. The population of the nation will be steadily enlarging, and on this plan the number of representatives will not follow it. Look at the table circulated by Mr.

O'Connor; you will not have 446 members in 1941. That is quite certain. If the increase in representation does not keep pace with the increase of population, as it will not-the smaller colonies before they can get an increase -they will only have to get an extra 50,000 at the start—may by the time they have passed the population to which their minimum entitles them, find that the quota has reached to 100,000. There is very little prospect of their getting more than their five representatives, while the middle colonies, between them and the colonies which will have a great increase, will be in an even worse position. They will not be prevented from falling back to the minimum. Hon. members may say, and properly say, that I am speaking of contingencies that may never arise, and I do not profess to say that it is more than possible. But as it is, this provision may last in the Constitution for fifty, 100, or 150 years. And which of us can foresee, or dare attempt to decree an iron condition

Mr. BARTON:

 What do you want after ten years?
Mr. DEAKIN:

Leave it to the Parliament to determine. If the Senate does not wish to increase itself further—if sub-divisions into States take place,

Mr. BARTON:

I do not wish to make a long speech about this. It seems to me that a great deal is being made of a very plain proposals proposal which works out plainly enough. The argument of my hon. friend Mr. Isaacs was very elaborate, and while upon the surface an argument against proportional representation according to numbers, it was, I take it, probably in its essence an elaborate argument against the proportion of two to one being maintained between the Houses of Representatives and the Senate. I really believe that is the point of attack. I am strongly in favor of maintaining that proportion.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Whether they want it or not?

Mr. BARTON:

I favor maintaining it, because in a Constitution of this kind it is a desirable thing that when you yourselves fix the relative powers of the two Houses you should also fix their proportions in number in such a way as will enable them to exercise those powers. If you define their powers you should also have a right to define their proportion to each other, so as to give that protection by which you think the proper exercise of those powers will be really secured. That is the object for which one portion of this clause was written, namely, that there should be as nearly as practicable a proportion of two to one in the two Houses, while, with reference to the method of defiling with the quota, that is left to the subsequent action of Parliament, so far as that quota may not meet with approval after. Now, that means, as I take it, that there are two things here concerned—a principle and a method. The principle is that the Houses should be in the proportion of two to one—that is a proper thing to lay down in your Constitution—and to require a referendum to alter it. On the other hand, the ascertainment of the quota is a mere method. It is therefore an appropriate thing to put in this collocation of words, "Until Parliament otherwise provides," because there may be something better devised than this quota, although the ingenuity of my hon. friends over there has not devised anything better. That is the real situation. It is to no purpose for Mr. Isaacs to argue that if there is a certain increase of population in the Commonwealth the result may be that one colony may have a larger proportion in that increase than his own colony. I thought the hon. member was a democrat, and that he wanted to maintain the principle of proportional representation in the House of Representatives. But his argument is against that, because if he wishes to destroy that principle only to fall back upon a proportion of one member to 50,000 of a population, then we come to one of two things; either there will be an inordinately large House of Representatives in the course of time, and an inordinately expensive one, or, on the other hand, the Senate will become so impotent that it can offer no effectual obstacle or bar to any injustice which is contemplated by the House of Representatives. That is not my view of Federation. I believe it is a total abnegation of the principle of Federation. While we, who represent large colonies, think that the principle of responsible government must be preserved, and while with Money Bills we may seek to have it in such a form that the working character of the machine must be preserved, we ought to be prepared to concede what are the principles of Federation, and to see that the relative numerical strength of the two Houses is not such that their very disparity may be a considerable injury to one House, and therefore to the people it represents. I may be told that the Senate of the United States has not increased in proportion to the increase in number in the House of Representatives. That is no answer at all-it is a surface answer only, for this reason: That the Senate of the United States has conserved to it to-day certain powers which will never be granted to a Senate under such a Constitution as this is. For instance, the Senate has the sole power of trying cases of impeachment, and while the President may enter into treaties, it is only by the Senate that these treaties may be ratified. While, too, he may have certain views as to executive officers, it is only by the Senate that these executive appointments can be ratified. There is that, wide range given to the Senate in the American Constitution which is so strong that it makes it a Court of Justice to try impeachments and an executive body to make appointments-powers which prevent it falling into a drivelling, weakly condition. It is necessary therefore to preserve the principle contained in this clause and to keep it intact, except by referendum to the people.

Mr. DEAKIN:

That statement is absolutely opposed to Mr. Bryce's judgment, for he says that those powers are no source of strength to the Senate, but rather tie it up.

Mr. BARTON:

They may be tied up as regards impeachments, because party violence may prevent those impeachments, but whether they are tied up or not, the hon. member can judge independently of Mr. Bryce.

Mr. DEAKIN:

It is not a source of strength.
Mr. BARTON:
Who refuses to ratify the arbitration treaty between Great Britain and the States? Is not the source of the strength of the Senate in the exercise of its powers? The result of that exercise may make a body unpopular, and if the hon. member is going to limit his argument to that point, who is to be constituted a judge?

Mr. PEACOCK:
Will the hon. member show us why there should be a ratio?

Mr. BARTON:
I am very sorry if my speech has been misunderstood. I have given reasons concerning that. I have laid down as a proposition that, inasmuch as you do not give to the Senate the powers given in the United States Constitution, it is no answer to say that we should prevent the Senate from increasing, in this ratio on the ground that the powers here given are a source of strength to it. On the other hand, why there should be a ratio is this, that in the use of those powers, if there is to be a wide disparity in numbers, so that as between the Senate and the House of Representatives the former becomes transformed into a small committee or board in the range of the powers given to it, it dwindles in popular approval and loses the support of the people in relation to the performance of its duty. I contend that it is not desirable to Place the Senate in that position, and the principle of these clauses should be maintained, which principle, we, who believe that there should be a measure of justice between the two Houses, regard as a vital principle. I will stand by the Bill in the way it is framed.

What are the reasons of all these difficulties which have been raised with reference to the quota of proportional representation from a mathematical point of view? There was a reason once given by a great statesman—perhaps it was a bon mot of his—with reference to statistics. He said there were three kinds of lies—lies, adjective lies, and statistics. Conjectural statistics, notwithstanding the fact that they have been placed before the Convention by my hon. friend Mr. O'Connor, are certainly open to that objection. The rates of increase calculated here are calculated on the assumption that the increase during the past decade will occur during the next fifty years throughout Australia.

Mr. ISAACS:
They were put before us to consider this very proposal.

Mr. BARTON:
I admit that perfectly.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Statistics of prediction.
Mr. BARTON:

Yes. There can be no statistics of prediction. I for one am entitled to my independent judgment about the matter, and I say that, although these statistics may have excited certain groundless fears in the mind of my hon. friend, the statistician has never yet and never will occupy the position of a prophet, and the able statistician who prepared these tables prepared them on the assumption that certain rates of increase that had gone on illustrated the proportion of increase that might possibly occur, but no one will assert that these increases will occur. There have been certain conditions affecting the colonies during the last ten years, and he would be an extraordinary man indeed who would say those conditions were going to continue for the next ten years. There have been conditions in Victoria, and also in Western Australia, but it would be a most absurd thing to say these things are going to affect the growth of Victoria and New South Wales for any certain number of years. We know that well enough. Let us apply the words of the proposal and see what it really is. The quota shall, when necessary, be ascertained by this process:

By dividing the population of the Commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by twice the number of members of the Senate.

Thus, the population of the States as shown by the latest statistics is to be divided by the quota, to determine the number of representatives to which each State is entitled. Let us take an instance of that. I have endeavored to get at the position in respect of the States and the increase within a reasonable time, in order to remove the speculation which has been mentioned by my hon. friend. Let us take the population of the colonies as being 5,040,000, and let us assume that within that reasonable time there are seven States instead of six. These seven States will have forty-two members in the Senate, and they have to be multiplied by two, which makes eighty-four. Then by a simple piece of arithmetic, if you divide that total of 5,040,000 by eighty-four you will find the quota becomes 60,000, which is I think a reasonable and fair quota. Supposing in ten or fifteen years we become a population of 7,000,000, or for the purpose of better illustration 6,720,000, and we will assume that there are eight States in the Commonwealth instead of six. That will give you the proportion of forty-eight. Multiply that by two, and then divide it into the 6,720,000, and you get about 70,000. I think these figures are a plain answer to the argument. Could anything be fairer? There is no possible answer but the one, and that works out right. According to any assumption as to increases, the figures work out so as to give a quota upon which you can work. Well, then, the next objection we have raised is this: we have as clause 27 the following:
Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, the number of members of the House of Representatives may be from time to time increased or diminished by the Parliament.

One would think that would satisfy my hon. friend, but it does not. Next he says the House of Representatives may be ready to increase their numbers, but the Senate will not, and follows it up to show the fallacy of his own argument by saying they may be ready to increase their numbers where the quota has been decreased.

Mr. ISAACS:

No, increased. Where it would have been greater if the change in the law had not been made.

Mr. BARTON:

Then he admits that in America the members have been increased, but that amounts to nothing, because an undue increase has been prevented through the quota having been increased at the same time. That leads us to the conclusion that Congress has been master of its own action.

Mr. ISAACS:

That is all I contend for.

Mr. BARTON:

We make the House of Representatives master of its own actions also. The ticklish point with my hon. friend is this: that if you increase the number of members in the House of Representatives you have also to increase the number of the Senate. His position is that the fate of Victoria is to be decided to its ruin in regard to its position in the House of Representatives, because the States will gain something in proportion to the House of Representatives. The proposition with which he started is not his real proposition, and he reached it when he objected to the increase in the Senate at the same time as the House of Representatives is increased.

Mr. ISAACS:

I say it is not a fair increase.

Mr. BARTON:

It is a reasonable proportion acted upon in connection with these bodies which we know here as Legislative Councils and Legislative Assemblies. Although it is not constantly acted on, it is one reasonably acted on in almost every case, and it is one which the experience of the colonies has found reasonable, and unless we are to have some new experience, which is to be calle

Mr. KINGSTON:

Have the local Parliaments power to alter?

Mr. BARTON:
Where there are nominee Upper Houses, but we say that this Constitution is at liberty to be altered by the people, and with reference to that clause prescribing the mode of making amendments my hon. friend will notice that under the Bill the process is made a great deal more easy than it was under the Bill of 1891.

Mr. KINGSTON:
The alteration of the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:
The process of altering the Constitution. Instead of putting each colony to the expense of holding a Convention to deliberate on each proposed amendment a direct poll of the people by way of the referendum is taken. It is much more easy and a great deal cheaper, besides being more acceptable to the people than the roundabout process proposed in 1891. The smallest modicum of common sense will tell anyone that to make the proportion of the Senate towards the House of Representatives the merest fraction, as you will in the lapse of time, will certainly lead to the practical abolition of the power of that Chamber. While I am not an ardent upholder of the Second Chamber, I think there should be preserved to it a certain amount of power, and in fact it is an essential in a Federation. The next suggestion was by Mr. Deakin, and it was put in such a very fair looking way that it is rather more difficult to answer his proposal than it was the other, and yet it is subject to the same objection. If we are going to trust the Parliament of the Commonwealth with power to alter the quota method, that is enough for us to say. We can leave the Parliament to make the alteration in that method, which can only be done by the consent of the two Houses, but we are going to trust the Parliament of the Commonwealth also to preserve that method of dealing with the matter by way of the quota, because no answer has been given to the arguments for its reasonableness in this debate, and as no answer has been given to it that is what we should preserve "until Parliament otherwise provides." Then my friend says we have no right to stereotype this proportion. We are not stereotyping it, and if my hon. friend has that trust in the people which he has announced, and which I know he will maintain, he will see that the difficulty can be overcome. There is no difficulty in amending this Constitution, except the expense, and perhaps there should be expense in matters of this sort, because it may deter people from raising unimportant points in the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS:
Can you amend it without an absolute majority of the Senate?

Mr. BARTON:
No; you must have an absolute majority of both Houses, and if my hon. friend pays any regard to it he will see that it would be absurd to have a majority of one and not of the other. If he thinks it should be neither, he wants to bring about amendments so that a slight modification of the Constitution may be secured in this way, and then he would put the country to the huge expense of a referendum on a matter which is of no importance. When the members in the House of Representatives are increased, the Senate has to be increased by half that number. Sir John Downer put it clearly enough. Is it likely that the Senate will deny all increase to the House of Representatives when it gets an increase itself? It is not likely to do so, and so we come back to clause 27, which says that Parliament may increase it. While the due proportion is preserved there is not likely to be any denial by the Senate, because that will get its due share of the increase. That is the answer to the whole of the argument that the Senate will be untrue to its duties. Then let us come to the value of my friend's calculations as to figures. He has gone to the year 1941. We will call it fifty years hence from the census of 1891. I am not a mathematician.

Mr. ISAACS:
I have gone as far as I have been invited to go by Mr. O'Connor.

Mr. BARTON:
My friend says he has gone as far as he has been invited to go by Mr. O'Connor. He has gone further. We go fifty years on to 1941, and because honorable friend-

Mr. PEACOCK:
Did Mr. Coghlan work out whether we will be here then?

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think he did, but if we behave ourselves I think we shall be in a certain place where mirth and laughter prevail, and then we shall enjoy the company of the hon. member.

Mr. REID:
I do not think the proportion will be two to one. The hon. gentleman has gone on fifty years, and has been frightened by a shadow when he found that the population would be eight millions in New South Wales and four million in Victoria, and he says, if you do not alter this proposal, the number of Victorian representatives might then be reduced to thirteen. If there is any truth in the principle of representation according to numbers, then my hon. friend should be satisfied. Then he says that the electorate would be too large. He is actually crediting the Commonwealth with being so insane as to refuse to increase its representation in the Senate and House of Representatives, whilst the population can increase. First he has assumed that there will be no increase of States, which is an impossible assumption, and next, notwithstanding the increase which follows population, neither the House of Representatives nor the Senate want to see an increase. I regret again that that is another impossible assumption. Is it not a fact that we are here to provide for things reasonable, natural, and probable, and that this Senate provides for all contingencies which are reasonable and probable, while the proportion of two to one between the two Houses is one which I am sure will be placed in this Constitution, as a principle not subject to alteration, except by proper amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I do not think motives should have been attributed to my hon. friend. It is said he desired to have this clause altered to lessen the influence of the Senate.

Mr. BARTON:
That may be perfectly conscientious; I did not say it was not.

Mr. TRENWITH:
It was contended that, although that was the ostensible argument, it was not really what was asserted. The hon. member also endeavored to make some capital out of my hon. friend Mr. Isaacs as being undemocratic in his representation of the case.

Mr. BARTON:
I hope my hon. friend will allow me to say, by way of explanation, that I stated that if he were a democrat as I believed, he would be unable with his argument to go in the direction of democracy.

Mr. TRENWITH:
The hon. gentleman attaches to his argument the inference that my hon. friend Mr. Isaacs was opposed to proportional representation. My hon. friend pointed out that there was a danger under this system, not from proportional representation, but from the difficulty of increasing representation in the Senate, so as to obviate the necessity of reducing the number of representatives in some of the colonies which would be painful and unpopular when it would have to be done. However, it seems to me that all these considerations are apart from the question. Sir John Downer put the question which we are to consider in a nutshell when he was concluding his speech. He said:

Is it necessary or is it wise?

It is all summed up in these two questions. Is it necessary? It seems to me it is not, and because it is unnecessary it is unwise; unwise to tie the hands of people that are not yet born by our views as to what is right as to their proportion of representation in the two Houses. We may, I think, be satisfied if we resolve to give them a start upon the lines that commend themselves to us as reasonable, leaving them to take care of themselves as time progresses, and assuming that they will have sufficient judgment in their day to continue or alter conditions we make for them. We have adopted this course in connection with quite a number of questions by saying "such and such shall be the conditions on which this Constitution shall start until otherwise altered by Parliament." If we do that in this connection we should be doing all that is required. I am prepared to grant the force of Mr. Barton's argument when he says that the proportion here proposed is the proportion commended to us by our experience. It is about the proportion that exists between the first and second Chambers in the respective colonies, but our experience teaches us that the necessities of our time have often rendered it very necessary that we should make material changes in the customs or arrangements that have been handed down to us; and we have a right to assume that the experience of the future may render it desirable that the people of the future should have every opportunity to make changes they assume to be desirable, as suggested by their surroundings. If we provide that the arrangements we have found to be reasonable, the arrangements commended by our experience, shall be the start of the Commonwealth, we should leave the Parliament of the future -a Parliament composed of two Houses, each of which must acquiesce in any change which is to be made-to arrange for some other proportion between the two Houses if they desire it. It might happen, as was pointed out on one occasion by Mr. Deakin, that in the future the Senate may deem it to be expedient in the interests of the States they represent - expedient in the interests of efficient government and the Parliament of the Commonwealth-that there should be an increase, and yet there might be ample reason, in consequence of increasing population, to increase the number of the House of Representatives; but if we pass this clause as it is, then - though such necessity might arise, though the Parliament might want that the House of Representatives should have its numbers increased without an increase in the numbers of the Senate-this Constitution would tie its hand.

Mr. DOBSON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH:

My hon. friend is a remarkable authority on what the people ought to be permitted to do. He suggests that the people have aspirations which should be thrust back by the policeman's baton and the soldier's bayonet. If the Constitution is carried in this manner, should the people desire to make an increase in one House and desire to refrain from making an increase in the other, this Constitution would deny them the right of going through the cumbrous operation of obtaining a change in the Constitution, or vice versa. It might so happen that the exigencies of the people who are to come might render it necessary to increase the number of the senators without increasing the number in the House of Representatives. Should such a contingency arise this Constitution as now proposed would prevent the people of any future period from doing so at their own desire without all the cumbersome machinery of a change of Constitution. In the language of Sir John Downer, is this necessary? If it is, that settles the question. If it is, of course it is wise to do what is necessary; but if it is unnecessary, clearly we may leave the Parliament of the future to deal with this question, which after all is a question for the people of the day to settle for themselves. Surely we can leave it to them. There can be no fear of the popular House increasing its own numbers against the will of the Senate, because it would have to be done, if it were settled until otherwise arranged by the Parliament, by an Act of Parliament, with the consent of both Houses. If it were proposed to improperly increase the numbers in the House of Representatives the Senate would certainly object, and such an Act could not be consummated. But if, as I have suggested, it may be desired with the consent of the Senate, or at the desire of the Senate, or even at the request of the Senate, in the interests of the people of the States to increase the numbers of one House without increasing the numbers of the other, the Commonwealth Parliament of the future ought to be permitted to consummate that without having to be hampered with the inordinate expenditure that would follow an alteration of the Constitution, I respectfully submit that in view of the absence of danger, in view of the fact that the Parliament which is controlled by the people would have control of this question, we may easily, properly, and without danger leave the guidance of the business of the future to the people of the future instead of trying to control it from this place.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I desire leave to withdraw my amendment, with a view to moving another.

Leave given.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I move:
To transfer the words "Until the Parliament otherwise provides" from the next paragraph to insert them at the beginning of this.

Then the words will govern the whole section.

Mr. BARTON:
That would make the question whether the House of Representatives should be representative of the people according to their numbers depend upon some law or other which the Federal Parliament may think fit to pass.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Does Sir George Turner intend to put the words at the commencement of the clause or before the words

As nearly as practicable?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I will meet the hon. member's view, and move to put the phrase before the words

As nearly as practicable.

I am, however, perfectly willing to put it at the commencement of the clause.

Mr. BARTON:

It would not fix the principle of proportional representation as apart of the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I should be quite willing to insert the words at the very beginning of the clause.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I hope these words will not be inserted. I hope you will not leave it to the Parliament to alter the ratio, which is proved by experience to be a fair one, and which I think it would be very undesirable in the interests of the State to alter.

Mr. SOLOMON:

I would ask you to put this clause in two portions, so that I may move an amendment in line 24.

The CHAIRMAN:

You can do that after.

Question-That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put. The Committee divided.

NOES.
In this sub-section we arrive in a very roundabout way at a representation in the people's House of one member for every 50,000 of population. I would like to point out to hon. members that the proportion under this clause means that two of the colonies at least will each have more than the whole of the smaller colonies put together. This to my mind is the most important clause in the Bill, especially as we have now clipped the Senate of all its powers in regard to the amendment of Money Bills and Taxation Bills. We have under this clause an arrangement that each colony shall be represented by one member for every 50,000 of its population, and under this arrangement the figures show that New South Wales would have twenty-six members in the House which has the control of the purse, Victoria would have twenty-four, Queensland nine, South Australia seven, and each of the other two colonies five members. It must be apparent to hon. members who look at these figures, and who will study the degree of representation for each State in the people's House, and at the same time consider the manner in which the powers of the Senate have been clipped by a resolution which passed yesterday, that although we may admit the right of the larger States to some greater degree of numerical strength than the smaller States, yet this representation on a population basis is absolutely and inordinately excessive. To say that in this House—the House which will make and displace Ministries, the House to which the Executive will be primarily responsible—two States out of five or six should have such immensely predominant power is to my mind a mistake—a mistake which some of the constituencies of the smaller States will be only too ready to call attention to. I admit that representation on a population basis is perhaps to some extent admissible—that it is to some extent fair and equitable—but at the same time to carry it to the extent to which it is carried in this clause, is to carry it beyond all reason, and to place the smaller States in the position of not having any hand in the control of the money matters of the Federated Australia, but in a position that they are absolutely powerless in any way. They are powerless in the House of Representatives, and they are powerless in the Senate. So long as the Bill remained in the position in which it was brought down to us by the Drafting Committee, up to the time that the vote was taken yesterday, when, through unfortunate circumstances some of the representatives of the smaller colonies passed over to the other side of the House to join with the larger colonies in a division—

The CHAIRMAN:
I will ask the hon. member to confine himself to the clause, if possible.

HON. MEMBERS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SOLOMON:
That is precisely what I am doing, and I am connecting my remarks with the clause, and these remarks I am making are only leading up to the point which I wish to impress upon hon. members; I might say, in response to the "Hear, hears" that fell from some hon. members just now, that I have not taken up as much time as some of them in this Convention. I am dealing with a question of importance to the States, upon which I have frequently spoken, and to discuss which, fully and fairly, I have the authority of those who sent me here. I do not contend that the smaller States are entitled to the same degree of representation in the Lower House as the larger States.

Mr. PEACOCK:
You are very considerate.

Mr. SOLOMON:
More so than the hon. member; and if this question trod on his corns

Mr. PEACOCK:
Peacocks have not got any corns.

Mr. SOLOMON:
If this question touched his feelings—if Peacocks have any feelings—as closely as it affects the interests of the smaller States, he would recognise that representation purely on a population basis is not fair or equitable in any possible way. I do not propose to suggest any radical amendment in this clause, but what I do propose will get over a great deal of the difficulty as to the gradual increase of members in the House of Representatives. Those hon. members connected with commercial life will doubtless remember that in large companies-joint stock and so forth—where a certain number of people join together for a purpose connected with financial operations, and I think that is much on the same lines as this Federation, that the deeds of association or partnership do not provide that each Party to that Partnership shall have representation, or voting power precisely in accordance with the number of shares he holds. Inasmuch as we have this done in our everyday-life in some of our largest commercial transactions, so I take it as an example to put to hon. members to show what, in my opinion, would be a more equitable and better working system upon which to constitute the Lower House. Under the present system we find that the smaller States are completely overshadowed. We find that out of a total of seventy-six votes they have some twenty-six, the other fifty being represented by the two larger States. I do not intend to go into the question of the probability or the possibility of these two larger States combining on financial questions, to the detriment of the smaller States, but at the same time I am not prepared to so implicitly trust to the integrity, goodwill, and sense of right of the larger colonies as to leave a question like this in the form in which it appears in this Bill. If we were to adopt a sliding scale, so that each State would be represented according to its numbers at the start, but in such a manner that as these numbers increase so the representation in the Lower House also shall increase, we could give very much the same number of members as is provided in the present clause, but on a slightly more equitable basis. I think if we were to provide that for the first hundred thousand of the population of each State they should have, say, six representatives—

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Will you agree to a reduction of the number of members of the Senate?

Mr. SOLOMON:
That question has been fought out and settled. I will await the result of my amendment before I pin myself to any agreement.

Mr. REID:
What is your proposal?

Mr. SOLOMON:
I am coming to it. The point is that on a sliding scale, such as I suggest, each colony would have for the first 100,000 of population six representatives, for the second 100,000 three, for the third 100,000 two, and for each 100,000 after that one representative.

Mr. REID:
Let us accept it at once. I never before heard of the zone system being applied to human beings.

Mr. SOLOMON:
The result of this scheme would be that instead of New South Wales having twenty-six members in the House of Representatives she would have twenty-one; instead of Victoria having twenty-four she would have twenty; instead of Queensland having nine she would have twelve; instead of South Australia having seven she would have eleven; and instead of Western Australia and Tasmania having five members, the minimum provided in this Bill, they would have six members. The result of this would be practically the same as far as total numbers are concerned, as under the scale of the Bill there would be seventy-six members of the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Are you right in your figures as to Western Australia and Tasmania?

Mr. SOLOMON:
Yes. Each having over 100,000 would have six.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You are not allowing for fractions.

Mr. SOLOMON:
I have simply taken out round figures. In answer to Sir George Turner, I would point out where the fairness of the scale comes in, that as Western Australia increased from its 130,000 to 200,000, instead of having six it would have nine members, and as Tasmania increased from its 150,000 to 200,000, instead of having six it would also have nine, and until each reached 300,000 it would have eleven members, receiving an additional member for each additional 100,000 in population after it reached 300,000. The larger colonies would only increase at the rate of one member for each additional 100,000, and that would be

Mr. HOWE:
They are so impatient of anyone but a lawyer talking.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Yes, there is a certain amount of clannishness about these gentlemen. My proposal may strike some as likely to be unfair, but let us examine what the results will be in a few years to come. When Western Australia, as she in all probability will in a year or two's time, has a population of 300,000; and when Tasmania, as she very likely will, with the access of commerce born of intercolonial freetrade, approaches the limit of 300,000-
Mr. REID:
That is the fourth lap.

Mr. SOLOMON:

One would imagine sometimes from the childishness of the hon. member's remarks that he had not long left his first paper. As I was remarking, when these colonies approached the 300,000 standard there would not be such an immense increase as against the numbers of the two larger colonies. The total of the four colonies would only be forty-eight as against the joint total of Victoria and New South Wales of forty-eight. Now I would ask hon. members to consider this point. Is it a fair thing, now that the Senate has been deprived, as it has been deprived, of the power of amending Bills relating to taxation, that the more largely populated colonies in the representative House should have such an overwhelming majority against the four smaller colonies. That is the whole point of the question. I desire to move:

That after the word "have" on the twenty-fourth line the following words be inserted: "Six members for the first 10,000 of its population, three members for the second 100,000, two members for the third 100,000, and one member for every additional 100,000 of its population."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
My hon. friend's proposal is so eminently fair and reasonable that I wonder he took such a length of time to explain the principles to us, and endeavor to induce us to fall in with his moderate demand. His proposition is that whereas the two colonies of Victoria and New South Wales possess a population of 2,500,000, and the other four colonies he refers to possess a population of 1,000,000, the basis of representation in the House of Representatives should be thirty-five to the smaller colonies and forty-one to the larger, and in the Senate they should have twenty-four to twelve. That means simply that, whereas they have two-sevenths of the population, they are in the House of Representatives to have five-twelfths of the representation and in the Senate two-thirds of the representation. I think this ought to be endorsed unanimously by this Committee.

Mr. GLYNN:

I am not going to speak on this question, for it has been already discussed. but I wish to raise a point, and perhaps Sir John Downer will tell me if I am right. The Bill says that, until Parliament otherwise provides, each State shall have one member for its quota of the people. Supposing Parliament passes an Act to say that one State shall have two members for a quota, and another four, is that not possible under the section?
An HON. MEMBER:
    Yes.
Mr. GLYNN:
    But that is not intended. Supposing an Act was passed to say that the quota meant that one State should have three and another five members?
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
    On a point of order I would like to ask for your ruling. Sir. I am getting wearied of listening to these lawyers.
Mr. KINGSTON:
    That is not a point of order.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
    I would ask whether the hon. gentleman should not now confine his remarks to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN:
    The hon. member certainly must confine his remarks to the amendment, but I understood that the hon. member wished to ask a question as to the construction of the clause before we arrived at that amendment.
Mr. KINGSTON:
    Hear, hear.
Mr. GLYNN:
    Exactly; the usual parliamentary courtesy will be extended to a member who wishes to move a prior amendment by the withdrawal of the amendment before the Chair. I would ask the members of the Drafting Committee whether I am not right in saying that the Federal Parliament might do what I have suggested. Would it not be possible, I ask, for a law to be passed to say that one State should have three members and another five?

HON. MEMBERS:
    Hear; hear.
Mr. PEACOCK:
    Quite right.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    Quite right. It is possible for there to be two members of the House of Representatives for every one member of the Senate.

An HON. MEMBER:
    That is only one part of it.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    Perhaps hon. members will allow me to go on. The clause says:
Until the Parliament otherwise provides, each State shall have one member for each quota of its people.

These are the clauses which are dealing with the relations of members between the two Houses. I do not think there can be any possible confusion myself.

Mr. PEACOCK:
It is the House of Representatives that we are dealing with.
Amendment negatived.

Mr. GLYNN:
It is all very fine for members to talk about lawyers, but lawyers understand this section.

Mr. SOLOMON:
It is the impatient lawyers who are the trouble.

Mr. PEACOCK:
You have laymen with you on this occasion.

Mr. WISE:
The hon. member for Victoria was on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GLYNN:
This is a Constitutional Bill, and I put it to the Premier of our colony, who is an authority in draftsmanship, is it not possible under this clause for the Federal Parliament to pass an Act stating that South Australia may have three members and Tasmania five?

Mr. GORDON:
That is not intended.

Mr. GLYNN:
Certainly not. Why not correct it?

Mr. GORDON:
This deals with the Constitution, and I think there should have been a stipulation in the first part of this subsection that there should be one member for each quota and no more. It is perfectly clear that Parliament could provide that each State should have any number of members for each quota. They could say 5,000 if they liked.

Mr. GLYNN:
I would suggest that those words should be inserted before "until the Parliament otherwise provides."

An HON. MEMBER:
What words?

Mr. GLYNN:
The words suggested by Mr. Gordon. It ought to be:
That each State shall have the same number of members for a quota.
That should be at the beginning of the clause.

Mr. GORDON:
That is open to the objection that this makes a constant factor of calculation.

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out that we have already passed the word "have," and the hon. member cannot move an amendment before that.

Mr. GORDON:
A suggest that the hon. member should get the clause re-committed.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I would suggest to Sir John Downer and the Drafting Committee that this point is well worthy of consideration.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We are going to consider it.
Sub-section as read agreed to.
Sub-section 3.

Mr. REID:
I strongly object to this deviation from the Bill of 1891. It gives a minimum of five representatives. The minimum in the Bill of 1891 was four, when the ratio was one member for 30,000 of the people. Now we have arrived at one member for 50,000, in order to make the number of members in the House of Representatives more nearly approach the number of members in the Senate. I must say that the clause is altogether out of reason in view of the fact that we have reduced the number of members in the House of Representatives from 120 down to seventy-two. I move
That the word "five" be struck out and "four" inserted in lieu thereof.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I hope we shall have a minimum of five.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Make it seven!

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I would not mind that.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Make it ten!

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
We have already made a considerable reduction in the members as compared with the Bill of 1891.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Increased them!

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
This was passed in the Constitutional Committee after considerable deliberation-

Mr. REID:
Oh!

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
And with our eyes open to the surrounding facts.

Mr. ISAACs:
Who did?

Dr. COCKBURN:
The majority; you are ruled by the majority.

Mr. PEACOCK:
The majority will settle it here. We are not going to sit here and accept every decision of the Constitutional Committee.

Mr. WISE:
I for one will hold to the decision of the Committee.

Mr. HENRY:
I do not think that the smaller colonies can claim as a matter of logic that five should be the minimum on the present population basis, but I hope hon. members will deal liberally and fairly with the smaller colonies, and in this matter I hope the Victorian representatives will remember that yesterday some of us stood by them.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Although I think there is no doubt that as a matter of reason the smaller colonies should not have a minimum of five I will vote for this clause.

Mr. GORDON:
There is both logic and reason in "five," because if the compact is to go on as it is the smaller colonies will want to know how to use their fives.

Leave given to withdraw the amendment.
Sub-section as read agreed to.
Clause as read agreed to.
Clause 24.-Provision for case of persons not allowed to vote. Agreed to.
Clause 25.-Mode of calculating number of members. Agreed to.
Clause 27.-Increase of number of House of Representatives. Agreed to.
Clause 28.-Electoral Divisions. Agreed to.
Clause 29.- Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each State that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification for electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State. But in the choosing of such members each elector shall have only one vote.

Mr. HOLDER:

I wish to propose the following amendment in this clause:

Strike out all the words after "be" in line 19 and insert in lieu thereof as follows:—"Every man and woman of the full age of twenty-one years, whose name has been registered as an elector for at least six months, shall be an elector."

Should I obtain the consent of the majority of the Convention to that, it will be necessary later on for me to bring down another clause providing for the preparation of the electoral rolls in the interval before the time when the Federal Parliament shall have created electoral machinery. The purpose
I have in view is simply to give effect to the desire that many of us cherish, that women as well as men should be recognised as electors of this great Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLDER:

I am not going to argue at very great length, because I do not think that what I can say will influence many votes, but I submit that women are equally with ourselves bound by the laws; they are, with ourselves, taxpayers; by the consumption of dutiable articles we obtain taxes from women as well as from men. At the present time a woman who may be the support of her family, and whose husband contributes nothing to that support, but is simply a burden and hindrance to the woman, has no vote, while her worthless husband, may be, has one. Such a thing is not right. In this colony we have had experience of woman suffrage. At the last general elections in this colony, the women possessed votes to nearly an equal number with the men for the election of members for the House of Assembly. I was at several polling-booths on the polling day, and I noticed, as did many others who are here to-day, the quiet determined way in which the women were going to the poll. There was nothing of trifling about them; they had come seized of the responsibility resting upon them, and determined to give effect to their views with the utmost calmness and decision. Not only in the city, but throughout the country districts, they voted, and, if anything, more heavily in the country than in the town. I do not believe that giving the vote to a woman makes her less of a woman. If I thought it did I would not give it her. But she can be just as much a woman, and care for what is going on round her, and also give time to exercise her franchise wisely.
and well. We have had experience of that here; we believe it has been tested by experience, and we are quite prepared to recommend a similar course to that which we have followed to the other States of the Commonwealth. It may be suggested, it has been suggested, that in striving to attain what I am moving, as I happen to be a representative of one of the smaller States, it is a case of the small States dictating to the larger. I do wish hon. members would now and again forget that there are smaller and larger States, and discuss a question apart from whether a member who happens to move it represents a large or a small colony. This is not a question of a large colony against a small one, or a small colony against a large. This is a much greater question than that. The question is whether we will grant to one-half the population, or nearly one-half, the right they ask, or whether we will deny them that right. I hope this Convention, assembled under such conditions as we are, will do itself the honor and do one half the population of Australia the justice, which I am asking. Especially do I wish to mention one fact This year we are celebrating the diamond Jubilee of the greatest woman in political life in the British Empire, and if a woman be able, as that woman has been, with all the greatness and all the grandeur of her character, to preside over the destinies of this Empire during the last Sixty years, it does not become anyone to say that other women are not able to rise to the responsibility of casting a single vote on a political question. The next point I wish to make is this: it is not a case of South Australia dictating to the other colonies, for while in South Australia public opinion may be somewhat more ripened, or may have ripened earlier than in the other colonies, public opinion is moving in the same direction all over Australia. And we know that petitions have been got up and largely signed in Tasmania asking for adult suffrage. We know, too, that in the lower branch of the Legislature in Victoria a Bill was passed conferring upon women the franchise.

Mr. ISAACS:
   Twice.

Mr. HOLDER:
   That was wrecked in the Legislative Council. I understood that that was because of another matter associated with it.

Mr. FRASER:
   That is not so. It was on legitimate grounds.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   They will pass it next time.

Mr. FRASER:
   On the merits of the case.

Mr. HOLDER:
I am not yet satisfied that the Legislative Council has declared against woman suffrage, so that the position they are in is: the lower branch of Legislature has declared in its favor, and the other branch has not given any deliverance at all. In the large colony of New South Wales motions in favor of woman suffrage have been adopted more than once. There are several hon. members who can speak more positively than I can as to the extent public opinion in this direction has ripened in that colony. In Queensland similar advance is being made, and petitions have been laid before this Convention from Queensland as from the other colonies. I have mentioned that we are asked to legislate in this direction. I hope that on these grounds we shall be prepared to take this step. The only other point I wish to refer to is this: it was said that whatever might be possible when the Federal Parliament had done its work it was most impracticable under present conditions to provide that the first elections for the Federal Parliament should take place on any other system than that on which this Convention is sitting. But I claim that I am not suggesting anything impracticable at all. It will be the simplest possible thing for a clause or two to be brought down providing for the necessary enrolment of women in all parts of the Commonwealth, and that the elections for the Commonwealth shall take place on those lines. I do trust that those who are in favor of woman suffrage, who if this were the first session of the Federal Parliament, would vote for it, will not vote otherwise on this occasion, but will have the courage of their convictions and will give effect to the views they hold, and will provide even now and here, on this more fitting occasion than any other that can be given to us, that when Federation comes into effect it will come into effect broad based, not only on the will of the male electors, but upon the will of the adults throughout Australia, both men and women. I might prolong what I have to say, but I recognise that moments are precious. and believing that I have put all the leading points in favor of my amendment, I submit it with the greatest confidence to the Convention.

Mr. WISE:

I am sure that every member of the Convention will be indebted to the hon. Mr. Holder for the clearness with which he has expressed his views, and also for the admirable self-restraint he put upon himself in not elaborating them. I will endeavor to imitate him, and to refrain from general observations on the question of woman suffrage. I limit my remarks to putting before the Convention this consideration: "Is it a prudent thing in a Constitution of this kind to venture upon an experiment?
I express no opinion for the moment whether woman suffrage is desirable or whether it is not. I content myself with noting as a fact that in three of the colonies which are represented here—or, if we include Western Australia, four of them—the principle of woman suffrage has not yet approved itself to a majority of the electors, who have now—and, under our arrangements, ought to continue to possess-unlimited power in managing their own internal affairs. Is it then a prudent thing to direct that the basis of the federal franchise should be one which does not approve itself to the electors of each colony in the management of their own affairs?

Mr. HOLDER:
Federal affairs are different,
Mr. WISE:
I am aware they are different. The franchise is a matter to them in one sense of Federal interest, but until the Federal Parliament is formed, it is a matter of purely local interest. To put a clause of this kind in, dictating to the electors of each colony what their franchise ought to be for the purpose of electing the Federal Parliament would be seen at once in its naked absurdity. If the proposal took another form—suppose that Mr. Dobson, who has expressed his view very strongly, and with that force we all like to hear, in favor of a modified form of property vote—suppose he could persuade a majority of this Convention to provide that the franchise under the Constitution for the first election should be on a property basis. The mere proposal would be treated as an absurdity by the electors, and why?

Dr. COCKBURN:
Because it would be wrong.
Mr. WISE:
Why?
Dr. COCKBURN:
In itself.
Mr. WISE:
Because the electors in the different colonies have chosen to frame their franchise on a different basis. What then is the distinction between your attempt to dictate to the electors of each colony as to the basis of their franchise, when you are asked to turn it into a different form in respect to property, or as to the persons who are to exercise it? The only difference is that, excellent though the form may be in their own colony, that is no justification to force it upon another colony preliminarily to coming into the union, which, when it is formed, will have supreme power over this and other matters. If this cause of female suffrage is so good as its advocates insist that it is—and we do not hear a great deal in opposition to it, because I do not think the opposition to it has been seriously expressed yet—it will make its own way. If the experiments in New Zealand and South Australia are such great successes, that fact must have an influence upon New South Wales, Tasmania, Victoria, and West Australia, not one of which, however, has so far been so impressed by it as to think fit to change their own system of voting.

Mr. HOLDER:

The whole thing is new.

Mr. WISE:

You are interfering at once with a matter, the power of dealing with which rests with the local Parliament. The franchise is a franchise.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

You are making it a condition that the whole Commonwealth will accept woman suffrage.

Mr. WISE:

As my hon. friend puts it, that is exactly the position assumed by Mr. Holder, and it is no more reasonable to make it a condition, as might be insisted upon by Mr. Dobson, to make the franchise a property qualification, than it is to adopt Mr. Holder's proposal. Supposing woman suffrage were proposed in New South Wales—this may seem a grotesque impossibility to Mr. Holder, but it is not so—and a large majority was against it, would not this proposal make it an essential condition of that colony coming into the Federation, that it should adopt woman suffrage? What are the purposes of the Federal Parliament? I take it that they will be of a higher and more important character than that which the local Parliaments will have to deal with. There has been no ruffle of skirts or stir of petticoats yet in Queensland in connection with this matter. I ask the hon. member: is it prudent to put this barrier in front of the formation of the Union? There is no reason why it is proper to try experiments of female suffrage in federal matters than in other matters which might lead to controversy of a serious kind. We cannot get away from this fact—disguise it as we may—that the ultimate sanction of all law is physical force. I need not go far back for an illustration, than only look to the early history of the United States Federation. It may yet be in our country, if we have female suffrage, that a law would be passed by a majority of women and a minority of men, which they would not have the physical force to carry into effect, and which can only be given effect to by a dissolution of society. I will give an illustration that accurately bears on this. The question that shook the American constitution to its foundation was the question of slavery. Do we not know that the attitude and object of all the prominent statesmen of the United States between 1826 and the outbreak of the Civil War, or certainly up to 1850, was to have a compromise on this question, and why? Not with regard to many of them because they were in favor of slavery, but because they knew that the time was not yet ripe for the immediate abolition of it.

Mr. KINGSTON:

What was the result of postponing it?

Mr. WISE:

Its ultimate abolition.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Bloodshed.

Mr. WISE:

It was ultimately abolished, and if they had had female suffrage in those early days, they would have had the votes of a large majority of the women, reinforced by the votes of men in favor of the immediate abolition of slavery, and that would have led to a complete disruption of the Union, and an entrenchment of slavery in a position from which it could not have been overthrown. I simply mention this matter to remind members of the dangers from this system of female suffrage, and which must be obvious to all. The force with which Mr. Holder has put his views has led me into a controversial discussion which I desire to avoid, but I put it to members upon the ground of practical principles, and with full assurance, that it will very materially increase the difficulty—and I am not using terms of exaggeration when I say it will very materially increase the difficulty—of getting this scheme accepted in New South Wales if we adopt this system of female suffrage in federal matters when it has not been adopted in regard to local matters there. Is it not quite sufficient for the Federal Parliament to deal with this matter? When that Parliament is established, if its friends still believe in the system earnestly, they can bring forward a motion in that Parliament similar to the motion which has been brought forward now. I hope the friends of the system will not allow their feelings to degenerate into fanaticism, but that they will leave it to the Federal Parliament to accomplish that which is their purpose, and which is in no way hindered or delayed by the rejection of this amendment.

Mr. HOWE:

I believe it is the intention of the hon. member to divide the Committee on the question.

Mr. HOLDER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HOWE:

Then I wish to speak. Mr. Holder has placed his case in a very fair manner indeed before this Assembly. I might say that before Mr. Holder entered into the sphere of active politics in South Australia I was an advocate of woman's suffrage. I could never bring myself to understand why women should not have the same voice in connection with the laws of their country as the men. All the time I had the honor of having a seat in this chamber I never hid myself behind a hedge when the question of woman's suffrage was introduced, even when introduced in a questionable form. I believe in the principle, and although I may have been in opposition to any Ministry who introduced the measure, no matter in what mode it came into the chamber they have always found me voting in favor of it. I know that the policy of the South Australian Government on the hustings in connection with the Convention election was adult suffrage, but I took an opposite view. I told my constituents of South Australia that, while I believed in adult suffrage, and were I resident in any of the other colonies which did not possess it I would fight for it as I had in South Australia, but as I believed in States rights, which in other words is home rule, I had no right to place on the people of the other colonies such a franchise, and to interfere with them in such a manner I designated as a piece of impertinence. Mr. Holder has presented to our gaze a deplorable state of things, and asked why the woman should not have the same right to vote in the making of the laws of the land as her husband who might be an abandoned and worthless fellow; but an abandoned and worthless woman is as bad as any man, so in giving the franchise to women we have increased the number of worthless voters; but the good women who are so numerous will counteract the influence of the bad ones. I am about to contest an election, and I wish the people of South Australia to understand my position, so that there shall be no mistake about my attitude. I thoroughly believe in giving the franchise to the women of the State in which I live, but I would look upon myself as unduly and unnecessarily interfering with the rights of other States by agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FRASER:
I am afraid if this motion is carried it will be handicapping Federation unduly, and we have already handicapped it to an extent that it can hardly bear. If we agreed to it the people of the other colonies would resent it-at all events I am sure Victoria would.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Your popular House is in favor of it.

Mr. FRASER:
That is possible, but it does not say that the women of that colony are in favor of it. I am an old parliamentarian, and I can tell you that, as far as my judgment goes, the women do not favor it. Of course there is always a section in favor of anything you like to propose, but that does not say that the majority do so. I will not, however, argue the matter out here, as the place to do so in my own colony. I have as much admiration for the women as any man—I mean in their proper places. If this question is going to grow, give it time to grow. You do not want to force the growth of a plant unreasonably.

An HON. MEMBER:

Asparagus.

Mr. FRASER:

It has not grown in the United States; it has not grown even in your own colony. A lady presented herself—a very estimable and eligible candidate stood for the Convention—but the people of South Australia did not elect her. Her own sex voted against her, probably.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Well?

Mr. FRASER:

Well. I was in a town in New Zealand that had a lady mayoress.

Mr. BARTON:

Onehunga.

Mr. FRASER:

I had the pleasure of doing the honors to the Mayor of Onehunga. In New Zealand I do not think there will be another lady mayoress. I am speaking now what is the opinion of all. I am not saying that in disparagement of womankind. Far be it from me. But I say the people of South Australia have no right to dictate to our colony as this amendment will he doing, and if it is carried it will handicap this Bill unnecessarily. I would suggest to those who are anxious for Federation not to press this to a division. I will have to vote against it, and I hope others will do the same who believe in woman suffrage in local politics, but not in national matters. Let it grow as it ought to grow. It will grow in our colony if it is going to grow, but if the example of South Australia and New Zealand is followed it will die. It has been in existence in a very small way in the United States, where I have travelled frequently, and there is no desire for its extension. Then why handicap this federal movement by a thing of this kind? It is not reasonable.

Mr. GLYNN:

I also, like Mr. Howe, am about to face an election in this colony, but I get up not to explain my position as a candidate for support. I expressed myself on the hustings in favor of the principle of woman suffrage, but I said at the same time that if it would be dangerous to Federation I would not support it. Let me say one or two words as to the adoption of it on the grounds of logic and also of expediency, and of not forcing on the other colonies a principle of election to which they have objections, of prejudice rather than of principle. I agree with Mr. Wise that if you make it a condition of the other colonies accepting this you will wreck Federation. As to the question of the effect upon the chances of a slavery war if adult suffrage had been in force in America, if you are to deal with large and general matters such as slavery, I believe that the male instincts are more likely to go on the side of abolition than the female instincts. Hon. members must admit this fact, that the votes in the House with diverse franchises will be subject to degrees of refutation dependent upon the extent of the suffrage applicable in the colonies of the members who gave the votes. If you have a majority composed of members who have been returned to the Federal Parliament on a restricted suffrage, the weight of the majority will be discounted by the fact of narrow representation. Reflections were cast upon the votes of the Western Australian representatives at this Convention simply on the ground that they were returned by their Parliament and not by the people directly. The question of American representation has been referred to, but in that case no doubt it was diverse representation, but for special reasons. The American Union was composed of thirteen States remarkable for their diversities—some organised, and some with hardly any organisation. Agriculture was the chief consideration in one, shipping in others, and so on. It was, therefore, incumbent upon the framers of the American Constitution to frame such a franchise as would pay some respect to the respective prejudices, and not thrust upon the whole number a representation to which half the States, in the then dangerous state of public opinion, and when mutual animosities were but slowly dying, would take objection. But our conditions are different. Our political influences are practically the same. We are essentially at the same stage of political growth, and it really remains as a matter of logic only to express our convictions in one uniform franchise. It may be said that you cannot trust the people. But you must trust the people, because the granting of adult suffrage is only a question of time. Mr. Wise has mentioned in effect that the experiment of testing the efficiency of adult suffrage had best be made in connection with the local Legislatures. In my opinion it had best be made in connection with the Federal House. In that case the questions that will come on are too large in their relations, too remote from class interests and prejudices, to be open to any danger on the side of popular power. I think we are entitled to apply the principle of adult suffrage to the Federal Parliament, but at the same time I shall not force my opinions upon hon. members of other colonies.
By doing so the result might be that we would not get Federation carried.
Logically I say they should not object to uniformity. The principle of uniformity of suffrage ought to apply to the Federal House. You should not have majorities discounted by an examination of the peculiar circumstances under which their component members are elected. We must remember, however, that we have here the representatives of large and wide suffrages, you have got the representatives of cumulative voting, you have got the representatives of a narrow suffrage; and if you impose a uniform franchise, though it is logically right, you will not achieve Federation. Therefore I join in asking Mr. Holder to withdraw his proposal.
It is all very well for some members to say adult suffrage should, on principle, not be granted, but men progress quickly in these times. My notion of public opinion is: with an educated people public opinion is quite as ripe as statesmen care to recognise. It is

Mr. GRANT:

The subject we are now discussing we should remember affects half our population, and therefore, even at this late hour, I venture to trespass on the patience of the Convention while I offer a very few remarks. I wish to put one or two points not dealt with by the previous speakers. This is a matter that has had great interest to me for many years past. I formed a decided opinion in favor of female suffrage before many members of the Convention were born. It was when Disraeli, at a time of political excitement, threatened the female franchise as a conservative weapon. I believe in female franchise we have the strongest conservative element, which will make the nation stable in council and render it less subject to influences of an unsatisfactory character than any other provision. The difficulty I have had on two occasions when I have had to exercise my vote upon the question has been that the women themselves have not asked for the franchise. We know that in our family circles they are able to speak for themselves, and I think in all probability if they wanted the franchise, we should have heard from them in large numbers, and not have had petitions signed by only one or two hundred. So far as I have been able to gauge public opinion in Tasmania, there is a distinct manifestation against the franchise. They do not want to have the discussion of political matters in their private family circles. From my knowledge of the United States, I know

[P.722] starts here

nothing would be more objectionable than female franchise to the higher and intellectual circles in which politics are eschewed almost as an unclean thing. Until women do approach us and express a desire, coming from a large proportion of them, to have the franchise, we should hesitate to force it upon them. We are told it has worked well in this colony, but we should remember that it has only been tried in South Australia at one election, that it is here in an experimental stage, and we do not know what objectionable ramifications may yet follow its adoption. I would far rather have a system of ascertaining the votes of women in the privacy of the domestic circle by means of voting by post. In the domestic circle, not only the wives, but the daughters and sons, who may be better educated than their parents, would be able to use that influence which would tend to make a more stable foundation for any electoral system. Another objection to giving women as a class a vote is the danger of popular excitement. They are abject to emotional or hysterical influences to a much greater extent than men. In the matter of strikes, the women, generally speaking, are the chief disturbing cause, and they hold on, to their own damage and detriment, far longer than men do. They are more moved by impulse, and do not maintain that self-control that men, from being continually associated with one another, are compelled to exercise. We should, therefore, hesitate before attempting to force upon the new Commonwealth woman suffrage. Forty years or more ago I was in favor of it; I am in favor of it now on a certain basis, but I do not think we ought to begin the Constitution of this Commonwealth by forcing thereon an unknown quantity which may prove disastrous thereto.

Mr. BARTON:
I should like to make a suggestion to the Committee. I think it is a fair time we came to a vote upon this question.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Hear, Hear.

Mr. KINGSTON:
No, no.

Mr. BARTON:
I think we ought to pass a self-denying ordinance in this matter. Mr. Holder made a very representative speech on one side of the question, and there has been at least one representative speech on the other. I think those two cover fairly nearly the whole ground. I myself have a strong opinion as to whether or not a uniform suffrage of this kind should be forced upon the Commonwealth, and as to whether the Bill would stand even a fair chance of being carried in the various colonies if this proposal were adopted. But I am prepared, in spite of all that, to forego the right which I think I have as a member of this Convention to speak. I think that, as the speeches which have been made are representative, we really shall not elucidate the subject much to each other if we make further speeches, and if we cannot do that we ought to come to a division at once.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I appreciate the desire to arrive at a division, but this is a question, perhaps, above all others in which it is necessary for some, myself among them, to say a few words. I am in favor of female suffrage; I should like to see it adopted by all the States. I do not agree with Mr. Grant when he says there is a doubt whether women could vote with wisdom because they are liable to hysterical influences. At the same time I am opposed to putting that principle in this Constitution. Therefore it is necessary for me to say why I am about to vote, if a vote is taken, against a principle of which I am in favor. My reason is that female suffrage is desirable, but there is a very considerable number of persons in some of the States who think it extremely undesirable. If we load this constitution with this principle we create another difficulty in the way of having Federation adopted, and we do not advance the cause of woman suffrage. If we pass the Bill in the form in which it is now, that the vote shall be taken on the basis of the franchise for the more numerous House in each State, that would be the suffrage for the Commonwealth. When progress is made with female suffrage in the various States, and it is adopted in these States, it immediately becomes part of the Commonwealth franchise. It has just as much chance, indeed it has a greater chance, of becoming part of the franchise of the Commonwealth by leaving it out of the Commonwealth Constitution. Putting it in may prevent Federation from being adopted. To adopt Federation without it may not retard female suffrage. And for this reason, without delaying the Convention, I desire to say that, good as female suffrage is, equitable as it is, little dangerous as it is, it ought not to be in this Constitution, because it may have a tendency rather to hinder than to advance Federation.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I think we can hear a little too much of the argument that if we do this or if we do that we shall imperil Federation. It was advanced with strong force at an early stage, and I paid some attention to it. But if in connection with every matter we are to be told by one side or the other that if this is carried or that rejected, there will be an end of Federation, I do not-

Mr. TRENWITH:

That is not argument.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I think those who believe in female suffrage should advance it by voting for it whenever they get the chance. I have no sympathy with those who say they are in favor of it, but when they have an opportunity of extending it throughout Australia they will have nothing to do with it. I believe in a uniform franchise.

Mr. FRASER:
We will have to take off woman suffrage.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am quite prepared that the hon. member shall make a proposal of that sort, and if he does I shall be prepared to resist it when he does. Uniformity is as necessary in a federal franchise as in a provincial franchise. Who ever heard of different constituencies of a province returning members on varying franchises? Would it be tolerated as regards this colony that one district, say, North Adelaide, should return its member on an extended franchise as democratic as you could wish, and that the rest of the colony should return members on a Conservative and retrograde franchise. What good, I ask, would be the democratic franchise of North Adelaide if it could be swamped by the franchises of the other constituencies? What good is it that South Australia with her, what she ventures to consider, advanced franchise, in which the women are permitted to vote, can return members to the Federal Parliament, if they are to be outvoted by the members returned on the less liberal and less extended franchises that exist in the other colonies. We are told it is not for us to dictate. Who talks of dictation?

Mr. SOLOMON:
You do.

Mr. FRASER:
Of course he does.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Nothing of the sort We propose what we believe in. I put it to the hon. member, does he find in the Constitution of Victoria that different constituencies return their members on varying franchises? Would it be tolerated.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That is for Victoria. That has nothing to do with South Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Does not the hon. member see-I do not know the various constituencies in Victoria that each constituency is as much interested in the franchise of the other constituencies in Victoria as it is in its own? So also in Federation. Is not each province as much interested in the franchise of the other colonies as it is in its own?

Mr. HOLDER:
Of course it is.
Mr. KINGSTON:
I put it plainly to the hon. member-What good is it to us on our advanced franchise? Hon. members can excuse the adjective in adulation of our own offspring.

Mr. TRENWITH:
It is advanced. You are quite right.

Mr. KINGSTON:
What good is it to us to return members on our advanced franchise when the other colonies, returning members on a less advanced franchise, outvote them? Why our slight contribution will be as a drop in the bucket. It will have no effect whatever on the Federal Parliament and federal legislation. We believe that just as the franchise determines the character of the elector, so it also affects the character of the elected, and the character of the elected determines the nature of the legislation, and the nature of the legislation not only affects Victoria and New South Wales, but South Australia also.

Mr. FRASER:
Can you get Victoria to pass an Act such as you desire?

Mr. KINGSTON:
I do believe they will. I do not profess to know so much about Victoria as the hon. member; but I do my best for the purpose of studying what goes on there, and I find in the popular House there that a Bill extending the franchise to women was passed by a considerable majority.

Mr. ISAACS:
More than once, too.

Mr. KINGSTON:
In the Legislative Council, however—I speak with bated breath in the presence of Sir William Zeal it was ruled out of order.

Mr. FRASER:
It was voted out as well as ruled out.

Mr. KINGSTON:
The representatives of Victoria, in the popular branch of the Legislature have declared their wish that female franchise shall be the law of the land. Where therefore is the dictation? We are proposing something in the nature of a partnership with the other colonies, and they are making reciprocal proposals to us. What we want to know is who we are going into partnership with? We resist a limited franchise on a property qualification. Why? Not because of any attempt to dictate to us, but because we did not believe in it. Similarly we advocate female franchise, because we believe in it.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
    Because we are conservative.
Mr. KINGSTON:
    We have had some practical experience of the working of it.
Mr. SOLOMON:
    Very little.
Mr. KINGSTON:
    We are content with that working, and our experience has been sufficient to prove that our content is justified. The hon. member Mr. Solomon will recollect that he and all who represent South Australia at this Convention own
Mr. DOUGLAS:
    Clause 29 reads:
    Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each State that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification for electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State. But in the choosing of such members each elector shall have only one vote.
    Is that not sufficient for the hon. member, Mr. Kingston? Does he want to force down our throats a thing we do not believe in? Since I have been in Adelaide I have been reading a newspaper, and I saw the account of a row which a man had with his wife who insisted on canvassing for a member of Parliament who happened to be a justice of the peace, and in the court when the case came on. I have not found a single woman yet who is anxious for this franchise. We had a meeting the other day at Launceston on the subject. There were three or four ladies there who wanted to have a vote.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. HOLDER:
I now move another amendment. It is a compromise which has been suggested by Mr. Trenwith, and a very fair one. I hope that is the view that will be taken by the majority. What I move is:

To add to the clause "And no elector no possessing the right to vote shall be deprived of that right."

That is to say that while the matter is left to the Federal Parliament no person who now possesses the right to vote shall be deprived of that right.

Dr. QUICK:
I hope that the Convention will accept this proposition, and if there is no opposition I will not speak.

Mr. WALKER:
It seems to me that this is tautology, as we have declared that the qualification shall be that existing in the States at the time of the passing of the Act.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
As I understand it Mr. Holder wants to have this amendment passed in order that the Parliament when declaring the uniform franchise shall not be able to deprive any woman, who can now vote, of that right.

Mr. Reid:

It will compel female suffrage.

The Chairman:

If I may, I would point out that it applies only to electors who now possess the right to vote.

Sir Edward Braddon:

How can a uniform franchise be secured if this amendment is carried? It will bind the hands of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. Barton:

As I understand the suggestion, it means that if the Federal Parliament chooses to legislate in respect of a uniform suffrage in the Commonwealth it cannot do so unless it makes it include female suffrage. It ties the hands of the Federal Parliament entirely. I cannot understand many of our friends, who profess to trust the people we are constituting, and who now cannot trust them in this matter. It seems such a deviation from a well-stated principle. Who is to say that the Parliament of the Commonwealth is going to take away any right? We have conceded to the Federal Parliament the right to frame a uniform franchise. Supposing woman suffrage were abolished in South Australia, where would be the necessity for this proposal? Under this Constitution women who have the right to vote in this colony will be entitled to vote for the Federal Parliament in South Australia; but if South Australia changes that law, this proposal is unnecessary. The result of the amendment will be that it will make a uniform franchise impossible, unless the Parliament adopts adult suffrage.

Dr. Cockburn:

You can make an amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. Barton:

What need is there to make an amendment of the Constitution, if you have stated that the people whom you are constituting shall have the right to make their own franchise? Why should you now tie their hands and say that because the women of South Australia have a vote, the Parliament shall not be allowed to make a uniform franchise unless it is on the basis of adult suffrage? That is a fettering of the Federation to which I will never consent. I do not believe in speciously putting in the name of freedom, and giving the rights of men away.

Mr. Kingston:
It is all very well for my hon. friend Mr. Barton to wax indignant about refusing to trust the Federal Parliament, but not so long ago, when we were discussing the relative numbers of the two Houses, my friend adopted the same attitude about the impropriety of trusting them. As regards that matter it was proposed that the House of Representatives and the Senate might fight the question of their relative numbers out for themselves, and if they chose to agree to a different course to that in the Bill they had a right to give effect to it. That was resisted and resisted successfully by Mr. Barton. Now what is being resisted? Although we come in under separate terms but with equal rights and with our own laws, yet if the Federal Parliament chooses it can enact a law by which these provisions of the State are swept away, and instead of a broad and democratic franchise, we may have a property qualification or plurality of voting.

HON. MEMBERS:

No.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Well, put it at the very best, a disfranchisement of some of the people. Surely it is right to leave it to the Parliament of the State, whether they shall alter their own franchise or not. Is it to be tolerated for a moment, that they must put their head into a noose like this against their will? It is the root and foundation of their political existence, and is it to be that their enjoyment of any privileges and advantages that their franchise gives them shall be taken away, diminished, or destroyed? I hope hon. members generally will assent to the principle in the amendment of my colleague, Mr. Holder. As regards the form, that may or may not be improved, but the principle is a most important one. It was difficult enough to fix this franchise ourselves. What will the result be if it be possible, whilst the States Parliament wishes to continue its system, for the Federal Parliament to take it away?

Mr. TRENWITH:

Mr. Barton said he would never submit to a position of this sort, which would limit rather than extend the freedom of the people, as has been pointed out by Mr. Kingston. He took the exactly opposite attitude a short time ago. There must be no objection to that, for we all hold ourselves at liberty to change our opinions. He said he objected to tying the hands of the future in an improper way. He was successful as to the relative proportion of the two Houses. Now, this is a question involving the right of the people to take part in the government of the country in which they live. The Parliament of the future might have power to extend the privileges of the people, but not the power to restrict the privileges of the people with reference to self-government and in pursuance of the legislation upon which we first proposed that we federated. Mr. Holder, as I understand it, is anxious to provide that no whim of a Parliament to be elected shall enable it to deprive any person who is now possessed of the right to vote of the power to vote in the future, or any class now possessed of the vote to vote in the future, and to provide that such alterations of franchise as may take place shall go on in accordance with historical precedent, which is to broaden out rather than to narrow or restrict. All the history of discussion shows that the desires of the people are in the direction of giving more extended privileges. We are to ask the electors of these colonies to say whether they will have the Constitution which we submit to them, and we shall have a greater chance of their endorsing the Constitution if upon the face of it there is a declaration that they cannot in future be deprived of a right they now possess. I opposed putting female suffrage in this Constitution because I do not wish to increase the difficulties of obtaining Federation and I felt by inserting female suffrage I should not be advancing the chance of its adoption; but I feel if we do not have some clear declaration made to the people who now have a vote that they will always be privileged to exercise their vote in the future, and that if there is an alteration made it will be in the direction of giving a vote to the people now if they have it not, we can well imagine the women of South Australia giving a negative vote for fear that the privilege for which they have struggled, and which has been obtained, may be taken from them at the will of the other colonies who have not yet obtained female suffrage; and I can readily understand the people who by this Constitution will be for the first time presented with equal voting power with their other male comrades in their colony, fearing that manhood suffrage may be taken from them by the whim of a Parliament that may be elected. Such power as is now possessed by voters should only be taken from them, if taken at all, through the most difficult process; for while it is proper that Parliament should have the right to facilitate and extend the privileges and powers of the people, it is only right that it should be most difficult to restrict the freedom of the people.

Mr. REID:

At first sight I was opposed to this principle, but I think, in the interest of Federation, it should be assented to. It is perfectly immaterial to New South Wales how the electors of South Australia are constituted. That is my view, and I think that is the view generally taken; we have no right to expose any elector or class of electors, such as the female electors of South Australia, to the risk of d
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I might suggest that the best thing to do would be to insert the words: Until Parliament otherwise provides.

The CHAIRMAN:
You cannot do that now, because we have decided that the words of the clause shall stand.

Mr. HOLDER:
We should not agree to that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
It seems to me we all want Federation. We want to do what is fair and right, but Federation is the main object we wish to obtain, and we do not want to put undue obstacles in the way. South Australia has resolved on female suffrage, South Australia wishes to maintain it, and I suppose the right to alter it if it is thought desirable, although I do not think it is likely to be altered. The other colonies have not adopted it, but they would still like to have the right to have some choice over their franchise, so that they may have female suffrage if they want it. If the amendment is carried, the effect will be that South Australia will have female suffrage for all time; they will irrevocably have it. South Australia cannot alter it; I do not say they want to. The other colonies have not got female suffrage, and cannot obtain female suffrage unless the Parliament of the Commonwealth gives it to them. So far as this matter is concerned, if the proposition is to make each State legislate for itself as to the manner in which it shall return its members, I do not see much objection. They can only return a certain number of members, and they can please themselves as to the way in which those members shall be returned, but I do not think we should say arbitrarily in the Constitution that it should absolutely remain fixed as it is.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is not said.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I think that is what it means.

Mr. ISAACS:
It does not.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
What does it mean?

Mr. ISAACS:
It means that everyone who has a vote under the Commonwealth Bill now shall always be permitted to have that vote.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Always have it?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It does not prevent the State taking it away.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is not the form of the amendment.

Mr. KINGSTON:
It is not in the original section.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That is worse. If you once give him the right to vote for the Federal Parliament you can never take it away again.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You can always alter it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Where is the authority for any State to alter its own?

Mr. KINGSTON:
In each State it is prescribed by the law for the time being of the State.

Mr. BARTON:
You say no person having the right to vote shall afterwards be deprived of it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
If the amendment now proposed is that no one who has now a vote shall be deprived of it, it deprives both the local Parliament and the Parliament of the Commonwealth from interfering with it, and fixes for all time the absolute and eternal right of everybody who has got a vote now. Surely that is not the intention.

Mr. HOLDER:
Although I am not willing to accept Sir John Downer's suggestion, I am quite prepared to accept another suggestion, which emanates from Mr. Isaacs, to make the amendment read:
And no elector possessing the right to vote shall be deprived of that right by the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLDER:
That will leave it still open to the Parliament of any State to take away that right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
No objection to that!

Mr. BARTON:
Does Mr. Holder mean "elector" at the establishment of the Commonwealth—this is a mere question of conformity of expression—or any elector who at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth, or at any time after, shall become entitled to vote, so that any person who at any time after the establishment of the Commonwealth is given the right to vote by a local Parliament—supposing, for instance, an infant of 16 years—shall not be deprived of the right to vote at federal elections by the Federal Parliament?

Mr. HOLDER:

I desire that at any time any elector having a right to vote which he had at the time the Commonwealth came into operation, or which he acquired afterwards by State legislation before the Federal Parliament legislates on the subject shall be protected in the exercise of that vote against any action of the Federal Parliament. I am quite willing to leave the matter of form to the Drafting Committee.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We admit the right of the Federal Parliament to declare its own franchise. As soon as it does that it certainly would not be right to allow any State afterwards to alter that franchise, but we claim the right to say to the Federal Parliament: "In declaring that franchise you shall not take from any person or class of persons who have the right to vote that privilege."

Mr. HIGGINS:

Even for State purposes?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We do not interfere with State purposes. We are dealing simply with the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BROWN:

I would like to ask whether the object which Mr. Holder has in view will be met by words such as these:

Provided that in case of any State possessing adult suffrage on the passing of this Act, such State shall be entitled to retain it until the Parliament of the State shall otherwise provide.

That, I think, is what most of us are willing to agree to. We wish to conserve our own liberties and let South Australia have adult suffrage as she has it now. We object very much to having the suffrage enjoyed by one particular colony thrust upon the whole Commonwealth. If words such as I have read will meet Mr. Holder's views, he might withdraw his amendment. I would support the adoption of similar words to those I have read; but I will not be a party to tying the hands of the Federal Parliament in such a way as that hereafter to obtain a uniform franchise we would be compelled to take the suffrage now enjoyed by South Australia.
Mr. O'CONNOR:

It is very little use giving the Federal Parliament power to make a uniform franchise if you tie its hands. If you pass this limitation you only make this effect: you stereotype the franchise in every one of the States. There can be no uniform franchise unless the States have arrived at a uniform franchise. You have in one colony, South Australia, woman suffrage; in another colony, Tasmania, there is a special educational franchise, given especially on account of Federation.

Mr. REID:

Tasmania?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

That is for the legislative Council.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I understood it was for both Houses.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

No.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Well, the Tasmanian representatives ought to know better than I do.

Mr. HIGGINS:

There is a wages vote in Tasmania.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

However, one or two illustrations are sufficient to show what I mean, that you never can have a uniform franchise until the States amongst themselves have all the same electoral qualification. The very object of giving this power to the Federal Parliament is that you shall make it uniform; but if you are to leave it in the hands of the States, until they shall agree there is no use in giving the power to the Federal Parliament. It appears to me to be an unwise thing to stereotype the franchises as they are at any particular time when the Parliament wishes to interfere. If we do not wish the Parliament of the Commonwealth to interfere in these matters it would be very much better to say so. But one of the reasons which make it advisable to place this power in the hands of the Federal Parliament is that it is only just, as the whole people are to be represented in the House of Representatives, there should be some uniform basis possible. But you never can have that unless you give the power to the Commonwealth. Uniformity can only be brought about by a process of levelling which may result in the taking away of a particular privilege or a particular franchise in some place or another. And that is done for the good of the whole. If it is good to have a uniform franchise, some portion of the Commonwealth must lose some portion of its rights in the adoption of that franchise. We are told that if this amendment is not passed there will be a danger that the franchise which is now hold by the women of South Australia will be taken away. Of course there is an absolute right in the Parliament to do all kinds of things. There is the right in the Senate to reject every Bill. There is the right in the Governor to refuse his assent to every Bill. But all these rights must be exercised with reason and judgment, and in accordance with circumstances. I would ask, "Is it not the tendency with regard to legislation to broaden the franchise"? If the supporters of woman suffrage have faith in it, why should not they have faith in the gradual education of the people throughout the colonies till they secure the final adoption of this principle? The power should be simply reserved so as to meet any eventuality which it may happen may come before the Federal Parliament. If you tie their hands in the way suggested, I do not see how they can act at all. I would like to say a word or two about the attempt which has been made to draw a distinction between my hon. friend Mr. Barton's action in respect of another clause and in respect of this one. It is one thing to place a right in a way that Parliament cannot interfere with it, and quite another thing when you give Parliament a power and do not tie its hands in the exercise of that power. That is a perfectly plain distinction.

Mr. REID:
With how much difference?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I think the hon. member has only just woke up.

Mr. BARTON:
The hon. member though when a Drafting Committee was appointed that he was going to muzzle the members of the Committee.

Mr. REID:
Oh, no.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I have put these considerations, because, it appears to me it is not a light matter. If we are going to give this power to Parliament, let us give it in some way that it can be exercised.

Mr. HOWE:
Mr. O'Connor has explained matters so plainly that it is patent to every South Australian that unless Mr. Holder's amendment is added to the clause the Federal Parliament would deprive us of the right we now possess to adult suffrage.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It might.

Mr. HOWE:
We gave them the right. Are we going to have woman suffrage come about in all these colonies within the next few years? I rather doubt it. Consequently that is the more reason why this amendment should be added to the clause. Although I would not interfere with the rights of other people in other States to pass into law any franchise they think proper, I will even deny the right of the Federal Parliament to alter the franchise which now exists in our State. I am a thorough home ruler. I believe in self-government, and that law which we have been instrumental in obtaining in this colony I will not give power to the Federal Parliament to alter.

Dr. QUICK:

Opposition has been raised to Mr. Holder's proposal, but I hope the Drafting Committee will not insist on opposing the amendment. I think there are some grounds for the acceptance of the amendment.

Mr. BARTON:

We are not acting as a committee here, but as individuals.

Dr. QUICK:

Very organised individuals.

Mr. BARTON:

We are only acting as a committee as far as the phraseology of the Bill is concerned, but we can exercise our own individual opinions.

Mr. PEACOCK:

You usually vote together.

Mr. BARTON:

Because we are sensible enough to agree.

Dr. QUICK:

My hon. friend, Mr. O'Connor, said that there was not much probability of the Parliament of the Commonwealth cutting down the established franchise, but he admitted there was a tendency to interfere with the franchise. That being so, where is the harm in putting in a security? Mr. Holder and others say their friends here entertain some apprehension on the point, but I do not think there is much danger of it being cut down. What people fear is that the right which is now secure under local legislation may afterwards be assailed by federal legislation. I hope that the appeal made by the representatives of South Australia will be successful.

Mr. BARTON:

In accordance with the suggestion I made to my hon. friend I have sketched out this amendment, and I will ask the hon. member to follow me in it, for, though I may be opposed to the principle, I desire to have the amendment in as perfect a form as possible. The amendment I have prepared reads:

And no elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth or who afterwards acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of a State shall be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising such right at elections for the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

That is going further than Mr. Holder suggested.

Mr. BARTON:

If it goes too far, I should like Mr. Holder to apprise me of the fact.

Mr. ISAACS:

All he wants is that the Federal Parliament should not abolish the qualifications existing at the present time.

Mr. BARTON:

I asked a distinct question on that subject. I asked my hon. friend if he intended his amendment to apply only to the rights acquired before the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth, or if it was to apply also to rights to vote acquired after its establishment. The hon. member means that when the Commonwealth proceeds to legislate it shall not make any law in derogation of the right acquired before it legislates, even though acquired after the Constitution has become law.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:

Under this amendment South Australia will obtain for herself her adult suffrage while the other States will retain their respective suffrages. It seems to me that by passing this amendment we shall make the whole clause perfectly ridiculous. We say in this clause that the Federal Parliament shall have the power of passing a federal franchise. What is that federal franchise to be, one for each State, or one for the whole of the States? Clearly it must be a uniform one, and therefore we cannot logically admit that there should be any exception to that in favor of one State or another.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Have the Tasmanian Assembly passed female suffrage?

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:

The Tasmanian Parliament has not.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Has the Assembly?

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:

The Assembly has passed it, but I do not see that that affects it one way or another. I hope we shall not stultify ourselves and make this Bill ridiculous by putting a clause in it that will not bear scrutiny.
HON. MEMBERS:
What is the amendment now?

Mr. HOLDER:
The Drafting Committee have put it in a form which makes it harmonise with the Bill, and I will accept it.

The CHAIRMAN:
The amendment is:
But no elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires the right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of a State, shall be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising such right at elections for the House of Representatives.

Mr. FRASER:
Under this amendment, if South Australia put on the roll of the Northern Territory 10,000 Chinamen who might reside in the country, we should be compelled to put them on the roll of the Commonwealth, and I do not think the Commonwealth should be bound in this way.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think this goes too far. The principle of this Constitution is that no right shall be taken away that exists at the time of the Commonwealth, but it goes further. It abnegates the whole [P.732] force of the clause, which is that a uniform franchise should be established for the Commonwealth. In reference to the position of South Australia, which has already established female suffrage, members do not think that that right should be taken away on the establishment of the Commonwealth, and that is a very fair thing, but I do not see that the clause should be further mutilated. We have laid, down the principle so far as we can go of a uniform franchise for the Commonwealth, and therefore I think one portion of that clause is quite unnecessary, and that it should be confined entirely to those rights which have been created at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:
I have on two separate occasions asked Mr. Holder if he wishes this to extend to rights acquired after the establishment of the Commonwealth, and Mr. McMillan does not think that is the meaning of it, but that is really the meaning. I have endeavored to put it that way before the Committee.

Mr. HOLDER:
What I wish is that these rights should be preserved which have been acquired up to the time that the Commonwealth makes its franchise.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I want to add these words to the clause:
And no property or income qualification shall be required of any elector.
It is a good thing to say that no man shall have more than one vote; it is a better thing to say that every man shall have a vote if he fulfils the conditions of registration.

Mr. BARTON:
What is the use of a proposal of this sort? We have prescribed that no elector should have more than one vote.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
No, he says every elector shall have one vote.

Mr. BARTON:
What I understand is this: that in countries like Tasmania there are some people who are not on the roll, and this means to enfranchise them; that is to say, the laws of the State are not to be interfered with, but they are to be totally altered. That is so inconsistent that I cannot entertain it for a moment. There is another point we may look at: We are making a Constitution, not a body of laws for the States. We are not making an Electoral Act for South Australia, and we should not load this Constitution with a multiplicity of provisions.

Amendment negatived clause as read passed.

HON. MEMBERS:

R

Mr. BARTON:

I propose only to take a very few clauses.

HON. MEMBERS:

Report progress.

Mr. BARTON:

If the Convention insists on sitting on Monday I think we should sit while we can sit. I only ask that certain machinery clauses be dealt with. One clause with regard to age in voting will not need much discussion. With that exception down to clause 50 there is only one clause about payment of members that I think will cause discussion, and I promise to postpone that.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I have given notice of an amendment in clause 49.

Mr. BARTON:

That's a very short amendment.

Mr. REID:

We will do good work if we go on for a bit.

Clause 30.-Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualifications of a member of the House of Representatives shall be as follows:—

I. He must be of the full age of twenty-one years, and must when chosen be an elector entitled to vote in some State at the election of members of the House of Representatives, or a person qualified to become such elector, and must have been for three years at the least a resident within the limits of the Commonwealth as existing at the time when he is elected:

II. He must be either a natural born subject of the Queen, or a subject of the Queen naturalised by or under a law of Great Britain and Ireland, or of one of the said colonies, or of the Commonwealth, or of a State, at least five years before he is elected.

Sub-section 1.

Mr. WALKER:

I move:
To strike out the word "twenty-one," and insert in lieu thereof "twenty five."

Mr. Reid:
For the House of Representatives?

Mr. Walker:
In the United States a person must be 25 to be eligible for the House of Representatives, and to have a seven years' qualification. I maintain that the age of 21 is too young for a senator.

Mr. Peacock:
Now, do not make a speech, or we will vote against you.

Mr. Walker:
I should like to mention another matter. The age of 30 is the minimum for a director of the Australian Mutual Provident Society, of the board of which I have the honor to be a member. If the age of 30 is young enough for a director of that society I think that 25 is very young to be a senator for the Commonwealth of Australia.

Amendment negatived

Mr. Gordon:
I move:
To strike out the words: "or it person qualified to become such elector."
I do this for three reasons

Mr. Reid:
Give us one.

Mr. Gordon:
One is that everyone born in the Commonwealth is qualified to become an elector.

Hon. Members:
Do not make a speech

Mr. Gordon:
My chief point is that I think that registration should be made compulsory. I would not give a man who has lived here for three years without registration a vote.

Mr. Peacock:
His name might have dropped off accidentally.

Sir George Turner:
He may have been away for a trip.

Mr. Reid:
Withdraw. (Laughter.)

Mr. Gordon:
I will ask leave to withdraw the amendment.
Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. HOLDER:
I move:
To add to sub-section I. the words "or must have been born within the limits of the Commonwealth."

Mr. REID:
Withdraw. (Laughter.)

Mr. HOLDER:
I am not going to make that the sole qualification. It would be sufficient in the absence of three years' residence.

HON. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Question so resolved in the negative.
Clause as read agreed to.

Clause 31.-Members of Senate ineligible for House of Representatives. Agreed to.
Clause 32.-Election of Speaker of the House of Representatives. Agreed to.
Clause 33.-Absence of Speaker provided for. Agreed to.
Clause 34.-Resignation of place in House of Representatives. Agreed to.
Clause 35.-The place of a member shall become vacant if for one whole Session of the Parliament he, without permission of the House entered on its Journals, fails to attend the House.

Amendment (by Mr. Barton) agreed to:
To strike out the words "one whole" and insert in lieu thereof "two consecutive months of any"

Clause as amended agreed to:

Clause 36. -Upon the happening of a vacancy in the House of Representatives, the Speaker shall, upon a resolution of the House, issue his writ for the election of a new member.

In the case of a vacancy by death or resignation happening when the Parliament is not in Session, or during an adjournment of the House for a period of which a part longer than seven days is unexpired, the Speaker, or, if there is no Speaker or if he is absent from the Commonwealth, the Governor-General shall issue a writ without such resolution.

Mr. GLYNN:
I would like to know what is the necessity for having the words "Upon a resolution of the House"? Why should you make a majority determine whether a vacancy is to be filled or not?

Mr. BARTON:
This has been adopted from the Constitution Acts of all the colonies, unless there is any difference in this colony. It has always been the custom when the House is in Session and a vacancy occurs to require the authority of the House for the Speaker to issue the writ.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is not so in Victoria.

Mr. BARTON:
We made considerable search into the Colonial Constitution Acts, and it was found in the majority. The reason is that when a House is sitting it might have some objection to the immediate filling of a vacancy. There have been cases, for instance, where the House of Commons has punished an electorate by delaying the issue of a new writ and so for a time disfranchising it, for reasons-bribery and corruption. This is a question where, for use in extreme cases, a right like this should be reserved. I do not think it is a right which will be abused in any way. Where abuses have been sheeted home, it has been found useful as a punishment for bribery and corruption.

Mr. REID:
With an electorate of 50,000 there cannot be wholesale bribery and corruption.

Mr. BARTON:
That depends upon the closeness of the contest. The question is whether it is not wise to retain words which have stood the test of time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

the words should certainly come out. At a time when there may be high party feeling, such as there was in Victoria recently on the tariff debate, where often questions are carried by one vote, or on a casting vote, a majority of one may decide an important point of this kind. The words:

Upon a resolution of the House can have no good effect; they may be injurious; and I move to strike them out.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

The words "without such resolution" must come out as a consequential amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I may explain this. The first part of the case provides that upon the happening of any vacancy while the House is in Session the Speaker shall issue a writ for the election of a new member.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Not necessarily while the House is in Session.

Mr. BARTON:

The second part of the clause makes that plain. In case of a vacancy happening when the House is not in Session, or during an adjournment of the House where there is an unexpired period of more than seven days, the Speaker can still issue the writ, but the case is provided for where there is no Speaker, or where the Speaker is absent; and then the Governor General has to do it. It seems that some other words have to come out. But the clause can be reconsidered afterwards.

Mr. WISE:

The clause can be put in about four lines:

Upon the happening of a vacancy in the House of Representatives the Speaker, or if there is no Speaker, or if he is absent from the Commonwealth, the Governor-General shall issue a writ for the election of a new member.

The CHAIRMAN:

We cannot go back now, as we have amended the clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We can recommit the clause if necessary.
Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 37.-The presence of at least one-third of the whole number of the members of the House of Representatives shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the House for the exercise of its powers.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I think the quorum is too high. In New South Wales it is twenty-five. I propose:
That the word "twenty" be inserted instead of "one-third of the whole number of the."

Mr. BARTON:
I think it is extremely necessary and desirable to keep up a due proportion for a quorum. When this is required it is generally obtained. They generally take advantage of a small quorum to absent themselves when they might otherwise be present. And I do hold that if you are going to pay members they should be obliged to attend to their duties. Of course in the House of Commons the quorum is only forty, but that has prevailed for centuries.

Amendment negatived; clause as read agreed to.

Clause 38.-Questions arising in the House of Representatives shall be determined by a majority of votes other than that of the Speaker; and when the votes are equal the Speaker shall have a casting vote, but otherwise he shall not vote.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think the Speaker of the House of Representatives should be placed in the same position as the President of the Senate. I would suggest to have the same provision in clause 38 as there is in clause 22.

Mr. REID:
You cannot do it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is more by way suggestion. I do not wish to dictate.

Mr. BARTON:
The reason appears to be this. The House of Representatives is a body which contains representatives in proportion to the numbers of the people without relation to any particular protection of State interests. Therefore it can make very little difference if the Speaker can only have a casting vote. But in the case of the Senate there is a difference, and that is the State requires the vote of its full proportion of representatives in the Senate for the preservation of its interests, and the President is therefore made entitled to vote.

Clause passed as read.

Clause 39-Duration of House of Representatives-postponed.
Clause 40.-For the purpose of holding general elections of members to serve in the House of Representatives, the Governor-General may cause writs to be issued by such persons, in such form, and addressed to such returning officers, as he thinks fit.

The writs shall be issued within ten days from the expiry of a Parliament, or from the proclamation of a dissolution.

Mr. HOLDER:
I want to ask Mr. Barton whether this ought not to be made to apply to both Houses. I see no provision for writs to be issued for the Senate.

Mr. BARTON:
There is something in this point, but there is a question whether it is necessary to provide that the Governor should issue the writs in any case. The issue of the writs for a general election is an exercise of the prerogative.

The CHAIRMAN:
Is it intended that the word "ten" in italics should remain part of the clause?

Mr. BARTON:
The reason is this: In New South Wales it is fixed at two. In a Commonwealth it is necessary perhaps to make the time a little longer than for a State election, and I think that fourteen days or more was suggested. The Drafting Committee thought they would make the suggestion ten.

Clause as read agreed to.

Clause 41.-Continuance of existing election laws until the Parliament otherwise provides. Agreed to.

Clause 42.-Until the Parliament otherwise provides, any question respecting the qualification of a member or a vacancy in the House of Representatives, or a disputed return, shall be determined by the House.

As a consequential amendment the words "or a disputed return" were struck out and the clause as amended was agreed to.

Clause 43.-Allowance to members.

Mr. BARTON:
I move:
That this clause be postponed, because one or two gentlemen who were very tired have gone away, and this clause may provoke considerable debate.

Clause postponed.

Clause 44.-Any person:
I. Who has taken an oath or made a declaration or acknowledgment of allegiance, obedience, or adherence, to a foreign power, or has done any act whereby he has become a subject or a citizen, or entitled to the rights or privileges of a subject or a citizen, of a foreign power; or
II. Who is an undischarged bankrupt or insolvent, or a public defaulter; or
III. Who is attainted of treason, or convicted of felony or of any infamous crime:

shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives until the disability is removed by a grant of a discharge, or the expiration or remission of the sentence, or a pardon, or release, or otherwise.

Mr. GORDON:
I should like to ask Mr. Barton whether there is anything in this point: A number of German fellow colonists may have taken the oath of allegiance to a foreign power, especially those who have served in the ranks in Germany. Would it not be necessary to add after "power" in line 27 the words "or who has not since been naturalised as provided in clause 30"?

Mr. GLYNN:
You cannot have two, allegiances.

Mr. BARTON:
No; a man might have to go out of our Parliament to serve against us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
He may be Minister of Defence.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I would like to put a case to Mr. Barton. It may happen that treaties may be in force between say England and Japan. There is a treaty almost in operation on the very lines I am citing that will give to a British subject travelling in Japan practically the same rights and privileges as he would enjoy as a citizen of his own country. Surely it is never intended that by a person travelling in another country, who becomes entitled to privileges conferred on him by a treaty between two high powers, he should be disqualified from holding a seat in the Federal Parliament. Our members of Parliament who are hardworked take their summer trips, and it may be that some of them may come back and find they have lost their seats as a result of this clause.

Clause as read agreed to.

Clause 45.-Place to become vacant on happening of certain disqualifications. Agreed to.

Clause 46.-Any person who directly or indirectly himself, or by any person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertakes, executes, holds, or enjoys, in the whole or in part, any agreement for or on account of the public service of the Commonwealth, shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives while he executes, holds, or enjoys the agreement, or any part or share of it, or any benefit or emolument arising from it.

Any person, being a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, who, in the manner or to the extent forbidden in this section, undertakes, executes, holds, enjoys, or continues to hold, or enjoy, any such agreement, shall thereupon vacate his place.

But this section does not extend to any agreement made, entered into, or accepted by, an incorporated company consisting of more than twenty persons, if the agreement is made, entered

Mr. GORDON:

I move:

To amend the third sub-section of this clause by striking out the words:
"An incorporated company consisting of more than twenty persons," and inserting in lieu thereof, "A company legally incorporated in any State."

Mr. HIGGINS:

This is a very common clause.

Mr. GORDON:

No doubt. Under the South Australian Companies Act five persons can form a company. If you wish to distribute a partnership so as to make sure of any one not being influenced by his parliamentary associations then you ought to make the number of persons who can form an incorporated company 100 instead of twenty.

Mr. BARTON:

No doubt when the words were first placed in the Constitution Act they applied to a different state of things. I would urge the necessity of keeping in this Constitution a disqualification of this kind up to a considerable number of people, so that there will not be the possibility of a body of seven or eight persons combining together to form a registered company, and then carrying out a fraud upon the public. I think it is better to adhere to the clause.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have known of a company with 50,000 shares, and every one of them, with the exception of four, was held by one person.

Mr. BARTON:

"One-man companies" they are called.
Mr. GORDON:
That is quite legal. The number composing any duly incorporated company should be fixed; if not how easy will it be to have twenty nominal shareholders who could combine to do a certain thing. If we are going to prevent fraud let us make the perpetration of it as difficult as possible.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I would like the hon. member to postpone this clause. I would like to touch upon an amendment I intended to propose. why members of the community should be debarred from entering into an agreement to perform duties on behalf of the State, and that the legal profession should be entitled, as they do in all the colonies, to hold large retainers for Crown work. It has almost become a scandal in Australia that our legal barristers in the various Chambers in the different Parliaments are retained by the Crown to do Crown work. It leads very often to suspicion in the minds of the laymen that they are disqualified while the profession of the law is not disqualified, but is privileged. We know that lawyers are, most of them, the ablest men in the Legislature, and that it is very material to a Government to be able to court the favor and secure the support of such leading men in the Chamber, and so long as we allow this thing to be done with.

Mr. BARTON:
Possibly the clause may be postponed, but I should like to say a word or two in reply to Mr. Carruthers. He seems to imply that if a barrister accepts a brief for the Crown, that the Crown must be buying him, and that he is willing to be bought. That is not a suggestion worthy of him, and he will not convince anyone that there is corruption in it. I will postpone the clause, but would like to point out that the trouble is that where a case of great moment is pending and where the Crown desires to engage the leading lawyers, if Mr. Carruthers' suggestion is adopted you will find that the private litigants who may be trying to despoil the public treasury have engaged the best lawyers, and that the Crown is unable to secure the assistance of any of them.

Clause postponed.
Progress reported.

PRINTING MINUTES AND EVIDENCE.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I understand that the Finance Committee when discussing their resolutions kept minutes of the proceedings, and in discussing financial matters I think we should have them before us.

Mr. BARTON:
Copies have been distributed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I want copies of the proceedings of the Committee, not the resolutions.

Mr. GLYNN:
I want the railway evidence, too.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It will be necessary to refer to those minutes in discussing the financial question, and I think that it would be wise if we had a day or two to consider them.

The PRESIDENT:
I may state that the papers laid on the table, and which have been ordered to be printed, have been printed.

Mr. BARTON:
I have not asked for the minutes to be printed, for a reason which I think members will appreciate. The discussion was confidential, and matters were done and undone in the various committees, while members gave votes on questions which were in a consultative position, and if these votes are published they may feel themselves bound by their votes or they may be twitted with inconsistency. Without an express order from the Convention I do not intend to have them printed.

The PRESIDENT:
Only those papers laid on the table which are ordered to be printed by the Convention will be printed.

ADJOURNMENT.
Convention adjourned at 11.53 p.m.
Saturday April 17, 1897.

Leave of Absence - Personal Explanation - Commonwealth of Australia Bill - Order of Business - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HOLDER:
I ask leave to amend my motion by adding, at the end of it, the following words:
And that five days' leave of absence be granted to the hon. member for New South Wales, Mr. Lyne.
Leave granted.

Mr. HOLDER:
I now move:
That ten days' leave of absence be granted to the Honorable Sir John Forrest, the Honorable J. W. Hackett, Mr. Hassell, Mr. James, Mr. Leake, the Honorable Sir J. G. Lee Steere, Mr. Loton, the Honorable F. H. Piesse, and Mr. Sholl, Representatives of Western Australia, on account of urgent public affairs in that colony; and that five days' leave of absence be granted to the hon. member for New South Wales, Mr. Lyne.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I second it.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Before you leave the chair, Sir, I wish to make an explanation.

I understand that Mr. Wood, a member of the South Australian Parliament, has complained that in making a statement in this House I reflected on his character in saying he adjudicated on a case in which he was interested. I had no intention of doing that. Mr. Wood has supplied me with a copy of the newspaper report, which I will read. At the commencement of the case the gentlemen on the Bench were Messrs. J. Gordon, S.M., R. Wood, the Justice referred to, and F. G. Belcher. The report says:

Mr. J. C. Hamp appeared for the informant, and Mr. N. A. Webb for the defendant. Mr. Webb intimated to the Court that evidence would be produced during the trial which would show that quarrels had taken place in consequence of the action the informant had taken to secure the return to Parliament at the last election of one of the justices on the Bench. He left it entirely to the discretion of the justice as to whether he should sit and hear a case in which evidence of such a nature was likely to be forthcoming. The S.M. said that if there was any justice on the Bench to whom Mr. Webb's remarks might apply he would leave it to him as to whether he would retire or not. [Mr. R. Wood, M.P., then immediately left the Bench.] The S.M. intimated that the Bench was not properly constituted, and adjourned the case for half an hour to secure another Justice.

I did not wish to accuse Mr. Wood of adjudicating on the case, but said, as reported, that he was on the Bench at the commencement of the proceedings.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee.

Clause 47.-If a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives accepts any office or profit under the Crown, not being one of the offices of State held during the pleasure of the Governor-General, and the holders of which are by this Constitution declared to be capable of being chosen and of sitting as members of either House of the Parliament, or accepts any pension payable out of any of the revenues of the Commonwealth during the pleasure of the Crown, his place shall thereupon become vacant, and no person holding any such office, except as aforesaid, or holding or enjoying any such pension, shall be capable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of either House of the Parliament.

But this section does not apply to a person who is in receipt only of pay, half pay, or a pension, as an officer of the Queen's navy or army, or who receives a new commission in the Queen's navy or army, or an increase of pay on a new commission, or who is in receipt only of pay as an officer or member of the military or naval forces of the Commonwealth, and whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

In dealing with this clause-I am not certain whether this is the right place-I would like to call the attention of Mr. Barton to section 6 in the Constitution Act of Victoria:

If any person shall, while he is a member of the said Council or Assembly, or within six months after ceasing to be such member, accept any office of profit under the Crown, he shall be liable to a Penalty.

But there is nothing here which prevents a person, who is a member of the Parliament, from accepting an office of profit. The only penalty is that he forfeit his seat. We ought to guard against that, and I shall be glad if the hon. member, Mr. Barton, will look into the matter, and see what can be done to meet the objection which I have raised.
Mr. BARTON:
We find that there is a provision of that kind in the Victorian Constitution, but it has neither been inserted in the Bill of 1891 nor in this Bill, and it does not occur in any other Constitution that I know of, though I have not made a thorough search. If this Convention desires to make it impossible for a member of the Parliament to accept an office of profit under the Crown within a definite period after his leaving Parliament, we think it would be better to leave it to an hon. member to move the amendment, because there was nothing in the instructions to the Drafting Committee to that effect.

Mr. FRASER:
In Victoria a legislator can accept an office of profit after vacating his seat for either six months or twelve months.

Mr. HIGGINS:
A very good provision.

Mr. FRASER:
Yes, a very good provision, and it should be embodied in this Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I will move an amendment to give effect to what it seems many hon. members are desirous of seeing inserted. Clause 47 provides:

If a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives accepts any office of profit under the Crown, not being one of the offices of State held during the pleasure of the Governor-General, and the holders of which are by this Constitution declared to be capable of being chosen and of sitting as members of either House of The Parliament, or accepts any pension payable out of any of the revenues of the Commonwealth during the pleasure of the Crown, his place shall thereupon become vacant, and no person holding any such once, except as aforesaid, or holding or enjoying any such pension, shall be capable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of either House of The Parliament.

I do not like to move an absolute amendment, because I do not want to prejudicially affect the drafting. What I desire to do is to make a provision so that if any person who is a member accepts office, he shall be liable to a penalty, and if any person accepts office within six months after ceasing to be a member, he shall be liable to some penalty. The object is to prevent the Ministry of the day from bestowing its patronage upon members of Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
What about the office of Agent-General?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
A Judge of the Supreme Court and the Agent-General are excepted. The object is to prevent the Government of the day from conferring a valuable position on an existing member who could resign his seat and next day be appointed to any office of profit. The object of this section can be frustrated under such circumstances, so we should make it so that a person will be rather chary of accepting a position, and probably he will not run the risk of being out of Parliament so long. I will move:

To insert after "Representatives," I either while he is a member, or within six months after ceasing to be a member.

Mr. KINGSTON:
What penalty would you provide?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
With us it is £50 a day. Here it appears to be, in a subsequent section, £100 per day.

Mr. BARTON:
The next clause gives a penalty.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I have no doubt Mr. Barton will see that the amendment is put in proper form.

Mr. SYMON:
Would it not be better to simply include words prohibiting any member of the Senate or the House of Representatives accepting any office of profit whilst he is a member, or within six months of ceasing to be a member? I do not think you want any penalty.

Mr. KINGSTON:
It would be better in a separate clause.

Mr. SYMON:
A simple prohibition would do. What is the use of fixing a penalty? It would be simply a question of what the penalty amounted to, for a man to decide whether it was worth his while to take the position.

Mr. BARTON:
I think there is a way in which what hon. members desire could be secured without any trouble. "A member" is the governing word, but the amendment goes further, and deals with a man when he ceases to be a member. We might after:

If a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, put in these words-
Or if within six months after having been a member of either House, any person accepts.

Then the cases of Judges and Agents-General could be met by subsequent words.
Mr. REID:
    I think you had better have a separate paragraph.

Mr. BARTON:
    As regards Mr. Symon's suggestion I would remind the Committee that this is a disqualifying clause, and it is in the same form that clauses of disqualification have always been, that is to say, any member who accepts an office of profit shall be incapable of sitting.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    The only penalty is that his place shall become vacant.

Mr. BARTON:
    The penalty is £100 for each day he sits.

Mr. ISAACS:
    He does not want to sit.

Mr. BARTON:
    Quite true. After all, it is a question whether you should make the seat absolutely void or impose a penalty on the person who accepted office. If you impose a penalty on the member there is some reason for dealing in like manner with the person who accepts office within six months of being a member.
    It is only a penalty for sitting in the House.

Mr. SYMON:
    Leave this clause as it stands, and put in a special clause.

Mr. BARTON:
    If it is the general view of the Committee that there should be this period of six months during which a person cannot accept such an office, and also that the appointment should be void, or the person made subject to a penalty, then the beat way to deal with the matter would be to frame a new clause. After obtaining the sense of the Committee on these two points, it might perhaps be left to us to draw up a new clause.

Mr. FRASER:
    Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
    That is the better course.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
    We should not forget that there is another side to the question. I admit the force of what Sir George Turner has said, and that it is desirable, if it were practicable without any detriment, to make a provision which should prevent the purchase of a vote in the Federal Parliament by any promise of an appointment. But if we make the provision too stringent we may prevent the Government of the day from making an appointment which would be, absolutely necessary in the interests of the Commonwealth and of its good government. There might be a member of Parliament admirably suited to some post-more fitted for it, in fact, than anybody else available—and yet the Government of the day would be precluded from appointing that gentleman for six months, which might mean they would be precluded from making the appointment altogether.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
If such an event as that mentioned by Sir Edward Braddon occurred, it would be competent for the Government to introduce a measure dealing with it.

Mr. ISAACS:
Not if it is in the Constitution.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
If it is meant to apply to general cases, as it does in Victoria, it should be made to apply to gentlemen aspiring to seats on the bench. If it is a source of danger to appoint members of Parliament to positions of profit under the Crown, is it not a hundredfold more dangerous to appoint a member of Parliament, he being an active partisan, to the office of Chief Justice? The exemption should be carried out in its entirety, and the clause made to absolutely prevent all members of Parliament from accepting offices of profit. I move the addition of words to carry out that object.

The CHAIRMAN:
The only matter before the Committee at present is the amendment of Sir George Turner.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
If Mr. Barton will undertake to draft a new clause, I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Leave given.

Mr. BARTON:
I should like to have some indication from the Committee as to whether the new clause, if it is to be drawn, should take the form of a more veto of the acceptance of such office, or whether there should be a penalty attached.

Hon. MEMBERS: Veto.

Mr. BARTON:
And then, whether, its a matter of policy, it is desirable to have a prohibition of this kind at all?

Mr. GLYNN:
No.

Mr. BARTON:

Because, since I said something about it, Sir Edward Braddon seems to have given some reasons why such a clause should not be inserted.

Mr. GLYNN:

Hear, hear.

Mr. DOBSON:

I suggest that the amendment of Sir George Turner should be submitted to the Committee. If it is passed, the Leader of the Convention could draft a new clause. I also suggest, having listened to Sir George Turner's reasons, that this required term of six months should be made twelve. If any Federal Ministers want to reward one of their supporters by giving him a lucrative post, the term should be twelve months, because, after the Session is over, or all the motions of want of confidence are dealt with, six months would not be long enough. The whole thing should be arranged in the way Sir George Turner suggests.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I am disposed to agree with Sir Edward Braddon's expressed views on this question. I know of no Constitution in which a clause of this kind is embodied. I know the Victorian Parliament has legislated on this matter, and that the South Australian Assembly has passed a resolution on the subject. I suggest that it will be sufficient if we give the Federal Parliament power to deal with it.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I cordially indorse what has been said by the last speaker. While the motion of the hon. member appears to be an excellent one, we can all imagine cases in which the provision ought to be set aside, and in which the whole Parliament would desire to set it aside. The Parliament ought to have the power if it desires to make an exception to this rule. Why should it be prevented from doing so if it wishes?

Mr. BARTON:

If it is a question of policy it ought to be kept for the Parliament itself.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Certainly. And giving the Parliament the power would be ample to meet the case.

Mr. FRASER:

That is all very well, but we want to protect Parliament against improper proceedings. I remember a case such as Mr. Deakin refers to, in which Parliament passed an Amending Act making the appointment legal.
Therefore I think the object is now to protect the Parliament against wrong-doing like that.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I think we may go a good deal too far in tying the hands of Parliament.

Mr. FRASER:
We cannot go too far in doing what is right.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I agree with Sir Edward Braddon, that there may be some case in which in the public interest some appointment may be made in less than six months. I think we may trust the Parliament to look after the purity of administration. It has always done that before. I think, as long as you absolutely prohibit members of Parliament from taking positions, you may leave Parliament to look after the other thing. It is very seldom that you will have so strong a combination in Parliament in such a thing as to support an improper appointment against the public interest.

Mr. FRASER:
The appointment would be made by the Ministry, and not by the Parliament at all.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I think we should leave it to the Parliament rather than run the risk of defeating the public interest by a provision of this kind. After all, it is a matter incidental to the carrying out of the powers of Parliament.

Mr. BARTON:
It is already provided for.

Mr. GLYNN:
I think we may go too far in assuming that politicians may be dishonest. If it applies generally it ought to apply to the judges. We know that in America judges have been appointed for the express purpose of upsetting decisions previously given.

Mr. REID:
You could do just the same thing by appointing men who were not members of Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN:
What is good for one is good for another. I would support this exception of the judges, because I think the application of such a principle in regard to their appointment would be bad in the extreme. I would propose:

That the words "Of being chosen or," in line 34, be struck out.

A man holding an office of profit under the Crown, and who would be a candidate for election, could either give up his seat or his salary. Why should we impose this restraint upon the discretion of the electors? If a man has a salary under the Crown, they know of it, and if they choose to put him in Parliament knowing of it, let them.

The CHAIRMAN:
Does the hon. member Mr. Gordon wish to move his amendment?
Mr. GORDON:
Yes.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
There is an amendment by Sir George Turner.

The CHAIRMAN:
Sir George Turner's amendment has been withdrawn.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I submit with very great respect that it has not been put to the Committee.

The CHAIRMAN:
I put it to the Committee, and the amendment was withdrawn
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I withdrew only on the understanding that Mr. Barton was going to prepare a clause to deal with it.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I certainly entirely concur with Sir George Turner's amendment.
Mr. BARTON:
I would point out that we must be exceedingly careful lest we be trying too often to legislate for the people we are going to call into existence. Our business is to frame a Federal Constitution -that is all the Statute under which we come here enables us to do. I do not think it was intended we should frame a body of laws to guide the Federation. As has been pointed out by Mr. Kingston, this is a matter which has been the subject of legislation in Victoria, and might equally be the subject of legislation in the Commonwealth. Every Parliament has the power to legislate with reference to the capacity and qualifications of its members. That is an inherent power of every Parliament; but, in addition to that, there is at the end of clause 50 a final provision giving power to the Parliament to legislate on all matters necessary for, or incidental to, the carrying into effect of any power given to it by the Constitution. Inasmuch as that sub-section exists-if passed, as I think it will be necessary to pass it-then the Parliament of the Commonwealth will be perfectly free to legislate on this for itself. I am speaking of this as a matter of principle. It may or may not be a most desirable thing that, such a provision should exist as a law of the Commonwealth, but it is not for us, every time we think that a provision of law would be desirable, to put it into the Constitution, because that is just the wrong place for it.

Mr. FRASER:
It is not a matter of thinking, it is a matter of knowing.

Mr. BARTON:
The hon. member may know a thing and other hon. members may think-

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
It is not a matter of thinking, but a matter of fact.

Mr. BARTON:
The whole question of these facts depends on the judgment of the people by way of reason. It seems to me that we ought not to hamper the Commonwealth by too many provisions such as are being constantly suggested.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Ought not this clause 47 to be struck out?

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think so. It is not the legitimate conclusion, because clauses of this kind have been in every Constitution-

Mr. ISAACS:
Not in Canada.

Mr. BARTON:
They have been in all Australian constitutions, or most of them. It must be recollected that a provision of this kind is really a re-affirmance of a certain law which has become part of the Constitution in England; a provision of the kind we find already in the Bill. A provision of the kind suggested is not in that category, but simply in the category of. laws which Parliament has made in this place or that for the purpose of having its own views expressed. This is a matter of policy, and, where we find a matter is distinctly one of policy, it ought to be left to the Parliament of the Commonwealth to legislate upon it, otherwise it will be so hampered that it will be difficult to say to what extent its members or electors are free men.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
With a view of testing the feelings of the Committee, I move:
That the words proposed by Sir George Turner be added to the clause.

I think that a number of hon. members will agree with me that if it has been found necessary-and it has been proved to be necessary in Victoria-that such a provision should be grafted on the Constitution by a measure passed by the local Parliament, it is essential that it should be included in a Bill framing the Federal Constitution. The object of the amendment is to protect Parliament against itself. I can testify to the fact that it has conduced to purity of administration, and, during troublous times, it has been a great boon. If its insertion is necessary in the case of minor appointments, it is, I repeat, doubly necessary in the case of major appointments, for it is quite possible that Parliament, at the instance of a strong, powerful Government, might be induced to acquiesce in the appointment of a gentleman to one of the chief offices of the Crown as a reward for political services rendered to that Government. Why should we shirk the question? Why not deal with it now and protect Parliament against itself? At all events, with a view of testing the feeling of the Committee, I move the insertion of the words suggested by Sir George Turner, and will force this proposal to a division.

Mr. BARTON:

The words are withdrawn.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Then I will propose them again.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Do you propose that there should be no exceptions?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I do not, but hon. members can express their views, and if this amendment is carried Mr. Barton will, I presume, act upon the instructions of the Convention, and provide a clause in the direction indicated.

Mr. BARTON:

The amendment moves by Sir George Turner was withdrawn partly because it was seen that it would not carry out its objects. If inserted in the place where Sir George Turner wanted it, it would only have the effect of disqualifying people already out of Parliament. That would be no efficient way of carrying out the intentions of the amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I said I moved these words to test the feelings of the Committee.

Mr. BARTON:

We must take care that if the words are placed there they will not disfigure the clause in the Bill without the addition of a provision which would be effective. I ask the hon. member to put it in some other way.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

This will not affirm in precise language what this Convention endeavors to be effective. I wish to affirm a principle, which can be done by adding the words suggested by Sir George Turner to the clause. Then that will give Mr. Barton an opportunity of drafting a provision which will carry out the objects of the clause
Mr. LEWIS:
I do not think these words will carry out precisely what the mover wants. If it is desirable that this matter should be tested, I would suggest that either Sir George Turner or the Drafting Committee should frame such a clause as will meet the object Sir William Zeal has in view.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I withdrew my amendment under the impression that that would be done.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Those who might be inclined to support, the principle contained in this clause cannot vote for this clause, because it is not framed in such a way as will carry out the objects of the Committee.

Mr. BARTON:
I Shall not take the responsibility of doing anything that will disfigure the Bill.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
If this resolution is passed the hon. member will understand what are the wishes of the Convention, and it is idle to say that he cannot frame a clause.

The CHAIRMAN:
Order. Mr. Lewis is in possession of the chair.

Mr. LEWIS:
I hope that Sir William Zeal will carry this, and we will then have an opportunity of discussing the proposed amendment in the proper way, I do not think this is the proper form. Whether we can amend the Constitution in the way suggested by Mr. Barton is a question I should like to have further information on. When the Victorian Parliament did what Sir George Turner now proposes it did so by an amendment of their own Constitution Act. Perhaps Mr. Isaacs will say if I am correct.

Mr. ISAACS:
Partly it was and partly it was not. Of course we have power to amend.

Mr. LEWIS:
If it is not put in the Constitution Act it is a question to me whether the Federal Parliament will have power to give effect to the proposed restriction without a distinct amendment of the Constitution. It is questionable whether it will have power to prescribe that certain persons are incapable of taking office by an Act passed by the Federal Parliament alone.

Mr. ISAACS:
They did so in Canada by 41 Vict., cap. v. of the Dominion Parliament. It was not done, as far as I have been able to discover, by an amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. LEWIS:

It shown that we should have a clause which we can further think over, and make up our minds whether we can support it or not. I should strongly urge Sir William Zeal to allow this clause to be passed, and, upon the framing and submission of a clause designed to give effect to our wishes, we will then have it in a form that we can think over, and adopt or reject as the majority thinks fit.

Mr. BARTON:

Of course Sir William Zeal will not misunderstand me in this matter. Anything that I have said has been said in a perfectly friendly way.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I am quite sure of that.

Mr. BARTON:

I think it would be better to withdraw this amendment. The general intention seems that there should be a prohibition which, if it is good in one case, is good in all, and Sir George Turner should not extend it merely to the Judges and the Agents-General, but we should rather extend it to all persons who may hold offices of profit. If the principle is good it should apply throughout, and if that is the intention of the Convention I think this amendment should be agreed to:

But no person, within six months after ceasing to be a member, shall accept any office under this section.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

He simply vacates his seat.

Mr. BARTON:

Members have asked for a distinct prohibition.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

While he in a member or for six months afterwards.

Mr. BARTON:

The previous port of the clause deals with that.

Mr. ISAACS:

You do not disqualify him from sitting in Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

That is not sufficient.

Mr. BARTON:

It is provided in clause 48 that:

If any person by this Constitution declared to be incapable of sitting in the Senate or the house of Representatives sits as a member of either House, he shall, for every day on which sits, be liable to pay the sum of one hundred pounds.

Mr. ISAACS:

Only for sitting.

Mr. BARTON:

That is a great deal more than he is likely to receive as salary; Are we to provide in the Constitution for every foreseeable contingency, or are we going to make it a Constitution? If we are to make it a Constitution we must avoid dropping into matters of this sort, I think the Commonwealth will be able to take care of itself in such matters.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Then we should leave out a lot of clauses.

Mr. BARTON:

We went too far in 1891, but for the sake of the Convention we have retained many of the clauses of that Bill. Is that any reason, however, why we should go to an extreme? I wish to point out that if this is a principle which applies at all, it is one that is as applicable to Agents-General as to the meanest officer in the State, and as it operates in that way when pushed to its full application, I think it is one we should not adopt, but, speaking on the drafting aspect of it, this portion of what is aimed at is secured by this amendment. The rest of the clause is not disfigured, and can be amended. This is only a step in the path which hon. members have indicated. Let us test the question on this form of the amendment, which carries the matter to its whole extent. If the Committee does not believe in altering the Bill as proposed in this amendment, it need not alter it in any other part dealing with the subject.

Mr. SYMON:

I would point out that it seems to me there is some misapprehension as to what this clause really is. The whole of these clauses are intended simply to deal with the qualification of members to hold their seats, and this clause is intended to be limited in its operation to that particular point. The whole of the sections from 43 to 49 deal with the disqualification of members, and their right to sit in Parliament, and the penalties to which they are subject for sitting while disqualified. The Parliament should regulate its own procedure, and I think Mr. Barton's amendment is only one that will raise the question of establishing an express prohibition. The question is whether the Convention is going to introduce in the Constitution matters dealing with administration and the manner in which appointments may be made, or whether they are going to limit it to establishing the Federal Parliament. If you introduce a clause saying the Federal Parliament Shall not appoint to an office some particular person who has been a legislator, you might just as well introduce provisions prohibiting it from appointing a great number of other persons. You are, it seems to me, instead of confining yourself to the establishment of a Constitution, entering

Mr. PEACOCK:
You might drop out a lot of clauses if that be true.

Mr. SYMON:
Let us prescribe the qualifications of the members.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
What about clause 46?

Mr. SYMON:
That clause says that persons holding an office of profit should be disqualified from sitting. But here you are going to declare that the Federal Executive is not to appoint somebody who has been sitting some six months previously. In the same way you may put it that no one should sit who is over 35 years of age, or something of that kind. To deal with such a matter in the Constitution is undesirable. I entirely agree with the propriety of the legislation in this colony which puts a restriction on the power of the Executive to hold out offices as a temptation to members of the Legislature. Nothing could be more desirable than to have a provision like that; but the question is whether we ought to leave it to the Federal Parliament to deal with, or introduce it into this Constitution, and introduce it in a particular portion of the Act where it is not really applicable. We are here fixing the qualification and imposing penalties where the qualifications are not held. Beyond that it seems to be undesirable to go.

Mr. ISAACS:
I would like to put my view to Mr. Barton for a moment. The object of clauses 46 and 47 is to prevent members of Parliament from using their public positions for their private benefit. These clauses as they stand do not carry out that object. They leave the man in possession of the position which his membership has obtained. They say to him, "If you accept a position for your personal advantage you must not sit in Parliament any longer."

Mr. GLYNN:
But we do not admit that is the object of the Act.

Mr. ISAACS:
The object is no doubt to prevent personal interest coming into conflict with public duty.

Mr. BARTON:
I think it is to prevent practical bribery.
An HON. MEMBER:
What about the Judges?

Mr. ISAACS:
I quite admit that the same principle applies to the positions of Supreme Court Judges and to Agents-General as to any other officers. But the section would be incomplete without prohibiting absolutely the conferring of an appointment upon a person while he is a member of the Parliament. The words put by Mr. Barton would prevent an appointment being conferred upon a person within six months after ceasing to be a member, but they do not prevent an appointment being conferred while he is a member. That is the great danger. These clauses would be like locking the stable door after the steed has gone. What would be the penalty under clause 48 for taking an appointment?

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is no penalty to him at all to lose his seat.

Mr. ISAACS:
this is the position that I want to lay down. We assume that A.B. is a member of Parliament, and he is appointed, while he is in Parliament, to a lucrative position in the State. He is told that he is liable to a penalty of £100 a day while he sits in Parliament. But he says "I do not want to sit in Parliament; I have my appointment and I am therefore subject to no penalty whatever." I do not think that would meet the case. If we are to put a clause in the Constitution at all, we ought to say right out that any attempt to confer an appointment upon a person while he is a member, or within six months after ceasing to be a member, shall be utterly null and void. In Victoria we have put a penalty in the Act upon a person who takes a position. It is clause 25 of the Constitution Act:

If any person shall, while he is a member of the said Council or Assembly, or within six months after ceasing to be such member, accept any office, or place of profit, under the Crown, he shall forfeit the sum of fifty pounds for every week he shall hold such office, or place, with full costs of suit for any person who shall sue for the same.

Mr. KINGSTON:
What year was that?

Mr. ISAACS:
I think it was passed in 1883.

Mr. BARTON:
I hinted something similar to that, that there should be a penalty attached to the taking of the office.

Mr. ISAACS:
But I would carry it much further than clause 48. If it is wrong that a member of Parliament should take an office of profit, we should say that the appointment should be absolutely null and void.

Mr. KINGSTON:
    Prevent the appointment.

Mr. ISAACS:
    Yes; I would not allow a man to secure the position and merely ask him to pay a penalty for it.

Mr. BARTON:
    How would this do?
    No person being a member, or within six months of his ceasing to be a member, shall be qualified or permitted to accept or hold any office, the acceptance or holding of which would, under this section, render a person incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member.
    I think it would do if we put in the words:
    But no person shall, while he is a member of the Parliament or.
    You must put in the words:
    While he in a member,
    if you prohibit him from taking office after he ceases to be a member.

Mr. HOLDER:
    There in one point that may be overlooked. I have listened very carefully to the arguments of Mr. Barton, and I agree with him that we are making a constitution, and not legislating for a future Federation. This point, however, seems to me to be one which should be dealt with to-day, for this reason, that when the new Federal Parliament comes into being it will have, within a very few months, an enormous amount of patronage to dispense. There will be a Chief Justice and four other Judges, there will be an Agent-General, there will be an Inter-State Commission of three or five members, and many other important officers of the State who will have to be appointed. One hon.
member has referred to "shutting the door after the steed has been stolen."
We shall do that with a vengeance if we permit one Parliament to make all these appointments, and then say to its successors: you shall not make even one such appointment a year, or even one in five years.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
    I think what Mr. Barton says has enormous weight - that we should not put into the Constitution anything that we ought to leave to the Federal Parliament.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
    You want to punish the small man and let the big than go free.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
There are two phases of this question. We may embody in this Constitution only what we understand to be vital matters, but on the other hand we may give direction to Parliament that a certain course should be pursued. I think the general feeling is that the clause should be passed, but that it should be subject to the Federal Parliament afterwards by the insertion of such words as these "until the Parliament otherwise provides." It seems a pity to bind this Parliament and make it necessary to have the roundabout process of a referendum to the people on matters which are purely matters of parliamentary concern.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I should like to know if there is any place, except Victoria, where such restriction is placed upon such appointments. If no other colony has found it necessary to draft such a law, it seems strange that the Parliament to be established under Federation should not have power to make alterations of a character which only experience can point out to them to be beneficial or prejudicial. At present we are trying to pass a law of a general character as regards the powers of Parliament, but if we put such a restriction in this Bill, which is really the Constitution of the Federation, we shall not have power, even if we find it necessary, to alter it, except by the amendment of that portion of the Constitution which refers to it. We had better wait and see whether the Federal Parliament will do such an improper act as favoritism of this character, instead of, as it were, looking on the Parliament of the Federation as on what will be a corrupt Parliament about to do corrupt actions. The Parliament itself will be the best judge of this question. If the Ministry of the day attempts to make an appointment of a corrupt character, is it likely that the Parliament of the day will permit it to do so against its wishes? The only proper course for us is to establish in the Constitution certain principles, and leave alone details of matters which only experience can point out as necessary or otherwise. In our own colony, when it was found that certain actions were of a corrupt character, the Parliament, soon remedied the evil. If we put this suggested clause in, we tie the hands of the Parliament for a length of time. Then, Mr. Holder has referred to appointments which must be made in spite of this arrangement; Judges, for instance, who may happen to be members of Parliament. It is much better to let the clause stand as it is.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
At the same time, if we are to have something before us, let it be definite. There are amendment after amendment, and suggestion after suggestion now before us, and no one knows exactly where we are.
The CHAIRMAN:

I think we shall get on a good deal quicker if members will confine their remarks to the particular amendment before the chair. The first amendment I am going to put is the one by Mr. Glynn.

Amendment (moved by Mr. Glynn)—To omit the words "of being chosen or"—negatived.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL, having obtained leave to withdraw his previous amendment, said:

It has been suggested to me by several members that the words:
Until the Parliament otherwise provides should be added to the new clause.

Dr. COCKBURN:

I hope you will not add it.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Personally, I would prefer the clause as drafted, but if there is a consensus of opinion that the words should be inserted, I am prepared to accept them. I shall press this to a division. My motion is:

To insert a new sub-section to come between subsections 1 and 2, as follows:—Until Parliament otherwise provides, no person, being a member, or within six months of his ceasing to be a member, shall be qualified or permitted to accept or hold any office, the acceptance or holding of which would, under this section, render a person incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I shall vote for the amendment. I did think at first that it would have been better to have left the Federal Parliament absolutely free to deal with the matter, and not to impose any limitation until they had so dealt with it. But I cannot help agreeing with the remarks of my hon. friend Mr. Holder that there will be an immense amount of patronage to be exercised in the first instance, and unless we are very careful it will be a case of shutting the door after the steed is stolen. And if there will be one time of difficulty more than another it will be during t

Mr. GLYNN:

I wonder how many instances of corruption of this sort can be called to mind by hon. members. The assumption is that in order to get the votes of the members of Parliament you put them in an office where their power of voting will be gone.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I have not heard any answer to the arguments used a little time ago by Sir Edward Braddon, that in the public interest we may go a great deal too far in amendments of this kind. I say it is impossible to secure the purity of administration by mechanical devices of this kind, and which may be very easily got over. When the time comes which hon. members wish to provide against, when the Ministry wish to appoint a man to some particular office—take a judgeship—they have only to tell him, "You resign; we will give you this appointment, and we will appoint an acting judge for, six months."

Mr. FRASER:
Then they would be voted out of office.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
What is there to prevent that being done?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
A man would not take the risk.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
A man would not take the risk? I will point out some very strong reasons why we should not put any restrictions of this kind in the measure. I do not think any feeling of false delicacy ought to prevent any member of the legal profession giving expression to his opinions on this matter, and I intend to very freely.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear. Do.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It must be obvious if you have a limitation of this kind it will have this effect: it will prevent men of great ability and eminence in the legal profession from seeking positions in political life. I am speaking in the public interest, which demands that you should have on the bench not only men of high legal attainments, but men of broad views and general knowledge, and it would be a sorry day indeed for this Commonwealth if they were restricted in the choice of their judges to men who had followed law and devoted themselves to nothing else. One of the most important qualifications of a judge is that he should have that knowledge of affairs and of human nature which a man acquires in politics, and which perhaps in no other school can be gained so well as in the school of politics. If you pass this, you will restrict your selection to men who have had their ambitions restricted to the narrow groove of following the law and the law only.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Would not the same thing apply to the agricultural expert who is farming?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

No; it is quite a different set of reasons. If you wish to have a free choice of the best men to put into the Federal Judicature, you should not in the public interest narrow that choice. I think I may appeal to the experience, not only of England, but of these colonies, and may ask whether there is a case in any of the colonies in which it can be said that a man has been placed on the judicial bench who is corrupt or unfit for the position, or who disgraces the administration of justice, and who has been corruptly placed there. No doubt there have been appointments made which may be directly traced to political partisanship, but I defy any man to say that-taking those appointments as a whole-any appointment has been made of a man who is incapable of fulfilling the position properly. Surely if this is to be government by the people for the people, and if we are to hand over to the will of the democracy which governs this Constitution the power of deciding how it is to be worked, surely we must leave them to judge and to watch over the purity of the administration. And if that administration has been maintained pure for so many years under our system of responsible government, surely we ought not to place these mechanical restrictions on the action of the Executive, which will result in narrowing the choice of the men capable of filling these positions. If we attempt to go too far in these kind of mechanical restrictions, we shall find ourselves restricted in the choice of the best men to fill these positions. I quite agree with many things that have been said by Mr. Isaacs with regard to the provisions in the Victorian Act. I think it might be very well that the Parliament, if it thought fit, should pass some Act of that kind with any limitations they might think proper to make. But the Parliament is the best judge of that.

Mr. ISAACS:

I agree with you.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

If the Parliament of the Federation find it necessary to make any provision of this kind it might be well to give them power to do it. But do not let us beforehand, without knowing anything of the conditions under which it may be necessary to make these appointments, tie their hands under this Constitution more than we tie the hands of ordinary local Parliaments. We trust laws to the people of this Commonwealth; then let us trust to the people the administration of their own affairs.

Mr. FRASER:
The objection raised by Mr. O'Connor does not apply to members of the present Houses of Parliament. It only applies to members of the Federal Parliament, and there will be any number of men eligible for the positions in the local Parliaments. that being so, I do not see there is any great danger.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
You shut them out from positions in the Federal Parliament.

Mr. FRASER:
Members of the local Parliament are eligible for appointments and it is only the members of Federal Parliament who are debarred in this respect.

Mr. BARTON:
Does the hon. member wish to turn these members into provincialists instead of federationists?

Mr. FRASER:
There is a great deal of force in Mr. O'Connor's argument. If the Ministry of the day, in the Federal Parliament, choose to single out a gentleman qualified for the position of Chief Justice, he has only to resign his place in Parliament, remain out of the Legislature for six months, and the country and Parliament will then acknowledge that the appointment is a legal one. Justice will continue to be administered during the six months.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You want the judge to give six months notice of his death.

Mr. FRASER:
That is only small talk.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
How would you fill up the gap?

Mr. FRASER:
There is no gap.

Mr. REID:
The king is dead; long live the king.

Mr. FRASER:
The administration of justice is going on all the same, and it is easy to fill a vacancy temporarily.

Dr. COCKBURN:
A judge often goes away for a year now.

Mr. FRASER:
Some go away too often; at least, that is the case in our colony.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Would you not call that a device for getting round the Act?

Mr. FRASER:
The Government of the day will say they are going to appoint John Smith to be Chief Justice of a colony, and they will stipulate that after six months have expired the appointment will be made. If Parliament and the public approve of it, what wrong can there be in that?

Mr. BARTON:
That is a "Sentimental Tommy's" way out of the difficulty.

Mr. FRASER:
It the thing were done clandestinely neither Parliament nor the country would support it, and the probability is that the Government attempting such a thing would be turned out of office,

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
There is a certain amount of absurdity in this amendment.

Mr. FRASER:
On whose side?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
On your side distinctly, inasmuch as it seeks to impose a restriction only upon the first Federal Government, where such restrictions would be least necessary, the first Federal Government having immediately to make appointments before it had held, office for any length of time, and before Parliament had relieved it from these restrictions. That Government having been in office only a short time, would not have found it necessary to apply this political device against which Sir George Turner's amendment seeks to operate. If eminent men who happen to be in Parliament are to be excluded from holding appointments in the first instance, i.e., the appointments effected by the first Federal Executive, this will in all probability exclude a large number of eminent men from that Parliament -men who but for that would have sought election and would have been elected—

Mr. FRASER:
There are plenty of eminent men out of Parliament.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I am not talking about men out of Parliament, but of lawyers in Parliament, for instance, who may think that they are entitled to a judgeship under the Federal Parliament. There might be throughout the colonies half a dozen men who might consider that they would make capable High Commissioners, and they would all stand out by reason of this provision. They would prefer to remain in private life rather than, by entering the Legislature, debar themselves of the worthy object of their ambition; and, inasmuch as it is only a partial preventive, as it is only applicable until otherwise ordered by the Federal Parliament, I think we might avoid it altogether and rather place that confidence in the Federal Parliament and Executive that they, at any rate, are entitled to, until they show by their actions that they are unworthy of it.

Mr. REID:

I think if we are going to legislate for the Commonwealth, instead of legislating for the establishment of the Commonwealth, our discussion will be endless. If any abuses arise in the Commonwealth it will be perfectly competent for the Parliament to set them right, and if no abuses arise I think it would be a pity to limit the choice of the Executive, especially with regard to the highest offices of the State. Whilst I do not at all say that eminent lawyers or eminent men would remain out of the Federal Parliament if such a provision were inserted in the Constitution, I do say that circumstances might arise in which it might be a positive calamity that such a provision existed in the Constitution. know that in our colony it has been found difficult enough to secure the services of the best men for the highest offices in the State. I remember well a case in which the Chief Justice died most unexpectedly, and there was the greatest difficulty in obtaining the services of a fit person to take his place. Nearly every eminent lawyer was in Parliament, and everyone desired to remain out of the Chief Justiceship, and the eminent man who is now Chief Justice was in possession of a practice worth £10,000 a year. He was a member of the Council, and was the most useful member the Council ever had. He at first refused th

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

With reference to what Mr. Reid has said, there is great force in his contention, and it would be much intensified if the practice in the neighboring colonies bore out his argument, but I point out that in Victoria out of the six judges constituting the Supreme Court Bench only one has been a parliamentarian. I read the names of those judges who have not been members of Parliament:—Mr. Justice Williams, Mr. Justice Holroyd, Mr. Justice A'Beckett, Mr. Justice Hodges, and Mr. Justice Hood. The exception is the present Chief Justice, Sir John Madden. Now, I say that shows clearly you have an ample choice outside of Parliament. You may not in small colonies, such as Tasmania, represented by Sir Edward Braddon, where there are not many lawyers, be able to find efficient men, but in the larger colonies this difficulty would not arise. There is no need to place such an argument before this Chamber. If a man supplying a ton of coal to the Federal Government is disqualified from being appointed to a minor office, surely a member of Parliament who probably is an active supporter of a Government is ineligible to hold a higher office. If the hon. member is prepared to expunge the exemption clauses I will withdraw my amendment. We must enact laws to ensure the purity of Parliament.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The strong objection is that eminent men, especially in the legal profession, would be prevented from taking seats in the Parliament. That is provided for in the words
Until Parliament otherwise provides.
If the Government of the day had an eminent man in Parliament whom they wished to appoint to a position they would bring in an Act of Parliament, and if Parliament thought it wise in that instance they would pass the Act.
Mr. REID:
What eminent man would submit himself to be discussed in a Bill?
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
If it is wise to say a member of Parliament shall not accept a position, is it not wise to say that a man for six months after ceasing to be a member shall not take it? If the difficulty arises that we cannot get a man outside, the Government of the day will have to go down to both Houses and say, "We think this is an appointment which ought to be made," and if the Parliament and people agree no harm will be done.
Mr. REID:
Then the appointment of a Chief Justice will become the question of a political discussion.
Mr. GRANT:
I agree with Sir William Zeal that in a matter of this kind we should not allow the lawyers to have any monopoly in obtaining appointments under the Crown. All the argument seems to turn upon the privileges of the lawyers, and I think we should not make an exception of them, as is suggested. With regard to the appointment of judges, which seems to oppress them most, I think it would be an admirable arrangement if the nomination of judges were made six months prior to their appointment. Many appointments have been made of an objectionable nature, and although they may not have been corrupt, and though the Government could not be charged with corruption, they have made appointments that have been thought objectionable. Therefore it would be far better to carry the amendment, and at a future time it may be thought advisable to make it a sine qua non that the appointment of judges be made six months before they enter into their office.
Mr. BARTON:
No one has proposed to make an exception here in favor of the lawyers. If the hon. member is under that impression, and gives his vote and supports the amendment an account of that impression, he will be voting without having realised what the amendment is. The amendment is placed in the present form in order that no exception shall be made in favor of the lawyers, and this form is opposed because the Executive should not have its hands tied in such cases as the appointment of judges and Railway Commissioners. We should not have an exception made as in the Victorian Act, because that excepts them from the purview of such a law as this. That I wish to make clear, and no speech has been made in this debate which puts forward any claim in favor of lawyers. Judges have been selected as an instance because it happens to be a singular example of how a provision such as this would miscarry, for it would either prevent distinguished men—the most eligible for the position—from being selected, or it would result in the subterfuge of getting round the Act, which would be consented to only by lawyers who would be unworthy of such positions. The Executive of the Commonwealth are, in a constitutional sense, the guardians of every right and privilege of the people, and being the constitutional guardians of the people, their right in the choice of appointment to offices high or small should not have an encumbrance placed in its way, because the encumbrance costs a great deal more than it is worth in the loss of services of men the best fitted to occupy the positions, or in the alternative, in a subterfuge which would only be resorted to by men who would be unworthy of such positions.

Mr. BARTON:
A verbal amendment will now be necessary. I move:
To insert after "officer" in the second line of sub-section 2 the words "or member."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I desire to ask the Committee whether this particular sub-section should remain at all. I should be very glad if we could get an expression of opinion from Mr. Barton as to why this particular exception should be made. We may be told it was made in the Bill of 1891, but it seems to me to be most extraordinary that we are going to say that persons who occupy positions in the Queen's navy and army are to be at liberty to be exempted altogether from the provisions of this section. Why should any distinction be made in their favor when we do not make it in favor of persons in the public service, or who have been in the public service, or similar classes of persons who might be mentioned?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We do not pay them.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The effect will be that a person occupying the position of Admiral or General may hold a position under the Federal Parliament.

Mr. WISE:
It also applies to local officers.

Mr. BARTON:
No; if you strike it out it would.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
In Victoria we say:
No person occasionally employed.
That is our clause applies to regular officers who get salaries for what they do.

Mr. BARTON:
Will this part of the subsection cover it?:
And whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I have no objection to that. I do not wish in any shape or form to shut out those who are volunteers, and simply receive some small emolument to enable them to pay for their uniform and expenses, but I do object to permanent officers who are really servants of the State, having the privilege of sitting in Parliament when we debar so many other classes.

Mr. BARTON:

This refers to the Queen's army and navy as distinct from any force of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

But the General or the Admiral who would be here commanding and controlling our army and navy would come under the description of being officers of the Queen's navy and army. Perhaps if Mr. Barton would explain to my dull comprehension what the clause really means, I may see my way clear to support it; but I am strongly opposed to it as I now understand it.

Mr. BARTON:

The reason of this clause is not hard to see, but it is a clause which reads in a rather difficult way. It is practically as it stood in the Bill of 1891. The reason that persons in receipt only of pay, half-pay, or pension, in the Queen's navy or army, are exempted is that they are not holding an office of profit under the Commonwealth at all, but their pay comes from the Imperial Government. It is obvious that there is no necessity whatsoever on the ground of interest to exclude them from having positions in the Parliament of the Commonwealth, because they are not servants of the Commonwealth, and have no interest whatever springing from the Commonwealth such as under the previous branch of the section disqualifies anybody.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Then this is not necessary.

Mr. BARTON:

Yes, it is; because it might otherwise be read to apply that way. The hon. member will well remember the case of Sir Bryan O'Loghlen, whose election for County Clare was upset on the ground that, while he was a Minister of the Crown in Victoria, he was holding an office of profit under the Crown. That case shows the necessity of these exceptions. Then those are exempted who receive a new commission in the Queen's navy or army, or an increase of pay on a new commission. That covers the case of those who receive a fresh commission, who happen to have been a member of the Queen's army drawing pay, half-pay, or pension, or who receive an increase of pay, supposing they are only in receipt of a half-pay or pension.
But they are still persons employed under the Government of the Queen, and not under the Government of the Commonwealth. Then the remainder of the clause exempts anyone:

Who is in receipt only of pay as an officer or member of the military or naval forces of the Commonwealth, and whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth.

If he belongs to what

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
No one objects to that.

Mr. BARTON:
The main point is that we exempt persons in receipt of pay, half-pay, or pension, or commission in the Queen's service, apart from the Commonwealth, on the ground that as they do not draw their pay from the Commonwealth, they have no interest against the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Have you that provision in New South Wales?

Mr. BARTON:
I think we have, but I will reply to that question in a minute.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
They have it in Queensland.

Mr. Barton's amendment-to insert the words "or member" after "officer" in the second line of sub-section 2 - agreed to.

Mr. GORDON:
I think it is very unfair to exclude from the operation of this clause pensioners of the Queen and not pensioners of the Commonwealth. There is no connection between political and military services, and I fail to see why pensioners of the Commonwealth should be under any disability. I move:

In line 40, after "pay" to insert "or pension."

Mr. BARTON:
I can quite see the point of the hon. member, but we have to read, the remainder of the clause, which includes:

And whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Suppose a man has an accident and he is given a pension, would he be then debarred?

Mr. BARTON:
I am putting it from the point of the effect it will have on the clause. It would appear that it would only apply to military cases where the individuals might be in the employ of the Commonwealth. That seems to make the clause self-contradictory if we make the amendment. If the hon.
member will think over it and prepare an amendment and hand it to me it may be looked at on recommittal.

Mr. GORDON:
I will withdraw my amendment.
Leave given.
Clause as amended agreed to.
Clause 49.-The Senate and the House of Representatives may each of them from time to time adopt standing rules and orders as to the following matters:
I. The orderly conduct of the business of the Senate and the House of Representatives respectively:
II. The mode in which the Senate and the House of Representatives shall confer, correspond, and communicate with each other relative to votes or proposed laws:
III. The manner in which notices of proposed laws, resolutions, and other business intended to be submitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives respectively may be published for general information:
IV. The manner in which proposed laws are to be introduced, passed, numbered, and intituled:
V. The proper presentation of any proposed laws passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives to the Governor-General for his assent: and
VI. The conduct of all business and proceedings of the Senate and the House of Representatives severally and collectively.

Mr. WISE:
It will be necessary to make an addition here to give full effect to section 8. By section 8 the two Houses have full power to define the privileges, immunities, and powers of the Senate and House of Representatives. In section 49 to give effect to that there ought to be a clause to this effect:
Maintain, regulate, and exercise their respective powers, privileges, and immunities.

Mr. BARTON:
We have considered that, and I do not think it necessary.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
The clause as it now stands clearly limits the Federal Parliament in the matters therein mentioned. The Constitution of New South Wales limits the power of that Parliament to pass standing orders best adapted to the ordinary conduct of the Council and Assembly respectively. On a recent occasion a member was addressing the Chamber, and a person in the gallery began throwing stones at him on the floor of the House. The gentleman addressing the chair was a labor member, and he was reproving another person for having thrown stones at the labor party.

Mr. BARTON:
That is a little nearer here than New South Wales.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
And a person in the gallery immediately said, "You want a stone at your head," and he thereupon threw two stones into the Assembly. It struck me-

Mr. PEACOCK:
What, the stones struck you?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
No; they did not strike me. But it struck me as I sat there presiding over that Assembly as an extraordinary thing that the Parliament there could not punish the person guilty of such an outrage. We had to hand him over to the police, and he was brought up at the Police Court and fined twenty shillings. It weakens the power and it weakens the influence of Parliament that it cannot control disorder within its own doors and within its own boundaries, and if we accept these six provisions we limit the power of Parliament to make standing orders for the purposes indicated there. Under the eighth section of the Bill hon. members will see:

The privileges, immunities, and powers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives respectively, and of the Committees and the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time declared by the Parliament, and until declared shall be those of the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom, and of the Committees and members thereof respectively, at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

But viewing this forty-ninth clause in its restricted form, it appears to me that if we attempt to pass Standing Orders we can only pass Standing Orders in accordance with that section. I therefore move:

That all the words after "as" in line 4 be omitted to the end of the clause in line 21, with a view of the insertion of the words "as they or each may deem to be necessary, and all such rules and orders shall have the force of law."

Perhaps it might be as well to put in what is put in the other constitutions of colonies, namely:

Upon being assented to by the Governor.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not like that.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I am not particular about that, but I think at all events the Federal Parliament ought to have power to make its own standing orders for the purposes of preventing disorder. When I say this I do not suppose the Commonwealth Parliament would attempt to exercise control with regard to people out of its own doors. But within our own dominion we ought to be absolute. If we summon a witness in any of our local Parliaments to the bar of the House, he can decline to give evidence, laugh at us, and walk away. The case I have just mentioned shows the necessity of Parliament having control over any disorder.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Anything to stop them throwing stones at labor members.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

In Victoria they took the matter in a wholesale manner, and passed an Act of Parliament declaring that the Victorian Legislature had all the powers, privileges, and immunities of the House of Commons. There was no mincing of matters there, and it was in consequence of the Parliament of Victoria having arrested a man, and it having been decided that they had no power to do so, that they immediately declared they had all of the powers of the House of Commons. The man, I think, was connected with Goldsborough's Company, and named Glass. He did something, and the Parliament arrested him, brought him to the bar of the House, and it was declared that they had no power to do so. In all the decisions of the Privy Council in reference to the powers of Parliament, the Privy Council has invariably declared that Parliament has no power outside the very words of the Constitution Act. In the case of Hampton and Fenton, I think, in Tasmania they had the audacity to tell a great colony like Tasmania that so far as it was concerned it had no greater powers than a municipality.

Mr. BARTON:

The Speaker only had the power of a chairman of a public meeting.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

Regarding the case alluded to by the hon. member, I happened to be present when the decision was given. The Privy Council did not declare that the colony had no power, but that any colonial Government, being under a Statute, would have no power beyond that Statute. The result was that the Tasmanian Parliament passed a law giving the powers to which the hon. member has made reference.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I think that the amendment which the hon. member has proposed must be considered in connection with clause 8, page 4 of the Bill, which provides:

The privileges, immunities, and powers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives respectively, and of the Committees and the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time declared by the Parliament, and until declared shall be those of the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom, and of the Committees and the members thereof respectively, at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

If the hon. member's amendment is to include the power of punishment it will scarcely be necessary. The effect of the decision of the Privy Council to which my hon. friend has alluded must be read in connection with the Constitutions of the several colonies, which were affected at the time of the pronouncement of these decisions. In New South Wales, and I think in Tasmania, what exists at the present time is a Legislature as distinct from a Parliament. A Sovereign Parliament has punishing power. A Legislature which is created by Act of Parliament, and with the equivalent powers conferred upon it, as they are conferred by section 8, has, in the case of New South Wales and Tasmania, no power except such as can be gathered from the necessary implication of the words of the Constitution. In the present instance we have passed a clause which states that the

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Has not the House of Commons power to make Standing Orders?

Mr. BARTON:

Yes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Then where is the necessity for this clause?

Mr. BARTON:

The necessity for it does not arise out of the powers of the Standing Orders, which are merely regulations for the conduct of the business within the House, but out of the power of punishment in cases where contempt is exercised by persons within the walls of Parliament. If, for instance, a person throws a stone and the Sergeant-at-Arms can catch him he can be brought before the Parliament and can be imprisoned or dealt with otherwise for contempt. Under the operation of the clause similar action can be taken by the Federal Parliament, and that goes far enough. It does not require Standing Orders to deal with the powers, privileges, and immunities of Parliament. They exist, and if you made Standing Orders you would really only limit them. Under the Bill we have taken the powers, privileges, and immunities possessed by the House of Commons.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Then why do you want clause 49?

Mr. BARTON:

I have already explained that, but I will return to it if my hon. friend wishes. I say in the meantime you have already taken the powers, privileges, and immunities of the House of Commons, and there is no necessity to pass Standing Orders with reference to them. They do not need definition in the Standing Orders; they are not the subject of definition in the Standing Orders; they are totally different in their whole circuit to the Standing Orders which relate to the conduct of the business of each House and its transactions with the other House. That is not a question of the powers, privileges, and immunities of the House of Commons, which exist independently of the Standing Orders. They have a historical application in the House of Commons, and they can be applied to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Could they not make Standing Orders?

Mr. BARTON:

The Federal Parliament, of course, will have power to make Standing Orders for the regulation of its internal business.

Mr. TRENWITH:

If we adopt clause 49 do we not restrict the power of the Federal Parliament with regard to any Standing Orders they may make?

Mr. BARTON:

No. You do not restrict them because you have the clause in the most general terms. My hon. friend wishes the clause to read:

The Senate and the House of Representatives may each of them from time to time adopt Standing Orders as they or each may deem to be necessary, and such Standing Orders shall have the force of law.

That is altogether too wide, as the Standing Orders would then have the effect of law outside the House.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear. That is the point.

Mr. BARTON:

It is the point to which I think the hon. member was anxious to come. What we have done is to adopt a clause giving the Federal Parliament power to pass Standing Orders for the conduct of their business, and so that there should be no doubt the power has been taken in the widest possible words. The House of Commons does not make its Standing Orders by reason of its powers, privileges, and immunities, but by virtue of its inherent powers as a sovereign Parliament. The Standing Orders are for the internal regulation of the House of Commons, but my friend would like to say that the Federal Houses may make Standing Orders for any matter it may deem necessary. This would have the effect of passing laws without the royal assent. I ask my friend if the clause as it stands is not sufficient.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I am strongly of the opinion that the amendment is too wide. Section 8 gives this Parliament all the powers, privileges and immunities which the House of Commons has and members also, and we want no more than that. Clause 49 merely makes assurance doubly sure by providing that each House of Parliament shall make Standing Orders for the conduct of its own business, and if the amendment be carried as proposed it means that one House of Parliament is able to make laws although the Constitution means that both Houses must concur in making laws. If one House can make laws it will have a very important bearing on the liberty of the subject and the liberty of the press. The words in the amendment are:

As each of them may doom to be necessary, and such Standing Orders shall have the force of laws.

There is no question which comes up more than that of libel, and it is important to see that one House of Parliament shall not make any law affecting the freedom of the press in referring to the conduct of members. Any such law ought to be framed by both Houses; but the effect of this is that one House of Parliament is able to make laws to alter the law of libel and such matters. I think the Speaker of New South Wales will see there is no need for this.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I do not agree with Mr. Barton, when he states that this House of Parliament will have inherent powers. The Privy Council has frequently declared that colonial Parliaments have no inherent powers whatever. They only have the powers given to them by the Constitution Act. I think that with clause 8 there is no need for clause 49.

Mr. PEACOCK:

They have not a clause like clause 8 in their Constitution.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Then where is the necessity for clause 49? Mr. Higgins says all kinds of things might be done with regard to the press. I have such a regard and love for the press that I cannot realise that Parliament would do anything to injure that great body. But the hon. member forgets that the eighth clause gives Parliament power to do what it likes with the press.

Mr. HIGGINS:
But both Houses.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
No. Clause 8, which has been passed, provides that the:

Privileges, immunities, and powers of the Senate and of the House of Representatives respectively, and of the Committees and the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time declared by the Parliament, and until declared shall be those of the Commons House of Parliament of the United Kingdom.

No one knows what the powers of the House of Commons are. It is a fact that within the last thirty years they have given up the practice of summoning to the bar members of the press for matters of libel. The hon. member who is so anxious and careful about the press-

Mr. HIGGINS:
And the outside public.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I ask the hon. member who is in charge of the Bill whether there is any necessity for clause 49, having regard to clause 48. I am anxious that the powers of Parliament should be limited to within its walls.

Mr. GLYNN:
Undoubtedly the effect of the amendment would be to deal with the outside public-that power which does not exist in the House of Commons. In Stockdale v. Hansard it was held that the courts of law were not precluded by a resolution of the House of Commons from inquiring into the legality of the act complained of, and in delivering judgment in the Court of Queen's Bench, Patterson (Justice) drew a distinction between powers -especially the power of invading "the rights of others"-and privilege. These powers are matters of common law in England, and are liable to be restrained by the Court. Under the proposed amendment, the House of Representatives could pass a resolution that would have the force of law to an extent denied to be a similar resolution in the House of Commons.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
In deference to the opinion expressed on the other side, I am prepared to withdraw my amendment.

Leave given.
Clause as read agreed to.

Sub-section 1, as read, agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Subsection 2 raises some difficult points which I understood were to be referred to the Drafting Committee for consideration. This clause gives full power and authority to make laws with regard to certain matters, and provides that the law with regard to bounties must be uniform. In various colonies, particularly in Victoria, and more recently in South Australia, the Government has thought wise to encourage production by giving bounties. We have for several years been expending money for the purpose of assisting in the freezing of certain articles which are exported by this means. We have built up a trade. We hope also to build up a trade with regard to the dairying industry. We are at present endeavoring to establish the sugar-beet industry under an Act of Parliament which has authorised us to give bonuses to the extent of £50,000 to the companies, but not to exceed altogether £100,000. It seems from the Bill, however, that as soon as a uniform tariff is passed the whole of these bounties will have to cease.
While it may be wise that Parliament should take control of the granting of these bonuses, I want it to be clearly understood that no bounties or arrangements existing at present shall be jeopardised.

Mr. BARTON:
   After the passing of the uniform tariff?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   No agreements or arrangements at present should be interfered with.

Mr. BARTON:
   Do you want the power perpetuated?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   In regard to the sugar-beet industry, we have actually entered into an agreement within the last few days.

An HON. MEMBER:
   That is an advance.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   It would come under the expression of bounties. I want to have existing contracts protected. It is a question that can fairly be discussed whether we are going to take away from the States their rights, for the purpose of assisting to increase the exports from the Commonwealth, of giving these various bounties. The effect of this and other clauses may be to prohibit a States Parliament from granting any bounty—a bounty which might be not so much to compete with persons within the Commonwealth, but to enable persons who desire to produce for purposes of export to do so. We should carefully consider this, because it might be a serious thing to prevent trade beyond the continent, which a little help to our producers would bring about. Then, too, I should like an expression of opinion on the words:
   No tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one State to another.
   What is the meaning of the words:
   Tax or duty?
   We, in Victoria, have a harbor trust in control of the harbors and wharves, and they make charges, just as in done in the other colonies. Later on we provide for a uniform tariff, and that trade and commerce between the colonies shall be absolutely free. If the meaning is that our harbor trust shall not be able to impose duties that it does now on commerce coming from the other colonies or other parts of the world, we will seriously jeopardise that body. Take away what is its largest source of revenue and you will leave it practically insolvent.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Is not your tax equal to a Wharfage rate?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I want to have it perfectly clear that the effect of the words "no tax or duty," construed in conjunction with the other section which says that the trade between the colonies shall be absolutely free, will not be to prevent the various charges I have mentioned.

Mr. BARTON:

I would ask Sir George Turner to look at clause 92, and see whether it would accomplish his object if there were an addendum which said that:

No contract nor anything done under a contract made before the establishment of the Commonwealth shall be affected.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It is a matter that requires serious consideration, because I feel certain none of us desire to do anything that will interfere with existing contracts,

Mr. BARTON:

Look at sections 105 and

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Clause 106 says:

A State shall not, without the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, impose tonnage dues.

Mr. BARTON:

It is not a wharfage rate.

Mr. SYMON:

Tonnage is a tax.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I do not wish to interrupt this discussion, but I wish to make an alteration in the first portion of the clause, prior to the first sub-section.

The CHAIRMAN:

That can only be done now by the unanimous wish of the House.

Mr. BARTON:

It might be better to put that question when the whole clause is put.

The CHAIRMAN:

That would be the better way.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I will wait till then.

Dr. COCKBURN:

The point raised by Sir George Turner is one of great importance. It will not be sufficient only to protect what has been done in the past by various States in fostering the export trade, but it will be necessary also to continue those rights to them in the future. Sir George Turner has mentioned several very important industries which are being fostered in this way by the colony of Victoria, but he might have made the list still longer. If anything is going to be done to prevent the State from assisting the export trade a very severe blow will be struck at the agricultural industry generally. Perhaps it is just as well that the Federal Parliament should have the right to give bounties equally throughout the States, go I do not know that this clause is the best place in which to make the necessary amendment, but this clause read together with clause 82 will not only give the Federal Parliament the right to give these bounties, but will absolutely preclude any State Parliament from doing the same thing. We ought, I think, to make the powers concurrent, and might call in the services of the Inter-State Commission, to which body the question of any bonus given by a State Parliament-so as to derogate from the principle of freedom of trade, or to give undue advantage to one State as against another-might very well be referred. As Sir George Turner has said, it is well that the Federal Parliament should have the power to give a bonus which should obtain equally throughout all the States, but it to not likely to give bounties in the early stages of industries, because in each case the industries will arise first; fit some part of the Commonwealth before they become general to the whole of Australia, and so the necessity of giving a bounty will be felt most in that portion of Australia where they first take. toot. An export industry will have to reach a very flourishing stage before it' can enlist the sympathies and secure the assistance of the Federal Parliament. In South Australia we have an export department in which as far as possible we endeavor to make the rate charged cover the cost of services rendered, but it cannot do that in every case, because when an industry first starts there must necessarily be some initial loss. Under the clause which puts the giving of bounties exclusively in the hands of the Federal Parliament any enterprise of this sort carried on at a loss, however small, would probably be regarded as equivalent to giving a bounty. In pioneering an industry a man makes a road which all can travel, and it will be very unfair to say he shall not have some hell) from the community which will benefit by his enterprise. If no assistance is offered no pioneers will come forward.

Mr. REID:

This is one of those subjects on which we might spend a day or two, but on which I think it is quite unnecessary to do so. If we are prepared to leave thousands of vested interests and industries which are affected by the tariff to the wisdom and justice of the Federal Parliament, surely these infinitely smaller questions can remain in the same position. especially when we recollect that, in the case of exports, there is an almost uniform practice prevailing throughout the whole of the colonies. New South Wales is exactly on the same track as Victoria and South Australia. and we are all pursuing, whether freetraders or protectionists, a similar policy. I think it will be safe therefore to leave this matter to the Federal parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
As soon as they pass a uniform tariff all our existing bounties have to cease.

Mr. REID:
As soon as they pass a uniform tariff perhaps all sorts of things will happen. But we have to face the contingency. We will have to trust the wisdom and justice of the Parliament, and if we confide the infinitely greater, surely we may confide the infinitely less. In supposing a case such as Sir George Turner has mentioned, where one colony may be in a difficulty, we must trust to the Federal Parliament to have due thought for the difficulty brought about, and endeavor to deal with it in some equitable manner.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The Constitution says that when the uniform tariff is framed all bounties must cease, and so they will not be allowed.

Mr. REID:
Yes; but that uniform tariff may contain certain provisions which will safeguard everything in that way. It may be the place in which to do it. It must not be forgotten that this clause 50 does not give the Commonwealth exclusive power.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
A later clause does.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Clause 82 is the one.

Mr. REID:
It seems to; but it is open to doubt. We know that in the ordinary course of legislation, such as contracts-

Mr. BARTON:
It does not interfere with contracts already entered into.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We have laws-Acts of Parliament-offering bounties.

Mr. REID:
But so long as the law has not been acted upon no harm is done. If it has been acted upon, a contract will have been entered into, and the Parliament in dealing with it will use those principles of practice and equity which every other Parl
Mr. BARTON:

I would ask my hon. friend Mr. Isaacs to oblige me by looking into the point as to whether, seeing, that the bounties will cease under this Act, a contract entered into for a bounty by a State must also cease—that is, would he give an ex post facto reading to the clause?

Mr. FRASER:

With respect to Sir George Turner's reference, there are contracts in our colony. We have spent enormous sums of money in providing for new industries, and it would be very unreasonable to think that we could not make fair charges for that expenditure.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Services rendered.

Mr. FRASER:

For services rendered. The bounties that are now being given, and are under promise to be given, should be protected. But I do not think any further provision should be made, because we are yielding to the Federal Parliament the right to establish Customs duties and bounties. It is not to be thought of that the Federal Parliament will not do its duty to the nation, because it would be impossible for the local Parliaments and the Federal Parliament to be doing one and the same thing. The local Parliaments will under this Bill waive their rights to give bounties, and the Federal Parliament must of course be assumed to assist in all matters for the national good. Therefore I agree with my friend Mr. Reid that you cannot have the States doing what we are going to vest in the Federal Parliament. Surely the Federal Parliament will in every way possible assist those industries which are indigenous to the various States. It can easily be arranged. A sum of money—say half a million sterling—can be applied for the purpose, and equally distributed over the whole colonies. Moreover, I suppose that each colony can apply some of the proportion of Customs duties that it will get to support its industries. Further than that I do not think the clause ought to go.

Mr. HENRY:

I rise for the purpose merely of saying that it should be made quite clear what the position of the various harbor trusts is under this section. I am entirely in accord with the view put forward by Mr. Reid in reference to the necessity of having uniform bounties, that the Federal Parliament should be the sole body to deal with this question of bounties. We must trust to the Federal Parliament that every protection shall be afforded to the various industries affected by bounties. I, should like the position of the harbor trusts in reference to wharfage rates to be made quite clear, because many wharfage rates may be imposed which will really be protective.

Mr. REID:
If they put on two scales of rates, one for the produce of the people of their own colony, and another for the produce of the people of a different colony, they would be acting illegally, as interfering with the equality of trade.

Mr. HENRY:
Then the Melbourne Harbor Trust might charge 5s. per ton on potatoes, but they must levy that charge equally on the Warrnambool producer and the Tasmanian producer.

Mr. REID:
It must be uniform.

Mr. HENRY:
I am entirely in accord with the view that the rates must be uniform, and that the necessary rates must be levied on imports from foreign parts. So long as it is made quite clear that the wharfage rates of the various harbor trusts should be uniform I am quite content.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Surely they can charge rates in proportion to the accommodation they give.

Mr. HENRY:
I am well aware that under existing arrangements wharfage rates sometimes really become a protective duty. But so long as the rates are uniform I am quite content.

Mr. ISAACS:
After providing that the duties of excise and customs and bounties shall be within the purview of Parliament, sub-section 2 of this clause states:
No tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one State to another.
That contemplates that you put a duty on goods of the State going from one State to some place that is not a State. I have some doubt whether that is right. The Commonwealth might put a duty on, say, Tasmanian apples going to England, and why should that be so?

Sir EDWARD BRADDOX:
Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You, have struck the right quarter now.

Mr. ISAACS:
I am glad I have touched a responsive chord in my hon. friend's breast.
Mr. BARTON:
   Sidere mens eadem mutato.
Mr. ISAACS:
   The American Constitution provides in article I., section 9, sub-section 5:—
   No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.
   Why should the Commonwealth have the power to put an export duty on articles imported from any one particular State?
Mr. GLYNN:
   Do you not want it to have that power?
Mr. ISAACS:
   I do not see why they should have the power to put an export duty upon goods of any particular State going abroad. That is not the purpose of Federation at all. I should like to hear the reasons for this innovation from the American Constitution as it seems to be an arbitrary power given to the Federal Parliament.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
   It is in the Bill of 1891.
Mr. ISAACS:
   Yes. I am aware that it is in that measure.
Mr. WISE:
   The reason for framing the clause in this way was to allow to the Federal Parliament absolute discretion in handling the fiscal policy. I am entirely with the hon. member, because, as a freetrader, I can see no more reason for the imposition of an export duty than I can for an import duty.
Mr. ISAACS:
   It is not a question of freetrade and protection, but of interference with the States.
Mr. WISE:
   I am willing to support him if he will move an amendment that no export duty shall be levied.
Mr. GLYNN:
   Of course this is a necessary right which must be vested in the Federal Parliament. It is quite as objectionable, from a freetrade point of view, to impose an export as an import duty. If the power is given to the Commonwealth to impose import duties which it is alleged are to encourage lines of production within a particular State, and if that is right, then a similar power must be vested in regard to export duties.
Mr. BARTON:
   Do I understand Mr. Isaacs to urge that instead of providing:
That no tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one State to another, we should provide that the Commonwealth shall not levy an export duty, and leave it in the American form so that no tax or duty shall be levied on any goods exported, also that there should be a prohibition against the States from doing so?

Mr. KINGSTON:
The object is only to prevent the Commonwealth doing any thing to interfere with intercolonial freetrade, and it is just as well to say that you shall not impose any duty on goods exported from one State to another as it is to say that you shall not impose a duty on goods imported from one State to another. It is as broad as it is long. I think we undoubtedly understand that the hon. member may make it clearer by adding his amendment, but what is the good of tying the hands of the States themselves, if you allow the Commonwealth to interfere with the freedom of trade?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I hope that the Committee will not agree to the introduction of a duty which is foreign to our policy.

Mr. MOORE:
Wharfage rates have been imposed before now which have been tantamount to a duty.

Mr. BARTON:
Mr. Isaacs has not moved an amendment to the provision which reads:
That no tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one State to another.
That is a prohibition against a State levying duties on goods imported from another State.

Mr. ISAACS:
I did not say that it was not.

Mr. BARTON:
Then the hon. member thinks that the Commonwealth should be prevented from levying any export duties on goods exported from the Commonwealth to any foreign port?

Mr. ISAACS:
Yes; I am in doubt about this. I wanted to know from any hon. gentleman why the American form was departed from, because I understand and fully sympathise with the desire that there should be absolute freedom of trade between the colonies. That is already provided for, but this is a curious expression. What we want to do is to prevent any duties being laid on goods going from one State to another, but to use the word exported in this connection raises some doubt in my mind. In the American Constitution it is provided that no tax or duty shall be laid on any article exported from any State. This Constitution says from one State to another. That leaves it open to the Commonwealth Parliament to put a duty on goods going from one State outside the Commonwealth altogether, and the point raised by Mr. Kingston is that if you say you will put a duty on articles exported it is equal to saying you will put a duty on articles imported. That may not be quite right, for exported from New South Wales may not be the same as imported into Victoria. I am not quite persuaded what the object of these words were. They are in the 1891 Bill, and I am not quite satisfied why the change of verbiage has been made.

Mr. BARTON:
I think I can explain. If the hon. member looks at section 9 of the United States Constitution he will see there are certain prohibitions on the Commonwealth, that is to say certain immigration shall not be prohibited by the Congress, that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, and that no Bill or attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed. Then clause 5 says:

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Go from that to the next:

No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriation made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditure of all public money shall be published from time to time.

Then further:

No title of nobility should be granted by the United States.

This is a series of prohibitions on the Commonwealth to prevent them from doing anything in derogation of freedom or free trade between the States. The words are:

That no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State.

The succeeding words seem to illustrate the whole matter:

No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any State on Imports or exports shall be for the use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.

That is a prohibition against the States, as the former is one against the Commonwealth; but, taking the whole of the section altogether, clause 5 of section 9 may act as a prohibition on the States as well as the Commonwealth. What is the meaning of the words:

No tax or duty shall be laid on goods exported from any State.

It is made clear by the following words. They are all for the preservation of inter-State free-trade, and it is clear therefore that whether it is the Commonwealth or the State that is enjoined, the tax or duty prohibited is a tax laid on goods exported from one State to another, because it is inter-State freetrade that is the whole subject of the prohibitory clauses in the American Constitution. If hon. members will look through these clauses and those connected therewith they will see clearly that that is the object. It is meant that a tax or duty shall not be laid as a tax or duty on articles exported from one State to another. It is with the Commonwealth to take its own course with regard to articles exported from the Commonwealth, whether they levy these duties or not. In this connection let me give an instance. Many years ago in New South Wales-I think it was in 1881—it was proposed to levy an export tax upon wool, coal, and cattle exported from New South Wales. The Ministry which proposed it was a freetrade Ministry. Two conditions arise under an export tax. One is that the article upon which an export duty is levied is an article which the community produces in common with other communities. In that case the price of the article is not increased by the amount of the duty of the export for the reason that that article of export his to enter into competition with articles similarly produced elsewhere. In such a case the tax falls on the producer. On the other hand, in cases where the exporting community has a monopoly the increased price of the tax has to be paid—if I may use such a comprehensive term—by the foreigner, so that the producer of the State is not taxed. In the one case therefore the export tax may operate as a very great limitation on freetrade, and in the other case it has no such limitation at all. In the one case the whole of the extra cost is paid by the persons in the country which imports from the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth will choose its own fiscal policy, and it is quite clear that the Commonwealth should not be prohibited from levying such duties of export as it may choose. It is clear that the prohibitions laid down in the American Constitution mean that the Commonwealth or any State should not be allowed any interference with intercolonial freetrade, and the intention is made quite clear in this Constitution, as in the American Constitution, by an express prohibition on a State from doing the same. The authority which is prohibited from levying duties of exports upon goods passing from one State to another is probably the Commonwealth.
itself. I think, taking that into account, that the words:

Exported from one State to another have been inserted as in the 1891 Bill to make it clear, and not to leave the meaning loose, only to be controlled by the remaining words of the section, and to make the obvious meaning quite clear to him who reads.

Sub-section 2 as read agreed to.
Sub-section 3 as read agreed to.
Sub section 4 as read agreed to.
Sub-section 5,
Postal and telegraphic services.

Mr. HOLDER:
I move as an amendment to add to this sub-section the words:
Without the boundaries of the Commonwealth.

My purpose is to exclude from the control of the federal authority all telegraphic and postal matters within the boundaries of the Commonwealth. I indicated at an earlier stage what my object was in doing this. Whether profit or lose is sustained in carrying on the services will make no difference to South Australia, because the accounts will be entirely federal in character, and debits or credits will be made to the individual States. It seems to me that postal and telegraphic matters are matters of purely local concern, and that to transfer them to the federal authority would be a great mistake. The effect would be to bring about centralisation in its worst form, and cause great detriment to outlying districts. I might refer to Western Australia, where such large developments have been recently seen. How would it have been possible for a Central Government, so far removed from the centre of operations, to have adapted itself stage by stage and week by week to the growing developments so well as the local authority did? In a matter such as posts and telegraphs we would save time and expense, and the public interest would be consulted in every possible way if the management were in the hands of the local authority. I am willing to hear what has to be said on the other side as to the advantage that is to, be gained by handing over the control of local affairs to a central authority, but I am afraid any advantages arising from the transfer will be greatly overbalanced by the advantages of leaving things as they are.

Mr. BARTON:
I hope the Convention will not accept the amendment, which would only leave the Commonwealth charge of external mail services and of cables and other communications outside the bounds of the Commonwealth. The hon. member would, however, saddle the Commonwealth with the subject of transcontinental communication, which has been carried on without the bounds of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON:

No.

Mr. BARTON:

I was wrong. None of the telegraph lines within the bounds of the Commonwealth would be taken over. The hon. member would saddle the Commonwealth with the question of ocean mails and cables, and would leave in the hands of the various States the various postal and telegraphic services, including the transcontinental service.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You would have two controls.

Mr. BARTON:

There will be two portions of one system. Anyone who telegraphs from one portion of the Commonwealth to England or America is using one entire system. His telegram may go from Coolgardie to Adelaide, from Adelaide across the Transcontinental wire, and then by the Eastern and Australian Telegraph Company's cable; so that he is using what really amounts to one system. And the same thing can be said of the postal service as a whole. Is it advisable, even for the purpose of economy or the preservation of State rights, that these systems should not he directed as one? A person expecting a cable from London may be assured that the cable service is in good order, yet he may be inconvenienced by a break occurring in the Transcontinental line which, ought not to have happened.

Mr. HOLDER:

We have kept it in good order for twenty-five years.

Mr. BARTON:

I am not complaining of anything that South Australia has done in this way. But if a person sending a long distance message expects to get an answer, then with respect either to the message or to the answer, he may be in a very queer position unless the whole responsibility rests with the Commonwealth of keeping the whole system as clear as possible. If the colony is to retain its own particular postal and telegraphic service, and the Commonwealth to be in charge of external questions with regard to posts, telegraphs, and so on, then we may have this peculiar condition of things: that there may be cause of complaint with respect to the external services under the charge of the Commonwealth, or with respect to the internal services which are sub-divided among six States, so that there may be a responsibility divided among as many as three different divisions. It would be preferable to make the Commonwealth responsible for the whole service, for by that means you would much more clearly conserve the interests of every member of the Commonwealth.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

The hon. member has pointed out a very good argument with regard to the telegraphic communication, but it fails entirely so far as his attitude to this Bill is concerned when applied to postal communication. He is quite prepared to let the postal communication be carried on by divided responsibility. We have not got the telegraph wires to carry the mails, but we have railways under State control to carry them; so that if he sees no objection to that portion of the State business which carries postal matter being under divided control, he can surely have very little objection to the telegraph wires being under State control. I should have been in favor of getting this sub-section into the Bill if the Convention had been agreeable to take control of what I consider to be analogous to our postal and telegraphic communication—I mean our railway communication. It is just as important that the Federal Government shall have the care and management of the vehicles which carry human beings and their goods as that it should have the care and management of the vehicles or ways which carry letters and telegrams. But I see very little chance of carrying a proposal of that kind, and therefore my vote is to be given with a view to preserving the consistency of this Bill having regard to other matters. I do think that there is a great danger in providing for the Federal Constitution to take over too many matters at the onset. I fear that there is a great danger that we shall over-weight Federation at the onset, and we shall have people voting against the Constitution because as regards the particular matters they deem important we are giving up too much of the right to govern themselves. I do say this: why should the Federal Government interfere in local postal matters? What interest would the national Government have in the carrying of letters from Adelaide to Glenelg, or from Adelaide to Hindmarsh, or from one street in Adelaide to another street in Adelaide? These are matters of purely local concern, and you cannot dignify them to a position of national importance. Moreover, I fear that by overloading Federation with these minor and local concerns, you bring in that which has tended so much to degrade public life in America, log-rolling and corruption. If you give over the telegraph and postal business you thereby hand to the custody of the Federal Government all the local appointments—the appointing of the postmasters, clerks, and other officers, who do not do national, but the purest local business; and you at once raise up a large army of civil servants, the influence of which we want to dissociate from our national life. If possible, we should elevate the position of our Federal Legislature above subjects of purely local concern, and what need is there to thrust these matters into a great national undertaking? The hon. member's proposal allows us to go just as far as we ought to go in this business. When this becomes a matter of national concern, let the national Government do the work, but the Federation should not do things which are best done locally. What cannot be done best locally should be handed over to this common executive. It is proposed to have an Inter-State Commission, which will deal with those matters where our railways, or our public arteries-our roads, or rivers-come into conflict. The idea is that the rival interests of one State against another should be adjusted and controlled by such a Commission. It is very easy to let this matter of posts and telegraphs outside the boundaries be regulated by this Commission. They need not take active management, but they could provide regulations which would have the force and effect of federal laws governing the various bodies. I do hope that in this matter there will be a division taken, so that those who are inclined to overweight the Federation with minor matters may vote for it, and those who are inclined to leave to the Federation clearly-defined national interests, may give their votes in that direction. I hope a division will be taken which will test this and many other matters. I have given notice of similar amendments, but I shall not persevere with them if Mr. Holder's amendment is lost.

Mr. DEAKIN:
As I understand the remarks of my hon. friend Mr. Carruthers, he admits the wisdom of transferring the telegraph service to the Federal Government, but contests the wisdom of handing over the post offices. Do
I understand the hon. member's position correctly?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
No. My hon. friend Mr. Barton pointed out that with regard to telegraphs it was, not wise to let these lines be under the control of the various States, and I answered him by pointing out that with regard to posta

Mr. DEAKIN:
The hon. member's argument was then simply an answer, not an argument, on the main question. It is not essential to the principles on which the Federal Government is to be established that either the post office or the telegraph service should be transferred to the national Government. But I submit that the post and telegraph office in both its branches comes first in the long list of services in which it is evident there are national interests to be dealt with rather than State interests. It is no imputation upon the existing post offices of the various colonies that one has sometimes been more prosperous than the other; that fact to my mind is chiefly due to the different policies pursued in the different colonies. If the other colonies had thought fit to pursue with regard to their post offices the policy of the South Australian Government they could have shown large surpluses. But they have chosen to use their post and telegraph offices not merely to earn profits, but as a means of opening up new districts. To my mind there is no reason why the post and telegraph service should not in every colony pay well for services rendered there and over the entire area of the Commonwealth. But the question naturally arises whether these services should be essentially local services. Surely if there are State undertakings which require to be administrated geographically and without reference to the arbitrary limits which separate State from State, the carriage of letters and the transmission of telegraphic messages are those interests.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
Outside State boundaries?

Mr. DEAKIN:
Within or without State boundaries. How can it be said that South Australia is more competent to administer the postal affairs of its Northern Territory than they would be administered from a central capital? Or how can it be said that the European mails for the extreme west country of New South Wales could not be better dealt with by the use of railways and means of transport through South Australia? Looking at the postal and telegraphic business of the continent of Australia from a purely business aspect, from the practical side of affairs, it appears to me that we are more likely to have satisfactory and complete communication if it be regarded as one whole and worked from the most convenient centres, without regard to State limitations. I say in answer to Mr. Holder that his illustration in regard to Western Australia proves nothing if we may rely upon American experience. If there has been one great federal success it has been the American post office, and if there is one regret in their politics it is that the American telegraphic service is not also in the hands of the Government.
The telegraphic service is in private hands, and the regret is widespread. I can say, from a short experience of some of the least settled and most distant territories of the West of the United States, that the postal communication there is much more complete than I have been accustomed to find in outlying districts of these colonies under their present State management. The National Government at Washington, 3,000 miles away, separated by a whole continent, has proved itself more liberal in its treatment of the people of the Far West than have the Governments of Australia proved themselves in regard to our back block settlements. In America the post office has been a great administrative, financial, and popular success; and any man who would propose to-day to hand that service over to other than to State administration would find that his proposition was short-lived. We may have greater difficulties to surmount than they have, but there is no reason why the Commonwealth of Australia should not also achieve a conspicuous success in this direction. The arguments used by my hon. friend Mr. Barton with regard to the difficulties arising from a divided control of the telegraph wires appear to be conclusive. It would be almost impossible to make arrangements as perfect and as economical for either postal or telegraphic services within Australia if you retain State boundaries, and it will certainly be more difficult to make arrangements for the extra-Australian services if you are called upon to consider State claims and demands, instead of only considering the real practical wants of the localities immediately concerned. It appears to me a desirable thing as a matter of practical business to transfer both of the services to which I have alluded to the Federal Government. We shall not place too great a burden on the federal authority, and the whole population will be better served than they now are or than remote districts can be by State authority. Placing the means of communication in the hands of the Federal Government will probably permit of that universal reduction of postage and cable rates which is one of the first demands of the commercial interest throughout Australia. The experience of our own colony is that the present cable rates are almost prohibitive. but by a satisfactory combination of the cable and postal services, with unity of administration, we shall be able to secure an immediate reduction in those charges, as well as in postal rates, and give the people of Australia better services than those they now possess.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

Every postal conference that has been held for years past has tendered a report suggesting that the postal and telegraphic services should be federated. Year by year conferences are necessary in order to keep ourselves in touch with what is going on and to keep pace with development. The clause of the 1891 Bill, transferring the control of post and telegraph offices, was largely for the reason that the losses amounting to £200,000 per annum, incurred by some States were for the benefit of the whole, and therefore should be of federal concern. That state of accounts has since altered, and South Australia, in 1891 the chief loser, and Tasmania, also an important loser, have both since secured profit in these departments, but much services as posts and telegraphs have by means of the postal conferences of postmasters annually, and by their reports, sought to establish uniformity, and tended strongly to support this federal purpose.
The cost of cable subsidies has already been divided intercolonia dly, and the completion of federal services will tend to support the "United Australia" purpose of the people. Nothing has a greater tendency to perfect your union than one postage stamp for Australasia. Uniform postal rate is also desirable; whereas in Tasmania, in a given radius from the General Post Office, the rate is one penny, in South Australia and Victoria twopence is uniform, whether across the street or to the end of their territorial limit. Mr. Deakin's reference to extra-colonial or over-sea services will remind representatives of the fact that the federal authority will, if only oversea services are of federal concern, as Mr. Holder suggests, pay the contractors, and that the revenue will be collected by the local or State authorities. The details of departmental works, such as the pay of postmasters and opening new offices in outlying districts, will by federal authority be settled upon the recommendations of the Local or State Secretary of the department in the Federation. To be compelled at the present moment to supply ourselves with Adelaide stamps, or if you are travelling in Tasmania with Tasmanian stamps, if; always inconvenient to that section of the public which is of a migratory character. We have also to consider that as far as our revenues are concerned they come in unequal proportions from the various contributors. In Tasmania we give in the city and suburbs the advantage of a penny service; but here, and I think in Victoria also, they have the same rate in the city and suburbs as throughout their territory, and I think if the federal spirit is to be generated by a Constitution of this kind, and if we wish to continue the belief that we are one people, we will do much in, this direction by providing a uniform postal and telegraphic service. Under these circumstances our various conferences have invariably tended in this direction, and hence during the last few years we have pooled all our cable subsidies. It was only natural that we should so pool them, as we in Tasmania were bearing more than our share, and we recognise that South Australia was giving to the people of Australia a large amount of work for which she was inadequately recompensed. We have reversed the position, and we are no longer losing by the postal service as we were in 1891. South Australia and Tasmania have altered their positions, but that is no reason that the remainder, now that our total loss has been reduced to about £80,000, should not pool the service which brings in contact every home throughout Australia. Then you have the money order system also, under which commission is charged in each colony, but if it were pooled, we would be able to distribute the money of a majority of our people at a lower rate than we do at the present time, which is within the scope of some future Treasurer or postmaster to propose. This advantage can be better secured to the people generally by Federation than it otherwise can be, and therefore I hope that we will respect the opinion of 1891.

Dr. Cockburn:

The proposed amendment will keep the administration of our postal services in the same position as now. By co-operation the colonies have already a federal service in regard to extra-colonial matters. The federal authority may well continue that work, and the local services remain in the hands of the States. I would like to say that this is not a question of revenue only, although some of the speakers have made a great point of that phase of the subject. The extension of the postal and telegraphic system is generally connected with the development of the country. It is a question also of opening up markets, a wheat market, for instance, cannot spring into existence unless it is provided with an adequate telegraph service. The States can better look after these local matters than the federal authority can administer them from a distance. The hon. member Mr. Deakin has mentioned the Northern Territory and some portions of New South Wales. I am not prepared to say that the administration of the post office in the Northern Territory would not be better if the seat of authority was closer to the services rendered, but if any want of good administration due to distance has occurred, would not the evils be multiplied a thousandfold if the greater part of Australia was managed by an authority a still further distance away? Taking over the telegraphs means taking over the telephones, and I think that matter is purely a local one which can be most satisfactorily managed locally. Telephones are local of necessity.

Mr. Deakin:

You can already speak from one colony to another, and probably further by-and-bye.

Dr. Cockburn:

The hon. member has pointed out that the Americans would be pleased to have the telegraph services under any sort of State control, but not necessarily federal. With regard to the post offices, I think he is also correct when he speaks of the general opinion in America, but is there not an argument which may influence the desire of the Americans to continue their present system of federal control of the post offices? Is not the possession of the post offices and the patronage appertaining to them one of the strongest instruments in the hands of party government there? The parties in America could not carry out their campaigns without the advantages which the control of the post offices places in their hands. I think we should keep this patronage and the temptations attending it out of the hands of the Commonwealth. We know that the manner in which postal appointments are made in America is a grave reflection on the whole people. I think the best way is to add to the clause the words of the amendment, and thereby we shall combine the advantages of a federal and a local administration of the post office.

Mr. WISE:
I do not rise to continue the debate, but merely to ask as a matter of order that I may be allowed to move an earlier amendment, because, if this amendment is dealt with, I shall be precluded from doing so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Finish the debate on this.

Mr. WISE:
I have the concurrence of the gentleman in charge of the Bill for doing this. I propose to omit all the words after the word "Postal," and to make the clause read as follows:
Postal, telegraph, telephone, and other like services within and beyond the Commonwealth.
If I move that it will be open to the hon. gentleman moving the present amendment to strike out the words "within and." It is necessary as a matter of drafting, to carry out this to meet the views of Mr. Holder, who moved the present amendment. Unless there are express words implying that this is outside the Commonwealth they will not know its limits. If we want the Commonwealth to have power to deal with cables, there must be express power to enable them to go beyond the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:
What are you intending to cover by the words "other like services?" Do you mean the railways?

Mr. WISE:
There might be a long distance telephone or phonograph. Mr. Peacock's laugh might then be heard in London. (Laughter.)

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We have his laugh here. Do not put him further on.
If Mr. Holder moves to omit the words "within and" it will come to the same thing. I am sure these words are necessary to enable Mr. Holder to carry out his object.

Mr. SYMON:
It is a little complicating the present issue to introduce telephones. Some of us would be rather caught by the insertion of these words in deciding upon the amendment by Mr. Holder. The introduction of telephones raises a distinct issue. It would be better to put them separately.
Dr. COCKBURN:
On behalf of my hon. colleague Mr. Holder, I will ask leave to withdraw this amendment, so long as it is not intended in any way to obstruct it.
Amendment temporarily withdrawn.

Mr. WISE:
Then I move:
To insert after "telegraphic," "telephonic and other like services."
I will not discuss this. Telephones are worked with telegraphs in every colony, and it would be a great inconvenience to separate them.

Mr. SYMON:
I should like to hear the views of Dr. Cockburn on this question, as some of us are not familiar enough with the subject to say whether there can be a detachment of the services.

Mr. DEAKIN:
They must go together.

Mr. WISE:
They use the same wires.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I do not think it is possible to separate them.
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WISE:
I now move to add to the sub-section:
Within and beyond the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
What is the object? Would it not apply to many other powers that we are to give.

Mr. SYMON:
I think these words are scarcely required. There could be nothing more comprehensive than the words we have just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN:
I will put Mr. Holder's amendment first.

Mr. REID:
This attempt to separate the post and telegraph services will, I think, be disastrous. It is impossible to work these two services by, two different departments. How is it possible to put on the Commonwealth the necessity of having a department to deal with one part only of the business.

Instead of simplifying the post and telegraph services of the colonies it will only complicate them. One of the strongest reasons for including the post and telegraph services within the Commonwealth is that, instead of having seven Ministerial Post and Telegraph Departments and seven staffs for the Australian colonies, the whole business can be managed under one federal head. If there is an argument in favor of federalising any service, it applies more strongly to this than to any other I can think of. There are certain side complications which will entirely disappear under federal administration. When one speaks of the colony of New South Wales having a loss on the postal service, and another colony having a gain, that simply arises from separate administrations and separate laws; laws under which, in New South Wales, we allow newspapers to go free, and laws under which in other colonies they do not; laws under which, in New South Wales, we allow one penny stamp over a fifteen-mile radius in all populous localities throughout the colony, and laws in other colonies under which they charge twopence to send a letter from one side of the street to another. Under a federal administration the charges will be regulated on a uniform basis, and all these inequalities will disappear. Why are we putting in various clauses to prevent unequal intercourse between the colonies in matters of trade if we do not put in these clauses which will prevent similar evils in connection with the posts and telegraphs of Australia? You could carry on most offensive State wars with these post and telegraph rates. It is essentially a matter of common concern which could be more economically administered by the Commonwealth. Although I always attach the greatest importance to the views of Mr. Carruthers, and we are generally found acting together, I must say on this occasion I feel it would be impossible to carry out the ocean transit of mails with one department, and local affairs with another. From my point of view there should be only one Post and Telegraph Department for Australia, only one executive head for Australia, and I believe that under that system the interests of the people of Australia will be better and more economically served.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

I hope the clause as it stands, will not be carried. I agree with Mr. Carruthers as to the necessity for local legislation. The arguments used by Sir Philip Fysh have induced me to rise now. All over Tasmania we have one postage, with the exception of the immediate vicinities of large towns, and they have another different one. You, in South Australia, also have a system of your own. Why should these things be interfered with by a general arrangement of this sort? At the present moment all these matters are in two classes-one the outside connection with Great Britain and other countries, and the other, local communications. In Tasmania and in other communities also, I suppose, there are numbers of small post offices where the annual payment of those in charge does not come to more than perhaps £5 or £6 a year. Why should such small matters as these be interfered with by the Federal Government? In all portions of Tasmania and other colonies new places are day by day rising up, and is postal and telegraphic communication with them to be delayed until the consent of the Federal Government is obtained?

Dr. COCKBURN:
Send deputations to the mainland.

Mr. PEACOCK:
That will soon kill deputations.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
At present the local authorities properly have to deal with such matters, and they ought not to be handed over until there is absolute necessity for it. Connection with outside countries can be regulated easily enough. It is all nonsense to make a bogey of keeping accounts. Other accounts will have to be kept in a separate way, and why should not this one? Better give up everything at once; we are diminishing the Power of the local Parliaments wherever we possibly can, apparently. I think we had better stick to the arrangements we have at the present time.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I think Mr. Douglas is unnecessarily alarmed as to the effect of this provision. If the administration of these systems by the Federal Government is satisfactory and efficient there will be a great measure of decentralisation about it. To a very considerable extent the conduct of local postal and telegraphic services will be left to the local officials.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
The local officials will be allowed a free hand in that respect.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
As to the extension of the postal service for a few miles, or the opening of a new office, anyone administering that department, if he were a capable administrator, would take particular care that such matters were left entirely to the local authorities.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
And recommendations would always be accepted.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I am in favor of the inclusion of these matters in those which shall be of federal concern, although Tasmania has to lose by it. We are making a profit out of our post and telegraph system as a result of good administration, and we are ready to make a sacrifice. But Tasmanians ought to be satisfied with having the postal and telegraph services through Australia conducted by a federal administration, inasmuch as the federal capital will be in Tasmania, and we shall have the Government quite close. (Laughter.)

Mr. DEAKIN:

Do you want the capital in Tasmania as well as Tattersalls?

Sub-section VI., as read, agreed to.

Sub-section VII., as read, agreed to.

Sub-section VIII., as read, agreed to.

Sub-section IX., as read, agreed to.

Sub-section x.—Astronomical and meteorological observations.

Mr. REID:
It does seem to me that this is really going to some extravagant extreme. Surely we are going to allow the observers of all the colonies to go on peacefully examining these heavenly mysteries without bringing a Commonwealth law down upon them to regulate them and their observations. It seems to me it is a fanciful item-

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Would you mind adding the words "outside the Commonwealth"?

Mr. REID:
That would make it a little more sensible. The notion of observations of this kind being brought within the laws of the Commonwealth seems to be altogether too ridiculous.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I am not going to let this godchild of mine die a natural death. It is very desirable that we should have uniformity throughout Australia with regard to these things. I am not so much wedded to the astronomical, but, in regard to meteorological observations, it is most essential that there should be uniformity throughout Australia. On a former occasion I pointed out the consensus of opinion among the best men that these observations would be invaluable to Australia. Why should the Government of Tasmania be called upon to meet an expenditure of this kind when it is admitted by the best men in Australia and elsewhere that these observations would be of more value to Australia than they could be to Tasmania, which happens to be the position from which they could be taken? If there is anything which ought to be the subject of a Commonwealth law, it is these observations, which will undoubtedly prove of great value to shipping and other interests of Australia.

Mr. GRANT:
I regret that the Premier of New South Wales should have taken the view he did of this matter.

Mr. REID:
Another inquisition.

Mr. GRANT:
With regard to the astronomical observations, it is very important that they should be under federal management. Take the case of the United Kingdom at the present time. There we have an observatory at Greenwich which I apprehend is the chief northern observatory of the empire. There is an observatory in Dublin, and another in Edinburgh, both admirably managed institutions, but we do not hear of them conflicting with the observatory at Greenwich, which maintains the paramount position in the United Kingdom. The same is the case with the Washington observatory of the United States. So also we should have an observatory in the Commonwealth which should rank before the other observatories. It commends itself to our intelligence that there should be a federal observatory, to take precedence over other observatories. I think there are obvious reasons that the meteorological observations should be placed under one general control, and I trust that the Convention will not object to the clause as it stands.

Sub-section, as read, agreed to.

Sub-section XI., as read, agreed to.

Sub-section XII.-Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits and in rivers which flow through or in two or more States.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I thought at first of moving the omission of the whole of this sub-section, but there may be hon. members who are not in favor of the elimination of the whole of the words. I propose to test the sense of the Committee by moving:

That all words after "limits" be struck out.

I think this sub-section is unduly interfering with what is purely a State question, and if the clause is allowed to Stand, it may give rise to a vast amount of local friction. If you concede the rights of the Federal Government to legislate with regard to fish, you must provide similar legislation with respect to game, because the game like the fish, travel from one colony to another. Any legislation introduced with reference to things in the water and on the land must be also made to apply to things in the air. What is aimed at is to give joint control to the people of South Australia of fish in the Murray river and her tributaries. But, supposing the Federal Parliament will pass a law with regard to the Murray fisheries, what Federal officer is to carry out that law? Is the Federal Parliament to have officers posted at short intervals up the river? If the matter be left to State supervision and State legislation, we should have the State policemen and officers employed, and a more satisfactory control would be established than if the Federal Parliament interfered. We, in New South Wales, are just as much interested, and, perhaps, more so, than the people of South Australia, and we have passed laws regulating inland fisheries, while we have officers to see that these laws are enforced. The moment you let the Federal Parliament make laws which prevail over the State laws, you take away local authority, which should look after matters of purely local concern.
Mr. GORDON:
As I believe I am responsible for this sub-section, I wish to say a word in its defence. I think it is recognised in every civilised country, that the fisheries are an important factor, as a wealth producer, much more so than the feathered game of which Mr. Carruthers has made so strong a point. It would be useless for one colony alone to make regulations as to the time of fishing, and the size of the fish which may be netted, and, therefore, it seems to me a most important thing that uniform legislation should be adopted.

Mr. REID:
What rivers do you refer to?

Mr. GORDON:
The Murray and the Darling principally.

Mr. REID:
You might mention the Clarence river and a few others.

Mr. PEACOCK:
The Torrens!

Mr. GORDON:
There are a few other streams in New South Wales, but these are the great rivers in connection with which the Federal Parliament could make regulations regarding the fisheries.

Mr. REID:
The desire of Mr. Gordon to assume control of New South Wales is no new desire, as ever since he appeared at a Convention he has been endeavoring to annex as much of New South Wales as he possibly can. In another subsection he wishes to take over a great part of Queensland, but that is a mere detail. We have very little water in New South Wales, and what we have we wish to keep. I have no objection, as far as water flowing between two States is concerned, to the Federal Parliament having the control, as it would put an end to difficulties which arise between two colonies at present in connection with the waters and the fisheries, but I must repudiate any idea of the Commonwealth assuming power over a river which is wholly in one colony, I do not think that any other colony would like the Commonwealth to assume control of the rivers within its boundaries, and what they would not like themselves, I am sure they would not force on New South Wales. I understand Mr. Gordon is not satisfied that we give him free trade over our borders, but in a spirit, which looks like ingratitude, he is trying to take from us something which he has no right to take. Whilst I am perfectly prepared to give the Federal Government authority over waters flowing between two States, as that would remove a great deal of difficulty, we must draw the line between waters flowing between two States, and water flowing entirely in one colony.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I would suggest that Mr. Carruthers should withdraw his amendment to enable me to move:
That the words "or in" be struck out.
It will be competent for him to move his amendment afterwards.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
No, you cannot go back.

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out that if we amend the clause by striking out the words "or in," Mr. Carruthers' amendment cannot be put.

Mr. FRASER:
I think we should confine ourselves to the 1891 Bill.

Mr. BARTON:
It Mr. Reid's view were carried out there might be a difficulty, because the whole course of the river would be covered. His view would be better carried out by saying:
Rivers, which are the boundary between two or more States.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I hope we will make some provision on this subject, for there have already been difficulties in the matter. I remember having had a letter from Sir George Turner on the subject. They were desirous of preserving the fish in the River Glenelg, and he pointed out that whilst they were trying to prevent poaching-

Mr. FRASER:
Netting.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Or the use of illegal instruments in their portion of the river, South Australia was not exhibiting the same industry in the protection of the fish in the portion of the river in this colony, and he desired the appointment of a federal officer who would look after the interests of both and see that the fish were not exposed to any more risks in one colony than the other. We ought to do something in this matter. Our fisheries are important, and if one colony is careless it will not only endanger the fisheries of that colony, but probably the fisheries of the other colonies. I think the clause recommended by the Constitutional Committee should be adopted by this House.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
The suggestion is to provide for a river flowing through two or more territories, and to protect the fish which are travelling up and down from one colony to the other. The question is whether we should give this power to the Federal Parliament at all. I think this power is much better left in the hands of the States. It means giving power to deal with the waters all through the separate States, because it means every part of the river.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Only for fishery purposes.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It may be a difficult thing to have the question raised whether the water in a river was not being so diminished by irrigation, or manufactures that the fish could not live in it. I think it would be better to leave things as they are.

Mr. BROWN:
Could not the question be dealt with by sub-section 33:
Matters referred to the Parliament of the Commonwealth by the Parliament or Parliaments of any State or States, but so that the law shall extend only to the State or States by whose Parliament or Parliaments the matter was referred, and to such other States as may afterwards adopt the law.

I think it is one of those matters which should be dealt with in that way rather than in the way proposed. I mean as to the control of fisheries in rivers which flow through or in two or more States. As to fisheries in waters beyond territorial limits, I think they should be left as in the Bill of 1891.

Amendment agreed to; sub-section as amended agreed to.
Sub-section 13 as read agreed to.
Sub-section 14 as read agreed to.
Sub-section XV.-Banking, the incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money.

Mr. ISAACS:
Anticipating another subsection, I notice that insurance, including State insurance, is to be dealt with by the federal authority. As regards banking, I believe in South Australia there is a State bank. It will be a question to seriously consider whether the Commonwealth is to deal with purely private banks, and not State banks. I understand that it is intended to have uniformity of legislation in banking matters throughout the whole of the Commonwealth, that financial institutions shall know exactly what laws they have to comply with, and that the laws shall apply equally over the various parts of the Commonwealth. But where a State Bank carries on business purely in its own State, I desire to know why that should come under the operation of the Commonwealth?

Dr. COCKBURN:

I am glad that this matter has been called attention to. It is a very serious one to those colonies which want to go ahead.

Mr. GLYNN:

How is that?

Dr. COCKBURN:

Because the federal authority may take the power out of the hands of a State to carry on the business of banking. This would be a concurrent power, and in its exercise in such a matter as the issue of notes, for instance, it would be very easy for the Federal Parliament by implication to compel any State to discontinue it. It might also explicitly forbid the States to undertake it. A hostile majority in the Federal

Sub-section as read agreed to.

Sub-section XVI.-Insurance, including State insurance extending beyond the limits of the State concerned.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I desire to understand whether by the word "State" here is meant a particular colony, or is it used in the general sense-the State as distinct from the individual? I apprehend that the word "State" means a particular colony, but I confess I do not understand the meaning of the term.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

This is a new subsection. It proposes to include insurance, and I think it is a very desirable inclusion amongst the list of powers. However, it involves a principle. The part the hon. member referred to is for this purpose: It was suggested that colonies might undertake State insurance, as was done in New Zealand, and it was held that State insurance should not come under the general laws. From that view I entirely dissent; but this clause was drawn in accordance with the views of the Constitutional Committee. The hon. member will see, therefore, that the words "State insurance" simply indicate that whereas a State within its own boundaries should have control of all its insurance business, and the regulation of its insurance under any State system, so far as it deals with the people within its own boundaries, any part of its system that proposes to deal with people beyond its boundaries should come under the general laws. "State" is used to designate colony. I should support the hon. member if be moved to strike out:

Including State insurance extending beyond the limits of the State concerned.
Mr. ISAACS:
It would include all insurance then?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Yes; and I think it ought to. If a State chooses to go into the business of insurance—I do not say it is wise or not—I do not see why any departure should be made as to the uniformity of laws with regard to insurance. The State should be subject to the same limitations as the individual if it goes in for State insurance. It would be absurd to say it should not. Supposing every State adopted a system of State insurance, according to this exception each State would be able to adopt a different method, so long as it kept within its own boundaries, and you might have five different Systems of insurance outside the general law.

Mr. ISAACS:
Is that not States rights?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
No; because you start with the proposition that general insurance laws must be the same throughout the colonies.

Mr. SYMON:
The object of this, I understand, is to exercise a federal control over any State undertaking the business of insurance outside its own boundaries. I agree, and most people will too, that if a State enters upon a commercial undertaking it should have no privileges and exemptions from which ordinary individuals are not free; but the language used here seems to be open to the criticism of Mr. Higgins.

Mr. WISE:
By keeping it in you give special privileges within its boundaries.

Mr. SYMON:
To that I do not object. If South Australia chooses to establish a System of State insurance, I do not see why she should not within her own limits. It affects her own subjects only, and we should diminish the rights of self-government if we decided otherwise; but if South Australia opens agencies in Victoria, then the federal law should be able to say, "If South Australia chooses to enter into commercial rivalry with those companies outside her own territory, she should be subject to the conditions imposed in other countries." I think that is the extent to which this provision was intended to go.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
It seems tome that these words:
Including State insurance extending beyond the limits of the State concerned ought to be, in the sense in which they they were inserted-

Mr. HIGGINS:
Struck out.

Mr. SYMON:
No; retained. But I doubt with Mr. Higgins whether they exactly and clearly give effect to that sense. I suggest some verbal modification such as the following:
Including any business of State insurance extending its operations beyond the limits of the State adopting it.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Hear, hear. That would be better.

Mr. SYMON:
The words:
State concerned are a little ambiguous.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I agree thoroughly in principle with Mr. Symon as to his intentions, but I would suggest that what is wanted here is an excluding phrase, and not an including phrase. Insurance covers all kinds of insurance. You want an excepting phrase. "Insurance" will be the general expression, and then will follow:
Except State insurance confined to the limits of the particular State.

Mr. SYMON:
That is the better way.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Put it this way:
Excluding State insurance within the State limits.

Mr. GLYNN:
We ought to be careful as to how we restrict the operations of State insurance. In 1869 New Zealand State insurance was established, and now, as a matter of fact, a very large business is carried on by the Government of New Zealand beyond the limits of that colony. According to the statistics of 1891, the position of New Zealand State Insurance in Australia was second only to that of the Australian Mutual Provident Society.

Mr. FRASER:
The New Zealand Government do not go beyond their own limits.

Mr. GLYNN:
They do. Policies are taken up elsewhere. And we ought to be careful how we attempt to confine the business of the New Zealand State insurance to that colony, because Australian insurance companies do large business in New Zealand, and the New Zealand Government may retaliate by excluding them. In 1891, out of 56,000 policies in force in New Zealand, the Government held 29,256, and the Australian Mutual Provident 16,761. If you impose a federal law, restricting the operation of State insurance without the limits of that State-

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is not intended. The intention is to have the federal law only to apply to insurance which is general over the colonies.

Mr. GLYNN:
You can impose a restriction upon New Zealand in carrying on business within the limits of the federal power.

Mr. O’CONNOR:
Why should New Zealand State insurance be in any different position from the insurance of any company?

Mr. GLYNN:
The present law extends to New Zealand State insurance. If you impose a special law upon State insurance, the result will be that New Zealand will probably impose a company law in New Zealand.

Mr. FRASER:
I do not think, notwithstanding what Mr. Glynn says, that the New Zealand Government Insurance department is doing any business outside of New Zealand, with the exception of receiving premiums.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Only that their policyholders travel.

Mr. DEAKIN:
They only receive the premiums here.

Mr. FRASER:
If a policy-holder goes to Kamtschatka, of course the premiums will be paid to the department all the same.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Is that near Oodnadatta?

Mr. FRASER:
Yes, I suppose. I think it would be grossly unfair to allow a State to extend its operations in life or any other insurances beyond its own limits. A department might be as rotten as possible, and carry on a huge business at great risk, and nobody would be able to control it. I think it is the duty of the Federal Parliament to make a law for the whole Commonwealth, giving a State power to establish an insurance department within its own borders; but to give a department the liberty of going outside its borders would be as absurd a thing as could be allowed.
Mr. WALKER:
    I would like to move:
    That all the words after "insurance" be deleted.

The CHAIRMAN:
    You cannot do that. An amendment has been made by Mr. Higgins.
Mr. HIGGINS:
    I do not want to embarrass Mr. Walker if he has an amendment which ought to be discussed, but I cannot see at present how my amendment may fit with his. My idea is this: That the Federal Parliament should be allowed to deal with all insurance matters, with only one limitation. I would refrain from dealing with State insurance in the colony establishing it, but if that colony extends its operations to other colonies, I do not see why it should not be treated like an ordinary company.

The CHAIRMAN:
    As a matter of procedure, Mr. Walker wishes to make no exceptions at all. He therefore proposes to strike out all the words after "insurance."
Mr. HIGGINS:
    Of course, if it will help him to have the question discussed, so long as it is understood that my amendment is to be submitted, I am quite agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN:
    I would point out that you cannot do that afterwards.
Mr. HIGGINS:
    Well, I must press it then.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
    I might point out that those who are desirous of striking out the words might do so without proposing that some other words be inserted. It would then leave a blank to be afterwards filled.
Mr. HIGGINS:
    I agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN:
    Mr. Higgins proposes to strike out the word "including," with the view of inserting something else.
Mr. FRASER:
    I do not quite understand what this will lead us to.
It will lead to a blank which the Committee mayor not fill up.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I understand that if the word "including" is struck out Mr. Higgins will afterwards move to insert:
Excluding State insurance within State limits.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Then if you propose to put in the words, that means striking out the lot.

Mr. FRASER:
I am more in favor of striking out the whole lot.

HON. MEMBERS:
Then vote against it.

Mr. FRASER:
I am anxious that others should do so as well as myself.

HON. MEMBERS:
We will.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think my friend is under a misapprehension as to this. I am limiting insurance matters for the Federal Parliament to have control over. I propose to exclude certain matters from federal control. The expression then will be to the effect that the Federal Parliament is to have power to make laws for insurance, but it is not to have power to make laws as to insurance effected within the limits of a colony by that colony. Then I think that my friend will be in favor of my view that the word "excluded" ought to be inserted.

Mr. WALKER:
I am sufficiently old-fashioned to consider that insurance is a business, and I therefore want law to apply to all insurance companies, whether State insurance companies or otherwise. I intend to vote against any amendment.

Amendment-striking out all words after "insurance"-agreed to.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I now move:
To insert "excluding State insurance not extending beyond the limits of that State."
Amendment agreed to; sub-section, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Now I want to add as a sub-clause the words:
Industrial disputes extending beyond the limits of any one State.
It seems to me that having just dealt with insurance, extending through the various colonies, and having very recently dealt with banking, &c., this is the right place to add the words mentioned. Of course the object is to enable the Federal Parliament, if it think fit, to-create Courts of Conciliation and Arbitration, but I do not want to ask members of this Convention to approach the matter and say that there should be Courts of Conciliation or Arbitration. We cannot tell what is in futurity, and I want simply to give the Federal Parliament a power to establish these courts if it think fit. Therefore there will have to be an incidental alteration in the judicature part of the Bill, so as to enable the Federal Parliament to create a court for the purpose. It may be said, "Leave the industrial disputes to the States"; but it is well known that these disputes are not confined in their evils to any one State If there is a shipping dispute in Sydney it is sure to be felt in Melbourne; if there is a coal dispute in Newcastle it is sure to be felt at Korumburra. Any one State is unable to cope with the difficulty. If it should hereafter be found expedient to have a Court of Conciliation and Arbitration, it must be a Federal Court which can extend its power over the whole Federation. As Australia is so isolated from the other countries of the world by sea, it would be eminently apt to have a Federal Court of Conciliation and Arbitration for the purposes of Australia. I shall therefore move the addition of the sub-clause I have read.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I hope we will give some power to the Federal Parliament to legislate in matters of this kind. It is a question in which I have taken some interest. When first I attempted to deal with it I thought that for the purpose of making any effectual provision on the subject federal legislation was necessary on account of the extent of the disputes which occurred in industrial matters, and upon which local legislation, confined to provincial limits, is not competent to deal. The opinion I affirmed is borne out by a variety of cases. If you had federal legislation dealing with this matter, you could establish courts which would exercise a wider jurisdiction and command greater respect and confidence than can be hoped for under any system of provincial legislation. Something has been done here-perhaps not as much as we would wish—and in New Zealand; and I was pleased to notice from the remarks of the hon. the Premier of that colony, Mr. Seddon, that he calculated that through the efforts of the tribunals and the officials appointed under legislation he has been able to carry, as much as a million pounds sterling has been saved to the colony of which he is the chief executive officer. I do not think we can over-estimate the importance of a matter of this sort. We at great pains provided tribunals dealing with disputes between individuals, but the magnitude of the issues involved in an industrial dispute like the shearers' strike, the maritime strike, or the Broken Hill strike, seemed to exceed altogether the whole interests involved in the individual differences to which I have called attention. I would like my hon. friend Mr. Higgins to have moved his amendment in a somewhat larger form, and make it a subsection which would read:

Conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes.

I think for a variety of reasons that this is preferable. It would be larger, and give more extended and effectual power to the Federal Parliament to deal with the question. As long as the prin-

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Would it include the settlement of strikes and disputes in hospitals-I mean federal hospitals? (Laughter.)

Mr. KINGSTON:
It would give power to look into matters of that sort if the Federal Parliament thought that its attention could be wisely directed to them. On questions of that sort a provincial government has been capable of dealing with some of these matters. Still, as regards the greater matter of industrial disputes, I do not think that anyone who has noted what has taken place during the last few years can come to any other conclusion than that we should be acting wisely in giving the Federal Parliament the greatest power to legislate as they may think fit under the circumstances.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It seems to me that we must decide whether we will give this power to the Federal Government or leave it to the States. The object of Federation is, while federating on common matters, not to interfere with the industrial and local life of the States. This is a proposition which goes a step too far, as you are giving a distinct power to override the States legislation. Is the power simply to be exercised with the consent of the States, or is it to be an overriding power.

Mr. KINGSTON:
It is a power which the Federal Parliament may exercise.

An HON. MEMBER:
If they make any law it will override any local law.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Only where it is inconsistent.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I have no legal knowledge to guide me, but it seems to me that everything that we put among these sub-sections is practically a power which necessarily overrides every other power, and therefore there is no doubt that while in some trade disputes their ramifications extend throughout the different colonies, still they are to a great extent local matters of dispute.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It will only apply where the dispute extends outside the limits of one colony.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Here again I am met by my want of legal knowledge; but it seems to me that it is a difficult thing for the Federal Government to interfere, even where the ramifications of the disputes extend beyond the limits of a colony, without the consent of the States. I think there are sufficient powers in this Bill to enable some conjunction of interests between the Federal Government and the States in matters of this kind being effected; but I do not think that there should be any power included in this Bill which will so interfere with the local industrial life of any State as practically to dictate to the State with regard to trade disputes.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I confess I do not understand the clause, nor do I see what it means. Industrial dispute extending beyond the limits of one colony are the words used, but how can that happen?

Mr. HOWE:
A maritime strike affects the whole national life.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
It does not extend beyond the limits of a State. The dispute is complete in itself in each State. Because there is the same dispute in other colonies, it does not create a dispute extending beyond the limits of the State. Each dispute is a dispute complete in itself in each State, and each State will have power to deal with it. Such a provision I think will be a fertile source of dispute. As far as the words are concerned, they appear to be simply meaningless, and I cannot conceive any dispute which in itself can extend beyond the limits of the State.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
How about a dispute with the masters in one State and the men in another, as in the shipping trade?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is not a dispute extending beyond the State. It may be a very difficult thing to work out, but if it is to be done at all-and I can see great difficulty in doing anything with it, because it will be extending the limits of the Commonwealth legislation to a most dangerous degree, which I think all the colonies will not be prepared to accede to-it will be a departure from the proposition that there must be a formula in which you can give the jurisdiction. These words, I submit, will not do it, because the dispute will be a dispute in the State alone, and will not extend beyond it.

Mr. HOWE:
I rise, as one of the laymen, in fear and trembling to give my opinion against those of the legal luminaries here. A maritime dispute may affect the life of the nation. We have before seen the whole commerce paralysed by these disputes, and if we give the telegraphic departments to the federal authority why not give them authority to settle a national dispute which is endangering the commercial enterprise and industrial life of the whole community. I am with Mr. McMillan on that point, and if these words will not accomplish their object I want Sir John Downer to find words that will.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I am entirely with my hon. and learned friend Mr. Higgins in the amendment he has moved so far as he has indicated his purpose. I had the pleasure in 1891 of supporting the Premier of South Australia when he made a similar proposition. It is a cause in which he has taken a continuous and active interest ever since. Some of the difficulties which confront Sir John Downer confront me, although I see the problem from another point of view. This sub-section would give concurrent federal power in dealing with industrial disputes when they extend beyond the borders of a single State. The granting of such a power is desirable, properly belonging to a Federal Government, because the disputes may be extended over large areas, and if they are to be dealt with as a whole they must be dealt with by the Federal Parliament. Concurrent legislative power here differs from the concurrent power usually given in other respects in this Bill. A dispute might arise in South Australia, where there is a law now on its Statute-book

An HON. MEMBER:
So it ought to.
Mr. DEAKIN:

Yes; but it will be difficult to determine the moment of overflow even if you can determine the point of overflow. We can scarcely say it there is to be a law in each State that the federal law must not differ from some, if not from all, of these. Consequently it will be a curious problem in relation to penalties and observances for those concerned to know the moment when they have passed from under the dominion of the State law to the dominion of the federal law. That is the great difficulty to settle. Although I am prepared to support the motion of the hon. member, I see grave difficulties in this proposal which is to retain the State law and federal law upon the same question as both may have to be applied in times of emergency and urgency. If you had merely left power to the State to legislate on industrial questions until the Commonwealth Legislature intervened, then the situation would be comparatively simple. But I know that neither of my hon. and learned friends desires that. They both desire to retain for their Several States for all time the privilege of controlling industrial disputes within their own borders. But then they are confronted with the difficulties to which I have referred, and upon which I would desire the Drafting Committee to throw some light so as to enable a determination to be come to. As to the time difficulty, I suppose it could be determined by proclamation of the Federal Parliament that a particular industrial dispute had ceased to be a State dispute, and had become federal. But the hon. member wants to obtain more than that. He wants, if possible, to graft a federal law upon the State law in such a way that the federal law should only be applied where the State law cannot be applied. If South Australia and Victoria had each a law enabling them to deal with a dispute, it might be advisable that each State should deal with it. It might be better that the dispute on the Victorian side should be dealt with according to the Victorian law, and that it should be dealt with on the South Australian side according to the South Australian law. But where the States altogether find themselves unable to cope with an intercolonial struggle, it seems to be highly desirable that there should be provision for federal action. I hope the hon. gentlemen will indicate to the Drafting Committee how they are going to distinguish between those two separate spheres of action.

Mr. FRASER:

This proposed provision will be adding another difficulty, and the worst of all. Suppose we pass a clause giving the federal authority power to settle disputes in a certain way, we will override the local law. The law of the colony may be quite different, or there may be no law at all. Therefore you must get the consent of the State to assimilate its local law with the federal law before you can effect your purpose. You load the Federal Constitution enormously by adding difficulties like these. All that is necessary is to give the Federal Parliament authority to deal with it as best it can when it is constituted.

Mr. KINGSTON:
That is all we are asking.

Mr. FRASER:
If that is really all, I have misunderstood the purpose of the amendment. I want to be clear. I understand if you pass this amendment it would override the present local law.

Mr. SYMON:
So it will.

Mr. KINGSTON:
It will not.

Mr. FRASER:
I am beginning to learn upon whom I can rely, and I am prepared to take my friend Mr. Symon's opinion as conclusive. Leave well alone. Let the Federal Parliament deal with it. It represents the whole of the people.

Mr. KINGSTON:
That is what we propose to do.

Mr. FRASER:
I would go any length in the direction of conciliation; but we may do a great deal of harm by overloading the Federal Constitution. This was not in the 1891 Bill, and I hope Mr. Higgins will not insist on his amendment now.

Mr. WISE:
It would not be fair to criticise the language of this amendment too closely, but I entirely agree with the observations that have been made by Sir John Downer and Mr. Deakin, that the amendment as now drawn is very unsatisfactory. The language is either too large or too limited. In one sense it is hard to say that any industrial dispute is a dispute outside the limits of the colony. I agree with Sir John Downer that it is impossible to say when any dispute extends outside the limits of a colony, because a dispute is always in one colony although it may be going on in every colony. In another sense every dispute extends outside the limits of a colony.

An HON. MEMBER: Indirectly.
Mr. WISE:
Sometimes, and sometimes directly. I rose rather to call attention to another aspect of the question. If the effect of the amendment is really to provide for the possible establishment of a Federal Court of Conciliation, I am at one with that object; but the essential part of the language used in the amendment - I am not criticising casual expressions-indicates a much wider object, which would turn this power into a weapon of very great danger. It would, I think, deprive those concerned in these industrial disputes, whether as masters or employés, of one of their greatest safeguards. There is no matter which the industrial population of Australia would more desire to confine to the local Parliaments, where they can make their influence upon members felt, than matters affecting industrial disputes. To give the Federal Parliament power to make laws affecting industrial disputes gives them authority to regulate by penalties every detail of the industrial life of every trade in the colonies.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Hear, hear.

Mr. WISE:
Surely that cannot be desired or intended. There is no matter in which varied local development it; more necessary or desirable to a State than the development of its industrial conditions, and the industrial conditions in every part of this continent in years to come may, and probably will, very largely develop.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Will you not trust the Federal Parliament with the same powers as the States?

Mr. WISE:
Will the working classes of this country be prepared to surrender the right of local self-government over industrial disputes?

Mr. SYMON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is not my question. Will not the Federal Parliament be equally to be trusted as the States

Mr. WISE:
I do not think the Federal Parliament or any centralised authority will be as competent as a local authority to deal with the necessary local conditions of trade.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:
This is not local.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

What is not?

Mr. WISE:

If these States develop, especially if the different colonies become split up, as many of us hope and anticipate they will, we may have one State with a very stringent law against what is now termed "blacklegging"; we may have another State, with very stringent laws in the interests of the employers, and of an altogether different kind. Is the Federal Parliament to have the power of overriding either class of laws at the dictation of persons in quite other parts of the continent, who know nothing of the local and industrial conditions which gave rise to that development in that part? I strongly oppose the proposal.

Mr. SYMON:

I think Mr. Higgins will feel that his amendment, as proposed, will not exactly give effect to his views on this subject.

Mr. HIGGINS:

If my hon. friend will allow me, I think I can save time by explaining that I do not adhere to the exact form of words of my amendment. I thought it better to have the question raised in substance by the ordinary popular phraseology, but I have been met on every side by small points as to whether this or that ought to be accepted. As long as it is decided that the Federal Parliament is to have power to make legislation with regard to industrial disputes, provided they extend over more than one colony, I have no objection to have these words improved. I however, find it difficult to improve them myself on the spur of the moment, but the task of deciding exactly when there is overflow of a dispute from one colony to another will fall upon the shoulders of the Federal Parliament and not upon us. It is very difficult to tell exactly when night ends and day begins, or when high tide ceases and low tide begins. But, admitting all these difficulties, I think we ought not to deprive the Federal Parliament in such manner, in such time as it thinks fit to deal with widespread industrial disputes. I do not think we ought to deprive it absolutely for all time. Unless there is some clause of this sort put in, the Federal Parliament will be absolutely incompetent to deal with it.

Mr. WISE:

If a clause were put in, the Federal Parliament would have power to fix a uniform rate of wages all through Australia in any particular trade.

Mr. HIGGINS:

If that is so, and if the hon. member has great confidence in the popular character of this Parliament
Mr. WISE:
   I prefer local authority.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   If the hon. member has confidence in the popular character of this Parliament, I do not see that there is much to fear of a uniform rate of wage being fixed below what it ought to be.
Mr. WISE:
   Suppose they take the Victorian standard. How will our workmen like that?
Mr. HIGGINS:
   I do ask hon. members on this matter to meet me in substance. Are they in favor of power being given to the Federal Parliament to establish Courts of Conciliation and Arbitration?
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
   No.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   That is a fair issue, and I hope we shall meet on a fair issue. I hope that we shall not be put in fear by the criticisms of Sir John Downer, who has pointed out with legal acumen that it there in a dispute you must have two to quarrel. You might have 100 men in the shipping trade in Sydney and 100 in Melbourne quarrelling with the same company, and they might say they would not work for a certain wage. Let the Federal Parliament deal with such a matter. Sir John Downer says it is impossible for the Federal Parliament to define what is an intercolonial labor dispute. Surely we are not here to haggle over quibbles. Suppose an industrial dispute is confined to New South Wales. I meet that at once by saying that I do not propose to deal with a dispute like that; but when a dispute is so widespread that a State cannot possibly deal with it, let the Commonwealth deal with it.
Mr. SYMON:
   My hon. friend interposed his speech as a kind of parenthesis to the speech which I had begun: but I take up the story where I left it off.
Mr. WISE:
   I call attention to the state of the House.

The CHAIRMAN:
   According to the Standing Orders I must report it to the President.
Mr. WISE:
   I withdraw it then.
You cannot withdraw it.

After the matter had been reported to the President, the Committee was re-constituted.

Mr. SYMON:

I was about to say that I hope in the very few observations I shall make on this amendment proposed by Mr. Higgins, I shall not do so in the spirit of that minor criticism to which be alluded, because I do not think myself that it is possible to exaggerate the importance of the subject. I do not think that my hon. friend said one word too much in referring to the difficulties and to the widespread influence of these industrial disputes when they arise. Nor do I think he and other speakers who followed him exaggerated one particle when they alluded to the very grave and really calamitous evils which follow in the train of many of these industrial disputes. But the difficulty I feel, whilst conceding these principles, is that first of all pointed out with so much force by my hon. friend Mr. Deakin, and secondly those others pointed out with force by my hon. friend Mr. Wise. The substance of the amendment, putting aside the language of it altogether, is that the Federal Parliament is to be given unrestricted power of legislation in respect of industrial disputes, where those industrial disputes overflow, or exercise an influence beyond the limit of a particular State. Now, venture to say, first of all, that an industrial dispute is really a matter of local concern. In its essence and in its origin it is a matter of local concern. And, undoubtedly, if there is one thing more than another which ought to be preserved to the individual States it is the power of dealing-by means of conciliation, or by means of any other method that can be adopted-with those terrible evils which sometimes flow from these disputes, without interference, by the federal authority. That seems to me to be an unquestionable principle, and we ought not to give to the Federal Government the right to interfere with the self-government of a State in this respect. Then if we did give it that power, just think of what it involves. It would not be limited to the establishment of a court or tribunal of arbitration or conciliation. If it is to be limited to empowering the federal authority to establish tribunals of arbitration that is one thing, but I am not dealing now with the language of the amendment, which-as Mr. Higgins himself admits- is not very apt, but I am dealing with the substance of it, which confers on the federal authority power to legislate in every way on industrial disputes. That would involve-as my hon. friend Mr. Wise pointed out in a question which he addressed to Mr. Higgins-the settlement of a uniform rate of wages applicable to the whole five or six, or it may be, if the continent was further divided into provinces, of the seven or eight different provinces of the group where local conditions might govern and differentiate the rate of wages in the different trades. For instance, if you have regard to trade in a tropical part of Australia, you could scarcely apply the same rates of wages as you would in South Australia. Then, again, you will be handing over to the federal authority a two-edged sword, which might operate with equal danger in the interests of the workmen as in the interests of the employers. It would entirely depend upon a majority of the members in the Federal Parliament as to which way that power would be exercised. If the majority were leaning in one direction legislation might go that way; if a majority were leaning in another direction the legislation might be directed accordingly. -It would be impossible to see the end of it, and I submit that it is outside the federal ambit for us to legislate in this direction. The point taken by Mr. Deakin appears to me to be insuperable. How is this court to act? Are its functions to be limited to a particular State where the industrial dispute occurs, or is it to travel outside the Commonwealth? There is no limitation. The way you get the test would be by asking whether it escapes beyond the limits of the particular colony affected by the trouble or whether it remains within.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The Commonwealth has no jurisdiction beyond its own limits.

Mr. SYMON:
The test my hon. friend would put would be as to the jurisdiction of this tribunal, and as to whether the dispute affected some country outside its own particular limits. Then if you treat it federally, how is the jurisdiction to be exercised as to the conditions of one colony to another? There can be no industrial dispute in New South Wales or Victoria without the ramifications of the organisations of employers or employes being utilised for the purpose of putting pressure-I am dealing with the matter now with perfect moderation and treating it as applicable to both sides-to bear in one colony or the other, to affect one side or the other. That would create intense bitterness in the particular colony affected. That might happen if there was to be a strike or a lockout. I assure you I look at this thing in a most disinterested manner. You might have such a state of tension developing as would produce something like a civil war. We know the difficulties which arise in consequence of the sense of injustice which may be generated either on one side or the other, and the side which feels the injustice may consider it beyond the relief of any court; and if you give power, whether by means of a court of arbitration or of conciliation, you are importing into the Federation an element which may result in bitterness between the federal authority and the States when you should promote at all hazards harmony. Above all things let us preserve to each State its own jurisdiction in this matter; let us promote conciliation, but do not let us impose upon the federal authorities anything which by any possibility will create occasions of difference between the State and the federal authorities. In regard to taking over the railways, I thought the Inter-States Commission would be unadvisable as compared with taking over the railway altogether, because it might give occasion for bitterness, and the difficulty was insurmountable. There, however, I do not think the difficulties are insuperable. As Mr. Kingston has pointed out, we have had efforts made that should be commended with the view of dealing in a harmonious and conciliatory spirit with difficulties which we all deplore and which, unfortunately, often arise. I say: leave them to the States to deal with, because it is a matter of home jurisdiction, or home rule. If we have a dispute in any trade it is a local matter, but if for some reason, or in pursuance of some particular policy, it is extended into some other State let us ask the other State to deal with it as a matter of home jurisdiction.

Mr. DEAKIN:
You would not object to the Federal Government dealing with it as far as two colonies are concerned?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
They can surrender it to the Federal Government.

Mr. SYMON:
I am only dealing with the position as it now stands. If two States find themselves overwhelmed and unable to deal locally with any Industrial dispute, and desire the aid of the federal authority, I should be prepared to consider any scheme with that object, and if it were workable to give it every favorable consideration, but I doubt very much whether such a scheme would be found to be practicable.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There are some disputes which cannot be dealt with by one State alone.

Mr. SYMON:
I think that every dispute is local to the State in which it originates.

Mr. BARTON:
If they arise in a particular State they must be determined by the laws of the place where the contract was made.

Mr. SYMON:
No doubt. There is another point I wish the hon. member to consider. You are not going to interfere with the laws of the States dealing with contracts. If the Federal Parliament deals with disputes it will be hampered by the varying laws relating to master and servant which may exist in the different colonies. If an industrial dispute in several colonies were treated as one it could not be dealt with as an ordinary dispute, but the laws of each separate State would have to be taken into consideration. Now that would be, I think-so it strikes my mind at present-a difficulty hard to be overcome. At any rate, what I am dealing with is rather the general proposition that is put in this amendment, not the language of it, but the general proposition, and if you are to give the Federal Parliament power to deal, as my honorable friend puts it, with industrial disputes-I will leave out the subsequent verbiage-I for one cannot see where the limit of its operation will come in. You give it a weapon which might be used according to the dominant majority in the Federal Parliament for the moment in a way we would not like. You are intensifying the possibilities of bitterness-that is to say, if they avail themselves of this power-without seeing the benefit that is likely to arise. I desire to emphasise the observation made by Mr. Deakin. It would be impossible to say at what time the overflow into the adjoining State begins and ends. If the Federal Parliament is to decide-

Mr. FRASER:
The judiciary.

Mr. SYMON:
I do not think it would be the judiciary. We lawyers do pour oil on troubled waters, but that is rather in a tribunal of contest than a tribunal of conciliation. This matter should be in a separate enactment dealing with this by itself. I ask my hon. friend whether it would not be better to withdraw this and frame an independent section dealing with it from the point of view of arbitration. The difficulties, and I may say dangers seem to me very much greater than any possible gain, and we should be unable to impose restrictions on the Federal Parliament which would do justice to both sides and all parties concerned in any dispute.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I sympathise with the remark which fell from Mr. Fraser, who suggested that a matter of this sort might come under the Federal Judiciary. We do not ask so much as that. We do not ask that there should be, as part of the Constitution, an elaborate and highly-paid court permanently constituted for the purpose of contesting to the bitter end any issues placed before it by a noble and much-maligned profession. We do, however, ask that in the interests of the State the Federal Parliament should be clothed with the authority, if it sees fit, to call into existence tribunals which will prevent industrial disputes of the highest magnitude, which will conciliate the parties at the earliest possible stage, preventing huge loss to the parties concerned and even greater loss to the community. I contrast two things—an elaborate creation for people who would cut one another's throats and whose interests may be a matter of purely trivial personal concern, and the attempted denial to a Legislature the power to create a tribunal which would prevent huge industrial troubles and injury to State and Commonwealth. Where we contrast the treatment of the less important matters, it seems to me from a public point of view, with the more important matter now suggested, we have little cause for encouragement. I would like to say to Mr. Fraser that all we are asking is that the Federal Parliament should have power to deal with this matter if it sees fit.

Mr. FRASER:
   And override the local Parliament.

Mr. KINGSTON:
   Yes.

Mr. FRASER:
   There is a dispute at once.

Mr. KINGSTON:
   So there maybe over other clauses we have passed, small and large, as regards the appointment of a postmaster, or the granting of extra postal services, for instance.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   And Customs officers.

Mr. KINGSTON:
   Yes. No longer shall they be under control of the State. Take another matter—marriage and divorce. No longer shall the relations between a man and his wife be within the State control. Laws may be made on the subject by the State, but the Federal Parliament, if it pleases, shall have power to override them. The laws of marriage and divorce are proposed to be handed over to the Federal Parliament by this particular clause, and just in the same way with the power of creating tribunals for industrial conciliation. Until the Federal Parliament acts the State's powers are absolutely untouched. So with reference to this matter of industrial conciliation. On a matter of this sort we hear a great deal about the time strike. Are they to be absolutely powerless, to stand by and see the industrial machinery of Australia thrown out of gear without the possibility of rendering help to prevent trouble. It seems to me that if the Federal Parliament is to be trusted, surely it may be trusted in a matter of this sort. We are not confining ourselves to the question of the precise terms of the amendment proposed by Mr. Higgins. What I understand the hon. member desires is this: that the Federal Parliament if it sees fit should have the right to legislate for the purpose of calling into existence a tribunal which shall endeavor to prevent industrial strife by trying to reconcile the disputing parties, and if necessary making an award, declaring on which side the right may be. I would like to tell Mr. Deakin, having had to some extent to consider this question in connection with a Bill we now have on our Statute book, that I do not think there will be the slightest trouble as regards defining where the State should deal with the question and where the Commonwealth should step in. In our local Parliament we were faced by the question, to some extent because it was necessary to consider whether we should not have two sorts of boards, one to deal with matters of general concern for the whole provinces State board-and the others local boards to be constituted in a variety of ways in different localities to deal with matters simply of local concern. We made provision accordingly, the State board dealing with troubles of general application, and the local boards confining themselves to matters of local importance. A provision was made that when a dispute arose the question of which board it should be referred to should be decided by the chief industrial officer, the President of the State Board of Conciliation. He would investigate matters and on his recommendation a proclamation would be issued by the Governor, thus doing away with the possibility of clashing, declaring which tribunal should deal with the matter. So it seems, in regard to the suggested clashing as to the matters which should be dealt with by the Federal Board, or the State Boards, this can be avoided by giving the chief federal industrial officer power to look into the matter and report to the Executive Council if necessary, and on his decision the proclamation could be issued. If it is a matter of provincial concern it could be remitted to the State authorities, either to be dealt with there by the State board or a local board as thought fit, and if the matter is of general interest to the Commonwealth it could be sent to the federal board. Further, any future developments might be provided for by a power to the chief industrial officer to further investigate the matter, and, if necessary, remove it from the jurisdiction of the board to which it was originally sent, and send it to the board of the Commonwealth or vice versa.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is for the Federal Parliament to arrange.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Just so. As regards the question of form, I would prefer, if Mr. Higgins thought well, instead of taking the power in the limited form he suggests, to make it read:

Conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes.

If a provision of that sort were in the Bill, what it would accomplish would be this: power would be given to the Federal Parliament-whom we are told on so many occasions we ought to trust, because it will be constituted of the very best men in Australia-if it thought fit, to legislate on those matters, and I do not think that in the interest of either State or Commonwealth a power of this sort should be denied.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOX:

I have the very highest possible opinion of the influence for good of boards of conciliation in matters of industrial dispute, in spite of the fact that in South Australia, I believe, they have been a positive failure, But what we have to consider in framing this Constitutional Bill is that we shall not load the Federal Parliament with duties and obligations which can be better fulfilled by the local Parliaments of the several States. I think if we introduce anything of this sort into our Constitution it can only have the effect of increasing rather than diminishing the difficulties in regard to these industrial disputes. It would have the effect possibly of interfering with trades unionism in some of the colonies, and of interfering largely with both employer and employees; and I think that should be in every possible way avoided if we can possibly do so. There is no occasion for our committing to the Federal Parliament or Government any matter whatever that the States can better deal with. These industrial matters, I think, are distinctly more within the province of the States to deal with than of the Federal Parliament.

The Chairman had put the question and declared it carried, when Mr. Higgins, who had been sitting on the opposite side of the House, crossed over to his place and began to speak.

The CHAIRMAN:

I have put it.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Mr. Higgins was on his feet.

Mr. BARTON:

He has already Spoken twice.

The CHAIRMAN:

Four times.

Mr. HIGGINS:

If the Leader of the House thinks that my delay in speaking in consequence of having to pass over from one side of the House to the other should preclude me from speaking now, I shall sit down.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not wish to curtail the hon. member's right to speak. I was only thinking of the time at the disposal of the Convention. I have myself a great deal to say about this question, but as a member desiring to save time I have refrained from speaking, and I do not want to see a member who has already made one or two speeches on it make another after the question has been put.

The CHAIRMAN:
Strictly speaking the question has been put.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Many of us did not cry out when you put it, so as to give Mr. Higgins a chance to speak.

The CHAIRMAN:
If there is a general wish that the hon. member should speak, he may do so.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not want to enforce my objection if the hon. member is particularly desirous of speaking.

The CHAIRMAN:
I shall put the question again. For the question say "Aye"?

Mr. HIGGINS:
About three minutes have been wasted by that little difficulty. This matter is very simple. The principal objection to this proposal is from Mr. Symon, who says all industrial disputes are local. If they are, then there certainly can be no harm done in providing for cases where the disputes are not local. But to speak of all industrial disputes being local is absurd in the face of the fact that our maritime disputes spread through all our ports.

Mr. SYMON:
Their origin is local.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is not a question of origin. Everything has an origin; even a river "extends," and I am speaking of things extending to a larger area. I say, therefore, if it is admitted that all industrial disputes are not confined to a particular colony, it is a mere question of detail to ascertain when a dispute commenced within a colony and where it extended beyond that colony. I am prepared to accept the suggestion of my hon. friend the President to have before the words "industrial disputes," these words:
"Conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of" industrial disputes.

I would prefer, personally, to have the words end there, but in order to obviate the fear which some members entertain that this may enable the Federal Parliament to interfere in disputes purely local, I think it better to put in the words I had originally at the end of my previous amendment:

Extending beyond the limits of any one State.

The whole thing would then read:

Conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes extending beyond the limits of any one State.

If it is in order, I ask leave to withdraw the first amendment and I move this.

Leave given.

Sub-section 22: Foreign corporation and trading corporations formed in any State or part of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
With regard to this clause, we have already given power to deal with the question of banking, and we are now giving power to deal with foreign corporations and trading corporations. I fail to see why we should limit the sub-section to trading corporations. There are financial institutions which are not banking institutions, and if we are going to give the Federal Parliament power to legislate with regard to banking, and with regard to trading corporations, we should go a step further and give it power also to legislate with regard to financial institutions.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not know.

Sir GEORGE TURNER Building societies.

Mr. BARTON:
I think the present wording of the sub-section covers as nearly as may be the intentions of the Constitutional Committee, and really for the amendment, which is a desirable amend

Mr. ISAACS:
I suggested the word for temporary consideration.

Mr. BARTON:
I Should like to be favored with any arguments in favor of the suggestion.

Mr. DEAKIN:
We recently passed a law in our colony which placed a strict limitation on the meaning of the word "banks," excluding from it particular kinds of financial companies which had hitherto been called banks, or treated as banks.

Mr. BARTON:
You mean that kind of financial company that went down so often.

Mr. DEAKIN:
We distinguish them from banks on the one hand and trading corporations on the other. We want to include all limited companies because the class of companies I am speaking of deal with lands and with deposits, and they require to be carefully regulated.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You want to include everything outside private companies.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Especially land and finance companies which caused so much litigation in the past.

Mr. SYMON:

In the original Act corporations simply are mentioned. Why this difference?

Mr. BARTON:

The reason of making the difference was this: It having been seen that the word "corporations," as it existed, covered municipal corporations, the term was changed to "trade corporations."

Mr. SYMON:

Why not simply use the term "company"? If you use that word it will be well enough understood.

Mr. BARTON:

Why not adhere to "corporation"? That governs everything under the Companies Act.

Mr. SYMON:

Why not leave out the word "trading"?

Mr. BARTON:

Or add the word "financial"?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I move:

To insert the word "financial" before "corporation."

Mr. BARTON:

Would it not be better to make it thus:

Any trading or financial Corporation.

So as to separate that branch from foreign corporations?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I will consent to that and move:

To insert after trading "the words or financial."

Mr. WISE:
I was not on the Constitutional Committee, and when I heard that this clause had been moved by Mr. Gordon, I took it for a joke.

Mr. GORDON:
I have an amendment to move. Will you allow me to do so?

Mr. WISE:
Certainly; but I would suggest that it should be struck out altogether.

Mr. GORDON:
I move:
To strike out the words "navigable streams and insert instead thereof the words "navigation on the Rivers Murray, Darling, and Murrumbidgee."

Mr. REID:
What have you to do with the Darling?

Mr. GORDON:
I propose to show the hon. member. I am responsible for this subsection, and so far from it being a joke, I consider it a very serious and important intercolonial matter.

Mr. REID:
You will want the Blue Mountains next.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They will want Reid next, and that will be worse.

Mr. GORDON:
I recognised that the clause as it stood was somewhat too large in its scope, and as I have no desire to cloud the real issue by raising points about which there may be some needless debate, I have moved this amendment in view of keeping the discussion absolutely to the point about which there must be discussion. So far from the question being a joke, as some hon. members from New South Wales would like to make it appear-

Mr. WISE:
I am sorry it is not.

Mr. GORDON:
I regard it as a most serious intercolonial question, and one which must be settled if we have Federation. It would be fatal to leave this question unsettled. Apart altogether from the question of Federation, it is almost disgraceful to the colonies concerned, except South Australia, who has always been willing to confer, that this matter has not yet been made the subject of convention. Of course I shall have to answer the question put by Mr. Reid and Mr. Carruthers, "What have you to do with our rivers?" That is founded on the theory that the Government of the country through which a river flows is the sole owner of the river, even though its course is continued through other countries, but that theory of law has been exploded for many years past. It is not true that these rivers belong to either South Australia,
New South Wales, or Victoria. They are the property of all the people of these colonies. I say that the contention that the country through which a river runs is necessarily the owner of the waters has been for years exploded in all civilised countries. It is a contention which will not stand examination, and "is opposed to the progress and destiny of mankind."
These are not my own words. I am using the words of an eminent writer, and when my hon. friends raise this narrow argument, and seek to lock up to one colony a great national fertiliser and channel of communication, they are raising a contention which has long ago been discredited. As a matter of fact, there are scarcely two civilised countries in the world which have not made conventions about the rivers running through their territories, even, although, as in Europe, these countries are armed to the teeth against each other. There is no single river in Europe with respect to which a convention has not been made.
Mr. BARTON:
Does that refer to their use for navigation,?
Mr. GORDON:
I am prepared, to meet the catchy argument of my friend, and will deal with it later on. Pitt Cobbott, Professor of Law in the University of Sydney, after stating the argument of strict law, says:
But though in strict law each State could thus appropriate and regulate waters wholly within its territory, the use and navigation of most of the more important navigable rivers that traverse the territory of different States, have now come to be generally regulated by treaty or convention.
I have other authorities here by the dozen.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We will take your word for it,
Mr. GORDON:
This writer summarises the law with regard to rivers flowing in or between two or more countries. In the abstract, he says it river is the property of the country through which it flows, although the boundaries of it belong to both. He proceeds to show that this strict law is in violation of natural justice, and that conventions made in Europe, and now recognised as the public law of the world, have restored that natural right to its proper position. He speaks, you will see, both of the use and the navigation of rivers then he goes on:
So far as European rivers go it was provided as early as 1814 and 1815 by the treaties of Paris and Vienna: (1) That the navigation of rivers bordering on or passing through several States should be free to their mouths. (2) That, subject to this freedom of navigation, States might exercise rights of sovereignty over rivers traversing their territories, but storehouses and stations for transhipment were not to be established, nor were those already in existence to be preserved, except so far as they was of use for navigation or commerce. (3) That navigation dues should be independent of the quality and nature of goods transported, and should not exceed the maximum fixed in June, 1815. (4) That the police regulations relating to navigation should be uniform and should not be changed by one State without the consent of others.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
The Darling does not go through one State.

Mr. REID:
The waters of the Murray do.

Mr. GORDON:
The waters of the Murray are fed by those of the Darling and Murrumbidgee, and they all flow into the sea in South Australia.

Mr. REID:
Do not you know that the great rivers in Europe running through different States are fed by hundreds of rivers over which there is no general control?

Mr. GORDON:
There are no tributaries of such importance and value as the Darling and Murrumbidgee. I will trouble hon. members with a little history which will show how acute is this question, how necessary it is that it should be settled, and how absurd it would be to enter into Federation unless it is settled. In 1887 a Commission was appointed by South Australia to deal with the question of the navigation and riparian rights of the River Murray. My hon. friend Mr. Glynn was a most valuable member of this Commission, and the Hon. Mr. Howe was another member. I will read a few extracts from the progress report of the Commission. This recital is necessary to show how acute the position has become.

In order to a mutual recognition of their several riparian rights, from time to time it has been proposed, and even urged, that a conference should take place between authorised representatives of South Australia, New South Wales, and Victoria; but up to the present no such conference has been made possible, though the Victorian Government has expressed itself as distinctly favorable to such an arrangement.

In order to a clear perception of the aspects of the question as it now stands, your Commission present the following summary of the facts:—

Correspondence respecting the Murray dates back many years; and prior to May, 1886, this suggestion for a conference on riparian rights and Murray improvements was regarded by the three Governments as desirable, the Victorian Government being understood to promise that no such conference should be held without a proper representation of this province. It, however, transpired that in May, 1886, a conference - or something of that nature - took place in Melbourne between commissioners of New South Wales and Victoria, at which resolutions were pawed relating to and apportioning the waters of the Murray in a way that threatened serious consequences to the trade and riparian rights of South Australia, although this province was not represented at such conference, nor had been invited to send any representative. The then Premier, Sir John Downer, made a strong protest against this procedure, which elicited explanations and a disavowal of any attempt to interfere with the riparian rights of South Australia. This Government pointed out the extreme desirability of holding at once a formal conference for dealing with the whole matter, at which each of the three colonies should be represented. The Victorian Government at once assented, and suggested that such conference should be held at Adelaide. Subsequently this Royal Commission was appointed, and the Governments of the other colonies were apprised of the fact. At one of the earliest meetings of the Commission a resolution was passed requesting this Government to earnestly press the importance of such conference being at once hold, and the Hon. the Premier (Mr. Playford) in April, 1889, forwarded to the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria a review of the correspondence, and strongly urged an agreement for the proposed conference. The Victorian Government once more expressed its acquiescence, but no reply was received from the Government of New South Wales. On the 20th May direct application was made to Sir Henry Parkes for a reply, and a month later that hon. gentleman promised to write fully in a few days. No communication, however, was received; and on the 23rd July he was informed that this Government still awaited his promised reply. The hon. gentleman then intimated by telegram that the question was receiving special consideration, and that he would communicate the views of his Government in relation to it in a short time. A very long period, however, elapsed without this direct assurance being fulfilled, and once again was forwarded a respectful request that the promised reply should be sent. In response to this Sir Henry Parkes definitely replied on the 6th of September, 1869, stating that he would write in the course of a week. No communication was received, and on the 18th of that month the Honorable the Premier (Dr. Cockburn) found it necessary to intimate to Sir Henry that this Government still awaited his reply. From that date no reply, an promised, to the communications mentioned has been received from the Government of New South Wales, though the letter, dated 6th March, 1890, set forth in Appendix J, mentioning the appointment of Mr. McKinney, and stating the position taken by the Government of New South Wales on the question of riparian rights, was received by the Premier, and has been forwarded to the Commission. It will, from, the foregoing, be perceived that this Commission has been unable to perform one-and perhaps the most important-of the duties assigned to it by your Excellency, all endeavors to bring about an intercolonial conference on riparian rights having been foiled by the unresponsiveness of the New South Wales Government.

These representations in themselves might not have amounted to very much, but they were supported by the most, startling facts which came to the knowledge of South Australia.

Mr. REID:

One of the startling facts was that we had been snagging the River Darling at our own expense for your benefit.

Mr. GORDON:

I shall give information which will show that my hon. friend is not quite fair. A conference was held with representatives from New South Wales and Victoria without any invitation being extended to South Australia, though it had been understood that she would be invited.

Mr. REID:

Why go in to ancient history? Let the thing be settled on its merits.

Mr. GORDON:

We know the hon. member would be glad to shirk it.

Mr. REID:

I do not want to.

Mr. GORDON:

If he will promise to support me I will not go on.

Mr. REID:

The history of ten years ago does not affect the merits of your amendment.

Mr. GORDON:

It shows the necessity for the amendment. It is not as if we did not know the intention of New South Wales regarding the use of the waters of these rivers. We have heard in the most pronounced way that they intend to do an injustice. It is a most acute dispute, and we ought to settle it now when we are making an intercolonial agreement.

Mr. REID:

If my hon. friend will permit me to interrupt him, I should like to say a word about one point on which I do not wish to be misunderstood. So far as any waters, no matter where they come from, between two States are concerned, I think that the two colonies should have control over the navigation. My point is with reference to a river the whole course of which is in one colony. I agree with the hon. member as to the Murray, which flows between Victoria and New South Wales and then into South Australia, that its navigation should be controlled by the two colonies between which it runs, but as to rivers which are only in one colony, such as the Yarra, the Clarence, the Derwent, the Tamar, or the Darling, that colony should have the control over them.

Mr. GORDON:

I have quoted from the report of the River Murray Waters Commission a statement showing how ineffectual their efforts were to procure even a conference upon this question with the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria, and that not only were their efforts in this direction unsuccessful, but that after a promise by Victoria and New South Wales that a conference would be held to which South Australia would be invited, a conference was held behind the back of South Australia, between commissioners representing the colonies of New South Wales on the one hand and Victoria on the other. I would like very briefly to show what those gentlemen said was right to be done with the waters of the River Murray. I shall not go into details, but I shall give one item of figures. They proposed to divert 244,500,000,000 cubic feet of water per annum into Victoria and New South Wales. These were no vague assumptions; they were definite proposals to use the water of the river to that extent, and the result would have been, according to the calculations of our Conservator of Water, that the River Murray within South Australian boundaries would be dry in such years as 1884-5, and reduced to the average of summer level during the whole of a year as 1886. It is almost incredible that those gentlemen should have coolly proposed behind the back of South Australia, schemes of irrigation which would have resulted in the River Murray, within the territory of South Australia, becoming dry. At that conference it was resolved:

That the waters of the tributaries of the Lower Murray, except such proportion thereof as shall under the direction of the trust be required as compensation water for the main river, may be diverted and used by the respective colonies through which they flow.

The whole of the waters of the Upper Murray and its tributaries, and the whole of the waters of the Lower Murray, shall be deemed to be the common property of the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria, and, subject to the reservation of such compensation water as the trust may from time to time determine, each of the said colonies shall have the right to take and divert one-half of such water at such point on points as may, with the sanction of the trustee be fixed on as most suitable for the requirements of such colony: Provided always that the totals of the quantities diverted by the two colonies when the whole surplus (after providing compensation water as above) is utilised shall be equal. Those resolutions have, however, not been confirmed by the respective Governments.

Thus these gentlemen calmly decided, as I have said, to divide up between New South Wales and Victoria what would be in dry years practically the whole of the waters of the River Murray.

Mr. BARTON:
To what extent have those reports been acted upon?

Mr. GORDON:
I am stating only the fact that these commissioners made such suggestions. Proposals made by such a body must be seriously considered.

Mr. BARTON:
They are no menace to you.

Mr. GORDON:
They are, indeed, a permanent menace to us. These were officers appointed by Governments to consider this matter. They were scientists and experts; they suggested definite schemes; and, notwithstanding the fact that long after this, and repeatedly after this, representation has been made to the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria-especially-to the Government of New South Wales-these Governments have never given the slightest intimation that they do not consider these schemes proper to be carried out, or that they do not intend to carry them out.

Mr. BARTON:
In what year were those recommendations made?

Mr. GORDON:
I do not know that I can give the year just at this moment; the report is not dated.

Mr. BARTON:
I think somewhere between 1887 and 1890.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It was in 1886.

Mr. BARTON:
It has not been touched since.
Mr. GORDON:

The hon. member seems to know little of what is going on in his own colony. I know from gentlemen in New South Wales that these schemes are still being recommended. Who can say we are not justified at being alarmed at the menacing suggestions which will leave the Murray absolutely dry within our boundary? Mr. Jones, our Conservator of Water, who states that fact with the grave reticence of the cautious official mind, concludes as follows:

When it is remembered that at what is known as summer level in the river between the boundary and Morgan the discharge of the river is about 120,000 cubic feet per minute, the assumption that from 20,000 to 30,000 cubic feet per minute for five months in the year is an equitable "compensation water" is, to say the least, startling. Such a discharge would reduce the depth at many parts of the river to less than one foot. It would thus appear that the irrigation schemes proposed or under consideration in New South Wales and Victoria are designed to take all the waters of the Murray and Murrumbidgee in low years, except a very small quantity passed down which will probably be insufficient for navigation, and keep the river in South Australia throughout most of the year down to or below what is known as summer level.

That is the conclusion of an entirely unprejudiced and highly competent authority. Of course I admit that these schemes have not yet been acted upon, but they have never been repudiated. It has been represented to the New South Wales and Victorian Governments how South Australia was threatened by these schemes, and anxious and urgent requests for conferences have been since then made, but absolutely without satisfaction. Here are a few words from the progress report of the Commission a year after the report which I previously quoted:

It is with very great regret that your Commissioners have to report that upon the most important part of the inquiry—that relating to a settlement between the colonies interested of the question of mutual riparian rights—they have been utterly unable to make the slightest advance, despite their strenuous efforts. The aim has been to obtain, in amicable conference with authorised representatives of the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria, an equitable agreement as a foundation for legislative action in each colony. For several years past this Government has sought in every possible way to promote this arrangement, and your Commissioners have been anxious to assist in securing so desirable a result. But the numerous communications forwarded by the South Australian Government pressing the subject upon the attention of the Governments of the other colonies have unhappily wholly failed in effecting their purpose. The Government of New South Wales, your Commissioners are led to understand, has with official terseness barely acknowledged the communications, and where fuller replies have been promised has omitted to send them. The Royal Commission has been dissolved, and the conservation of the whole river system, your Commissioners are informed, has been placed in the hands of one Government official, The Government of Victoria

Your Commissioners would lay stress upon the fact that whilst the Government and this Commission have been endeavoring to obtain a conference on this important subject large irrigation schemes in the other colonies have been energetically pushed forward, and your Commissioners are justified in expressing their strong conviction that the results of the withdrawal of such large supplies of water from the national highway—the Murray—must prove highly detrimental to the interests of this province.

And then Mr. Glynn adds a note to that report which so concisely summarises the legal position that I cannot refrain from quoting it.

The water rights of the province to be preserved depend a good deal upon the extent of their recognition by the other colonies. What they are according to the principle of international and private law—the analogy of which should guide us in defining them—may be clearly stated, but the mere statement of the colonies' respective rights in the river, unless made the basis of an agreement for the mutual exercise and respect of them, would be of little use. There is no tribunal to which a colony, on breach of its water rights, can appeal for a remedy, so that the rights are legally ineffective.

Mr. Glynn goes on to state what really should be made the subject of this arbitration, viz.:—

1) Generally, the mutual rights and equities of the riparian colonies in and to the River Murray and its tributaries:

2) Particularly, the minimum quantity of compensation water that should be allowed to flow into or pass by each colony for each month of the year, both before and after the construction of locks, or other conservation works on the rivers:

3) Subject to clause 2, the proportions in which New South Wales and Victoria should share for irrigation purposes the waters of the river flowing between their territories

That is a fair statement of the points by one who has carefully studied this question. These considerations were urged again and again on the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria, and finally, thoroughly disheartened by all their efforts, the Commission threw up the work in despair.

Mr. BARTON:
What date was that Commission?

Mr. GORDON:
The final report was in 1890, and it was only ordered to be printed by the House of Assembly in 1894.

Mr. BARTON:
Was that after the general report which my hon. friend has spoken about?

Mr. GORDON:
Yes; I am quoting the reports in their order. Between the times of all these reports the Commissioners never failed to urge on the other colonies the necessity for a settlement of this question. They knew, of course, what the result would be to the waters of the Lower Murray if these irrigation schemes were carried out, and they persisted in their representations to the other colonies. But in 1890, as I have said, utterly disheartened by their failure to secure even the courtesy of a reply from New South Wales and the courtesy of anything more than a mere "put off" from Victoria, the Commissioners resigned their commission. They refer to their unsuccessful attempts to secure a conference and say:

As we considered such a conference indispensable to a proper inquiry into, and report upon, the question submitted to us, we endeavored, as previously mentioned, to impress upon the Governments of the other interested colonies the expediency of holding one, but, in the case of New South Wales, without success. The disinclination of that colony to meet us has led to the consideration of the proposal for a conference being deferred from time to time; and we cannot see that the last communication, dated October 27th, 1892, received by this Government from the Honorable the Premier of New South Wales, Sir G. R. Dibbs, K.C.M.G. (a copy of which is enclosed), contains such an assurance that the question of a conference is being seriously considered as would justify us in postponing the presentation of this our final report.

Mr. BARTON:
Is that in the report of 1890?

Mr. GORDON:
I am not quite sure about that. It was printed in 1894.

Mr. BARTON:
It was made in 1890, you said?

Mr. GORDON:
This last report is evidently in 1893, but it is not dated.

Mr. GLYNN:
The report was presented in June, 1890.

Mr. BARTON:
If there is anything from Sir George Dibbs in it he could have only acted for the Government between January and March, 1889.

Mr. GORDON:
There is a letter appended from Sir George Dibbs, dated Colonial Secretary's Office, 1892, so that this report must have been presented in 1893.

Mr. GLYNN:
They suspended proceedings for a while and presented their final report after.

Mr. GORDON:
The report refers to the unsatisfactory letter from Sir George Dibbs, dated October, 1892, and continues:

Your Commissioners, under these circumstances, feeling that they have exhausted all the means at their command to bring about a satisfactory intercolonial agreement in respect of the waters of the River Murray, beg to be relieved of any further responsibility.

There is thus ample evidence that since 1887 the colony of South Australia has been entreating the other colonies to adopt that procedure which every other civilised European nation has adopted.

Mr. BARTON:
You are dealing with the rights of navigation.

Mr. GORDON:
Yes, and the use of the water also.

Mr. BARTON:
In the quotation you read from Mr. Pitt Cobbett's book were you not dealing only with navigable streams?

Mr. GORDON:
The quotation refers to the navigation of the streams and their use. The contention that only navigation and not also the use of the water should be the subject of convention is a mere lawyer's quibble, as I shall be able to show.

Mr. BARTON:
That, perhaps, will not be distasteful to the hon. member.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The use of streams in Europe differs from their use in a country like this.

Mr. GORDON:
The navigation and use of these rivers is a question of international law. I am speaking from memory now, but I think it is either Kent or Wolseley who says that it is considered discreditable if any civilised nation refuses a convention on such a matter of mutual interest as this. Hon. members who have not been privy to the circumstances of this dispute, who have no personal interest in it, or are not influenced by any local bias—I am afraid some hon. members are blind to the justice of the case—will say: I am sure that this matter must be settled if we are to have Federation. It would be fatuous to enter upon an agreement, unless some settlement of the question is arrived at or some tribunal appointed to settle it. I think I have clearly shown that there is nothing in the argument that the other colonies—South Australia, for instance—has no right to make any interference with the river which has its rise in New South Wales and flows into South Australia. The conventions of all civilised nations show that a mutuality of property exists with regard to rivers which flow through more countries than one. I have been met by Mr. Barton with the argument that I can find instances of mutual arrangement with regard to navigation, but none with reference to irrigation. That, as I replied, can only be characterised as a mere lawyer's quibble.

Mr. BARTON:

That is to say that you keep a river open to take another man's water out of it.

Mr. GORDON:

In the treaty of Washington—

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

What has that got to do with the Murrumbidgee?

Mr. GORDON:

I hope to educate the non. member a little on this question. The following is an article of the treaty of Washington:

The Government of Her Britannic Majesty engages to urge upon the Government of the Dominion of Canada to secure to the citizens of the United States the use of the Welland, St. Lawrence, and other canals in the Dominion on terms of equality with the inhabitants of the Dominion.

What the precise terms were the treaty does not say. But they were terms of equality, and the treaty supports my contention that we have examples of conventions giving equality of interests to the countries through which waters flow-equality of use. Probably the reason why I am unable to adduce any other instance besides this of a mutual arrangement for irrigation is this, that the great volume of American and European rivers renders any arrangement on the question unnecessary. They are rivers down which large volumes of water flow permanently, and there is more than enough water for all. But with us the question of the use of the water is vital, absolutely vital, and I contend that the claim of a mutual use for... irrigation is founded on the same principles of natural justice that promotes and procures a convention with regard to a mutual arrangement for navigation and improvement. The Danube Convention includes arrangements for the mutual improvement of the river, as well as for navigation. What principles does this Convention rest on with regard to rivers running through contiguous territory? I contend it is this: that running as they do through great lengths of the earth's surface and being necessary to all the countries through which they run, they equally belong to all. I contend that principle cannot be disputed. On the same principle rents the riparian rights of individuals. It is as just to say that one riparian owner can stop the stream from flowing to the owner lower down as to say that one nation can take the water from a stream which is running to a nation lower down. There is no difference. Can any lawyer contest that proposition?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Several.

Mr. GORDON:
The principle upon which this contention rests is, I think absolutely sound, that no nation has any right to divert or seriously diminish the flow of a river running to another nation. The only difference is that individuals are in a forum where that principle can be enforced, whereas the final reference, if nations cannot agree, is the arbitrament of war. But the principle of justice remains the same.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
What if it can be shown that we have doubled the resources of the river?

Mr. GORDON:
If the hon. member can show that, I will say Victoria has laid the Australian continent under a load of obligation. Still, if she has conferred such a benefit upon her neighbors, it is one in which they are entitled to share.

Mr. SYMON:
We only want as much water as will maintain the navigability of the river.

Mr. GORDON:
We want a little more. We make a claim for a fair proportion of the water of the Murray for irrigation.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
We have doubled the quantity.

Mr. GORDON:
If the hon. member's colony has done that it is, as I say, one more addition to the obligation under which the neighboring colonies lie to the colony of Victoria. That, however, is another question.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
You want all the advantage and want not to pay for it.

Mr. GORDON:
I am answering the argument that no case can be shown, except the one I have quoted, for a mutual right to waters for irrigation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That case does not show it.

Mr. GORDON:
I think it shows that such an agreement was recommended by the Treaty of Washington.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That is only for purposes of navigation.

Mr. GORDON:
It stipulates for equality of use of the waters. My contention is that navigation and irrigation stand on the same footing as regards the justice of the case. In Europe, the necessity for joint control in the interests of all is generally expressed to be confined to the improvement and navigation of the rivers; but with us the necessity exists, in addition, for the control of the actual consumption of the water in the interests of all. The principle which calls for this joint control to enjoy the rivers equally obtains with even greater force in regard to irrigation than to navigation. Our rivers are not only the means of communication between the colonies through which they run, but they are the great fertilisers for their joint benefit. It is not simply a question of having them as the means of communication and navigation; they are the only great fertilisers of the continent, and to us it is a question almost of life and death.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
How are you going to divide them?

Mr. GORDON:
I would leave it to the Commonwealth Parliament to say what is fair between the colonies. To continue the absolutely unfair and intolerable position which exists at present is opposed to the practice of all civilised nations. I appeal to Sir Edward Braddon, who knows a great deal of international law and the customs of most countries, whether the present position can be described as anything but discreditable. The rivers are the natural highways and fertilisers of the whole of that part of the continent through which they run—the channels of God. To stop them at their fountain-heads, or to exhaust them during any part of their course, while they have other colonies to serve, is to act not only against the comity which should prevail between colonies under the same Crown, but to act also against natural justice. You cannot honestly refit a claim to do this upon possession or upon any narrow words in the New South Wales Constitution or upon the abstract law. If the members of this Convention are prepared to trust our mutual interests to the Federal Parliament they are acting in the true spirit of Federation. What have members to be afraid of? Either they know that they are holding that to which they have no right under the comity which should govern these colonies, or they are afraid to trust the federal authority. We have had eloquent appeals from some members to trust the Federal Parliament, to act in a federal spirit. Let them shew that they have not been mere empty words. To leave the matter as it now stands, to leave South Australia threatened by injustice is nothing less than monstrous. I am not binding myself to the exact words of this motion. All I want to see is fair play between the colonies and to break up the intolerable position which at present exists.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Had you not better confine your motion to the Murray?

Mr. GORDON:

I am always willing to accept suggestions, and I know the hon. member will do what is fair.

Mr. REID:

We have had the use of the Murray for a good many years.

Mr. GORDON:

The hon. member was not here when I read the correspondence, which showed the intentions of New, South Wales and Victoria. We are threatened specifically with the menace that we shall not have the water very long.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

The hon. member has quoted authorities to show what is the international law on this subject, but unfortunately in Australia we have a state of affairs which is perhaps without parallel in any other country in the world. Our rivers are of a totally different character to the rivers in any known portion of the world, and we shall have, to at large extent, to make a law unto ourselves. The moment we attempt to apply the old world laws of riparian rights we begin to deal with our rivers in a way that will like them useless. There-in the old world-they have rivers which flow all the year round, large and permanent streams. Here they have no continual flow, with the exception perhaps of the Murray. They are only running streams, four or five months during the year. Take the Darling and the Murrumbidgee, they do not flow all the year round; with regard to the other rivers, the waters in them are absolutely necessary to be used in conjunction with the land if we are to have any settlement on the land. If you decide that these great rivers of Australia shall be conserved for navigation purposes, you may bid goodbye to putting the people on the land. Every sup of water will be required for the thirsty soil, to enable people to occupy the land profitably. I maintain that in the course of less than perhaps a hundred years we shall find that these rivers aimed at in this resolution—the two tributaries of the Murray—will be for portions of the year absolutely drained dry. It will be more profitable to the people than to have them as streams for ships to ply up and down. What is the use of navigation on these rivers if you have the people driven away from settlement, and you have no goods to carry? As far as New South Wales is concerned, this matter cannot be approached from any sentimental point of view, and it cannot be governed by precedents derived from old countries of the world where the conditions are not similar to ours. There are 140,000,000 of acres of land in New South Wales which depends for its waters on the tributaries of these streams. That 140,000,000 acres to-day sustain practically a mere handful of people, and it is by the development of that great and rich territory that we hope to have the teeming population of the future. But if you shut out from the people the source of the water supply you shut off the possibilities of development in the future. So far as we are concerned, and I think that all reasonable men will admit it, land communication can be just as profitably carried on as water communication, and navigation is a matter of secondary importance. The matter of importance is to get the people settled, to increase the productiveness of the soil by promoting increased population, not by increasing the facilities for navigation, but by increasing the facilities for closer settlement. But the moment you hinder us from using the water that moment you hinder that settlement. We have got to trust to our own State, not to Federation, for the moment we hand over the control of these rivers we bring in an authority which will not be so much in sympathy with the aims and desires of the New South Wales people to settle its people on the land as the local authority, and we shall never persuade the people of New South Wales to accept a Federation which hands over the great arteries of our colony to another power, even though that power be one in the authority and influence of which we share. I have had many instances during the last three years which would perhaps open the eyes of those who look at this matter from a mere theoretical standpoint. Only a few days ago, on one of the tributaries of the Murray, the billabong running from Albury down to Jerilderie for several miles was dry. The only water practically was that conserved by the construction of a dam. A time of drought was on. Stock were perishing from want of water. The settlers below the dam, just like the South Australians here, were crying out that the flow of water was impeded. They set to work and cut the dam to let the water out, and in twenty-four hours there was no water in the billabong. What they thought would benefit them was a suicidal policy. It takes an immense body of water before you can satisfy the soil itself, and the tributaries, if not dammed up would, in many parts of the year, contain no water at all. I can give another instance. There is another tributary of the Darling—the Warrego. For six months of the year it is practically a dry bed, and you can drive across it.

Mr. FRASER:
There is the Paroo, too.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
On the Warrego water is conserved in flood-time by dams. These dams have been cut, and the water has disappeared in the course of a few hours. It is not the water that is used by the New South Wales people, by the stock-owners or the settlers, which deprives the Murray of its flow, but that water which mysteriously but surely percolates into the hidden streams of Australia, that water which disappears by evaporation, and which no amount of legislation can retain. That is the water, which if we could retain it, would be employed to supply the requirements of humanity, and which would be used for navigation. The hon. member's aim is manifest. It is to give to South Australia not riparian rights for the use of the water for fertilising the soil, but to give her rights so that she may carry on navigation, so that she may have an increased flow of trade. Well, we are not prepared, for the sake of seeing the trade of our colony go through South Australia, to inflict a death blow on every settlement on what we rightly consider to be perhaps the best land in our colony. We have looked that land up for twenty-eight years against any closer settlement, because we hoped during that period to devise some scheme by which we can so utilise the water that we can place men there in occupation of small holdings. We have at present the greatest expert of the British Empire, Colonel Home, engaged in reporting on some system of irrigation, and, notwithstanding all the objections that may be put to me, I say it will be a distinct boon to Australia-federated or not-if the supply of water in the Darling can be used by those occupying the land. There will be just as full benefit derived from that as would be derived if the water were left in the river. Again, if hon. members study the geography of New South Wales they will see that we have a number of lakes which are fed by the overflow of the Darling. If we choose to shut off the openings of these lakes we can diminish the supply of water in the Darling to such an extent as to render it only navigable for half the period that it is now navigable. A federal law may, by preventing the flow of water into these lakes during flood time, cause a greater flow for navigation purposes, but if we could enclose the entrance to these lakes a large area of country could be watered so as to carry half as many sheep again and produce half as much wool again as it does now. There is another instance on the Lachlan, where we constructed the Willandra weir. What was the result? In a district where it had been almost impossible to carry stock to any extent, without going to great expense in conserving water, we dammed the water back for 100 miles, and there has since been a permanent supply of water, and the country carries twice as many sheep as it did before. Increased settlement and increased production on those lands will benefit South Australia, because a great proportion of the traffic will go through the colony. Hon. members may think the amendment will, to some extent, minimise the difficulty, but it minimises the difficulty to this extent—that it concentrates the full force and effect of the sub-section on New South Wales; instead of having the right to interfere with the rivers of Tasmania and West Australia, it will confine the right to the rivers and their tributaries in Now South Wales, right to our Far North; to our New England waterways—the Namoi, the Gwydir, and the McIntyre—and all those rivers where the dams are absolutely essential to the settlement of the country. Federal legislation might be passed prohibiting any interference with the natural flow of the waters. This is a very far-reaching section, which, if passed, will in the future threaten the best interests of the great colony of New South Wales.
What does Mr. Gordon, with his double-barrelled amendment, propose? Not to have legislation merely to protect the people lower down the river Murray; but it is within the cognisance of this Committee that the hon. member has proposed that the Federal Government should undertake the work of cutting a deep water channel at the Murray mouth, so that large ships may come in and out of the Murray with freedom, and that if the Federal Parliament does not do this, authority may be given to the local Government to do it He knows that if the channel is cut, the water will flow away much more freely than before, and so be of no benefit to the settlers on the river, but all this is to be done for the benefit of the colony of South Australia only, so that traffic may flow through its territory. So far as Australia is concerned, the old-world law with regard to waterways w

Mr. MCMILLAN:
This happens to be a very wide subject, which might occupy us here for days. We have heard tonight a very able and exhaustive speech from the hon. member for South Australia-absolutely exhausting, I think, his side of the question. We have heard a speech from the Minister of Lands of New South Wales who has peculiar opportunities of knowing all about this question. Now, the question has been put by these two gentlemen in nearly all its aspects.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
It has not, indeed; we have something to say.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I should advise the hon. gentleman who proposed the amendment, if I might respectfully do so, to confine it entirely to the River Murray. In subsection 33 of the clause we are on now, there is opportunity given for a great deal of federal influence in many matters which cannot be decided by this Convention, and I look forward to the Federal Government as the chief negotiator in all these matters of difference between the different States.
But I do not think there is the slightest chance of a single vote being given by the representatives of New South Wales for the larger amendment of the hon. member. I think the question, as before us now, is as broadly and fully stated as it possibly can be, and I would respectfully ask, for the sake of our time, that we should get to a vote as soon as possible.

Mr. WISE:
Hear, hear. Divide.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I would not intrude in this discussion, which has practically been narrowed down to a discussion between New South Wales and South Australia, but for the fact that I happened to be the President of the Commission from Victoria which was concerned in the proposed Murray river treaty about which our friend Mr. Gordon has told us so much this evening. I may say that at the time that conference between the two Commissions-the one representing Victoria and the other New South Wales-was held, there had not been, to my knowledge, any previous intention to admit South Australia to it, nor, so far as I was aware at the time, had there been any expression of a desire on the part of South Australia to come into it. The reason why that conference was held between New South Wales and Victoria only was because it dealt with questions relating to the head waters of the Murray, which, so far as we knew, were of no direct interest except to those two colonies. New South Wales has special legal claims to the bed of the Murray, which complicate, though they by no means settle, the question of the riparian rights upon that stream, and it was partly because of this complication that this conference was held. It is perfectly true that the conference arrived at an agreement as to the relative rights of diversion, but it never was contemplated that within the life of living men, or for a long time to come, anything more than a fraction of those quantities ever could or would be diverted. It was simply laid down as a maximum in order, if possible, to establish an equality of benefits as between the two colonies. If the province of South Australia was then omitted it was for the reasons I have given. Afterwards when a request was made by South Australia for a conference we at once cordially and freely assented, and without any reserve, but we felt that it was useless to hold any such conference unless New South Wales was also represented, a colony quite as interested as ourselves. Now, the colony of New South Wales and its various Governments did not see their way to consent to that meeting. They did not ignore the subject. To my knowledge they spent a large portion of the time that intervened in making exhaustive enquiries about the water supply of the Murray basin and what quantity could be used or diverted. They caused researches to be made which had not up till then been made, and without which no determination could be arrived at. Mr. Gordon has stated his case fully and clearly, but he will admit that if there were cast upon him the task of determining how these waters should be apportioned the task would be almost beyond the capacity of man. The position is as Mr. Carruthers has clearly stated. First of all, if it be a legal issue, this is practically a question of international law, and though it may be the custom of adjoining nations in the old world, and also in the new, to agree to conferences in regard to the navigation or the use of the waters of rivers, I know of no power to coerce any self-governing colony into holding such a conference. I am not arguing against the reasonableness of the hon. member's claim, nor am I contending that New South Wales in this instance would not be acting a courteous part in agreeing to a conference. It seems to me highly desirable that some friendly enquiry into this matter and into the circumstances surrounding it should be entered upon.

Mr. GORDON:

I only want a tribunal to which it may be referred.

Mr. DEAKIN:

But if we have a tribunal we must have some general idea of the principles upon which the tribunal is to proceed to try the case. In this instance there is no basis upon which the Federal Parliament could proceed to decide it.

Mr. DOBSON:
Have you not said that international law could be applied?

Mr. DEAKIN:
No; I do not know of any international law that can deal with this question. I do not remember where it has enforced the purely private doctrine of riparian rights. But if there were any such reference in the old world experience I would go quite as far as my hon. friend Mr. Carruthers in saying that the principles of riparian law are no more applicable to this country than they are to the Western States of America. Almost the whole of the States of America have adopted the common law of England; but some of the Western States of America, where rivers like this are found, and where exactly the same circumstances of dearth exist as in the Murray basin—in such States as Colorado—they have expressly set aside the common law of England in order to get rid of the riparian law. They have felt that the riparian law of England was so absolutely opposed to every principle of public policy that they have set aside the common law of England rather than be entangled in its meshes.

Mr. DOBSON:
That is not the case here.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Did they not do it on terms that were fair to each other?

Mr. DEAKIN:
They did it in the constitution of a new State.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
They grabbed.

Mr. DEAKIN:
They colonised. The mother-country "grabbed" this country when she colonised it. But I am not speaking adversely to Mr. Gordon. I am merely showing the difficulties which surround this case. It is impossible to apply the principles of riparian law to the River Murray.

Mr. DOBSON:
Do not add to the difficulty, but get us out of it.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I am afraid I should require much more time than this Convention could allot me if I were even to offer an opinion on that subject. But I want to show Mr. Gordon the unwisdom of endeavoring to include in the Federal Constitution the settlement of a problem such as this: the acquirement, in point of fact, under this Constitution of a legal right where at present no legal right exists or is enforceable; and, inasmuch as this is the claim of one colony against another, it is a matter for a conference treaty or discussion between those countries, and not a matter that is ripe for reference to a federal authority. No doubt when the federal authority is established there will be a growth of the federal spirit which it; yet but in its germ, and under these circumstances the reasonable and proper application of the hon. member and his colleagues for a conference upon this question would probably be acceded to, and in my individual opinion ought to be acceded to. But I wish to point out the practical reason why riparian law could not be applied to the river Murray. That law, of course, requires that the waters should be allowed to pass undiminished in quantity and unimpaired in quality. This means that the only persons authorised to draw water from the River Murray, which is capable of being so materially reduced in certain seasons, would be the persons immediately situated at the mouth of that stream, and that practically the only irrigable portion of the Australian continent which is watered by that enormous river would be the low-lying lands surrounding the mouth of the Murray. It would be impossible to withdraw any large quantity of water such as Mr. Gordon has spoken of, and such as may be drawn from the waters or that stream on its remoter watersheds, without the probability in dry seasons of the general body of the river being seriously impaired. This would mean that in order to preserve riparian law the whole of the waters of the greatest river of the Australian continent—a river, whose waters might periodically be said to be almost worth their weight in gold, would be allowed to flow idly and uselessly to the sea for all time in order that the theoretical riparian rights of the dwellers near its mouth might be conserved. Surely that is an utterly unreasonable and untenable position.

Mr. BARTON:
And the ruin of the proprietors of the land through which the river runs.

Mr. DEAKIN:
No great benefit will accrue to the proprietors near the mouth of the river, and ruin to all the rest in some seasons. If then riparian law must be set aside other principles can be adopted. The hon. member recognises that there must be some general principles of fairness and equity discoverable in connection with this problem.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is all we ever asked for.

Mr. WISE:
Railways and rivers must be dealt with together.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I agree; as to the ownership of railways I have changed my views since I came to this Convention.

An HON. MEMBER:
It is not proposed to touch the railways.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Looked upon as highways the railways and rivers should be dealt with together, because one of the chief factors which helps to bring about differential rates is water carriage. If any part of the river, as the hon. member partly implies, though not entirely maintains, in to be retained for navigation only, that can only be done on terms of equity. Mr. Gordon must recognise that the matter is complicated in many ways. There is this fact: New South Wales has spent large sums of money, partly in conserving and partly in distributing its river waters, and also in improving their navigation, by means of which South Australia has benefited. Victoria has spent thousands of pounds in snagging the Murray, to the serious injury of her railway system, and South Australia has obtained practically the whole of the benefit of the improved navigation. The balance is not altogether on one side, as the hon. member seems to think. The two colonies concerned have done something—and, indeed, a good deal—by improving the navigation of the river and its tributaries, without displaying any selfish spirit.

Mr. GLYNN:

All the colonies have done something.

Mr. DEAKIN:

What South Australia has done, I am not in a position to say; but what she has done has been for her own benefit and the benefit of her railway system. I take it that, in the territory through which this magnificent river flows, there must be federal action, of a kind and upon a scale not contemplated as yet by any colony of this group. The absolute necessities of the drought-stricken inland districts will lead to expenditure upon it in the way of dams, locks, diversions and storages-undertakings which may equal that enormous expenditure which in the United States was incurred at the head of the waters of the Mississippi and Missouri. The Government of the United States has spent enormous sums in improving their navigable streams, and in the future in the basin of the Murray enormous sums will also be disbursed, but whether that will be spent for navigation I am not prepared to say. It might be found advisable in the future to have a joint scheme of navigation and irrigation whereby, while the traffic on the Murray was increased, along the banks of the streams you would have a quantity of produce raised which would move down, towards the South Australian border, until finally only a comparatively small proportion of that rainfall actually finds its way into the river. We have also located some places where there are great subterranean losses. Whether they can ever be checked I am unable to say. It is possible that in many parts of the basin some water could be withdrawn and used for irrigation, and yet a considerable proportion of that water would find its way back again into the bed of the river and swell the stream lower down. Until we know something of the physical facts relating to this enormous territory it would be premature in the extreme to attempt to define State rights to its waters. So I say to my friend Mr. Gordon that the very reasonable, proper, and legitimate claim of South Australia for federal action in this matter is one that must be met in the future and must be determined; but I urge him not to submit any premature resolutions. If he embodies his proposal in this draft Constitution it must afterwards be submitted to the people and Parliament of each colony. If he applies for a conference to fully investigate the subject he can also get that by the consent of the people and Government of New South Wales. The object he has in view can be obtained by him directly instead of by the indirect way he proposes, which may imperil Federation in New South Wales.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

We know we cannot get it as it is. They have always refused to do anything about it.

Mr. REID:

When was the last request?

Mr. DEAKIN:

As far as I know the present Government of New South Wales has never refused to confer on the subject, and the present Government of Victoria has never been asked to confer. If the present Government of South Australia wishes to enter what must be hereafter a great field of federal action, I believe I can say on behalf of the Government of Victoria, although I have not consulted the Premier, that they would probably cordially concur with the proposal to have a conference to see how far even a temporary arrangement can be made. We all know that the Government of New South Wales have obtained the services of a gentleman whom I have not had the pleasure of meeting personally, but whom I heard of during my trip to India seven or eight years ago as one of the most eminent authorities in the Indian Empire on irrigation—and that is the country where modern irrigation has been carried out on a greater scale than anywhere in the world. The New South Wales Government has not obtained the services of that gentleman for nothing, and he in his report on the water resources of the interior will probably indicate to that Government the extent to which it is advisable and possible to utilise river waters for irrigation, and if so how they will require to be controlled by storage and preservation. If so controlled, it may be possible to spare a sufficient quantity to furnish the compensation water required for rendering the greater part of the river as navigable as it is to-day.

Mr. GORDON:
It would be so short that the river would be below navigable point.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I know that is the opinion of Mr. Jones, but I know that the Engineer-in-Chief of Victoria does not concur. He says that the quantity in the Murray is larger than Mr. Jones calculated. I sympathise with the him member, and feel that the question must be jointly dealt with, and that as there is a comity of nations we must have a comity of colonies. No colony should appeal to its neighbors in vain for just and fair consideration. I adjure him to omit his proposal from the Constitution. There is no reason why some arrangement should not be made between the several colonies before this Constitution can be accepted. The work of collecting data must go on for some time before any colony can risk the loss of any of its rights and privileges-rights and privileges which mean life and subsistence to those inhabiting the arid interior of these colonies. Before the colonies can enter into any intercolonial agreement there must be a far more searching enquiry, and the accumulation of a great many more data than are at present amassed. Before any conference or committee could venture to arrive at a settlement of this great and vexed question-a question which must be settled, but which cannot be settled here-we must be much better acquainted than we are with the needs and possibilities of our vast arid area.

HON. MEMBERS:
Divide.

Mr. FRASER:
I am loth to waste time, and if there is a desire to take a division, I will sit down.

HON. MEMBERS:
Divide.

Mr. FRASER:
Then I will not speak.

Mr. GLYNN:
I am not going to be bluffed out of this matter. It is all very well for the members for New South Wales and Victoria to talk about shutting up the debate, after they have spoken, but this is a matter of extreme importance to South Australia, and of far more importance than many of the constitutional questions on which some members have spread themselves. Various efforts have been made to settle this question, and, I think, it is about time that we took legislative power to do so. The first effort was as far back as 1857, when South Australia and Victoria considered a joint scheme for maintaining the navigability of the River Murray. In 1863 there was a meeting held in Melbourne by the colonies interested, and the question of the riparian rights in connection with the Murray was discussed. South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales were represented, and this resolution was arrived at:

That in the opinion of this Conference the commerce, population, and wealth of Australia can be largely increased by rendering navigable and otherwise utilising the great rivers of the interior, such as the Murray, Edward, Murrumbidgee, and Darling, and that the obligation of carrying into effect the necessary works to accomplish these objects devolves primarily upon the respective Governments having jurisdiction over such rivers.

Then, again in 1887 two Commissions sat together, one from Victoria and another from New South Wales, and the result was communicated through the medium of the Press to South Australia. They then decided to divide between them the whole of the waters of the Murray as far as the South Australian boundary.

Mr. REID:
How long ago is that?
Mr. GLYNN:
In 1887.
Mr. REID:
And have all the waters been divided?
Mr. GLYNN:
It is all very well to talk like that, but schemes are projected which will materially affect the flow of the Murray. These Commissions met, and an effort was made by South Australia to hold a conference with these Commissions, so a Commission was appointed here in 1887. We formed a Commission in 1887, and at the moment our Commission was formed, New South Wales dissolved theirs. You have heard from Mr. Gordon of the efforts made during the sittings of our Commission to get an answer to our demands made on New South Wales. Our report was sent in, and immediately came a letter from Sir Henry Parkes claiming the whole of the waters of the Murray. I think he claimed that, according to the 14th Victoria Act, as subsequently amended, a grant was made to that colony of the waters of the Murray to the point where they entered South Australian territory, and he cautioned South Australia against diminishing the normal level of the river. We were not to interfere with the so-called paramount rights of New South Wales. Mr. Gordon simply asks that power might be given to settle this. Mr. Deakin asks its to wait until something can be done by compromise. I say the time is now, and it is of extreme importance to us. Let us see what was attempted in Victoria. Mr. Deakin, who is an excellent authority on this question, will remember there were schemes contemplated in Victoria which would practically exhaust the whole of the waters of the Murray.

HON. MEMBERS:

No.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Absurd.
Mr. GLYNN:
It is not absurd. I am dealing with a pamphlet published by Mr. Deakin, and in this he showed that the Cavour Canal in Italy had a capacity for irrigating two and a quarter million acres, and its discharge was considerably more than the Murray's. It was about 1,600,000 cubic feet per minute, while that of the Murray at navigation level was 356,000ft. per minute. The Victorian schemes that were contemplated were to irrigate more than 2,250,000 acres.

Mr. DEAKIN:
How much?
Mr. GLYNN:
The number of acres was considerably over 2,000,000. This is an undoubted fact, and I think the hon. member will agree with me. He will agree with me, too, that not more than 3 per cent, total waterfall on the Darling watershed ever reaches the sea.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I know nothing about the Darling.
Mr. GLYNN:
What has New South Wales spent in improving the navigation of the Darling?

Mr. REID:
A good deal.
Mr. GLYNN:
In improving the navigation of the Darling?
Mr. REID:
Yes; the Murray and Darling.

Mr. GLYNN:
According to the evidence taken in 1887, New South Wales had spent £100,000 on the Darling and Murrumbidgee, and we had spent about £57,000, so there is not a large difference.

Mr. REID:
Yours was all on yourself; ours was all on you.

Mr. GLYNN:
New South Wales is anxious to bluff us on this point, and you can see the reason for it. Mr. McKinney stated in 1889 - I will quote from his report:

Again the commissioners were in favor of constructing canals from the Murrumbidgee to irrigate two systems of 540,000 and 180,000 acres each, and stated that their engineer, Mr. McKinney, now at the head of the Water Conservation Department of New South Wales, proposed to dam back the waters of the Darling lakes, which feed the river when low. What this damming means may be seen from the statement that lake Menindie alone contributes "so materially to the volume of the river as to prolong by two or three months the period for which navigation is possible."

The fact is simply this, that the Darling overflows into Lake Menindie, and that you can, for an expenditure of about £100, dam up the inlet, and by keeping back this water for irrigation, the reflow into the Darling would be stopped. That is only one of the lakes with which the extensive scheme of New South Wales proposes to deal. Let me show what would be the effect upon Victoria if the scheme advocated by New South Wales is carried out. As I pointed out in 1891:

The New South Wales Commissioners regarded navigation as quite a secondary matter to irrigation. They only considered the possibility of maintaining a constant stream in connection with an extension of the Bourke railway to a lower point than Bourke, so as to direct to Sydney a considerable amount of trade which now goes to adjoining colonies. Though the river is admitted to be the natural highway of settlers on the Darling, who suffer great inconvenience and loss when the water is low, the interests of Sydney are regarded as paramount. . . . . The Commission says that Victoria in proceeding so rapidly with works for water conservation that "in all probability, within a few years from the present time, no quantity of water will reach the Murray, except in high floods, from the Victorian tributaries west of Albury, except the Ovens."

We find New South Wales complaining of the schemes contemplated in Victoria as being likely to interfere with New South Wales, and if I quote from Victorians we find complaints made on behalf of Victoria that if New South Wales goes in for her contemplated schemes Victoria would suffer as much as New South Wales. We in South Australia have also a reasonable cause to complain. Look at the position as regards South Australia. If the navigable depth of the river is not kept up it will practically extinguish our trade down the Murray to the South Australian railways. That trade goes on according to the navigable state of the river. I will give hon. members some figures to show how vital to our trade is the maintenance of the navigable depth of the Murray. In 1884 the imports to South Australia from New South Wales by way of the Murray were £785,000 in value, in 1885, when the river went down, they sank to £101,000 in value; in 1886, when there was an increase in the depth of the river, they were £571,000; and in 1888 again, when the river was low, the imports went down to £101,000. If you carry out even one-fifth of the schemes contemplated in the other colonies you will keep the river continually below the navigable depth, and by doing so you will practically rob South Australia of her trade—that is a very important standpoint.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Will you show how that is?

Mr. GLYNN:
I do not want to go at great length into this matter.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
It is not a fact.

Mr. GLYNN:
I will tell the hon. member that it is.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
So will I.

Mr. GLYNN:
The depth required to be kept in the river for the purpose of navigation is 4ft, I am speaking from the evidence of experts before the South Australian Commission.

Mr. FRASER:
Some boats can run at 2ft.

Mr. GLYNN:
The constant depth ought to be about 4ft.

Mr. FRASER:
Two feet three inches would do.

Mr. GLYNN:
There are some boats, no doubt, with a capacity of 2ft. 3in., but for the purpose of trade they should rely on steamers that have a draught of between 3ft. and 4ft. That is, at any rate, the effect of the evidence given by Mr. Landseer, who is a practical man, and knows more about it than any hon. member of this convention.

Mr. GORDON:
He is a large boat owner.

Mr. GLYNN:
I am taking an average, and I say if you do not allow for a depth of about 4ft., the use of navigation for the trade between these colonies will be gone. If you carry out one-fifth of the the schemes contemplated you will absorb more water every year than is required for the navigable depth of the river. At some times of the year you can even walk across the Murray at Overland Corner. Mr. Deakin has referred to riparian rights. I ask you are you going to settle this question from the point of international questions, or from the point of view of municipal rights. Mr. Deakin says that you must not touch the riparian question, because our conditions are new. Can it be said that the carrying out of extensive irrigation schemes would not interfere with the flow of the river. If you put State against State, and if you find that a State scheme of irrigation is likely to destroy the navigable depth, on what ground of international law and common sense can you refuse the just right or equity of one State given under the law of riparian rights? New South Wales says it owns the bed of the Murray. The reason the bed was ceded to New South Wales was to give her rights over offenders under the customs laws, and for no other reason. When the mid-channel was the extent of the limits of the riparian owners it was impossible to punish offenders against the Customs laws, because they could not tell in whose territorial jurisdiction the offence was committed. In drawing up the Constitution of New South Wales it was expressly provided that, for the purposes of Customs jurisdiction, the watercourse of the river would be considered to be in the territory of New South Wales. That was put in by the Imperial Parliament without any derogation of the right of the Victorians on the other side of the river. Further, I say, the right to the uninterrupted flow depends not on the ownership of the bed of the stream, but on the ownership of the banks.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. GLYNN:
That is a rule of law which requires no arguing. Members will see it is a matter of great interest to South Australia. If New South Wales carries out her schemes of irrigation and diverts the ordinary flow of the water, we are done so far as navigation is concerned. I think, as Mr. Wise has said, we should work the rivers in conjunction with our railways. It is a question which should be met with some breadth of grasp. It the rivers were taken over by the federal authority, a scheme could be brought about to lock the Darling and Murray, and the receipts could be pooled. I believe that is the scheme which should be adopted. It is a strong scheme to be presented now, and one not likely to be adopted, but we should give the Federal Parliament power to, as time goes on, deal effectively with this question.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I have listened with great interest to the debate on this matter. A little impatience has been shown by the representatives whose colonies are not interested in the question, but it is of great interest to South Australia. The speech of Mr. Carruthers really put the matter very much on the lines which I thought New South Wales would want. For many years we had some correspondence with New South Wales on the subject—it was mostly on my side, because they did not always reply—and we took a good deal of trouble to try and get some sort of understanding, but without any result. But now that I have heard Mr. Carruthers, I do think, if he represents the position which New South Wales takes in the matter, that I understand that position. He says first, that you cannot apply the laws which appertain to civilised nations in respect of navigable streams in Australia. He says he admits that by the comity of nations there is, in the countries where civilisation has made any advancement, some sort of understanding that the person above must not steal the water from the person below, but must keep the stream navigable. He says in Australia, with her limited water supply and the limitless separate advantages that might be obtained from irrigation, to preserve the navigability of the stream altogether a different line of consideration and international arrangement ought to be adopted. That line of international arrangement is to be, he says, that the State which is higher up the stream can use the whole of the water for irrigation and leave the other dry right through. If that is not an act of supreme selfishness, in respect of a navigable stream in a country where water is particularly required for every purpose, I have never heard of one. But we have really to go on some principle. I do not want to go the length of the motion of Mr. Gordon. It would be quite enough from my point of view, if we gave the Commonwealth the control of navigable streams running through or on the boundaries of two or more States, so far as the preservation of their navigability is concerned. At all events that would be the least that one could ask for.

Mr. GORDON:

Hear, hear.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is what would be allowed as a matter of course in every part of the civilised world.
Mr. HIGGINS:
Would you include the Darling?
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I am not going into the question of the Murray, or the Darling, or the Murrumbidgee, or any other stream.
Mr. KINGSTON:
The names are enough.
Mr. REID:
Call it all the catchment area of South Australia.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I am always glad to hear the interjections of my hon. friend, and they appear to be very amusing to those on his side. They are certainly always very good tempered, and amusing to his friends.
Dr. QUICK:
And very much to the point
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
And sometimes to the point. We have a question before us that has been a subject of dispute for a great many years, in which assertions of right have been made public—which fortunately nobody has ever tried to exercise—which have produced a great deal of correspondence and also caused a great deal of uneasiness in the minds of people in South Australia; and when we come to the question, as we ought now, of trying to make a lasting union between the colonies, we surely ought to try and prevent the possibility of disputes about this river which must create the greatest misunderstanding in the future. What is the way New South Wales proposes to get over the difficulty? By simply ignoring it. By promising us a conference, and saying it is quite impossible to put anything in the Bill that will deal finally with this question. South Australia has never asked for anything more than she ought to get. She only wanted an inquiry made to settle finally what she ought to get, and to get it, and have no further dispute. The position which New South Wales and her Committees took was this "You have no right to this as a navigable stream. The general law of nations does not apply in the altered state of circumstances in these colonies;
and, therefore, we have to come to a method by which we, higher up, can take all the water, and you have to do the best you can." While this line of argument is very simple, but in which no agreement can possibly be arrived at, it is not at all a line of argument which is calculated to bring about that kindliness of feeling with which we are to carry out the federal idea. And I do ask Mr. Reid, if he can, to help us to settle this question. I am not at all sure that it might not be that the Murray waters could be made more useful for irrigation purposes than for navigation. That is a question I do not wish to make any assertions about one way or the other, but I want something to preserve the right which we have in the navigability and to the use of the waters of the Murray, or, if we are not to have the ordinary right which citizens would have, supposing a stream passed through only one State, then to fall back on the rights which prevail by the comity of nations between foreign States in respect to rivers that pass through their boundaries; or if we are to have a new method applied altogether, through the inapplicability of the old one of settling it in the best way that these matters can be settled-in a way that is fair and just to all-then give the jurisdiction in the four corners of the Bill to the Parliament of the Commonwealth. Why should New South Wales and Victoria have any reason to doubt the Commonwealth? Nothing could be done without an Act of Parliament. Their representation will be much larger in the Federal Parliament. It is only asking for jurisdiction. We do not want to take anything we are not entitled to. We only want security against a stronger power, which we think is right, not only as between friendly colonies, but as between nations, and will be a guarantee of security to us by well understood international law. Surely it cannot be said that we are seeking to obtain any undue advantage when we ask our friends of the other colonies, our brothers, to give us only that which we might ask as a matter of international right against hostile nations next door to us. Let us have it settled now. We can do it by a few words in the Bill, if New South Wales will accept the amendment I suggest. Then I say put it in any form that suits them, which will give the Commonwealth jurisdiction to control the matter.

Mr. FRASER:
Section 33 will do it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I do not see a single word except the clause we are dealing with now. That has been the difficulty, to get them to refer to it. Where is the difficulty of letting the Commonwealth deal with the question? For my own part I would be willing to accept it in the form I suggested.

Mr. FRASER:
It would be a danger to Federation. They would insist upon this.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is an old gag. Everyone says if this is not carried or that is not carried Federation will be endangered. I look upon it as a little fit of temper which arises in youth, but which passes away when we get older. I do entreat Mr. Reid, who, judging from his utterances, and his actions, has tried very hard to assist the cause of Federation, I do ask him to try and assist us now. We do not want any precise lines laid down, but we want the Commonwealth to have authority to deal with it. He can limit the lines if he likes, so long as these lines will give the Commonwealth power to give right and justice. But then we must take care that when that is done, all the water is not taken by the people at the upper end of the stream, and lessened for those lower down, till there in none left for those-

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That is impossible.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
It might be impossible to take the whole of the waters.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Or to take half of them.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I do not know.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I will show you presently.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I do not know, but at all events, for the purpose of bringing the matter to an issue without taking up further time, I move:

To strike out all the words after "navigable" with a view of the insertion of the following words:—"Rivers running through or on the boundaries of two or more States so far as is necessary to preserve the navigability thereof."

The CHAIRMAN:
I would suggest that as the two amendments appear to clash, the best way would be-in order that the Committee may have an opportunity of voting on both-for Mr. Gordon to move to insert:

"Navigation on the rivers Murray, Darling, and Murrumbidgee," after the word "of," in line one.

If these words are inserted, the others can be struck out. If they are not inserted, then Sir John Downer can move his amendment.

Mr. GORDON:
I withdraw my amendment in favor of Sir John Downer's.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I think my hon friend Sir John Downer unwittingly did the Hon. Mr.
Carruthers an injustice, for that hon. member did not speak generally on this question, but only gave a special instance. Mr. Carruthers dealt entirely with the River Darling, and he mentioned a case where Lake Menindie might be made more useful by conserving the flood waters of that river. That illustration does not apply to the waters of the River Murray. From personal observation I endorse all that the Hon. Mr. Carruthers has said, having lived near the locality for many years, and I further state that what he has said about the Willandra billabong is not exaggerated. Before South Australia can claim the exclusive advantages she desires to obtain from the use of the waters of the Murray, what, I enquire, has she done or proposes to do to justify her claim?

Mr. GORDON:

We have spent £67,000.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Why, we have spent £670,000 on the Callum reservoir alone, which puts millions of gallons every day down the river that flows into the Murray. There are scores of reservoirs made by the Victorian Government on the various rivers between the Ovens and the Wimmera, at a cost of millions sterling, which provide daily millions of gallons of compensation water during the summer season for the Murray, thus preventing the river from practically becoming too shallow to be navigable. Has the Government of South Australia paid her share for those improvements? The reservoirs to which I have alluded are conserving water during flood time, and the surplus is passed down the stream in the shape of compensation water to keep the Murray navigable. While two colonies, Victoria particularly, have spent millions in the conservation of water, South Australia has not expended any large sum. The £60,000 to which Mr. Gordon has alluded did not go towards increasing the volume of water in the Murray, but merely increases the facilities of transit. Do hon. members know that during times of flood the River Murray at Echuca is sometimes nearly two miles wide, and that during summer time, when the surplus water is turned back into its natural channel, South Australia gets the advantage of that surplus water? I hope South Australia will join her neighbors in considering the question of the riparian rights of the Murray on a fair and equitable basis; but does she think it fair that she can enter the New South Wales territory and take water that does not belong to her? Is she prepared to pay her fair share for locking and snagging the River Darling, and making it constantly navigable? If she does, no doubt the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria will meet her, but it is idle otherwise to say South Australia has claims on the waters unless she will perform a neighbor's part, and pay her fair share of the necessary improvements.
Mr. SYMON:

I think Sir William Zeal has dealt with the subject as though we were engaged in the negotiation of the terms on which South Australia and Victoria should jointly deal with the waters of the Murray. We are only inviting the Convention to empower the Federal Parliament to deal with the subject. When the matter is brought before the Federal Parliament or Executive, then all these questions of compensation in connection with this great reservoir will arise.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

There are dozens of them.

Mr. SYMON:

Then so much the greater will be the claim of Victoria to compensation. All we are now asking the Committee to say is that this is a matter of federal importance, that the federal authority is competent to deal with it, and that it may be removed from the individual control of the States who have been unable to come to any agreement on the subject. For my part I recognise very strongly the difficulties which have been pointed out in the possible adjustment of the question. There can be no doubt as to the position taken up by Mr. Carruthers, and that many of the rules of the common law and rules of international comity in other countries cannot be justly applied here. Then, if you are separating the question of the navigability you are met with the difficulty of how the volume of water is to be ascertained that is to be passed from one State to another. I hope the amendment in something like the shape proposed by Sir John Downer will be adopted. There can be no question as to the navigability of the river being vital to us, as much so as its use for irrigation and conservation is to the neighboring colonies. If we were foreign and independent States the question of the navigation of the river would have to be settled according to the principles of international comity.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It would be done by agreement.

Mr. FRASER:

Or settled by arms.

Mr. SYMON:

In case of an obstruction to the navigation by one State it might be so settled. Surely, however, we can trust the federal authority by devolving on them the duty of controlling the navigability of the stream. That is all we ask you to do, and it seems to me that, without entering upon questions of great difficulty, no fear need be entertained by either of the colonies concerned as to the fairness with which the Federal Parliament will deal with this question, or the justice that will be meted out. I feel indisposed to go to the length of the amendment which Mr. Gordon first put, as I do not think either justice or law would lead us to interfere with the control by New South Wales and Victoria of the rivers which are absolutely necessary for the development of their own country. As far as the Murray is concerned, it is a different question, and I think the interests of the three colonies would be conserved by leaving the control of the rivers as a navigable stream to the Federal Government.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I think we are indebted to previous speakers for having devoted so much care and attention to the statement of the South Australian view of the case.
I trust that the Convention will not separate before we have framed a Constitution which will render it possible that an existing source of friction may be at once and for ever removed. There is no doubt that, in connection with this particular question there has been a great deal of friction, not to say irritation, between the various colonies which are affected, by what appears to me to be an extravagant use of the head waters of the Murray, to the detriment of those through whose territory the river flows.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That is not as far as the Murray is concerned.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I was referring to the Murray as including the tributaries by which it is fed. I know that Sir John Downer at different times devoted a great deal of attention to the subject and corresponded with the Government of New South Wales on the subject with but very little effect. It seems as it our protests or representations in connection with the matter were put quietly away in a pigeon hole; certainly we heard nothing more of it. I am able to take up the history of the question at a later stage.

When Sir John Downer had given up any attempt to deal with the question, it fell to my lot to communicate with the Government of New South Wales before the present administration was formed, and with a similar result. I do not think we were even favored with an acknowledgment, but when the present Government was formed and we heard who was at its head we were sufficiently sanguine to believe that a personal interview with the leader of the Government would be productive of the very best results, and under those circumstances my colleague, Mr. Holder, waited on Mr. Reid and directed his attention to the question, and sought a conference amongst the colonies interested for the purpose of, for once and for all, coming to some reasonable arrangement on the subject. We were met by Mr. Reid with his usual courtesy.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Did you get anything else?

Mr. KINGSTON:
We got an assurance that justifies us in pressing this subject on the attention of the Convention. We were told it was not a matter for a conference, but that it should be dealt with by Federation, by a Federal Government and a Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID:
The Murray. You never had the assurance to mention the Darling.

Mr. KINGSTON:
We were told it is not a matter for a conference, that that is an informal gathering from which nothing results. We were told we would have their assistance in establishing a Federation, that the whole thing would be referred to the Federation, and there would be no more trouble. We have acted on that, and I await with a great deal of interest the explanation of the Premier of New South Wales as to how he will enable the Federation to deal with the matter, for he promised years ago a fair and satisfactory reference of the question.

Mr. REID:
I am loth to say anything on a matter which has been canvassed so much; but so many observations have been made by my friends of South Australia in reference to the colony I represent that I really, with an apology to the Convention, must say a few words on the subject. One would think my hon. friends provided the watershed for all the rivers that flow through New South Wales. The fact of the matter is that the rivers to which they have referred are fed by nearly the whole colony of New South Wales, and none of them but one comes to South Australia, and the claim put forward by Mr. Gordon was practically an annexation of New South Wales as a catchment area for South Australia. I know Mr. Gordon is a prince of jesters, and imagine he was entertaining us in his usual bright manner. But Mr. Kingston is of the same idea, and it is necessary for me to point out that South Australia has no more to do with the Darling or the Murrumbidgee than Fiji, and never will have. But I am very glad my friends have come down now to a proposition that we may consider. I would remind my honorable friends that we have spent money on these rivers, with the result that South Australia can use them against our railways, and I have not noticed any offer from South Australia to share in that expense, so we have paid for many years to clear these waterways for the benefit of our friends in South Australia. I am sorry that after our efforts in the scavenging line we should be accused of doing this with South Australian waters. Consequently we are not prepared to give up the control of our own internal rivers, but so far as any rivers which flow between two colonies are concerned I am prepared to meet South Australia in the fairest possible way. I quite admit that they should be subject, as navigation should be, to federal control. But the whole bed of the Murray so far as its boundary in New South Wales is concerned is conferred by Imperial Statute upon New South Wales. Even then we have never asserted our rights, as Victoria has carried out schemes for irrigation without ever asking the favor of our consent to their doing it. Still we never have complained. Several islands in the Murray belonging to New South Wales have been leased by Victoria, but we have not written any warlike despatch upon the matter. That shows the way in which we have been dealing with our neighbors, and it is really discouraging to see South Australia wishing to annex the watersheds of New South Wales. However, they have repented of that, and now they propose to make another annexation which I do not quite understand, and which is almost as objectionable as the other. "Preserve the navigability of the river," they say; that is not easily done. Sometimes rivers in Australia become a chain of waterholes. The Darling over and over again is a mere chain of waterholes, and navigation is impossible. This is a nice task to put upon the Commonwealth, when the water is not there. The Commonwealth will have to bear the burden of the expense necessary to preserve the navigability of the River Murray. The amendment is ambiguous and objectionable. The true power to give the Commonwealth is the regulation of the navigation of rivers, so far as they form boundaries between States. It goes beyond navigation where there is no water to navigate.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Dry channels.

Mr. REID:

I believe the Murray above South Australia runs so low as to make navigation impossible. I understand that long before irrigation was thought of in Victoria the Murray was so low that navigation was impossible.

Mr. FRASER:

A chain of waterholes for years.

Mr. REID:

In fact I believe that these attempts at irrigation really increase the volume of the river, and that were it not for them the flood would pass to the ocean with lightning speed, whereas water conservation has preserved the water for use. I am prepared to give the Commonwealth power as to the regulation and use of water so far as the rivers form boundaries between States.
Mr. GORDON:
Or running through States.

Mr. REID:
The River Murray is always a boundary between two States, except where it is wholly within South Australia. Pitt Cobbett lays down the law on this matter very shortly:
Where a navigable river lies wholly within the territory of one State dominion and user belong exclusively to that State.

After reading that my hon. friend tried to annex the Darling. That is the strict law with reference to the rivers entirely in New South Wales, and that is the law we intend to apply to you. I know that I would get the strict law if I came into South Australia and kept some of the water back. The second principle laid down in Cobbett is:
Where a river constitutes the boundary between two States the frontier line is the middle of the channel or thalweg; but there is a presumption that both States have a right of user or navigation.

Let me point out this: As to most of the course of the Murray it is a question between Victoria and New South Wales, not one between the States and the Commonwealth, and consequently the Commonwealth would be taking over a matter which has nothing whatever to do with the Commonwealth as a Commonwealth, but only with two States—Victoria, and New South Wales—and perhaps we must add South Australia. In the interests of peace and goodwill I think we should all be prepared to hand over this matter to the Commonwealth, so far as the waters run as a boundary. If it does not form a boundary it is only a question of one State to deal with, and the Commonwealth has nothing to do with it. We do not want any ambiguity. I will support anything like what I have suggested, though it will be placing an arduous task on the Commonwealth, and will involve a number of very troublesome questions.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Is there any other river but the Murray?

Mr. REID:
No; and we might almost specify the Murray. The only objection to it is that by and bye if there were any sub-division of States it might happen to apply to other rivers.

Mr. WISE:
The Murrumbidgee might be a boundary.

Mr. REID:
I am quite prepared to accept any amendment to hand over to the Commonwealth the control of the navigation and use of rivers so far as they form boundaries between States, but not where they are entirely within a colony. But Sir John Downer's question of preserving the navigability of rivers suggests difficulties which nature itself may war against.

Mr. WISE:
Divide!

Mr. GORDON:
I have heard nothing whatever which appears to me to materially weaken the arguments I have adduced, although what I heard from Mr. Deakin and Mr. Carruthers showed that there are many difficulties to be overcome before a settlement can be properly arrived at. They have pointed out very fairly and clearly that these difficulties do exist, but the fact that we know there are difficulties is no justification for not attempting to find a remedy for them. The federal authority, or some commission to which the matter must be referred, is the real tribunal for such difficulties. Mr Reid has admitted that it is a matter for the Federation to settle. It occurs to me that since it appears to be generally conceded that our railways must not be used by any colony to the injury of the adjoining colony-railways which are artificial means of communication, built at great cost to the colonies—how much more strongly should that principle be true of the rivers, which have cost the colonies practically nothing, except in matters of improvement, and which are natural, not artificial, highways. Why should a State be allowed to use the rivers to the injury of its neighbor? The argument from railways is really in favor of my position. Mr. Reid made some exceedingly witty remarks, as he always does, but most of them were essentially wide of the question. He is, I am sure, really thoroughly ashamed of the position taken up by New South Wales, and tries to put it off with a laugh and a joke—an accomplishment in which he shines, as we all see. But this matter is really too serious, and if we are met here to establish a federal agreement, it is one which must be settled. He offers us thin air—nothing. We are entitled to a mutual share in the navigation and use of the Darling, Murray, and Murrumbidgee, because they are rivers which, having their rise somewhere else, still flow through our colony, and in respect of which—if we are to have fair play at all some such proposal as I attempted to move, or as has been moved by Sir John Downer, must certainly be agreed to.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Mr. WISE:
I have given notice of a printed amendment to debar the Commonwealth-

Mr. DEAKIN:
A new subsection was to be proposed to take the place of this.

Mr. WISE:
I do not propose to move the new sub-section which has been printed.
Mr. Barton has assured me that this is a matter which the Drafting Committee will take into consideration, and draw a clause to meet the difficulty.

Mr. BARTON:
We did not say that.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I understood a new subclause would be drafted to take the place of this.

Mr. BARTON:
I was under the impression one would be moved.

Mr. WALKER:
I propose to add a few words.

The CHAIRMAN:
Sub-clause 31 is struck out.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Words can be substituted for it.

Mr. ISAACS:
I move to insert in its place the words:
Control and regulation of rivers between two States, and the use of the waters thereof.

Mr. BARTON:
Say "so far as they form the boundary between two States."

Mr. ISAACS:
I think if they are between two States it is the same. I cannot appreciate the difference.

Mr. BARTON:
It might not take in their whole course, but only the part which is the boundary.

Mr. ISAACS:
I understand Mr. Reid wishes to put under the federal control only such parts of these rivers as form the boundary between two States. I do not quite understand how that is practicable, and I will move it in this form:

The control and regulation of rivers between two States and the use of the waters thereof.

Mr. GORDON:

That is a nice little amendment. It means that the Federal Parliament may agree to a compact between New South Wales and Victoria, leaving South Australia out of it.

Mr. ISAACS:

No. I want to keep the control of the whole of the Murray under the Federal Parliament.

Mr. GORDON:

Then if it does that it is in the direction of justice, and I thank the hon. member even for so much, but I thought it was giving the Federal Parliament control of that part of the river which only flows between the two States.

Mr. REID:

That was my proposal.

Mr. GORDON:

Then it was a proposal which I can only characterise as simply monstrous.

Mr. ISAACS:

Perhaps the proposed words do not go as far as I intended. I propose that the whole of a river that flows between two colonies should be under the control of the Federal Government, but not its tributaries. If you will allow me, I will reframe the amendment.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I would ask the hon. member whether he means those rivers flowing between two States and constituting the boundary between two States.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I understand that the bed of the Murray is in New South Wales, so that you cannot say that the Murray forms the boundary between New South Wales and Victoria. The only way will be to use some expression that it is at the boundary, or perhaps as it is intended only to refer to the Murray, it might be as well to restrict it to that river.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The only other river is the Tweed between New South Wales and
Mr. SYMON:

We might make it:

The control and regulation of rivers between and through two States.

That would cover the case of the Tweed.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I would suggest to Mr. Symon that he should put his amendment, and I think Mr. Isaacs must have had it in his mind, because I cannot think that he merely meant to say that the Commonwealth was to have control of the rivers simply as far as they were the boundaries of States, and to have no control over them in their course through the States. Not that I am at all sure but that the Commonwealth would have control of the river simply by the words describing the boundaries of the States. Let them have control of any part of the river and they will have power to deal with it by regulation, and this will do what my Tasmanian and South Australian friends think ought not to be done. We will be content that as between colonies the same rights should exist as would be respected between foreign nations. That is all we have been asking for, and to me it is simply shocking that this is not granted. It is so against the friendly spirit, not to say federal spirit, for friendly States to meet here for the purpose of making a federal union, and for them not to concede to the poorest State that asks for it the rights that one State should give to another. Mr. Isaacs thinks something ought to be done to bring the matter back to a more reasonable basis. If he will amend his motion as suggested by Mr. Symon I think it will meet the case. The effect would be to put the colonies in the same position in which the comity of nations places nations.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Keep on talking, Sir John. All the lawyers are preparing amendments.

Mr. GORDON:

I have an amendment:

The control of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof.

Mr. BARTON:

I have a further amendment:

To leave out all words after the word "the," for the purpose of inserting the following words: "navigation of rivers so far as they form boundaries between two States."

Mr. GLYNN:

But the River Murray is not the boundary between two States. The exact words of the Act 14 Vict., see. 59, are:

The territories therein described as bounded on the north and north-east by a straight line drawn from Cape Howe to the nearest source of the River Murray and thence by the course of that river to the eastern boundary of the colony of South Australia should be erected into a separate colony to be known and designated as the colony of Victoria.

This was explained by a subsequent Act as giving the watercourse to New South Wales. That is the boundary between the States; the banks are the determining point.

Mr. GORDON:

Leave out "control and regulation" then.

Mr. WISE:

I should like to ask Mr. Gordon whether if his amendment is carried he intends that the Federal Parliament shall make provision to purchase irrigation works in Victoria. Are the representatives of Victoria prepared to hand over all their works to the Federal Parliament? If they are it is just as well that we should know. This matter affects the representatives of Victoria more than it affects any others.

Mr. GORDON:

In the Federal Parliament New South Wales and Victoria will have such an overwhelming majority that it is very unlikely that anything unfair to Victoria or New South Wales will pass through very easily. Besides, we can trust the Federal Parliament to deal honorably and fairly in this matter. I believe that it will do what is absolutely fair and just to the colonies.

Mr. DOBSON:

I have already given two votes with very much hesitation, and I would like to be spared the anxiety of giving a third vote upon a matter which is very complicated and intricate, and the most far-reaching question with which we have had to deal since we met. What rights has the colony of New South Wales in the waters of the Murray and all the magnificent tributaries which form that large river? If the colony of New South Wales has certain legal rights, and by my vote I am taking away those rights without her consent, I am doing her an injustice. If South Australia thinks she has certain rights, and South Australia is not allowed the full exercise of those rights, because of the prior rights of New South Wales, she has a perfect right to say if we are to federate, if we are going to be one people, and have, as far as possible, unity of interest, "We ask you honestly and straightforwardly-are you prepared to give up some of your rights and vested control of this great river which is the great highway to us as well as to you." From that point of view I think that the South Australian people are not asking anything unfair, and it is that aspect of the question which has already gained my vote on two occasions. Now, I think, however you may trust the Federal Parliament—and I am going to trust it as implicitly as my hon. friends opposite—that Parliament is not competent to deal with this question. That may be belittling the tribunal we are here to erect, but, so far as I can see, this question is too complicated for the Federal Parliament to deal with. Why not have some provision by which the claims of all the States interested in the Murray may be submitted to the Federal Parliament, not for its decision, but in order that it may remit them to the High Court, which is the only body capable of dealing with this complicated legal question.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It is not a legal question.

Mr. DOBSON:
The only point Mr. Carruthers dealt with was the absolute necessity that New South Wales should have control over those rivers in order to develop her territory. That is exactly the point of view that South Australian people take: that they want the waters of the Murray with which to form a highway and irrigate their desert lands. Now, the point I want answered by some of my legal friends is this: May New South by constructing enormous irrigation works and cutting channels entirely cut off the flow of these waters before—they enter the boundary of South Australia?

Mr. BARTON:
I think not.

Mr. DOBSON:
If they have a right to do that it is simply a question for the South Australian Government to say, "Will you give up some of your rights or not?" I do not think we can make a proper settlement of this to-night. Anything we do may work injustice to some one.

Mr. FRASER:
There are millions of tons of water going to waste in the Murray and its tributaries because we do not conserve it. The conservation of the water will tend to make the streams more navigable in the dry months. Victoria has spent hundreds of thousands if not millions of pounds in the conservation of water at a time when it would otherwise go to waste. The proper policy is to conserve it where it can be done with the contour of the country, and thus make the river more navigable during the dry months. Millions of human beings could be supported on the banks of these rivers, and it in infinitely more to the interests of the colonies that they should be there. The whole population of South Australia could be put into one corner of the Darling country if the waters were properly conserved and utilised, as in India and other countries. Difficulties of navigation will not arise for 100 years, and the Federal Parliament can deal with them when they do arise. It will be best to let the people of the future deal with this question.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It seems to me that the question has now narrowed down, if we are to come to any practical result, to the question of the Murray River; and I think that is narrowed down to a question of navigation. It seems to me, if you narrow it down to navigation, or introduce the word navigation at all, that you must not only take that part of the Murray which flows between two colonies, but you must take the whole course of the river. I humbly advise that the new clause be confined to the River Murray and the mode of its navigation.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

The Committee may imagine that in voting for this amendment of Mr. Gordon's, they are voting with reference to the River Murray from w

Mr. FRASER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

That is the Tumberumbera, the upper Murray districts, right up to the Monaro and Snowy Ranges. In these districts is the natural watershed where you can construct your enormous works for irrigating on the lower level. We have in no other part so favorable a site for irrigation, because there we have the great help of gravitation. If you hand over the control of the Murray, as the amendment proposes, you do not limit it to the head of navigation, but you also take it right up to its source.

Mr. FRASER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

You hand over a good asset of New South Wales, who can put it to a far better purpose than merely making the Murray navigable. As Mr. Fraser says, you can irrigate and use the water there as much as you like and hardly interfere with the navigation. I hope the Committee will confine itself to what we are all agreed upon. There is only one river in Australia which divides colonies. Why not expressly confine the division to the Murray from the head of navigation, say Albury, right down to its entrance to the sea, and we will support an amendment of that character.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I respectfully submit that the River Murray is a river which has divided colonies in more senses than one, and that seems to me to be a reason why it should be handed over to federal control.
Mr. SYMON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH:
While the disputes that are continually arising over the proper use of it are possible, the colonies will continue to be divided in that other sense to which I referred. Mr. Wise asked, in connection with some irrigation works whether Victoria was prepared to hand over its irrigation works. It seems to be altogether unnecessary. That is not involved in the resolution.

Mr. GORDON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Because, if we handed over the control for navigation purposes, and the control of the use of it-it is not to be assumed that the Federal Parliament will act unjustly. It will properly and fairly treat both the navigation and the use of the river. And Victoria will not be afraid to trust the Federal Parliament. But where disputes arise between two or more colonies in connection with the waters of this river the Federal Parliament will be able, it seems to me, in a more unbiased manner to appreciate the difficulties and the interests of the respective colonies. For that reason I will support the resolution as submitted by Mr.

Gordon, feeling confident that the Federal Parliament elected by all the States, having only the interests of the whole of Australia to consider in connection with all its legislation, will so control the navigation and use of the waters that injury is done to none of the States.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
With a view of testing the opinion of the Committee upon a matter about which we are all agreed, I move in Mr. Barton's amendment:
That all the words after "navigation" be struck out, with a view to adding "of the River Murray from Albury to the sea."

The CHAIRMAN:
I wish to point out that the question is "That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the proposed sub-section." If those words are not struck out then of course the new sub-section as moved by Mr. Gordon will be the substantive question, but if they are struck out then Mr. Barton's amendment will come on for consideration, and Mr. O'Connor's amendment to amend Mr. Barton's amendment will be taken.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It would be a simpler way to withdraw Mr. Barton's amendment. On behalf of Mr. Barton I withdraw his amendment, with the consent of the committee.

Mr. Barton's amendment withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN:

The proposed new sub-section now reads:
The control of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Then I move:

To strike out the latter part of the sub-clause with a view of adding the words "from Albury to the sea."

Mr. ISAACS:

I would point out that that will do no good whatever. To say you shall have control of the navigation means that you shall say what size ships shall be upon it, how they shall sail, to regulate the bridges with relation to navigation, the rules as to loading and unloading, &c. That is utterly useless for the purposes now desired, and those who vote for that will vote for nothing.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I must say now that I am altogether disappointed as regards the attitude of this Convention in reference to this river question. There is no doubt whatever that the use of these rivers, both for irrigation purpose's and for the purposes of navigation, is of the greatest value, not only to the colonies in which these rivers have their source, but to all the colonies through which they flow. What is the position? So far as the divisions which have already taken place allow us to form an opinion of the intentions of this Convention, it appears that although the rights of those lower down stream in the case of foreign nations, even on the least friendly terms, would have been secured by a friendly Convention, yet in the making of a Federal Constitution the recognition of those rights is repeatedly denied by the colonies in which the rivers have their source to those colonies lower down. We are not proposing even now that a treaty should be made once and for all as regards this question. Here we are, in the discharge of our duty, discussing terms of a friendly Federation, and we only ask that all the colonies represented in the Federation should have power to consider and deal with these questions. This, however, is refused us.

Mr. FRASER:

You are bringing in colonies that have nothing to do with it.

Mr. KINGSTON:

We are trying to bring in all the colonies interested in it; and I utterly dispute the suggestion put forward with a great deal of force and candor by
Mr. Carruthers that the colonies in which these rivers have their sources have a right to drain their channels lower down perfectly dry, and leave South Australia no opportunity for the navigation of the stream to which she is rightly entitled, and no opportunity for the use of its waters for irrigation. Is this, the way in which we are to be met? I look at the proposal before the Convention. It savors, to my mind, of an attempt to placate one colony-Victoria-by a partial recognition of those rights with a view to the establishment of something in the shape of an alliance which is denied to a colony lower down in connection with this matter. As regards Victoria they say, "Where the river is between us and not higher up than Albury we will let the Federal Parliament have some power to deal with the question of navigation." This even is a most limited concession, having no reference whatever to the use of the waters of the river for other purposes. Is Victoria going to be satisfied with a concession of this sort?

Mr. DEAKIN:

It is not a question between Victoria and New South Wales.

Mr. KINGSTON:

It ought not to be. How is it they will only allow the Federal Parliament to deal with this matter as regards the river which runs between Victoria and New South Wales and forms the boundary line? Is it simply on account of its position as a boundary line? After considering the matter to the best of my ability, I think that if it is only intended to give the Federal Parliament such limited power of dealing with this question and settling it in a friendly spirit, it would be infinitely better to leave the matter to the High Court of Australia, which it is proposed to create, and give the court also the power of dealing with our legal rights, which in connection with the use of rivers and streams like the Murray would correspond very closely to equitable rights. It seems to me, as regards the concession now proposed, it is not worth the paper it is written on, and it augurs ill to Federation that the representatives will not trust the Federal Parliament representing all the States, in which Victoria and New South Wales will have a much larger representation than we can have, in connection with this matter in which we feel so deeply, and on which we have sought so long and vainly to obtain a recognition of our rights. It is a pity indeed that the decision we have arrived at has been reached. I hope it may be reconsidered, and that a measure of hope may be held out that the Federal Parliament will be trusted with federal questions of the gravity involved in the use of the waters of the Murray.

Mr. WISE:
I agree with the Prime Minister of South Australia that there is grave cause for disappointment, but it is not at the attitude of the representatives of New South Wales, but at speeches like that to which we have just listened. Let me ask the Convention to think what is meant by the assertion that we are giving up nothing. If that is the answer we receive, I hope Mr. Reid will withdraw the offer. The water is as much the property of New South Wales as any inch of its territory. The bed of the river is ours, and we have the power to gather a pretty considerable revenue from wharfage and tonnage dues, the whole length of the boundary between New South Wales and Victoria. That power we have never exercised; and the Prime Minister of our colony has offered to give it over to the Federal Government without receiving one penny of compensation. When that offer is generously made in order to carry out Federation it ought to be received in a federal spirit. It is, however, rejected in the language to which we have listened tonight, as though we were trying to cheat others out of their rights. On the contrary, we are making a free and handsome gift, and it augurs ill, as the Prime Minister of South Australia has said, if conduct of this sort is to be so received. I have always entertained the view that it is a mistake to give these rivers unless the railways go too. I had intended to vote for the amendment moved by Mr. Reid.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Mr. Reid did not move it.

Mr. WISE:
Mr. O'Connor has practically moved it for him.

Mr. PEACOCK:
No; entirely different.

Mr. WISE:
No doubt the Victorians regard the matter in a different light, for they have also used our waters for years and not paid for it.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It could be diverted before it reaches the Murray at all.

Mr. WISE:
It is admitted we have the right of imposing tolls on navigation.

Mr. GLYNN:
No, it is not.

Mr. WISE:
I would like to know what vessels could land on the New South Wales shore or sail on her waters without her permission, or refuse to pay tolls, where the bed belongs to us?

Mr. GORDON:
You would be acting like a barbarous uncivilised people in doing so,

Mr. WISE:
Are we to be asked to give up more, and put all our country at the head of the Murray at the mercy of people whose feelings are such as have been exhibited in the speeches of the representatives of South Australia?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
As members of the

Mr. HIGGINS:
I wish to inform Mr. Wise that he is wrong with reference to the statement that because the bed of the Murray is in New South Wales, she has the right to levy dues. In 19 Victoria, chap. 54, sec. 5, it will be seen that it is left to New South Wales and Victoria, by proviso, to make rules for the regulation of the navigation of the river by vessels.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I desire to limit this sub-section now, and I think my friends opposite will concur in this. I desire to limit it so that it will control the river from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales down to the sea.

Mr. PEACOCK:
So there will be no interference with the tributaries.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
At its source it has, so to speak, several tributaries. There are about a dozen streams, and it is difficult to say which is the Murray. I propose to add these words:

From where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea.

Mr. DEAKIN:
There is not very much in that. There are several small streams and there is a dispute as to which is the Murray. One is known as the Little Murray. I think the least we can do is to meet New South Wales.

Mr. BARTON: Say:

From Albury to the sea.

Mr. DEAKIN:
No; it will be best to meet him.

Mr. REID:
That is exactly what I said at first, that wherever a river forms a boundary it should be subject to Federal control. When we remember that the whole bed of the Murray is in our colony it is the least you can do to meet Mr.
Carruthers.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
If this amendment is carried we are not a bit further on.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Better report progress, and we shall know what we are doing.

The CHAIRMAN:
The amendment now before us reads:

From where it first forms the boundary to the sea.

Mr. GORDON:
The point is that it never forms a boundary.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
These words seem very vague and very inconclusive. It may hereafter be contended that the river never does form the boundary at all if it all belongs to New South Wales, that is, unless you fix the boundary definitely.

Mr. REID:
Say from Albury.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I respectfully submit that the fears appeared to be entertained by my hon. friends Mr. Carruthers and Mr. Reid are altogether groundless. It is assumed that the Federal Parliament may so legislate as to prejudicially affect the people of New South Wales with reference to these head waters. That is an assumption so unreasonable and so altogether improbable that we need not have any fear.

Mr. GORDON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
I suppose it is not very unreasonable that we should give you the whole of the river to which we have the statutory right.

Mr. TRENWITH:
My friend Mr. Reid has made a very gracious offer when he agrees to forego any claim that New South Wales has within certain limits. I am endeavoring to urge upon him that he may yet extend his graciousness by trusting the Federal Parliament, which will have the interests of all Australia always in its mind, and will certainly in no circumstance order regulations with reference to the Murray, so as to injure New South Wales in connection with the heads of the rivers spoken of. If we say from where the river first forms the boundary—and it has been suggested that it does not form a boundary anywhere—I think it will be a mistake. It would be a mistake to limit it anywhere, because there may arise contingencies in which it may be necessary to regulate the water flow. The control should be made as complete as possible. We would surely be justified in handing over such a trivial matter as this.

Mr. REID:
Trivial if it does not belong to them, of course.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Of course if we are going to stand upon mine and thine—

Mr. REID:
Will you hand over the Goulbourn River in Victoria?

Mr. TRENWITH:
We have spent an immense sum of public money in irrigation works, and we have no fear that the Federal Parliament will treat us unjustly. I think we are perfectly willing that regulations for its control shall be in the hands of the Federal Government, which is to be created to advance the interest of all the colonies rather than to injure or retard the interests of any of them.

Mr. REID:
I should like my hon. friend as a practical man to see that if we are prepared to accept a certain settlement on behalf of New South Wales it is well to secure that assent instead of our determined opposition. The whole of this question has turned on navigation, but beyond Albury nothing turns on what we have been talking about. If the amendment is amended so as to make a definite point from Albury, we will remove any further disputation or opposition. There can be no navigation above Albury.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I desire to amend my amendment by inserting:

"Albury" instead of "from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales."

Mr. DEAKIN:

I ask the hon. member not to make that request. The first point is definite, and it has the advantage of being the commencement of the boundary between the colonies. The river above that point is practically wholly in New South Wales territory, and it seems to me unreasonable to ask that the river, where it is purely in New South Wales territory, should be placed under federal control. Only the point from where it becomes the boundary is it a proper subject for federal control, and for that reason. Though nothing has been done, and nothing is proposed, something may be proposed to be done to the river above Albury. We are dealing with a principle, and the amendment as framed will be more in accordance with the principle, while it will provide for the future.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Meanwhile you confirm the title of New South Wales, not only to the bed of the river, but to every drop of water in the river. You give the Commonwealth no control over it, and if in this case for the benefit of the humanity which is centralised in New South Wales, the whole water should be used in their interests, then Victoria, whose territory it bounds, and South Australia, through whose territory it passes, will just have to grin and bear it. It reminds me very much of the old story of a dispute over a beast. When the two men decided that it belonged to both of them, one man said, "I wish to kill my half." We are to have, as a generous concession, the fact that New South Wales retains substantially all she has got, with an admitted right to take away from the river all the water, without which there is no river at all, and to use it for those irrigation purposes of which they properly think so highly, and the Commonwealth is to be able to legislate down below as much as it likes, when there is nothing of any value there to legislate about. I do my friends in both colonies the justice to think that in practice they will not do those things. We give up our share of the river to the Federal Parliament; they give up nothing.
Mr. GORDON:
   Hear, hear.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   They are to have control over parts of the river which bound Victoria, and which run through South Australia. We have no wish to make anybody pay anything.
Mr. GORDON:
   Hear, hear.
Mr. CARRUTHERS:
   That is not proposed.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   We are perfectly satisfied to leave it to the Commonwealth to do everything that is just and right as far as every penny expended by any State to make the river more navigable is concerned. We are not trying to run any game at all. We are asking for what is fair and right, and that the control of these waters and their navigation should be in the hands of the Commonwealth. Then we are met with a so-called generous compromise, which is not only not a compromise, but will be a legislative assertion a conclusive establishment of a right which does not exist now, except it be the right of might.
Mr. KINGSTON:
   Hear, hear.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   And which would not exist between two unfriendly States under th
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   But which we are asked now, under the guise of a concession, to formally concede and so legislatively fix for ever. I shall be no party to it. I wish nothing but what is fair and right for New South Wales or Victoria; if they have spent a lot of money and made this river more valuable, that is for the Commonwealth to consider, and if they want the Commonwealth to consider it let them vote to give them that power. I have no fear of the Commonwealth. They seem to have. To assert by a substantive enactment by Act of Parliament that New South Wales has a title, which she never had, to the flow of a river that belongs to all the countries through which it flows, is a thing to which I will not submit. It will be a matter of dispute in the future, and without benefit to New South Wales, through having this exceedingly reasonable clause omitted, the wrong and injustice will be asserted to be right, and a bar will be placed in the way of that fair dealing, which alone can be a proper basis on which we can arrive at an arrangement. I ask for no advantage or concession, nor do I wish to give any. We merely ask them to give us, friendly colonies under the same Crown, what men or nations individually unfriendly with one another would not fail to concede. I support the motion as it stands.
[P.829] starts here

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON:
I wish to make an explanation with reference to the division before the last one. My hon. friend Mr. Symon had to go away, and he asked me to pair with him on the amendment. I incontinently forgot the pair. It does not much matter, as there were only five or six "noes" but it is only right that I should explain that I voted by pure inadvertence.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I hope the subsection will be rejected. As it stands now I consider it is a re-affirmance of a very bad law, both internationally and domestically, and I can only hope that as this subject was introduced for the purpose of making a concession to South Australia, and as South Australia is very clear that she will be worse off under this supposed concession than she is at the present time, the sub-section will be rejected. We shall at all events stand as we were before, and not affirm legislatively that we have received a concession. Mr. Carruthers made a speech in which he asserted with transparent clearness the right of New South Wales to take whatever water was in their territory whether we had a right to it or not. His selfishness on behalf of his colony is so clear that one does not want to discuss the subject. On behalf of the representatives of South Australia-I think I may speak on behalf of my fellow representatives-they wished this subject to be introduced to obtain a settlement of a long-vexed question which they, as true-hearted federationists, feared in the future may be a constant source of trouble. However, we refuse to admit that any concession at all has been made by the colonies from which we asked and expected it.

An HON. MEMBER:
Did you expect it?
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We did expect that they would treat us no worse than if we had been enemies instead of friends. They have taken a position which instead of making our position stronger renders it weaker. I hope that both the New South Wales and Victorian representatives, who profess to be giving a concession, will accept the assurance that we have had none, and will not assist in putting us in a worse position than before. I hope this will be struck out.

Clause 51-The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have exclusive powers to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to the following matters:

I. The affairs of the people of any race with respect to whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws not applicable to the general community; but so that this power shall not extend to authorise legislation with respect to the affairs of the aboriginal native race in any State.

II. The government of any territory which by the surrender of any State or States and the acceptance of the Commonwealth becomes the seat of Government of the Commonwealth, and the exercise of like authority over all places acquired by the Commonwealth, with the consent of the State in which such places are situate, for the construction of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, quarantine stations, or for any other purposes of general concern:

III. Matters relating to any department or departments of the Public service the control of which is by this Constitution transferred to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth:

IV. Such other matters as are by this Constitution declared to be within the exclusive powers of the Parliament.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I have now the opportunity of pointing out to the Drafting Committee, as already instructed by the Constitutional Committee, at my instigation, that they ought to look into the question as to whether the first sub-section, giving power to the Federal Government to regulate the trade and commerce of the Commonwealth, does not take away unintentionally from the several States the power, which each of them undoubtedly possesses at the present moment, of regulating and of absolutely prohibiting the importation of alcohol and opium or other imports calculated to be injurious to the State. Such powers exist in each colony at the present time. There are a series of American decisions which decide that power to regulate trade and commerce with other countries, having been given to the federal authority, it is not in the power of any State to do so, without an Act of the federal authority, authorising them to prohibit. In the decision of Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., page 419, it was determined that the State of Maryland had no power to prevent the introduction of goods from abroad the sale of which was prohibited in the State. In a later case Bowman v. the Chicago and North Western Railway Company, 125, U.S.L.R., page 465, the importation from, one State to another, that is to say, from a State in which there was no prohibition to a State in which there was, was held not to be capable of prohibition, for the same reason that it was an interference with the sole power of Congress to regulate trade and commerce. In the historical case of Lesley v. Hardin, 135, U.S.L.R., 100, it was decided that liquor introduced as an original package imported from abroad could be sold in a prohibition State in the original package. In consequence of this the Wilson Act was passed in 1890, by which the Federal Parliament re-endowed the several States with power to prohibit the introduction of alcohol or opium even if in original packages.

Mr. BARTON:

The Drafting Committee were of opinion that the clause about-

The CHAIRMAN:
The only question which can be dealt with, and that is by special leave, is sub-section 1.

Mr. BARTON:
If we carry that I will report progress. The point Mr. Deakin has raised will come in more properly with regard to the sub-section dealing with the freedom of trade. The Drafting Committee will frame a clause if Mr. Deakin will move it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I desire to ascertain the meaning of the word "country." Supposing Queensland and Western Australia do not come into the Federation, they are not State;. Are they countries?

Mr. BARTON:
Yes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I very much doubt it. Would it not be better to insert the word "colony."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REID:
It would be a great convenience to myself if the financial clauses were taken on Monday, as I am afraid I will have to leave on Wednesday. I think it would be more satisfactory to the Convention if I were present during the discussion.

Mr. BARTON:
There is nothing until the end of the part which need cause debate except clause 51. Then there are two or three clauses dealing with the Royal assent and such matters which are formal. That will take us to the end of the chapter, and I then propose to postpone the part dealing with the Executive Government and the judiciary, and that will bring us to the financial clauses.

Mr. REID:
That will suit me very well.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
In Committee.
Clause 51.- The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have exclusive powers to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to the following matters:

I. The affairs of the people of any race with respect to whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws not applicable to the general community; but so that this power shall not extend to authorise legislation with respect to the affairs of the aboriginal native race in any State.

The government of any territory which by the surrender of any State or States and the acceptance of the Commonwealth becomes the seat of Government of the Commonwealth, and the exercise of like authority over all places acquired by the Commonwealth, with the consent of the State in which such places are situate, for the construction of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, quarantine stations, or for any other purposes of general concern:

III. Matters relating to any department or departments of the Public Service the control of which is by this Constitution transferred to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth:

IV. Such other matters as are by this Constitution declared to be within the exclusive powers of The Parliament.

Sub-section 1.

Mr. HIGGINS:

According to the first sub-clause:
The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have exclusive powers to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to the affairs of the people of any race with respect to whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws, and so forth. I confess I do not like the expression. I do not think it carries out the idea. It is the same phrase that is used in the Bill of 1891. I apprehend it is to provide for the Parliament dealing with the kanaka question for, instance. I would suggest that the object of the clause is not to allow the Federal Parliament to deal with the affairs of the kanakas, but rather with the relations of the kanakas towards Australia, and the difficulty to which they may be-

Mr. O'CONNOR:

It is included in emigration and immigration.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I apprehend this first clause relates to the same thing. It strikes me the words here are apt to lead to questions hereafter as to the extent with which the Federal Parliament may deal with the important question of the exclusion of the kanakas. It may be said this gives the Federal Parliament power to deal with the affairs of kanakas in their own islands. I want to make it clear, and would suggest that the words at the beginning:

The affairs of the people of be left out. It will then read:
With respect to any race.

Mr. REID:

It does not make the slightest difference which way you put it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

No doubt the Premier of New South Wales has made up his mind to support it as it is. I have no doubt Mr. Reid has good reason for it. But I consider that I am entitled to put the position as it appears to me. It will make a difference. So far as I can see, it is liable to misconstruction. It is a matter, however, which I would rather leave to the Drafting Committee, because no one more than I realises how important it is not to interfere with the drafting. But it is our duty to call attention to what, to my mind, will be an ambiguity.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

The words are quite sufficient as they are. I cannot see that the alteration suggested by the hon. member will make the slightest difference.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

This is Sir Samuel Griffith's clause. He had a special knowledge of the matter.

Sub-section I as read agreed to.
Sub-Section 2 as read agreed to.
Sub-section 3.

Mr. ISAACS:

As regards this third sub-section, I am sorry that my hon. friend Mr. Barton is not here. I asked the question on a previous clause with regard to taxes on exports. This subclause deals with matters relating to departments the control of which is to be transferred to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth. We find by clause 67 that that includes Customs and excise. I want to refer for the consideration of my hon. friends opposite to the matter of taxes on exports. I think on consideration that my hon. friend Mr. Barton will find that the interpretation he was disposed to attach to the expression in the American Constitution restraining the imposition by Congress of taxes upon exports upon any article is not confined to exports between States. The particular subclause to which he has regard in the American Constitution as to the proposed tax is put quite distinctly from subsequent paragraphs, and I think is so dealt with in American works on taxation. Judge Cooley's work, on page 38, deals with the subject. The extract I shall give is very short, and I will read it so that it may be referred to afterwards:

Taxes on exports. These, if the articles exported are a necessity to foreign countries, tend to transfer to such countries a part of the burden of supporting our own government. If not a necessity they diminish exportation and production. In either case they will usually be impolitic: in the latter, almost certainly, and in the former by inviting retaliatory legislation by the countries affected. In this country the States cannot levy export duties without the consent of Congress, except for the purpose of inspection, and Congress is also, prohibited to lay any tax or duty on articles exported from any State.

And that is apparently the view of American jurists, and the same idea is in Story and Burroughs. Reading the Constitution with the aid of these, there seems an absolute prohibition, apparently well-established in the Constitution, against putting export duties upon any articles exported from any State anywhere, and the reason of it, after reading the debates of the Philadelphia Convention, will be seen to be this, that it was considered, as regards various States exporting articles of different classes, it would be impossible for Congress to levy uniform export duties upon those exports with equal justice to the various States, and that therefore any such tax would unfairly prejudice the various States That was exactly the same matter I was referring to the other day, when I said that the Parliament might put a tax on the export of Tasmanian apples or Victorian butter, or New South Wales coal or wool; and it was the view of the majority of the Philadelphia Convention that Congress should be restrained from putting export duties at all upon the produce of the States. The idea apparently was that if there were to be any export duty at all, the State should be allowed to put it on as advancing its own interests, but only with the consent of Congress, as protecting the general welfare, and not to allow Congress to interfere with the production of the States and their exports to foreign countries at all.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I have taken a note of it.
Sub-section, as read, passed.
Sub-section 4, as read, passed.
Clause, as read, passed.
Clause 55.-Royal assent to Bills.

Mr. ISAACS:
I apprehend a note has been taken of the alteration that has been made in the word "law," and that it will be altered right through.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That will be done as a matter of course.
Clause, as read, passed.

Clause 56.-Disallowance by Order in Council of law assented to by Governor-General. As read, passed.

Clause 57.-A proposed law reserved for the Queen's pleasure shall not have any force unless and until within two years from the day on which it was presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent, the Governor-General makes known by speech or message to each of the Houses of The Parliament, or by Proclamation, that it has received the assent of the Queen In Council.

An entry of every such speech, message, or Proclamation shall be made in the Journals of each House.

Mr. REID:
I am inclined to think the period of two years is a long one to keep the Commonwealth in suspense as to whether the proposed law which it has passed is to become a law or not. I move:
To strike out "two years" in the second line of the clause with the view of inserting "one year in lieu thereof.

Mr. LEWIS:
I hope the amendment will not be agreed to without consideration. "Two years" is the maximum within which the Queen's pleasure may be announced, and it may be necessary for a considerable time to elapse in correspondence backwards and forwards. Only within the last two years a Bill passed through both Houses of the Tasmanian Parliament was reserved for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure. It was a Bill dealing with foreign companies. The Bill was sent to England, and was there referred to the Board of Trade. Their views were recorded and sent to Tasmania. A lengthy correspondence followed, and I believe it was considerably more than a year before the Queen's assent was given to that measure. Something of the same sort might happen again; as "two years" is only a maximum time, I hope the words will not be altered.

Mr. ISAACS:
I think Mr. Reid overlooks one important consideration. In the previous clause the period is "one year."

Mr. REID:
I have not overlooked that.

Mr. ISAACS:
In the previous section it is provided that if the Commonwealth Parliament passes a Bill the Queen's power of disallowance shall not extend beyond one year.

Mr. REID:
We all understand that.

Mr. ISAACS:
This clause relates to a Bill which is reserved for Her Majesty's assent. "Two years" does not seem to me to be too long. It is the time which has been in force for many years.

Mr. REID:
It used to apply at a time when it took 120 days for a mail to arrive here from England.

Mr. ISAACS:
My hon. friend's amendment would limit the power of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID:
It hangs a law of the Commonwealth up too long.

Mr. ISAACS:
Suppose, in the case that Mr. Lewis has referred to, it had been necessary for the Home Government to consult or correspond with other countries with which they had treaty obligations. There would be a long correspondence between the Colonial Government and the Home Government, and perhaps replies and re-replies, and then communication between the Home Government and the foreign Government; and if one year happened to elapse without the matter being definitely settled, all our work in the two Houses of the Federal Parliament would be thrown away and have to be gone through again. There can be no harm in keeping in "two years," while to limit that time would limit the powers of the Commonwealth.

[P.834] starts here

Mr. KINGSTON:
I agree with Mr. Reid, and think that the only effect of curtailing the time will be that we shall get the assent sooner, and prevent the matter being hung up. I had some knowledge of the matter to which Mr. Lewis has referred, and it strikes me that if there had been this alteration then the sole effect would have been that be would have got the assent earlier.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:

He might not.

Mr. GLYNN:

I would like to see all the clauses the same in this matter, and that if an Act of Parliament is not disallowed within a certain time it shall remain law. But we have throughout the Bill made the word Parliament to include the Queen, whereas in England it does not now really include the Queen. We are really fixing the Queen still as a legislative power of the realm. although constitutionally the position of the monarch in that respect has been dead for the last 200 years.

Clause 79—All duties, revenues, and moneys raised or received by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, under the authority of this Constitution, shall form one Consolidated Revenue Fund to be appropriated for the Public Service of the Commonwealth in the manner and subject to the charges provided by this Constitution.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

There seems to be a general desire that some statement should be made with regard to the work of the Finance Committee of an explanatory character. During the course of our debate on finance and trade, the work of the Committee will practically begin from clause 87; and, in order to avoid a general, debate at the beginning, I should be inclined to ask your indulgence until we come to clauses 87, 88, 89, and 90, which are really the most important part of the work of the Committee. The other clauses do not exactly admit of the same detailed debate.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I move a little alteration. As the clause stands it would cover loan moneys, and of course we do not want that. We do not want loan moneys to form part of the consolidated revenue fund to be appropriated for the public service of the Commonwealth.

They form part of the public accounts.

I propose:

That the words "duties" and "moneys" be struck out and "profits" inserted instead of "moneys."

So that it would read:

All revenues and profits raised or received by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, &c.

We do not want to have loan moneys included.

Mr. PEACOCK:

What are profits?

Mr. SYMON:

Are they not moneys you have received?

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

Why not let it stand as it is?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Because we do not want loan moneys taken into the revenue for the purposes of the Commonwealth.
Mr. REID:
Why not insert a proviso at the end of the clause:
Provided always that moneys raised by loan shall be passed to the credit to the Loan Account.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I think it is well to put it shortly I will first propose:
To strike out the word "duties,"
And then:
To strike out the words "and moneys."
Amendments agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.
Clause 80, as read, agreed to.
Clause 81.-No money shall be drawn from the Treasury of the Commonwealth except under appropriation made by law and by warrant counter signed by the Chief Officer of Audit of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I propose:
To strike out the word "by" before I warrant with the view of inserting the word "under."
It is only a verbal alteration.

Mr. ISAACS:
What is the object of that? It is right as it is. It is appropriated by law and drawn by warrant. You must leave it as it is.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Very well then.
Amendment negatived; clause as read agreed to.
Clause 82.-The Parliament shall have the sole power and authority, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, to impose customs duties, and to impose duties of excise upon goods for the time being the subject of customs duties, and to grant bounties upon the production or export of goods.
But this exclusive power shall not come into force until uniform duties of customs have been imposed by the Parliament.
Uniform duties of customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth.
Upon the imposition of uniform duties of customs all laws of the several States imposing duties of customs or duties of excise upon goods the subject of customs duties, and all such laws offering bounties upon the production or export of goods, shall cease to have effect.
The control and collection of duties of customs, and excise and the payment of bounties shall nevertheless pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth upon the establishment of the Commonwealth.
The CHAIRMAN:
I will put the clause in separate paragraphs. The question is, that paragraph I be agreed to."

Mr. WALKER:
I ask for information. Perhaps my hon, friend Mr. McMillan will favor us with a definition of the word "bounties" in line 29.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I should rather be inclined, upon a general question of this kind, to turn to my friend for a definition, as I do not at all pretend to be a higher financial authority than he is. It seems to me that the word "bounties" is a general term which might include almost anything specially done by the Government to induce trade or foster any particular industry. I think the word is general in its application.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
This clause provides that:
The Parliament shall have the sole power and authority, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, to impose Customs duties and to impose duties of excise upon goods for the time being the subject of Customs duties, &c.

Why should we limit our power to impose excise upon articles which are the subject of Customs duty. I fail to see the necessity of these words. because, it might be that we would deem it to be advisable to have an excise duty on an article which was not subject to Customs duty. If we leave these words in we limit the power of the Federal Government, but if we strike them out we enlarge their power. Unless some strong reason can be shown for the retention of the words, I propose:
To leave out "upon goods for the time being the subject of Customs duties."

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out that it will be necessary first to strike out the word "and" in line 3 of this paragraph.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Then I will move that.
The amendment to strike out the word "and" in line 3 of the paragraph was agreed to.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I think the other words ought to remain in. We had a great deal of discussion in 1891 upon the question of whether they were to impose excise duties on goods that were not the subject of Customs. I think Mr. McMillan, who took a prominent part in the discussion, will recollect the circumstances and the reasons.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It seems to me that under almost every conceivable circumstance an excise duty would be a sort of counterpoise to an import duty. But you may have an excise proposed upon an article which is not the subject of Customs duty, and perhaps in a Bill of this sort it would be as well not to do anything that would restrict the power of the Federal Parliament.

Amendment—to omit the words "upon goods for the time being the subject of Customs duties"—agreed to.

First paragraph of clause as amended agreed to.

Paragraph 2.

Mr. HENRY:

Hon. members will notice that the exclusive power of levying duties of excise is not to come into force until uniform duties of Customs only have been imposed. In the subsequent clause it states that:

Upon the imposition of uniform duties of Customs all laws of the several States imposing duties of Customs or duties of excise upon goods the subject of Customs duties, and all such laws offering bounties upon the production or export of goods, shall cease to have effect.

Now it is tolerably clear to me that it will be necessary that the uniform excise duties should be imposed at the same time as the Customs duties, because all the existing excise duties would be imposed on that. There is no provision in this sub-section for imposing excise duties.

Mr. REID:

That again is a matter with which the Federal Parliament must be trusted. They will not overlook the fact that the local excise will cease until a uniform tariff is passed.

Mr. HENRY:

But this sub-section states that the exclusive power should not come into force until uniform duties of Customs have been imposed by the Parliament.

Mr. SYMON:

This is only fixing a time.

Mr. HENRY:

I think it is necessary to add after "Customs" "and excise."

Mr. REID:

That is compelling them to impose duties of excise.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I do not think the excise duties would cease.

Mr. HENRY:
If the hon. member will read the sub-section he will see that they will cease, and we are to be in this position, that the Federal Parliament may not think it necessary to impose uniform excise duties. It is just as necessary that the Federal Parliament should be authorised to deal with excise as well as Customs duties.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
The revenue would cease, and they would have to do something.

Mr. HENRY:
I move to add after "Customs," in line 32, "and excise." I think that will coincide with the ideas of the framers of the Bill.

Mr. SYMON:
May I point out to my hon. friend that this amendment is unnecessary, for the only object of the first sub-section is to confer the sole power of authority on the Parliament, is to impose Customs duties and to impose duties of excise upon goods for the time being the subject of Customs duties, and to grant bounties upon the production or export of goods; that is to say, that there is to be exercised by the Federal Parliament alone a power in substitution for the power previously exercised by the different States. This object of the sub-section is merely to define the time in which this is to come into operation, and there is no obligation imposed on the Federal Parliament to do what the hon. member seems to imagine. It does not say that the Parliament should declare uniform Customs duties, and therefore I think the amendment is not necessary.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I should like to call attention to the wording of this sub-clause, and I have spoken to Sir John Downer on the subject, but he does not appear to see with me that my objection is material. The section has led to considerable criticism as to the expression used. The first subsection says the Parliament is to have sole power and authority to impose Customs duties, and the second says this exclusive power should not come into force until uniform duties have been imposed. The thing is inconsistent and absurd, and the object will be better attained by saying:

But this power shall not be exclusive.

I understand any State can alter its duties until uniform duties have been imposed.

Mr. REID:
I think it will be accepted.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   It is exactly the same thing.
Mr. REID:
   Exactly.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   You first say Parliament has the sole power to impose duties, and then you say the power is not to come into force until uniform duties have been imposed. I suggest therefore that the words:
   This exclusive power shall not come into force should be struck out, and that we insert in place of them:
   This power shall not be exclusive.
Mr. ISAACS:
   The way it strikes my mind is this: if we turn to section 50 it is provided that the Parliament shall have power to make laws for Customs duties and bounties, and that power comes into force at once. It is a concurrent power.
Clause 82 says they shall have the exclusive power, but that it is not to come into force until the happening of a certain event. We have this concurrent power, and as the power provided in this clause does not come into force until this event happens-
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   The clause is properly worded.
Mr. ISAACS:
   I think it is.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   The point is that the only power to impose Customs duties is a power to impose uniform duties; and until uniform duties are imposed a State Parliament can impose any duties it likes. It follows, therefore, that the sub-clause should read:
   But this power shall not be exclusive.
Mr. REID:
   Is not that what it means now?
Mr. SYMON:
   Yes.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   No.
Mr. SYMON:
   The governing word is "exclusive."
Mr. HIGGINS:
   I have carefully avoided this question of drafting, but before I submitted this to the Committee I put it to Sir John Downer. This particular wording has been criticised by Sir Charles Dilke and others as being weak and inconsistent, and I suggest that the wording should be put right.

Mr. HENRY:
I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.
Leave granted.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I move to amend the clause
By striking out "This exclusive power shall not come into force," and inserting "This power shall not be exclusive."

Mr. SYMON:
I ask Mr. Higgins not to press this amendment. I do so for this reason: I quite agree that this clause is not drafted with that clearness and precision that it might have been, and at the risk of being considered critical, I may say that the same applies to other clauses as well. We cannot, however, sit as a supervisory Drafting Committee, and, therefore, I ask the hon. member to withdraw the amendment and allow the Drafting Committee to deal with it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I will withdraw the amendment.
Amendment withdrawn.
Paragraph agreed to.
Paragraph 3.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I have a little doubt in my own mind regarding this paragraph.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Is it about drafting?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
No. In imposing uniform duties of Customs it should not be necessary for the Federal Parliament to make them commence at a certain amount at once. We have pretty heavy duties in Victoria, and if the uniform tariff largely reduces them at once it may do serious injury to the colony. The Federal Parliament will have power to fix the uniform tariff, and if any reductions made are on a sliding scale great injury will be avoided. Before the clause is passed I should be glad if Mr. O'Connor will say if the fair and true reading of this particular clause is that in imposing uniform duties the Federal Parliament has power to impose them on a sliding scale?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think the reading of the sub-section is clear. The reductions may be on a sliding scale, but they must always be uniform.
Paragraph agreed to.
Paragraph 4.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:

This paragraph raises a very important question, that of protecting existing arrangements which have been entered into with regard to bounties. It provides:

Upon the imposition of uniform duties of Customs all laws of the several States imposing duties of Customs or duties of excise upon goods the subject of Customs duties, and all such laws offering bounties upon the production or export of goods shall cease to have effect.

This only provides for laws, but there may be other arrangements for bounties.

Mr. REID:

May I suggest that the point you are raising will come in better under clause 85, which specially provides that in a certain event the local laws as to bounties shall cease. A rider could be added, if a majority agrees to it, protecting these existing arrangements.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

That is only until uniform duties are imposed. Clause 85 is limited.

Mr. REID:

We are all agreed that the local legislatures should not give bounties, and a rider as to existing contracts would come in better under clause 85, which terminates the local laws.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I do not understand the necessity for the two clauses.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Carry this sub-section into clause 85.

Mr. REID:

It is somewhat of a repetition in clause 85.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I do not exactly understand the object. I would point out that this only applies to laws offering bounties, and many of them are given by virtue of regulations.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

The regulations are framed under Acts.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Of course these regulations are made by virtue of laws. The main point I wish the Committee to consider is with regard to contracts already in existence, or which may be in existence before this Act comes into force, or before the uniform duties of Customs come into operation. I think that where a colony has already entered into arrangements, or where before this Bill becomes law, the colony chooses to enter into an arrangement, that arrangement ought to be protected; otherwise we may have this position, that by giving a bounty we have encouraged the starting of some new industry, and if that is to cease suddenly it may mean ruin to that industry. I am not prepared to draft an amendment. I think that is the duty of the Drafting Committee, if they are of the same mind as myself. There is that question, and also the other question whether we will take away from the States the right to give bounties for exports if they so choose. That, however, is another point altogether. What I want to deal with now is that the Drafting Committee will take some steps to draft an amendment to protect the industries that are supported by bounties.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

The Drafting Committee will be glad to prepare the amendment, which the hon. member wants, but as one of that committee, would vehemently oppose it, because I think it would be dangerous. We would enable a coach and four to be, driven through this Bill, which cannot come into force for some time, and in the meantime, by giving bounties right and left, we would have the policy of free trade handicapped to a great extent. We would be glad to assist the hon. member in framing the amendment, but, so far as the Drafting Committee are concerned, I do not think any one member would support it.

Mr. FRASER:

Undoubtedly existing bounties should be protected.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Certainly.

Mr. FRASER:

And I think they might properly be made a charge on Customs. They are not so extensive that we need strain at them. I quite agree with Sir John Downer that any future bounties might jeopardise the Customs revenue hereafter, and they should not be allowed.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

From now?

Mr. FRASER. Yes; from now.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

There would be no objection to that.

Mr. FRASER:

Each colony should keep faith with the work we are doing, and give no more bounties from now.

Mr. REID:

No one would object to that.
It is absolutely necessary that no harm should be done to existing industries, but only existing bounties should be protected.

Mr. HOLDER:

I want to mention an instance. In the Northern Territory we have paid a bonus on the export of cattle. The contract has two years to run, and if Federation came about within that two years, even in spite of that clause South Australia would be compelled to carry out that contract and pay the export bounty—I think a pound a head.

Mr. FRASER:

It is no very big matter.

Mr. HOLDER:

We ought not to pass legislation here which would have the effect of requiring any of the States to abrogate any contracts they have entered into. There is some force in the statement that the matter should not be left open so that all sorts of bounties may be paid, but we should provide that all contracts should be recognised before the coming into operation of this Bill,

HON. MEMBERS:

No. Before this day.

Mr. HOLDER:

I wish I was sanguine enough to feel that Federation was so close.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It will prevent us giving bounties during the next twelve or eighteen months.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

And a good thing, too.

Mr. HOLDER:

If we are to provide that it shall be up to to-day a State will have considerable difficulty and delicacy in giving bounties which it may not be able to continue. If it were quite clear that Federation were coming about within a year or two, we might well fix the date; but as it is impossible to say how long it will be it is reasonable to say that up to the date of the issue of the Proclamation bounties may be given. I want to follow Sir George Turner in his desire to leave out the words "or export." It is quite proper to prevent bounties being given by a State for the production of goods that are disposed of in Australia, because that would strike a blow at the very root of equality of trade. But the States should not be prohibited from giving assistance in the production of goods for the foreign market. South Australia has done something in that direction, Victoria is doing something, and did so before South Australia, and other colonies are contemplating doing something of the kind with the view of promoting the export of colonial produce; and I cannot see at all why we should absolutely prohibit any State from rendering aid from its revenues in that way to develop a particular industry. It may be said that the federal authority should give these bounties, but there are various difficulties in the way of that.

Mr. FRASER:

The Dominion of Canada gives them, and very liberally too.

Mr. HOLDER:

But I want to point out the difficulty of following the example of the Dominion of Canada. Canada includes country not much different in various parts from other parts in its natural character and productiveness.

Mr. FRASER:

Oh, yes; very different.

Mr. HOLDER:

But herein Australasia the conditions are not the same. Supposing, for instance, that it were desired to develop the beet sugar industry in South Australia or Victoria, how could any Federal Government having in view the sugar industry in Queensland give bounties out of its federal funds to develop the sugar beet trade in Victoria or South Australia? The same remark would apply to other industries. Any movement in this direction must be local, or confined to one colony or two colonies; it cannot have a general application. In spite of what has been said, any proposal of a bonus must of necessity be for the benefit of one or two colonies, and cannot be shared by all the colonies, because of the different character of the colonies. Seeing the different character of the colonies, and the different conditions that prevail, each State must be left to develop its own territory, and its own territorial industries. Therefore, if the words "and export" are struck out, I shall be quite prepared to follow the suggested amendment.

Mr. FRASER:

I contend that each colony will have to take the full responsibility of what it is doing, and as each colony will be fully aware of about the date when Federation will come about—if ever it does come about, for it will not come in a night or like a thunderstorm

Mr. SYMON:

It will be like the dawn—not a thunderstorm.

Mr. FRASER:

If each colony should carry on its bounties for, say, one year the producers will not be caught in a trap. I do not think the clause requires any alteration at all.
Mr. MCMILLAN:

I am advised that this question of bounties, of which we are anxious to get a definition, has been made a very close study by the Hon. the Minister of Education in Victoria, and that hon. gentleman may enlighten us on this subject.

Mr. PEACOCK:

I have sent it on to the Attorney-General. You do not have me that way.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Now, this is a very serious matter. It is a very serious matter to turn our backs on an absolute and complete system of intercolonial freetrade; and I am very much afraid we must either make a sacrifice in some direction or we must trust implicitly to the Federal Government to find a way out of the difficulty. If you once begin to allow certain exceptions to this absolute system of intercolonial freetrade by which the respective States can give bounties, foster industries, and do all sorts of things of that kind, it will be almost impossible to avoid subterfuges which will affect the general principle of intercolonial freetrade. Therefore this seems to be one of those things where we must practically yield to the Government, trusting to them to deal with it on a broad and comprehensive system. With regard to this question brought up by Sir George Turner, it was one of the suggestions made in a memorandum to the Drafting Committee that the respective rights should be preserved, but I agree with other Speakers, that unless we make a definite date, very soon from now-

Sir JOHN DOWNER Make it the date of the beginning of our proceedings.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It will be impossible to prevent matters being done in contravention of our own Act. It would not do to make it the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth, because in the meantime this work might be going on, and it might be building up huge obstacles in the way of the Federal Treasurer. I think we might make it the first day of the meeting of this Convention.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Make it January, 1898.

Mr. SYMON:

I hope that neither the amendment of Sir George Turner nor that hinted at by other speakers will be adopted. I seems to me that this is striking a much more serious blow at the policy of this proposed Constitution than at first eight appears. To begin with, if we introduce any exceptions at all we are striking a blow at not only the symmetry, but at the essential features of this scheme of intercolonial freetrade. I hope hon. members will not be carried away by any suggested compromise, which is really not a compromise, but is an evasion of that principle. What is suggested is that first of all we give to the federal authority the power of imposing uniform duties of Customs. That power is to be exercised within two years. They are also to impose uniform duties of excise, and all local duties are to cease. It is also to have the power of granting bounties, and the State power of granting bounties is also to cease. Why should an exception be made in the case of bounties which is not made in the case of Customs or excise? Why are excise or Customs duties, in respect of which large vested interests of the greatest importance have grown up, not to be protected against the onslaught of the Federal Parliament? If you are to trust the Federal Parliament in one respect, surely you can in another. If you are to invade its authority in the direction of bounties, why not in the direction of excise and Customs? In this colony we might have industries which those who happen to be protectionists—and I am not one—may wish to put on a high tariff; and it may be difficult to get the men interested in these particular industries to yield up the control of the duties which protect them to the Federal Parliament. But there will be no more difficulty in that case than in the case of those who want to be privileged to have bounties.

Mr. FRASER:
Bounties are bound by contract.

Mr. SYMON:
So are these. Is it not a matter of parliamentary contract?

Mr. PEACOCK:
That is too fine a point.

Mr. SYMON:
Undoubtedly it is subject to repeal, but no Parliament in the world would play fast and loose with what is entrusted to it, and I for one, freetrader as I am to the very core, would protest against any wholesale or wanton interference with these Customs duties.

Mr. FRASER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
I think it would be dangerous and unjust indeed.

Mr. FRASER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
But it is not more unjust in the case of Customs than of bounties.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Bounties have to be paid for a certain number of years.

Mr. SYMON:
I admit that is so if there are contracts at this moment. We cannot take a better case than that put by Mr. Holder, the existing contract to give bounties on the export of cattle from the Northern Territory. Will anybody suggest for one moment that the Federal Parliament would be so lost to all sense of the solemnity and the binding character of contracts as not to give effect to that?

Mr. Reid:
Hear, hear.

Mr. Symon:
The thing would be absurd. That contract would be protected.

Sir George Turner:
They could not do so if the local laws are to cease.

Mr. Symon:
I look on this as simply transferring the controlling power with regard to bounties from the State to the Federal Government. It is simply a matter of transference, and not a cessation of the bounties.

Mr. Peacock:
Would it leave to the Federal Parliament the power to carry out the contract?

Mr. Symon:
Undoubtedly. If it does not, I have altogether misunderstood the Bill.

Mr. Reid:
It will leave the obligation of the State unimpaired.

Mr. Symon:
If anyone can say it is an intimation to the federal authority to abrogate all existing contracts I think the sooner we tear that page out of this Constitution the better.

Mr. Henry:
If the powers as to bounties are to be uniform, as they must be, how does that affect your view?

Mr. Symon:
If the bounties are to be uniform I do not know whether they will be.

Sir George Turner:
They would be. Look at section 50.

Dr. Cockburn:
Sub-section 2.

Mr. Symon:
Even assuming they would be, the Federal Parliament undoubtedly would have the power to protect existing contracts under the legislation which imposed these bounties.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Why not make certain and put it in?

Mr. SYMON:

I should have no objection whatever to that. So far as regards existing contracts, so long as you can frame the words in such a way as not to make an exception to the system which is to be established by this Constitution-

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:

I mean the intention of having a symmetrical and just system of intercolonial freetrade. If we had to make exception as to bounties it ought to be extended to Customs duties, which certainly ought not to be repealed so as to inflict injustice on any person or business. We are entrusting that to the Federal Parliament, and if we are to give them any power in this connection and under the system we are framing, it ought to be to the full width of the scheme which is being established, and we ought not to introduce any exceptions unless it be in the direction indicated by Mr. Peacock: simply to reserve those matters which are the subject, not of legislation, but of special contract, when the Federal Parliament comes to deal with uniform duties. I do not want to save much about striking out the words "or export." I submit it will be a very great mistake to strike those words out. Whilst I appreciate what has been said as to the difference between offering bounties upon production and bounties upon export, still by giving to a State the power of conferring bounties upon exports you may practically cut away from the Federal Parliament the exclusive right which it is to have to give bounties on production. By giving them on exports of local production to foreign parts you indirectly give bounties on production. It might lead to great abuses-to great difficulties between the State Parliaments and the Federal Parliament, and it would be better, as we are desirous to have this as free as possible, and so that causes of irritation and difficulty may be avoided, to leave the clause as it stands.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Before you put this paragraph it seems to me this question of how to deal with bounties is of much greater importance than at first eight appears. There are a number of industries, I think, in a new country such as ours is, that are continually appealing to the State for assistance, and it frequently happens that industries of immense importance are incapable of development without State assistance. And if we deprive the States of the power to give bounties for the development of industries within their own boundaries, we may very materially cripple the States and retard the development of Australia. It just occurs to me now that we give in Victoria every year very large sums for the development of mining. I do not know whether these would be called bounties, and whether the State should be prohibited from giving them.

Mr. Barton:
The words are:
And to grant duties upon the production or export of goods.
That can scarcely apply to mining.

Sir William Zeal:
It cannot apply to mining.

Mr. Trenwith:
Perhaps not. Then we have the iron industry. We have discovered no iron within our borders in Victoria yet but it is assumed that we have large deposits of iron, and it may be in the very near future found expedient to give from the State coffers some encouragement for the development of the iron industry.

Mr. Wise:
How would that work out in regard to New South Wales? We are producing iron, and sending it to Victoria.

Mr. Trenwith:
Suppose this iron industry does not develop to any extent in New South Wales, and she found it expedient, as I think she may, to give some substantial monetary assistance for the development of her iron industry, would it not be a misfortune if she were prohibited by this Constitution from doing so? I am pointing these difficulties out because it is important that we should get over the difficulty by some amendment providing that bounties may be given by the respective States with the consent of the Commonwealth Parliament.

Mr. Walker:
At the expense of the State?

Mr. Trenwith:
At the expense of the State. This is merely a suggestion which has just occurred to me. I have not thought out an amendment, but I do wish to point out one of the hundred and one ways in which this difficulty may confront the various sections of the Commonwealth unless some safety clause is adopted by which, without infringing that freedom of trade between the colonies which we are anxious to achieve, we may at the same time give the greatest possible facility to the States to develop their natural resources. I would strongly urge upon hon. members this view, and suggest to the Drafting Committee the desirability of seeing if some clause could not be framed by which any infringement of the freetrade we are anxious to achieve should be prevented, and at the same time liberty given to the States within fair and proper limits to develop their internal resources.

Consequential amendment - to omit "upon goods the subject of Customs duties"-agreed to.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Although I agree to the-very fullest extent with Mr. Symon as to the desirability of freeing our trade and commerce in every possible way, I think we ought to pay due regard to those engagements which have been entered into by the different colonies in regard to these bounties. I see a very wide distinction between bounties on the one hand which are a matter of contract between governments and individuals and excise and customs which are not matters decided between contracting parties. And inasmuch as a breach of any contract entered into up to the present time by any one colony with manufacturers or others to whom bounties have been promised, would be an absolute breach of faith which we should not desire to see committed. I will move to add to the sub-section the following proviso:

Provided that this sub-section shall not affect any bounty contracted for prior to March 31, 1897.

Mr. HOLDER:

The hon. member Mr. Symon used with very great effect the argument that any bounties given by the federal authority must be equal. If they could be equal I should say nothing against committing the whole matter to the care and control of the federal authorities; but I want to point out certain instances-three at least-in which any attempt at equality would simply be a pretence, and that equality in respect of the things to which I refer is a matter of impossibility. Supposing, for instance, that a bonus should be given for the export of cane sugar, does not everyone see that that would be a bonus offered to Queensland alone?

Mr. FRASER:

Not necessarily.

Mr. HOLDER:

Supposing that a bonus were given for the export of beet sugar, does not everyone see that that would be a bonus offered to the southern colonies, and that Queensland might suffer a serious disadvantage? Or supposing that a bonus were given for the export of wine, would not that be a bonus from which New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia might get an advantage, but which the other colonies could not get any advantage from at all?
Mr. FRASER:

Queensland would.

Mr. HOLDER:

Queensland, from wine? Queensland's wine is not very good yet, and is not going to be. Some of the most southern districts of Queensland may be able to produce wine, but I was told by a Queenslander the other day that some people called it wine, but he called it bad vinegar. So far as the greater portion of Queensland is concerned, it is impossible that it can ever become an exporter of wine in any quantity. It is impossible to make this much-vaunted equality work out throughout the Commonwealth, on account of the different conditions under which we live. It ought to be left to each State to provide the funds out of its own revenues, and to deal with this matter as it thinks fit. We leave the question of territory-land with all its associated problems—in the hands of the various States, and what has more to do with the development of the Crown lands and the foundation of the settlement of these lands, as well as enlarging the industries dependent upon th

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You are confining your remarks to export.

Mr. HOLDER:

Yes, and that only. I am pointing out that in these matters we ought to give a free hand to the States, for which I plead for larger freedom.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The question of bounties is important from either aspect. In the first instance, any attempt to impose nominal conditions upon the granting of bounties would, as Mr. Holder points out, be futile. Personally, I do not find that a ground for State alarm, nor do I find the illustration which the hon. member has offered any ground for alarm either. It appears to me that the representation in both Houses will be efficient enough to deal with all the districts included in all the States; and no scheme of bounties would be likely to receive the consent of the Federal Parliament unless there were coupled with bounties which could only be to the advantage of particular portions of the Continent, other bounties offering an equivalent advantage to other colonies. There must be in a colony with such diverse products as those of South Australia, in an even greater degree than in Victoria, where so many experiments of this kind have been made, the proof that bounties are given which affect only small parts of the colony, and yet we have found no difficulty in equalising concessions made to particular districts. I fail to see why the Federal Parliament should not adopt a similarly equitable course.

Mr. HOLDER:
Australasia is a bit bigger than Victoria.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The same principle applies, and therefore I do not see the application of the interjection. All I have to say is that on this and on similar matters we must trust the Federal Government. I am with the hon. member in looking upon the restrictions apparently sought to be imposed by this clause in the matter of bounties as extremely serious. For instance, under the wide wording of this clause I have no doubt, as Mr. Trenwith has pointed out, that the bounties we grant on our gold mining industry might be affected. Only during the last six months our Parliament voted large sums of money to encourage the production of gold, which is mainly exported. It was never intended by the most ardent federalist that there should be the right to interfere with each State in dealing with such industries. If we adopt the suggestion that has been thrown out, following up the clue given by Mr. Holder, we may find a way out of this difficulty. The State need not be prohibited from granting bounties on all goods which are exported and sold abroad. If it is possible to effect freetrade between the different colonies in the group without this restriction, although such a privilege might enable that State to give an advantage to its products abroad over those of the other States of the Commonwealth, it appears to be an unnecessary limitation of State powers to forbid them absolutely on that account. I would rigorously enforce the principle embodied in the 86th clause, that:

Trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth shall be absolutely free.

I would make every bounty invalid that in any way attacked the principle laid down in that clause. Provided that this can be preserved, it appears to me there is no necessity for the Federal Government to seek to interfere with the States in granting bounties for every export so long as this freedom is absolutely preserved. This matter is of serious importance, and it should not be left with the mere bare statement contained in this clause, which, with the apparent object of rendering trade and commerce absolutely free, might unnecessarily deprive the States of rights they possess, and ought to possess in the future, of being able to foster their mining and other similar interests.

Mr. REID:

The illustration made as to bounties and export duties, as if they differed from the ordinary principle underlying Customs, seems to me to entirely fail of analogy. For instance, if you offer a premium for the export of a single article, is not that placing, the production of a certain colony in a superior position to that of another colony which does not offer bounties, and which regards the system as a pernicious one. Will it not affect the position of that colony where there is no such premium or fiscal encouragement? The whole question of bounties is wrapped up in the fiscal policy. Take the case of a protective tariff. If a Parliament honestly goes about its work to pass a protective tariff, will that not be the means of protecting articles produced in only one part of the Commonwealth, and which cannot possibly be produced in any other part? Will not that be a preference to that one particular part of Australia over every other part? But it is entirely justified from a broad protectionist point of view. The protectionists, if their area of view is enlarged will, I am sure, apply the principle just as fairly to products grown in the distant parts of Australia as at their own doors. We must trust the Parliament to carry out the principle, if carried out at all, honestly and fearlessly. Suppose, for instance, there were a protective tariff, it would be the duty of the Parliament to put a duty on coal, and that would benefit only a few parts of Australia. I mention this as one of thousands of instances to show that we must trust to the Federal Parliament to fairly and honestly and fearlessly do their work. On their broad principle the protectionists allege that anything that will benefit a particular part of the Commonwealth will benefit the whole, but it appears to me, if we are handing over the paramount power of the fiscal policy, we cannot allow the different colonies to apply the fiscal experiment for themselves. The result would be that, in self-defence, colonies would be compelled to adopt a policy which they might thoroughly repudiate. If one colony sets itself to work to encourage an industry by bounty it is clearly the duty of others to interfere. If one colony is allowed to, in this way, alter the conditions of production of any article it will alter the conditions of production throughout the whole Commonwealth, and in consequence people who may disapprove of the policy may be forced in self-defence to offer similar bounties in their own colonies.

Mr. DEAKIN:
You do not object to grants in aid to mining?

Mr. REID:
They cannot come under the operation of the clause, as mining or local enterprises do not fall within the meaning of the words "finance and trade." What has the development of a gold mine to do with trade and finance in the ordinary acceptance of the word?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You cannot apply it to coal mining.
Mr. REID:
I do not see how it can be applied. The premium for the discovery of mines or of gold at a certain depth surely does not come under a clause of this kind. If it does, we can safeguard it. I do not much object to Mr. Trenwith's proposal that a State should have the power to offer bounties with the consent of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON:
That is only the power of the Federal Parliament over again.

Mr. REID:
I do not object to elasticity where it is safeguarded. The basic principle on which we are acting is the withdrawal of the right of States to offer bounties. Existing contracts are quite different things. I am quite sure that no court of law, on the face of the words of the section as it stands, would decide that it abrogated existing contracts. It would want much stronger words than these to do so, especially when work has been done.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It may not be done.

Mr. SYMON:
The word is "law."

Mr. REID:
If you destroy the root you destroy the tree. In spite of that I do not think any court would hold any contract to be void without express terms. At the same time I think the clause should be altered, and I am quite agreeable to the amendment of Sir Edward Braddon, which will protect every bounty which has been established up to the present time. We must all admit, now that we are on the brink of knowing whether we are to have Federation, that we should hold our hands as far as possible, and Sir Edward Braddon's amendment may be safely introduced. It would recognise a just principle, and leave the obligation of paying the bounty on the State which imposed it, whereas the effect of the words in the clause-I would draw Mr. Barton's attention particularly to this-would lay the obligation of the payment of the bounties imposed by any State on the Federal Government, although the bounty was established by a local body in its own interests, and the benefit would probably be reaped by the community which imposed it. I do not think the Commonwealth should be saddled with such payment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That should not be done.

Mr. REID:
I am quite in favor, as every honest person must be, of protecting existing contracts. It is a question of morality, and I think Sir Edward Braddon's amendment would make it plain. I believe that without his amendment they would be protected, but I do not think we should object to a few words if they have the effect of making it clearer. They would certainly remove any anxiety from the minds of those who have expended money on the strength of the bounties. I would point out to Mr. Barton that the responsibility of paying a bounty should remain on the State which imposed it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
My hon. friend Mr. Symon has suggested a better form of wording for my amendment, and it is this:
But any contract subsisting with any State on the thirty-first of March, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, under which bounties are given by such State shall not be impaired.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
If you put that it will shut Mr. Holder out. He comes before that.

Mr. BARTON:
He has not put an amendment.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I think the answer of the Premier of New South Wales in regard to this is sufficient. I do not see how we can preserve what I desire to preserve without running grave risks. What I now suggest is that the object I had in view might be partially met by adding the words:
Wares and merchandise after
Goods.
This would help to show that gold mining is not intended to be included. We want some definition of the word "bounty," or some understanding that it is to be read in connection with the clause providing for freedom of trade and commerce. What is wanted is a prohibition against a State interfering with clause 86, providing for the absolute freedom of trade and commerce. Subject to, that one important qualification we need not hamper State action in this regard.

Mr. BARTON:
I think there is something in what my hon. friend Mr. Deakin has suggested as to adding the words "wares and merchandise" after "goods."

Mr. DEAKIN:
It was Mr. O'Connor's suggestion.

Mr. BARTON:
It has occurred to Mr. O'Connor and myself that a bounty would not be a reward for the discovery of a goldfield.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Would goods, wares, and merchandise cover gold productions?
Mr. DEAKIN:
It narrows the meaning.

Mr. BARTON:
If Mr. Deakin's suggestion were adopted the Chairman might have permission, as he had before, to make the addition of the words where necessary.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I have pleasure in moving that, as I understand my hon. friend does not desire to move amendments-

Mr. KINGSTON:
The control and collection of duties of customs and excise, and the payment of bounties shall nevertheless pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth upon the establishment of the Commonwealth.

The word "nevertheless" shows that this paragraph was intended to follow the second paragraph:

But this exclusive power shall not come into force until uniform duties of Customs have been imposed by the Parliament.

It would be better to have paragraphs 3 and 4 dealing with the position of affairs on the imposition of a uniform tariff in clause 86 than in this one, which simply deals with the powers of the Commonwealth in various respects. As it is now the paragraph is out of place.

Mr. BARTON:
There are now five paragraphs instead of four as in the 1891 Bill.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am now suggesting to the Drafting Committee that we ought to deal in one broad and comprehensive clause with what will be the position of affairs upon the adoption of a uniform Customs tariff. There are at present two provisions on the subject introduced in two different places, and it would be much better that they should appear together. Clause 82 should be more properly confined to dealing with the power of the Commonwealth with reference to various matters, and as to what happens when that power is exercised in a certain way we might put it where we find a similar provision on the subject in section 86, which deals with what is the position upon the adoption of a uniform tariff.

Mr. BARTON:
Would it be sufficient if we obtained a transposition of this subclause and put it next after clause 86?

Mr. KINGSTON:
It seems to me that section 82 more properly deals with the powers of the Commonwealth with reference to various matters, that clauses 83 and 84 deal with incidental matters, clause 85 deals with what is to happen until uniform duties are imposed, and that clause 86 deals with what shall happen so soon as the powers referred to as regards the imposition of uniform duties have been exercised by the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:
I will look into these matters. Notwithstanding the able draughtsmanship of the 1891 Bill, there are several clauses not quite in their right place in it, and it would be well to alter their order. The Drafting Committee will look into that matter, and at the end of the proceedings will ask hon. members to give their attention to such alterations as they may suggest. It will be better to transpose some of the clauses. With reference to Sir Edward Braddon's amendment, which is put in a better form than that suggested by Mr. Symon, I do not think there is any actual necessity for it. I find in Maxwell on "Interpretation of Statutes," 1st edition, page 192, this passage:

It is where the enactment would prejudicially affect vested rights, or the legal character of past Acts, that the presumption against a retrospective operation is strongest. Every Statute which takes away or impairs vested rights acquired under existing laws, or create a new obligation, or imposes a new duty, or attaches a new disability in respect of transactions or considerations already past, must be presumed, out of respect to the Legislature, to be intended not to have a retrospective operation. Thus the provision of the Statute of Frauds, that no action should be brought to charge any person on any agreement made in consideration of marriage, unless the agreement were in writing, was held not to apply to an agreement which had been made before the Act was passed. The Mortmain Act, in the same way, was held not to apply to a devise made before it was enacted. So it was held that the Act of 8 & 9 Vict., c. 106, which made all wagers void, and enacted that no action should be brought or maintained for a wager, applied only to wagers made after the Act was passed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There is no doubt about those cases, I should say.

Mr. BARTON:
In subsequent editions these examples are multiplied. The principle underlying the matter is this: that a court in construing an Act assumes that Parliament never intended to do a thing which is unjust. I am quite sure that Mr. Symon will agree that the provision is not necessary.

Mr. SYMON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:
There need not be the least fear that any court of justice would so interpret the provision as to apply to anything made before the law took effect. But there is something in the amendment which, of course, must not be overlooked, and that is that it imposes a limitation as to time which may be most valuable; that is to say, it would prevent anyone belonging to any State from so arranging contracts under a system of bounties-if the probability of this Convention resulting in Federation were ascertained-which would have the effect of enabling contracts mountains high to be heaped up which the Commonwealth would have to allow to continue. I should like to endorse very strongly what has been said by Mr. Reid with reference to the argument used by Mr. Holder. The object of a bounty is the encouragement of the production of an article ascertained to be producible in a country in the same way as you would encourage its production by placing an import duty upon it. If you are to consider that the question of a bounty on sugar, the produce of Queensland, is only of interest to Queensland and that Queensland alone should bear the expense of it, then it follows that a protective duty on that article would be a matter-though it would be paid by the rest of the colonies-which would be of interest to Queensland alone, and therefore of no interest to the Commonwealth. The two arguments must go together; that is to say, what is said about the policy of a bounty must apply to the policy of an import duty. Take the case of iron in the United States. If the United States had placed enormous bounties on the manufacture of iron, and had not made high duties having for their object the encouragement of its production, it would have been arguable that those who favored the production of iron by an import duty were taxing the whole of the United States for the benefit of the State of Pennsylvania. The argument may be held by protectionists to fail in one respect, because there was a national importance in the production of iron which outweighed the payment of the duty by the whole community; and so with a bounty, extend your area, as you may. If New South Wales puts a heavy duty on sugar, principally produced in the Clarence, Richmond, and Tweed districts, it is argued that New South Wales is taxing the whole of her inhabitants to enable the production of sugar to be carried on in one portion of her territory. That may be urged, but on the other hand it is urged that this is an industry of importance to the national entity, and the encouragement of it in that way is arguable precisely in the same way. My argument applies to bounties, and it has its application even if you extend the area to which it applies. The federation of Australia into a Commonwealth for fiscal purposes does not affect the argument. If the industry is sufficiently important to be encouraged, the same argument applies to the imposition of a duty as to the offering of a bounty. It would be as much an infringement of the principle of equality of trade and fair play all round to allow a State to continue to offer bounties as to continue to impose duties. The suggested amendment of Mr. Trenwith partially meets, but does not wholly answer, that argument, because if the Commonwealth allows a State to go on offering bounties it is the same as if it allows a State to go on imposing duties on goods. One cannot be allowed any more than the other, but if it is sufficiently important for the whole of the Commonwealth, on the ground of national importance, the Commonwealth would be justified in imposing an import duty or offering a bounty.

The CHAIRMAN:
Do I understand that Mr. Barton presses the amendment as to wares and merchandise?
Mr. BARTON:
Yes; I should like to press it. I ask to have it put in at the end of line 38.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That will probably shut Mr. Holder out.

The CHAIRMAN:
Mr. Holder has given notice of an amendment which comes at the end of the clause.
Mr. HOLDER:
I am afraid I am precluded from moving that just now because I understand Sir Edward Braddon has one which comes before it.

The CHAIRMAN:
Several amendments have been indicated, but I have not put any yet.
Mr. HOLDER:
Mr. Deakin is moving in the direction in which I am very anxious to see some action taken, but I wish to suggest to him that the first sub-section is the one which really declares that the Federal Parliament shall have the sole power of authority.
Mr. DEAKIN:
Hear, hear. I was referring to that.
Mr. HOLDER:
But to make that alteration in sub-section 4 would not accomplish the purpose Mr. Deakin has in view.
Mr. DEAKIN:
I quite see that.
Mr. HOLDER:
It would be better if the hon. member could introduce an amendment to modify the effect of sub-section 1, whereas the addition of words to the words already existing would rather leave the difficulty unmet. If we leave out the word "goods" and insert the word "merchandise," well and good, but if we leave in the word "goods" and add by way of amplification some further items, we shall get very wide of the mark. While I admit the weight of what Mr. Reid and Mr. Barton have said as to the close relationship between bounties and Customs duties, I would strongly press the point that this question of bounties has everything to do with the development of our territory.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLDER:
We have large areas of land, the price of which, the value they are to the State Governments, and the extent to which population is settled on them, and to which production is encouraged, depend on the power of the State to grant these bounties. The practical advantage in leaving the States free in these matters is sufficiently great to justify us in departing from some of that scientific accuracy which some hon. members—at least on this occasion, though not on others—have urged upon us.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Perhaps it would be the simplest course if I were given leave to move to insert in line 30-

The CHAIRMAN:
I do not think we can go back.

Mr. BARTON:
If we put it in line 38, we can authorise you, sit, to go back and make the consequential amendments, as we did with regard to the words States Assembly and Senate.

The CHAIRMAN:
I will put it to the Committee, and if they are unanimous, we can go back.

Mr. REID:
I was going to make a suggestion which might remove all these difficulties about the mining matter. Supposing we put in the word "trade" in front of the word bounties in line 38, that would clearly exempt the mining industry.

Mr. BARTON:
Has that word any well-known technical meaning?

Mr. REID:
It will mean a bounty with the object of promoting trade, which would be export, or import, or local consumption. Clearly no one can consider such an expression as prohibiting a bonus for the development of the mining industry. The expression "trade bounty" covers all we want in this clause; it is used as a general expression covering every bounty on an object.

Mr. SYMON:
I think neither of these amendments will carry out the objects of the movers. They are not clear.

Mr. REID:
There is nothing clear about it.

Mr. SYMON:
If we put in "trade" before "bounties," it does not, to give a concrete instance, include the power of Victoria to give large bounties on the export of coal.

Mr. REID:
That would be a trade bounty surely?

Mr. SYMON:
You do not wish to exclude that?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Oh, no.

Mr. SYMON:
If you aim at giving bonuses for mining discoveries and purposes of that kind, it will be very much better to secure it by way of a proviso, either here or at the end of the clause, as suggested by Mr. Kingston, than to do it as has been suggested; as it would give rise to a great deal of ambiguity, involving much difficulty in interpretation. I cannot see what possible gain you get by putting in the words "wares and merchandise." That is simply an amplification of the word "goods." Therefore, what I suggest to my hon. friend to do is to propose what he wants done as an exception, and then in dealing with that exception we might have other matters in view. I would suggest the use of language that would cover our wishes. To put in "wares and merchandise" is to use language already covered.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I have already twice called attention to the importance of this matter, once in the Convention and once in this Committee. It is all very well to provide for the further development of our mining industry, but it is also necessary to provide for the development of other industries; and I feel that if we give the sole power of granting bounties to the Federal Parliament we shall practically abolish the giving of bounties altogether. I cannot imagine a case in which the Federal Parliament would grant a bounty. Unless those who advocated a bounty in the Federal Parliament were able to point to some part of the Commonwealth where a similar bounty has been given with success, it would have no chance of being carried. I think this matter of granting bounties should be a concurrent power, to be exercised by the Federal Parliament if it chooses to do so, and to be exercised also by the State Parliaments. I propose:

That at the end of this sub-section the words be added, "If in the opinion of the Inter-States Commission they derogate from equality of trade."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We may not have an Inter-States Commission.

Dr. COCKBURN:

Then if we do not, the clause may be recommitted. I am sure that Sir George Turner and the other hon. members who come from Victoria will see the importance of this, because Victoria has earned a debt of gratitude in this respect from the whole of Australia. Victoria has really led the way in Australia, and has shown what a good influence may be exercised by the judicious granting of bounties.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Are we justified in doing that with a uniform tariff?

Dr. COCKBURN:

Yes; I think there are many cases in which the granting of a bounty will not interfere with equality of trade.

Mr. DEAKIN:

What do you mean by equality of trade?

Dr. COCKBURN:

Supposing there was a bounty for exports outside the Commonwealth, there cannot be any disadvantage to anyone within the Commonwealth. I do not think the granting of a bounty on butter, for instance, did anything but good to the whole of Australia.

Mr. SYMON:

The Federal Parliament could do it.

Mr. REID:

I wish Victoria had extended it to us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You are so far behind the age that no bounties would do you any good.

(Laughter.)

Dr. COCKBURN:

There are some bounties which would derogate from equality of trade, but there are others which would not. This is really a matter of vital importance; it is one of the most important questions we have had before us—that is of the minor questions—and we should do everything we can to avoid the possibility of a bar being placed in the way of the development of our producing interest. Take away from the States this power of encouraging production and you practically take away the power of encouraging production altogether, because the Federal Parliament will not grant bounties. All industries must start in some locality before they can be recognised as legitimate subjects of a bounty. By the time they come under the notice of the Federal Parliament sufficiently to enlist the sympathy of that authority the bounty is unnecessary. But unless the bounty is given in the first instance that time will never come. That power can only be exercised by the Federal Parliament if it has already been exercised with advantage by the local authorities. This will practically be an initiatory bounty, and I do not think the other States will feel an interest in the matter until they see that the conditions are favorable in their territory also.

Mr. FRASER:

Let it be given with the consent of the Federal Parliament. There is no harm in that.

Dr. COCKBURN:

I am quite willing to do that, because I can see quite well that the industry must start in some locality where the conditions are specially favorable for the industry. It would be at first a purely local matter, and the Federal Parliament or Inter-States Commission would recognise that. They would say: "This is an industry which may or may not become general, but at present it affects only those who are so striving to encourage it." As long as the various States have to bear the expense I do not see why the federal authority should prevent assistance being given to pioneers. The pioneers of an industry should be assisted in the first instance because they are making a road on which everyone has the right to travel. To the pioneer who starts an industry the reward of his efforts is a reward, not only to him personally, but to all who choose to travel on the road he has made. Unless the States have the power to encourage this pioneering work there will be a great limitation put upon the development of various industries.

The CHAIRMAN:

I must ask Mr. Barton if he wishes his amendment put. If he does, I will withdraw it in favor of Mr. Reid's amendment, which comes first.

Mr. BARTON:
I think Mr. Reid's has only been a suggestion. I really think what has been suggested already is the best way of meeting the difficulty-goods, wares, or merchandise."

Mr. DEAKIN:
I am afraid that helps us very little.

Mr. BARTON:
It helps us to some extent.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Do you not think, although it might not be properly expressed, that the idea suggested by Dr. Cockburn might be applied, namely, if there is to be an Inter-State Commission that that Commission should be given power on certain principles to offer State bounties, if it does not derogate from freedom of trade or give any undue advantage to a particular State?

Mr. BARTON:
I should say that Dr. Cockburn's proposed amendment is one which I would ask the Convention not to entertain. Of course, we may or may not have an Inter-State Commission. I think we shall. But the amendment will have no effect unless we have an Inter-State Commission; in point of fact, it will become mere surplusage then. I think it would be a mistake to propose to hand over this question to be decided by an Inter-State Commission, because the Commission has first to see that the offering of trade bounties on productions for export will not derogate from freedom of trade. Although I am a protectionist, I see clearly that the offering of these bounties by the various States must be a derogation from freedom of trade, and I do not think it should be handed over to any authority, but this Constitution itself, to proclaim that there shall be freedom of trade from the establishment of the Constitution. Unless we can say that there are bounties which are not practically protective, we have no business to consent to an amendment handing over the decision of this question to another authority.

Mr. SYMON:
If we are to make exemptions, where are we to stop?

Mr. BARTON:
If it is to be left to the decision of the Inter-State Commission, whose chief business is to regulate commerce, I think it would be taking away first from those who make the Constitution, and afterwards from the Federal Parliament, the power of deciding for themselves on such questions.

Mr. PEACOCK:
The hon. member Mr. Barton has put the view better than I could do it. I think the feeling of the whole of the people of Australasia in regard to the need for Federation is due to their desire for freedom of trade between the whole of the States. Whilst I am a protectionist, I do not think we could follow the advice of Dr. Cockburn, for if we did we would be placing on the Inter-States Commission the duty of deciding upon the policy to be adopted. I am only a layman—another poor layman!—interfering and causing trouble.

Mr. ISAAC:-hardly a layman now after the distinguished part you took on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PEACOCK: The matter is perfectly clear, and we are all practically unanimous on the point over which we have spent an hour's talk, that the Federal Parliament should have the power of dealing with the tariff and bounties, while every man in this Convention is of the same opinion concerning existing contracts, which ought to be preserved for the reasons given by Mr. Barton. As we are all agreed that there should be no interference with the assistance given to gold mining, it would be far better for our legal friends to give us a sub-clause dealing with this point. We are all practically agreed upon what we want. In Victoria there has been a great deal of agitation over the duty on coal. If Federation is to be an accomplished fact, and if power is left to the local Parliament to give encouragement to the coal industry by promoting our railway system through offering reduced rates, that would be an interference with the policy. That would be thoroughly wrong, and would give a great deal of trouble.

Mr. BARTON: The question of mining for gold or silver does not affect "goods, wares, or merchandise."

Mr. PEACOCK: If, as I suggested before, a sub-clause were introduced dealing with this, we would progress a little faster.

Mr. HIGGINS: There is a difference here on a question of drafting and on a matter of principle. I quite agree with Mr. Barton that existing contracts will not be prejudiced by an enactment that all laws offering bounties are to cease to have effect. But I think on the question of drafting we ought to yield to any timidity expressed by members with regard to the effect of the wording of the clause. There is a distinct difference of principle between what was said by Mr. Holder and Dr. Cockburn, on the one side, and Mr. Reid and Mr. Barton on the other. Mr. Holder wants, as I understand it, upon a matter of principle to leave to each State the power to grant bounties for the development of its own Crown lands; but both Mr. Barton and Mr. Reid are against that on principle. It is not a question of drafting; and Mr. Peacock is wrong in stating that we are agreed upon this matter. Although it seems to be a hardship upon South Australia that it cannot give a bounty for the development of its own Crown lands, still the same argument exactly applies to a proposal for a protective duty for the development of those lands. You must trust the Federal Parliament in this matter. There are certain protective duties that will have effect, perhaps, only on the industries of South Australia, and if you propose to trust the Federal Parliament with that tremendous power, then why not trust them in the matter of bounties? Therefore, without in any way presuming to dictate to the Drafting Committee as to what is to be done, I suggest that the words "Wares and merchandise" will not give us any help. "Goods" is the widest term we can have. I suggest that at the end of the clause, in order to guard against the fears of those who have existing contracts that they may be impugned, we should add:

But this section shall not prevent any bounties for the discovery of gold or minerals, nor shall it prejudice any contract of a State to give bounties it made before March 31st, 1897.

We are all agreed that we should not prejudice the bounty for mining.

Mr. BARTON:
Do minerals include coal?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes. The bonus given in Victoria for gold is not for its production or export, but it is simply a bounty for the discovery of gold. Perhaps the words of the amendment are not the best that can be used, but they will indicate the sense of the Committee.

Mr. SYMON:
Sir Edward Braddon's amendment will cover that.

Mr. HIGGINS:
No; it will not. We want to protect the prospecting vote. I think the Drafting Committee may much better deal with my amendment than I can in the haste of debate, and I suggest it to them. We have a distinct question of principle here. I am with Mr. Barton on the principle, and I say we should not hinder existing contracts nor interfere with the prospecting vote.

Mr. BARTON:
For the present I shall withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN:
I will put Sir Edward Braddon's amendment.
Mr. BARTON:
Will you wait a minute until we we the amendment suggested by Mr. Higgins? We might be able to accept it.

Mr. SYMON:
I suggest to Mr. Higgins that, for the sake of clearness, he had better accept the suggestions of Mr. Kingston; that is to say, to except mining under clause 86. The only object which Sir Edward Braddon and the committee have in view is to take care that this provision, which declares that the offering of bounties by a State shall cease on a certain date, shall not apply to existing contracts.

Mr. BARTON:
I have now before me Mr. Higgins' amendment which may be proposed in place of Sir Edward Braddon's. It reads:
But this sub-section shall not prevent any bounties for the discovery of gold or minerals, nor shall it prejudice any contract of a State to give bounties if made before March 31st, 1897.
I think that gives effect to the object both of Sir Edward Braddon and Mr. Symon.

Mr. SYMON:
It is better.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
It takes in any contracts made before March 31st, 1897.

Mr. SYMON:
It will keep alive the right of a State to give bounties for minerals.

Mr. BARTON:
It will do so indefinitely, while the latter part only relates to the right of a State to give bounties made before March 31st, 1897. Shall I move it or will you, Mr. Higgins?

Mr. HIGGINS:
I will move it.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I would suggest that the word "discovery" is too limited. As a matter of fact we in many cases give assistance to a mine in which gold has been discovered and it becomes a question of going to a greater depth.

Mr. REID:
It would still be the discovery of gold.

Mr. DEAKIN:
In certain cases we have bored and discovered that the gold is there, and it is simply a question of assisting them to get at it by special means to surmount special difficulties.

Mr. BARTON:
The words "for the search or discovery" would get over it.

The CHAIRMAN:
Does Sir Edward Braddon press his amendment?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.
Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I would suggest that what is intended to be reserved to the State regarding what can be done in the way of mining would be met by the word "encouragement" or "development."

Mr. BARTON:
That goes too far.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am not at all disposed to agree with the limitation which is proposed to be imposed on the State with reference to the offering of bounties. No doubt it has been put fairly enough that the effect of offering bounties must be to some extent felt in the local market, but I take it that the two things, protection and the offering of bounties, are adopted with precisely opposite objects. In the one case, by a system of protection we hope to preserve for the benefit of particular localities the local trade, and no doubt it is wisely provided as a fundamental provision of the Federation that is to be, that there should be freetrade between the federated colonies; but, on the other hand, I think that an equally im-important matter is the development of our export trade; and I think also that the slight effect in the way of interference with local trade which the offering of bounties on exports might have, is as nothing compared with the importance of developing our export trade. We know full well what has been done in this respect by offering bounties in the past. Victoria has profited immensely, and set an example to the rest of Australia. We were pleased to follow it-I am referring particularly to the bonus on butter-and we have every reason to be satisfied with the result. What has been our experience in this respect would be our experience in the future in other matters, with equally beneficial results, if we had our way. I think we are making a mistake in laying it down as a hard and fast rule that a State should not offer anything in the shape of a bounty, even though out of its own funds. Where is it going to stop? It has been said that if we do this we cannot offer anything in the shape of preferential rates to producers as regards exports. What is to become of our export departments; are they to be abolished or shut up?

Mr. REID:
Surely it would not be a preferential rate if it was equal throughout the colony. What relation is there between the people here and on our eastern boundary? You can fix rates to suit your people.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am glad to have it a little clearer. I have an idea—I may be wrong—that if it was found that the State was offering to its producers in particular lines certain preference and advantage as regards goods exported, that would be held to be an interference with the Bill as it is proposed to be amended. What can we do for the purpose of encouraging the export of our products?

Mr. REID:
Leave it to the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON:
My friend is very ready to leave everything to the Commonwealth now. A little while ago, when we proposed to leave the right of dealing with our waters to the Commonwealth he was not so willing. (Laughter.) It is all very well to smile about it. No doubt a little diversion in that way is good, but at the same time it is a question on which I feel strongly. No doubt my friend Mr. Reid will have an opportunity of reconsidering his decision on this point. Are we not to be allowed to make arrangements for our people exporting their produce? What is to become of our export departments? Will it be possible to continue the arrangement by which we take charge of products, wine and other things, and see to their being put on to the European markets in proper condition, and do what we can to get the best price for them? Are these things to be interfered with? We are particularly interested in these questions, because we have not had the system for very long, but so long as we have had it we like it, and the more we see of it the more we like it; and if it is going to be taken away from us under the proposal before the House it is well to make it perfectly clear. I think that the general desire amongst the people of South Australia will be found to be that such a proposal as that should be resisted. I am interested to note the desire on the part of some hon. members to preserve the right to continue certain bounties. We also desire to preserve our right to continue ours. Without entering into a compact, I would like to say that we are relying upon their assistance to help us. This proposal of my honorable friend Sir Edward Braddon is to make the thing worse than we had it when the Bill was first introduced. When the Bill was first introduced, according to the interpretation which would be placed upon the Statute by a court of law, any contract which was in existence at the time that the Federal Parliament legislated for the adoption of a uniform tariff would be held to be good, and would be preserved, but now Sir Edward Braddon proposes that from March 31st in this year the hands of the State should be absolutely tied. What does that mean?

The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out that the hon. member, Sir Edward Braddon, has withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. KINGSTON:
There have been so many amendments or suggested amendments that some little confusion is to be excused; but I understand that there is an amendment which embodies the same principle. Nobody can predict when Federation is going to be accomplished; but however long it may take, it must, in the natural course of things, be some years before the Imperial Act is passed; and consequently until we have a uniform tariff provided. Notwithstanding all that, no contract with reference to a bonus made in the meantime after the end of last month is to have any effect whatever.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Until after uniform duties have been imposed. All contracts made up to that date are to be carried out.

Mr. KINGSTON:
But what does that mean? Every contract made after the 31st March would be absolutely void.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
None will be entered into then.

Mr. KINGSTON:
There will be no power. The whole thing will be strung up. It will be subject to this possibility, that if the power is exercised the contract will be void. There will be a State responsibility to some extent, and there is a direct enactment of the Federal Parliament that it shall not be given effect to.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The agreements for bounties will have to be made for short terms.

Mr. KINGSTON:
In such a circumstance it will be practically paralysing industries.

Mr. FRASER:
Give bounties for a year.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I know that in this matter the hon. member Mr. Fraser brings a vast amount of commercial experience and knowledge. But as regards a contract for only a year, would he be prepared to launch out on an agreement of that sort, and embark his capital, laying out a considerable sum, when he knew that he had a guarantee in the shape of a bonus for say only a year; and when, further, it is possible that even a contract of that sort can be declared void by federal legislation?

Mr. FRASER:

The subsidy might be made greater during one year.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Then the State is to pay more and get less.

Mr. REID:

It would come to the same thing. You would pay the same in one year as you would in five.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Then the industry would be stopped altogether. I object to unnecessary interference with the rights of the State regulating these matters for itself; it will have a very bad effect. I speak of these matters because South Australians take a considerable interest in them.

Mr. FRASER:

So we do in the other colonies. I ask hon. members to thoroughly consider these two propositions--the declaration that there shall be intercolonial freetrade-no doubt necessary in the establishment of Federation to secure to all federated States the commercial advantages they are entitled to with regard to local markets-and the proposal to abolish the bounty system when that system has worked well enough in the past without injury to other Australian States, simply existing to assist our producers to exploit outside markets.

Mr. REID:

I think our friends in South Australia are so steadily developing the tone and attitude of a band of martyrs--

Mr. SYMON:

I hope you do not consider that I am one of them!

Mr. REID:

That I think it is time I told them that we in New South Wales are prepared to give most vital powers to the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

As a freetrade people we are prepared, for the sake of Federation, to expose our people to the risk of a protectionist policy such as, if they had a choice, the majority of them would be the last to accept. We are prepared to leave the whole of our policy of trade and bounties at the mercy of the Federal Parliament. My hon. friend begins to feel timid on the question of bounties and the regulation of the export trade. Why should he, when he knows that on that question all the colonies are agreed? In every colony the same system is being followed. In New South Wales of late years we have established a Board of Export Trade and a Government department to facilitate the export of the produce of our farmers and others. Now if the policies of Victoria, New South Wales, and other colonies are identical with the policy which my hon. friend advocates, where is the necessity for this fear and timidity?

Mr. GLYNN:
It is anti-federal.

Mr. REID:
This fear is entirely without foundation, because we are all agreed as to the wisdom of the policy which the South Australians are advocating, and we ought to believe that the Commonwealth will not interfere in a way we will not wish to see. I hope my hon. friend will see that other colonies are taking greater risks than South Australia, and since we in New South Wales make no reservation, and wish the whole of these troublesome matters handed over to the Federal Parliament, I do not think it is right that any one colony should fear as to its local interests, and try to impair the freedom of the Commonwealth. There is no need for fear. In the Commonwealth Parliament, if ever I reach it, I would be found just as earnest as my hon. friend in advocating quite as great export facilities for the benefit of the producers of Australia as the producers in South Australia now have.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I will withdraw my amendment, and move instead of it:
That the following words be placed at the end of the sub-section:—"Contracts subsisting with any State on March thirty-first, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, under which bounties are offered or given by such State, shall not be impaired, and any State may continue to offer and give bounties and rewards for mining prospecting or discovery."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
If you extend it to mining development I will go with you.

Mr. ISAACS:
I should like to say that the amendments that have been moved up to the present would be highly risky with regard to pursuits in mining both in Victoria and Tasmania, which have no relevancy whatever to the question of protection or freetrade. All mining for metals in Victoria, especially gold mining, and silver mining in Tasmania, is purely local. There is no question of interference with the trade of other countries, and I am strongly opposed to handing over to the federal administration any powers with regard to those industries. If we merely put in an amendment at the end of sub-clause 4 of clause 82 to the effect that existing contracts under existing laws shall all subsist in full force and effect, or even if we say the existing laws are to remain, that will not be nearly sufficient, because sub-clause 1 of that clause would prevent any State-Victoria or Tasmania for example-in the future from making any law with regard to gold or silver mining; and we do not intend, so far as we can prevent it, to hand that power over to the Federal Government. We want to preserve to ourselves as independent States the right to develop industries which are purely local; and therefore I should suggest to one of my hon. friends who have charge of the various amendments that they should propose, if they will-if not I shall have to do it hereafter myself-a new sub-clause to the effect:

That the provisions of this section shall not apply to mining for gold, silver, or other metals.

That will not touch industries which are admittedly outside the controversy of protection or freetrade. Then with regard to coal I recognise some difficulty. I recognise that a serious question arises as to interference with equality of trade if bounties with regard to coal mining are allowed to be given without any restriction, but as to that I should like to hear some more argument, and to be more strongly convinced than I am at the present that the full power even in this regard can be safely and properly and fairly handed over to the Federal Government, and the States Governments deprived of it. I am very loth without more information on the subject, and without having certain difficulties that now beset me cleared up, to say to the coalminers of Victoria: "We are going to abandon you; we are going to hand over to the Federal Government the question whether you are to have any more assistance, and whether the coal mining industry in Victoria-which has to a great extent become one of our staple industries-should be placed outside the reach of assistance from the Government of Victoria."

Mr. O'CONNOR:
No assistance for prospecting?

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not know. I am not prepared at the present moment to abandon all claim to it. I am determined to go as far as necessary to have intercolonial freetrade in coal as well as in every other commodity, if that can be done with fairness to the miners of Victoria, and no undue abandonment takes place with regard to local development. I certainly hold with my friends from New South Wales that we must have intercolonial freetrade. I do not intend to support any proposal to interfere with that great principle. But I am not satisfied that that principle would be departed from altogether if we still maintained some power to develop an industry which is to a great extent local and of very great importance, but with regard to mining for gold or silver or other metals, no question whatever can arise. The colonies should have the fullest power to deal as they please with those industries.

Mr. GLYNN:

I agree with what Mr. Isaacs has said, that the encouragement to the gold mining industry does not affect us in a federal way at all. The powers you give a local body in regard to mining for gold does not affect its price at all. But it is a different matter with regard to coal, the price of which would be affected by the amount of duty placed on, or bounty given to it. The export bounty on it can affect its internal price by taking from the consumers of coal to the extent of the bounty on coal. On the question of general bounties I am altogether at issue with the Premier of South Australia. I say that encouragement by way of export bounty on local production is nothing more nor less than protection. It is a form of protection. By giving a bonus on the export of some local production two things may result: You may have the local price increased, and the price so far as the foreign consumer diminished. That took place in connection with the bounty on sugar at the beginning. When large bonuses were given for the manufacture of sugar in Germany the effect was that sugar could be purchased cheaper in the English market than in the place where it was manufactured. How can it be asserted, therefore, that putting bonuses on the export of particular lines—such as for instance sugar—does not operate in effect as a protective duty? If you once admit this principle you may be in this position: The encouragement of production may be so used in particular States that other States, which ought to share in the manufacture of those particular lines, would be tempted to put on corresponding bonuses. I think we ought to stick to this principle, that bonuses granted for local production are only protection in another shape, and that if we once grant this power to local Parliaments, we will injure the extension of intercolonial freetrade.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Before the adjournment some of my hon. friends felt that the wording of this amendment as I put it could be improved, and, yielding to their views, which I think are right, I have written it out in the form in which I think it ought to be now. I think we have to deal with two things. One is the preserving of existing contracts as up to the end of March, 1897, for any kind of bounty if there is a contract made up to the end of March, 1897. I think we are all agreed with that. That ought to be allowed. I therefore propose:

That at the end of this particular sub-section the following words be inserted:—"Contracts subsisting with any State up to March 31st, 1897, by which bounties are ordered to be given by such State shall not be impaired."

That is the same in effect as Sir Edward Braddon's amendment, and the same words as I put before you before the adjournment. With regard to the other matter as to mining, it has been pointed out to me that in Victoria it is the practice not only to give a bounty in respect of prospecting or discovery, but to give assistance in the direction of erecting batteries or other mining plant. So that the words which I used before the adjournment would not cover that, but I understand-if I may judge from some private expression of opinion from those who are interested in the clause-there it no objection to Victoria or any other State still having a power to give a bonus or bounty in the direction of erecting batteries or other plant upon mines. Therefore I would suggest that at the end of the whole section - which whole section deals with the granting of bounties after uniform duties are imposed-we should have this short clause:

This section should not apply to mining for gold, silver, or other metals.

Of course, very naturally, hon. members will ask, "Will that enable Victoria, say, to give a bonus for coal mining?" The answer is "No," because it is not a metal, and I am confining it to gold, silver, or other metals.

An HON. MEMBER:
Why other metals?
Mr. HIGGINS:
We do not wish to limit it to gold or silver, as there may be a bonus on copper for instance.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
There might be a large production of copper.
Mr. HIGGINS:
After consulting with those gentlemen who were so good as to assist me during the adjournment, I find that Mr. Barton and Mr. Symon concur that there is no objection to t
Mr. GLYNN:
I would like to point out to the Committee that it may be possible that some of these contracts are not for any definite period, but may be terminable by notice being given by either of the contracting parties. Under such circumstances we may have these contracts going on for a number of years. Sir George Turner may be able to give definite information as to whether there are any such contracts in existence. If there are contracts of that sort in existence by the different governments, any government concerned may keep them going for an indefinite period. I think we ought to prevent the possibility of any such indefinite extension of bonuses taking place in these colonies.

Mr. GRANT:

I think in the early part of the discussion, Sir, you ruled that it was competent for hon. members to deal with the clause generally.

The CHAIRMAN:

We will get on much quicker if we deal with one thing at a time; and the one question now proposed to be dealt with is simply the question of bounties, and has nothing to do with mining.

Mr. GRANT:

I want to take exception to the first part of the clause.

The CHAIRMAN:

You are too late, as that has been passed, and the clause now under consideration is sub-section 4, to which an amendment has been moved. I ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to that sub-section, and to the amendment.

Mr. GRANT:

I have certain words to move, and I think the Drafting Committee will find them applicable to the position put before us, and will endeavor to incorporate them in the Bill. In our own colony there are certain bounties and gratuities given for the purpose of stimulating trade in different districts, and it would be disastrous to that colony if the State were prevented from giving assistance in matters which would not be of sufficient importance to be dealt with by the Federal Government, but could be dealt with by the local Government. I will therefore move to insert at the end of the clause:

But the Parliament may permit any State to offer bounties on goods exported provided that such do not derogate from equality of trade.

I have no doubt the Drafting Committee will be able to deal with this.

The CHAIRMAN:

I would point out that I cannot put that amendment unless the amendment before the chair is withdrawn. We have had so many amendments proposed and withdrawn that I suggest we should now come to a conclusion.
Mr. BARTON:

I would suggest that the name of the Drafting Committee be changed to "Grafting Committee." The Drafting Committee was appointed by the Constitutional Committee to draft a Bill, but from that it must not be implied that they are everybody's three niggers, if I might use the term without being disrespectful. I think they are entitled, as they sit morning, noon, and night, to some consideration, and I would suggest that each hon. member put his own proposals in a shape which would not be unworthy of the ordinary form of such a measure as this. Although we are prepared to do as much as we can, we cannot do more than that.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Not much work at present in watching the progress of the Bill.

Mr. BARTON:

There is more anxiety than hurry about it. With regard to the amendment proposed by Mr. Higgins as amended, I think it is superior to the form in which it was originally suggested, but I ask whether the proposed addition to the fourth paragraph provides against the impairment of contracts entered into before March 31st, 1897, and I ask whether there are any contracts on behalf of any colony which are in their nature perpetual and subject only to defeasance by the State itself, that is, so long as the person is ready to perform services or export goods, whether he will continue to draw payment from the Treasury. If so, we might fix the Federation, but we may have ad infinitum a system of contracts entered into by a State which would be a derogation from trade in the Commonwealth, and which would have a perfect life as against any attempt on the part of the Commonwealth to bring it to a conclusion. I should like to know whether any member knows of any such cases before I can state whether I shall accept the amendment or not.

Mr. GORDON:

I should like to be quite clear about the position this dispute has arrived at. Is it conceded by everyone that bounties, so far as home consumption is concerned, are to cease? If so, there are two positions. The disadvantages and advantages of these positions have been well exemplified on the one hand by the arguments of Mr. Glynn, and on the other hand by those of Mr. Holder. Mr. Glynn contended that bounties on goods for export would have some reflex influence upon intercolonial freetrade, and prejudicially affect the home market, and that must to some extent be admitted. On the other hand, we have it argued by Mr. Holder, that if the colonies are shut out of granting bonuses on goods for export their hands will be tied for a long time, perhaps, in respect to many matters in connection with which they might like to grant bonuses. It is absurd to say, as Mr. Fraser has put it, that bonuses for a year will have any value in promoting production. With regard to bonuses for the export of cattle from the Northern Territory, the people who got the bonus had to build a special steamer which cost many thousand pounds, and they had to enter into arrangements with the various stations for the supply of stock; a bonus for a year would have been nearly worthless to them. I am inclined, although I was not so at first, to vote with Mr. Holder, because while the influence of bounties on goods for export on intercolonial commerce must be comparatively small, the disadvantage of preventing the colonies from offering any bonus is considerable.

Mr. WISE:
I should like to have an answer from Sir George Turner to the question put by Mr. Barton. I understand the question to be: are there any contracts in existence by which bounties will be given so long as the goods are produced subject to defeasance by Act of Parliament? If they are in existence it will be necessary to alter the amendment of Mr. Higgins so as to provide a time at which these contracts shall absolutely cease.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Of course it will be impossible for me at a moment's notice to give a certain answer to such a request as the hon. gentleman has made. We have promised our coal mines for a period of two years, fifteen or eighteen months of which have yet to run, to give them certain assistance, and we cannot go back on that concession. We have also promised the growers of vines certain concessions, but I do not know that we have entered into any definite, contracts.

Mr. BARTON:
They operate so long as the Statute exists.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
No, because we appropriated a certain sum of money which in twelve months will be expended, and after that we will leave to again make grants on the Estimates in the ordinary way.

Mr. BARTON:
Then all these things may go on indefinitely so long as you make a grant on the Estimates.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Independently of any law which may be passed by the Federal Parliament, so long as we chose to place a sum on the Estimates which will enable the persons to be paid it would go on indefinitely. I cannot say that we have any contracts entered into before a particular date which would last any specified time.
Mr. ISAACS:
I should like to point out before the clause is passed that we are going a long way in fixing this date.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
You are not going a long way back.

Mr. ISAACS:
The meaning of the clause is that the Parliament of the Commonwealth is to have the sole power to impose duties of Customs and excise and the granting of bounties as soon as the uniform duties have been imposed by that Parliament, but until that time the States are to have power to make laws granting bounties amongst other things. It therefore recognises in the first instance that until the uniform duties are imposed it shall be perfectly lawful to grant these bounties, and then comes this amendment which says that although the States may do this in the meantime, yet as soon as the Parliament of the Commonwealth imposes a uniform tariff—it may be two years after the Commonwealth is established—the States shall be retrospectively powerless as from March 31st, 1897. But surely that may work a very great wrong. I do not see why we cannot trust to the honor of the States in respect to that as to all contracts that may be entered into after March 31st.

Mr. FRASER:
That covers it.

Mr. ISAACS:
Oh yes. Of course it covers it, and it may cover a great deal of injustice too. When the Commonwealth comes into existence it may be some time before uniform duties are imposed, and in the meantime those contracts entered into may be declared illegal.

Mr. PEACOCK:
In the meantime could any object of the clause be defeated?

Mr. ISAACS:
No, because the clause recognises the right of the States to grant it until the last moment. It says:

But this exclusive power shall not come into force until uniform duties of Customs have been imposed by the Parliament.

But though this says that in fact and actuality the States shall be deprived from the moment we pass this resolution, because no one will then enter into a contract.

Mr. HOLDER They want to tie us from the instant.

Mr. ISAACS:
I think that is very wrong. It ties the hands of every Government and of all who want to take advantage of the Acts now in existence.

Mr. WALKER:
It will hasten the coming of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not think it will. If it does it will be all right, but this was not the course pursued in 1891. I think great hardship will be inflicted, and it only comes to this: this Convention says it does not trust the honesty of the States. It is no use putting in these dates if you do not wish to trust the States. I think our presence here to-day is a guarantee that we will keep faith with one another. This proposal, if carried, may be a serious obstacle to development in the meantime. I move:

That the words from the thirty-first March, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven," be struck out with a view to inserting in lieu thereof "from the establishment of the Commonwealth."

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
As the member who moved this amendment, including the date mentioned, I desire to say frankly that I had it in my mind to prevent any colony from entering into these contracts hereafter, as well as doing that which might provide for a possible breach of faith in respect of past engagements. It is just as desirable to do one thing as the other, and I conclude that the hon. member Mr. Higgins, who has adopted my amendment, sees the matter from my standpoint and endorses the view that I take.

Mr. BARTON:
I hope the amendment which Mr. Isaacs has proposed will not be accepted. It is important that there should be some definite limit on the existence of bounties upon the production or export of

Mr. SYMON:
Not void, for if they are made subject to the provisions of the Constitution they will be good. We should say that they should be determined after a certain time.

Mr. BARTON:
Well, determined after a certain time. I would submit an amend-

To insert at the end of line 39, after the fourth paragraph, the words: "Every contract for any bounty made by any State, and subsisting at the establishment of this Constitution, shall be good if made before the 31st March, 1897, but every contract so made before the 31st March, 1897, shall be illegal and void at the expiration of three years after the establishment of this Constitution."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Oh! Why men on the faith of the bargains we have made have entered into contracts which may last three years. They may only get the benefit of the State help at the end of three years.

Mr. BARTON:

Well, will the hon. member name a definite date?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

How can I?

Mr. BARTON:

If the hon. member cannot, then this Convention must do it. If we agree upon a Constitution which becomes acceptable it will be quite a year and a half or two years before it becomes the law of the land, and if there are three years after that, there will be five years altogether.

Mr. FRASER:

That is more than ample. The man who does not take that is not reasonable.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Well, I am not reasonable.

Mr. BARTON:

If the hon. member will name a certain definite date, then we may meet him.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I cannot. It will be a bad day for Victoria if she gets into Federation on these terms.

Mr. BARTON:

Hon. members will see that is necessary to fix a definite time, so that we may know where we are, and if that is done so that the people will know whether they are standing on their heads or their heels, I shall be satisfied. Here we provide a guarantee to protect certain obligations, and so long as these obligations are protected by the law of the Commonwealth, that is all that is necessary. If we have nothing fixed we have no Federation at all, for the basis of Federation is destroyed. If we have a time named, then we shall know where we are. I am not wedded to the term

Illegal and void.

In the suggested amendment of my hon. friend Sir John Downer that part may be robbed, perhaps, of its sternness by a milder form of expression; but that there should be a time fixed beyond which the Commonwealth shall not be deprived of its freedom of trade is a matter of certainty; and we must be able to have some such term, or the Parliament and the people will not know what we are asking them to undertake.

Mr. SYMON:

I think I can make a suggestion which will meet the case. I prefer the amendment in the form in which Mr. Higgins has moved it. It avoids the use of those expressions to which objection may be taken, expressions which perhaps are hard.

Mr. BARTON:

I am willing to accept a suggestion. If we leave the amendment in the form Mr. Higgins has moved, then we will have to regard certain contracts.

Mr. FRASER:

There are none. I have not heard of any.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not mind the words "cease and determine" instead of illegal and void."

Mr. SYMON:

I think we might add to Mr. Higgins' amendment

Except that any such contract terminable on notice may be terminated by the Federal Executive in accordance with its terms.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I do not object to that.

Mr. BARTON:

That will not do.

Mr. SYMON:

You recognise the validity and force of all contracts, but if there is any contract that is not of a fixed period, but is terminable on notice, then the Federal Executive may give that notice.

Mr. BARTON:

Does my learned friend see this; that if it is terminable on notice in accordance with the terms of the contract, that depends on the manner in which it is terminable on notice, and it may not be terminable for twenty-five years?

Mr. SYMON:

I do not agree with imposing a hard and fast time for the termination of these contracts. We have to do what is fair and reasonable on all sides. Some of these bonus contracts it might be well to terminate in three years, but in other cases it might be unjust, in connection with an industry which was being built up, that a contract should terminate in three years. I think the words "on notice" might be left out of the amendment I suggest.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I could, of course, have no objection to the words suggested by Mr. Symon, because if the State has entered into a bargain which the State has a right to determine it would be only fair that the Commonwealth should have an equal right; but is it fair, right, reasonable, equitable, or just that where the State under an existing law has entered into a bargain with one of its people, another body shall come in and say, "Though you have entered into a bargain under the existing law, and in faith with that contract have done certain things, you shall get no benefit out of your contract after three or five years." That is unfair, and we ought not and dare not provide that. If bargains have been entered into we should carry them out. So far as I know, there are no contracts which extend over many years, but I would not like to pledge myself without inquiry of the various departments as to the length of time which their contracts will run. In the case of vignerons, for instance, we have agreed that if they plant a certain area we will assist them for a certain number of years. If we say that contracts entered into on the 31st of March will be respected that will simply prevent the governments entering into other contracts until we know definitely whether Federation will or will not take place.

Sir Edward Braddon:

Hear, hear.

Sir George Turner:

Because no man would be idiot enough to enter into a contract with the Government that he is going to prepare and cultivate and plant his land, knowing that the moment Federation takes place all the benefits he could possibly derive would immediately cease and determine. While I would accept, but with a good deal of reluctance, the fixing of a particular date, I still say that when a Government has entered into a contract with one of its citizens in good faith, that contract ought and must be respected.

Mr. Barton:

I understand it is intended to make the proposed amendment, or the suggestion of Mr. Symon, read this way:

Except that any terminable contract may be terminated by the Federal Executive in accordance with its terms.

Mr. Symon:

I put it:

In accordance with the terms of such contract.

But the shorter form:

In accordance with its terms, will be better. It simply substitutes the Federal Executive for the local.

Mr. Higgins:

I do not see any objection to the addition of those words which Mr.
Symon and Mr. Barton have referred to.

The CHAIRMAN:
Had we not better deal with one amendment at a time?

Mr. SYMON:
Hear, hear; carry yours first.
Amendment-To strike the words "31st of March, 1897," out of the proposed amendment-negatived.

Mr. BARTON:
I would like to point out to Mr. Symon that if to the amendment of Mr. Higgins be added the words he suggests:
Except that any terminable contract may be terminated by the Federal Executive in accordance with its terms, there are still contracts which, as Sir George Turner has already told us, must have effect as long as the Victorian Government itself appropriates the money. So that to terminate this contract in accordance with its terms, would simply be on terms which have relations between the contractor and the Victorian Government, and as long as the Victorian Government want to appropriate that money the power of the Federal Executive to terminate that contract would be nonexistent.

Sir GEORGE TURNER and Mr. PEACOCK:
Oh, no.

Mr. BARTON:
It is a matter that we can discuss calmly at any rate, and the words may or may not have the meaning I am attributing to them. What I have just put applies to certain contracts which Sir George Turner has indicated, so long as the Victorian Government finds certain money by way of annual appropriation-

Mr. SYMON:
There will be no purpose to put it to.

Mr. PEACOCK:
The contractors will bring sufficient pressure on the Government to make it find the money, you may be very sure.

Mr. BARTON:
So long as that money was found by the Victorian Government it would not be in accordance with its terms if the Federal Executive put a stop to that contract.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Oh, no.
Mr. BARTON:
If you left this clause alone the contract would be void, but as the clause stands now it would not. The clause goes to the case of actual contracts in existence. And I think it is one of those case
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I cannot object to that so long as you give the undertaking that it shall be recommitted.
Mr. BARTON:
Certainly; we can pass this without the amendment proposed.
Mr. PEACOCK:
We will only start another discussion on the whole thing when we come back to it.
Mr. BARTON:
We have reached something near a climax of varying conditions, which will not appear so varied when we have dealt with the other clauses.
Mr. DOBSON:
Although there are a great many lawyers in the Convention-
Mr. BARTON:
It is a pity you are not a solicitor.
Mr. DOBSON:
It seems to me we have got into great confusion from a wrong interpretation of the word contract. Mr. Holder said something about a contractor purchasing from squatters in the Northern Territory cattle and receiving £1 per head as a bonus for each carcase exported. Therefore the only contract that comes into this discussion is a contract in which a man purchases goods or animals relying upon an export bonus or duty granted to him by an Act of Parliament. Then Sir George Turner pointed out his meaning of the word contract-every man who, owing to Act of Parliament, can export something, or produce something, or spend something, which will enable him to receive a bonus or bounty. I do not think that is the meaning of the word contract.
Mr. TRENWITH:
Surely the Government have contracted to do that.
Mr. DOBSON:
I would point out that I think that the whole question will have to be dealt with as two distinct matters. I think the amendment of my friend Mr. Higgins, supported by Mr. Symon, is absolutely correct and right. Then you want another clause of one line that says that any bounty or bonus granted by Act of Parliament in any State must cease at the expiration of a fixed period from the imposition of the uniform tariff. If Mr. Barton would approve the plan suggested. it would be a simple way of dealing with the question.

Mr. FRASER:
Pass the clause.

Mr. DOBSON:
If you pass the clause you are really not providing that all bonuses and bounties shall cease.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I will propose that we postpone this clause.

Mr. BARTON:
We can pass this clause as it is and then recommit it afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN:
Do I understand that Mr. Higgins proposes to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Do I understand the wish of Mr. Barton is to have the clause passed as it stands without, my amendment and recommit it subsequently?

Mr. BARTON:
Yes; and recommit it if Sir George Turner requests.

Mr. HIGGINS (to the Chairman):
Certainly.
Leave given.
Paragraph agreed to.
Paragraph 5 agreed to.
Clause as read agreed to.

Clause 83.-Upon the establishment of the Commonwealth, all officers employed by the Government of any State in any department of the Public Service, the control of which is by this Constitution assigned to the Commonwealth, shall become subject to the control of the Executive Government of the Commonwealth; and thereupon every such officer shall be entitled to receive from the State any gratuity, pension, or retiring allowance, payable under the law of the State on abolition of his office.

Mr. GORDON:
Two points arise out of this. Is it the intention of the draughtsman to make compulsory service under the Federal Parliament whether the officers like it or not? I think the words "if they elect to serve thereunder" should follow the word "shall," in line 4.

Mr. BARTON:
They can always resign.

Mr. GORDON:
It reads like compulsory service. If, for instance, you say that a man shall serve in the military, he must serve whether he likes it or not. The second point is more important. In the sixth line of the clause it says:

And every such officer shall be entitled to receive from the State any gratuity, pension, or retiring allowance, payable under the law of the State on abolition of his office.

So that if a man only happens to be 21 years of age, and is transferred to the federal authority, he is to receive from the State the full compensation he is entitled to receive on the abolition of his office, although for the rest of his life he may be employed by the federal authority. Surely that is not the intention. Such a proposal would impose on the States a very heavy burden which they ought not to incur. I draw the attention of the Committee to both these points.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I was about to draw attention to these particular words, because they do, to my mind, provide that any person who is transferred over, in addition to being transferred over, is to get the benefits which he would have got if his office had been abolished, In our Victorian Act we have power to abolish offices, but the effect of the Act is that a man in such a case no longer serves up. In that case he gets a month's pay for every year of service, which is fair and reasonable. But that certainly would not work well here, because the federal authority takes over the officer, and then practically says:—"Because we employ you in future instead of the State, we are going to make you a present of several hundreds of pounds," or perhaps an even larger sum than that. Many of these officers, too, have inchoate rights to a pension when they arrive at 60 years of age, but you are going to transfer these officers to a body that is not bound to preserve those rights. That will not be fair to the public servant, because, although you give him the amount that you will give him on the abolition of his office, that will not be so beneficial as if he were allowed to retire on his pension. What you want to say in this clause is not that he is to got a certain sum under all circumstances, but that whatever his rights are you will preserve them. When these men enter the service of the various States they have given to them by Act of Parliament certain rights which they enjoy so long as they remain in the service of those States. If, therefore, they are transferred over to some other body, surely it is only fair and right that they should carry to that new body whatever right to they had in the old body.

Mr. BARTON:

Supposing they serve a State for fourteen years, you do not mean that the Commonwealth should pay them for having done it?
Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I would not mean that. I told Mr. McMillan the other day that we had a clause in the Bill we passed in Victoria last Session, whereby we transferred the Post Office Savings Bank to Commissioners. There we provided that the officers should carry over their rights with them, so that when they came to retire they would get their retiring allowances, which should be divided between the new body and the old body, and certified to by the Commissioners of Audit. No one was injured by that—the new body was not injured, the old body was not injured, and the man himself was not injured.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Have you got a copy of that Bill with you?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I can get a copy. Such an arrangement is fair to the State, fair to the Commonwealth, and fair to the man. This proposal, however, is certainly unfair to the State under certain circumstances, and unfair to the man under other circumstances.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I think we are all agreed that when an officer is taken over by the Commonwealth he should not be placed in an unfair position, or lose any rights by being taken over, because it is no fault of his that the continuity of his service has been broken. The Bill of 1891 provided that all existing rights should be preserved, but nothing more. That would be quite inoperative in many cases, for this reason: In the case where a pension was due after a certain number of years' service, the period might have been almost complete to entitle a man to a pension, but if it were not actually complete, he would have no rights whatever.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I suggested the insertion of the words "rights existing and accruing."

Mr. O'CONNOR:

The difficulty there is that an existing right would be really nothing unless it were taken over by the Commonwealth. That would impose a serious obligation on the Commonwealth, because I take it from the structure of this Bill that the Commonwealth probably would not introduce a system of pensions, and consequently that would, as I have stated, impose upon it the obligation of taking over the right or duty to pay pensions to its officers. The way of dealing with the difficulty is this: Inasmuch as the service of the officer was stopped compulsorily by the Commonwealth taking him over, any rights which he had at that time should be recognised. In New South Wales a certain service entitles a man to a pension, and the abolition of office, after a certain number of years, entitles him to a gratuity. Therefore it would be unfair to saddle the Commonwealth with the payment of any pension which would be taken during life, and the better way to do it would be to treat him as if his office were abolished by reason of his being taken over by the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:
He would still be in the employ of the Commonwealth.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Yes. He has already been in the State where he has a right to a gratuity, and why should he be deprived of that? The merit of the proposal is that it leaves all payments and liabilities to be met by the State, and it imposes no new obligation either on the State or on the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Have you any idea what this means in figures.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I have no actual idea, but it would not mean a great deal, because there are not many c

Mr. KINGSTON:
We have retiring allowances.

Mr. BARTON:
Have they not almost died out?

Mr. KINGSTON:
Oh, no.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
In answer to Mr. Kingston's remark, I should like to call attention to the wording of this clause, that he is only entitled to what becomes payable under the law of the State on abolition of office. If the law of the State gives nothing on the abolition of office, no right accrues to him. There would be no right to take over a pension. Of course there would be no objection to the payment of the retiring allowance or gratuity being deferred until after his services to the Commonwealth have ceased. That might be done. What we really want to get at is that his right shall be crystallised at the time, and that the money shall be payable not by the Commonwealth, but by the State.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The State has a chance of his dying.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
On the other hand, you take away from him the right that he would have if he did not die.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There will be a lot of grumbling.
Mr. O'CONNOR:

You cannot do absolute justice in this case, and we have to do the best we can. Something ought to be done by which the same rights should be given to those officers whose services are taken over, and whose rights, by being taken over, are somewhat interfered with.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

And you make the State pay this money too?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I understand Mr. Wise has an amendment which may meet the views of hon. members.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I suggest that clauses 83 and 84 be postponed. If members will look at clauses 64 and 68 they will find that there we deal with the question of payment of the Civil Service and other matters in connection with the taking over of departments. It seems to me that that is the proper place to deal with this question of the public officers. It is out of place to deal with it amongst the questions of finance and trade, because we shall have two distinct subjects under the one head if we do. Only a little time is wanted to draft an amendment that will suit everyone, and if we add it to clause 64 our business can be better proceeded with, and we will save time.

Mr. WISE:

I beg to move to add at end of the clause:

But shall not be entitled to demand payment of the same so long as he remains in the service of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN:

This meets one objection I was going to raise. The clause would impose a heavy burden on the States at once, and give to the men who only change their employer a solatium, without having deprived them of their employment in any way. But I am not quite sure that even with this we shall meet all that requires to be met. The language of the clause is:

Every such officer shall be entitled to receive from the State any gratuity, pension, or retiring allowance payable under the law of the State on abolition of his office.

I do not know whether the Drafting Committee have satisfied themselves if in every other State likely to join the union there is payment of compensation on the abolition of office.

Mr. BARTON:

There are some States where there is not.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Then their public servants, if transferred, are not provided for.
Mr. WISE:
They will have to be provided for by the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:
All that we suggest is that where a person is entitled to a locally-accruing right under the law of the State in which he has served that right shall not be impaired; but where under the law of the State in which he has served he is not entitled to any gratuity, pension, or retiring allowance the mere fact of the transfer does not give him the right to the payment of such.

Mr. DEAKIN:
That is not provided in this clause., He would only receive whatever he was entitled to on the abolition of his office. If entitled to nothing on dismissal he would get nothing, and all his other rights would be disregarded. As matter of fact he simply changes masters and his office is not abolished at all. I do not understand why all rights and privileges are not simply continued, and why, a change of master should involve any change in the conditions under which he is employed.

Mr. BARTON:
A person may be entitled to a pension after serving fifteen years, and he has served thirteen. He should be entitled to demand what he would have received, or a proportionate amount of it, on the expiration of the fifteen years.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I should say that he is entitled to receive that in two years from someone; I will not at this period say whom. He would be entitled to it after his fifteen years' service, although there had been a change of masters. Any statutory rights which exist should be continued, as the change is only a change of master and not a change of functions. As that is only a nominal change, why should there be any change in his privileges?

Mr. WISE:
There may be a change of locality.

Mr. REID:
You cannot impose on the new master the policy of the old master, which may force on the Commonwealth a system of pensions.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It would save a great deal of anxiety and risk on the part of the civil servants if their existing rights under Statutes were conserved to them under the Commonwealth. It would be a simple thing to do, and no one's position would be injured or improved. Nothing could be fairer. Then there comes the second question raised by Messrs. Barton and Reid, and that is the question as who is to pay. I am of opinion that it is the Commonwealth that should pay.

Mr. REID:
Would it not be better to postpone this clause and go on with the real financial clauses?

Mr. WISE:
I object to clause 84 being postponed,

Mr. REID:
We are anxious to get to the real financial clauses.

Mr. BARTON:
I have not the slightest objection to clause 83 being postponed.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I have no objection to it being postponed, but I will state one point first. The Commonwealth should pay if for no other reason than that provision is made for the taking of accounts between the Commonwealth and the States. Compensation should not be paid until it is due, and then it should be paid by the Commonwealth and deducted from the sum returned to the State simply as a matter of convenience. I shall argue the matter at greater length when the clause once more comes on for consideration.

Clause postponed.

Clause 84.-All lands, buildings, works, and materials necessarily appertaining to, or used in connection with, any department of the Public Service the control of which is by this Constitution assigned to the Commonwealth, shall, from the establishment of the Commonwealth, be taken over by and belong to the Commonwealth, either absolutely, or, in the case of the departments controlling customs and excise and bounties, for such time as may be necessary.

The fair value thereof, or of the use thereof, as the case may be, shall be paid by the Commonwealth to the State from which they are taken over. Such value shall be ascertained by mutual agreement, or, if no agreement can be made, in the manner in which the value of land, or of an interest in land, taken by the Government of the State for the like public purposes is ascertained under the laws of the State at the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. WISE:
I desire to move an amendment in line 12. I propose.
To add after the word "Commonwealth" it and the railroads."

I do not want a discussion. If there is to be a discussion I will withdraw the amendment. I am well aware this has been talked over in Committee and privately, and I know I am in a minority; but I want to put my views on the subject on record. I want to have this matter decided and put on one side, so that it will leave the financial discussion clear. I mean that the railways of all the colonies go over to the Commonwealth, whether it is against the will of the colonies or not.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I intend to vote against it as it is now, but when we come to deal with the clause later on there is a proposal that all the debts be handed over; and many who feel doubts about handing over the railways would be prepared to do so if the Commonwealth is to take over the debts. To put this question at once without discussion would be absurd.

Mr. REID:

I would like to point out in reference to what Sir George Turner has said that to know the mind of the Convention on this point would clear away a number of difficulties in considering the other point. Certainly if the railways are to be handed over I would be the first to say the debts should be handed over. I am opposed to handing over the debts without the railways, but if the Convention is in favor of the railways being handed over I will remove my objection as to the debts.

Mr. FRASER:

So would I.

Mr. REID:

I am going to vote against the amendment, for I think the two should certainly go together. I think we might find out the will of the Convention on the point.

Mr. FRASER:

I am glad to hear Mr. Reid speak as he has done. If the debts are to be taken over, then I will waive my objection to the railways being taken over. There is great difficulty in taking one over without the other, although in any case there is difficulty in taking over the railways, particularly the railways of a colony not connected with us by land.

Mr. WALKER:

I do not wish to detain the Convention. I am in favor of both the debts and the railways being taken over, and will vote with Mr. Wise.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

This is one of the most important matters that can be adopted here, and it would be considered curious outside if we were to pass it without discussion, I think it should be fully and freely discussed. Therefore I trust it will be put in its right place, and be fully discussed.

Mr. WISE:

I am pleased that our arguments have had such weight, for we were in a very small minority when we came here four weeks ago—that some hon.
members have been induced to agree with our feeling that the railways should be taken over.

Mr. REID:
I shall not.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I am prepared to vote against it now.

Mr. WISE:
Desirous of encouraging that feeling to the utmost, and finding that this proposal will not save time, I will with the permission of the Committee, ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. BARTON:
There are one or two verbal amendments to be made in this clause. If the words "belong to" are changed to "vest in" it may become more clear that lands, buildings, and works in connection with the department will pass to the Commonwealth without the necessity of any legal assurance given by the operation of this Constitution.

Mr. REID:
What about buildings used only in the State?

Mr. BARTON:
They will be vested in the Commonwealth until such time as might be necessary, There will be no confusion there because the State may vest in the Commonwealth, either for fee-simple or for a number of years. I propose:
To leave out the words "belong to" and insert "vest in" in lieu thereof.
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I also propose;
To strike out in the last line of the clause the words "the date of."
This is merely for conformity. The expression:
At the establishment of the Commonwealth, is used right through the Bill.

Mr. DOBSON:
I should like to know if Mr. Barton proposes to leave in the words The fair value thereof, or the use thereof.

Mr. BARTON:
Yes; for the reason that lands, buildings, &c., are to be taken over absolutely, or in the case of departments controlling Customs and excise and bounties, for such time as may be necessary, There will be a large number of buildings and lands in connection with Customs which will only be taken over in the time intervening between the establishment of the Commonwealth and absolute free trade. There will be a number of such lands, buildings, and works, and the Commonwealth does not want them after it has got uniform Customs. For instance, there will be those on the border, which will not be wanted after five years; but these periods cannot be determined at present absolutely, and the only phrase that can be used is:

For such time as may be necessary,
"Vest in" is commonly used, and will apply to either.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
The hon. member Mr. Barton has not met the case referred to by my hon. colleague Mr. Dobson. I know of post offices and telegraph offices connected with supreme courts, and it will be impossible for those buildings to be taken over in the sense of complying with this clause. The use of such buildings must necessarily be vested in the federal authority for which a certain rental will be made. I presume the term "use" includes rental. On that point I desire to be informed.

Mr. BARTON:
The probability is that in such circumstances the building would itself vest with the Commonwealth for the time necessary to hold it, whether the building were rented by the State or not., and the Commonwealth would make its own arrangements with the State.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
It cannot vest in the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:
It Must.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Take, for instance the post and telegraph office at Hobart, which is part and parcel of the building used for the Supreme Court. That could not be vested in the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:
That is met by the words:
Or used in connection with any department of the Public Service.
That is to say, so much as is necessary would be vested in the Commonwealth.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I do not intend to move an amendment now, because I do not carry enough guns to fight the three members of the Drafting Committee, but I give fair notice that I shall endeavor in the New South Wales Parliament to improve the drafting of this clause. Mr. Deakin, who is not a member of the Drafting Committee, will probably agree with me. There is no title known in the law as:

For such time as may be necessary.

In my position as Minister of Lands in New South Wales, when these Customs houses on the border have to be disposed of, they will be sold through my department. I can give no title to the purchaser, because the vesting is, so far as the State is concerned, for an indefinite period. I trust that, before we meet again, some of these legal cobwebs may have been swept away.

Mr. BARTON:

My hon. friend says he does not carry so many guns as the Drafting Committee, but he seems to know more about drafting than they do. I leave him to enjoy the position.

Amendment agreed to; clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 85.-Until uniform duties of Customs have been imposed, the powers of The Parliaments of the several States existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, respecting the imposition of duties of Customs, and the imposition of duties of excise upon goods the subject of Customs duties, and the offering of bounties upon the production or export of goods, and the collection and payment thereof respectively, shall continue.

Until uniform duties have been imposed, the laws of the several States in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth respecting duties of Customs, and duties of excise on goods the subject of Customs duties, and bounties, and the collection and payment thereof shall remain in force, subject to such alterations of the amount of duties or bounties as The Parliaments of the several States may make from time to time; and the duties and bounties shall continue to be collected and paid as theretofore, but by the officers of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GORDON:

I would like to point out what seems to me to be an anomaly. The first part of the clause provides that the State Parliaments shall retain all their existing powers with regard to the collection and payment of duties, but the next sub-section provides that the duties shall be collected by the officers of the Commonwealth. It appears to me that there is a contradiction there. A good many of the powers relating to Customs have to be exercised conjointly by a State officer and the Ministers of the States. It will be necessary to clothe the federal officer, in conjunction with the States Ministers, with the various powers now given by the Customs Acts of the colonies.

Mr. BARTON:
There is no contradiction. The proposal is that the imposition of duties, the offering of bounties, and the collection and payment of them shall continue with the single exception that, as regards the collection and payment of them, the persons appointed to do that shall be the officers of the Commonwealth.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

It is a change of masters but not of men.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I should like to test the feeling of the Committee on one important point. In the second section of this clause appears this very remarkable statement:

Subject to such alterations of the amount of duties or bounties as the Parliaments of the several States may make from time to time.

That, I believe, was in the Bill of 1891, but the records of the debates do not show exactly for what reason it was introduced. I presume the idea was that the Federal Parliament would fail after coming together to create a uniform tariff, which might thus be indefinitely postponed, and cause a great deal of trouble to State financiers. But we have in this Bill, in a subsection of section 82, which we have just been discussing, the following words:

Uniform duties of customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth.

I think the introduction of that sub-clause does away with the necessity of this part of the clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

What part?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I am objecting to any State Government being allowed to touch the tariff after the Commonwealth is established. The uniform tariff has to be established at the outside within a period of two years. See the position you will be in. You give over the Customs machinery and officers, so that the State will practically have nothing to do with the Customs, and yet you allow a State Government—which has practically transferred this power—to deal with it in its most important aspects. Furthermore, you might have this difficulty: that while you are bending all your efforts upon a uniform tariff, you may by the operation of this clause have a perfect war of tariffs going on, and the whole subject of the fiscal policy discussed in every State. It is absolutely necessary to make that two years a period of truce, as Mr. Reid mentioned.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.
Mr. MCMILLAN:

It is necessary that the whole mind of the Commonwealth should be fixed on a uniform, tariff, not on a local basis, but on a basis for all Australia. If no one has a further amendment, I will move to strike out-

Mr. BARTON:

I have an amendment in the first part of the clause, but I should like to point out to Mr. McMillan that it is not a certainty that after the establishment of the Commonwealth, and before the Commonwealth itself takes the matter of a uniform Customs tariff in hand, the States should be prohibited from making any alterations in the Customs laws. Until the Commonwealth assumes absolute control of the finances, all the States are interested, as they may have to make certain dispositions for the collection of revenue for the period which must elapse until the Commonwealth legislates, and we do not know what emergency may arise which may not impel them to the collection of further revenue; but it would be forcing them to apply themselves to one system of taxation only-one of direct taxation, for instance, which might not be their policy-if they were prevented during the interregnum, if I may so term it, from imposing such duties on Customs and excise as seemed good to them. We must leave the several States perfectly free to direct their own fiscal policy until the ultimate direction of that policy by the Commonwealth, upon the imposition of uniform duties of Customs and excise. You should not interfere with the rights of the States in this respect until uniform duties have been imposed.

Mr. KINGSTON:

In matters of bounty as well?

Mr. BARTON:

They may not be so important. They are not so important to the fiscal position of the States. But matters of bounty in this clause will have some relation to this question of bounty discussed in clause 82.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Will not the provision which I have mentioned interfere with the Federal Treasurer's arrangements, too?

Mr. BARTON:

There may be a difficulty in that direction, I admit, but inasmuch as the interests of the States may be paramount until the Federation gets into full owing, it is a very arguable question whether you should strike the power of dealing with their tariffs out of the powers of the States. It is therefore a question of what the interests of the States may be before ever Federation becomes really complete in all its parts, as it will not be until the imposition of Customs duties. I wish to make two verbal amendments in this clause. They are consequential amendments:
That the word "and" in lines 23 and 33 be omitted, and the words "upon goods subject to customs duties" be struck out of lines 27 and 28 and lines 33 and 34.
Amendments agreed to.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
On the sub-clause, which gives the power to the States until uniform duties can be imposed to regulate all matters with regard to Customs duties and bounties, I think, having regard to what we have already done, and the restrictions we have laid upon various States in regard to the imposition of contracts for new bounties-
Mr. WISE:
That has been postponed.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
My hon. friend says that has been postponed, but we have postponed it with the agreement that we are to make distinct provision for regulating bounties as they may be contracted for by different States, and if we have postponed that we ought to postpone this.
Mr. HIGGINS:
It is postponed, and will be recommitted.
Mr. BARTON:
The clause was passed.
Mr. SYMON:
Subject to recommittal.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I understood that it was passed. I shall move:
That the words "and bounties" in the thirty-fourth line be struck out.
The CHAIRMAN:
Ought not the amendment to remain in the first part of the clause, on the twenty-eighth line?
Mr. REID (to Sir Edward Braddon):
You do not need that.
Mr. BARTON:
In clause 82 we have practically provided for that by saying they shall remain until then.
Mr. REID:
That is a question of administering existing laws by officers of the Commonwealth instead of by the local Parliaments.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I do not wish to press my amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I quite agree with Mr. Barton that we should allow those, words to remain. I am speaking with regard to the words referred to by Mr. McMillan.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I will move to strike them out, if you like.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
He has suggested to strike out the words:
Subject to such alterations regarding duties and bounties as the Parliaments of the several States may make from time to time.
The object of these words is to make it clear that until the uniform tariff is actually imposed the States may deal with their own individual tariffs, and that if passed the money to be derived from these tariffs goes to the State in which it is collected. Surely it is for the State to say what amount of money it desires to raise by Customs duties. A case might happen in which the Treasurer of the day, being short of funds, might say that for twelve months or two years he desires to have a primage duty of £80,000 or £100,000. And if so, why should he be deprived of that power? On the other hand, suppose the Treasurer of the day had a surplus. He might say that for twelve months or two years he desires to give the people the benefit of the surplus by reducing or abolishing the duty on tea or sugar or some necessary of life. I quite understand that a difficulty may arise with New South Wales. It might be contended that it would be impossible to detect whether they would have a protective duty or not, but we have not now to look into that particular point. This is a reasonable power. It does not take away from the States the power of moulding their tariffs until the uniform tariff is fixed. It will enable them to do anything they like with existing Customs.

Mr. BARTON. It may lead the Federal Parliament to settle the question of the uniform tariff as soon as possible.

Mr. REID:
I would not have a word to say on this matter if Sir George Turner would apply the same rule in another way. Sir George Turner is thoroughly in favor of leaving the colonies unfettered until the Federal Parliament begins to exercise its powers. I am equally desirous not to fetter the Commonwealth afterwards as to how certain amounts are to be received. There is no consistency between the two positions, If you are not going to allow the colonies to be fettered until the uniform tariff is arranged, then, I say the Commonwealth should not be fettered afterwards, I strongly sympathise with the view which Sir George Turner expresses if he will apply it to the movement in reference to the Federal Commonwealth after it passes the uniform tariff, and not compel it to raise a certain amount of money whether it likes it or not. I have always been in favor of leaving the Commonwealth free, and the colonies free, as far as possible. I will not press my views on the Committee on this clause, but when we come to other clauses I shall strongly contend for the application of the views to which I have referred.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I fancy that the Committee is against me in this matter. At the same time I would make another remark. It is all very well to look at the State side of the question, but I am perfectly certain it will be a great trouble to the Federal Treasurer if this clause is passed as it is, because you allow the whole of the colonial tariff to be interfered with. You might want to take off a duty in order to give the benefit to your budget, but on taking it off you might much embarrass the Federal Treasurer.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

He does not get the money,

Mr. MCMILLAN:

But he has to Pay the federal expenditure, everything, connected with the Federal Government. You might also very much dislocate the machinery if you put on a new tax, or take off an old one. You embarrass altogether the machinery of government therefore, while I do not intend to move an amendment, there is no use going to the trouble of putting it now. I am perfectly certain that the way I contend for is most in accord with a successful financial operation.

Clause as read-agreed to.

Clause 86.-So soon as uniform duties of Customs have been imposed, trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or, ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Previously I suggested that a proviso should be added to the first subsection of clause 50, providing that the power which all the colonies at present possess of prohibiting the introduction and sale of any injurious article within their own borders should be placed in that sub-section, but at the suggestion of Mr. Barton I withdrew the amendment with a view to moving it on this clause. I now beg to move that the following words suggested by him be added to the clause:

But nothing in this Constitution shall prevent any State from prohibiting the importation of any article or thing, the sale of which within the State has first been prohibited by the State.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I desire to draw attention to the words "absolutely free" in this clause, which reads:

So soon as uniform duties of Customs have been imposed trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

I can understand you saying that they should be absolutely free from any duty on importations. These words are about the largest that could be possibly used, and might include all charges for tolls, wharfage dues, and other matters like that. We ought to be careful about using words which may have a wider interpretation than was originally intended. I will ask Mr. Barton to tell us what the words mean, for the desire of the Committee is that when we have a uniform tariff as against the outside world, as between State and State there should not be any Customs tariff.

Mr. GLYNN:

It would be better to strike out the clause, which goes further than was intended, and has given to the Bill a scope that was never contemplated. If we decide upon taking over the navigation and control of rivers it might be necessary to impose a toll upon navigation within our limits, but it would be impossible to put a toll on the passage of the steamers into South Australia.

Mr. REID:

This clause is a financial peroration.

Mr. GLYNN:

I will draw Mr. Deakin's attention to this fact: would it not be possible for the State to totally prohibit the importation of any goods that might be subject to Customs duties? There is a concurrent power dealing with the matter of Customs duties set out in section 50, and then there is an exclusive power regarding duties. Is there any power denied to the States prohibiting the total importation of the goods the jurisdiction of the Customs duties on which has been shifted on the Federal body? That would lead to complications in every line of the Customs tariff, and if what is suggested is done every single line of the tariff might be subjected to prohibition by local law.

Mr. DEAKIN:

My amendment is that no State should be prohibited from importing any article the sale of which within the State has first been prohibited by the State.

Mr. GLYNN:
I can quite see the force of that amendment, which leaves it open for the State to say: "You cannot import in the future." Of course it would be a ridiculous thing to do, but that would apply to other articles.

Mr. BARTON:
I was under the impression that these words were in the American Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS:
They are not.

Mr. BARTON:
But so far as my Search has extended just now that impression does not appear to be correct. It was thought in 1891 that this clause should be as absolute in its terms as possible. If there is to be any exception to absolute freedom of trade and intercourse from end to end of of the Commonwealth it should be expressed by way of exception. We take it that if we are to make provision for this or that as the necessity arises, and that this thing shall not be charged with Customs while that shall be, we may have prolonged attempts to make things definite. Make them indefinite and the best way for the protection of the Commonwealth in its internal intercourse, which is the object aimed at in this clause, is to prescribe definitely that all trade and intercourse may be absolutely free except with regard to these derogations or exceptions which the Constitution imposes. That was the view with which the clause was drawn now and in 1891, and it is better to plan the clause that way than to plunge ourselves into a difficulty by inserting constant repetitions. The clause does not make it unnecessary for any man to pay for any services he has done for him by a State or a private person.

Mr. HOLDER:
Light and tonnage dues?

Mr. BARTON:
Light dues Stand in the same position, and tonnage dues are dealt with in another part of the Bill.

Mr. HOLDER:
Wharfage dues?

Mr. BARTON:
Wharfage dues come in the nature of services and rents for the use of the wharfs. We shall have to pay for services rendered, but if this clause were construed in the way it has been suggested a person could send a letter from one end of the Commonwealth to the other without putting a Stamp on it, and that is not what is meant at all. Every ordinary service must be paid for, but, subject to the services which are to be paid for, trade and intercourse is to be absolutely free. We had better leave the clause in its
The question which I am raising is altogether separate from fiscal issues. It is only proposing that the present power of any colony to prohibit the importation of any article for fiscal reasons or not may be exercised under the Commonwealth, provided that the sale of that article has been prohibited in the colony itself, in which came the prohibition of importation from abroad can have no fiscal effect whatever.

Why not effect prohibition by the same Act?

My amendment reads:

But nothing in this Constitution shall prevent any State from prohibiting the importation of any article or thing the sale of which within the State has first been prohibited by the State.

Why the emphasis on the "first"? Do it by the same Act.

I do not think the word "first" is necessary.

Is there such an article?

Such articles as opium and alcohol?

You cannot prohibit them for medicinal purposes.

A Bill was introduced in Victoria for the purpose of prohibiting the importation of opium as an article of commerce, except as a drug. Possibly it maybe necessary to make this amendment a little more specific, because in all cases it may be necessary to introduce some opium and some alcohol for medicinal purposes. It may be therefore necessary to alter this amendment, which has been prepared at my request by the Drafting Committee; but as I did not mention this point they naturally did not provide for it. The question has nothing to do with the fiscal issue. Hon. members will recollect that I called attention to a case in which the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that the language which we propose to adopt in this Constitution is sufficiently wide to prevent any Government, except the Federal Government, from prohibiting the importation of any article, and that, in 1890, an Act known as the Wilson Act was passed. to re-endow the States with the power of prohibiting the introduction into their territory of opium or alcohol if its sale was prohibited within their borders.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Would that not render necessary all the machinery of the Customs House?

Mr. DEAKIN:
The Federal Government would then have the Custom-house. Each colony has the power of prohibition at the present moment, and there is no necessity why it should be sacrificed on its entering into the proposed federal union. I think hon. members will agree with me that a proposal to prohibit could be better dealt with by the several States, each for itself, than by leaving the sole power to the Federal Parliament, with whom the only question could be whether there should be prohibition throughout all the colonies at once and as one whole. There is no reason why the Federal Government should be the only political body to have that power.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
How could you do it without creating all the troubles of border Customs-houses?

Mr. REID:
It is limited to articles the sale of which is prohibited within the colony.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The object of the amendment is that if either Tasmania or Victoria, for instance, desires to prohibit the introduction of opium or alcohol, it may do so. The terms of the Constitution as at present worded would deprive it of that right. I wish to prevent any colony from being shut out from exercising a power which it at present enjoys.

Mr. REID:
Will you allow me to suggest that we should postpone this clause in order to reach the substantial financial clauses?

Mr. DEAKIN:
I think there will be no discussion on this amendment.

Mr. REID:
I am told that there will be.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I wish that had been stated, and I would not have commenced to speak.

Mr. REID:
I find that the days are going, and we are not getting to the pith of the subject.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I understand that this means I can have the hon. member's support when it does come on.
Mr. REID:
If I am here when it comes on. It is not likely.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I move:
That the clause be postponed.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

Clause 87.-Until uniform duties of Customs have been imposed, there shall be shown, in the books of the Treasury of the Commonwealth, in respect of each State:

I. The revenues collected from duties of Customs and excise, and from the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the State to the Commonwealth by this Constitution;

II. The expenditure of the Commonwealth in the collection of duties of Customs and excise, the performance of the services, and the exercise of the powers transferred from the State to the Commonwealth by this Constitution:

III. The balance, if any, in favor of the State.

From the balance found in favor of each State there shall be deducted its share of the expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of the original Powers given to it by this Constitution, and this share shall be in the proportion of the number of the people of the State to those of the Commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth. After such deduction the surplus shown to be due to the State shall be paid to the State month by month.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The idea was, I think, that as I had the honor of being Chairman of, the Finance Committee I might be able to explain from the chairman's standpoint the difficulties that arose in dealing with these financial questions and also to give a fair explanation of the general tenor of them. I think that in dealing with this financial question we cannot be too honest to ourselves or to our constituents. There are a great many matters involved in this question, and I think we have to meet them clearly and fully. We have heard a great deal about compromise in this Committee and in the Convention, but it seems to me now that, unless we are very careful, we may, as far as New South Wales is concerned, be getting into the region of sacrifice. The difficulties that have beset us in dealing with this question of finance are the varying conditions of the various colonies. We have got five colonies now attempting to federate. Three of them have distinctly, protective systems; one, Western Australia, is in a practically abnormal state at present, and New South Wales has, during the last couple of years, been gradually cleansing her tariff, so that it is now absolutely free trade, or as near that as can be. In 1895 the position of the colonies was much more in line with regard to the tariff. In 1895 the Dibbs tariff came to its last stage, and the duties realised in that year were larger than those realised in any year previously or since. If we had been attempting to federate in the year 1895, a great many of the difficulties that now beset us would not have come into operation. The tariff, which in New South Wales in 1895 yielded £2,200,000, will now yield in July next-if certain further duties have been removed-only £1,400,000. In other words, we have to place the tariff of New South Wales, which is established practically on free trade principles, alongside others which are highly protective. The question is with regard to the distribution of what is known as the surplus—that is, the amount of money that will remain after the payment for the services transferred and for the special administration of the Central Government. What that surplus was during the first two years before the uniform tariff has been imposed will be found by a system of book-keeping. Therefore, under the clause before us now, there will scarcely be any comment necessary in the debate. But the difficulty comes after the uniform tariff has been imposed, and there we have to deal with practically an unknown quantity. We have had a great many tables of figures placed before us to show us what under different sets of circumstances would be the result an regards different colonies; but I am quite prepared to allow that no calculations of that kind can be substantially correct, because it is impossible to know what the peculiar tariff will be, whether it will be on protective lines or on revenue-producing lines. Therefore, we can only get tolerably near to our conclusions. At the same time a great problem arises because we apply these anomalous conditions to a colony that is one of absolute free trade, and imagine that all the difficulties will disappear as if by the magician's wand. We are giving away under this Federal Constitution the most elastic and powerful piece of machinery for the collection of taxation. Therefore, the difficulty is how can we come together as federated colonies, agree to a uniform tariff, and at the same time prevent the great danger of the dislocation of the State finances? I will give a few figures just from memory to illustrate the position. Taking the tariff of New South Wales as it will be in July, at the present time the total amount collected from Customs duties for these five colonies is about £4,200,000.

Mr. PEACOCK:

For twelve months?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Yes.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Under the present tariff?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Yes, under the present tariff. It is near enough to say about four millions.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There would be another million if you had a tariff in New South Wales.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Coming to the question of border duties, these are, roughly speaking, about a million of money. There have been various calculations made from £500,000 to £1,000,000; but I think it is safe to consider that, one way and another, there will be a million to be made up with regard to those duties. Besides that, you will have something between £400,000 and £500,000 for the special services connected with the administration of the Central Government. I am not now putting the matter with regard to my own fiscal opinions, but stating it as it appeared in the Committee. You will therefore see the difficulties which surround the State treasuries in the future, and if you are not going either to economise very much or increase your direct taxation in the various States, you will have to create through Customs duties a revenue equal to the whole of the present amount now collected, plus the expenditure for the central administration. If you lose a million of money in connection with your border duties, and if it costs £500,000 more for your central administration, and if you want to put the States in a position to absolutely lose nothing—which we do not—and if you want to put the States in exactly the same position as before Federation, so as to give them back a surplus which would place their treasuries in the same position as before with regard to the transferred services, then you will have to raise at least a million and a half further money by some way or other in order to create these co

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
One million, and it is only a transfer.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Not at all. You lose a million.

Mr. REID:
It does not affect your argument.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It does not affect my argument that you would have to increase your duties because you lose a million that you will have to make up from extra duties or some other source. I am stating the position of the State Treasurers of the protected colonies. Very well. Now, I would be perfectly willing to leave this conundrum to the Federal Parliament. We have passed the machinery, which is only a mere bookkeeping process, by which during the first two years, presumably as they are framing the uniform tariff, everything goes on exactly on the present lines, and after paying per capita the amount of the Central Government's expenses we get returned to us absolutely what is due to us. That is to say that supposing Now South Wales pays, say, £140,000 to the central administration, its finances would be exactly the same, with the exception of the £140,000, as if there had been no Federation.

Mr. PEACOCK:
That is for two years.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Yes. Now, the position taken up—I want to state it fairly for the benefit of the Committee—the position taken up by certain Treasurers of the different States is this: They say, "We must have a certainty with regard to our State finances, at any rate for four or five years, and therefore, no matter what policy may be adopted, we must have a definite minimum amount given back to us." But the difficulty, especially to New South Wales, is, that if you fix a definite sum you practically dictate the tariff of the future.

Mr. SYMON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
There is no use getting out of it by a sort of quibble, and saying: "Oh, but you have got direct taxation to go to, and it does not follow because you fix the sum you are going to increase the burdens of the people through the Customs." That is to my mind nonsense. We know well enough that whatever revenue is raised during the first few years of Federation must be practically raised through the Customs. We may as well face the position, because this condition we all believe will be the actual condition of things. Very well. Now, it seems to me, that if we are going to hand over the whole of our Customs revenue to this federal authority, we are giving them such enormous powers, and we are surrendering to them such a tremendous engine of taxation, that anything else we leave to them is practically child's play. Therefore, I believe in leaving the whole adjustment of this matter to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID:
Hear, bear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Furthermore, you will see that by indicating these surpluses, and by putting in this Bill a certain modus operandi, as this clause would, we are establishing a financial link between the Federal Government and the State Governments which cannot be ignored. Just take the operation of our elections for the Federal Parliament. Will it not be perfectly just and right that influence—the legitimate influence of public opinion, I mean—should be brought to bear on the men who will be elected for the different States to represent those States in that Federal Parliament? And it is not as if we were transferring these things to a foreign power.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

We are simply transferring them to ourselves in our corporate capacity as a whole, so to speak. Therefore all these difficulties of the State treasurers will be known as well to the Federal Treasurer, through the States representatives, as they are known here by us to-day. Therefore it seems to me, if we were not allowing that surpluses were to be given at all—if we were giving over certain revenues for good and all—there would be an absolute break between the Federal and State finances; but that break is not going to occur; and it seems to me that there will be exactly the same influences at work in the Federal Parliament which are at work here in this Convention for the protection of the different State treasuries. It will be very plain to hon. members who think out this matter that any minimum amount that may be fixed for these surpluses must put the freetrade colony of New South Wales in a very unfortunate position, because it practically dictates the policy of the future. I have determined to be perfectly honest in this matter; to say exactly how it would appear to us in dealing with our constituents, in order to get this Federal Constitution passed. We shall have to confess to the people of New South Wales that we have absolutely embedded in this Constitution certain arrangements by which it will follow as an absolutely logical result that Customs duties must be increased for the people of New South Wales. At the same time, there is no necessity, as far as I can see, to face that extreme position, and I would further say, that, although there has been a great deal of criticism upon this Finance Committee—criticism which I think to some extent unreasonable we have to face, if we do not leave it to the Federal Parliament, an almost insoluble enigma. You cannot on any scientific grounds settle this question. And, why? When we go into this Federation, and create a uniform tariff, that tariff will not operate immediately in exactly the same way in the different colonies. I will take it, for the sake of example, and purely as an illustration, that the tariff of Victoria were accepted. If that tariff were accepted, and if there were any scientific arrangement made such as the distribution of the surplus on a per capita basis, it can be proved— you may make all allowances for exaggeration, but it can be absolutely proved—that New South Wales would practically be losing on a per capita basis from £500,000 to £750,000 per year.

Mr. DEAKIN:

What do you mean by "losing"? Who gets it?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I mean that a tariff must take some time before it brings about its legitimate result. Any hon. member will see clearly that a country that has been practically freetrade for many years will not begin to feel the effect of a protective tariff until some years have elapsed. It is practically a matter of fact that for the first five years of that tariff, which after a while, if a protective tariff, would become a reducing quantity, there will be hundreds of thousands of pounds' worth of importations into that freetrade colony which would not come into the other colony with the same population.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

But you get a larger revenue.

Mr. REID:

If we get it back.

Mr. DEAKIN:

You do not lose it.

Mr. GLYNN:

It will make the fortunes of all the merchants in Sydney.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

If we get it back. I am now coming to this point, that you can have no absolutely scientific arrangement, and therefore that leads me to the next point of our financial operations. In order to meet the difficulty we have had to keep up this destable system of bookkeeping for a period of five years. I look upon that as the weakest point of the whole of our arrangements.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I want to be perfectly fair to all the other colonies. There are two proposals that might be made—we are shut up to two if you want to avoid book-keeping. We must either simply keep alive the book-keeping for the first year and make that a test for those five years during which the tariff is supposed to gradually operate until it comes into line in its results with the same tariff of the other colonies, or we must go right at once to a per capita basis of distribution. Thus when the uniform tariff comes in, and I take for the matter of illustration that it may be a protective tariff, from the first year under that tariff New South Wales, with almost the same population as Victoria, would practically get—it is almost certain she would get—at least from £750,000 to a million pounds more of duties than Victoria. Consequently it would not be fair to Victoria to take the first year as a gauge for the whole five years because the principle is this: that year by year under the influence of that tariff, if it continues, this relative difference between the two States of the same population would decrease. If my hon. friend Sir George Turner would agree that we should take for that five years the basis of the first year of the uniform tariff then I should be delighted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I would not.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

We want to know what the Government of New South Wales would do.

Mr. REID:

I do not think it would be fair to the other colonies. I would not ask it.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It would not be fair to Sir George Turner. Now, Mr. Reid, I may say, without any disclosure of confidence, in the Committee thought that the period should be extended for ten years, and probably he was right; but, for the sake of stopping this wretched and miserable book-keeping system, we agreed in the end to extend it to five years, and then we should have a per capita distribution. Then I come to the other proposal, namely, to start at once with a per capita basis of distribution. The one thing applies the same as the other, and on a per capita basis New South Wales would be losing during the first few years from £500,000 to £750,000 a year. Thus, while the first proposal to end the book-keeping in the first year would be manifestly unfair to Victoria the proposal to start at once with a per capita distribution would be even more unfair to New South Wales. Therefore the Committee, in its wisdom, decided after the most painful consideration—after about a thousand and one schemes had been set up and knocked down—that the only process was this process of bookkeeping. If that process is allowed, nothing can be fairer. There is no doubt it is a great nuisance to carry on the machinery on the borders of the different colonies. There is no doubt you will not be able to get at an exact result because there will be thousands of goods coming backwards and forwards in broken packages which it would be ridiculous to take any notice of. You will have to deal with the thing in the bulk, and strike a balance in the beat way you can. After all if that matter is agreed to—although it will be very unpleasant, and although it is a project that I am ashamed of personally - it is not a matter which involves much principle. The great question involved in these clauses is the question of fixing a minimum for the different Treasurers in the different services. And I may say that is a tremendous block on our arrangements. Is seems to me that it opens out an enormous difficulty as far as New South Wales is concerned. Of course I see the difficulty of different Treasurers. I am told that in one colony it is absolutely impossible to go further in the way of direct taxation; and these Treasurers, according to their own statements, will have to face their constituents by telling them they have practically given over this great engine of taxation to the Federal Government and have no absolute guarantee that after the first year of the uniform tariff they will not have to face a large deficiency. I am not touching now so much upon the debts, but I think I have explained pretty fully the exact difficulties of the position. I may say one word more incidental to the debts, but I will not deal with them exhaustively. Another question will arise with regard to the surplus. If you get a certain surplus which is payable in the early part of the Federation, say a surplus arising either on the first year of the uniform tariff's operation, or on the last year of the old regime, the question arises as to the covering of that particular surplus, and no doubt if it could be covered by a similar amount, of interest capitalised, it would be a very good operation; but that is not for all by the Central Government. But still the question will always arise in regard to these surpluses. I would point out that all we do in this complicated position is simply to direct a definite operation for five years.

Even after five years surpluses may occur, and there we agree to leave the amount to the Federal Government for per capita distribution. The question naturally arises "Would it not be better to allow the Federal Parliament, which will be as just and equitable as we can possibly be, to deal with that matter themselves?"

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
What matter?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The matter of dealing with the surpluses, the getting at the amount, and its distribution during the first five years of the Commonwealth after the uniform tariff has come into operation.

Mr. HIGGINS:
You want us to go in blindfold.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I am quite ready to recognise that difficulty, and I have recognised it in the remarks I have made. But at the same time if the different States gave way in this it would clear the atmosphere tremendously with regard to this question, and I think would make it completely acceptable to the people of New South Wales.

Mr. WISE:

The Commonwealth must see that the States pay their way.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I do not know that they would at all. The Commonwealth might say you had better go in for direct taxation and tax your people for any deficiency you have got. I think it would be better, if I might so suggest, to deal first with this question of the surplus as we have it in this clause, and then afterwards deal with the matter of the debt. I have put the question as clearly and as concisely as I could to the Convention, and I do think that we may be able to get at a solution of the difficulty, though there is no solution of an absolutely scientific character possible under the circumstances.

Mr. BARTON:

Did the Committee take into consideration the question that if the debts were taken over there would be no authority for the regulation of the subsequent portion of their debts?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

They divided that matter altogether. In the first place, the opinion was that if it were not to be absolutely a taking over the debts, then it was considered that the question of the present and the future debts should be left. There is some difference of opinion as regards the drafting of that clause, but it is so drafted that if an alteration is agreed to it can easily be effected. At the present time, as far as I have understood the position in the Committee, we have not decided for the compulsory taking over of the debts, but if we had done so then certainly there would have to be some arrangements made with reference to the future debts, or something indicated with regard to the position of the Commonwealth in the future in relation to the debts of the particular States, because if we absolutely decide that the Commonwealth shall take over the debts then it would be absolutely necessary for us to indicate how we are to deal with future debts. There are two objects in taking over the debt, the first, in part, being the covering of the surpluses. In looking at the matter broadly, the great object is to have one consolidated debt, to prevent a lot of small debts, so that if we decide to force the Commonwealth in this Bill to take over the debts it would certainly be necessary to indicate how we are to deal with them in the future. The difficulty of a debt to my mind is that it belongs to two different classes of assets in the State. You have got, including Queensland, 169 millions, and while you have 110 millions covered by railway construction, you have got fifty-nine millions in other different services. Now, it does not follow that a certain amount of the debt could not be taken over in connection with these other services, but you must recollect that when you give over the whole of the debt which covers these promiscuous services, which will be to a great extent self-supporting, you open up a very difficult and complicated question. I have always held from the beginning-and from time to time I have thought over this matter seriously too—that this Convention is scarcely in a position to deal either with the debts or railways. I have always held that it will be better to leave the whole of these complicated questions to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament as the great negotiator with the Federal States. Therefore, it seems to me, on broad lines, that we should leave the question of the debts for the present as purely local matters, giving the Commonwealth power, with the consent of the States, to take them over, either consolidated or under a certain arrangement satisfactory to all. I am perfectly certain from a financial point of view, both with regard to the railways and debts, that it will be much more satisfactory, as a matter of arrangement and economy between the States and the Commonwealth, to allow those operations to take place not by arrangements made in this Convention and embedded in this Bill, but by arrangement or negotiation between the Federal Government and the State Governments hereafter. I am sure if we touch these matters it will create a large amount of feeling. It will be almost impossible to adjust them on proper lines, and I doubt very much whether they will assist this Bill when it comes before the people of our respective States. After all, we have come here with a sort of mandate that we are not to take away from the States in this first step to Federation anything that can reasonably belong to them, and which can possibly, until opinion ripens, be better done by the States. I am sure if we leave this question of debts and railways outside of present arrangements we are far more likely to have this Constitution made acceptable to the general body of the people.

Mr. HOLDER:

I think Mr. McMillan is to congratulated upon the exceedingly clear and fair way in which he has placed before us the extremely difficult problem with which the Finance Committee had to deal, and with which we have now to deal. While I recognise that he has most fairly placed this matter before us, there are one or two matters surrounding it from my side which require a little more attention and a little further development. I hesitate somewhat to raise these points, because there are some who speak of the action of anyone who refers to difficulties in connection with Federation as being anti-federal. I protest against being stigmatised as one who is anti-federal. I point to these difficulties because someone must, and in the hope that if I cannot point to a way out of them someone else may be able to do so. Although I see many serious difficulties, no one is justified in saying I am anti-federal. The position as it affects the small States is that they do not at all know how, without the Customs revenue, they are going to make both ends meet. I am not going to say South Australia is better off or worse off than any other colony, but I shall take her case, because I know it best, and am most familiar with the details of her position. We have a debt which involves the payment of nearly a million a year in interest. A considerable portion of that annual payment is derived from the profits on railways and from returns over and above the expense of working other loan undertakings; but we depend upon the £500,000 we realise from Customs for the payment of so much of the interest on the debt, and if we are going to hand over to the federal authority this sum of £500,000 yearly, unless we can see we are going to get it, or a large portion of it, back, we can see very clearly that South Australia is within measurable distance of a serious difficulty. We might increase our direct taxation, but I should be very sorry to be the Treasurer to propose it, as the people are already sufficiently heavily burdened with various measures of taxation. I should be very sorry to have to propose any addition to these burdens, and yet nothing else could possibly be done by any Treasurer who wished to make both ends meet. There are two points of view. There is the point of view of the Federal Treasurer who wants his hands free, and wants to be able to come down and propose a freetrade tariff, if he be a freetrader. He may want to frame a tariff that will bring in an exceedingly small amount-enough only to cover the expenses of the Federation-and if we leave him a free hand, and permit the majority to sanction a tariff that will produce but little more than is necessary to cover the cost of the Parliament, we make provision for their returning practically nothing to States for the surrender which they make of four millions sterling. That position, if it were tolerable to the larger colonies, would be intolerable to the smaller ones, and while we should like to give the Federal Treasurer an absolutely free hand, I do not hesitate to say that we cannot afford to do so. South Australia cannot give that free hand, nor can Tasmania, nor Western Australia, nor Queensland, if she were here.

Mr. MOORE:

Or Victoria.

Mr. HOLDER:
Victoria can speak for itself, and I have no doubt that Sir George Turner is fully prepared to take his own part. We cannot afford to surrender these large sums of revenue unless we receive large returns from the sums we surrender. That brings me to this point: while we would like from the point of view of the Federal Treasurer to leave him free, we cannot from the point of view of the States. In saying this I must not be called parochial. Surely it is to the interests of the Federation as it is to the interests of the States that the States should be solvent. What is the use of contemplating a Federation whose Treasury will be full to overflowing, while the States themselves are insolvent.

Mr. GLYNN:
How will that happen?

Mr. HOLDER:
My answer to the hon. member is that such would happen if we gave to the federal authority power to make what might possibly be a freetrade tariff under which there would be no return of Customs duties to the States.

Mr. SYMON:
Would they make it freetrade?

Mr. HOLDER:
The hon. member then accepts the proposition that we cannot leave it within the power of the Commonwealth to adopt a freetrade tariff, which would ruin the States.

Mr. GLYNN:
It might be a high revenue tariff.

Mr. REID:
What would you call the tariff of England, which produces millions each year?

Mr. HOLDER:
I lay myself somewhat open to criticism when I use the phrase "protective tariff," as there might be a high revenue tariff which would produce as large an aggregate as a protective tariff, and perhaps more permanently. I will substitute, with the permission of the Convention, the words "high revenue tariff-meaning a tariff which would produce some 25,000,000 yearly-for the phrase "protective tariff." Returning to my argument, I say we cannot afford to give the federal authority a free hand in levying a low tariff, or to play fast and loose with the subject.

Mr. REID:
You cannot trust the Federal Treasurer.

Mr. HOLDER:
I am not keeping to the track which I had marked out for myself, but I shall get there all the same. I return to the point at which I think it was Mr. Peacock thought I was tripping.

Mr. PEACOCK:

No; I am following you closely all the time.

Mr. HOLDER:

We are charged with not being willing to trust the Federal Government. Now, I could trust the Federal Government exceedingly well under certain circumstances. If South Australia were going to have twenty-five or twenty-six members in the House of Representatives, I think we could put a good deal more confidence in it, and could exercise much more trust. If we had a strong Senate, such as some of us wanted, a Senate strong enough to demand for any State its rights and the protection of all its interests, I should not now be saying what I am. I would say, "Trust the whole thing to the federal authority." But with a Senate, such as we are offered, and with such small representation in the House of Representatives which we are entitled to, and against which I make no complaint, I say the smaller colonies cannot trust themselves as fully and as restfully as the larger colonies can. Now, the difficulty seems to me between two points, shall we leave the Federal Treasurer to be free, by which the solvency of the States would be endangered, or shall we secure it by requiring a certain return back to the States at the expense of the Federal Treasury? I would rather tie the hands of the Federal Treasurer than I would risk the solvency of the States by leaving the hands of the Federal Treasurer free. I would prefer to leave the Federal Treasury free, but we cannot afford to do it. They must tie the hands of the Federal Treasurer so that the States may feel safe, and that for some time to come. So far as the scheme of the Bill is concerned, which is based on the recommendations of the Finance Committee, I have no criticism to offer in respect to clause 87. It is much the same as I suggested when the subject first came before the Convention. It embodies, not in the same way as I suggested, but in another, the very principle for which I then contended. I pointed out then that the cost of the Government should be borne per capita. The accounts are to be made up so that a special expenditure in one colony should be debited to that colony. The expenditure of the federal authority is to be charged per capita for the whole Commonwealth, and the balances will be returned. The only difference is in the manner. This involves a double operation—the collection and the paying back. But as the result is the same, I will not seek to have it altered. Clause 89 says:

During the first five years after uniform duties of Customs have been imposed, the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the States for any year shall not be less than the aggregate amount returned to them during the year last before the imposition of much duties.

I have serious objection to the five years' provision. One of the greatest advantages accruing to us all through the establishment of this Federation is intercolonial freetrade. Besides that, everything else so far as the advantages South Australia will gain, is scarcely worth mentioning, unless it be the question of defence. I say there is no other matter which will be a gain to us beyond the freedom of trade. If we are to have on our borders still these Customs officials not collecting duties, but passing entries and taking accounts of goods passing backwards and forwards, we shall be deprived for five years of the advantages of intercolonial free trade. We know something of the difficulty in this colony, for in all our accounts we have kept the affairs of the Northern Territory distinct from South Australia. We have been very scrupulous in this matter, and have treated the colony as if it had been a separate colony. This is precisely what would have to be done here for five years between colony and colony. Our arrangement was not with respect to goods passing from one State to another, but from one part of this colony to another, and yet there are frequently difficulties arising as to the exact amount of duties to be charged. The quantity passing over the Northern Territory border is very small, but with the same system between the colonies we will have to deal with large quantities of goods in different stages of manufacture, some of which come in as unmanufactured, some of which pass through stages of manufacture in the colony to which they were first introduced, pass to another, and may be to a third. I do not hesitate to say that the difficulties, the friction, the trouble, the delay, and the loss to traders resulting from the keeping of these accounts must be most serious, and so I hope that the Convention will take the utmost care to expunge from this Constitution all provisions requiring the maintenance of those most difficult interests between colony and colony through the Custom-houses on the border. But if we are not to keep these accounts so that the surplus of the different States may be returned to the States in which it was produced what shall be the method by which it shall be returned equitably? When I spoke at the beginning of this Convention, I said that I had looked at this matter until the problem seemed to be insoluble Mr. McMillan has told us that even after the further inquiries of the committee, after the fullest investigation, and with all the ability he possesses, he is inclined to come to the conclusion that there is no solution of these difficulties; so that it seems to me that I was right after all, indeed, that in almost the exact words as I used on that occasion Mr.

McMillan has put the position to-day. If we had a Senate such as I have referred to, and if we had representatives in the other House such as I have referred to, then I should be prepared to say after a uniform tariff has come into force, "Leave it to the Federal Parliament as it is," but we cannot consent to that, nor can we consent to these accounts being kept on the borders, and we are therefore driven back to the position that we must seek some compromise, which seems to me the only possibility between the two colonies most vitally concerned—the two great colonies of New South Wales and Victoria. We must seek at their hands some compromise to enable us to get over the difficulty, for the representatives of South Australia have not in their hands the power to concede what is required to meet this difficulty. If the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria can, by any compromise whatever, or by any method of adjustment they can devise, say by taking the figures of 1895 or 1896 as a basis for the calculations, arrive at any basis which is fair to them, then they will have solved the difficulty, and we in South Australia would be content with anything which is fair to them.

Mr. McMillan:

The only year we would be content with is 1895, but that might not be suitable to the other colonies.

Mr. Reid:

Ninety-six would be much better.

Mr. Holder:

Ninety-six would suit us. Our Customs duties were rather low in 1895, but in 1996 they mended, and this present year they are considerably more, and we would rather have the adjustment on the basis of this year; but that would be impossible as far as New South Wales is concerned. If an adjustment can be arrived at in New South Wales and Victoria on the basis of the 1895 or 1896 figures, so as to save the necessity of keeping officers on the borders, then those two colonies will have laid the smaller colonies under a deep obligation. But then would come the difficulty as regards Western Australia. The extraordinary fact appears that Western Australia, with a population of less than half of that of South Australia, and with a Customs tariff lower than that of South Australia, will this year collect twice the Customs duties to be collected in South Australia, or, to put it in another way, Western Australia is to day collecting Customs more than four times as much per head of her population as is the case in South Australia. Now, I think that we must admit that this is absolutely abnormal, and must be considered as such, and that any attempt to arrive at a settlement on that basis is out of the question. We cannot afford to consider Western Australia's tariff to-day or her revenue returns from Customs as a fair basis for a settlement. A fairer basis, and I think we may well do this, would be to consider that under a uniform tariff, with fairly uniform conditions, with people about equally prosperous, when the special difficulties arising from the change from free trade to protection have been overcome in New South Wales—that is the only point of difficulty—then a uniform tariff operating over the whole Commonwealth would produce for all practical purposes a uniform amount per head of the population.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

We allow that.

Mr. HOLDER:

I emphasise now that all we have to settle is this one difficulty of the five years while New South Wales is adjusting her condition to the new tariff. I say again that the difficulties of that five-year period can be met by no one else than the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria. I have spoken early in the debate, purposely before Mr. Reid and Sir George Turner, so that I might put this point, and ask whether they can assist this Convention by facing these difficulties and arranging between themselves in some way—which I am sure will satisfy all the rest of us—how this obstacle can be overcome? I do not regard the Western Australian difficulty as permanent. I think it will settle itself very soon, and that we may expect to receive from Western Australia at the time the uniform tariff comes into force practically the same amount as from the other colonies. When we come to clause 90 we find that the surplus revenues, after the five years' period, are to be distributed per capita over the whole population. If the amount is collected equally per capita then the distribution per capita must be fair. Let me now go back to the point that the fair distribution of the surplus after the expenditure under the Commonwealth has been met does not absolutely place the States in an assured position, because the Commonwealth may launch out into extravagant expenditure.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLDER:

That is one of the most serious difficulties I can see. It seems to me that nothing is more likely under some circumstances than that a power called into existence as this Commonwealth is might launch out into heavy naval and military expenditure. We all know how easily money can be squandered in that way. Millions are nothing. Unless there were some safeguard, some provision made for securing all the States' Treasuries, we might find some fine day that, though we had arranged for an absolutely equitable distribution of the surplus, there was no surplus to distribute. Therefore we must keep in mind, not only the equitable distribution of the surplus, but that there shall be a surplus, and that that shall amount to, as nearly as possible, what the States surrender. I strongly object to clause 88. No more unfair provision could be devised. To say to a power such as this will be, a sovereign power, "You shall not, under any circumstances that may arise in the performance of the duties of the Commonwealth, on any of the matters referred to in this Constitution, spend more than, say, half a million a year "-the amount is blank in the clause-"for four years," is to say what we should not say, and what this Convention, I believe, will not say.

Mr. HIGGINS:
What would happen if there were a war?

Mr. HOLDER:
Of course in that case, Constitution or no Constitution, money would have to be spent. But the hon. member Mr. Higgins will see the absolute impossibility of putting in such a safeguard as that. If this clause were qualified by words such as that the specific expenditure might be exceeded in case of emergency, then everything would be an emergency. We could all get through that if we wanted to; so that the clause will not do as it is, because it is a clause which ought not to pass, as tying the bands too tightly of a sovereign power, and it would not do if we put in an emergency section.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
An abnegation of Federation.

Mr. HOLDER:
What is required is not to say that the federal authority shall not spend more than so much, but practically to put in something which will have the effect of a special appropriation. We all know what they are. We have them in every colony, and before we begin to make up our ordinary estimates of expenditure we have to provide for these special appropriations, which are by Statute. If we can put in some provision which will have the effect of a special appropriation, and which will require the Federation before dealing with its moneys to pay out to the States some fixed proportion of the revenues which it collects and which they are now deprived of, then, and not otherwise shall we have sufficiently safeguarded the interests of the States. I suggest that when the negotiations are proceeding between the two Premiers most concerned in arranging terms, they should at the same time consider whether there cannot be some fixed percentage of the Customs received which can be returned to the several States from time to time, so that they may be assured in their solvency and that through their prosperity the prosperity of the whole Commonwealth may be assured.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You would have to first fix the amounts they are going to collect by Customs before you can fix that percentage.

Mr. HOLDER:
I do not think so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Supposing they only handed over small amounts the percentage to be returned will be a small amount, and the State Treasurer will be in a difficulty.

Mr. HOLDER:
We know precisely what the amount will be during two years, and if we say that the percentage to be returned during the next five years shall not be less than during the two years after the tariff comes into operation, we shall have absolutely assured the position of the State Treasurer.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
YOU make a calculation of the minimum amount for central expenditure, including services transferred?

Mr. HOLDER:
I do. But the hon. member will see that, while I make my calculations of the estimated return upon the basis of the estimated expenditure, I should not necessarily tie the Federation down to that expenditure.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You make a calculation of, say, 70 per cent. returned, while 30 per cent., under ordinary circumstances, covers the other, and you let them extend it?

Mr. HOLDER:
Yes. They should return to the States not less than 70 per cent. of the sum which is collected as Customs and excise duties and not less than the aggregate returned to them as the mean of the two years before the uniform tariff came into operation. Besides this the Federal authority would relieve the States of certain charges, such as defence, now borne by them. Then we should have assured the States as far as we ought, and would not unduly bind the Federal Treasurer in the exercise of his responsibility. There are several matters in connection with the debts which I should like to touch on, but it is not opportune to deal with them just now.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLDER:
If we can keep the surpluses and their distribution separate from the debts and their conversion or otherwise, we shall, I think, save time. We can deal with the debts when we come to them in the due course of business. I commend what I have said to the Convention, and I hope that, great as the difficulties are, someone may be able to find a way to get past them before we conclude.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I agree with my hon. friend Mr. Holder, that Mr. McMillan in dealing with the question has placed before the Committee the difficulties in a fair and straightforward manner; and it is for us to endeavor, as far as we possibly can, to reason out the various points which he has placed before us. The great difficulty of course is occasioned by the fact that the majority of the colonies have their revenues derived from Customs tariffs based practically on protection, whereas New South Wales lately has thought it wise to alter the system in operation there up till 1895, and receives a smaller amount of revenue, practically on the principles of free trade. For the first two years I think there can be no objection to the system taken in the Bill, because that leaves the colonies exactly as they are at the time Federation takes place, only requiring them to pay per capita amounts for the expenses of the Federal Government. Unless the colonies are prepared to pay that, power would have to be given to the Federal Government to raise an extra amount by some means in order to meet the federal expenditure. With regard to border duties, my hon. friend Mr. Holder estimates them at £1,000,000. I do not think they would come to so much as, that, for while at the present time they come to £700,000 or £800,000, a considerable amount is allowed by way of drawbacks, so that on the whole the estimates of border duties would be rather larger than the amount which would have to be actually taken into consideration. So far as the requirements go, I think the amount set down—£400,000, or £500,000—will not be wide of the mark. Probably when we come to deal with the details we may be able to reduce it. We ought to keep in our minds that we will have to provide that amount. The border duties will be lost, so far as the Treasurers are concerned, throughout the whole of Australia. The people themselves will probably reap some benefit by the fact that foreign imports will have to pay these duties. But the amount will have to be collected from some other source.

The duties on goods now passing from colony to colony are now paid by our own people, but under the proposed system that will not be in operation. There is no question about one limit. We must, if we possibly can, take care that the States Treasurers will have for a certain number of years a full amount returned to them, equal at all events to the amount which we give up to the Federation, and we must face this matter. It is all very well to say that we must not deal with it in any spirit of huckstering. There can be nothing unfair in saying to the Federal Treasurer: "You must for a period of seven years place us in such a position that we know as soon as possible what we are going to receive, and moreover that for that period, at all events, we will receive as near as possible an equivalent to what we have given over to this Federation." Mr. McMillan suggests that we should leave the whole matter to the Federal Parliament. The Federal Parliament will have first a grave difficulty to deal with in endeavoring to deal with the surplus. We are here as representative men, and can we go back to our various colonies and say that we, as representative men of the Colonies, have met together, we have appointed from our midst a Finance Committee, and ended our discussion by deciding that the only way we can deal with the question is to say that it shall be passed on to a new body which is to be created? I do not think we ought to do that. If we do, what will the people say? Will not the people say, "What is it going to cost; what extra amounts have we to find, and how are we to find them?" If we put this Federation to the people, with extra difficulties standing in the way, will the result not in all probability be that they will say, "Well, these men could not solve this difficulty, and how do we know that the Federal Parliament will solve it in a fair and reasonable manner? If you tell us what your plan is as to how these difficulties are to be met, we are then in a position to know what to do. But if not, you are asking us to take a leap in the dark, you are asking us to enter into a system when you yourselves cannot formulate the most important portion of that system—the financial portion." And where there are waverers, those who are wavering as to whether this scheme will be advantageous or not, when we raise the point that this proposal should be left over to the Federal Parliament to deal with, will vote against the scheme altogether. Therefore we should use every possible effort to place in this Bill a definite and distinct proposal before attempting to hand it over and shelve this matter in the way that my hon. friend Mr. McMillan would seem to, suggest. The colonies are unquestionably in such a position at the present time, and have been for some years past, that they cannot afford to give up any considerable part of the revenue they have been collecting. We know it would be very difficult indeed in any of the colonies, for the purpose of raising this extra money, to attempt to impose any form of direct taxation. I can understand if we went to our people and said, "We think the incidence of taxation ought to be changed, for the purpose of reducing charges we have to make on our farming population and other portions of our community, and we propose, therefore, to make certain reductions in this direction, and in lieu thereof to impose direct taxation," the matter might be considered on its merits and debated. But if we are to go and say "We are going to lose £700,000 by this proposal, and we are going to work this scheme by direct taxation," then the people will say "You are going to charge us extra amounts without any corresponding benefit, and therefore we will go against the scheme."

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is only a fraction of the £700,000 that will fall to each State.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It is only a fraction of £700,000, but in Victoria, as our share of it, we will probably have to raise from £300,000 to £350,000, and I think if the Treasurer told the Parliament of Victoria that he required £350,000 for this purpose he would find very great difficulty in getting either Parliament or the people to endorse his proposal. My hon. friend Mr. McMillan fairly puts it that the Customs revenue which we hand over is one of our chief sources of revenue, and that it is elastic. We must not forget that seven or eight years ago we received in Victoria something over three million pounds for Customs; now we get under two millions. But in ten or fifteen years' time, if a gradual improvement takes place, the amount of Customs duties will steadily increase.

Mr. REID:

That will disappoint those who believe in the efficacy of a tariff to prevent importation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No, because seven or eight years ago we were at the height of the boom, when we all had immense sums to spend. The great falling off has not merely been in the articles which are protected, but in other articles, such as spirits and tobacco, which the people when they have plenty of money will buy freely, but which as soon as they get a little hard up they will do without. No doubt that the Customs duties are down at the present time as low as they are likely to go, but they are gradually increasing in all the colonies, and with the increase in population and prosperity they must rise rapidly, and in a few years' time the amount received from that particular source will be very large indeed. The hon. member seems to think that by influencing the State elections and by pledging candidates to certain views and lines of action we could force the Federal Parliament to provide a tariff which would give the necessary amount of money to allow of the needful returns to the States.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

What I said was that the views and wishes of candidates would be known as thoroughly as our views are known now on the question.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No doubt, but we have the power in our own hands. We may say to the Federal Parliament, "You must raise a certain amount of money," but if we leave the matter unsettled we part with that power, and the views of the members of the Federal Parliament may be adverse to the course that we think ought to be taken. That is a strong reason why we should endeavor to settle the difficulty and not leave it to the Federal Parliament. We can then go to the people and say, "This is the best bargain we can make; you know what you will get, and what you will have to pay," and they will be able to say whether they will come into the Federation or not. We influence Parliament through the elections; we might influence it to give us back the full amount required of us. The people would be chary of entering into an agreement of this sort blindfolded. The hon. member raises the objection to the proposal that a certain minimum amount must be returned every year because that would leave those who advocate the cause of Federation in New South Wales in a more difficult position. It might be said that they had bound the Federal Parliament to put on a protective tariff in a colony, and that the views of that particular province might be in the direction of freetrade. You say it will be in the hands of the Federal Parliament to raise a certain amount of money, and that they could get that money by a freetrade tariff.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Perhaps I should have said by increased Customs duties. I look upon all taxation as a burden to the people, and what I simply meant to convey was that the Parliament might say to us, "You are increasing the burden of the people through the Customs by this particular act of yours."

Mr. REID:

Irrespective of whether it was a freetrade or a protective tariff.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

My hon. friend need not have selected New South Wales for his illustration, as we all have had our difficulties. Whatever means we take to raise the money, the State Parliament will have to raise it. Where is the difference? If that is the only difficulty in the way he will have to tell this to the electors of New South Wales: "If by fixing the minimum we have increased the Customs taxation, is it not as great a difficulty as that by not fixing the minimum we have increased taxation?"

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The difference is that the people have to pay whether you make it protective taxation or Customs.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I was under the impression that my hon. friend thought that by fixing the minimum we were declaring that the tariff in the future must be a protective one. We simply declare that that amount must be raised by some means, either from Customs or direct taxation; indeed we say, "You are going to take away from us certain sources of revenue which bring in a certain amount, and we expect you for a certain number of years to return us an equivalent amount." We will leave them to raise the amount by means of a protective or freetrade tariff, or in any other way, so long as they return it. We have thought over it, and it is impossible to have any scientific settlement of this question. Therefore, it must be admitted that, whatever we do, we are dealing with it in practically a rough-and-ready mode. With regard to the statement as to the distribution, at the present time or immediately after the uniform tariff comes into operation, of the amount of loss—£700,000—to New South Wales, I hardly followed Mr. McMillan. I am prepared to admit that, being a freetrade colony, the imposition of a protective tariff would for some time give that colony a decreased revenue, but year after year it would gradually increase, and instead of importing articles from the outside world and paying Customs duties they would soon import largely from the adjoining colonies, and would pay no duties. They would not pay into the general fund either, so that the amount Mr. McMillan mentioned would have to be largely discounted. As ye diminished, and it is unfair to take the first year and say it is the basis on which a calculation should be made.
[P.893] starts here

HON. MEMBERS:

We admit that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

The proposal is to keep up the present system for five years to obviate the difficulty, but as the Bill is drafted it appears to me it does not carry out the report and does not carry out what I think was the desire of the Finance Committee. It was resolved in the Committee:

That during the first five years after an uniform tariff has some into operation, the Federal Government shall continue to keep such statistics as may be necessary to secure the distribution of the surplus to each State on the same basis as that adopted during previous years.

The basis adopted during previous years was simply that whatever amount was collected in the State was to be credited to the State, and, after the expenditure was debited, that the amount should be returned; but under the proposal in the Bill we have a complicated system of book-keeping to ascertain what amount of money is paid by any one State on goods consumed in another. If we are to do this we are to have a most complicated system, and it will postpone for five years the benefit of an intercolonial freetrade tariff. I did not know that was the intention of the Committee, or I should have entered a protest against it, and endeavored to have had it altered.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
All the members of the Committee have pretty well assured me that that thoroughly interprets what was intended.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It certainly may have been my obtuseness, but I was under that impression; because if I had not been I would have raised objection against a scheme which will delay the benefits of intercolonial freetrade for five years, and which must necessitate what we must all admit is an impossibility. I really cannot understand how a majority of the Finance Committee, to whom my hon. friend refers, could have held an opposite view.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It would have been useless to have had other than this modus operandi.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The objection to having this per capita distribution at once was, that it would be unfair to New South Wales, because they would be paying a large amount of money into the pool which would be divided in a manner which would compel them to suffer to a considerable extent, and, in order to prevent that, I was prepared that the accounts should be kept exactly, as they are decided to be kept under the Bill; that is, that the money collected in each State should be credited to that State, the expenditure should be deducted, and the balance distributed. It is unfortunate that we did not all agree as to the meaning of our report. I am not in favor of keeping up that system for an extra period of five years, and of keeping up these impossible accounts.

Mr. REID:
Why should you, if you gain a lot of money by not doing so?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
By the system you propose, all the duties on the goods going to the Riverina would be credited to Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
So they will, under this proposal for two years.

Mr. REID:
Indeed, they will not.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Of course the question of drawbacks may come in here. If we are to adopt the view of the Committee, it is a further argument why we should not have a period of five years, and why we should endeavor to have some fixed basis which should come into operation at once. We ought to agree that, after the period of five years, we will leave the distribution to the Federal Parliament; but it is one thing to say we will leave the distribution to the Federal Parliament at once, and a different thing to say it shall be at the end of five years, because, at the end of that period, they will know that they have to provide a certain amount of revenue to return to the States, and that they have to frame their policy on those lines. After that period it is not likely, unless there is some very strong reason for it, that they will change that policy. We must start with the fact that we have to fix some definite and final amount on which we can act not by scientific, because that is impossible, but by some rough and ready means. I am prepared to hand over to the Federal Parliament the collection of the Customs, the Post and Telegraph Departments, and the administration of the Public Debt.

Mr. PEACOCK:

That is the only way to solve it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

There is no doubt that, for the first few years, the Federation would lose money, because they would have to pay a sum over and above that which they were receiving, but with the rapid increase which would take place-

Mr. REID:

Is not "the administration of the Public department rather vague?"

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I would hand over to them the responsibility of paying the interest on our public debt.

Mr. REID:

About five and a half million.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No doubt it is about that sum, and nearly the whole of that is made up of the surplus revenue which they would have to return to us, so that the amount they would have to raise would be comparatively small even at the commencement.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You would still have to adjust the accounts between the Federal Government and the States.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Which could be done by a simple mode, because it is easy to tell the amount collected in each State.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It would not stop the question of credits and debits between the States.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You must, under any circumstances, keep records of the amount collected in each State, so that there can be no difficulty with regard to it.

An HON. MEMBER:
Would that scheme bring any State in a debt instead of a surplus?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That scheme at present would bring in some in debt, probably all. It would bring in South Australia in debt to a large amount, but there is the question of the post office, where they make a large profit, and their expenditure on telegraph lines and other matters, and we would have to consider the debt on these and the interest they have to pay. Then there are other services on which we have spent a large amount of money, and we have to pay interest on these. In our debt we have some £5,000,000 which is being paid to us, representing advances made by us to Corporations. There is £2,000,000 to the Metropolitan Board. In the first few years the Federation will lose some money, but in time it will not, owing to the greater receipts from Customs. I am endeavoring to point out that it is impossible for us to have any scientific mode of dealing with this most troublous question.

Mr. HOLDER:
May I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is a matter of such importance that there should be a quorum?

A quorum having been constituted:

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Instead of endeavoring to undo the Gordian knot, it would be better if we possibly could, by some means fair to all the colonies, cut it at once. A view I hold is that, as the amount we have to pay interest on in most of the colonies closely approximates to the amount that we collect for net Customs revenue, it would be simple indeed and reasonably fair to all the colonies to at once hand over the liability with regard to our interest to the federal body, and let them take all the Customs, seeing that, although in the first instance they might have to pay somewhat more than they received, they would gain large benefits from it, not alone by increase of Customs duties, but in the saving of interest. That would be a very good bargain for the Federation; but perhaps if we carefully consider it we may say that in years to come it would work unfairly towards the States. There, of course, is a difficulty, that while at the outset it would be beneficial to the States, eventually it would be a heavy lose to the States. If that mode cannot be adopted, then we have to endeavor to devise some other means to overcome the difficulty. In any scheme, be what it may, we have to deal exceptionally with the colony of Western Australia, because that colony has abnormal circumstances, and, with her increasing consuming population, a very large Customs revenue. Mr. Holder puts it very clearly. My hon. friend refers to section 88, which prevents the Commonwealth from spending yearly for the first four years a larger amount than is reasonably sufficient to pay the new expenses and the expenses of the various services which have been taken over, and he points out that emergencies may occur which would render that absolutely impossible. Now, I do not advocate that we should limit the expenditure of the Commonwealth under all circumstances. The object of this is to see that there is returned to the States a reasonable amount of money, and to put a check on the Federal Parliament, so that they may not run into extravagance, as we know all Parliaments do when they have plenty of money to spend. That difficulty might be easily obviated by saying that, so far as this limit of expenditure is concerned, we would only fix as regards amounts to be returned to the States. I would give the Commonwealth a free hand, but if we fix it in that way they would have to take means to return the revenue, and if we do not the States Treasurers will never be able to calculate what they will receive. Then we say:

During the first five years after uniform duties of Customs have been imposed the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the States for any year shall not be less than the aggregate amount returned to them during the year last before the imposition of such duties.

That may act unfairly to some of the colonies. My own idea with regard to that is that in order to place the State Treasurers in a safe position we should say that the amount to be returned to each State in each year should be a sum not less than the amount received during the year prior to the placing on of a uniform Customs tariff. Again, the freetrade policy of New South Wales disturbs these calculations, but rather than see any grave difficulties arise-the colony of Victoria will lose by the proposal that the aggregate amount to be divided shall be not less than the aggregate to be divided in the year previous-I would agree to that proposal in order to bring the matter to a settlement, if we possibly can Then my hon. friend seems to think that we should say that the amount to be returned to the States should be not less than a certain percentage of the amount of Customs duties collected. The difficulty I see with regard to that is that we do not say how much they are to collect, and therefore we leave ourselves in just the same doubt and difficulty as State Treasurers as we were before.

Mr. HOLDER:

Not less than the mean of the two years preceding the uniform tariff.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

So long as we fix a certain percentage, and so long as we provides that the mean shall not be less than the amount they got in the year or two years before, there is no difficulty.

Mr. BARTON:

But if the mean of two years is taken, then that would pre-suppose that it will take two years to impose the uniform Customs tariff.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I suggest that we take a year before the passing of the tariff, and that we take the minimum of that year. As Mr. Barton points out, there would be a difficulty in taking the mean between two years if there were not two years during which we could take it. Still I cannot see why we should limit the amount to be returned to the States. If we fix a certain definite percentage, the amount may be more than that particular mean. What I say is that the Federal Government should so provide that the amount to be returned to the States during this period of suspension-five years-should be not less than the amount paid in the previous year, and that is practically the provision that is contained in the Bill. We ought to be careful not to disturb, more than is absolutely necessary, the State finances, because we know what a difficulty that would be to the Treasurer, and what a difficulty it would occasion to the people interested, because the first question they will ask is "How much is it going to cost us.; how much extra will we have to pay?" And that will be the stumbling-block with regard to the matter when we go back to our various colonies. I am entirely in accord with those who say we should not have an elaborate system of book-keeping. Such an arrangement would be a great mistake, and create many difficulties. And with that object I would suggest that, as we probably cannot carry out the simple scheme of handing everything over, the wisest plan will be to take some year, 1895 or 1896, for instance; so far as Victoria is concerned it does not matter which.

Mr. REID:

1895 would be better for you than 1896.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No. We received certainly a larger amount of revenue in 1895, but the expenditure was heavier, whereas in 1896, though the revenue was smaller, the expenditure had been so considerably reduced that the net amounts came to practically the same in both years. We might possibly pass a scheme of taking either one or other of those years to settle the tariff of the colonies, then ascertain how the Customs revenue was collected during that year, and form some percentage.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

That was one of the proposals to the Committee.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I was only suggesting that the scheme might be considered as a way of getting over the difficulty. I did not say it was original, because none of there schemes are. They have been all stated before by means of speeches and pamphlets and papers. Our duty is not so much to think out something original as to take that one which is fairest to all the colonies and the one which will be the simplest to work in years to come. After doing this we could then ascertain what percentage the surplus was of amounts collected, and then deal with them year by year with regard to the amounts collected in the various States. Let it be a fixed percentage that is to be returned, and that will obviate to a very great extent the question of book-keeping, and the question of keeping Customs-houses on the borders, or of collecting statistics, which will give as much annoyance and trouble and bother as at present, the only difference being that now they collect money, but under the new circumstances they would not. If we can adopt some simple scheme that will be reasonably fair to all the colonies we ought to, rather than carry on an elaborate system of book-keeping for a long period. I should much prefer it if we could have a distribution per capita straight away.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOX:

Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

And were it not for the unfairness that might occasion to New South Wales I should advocate it.

Mr. REID:

And to Western Australia even more.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Yes; perhaps to Western Australia. But can we not fix some arbitrary amount? Would it not be possible, say, for the Treasurers to consider the various items, and then, instead of having a book-keeping or percentage allowance, to by some means fix a scheme by which we would see a certain fixed and definite amount returned to each colony? That, I am convinced, would simplify the matter altogether, and leave us free from the... complications which we shall get into if we endeavor to follow out what I admit to be the true scientific method, and we shall avoid the complications of elaborate book-keeping. I might also point out that as New South Wales has a freetrade policy now, as soon as Federation takes place, and there is a probability of a uniform tariff coming into operation, the merchants of New South Wales will take care to lay in good solid stocks.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

And then, having got them free of duty, they will be able to send them into our colonies for some considerable period after the uniform tariff has come into operation, and, although the Treasurer of New South Wales will derive no advantage from that, the merchants and people of New South Wales will derive a large amount of profit at the expense of the merchants of the other colonies.

Mr. GORDON:

Merchants in the other colonies can do the same thing.

Mr. REID:

A Victorian merchant can do that just as well as a Sydney one. So could a Russian merchant or any other merchant for the matter of that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No, he could not, for you must not forget the difficulty he would have of getting storage accommodation, and that he would have far and away heavier expenses in connection with that matter than those who have their business established there and their storage all ready. The merchants of Sydney are unquestionably going to receive a very large benefit and advantage from the freetrade policy being in operation when the uniform tariff comes into operation—if the policy of New South Wales is still freetrade at that time. I do not desire to detain the Committee any longer on this question, which is, however, to my mind, the crux of the whole matter, but I would impress on hon. members that it will never do for us to shirk our duty and try and put this away, to put it out of sight, or hide it, but we must devise some scheme, whether good or bad. Then, when we do, and evidence has been brought forward, and we are satisfied that the proposals are unjust to any colony, we must do what we can to make them fair. I would urge you not to put this on one side or leave it to the Federal Parliament. If you do we will have the Treasurers in doubt and the people in doubt, and we will imperil what we all desire.

Mr. REID:

I have listened to the speeches delivered by my hon. friends the Treasurers of South Australia and Victoria with great pleasure. I am fully sensible of the difficulties in this matter, and I say at the first that the mere matter of £100,000 or £200,000 a year I would not allow to stand in the way. My difficulties arise owing to a more serious thing than that. In the first place, to get rid of one point used by my hon. friend Sir George Turner, that Sydney merchants could, before the duties came into operation, make a large profit by storing goods which would subsequently be liable to taxation, I would point out that there is nothing whatever to prevent Victorian merchants doing precisely the same thing. If the Victorian merchants wished to lay in a stock of dutiable goods, although I do not suppose they would do that, because the duties are not likely to be increased, but supposing they were to lay in a stock of goods which are not now subject to duty, they would have just the same advantages as the Sydney merchant.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
But we have a much smaller number of lines to import free of duty.

Mr. REID:
When there is a duty, they could place them in bond. There is not the slightest difficulty in putting dutiable articles in bond, and that is what anyone would do. In the ordinary way goods which are subject to duty and upon which it is likely an increased duty will be put.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Will my hon. friend pardon me? Perhaps I did not make myself clear. New South Wales has no duty on woollens. Supposing the merchants there import a large quantity, and put them into their stores. When a duty is put upon them, they can make a handsome profit. But, in Victoria, there is a duty on woollens, and hence Melbourne merchants could not profit in the same way.

Mr. REID:
I see you are right there, but what the Sydney merchant can do in Sydney the Melbourne merchant can do in Sydney, and no one knows it better than the Melbourne merchant, who has found it to his interest to establish a number of branches in Sydney. As to this point, it would be unworthy of the colony of New South Wales to dwell on such a small point. It is our place to show a capacity for development. We should not be too nice about £100,000 or £200,000 a year, but the figures which have been pressed upon me are much more serious than that, and we cannot be prepared without any reserve to accept them. For instance, what has been the policy of Victoria for the last twenty-five years? The policy of preventing imports, and encouraging the production of articles for home consumption within the home market, and as a result of that policy the tariff of Victoria has gradually become higher and higher, a matter of satisfaction to the protectionist, because he was having his way. Then, take a country under a different policy, which has not established these high barriers. We know well-taking the two different markets-that you might apply the same tariff to those different markets, and the same duty will produce a great deal more per head of the population in one market than it will in the other, plus this advantage to the market which has made the duty a heavy one, that it has had twenty years start in the manufacture of articles over the market in which that duty did not prevail. Without any federal conditions, we have thrown our markets open freely and willingly to the manufacturers of Victoria, though I will lay no stress on that point. But when I find from the best information I can procure that the difference on the per capita basis would be so enormous, that I could not, as the guardian of the interests of the people of Victoria-

HON. MEMBERS: Of Victoria?

Mr. REID:
I mean of New South Wales, but I am happy to say that I am becoming so federal now that it makes very little difference. Applying any conceivable tariff I can to the facts of the mean average home consumption in New South Wales and the other colonies for a given period of the three years, 1893, 1894 and 1895, I find under the per capita basis that the people of New South Wales, if they only got back per head at the same rate as the people of the other colonies, would leave in the Commonwealth exchequer an amount so large over and above what they got back that that inequality would pay the expenses of the Federal Commonwealth. In other words, out of the excess taxation per head levied in New South Wales, so large an amount would be obtained by the Commonwealth that would not come back to New South Wales that it would more than pay the expenses of the Commonwealth for all the other colonies. That would be a delightful state of things for the selfish men of the other colonies, but we here, I am sure, do not wish to bring about that state of things even if we could. It is not likely that New South Wales would allow any such thing to be done. Take again the case of Western Australia. On the per capita basis West Australia is even in a worse position than New South Wales. I will give the figures. I have tested them by all the tariffs I know of in the Australian Colonies, and I will just take two tariffs-the Victorian and South Australian-and see how the figures work out on the facts of the trade of the respective colonies, the average for the three years I have mentioned on an intercolonial freetrade basis, as if we had had a federal system of Customs during that time. Taking the Victorian tariff and applying the facts I get these results: Under the Victorian tariff there would be—after deducting the federal expenditure, which we estimate at £1,518,000—for distribution £4,881,282. In New South Wales we would receive £2,847,766, and her share of the expense would be £628,000. Under that she ought to get back a sum of £2,216,000, but she would only get back on the per capita basis £1,755,000, a loss of nearly half a million a year. Do not for a moment suppose that I think this would be a perpetual loss—

Mr. DEAKIN:

That is only an estimate.

Mr. REID:

But in very serious matters some of us have to test these general forms of words by figures and facts. This, too, has the advantage of being an estimate based on the actual facts of trade during the time I have mentioned.

Mr. DEAKIN:

And as if you

Mr. REID:

Things cannot change with the swiftness of magic in industry and commerce. In ten months you cannot revolutionise the industrial position of a country. I do not for a moment say that this serious state of things will continue for any lengthened period, but it is the state of things we have to face. If I were in my hon. friend's position I should decline to face it, because there is no occasion to do so in Victoria, for she can shut her eyes and take all the plums.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We do not get much while New South Wales is about.

Mr. REID:

Apply the tariff to Victoria on that colony's own facts of trade, and during the years I have mentioned she would contribute £1,704,620; her share of the expenses would be £568,877; she ought to get back £1,135,743, but would get back £1,698,568, so that there would be a loss of £460,000 to New South Wales and a gain of £562,825 to the people of Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We will undertake to give you back our gains.

Mr. REID:

They are in too many pockets. South Australia on the basis of the Victorian tariff would receive £609,767; her share of the Federal expenditure would be £174,418; she ought to get £435,349, but would get £496,359, or a gain of £61,010. Tasmania would receive £216,716; her share of the expenditure would be £80,431; she ought to get £136,235, but she would get £220,925, or a gain of £84,690. Take Western Australia's position; the position there is even worse than ours. Under Federation the federal Customs officers would get £389,684; her share of the federal expenditure would be £66,802; she ought to get back £2322,882, but she would only get £74,962 or a loss of £247,920 to the revenue. Take South Australia, which has a different tariff altogether from Victoria, although it has high duties. On the basis of the South Australian tariff New South Wales would lose £455,000, Victoria would gain £480,000, South Australia would gain £108,000, Tasmania would gain £76,000, and Western Australia would lose £313,000. I only mention these figures to show that it is impossible to apply what we were all desirous of doing from the beginning—the principle of the per capita basis. If we could have done it I would have been the first to support it, because we have shown in a frank way our desire to free Australia from the restrictions of border tariffs, Our sincerity cannot be questioned in that matter, and we are prepared now to make considerable sacrifices. These figures, which have been revised over and over again by our Government Statists, are too serious, and I dare not go back to New South Wales and say to the people, "Federation is to start on this financial basis." The people would not listen to it.

Mr. TRENWITH:
In these figures is there any allowance made for intercolonial freetrade?

Mr. REID:
These figures are based upon the state of intercolonial freetrade, as if it had been in full force during the time the facts were taken.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Is any deduction made on the goods coming from one colony to another?

Mr. REID:
Yes, on all dutiable goods which went from one colony to another, and the duties where quantities are in the different colonies are all eliminated, and goods are treated as if they were Australian, being duty free. I cannot escape from these figures. Here is another aspect of this subject. First of all I have given you what we know on principle ought to be the state of things. If in a freetrade country you suddenly apply duties up to 20 or 30 per cent. the return per bead must be enormously greater than a duty of 30 per cent. on clothing, for instance, in Melbourne. There the duty is 30 per cent., and we know it produces only it small amount of money. Apply that duty to the port of Sydney on one line of drapery alone, and it would produce half a million or perhaps £750,000 in a year. The fact that Western Australia would be debarred on the per capita basis is enough. I do not wish to go into the views of the Committee, but members will see that Western Australia cannot accept the per capita basis. It would simply rob her of nearly all of the money she gets. Under that basis she would pay about seven times her share. I have only to mention that to show how impossible it is to start the distribution on that basis. The next thing is that we all agree that anything like taking accounts is a gross state of things we wish to abolish at once. In abolishing the duties, and still retaining the Customs houses and officers, and doing routine work, we are only half performing the work of Federation. In view of that, I am at one with Mr. Holder and Sir George Turner in the great anxiety I have to dispense with the taking of any accounts. I am prepared to arrive at any liberal arrangement, not regarding whether it meets our just claims, but on any basis defensible. I am agreeable to dispensing with the taking of accounts, and will be prepared to do this: Take 1895, when we had the Dibbs tariff, with its ad valorem and other duties-or take the average of 1893-4-5, but I think 1895 was the fairer year-as the basis or actual movement of trade throughout the colonies-you must have a uniform basis for all of the colonies, because we cannot have one colony different to another.

An HON. MEMBER: You cannot take Western Australia.

Mr. REID: That will destroy it then. We cannot have two financial systems of the Commonwealth, one for one colony and another for another. Any system which involves that is destructive. We must have the one system applied to all of the colonies. If we cannot do it in any other way, I will be prepared to make this arrangement: Take the first year when the federal tariff is actually in operation and let it be taken as a basis for the distribution of the customs revenue, and so far as New South Wales is concerned, I will be quite prepared, as a special concession which I would not ask other colonies to make-that is, Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia-for the five years mentioned in this Bill-I thought it should be ten, but the Committee said five, so I take it at five years-I shall be quite prepared to consent that during the remaining four years a percentage each year shall be deducted from a basis which might be arrived at by consultation. For instance, so much per cent. should be taken off the basis of our receipts in the second year, and so on for the remainder of the period. I do not wish to mention any figure without consultation, but I am prepared to have a liberal percentage taken off, because with each year the inequality will disappear; but we begin with too serious an inequality for me to ignore it, and after all, even if we are compelled to keep accounts for these two years, we are securing absolute freedom of trade over our borders for all generations to come. With reference to another proposal which has been made that an aggregate amount should be returned to the colonies, I have no sort of sympathy with it. All through our desire has been to leave to the Commonwealth the settlement of its financial affairs, but the effect of this proposal is to make the Commonwealth the financier for the States. In saying that I quite realise the difficulties of my hon. friends who have spoken. Fortunately for us, at least in one respect, we have the advantage of an illimitable source for fresh taxation, but the colonies which have pushed the theory of taxation to an extreme now find themselves in an anxious position with regard to anything involving fresh demands on the people as suggested, and therefore I do not differ from my friends strongly nor have I the desire to push it to a fighting point. I strongly dislike any project to tie up the finances and financiers of the Commonwealth in the way described, and when Mr. Holder thinks that there is any danger of the Commonwealth by its financial system pushing any state into a condition of insolvency, I think he goes a little too far. There can be no possible desire on the part of a new Commonwealth composed of five or six colonies to do anything to cause any financial distress or difficulty to those colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Not the desire.

Mr. REID:
The whole of the colonies will be represented by men possessing sufficient financial ability to do that which they desire.

Mr. HOLDER:
That will be the necessary result of a low tariff.

Mr. REID:
The hon. member does not quite speak by the book, because it would be possible to frame a freetrade tariff on a comparatively small number of articles, and yet receive more than the Victorian tariff of to-day yields, and certainly a great deal more than that of South Australia.

Mr. HOLDER:
By a low tariff I mean one which produces a low amount.

Mr. REID:
If the tariff is small and has a small number of articles, which is the sort of tariff I would like—and if I cannot get precisely the tariff I would like,
and I do not think any one of us will get what we want in the Commonwealth, I shall endeavor to produce the revenue by as small a tariff as possible-it would be possible to produce the amount that a protective tariff would yield on the basis of a revenue tariff.

Mr. HOLDER:
A tariff which would not yield that amount would be a low tariff.

Mr. REID:
I have been looking at the figures as they affect South Australia. Take South Australia and her position. She has a revenue of about £525,000 from Customs.

Mr. HOLDER:
£570,000.

Mr. REID:
Take that £570,000 under the phenomenally small tariff of New South Wales. I am speaking of the small number of goods on which duty is charged in our colony, and South Australia would receive in Customs revenue £312,000, as against £570,000.

Mr. HOLDER:
£260,000 less.

Mr. FRASER:
Is that on their own basis?

Mr. REID:
That is on a freetrade basis. South Australia would collect £312,000.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
How much would that be on spirits and narcotics?

Mr. REID:
I do not know. We are at present on a question of figures. How much money will come back to South Australia? It is immaterial where it comes from, and I do not see that there need be any anxiety on the part of South Australia in connection with the freedom and discretion of the Commonwealth. Then let us remember that every pound less than £575,000 would represent so many pounds in the pockets of the South Australian people. They are not losses, but gains to the people. They represent so much less taxation taken out of the pockets of the South Australians. But at the same time, I see and fully recognise the difficulties of a Treasurer under those circumstances, because in South Australia they have direct taxation to a pretty high extent, and I am aware that my figures do not altogether remove the difficulties my hon.
friend has mentioned.

Mr. FRASER:
How would you raise the balance, seeing that they cannot have the Customs and excise?

Mr. REID:

In some way that would frighten the soul of my hon. friend. The Customs-house has been the fairy godmother of the substantial interests of Australia. I do not know whether it will always continue to be so. It is only fair to admit that a large revenue to the Commonwealth does not at all mean a high Commonwealth tariff, and that is one of the points I wish to put to those who wish the Commonwealth to be a large financier and tax-gatherer of the State. While you may fix on the Commonwealth Treasury large liabilities, large necessities for raising taxation, you will open up responsibilities and you will open up methods of collecting taxation from the people that will require serious consideration. If you graft on the Commonwealth the responsibilities of your finances you make the Commonwealth absolute master of all the sources of taxation, and, instead of a mild Customs tariff more or less protective, you must see that the Federal Parliament will be at absolute liberty and possibly absolute necessity of imposing direct taxation upon the States. I do not want to see taxes multiplied and piled upon the people in any form, and direct taxation takes perhaps the most obnoxious form of all, however fair it may appear to be. The strong objection that I have to loading the Commonwealth with a debt of 141 millions - taking the five colonies, and leaving out Queensland at present - is this: You do not propose, I understand, to hand over the works which represent the debts; you do not propose, I understand, to hand over the net earnings of the works in respect of which these debts were contracted, and this represents very much that sort of transaction which has been closely scrutinised in the insolvency jurisdiction, where certain gentlemen having a number of heavily-mortgaged estates, form a partnership, put the mortgages into the partnership, and get the estates.

An HON. MEMBER:

No.

Mr. REID:

It is suspiciously like it. These five colonies receive as a fair contribution towards the interest on these debts, net railway earnings over working expenses, a sum amounting to £2,875,000 a year. Those moneys belong to those debts, they belong to the reduction of the interest payable on those debts, and I will never be a party to that sort of finance which loads upon any Commonwealth say 140 millions of debt with the obligation to pay five and a half millions a year as interest, whilst the different colonies give themselves £2,800,000 to play with in any way they like. That is the inherent viciousness of that proposal.

Mr. BARTON:

What about the receipts from Customs they would lose?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Hear, hear. That is a complete answer to it.

Mr. REID:

Well, I say there is nothing like facts-net railway earnings and Customs revenue. The New South Wales net earnings of the railways amount to £1,321,000 under our low tariff. At the present moment we receive about £1,500,000 of Customs revenue under any sort of tariff that would be required. To raise seven millions for the Commonwealth-that is five and a half millions for interest, and for expenses of the Commonwealth one and a half millions-and to return to each State what it received the year before this uniform tariff was imposed you would have to plunge New South Wales into additional taxation to an enormous amount, whilst at the same time you would present her with this amount of net earnings from the railways.

Mr. TRENWITH:

We propose to ask for a return if the debts are taken over.

Mr. REID:

But I am wiping out any surplus. I am simply speaking of the operation of a tariff on that basis. There is another fatal objection to this proposal. The Customs tariff of South Australia yields about £576,000 a year. It is a high tariff, and it is very probable that no Commonwealth tariff would be likely to give them much more, especially after deducting their share of the new expenditure. Well, the railway interest debt of South Australia is £954,000 a year, nearly double. After deducting her share of the federal expenditure, the net expenditure-because, of course, we must allow for the fact that a number of expenses are taken over-from £575,000, you come to this condition of things in the case of the public debt of South Australia, that the Customs would only pay one-half per annum of her liability in the shape of interest on the public debt.

Mr. GLYNN:

Are you not taking interest on the whole of our public debt?

Mr. REID:

I suppose I am. I supposed the whole debt was to be taken over. I have never heard of a proposal to take over half.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Both proposals have been made.
Mr. REID:

Let me say at once that this sort of thing would be a godsend to colonial treasurers who were in a tight place. I am not, and I do not feel driven to it; and I will not be a party to what I call vicious finance under any circumstances unless I am driven to it. Let me pursue the situation of South Australia. South Australia clearly—my friend, the Treasurer, admits it—would pay into the federal exchequer half the total of the interest on its public debt. That is to say that, unless there was some tremendous effort of some financial genius to meet this difficulty of giving South Australia a million or so back in the shape of Customs revenue, no possible tariff or system of taxation—of course I quite admit all these moneys could be made by direct taxation as well as by a tariff—no arrangement of that kind, which would be at all tolerable in the other States, would produce a sum which would enable the Commonwealth to set South Australia's share against South Australia's interest on her public debt. And I must say I should be very slow, with all implicit confidence in the stability of South Australia and her people—which we do not in the slightest degree doubt—to be a party to a system of finance under which the people of New South Wales, under any Customs tariff you fix, would give three times the amount of the interest on her debt, while another colony would only give half the amount of her interest. I would decline to be a party to a position in which the Commonwealth might, perhaps owing to a dispute between South Australia and the Commonwealth owing to some other matter, be under the painful necessity of putting financial compulsion to bear on South Australia to secure payment of the interest on her debt. There is no one who has higher respect for the colony of South Australia, but I would not, if I were a South Australian, ask you to allow me to occupy this position. The position breaks down from the fact that the Customs revenue, as it is at present, would not enable all the States to pay the interest on their debts.

Mr. GLYNN:

Why not adopt the Canadian scheme of making allowance for the interest on the debt?

Mr. REID:

And wipe off the difference of £500,000?

Mr. GLYNN:

They open an account when the interest on the debt is more than the Customs duties.

Mr. REID:

I wish I could open an account. It is not always that you are allowed to open an account. It is simply a matter of when you can manage it. That does not help you out. My objection is that one State would have to open an account with the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth would have to make itself personally responsible for a debt of about 120 millions sterling, without being able to do anything more than open an account for it. Because, who would listen to any suggestion that we should put in this Constitution a power that if the contribution of a State fell short of its share and it did not pay, the Commonwealth should take some power over the State in order to raise special taxation? Who would listen to it?

Mr. GLYNN:
That was not the Canadian system.

Mr. REID:
No; I do not know what it was. I am glad my friend is learning the Canadian system. I know it is very different from ours. Is not the main railway debt of Canada in respect of trunk lines, national lines?

Mr. FRASER:
There was very little expenditure on railways.

Mr. BARTON:
There was only one small railway to take over in Canada.

Mr. REID:
Now that is too bad of my friend. My friend is open to a joke occasionally; he is profoundly versed in all the literature of this subject, and knows I am not, and so he fires off that little joke at me. He must know there is a great difference between the affairs of Canada, with one railway in one colony, and the continent of Australia, where there is a railway debt of getting on for £150,000,000.

HON. MEMBERS:
£110,000,000.

Mr. REID:
Yes; I meant the public debt, about £141,000,000, I must say frankly, that while we are prepared in New South Wales to take the risks of the future as to the financial policy and the fiscal policy, while we are prepared cheerfully, with the odds against us staring us in the face, to leave the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth absolutely in the hands (if the Commonwealth, we are not prepared by such questionable means to allow the interests of the Commonwealth to be loaded to a maximum point so as to make certain that that which we fear shall, as a matter of necessity, Push against us to its absolute extreme.

Mr. HIGGINS:
But you said that under a freetrade or revenue tariff you could get as much money as under a protective tariff.
Mr. REID:

There is a limit even to that. We may have to make a number of allowances to colonies which have established industries. Although I am a very ardent freetrader, I am not altogether blind to questions of that kind, and I do not think I could afford to be, except under the pressure of some great national necessity. I do not think that this financial scheme will be favorably received in our colony if this sort of finance is to be practised. It is a sort of finance which complicates very seriously the problem we have before us, because, as is well known, there is a very strong objection in our colony to the railways being taken over by the Commonwealth, and I for one, although I admit it is quite possible to take over the debts with the railways, look upon such a transfer as a very questionable one indeed, and one which sound financiers in the colonies generally will not be found to concede. It is a splendid thing, I say again, if the finances are in difficulties-a splendid stroke of policy. But believing as I do that the finances of these colonies are sound-thoroughly sound-I do not think there is any necessity to take this step, and it does not get rid of the difficulty of the surplus at all. Supposing the interest on the public debt were taken over to-morrow from New South Wales, this difficulty about the allocation of the surplus would remain.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

It would not be removed at all. It does not touch the great difficulty we have. These proposals are made very much to remove this difficulty, which has arisen owing to the unequal conditions of the consuming powers of the different colonies in dutiable goods. That will not touch this difficulty at all, because, so far as the people of New South Wales are concerned, they would not thank you one half-penny for taking over the interest of their public debts. They are perfectly competent and able to pay it themselves. They would not thank you for taking anything from their shoulders, and they would not accept as anything at all bearing upon the fact that whatever your Customs tariff is it will produce infinitely more per head than the colonies of Victoria, South Australia, or Tasmania. And the same trouble remains with Western Australia in a more aggravated form. Now, we have thought these things out day after day, and the taking over of the debts offered a solution. This solution was the best we could arrive at. It is not a solution that I approve of altogether, but it is a solution I am not going to vote against. It is a solution I can take to my colony, but I can only tell them that I do not think it is for us to be too nice, even if we do lose a few hundred thousand pounds upon this matter during this intervening period. I can only justify my position on these grounds, and I think there will be no cavil over these grounds in New South Wales. But if you load this Commonwealth—which is to be established for strictly limited purposes—if you make the Commonwealth the means of unloading the debts of the colonies on to the Commonwealth, you remove a very serious obstacle in the way of Federation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Nobody wishes to unload them.

Mr. REID:
But if you make the Commonwealth pay the interest, you unload the colonies and put the load on the Commonwealth. I do not know whether anyone wishes to do it, but wishes will not alter the position. I am told to get it from the Customs, but I desire to point out to you, as a man representing 41 per cent. of the total taxpaying power of this Commonwealth, that the people of New South Wales have a very strong voice in this matter, and they will decline to be taxpayers to that extent in respect of the railways of the other colonies. I say that frankly.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You have never been asked.

Mr. REID:
Well, if this obligation is paid and the interest of the public debt is loaded on to New South Wales, 41 per cent. of the obligation is loaded upon us in New South Wales.

Mr. HIGGINS:
We have the burden of your debts as well.

Mr. REID:
But we decline to burden you with our debt. We do not want your assistance. We do not need it. We did not come here to federate the railways.

Mr. PEACOCK:
The proposal to federate the railways came from New South Wales.

Mr. REID:
Not from New South Wales. I do not know who has said so.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Mr. Walker, Mr. Wise, Mr. Carruthers.

Mr. REID:
They have their own opinions.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Still they are delegates of New South Wales sent here.

Mr. REID:
But does my hon. friend think, because these gentlemen hold these views, New South Wales sent them here to advocate them?

Mr. PEACOCK:
They did not come from Victoria.

Mr. REID:
This proposition of paying debts by the Commonwealth comes from Victoria.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Is that so?

Mr. REID:
It is so. Sir George Turner has advocated that here to-night. I think he advocated it here to-night. I hope I am not stating what is not correct.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It was first proposed at the Bathurst Convention in New South Wales.

Mr. REID:
Well, you know, lots of things have been proposed in lots of places; but I am dealing with what has been proposed here by a responsible statesman, Sir George Turner, and proposed to us for our acceptance.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
What is the proposal?

Mr. REID:
My hon. friend couched it in the delightfully vague term of the administration of the public debt." I asked him what he meant, and he told me that he meant the interest on the public debt. Whilst some may say it is an answer to me that it comes out of Customs, my answer to them is that probably-I cannot speak positively, of course, none of us can, but I am giving the Committee the benefit of my judgment, knowing the people of New South Wales pretty well as I do-the people of New South Wales will not consider that you are relieving them from any burden if you take the interest of the public debt from them. They prefer to pay their public debt, not out of Customs at all. We are fortunately in a position in which we do not need to look to Customs for the interest on our public debt. I do not wish to mention this, except as showing how the circumstances of the colonies differ. Our Customs are not needed at all for the interest on our public debt. As hon. members know our revenue stands by a mere accident on a number of footings which are not so strong perhaps in the other colonies. But we came here with a certain definite mission and to place a certain definite number of things on the Commonwealth, and it will not do in order to meet some other difficulty to raise these startling propositions, which I never came to this Convention either to accept or consider.
Mr. FRASER:
What are you prepared to do?

Mr. REID:
I am prepared to meet my friends Sir George Turner and Mr. Holder—the Treasurers of the different colonies in fact—and to see if we cannot hit on some arrangement which will prevent this taking of accounts. I think it is necessary perhaps to take them for one year at the most, but we might hit on some understanding to prevent the taking of a single account on the establishment of the Commonwealth. But this is one of those matters which I think my hon. friend from Victoria and myself will need some amount of reflection upon. It is a most important thing. We are all anxious to do what is fair and right by each of the colonies, and we ought to use our utmost endeavors to prevent the continuation of these accounts the moment the Commonwealth is declared. I promise my hon. friends that I will not be nice about this or that account.

Mr. BARTON:
I hope my hon. friends were not all on the Finance Committee at the one time.

Mr. REID:
We had to look after you and some other members of the Constitutional Committee so much that we had a divided allegiance. I was drawn upstairs against my will.

Mr. HOLDER:
Can you suggest some plan as to the surplus?

Mr. REID:
I suggest two plans. The one I would rather prefer is that we should take the facts of trade for the year 1895 on an intercolonial free trade basis, that we arrive at some estimate of the inequality so far as it affects New South Wales and Western Australia, that we arrive at some sum which will be added to the per capita of those two colonies, or rather that the per capita should be distributed after it certain allowance has been made to those colonies and then that the amount of that allowance shall diminish each year until the whole five years have expired. Each year of the five there should be a considerable percentage taken off.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
You do not know that you are entitled to a single penny.

Mr. REID:
I am prepared to have any inquiry made in order to arrive at that fact. I am advised by those whom I consider competent to advise me, that the facts are as I have mentioned. I cannot, unfortunately, take my advice from my distinguished friend in these matters. I have got these facts, not only from the Government officers, but from one of our ablest writers in New South Wales, who, independently of the Government, has placed his finger on this very spot. Mr. Nash, in the Sydney Daily Telegraph, has pointed out that this was the great difficulty in the way of the per capita principle, and has proved that on the facts New South Wales must pay hundreds of thousands of pounds more than she should. Other writers join in attesting to the same facts, and the matter is too substantial to enable me to dismiss it as the representative of New South Wales. That was the difficulty of the Finance Committee. I wish to pay my strongest tribute to Sir George Turner and Mr. Holder for the thoroughly honorable and indefatigable way in which they have tried to bring about a just settlement of this matter.

Mr. BARTON:
I have been very much impressed with the speeches made by the three Treasurers to-day, and as Mr. Reid has made such a good suggestion perhaps we might act upon it. Supposing we adjourn till to-morrow morning, and leave the Treasurers of the four colonies to debate these points, up to a certain time-without injuring their health say, not beyond 2 o'clock in the morning, so as to try and arrive at a solution of the difficulties.

Mr. REID:
You can go on with some other work in the meantime.

Mr. BARTON:
We could go on with the executive and the judiciary clauses. If hon. members agreed to this it would be an admirable idea, and while we went-on with other matters the Treasurers might take the substance of this debate into their own ken, and settle it in a way never attempted before.

Mr. WALKER:
I think that Mr. McMillan, who is an ex-treasurer of New South Wales and was chairman of the Finance Committee, ought to be at the Conference.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Why not confine the Conference to the Treasurers? We do not want too big a Committee.

Mr. BARTON:
These clauses can be postponed, at any rate, and we might get through the other parts of the Bill rapidly. I am not hurrying them, but the Bill has to be dealt with.

Mr. REID:
Go on with the other parts.

Mr. BARTON:
If the suggestion is not a real one, what is the use of postponing the clauses, but it seems to me to have been reasonable that the Colonial Treasurers present might well consider the matter while we go on with the other work. If I get a favorable response to that from the Treasurers, I shall move the postponement of the clauses.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
    I should like to hear Sir Philip Fysh.

Mr. BARTON:
    He intends to speak on the main question.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
    I do not intend to discuss the main question at this time because of the suggestion thrown out by Mr. Reid that the Treasurers of the colonies withdraw to see if they can agree whether any basis for division of revenue can be established upon a scale during five years, which, diminishing or increasing yearly, shall, on the expiration of that time, bring us all to the happy conclusion that bookkeeping shall promptly cease, and after the fifth year adopt the division upon a purely per capita basis.

Mr. KINGSTON:
    I think it is infinitely preferable that we should adjourn at some reasonable hour to-night, and to-morrow morning the Treasurers might meet and discuss this before we begin work again, say at 11 o'clock. I do not think it is desirable that we should lose the services of the Treasurers in the discussion on the other business.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
    Can we not go on with the debate on the other clauses?

Mr. KINGSTON:
    These are all of sufficient importance to make it desirable that the Treasurers should be present. We shall hardly know where we are if we go on turning from one clause to another.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
    We had better meet for an hour to-night and discuss the matter.

Mr. KINGSTON:
    Upon a question of this sort I think it would be well to adjourn at a reasonable hour, so that the Treasurers could consider it.

Mr. BARTON:
    If the Treasurers will take advantage of the comparatively early hour, and discuss it this evening, I do not think we need adjourn. I think we are agreed that the remaining difficulties are to be summed up in the clauses from where we are to clause 96, and I will undertake that these shall not be touched to-night. Are the Treasurers willing to discuss it?
Mr. HOLDER:
Yes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I do not object.

Mr. REID:
Nor do I.

Mr. BARTON:
As Sir George Turner, Mr. Reid, and Mr. Holder are willing, I will move:
That the clauses be postponed.

The CHAIRMAN:
Chapters II. and III. were postponed until after chapter IV., so that if we postponed clauses 87 to 96 until after the consideration of these we can go back to II. and III.

Mr. BARTON:
We can postpone them until after the short chapter relating to the States. I move:
That clauses 87 to 96 be taken after chapters II. and III.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

CHAPTER II.
The Executive Government.
Clause 58-The executive power and authority of the Commonwealth is vested in the Queen, and shall be exercised by the Governor-General as the Queen's representative.

Mr. REID:
It will be observed that in clause 2 of chapter I. there is this provision:
The Queen may, from time to time, appoint a Governor-General, who shall be Her Majesty's representative in the Commonwealth, and who shall have and may exercise in the Commonwealth during the Queen's pleasure, and subject to the provisions of this Constitution, such powers and functions of the Queen as Her Majesty may think fit to assign to him.

I only call the attention of the Committee to that, and pass on to the clause now under consideration. For a long time I have been impressed with the view that since we are now expressing, in precise written characters, the various functions of the Governor, and conditions under which the power of the Commonwealth is to be exercised, it would be well in this clause, whilst providing that the Executive power and authority of the Commonwealth shall be vested in the Queen, and shall be exercised by the Governor-General as the Queen's representative, that we should add that which will in reality be the practice, that it is by and with the advice of the Executive Council. Members will notice that the legislative powers in the Queen are expressed under Statute as being exercised with the consent of Parliament. The Queen sets her seal upon Acts, and it is attested in the Acts themselves that they are by the authority and with the consent of the Parliament—that is, the two Houses of Parliament. Now, I think we had better, since we are going to put in black and white the full functions of the Commonwealth, state what I deem will be the fact in practice, that the executive power is to be exercised by and with the advice of the Executive Council. I have looked through the works on the prerogatives of the Crown, and I find that they really came as far as anything in these colonies is concerned to the question of the right to assemble, dissolve, and prorogue Parliament, the pardoning of offenders, the issuing of proclamations, and so on. That is about the whole scope of the prerogatives which could be exercised under this Commonwealth. In the old country the Queen, of course, is the supreme head of the Church. That does not apply here. She has the power of making war or peace. That does not apply here. I am simply referring to things within the reach and range of this Constitution. In reference to the right to assemble, prorogue, and dissolve Parliament, that is always done on the advice and consent of the Executive Council. The refusal to receive advice is not an executive act at all. An executive act is something which affects the subjects of the country. The refusal to do it affects no one, except that it creates a crisis and would probably effect a change of Ministers.

Mr. BARTON:
It is an exercise of the prerogative.

Mr. REID:
It is an exercise of the prerogative, which is not an executive act. The refusal to accept advice does not fall within that category. The carrying out of the steps necessary for the assembling or proroguing of Parliament would, and that would be with the advice and consent of the Executive Council. There is not one appointment in the United Kingdom which the Queen makes, but that the counter signature of a Minister of State is required.

Mr. FRASER:
How about a dissolution?

Mr. REID:
Supposing Ministers ask for a dissolution, and the Governor says "no"; that is not an executive act. It is a refusal to do an executive act. To issue a proclamation would be an executive act. This difficulty would not arise. It would leave the independence of the Governor as to accepting the advice of his Ministers absolutely intact. In England nothing can reach the state of an act affecting the subjects, unless there is the signature of a Minister to it.
That is the practice all over the world under similar conditions. So I say that if the British Constitution were being reduced to black and white, that might be put in. If the British Constitution were being drawn up to-day, the main feature would be that the Queen must act on the advice of responsible Ministers. The moment she does not you have no constitutional Government at all.
Mr. SYMON:
   How about the appointment of Ministers?
Mr. REID:
   Some Ministers' appointments would have to be countersigned by a Minister.
Mr. SYMON:
   That is, the publication only.
Mr. REID:
   Yes; my honorable friend is quite right. Of course this comes afterwards.
By section 2 of chapter I., Her Majesty would assign that prerogative to the Governor, amongst other prerogatives, which she would assign to him.
That prerogative would remain in the Governor under section 2, chapter I.
This executive power and authority of the Commonwealth is something different altogether from the prerogative of the Crown. The executive power and authority of the Commonwealth is a thing which must be exercised by Ministers. The other is a prerogative matter which is safeguarded by the section I have referred to.

An HON. MEMBER:
   What about the dismissal of Ministers?
Mr. REID:
   Even if Ministers are dismissed, they have to hold office until their successors are appointed.
Mr. KINGSTON:
   Not dismissed; they resign.
Mr. REID:
   Yes; they hand in their resignations. But even if His Excellency exercised the extreme prerogative, and dismissed them-a thing never heard of in these colonies-supposing the Proclamation had to go out before the new Minister was sent for, could the Governor dismiss them without a Minister?
Mr. SYMON:
   No; that would be done before the Minister left office.
Mr. REID:

Exactly; that was what I was endeavoring to point out. But I do not want to press this matter too strongly, because I quite admit that this Bill, as at present, will ensure that the practice will be carried out. What necessity was there to put in clause 2 that Her Majesty's representative could exercise Her Majesty's prerogative. What reason was there for it?

Mr. SYMON:

No reason at all.

Mr. REID:

Well, it is put in. If we safeguard in this unnecessary way the prerogative of Her Majesty, and the prerogative of the Governor-General, surely we can put in black and white the principle of executive action which always is that the Governor shall act with the advice of the Executive Council. Why could we not understand all this? What is the use of putting it in at all? Did it not follow, as a mere matter of course, that if Her Majesty appointed a Governor-General to represent her, he would exercise the powers which she had and has? However, I do not press my suggestion, because it is practically in the Constitution; but I would point out, that whilst we have been careful to put certain clauses in the Constitution, I think others are of sufficient importance to be there.

Mr. BARTON:

The hon. member has not moved in the matter, and as he admits that what he desires is secured in section 61, which is an adaptation of what is in the South Australian Constitution Act, and is somewhat similar to the Victorian Act, it is just as well not to take up much time in debating it. Executive Acts of the Crown are primarily divided into two classes: those exercised by the prerogative-and some of those are not even Executive Acts-and those which are ordinary Executive Acts, where it is prescribed that the Executive shall act in Council. These are the offsprings of Statutes. The others are Acts so far as they are not affected by Statutes. Now there is no necessity to make any alteration in this clause. The clause has been drafted in precisely the ordinary way-it was similarly drafted in 1891-which is simply to express in a document of this character the depository of the Executive power in the kingdom or the Commonwealth. Moreover there is no necessity to add the words:

With the advice of the Governor in Council, because in a constitution of this kind it is no more possible than it is under the English Constitution for the prerogative to be exercised as a personal act of the Crown. The prerogative is never in these days exercised as a personal act of the Crown as we understand it, but there are certain acts which have become, either by the gradual march of statute law or in any other way, nothing but ordinary executive acts and these are expressed to be exerciseable only with the advice of the Executive Council. There are others again which have not been expressly affected by legislation, and while these remain nominally in the exercise of the Crown they are really held in trust for the people, although they are exercises of the prerogative. This is explained by Dicey in "The Law of the Constitution," and the extract I will read will be followed with interest by lay as well as by legal members.

Mr. REID: He was writing of an unwritten Constitution.

Dr. COCKBURN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON: The Constitution of England is not wholly unwritten. A vast body of it is in statute law, a vast body is unwritten. But let us understand that the Imperial Parliament has in all its drafting of the Colonial Constitutions drawn the distinction. Yet it is understood that the Crown exercises the prerogative only upon ministerial advice, and it is exercised not personally by the Crown, but only with the advice of the Ministry or a Minister. Every Constitution is explicit on that point. You do not find it anywhere in the Australian Constitutions nor in the Canadian Constitution, which is written like this, that there there is a prerogative act expressed to be exercised with the consent of the Executive Council.

But we all know that it is exercised with the advice of those who must answer to the people. The point of the matter is that where the expression of the Act is in the form commonly used to indicate prerogative act—that is without the addition of the words, "in Council"—that does not indicate any real personal power in the depositary of the Crown's authority. That is made clear by the passage I am about to read, and it applies just as strongly to written Constitutions as to those Constitutions which are partly written and partly unwritten. Dicey says:

The survival of the prerogative, conferring as it does wide discretionary authority upon the Cabinet, involves a consequence which constantly escapes attention.

The survival of the prerogative really means that where the prerogative act is to be exercised the Cabinet meets, and the Governor or the Queen cannot for a moment intrude. The Cabinet, of course, is not expressed in any Constitution, but it is one of the living powers which must exist in such a Constitution as this. The Cabinet meets and something is determined, or where the Act does not require the assistance of the Cabinet, the Minister determines to do it. In both these cases a formal resolution is passed by the Executive Council with the Governor as chairman, or, when he is

It immensely increases the authority of the House of Commons and ultimately of the constituencies by which that House is returned. Ministers must in the exercise of all discretionary powers inevitably obey the predominant authority of the State. When the King was the chief member of the sovereign body, Ministers were in fact no less than in name the King's servants. At periods of our history when the Peers were the most influential body in the country, the conduct of the Ministry represented with more or less fidelity the wishes of the Peerage. Now that the House of Commons has become by far the most important part of the sovereign body, the Ministry in all matters of discretion carry out, or tend to carry out, the will of the House. When, however, the Cabinet cannot act, except by means of legislation, other considerations come into play. A law requires the sanction of the House of Lords. No Government can increase its statutory authority without obtaining the sanction of the Upper Chamber. Thus an Act of Parliament when passed represents, not the absolute wishes of the House of Commons, but those wishes as modified by the influence of the House of Lords. The Peers no doubt will in the long run conform to the wishes of the electorate. But the Peers may think that the electors will disapprove of or, at any rate, be indifferent to a Bill which meets with the approval of the House of Commons. Hence, while every action of the Cabinet which is done in virtue of the prerogative is in fact, though not in name, under the direct control of the representative chamber, all powers which can be exercised only in virtue of a statute are more or less controlled in their creation by the House of Lords; they are further controlled in their exercise by the interference of the courts.

Then also the Bill in 1872 for the abolition of the system of purchase in the army is referred to; it is interesting, but I do not think I need read it at length. It will be remembered by everybody that the Bill was rejected by the Lords, but that the system of purchase should be abolished was ascertained to be the definite wish of the House of Commons, and also of the people. The result of the rejection of the Bill by the Lords was that Mr. Gladstone, who was then Premier, by royal warrant—a distinct exercise of the prerogative—abolished the system of purchase in the army.

Mr. REID:
If we can dish the Upper Houses that way, I am agreeable.

Mr. BARTON:
From what I know of my friend it ought to suit him finely.
Mr. REID:
    Hear, hear. Down to the ground. But unfortunately our army is under an Act.
Mr. BARTON:
    Our federal army is not under an Act yet.
Mr. REID:
    Oh, I mean the local forces.
Mr. BARTON:
    This Bill having been rejected by the Lords, and the will of the people and of the House of Commons having been distinctly ascertained, the system was then and there abolished by royal warrant—an exercise of the prerogative.
Mr. REID:
    For which Mr. Gladstone was responsible; it was not a personal act of the Queen.
Mr. BARTON:
    If the House of Commons or the people had been against the abolition of this system, Mr. Gladstone would have paid the ordinary forfeit-loss of office.
Mr. FRASER:
    Hear, hear.
Mr. BARTON:
    Which goes to show that the exercise of the prerogative, although there is nothing in statute law to say it must be exercised on the advice of a minister, must still take place on the advice of a minister, and that that minister is responsible for its exercise. This is what the author says to some of these matters:

    The change, it will probably be conceded, met with the approval, not only of the Commons, but of the electors. But it will equally be conceded that, bad the alteration required statutory authority, the system of purchase might have continued in force up to the present day.
* * * *

    The existence of the prerogative enabled the Ministry in this particular instance to give immediate effect to the wishes of the electors, and this is the result which, under the circumstances of modern politics, the survival of the prerogative will in every instance produce. The prerogatives of the Crown have become the privileges of the people.
Mr. REID:
    Hear, hear.
Mr. BARTON:
And anyone who wants to see how widely these privileges may conceivably be stretched as the House of Commons becomes more and more the direct representative of the true Sovereign, being a Sovereign Chamber itself, mind:

Should weigh well the words in which Bagehot describes the powers which can still legally be exercised by the Crown without consulting Parliament; and remember that these powers can now be exercised by a Cabinet who are really servants, not of the Crown, but of the representative Chamber, which in its turn obeys the behests of the electors.

Then there is a passage from Bagehot's book on the English Constitution, pages 35-6 of the introduction, which I might as well read also, because it will tend to shorten argument on my part:

I said in this book that it would very much surprise people if they were only told how many things the Queen could do without consulting Parliament, and it certainly has so proved, for when the Queen abolished purchase in the army by an act of prerogative (after the Lords had rejected the Bill for doing so) there was a great and general astonishment.

Astonishment at the fact that a Minister could exercise the powers of the Crown by merely advising the Queen to issue her royal warrant. He goes on:

But this is nothing to what the Queen can by law do without consulting Parliament. Not to mention other things, she could disband the army (by law she cannot engage more than a certain number of men, but she is not obliged to engage any men); she could dismiss all the officers, from the general commanding-in-chief downwards; she could dismiss all the sailors too; she could send off all our ships of war and all our naval stores; she could make a peace by the sacrifice of Cornwall, and begin a war for the conquest of Brittany. She could make every citizen in the United Kingdom, male or female, a peer; she could make every parish in the United Kingdom a "university;" she could dismiss most of the civil servants; she could pardon all offenders. In a word, the Queen could by prerogative upset all the action of civil government within the government, could disgrace the nation by a bad peace or war, and could, by disbanding our forces, whether land or sea, leave us defenceless against foreign nations.

All that Dicey has to add to that is this:

If Government by Parliament is ever transformed into Government by the House of Commons, the transformation will, it may be conjectured, be effected by use of the prerogatives of the Crown.

All that passage goes to show this, that every prerogative which the Queen retains is retained in trust for the people, and it does not matter whether she is told in the Statute that she is to exercise that prerogative by the advice of the Executive Council or not, if she is given the power in the Statute she can only exercise that power of prerogative by and on the advice of the Ministers. In other words, if you have a Statute embodying a Constitution, or if you have a Constitution in which the moving power is responsible government, in one case or the other, whether acting as a prerogative or in Executive, there must be a Minister responsible for the action to the people. And that is the principle embodied in this Bill as drawn. We shall be told if we alter the drafting of it in this particular, if we say we are not aware of the distinction between the Acts which are assumed to be prerogative and which cannot be received without Executive advice, if we say that we do not know the distinction between these, we shall be told how the distinction would be made every time. The words:

With the advice of the Federal Council would be struck out and the words:
The Queen or
The Governor-General would be left. There will be this little further result: We shall be told that we did not know how to draft an Act of Parliament because we did not have sufficient constitutional knowledge. It is all very well for my hon.

friend to propose an amendment, but if the Bill is accepted as drawn he can take this conclusion: that all executive powers must be in trust for the people, because every Constitution has been workable only by responsible government. As there is at the end of clause 61 provision which makes what my hon. friend desires safeguarded there is no more contest needed about the matter. We have provided in clause 61 that officers shall be members of the Federal Executive Council and shall be the Queen's Ministers of the State for the Commonwealth; that after the first general election no Minister of State shall hold office for a longer period than three calendar months, unless he shall be or become a member of one of the Houses of Parliament; and that Ministers of State shall be in the Parliament, and that is the hold by which Parliament, if there were no other hold, would make them responsible to the people. This Act, as it was, would have made the Ministers responsible to the people, and have given us cabinet government responsible to the people. I do not think there is need for further discussion. We can take the clause as drawn.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

My hon. friend's new argument shows that if the words were inserted they would at the very most be mere surplusage, and if this surplusage will satisfy the minds of the hon. members the surplusage is justifiable. I paid particular attention to the last argument, that it might possibly expose us to some adverse criticism from the home authorities in regard to the drafting of the Bill. I should think we would be prepared to put up with a little bit of criticism. We are not supposed to understand the whole of the laws of the Empire, and possibly if we make a mistake we will stand being corrected. We will not be like little little children-set our backs up in obstinacy because someone can point out how to do better. Mr. Barton first of all recites Dicey to show what occurs under the unwritten Constitution of England. But here we are framing a written Constitution. When once that Constitution is framed we cannot get behind it.

Mr. REID: Why should we have said the executive authority is vested in the Queen?

Mr. CARRUTHERS: We have been told before on the question of "proposed laws" that the federal judiciary is established for the purpose of keeping us right down to the very text of our Constitution, and if we are to be so kept down it is better to let that Constitution clearly express what it is intended to effect; do not let us have to back it up by quoting whole pages of Dicey. This is a Constitution which the unlettered people of the community ought to be able to understand. We have had it cited that in Canada a similar provision is enacted. But the provision in Canada is not similar. The provision in Canada uses words to this effect:

The executive power and authority of the Commonwealth shall continue and be vested in the Queen.

That means simply that that executive power, which by the unwritten Constitution or the unwritten law was vested in the Queen, should remain so vested. The words "shall continue" have a very marked and clear meaning. You cannot "continue" the existence of a thing except in so far as it did exist. Here, however, is the creation of its existence. In the next place, in the Canadian Constitution there are no such words as we have in clause 2 of chapter I. If the Canadian Constitution had these words, how different the arguments would be. In clause 2 of chapter I. we specifically deal with the matters of the Queen's prerogative, and, having dealt with them, we provide that they shall and may be exercised by the Governor. The section reads:

The Queen may, from time to time, appoint a Governor-General, who shall be Her Majesty's representative in the Commonwealth, and who shall have and may exercise in the Commonwealth during the Queen's pleasure, and subject to the provisions of this Constitution, such powers and functions of the Queen as Her Majesty may think fit to assign to him.

That is the section dealing with the prerogative rights, and all those matters cited by Mr. Barton are matters where the Queen must exercise her prerogative, and even her prerogative has been limited by the constitutional usage of the mother-country. Here all these matters, however, have been dealt with in clause 20, and are introduced for the first time in Federation Bills in this Bill. For what specific purpose? Surely the draughtsmen have some particular purpose in introducing this clause 2 of chapter I. It must have some meaning, and what does it really amount to? The very words of it clearly show that it relates wholly and solely to those matters which are matters of the Royal prerogative. We propose that they should be handed down to the Government under the advice of the Executive Council there. Then when we come to the next clause:

The executive power of the Commonwealth is vested in the Queen.

That is totally different from the divesting of prerogative rights—a very different thing. Here we are handing over matters totally distinct from the prerogative rights, and the argument of my hon. friend goes to show that the executive powers must be exercised by and with the advice of the Executive, and if that be so, what harm can there be in clearly expressing within the Constitution itself what we mean? I hope that we shall not be detained for some hours in discussing this, when we have got the admission from Mr. Barton and the Drafting Committee that practically without these words the work will have to be done by an Executive Council with a reference to the home authorities and constitutional usages. I hope the Committee will adopt the proposal of my hon. friend. In the pamphlet, "Notes on the Commonwealth Bill of 1891," Mr. G. P. Barton says:

It is contended that this clause, as it stands, vests the executive power in the Governor-General independently of the Executive; and that it ought to have concluded with the words "acting by and with the advice of the Federal Executive Council." If those words had been inserted they would not amount to anything more than surplusage. Parliamentary Government being established as the basis of the Federation, the Governor-General could not act otherwise than "by and with the advice of the Federal Executive Council," unless he was prop trod to take the responsibility of acting without it and against it.

We do not want to be put in this position, that the Governor could, if he liked, exercise this executive responsibility and powers, and we want to have the functions as set out in the clause distinguished from the exercise of the Royal prerogative. We do not want the Governor to have the power to do wrong; we want to have him limited by the terms of the Constitution Act, and kept to the straight paths by a Federal Judiciary.

Mr. REID:

He holds no responsibility to us at all.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

We do not want the Federation to be plunged into a broil through the Governor taking responsibility on his own shoulders. I hope my hon. friend's suggested amendment will be carried.

Clause, as read, agreed to.

Clause 59—There shall be a Council to aid and advise the Governor-General in the government of the Commonwealth, and such Council shall be styled the Federal Executive Council; and the persons who are to be members of the Council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor-General, and sworn as executive councillors, and shall hold office during his pleasure.

Mr. GLYNN:

On the question of responsibility I would like to draw attention to the fact that we are creating an Executive Council, a portion of which cannot be responsible. We had a discussion just now on the question of the obligations of the Governor to the prerogative of the Crown, and the responsibility of Ministers. Under this it is possible that you might create a responsible Council who would not be responsible at all, because there is a certain number of members of the Council who may not be Cabinet Ministers. In Canada the Council is swollen by the continuance as Executive Councillors of ex-Cabinet Ministers. Here we can do the same, and also appoint men to the Council at once who would never be in Parliament. If that is so you can have the prerogative of the Crown exercised by men who are not at all subject to parliamentary control. In Canada they have a non-parliamentary Council simply by accident; and it is by the accident of Ministers going out of office that they are retained as a matter of honor in the Executive Council. In England the Executive Council does not exist practically outside of the Cabinet. You are going to create under this a large Executive of thirty or forty, and you are going under the express terms of this Act to let them carry out the prerogative of the Crown in conjunction with the Governor-General, altogether overlooking the fact that the Executive Council ought to be responsible. Here we have a clause which says there shall be a Council to advise the Governor-General of the Commonwealth, but a portion of the Executive need not be Cabinet Ministers, and is it not possible, therefore, to create a large Council, some of the members of which would be responsible while others would not?
Mr. O'CONNOR:
What possible powers could they have?

Mr. GLYNN:
Well, what is the use of them? You are going to fix an Executive Council that is not required. Todd, the leading authority on parliamentary government in the colonies, says we should stick to the principle of having only Cabinet Ministers in the Council. The Queen's Privy Council is retained more for the honor than for its use. At one time the Privy Council, with the Sovereign, was the legislative body. The monarch called the Council together whenever it was considered necessary, but as time went on the legislative function of the Council was taken over by the people, and the Privy Council was kept up simply as an honor. The Council has not been called upon, except as regards the members of the Cabinet, to discharge any executive function since it signed the Utrecht. I say that, under this proposal, we will be putting in the Constitution the possibility of having an Executive Council who can sign proclamations and advise the Governor-General, but who still need not be in the slightest degree responsible to the Parliament.

Mr. TRENWITH:
YOU will have the advantage of their experience if you want them, but generally they will take no part.

Mr. GLYNN:
You are going to create a body that is of no use, and an appendage to the Governorship that is not required.

Mr. SYMON:
I think my hon. friend has rather found a mare's nest, because he seems to be under the impression that the Governor will take it into his head to surreptitiously pack the Executive Council to the serious detriment of the Ministers of the State, and the public interests generally. We can hardly imagine under the present era of responsible government anything of the sort taking place, and if there was any idea that the Executive Council might be interfered with it is set at rest by clause 61, which says that the seven Ministers of State shall form the Executive Council. We want some fringe of ornament to the Constitution; it cannot all be prosaic.

Clause, as read, agreed to.
Clause 60, as read, agreed to.
Clause 61 as read agreed to.

Clause 62.-Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the number of Ministers of State who may sit in either House shall not exceed seven, who shall hold such offices, and by such designation, as the Parliament from time to time prescribes, or, in the absence of provision, as the Governor-General from time to time directs.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I would ask as to the number of Ministers, whether there is any need for seven?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
The number is not to exceed seven.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It seems to me that we must be very careful not to frighten the people by huge expenses.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There are seventy-six members to begin with.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Move to reduce the number.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I would not undertake that responsibility, but I wish members to consider whether we should put any particular number or any particular sum as their salaries in the Bill. I think it might be left open.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I point out that if the hon. member feels any difficulty they can give four members to the Senate and three to the House of Representatives.

Clause, as read, agreed to.

Clause 63, as read, agreed to,

Clause 64—Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the appointment and removal of all other officers of the Government of the Commonwealth shall be vested in the Governor-General in Council.

Mr. WISE:
I think this will be the place to move an amendment of which I have given notice, which is drawn with the view of preventing the coming into existence in this country of a state of things which is such a drawback to the public life of the United States, and which is known as the "spoil" system. I propose to move:

That the following words be added, "Provided that no such officer shall be removed except for cause assigned."

That in no way limits the power of the Executive to remove an officer for any cause they please, such as inability to perform his duties, or that big services are not required, and so on, but it imposes on them the responsibility of stating to Parliament and the country at large what their reason is, and it will prevent the wholesale removal of officers to make room for political friends. It also gives a security of tenure to the general body of civil servants, who as a rule are not overpaid compared with the responsible duties they have to perform. It will prevent them being removed by secret commissions or by commissioners who take evidence in secret, and who listen to charges which the civil servants may not have the opportunity of answering, and which may prove fatal to their positions. My real object is to put into this Constitution a clause which will establish a custom, which will ripen into a law, and will prevent civil servants from being removed from office for purely political reasons.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I trust this amendment will not be made. The practice which my hon. friend has cited with regard to America is one not likely to come about in any of our colonies. It is on a different basis. They have an Executive not responsible to Parliament. Here the Executive will be responsible to Parliament, and I do not think would ever dare to take this step of dismissing a large number of public servants for the purpose of putting their friends into their places. If a Ministry in our colony were to do that they would not sit on the Treasury benches for twenty-four hours. Then it is wished to insert the words "for cause assigned"; that is, if you dismiss a telegraph boy or messenger you must assign a cause. The very same danger that the hon. member apprehends might exist then, for if the Government were so corrupt as to put their supporters in office they would take very good care to find some reason for making dismissals.

Mr. ISAACS:

It says, "Until Parliament otherwise provides."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

As the Attorney-General for Victoria points out, it is simply "Until Parliament otherwise provides," and it would be quite in the power of Parliament to make amendments. There is the matter of pensions which we might consider.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I would point out to Mr. Wise that his amendment might be doing considerable injury to some civil servants whom it might be necessary

Mr. WISE:

Such officers could always resign.

Mr. TRENWITH:

We have to get rid of people for unsteadiness, and we should not publish the cause to the world and say they were unsuitable. We should let them do the best they can to get another position. If the amendment were carried we would have to say that John Smith or James Brown had been dismissed for some cause, and it would be very unwise. I think Sir George Turner has shown that in the colonies we have never had even the suspicion of corruption in connection with appointments in the public service, at any rate not in a wholesale manner. In the United States the circumstances are different. The Senate is not responsible to Parliament, and there goes on notoriously an immense amount of logrolling that could not happen here.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I cannot see what object there is in this amendment, because if the officer is not to be dismissed, except for cause assigned, that must surely be with a view to allowing some tribunal to decide whether the cause is adequate or not. I am quite sure that my hon. friend cannot be moving this motion simply for the purpose of declaring that no Minister shall dismiss an office boy without giving the precise reason for doing so. I suppose he must give a good cause.

Mr. WISE:
Only state a cause to the public. Put it on record.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
But does my hon. friend not think that this is a matter of too small importance to introduce into the Constitution?

Mr. WISE:
No.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I think we have quite enough elaboration in this Constitution Bill. Having established a Government which shall be responsible to the Parliament, we may fairly leave the control of the officers in the hands of the Government, without introducing provisions which might do the greatest injustice to individuals.

Mr. FRASER:
Divide! Divide! Divide!

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I think in the interests of the civil servants this is a very desirable amendment. I can see every reason for protecting them against dismissal without cause.

Mr. FRASER; Is that ever done?

Mr. WISE:
Yes; I have known it done.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
No harm can arise by defending civil servants from dismissal without cause. When I am told, as I am told by Mr. Trenwith, that this will be inimical to the interests of the civil servants, inasmuch as they will not like to have the causes of their dismissal published, I laugh at that argument, because if the causes are such that they do not wish to have them made public, the matter is in their own hands.

Mr. TRENWITH:
No; it is not.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
They need not publish them.

Mr. TRENWITH:
There must be a reason assigned.

Mr. ISAACS:
And who shall be the judge?

Mr. WISE:
There is no necessity for any one judging; there is necessity to publish it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
There is no necessity whatever for publication. A Civil servant is defended by this to the extent that he cannot be dismissed unless a cause is assigned.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I would remind my honorable friend Mr. Wise that clause 83, which deals with this subject from another standpoint, has not yet been disposed of, but was postponed. That deals with the whole of the public servants taken over by the Commonwealth, and if their rights, as at present enjoyed, are preserved, that clause, if so amended, will no doubt carry a larger measure of protection to them than this does to new appointees. I cordially sympathise with my honorable friend's proposal; but it does not go far enough. I am quite sure that the Federal Parliament will provide for a satisfactory tenure of office for its servants. In the meantime, if their rights are to be safeguarded, as no doubt they ought to be, we may accept this amendment as an indication that equal protection should be afforded to all public servants.

Mr. WISE:
I think there may be something in what Mr. Deakin Says. But I prefer to take a division now, and if my learned friend's idea proves correct, we can easily alter clause 83 when we come to it, and the Drafting Committee can put it into shape. It is by no means the unimportant matter Sir John Downer seems to think. I regard it as of the highest importance that the Federal Commonwealth should be launched with a competent staff of administrators, and I am not speaking on a subject on which I have no knowledge, for I have had the honor of a seat on the Civil Service Commission of our colony. In our colony there has been a steady depreciation in the quality of the Civil servants in consequence of the growing insecurity of tenure which has attached to their office. It is not only on account of the system of "the spoils to the victor" being introduced that I want the amendment passed, and the remarks of Sir John Downer and Mr. Trenwith were beside the mark. They say, "You can trust the people"; but in America they do not, or regard that system as dishonest. The custom has grown up, and they regard it as honest enough for a man to be given a position on account of his political opinions.

Mr. TRENWITH:
They do regard it as dishonest.

Mr. WISE:
Some do, but a Government man does not. It has become second nature with them. I want to enforce the direct responsibility of the Executive for dismissal from the Civil Service. In some colonies the Executives have shirked the responsibility by appointing Commissioners, who have absolute authority; and of course then nobody is to blame for dismissals. To my knowledge some acts of injustice have been done.

Mr. KINGSTON:
But is a dismissal an act for the Executive or a Commission?

Mr. WISE:
I understand, in one case, an Executive disclaimed responsibility, and put it on the Commission. Unless the amendment is carried tenure of office may be as insecure as it is to-day.

Mr. FRASER:
This amendment means that the Executive Government will not do their duty, that they are dishonest, and unfair, and will make appointments improperly.

HON. MEMBERS:
No, no.

Mr. FRASER:
You can say "No" as much as you like, but that is the meaning of it. There may be one case in a million of injury to a civil servant, but that is inseparable from our form of Government. Are we going to pass an amendment like this because of one isolated case? I have known many cases during my twenty-seven years of public life where civil servants should have been dismissed but were not, because they brought such an enormous amount of influence to bear. I do not say anything against the Civil servants. They have great responsibility, and are deserving of every protection in this Act, but do not let us cumber the Act with provisions like this.

Mr. ISAACS:
There are two or three reasons in addition to those given by Sir George Turner why the amendment should not be carried. The first is, that it is not a matter for the Constitution at all. We are not framing a code. We are not legislating in a Federal Parliament; but it seems to me that if we are going to descend to details of this kind, we had better start and frame, as Mr. Deakin has said more than once, "a three-volume set of Statutes."

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
You are making a new departure with a very large body of civil servants.

Mr. ISAACS:
We have the Constitution of every colony in Australia, and with exactly the same power to start with no such wrong and injustice has been done as the hon member has referred to.

Mr. WISE:
There has been a steady increase in the ease with which civil servants are dismissed.

Mr. ISAACS:
I think it is quite the other way. So far as Victoria is concerned that remark has no application whatever. There are thousands of men employed in the Railway Department at the pleasure of the Railways Commissioner. None of them would be dismissed on a political ground, and no one would dream of doing it or permitting such a thing to be done.

Mr. WISE:
Look at New Zealand.

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not know about New Zealand, but I can say that not one of the colonies in Australia would dream of dismissing civil servants, if they had it in their power, for political reasons. But my hon. friend's amendment gives no protection whatever to the civil servants, and I am prepared to support a real protection to them. But this proposal will be the most illusory thing in the world. He says they are not to be dismissed" without cause assigned." The cause may be political reasons.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Very likely, is it not?

Mr. ISAACS:
But no one would dare to may so, and the civil servants would suffer all the same. To whom is the Governor-in-Council to assign the reasons? He may put any reason he likes, and nobody can challenge it; there is nobody to decide whether it is right or wrong or justifiable or not, yet we are told there is a great protection to be given to civil servants.

Mr. WISE:
It will prevent a stab in the dark.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is just what it will not do. I sympathise strongly with the desire that men shall not be dismissed for political reasons, and had I the honor to have a seat in the Federal Parliament I would support an amendment to give real protection to civil servants, and not an illusory one such as this.

Mr. SYMON:
I shall vote with some regret against the amendment, because out of these words there would really come no protection whatever to civil servants. If the amendment was "without just cause" that might possibly be some protection.

Mr. WISE:
That would hamper the Executive too much.

Mr. SYMON:
And this hampers it too little.

Mr. WISE:
It makes a man act in the open.

Mr. SYMON:
Suppose a man is dismissed, and a reason has to be assigned. The reason would simply be "because his services are no longer required." You would never be able to pin a Government down to a reason when they wished to get rid of an undesirable civil servant. To carry the amendment would be to introduce words having no real effect, affording no real protection, and beneath the dignity of the Constitution.

Question-That the words "Provided that no such officer shall be removed except for cause assigned," proposed to be added, be so added-put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the negative.
Clause, as read, agreed to.
Clause 65-Authority of Executive-as read, agreed to.
Clause 66-Command of military and naval forces-as read, agreed to.
Clause 67.- On the establishment of the Commonwealth the control of the following departments of the Public Service shall be assumed and taken over by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth shall assume the obligations of any State or States with respect to such matters, that is to say

- Customs and excise:
- Posts and telegraphs:
- Military and naval defence:
- Ocean beacons and buoys, and ocean lighthouses and lightships:
- Quarantine.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I called attention to this clause before. There is an ambiguity about it which may lead to considerable pain and trouble. I am in a quandary as to what is meant by the framers of the clause. It is in the same form as the Bill of 1891, as Sir John Downer has shown me, but what is meant by the Commonwealth assuming the obligations of any State or States with respect to such matters as military and naval defence? There are some of our colonies which have borrowed money specifically for defence work; others have spent large sums of money on defence works from revenue; and it would be obviously very unfair to those who have paid for their defences from revenue if the obligations which stand as fixed debts against defence works by other colonies were taken over by the Federal Parliament. Is it meant or is it not that permanent debts for defence works shall be taken over?

Mr. BARTON:
Would not that come in in clause 84?

Mr. HIGGINS:
If you look at clause 83 you will see that in the establishment of the Commonwealth all officers employed are to be transferred to the Commonwealth, but the State retains the obligation of any gratuity, pension, or retiring allowance. Then clause 84 states that all lands and property which belong to these specified departments are to be vested in the Commonwealth. I understand they are to be vested in the Commonwealth with a liability to pay a fair value, to be ascertained by arbitration. But I apprehend it is not intended that, in addition to the price to be paid as a fair value, there is also to be paid the amount standing against it as a fixed debt.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Not the powder that has been blown away, but the powder that remains.

Mr. HIGGINS:

But supposing the powder that remains is £10,000 worth, and supposing there is standing against it £8,000, surely it is not intended that the Commonwealth shall pay for both. I do not think that section 67 of chapter 2 means to transfer to the Federal Government the obligations which stand against a particular State. All that that clause ought to mean is that the Commonwealth is to assume the functions of any State or States.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

That would not be obligations, you see.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Obligations, I need not remind the lawyers here, who are sufficiently numerous, ordinarily includes debts.

Mr. ISAACS:

Contracts.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I only want to have a word put in which shall prevent any possible inference that the debts are being taken over. I would suggest that the second half of section 67, which appears to have no meaning whatever, should be left out altogether.

Mr. BARTON:

I would leave that part in, because it seems to me that the obligations there intended are not public debts, but certain duties such as contracts—works that are to be taken over, and in respect of which, as to their lands, buildings, and materials, clause 84 provides. Surely there are also duties and obligations such as the dealing with the current claims of contractors. There are a number of these claims constantly in existence, and it is only right that such obligations as these should be taken over by the Commonwealth when it takes over the matters to which the obligations are attached. A more material question I think has been raised by my hon. friend's arguments, and that is whether the provisions of clause 84 might not be worthy of extension so as to make it clear that all lands, buildings, materials, etc., are to be taken over, and a fair price to be paid. But there are other things besides lands, buildings, and works. Suppose we count posts and telegraphs among "lands, buildings, and works." The clause might not cover the expenditure, we will say, on naval defence. In addition to lands, buildings, and works, there may be ships taken over which are not covered by clause 84. That is the clause which makes it necessary to assume the obligations by way of debt in this way, that the Commonwealth must take over lands, buildings, works, &c., and will have to pay a fair price for them. Probably the Commonwealth too will have to borrow money for the purpose of discharging the obligations of the States so far as regards the taking over of works constructed by loan, and assuming these obligations themselves as representing fair value. That applies to matters which are more than lands, buildings, and works. I think the better way would be to make an amendment in clause 84 on its recommittal, providing for the enlargement of the scope of it, so that there could be no doubt about that point. Under the present clause "obligation" must have the necessary limitation attached to it, and that is that the obligations which are connected with the administration of these matters should be taken over; so if there are any works incomplete the obligation is in the completion of them.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Does not "obligation" mean the taking over of defence works, posts and telegraphs, &c.?

Mr. BARTON:
Clause 84 deals with that.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The point I want settled is to make "obligation" clear.

Mr. BARTON:
I think it is sufficiently clear for all purposes. Clauses 84 and 67 must be read together.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think the expression is too wide.

Mr. BARTON:
If the hon. member takes clauses 67 and 84 together he will see that the purpose of one is to take over the departments, and discharge such obligations as are attached to them, and the other is the taking over of lands, works-and vessels I think should be added-
I think under the heading of "Naval Defence" should be included the liability of the colonies under contract with the Imperial Government for a matter of £120,000 in respect to the naval squadron. I would ask if it is not so intended?

Mr. BARTON:
I am afraid we could not include this here, because this is a joint contract between the colonies and the Imperial Government, and I do not see how that could come under "obligations"

Mr. KINGSTON:
Suppose we federate to-morrow surely the Commonwealth would relieve the States of their liability with reference to that agreement. I will draw attention to the wording of the Clause which stated:

The Commonwealth shall assume the obligations of any State or States with respect to such matters, that is to say.

Mr. BARTON:
That must be read with with sub-section 6 of clause 50.

Mr. KINGSTON:
My mind at present is that this clause does relieve us of this responsibility, and I would ask Mr. Barton to look closely into it. If he has any doubt on the subject he can give us the opportunity of considering the matter. If we are going to continue under this liability, then half the benefit of our association for naval defence purposes-.

Mr. ISAACS:
I would ask if he thinks this is provided for, "or whether an existing debt for a past benefit which the Federation does not get" but which is connected with these matters.

Mr. HIGGINS:
A spent power.

Mr. ISAACS:
Yes, a spent power. It has been carried out for the benefit of the State, but does the obligation exist?

Mr. BARTON:
A sum of money spent, but the object has past and gone.

Mr. ISAACS:
Yes.

Mr. BARTON:
That would depend upon whether it existed for lands or buildings or other such assets.

Mr. ISAACS:
It may be for mail service.

Mr. BARTON:
That would not be included.

Mr. ISAACS:
It might be one of the obligations.

Mr. BARTON:
That is for money spent?

Mr. ISAACS:
Money owing for services rendered.

Mr. BARTON:
Supposing there has been some work undertaken the purpose of which is past and gone, if the money has been spent I take it that is not an obligation which the Commonwealth is to take over. Supposing the State has used loan money for a particular purpose, it would be hard to contend that, the State having had the full benefit of it and having discharged its debt in respect of the matter, the Commonwealth should take the debt over. I think this clause means current obligations.

Mr. WALKER:
I intend to propose at the end of the clause:
To insert "railways" after "quarantine."

Mr. BARTON:
Let us settle this point first. I do not think it is necessary to add any word. It is plain enough. When we are choosing the clauses to be recommitted we will consider all of these suggestions.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If Mr. Barton will undertake to reconsider the clauses I will let this one pass.

Mr. WALKER:
I move:
That the word "railways" be inserted after quarantine."

I have given notice of a new clause to be inserted later on, so I need not now enlarge upon the proposal as to the way in which the railways should be taken over. The clause I intended to bring forward later on is as follows:
The Parliament shall take over the whole of the railways of the several States, except Tasmania and Western Australia, and each State shall be charged with any deficiency or credited with any net profits on the working of such railways.

On Saturday night we established the principle that the Federal Government is going to have some control over the means of communication by federalising the River Murray.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is very important that the Premiers should all be here while this matter is being discussed, and it will be far better for the hon. member to make his proposal on the clause when we come to it.

HON. MEMBERS:
Let us have it now and get the whole thing over.

Mr. WISE:
They will be here for the division. Get it over.

HON. MEMBERS:
Go on.

Mr. WALKER:
Very well. Several of us in Now South Wales informed the electors that we intended to bring forward this question, and I have waited patiently up to the present for an opportunity to speak, and now I propose to say something.

Mr. DOBSON:
I rise to a semi-point of order. We have allowed the different Treasurers to retire in order to settle the financial clauses of the Bill, which are the greatest trouble we have, and it is known to us all that their schemes exclude railways. I am sure that Mr. Walker is frustrating their efforts to come to a conclusion upon the financial question by bringing forward this motion.

Mr. WISE:
It will dispose of all their difficulties.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It must be discussed at some time. It may as well be now.

Mr. WALKER:
Of course there is some force in that point, but I believe that the members absent have made up their minds, and therefore all I can say will not affect their votes, but I shall try to convert some of the representatives who are present. We have heard a great deal about the difficulties connected with the financial clauses. I had the honor with Dr. Quick to attend a Convention a few months ago held in the city of Bathurst. At that we had also the honor of being on the Financial Committee which brought up a report, in which was recommended, amongst other things, that the non-political control of the railways should be vested in the Federal Government, and that there should be a consolidation of the public debts. I should not have much difficulty to give figures by which, if the Federal Government were to see its way clear to take over the control of the railways and the consolidation of the public debts, as well as the Customs and excise, it would be able to carry on the Federal Government at a practically less burdensome charge to the community than existing governments cost at present. I shall have an opportunity of speaking on the consolidation of the public debts later on, so at the present time I shall confine my remarks to the control of the railways by the Federal Government. It is not intended that any colony shall lose the advantage of its railways. It is proposed that there shall be a non-political board, and that the initiative for the construction of any new lines shall rest with each State, so that they will, for all practical purposes, continue to own the railways, and will have the control of the construction of new lines. There will be in consequence a considerable saving in the working of the lines, and we may also in time, with the approval of the Federal Government, bring about a uniformity in the gauge, and in all respects these lines will become national undertakings in the best sense of the word. I regret on this subject not to have seen the evidence of the railway experts who were recently here. I was one of those who heard with great pleasure the intention of the Premiers to allow the Railway Commissioners of the various colonies to give evidence. They did so, and I heard indirectly and unofficially that the three Commissioners are strongly in favor of a uniformity in the gauge. In the improbable event of the Convention agreeing to grant to the Federal Government the control of the railways, I am prepared to submit several additional clauses as to the management of details, but I shall not enlarge on that aspect of the question at the present time. Of course I recognise that in the event of our taking over the railways we shall have to treat Tasmania in a somewhat different manner from the rest of Australia. Tasmania stands by itself, and there is no absolute necessity why her railways should be under the same control as the lines on the continent. I believe that the Tasmanian representatives are indifferent as to whether their lines should be handed over or not. For the like reason it may be unnecessary to deal with the Western Australian lines, but we must look to the future of the Commonwealth and to the time when we shall have the Western Australian lines connected with Port Augusta. It seems to me that in the matter of Federal defence it is necessary that we should have an opportunity of sending troops from one end of the country to the other without needless delay. With regard to this matter of connection with Western Australia, within the last few weeks, and even to-day, we have had instances of the disadvantages that the Western Australian people are under through the breaking out of smallpox or some other Eastern epidemic. If we had a railway they could come right through, and would avoid this. That may be a comparatively small matter, but it is by the way. Again, I think it is very undesirable that the Federal Government should rely only on Customs revenue for the payment of interest on the national debt. If they had an income partly from Customs and partly from railways, they would be in a splendid position to meet the obligations for the colonies, besides returning something considerable to the States. Including Queensland, which I trust will enter the Federation, the Customs and excise revenues amount to £6,000,000 a year, and the net profit on the railways is £3,000,000 a year, so that these sources of income produce £9,000,000 a year, and at thirty years' purchase that would represent a capital value of £270,000,000. The cost of the lines has been £110,000,000, and the balance of the national debt, £70,000,000, would be amply represented by the income from Customs and excise. We have heard a lot about leaving it to the States hereafter to hand over the control of the railways to the Federal Government. I think the Constitution should do it. Otherwise, you have to consult six different Governments, and it is a very difficult matter to get six different Governments to come into agreement. With regard to the Constitution of the Federal Government it seems a great pity to erect a magnificent piece of machinery and not to give it sufficient work to do. I can scarcely believe it was ever intended that the Federal Government should have only control of Customs and excise, post and telegraphs, and defence. Surely it was intended it should have the control of the railways, and should arrange for the consolidation of the debts, by which I think the annual saving would suffice to pay all the expense of the establishment of the Federal Government. I trust that some other representative will see his way to endorse what I have said, and afterwards, if need be, I may have something to say in reply to others.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I think the Convention owes a great deal to Mr. Walker for the painstaking manner in which he has investigated this question. I spoke at length on the question in the opening debate, and I do not intend to repeat what I then said, but I would like to say something about the general view held by most of us. To consolidate the debts and bring them under a Central Government would be a very fine, symmetrical, and statesmanlike action. At the same time we are bound to consider the feeling of our respective colonies, and while I hope that in the evolution of our Federation we may yet have the railways united under some central power free from political influence, I am strongly of opinion that that time has not yet come, because railways and debts involve very complicated processes of negotiations. The interest earned by the respective railway systems, the differential rates in our loans, and other matters which are complicated with these, make it clear to me from my position that it is impossible for this Convention to deal with questions like these. I do hope that when the railways become more interlaced between the different colonies the very exigencies of the position will necessitate some common control. But you must recollect that you will have to evolve a scheme under which the construction of new lines must be left entirely at the discretion of the respective States. The development of the Crown lands of many of these colonies is largely involved in railway construction, and when you take the map of Australia you will clearly see that the present development of our railway system is merely in its infancy, and when you recollect that our railways are much in the same position as roads and bridges, and that many of them would be, in certain instances, purely local lines, I think it will be clear that this railway question is at present to a great extent purely a local matter. I feel very strongly, as I have said before in referring to the debts, that if we attempt to overload this Federation in its earlier stages with things which more properly belong to our local life, and which are in the early stage of development, we shall be creating a Constitution which will not be acceptable to the great body of the people at present. Therefore, while from a broad administrative point of view, I should like to see our railways under one common control, and while, as a business man, I should like to see a complete consolidation of our debts, I believe that these things will be brought about much earlier if we trust to the course of federal evolution. For instance, we propose to create an Inter-State Commission, in order to watch over varied matters of a federal character, arising out of the railways which come near our respective borders and in the Inter-State Commission we may have the nucleus of a future board free from political influence. But there is such a mass of matter which will be so necessary to understand that it cannot be at our command at present. It will involve months of consideration; so that we are, at any rate, as far as I am concerned, closed up to the necessity, under any circumstances, of leaving this question over for the future. Then we are told that if we do not do the thing now the Central Government will have to negotiate with five or six colonies, but we must recollect that when we once have this Federal Government as a negotiator we have got one central power to dominate and influence, and deal directly with the different States; whereas at the present time all that we can manage is a conference among the States in which one power is exactly on the same level as the other. Therefore, while I hope that something may result through the future movement of Federation, still I do unhesitatingly say from what I know of the feeling of my own colony, and I believe these feelings exist among the other colonies, that we are not yet ripe to embody this in the great scheme of our Constitution. While I am in the fullest sympathy with many of the views expressed by Mr. Walker and those who think with him, I shall be obliged to vote against his proposal.

Mr. SYMON:
I should like to express my indebtedness to Mr. Walker for the very clear and succinct way in which he has put the case he has presented for the taking over of the railways. I thank him also for the research and care with which he had previously placed his views on this question in print, with a clearness which has been of great service to many members of the Convention. I should have preferred, however, that he would rather have adopted the plan suggested by some members of the Committee, and had taken another opportunity of moving in this p

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think everyone allows that if the railways are taken over the debts must go with them.

Mr. SYMON:
It is on that assumption, if the two go together, that I should be found voting with Mr. Walker. Undoubtedly there are great difficulties in carrying this into effect, and there are also reasons which have been indicated by Mr. McMillan, reasons of convenience, and perhaps prudence, which should be considered in connection with introducing it into the Constitution; but I do not assent to the strong way in which Mr. McMillan put it when he suggested that it was impossible that this could be done, or that it could be done now. It seems to me that if we have, as we have, taken over the post and telegraph system—and in that respect I agree with Mr. Carruthers—the two are parallel undertakings, and if we are prepared to take over the post and telegraph services throughout the whole of Australia, we ought to be prepared, so far as the question of feasibility is concerned, to also take over the railway systems.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
They practically balance each other except by about £100,000.

Mr. SYMON:
All the difficulties I have heard against taking over the railways I have heard as objections to taking over the post and telegraph services. The point was put with great force by Mr. Holder that you would have difficulties with the local services. It has also been said that in many instances telegraph systems—telegraph extensions—were established for the purpose of opening up new country and facilitating trade in remote parts of the separate States. It has also been put forward as a very strong objection to taking over the post and telegraph systems that you would create a federal army of servants which might constitute a danger in the political life of the States - that you would ally to the Federation a body of officers who, although holding their employment and carrying on their duties in the separate States, would give their influence and voice in favor of federal matters. All these and many other objections are the same as have been raised to the taking over of the railways, and if they may be overcome in the case of the postal and telegraph services it seems to me they may be equally overcome in the case of the railways. Then, again, it is said that you would have to undertake the control of these local railways which are mostly for the purpose of local development. From that I do not shrink for one moment; there ought to be no exception, and the same power which would be enabled to deal with trunk lines and lines of commerce would equally deal with these local lines which are for the development of particular parts of the country. It is true of course that each State has to develop its present unopened lands, but the federal authority, if it is to be trusted at all, would equally see to the development of those parts of the different States that require opening up, and be ready to deal justly with the development of the railway systems for that purpose in which all are interested-as this is not a State matter, but a national matter-and no difficulty can possibly arise in commencing the construction of new lines or maintaining those lines which already exist.

There are perplexities no doubt, and difficulties no one can fail to see; perplexities which we are unable to think out at the moment often work themselves out when we face them and enter upon the task of solving them. I quite agree with my hon. friend in reference to gauge, differential railway rates, and every topic in connection with railways, that all those difficulties which are supposed to be met by the establishment of this Inter-State Commission would be much more effectually met and much more satisfactorily disposed of in the common interest if the railways were bodily taken over and these difficulties at once faced. I cannot see any merit in half measures, and it appears to me that the troubles have been magnified, and on closer examination will disappear. At any rate, if we only grasp the nettle-if this is a difficult subject or a troublesome one-firmly, we shall do no harm. I shall be found supporting my hon. friend's motion if he presses it to a division.

Mr. GRANT:

I have much pleasure in supporting the arguments of my hon. friend Mr. Walker in regard to the Commonwealth taking over the railways, but am not quite clear that he proposes the best way of putting it in the Bill. I rather think we missed our opportunity of having this matter of the railways before us in the proper form in clause 50. We should have given the Commonwealth power to deal with the railways in a sub-section of that clause. That clause at its best was very inconsequential, inasmuch as it only gave the control of the railways for military purposes to the Commonwealth. There is very little value in that, because if such control were necessary in time of war or great emergency the Federal Government would undoubtedly do all that was necessary to secure it; or at least it would satisfy itself that the railways would be temporarily managed in the best interests of the Commonwealth. I am very much impressed with the arguments of the Hon. Mr. McMillan as to the difficulty of dealing with the railway at the present time, but all things must have a beginning. I do not doubt that if we did arrange that the Commonwealth should take over the railways of all the colonies at the same time, the scheme would be found to work out to a satisfactory conclusion; but I think that the proper opportunity of giving the Commonwealth full powers to take over the railways, at any time it seemed fit to them to do so, was when we passed the 50th clause. Rather than lose the opportunity I will take advantage of that afforded by Mr. Walker's motion, specifying in this 67th clause that the railways should be under the control of the Commonwealth. I see an exception is made of the railways of Tasmania and Western Australia. The railways of Tasmania will always remain distinct systems to themselves. I do not think they will be prejudiced in any way by being controlled by a board of experts rather than the political officers of the State. It has been my lot in practically considering the working of the railways to find the baneful effect of the State interference therewith on many occasions. At a recent inquiry I was engaged in that was brought prominently before us, and I have no hesitation in saying that political and local influences are prejudicial to the working of the railways. Those influences should be abolished as far as possible. The railways should be worked as a commercial undertaking purely and simply, and although that would not prevent their being operated in connection with the real estate of the colony, still this should be subordinated to their working commercially in every respect. I believe that in the working of the New South Wales railways commercial principles have received more attention than in other colonies, and that the highly satisfactory results obtained is due thereto. I feel sure that if the railways were under the federal control of a central power they would all be made to pay their own way, and conduce to the benefit of the Commonwealth in every respect, and they would be worked in a more profitable manner. I have very small hope of the inter-State railways being worked satisfactorily in regard to differential or preferential rates, unless they are federated, or until a system is adopted for pooling the receipts. Federation of the railways would be far the better course. I hope we may look forward to the federation of railways in the near future. I quite agree with previous speakers that the debt of all the States also should be consolidated at the same time that the railways are taken over. A very large portion of that debt was incurred for the construction of railways, and it seems a sound-principle, that when the liabilities are handed over, the assets should also at the same time be parted with. I agree with Mr. Walker's motion to add the railways to the 67th clause, but I would rather it had appeared as a subsection, and been more fully dealt with in the 50th clause.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The proposition for the federalising of our railway systems came in the first instance from New South Wales-from certain leading members of its delegation. It therefore commanded general attention. But to-night we have heard from the Premier of New South Wales a peremptory assurance that any such project would not, in his opinion, be taken into consideration by the people of New South Wales, and that its adoption here would prejudice the fate of the draft Commonwealth Bill. That assurance has been, in more moderate terms, endorsed by another high and independent authority from the same colony—the Hon. Mr. McMillan. We are also greatly pressed for time. Under these circumstances I cannot but feel that the question of federalising the railways has become for the present rather theoretical than practical and that it is unnecessary to detain this Convention with any observations upon it. I have already admitted the extent to which my mind has been swayed, and my opinions materially modified by the further consideration of this proposal, afforded during the sittings of the Convention. I have not yet been enabled, on a question of such magnitude and complexity, to arrive at a final opinion; but the whole bias of my mind at present is in favor of the proposition submitted by Mr. Walker. If it were pressed to a division I should vote for it, with a view to its further consideration; but with a view to its further consideration only. For after the distinct avowal of Mr. Reid and Mr. McMillan, it seems to me, I will not say fruitless and I will not say hopeless, but at all events unnecessary to endeavor to grapple with this great problem in detail, as if we were now endeavoring to arrive at a fixed determination upon it. This question will come up again perhaps at the adjourned meeting of this Convention.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I regret very much that this matter to which the hon. Mr. Walker has given so much time, labor, and attention should have to be dealt with in so thin a House, and at so late an hour at night. Only that it has been rescued from inattention by the utterances of Mr. McMillan, Mr. Symon and Mr. Deakin, I should think that one would be treating this debate as almost a piece of amusement rather than a piece of work. I am not quite sure whether a piece of amusement is the correct expression under the circumstances. The more I think about this subject the more I think that if you federate without the railways being taken over you are like playing Hamlet with Hamlet left out. I think these railways are the arteries of our continent, and in place of having the arteries ministering to the system of Australia as one whole we have a miserable wretched system of each colony trying to manage its own arterial system and ministering only to one centre of itself. I feel that this is not merely a question of break of gauge being awkward, it is not a question of preferential or differential rates being awkward, but the question is more important to the whole of Australia than any other question can possibly be. The analogy of posts and telegraphs Mr. Symon has referred to. What possible ground can there be for federating posts and telegraphs in all their ramifications which cannot be applied also to the railways? I should like to treat them as we should treat the rivers. I say you cannot treat the main rivers of Australia independently of their tributaries, and neither can you treat the main trunk lines independently of their tributaries. Just as the Murray watershed has to drain a huge area comprising three colonies practically-perhaps it may be more-so I say that this railway system of Australia must be dealt with as one whole. It is equally absurd for any colony to insist upon any tributary or any river in Australasia as belonging to that colony exclusively, and to treat subsidiary lines apart from trunk lines. You cannot sever the principle of a trunk line, as you cannot sever the principle of a river from its feeding streams. I feel that we are losing a chance which we will not have so soon again, of showing a true federal spirit, and we are not treating rivers and railways on that broad federal basis upon which they should be treated. The opportunity is going, and will be gone presently because we cannot make up our minds to break down that wretched system of trying to bring the most trade into one district or other of the colonies. There can be no proper regulation of the rates so as to benefit Australia as a whole, and there can be no proper regulation of the construction of railways so as to prevent the terrible waste of money, as well as the prevalence of a painful feeling which should be obliterated. Roads and bridges are radically different from railways. A railway is a road and a bridge is part of a road. Roads and bridges are more of a local character, and can be dealt with by local authority for local interests. You cannot, however, treat railways in the same way. It may be that Victoria has got no interest in the road which runs between Sydney and the Glebe, but it has got an interest in the railroads. A great deal, in fact too much, has been made of the break of gauge question. No doubt it is important to have one gauge, but I think our military authorities have overstated the case. There might be a delay of an hour or two in the transhipment of troops, so they say. The chances are so infinitesimal of troops being required to be mobilised, and of any troops, if mobilised, being seriously delayed, that I hope we shall in this matter, of the break of gauge not incur any huge expense upon the mere advice of military men, but look at the matter as men of common sense ourselves. I think the proposal to appoint an Inter-State Commission an important one.

The CHAIRMAN:

Does the hon. member think this is relative to the issue?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think it is. My hon. friend Mr. Walker says you must give the railways wholly over to the Commonwealth. No railway ought to be constructed without the sanction of the Commission. In Victoria we have excellent work done by our railway board; and no line can be constructed without its auction. I suppose we shall be told that we are talking quixotically, while Mr. Reid will no doubt say, as he does of every argument he wishes to dispose of, that it is academical; but I feel strongly on this that we are losing a grand chance because we are not sufficiently federal in feeling yet, but the Inter-State Commission I hope will deal not only with the question of rates, but also with the question of construction. I shall therefore, if Mr. Walker goes to a division, feel it to be my duty to vote with him. If I felt it would endanger the prospects of Federation I would not, but I do not think it will.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I shall not detain the Committee more than a few Minutes, because I feel it is unnecessary to repeat what other members have said; but I wish to call attention to a matter not fully considered. It has been alleged that now is not the proper time to consider this question, because it is fraught with difficulties, and that we must wait until some future time when the matter can be more opportunely dealt with. It seems to me that this is not a statesmanlike way of dealing with the difficulty. When we have a difficulty to meet it should be grappled with at once and dealt with in a businesslike way; but is it businesslike to shelve the question on the arguments advanced? Because it is surrounded by complications should we discuss it in such an unworthy fashion? When we look at the history of the railways since 1852 we see that it has resolved itself into a question of six or seven different systems of management, and that the break of gauge difficulty is entirely due to the absence of any uniform system. If members will examine Coghlan's work they will see how the break of gauge arose, and the cause which brought it about.

Mr. Howe:

Between Melbourne and Sydney.

Sir William Zeal:

And this colony also. With regard to what has been said in respect to taking over the railways, do members not know that the problem which the Premiers are now discussing in another Chamber arises from the railway difficulty, and that had the railways and the State debts been taken over it would be unnecessary for their conferring together? There is no more difficult subject than that of controlling either the Customs or the railways. When we reflect that we have over our State railways three most experienced men capable of grappling with the subject, if the railways were taken over by the Federal Government there would be no necessity to divest them of their local management, but specially difficult matters might be referred to the Federal Government for settlement. The question of preferential and differential rates and the unnecessary and ruinous competition for traffic arises out of the competition of the State railways, and how are we going to grapple with the question unless the Federal Government takes them over? The Inter-State Commission cannot grapple with it. If the steamboat proprietors desire to evade the Act it will only be necessary for them to make some private arrangement, and that will entirely thwart the wishes of the Federal Government.

Mr. Higgins:

Would not this happen in a Federation of the railways also?

Sir William Zeal:

No; it would not arise if the railways were federated and taken over by the Central Government. As to the commercial aspect of the case the advantages are manifest. Let members examine the railway returns which have been published by the Government of New South Wales and they will find that after paying working expenses our State railways returned upwards of £2,913,778 for the year 1896, and that the net revenue of these railways for 1897 will considerably exceed £3,000,000. If these railways could be dealt with by the Federal Government we should do away with localism or that parochialism which in Victoria, at all events, has been the great curse of our present railway system. The more difficult you make it for public men to interfere with departments like the railways the less abuses there will be. As it is Ministers are constantly troubled by representations made to them by interested persons for the advancement of their friends holding office in our State railways. The larger the service the more difficult that will be. Moreover, members must know that there is a desire amongst the different colonies to introduce a cheaper system of railway construction, and surely that should be under some well-ascertained system, which should receive the support of the railway authorities. It will be necessary that some general arrangement be given effect to by the representatives of the three great railway systems. I quite agree that there is little probability of Mr. Walker's amendment being carried, but that does not lessen the duty of those who believe in it voting for the principle, which will do more than anything else to make Federation an undoubted success.

Mr. GLYNN:

We are certainly indebted to Mr. Walker for the study he has made of this question, and although he has not spoken at length in Committee he has compiled a number of facts which have been very helpful to members who have discussed the matter in private. He has also had drafted under his own advice a series of clauses, which, if the Convention would favor the adoption of this policy, would enable it to be put into effect. I would remind members of this fact that the question of the gauges was mentioned as far back as 1857, when the matter of the Federation of the colonies was discussed in England, and it was recommended that there should be uniformity in the gauges of the railways in the colonies, so that as far as I can gauge the opinion of the Convention there has been a retrogression in public opinion. In 1889 I tabled a motion in the South Australian Legislature regarding the assimilation of the railway gauges in the colonies. I suggested then that the Railway Commissioners should decide what the gauge should be, and that it should be declared by Act of Parliament that that should be the gauge of the future, and that any rolling-stock ordered in the future should be so constructed as to allow of alteration for that gauge. That was carried here, but except in New South Wales, little attention was paid to the subject. I would remind Mr. Higgins that the question of adopting a uniform gauge does not altogether receive its importance from its efficacy for military purposes. That is a subordinate one, and one, judging from the possibilities of Australia, we need not pay much attention to. We are more industrial than aggressive, and will not probably be called into defensive action for many long years to come. It has been shown by Mr. Eddy and English authorities that by the establishment of a uniform gauge a saving can be effected, a saving that would pay the interest.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If you can show that, by all means do it.

Mr. GLYNN:
I can refer the hon. member to the facts in print on this point, which I think will lead him to the conclusion at which I have arrived. A very great saving can be effected by this. As regards the rolling-stock, the Great Western railway had a gauge of 7ft. 3in. or 7ft., and they changed it to the standard gauge of the world-the 4ft. 81/2in.-and some of the existing rolling-stock was used. If it is possible there with such a difference in the gauge I say it would be possible to use the rolling-stock at present used for the 5ft. 3in. gauge on the 4ft. 81/2in. If you carry out Mr. Eddy's idea and have a uniform gauge of 4ft. 81/2in. in them, the work of converting all our lines to one uniform gauge can be brought about in a week. It has been said that if you take over the debts you should take over the railways. I think too much is said of the dependence of the debts on the railways, and I cannot see the connection between them. If you take over the debts I think you must buy the railways on the principle of giving a certain number of years of purchase for the net profits of the railways. A suggestion made by the Commission of the House of Lords was that power should be taken to purchase the railways at twenty-five years. The purchase must be altogether distinct from taking over the debts. In taking over the debts we do not take them as a set-off against the railways. It would be utter folly also to say that when you take over the Customs revenue you must, as an exact set-off, take over the debts. That would be exceedingly stupid, seeing that the interest on the debts and Customs duties do not bear any relation to one another. It this motion of Mr. Walker's fails we are necessarily driven back on the principle of adopting this Inter-State Commission. I am sorry evidence was not taken by the Finance Committee about taking over the railways. They took evidence of Mr. Eddy and the other Commissioners, but the moment Mr. Eddy started to give his evidence as to vesting he was stopped by the chairman and told that they had decided the railways were not to be taken over. It seems to be rather curious that they should first decide without evidence what should be done. On the question of vesting the Committee decided first and then declared that, under the circumstances evidence was unnecessary, and limited themselves merely to the possibility of control. The Committee should have taken evidence as to the expediency of vesting railways from the points of view of-first, more economic working; secondly, the abolition of preferential rates; thirdly, the abolition of differential rates which are in effect preferential; fourthly, the saving of capital expenditure on political lines; and fifthly, the probability or otherwise of lines of development, not at once or directly productive, being constructed. They might also have gone into the efficacy, as an alternative, of control by a Federal Act. They limited themselves to control, and did not examine as to the working in America and England. If they had had the evidence of the experts it would have helped to decide between the two alternatives now before us. The Committee found that preferential rates are injurious to the States—a fact patent as noonday—that differential rates may be necessary for a development—they might also have deduced that—and that differential rates may be in effect preferential. Now, as regards the new departure suggested to this Committee, I would impress upon hon. members that this principle of control has broken down in practice in England and America. The new departure is expensive. You will have to create a body of men to whom you will have to pay substantial salaries. There is the initial expense. There must be men of considerable competency, and they must be able to find out what will be a fair return upon railway capital. That has been stated in England to have been a difficulty—the failure of the Board of Trade to settle rates properly.

Mr. BARTON:
How are we ever to get on?

Mr. GLYNN:
This question of railways has been raised now. The only possible alternative to taking over vested railways is the adoption of the interState Commission. Though this Convention is not going to settle this question of the purchase of railways, there is the referendum to be considered, and it is perhaps as well to educate public opinion upon this vital question. The report of the Lords and Commons Committee presented in 1872, said that up to that time:

The Acts passed in consequence of these reports contained nothing which had any effect in checking and regulating monopoly.

They were all passed for the purpose of interfering with certain rights which had worked prejudicially to the public interests, all of which were exercised by the railway companies. A Railway Commission was then appointed similar in character to the one proposed to be appointed under this Bill, and that Commission was in three years found to fail in its work. Then the control of the railways was vested in the Board of Trade, but in the face of that there were over eighteen reports presented by committees appointed to get over the difficulties the Board of Trade was unable to check. In 1872, a report of a Committee of the House of Lords stated, after making a recommendation in favor of the amalgamation of various lines on the principle that you may more economically work and more efficiently control the railways if they are amalgamated:

It is generally easy to show that the public will gain largely by harmonious arrangements; and considering how doubtful is the extent of competition, or of the facilities it produces, the balance of advantage to the public, as well as to the shareholders, may often well be thought to be on the side of amalgamation.

I stated that the Inter-State Commerce Commission is a failure. There is a book on the subject, published in 1890 by Boneham, on "Railway Secrecy and Trusts," and, after going into the various attempts through legislative control that were made to check the working of the public railways in America against the public interest, he states:

Notwithstanding the latest efforts of the Inter-State Commerce Commission to preserve equal rights to competitors, the Standard Oil Trust is now effectually obstructing refiners of Pittsburg and the interior in their efforts to get to the seacoast to reach the consumer.

Now, I will just allude to the head of one of the chapters, because I do not want to load the subject too much with quotations. The head to which I allude to is "The Impossibility of Reforming the Inherent Evil of Railway Management by those in Control of the Railways." The chapter, then, is an extension of the note to the effe

The vices of railway management lurk, then, in secrecy-in organised secrecy: for the secrecy is part of a system whereby a corporate franchise, conferred by the citizens for their benefit, is operated for unlawful ends. Dishonesty, born, of this secrecy, is an essential part of the system. I say it is an essential part, because it has become a prime condition for success in the rivalry among the different corporations.

Again the writer states:

The inter-state commerce legislation which Congress has thus far enacted does not furnish the power necessary for reaching the secret practices of the railway managers, which it was the object of the legislation to expose and to prevent. Indeed, it has not proven even sufficient to extract here and there in specific cases that information which was necessary for the determination of such cases.

I could point to quotation after quotation to the very same effect, but I think I have shown sufficiently at all events that the efficacy of an Inter-State Commerce Commission cannot be accepted without the evidence of its working. A suggestion has been made that the railways should be worked in connection with the rivers. Let me just quote upon the question of river traffic the report of an engineer, Mr. Gordon:

Inland navigation, after having for some time been almost at a standstill owing to the rapid extension of railways, has of late years exhibited a revival in both England and more especially on the Continent, its numerous advantages, more especially the low cost of haulage and of maintenance, enabling it to contrast favorably with railway traffic. When a river is canalised, and the navigation, is independent of floods and drought, the one great advantage of railway communication-its regularity-disappears, while the capacity of a canal is much greater. The total cost of carriage on a canal or navigable river decreases in a far greater ratio with the increase of traffic than does that by railways.

In the Contemporary Review for April, 1891, General Hamley writes upon railways and canals as systems of traffic-

The CHAIRMAN:
Does the hon. member think that has anything to do with the question?
Mr. GLYNN:
Yes; it has been said that the best way is to take over the railways and work them in connection with our rivers.
Mr. BARTON:
Wherever a railway can carry is not too remote from the question.

Mr. GLYNN:
I shall finish the quotation, and then finish, and then the hon. member's impatience may cease.

Fifteen years ago it would scarcely have been disputed that canals must give place to railways. The teaching of to-day is, however, quite different. There is a widespread belief that inland water carriage may compete successfully with railways, and a general desire to bring the former mode of transit into more extensive use. It has in fact been found advisable, even where railway communication already exists, to contract lines of navigation or to improve rivers, at a cost of from £7,000 to £11,500 per mile.

I think I have said sufficient to show that a very strong case can be made out, on account of its manifest advantages and the difficulty of getting an advantageous alternative scheme, for the adoption of Mr. Walker's amendment. This is a big question which ought to be properly faced; I know it raises a great many difficulties, but we are sent here to face a big task.
Mr. WALKER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. GLYNN:
And we should face it with the fortitude and grasp of statesmen, and not consider it from the standpoint of timid and temporising politicians.

Mr. ISAACS:
While personally indebted to Mr. Walker for introducing this question, I must say I think it would have been better to defer it, because until we have discussed the question of the finances, and know what conclusion has been arrived at by the Premiers and Treasurers, and until we have positive information as to whether we shall be able to properly arrange so as to have no preferential or differential rates, we shall not be in a position to say definitely whether we are prepared to hand over the railways to the Federal Government. I for my part consider that provided you can permit the Federal Government to have sufficient transport arrangement for Commonwealth purposes, and also prevent a war of cut-throat tariffs, you will have done all that is necessary for the present.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS:
And the railways of this country, we should recollect, are in many cases constructed and used for internal development, for putting the people on the land and keeping them on the land, and other State reasons of local concern; those are questions outside the object of Federation. After considering these matters I am not prepared to vote, at the present moment at all events, for handing over the railways to the Federation, and I feel sure for the people of Victoria that they would hesitate very long before consenting to transfer the railway System to the Commonwealth Government. I shall, therefore, be compelled to vote against the proposal of my hon. friend.

Question so resolved in the negative.
Clause agreed to.
Clause 68-Powers under existing law to be exercised by Governor-General, with advice of Executive Council.
Clause read and agreed to.
Clause 69-The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in one Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other courts as the Parliament may from time to time create or invest with federal jurisdiction. The High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice, and so many other Justices, not less than four, as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I desire to move: To strike out of lines 7 and 8, the words "Not less than four."

My reason is that there seems to me no good reason for tying the hands of the Federal Parliament so as to insist that there are to be five judges at the very onset. In your good sense three judges may be sufficient; four judges may be sufficient. But here is a hard and fast rule to be laid down at the very outset of the Federation that there must be five judges.

Mr. ISAACS:
Had we not better take a night to consider that?

Mr. BARTON:
We will never get through the Bill unless we make some progress.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
The Court of Appeal in New South Wales consists of four judges. Surely if there is anything you can trust the Federation on it is as to the number of officers. Here, when dealing with Cabinet Ministers, we did not say that there shall be seven, but that the number should not be more than seven. In this section, however, a minimum is fixed. The court is to have five judges. If five judges are necessary they will be appointed -that is a certainty. I quite agree that five judges may be necessary, but if we can do with four let us do so. Why insist on the Federal Government employing five judges?

Mr. SYMON:

I do not think this is an occasion for any very inflammatory speech, but surely there can be no particular reason for having less than four judges, which was the number originally fixed in the Bill of 1891. I do not put that forward as part of the compact—in fact, my own view originally was that the number should not be less than two. But it has been pointed out that appeals will come to this court—it is intended to make it an appellant court—and it seems to me therefore that four would be a fair minimum, and that we should adhere to that number. I was not at first disposed to fix the minimum at more than two, but arguments have been advanced which satisfy me and may satisfy the Convention that four would be a better minimum to fix than two.

Mr. WISE:

This matter was very fully discussed in the Judicature Committee and the reasons urged there were briefly these: that it is of the very greatest importance that this court should be a court of dignity, a court whose decisions should carry weight, and a court suitable to review the decisions of the courts of any colony.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

Cannot you trust the Federal Government to do it?

Mr. WISE:

The hon. member who interjects that question can hardly fail to have noticed the very great distinction between the provisions of clause 69 and the Bill of 1891 in that particular. The whole object of the Judicature Committee in drafting these clauses in regard to the High Court has been to make the High Court in all essential parts independent of Parliament.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

You have not made it independent, as the section reads:

And so many other Justices as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe.

Mr. WISE:

The hon. member did not hear me. I said in all its essential characteristics it was to be independent of Parliament; that is to say, it comes into existence by the Constitution and not by Act of Parliament, and the same instrument which brings it into existence as a court in the opinion of those who formed the Committee ought to prescribe that on its coming into existence it shall be of sufficient number to worthily uphold the dignity of the Commonwealth, and to be a fit body to which appeals shall be brought from the Courts of the Commonwealth, and also promise that it shall not be competent for Parliament to reduce its members below the limit of efficiency. We cannot close our eyes to the fact that in the future controversies may arise between Parliament and the court, and it is therefore desirable that there should be no power left to reduce the efficiency of the court by reducing its numbers below what should be sufficient to inspire respect. In the Full Courts in Victoria there are sometimes six judges, and it is quite possible that their decision, sitting in the Full Court, might be upset by the Federal High Court, consisting of only three members.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I have never known of that happening.

Mr. WISE:
I have known of similar cases in our own colony where seven judges sit.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It does happen.

Mr. WISE:
Is there a member of this Convention who would say that three was a sufficient number to hear appeals from any court in this colony?

An HON. MEMBER:
Yes.

Mr. WISE:
I am surprised to hear that. If we want to get a powerful court, and if we want to have a sufficient number of capable men to inspire respect, I hope this will be left as it is, and let us not leave it in the power of Parliament to improperly reduce its numbers.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. We at any rate have to consult the interests of the colony, and we have to see that the Federal Judiciary and the Federal Government generally are not extravagant and beyond our means, and it is a great mistake on our part to insert anything in our Constitution which will involve us in any larger expenditure than is necessary. For that reason I cordially support the motion to strike out these words.

Mr. SYMON:
My hon. friend Mr. Wise has gone into the many reasons which actuated him in influencing myself in agreeing to the number being fixed at four in the Constitution. There was another thing that influenced me, to which he has not adverted. We are fixing the establishment of the court by the Constitution, and the court is to exercise high functions and powers under that Constitution. Under clause 70 it is provided:

The Justices of the High Court and of the other courts created by the Parliament:

I. Shall hold their offices during good behavior.

II. Shall be appointed by the Governor-General, by and with the advice of the Federal Executive Council:

III. May be removed by the Governor-General with such advice, but only upon an address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same Session praying for such removal:

IV. Shall receive such remuneration as the Parliament may from time to time fix; but such remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

If we intend to establish a strong court I take it that it will be so formed as to inspire confidence, and if the element of numbers is to be taken into consideration we ought to fix that number by the Constitution; otherwise Parliament might. We cannot tell what may happen in the future.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

What will they wish to do?

Mr. SYMON:

That involves another question as to the powers to be given. We give them sufficient work to do, but if we are to establish a strong court, and one that should be beyond the reach of Parliament, we should fix it by the Constitution. This is the reason which convinces me that it is desirable to have the number fixed at four. The Federal Supreme Court of the United States is an entirely irremovable body. It is appointed during good behavior, and there is no power on the part of the Congress to remove any part of it. Here we are introducing into the Constitution and in relation to the judiciary that which belongs properly to a unified Government, viz., the power of removal of the judges, which does not exist where the system is most perfect, in the United States. I desire to point out that if you want to have a strong court to discharge the functions which the Constitution imposes upon it, and it is to be beyond the reach of the Parliament, you should fix by the Constitution the number and strength you desire it to possess. I am satisfied that must have been the reason which actuated the framers of the Bill in 1891 in fixing four in addition to the Chief Justice as constituting the court, and I think the Committee will do well to adhere to the four fixed in the Constitution, leaving it to the Federal Parliament to make the number as many more as they think fit, subject to the power of removing them at any time.

Mr. DOBSON:

While I agree with Sir Edward Braddon that we should do everything to keep down the expenses of the Federal Parliament, I think the High Court is the one exception to the rule.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Lawyers again.

Mr. DOBSON:

It is something far above the lawyers. It is the rights and protection of the citizens. Mr. Wise has pointed out that this judiciary is an inherent part of the Constitution, and I would remind members that it is to be the interpreter of the Constitution. If America is to be any guide, the High Court there gives decisions on the most vital and important questions between the States and the Commonwealth, and considering that the bench of New South Wales consists of seven judges, and the bench of Victoria consists of six or seven, and that sometimes the decisions are given by five judges, I think that as this High Court is to be a Court of Appeal and the interpreter of the Constitution, it would to some extent belittle the court if you had to take a case from five strong judges in New South Wales or Victoria to even three eminent judges of the Federal Court. Hon. members will at once see that if this is to be a court of appellate jurisdiction and to interpret the Constitution, you cannot be penny wise and pound foolish. Members will notice that we have taken away the right of the private citizen to appeal to Her Majesty the Queen in Council, and an appeal is only given where a matter of public interest is concerned. I do not believe in that, as I think you have no right to take away that power of appeal on the part of a private citizen, and the argument against it is that you want to make the High Court eminent, and one to command the respect and confidence of the citizens; but if it wins that respect which I am sure it will, no one will want to appeal to the Privy Council, except one case in a hundred, and in that case the right should not be taken away. If you take it away you must keep up the number of judges of the High Court, and for that reason I hope the amendment will not be passed.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I only wish to reply to those hon. members who have treated this amendment to a considerable amount of argument. I confess I am influenced by those arguments, but they have not been convincing. All that they say goes to show that it is necessary that the Court should be a dignified body and one of sufficient numbers as to be able to properly perform the work, but these are matters which will equally commend themselves to the Federal Parliament as they do to this Convention.

Mr. WISE:

Perhaps the Court is in conflict with the Parliament.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I ask members how it is that they leave it to the Federal Parliament to fix the remuneration of the judges, which is a far more important matter than the numbers of the judges.

Mr. WISE:
We have not left it to the Parliament once the remuneration is fixed.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
We are trusting the Federal Parliament to fix the remuneration from time to time, or when a vacancy occurs they can fix it at £10, which would destroy the Constitution.

Mr. WISE:
But do you think they would do that?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I do not wish to be compelled to tell my constituents that we are binding the Federal Parliament to a lavish expenditure on what the people do not well tolerate. The people do not care about a large expenditure on law and lawyers.

Mr. SYMON:
This is not an expenditure on law and lawyers, but on the administration of justice, which is a very different thing.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
It is not a popular expenditure.

Mr. GLYNN:
It is in this colony.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You should not be rounding on the profession.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
As far as my constituents are concerned I should not like to go back and tell them that by a hard and fast rule we have fixed the number of judges, all of whom will be receiving large Salaries. The people may think that they are required, but we can leave it to the Federal Parliament to decide this question. I say there are other matters far larger and of far greater importance which have been left to the Federal Parliament than a matter of this kind involving the appointment of officers about whose utility or whose good work we have no judgment at all. Supposing it is found after these judges have been appointed for two years that there is not enough work to keep them going, then we find that Parliament would be tied up by this Act and could not reduce the number. Then if the Constitution is to be altered a motion must be passed by a majority of both Houses, and a referendum of the people taken. I intend to push the matter to a division.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
If all these things happen, and supposing the judges have nothing to do, I should still think it was absolutely necessary to have a very strong bench. What I understand to be practically at the bottom of this is that the hon. member does not see the necessity of a Federal Supreme Court at all.

Mr. Carruthers:
I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. Barton:
The hon. member said so during the election.

Mr. Carruthers:
That is incorrect.

Sir John Downer:
I can see the impatience against having a protection of this Constitution. That is what it is. This is a court by analogy similar to the American court, which is to take care that the Constitution is protected. It is no paltry question of lawyers and lawyers' fees.

Mr. Wise:
The lawyers are giving up more money than anyone else in coming to this Convention.

Sir William Zeal:
They are taking up more time, too.

Sir John Downer:
If the Constitution is to have stability we must take care of this court that protects the Constitution. Look at its power. Both Houses may pass an Act, and the court can upset it if it is unconstitutional. Surely if a court is to have such excessive power it must be strong in numbers.

Sir William Zeal:
How does that strengthen the court?

Sir John Downer:
Does my hon. friend think that the Legislature which is being over-ruled would be equally satisfied whether one judge decided the point or whether eight or ten decided it? And does he think that one man would resist popular pressure as a phalanx of eight or ten would?

Sir William Zeal:
Yes.

Mr. Higgins:
I feel there are strong arguments in favor of having five judges, and it is very important that this court and its decisions shall be respected, and if the judgments be final, the decisions should be the finding of a big court. Those are good arguments to be addressed to the Federal Parliament, but not to be addressed to us. The question is whether we shall make it a rule that they shall appoint five judges. I am not at all impressed by the argument that the Federal Parliament may perhaps be at loggerheads with the Bench. Supposing it is, what happens? The Federal Parliament can, if it thinks fit, pass an address to remove a judge.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We will consider that when we come to it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think we are entitled to consider it as it stands now. The position is that to be considered as it stands now. The position is that anyone can be removed upon an address without showing cause.

Mr. SYMON:
You must have four judges.

Mr. HIGGINS:
They can remove one man and put another in his place. We must not be impressed with the argument that there will be a quarrel between the Commonwealth and the judges, because if they quarrel with a judge they can by address remove him and put another in his place. The second thing is that if there is a vacancy in the bench by death or resignation the Federal Parliament, if it wants to lower the status of the judges can reduce the pay of the next judge who fills the vacancy, and so on. I think we must trust the Federal Parliament in this thing. I find that in this House, as soon as it suits an hon. member to trust the Federal Parliament he does so, and as soon as it does not suit him, he says, do not trust them.

Mr. BARTON:
That seems to cut very much both ways.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Perhaps it does. But before we know the amount of business to be done by the judges are we going to fix the number of judges? For years after the United States Constitution was formed only a few cases arose affecting the Constitution.

Mr. WISE:
Then they had no original jurisdiction.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes; and we have in addition appellate jurisdiction, but we have no more appellate jurisdiction than the Privy Council. There are very strong reasons given for having five judges, but we should leave those reasons to be worked out by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. PEACOCK:
I have taken but very little part in connection with these debates, but my experience of the electors of Victoria is that, whilst they are desirous of seeing Federation an accomplished fact, and a reasonable Constitution framed by this Convention, they are particularly anxious to see a strong Court provided in the Constitution. In listening to my friends on the Judiciary Committee, I was particularly impressed with the view put forward by some speakers who have addressed the Committee to-night that it is absolutely essential that there should be a strong Court provided in the Constitution itself. I know well that the arguments Mr. Carruthers adduced, if put before the average body of electors in any one of our centres, would immediately make them think that we were increasing the expenditure; but everyone of us knows from his own experience that when any vacancy has to be filled in connection with the local Supreme Court any gentleman who accepts a position does so at great personal sacrifice. Then again, this court which is to be constituted should be placed in such a position that the very possibility of conflict between it and the Parliament should be provided against, and therefore it would be wise that there should be a strong, powerful court constituted.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Why not go for the four judges then?

Mr. PEACOCK:

The hon. gentleman knows that one of the chief inducements held out for the appointment of this court is, that there shall not be any necessity to go to the Privy Council, and I anticipate that a large amount of work will be placed before the court. It would not be right to neglect the possibility of conflict.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

Would there not be greater danger in sub-section 4, which allows the Parliament to fix the salaries of the judges?

Mr. PEACOCK:

I do not say it would not be desirable to make that sub-section stronger, but that is no argument against providing against a weak court. The case of the Transvaal Republic shows the necessity of having a strong court. Again-this is better known to the legal men-the Supreme Court of the United States had to deal with direct taxation, and say to Parliament that the law was ultra vires and could not pass. These contingencies may occur in our Commonwealth. It must be remembered that we are not legislating for the present only, but for years ahead.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It has been urged that all the arguments that have been submitted in favor of having a strong and dignified court are arguments that would appeal to the Federal Parliament, and that therefore we need have no concern. I respectfully submit that we have to submit this question of the Constitution to a jury, which under this Constitution is to be deprived of the right to appeal to the Privy Council, therefore we have to give that jury an assurance that in depriving them of the privilege that now exists we are giving them a court competent to do the work. That is an important consideration, and that comes before the Federal Parliament comes. For that reason we should fix in the Constitution the certainty that it will be a court worthy of respect. There is another aspect of the case. We are creating a Constitution in connection with which we are fixing all kinds of matters for protecting State rights; but, whatever we do, unless we provide a competent tribunal to act as custodian of the Constitution, the people will have doubts as to whether the Parliament will exceed the powers that were intended by the Constitution, and thereby curtail the State rights about which we are all so anxious. We want to create unification in a central body for specific purposes, but we are extremely anxious that the central body shall deal with nothing else but what we submit to it. Therefore, we shall have a strong and dignified custodian of the Constitution. I feel, as I have all along, that where you give you must trust the Federal Parliament, but you must give the people the assurance that, if you take from them a privilege that they now have and prize very highly indeed, they will have a court strong in numbers, strong in intellect, and dignified in its character.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
That should be left to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I agree that the Federal Parliament may be trusted, but I respectfully submit that before we have a Federal Parliament this Bill will go before the people of this continent, and when they see we are taking from them rights they now possess they will naturally ask what protection they are to have in substitution of the protection they now have in the Privy Council, and we shall be able to say to them, "Here is provision that, at any rate, there shall be a reasonably strong and competent tribunal to take the place of that of which we are depriving you"

Mr. KINGSTON:
I believe that for the safety of the Constitution we must have a High Court of Australia, and I think we should have one worthy of the name. At the same time I am inclined to think its dignity and reputation will not depend so much on its numbers as on the learning and integrity of the judges which constitute it. I do not, however, quite like the amendment suggested by Mr. Carruthers, which would strike out the words:

Not less than four, leaving it absolutely in the power of the Federal Parliament to do two things; the first, if there are five judges originally, to remove four of them, without cause shown; and secondly, if they appoint any successors to fix their salaries so low that they cannot secure judges worthy of the name, or refrain from making the appointments at all. I do not think that ought to be the position. I think we ought to strain to the utmost to give these judges absolute security of tenure as regards office.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. KINGSTON:

So long as they conduct themselves in the way in which the nation has a right to expect. And I put it most strongly that the construction as suggested by previous speakers, that on the mere passage of a motion by the two Houses of the Federal Parliament there should be power on the part of the Federal Executive to remove a judge of the High Court of Australia from his position, independent of any consideration as to whether be was incapable or misconducted himself, should not be allowed for one moment.

Mr. TRENWITH:

The two Houses of the Federal Parliament could not and would not do that.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Such a construction I am inclined to think is against the express terms of the Act. I pay considerable deference to the views of those by whom these clauses were framed, and I understand the contrary opinion to be held, and that, although in the first instance it is declared that a judge shall hold office during good behavior, yet notwithstanding there is no suggestion of misconduct or incapacity on his part, on the passing of an address by both Houses of Parliament he may be removed.

Mr. SYMON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. KINGSTON:

If this is so it is a direct contradiction of paragraph I of clause 70.

The CHAIRMAN:

I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to this clause. We will come to clause 70 directly.

Mr. KINGSTON:

It would be an absolute cutting out of the first paragraph of section 70. Undoubtedly the section ought to be so altered that the power to remove by address will be confined to cases of misconduct or incapacity on the part of the judge who holds that office. I trust that will be done. At the same time, though I favor economy, I do not think it will be a good thing to strike out the whole of these words because the court might be left in a position constituted of only the Chief Justice and one judge.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
It cannot be one.

Mr. KINGSTON:
It is proposed to strike out "not less than four."

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
And a Chief Justice.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I would not object if it was not less than two. As to the score of economy, I suppose the salaries of five justices would total £15,000 a year. It cannot be a less salary to each than the average salary of the various provincial Chief Justices.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
We pay ours £3,500.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I put that as a reasonable estimate. Reduce the numbers by two and you will put it in the power of the Federal Parliament to save 26,000 a year. This saving in two salaries of 26,000 is worthy of consideration, and if we cannot trust the Federal Parliament altogether it will be just as well to provide that there is an efficient High Court of Appeal, and you can constitute that with a Chief Justice and two judges. If Mr. Carruthers would bring in the amendment in the direction I suggest, which was evidently the original view of the Chairman of the Judicial Committee, I think that we will do what we ought to.

Mr. SYMON:
I must endorse the strong expressions to which the hon. member Mr. Kingston has given utterance against giving the right of removal of the High Court of Justice to the Federal Parliament.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That is the tenure of the office in Australia.

Mr. SYMON:
Indeed it is not.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
It is in Victoria.

Mr. SYMON:
The hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, was good enough on Saturday to show me the Constitution Act of Victoria, in which the judges are appointed during good behavior. Nevertheless they are liable to be removed by the vote of both Houses of Parliament. It is the same in our Constitution.

Mr. PEACOCK:

So a Government could say that there is not sufficient work for two, and ask for the removal of one.

Mr. SYMON:

I feel certain that in that Mr. Kingston is mistaken. Under clause 30 of our Constitution Act our judges are appointed during good behavior, and no power is given for the removal or the judges except by address to Parliament. The federal principle is-make the judges of the High Court once appointed irremovable. The High Court in its position should be equal to, if not above, the Parliament and Executive.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Irremovable except for misbehavior.

Mr. SYMON:

Most certainly.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Suppose there was corruption!

Mr. SYMON:

I do not know what you call that. I call it misconduct. Under the federal system rightly understood, the Judges of the High Court to be established ought to be appointed beyond the reach of Parliament. They ought to be placed in such a position that their pulses ought not to beat one atom faster in consequence of the animadversion or the efforts of any one party in Parliament. Therefore I agree with what has just been said as to the desirability of making them irremovable. For that reason I would ask Mr. Carruthers not to press his amendment, nor to accept the suggestion of Mr. Kingston. I do value what Mr. Trenwith has said on this question. If we abolish the Privy Council and confer on this court the right of determining these appeals, then we should have to go before the people and offer them something that is an equivalent. A court of three members is not an equivalent. It will neither inspire confidence nor have that dignity which we want to see associated with it. I admit that the main elements in any court are integrity, learning, and experience. But you want in addition to that numbers. One judge may not have the moral courage to decide great questions of State alone, but when he has others associated with him be will not be so influenced. I am sure that hon. members will feel that the amendment which has been so effectively supported by Mr. Wise for reasons which certainly convinced me is a right one, and that we ought to adhere to it.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
There is no Constitution in Australia like this, limiting the acts of Parliament.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

It appears to me that if Mr. Carruthers' amendment is carried it will not have the effect which its opponents say it will, because if the words he objects to are struck out it will not prevent the Federal Government from appointing six or seven judges if they are required. The section reads:

The High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice, and so many other judges, not less than four, as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe.

There is nothing therefore to prevent the Government from appointing a Chief Justice and five or more other justices. My hon. friend Sir John Downer has stated that numbers will constitute power, but I may tell the hon. member something he has probably forgotten. During the time of one of the most severe crises in Victoria-occurring under the McCulloch Government-and at the time of Mr. Higginbotham holding the office of Attorney-General in the strongest Government that has ever held office in Victoria-

Mr. PEACOCK:

Excepting the Turner.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I will not except the Turner Administration-the then Attorney-General had the misfortune to differ with Mr. Justice Molesworth, and the latter, though single-handed, would not be dictated to by the Attorney-General or the Government. Mr. Justice Molesworth persisted in his duty, and succeeded. Mr. Justice Molesworth showed the then Attorney-General that he was not to be dictated to, or to be prevented doing his duty.

Mr. SYMON:

You do not get Molesworths every day.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

If you have five or more judges I would give them a secure tenure of office. I also believe in paying efficient men good salaries, and I think these justices should have fixed salaries, which the Federal Parliament should not interfere with. The integrity and independence of the judges should be upheld, and not be interfered with by Government. If a division is taken I will vote for the striking out of these words.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We certainly ought to have three, and two others ought not to be objected to.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I think five judges are unnecessary, and that a Chief Justice and three other justices will be sufficient. Three judges form a Court of Appeal in Victoria and that is ample. Sir George Turner has constantly referred to the difficulties in ways and means in connection with this matter. Does he want to overload the Federal Government with a larger amount of expenditure than is necessary?

Question-That the words "not less than four," proposed to be struck out, stand part of the question-put. The Committee divided.

Clause, as read, agreed to,

HON. MEMBERS:
Report progress!

Mr. BARTON:

Let us take the next two clauses. This Bill will never be passed if we do not make greater progress. We have the crux of the matter yet to deal with in the financial clauses, and the Treasurers have retired to consider the question. I do not wish to coerce members, but I think we ought to go on with the Bill a little further.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I urge Mr. Barton to report progress. In the morning we have to consider the most important part of the measure, and we should be fresh, but if we are to stay here until 2 o'clock we cannot be fresh. The Treasurers have been considering that portion of the Bill, and they will want some little time to think over it by themselves. They have to meet again at 10 o'clock in the morning, Find it will be unfair to them to go on. We have been here since 10.30 on Monday morning, and it is now 12 o'clock, and surely that is long enough. If we sit later we shall not be in a fit state to properly consider the matters we have to in the morning.

Mr. BARTON:

I shall accede to the request. I do not wish to do anything in an arbitrary way, nor to try and enforce my views upon members, but if we do not make better progress than we have to-day then I say it was useless and cruel to make us sit on Saturday and to-day.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

Convention adjourned at 12.5 a.m.
Tuesday April 20, 1897.

Petition - Commonwealth of Australia Bill - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITION.

Mr. REID:

I have to present a petition requesting that a declaration should be made in the Constitution that no State in the Commonwealth should be allowed to make any law respecting religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. It is signed by 2,337 persons—839 from New South Wales, 1,269 from Victoria, 129 from South Australia, and 100 from Tasmania.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee (consideration resumed from April 19th).

CHAPTER III.

The Federal Judicature.

Clause 70-The justices of the High Court and of the other courts created by the Parliament:

I. Shall hold their offices during good behavior:

II. Shall be appointed by the Governor-General, by and with the advice of the Federal Executive Council:

III. May be removed by the Governor-General with such advice, but only upon an Address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same Session praying for such removal:

IV. Shall receive such remuneration as The Parliament may from time to time fix; but such remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Mr. SYMON:

I have a verbal amendment in the first line. I move:

To strike out the word "justices" with the view of inserting "judges."

This will restore it to the form adopted in the 1891 Bill.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I think "justices" is a very good word. We have not here, but they have in the other colonies district judges, and we use the word "justices" to indicate the judges of the High Court.

Mr. SYMON:

It is true that the word refers to the judges of the High Court, but there may be other Federal Courts, and those who preside over them will be known as judges. The generic word "judges" will be better although "justices," it is true, is the technical term.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I would treat the Federal Courts as courts of high dignity, and after all it is merely a question.

The CHAIRMAN:
The word justices is used in the 69th clause.

Mr. SYMON:
This is not exhaustive. This clause deals not only with the judges referred to in clause 69, but all judges by whatever designation they may be known.

Mr. WISE:
"Justices" is a far better word.
Amendment negatived.

Mr. SYMON:
I have an amendment which will shorten sub-section 2. I propose:
To strike out the words "by and with the advice of the Federal Executive Council," with the view of inserting the words "in Council."
Amendment agreed to; sub-section agreed to. Consequential amendment in sub-section 3.

Mr. GLYNN:
I think the whole of subsection 3 should be struck out with the object of rendering the judges irremovable except on impeachment. I do not propose to argue the matter at any length. I will only say this, that when the court was instituted in America it was stated in the Federalist that the permanency of the judiciary was the very citadel of public justice. It shows the necessity of having the Court secure above popular clamor and political influence. Wilson in his work on "Congressional Government says:
Then, too, the Supreme Court itself, however upright and irreproachable its members, has generally had, and will undoubtedly continue to have, a distinct political complexion taken from the color of the times during which its majority was chosen. The bench over which John Marshall presided was, as everybody knows, staunchly and avowedly federalist in its views; but during the ten years that followed 1835 federalist justices were rapidly displaced by democrats, and the views of the court changed accordingly. Indeed, it may truthfully be said that, taking our political history "big and large," the constitutional interpretations of the Supreme Court have changed, slowly, but none the less surely, with the altered relations of power between the national parties. The federalists were backed by a federalist judiciary; the period of democratic supremacy witnessed the triumph of democratic principles in the courts; and republican predominance has driven from the highest tribunal of the land all but one representative of democratic doctrine. It has been only during comparatively short periods of transition, when public opinion was passing over from one political creed to another, that the decisions of the federal judiciary have been distinctly opposed to the principles of the ruling political party.

I say, even with this safeguard in America, attempts have been made to influence the court, and, therefore, it is necessary to have this as a protection. Then let us go a little further. Wilson shows that attempts have been made to, what Webster calls, dilute the Constitution by adding additional judges to upset a previous decision. They even went to the length of endeavoring to deprive the Supreme Court of a portion of its jurisdiction when they found the judges did not fall in with the views of some of the representatives of Congress. In the United States and here, as members will see, if they refer to section 72, there is power to interfere with the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. According to that:

The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe.

"With such exceptions" gives the opening here. In America attempts have been made to take away the jurisdiction of the judges where the judges were not complacent to Parliament. Wilson says:

A Democratic Congress swept away, root and branch, the system of Circuit Courts, which had been created in the previous year, but which was hateful to the newly-successful Democrats because it had been officered with Federalists in the last hours of the John Adams' administration.

I think I have said sufficient to recommend this proposal. There was only one case in America where an attempt has been made to remove a judge, and that was in the case of Judge Chase in 1803.

Mr. HIGGINS: It has no meaning under our Act.

Mr. GLYNN: It has no meaning in America. You can impeach a judge for corruption or if his brain failed him. You leave it to the discretion of the two Houses of Parliament to remove a judge, but that power should not be put in their hand.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL: Is it dangerous to be connected with politics?

Mr. GLYNN: It should not be regarded as a danger to have the matter connected with politics; but there is the fear of having a repetition of what has occurred in America, and the likelihood is greater here than under the inception of the system there, because with the larger franchise, we are so subject to being swayed by popular opinion.

Mr. WISE:
I entirely sympathise with the object of this amendment, but I can see that if it is carried it will raise difficulties out of all proportion to the value of what my hon. friend seeks to obtain. In the first place, we have no provision for conducting impeachments under this Constitution. In the United States the Senate is expressly given power to hear impeachments. We have no machinery for conducting impeachment. It is a cumbrous process. The carrying of the amendment would necessitate the drafting of further clauses, and although that is no particular objection, because if it is desirable to make amendments nothing is to be gained by refusing to spend the requisite time in doing so. But I do not think it is so necessary as the hon. member imagines. The power of removing upon an address from both Houses for misbehavior is a power well understood by all English colonies. It is a part of the Constitution of New South Wales and of the Constitution of Victoria, and, speaking subject to correction, something of the same power exists here.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
And in Tasmania.

Mr. WISE:
Yes, and in Tasmania. We are all familiar with this practice, but we are not familiar with impeachment, and there is really no necessity to graft an entirely new procedure upon this Federal Constitution. There was one case of removal, either in Tasmania or in the early days in New South Wales.

Mr. KINGSTON:
And there was one here.

Mr. WISE:
The power was exercised, I believe, in both these cases for very serious faults, faults which would hardly have justified impeachment, because they did not come into the category of criminal acts, but there was no doubt that the judges were properly removed. If, however, it had been by impeachment, the court would have been compelled to have adjudged them not guilty, and to have retained them in their positions.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
That was before responsible government.

Mr. WISE:
Yes. I trust that the amendment will be rejected, and the clause retained as it is.
Mr. KINGSTON:

I think we should be at great pains to secure the absolute independence of the Judges of the Federal Court, particularly of the Judges of the High Court of Australia, who are intended to adjudicate on matters which may affect the Federal Executive and the Federal Parliament. To my mind we shall be committing a glaring mistake if we do not protect these judges from ill-considered action either by the Federal Executive or by the Federal Parliament. I note that the first paragraph of this section declares that:

The judges shall hold their office during good behavior.

That is a most excellent principle to lay down, and we should be very careful lest we introduce any provision which may have the effect of limiting the declaration to which I have referred. Now, although we have that declaration in paragraph 1, in paragraph 3 we have a provision which, if allowed to pass in the shape in which we find it in the section, will-and I understand that the Judiciary Committee so intended-have the effect of allowing a judge to be removed although his behavior is everything that could be desired.

Mr. WISE:

Certainly not.

Mr. KINGSTON:

That is what I understand.

Mr. SYMON:

That is not intended,

Mr. WISE:

It is not the effect of the provision, either.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I interjected an inquiry yesterday, and the information I received was of the character to which I have referred; and I have no doubt that if you pass the clause as it stands now that will be the effect. I am glad Mr. Wise did not intend it. Besides the first declaration that he shall hold office during good behavior, we have also this:

May be removed by the Governor in Council upon an Address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same Session, praying for such removal.

It strikes me that if you pass that the effect will be that on the address of both Houses a judge can be removed independently of whether or not he has been guilty, and that should not be so.

Mr. BARTON:

You must read sections 1 and 3 together.

Mr. KINGSTON:

You may, but we must make the thing as clear as clear can be. We should amend the clause. I move:
To strike out "may be removed" from subsection 3 and insert in lieu thereof "shall only be removed for misconduct, unfitness, or incapacity."

Mr. SYMON:
Substitute "misbehavior" for "misconduct."

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am inclined to think that that would require some active act on the part of the judge, and would not apply in a case where there was unfitness or incapacity, resulting from old age or some other similar cause. I want to protect the judges as far as ever I possibly can.

Mr. WISE:
Leave out "unfitness."

Mr. KINGSTON:
I think there are a class of cases in which this would be required. There is, for instance, a distinction drawn between unfitness and incapacity in the case of trustees. A trustee becoming insolvent-may be a case of unfitness, though not of incapacity. I agree entirely with the provision that the judges shall hold their offices during good behavior. I want paragraph 3 turned into a clause for the further protection of the judges, so that it shall not be a case in which the Federal Executive can act of their own mere motion, but they will have to consult Parliament on the subject; and there must be a consensus of opinion between the two Houses of the Federal Parliament and the Federal Executive that the judge in question has been guilty of misbehavior, or is unfit or incapable, and then, and then only, shall the power to remove be exercised. It seems to me that this is a matter of considerable importance, and I draw the attention of the Judiciary Committee to the fact that the clause as we had it in the Commonwealth Bill did not leave the same room for doubt as to whether this sub-section 3 was an active power that can be exercised on the mere motion of the Executive Council with the consent of the two Houses, independent of any misbehavior. In that Bill it was expressly declared, after the judges had been given a tenure of office during good behavior, that it should not be lawful for the Governor-General to remove any judge except upon the address of both Houses. It was an additional safeguard, and that is what we ought to require in connection with this particular case.

As regards the special form of the amendment, I commend the matter to the attention generally of the Convention, and particularly of the Judiciary Committee, and believe there will be a general desire on the part of the convention to do what it can to preserve intact the absolute independence of the judges, both in relation to the Federal Executive and the Federal Parliament; that they may have nothing to hope for, and nothing to fear either; and that in doing their duty they may feel secure in their office.

Mr. ISAACS:

I wish to point out that there is some danger of confusion in this matter. I think that if we just look at the present position of English and colonial judges it will be the best guide in this matter. There seems to be an apprehension that judges in England and in the colonies can only be removed for misbehavior. That is not so. Far back, up to 1688 or thereabouts, as shown by all the constitutional textbooks, judges were absolutely at the mercy of the Crown, held their positions at the pleasure of the Crown, and drew their salaries at the pleasure of the Crown; and that was felt to be such a wrong position of affairs that under the Act of Settlement in the year 1700 they received a distinct and firm position by which they held their office thereafter during good behavior, but with a proviso that they might be removed by the Crown upon an address of both Houses of Parliament. I want to point out to the Convention that they held their office under two conditions, which are preserved down to the present time. If they are guilty of judicial misbehavior in regard to their office, they may be removed without any vote of the Houses of Parliament at all; but it Parliament comes to the conclusion that, for reasons good and sufficient for Parliament, these judges ought to be removed, they may, without any judicial determination on the question of misbehavior, ask the Crown to remove them, and the Crown has power so to do. Now, I think if we take the position that the judges are not to be removed on the vote of the two Houses of Parliament, as suggested by my hon. friend, Mr. Glynn, we shall be making a very great mistake, because it will then always be a matter in dispute between the judge in the particular case and the governing power. I hope the circumstance will never arise, but if it should arise there would probably be a litigious contest between the judge and the governing power. The proviso that was inserted in the English Act and copied into our colonial Statutes, giving the Parliament the power by an address of both Houses to petition the Crown to remove a judge, was intended to get rid of these litigious proceedings. Of course we know Parliament would not do that unless there were good grounds. For instance, a judge might not be guilty of judicial misbehavior, but he might suffer such incapacity as to unfit him for the proper discharge of his high and important functions, and Parliament might have a case of this kind to deal with. In one portion of the British Dominions there was a case where a judge became deaf and eccentric, and unfit to carry out his duties; but he refused to go. He said that he had not been guilty of any judicial misbehavior; but a gentle hint was given him that unless he did resign Parliament would present an address to the Crown to remove him. He at once consented to resign, and if my memory serves me aright a very handsome pension was granted to him. If we introduce into this Bill any alteration from the present British practice of allowing Parliament the right in the highest interests of the nation at any particular juncture to petition the Crown to remove a judge, then I think we shall be making a very great mistake. It will bring upon us much possible litigation; but if Parliament comes to the conclusion—if not merely one, but both Houses, after serious and careful consideration think—that a judge ought to be removed, and they petition the Crown, and the Crown remove him, the judge may fight the matter out somewhere—I do not know where, but in the courts of law, I suppose—and if he were not guilty technically of misbehavior as a judge, he may defy the Parliament, the Crown, and the nation. That is a position which we ought not to court.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is a balance of risks which we might well take together.

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not know that any trouble has arisen during the nearly 200 years in which the British Constitution has adhered to its present practice. In the thirty-eighth section of the Victorian Constitution we have this provision:

The commissions of the present Judges of the Supreme Court, and all future judges thereof, shall be, continue, and remain in full force during their good behavior, notwithstanding the demise of the Queen or of her heirs and successors, any law, usage, or practice to the contrary hereof in anywise notwithstanding: Provided always that it may be lawful for the Governor to remove any such judge or judges upon the address of both Houses of the Legislatures.

So that a judge holds office subject to removal for two reasons—first, if he is guilty of misbehavior, and, secondly, if the Parliament thinks there is good cause to remove him, when they may petition the Crown to do so. We must trust the Parliament in the last resort, as representing the will of the people in that respect, for what the two Houses of Parliament would do would be equivalent to an Act of Parliament. I have referred to Todd, page 190, as laying down the rule I have alluded to, and at page 191 this is what he says:

"The legal effect of the grant of an office during 'good behavior' is the creation of an estate for life in the office." Such an estate is terminable only by the grantee's incapacity from mental or bodily infirmity or by his breach of good behavior. But, "like any other conditional estate, it may be forfeited by a breach of the condition annexed to it, that is to say, by misbehavior. Behavior means behavior in the grantee's official capacity. Misbehavior includes, first, the improper exercise of judicial functions; second, wilful neglect of duty, or non-attendance; and, third, a conviction of any infamous offence, by which, although it be not connected with the duties of his office, the offender is rendered unfit to exercise any office or public franchise."

Mr. HIGGINS:
Does that include ordinary unfitness?

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not know what is meant by ordinary unfitness.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That he is incapable, because of age.

Mr. ISAACS:
It continues:
"In the case of official misconduct, the decision of the question whether there be a misbehavior rests with the grantor, subject of course to any proceedings on the part of the removed officer. In the case of misconduct outside the duties of his office the misbehavior must be established by a previous conviction of a jury. When the office is granted for life by letters patent, the forfeiture must be enforced by a scire facias. These principles apply to all offices, whether judicial or ministerial, that are held during good behavior."

The legal accuracy of the foregoing definitions of the circumstances in which a patent office may be revoked is confirmed by an opinion of the English Crown Law Officers (Sir William, Atherton and Sir Roundell Palmer) communicated to the Imperial Government, in 1862, wherein it is stated, in reference to the kind of misbehavior by a judge, that "would be a legal breach of the conditions on which the office is held," that "when a public office is held during good behavior, a power of removal for misbehavior must exist somewhere; and when it is put in force the tenure of the office is not thereby abridged, but it is forfeited and declared vacant for non-performance of the condition on which it was originally conferred."

Then there are other technical observations which I pass over, and I come to page 193, where it is laid down:

But, in addition to these methods of procedure, the Constitution has appropriately conferred upon the two Houses of Parliament-in the exercise of that superintendence over the proceedings of the courts of justice which is one of their most important functions-a right to appeal to the Crown for the removal of a judge who has, in their opinion, proved himself unfit for the proper exercise of his judicial office.

Hon. members will observe that it is Parliament's opinion of the matter which is to be paramount.

This power is not, in a strict sense, judicial; it may be invoked upon occasions when the misbehavior complained of would not constitute a legal breach of the conditions on which the office is held. The liability of this kind of removal is, in fact, a qualification of, or exception from, the words creating a tenure during good behavior, and not an incident or legal consequence thereof. In entering upon an investigation of this kind Parliament is limited by no restraints, except such as may be self-imposed.

Then it goes on practically to say that of course Parliament would always regard the public welfare, and indeed no instance can be cited during the 200 years that this system has been in operation where Parliament has been actuated by a sudden impulse of public feeling or has been swayed by a political desire to bring pressure on any judge. In a matter of this kind it is highly important that we should not put in words which would prevent judges from being removed even by Act of Parliament. Otherwise it would simply be open to the judge on every occasion, though he was removed by both Houses of Parliament, to bring his action, possibly before his brother judges, or if he went to the Privy Council and established his case, however technical the point of success might be, he would come back, sit on the bench, and could not be removed. That is a state of things which we should not drift into. It is quite right that the judges should hold their offices for life and should have their independence carefully preserved, but it is highly important that there should also be preserved the power to the two Houses of Parliament to petition the Crown on the highest grounds of public welfare, and for the Crown to act upon that petition and remove the judge. I think it would be well if we should do here as is done in some Constitutions - our own and others - provide that the salary of the judges shall be beyond the reach of the annual appropriation.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is done.

Mr. SYMON:
There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Look at clause 4.

Mr. ISAACS:
I am not quite sure that it is done as effectively as it ought to be. The section says:

Shall receive each remuneration as the Parliament may from time to time fix; but such remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.
That in my opinion is not quite full enough. It is not an appropriation of it.

Mr. WISE:
It is in effect. It goes into Schedule A and cannot be touched.

Mr. ISAACS:
It has not gone as far as the colonial Constitutions. I think we would be making a very great mistake if we departed from the lines that have worked so well for nearly two centuries under the British Constitution.

Mr. SYMON:
I shall have the greatest pleasure in supporting the amendment to strike out the word "may," and to insert the word "shall."

The CHAIRMAN:
No; that is not the amendment. The amendment handed in to me is to strike out all the words down to "by" with a view of the insertion of the words "shall not be removed except for misbehavior, unfitness, or incapacity, and."

Mr. SYMON:
I have the greatest pleasure in supporting that amendment, with one exception, to which I shall refer, and it seems to me it will have the effect of setting at rest any doubt as to possibilities which may arise inimical to the independence of judges, or as to the control that Parliament may have over that independence under the sub-section as it stands. It seems to me that my hon. friend Mr. Isaacs is not quite accurate when he suggests that the Convention misapprehends the position that already exists in constitutional law regarding the position of judges. The misapprehension is on his own part in assuming that we are now dealing with the ordinary state of things which exists in the colonies and in England. He does not sufficiently discriminate between a Constitution in the unified state and a Federation. Now, the position of the High Court which is being established under Federation is entirely different in many respects from that which prevails in connection with the Supreme Court of the colony or the High Court in England. The Federal High Court is placed in a position to safeguard the liberties of the subject and the rights of the individual States against the encroachment of the Legislature. It is placed in a position in which its independence must be absolutely assured. Without attempting to take up the time of the Committee unduly I would like to read two sentences from one of those articles in the Federalist, which are even at this day wonders of constitutional learning and foresight upon this question.
Hamilton, in one of his articles on the federal judiciary, says:

If, then, the courts of justice are to be considered as the bulwarks of a limited Constitution against legislative encroachments, this consideration will afford a strong argument for the permanent tenure of judicial offices, since nothing will contribute so much as this to that independent spirit in the judges which must be essential to the faithful performance of so arduous a duty. The independence of judges is equally requisite to guard the Constitution and the rights of individuals from the effects of those ill humors, which the arts of designing men, or the influence of particular conjunctures, sometimes disseminate among the people themselves, and which, though they speedily give place to better information, and more deliberate reflection, have a tendency, in the meantime, to occasion dangerous innovations in the Government and serious oppressions of the minor parties in the community.

He goes on to elaborate that point with very great care, and he concludes by emphasising the fact that unless you have not only a powerful High Court but a High Court which shall be constituted under such a Constitution that it will maintain its fortitude under all conditions, you will damage what is really the keystone to the federal arch. If it is necessary to maintain the independence of the judges under a Constitution such as we have in the colonies, and I admit there are no instances so far as I am aware in which the power vested in the Parliament has been abused, we must guard not only against instances that may be likely to be founded upon some precedent, but against the possibility of abuse, and if these instances of abuse have not occurred, we may also say no instance has occurred except one in this colony, so far as I am aware, in which the power of the Parliament to remove a judge has ever been exercised. The occasions are rare in the extreme when judges have wished to retain their seats when incapacitated. I should like to call the attention of Mr. Isaacs to the arguments which were used with much force last night in connection with clause 69 and the number of judges to be appointed. It was then pointed out that if the clause stood and had the effect contemplated, the result might be that the Federal Parliament might defeat the object of the Constitution by removing some objectionable judge and putting some one else in his place. Mr. Higgins said, "What is the use of appointing four judges if, when they become objectionable, they can be removed and the bench packed" he did not use that word- "by others being put in their places." That argument, which was used with so much effect by Mr. Higgins, is a strong argument why we should not put it in the power of the Parliament to remove any of the four judges and substitute others who would be wholly amenable to the popular will. We have passed clause 69, and declared it is necessary to have a strong court with four judges, and we may defeat that by giving this power to the Parliament, which may be exercised to the detriment of the High Court. The amendment which has been proposed meets the difficulty, and limits the power of the Parliament to deal with cases of misbehavior, incapacity and unfitness, but I shall ask the hon. member to eliminate the expression "unfitness." It is a wide and rather uncertain expression. It is used in connection with trustees, as he said; but there is a tribunal to determine cases of unfitness, and that is the court before which the matter is brought. The tribunal to determine the tenure of the judges will be the Parliament, the Senate, and House of Representatives, and it would be introducing an element of great uncertainty if the word "unfitness" were left in, as all that it is necessary to guard against is misbehavior and incapacity.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I think misbehavior has always been the word, and is all that is necessary.

Mr. SYMON:
I should be content with putting in "misbehavior," but if the amendment is pressed I shall have no objection. The two words suggested are exhaustive of the conditions under which the Parliament should exercise its power of removal, otherwise we would place the High Court, which is supposed to be coequal with the Parliament, entirely under the dominance of the legislature for the time being, and that would be fatal to that independence of the High Court, which we all desire to secure. Its functions are enormous and are of the most critical and serious character in the interests of the Constitution, and they involve not only the interests of the States, both large and small, but of the individual as well; and therefore their independence should be placed above the interference of Parliament. I think, with the inclusion of these words, we shall be able to secure a high-minded and capable bench, and therefore, speaking for myself and the other members of the Judiciary Committee, I am glad that the amendment has been moved. I think it is a distinct improvement, as it accomplishes the purpose which everyone who has the interests of the Constitution at heart desires, namely, the independence of the judges.

Mr. BARTON:
I would point out that the Constitution of Canada seems to show a misapprehension which we should avoid in a true federal union. It expresses this in clause 99, and in expressing it carries out the view held by Mr. Isaacs, which is applicable to a unified or separate State. The provision declares:

The judges of the Supreme Court shall hold office during good behavior, but shall be removable by the Governor-General on address of the Senate and the House of Commons.

That practically carries out the ideas of Mr. Isaacs, which, if we were not making a Federal Union, would be applicable to this Constitution. The Canadian Constitution is not a Federation, but belongs to those large number of bodies which have been included under the names of unions and confederacies, with the exception that the tendency, in the case of Canada, is towards unification. In the United States Constitution it is provided in Article III.:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold office during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

There is no word in that about any manner of removal from office; and from the nature of the Constitution I do not think it can be gathered that the Executive can remove them under their own power. We, however, look at the power of the Senate, and we find how the judges can be removed. In article 1, section 3, clause 6 states:

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Mr. ISAACS:

That puts it in the hands of one of the Houses.

Mr. BARTON:

It may put it in the hands of one of the Houses, but it must be recollected that that House is not like the House under this Constitution which it is proposed to establish, but it is one which from the very beginning has been invested with certain executive and certain judicial powers. Besides there is the great difference that that House in the United States cannot remove anyone except by trial at law. The Canadian Constitution amounts to an attempt to place it in the hands of Parliament to remove a person on presentation of an address, without actual cause assigned. That is no doubt the meaning of the Constitution, as my friend Mr. Isaacs has stated-without pause assigned and without a trial. There is a difference between a unified and a Federal Constitution, and I think we ought to make this Constitution as clear as possible in the federal element, and therefore I agree with Mr. Symon in that respect.

Mr. ISAACS:
Who would be the judges of misbehavior in case of removal of a judge?

HON. MEMBERS:
The Parliament.

Mr. BARTON:
The two Houses of Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS:
Would they be the judge of the misbehavior?

Mr. BARTON:
Unquestionably.

Mr. ISAACS:
If that is so it is all I contend for.

Mr. BARTON:
If we do not insert some provision making it plain that it is only for certain causes a judge can be removed, then we shall have the position that a judge may be removed, notwithstanding the life tenure, without cause assigned and without trial, so long as both Houses concur. I might quote a short passage from Dicey, who shows the difference between the Canadian Constitution and that of the United Kingdom. The words "official mendacity" which he uses are apt to express the untruth of any statement in the Canadian Constitution which might describe that Constitution as a federal one or one like that of the United Kingdom. It is neither; it is a mongrel between both. The Federal Judiciary must be the bulwark of the Constitution. It must be the supreme interpreter of the Constitution, and it is not true that in the United States the Supreme Court is above the Constitution, and the Parliament below it. That is the way in which the matter has been stated by Englishmen who have not thoroughly studied the question. The truth of the matter is this, as laid down in the American Constitution in few and stately words:

This Constitution is the supreme law of the land. It is over judge, President, Parliament, and citizen, and it is that Constitution, characterised in few and stately words, which it is the office of the court to carry out, and that cannot be done if the judges are to be questioned unduly by those who may be the party most annoyed by a decision which wrests from their hands the power to make any attempt to mutilate the Constitution. When the Federal Judiciary or the Supreme Court of the United States has confided to it the maintenance of the Constitution, which is confided to it by that very phrase, the settlement of any question in which Parliament makes an attempt to transgress the law of the land comes within their jurisdiction. Acrimony may arise between the Parliament and the Supreme Court, and we have to ensure that the judges shall not be removed upon the occurrence of that acrimony. What will be the case if that happens? As Mr. Symon points out, there will be a crumbling of the keystone of the federal arch. That is the danger we must avoid. Whatever we do in this Convention, I hope we shall be able to arrive at some mode of putting this principle in such a way that the judicature will be saved, because upon the safety of the judicature rests the safety of the Constitution. That is the only way in which the Constitution can be maintained. I confess my indebtedness to hon. members for suggestions, and will say that I quite agree with any hon. member who will endeavor to amend this clause—if it is not clear enough as it stands—in such a way as to show that there must be misbehavior and incapacity before removal, and personally I shall be better pleased if it be made so plain that some proceeding must be gone through which would give a judge the opportunity of being heard in his own behalf and of indicating his own defence before he can be removed from office.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I understand the amendment is this, that a judge ought not under any circumstances to be removed from office except for misbehavior.

Mr. SYMON:
Or incapacity.

Mr. HIGGINS. Or incapacity. Who is going to be the judge of incapacity or misbehavior?

Mr. SYMON:
The Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Is the hon. member willing to say that if in the opinion of both Houses a judge is guilty of incapacity or misbehavior he shall be removed.

Mr. SYMON:
Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Then the end of it all is to leave it to the two Houses; and my friend the Attorney-General has urged that the final power should be left in the Federal Parliament. It is true that there is a distinction between unity of Government and a Federation, and we must keep this bench as independent and strong as possible, especially as it has to decide between the States and the Federation and upon encroachments by the Federation upon the States. I admit all that; but what is the protection given in America? Judges can only be removed by impeachment. That means that one House brings a charge before the other House, and a judge cannot be removed unless both Houses agree.

Mr. BARTON:
The Senate alone has sufficient power to remove.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes; but one House in the United States is able to remove upon indictment by the other House. I think that the British system affords sufficient safety. I do not think that there is any practical danger about it. You really have eventually to come to the judgment of both Houses of Parliament, no matter how you reduce it; and having reduced it to that, my friends say "Let it be a joint address." There is no difference of principle. We all want the judges to have as strong and independent a position as we possibly can give them. I hope we shall adhere to the British Constitution so far as we can, because we are more used to it. May I point out to Mr. Kingston that his amendment will not leave it to the judgment of the Houses of Parliament as to whether there has been misconduct or not. It will put a burden on them first to prove in a court of law that there has been misconduct or incapacity, and Secondly to pass an address. I say then it will be almost impossible to remove a judge if we put in that he shall only be removed on an address of both Houses of Parliament, leaving it to the Houses to prove inca-

Mr. FRASER:
I endorse the amendment of Mr. Kingston. If the removal of a judge is to be left to Parliament it would depend how this clause reads whether the Parliament would remove a judge. They would want to have it clearly set out on what grounds they could remove him. They would not dare to remove him unless he was guilty of something or other. Therefore Parliament is the Supreme Court in this case. I do not follow the argument at all that there is no necessity to take this precaution, because a judge of the Federal Court will have very different duties to perform to the judge of the ordinary court. There may be a momentous State question to be settled, and it is absolutely necessary for the future of the Commonwealth that the judges should be in an independent position.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
What more do you want than you have in the clause?

Mr. FRASER:
I want everything possible.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
It is here.

Mr. FRASER:
It is not. Parliament may be in a hurry; the may be misinformed; the Ministry of the day may tell them a bushel of lies about a judge. I see no danger in making the amendment; there are all sorts of good reasons for carrying it, and there is no justification for rejecting it.

Mr. DOBSON:
It is rather difficult to answer the well-put arguments of Mr. Kingston, Mr. Symon, and Mr. Barton, but such judgment as I have tells me they are in error, and have not sufficiently answered the strong arguments of Mr. Isaacs. The danger they wish to guard against is not, to my mind, so great as the danger they are creating, of having a Parliament turned into a kind of tribunal to try whether a judge has been guilty of misconduct or incapacity. There will be caused an enormous amount of litigation, and the judge may have the right of appeal to the Privy Council on some technical point, even when the whole Commonwealth might, know that, in the best interests of justice, that judge ought to be removed.

Mr. SYMON:
Would not Parliament be turned into a tribunal just as much the other way?

Mr. DOBSON:
No; I think not. For 200 years there has not been a single instance of Parliament having tried to do the slightest injustice to the judges.

Mr. SYMON:
Then what is the harm of the amendment?

Mr. DOBSON:
A judge will not be found guilty of embezzlement by a jury, or of any other crime; that is a very simple question. But a judge may act in such a way as hardly to be guilty of misconduct or incapacity, and yet it may be most undesirable that he should continue to be a judge. What is the first thing that goes wrong in the machine called man? The brain. A judge gets a kink in some direction in that brain, yet he might be in other points a most upright man—a most honest judge; and yet that small disturbance of his brainpower might render it undesirable that he should still sit on the bench.

Mr. SYMON:
Then would not that be incapacity?

Mr. DOBSON:
It would be a very nice point which the Parliament would be called upon to decide judicially, and the judge would have an appeal against their decision. That is more undesirable than the present clause, which comes from the Canadian Act, and Mr. Barton is hardly consistent when he says that Canada is not a Federation, or at least is not such a Federation as gives us an authority for the clause. He turns then to the United States, which I think still less to the point, while the quotation which Mr. Isaacs read to us exactly sets out the difficulty which will arise if we adopt the amendment of Mr. Kingston. The judge removed in Tasmania thirty or forty years ago did nothing very dreadful, but as you walked down to your office you heard that judge so and so was being sued for his milk bill, and the next day you saw a bailiff waiting at the judge's front gate; in fact the judge was like Micawber, his assets were not quite equal to his liabilities; and he brought the administration of justice into disrepute and contempt. It is much better to leave with the Federal Parliament a case of that sort, which may only happen perhaps once in fifty years or so, where some little disturbance of a judge's brain makes it most undesirable that he should continue to be a judge. I shall vote for keeping the Canadian clause as it is in the Bill, and shall not be found supporting Mr. Kingston.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I take the exactly opposite view from Mr. Dobson. I think we are under an exceedingly great obligation to Mr. Kingston for having introduced this amendment. It is a most important one, and the quotation made by Mr. Isaacs in reference to Great Britain, is entirely out of place as regards this Federation.

Mr. DOBSON:
Very much in point.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Here the judges are called upon to express their views upon an Act of Parliament. In England the judges do not express any opinion as to the legality or otherwise of an Act of Parliament, because there, however queer or undesirable an Act of Parliament may be, as long as it is an Act of Parliament the judges have to obey it, right or wrong. Here, however, the judges are called upon to express opinions that may be exceedingly adverse to the views of Parliament, but which may be right, and we know that in a recent decision in America the opinion given by the judges was contrary to the views of Parliament or of the Congress. If these judges had held their offices as proposed by Mr. Kingston, they could not be removed. The words which Mr. Kingston proposed would prevent such a removal unless misconduct or incapacity were proved as facts. The hon. member Mr.
Higgins asks how we are to prove it. It is easy to prove a fact. If a judge is incapacitated from want of brain power he ought to be removed. If he is guilty of misconduct, either moral or judicial, he ought to be removed. These are questions of fact, and they ought to be laid before Parliament in some way or other before a judge should be removed. Therefore I hope that those who are connected with the legal profession as I have been will support the view of Mr. Kingston coupled with the slight amendment of Mr. Symon, and assist in carrying it out. We cannot make these judges too independent of outside feeling. They should be upright, and independent and fearless in doing their duty, which they could not be in matters involving party politics or any particular laws passed by the Senate which were unconstitutional. Therefore I shall support the view of my hon. friend Mr. Kingston.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I was a little shocked to hear the radical sentiments which fell from Mr. Dobson.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Radical?

Mr. SYMON:
Radically wrong.

Mr. BARTON:
Revolutionary!

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
And which almost justified the term used by Mr. Reid-"A firebrand."

Mr. DOUGLAS:
A Tory, not a firebrand.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I thought so before. But as far as this particular part of the Bill is concerned, I am surprised at my hon. friend. The bench ought to be placed in the highest independent position. Do not we follow the American precedent on this point in preference to following the English Constitution, which has no possible relation to what we are doing now? I look upon this part of the Bill as the most important part of all, because this court is what we have to look to, what all the States have to look to, for the protection of the Constitution.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Protection against federal encroachment.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Yes; against federal encroachments. We have to make it noble and lofty, and we have to put it beyond all possibility of being terrified by influence of any kind. The Americans took much care to avoid this, and my hon. friend Mr. SYMON has read some passages from Hamilton showing the views that actuated them.

Mr. ISAACS:
They apply to any court.

SIR JOHN DOWNER:
Those remarks may apply to any court, but they apply more particularly to this court.

Mr. ISAACS:
Not a bit.

SIR JOHN DOWNER:
Because there is no such likelihood of conflict between the judges of any English or colonial court and the Legislature as might be not unreasonably expected to arise between the Federal Parliament and the High Court of Justice. One does not anticipate, one, hopes it will not arise, but we want to make the judges strong enough to do their duty if it does take place, because we look to them to preserve us against encroachment, against the destruction of the Constitution, and the injury of the weaker. What is provided here? In Mr. Kingston's amendment, if the Houses of Parliament can come to his conclusion, they have got to find whether a man is guilty of misbehavior, or unfitness, or something else, but there is no method prescribed as to how they have to find this out. It may be done without a trial and without hearing the person affected at all, and this power which is to be exercised by the Parliament, to which in certain important matters the court is superior, may be exercised in a manner that will tend to injure the prestige of the judiciary and diminish the independence of its members.
The Americans required two things to be done, and their custom has worked well. I think we had better do the same. They require an impeachment to be made by one House and a trial by the other. With reference to the trial of an official in America, to which reference has been made, the facts were that before one of the Houses impeached it had come to a conclusion, using such popular methods as it thought fit. Having come to a conclusion, it incapacitated itself from judging, and had to give this officer and high dignitary a proper trial. To do that the matter had to go to the Senate, and then even after it had reached that Chamber the judgment of the majority did not rule. The judgment that was to remove this high officer had to be the judgment of two-thirds of the members present. I hope hon. members will consider that time has not been wasted in talking about this part of the Bill. If troubles and difficulties arise between States in the future concerning the interpretation of the Constitution we will have this to fall back upon. If the citizen is in trouble this is his anchor, and is, as my hon. friend Mr. Barton suggests to me, his ultimate protection. Parliament will know he has got that protection, and will be careful that his liberties are not invaded. We ought to surround the removal of the judge-who himself can be the judge of the acts of the Legislature-with all sorts of precautions. We ought to ensure him a trial, and not act upon the loose talk of the two popular Houses in a mere debate, to which he has no possible opportunity of replying. A judge might be accused on account of all sorts of causes and prejudice apart from the merits. If we want to make this office a protection to the citizens of the Commonwealth—and we should give the person charged a trial before the highest tribunal, surrounded by the greatest solemnities—there must be some way of removing a judge, and this the Americans understood, for they prescribed accordingly, and in doing that they did well. They not only insisted upon what is the first attribute of justice, that a man should not be convicted without first being heard, but that the trial should be conducted under the most solemn circumstances and by the highest tribunal. The Senate and House of Representatives will be representative of the citizens. They will represent the same class in both Houses. I suggest the following substitution:

May be impeached by the House of Representatives and tried before the Senate for misbehavior; but shall not be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present, and if so convicted shall be removed from office and disqualified to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Commonwealth.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Why not make it an absolute majority?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
This is more than an absolute majority.

Mr. BARTON:
With a jury you would want the whole lot unanimous.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
The system to which I have just alluded has been in force 100 years, and has worked well, and in beginning the erection of this new edifice we ought to be careful we do not make a foundation mistake, for while we are pretending to make these judges the protectors of the citizens in the Commonwealth, and even superior from certain points of view to Parliament itself, at the same time we ought not to give Parliament, against whose unauthorised acts we intend the High Court to protect us, authority to remove the judges without the greatest cause and the gravest trial. I think this is a matter well worthy of the serious consideration of hon. members. We should make our Supreme Court so strong and powerful that no Government will be able to set the Constitution at defiance owing to the presence of a majority in either House, whereby an authority would be obtained that was never intended by the founders of the Constitution.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I should like to make a few remarks with reference to the popular view of this matter. Hon. members, particularly of the legal profession, have discussed this question at great length and have pointed out many contingencies, which in the ordinary course of events never arise and are never likely to arise. There are two conditions stipulated. One is that the judges can hold office on good behavior, and secondly they can only be removed by an address from both Houses. What has been the contention throughout this debate in reference to the position which the two Houses occupy, viz., that the Senate and the Assembly never agree? Are hon. members going to suppose that, for the sake of committing an injustice on an honorable and distinguished man, these two Houses will sink their differences and enter into a conspiracy to oust him from his office? It is perfectly monstrous to suppose such a thing. Are we going to put the judges into a position that they are not to be assailed When they do wrong, and that they cannot be censured when they neglect their duty? I say that these gentlemen are not entitled to any more consideration than the clause affords them. It is extraordinary that the whole business of this Federation is now being subordinated to the rights of the legal profession. Here we have hour after hour legal gentlemen getting up and discussing the matter at inordinate length, while the great question of Federation is trembling in the balance.

Mr. ISAACS:

This is Federation.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

The great question of Federation is to make the States one for the purpose of our common interest and our common defence. Yet we have had legal gentlemen continually getting up and practically hair-splitting as to the meaning of words. Let us go to work and try to complete this Federal Constitution. Under the clause now being considered a judge will get every protection that the unanimity of the two Houses can afford him. If a judge does wrong punish him, but if he does that which is Constitutions ever since the colonies have enjoyed self-government, and we have never heard of one instance of where the power has been abused. Sir John Downer speaks of the necessity of a trial of the judges by the Parliament, but can we contemplate that this power will ever be exercised without a trial? Parliament would never be so debased as to remove a judge from his position without first making a trial. There is a suggestion that there should be an impeachment by the Lower House, but the moment the judge is assailed there is an impeachment. Under the Bill he has to be impeached by both Houses, and we have provision practically for an impeachment by one House and a trial by the other—a trial in fact by the two Houses. Sir John Downer suggests that the judges should not be removed except by a two-thirds majority of the Senate, and can we fancy such an intolerable position of having a judge on the bench against whose occupancy or position a majority have voted, but not a two-thirds majority, and therefore he retains his seat. I will undertake to say that if a position of that character were conceded, and if a majority, although not a two-thirds majority, voted for the removal of a judge the public would instantly lose confidence in the administration of justice if a man were allowed to remain on the bench against the will of the majority of the House. Such a judge would feel compelled to resign at once if he had any sense of decency. The whole argument is based upon the assumption that Parliament will be so corrupt as to remove judges without due cause. We have never seen the power entrusted to our present communities abused, and still we are asked to do away with a power which has never been badly used, in order to so strengthen the hands of the Federal Judicature that if we get a judge whose brain faculty is disappearing we cannot remove him.

Mr. KINGSTON:

That would be incapacity.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

You can remove him by a roundabout process. I was much struck by the observations used by the mover, and by every member who has supported this new departure. They speak of the Federal Judiciary as being the bulwark of the liberty of the citizens and safeguard of the Constitution, and they desire to have it so constituted as to be above parliamentary interference.

Mr. SYMON:

And improper interference.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

That brings me at once to say that the dilemma that these hon. gentlemen are in arises from the fact that they are cutting off their right of appeal to that tribunal, the Privy Council, which is far removed from any local parliamentary influence. If you preserve the right of appeal to that body you have a court with which no local legislation can interfere.

Mr. SYMON:
If you abolish the Privy Council, why not put this High Court above political influence?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
You are not abolishing the Privy Council as far as some of the decisions of the High Court are concerned. It has been put that if from a feeling of resentment on account of the decisions of the Federal Judiciary, any action was taken for the removal of the judges there would be interference with the administration of justice. It is put that, in order that the judiciary should not be interfered with, this power should be taken, and that we should have a body which cannot be overawed by any local Legislature. Members talk of the High Court as being the bulwark of the Constitution, but they are taking that bulwark away when they abolish the right of appeal to the Privy Council, which is far removed from any influence exercised by our local Parliament.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Do you believe in a High Court of Justice for Australia?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I believe in the establishment of a High Court for Australia, but not of the character proposed, which will sever all connection with the Privy Council, and which will, if we follow the logic of my hon. friend, be placed in a position above any power of the Commonwealth to control it. All men are human, and it is human to err with lawyers as much as anyone, and are we not to have any regard for the liability of our having a corrupt bench as we may have a corrupt Parliament? History shows that benches sometimes become corrupt. It is highly improbable and we cannot conceive it, but how can we conceive a Senate and a House of Representatives—a majority in each combined—being so corrupt as to inflict an injury upon another component part of the Constitution, simply because it has not done that which the legislature desired? By all means give a correcting power to the judiciary, but let there be a restraining influence in the other power; but if we adopt the amendment we shall be creating a power too strong for its proper strength in the Constitution. I shall, therefore, vote for the clause as drafted.

Mr. SYMON:
I wish to point out the extremely anomalous position in which Mr. Carruthers has placed himself. He wants to retain the right of appeal to the Privy Council, which he says will be above the reach of local influences.
and totally beyond the control of the local legislature, and in order to have an argument to support this contention be wants to make the High Court subject to the dominance of the local legislature. If that commends itself to the minds of hon. members the sooner we sweep the High Court of Australia out of the Constitution the better, if my hon. friend's contention is correct. I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that you should put the first part of the amendment first,

The CHAIRMAN:

The question I will put is:

That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause.

Mr. SYMON:

I propose to ask you to first strike out the word "may" with the view of substituting "shall only be." It is a better form of expression. The substance of the amendment is the latter part.

The CHAIRMAN:

Mr. Kingston's amendment is "shall not be."

Mr. KINGSTON:

"Shall only be."

The CHAIRMAN:

I have it in the hon. member's writing "shall not be."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I have altered the amendment The way I now move it is that "except for misbehavior, unfitness, or incapacity." As regards the word "unfitness," I think that might perhaps be left out and I will leave it "misbehavior or incapacity." I think it will be idle to talk of these judges holding their offices during good behavior if, by the express terms of the Act, we render them liable to removal at the will and pleasure of the Executive and of the Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS:

Who will be the final judge?

Mr. KINGSTON:

The Parliament. I think the complaints should be investigated by the two Houses in such way as they see fit. I have such a high idea of the honor of the Federal Parliament, so long as you lay down principles for their guidance-and we do lay them down-that I think it will be unnecessary to provide here the precise mode in which these powers shall be exercised; and that is why I take a little exception to the argument of Sir John Downer. The Federal Parliament will provide the necessary machinery for carrying out the law. There is difficulty in providing that the Senate shall deal with the matter first.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
The House of Representatives first.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I think it will be as well to leave it to the Federal Parliament to regulate that.

Mr. ISAACS:
Then they will not be the final arbiters.
The amendment was altered so that it provided to insert the words:
For misbehavior or incapacity and.
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
The judges shall not be removed except for misbehavior or incapacity, and then only upon an address, &c.
Would that not be sufficient, because the removal must be by the Governor-General with the consent of the Executive? If the two Houses decide to remove a judge then the Executive act must be carried out by the Executive authority. So we may simply say:
Shall be removed only for misbehavior or incapacity, and then upon an address.

Mr. SYMON:
Yes, that would do.

Mr. BARTON:
If that is acceptable I will move:
To strike out the words "Governor-General with such advice" and insert in their place "and then only."

Mr. KINGSTON:
Is there any particular object in striking out those words when it is made so clear.

Mr. BARTON:
Except that it is not necessary to retain the words. The authority which appoints is the authority which removes. It reads more clearly and makes better English, I think, if the words are struck out.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I would suggest that we make the section read as follows:
Shall not be removed except for misbehavior or incapacity, and then only by the Governor-General in Council, upon an address, &c.

Mr. SYMON:
That will do.

Mr. BARTON:

If that is so, I will move then:
To further amend the clause by inserting "then only" after "and."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I now move:
That the words "I but only," be omitted.
Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN:

The sub-section as it stands now reads:
Shall not be removed except for misbehavior or incapacity, and then only by the Governor-General in Council upon an address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same Session, praying for such removal.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I have said what I had to say in reference to the form in which, in my opinion, this very important Constitutional question should have been worded. But I, found myself so much in a minority amongst the members of the Convention generally that I did not think it expedient to force a division on the matter. I would like that the amendment I had intended to move should be put in print and circulated amongst hon. members for their careful consideration. I consider-and most of the lawyers who have studied constitutional subjects will agree with me-that this is about as important as any part of the Bill. I shall probably, before the Convention is over, bring the matter up again with the view of seeing whether they have not made a mistake and weakened the Constitution by depriving it of the safeguards which have proved so efficacious in the great American Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS:

As the clause will stand now, except during a session of Parliament, there are no means whatever of dealing with a judge, no matter what he may do. The power found in British and Colonial Constitutions of suspension or removal in flagrant cases is entirely absent.

Mr. SYMON:

What sort of flagrant case could you imagine?

Mr. ISAACS:

The hon. member can imagine them as well as anybody else. We are doing this with our eyes open. We are not only, as I think with Sir John Downer, weakening the Constitution, but we are wilfully shutting our eyes to the safeguards introduced in England And throughout the colonies for bringing any officer, however high and dignified his position, within the range of the Constitution under which he is appointed.
Sub-section as amended agreed to.
Sub-section 4—Remuneration of justices—as read agreed to.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I would like to ask Mr. Barton whether he does not think it would be an improvement to provide in this clause, as we have provided with regard to the salary of the Governor, not only that it shall not be diminished during continuance in office, but that it shall not be increased?

Mr. BARTON:
I think it would.

Mr. SYMON:
I hope Mr. Barton will not so readily agree to that, because there is a great distinction between the appointment of the Governor-General and his salary, and the appointment of a judge and his salary. The appointment of a Governor-General is for four, five, or six years. The object of the clause fixing his remuneration is to prevent him intriguing for an increase of salary during that short period; but where you are appointing judges for life, during good behavior, the conditions are so altered that the condition would not be essential.

Mr. ISAAC:
Would not your argument apply to diminishing as well as to increasing?

Mr. SYMON:
No; because the provision with regard to diminishing is again introducing the principle of preventing pressure being put on on a judge.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
A judge should have nothing to hope for.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
That is a very convenient phrase, yet like other phrases it is one which creates a good deal of misapprehension. I should only like to call the attention of Mr. Barton to the view taken by the Federalist on this very point. It is a singular thing how little alteration there has been in the points which have been raised on this judiciary question, and indeed on many other questions.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
In fact, on any other question.

Mr. SYMON:
And how little the objections have changed in the last 120 years or so in relation to these matters. This very point was taken, that if you provided that the remuneration of the President of the United States of America should not be increased nor diminished during his term of office you should provide the same for the judges. This is what Hamilton, in one of his exceedingly able disquisitions,

It was therefore necessary to leave it to the discretion of the legislature, to vary its provisions in conformity to the variations in circumstances, yet under such restrictions as to put it out of the power of that body to change the condition of the individual for the worse. A man may then be sure of the ground upon which he stands, and can never be deterred from his duty by the apprehension of being placed in a less eligible situation. The clause which has been quoted, combines both advantages. The salaries of judicial officers may from time to time be altered, as occasion shall require, yet so as never to lessen the allowance with which any particular judge comes into office, in respect to him. It will be observed that a difference has been made by the Convention between the compensation of the President and of the judges. That of the former can neither be increased nor diminished; that of the latter can only not be diminished. This probably arose from the difference in the duration of the respective offices. As the President is to be elected for no more than four years, it can rarely happen that an adequate salary, fixed at the commencement of that period, will not continue to be such to its end. But with regard to the judges, who, if they behave properly, will be secured in their places for life, it may well happen, especially in the early stages of the government, that a stipend, which would be sufficient at their first appointment, would become too small in the progress of their service.

Mr. Isaacs:

Why is not the contrary correct?

Mr. Symon:

That is the view on which all these provisions with respect to the salaries of judges have been drafted, and I would beg my hon. friend not to place too readily this provision with regard to judges' salaries on the same footing as that which applies to an executive officer, who only holds his office for a comparatively short term.

Mr. Higgins:

When did Hamilton write that?

Mr. Symon:

After the Constitution had been framed, when he was dealing with objections taken to its provisions.
Mr. ISAACS:
When he was pressing the people to accept it.

Mr. SYMON:
Yes, just as, I suppose, the hon. member is trying to persuade us to reject the proper provisions of this Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:
The suggestion made is one worthy of consideration. Although it may be that the circumstances of a new country may show that the salary which a judge is paid on his accepting office becomes inadequate as time goes on, I think that is a question which he should consider for himself before he takes office.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think it is a good thing under any circumstances that a judge under a Federal Constitution, at any rate, should have anything to hope for from Parliament or Government.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:
Where you have a sovereign Parliament, and the judge is merely the interpreter of the laws as they arise, and not the guardian of a Constitution in the same sense as a federal judge is, the same circumstances remain in part; but where you will have a tribunal constantly charged with the maintenance of the Constitution against the inroads which may be attempted to be made upon it by Parliament, then it is essential that no judge shall have any temptation to act upon an unexpected weakness—nor we do not know exactly what they are when appointed—which may result, whether consciously or not, in biasing his decisions in favor of movements made by the Parliament which might be dangerous to the Constitution itself. My friend Mr. O'Connor points out that the most important questions that may arise may be those between the States and the Commonwealth, the validity of State laws, and the validity of Commonwealth laws which may overlap or override them. Those very questions which the Senate exists to prevent may be arising and embarrassing the Constitution. The Senate will have to exercise its powers to prevent overlapping of that kind, but if it fails to exercise its authority power must be present in the court to adjust matters. You may easily conceive a case in which there might be a desire to reward a judge for past services, and with the view that he may be insensibly influenced in regard to future cases. I do not think a judge should have anything to expect in that way.
Clause as read agreed to.

Clause 71. The judicial power shall extend to all matters:

I. Arising under this Constitution, or involving its interpretation:
II. Arising under any laws made by the Parliament:
III. Arising under any treaty:
IV. Of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction
V. Affecting the public ministers, consuls, or other representatives of other countries:
VI. In which the Commonwealth, or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, is a party:
VII. In which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth
VIII. Between States:
IX. Relating to the same subject matter claimed under the laws of different States.

Mr. GLYNN:
I have given notice of a proposed amendment by the addition of the words as sub-section x.:

Any matters that the Parliament may prescribe.

The effect of that will be that the Federal Parliament may pass an Act giving wider powers than are conferred by the Constitution upon the judges. I would remind hon. members that my proposition simply goes the length of vesting the power of passing an Act in the Federal Parliament. Some hon. members may say that it is a dangerous question of policy, but I would remind them that in Acts 3 and 4 Victoria, chapter 41, the power is vested in the Government in England to refer to the decision of the Privy Council in all matters whatever that the Crown may think fit to refer to the Council. Now it is not at all certain that we will retain this power of appeal to the Privy Council. We propose abolishing the right of appeal to the Privy Council, and if we succeed in that, another amendment will be necessary. We will have to invest our High Court with the power which is vested in the Privy Council to decide certain matters which are not matters of contentious litigation at the time. I may mention that under the Canadian Act—the Supreme Court Act of 1875—wider powers are vested in the Executive Council. Todd, in his last edition, says:

By the Supreme Court Act 1875 the Governor in Council is empowered to refer any matters whatsoever to the court for hearing or consideration; and the judges are required to examine and report upon any Private Bill, or petition for the same, that may be referred to them by the Senate or House of Commons of the Dominion. And by the Act 54 & 55 Vict., c. 25, the power was greatly enlarged of reference to the court for opinion of the judges; and important questions of law or fact touching provincial legislation, appellate jurisdiction relating to educational matters, constitutionality of any legislation of the Parliament of Canada, or touching any other matter with reference to which he sees fit to exercise this power, may be referred by the Governor in Council to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration.

Of course, as I have said before, I am not proposing that that should be vested in the Supreme Court. My proposition is that the powers vested there by Act of Parliament should be given under the Constitution. Again, in eight of the State Constitutions of America this power of reference to the judges is preserved, so that to some extent, at all events, we have precedents for the adoption of the amendment I suggest. Upon the expediency of doing this -not to rely merely on my own opinion in reference to this matter, which would carry very little weight-I will refer to Bryce, page 448, where it says:

It may be thought, and the impression will be confirmed when we consider as well the minuteness of the State Constitutions as the profusion of State legislation and the inconsiderate haste with which it is passed, that as the risk of a conflict between the Constitution and statutes is great, so the inconveniences of a system under which the citizens cannot tell whether their obedience is or is not due to a statute, must be serious. How is a man to know whether he has really acquired a right under a statute? How is he to learn whether to conform his conduct to it or not? How is an investor to judge if he may safely lend money which a statute has empowered a community to borrow, when the statute may be itself subsequently overthrown? To meet these difficulties same State Constitutions provide that the judges of the Supreme Court of the State may be called upon by the Governor or either House of the Legislature to deliver their opinions upon questions of law, without waiting for these questions to arise, and be determined in an ordinary lawsuit. This expedient seems a good one, for it procures a judicial and non-partisan interpretation, and procures it at once before rights or interests have been created.

He goes on afterwards, of course, to discount this statement of the case for vesting the power in the Supreme Court by showing that it is open to some corresponding disadvantage. I might also mention that in 1886, in the Government of Ireland Bill introduced by Mr. Gladstone, power was given to the Lord Lieutenant to similarly refer matters to the Supreme Court.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Did you quote Bourinot? He speaks favorably of its operation.
Mr. GLYNN:
I have it here. I simply ask that this power should be given to the Federal Parliament. It is simply preserving to the extent of the delegated powers the absolute authority of Parliament. For these reasons I submit the amendment to the Committee.

Mr. BARTON:
I think we will have to be rather careful before adopting a sub-section of this kind, because it framed in such a wide way as to include any matters that the Parliament may prescribe. We shall have in the first case to determine-and we shall have to invoke the power of the Supreme Court to determine it-whether a matter prescribed by Parliament is a matter within their power to so deal with under the Constitution. We should there find some fruitful sources of litigation if a proposal of this kind were carried.

Mr. SYMON:
It is in the wrong place altogether.

Mr. BARTON:
An amendment giving power to prescribe that anything is within the judicial power may not only have a very great effect in taking matters outside the ambit of the judicial authority, but the power to legislate for contingencies tells us that any attempt made in this respect may go so far as to bring about great ambiguities, in deciding whether a matter prescribed by Parliament is one that is within their power under the Constitution. That is to say, that there may be a new jurisdiction imported which would conflict with the jurisdiction conferred by the Constitution. To accept the proposal of my hon. friend would, I say it with all respect, condemn it. In England the House of Lords has the power of consulting the judges; and a similar power has been conferred on the Canadian Privy Council. The Governor-General in Council may refer to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration any matter which he thinks fit to refer, and that court is required to certify its opinions to the Governor in Council. That is a substitute, according to Munro, not for the power of the Queen to refer any matter whatsoever to the Privy Council, but for the power which the House of Lords has to to consult the judges. It is only in a judicial capacity that the House of Lords ever wants to consult the judges. There is no such body created, or likely to be created, as far as is suggested, as far as I can see, and we cannot see that there is anything of the kind likely to be dealt with under this Constitution. The reason for which similar power has been conferred upon the Governor in Council on Federal legislation does not exist here. If we look at the clause as it stands we shall be satisfied that we have given judicial power to the Commonwealth which is likely to be sufficient for all its purposes. In the clause setting out the jurisdiction of the High Court we say that:

In all matters affecting public ministers, consuls, or other representatives of other countries, arising under any treaty between States in which the Commonwealth, or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, is a party, in which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth, the court shall have original its well as appellate jurisdiction.

I ask the hon. member if it is necessary to go beyond these powers?

Mr. BARTON:

Yes; in cases that come before a Court having jurisdiction under these judicial powers so defined. The question which seriously exercises my mind is whether we are not giving sufficient jurisdiction to the Supreme Court in this clause.

Mr. SYMON:

It is not jurisdiction.

Mr. BARTON:

It is a definition of the judicial powers.

Mr. SYMON:

Parliament has no right to alter that.

Mr. BARTON:

I am not saying that it has, and therefore Mr. Symon was right in his interjection that this amendment was moved in the wrong place. The judicial power, which includes the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, is sufficient for the cases we have defined. We have a provision here dealing with the jurisdiction which may be conferred upon other courts. We have it in clause 74 that:

Within the limits of the judicial power of the High Court the Parliament may from time to time: Define the jurisdiction to be exercised by the Federal Courts other than the High Court: Prescribe whether the jurisdiction of the Federal Courts shall be exclusive of, or concurrent with, that which may belong to or be vested in the courts of the States, and invest the courts of the States with federal jurisdiction within such limits, or in respect of such matters, as it thinks fit.

Then we are told that in certain matters, which include many of the most important of these referred to in clause 71, the High Court shall have original as well as appellate jurisdiction. I ask Mr. Glynn whether he thinks it is worth while proceeding with the amendment - first, because it is too wide, second, because there is jurisdiction, and third, because if it ought to be inserted this is the wrong place to insert it.

Mr. SYMON:

My hon. friend's amendment is directed to one point, and that is to enable matters to be dealt with and constitutional questions to be raised by the High Court and dealt with without suit. If this is the point he has in view, it deals with the procedure or jurisdiction of the High Court and not its judicial power. It has nothing to do with the judicial power, which is contra-distinguished from the executive and legislative power under the Constitution. There are three elements in the Constitution. One is the legislative, the second is the executive, and the third is the judicial power, and that judicial power exists quite irrespective of the procedure under which it is exercised. My friend is moving the amendment with a view to enable questions to be submitted to the Federal Judiciary without the intervention of a party or suit. It may or it may not be a good object. The Canadian Act has secured it. Our provisions do not secure it. The Home Rule Bill of 1886, introduced into the Imperial Parliament, provided for it, but it is not a question of judicial power. Judicial power is one thing, and it is sufficient to embrace what is desired provided the machinery is good, and what my hon. friend desires is to provide machinery. I suggest, if he desires to see it carried into effect, that he should introduce it in a separate section, to be inserted in a more appropriate place. On the question itself, I submit for his consideration, that really it is not a desirable thing to introduce. The great charm of the judiciary in the Supreme Court of the United States consists in the fact that they do not mix themselves up with the questions of legislation or constitutional law or the question of executive control until their attention is directed to it in some suit between parties, and it seems to me that this is a very desirable course to preserve. If my hon. friend had followed his own quotation from Bryce he would have seen the encomiums which the writer passed upon the United States system. He says:

It is nevertheless true that there is no part of the American system which reflects more credit on its authors, or has worked better in practice. It has had the advantage of relegating questions not only intricate and delicate, but peculiarly liable to excite political passions, to the cool dry atmosphere of judicial determination. By leaving constitutional questions to be settled by the courts of law another advantage was incidentally secured. The court does not go to meet the question; it waits for the question to come to it. When the court acts it acts at the instance of a party. Sometimes the plaintiff or the defendant may be the National Government or a State Government, but far more frequently both are private persons seeking to enforce or defeat their private rights. For instance, in the famous case which established the doctrine that a Statute passed by a State repealing a grant of land to an individual made on certain terms by a previous Statute is a law "impairing the obligation of a contract" and therefore invalid, under article 1, section 10, of the Federal Constitution: the question came before the court on an action by one Fletcher against one Peck on a covenant contained in a deed made by the latter, and to do justice between plaintiff and defendant it was necessary to examine the validity of a Statute passed by the Legislature of Georgia. This method has the merit of not hurrying a question on, but leaving it to arise of itself. Full legal argument on both sides is secured by the private interests which the parties have in setting forth their contentions; and the decision when pronounced, since it appears to be, as in fact it is, primarily a decision upon private rights, obtains that respect and moral support which a private plaintiff or defendant establishing his legal right is entitled to from law-abiding citizens. A State might be provoked to resistance if it saw as soon as it had passed a Statute, the Federal Government inviting the Supreme Court to declare that Statute invalid.

That is exactly the difficulty which is met by leaving these matters to arise between private parties. You then do not provoke the resistance of a State which has its law brought by the intervention of the Commonwealth before the judiciary to have its validity tested. Immediately you do that you arouse a debate which may never otherwise arise, and you bring about a mongrel suit to determine some matter which may otherwise never be brought before the court. I advise my hon. friend, if he desires to push the matter, that it should be done by way of a separate clause.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Although my professional sympathies may not be expected in a case of legal procedure to be in the direction of haste, I thoroughly agree with the object of Mr. Glynn with regard to the propriety of providing some facile, expeditious, and inexpensive means whereby the highest judicial pronouncements on matters of great public concern can be obtained. I do trust we will not attach too much weight to the suggestion that we should go through the old routine of having to find some unfortunate people to make it a personal quarrel before we can obtain the decision of the highest court in the realm. I trust that Mr. Glynn, although for the reasons I shall presently mention I shall be unable to support him in the amendment, will do what he can by the adaptation of something similar to that we find in the Canadian Constitution, to enable the Federal Government or a State Government to obtain, without waiting for litigation between private parties, a decision from the High Court as to whether the federal law or the State law is valid and ought to prevail.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Even if the facts have arisen on which there is a dispute?

Mr. KINGSTON:

On a question of dry law, as to the legality or otherwise, the constitutionality or otherwise, of the Federal Act or the State Act, I imagine that there would not be the slightest difficulty in stating a case to which the judges could address themselves, with perfect confidence of their being able to pronounce a judgment which would satisfactorily deal with the point raised. I hope Mr. Glynn will confer with Mr. Deakin, who has already directed the attention of the Committee to a matter of this sort. I would, however, say that I agree with the objection which has been taken to the amendment which is now before the Convention. It seems to me that if you assent to the extension of the judicial power to all matters which the Federal Parliament may prescribe, it is simply in another way giving to the Federal Parliament the absolute power of arrogating to itself all the judicial powers it may wish, even to the extent of ousting State legislation. I hope that my friend Mr. Glynn, under these circumstances, will not press the amendment he has now moved, but I do trust that the principle to which he seeks to give effect by his motion will be embodied in the Constitution, and will prove acceptable to the Convention, and enable the Federal Parliament or State Parliaments to obtain a declaration from the High Court of Australia on matters of public concern, without all the routine, delay, and expense which are involved in litigation as we generally know it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I feel strongly that it is most inexpedient to break in on the established practice of the English law, and secure decisions on facts which have not arisen yet. Of course, it is a matter that lawyers have experience of every day, that a judge does not give that same attention, he cannot give that same attention, to a supposititious case as when he feels the pressure of the consequences to a litigant before him. If he feels that the effect of his decision will be ruin to this man or that man he will take the utmost pains in considering his decision. But here is an attempt to allow this High Court, before cases have arisen, to make a pronouncement upon the law that will be binding. I think the imagination of judges, like that of other persons, is limited, and they are not able to put before their minds all the complex circumstances which may arise and which they ought to have in their minds when giving a decision. If there is one thing more than another which is recognised in British jurisprudence it is that a judge never gives a decision until the facts necessary for that decision have arisen. I think it is advisable that private people should not be put to the expense of having important questions of constitutional law decided out of their own pockets. But I feel sure that is not the way to do it. If it is thought by the Convention or Federal Parliament that private persons who raise important points of constitutional law ought to be reimbursed out of the State coffers that is another matter. That is for Parliament to deal with. But with our knowledge of how English jurisprudence has grown up, and has the confidence of the whole empire, for us to allow judges the power of ruling on hypothetical cases would be most injurious. I sympathise with the desire of the President to prevent people being put to this expense. I hope we shall adhere to the clause, and not provide for the judges giving decisions until the facts have arisen.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Some days ago at a time which did not appear appropriate, I introduced this particular question, and introduced it guardedly because I felt in advance the weight of the arguments which have just been forcibly explained by my friend Mr. Higgins. But it appeared to me then that possibly a sufficient safeguard by way of limitation might be found and at the same time some extra protection afforded to the smaller States. If the exercise of this judgment in advance were allowed first of all only when State interests were supposed to be involved, and secondly, only on the application of accredited representatives of the less populous States, that limitation would rob the suggestion of a good deal of its danger and many of its difficulties. But on further consideration I recoil a little from even that proposal, and have fallen back to something like the position of my learned friend who has just sat down. While recognising the end in view to be eminently desirable, I feel great diffidence in lending any sanction to a proposal of this kind until it has been better digested. I am cordially with my hon. friends Mr. Glynn and the President in admitting the hardships inflicted upon innocent litigants, and the dangers and difficulties which they run, but the more I consider the great risks we must run the more I hesitate to take any decisive step towards placing in this Constitution such a power of reference as has been suggested.

Proposed sub-section negatived; clause agreed to.

Clause 72 - The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe, to hear and determine appeals, both as to law and fact, from all judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences of any other federal court, or court exercising federal jurisdiction, or of the Supreme Court of any State, whether any such court is a court of appeal or of original jurisdiction; and the judgment of the High Court in all such cases shall be final and conclusive: Provided that no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in the High Court than according to the rules of the common law.

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the conditions and restrictions on appeals to the Queen in Council from the Supreme Courts of the several States shall be applicable to appeals from them to the High Court.

Mr. GLYNN:

It seems to me that the words:
With such exceptions and are exceedingly wide, and gives power to the Parliament to cut down the powers to practically nothing. I move:
To strike out "with such exceptions and"
Amendment negatived.

Mr. WISE:

I move:
To strike out of the third line of the clause the words "both as to law and fact."

If this is carried it will be necessary to strike out the proviso at the end of the first sub-section. I think I was the cause of these words being put in, but on further consideration I have come to the conclusion that they are unnecessary. It is better to give the unrestricted power to appeal to the High Court, and let the Parliament fix the conditions. It has been laid down in New South Wales that where there is an appeal it does not include the power of re-hearing, and a similar decision has been given in Victoria, though, in my opinion, it does. The words were taken from the American Constitution, where the High Court has the power of reviewing a decision of the jury on a question of fact.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. WISE:

I now move:
That the following words at the end of the first section be struck out - "Provided that no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in the High Court than according to the rules of the common law."

Mr. ISAACS:

I quite agree with my hon. friend that the words are not needed. I have been extremely puzzled to know what the words mean to-day. There might have been some meaning in them and some necessity for them 100 years ago, when judges exercised such extreme powers, and when they tried to override trial by jury.

Amendment agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 73 - No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any State or from the High Court or any other federal court, except that the Queen may, in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any State, or of any other part, of her dominions are concerned, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

This is a clause which, as I understand it, takes away from us the right of appeal to the Privy Council, and I shall test the feeling of the Committee as to whether appeals may be made in any case provided the consent of either the Federal Court or the Queen in Council is given. I agree that it would be wise to have some restriction on these appeals, so that there will be real cases in which the decision of the highest court in our land should be obtained. If we have a provision by which the appeal cannot be made in every case, but only with consent of the High Court, from whose decision is to be made, or from the Queen in Council, we will obviate any difficulties. I move:

That we strike out "may in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any State, or of any other part of Her dominions, are concerned."

If that is carried I will move To insert after the word "Queen," the words "or the High Court may grant leave to appeal."

Mr. HIGGINS:

Would you allow appeal even from the High Court?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Yes, by special leave of the court or of the Queen.

Question - That the words - "In any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any State, or of any other part of Her dominions are concerned," proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause - put. The Committee divided.

Ayes, 17; Noes, 14. Majority, 3.

Ayes.

Barton, Mr.
Berry, Sir Graham
Cockburn, Dr.
Deakin, Mr.
Downer, Sir John
Sir Edward Braddon:

I think this is a clause which ought to receive greater attention than it has received, inasmuch as a division has been taken, I understand, without any debate whatever. I think we ought to remember that this is possibly one of the most important provisions in the whole of the Constitution Bill. We have but very few links uniting us with the British Empire. We have sentimental bonds which, although very strong, are not sufficient for every purpose. The substantial links are very few indeed, and this particular one is one of these, and by limiting the power of the subject to appeal to the Queen we are, I think, doing a wrong to the subject in whatever part of the empire that subject may be. We are denying by this particular clause as it is drafted the right of the people of Australasia to do that which is in the power of the people everywhere throughout the British Empire to do, whether he be a native of Canada, whether he be a native of the British Isles, or whether he be a native of any other part of the British dominion. I should like to read in this connection the opinion of a distinguished judge, the Chief Justice of Tasmania. He writes:

I do not know anything that contributes more to the constitution of a united British Empire than the fact that every subject may appeal to the Queen herself in Council if he considers himself wronged by the decision against him of a colonial Supreme Court. A Committee of the Privy Council - the Judicial Committee, as it is styled - hears the appeal and reports to the Queen in Council, by whom the judgment is finally given. This general right of appeal is a strong binding link between the Crown and the colonies. The Supreme Court of Australia cannot be as powerful a court as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Judges of the same experience and ability as those who form the Judicial Committee are not to be found in Australia. We have no Sir Horace Daveys or men of that calibre. The Supreme Court of Australia will presumably consist of three or five judges; but the Supreme Court of Victoria already consists of six judges, and an appeal from the Full Court of Victoria to the Supreme Court of Australia would be an appeal from a powerful bench to a tribunal probably not so strong as the Full Court. The appeal would be more expensive. Counsel from the different colonies would probably attend the Supreme Court to argue the appeals from their colonies. The expense of counsel coming from one colony to another, and so abandoning and losing business in his home colony, is heavy; 150 guineas is the lowest sum paid for counsel coming from Melbourne to Tasmania, and I have known £800 paid. Now, in England £25 to £50 are fair leaders' fees in ordinary appeals to the Privy Council. Again, the solicitors' costs in England are, as well as the counsels' fees, more moderate than those charged and allowed in Australia. Delay may be urged against the Privy Council, but except as to the time taken in transmitting the papers to England, which is insignificant, the probability is that solicitors and counsel in England act with at least the same promptness that is likely to be shown in Australia. The Privy Council does not sit during the long vacation, nor will the Supreme Court of Australia sit continuously. For these and other reasons I should be sorry to see the appeal, as of right to the Privy Council, that is now enjoyed in every case of reasonable importance, taken away and conferred upon another tribunal which holds out no one advantage over the Judicial Committee. If the Supreme Court of Australia is to be constituted a Court of Appeal, I should say let it be left optional to each of the colonies to adopt it as its Court of Appeal by its own legislative enactment, or else let the Supreme Court have only concurrent jurisdiction with the Judicial Committee, leaving the suitor to elect to which tribunal he will appeal. This would leave the matter optional with the colony or the suitor, but do not let the Constitution take away the right of the subject to appeal for justice to the Sovereign. I think that is an opinion that ought to be heard with considerable deference by hon. members of this Convention, and notably by those hon. members who are of the legal profession, because it is the opinion of one who is a leading member in their own profession, and whose opinion, therefore ought to be of especial value. My hon. friend Mr. Carruthers I hope has some amendment to propose. I have led the way and given him time by reading this opinion to frame any amendment which he may desire to submit.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I entirely agree with every word that has been uttered by Sir Edward Braddon. It appears to me it would be a calamity if, throughout the British Empire, we had for every place except for Australasia, a uniform law. If we established this Court, giving it power to interpret the laws of the Australian Colonies, how do we know that we shall be following the laws of the Empire at all. At the Convention of 1891, a very able letter written by Mr. Justice Richmond, of the New Zealand Supreme Court, to the late Sir Henry Parkes, was received. Possibly that letter is not available at the present time to hon. members.

Mr. KINGSTON:

It is in the proceedings.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

But very few hon. members have had copies of those proceedings. And, although I may detain the Committee at this time - and I am not one of those who has done much to waste time - still I feel so strongly the necessity for uniformity of law throughout the British dominions that I will crave the indulgence of the Committee while I read it.

Mr. WISE:

Have you read Mr. Clarke's reply to that letter?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

The hon. member can do that. I will accept the opinion of a man who was on the Bench for more years than Mr. Clarke has been a lawyer, and who was associated in a large degree with the public life of New Zealand. On March 11th, 1891, Mr. Justice Richmond wrote to the late Sir Henry Parkes as follows:

Although I have not had the advantage of a personal introduction to you,
I make no doubt that you will excuse my addressing you on a subject of interest and importance to the whole of Australasia. It is one of which I may claim to have some special knowledge, being now in the twenty-ninth year of my service as a Judge of the Supreme Court of New Zealand, and having previously had some executive experience as a Colonial Minister. The subject I refer to is the proposal now made at Sydney to establish an Australian Court of Appeal, whose decisions shall not be subject to review by the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council.

Of course, this is at present a mere proposal and I cannot but think that, on deliberate consideration, good reason will appear for not insisting upon it.

1. The first and most obvious objection is one which must necessarily have occurred to yourself, and to any other statesman who has given the matter a thought. British capital is, and it is to be hoped will continue to be, largely invested in these colonies. It appears, therefore, to be a perfectly reasonable demand on the part of the mother-country, that any British subject feeling himself aggrieved by the decision on his civil rights of a local court shall, if the case be of sufficient importance, have his right of final appeal to an Imperial tribunal. However fair colonial judges and juries may have shown themselves, it is inevitable that persons resident in the United Kingdom, or in other colonies, who should find themselves worsted in litigation before a colonial court from which there was no appeal, would, in many cases, both feel and express a doubt that justice had not been done them, and would be ready to impute the decision against them to local prejudice and favoritism.

It always makes things plainer to give an example of the working of a principle, and I will, therefore, shortly state a recent case in this colony. A large ship, owned by an English shipping company, with a valuable cargo, was lost in attempting to leave the artificial harbor of Timaru, in the South Island. The accident was attributed by the company, or its underwriters, to the negligence of an officer of the Timaru Harbor Board, and an action for damages was accordingly brought in the name of the company against the board. The issues of fact were tried by a Wellington jury, and a verdict was returned for the plaintiffs for about £40,000, the value of ship and cargo. This, however, was subject to a large number of reserved points of law, which were subsequently argued before our New Zealand Court of Appeal. Two judges, out of three who formed the court, upheld one of these objections as fatal, and gave judgment setting aside the verdict. But a considerable proportion of the costs was thrown by our judgment on the defendant board as having failed on the main issues of fact. The shipping company appealed, as was, of course, expected, to the Privy Council; and Lords Halsbury and Bramwell sat with the ordinary members of the Judicial Committee to hear the case. The argument occupied five days. Finally a reserved judgment was given upholding the decision of the New Zealand Court of Appeal on a wider ground than we had taken, and charging the appellant company with the entire costs of the proceedings. Now, in a case of this kind, it is obvious that the result, from a public point of view, is far more satisfactory than it would have been had the plaintiff company been compelled to submit to the colonial decision in favor of the local body as final. It is more satisfactory to the people of both countries concerned; more satisfactory to the members of the colonial tribunal - I should say the same if the decision had been the other way; more satisfactory even to the defeated litigants - in this respect at least, that they must feel that justice, so far as attainable in courts of law, has been done them.

To quit this part of the subject: It is to be expected that the proposed measure, if ever carried must have a prejudicial effect on the financial interests of these colonies. The confidence with which investments of all sorts are now made in Australasia by people at home must be largely due to the knowledge that rights of property will be dealt with here by the Law Courts on British principles of justice, and subject to final review by one of the highest English courts.

If we establish this court, it does not follow that these rights will be established upon principles of British judgment, but rather upon principles of determination of this Australasian court, which will be final. We will have in the British dominions one law for the majority of the dominions - that is, the law of the Privy Council; and we will have this law for the Australasian colonies, which will be the law of this federal judiciary. Judge Richmond goes on to say:

I conceive that this confidence must certainly be impaired if we constitute ourselves a foreign country in regard to the administration of justice.

The decisions of a colonial court of ultimate appeal would not only give less satisfaction to an important class of litigants. Such decisions would in all probability be lose satisfactory to litigants in general, and intrinsically less satisfactory. It is no disrespect to the Australasian benches to say that the chances are against our being able to furnish a court of appeal equal in legal attainment to the highest English courts.

I ask members to bear in mind that this is a member of one of the Australasian benches, and who has been a member for twenty-nine years, who is now speaking. He goes on:

Of course, we may produce great jurists here, and please God we shall.

Too many of the judges have got on to the Supreme Court benches because they have been members of Parliament, and not for the reasons which ever distinguish the judge who gets on to the British bench. He continues:

Of course, we may produce great jurists here; and, please God, we shall. But the present area of selection for the bench is a very narrow one. English judges, on the other hand, are taken from amongst the leaders of a numerous bar. They have had their ability tested in practice at the greatest business centre in the world, and have succeeded in a competition with which the colonies have nothing to compare. The composition in late years of the Judicial Committee may not have been entirely satisfactory-on that subject I have a word to say-but important appeals to the Queen-in-Council are generally attended by some of the most eminent English Judges.

3. It would be a dead loss to both bench and bar if the legal standard to which we have now to submit ourselves were removed—as in great measure it would be were decisions here rendered final. I should be sorry to see the judgments of lawyers reared in our comparatively narrow circle become our most important authorities. I say this, fully recognising the excellence of much judicial work amongst us. The public is more interested than it knows in maintaining the highest scientific standard in the administration of the law. The intellectual interest thus created in the profession is one of the best guarantees for purity of administration. Thoroughbred lawyers are supremely anxious to be right in their law. They may not always succeed in freeing themselves from class prejudices and party ties; but their interest in abstract law makes them generally incapable of showing favor to individuals.

4. The establishment of colonial precedents as paramount would lead to divergencies from the law of the mother-country which would be productive of considerable inconvenience; nor could colonial judgments be entitled to the same favorable reception in the courts of the mother country as they now meet with.

I take it that this is the very strongest argument against appointing this court as the final court of decision. The decisions may be just, and I have no hesitation in saying I believe the decisions of most, indeed of all, the Supreme Courts of Australia have been, according to the views of the bench, entirely just; but there will always be the feeling that we have in the British Empire two final courts, one in England for the whole empire with the exception of Australasia, and one in Australia for the Commonwealth alone. This will create a feeling in Australasia amongst a large class of people that they have not got the same rights as the rest of the people of the empire. Then he says:

5. A very important consideration is the following:—In every colony possessing a Constitution the legislature is exercising powers created by a Statute of the Imperial Parliament. Its powers are limited by this document, and the document is subject to the interpretation of the Court, of law of the country. The Supreme Court of each of these colonies has jurisdiction to decide that a colonial Act is ultra vires. The power has actually been exercised in this colony in the case of an Act for deporting fugitive offenders, it being held that the General Assembly of New Zealand is incompetent to provide for the custody of such persons during their passage over-sea to another colony. The difficulty has since been removed by Imperial legislation. Now, it is evident that if the integrity of the empire is to be maintained (which is our common object), the decision of a local court in regard to the powers of the local Parliament ought to be subject to review by an Imperial court. Otherwise, all limit to the local power of legislation might be disregarded, and practically set aside, by judges with strong separatist tendencies.

6. It may appear paradoxical, but in point of fact the Australian courts themselves will be degraded by the proposed measure. They will sink from the position of Imperial to more local tribunals, with, I apprehend, a corresponding contraction of their present jurisdiction, and, in the future, a probable diminution of judicial independence. To illustrate my meaning, I will again cite a recent proceeding in this country. A few years ago a gentleman resident in Samoa was forcibly removed from that island by Sir Arthur Gordon, then Her Majesty's High Commissioner for the Western Pacific, who supposed himself to be exercising powers conveyed by the Order in council constituting his office. The person so dealt with conceiving himself aggrieved, brought an action for wrongful arrest and imprisonment against Sir Arthur in the Supreme Court of New Zealand, both parties being then in the colony. Commissions to take evidence in Samoa and in London were issued and executed. It was understood that Sir Arthur was defended by the British Treasury; and the present Mr. Justice A. L. Smith, of the English High Court of Justice, acted as his counsel on the execution of the Commission in London. No objection was taken on behalf of the defendant to the jurisdiction of the New Zealand court, No doubt this was on the ground, established in the leading case of Mostyn v. Falrigas, and other oases, that a British subject may be sued for damages in any British court within whose jurisdiction he is found for a personal wrong done to another British subject in any part of the world. But such a jurisdiction is one which cannot belong to a merely local court. Supposing that it could in law survive the contemplated alteration, it is plain that the British Parliament could not allow it to remain. It may be asked: What loss would that be to the colony? I maintain that it would be a real loss. For by the existence of such a jurisdiction the remedy for injustice and oppression in this quarter of the globe is made more prompt and easy. The dignity of the tribunal exercising so high a function is enhanced. The unity of the empire is affirmed in a striking manner. To destroy such a jurisdiction would be an act of separatism and a degradation of our courts. If this view is regarded by anyone as sentimental, I would observe that it is exactly by the prevalence of such sentiments, if at all, that the unity of the empire can be maintained.

In Sir Arthur Gordon's case the decision was on the main point, favorable to the defendant, the question being one of law, but judgment went against him for a small sum. There was no appeal lodged. The plaintiff, it is said, would have appealed had his means permitted. The British Government acquiesced in the decision.

One point more in this connection: I believe Sir Arthur Gordon, though still in the colony, was no longer Governor when the writ in the action against him was served. But, had he been Governor, it is established by the case of Musgrave v. Pulidos before the Privy Council [Law Reports 5, Appeal Cases 102] that he would none the less have been liable to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the colony. Such a court has, under our present Constitutions, the right of determining whether any act of power done by a Governor is within the limits of his authority. Evidently this high jurisdiction could not continue to be exercised by a colonial court whose decisions were not subject to appeal.

7. No doubt it will be said that the expense and delay of appeals to London are great. I do not pretend to be able to speak with certainty upon these points. But it may be questioned whether in either respect there need be much difference between appeals to the Judicial Committee and appeals to the proposed new court. Distances in Australia are great, and the local lawyers would seldom be content to leave their appeals in the hands of the bar of the city where the court happened to sit. Hence a large outlay in travelling expenses would be apparently inevitable. As regards delay it would not, I apprehend, be found practicable at present to appoint special Justices of Appeal to sit continuously. The court must be formed by the attendance of members of the existing benches, and could only sit periodically, as is our practice in New Zealand; these, however, are points on which I do not venture to express any positive opinion.
At present the Judicial Committee appears to be overloaded with work. If the committee wants strengthening in point of numbers so as to be able to sit in two or more divisions, the British Parliament is bound to find the means. Indian appeals which seem to take up a great deal of time might, one would think, be dealt with by a separate division. There can be no good reason why appeals should not be much accelerated.

8. Although several eminent judges have been amongst those who regularly sit on the Judicial Committee, the court has not maintained the extraordinary authority it had with the profession during the years when Lord Kingsdown commonly presided over it. Looking to the present importance of the colonies, and I venture to say, to the learning of colonial lawyers, it is not satisfactory that any but the most eminent in the profession should sit as judges of appeal from colonial courts. It is unfortunate that the attempt to constitute a single court of appeal for the whole empire did not succeed. The colonies have, I conceive, a right to ask that the ultimate appeal from colonial decisions shall be to the same tribunal, whether the House of Lords or some court to be substituted for the House of Lords.

9. But to sum up: whatever may be the defects of existing arrangements, they are such as appear to be remediable without extraordinary difficulty. Even taking things as they are, we shall be wise, I conceive, not to seek a change open to objections such as I have endeavored to state-objections which seem even more important and significant in a political point of view than in one purely juridical. As I desire the fullest and most public discussion of the subject of this letter, I need scarcely say that you are at liberty to deal with it in any way you think proper.

That letter was handed over by Sir Henry Parkes to Mr. A. Inglis Clarke, who was then Attorney-General of Tasmania, for his observations. Mr. Clarke did not agree with Mr. Justice Richmond. Against his views of the matter I place the opinion of Mr. Justice Richmond, who for twenty-nine years was a judge of the Supreme Court in New Zealand, and for a long time before that was mixed up with the public affairs of New Zealand, and was also a leading member of the bar. Added to that, we have a letter to day read by Sir Edward Braddon from the Chief Justice of Tasmania. We know the opinion of our own Chief Justice in New South Wales, who endorses that of the Chief Justice of Tasmania, and we know the opinion of Sir Samuel Griffith, the Chief Justice of Queensland. In the face of all these opinions, are we going to say that for one part of the British Empire there should be one law and for the rest of the Empire a different and perhaps bad law? I believe all the colonies ultimately will be joined in this Federation. Suppose we have for many years a neighbor in the north and another in the south that will not join, we will have this absurdity: we will have a law which is not a law all over Australia. Queensland—if not of the Federation—will be able to go to the Privy Council, while the other federated colonies and Tasmania will be bound by the law of this Federal High Court. I admit this Federal High Court will be a body superior to anything we have had in Australia, but at the same time it will be a body without that experience which the Privy Council has got in England, and it will be a body which will never command for its decisions the same respect.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
The judgments of the Supreme Courts command respect.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
The judgments of the Privy Council command greater respect. The decisions of the supreme Court command respect for themselves, but more largely because they follow the decisions of the Privy Council. The judgments of the Commonwealth Courts will, under this proposal, not be bound by the decisions of the Privy Council, but by the Federal High Court. The Supreme Courts at present are not free to give their opinions as they think fit, for they have to follow the law as laid down in England, and therefore their decisions command the greatest respect. If we establish this Federal Court, and take away the right of appeal to the Privy Council, the Federal Court will have to establish its own precedents and its own laws, following or disregarding Privy Council as they think proper.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Like the American Courts.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
The American Supreme Court represents a nation.

Mr. SYMON:
So are we going to be.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
When we are a nation separated from England it will be different.

Dr. COCKBURN:
The American courts have no appeal outside the States.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
The American courts in the States are not courts which I would like our colonies to follow. The bulk of the American State courts are not courts which are held in respect in any place in the world, and they are held in less respect in their own State than outside. The decisions of the Supreme Court of America are held in respect, but that Supreme Court is a Supreme Court of a nation, as the Privy Council is the Supreme Court of the British Empire, and, acting for the British Empire, all its decisions are held in respect, and although they may not be agreed with, our courts must follow them. They have not got to strike out a path for themselves, but this Federal Court will do just as they like when they know that there is no review of their decisions.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
No.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
The hon. member, Sir John Downer, laughs. How much better it will be to have uniformity of the law by compulsion throughout the British Empire than by the will of a particular court. The Supreme Courts of all the colonies are now respected, not because they give decisions of their own, but because they give decisions in accordance with the laws of the British Empire. But let us once set up this court of our own, which is not bound by any decisions of the Privy Council, and it will never command the respect which the Supreme Courts at present command throughout Australia. The very fact that they command respect is because they are guided by the principles laid down by the highest court in the British Empire. But this proposed court will not be guided by any such principles. This court will do, as I have heard some lawyers say, what they like. They may say that the Privy Council does not know anything about Australian matters; that the Privy Council does not know the circumstances under which a decision was given. One of the ablest judges in New South Wales has said-I will not say he said it publicly, because he was too wise to do that, but he has nevertheless said it-that the Privy Council was wrong, and that the Supreme Court was right. But whether right or wrong we have the advantage that uniformity of decisions results from following the decisions of the Privy Council. I remember the case of a lawyer practising in one of our courts. He was then very young and inexperienced, but he is now a Queen's Counsel and leader of the Bar in New South Wales. He said to the judge, "I think you are wrong." The judge said, in reply to him, "When I was a young man I often thought the judges were wrong, but I never had the impudence to tell them so." The public will have to take these decisions, whether right or wrong, and submit, because there is no appeal, but if there is an appeal to the highest tribunal of the nation, the public will acquiesce in these decisions, and when the public know that the Federal Court would be compelled to follow these decisions no doubt they will accept these decisions as heartily and as readily as they accept the decisions of the Supreme Courts. I am not one of those who believe that we are to place no restrictions upon these appeals. Some restrictions should be placed upon them. Too often an appeal to the Privy Council is used as a weapon, but we can restrict that to some extent, and I would much sooner see any number of restrictions placed upon these appeals than see the decisions of the highest court in the British Empire ignored for a Federal Court, which may mark out its own path without following precedents.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I have a good deal of sympathy with the two speeches that we have listened to, because one naturally has inclinations towards the way in which one has been brought up. But I would like to ask both Sir Edward Braddon and my hon. friend who has just sat down, whether we are ever to get out of our swaddling clothes? What are we here for?

Mr. FRASER:
Not to cut the painter.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Not to deprive a British subject of a right.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We have come to the conclusion that we may cease to be provincial, and form the foundation of a nation. We do not propose in any way to separate from the British Crown, but on the other hand we look to it with reverence. We consider ourselves the same people, but the very essence of the difference is that we think we can make laws which will suffice us; in other words, to put it colloquially, we think we can manage our own affairs. I ask these two hon. gentlemen to think for a moment or two. We are to have powers dealing to an unlimited extent with the most sacred of all subjects-life-and with property; in fact everything that can affect us is to be within the legislative power of the Commonwealth. Our relations to foreign powers so far as they do not interfere with Imperial concerns, we wish to have in our own hands, but when we come to the subsidiary thing, the administration of our own laws, we have got to admit our inefficiency.

Mr. FRASER:
They may not be our own laws.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
They are our own laws, because the laws we bring from England are only our own laws so long as we do not please to alter them.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
What about the Merchant Shipping Act?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is a question for the Imperial Parliament to consider, and no doubt they will. That will in all probability remain in force in spite of this or any other Act. We are asking for an Imperial Act, and we shall use the powers that that Act gives us. But when we are told we are quite competent to make laws as regards our own lives and property, and also as regards external relations with other nations we are in the same breath warned that we are not competent to establish an administrative body in ourselves.

Mr. FRASER:
    Small talk.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    Indeed it is not small talk. It is small talk on the other side. It appears to me to be a contradiction in terms. The greater includes the less. I venture to think the arguments we have heard arise from the prejudices that have grown up with us.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
    What prejudice can I have? I have never been out of the colonies.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    I believe Sir Joseph Abbott means what he says. I am talking with the same fairness as he did.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
    You call ours prejudices, but yours are opinions.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    Perhaps mine is a prejudice.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
    Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    The only thing is mine is a prejudice upon a prejudice, for I had a prejudice, the same as my friend had, but I have superseded it with another which is founded on reason. If we are good enough to do all these things that we have arranged that we can do, and good enough to become a nation, we ought to be good enough to administer our own affairs among ourselves.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
    That is just it. We are not becoming a nation. If we were I would go with you.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    And then, Sir Joseph Abbott says:

What will happen? We shall have the restraining influence of the Privy Council taken away, and the judges will develop the natural corruption of human nature.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
    I never said anything of the kind. It is not right to charge me with having said words which I never uttered, and which even by im-[99x763]putation cannot bear the construction put upon them.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I know you did not use those very words, but you said:
The judges will do what they like.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I do not think I put an unfair construction on what you said. Let us consider another great country, which took with it the English law, and which has, with such alterations as their Constitution has b

Mr. REID:
Hear, bear.

Mr. SYMON:
Why should we not have uniformity?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We shall follow English precedents. It will make no more difference than it does in America, which respects the House of Lords almost as much as we do.

Mr. HIGGINS:
And we respect American decisions.

Mr. SYMON:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
And this difference which ought to have resulted in the judges doing as they liked, and in endless confusion, has led to greater wisdom and better administration. There are certain stages in conflicts between individuals in which it becomes almost a question of the temperament of the judge how the decision goes. In many of, these matters it gets both by law and fact to such a refinement that it depends almost on the meal a man may have had, or his local condition, as to the manner in which he shall decide.

Mr. SYMON:
I suppose digestions are no better in England than here?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
No. I expect human nature is no different here. have heard my hon. friend say so. What we want in law, above all things, is finality.

Mr. FRASER:
We want justice.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Of course we want justice. But when the question of what is just comes to the question of what a judge has had for breakfast, or reaches such a state of refinement that it becomes a mere matter of temperament of the individual, do not let finality be destroyed for the purpose of indulging in that new experiment of uncertainty. For my part I think it follows as a corollary of what we are doing that we ought to give our courts final jurisdiction in the ordinary cases in which appeals are now prosecuted. When we come to matters between States or between Commonwealth and State, or matters of Imperial concern, then it would be wise, and the Imperial Parliament will insist on it, not to interfere with appeal to them, and that is what this clause preserves. As far as ordinary private litigation goes, the decisions of the Court of Australia are final, as they should be, but when we come to matters in which the public interests of the Commonwealth or of any State, or of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions are concerned, then there is a power to grant leave. I say that so far from sacrificing any right what we are doing is only a corollary of what we have done, and that to assume we have not the competency of appointing our own tribunals to finally decide these matters is to assume what is not correct.

Mr. Reid:

I do not underrate the gravity of this matter. It is really one of the most important matters we have to consider, and I also attach very great weight to the views which have been expressed in favor of preserving the right of appeal to the Privy Council. But it occurs to me that we really in this matter only have the choice between a Federal Court of Appeal without an appeal to the Privy Council, or no Federal Court of Appeal at all. That is the position we are in. I have every sympathy with the desire for scientific law, which great banking institutions can afford to try to get, and which desire they manifest on special occasions. I have every sympathy with them, and so far as I am concerned I would always be willing to help them on in their desire for scientific justice; but if you had a court above the Privy Council find another tribunal upon that again, you might be as far from the attainment of scientific justice as ever. We have to look at this matter in the interests of the mass of persons who are engaged in litigation. Looking at this mass of persons and their interests, I believe that the Federal Supreme Court of Australia would be a decided boon to those persons. To get a settlement of disputed points is sometimes a supreme question. As for bringing about any state of things in which the litigant will be satisfied after he is defeated, I despair of any such result. You may go to the Privy Council, and if you are successful, then it is the most august and just tribunal in the world. If you are not successful, you think it is the very opposite of that. I give up any search for scientific justice. It is only the great, wealthy corporations who can afford to look after that sort of thing. What we have to consider is this: will the Federal Supreme Court give as much justice as any other tribunal of a similar kind? I think it will, and I believe its decisions will create uniformity within the Commonwealth. I think we all value our present privileges very much. I have, as I say, the greatest respect for the Privy Council. I would have still greater respect for some tribunal higher, than that, and so on, and so on, but we have to consider the average litigants. They want justice, but cannot get justice; they, want decisions as near their own homes as possible. The Privy Council is, so far as the mass of people is concerned, beyond their reach. They can never get there. The Federal High Court of Australia will be much more accessible to them. I believe in bringing an important superior tribunal as near the people of Australia as we can. The federal tribunal will, I know, be for a great many people too far away also, but, looking at the choice between the Privy Council and the Federal Court of Appeal, in the interests of the great masses of those who are unfortunate enough to become plaintiffs and defendants, I say again it is the choice between a Federal Court of Appeal or no Court of Appeal at all, as far as the bulk of the people are concerned. I admit that we will require a Federal Court for other purposes. But I think this Convention will agree with me that we must decide this matter on the simple issue: Are we going to bring the final settlement of litigation nearer home to the Australian people? If so we must make the decisions of the Federal Court final; but if, on the other hand, we think that the loss of the advantage of Privy Council decisions would be so great that it overbalances the advantage of bringing the final decision nearer home, then let us bid good-bye to the Federal Court of Appeal. We have to make our choice, either to leave things as they are and allow the people of several colonies to appeal from the local Supreme Courts to the Privy Council, or to make this Federal Court the tribunal of Australia. On the whole, while admitting that the arguments on the other side are very weighty, I am prepared to take the step of creating, this local final tribunal. It will have the advantage of the decisions of the Privy Council and the House of Lords just the same.

An HON. MEMBER:

It will not be bound by them.

Mr. REID:

They will not be bound to follow them, but the decisions of such bodies will carry the greatest weight in the Federal Court even though there be no appeal from the Federal Court, just as the decisions in America do in the House of Lords or the Privy Council. I believe that in the end, flowing from the establishment of this Federal Court, the tone and precision of the laws of the empire may be improved, instead of the opposite result coming upon us. It is admitted that American jurisprudence has thrown lights on the British law of a most valuable kind.
So in the administration of justice in Australia it may well be that in the course of years the fact that we have a final tribunal here, instead of creating confusion, will tend to improve the state of law. But the main point is, "Are we going to make the choice?" It would simply be mocking litigants to create a new and expensive obstacle in their way without removing any of the existing obstacles. These are sufficiently numerous already. On the whole, I prefer to take the clause as it stands.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

The hon. member who has just resumed his seat appeals to the vote of the Committee, chiefly on the ground of saving expense to litigants. Well, if this proposal is carried the litigants will not be dragged to London, but they will be dragged with their case possibly to one of the inland towns in one of the States. Counsel, too, will have to travel a considerable distance, and they will not go for nominal fees; so that when you come to the question of fees to be paid to them, I will undertake to say that they will be much higher than you would have to pay counsel in London. You will have to pay them for travelling perhaps to Ballarat or Goulburn. With the multitude of men of great ability who are offering their services to litigants in London you can fix your price at a reasonable figure.

Mr. REID:

You would prefer to have both courts?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

No; I do not believe in giving this right of appeal to the Privy Council unless both parties consent. Do not make these obstacles for litigants to surmount. My hon. friend here has never been in the unfortunate position of having had to take a case to the Privy Council, and he is never engaged in a case except where it pays him well. Sir George Dibbs at the 1891 Convention expressed the opinion that he would find it much cheaper to go to the Privy Court than to a local court. The law is just as cheap in England as in Australia. We have so few men at the bar to take great cases in hand that they almost put whatever fee they like upon their services, and those fees are often enormous. If you go to an English bar you have the choice of 2,000 men of great ability, and the experience is that the Privy Council cases are not expensive. The reverse is the case, as the great bulk of the expense is incurred in the trial of the cases here-in Australia-and this plea about expenses being saved to litigants is one that will not bear examination, or if it be examined it will be found to be as I have indicated. With all due respect, I say that this is one of the steps towards separation from the mother-country. We have too few links left now binding us to the Crown. I am in favor of maintaining connection with the mother-country, for I do not want to see the links whittled away and destroyed one by one, unless there is a distinct mandate from the people of Australia to do so. Edmund Burke says Change is a word of ill omen to happy ears. Has there been any agitation for this? Has there been any complaint as to the administration of law by the Privy Council? Why force this change upon the people, then? Why should we take away from the people a civil right which has nothing to do with Federation? We are here for the purpose of federating the Australian States, and to increase the rights and liberties of our people, not to deprive them of their privileges. You are by this action taking away from the people of Australasia that which they may hold dear, and even if only a large minority hold it dear, you have no right to deprive them of it, and risk Federation in making experiment of this character. If it is necessary to take away this right, then leave it to you Federal Parliament to do it. Do not attempt a thing which will imperil Federation. I know of circumstances which I am not at liberty to repeat here, but which make me hold strong views on this question. It is a matter of public notoriety that our own Chief Justice is against this being done, and after this and the testimony which has been added by Sir Edward Braddon we must pause before we deprive men of their civil liberty. This, I repeat, is one of the first steps towards separation from the mother-country, and this change is utterly uncalled for. My hon. friend Sir John Downer said it was a necessary corollary of our right to make our laws that we should be capable of interpreting them. The laws are made by the Parliament, of which the Queen is a component part. The laws are as much made by the Queen as by the people here, and you are going to cut out from the judiciary that which is an essential part of the legislation. The laws are not made by the two Chambers, but, in the words of the Act, by the Queen,

By and with the advice of the two Houses of Parliament.

We do not yet take the right to make our laws.

Mr. TRENWITH:

We take the right to make them in this way, if the Constitution is passed.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

We are not competent, in the sense urged against this Federal Court of Appeal, to make our laws, because we recognise the necessity, of approaching Her Majesty. The hon. member speaks of this as one of the essentials to our becoming a nation, but we are not becoming a nation.

Mr. SYMON:
What are we becoming, then?

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
We are becoming a dependency; we are a dependency; we, are not an independent nation.

Mr. TRENWITH:
A nation within a nation.

Mr. FRASER:
Part of a nation.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
These interruptions sometimes help a speaker, but they do not help me. I hope it will not hurt hon. members if I do not reply to them. There have been strong arguments urged in the letter which was read by Sir Joseph Abbott, and they are arguments which cannot be lightly put aside. An additional argument, which would never be used by a judge, and which I dare to use, with all respect, is that with men selected in small communities where every man is known to the other, and where influences not felt in great communities are strong and make themselves manifest, even the most strong-willed and right-minded men are unconsciously biased. That bias is undoubtedly felt by judges in small communities, and would not be felt by judges in the court of any great empire. Knowing that the bias must exist, it is well to provide that the court should be as pure as the stream from the fountain by administering justice from that fountain-head where these influences are absent. I can give an instance which imputes no dishonor to anyone. I remember Mr. McMillan moving our House in New South Wales to take into consideration the case of the pastoral lessees of the Crown who were being rack-rented. The decision of the Supreme Court was given in the case of Allison v. Burns that the Minister of Lands had the power to put his pen to paper and fix the rent of pastoral leases. It was held that the Legislature intended that to be so, but an appeal was taken to the Privy Council, and the decision was given that the Minister of Lands had not this power. The power of determining given to his hands was merely that of fixing it after it had been determined by another authority and recommendations on the subject had been made to him. That decision on the question put every lawyer of the colony on his feet, and they said it was against the intention of Parliament. Parliament was then appealed to, and it declared that the Privy Council had properly announced its intention. There we had an instance of a body, not surrounded by local influences, and not breathing the air of local circumstances, which led up to the fact, and which was not influenced by evidence given in the court here, nor by the surroundings and circumstances which local men cannot possibly put on one side, giving an independent decision. As a result of that decision the pastoral lessees effected a saving of £200,000 or £300,000 per annum. Would that body of men in New South Wales, recollecting their experience, and recollecting that justice had been given by the Privy Council, and that it was denied them by the local courts, be prepared to hand over their civil rights to this Federal Court of Appeal? I will take another ease in which at the time most men thought the local court was right. I refer to the case of Taylor v. Barton, in which the privilege of Parliament was concerned. The decision of the local court was, however, overruled by the Privy Council, but at the first blush nine men out of ten thought the decision of the local court was right. What has been the result? Is there a man now who questions the decision of the Privy Council?

P.980 starts here

Mr. BARTON:
Will my hon. friend pardon me. He is utterly wrong, because the decision of the Privy Council was the same as that of the Supreme Court, which shows that the Supreme Court was sufficient.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I may have been wrong in this ease. It was one which occurred to my mind while speaking. The English Court has opportunities of arriving at knowledge on legal matters which the courts here have not. Its lawyers have better opportunities and better experience, and, more than that, there is a greater selection of men to fill the positions than we will ever have here. I hope, therefore, that there will not be this unnecessary interference with the privileges of the people. We have declared to them that Federation will not curtail the civil rights of the people, but will enlarge them; but here is a curtailment of a right which every Englishman holds dear-the right that justice shall flow free from the fountain head. We are going to demand more than was conceded to Canada, more than has ever been demanded from the British Government, as we are demanding that the Queen shall give up her right to administer justice, through her best men, to the people who are her subjects. In a matter of this kind, do not let us jeopardise the cause of Federation by introducing this foreign element. For whose benefit is it? It is not for the benefit of the litigants, because it will be quite as costly, and the delays are as great now in the Local Courts as they are before the Privy Council. I can give cases where the Department of Lands has been waiting for two years for decisions from our Local Courts. We do not have to wait longer for a decision from the Privy Council. For the sake of uniformity of decision, and of that confidence which the people have in the Privy Council, do not let us make this change. Another thing the hon. member pointed out was that human nature affects men. We know that our judges, as well as any other men, are better for having a corrective influence behind them. There is no man so good, but he is better for knowing that there is a corrective influence behind him, and our courts would be all the better for having a power behind them, which could correct their judgments, if they are against the law. Do not let us remove this corrective influence, and take away the rights of the people. If the matter has to come, let it come in its own time, when public opinion has shaped itself. Let us remember that there is a large body of men who will vote against Federation, if only because the Constitution contains this innovation. Do not let us jeopardise the cause of Federation by imposing this distasteful provision.

Mr. SYMON:
The hon. member, as he very often does, has adopted that uncompromising tone which carries him beyond the necessities of his argument. He reminds one-in fact he is an Australian reproduction-of that celebrated English politician known as "Tear'em." When he attempts, in that emphatic manner of his, to prove that the effect of the clause will be to take away rights which British subjects possess all over the empire, he is imposing a little too much on our credulity. This clause does not take away what is known as the inalienable right of a British subject in one single particle. The inalienable right of a British subject is to approach Her Majesty as a suppliant. That is left entirely untouched by this Constitution. It is the right of every British subject, the humblest in the realm, whether in this portion of the Empire or any other, to go to the Throne for the redress of grievances, but Her Majesty has constituted in various parts of the Empire, courts for the redress of grievances, and each of these courts is as much the court of Her Majesty the Queen, whether it exists in this country or in England, as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Now, if the Imperial Parliament had chosen, as they might have done, to declare some court in these colonies to be the final court of appeal, no one could have said for one instant that that was not giving the subject the right of final appeal to which he was entitled; and all we propose to do here is to declare that, instead of having a court of appeal in England to which the suitor can go, we have a final court of appeal here which should absolutely and finally decide the question.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
   Is that not begging the question?
Mr. SYMON:
   No. What particular virtue is there in the Privy Council that is not shared by the courts in Australia?
   Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT: More able men!
Mr. SYMON:
   More able men, says Sir Joseph Abbott.
Mr. FRASER:
   More experience!
Mr. SYMON:
   Mr. Fraser says more experience.
Mr. FRASER:
   Less liable to influence!
Mr. SYMON:
   Less liable to influence! I will relate a story told by Lord Westbury to illustrate the point. Lord Westbury met the late Sir William Erle, a distinguished Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, and he said,
   "How is it you never come and sit with us in the Privy Council?" "Well," was the reply, "I am old and deaf and stupid." "Oh!" said Westbury, "that's nothing. Chelmsford and I are very old, Napier is very deaf, and Colville is very stupid, but we make a very good Court of Appeal nevertheless."
   Except that I am supported by so distinguished an authority as Lord Westbury, I would not venture to insinuate any opinion of that kind against a court esteem in its proper place, and when it is right, for it has been admitted that it is sometimes wrong. But when we hear these extravagant eulogies passed upon the Privy Council in comparison with this High Court of Australia, which we intend to make strong and able and respected, I think it is doing a great injustice, and perpetrating a gross calumny on both the bench and bar of this country, and that in spite of the letter which an hon. member was good enough to show me, and which has been read by Sir Edward Braddon. I want to refer to the letter from Mr. Justice Richmond, read by Sir Joseph Abbott to-day, and which was read to the Convention of 1891.

An HON. MEMBER:
   It was not read, it was printed.
Mr. FRASER:
   Had it been read the majority would have been the other way.
Mr. SYMON:
   It would have had exactly the opposite effect.
Mr. KINGSTON:

There was a reply by Mr. Inglis Clarke.

Mr. SYMON:

I am told that there was a reply to that letter-by Mr. Inglis Clarke, and it was printed. In that connection I wish to deprecate an observation which, I am sure, was good-naturedly used by my hon. friend Sir Joseph Abbott when he was rather scornfully alluding to Mr. Inglis Clarke's reply by saying that Mr. Justice Richmond had been longer on the bench than Mr. Inglis Clarke had been at the bar. I have certainly not had a very long acquaintance with Mr. Inglis Clarke, but I have had enough to know that there is no man in Australia on the bench or off who has made a more profound study of jurisprudence, or who is more capable of expressing an opinion on such matters as these now before us than that gentleman.

Mr. BARTON:

Especially when they relate to a Federal Constitution.

Mr. SYMON:

And as my hon. friend Mr. Barton observes, especially when they relate to a Federal Constitution. But I would commend this point to my hon. friend Sir Joseph Abbott, that although Mr. Justice Richmond-who, I believe, is dead now-was undoubtedly an eminent and distinguished judge, that letter which has been read is the letter of an advocate written by a judge; it is not a judicial letter, but a letter from the point of view, too, of a judge, and not of an advocate in actual practice and knowledge of his profession, because if hon. members attentively consider some of the passages of that letter they will, as I do, feel a sense of regret that so distinguished a judge should have indulged in such extraordinary and in some parts, for a letter, heated language. In the last paragraph-he does not say so in direct terms-but he implies or suggests that, looking at the present importance of the colonies and the learning of colonial lawyers, none of them are fit to sit on the Privy Council or adjudicate upon colonial questions.

Mr. DEAKIN:

What about the Chief Justice of South Australia then?

Mr. SYMON:

Yes: there is the test of the value of his letter. At this particular moment Australia has joined in sending one of her judges to take a seat on the Privy Council, in order, if you please -because it really amounts to that-to instruct the Privy Council on matters of Australian moment and assist in determining Australian questions. Surely that is the best illustration.

Mr. FRASER:
And yet we want to cut off the connection.

Mr. SYMON:

We want to keep our judges here. We do not want to send our judges to the Privy Council in order to strengthen that body and the administration of justice on colonial matters.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

You worked very hard to get it done, though. (Laughter.)

Mr. SYMON:

I did not; still I do not know but that perhaps the hon. member is not to some extent right in saying that. I think the interests of Federation were against it. But if we did ask for the appointment he refers to, surely that affords

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

When you get the Chief Justice there you destroy his localism.

Mr. SYMON:

My hon. friend must see that if we in Australia consider it necessary or desirable that that tribunal which he lauds so much should be the court for dealing with colonial appeals by the presence on its bench of a colonial judge, the logical conclusion is—and this I put to my hon. friend Mr. Carruthers, who tries to be logical, with occasionally a fair amount of success—

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

We hold mutual opinions in that respect.

Mr. SYMON:

I say the result is that instead of trying to bolster up—and I use that word with all respect, for I should be sorry indeed that any disparaging words should escape my lips—instead of trying to build up the Privy Council in dealing with Australian appeals by sending home one or more of our judges, we had very much better keep our judges here to constitute a strong Court of Appeal in our midst. Then Sir Joseph Abbott talked about uniformity of the law. Well, really those of us who are in practice are well aware that the decisions of the Privy Council would exercise practically, if not absolutely, as much influence if cited before the High Court of Australia, if it were the final Court of Appeal, as they do now. The phrase that "the court is not bound by" is a mere façon de parler. It is a phrase we are in the habit of using. As Mr. Higgins said, great attention and weight are attributed to United States decisions, not only from the highest court of the land, but from the Supreme Courts of the States, and they are cited before English tribunals, though they are not bound by those decisions. The law administered here would be the common law of England, as it is now, without divergence and without qualification, except as it is varied by Statute law. I have yet to learn, as Mr. Reid put it very clearly and very moderately, that the laws administered by our High Court of Australia would not have at least some weight in England. We have given statutes to England. We have had our statutes placed on the statute book of other colonies, and England has followed suit in some respects. I feel no reason to apprehend that the law which has been weighty in other courts of the realm would not be as weighty within the bounds of the Commonwealth we are attempting to create. My hon. friend said the establishment of the High Court of Australia and the discontinuance of appeals to the Privy Council would degrade our State Supreme Court. Surely he cannot have weighed that. How can it have such an effect? How can it be said that there would be one single element of degradation? He speaks of our financial interests, and we hear of the great bogie of the rights of property. I have as great a desire to maintain the rights of property as he has. I do not believe in the sacred rights of contract being wantonly interfered with. I do not believe in sacred rights of property being assailed unnecessarily, but it would lessen the power of the purse if we pass this; and if we do that, even, to a small extent, it will redound to our credit and bring upon us the commendation of those who have sent us here. Then Mr. Carruthers talked about local influences. We propose to have this federal judiciary exercising its functions in the federal territory. Does anyone mean to tell me—because this is really a suggestion of possible corruption—that the High Court would be more liable to local influences than the judges of our Supreme Courts, whose decisions are treated with respect? Would they not be less liable to be so influenced? And if they would be less liable to be so influenced, why should we not go to them for the final arbitrament of our cases? Is it necessary to go 12,000 miles away to get rid of these local influences? Is it necessary that one litigant should drag another to the other end of the earth in order to escape the possibility in some rare case—none has ever been suggested yet—in which local influences might be exerted? But then it all comes back to the real issue as put by Mr. Reid: either we are to abolish the High Court altogether or to do away with the appeal to the Privy Council. We have this morning with great care been constituting a High Court of Judiciary for the Federation; we have been establishing it with a minimum number of four judges and a Chief-Justice; we have been surrounding it with safe, guards to secure its independence, to secure its integrity, and to secure its freedom, from legislative domination. Then if we are going to keep the Privy Council for all appeals we want no such court; it is a useless expenditure of public money, because the State Courts will give their decisions, the subordinate Federal Courts will give their decisions, and if you are going to have an appeal to the Privy Council you want no Federal High Court at all. If you strike out this clause upon which we are now engaged, then I for one am prepared to go for certainly a modification if not the absolute repeal of the provision with regard to establishing the High Court. It is an unnecessary expense, whose only justification is that we want this High Court of Judiciary in our midst with a view to deciding questions which may arise. If we are going to entrust it with the determination of all these momentous questions of constitutional law, if it, is competent to decide them, surely it is competent to decide the thousand and one comparatively small matters of litigation in relation to the ordinary affairs of life? That is what is sought to be taken away from its appellate jurisdiction. I think we should be simply inserting in this Constitution a court that would be an absolute mockery if we withdrew this power of final appeal from it. The object of the court is to decide high matters of constitutional right-constitutional interest—and we superadd to that all the other powers of appeal in order to save expense; in order that all shall be on an equal footing, and have equal opportunity of going to the nearest court in order to have their cases determined. Then again what is the High court to do if we take away this power of appeal? What are to be its duties? How long is it to sit? What power is it to have? If you take away this power you give it practically nothing. The Convention has assented to the clause which establishes this High Court, and then in the next clause it is sought to take away from it its work. I would like some hon. member to say what this High Court of Australia will have to do. Mr. Carruthers is uncompromisingly inconsistent. He says, take it away. If the Convention, in its wisdom, had declared there should be no High Court, it would have avoided the necessity of a struggle to maintain appeal to the Privy Council, which would then have been the only means of redress, although a very inconvenient one; but to carry the clause and still retain this iniquitous and burdensome power of appeal is to be utterly consistent as well as extravagant.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Iniquitous?

Mr. SYMON:

Yes; absolutely iniquitous in its working in respect to poor litigants in this country. I have had some experience of its working. I do not put it upon the point as to the measure of fees here or there, but I say that no litigant can possibly instruct his advisers in England with the same efficiency or to the same degree as he can when he is on the spot. He has got to trust to correspondence, and he has communications made by other people who are there. He has not any direct communication with these, and the whole thing is in the hands of your wealthy litigants and wealthy corporations, who are able, holding this engine of appeal over the heads-I will not mention specific cases- of some less favored men, to compel a settlement or compromise that, the principles of justice would never have tolerated. Now, I want to say a word about that so-called link. I have no wish to sever any link, and I have

Mr. FRASER:
A so-called link?

Mr. SYMON:
Yes; the Privy Council is no link connecting us with the mother-country. This Council might conduct its proceedings in Central Africa or wherever else it might be located. The Privy Council is constituted under an Imperial Act, and there is no special virtue in it. It is no link between us and the mother-country any more than any other court. Why should not this appeal be given by the Imperial Parliament, to the Queen's Bench, the Court of Appeal in England, or the House of Lords? The appointment of the Governor is a link, and if we were to interfere with the appointment of the Governor by the sovereign, we should be on the brink, of republicanism. Here we are merely establishing one court, a Federal High Court for the necessities of Australia. All we say is, having gone to the expense of constituting this court, secured its independence, secured men of ability and probity to give its decisions, we prefer that Her Majesty -not that we-shall name that as a final Court of Appeal for Australia instead of the Privy Council.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Do you think the Queen will ever assent to this?

Mr. SYMON:
I say emphatically yes. I think she will. I have no hesitation in believing that Her Majesty's assent will be assured if the people of Australia request this by their Constitution. Do I understand that Sir Joseph Abbott says that he will take care she does not?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Yes.

Mr. SYMON:
Then, I submit I feel a little embarrassed on this question. I can see my hon. friend going as a sort of corporation sole-a sole ambassador-in order to implore Her Majesty not to assent to this. I do not think he would meet with the success which in other and worthier causes he would deserve.
does not seem to me that we ought to consider this for a moment. If we think that it is for the happiness, the comfort, or better government of the people of Australia, we ought to insert it and take the risk, and I for one do not feel inclined to allow my courage to ooze out because of that delicately-put threat of my friend Sir Joseph Abbott. I am, reminded that in substance, although not in phraseology, this language is used in the Canadian Act. Matters of local interest are not referable to the Privy Council. In closing the remarks I have made I would only like to resent the imputation that it would be impossible to get men competent to sit upon this bench in Australia. All I can say is that if with a population of between three and four millions you are not able to establish a court of this character, which only requires five men to make up its full complement, then I say that we are here on an errand in establishing this Constitution that may, and indeed ought to be, fruitless. We ought to be a self-contained nation in this as in everything else-a self-contained nation not in the technical sense to which my hon. friend Mr. Carruthers referred, but in the large sense in which we have all used that expression. We should be a nation to all intents and purposes under the Crown, and we ought to be self-contained as far as it is possible to be so, and one of the elements of being in that position is that we should have a High Court capable of deciding all our litigation and all our disputes. The suggestion about not being able to secure competent men is the same antiquated argument that was trotted out when these colonies got representative government. It was said: "Oh, you will not be able to find trained and competent men to conduct your public business." But we have found them; and an argument of that sort is answered by the presence here to-day of my hon. friend Sir Joseph Abbott and my bon. friend Mr. Carruthers.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Which is the worst, a weak bench or a weak bar, and where would the bar of South Australia be if you were taken away?

Mr. SYMON:
My own view is that in New South Wales you could constitute this bench twice over.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
A very weak bar would be left.

Mr. SYMON:
I hope my hon. friend will not reflect on the capacity of his own colony's bar or bench. Equally in Victoria you could constitute such a bench.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
You would leave no bar.

Mr. SYMON:
Whether that is so or not it is the same old argument that Australia cannot produce the same class of men as they can elsewhere. It was said so in regard even to our cricketers, but we have shown pretty conclusively what we can do in that line of life. The same thing was said of our oarsmen, and has been said over and over again in regard to other matters. Really, it is time that that argument was treated like the Trojan horse-turned out to grass.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
The Trojan horse was not turned out. He was taken in.

Mr. SYMON:
He took others in. However, the v

HON. MEMBERS:
Question, question.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Sir-

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
We have had quite enough of this—quite enough of it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
You move:
That the Committee do now divide.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Notwithstanding the rather ungracious way in which my hon. friend Sir William Zeal has seen fit to treat me, I intend to have my say.

Mr. DOBSON:
If the hon. member wants to go home he can.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I shall go home, and I shall not ask you.

Several HON. MEMBERS:
Divide, divide.

Mr. HIGGINS:
My remarks will be shorter because of the speech delivered by Mr. Symon -

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
We have heard the same argument a dozen times.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I wish to appeal to the Chairman to allow me to proceed. I think I am entitled to speak.
The CHAIRMAN:
    The hon. member is entitled to address the Committee.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    I can assure Sir William Zeal that the debate will be made shorter if he will refrain from interrupting. Feel a misapprehension has grown up that we are trying to do something new. The object of this clause is simply to stereotype in the Act what has already existed in Canada, where there is a general right of appeal reserved to Her Majesty in Council on a decision of the Privy Council, but that right of appeal is not allowed unless the cases are of public interest. Therefore the effect of clause 73 is simply to put in plain English what is the law now in Canada.

Mr. BARTON:
    That is the whole purpose and object of the clause. My hon. friend has saved me the trouble of explaining it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    As Sir John Downer put it in 1891 at the Sydney Convention, we were merely putting that in plain language, so that it could be easily interpreted. There are certain phrases becoming current about this subject which are scarcely applicable to the position. It is said that we are cutting one of the links which binds Australia to England. I rather like the expression "link," but if you consider it one of the irritating links—one of the fetters round the feet of the people in Australia—then, of course, it is by no means conducive to amity between the old country and ourselves. If there is an appeal to the Privy Council when one of the parties to the action is beaten he does not like that body. As a rule, both parties dislike the Council because of the expense. How, then, is it to be regarded as conducive to harmony between England and Australia I do not know. How many are affected by this appeal to the Privy Council? I undertake to say there is not one man in a hundred thousand who has an appeal to go to the Privy Council; and I am sorry to think—that Sir William Zeal, and others who agree with him, think this appeal to the Privy Council is one of the means by which the Empire is held together.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
    I have not expressed an opinion on it. You have talked me out.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    We have a stronger link with the old country than this—a silken tie in the direction of language, history, and sentiment—than in this miserable right of appeal to the Privy Council. It has been put as if we should be severing ourselves from the great stream of British law if we take away this right of appeal. The Privy Council is not an English Court; it is like a back water of the English law, and the English Courts refuse to be bound by its decisions.

Mr. BARTON:
It is practically a board.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes; and the judges of England sitting in the High Courts of Justice have refused to be bound by its decisions. It must not be thought that by this proposal we are cutting ourselves off from the stream of British law. Is it true that these colonies can get better law and justice from the Privy Council than from their own Supreme Courts? I remember the case of a poor woman in Victoria who suffered considerable injuries in consequence of the negligence of railway employes. She brought an action against the Government under it, and got substantial damages. The Victorian Government took the case home to the Privy Council and won it, with the result that the poor woman was ruined. Then a year or two afterwards that decision of the Council was commented upon in terms of the greatest severity by English Courts, which refused to be bound by it. The Victorian Court was right and the Privy Council wrong in the judgment of the best experts.

Mr. ISAACS:
The Victorian Government could get an appeal to the Privy Council under this clause.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If I have not been wrongly informed, I think there was great confusion introduced into the New South Wales land laws in connection with a decision of the Privy Council about fifteen years ago. I understand that a whole series of the New South Wales Acts were upset by a remarkable decision of the Council, and that about ten years afterwards the same point came up again and, without expressly overruling their former decision, the Privy Council so distinguished the decisions that it practically amounted to an overruling of the previous decision.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Does not that occur in connection with all legal decisions?

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is a very vague question. There have been cases in which the ordinary courts of England have said they would not follow the Privy Council decision. I do not wish to speak disrespectfully of the work of the Privy Council, who have done so much work for the Empire, but when we say we are losing a valuable link with the Empire I say it is wrong. The Privy Council, up to a recent date, consisted principally of retired Indian judges, men who had no knowledge of the history and conditions of the colonies, but I admit there has been an improvement during late years. I feel there is no answer to Sir John Downer's contention. If you give to the Parliament of Australasia power to make laws to affect the lives and property of men, there is no possible reason why you should not give to the Federal Executive and Judiciary power to administer those laws. I feel that efficiency of the Court and dignity will come with responsibility. I say there is nothing that will make the Australasian Court so strong as the feeling that its decisions are to be final and are to guide the other courts. I think too much has been made of the point that there will be a cheapening of litigation. But the English counsel has to make himself very often familiar with a long course of colonial legislation and decisions in order to work up his case, and it stands to reason that he must charge more fees than a colonial counsel. I regard it also as very likely that wherever you place the federal capital you will find that lawyers will settle there, so that they will be available for conducting cases before the High Court. Another point raised is that British capital will be terrified from investment in Australia if we keep this High Court only. Does anyone say that British capital has been kept away from the United States because the States have not got an appeal to Great Britain? We know that British capital flows more readily there than to Australia, and you will find that the securities of the States—whether Government, railway, or corporation—stand upon as high a level at any security in the world, with the exception of English consols. As British capital flows to the States it will flow to Australia, so long as Australia keeps its settled condition and shows its wholesome dread of any violent changes. I have therefore to say, although we have come to a division on the subject, and the only question is that the clause shall stand without amendment, that I feel sure that no one who has seized the idea of the importance of a Federal Court—because I say Australia is a nation under the Queen, and long may it remain so—will refuse to that national court the dignity and efficiency which will result from giving to it final jurisdiction.

HON. MEMBERS:

Divide

Mr. DOBSON:

I have only risen to claim the votes of my hon. friend Mr. Symon and the Premier of New South Wales, and will keep the Committee but a few minutes. I claim their votes for three reasons. Mr. Symon has spent his wonderful eloquence in pointing out that eminent and able lawyers will preside over the Federal Supreme Court, but he absolutely gave his case away when he said that if you allow citizens the choice as to whether they will appeal to the Privy Council or the Supreme Court there would be no need for a Federal Supreme Court.

Mr. SYMON:
Not the choice.

Mr. DOBSON:
We simply ask you not to take away a right which every British subject now possesses. It is all very well to refer to the petition of right, but that is never used once in a century.

Mr. SYMON:
It has been used here.

Mr. DOBSON:
It may be used once in fifty years, but we are talking about the practical right to appeal to the Privy Council from the decision of a colonial court. Both Mr. Symon and Mr. Reid have declared that there will be no need for the Federal Supreme Court, and that you might as well sweep it away altogether as give the people the right of appealing to either the Federal Courts or the Privy Council. In the words of Mr. Carruthers, we are here to enlarge the rights and privileges of the people and not to put a sentence in the Bill which will curtail a privilege which many of us hold very dear indeed. I do not believe that one case out of thirty will go to the Privy Council, but if in that one case and in other cases the parties agree to reserve a law point for the decision of the Privy Council why should they be debarred from that privilege? I have such an opinion as to the eminence of our colonial judges—and there are not as many of them amongst four millions as there are amongst forty millions of people—that I believe they will win the confidence of the people of Australia without our compelling all appeals to go to them, but, instead of strengthening them, by shutting out the right of appeal to the Privy Council you will weaken them. The judges of the High Court will have power to make rules for the conduct of appeals, and they will take very good care to keep down the fees if they have to compete with the Privy Council. I do not wish to make much of this point, but the fees at home are one-third less than they are here. I can show my bills going back for the last thirty years, and on the question of cheapness it is much better to go to England than go to an Australian Court of Appeal. Then you may have a German Subject from Samoa, or a Frenchman from New Caledonia losing a case here, and being advised by English lawyers that the very point of international law or maritime law involved in their action has been missed, but they would be debarred from going to the Privy Council. I believe our judges, in spite of the opinion of Mr. Symon and Mr. Reid, will gain the confidence of the people and secure most, of the appeals even if we allow the privilege of appeal to the Privy Council to remain, and I hope it will not be taken away.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Clause 74-Jurisdiction of courts-as read, agreed to.
Clause 75-Original jurisdiction of High Court-as read, agreed to.
Clause 76.-Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to authorise any suit in law or equity against the Commonwealth, or any person sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, or against a Stat or any person sued on behalf of a State, by any individual person or corporation, except by the consent of the Commonwealth, or of the State, as the case may be.

Mr. GLYNN:
I propose to move an amendment in this clause.

Mr. BARTON. Perhaps the hon. member will allow me to say that I have been considering this particular clause. Although it is in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, and went through the consideration which that measure went through, I am not at all certain that that clause should find a place in this Bill.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Hear, hear. Let us strike it out.

Mr. BARTON:

The Judiciary Committee decided to send this clause on, and therefore the Drafting Committee thought they had no alternative but to embody it here. If, however, it is, thought that the clause should be defended it would be well to defend it now, and if it is not to be supported, let us strike it out.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Supposing you do, will the individual have the right to sue the State?

Mr. BARTON:

Why not? This Constitution binds the Crown.

Mr. GLYNN:

I made a hard fight in the Judiciary Committee to get this clause left out, but I did not succeed, and if it is to be struck out I will not press my amendment.

Mr. WISE:

I thought it should be in.

Mr. GLYNN:

The hon. members agree to it being left out now.

Mr. WISE:

I do not agree, but if the majority is willing that it should be left out I will not object.

Mr. GLYNN:

This deals with the right of the subject to sue the Commonwealth without the consent of the Commonwealth. We saw what occurred in the Transvaal recently, where a subject sued the State; and judgment, was given against the State, and an attempt was made by the Parliament afterwards to practically emasculate the power of the court. If they had the power to prevent it they would have stopped the action. At present there is the remedy of petition of right against the State, if there is a breach of contract, and what I would propose is, seeing that some of our colonies have disposed of the necessity of proceeding by petition of right against the State, that we ought to authorise the Federal Parliament to pass a similar law declaring that the subject shall have the right under certain circumstances without a petition of right. I would propose an amendment:

To insert at the beginning of the section "until Parliament otherwise provides."

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Strike the whole clause out.

Mr. ISAACS:

I would like to hear the meaning of this clause.
Mr. GLYNN:
The meaning is that a subject has not the right to sue the Commonwealth or State without the consent of the Commonwealth or of the State.

Mr. ISAACS:
I should like to hear what the chairman of the Judiciary Committee thinks of the clause.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
No one is in favor of it.

Mr. SYMON:
I think it should be struck out.
Clause struck out.

Clause 77.-The jurisdiction of the High Court, or of any other court exercising federal jurisdiction, may be exercised by such number of judges as the Parliament prescribes.

Mr. SYMON:
I move:
To insert after "Judges " the words "and in such places."

Mr. LEWIS:
Surely the Executive should fix the place.

Mr. BARTON:
Where would the High Court, or any other court which might be vested with federal jurisdiction, sit until an Act was passed by the Parliament?

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:
If the Parliament-like Some physicians-delayed prescribing for a little while, the community would be sick for want of the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. SYMON:
I think they will all be appointed pretty well simultaneously, and there would not be any difficulty. It would be convenient to leave the amendment I propose.

Mr. BARTON:
Would this not be a difficulty? The Commonwealth would be in existence for six months before the Parliament can sit. If the amendment is carried subjects of the Commonwealth anxious to bring appeals, appeals which would be substituted for the appeal to the Privy Council, would not be able to unless there is some means for the Executive to determine where the court shall sit.

Mr. WISE:
The first act of Parliament must be to pass a Judiciary Act.
Mr. SYMON:  I do not see how the High Court, or any other Federal Court, could exercise its jurisdiction until there is a Judiciary Act.

Mr. O'CONNOR:  I would point out that we ought not to fix the place for circuit under an Act of Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS:  You might fix the times too.

Mr. O'CONNOR:  It might be necessary to alter the place. You cannot say where the judges will go to circuit because principally the Court of Appeal will sit where the centre of government is. The circuits, must be left to be provided by regulations; otherwise our hands may be tied in an inconvenient way.

Mr. SYMON:  This amendment was moved in deference to the wish of Sir Samuel Griffith. At the same time I admit there is great force in what my hon. friends have said, and it would be better to leave the words out and leave Parliament or the Executive to make arrangements. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Leave given.

Clause as read passed.

Clause 78-The trial of all indictable offences cognisable by any court established under the authority of this Constitution shall be by jury, and every such trial shall be held in the State where the offence has been committed and when not committed within any State the trial shall be held at such place or places as the Parliament prescribes.

Mr. HIGGINS:  I shall vote against this clause. Trial by jury is an expedient which the Federal Parliament may or may not insist on. For my own part I think all criminal cases should be tried by jury, but still I think we should not tie the bands of the Federal Parliament, especially as there appear to be arising new conditions under which the whole system of trial by jury may be reorganised, although it would be almost impossible to change the existing system if this clause stand. All I want is not to tie the hands of the Federal Parliament, but to leave this as a question of expediency for the Federal Parliament to determine.

Clause, as read, agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:  I have a statement to make to the Committee. The Treasurers who have been deliberating about the finance and trade provisions of the Bill have been in communication, and I believe that they have practically arrived at some provisions to be submitted to the Convention.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

We have not yet had these placed in our hands, and when they are so placed it will be necessary for a couple of draughtsmen to detach themselves for the purpose of bringing the resolutions of the sub-committee into the shape which the Bill will require, so that we cannot now, as intended, go on with the finance and trade clauses. I propose to move their postponement till after the chapter dealing with the States has been considered, and if they are not ready then, till after the chapter dealing with new States. In the meantime we can go on with the clauses dealing with the States. I move:

That clauses 87 to 96 be postponed until after the consideration of chapter v.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. SYMON:

I ask the attention of Mr. Barton to the words in the first line of section 74:

Within the limits of the judicial power of the High Court ought to be struck out. It is an error, and might cause confusion hereafter.

Mr. BARTON:

I shall remember that. They are unnecessary words.

CHAPTER V.-THE STATES.

Clause 97.-Continuance of powers of Parliaments of the States-agreed to.

Clause 98.-Validity of existing laws-agreed to.

Clause 99.-Inconsistency of laws-agreed to.

Clause 100.-Powers to be exercised by Governors of States-agreed to.

Clause 101.-Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, the constitutions of the several States of the Commonwealth shall continue as at the establishment of the Commonwealth, until altered by or under the authority of the Parliaments thereof in accordance with the provisions of their respective Constitutions.

Dr. COCKBURN:

I move:

To strike out the words "in accordance with the provisions of their respective constitutions."

I take it that it is an inalienable principle in a Federation that the States within the Federation should be at liberty to decide themselves as to what form of Constitution they will live under. They should not require to go to any outside authority.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Only to their own Parliament.

Dr. COCKBURN:

They require under this clause to have the Royal assent to any alteration of their Constitution. The Parliaments of the States will have no longer the power to deal with questions outside the Commonwealth. They will be confined to matters within the States. They will have no power whatever to, legislate in reference to navigation, immigration, or any of those matters regarding which- formerly Bills passed by the Parliaments have had to be reserved for the Royal assent. Therefore, seeing that it is regarded by all authorities, as a characteristic of Federation, and as a means of increasing the powers of self-government of the people, that the Constitutions under which the peoples of the States choose to live may be changed by them at their own will, without reference to outside authority, I propose to strike out these words.

Mr. ISAACS:

They preserve the right you speak of.

Dr. COCKBURN:

No; the States will not have the right to amend their Constitutions without appealing to some authority outside. They do not have to do that in Canada, nor in America.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Do you want our States to take the place of Canadian provinces

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

They only communicate with the Queen through the Governor-General.

Dr. COCKBURN:

I have raised this point at every opportunity. I do not wish to take up the time of the Convention, but I certainly shall move-an amendment, because the clause is not in accordance with the general provisions of Federation. The States composing the Federation should have full power to deal with local affairs. Essentially, all external relations are taken out of their jurisdiction. I do think they ought to have the power themselves to say what the Constitution under which they live shall be.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I would like to ask Sir John Downer, who, I see, is in charge of the Bill, whether this would be the proper place to move the re-insertion of the clause which requires all communications with the Queen to be made through the Governor-General. It was in the 1891 Bill, but was omitted by the Constitutional Committee.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We, have already decided, I think, that each colony can communicate direct, as to its own affairs.
Mr. DEAKIN:
Not in this Committee; only in the Constitutional Committee.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I would suggest it could, be better done as a new clause.
Mr. DEAKIN:
This is the proper place for it.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN:
The proposition had better be put in this clause, or otherwise we will have to go through the Bill without it.
Mr. DEAKIN:
It will be a new clause sandwiched between these clauses; but, if desired, we can defer it till the new clauses are considered.
Clause, as read, agreed to.
Clause 102-In each State of the Commonwealth there shall be a Governor.
Dr. COCKBURN:
I wish to move:
That the following words be added to this clause! "The Parliament of a State may make such provisions as it thinks fit as to the manner of appointment of the Governor of the State, and for the tenure of his office, and for his removal from office."
Mr. DEAKIN:
In the 1891 Bill it was dealt with in a separate clause.
Dr. COCKBURN:
If the lion. member wishes to move it as a separate clause I will give place to him.
Mr. DEAKIN:
No.
Dr. COCKBURN:
This was a separate clause in 1891. It was excised by the Constitutional Committee, but I think a mistake was made in excising it. It would be a mistake to deprive the States of the power of making such provision for the appointment of its Governor as it may-think proper. If this clause stands in its present form the appointment of Governors of the States will practically lie in the hands of the Federal Executive. The Governor-General will make the appointments. The Federal Executive and the Governor-General will have such an influence with Downing-street that practically the nomination of State Governors will lie in the hands of the Federal Executive. I think that would be a most objectionable state of things. That is practically what occurs in Canada, and it is open to grave objections. The result there is that very often appointments are bestowed on persons who are unacceptable to the various provinces. A mistake has been made in excising the clause, and I hope this Committee will restore it. In any case I will press the matter to a division.

Mr. GRANT:

Before you put the question I would suggest:

To substitute "Lieutenant-Governor" for "Governor."

I propose this amendment so that we may have some information from the Constitutional Committee, which is now represented here by Sir John Downer, as to why the word "Governor" is used. It seems to me that the term might give rise to some confusion of names, and it might be better therefore, as is done in Canada, to use the words "Lieutenant-Governor." I was in Canada when the first lieutenant-governors were appointed from local men, and so far from dissatisfaction having been shown, the community was pleased with the choice. They were selected from leading men, some of them being politicians who were anxious to retire from political strife. It would, I think, be better on behalf of the Commonwealth that eminent local men should be appointed at a moderate salary, and as a reward for services rendered to the community. I would like to see my amendment carried, unless the Constitutional Committee can give us some reasons against it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

The reason the word was retained is practically mixed up with the amendment of Dr. Cockburn. We do not call them lieutenant-governors, because they are governors. We wish in this Constitution to preserve the entities of the States, except so far as they are surrendered, and we say that they are to have their governors.

Mr. ISAACS:

Do you really want clause 102 at all?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I should think it would be as well to leave it, because it will prevent misapprehension on the subject.

Mr. BARTON:
In order that we might not be supposed to resort to the Canadian practice of having Lieutenant-Governors.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I really do not know. It may be that under the Canadian Constitution the States have become so emasculated that there may not be so much trouble about anything; but I fancy that these colonies are not prepared to federate unless they understand that the States are to preserve their individuality to a very considerable extent. If they are to remain with all their Houses of Parliament and all their machinery of Government, I think the same arguments will apply with equal force here. It will be very bad to have at the head of the Commonwealth a man who is bound to be mixed up in the politics of the moment, with all the powers and prejudices that they will create. There are the same arguments against the Governor of a State being appointed as there is against the Governor-General.

Mr. WISE:

I hope the amendment will be carried. It has been insisted frequently through these debates that in order to recommend this Bill to the people it will be necessary to show that there will be some compensating economies for the anticipated extra expenditure. Nothing can be more wasteful, as I think nothing can be more absurd under our Constitution, than for each of the colonies to keep up a separate Government House. I aim not going to enter into a discussion as to whether a Government House is a desirable thing in any colony; but letting that pass, we must admit that however much any colony might desire to change its present system of the appointment of its Governor, under the existing Constitution Act that process would be difficult. We are now making a change so complete as if not altogether intended to destroy the efficiency of Governors appointed from England, at all events considerably to modify the nature of their work. It seems only fitting that in making this change we should put it into the power of any State by a simple method to provide a new mode for obtaining a Governor for its own immediate requirements. In the interests of economy I hope that this clause will lead to the cessation of the practice of appointing State Governors from England, and establish the practice of choosing Governors in the provinces. I quite recognise that the amendment, if carried, will not necessarily lead to that result, but will simply put it in the power of each State to say which is the method to be adopted by which the Governors shall be elected. I shall support the amendment.

Dr. QUICK:

I will support Dr. Cockburn's amendment. In the Constitutional Committee I voted for the omission of these words, which appear in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, but on reconsideration I think it would be desirable to restore the words to give the various States power to determine and fix the method by which they shall appoint or elect their Governors. I think that this will be an important concession to the States which they will duly appreciate.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I oppose the amendment, for I think it very undesirable in the interests of the people at large to have Governors elected by the people instead of being appointed by the Queen. If the amendment is not carried I will move at the end of the clause in that direction.

Mr. BARTON:
If you leave the clause as it stands that aim will be secured.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I should like to see Australia declared a nation to-morrow, but as this is not to be, and being under Imperial rule, we should not interfere with the arrangements which exist now. If the people of any State want to make all alteration in the Constitution, they can do it by petition to the English Parliament. We know very well that it is

Mr. BARTON:
I propose to stand by the clause in this respect The clause enacting that appointment of Governor was put in this way by Sir Samuel Griffith, who said:

One reason for the clause, however, occurs to me. It is desirable that the States should know that the heads of the States are to be called Governors, and not Lieutenant-Governors or administrators. There is a great deal of difference between them. Here we are now accustomed to the term "Governor," but in olden days that was not the case. In Tasmania the Governor was formerly called Lieutenant-Governor, while the Governor of New South Wales was called the Governor-General of Australia, all the other Governors being more or less subordinate to him. My hon. friend Mr. Kingston reminds me that the Governor in South Australia was formerly called Lieutenant-Governor. There is a considerable difference between the two things.

What was running in his mind in connection with the term "Lieutenant-Governor" was the implication that the Lieutenant-Governor is subject to some other Governor. This Constitution does not propose to make the Governor of the State subject to the Governor General. It gives the Commonwealth paramount authority in respect of his own civil authority, but leaves untouched his relation to the Governor-General. Sir Samuel Griffith went on to say:
It may be thought by some hon. members merely a matter of words, perhaps; but I have heard of a controversy going on of late when the question arose as to whether an admiral would take precedence of a Lieutenant-Governor when a Lieutenant-Governor is administering the government of a colony. That is a point that occurs to me now, and it may be of importance. We indicate by this clause that there are to be Governors of States, and I think that this is the proper term to indicate that the States are sovereign.

We wish to indicate that, and we cannot have a better way of indicating it than by having this short clause. I should like to urge some of the reasons that were urged by members at the 1891 Conference. Mr. Gillies said in the Constitutional Committee where we had a long discussion on the subject:

As a reason for the insertion of this clause it was contended that the people of any State or colony should have an opportunity to determine whether the Governor should, or should not, be elected. It was argued, on the other band, that there could be no objection to the insertion of this clause, because it did not lay down the provision that there should be an election, but merely gave power to the various States to determine whether a Governor should be elected or not. This clause does a little more than that. No doubt the concluding portion may be said to be a corollary of the first portion: The Parliament of a State may make such provisions as it thinks fit as to the manner of appointment of the Governor of the State, and for the tenure of his office, and for his removal from office. I say that if that be done in any colony it completely changes the relations hitherto existing between the colonies and the Crown.

Lower down Mr. Gillies says:

If the Crown once permitted any colony to adopt a provision such as is contained in this clause, that is, if any colony were to pass a law providing that the Governor should be elected by the people, and the Imperial Parliament were to assent to that law, and the Queen's assent were also given, what would happen? As was pointed out on several occasions in the Constitutional Committee, the position would be a most inadvisable one.

This is the reason given in the debate and it is a strong one:

The party which for the moment was predominant in the province would support the election of a Governor who belonged to their side. The Governor would at once become a strong partisan, or he would not be elected.

That is to say, so long as he remained in office he would be supporting the policy of one Ministry and thwarting the policy of the other side. He goes on-
In addition to that, the whole colony would be his constituency, and he would require to canvass it from one end to the other and solicit votes in the same way as they would be solicited by any gentleman seeking a seat in a legislative assembly. Now, for a gentleman proposing to take up the independent position of a Governor, to see that fair play is given to both parties in the State, that is an extraordinary proceeding. A gentleman sitting below me contended the other day that if a Premier asked a Governor to dissolve Parliament, the Governor was bound to dissolve it at that Minister's request. That would mean if course that if the Governor was a friend of the Ministers who had absolutely helped to put him there he would be under such obligations to them that he would naturally take sides with his Ministers, and would give them as many dissolutions as he decently could. That would be an unfortunate position for the Governor; nay, worse than that.

Then he said:

As I have already told the hon. member, Sir Henry Parkes, without disrespect to him, if I were a citizen of a community which proposed to elect its Governor, I would do all that I possibly could to prevent his election as Governor. That hon. gentleman occupies a public position in this country which would make him far too powerful for the place of Governor.

That is to say; the strongest politician in the State might claim election as Governor, and being returned and identified with a party in the State, his election would at once give that party a position of predominance which would enable it to exercise power in a manner quite apart from the manner in which a Governor should act in connection with contending parties. The hon. member continued to say:

It is a stage we are ask to reach, and which I object to reach. The hon. member, if he aspired to the position of Governor, would go through the length and breadth of the colony making some of those grand-toned orations which touch the hearts of the people, and I have no doubt that he would be elected almost unanimously. After he secured his seat in the saddle it would he the most difficult thing to dislodge him. I do not think that we should create such troubles unnecessarily.

Then he went on to give several illustrations. On the other hand, he supported the retention of the clause on the ground that if, as matters stand now, any State proceeds to make a change in the selection of its Governor, it cannot pass a law to that effect, and that any law giving it the power to make a change in the manner of the choice of the Governor, would have to be one passed by the Imperial Parliament. Consequently he urged that it would be better to allow a clause of this kind, which was struck out by the Constitutional Committee, in this case, to be inserted in the Act, so that in the Australian Constitution Governors of the States might, if the people thought well, be elected by the States. Still the question remains whether the Australian Constitution is to contain such a provision. The object is to create a system of government under which, as to over all the powers they retain, the States will be supreme and sovereign in their own sphere, and over all the powers which are given to the Commonwealth, whether original or transferred, it shall have sovereign power within that range of powers. If we are to complicate the Constitution by putting in provisions not to conserve the interests of the States, which we are fully entitled to do, but fresh clauses which give fresh powers to the States, it is a position which does not arise in the making of a Federal Constitution, and it is foreign to its purpose. In any case the authorising of the election of the Governor by the States, would result in the evils, which are so well pointed out, in the election of partisans to positions which should only be held by impartial men, and, under the circumstances, I do not think we should pave the way for such a state of things, and it is not part of our business to deal with such a thing.

Mr. WISE:

I am afraid I have unfortunately led this discussion into altogether wrong lines, as the question of elective Governors has nothing whatever to do with this question. This is not a clause to provide that the Governors of the States shall be elected, and it was only, as I see now, an unfortunate reference to my own opinion, as to how it would operate if the States were allowed to do so, that has brought about this discussion. The question is whether by this Constitution we may perhaps destroy the necessity for Governors in the several States. However that may be, when by this Constitution you do most materially modify their position, you ought in having made that change, by the same Act give to the States, which are affected, the power to adapt themselves to the new circumstances. That is why it was put in the Constitution, and that is why Sir Samuel Griffith was right in insisting upon it, and not for the purpose of expressing an opinion as to whether the Governor should be elected or not, but to put it in the power of the colonies to adapt themselves to the new circumstances.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I agree with the remarks of Mr. Wise; and I hope the amendment will be inserted. It is a fact that whilst we have the quotations from the utterances of the gentleman who was foremost in his opposition to this clause in 1891, yet we cannot help also noticing the fact that that gentleman is nut here with us to-day.
Mr. HIGGINS:
Who is that?
Mr. KINGSTON:
I need not mention his name, except to say that he was a candidate who was not elected. It is also a noteworthy fact that this particular clause was affirmed by a majority of the Convention in 1891, and that Sir Samuel Griffith, who has been largely quoted in this and other matters, was in favor of the amendment now suggested, and said towards the close of his speech:

For these reasons I say that the Constitution would be incomplete without a provision of this kind, because it would be necessary to have recourse to the Parliament of England to provide a change.

There is another noteworthy fact which I was hopeful would promote the assistance and sympathy of the Drafting Committee, and that is, that the only member of the Committee who recorded his vote voted in favor of the amendment now proposed. The way I look at it is that it is not a question of elective Governors, or anything of that sort.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It may become possible.

Mr. WISE:
Why should they not?

Mr. KINGSTON:

A lot of statements have been made in connection with the matter, and for my part I am not in favor of an elective Governor. The working of a system of popular election of our Governor in connection with our responsible government would raise many difficulties. It would be difficult to keep the Governor so elected in his proper place, and induce him to take the advice of his constitutional advisers with that humility which is proper in the discharge of his vice-regal duties. He would say that his position was somewhat superior to that of his Ministers-elected by constituencies and removable by a vote of the House of Representatives.-in view of his election by the people throughout the colony; and, under the circumstances, I am not in favor of an elective Governor. But I do think we ought to take the power of effectually making our views and sentiments on this subject known in the future. It could be done in the beat way by Parliament passing an Act declaring their wishes in this respect, and it could be either assented to or rejected as circumstances required. I do not think we have had much cause to complain in the past, but there have been occasions where there has been exhibited on the part of the Colonial Office a reluctance to consult local wishes, or even to make the Imperial intentions known with regard to vice-regal appointments. I hope this may not be repeated, and I think the best plan will be, for the reasons I have mentioned, to take power for the local Parliaments by appropriate legislation to make their wishes on the subject of the system they desire known to the Imperial authorities. I think if that power is given we can rest assured it will be wisely exercised, and will supply a means of expression of local views on matters of considerable importance to the various provinces, which has hitherto been wanting, and which ought to be supplied in the way now proposed, and which recommended itself to the majority of the Convention in 1891.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I cannot assent to the arguments of my friend Mr. Wise, that this Constitution will make any difference to the position of a Governor in the colonies, in regard to the discharge of his duties; nor do I think it will come anywhere near destroying the necessity for his office, and I took it that one of the arguments of my learned friend was based on that principle. The Governor would have the same powers with regard to all matters left to the State that he has now. These powers, as the population and importance of the different States advance, will become more and more important, inasmuch as they affect larger and larger populations. And it appears to me, whether under the present Constitution, or under the powers which the States will have left to them under this Constitution, it is equally necessary that the Governor should be a person not only removed from the arena of politics but from all active sympathy of politicians on every side, and above the suspicion of being influenced by local likes or dislikes or sympathies. It is said that this is only an enabling clause, that it gives the power to the Parliaments of the States to make this election if they think fit. That is true, but it is an illusory argument. It means that once you place that power in the hands of the States Parliaments, then you at once enable any Parliament which may be brought in on an agitation set up for this purpose, to at once enact a law for the appointment of a Governor by election or nomination, or in some other way. In other words, for a State to make this important change in its Constitution should be a difficult matter, and one which could only be obtained by the assent of the Imperial authorities. You are making it a matter which can be brought about by the carrying of an Act through any State legislature under the influence of some local excitement.

Dr. COCKBURN:

It is already decided that the Act must have the Queen's assent.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I know that, but if the Act is passed by both Houses of any State, the Queen would not refuse her assent. The Queen would never interfere with the exercise of the legislative powers of the State in any way. But if this power is left open to the States, it could very well happen that, under the influence of some popular agitation, the people unthinkingly may adopt some mode of appointing or electing their Governors, that would make it almost impossible to work the Constitutions of the States as they ought to be worked. There is a large number of people upon whom the use of the term popular election operates like a charm, and in the circumstances, they forget altogether that they are going to obtain any advantages the proposed change. But there can be no question, that, if you hand over the appointment to the people, that power can only be exercised in two ways. Either the Governor must be elected by the Executive authority or by the people. In the case of nomination, at all events, he must be the strongest man of the particular party which puts him in office, so you have in that place in the Constitution, in which a man ought to be above party influence, a partizan whom it would be difficult, and perhaps impossible, to get rid of. If you chose the mode of popular election, then you create an authority under the Constitution who would probably not feel disposed to be guided by the advice of a Ministry elected on a chance majority, but would feel that his position is that of a man who has been elected by the whole of the people of the State.

Mr. WISE:
I would ask whether this discussion on the system of the election of Governors has anything to do with the matter before the chair?

The CHAIRMAN:
It seems to me that the whole question is involved in it.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I am sorry that my hon. friend fails to see the application of the argument. This is not only a power to elect Governors, but an invitation to the States to elect Governors.

Mr. WISE:
No one has ever proposed to elect Governors. Such an absurdity as put by the hon. gentleman has not been suggested.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I wish to point out that it is impossible for the system of responsible government to be carried on except by some system in which the position of Governor is held by some person who stands altogether above and outside the arena of party politics. This clause is not only an enabling clause, but it is an invitation to the people of the States to either elect or nominate their Governors, and it is impossible to suppose that you would not find, at some time or another, a clause like this taken advantage of by the leader of some extreme party in a State for the purpose of winning popularity. We know there are persons who take the view—thoughtlessly, it appears to me—that the election of Governors would be a very good thing. Therefore, it seems to me, that if the majority of us think it would not be a bad thing to have an elected Governor, in such a condition of things a nominated Governor would be an impossibility. Why, then, should we put in the hands of the States the power, in the event of some popular agitation of bringing about such a condition of things. At the present time any agitation of that sort must reach such dimensions that it is strong enough to persuade the Imperial Parliament that the power sought should be given. The change is said to be only a nominal one, but in reality it would change the affairs of Government in these colonies. For these reasons I hope the Committee will not assent to Dr. Cockburn's amendment. Circumstances as they are at present are recognised by the Federal Constitution. They will go on as now. Let us not interfere with them in any way. It is no part of our duty to make it easier for the States to amend their Constitution, and if you put it on the ground that we are really not affecting the position of the Governors of the States, I say that has not been shown. Their power will be exercised exactly in the same way as now, and the only difference will be that the number of subjects over which the local Parliament have jurisdiction will be diminished.

Mr. Wise:

Will not five Government Houses, on the same scale and style as at present, be a grotesque absurdity?

Mr. O'Connor:

If hon. members put it on that ground, I would point out that each of the colonies would have to pay for its separate establishment, and would have to decide whether there was any necessity for its reduction or not. Surely they are the best authorities to deal with that question. If they find there is any reason for a change, you may be certain that a change will be made. For my own part I cannot see that the taking away of any of these subjects will affect in any way the importance of the office or the powers to be exercised under it. Under section 97 the powers which are now vested in the Constitutions of the different States will be exercised by the Governors, with the advice of the Executive Council, except the powers which the States give; and we know that the area of jurisdiction which is given to the Government (if the Commonwealth will not practically diminish the importance and area of the State powers.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
I do not intend to say much on this question. I do not think we need enter into the question of what the colonies would do as separate States if they had this particular power. I do not think we have any business to intimate in this Bill that a different mode of procedure shall go on in future to what has ruled in the past. Is it not better to leave those States, after certain powers have been given over, to work out for themselves what will be the status of their Governor and in what way they will carry on their local government.
Dr. COCKBURN:
That is what is sought to be done.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
But you do more than that. You practically embody in this Constitution a modus operandi for doing that, whereas I consider we have no reason to decide there shall be any change whatever.
Mr. O'CONNOR:
Hear, hear.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
That should be left entirely to them. Then, furthermore, this Act of course as a whole will be assented to by the Queen, and it seems to be a pity to put into it anything that might be of an objectionable character. It seems to me we are introducing into this Bill a proposal as a guide to the different States when they are very well able to look after their own business. We are departing entirely from our object. I think myself that the safest and the best way is to carry the clause as it is in the Bill, because, while Mr. Wise talks about these various Government Houses, and the absurdity of the little State business being kept on by these different local Parliaments, still it is for them to say what their dignity and status will be, and we are not, now going to forecast a much lower state than they have at present, because they are in their own domain practically separate entities, practically separate sovereignties, and it seems to me that by belittling them, even inferentially, in a Bill like this, we to a certain extent go entirely outside our own province. I fail to see why it is necessary for us to contemplate any other system than that which now prevails, and under which responsible government is so effective.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I move:
That the Committee do now divide.
Mr. DOBSON:
I wished to raise a point of order. I do not think the amendment is in order.
The CHAIRMAN:

The motion is:
That the Committee do now divide. I must put it.
Question resolved in the negative.

Mr. ISAACS:

Very wrong to try and stop discussion.

Mr. SYMON:

I shall not keep the Committee long. After listening to the debate which has taken place, I cannot for the life of me see what business this clause has in the Constitution at all. I was under the impression that we were framing a Constitution which implied that the various States were to hand over something to the Federation, not that the Federation under the Constitution was going to hand over something to the States that they had not got already. I can find no other provision in the Constitution which either gives the States something they had not got before. The States have not got this power at the present moment. It is sought to confer upon the Parliament of the State power to make such provisions as it thinks fit as to the manner of appointment of the Governor of the State, and for the tenure of his office, and for his removal from office. What have we got to do with that? We are framing a Constitution for the Federation. We are not legislating or framing a Constitution for the various States; nor are we framing alterations or making reforms in the mode of the appointment of Governors or the establishment of Government Houses, or anything of that kind. It does seem to me that the discussion as to elective Governors is outside this matter altogether. At the same time, the amendment itself seems to be out of place in this Bill, and if any State, as it is entitled to, chooses to pass an Act through its own Legislature, seeking to give itself the power of appointing its own Governor, then it is at liberty to do so and to send it on to the Imperial authorities; then if the Queen's assent is given, they have got power. We ought not to interfere with that. This will be an enabling clause, no doubt, in a Constitution which will bind the whole five colonies in a particular direction, when some of them, if properly consulted, would not agree with it at all.

Mr. DOBSON:

I wish to put a point of order. I carry the argument of my friend Mr. Symon still further. I submit that the amendment is absolutely ultra vires, and if the clause is passed, and you then pass the Bill, you will be getting the Royal assent to a Bill which practically alters the Constitution of my colony. Now Tasmania has not sent me here to consent to or to discuss such a provision. If we like to pass an amendment of the Constitution Act of Tasmania, and the Queen assents to that, with all the circumstances of our colony before her, she might exercise a wise discretion; but if you ask her to assent to a provision in globo, which alters the Constitution of each colony, and we are not sent here for any such purpose, that is a different thing. Therefore I ask you whether the motion is within the province of the work we are sent here to perform.

The CHAIRMAN:

No doubt the question is one of very great difficulty. By clause 18 of the Federal Enabling Act the duty of the Convention is stated to be the framing for Australasia of a Federal Constitution under the Crown. Now, the question which I understand the hon. gentleman submits is this: whether it is within the scope of our powers in framing that Constitution under the Crown to alter the Constitution of any of the colonies. I admit that the question is one that on the spur of the moment I have some difficulty in answering. But it seems to me that we must of necessity alter the Constitutions of the various States, inasmuch as we take from them certain powers and confer these powers on the Federal Government. In doing this we are, to a certain extent at all events, altering their Constitution. Therefore I am not prepared to say that the amendment is out of order.

My hon. friend Mr. Isaacs has pointed out to me a matter worthy of the most serious consideration in connection with this clause.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Let us divide.

The CHAIRMAN:

The proposition that the Committee divide cannot be put again for fifteen minutes.

Mr. WISE:

I would ask the attention of Mr. Barton to this matter. As the clause stands it says, "In each State there shall be a Governor." You are absolutely imposing restrictions for all time upon the States. If that clause stands, it imposes a restriction which limits the powers of the self-governing States as exercised to-day, because if we choose, with the consent of the Imperial Government, we can get a Governor changed to a Board of Advice; but if the clause stands, we cannot do it. If the clause stands, the amendment should go with it; and, if the amendment goes, the clause might go with it. The subject is, are-
Mr. BARTON:
I understand that Dr. Cockburn is willing to let the amendment go with the clause.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I will withdraw the amendment, and let the clause remain to be decided on its merits. Then, if the clause is passed, I will move my amendment.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not call that any concession at all.

Mr. WISE:
If the clause is struck out, there is no need to move the amendment.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I shall ask to have the amendment added, and then it will be competent for anyone to vote against it and the clause.

Mr. BARTON:
I will undertake to move for the omission of the clause if the hon. member will withdraw his amendment.

Dr. COCKBURN:
If that is the case, I will ask leave to withdraw my amendment.
Leave given.
Clause struck out.
Clause 103 - Appropriation of provision referring to Governor-as read, agreed to.
Clause 104-A State may cede any of its territory-as read, agreed to.
Clause 105-States not to levy import or export duties, except for certain purposes-as read, agreed to.
Clause 106.-A State shall not, without the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, impose tonnage dues or raise or maintain any military or naval force, or impose any tax on property of any kind belonging to the Commonwealth; nor shall the Commonwealth impose any tax on property of any kind belonging to a State.

Mr. HENRY:
I would like to ask Mr. Barton what effect this would have on several Marine Boards and Harbor Trusts of the colonies which are dependent for their revenues on tonnage rates. This clause, I see, provides that no tonnage duty should be imposed except by Commonwealth. What position, I would like to know, would the various Harbor Trusts and Marine Boards, which are dependent for a portion of their revenue on these tonnage dues, occupy till the Federal Commonwealth has had time to legislate upon this matter.

Mr. BARTON:
If the tonnage dues are not an infringement upon the principles of intercolonial freetrade, I take it that they would remain in force after the establishment of the Commonwealth; but if the State proposed to take in hand legislation on the subject, it would not be permitted to legislate on that subject without the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If it were only an amendment?

Mr. BARTON:
Possibly the only trouble there would be, that a period of six months would elapse before the Commonwealth Parliament was called together after it is established. So far as the tonnage dues, mentioned by Mr. Henry, did not infringe upon the principles of intercolonial freedom of trade, there would be no difficulty.

Mr. GLYNN:
I think the last few words of this clause are too comprehensive in their meaning. In South Australia there is a lot of land which is leased with the right of purchase, and I can see that under the latter portion of this clause there is considerable danger of defeating the effect of direct taxation.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
In a case of that kind the reversion which is in the Crown would not be taxed, but the letting value would be taxed.

Mr. BARTON:
I might mention that the property of the Commonwealth in that land is the reversion upon the lease. The reversion upon the lease would not be taxable, but the interest of the lessee in the property would be taxable.

Mr. GLYNN:
I am only pointing out a difficulty that might arise.

Mr. HENRY:
I would like to raise a question as to the right of the Commonwealth to tax materials for State purposes. In the event of a colony importing rails, machinery, engines, &c., for State purposes, I would like to know whether such exports are to be free from Customs duties. Will the Federal Parliament have a right to levy duties on materials imported for State purposes?

Mr. BARTON:
This is a matter that was discussed very fully in the Constitutional Committee, and I think my hon. friend Sir George Turner will remember that I consulted the members of the Finance Committee upon it, intimating to them the opinion of the Constitutional Committee on the point. The words:
Impose any tax on property do not refer to the importation of goods at all, and any amendment to except the Customs would be unnecessary. This clause states that a State shall not, without the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, impose taxation on property of any kind belonging to the Commonwealth, meaning by that property of any kind which is in hand, such as land within the Commonwealth. That has no reference to Customs duties.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Will articles imported by the States Governments come in free?

Mr. BARTON:
The question then arises whether articles imported by the States Governments are to come in free, but this section has nothing to do with that. Under this Bill and in the measure of 1891 I believe duties would have been collectable upon imports by any State, and after the consultation which I had with the hon. member and his colleagues on the Finance Committee the Constitutional Committee decided not to make any exemption in the case of any State.

The CHAIRMAN:
I would ask hon. members to confine themselves to the discussion of this clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I propose to carry out your desire, Sir, to restrict my remarks to this particular clause. In Victoria, as I mentioned the other day, we have an independent body called a Harbor Trust, which collects a large amount of money and, as far as I can recollect, does it in the way of tonnage dues. If we pass this clause, and we deprive this body of its revenue, they will simply have to fall back upon the Government of the State. What is the meaning of the phrase:

Impose tonnage dues?

According to the way I read the clause it means that it is not to pass any law which would put on any fresh dues.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I suppose the States gave these rights to the harbor trust.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The State passes a law constituting a Harbor Trust and gives over to them the right to collect these various revenues. What I desire is to preserve that right, whatever it may be. I am in great difficulty as how this particular clause will affect that body, as well as similar bodies in other colonies which collect small sums. I would be glad if my hon. friend Mr. Barton can give me any assistance with regard to this matter, and tell us if this clause will or will not interfere with this existing body. If that be so I shall be prepared to let the clause pass, and then, before the adjourned Convention is held, we shall have an opportunity in the different colonies of ascertaining how these dues and rates are collected, and how this clause will affect them, and whether we should make this amendment. In the meantime I should like Mr. Barton to give me the real meaning of the clause.

Mr. BARTON:

As far as I can gather from this clause and the clause of 1891, it seems to me to refer to any future legislation on the subject:

The State shall not impose tonnage dues.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I think these tonnage dues must be excepted if the Parliament is to take over harbors. Tonnage dues are simply payment for services rendered, and they do not practically come under the system of taxation at all. They are levied for something done. If they are not excepted great trouble will ensue, especially in regard to corporations. Is that System referred to by Sir George Turner administered by a Minister of the Crown?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Does it apply then? These. are dues paid by the State as a State, but the case mentioned is one of a corporation, in which there is a payment for services rendered. Tolls are exacted for the services, call them dues or wharfage rates or whatever you like; they are the same in essence.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

If we do not guard against it corporate bodies may evade the Act, and the State may appoint corporations to do work so as to evade it.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Something will have to be done or great trouble may ensue.

Mr. BARTON:

With reference to the question of wharfage rates, members will recollect that the United States Constitution contains a prohibition against the State levying tonnage duties without the consent of Congress. It has been decided in the case of the Packet Company v. Catlettsburg, 105 U.S., 559:

&

That would appear to be rather in favor of the exemption of the harbor trust.

Mr. HENRY:

It is within my own knowledge that there are Marine Boards in Australia, at all events in Tasmania, worked as State departments. They are nominee bodies with a Minister practically at their head.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Who gets the money?

Mr. HENRY:

The Customs officers collect the wharfage and tonnage dues, and they pass into the hands of the Government. I would like to ask Mr. Barton how it would operate in cases where the tonnage rates vary at different ports in Australia? We might have one harbor with a particular rate and another with double or treble that rate, so that we would not have an equality of trade. This is one of the difficulties which Mr. Barton and others, in considering this matter, should have placed before them. In this clause we are going to hand to the Federal Government the right to legislate with regard to tonnage dues, and it is desirable that we should know precisely what we are doing and how it is going to affect the various harbor trusts and marine boards.

Mr. BARTON:

On considering the matter, I think that the tonnage dues mentioned here-we have altered the word "duties" into "dues," and they seem to me like the word "tonnage dues" that used to prevail in the old country, such as tonnage dues on wines. We find the word referred to in Acts 9 Anne, and 10 George IV. They were tonnage dues granted to the Queen, and I think those referred to here were the same in the United States Constitution.
Whether that be so or not, the tonnage dues referred to in the clause seem to be charges for services performed. For instance, a Harbor Trust is formed and carries out improvements and as a means of recouping themselves the harbor authorities charge dues. Wharfage dues are for the use of a wharf and have they not a similar meaning in the modern acceptation of the term? One is an impost for the use of a wharf, the other for the use of a harbor on which money has been spent for the purpose of rendering it more adapted for shipping. If that is so the words may be left out, and if they are left out any tonnage due which is not a charge for services performed would be an impost interfering with the freedom of trade and intercourse, and would come under section 86; that is to say, as soon as uniform duties have been imposed, trade and intercourse shall be absolutely free. If they interfere they could only do so so far as they are of the nature of taxes. If they are only charges for services performed, as I explained in connection with clause 83, then there can be no objection to them. because charges for use of a wharf are much in the same position as charges of the post office authorities for the carriage of letters; they are payments for services. If that view is taken I shall offer no objection to it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Why not for post and telegraphs?

Mr. BARTON:

Any mere service that the Commonwealth does not take over is still in the hands of the State. Clause 86 can only be infringed by something which means an interference with the freedom of trade and intercourse. Anything that is fairly construable as a payment for services performed is not handed over—the mere service can be charged for as before, because it is not an interference with trade and intercourse. In such cases as that, mere service can be charged for as before, because it is not an interference with trade or intercourse. I think we may well accept that view and leave out the words:

Impose tonnage dues or.

I move that they be left out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I am glad that my hon. friend, after consideration, has taken this view, because it is very difficult indeed to understand what these words refer to and what effect they would have upon harbor trusts and similar bodies. But, as the other clauses appears to be sufficient to prevent any injustice being done, and in order to remove any doubt as to what the words really mean, it will be well to strike these out.

Amendment agreed to.
Clause, as amended, agreed to.
Clause 107-State not to coin money—as read agreed to.
Clause 108—Nor prohibit any religion —as read agreed to.
Clause 109—Protection of citizens of the Commonwealth—as read agreed to.
Clause 110—Full faith and credit shall be given, throughout the Commonwealth, to the laws, the public acts and records, and the judicial proceedings, of the States.

Mr. DOBSON:

I should like to ask the Drafting Committee an important question. I understand that my hon. friend Mr. Wise is not moving in another clause in accordance with his notice to insert:

Wills, intestacy.

I was going to move an amendment to add:

Lunacy.

I desire to know whether, under this section, the courts of the other colonies take cognisance of the appointment of a Receiver or Trustee of Lunacy or Curator of intestate Estates, so that upon the registration of the document making the appointment, assets and lands in different colonies can be administered. I have now two cases in my office where I want to sell land belonging to a patient in lunacy in another colony, and where I want to get land in Victoria sold, the estate having already been administered in Tasmania. I want to know whether under this section we can have some such machinery as that under the Probate Acts, where probate granted in one colony is sealed in another colony, whereby the will is practically proved in another colony, so that estates of an intestate or lunatic may be administered under the one authority.

Mr. BARTON:

I may mention one or two illustrations of cases decided which seem to me to be relevant to this matter, and which perhaps will serve to clear up any doubt. They were decisions based under a similar section in the United States Constitution. In Baker's "Annotated Constitution of the United States":

Record of judgment, conclusive when-Attachment.-The record of a judgment in one State is conclusive evidence in another, although it appears that the suit in which it was rendered was commenced by an attachment of property, the defendant having afterwards appeared and taken defence and judgment of one State, how enforced in another -A judgment rendered in one State does not carry with it into another State the efficacy of a judgment upon property or persons to be enforced by execution. To give it such force in another State it must be made a judgment there, and can only be executed in the latter State as its laws may permit.

Then there is a more important decision illustrative of the principle which has been decided in another case.

No new powers are conferred on States by this clause.-By this provision "the Constitution did not mean to confer any new powers upon the States, but simply to regulate the effect of their acknowledged jurisdiction over persons and things within their territory. It did not make the judgments of other States domestic judgments to all intents and purposes, but only gave a general validity, faith, and credit to their evidence.

So I take it that the effect of this clause would be to cause the courts of the Commonwealth to take judicial notice of the laws, acts, and records of the States without the necessity of requiring them to be proved by cumbrous evidence. It would depend upon the opinion of the whole Convention as to whether the transfer to the Commonwealth of the power to make laws of intestacy and lunacy would be a wise provision. The proper place to do that would be in Clause 50. For myself, I do not think there is a necessity to deal with intestacy or lunacy in this Constitution.

Mr. DOBSON:

I thank my hon. friend for his explanation. I understood Mr. Wise was going to move an amendment as regards intestacy in clause 50, but, after consulting the Drafting Committee, decided not to do so. We want to simplify the law. The point is, if a man dies intestate in one colony, would the administrator or curator be able to register his appointment in another colony and deal with the assets there? Then, as to the case of a lunatic, when a man is declared to be a lunatic, the sheriff has to summon twelve good men and true, and, if they find the man to be insane, a trustee is appointed. If a man is declared to be a lunatic in Victoria, how are you to get hold of his assets in Brisbane, unless there is a provision which says action shall be taken in Queensland upon a record of the proceedings in Victoria being filed?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

You can do it now

Mr. DOBSON:

The only legislation I know of is the Intercolonial Judgment Act passed by the Federal Council. We do not want to make the Federal Parliament more impotent than the Federal Council.

Mr. BARTON:

I shall give another illustration, so that we may be quite sure as to the effect of the clause. This is clearly elucidatory:

This provision and the laws of Congress in relation thereto establish a rule of evidence rather than of jurisdiction.

It would have this effect. If there had been a suit between two parties in one State touching certain causes of action that dispute would only be taken judicial notice of in any State, but as regards the subject matter of the dispute between them it would be conclusive between them. The illustration goes on:

While they make the record of a judgment rendered in one State, after due notice, conclusive evidence in the courts of another State, or of the United States of the matter adjudged, they do not affect the jurisdiction, either of the court in which the judgment is rendered, or of the court in which it is offered in evidence. They differ from judgments recovered in a foreign country in no other respect than in not being re-examinable on their merits, nor impeachable for fraud in obtaining them, if rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the cause and of the parties.

That is the full explanation.

Mr. DOBSON:

Will you consider the other point?

Mr. BARTON:

Yes, we shall take that into consideration.

Mr. ISAACS:

Would the hon. member look at another clause which has reference to that matter almost in the same words: Sub-clause 26 of clause 50 gives the Commonwealth Parliament power to legislate for the recognition throughout the Commonwealth of the laws, the public acts and records, and the judicial proceedings of the States. That might be merely a recognition of them, but coupled with the previous sub-clause 25:

The service and execution throughout the Commonwealth of the civil and criminal process and judgments of the courts of the States.

It might mean more. But I am not quite sure that that sub-clause 26 would go to the length that Mr. Dobson wishes, by recognising them in such a way as to treat them as a judgment of every State, but it might be so. The Commonwealth Parliament might possibly exercise the power to give the same effect throughout the Commonwealth to the judgment of the State as is given in the State to the judgment itself.

Mr. BARTON:

It is more than possible that the hon. member's suggestion is correct. One clause means that as a matter of evidence judicial notice is to be taken; the other means that there is legislative power, not only to define the manner in which that shall be done, but it may also mean further than that, that there is a legislative power to cause recognition of these matters in substance as well as in evidence.
Mr. KINGSTON:
No doubt there is something in that. But I trust Mr. Dobson will further press an amendment to section 50, to give in addition power to bring a Clause agreed to.
Clause 111-Protection of States from invasion-agreed to.
Clause 112-Custody of offenders against laws of the Commonwealth-agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN:
We now go back to clause 87.

Mr. BARTON:
The Treasurers of the colonies have not yet placed in our hands their resolutions, but I understand they need very little more discussion.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We are waiting to get some prints over from the Government Printing Office. We shall let you have them to-night, but they may be late.

Mr. BARTON:
I move:
To postpone clauses 87-96 until after the consideration of chapters VI., VII., and VIII.
I wish the finance and trade clauses to take precedence of other postponed clauses so that we may get them at the earliest possible moment.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

CHAPTER VI.-NEW STATES.
Clause 113-Any of the existing colonies which have not adopted the Constitution may upon adopting this Constitution be admitted to the Commonwealth, and shall thereupon become and be a State of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
This clause provides that any of the existing colonies may, upon adopting this Constitution, be admitted to the Commonwealth, and shall thereupon become and be a State of the Commonwealth. The next section provides for the admission of new States, with power to impose certain conditions on their admission. Is it wise that we should allow any of the existing colonies to stand aside as long as they like, for any number of years, and to ultimately come in, whether the colonies which have joined like it or not, on exactly the same conditions? Surely it is not unreasonable to say to the existing colonies: "You have a perfect right to join with us, to throw in your lot with us, participate in the advantages, share the risks, make the losses we have to make jointly, make the enterprises we have to make jointly; but if you do not wish to do that, if you desire to stand aloof and allow us to make this Federation, we must have some say in it when you wish to join." I think that is fair and reasonable, and I should be glad if Mr. Barton will explain why this unlimited right should be given to the existing colonies, and why the Federal Parliament should not have the power to admit any existing colony on conditions which may be laid down.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Something similar to clause 114?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

According to clause 114 new States may be admitted on terms which the judgment of the Federal Parliament might fairly decide. Certain conditions ought to be imposed by the Federal Parliament as representing the States which initiated the Federation, and which certainly ought to have some say in it. I do not desire at the present moment to move an amendment because my hon. friend may be able to give some good reason why this distinction should be drawn. If so I will be willing to fall in with it.

Mr. BARTON:

The reason of this provision is partly due to what is included in the United States Constitution as follows:

No new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress.

That section is practically the same as we have placed in this Bill—sections 133 and 114 read together. Section 113 provides a sort of locus poenitentiae that every existing colony may be allowed to come in when it likes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

At any time.

Mr. BARTON:

Clause 114 allows the Commonwealth to make and impose conditions, as to the extent of representation in either House of Parliament or otherwise, as it thinks fit. However we might read the parallel provisions as they appear in the American Constitutions, as they appear here it does seem as if the existing colonies not joining the Federation at first are entitled to come in under these provisions at any time, and that only new States are made subject to conditions. I think that is the meaning of the clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

That is the intention.

Mr. BARTON:
That is the intention. The motive of the clause is that we may offer a fair inducement to those colonies which we want to join us to come in at the earliest moment. It is for this reason that every State that does not join under this Constitution at first, as the rest of the Bill shows, is a colony. It is a State when it joins. After this Commonwealth is formed any existing colony that joins will in a sense be a new State, because the States will be the colonies which join at-first. That is why this provision is placed in this chapter, and I think it is as convenient a place for it as any other. We are offering, not a time, but an opportunity to the other colonies which do not join with us at first, being existing colonies, to come in and join, and we offer them an absence of the conditions that we would have to impose on new States if new States had to be created. There may be difficulties existing as to the joining of other existing colonies which will be smoothed over by a provision of this Sort. If you place them all on the same footing, and make existing colonies, as well as those which are to be created hereafter, all liable to conditions, then, it seems to me, that there may be a very great discouragement to any State, such as Queensland or Western Australia, which might not decide at first, to join in the Commonwealth. But if you give them an opportunity, even for an indefinite period, to join, you are really offering them the terms of this Constitution, which, if varied from, would make it harder for them to come in.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Is not this an inducement not to join now?

Mr. BARTON:
I think not. The greatest advantage is to be gained by joining when the others join.

Mr. SYMON:
Would you limit the time?

Mr. BARTON:
No; and for this reason: This clause is not to be read with the Federal Enabling Act which will be a spent Act within a short time. Then it might be argued that this clause did limit a certain time, but that is not so. So it does not impose a definite period of time. But the Committee may think it is better to leave the provision in its present state, leaving it to the Commonwealth, if the existing colonies do not come in within a reasonable period, to fix a limit.

Mr. DEAKIN:
That would mean an amendment of the Constitution. The clause as it stands is entirely one-sided. It binds the outstanding colonies to nothing, but it does bind the colonies who federate to the unconditional acceptance of a colony which has stood out as long as it has been to its interest to stand out, and enabling it to come in at its own will without the consent of the other States. I take it that at least the consent of the Commonwealth should be necessary before any State should be able to join in this union.

Mr. WISE:
If we begin that clause with the words "Until Parliament otherwise determines," would that meet the difficulty?

Mr. DEAKIN:
That would meet the difficulty I have just mentioned, and would certainly be a very great improvement. It would be unreasonable, as Mr. Barton indicated, to expect that all the colonies about to join can federate within the same month, or perhaps year. In the case of the United States more than twelve months elapsed before all the colonies were brought into line. A certain time limit might perhaps be fixed, but I do not know if, after all, the proposal that has been made is not better. It makes this, then, a less one-sided arrangement, which now binds the Commonwealth and does not bind the States.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Is not this one of those things which would be better dealt with after the adjournment?

Mr. DEAKIN:
I feel strongly that it is absolutely necessary to insert the words, "Until Parliament otherwise determines." I think this is absolutely essential, for the present clause is obviously unfair on the face of it. Supposing there was a great emergency and some of the colonies came together for a common purpose—say for defence—and at great expense provided against risks. It might happen that some colony which stood out at first would step in subsequently, not to share in the risk, but only in the profits.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Why not strike out clause 113?

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Would the hon. member allow me to suggest to add to the clause these words:
As may from time to time be declared.

Supposing one colony comes in this year and another colony comes in three years afterwards, you would then have to make a calculation of the revenue, and the colony that was late in entering the Federation would have to pay a sort of penalty fixed on a comparative financial basis.
Mr. DEAKIN:
That would be best. The hon. member has put his finger upon a further difficulty. I understand that a financial scheme has been drafted which is to be determined by calculations made for a particular period; but these calculations will be null and void as far as the particular province coming in is concerned. Having stood out it seeks to enter the Federation, so as to dislocate the whole financial system.

Mr. BARTON:
Perhaps we had better see what the financial scheme is first, and postpone these clauses.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I would like to ask the Leader of the House how is a colony to be admitted, and what is the proceeding to be gone through?

Mr. BARTON:
It can only be done by Act of Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS:
Whatever the financial scheme may be, I think we should deal with this clause in the way suggested, and not postpone it, and I think the view taken by my hon. friend Mr. Wise is the correct one. We may be able to incorporate the principle to which he alluded at a later period, by inserting, the words "upon such conditions as Parliament may think fit," in a subsequent portion of the clause. Whatever may be the financial scheme arranged, I think this should be done; for as the provision now stands it is offering a premium to stand out from the Commonwealth—something like a mining speculator who holds aloof until he sees which way things are going. We should all throw in our lot at once and take our chance, and not stand out till there is an opportunity of coming in afterwards, when difficulties are over, and sharing in the profits. I think we ought to deal with this question irrespective of what the financial scheme is.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I hope we shall safeguard the Commonwealth. I think some provision is necessary to be taken against those colonies that are languid in the movement. We do not want to allow any colony to loun

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think it will be well to leave out clause 113 until we have made some alterations to clause 114. I am a little exercised in my mind as to the meaning of certain words in the clause, and if the legal members will give me their assistance I shall be glad. In clause 114 you will find these words:

The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make and impose such conditions as to the extent of representation in either House of Parliament, or otherwise.
Mr. WISE:
Strike them out.

Mr. BARTON:
No, do not strike them out yet; I am a little exercised as to the meaning of the words:
As to the extent of the representation in either House of the Parliament, or otherwise.
Would they not exclude the Commonwealth from making provision, except as to representation?

Mr. WISE:
You had better strike out all the words after "conditions."

Mr. SYMON:
Put in after "conditions" the word "including," and strike out "as to."

Mr. BARTON:
I think I shall move:
That clause 113 be struck out,
I shall, if that is done, move amendments to the next clause, and make the one deal with the whole matter.
Clause 113 struck out.
Clause 114-The Parliament may from time to time establish and admit to the Commonwealth new States, and may upon such establishment and admission make and impose such conditions, as to the extent of representation in either House of the Parliament or otherwise, as it thinks fit.

Mr. BARTON:
In the first line I move:
To insert after "from time to time" the words "admit to the Commonwealth any of the existing colonies and may," and strike out "and admit to Commonwealth."
Then I shall adopt Mr. Symon's suggestion, and move to insert "include" and leave out the words "or otherwise."

Mr. KINGSTON:
I think you will want to make the words read:
And may upon such admission or establishment.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
You do not want the word "establishment."

Mr. BARTON:
I would explain this for the consideration of the Convention, that you do want the word "establishment" with regard to new States.

Mr. KINGSTON:
You want both.

Mr. BARTON:

Yes; I was explaining to Sir John Downer that we do. We are only dealing with the continent and Tasmania, as far as we know at present. There may be such a thing as the division of Western Australia and Queensland, but apart from that any new State would have to be carved out of the limits of the Commonwealth. That would consequently be matter for absolute establishment, as new States could not be created any other way.

Mr. ISAACS:

I do not know whether I caught the answer correctly, but I think Mr. Kingston wants the word "admission" repeated.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

To insert after the word "time," where it occurs the second time, the words "admit, to the Commonwealth any of the existing colonies of (name the existing colonies which have not adopted the Constitution) and may from time to time.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

To strike out the words "establishment and admission," with the view of inserting the words "admission or establishment."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I propose

In line 4 to insert before "conditions" the words "terms and."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I propose:

To leave out the words "as to," just following "conditions," with a view to putting in their place the word "including."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I propose:

In the next line to strike out "or otherwise."

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN:

I will read the clause as amended:

The Parliament way from time to time admit to the Commonwealth any of the existing colonies [here name the colonies which have not adopted the Constitution], and may from time to time establish new States, and may upon such admission or establishment make and impose such terms and conditions, including the extent of representation in either House of Parliament, as it thinks fit.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I think your grasp of this clause in its present condition shows your perfect knowledge of the art of amendment in every possible way. It has been done in such a way that we have not the scantiest idea of what it now provides.

Mr. DEAKIN:

It is a mosaic.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Distinctly mosaic; but I think the majority of this Convention do not know what it is. We have embodied everything and struck out everything.

Mr. DEAKIN Give up everything, and take back all."

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I would suggest that those who have not grasped this volcanic amendment in the way in which our chairman has, should have this clause placed before them in print, so that they may see what it is.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Have it set to slow music. (Laughter.)

The CHAIRMAN:

Perhaps Sir Edward Braddon will take my assurance that it is all right.
(Laughter.)

Mr. DOBSON:

I confess I was very much disappointed with Sir Edward Braddon's last utterance. I thought he would be the fool to rush in where the angels fear to tread.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Disappointed that he was not the fool?

Mr. DOBSON:

I thought he would say that here is a departure from equal representation in the Senate. I can see why the clause should stand as it is to the extent of equal representation in the House of Representatives, but not as to equal representation in this Senate. It can hardly arise that Norfolk Island would come in as a separate State, and few of us would like to give Norfolk Island six senators. Here we are making a departure as regards new States, inasmuch as we are giving the Federal Parliament power to alter that which is supposed to be the very foundation of the federal edifice we are rearing.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Before we pass this I think, with Sir Edward Braddon, we should see this clause in print.

Mr. DEAKIN:
You can have it recommitted if necessary.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
It seems to me that the wording is entirely incorrect.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
I would ask Mr. Barton's attention to clause 23, which we have already passed. We have provided there:
Each of the existing colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the province of South Australia shall be entitled to five representatives at the least.
That seems to conflict with the clause we are now considering.

Mr. BARTON:
No. That clause is part of the Constitution dealing with the existing colonies which become States, and the Commonwealth would not under the clause we have just dealt with be deprived of making terms and conditions which give more than five representatives if the States were entitled to more. Clause 23 deals only with the minimum number of representatives.

Mr. GLYNN:
This clause will be part of the Constitution, and will give the power to change the representation. I am afraid we made a mistake in leaving out clause 113. There should have been a distinction between existing colonies and new States. If Queensland does not come in at once and wants to come in later on she will have to make application without stating the terms on which she wishes to be admitted. The Parliament can state the terms, and it will be out of Queensland's power to revise them, and it may then be difficult for Queensland to come in.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I should like Mr. Barton to tell us what this really means.

Mr. BARTON:
If the hon. member will look at section 113 he will see within brackets: [name the existing colonies which have not adopted the Constitution.]

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
How can that possibly be done? None of the colonies have adopted the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:
That of course can only be done when the colonies which have adopted the Constitution are known, then their names could be filled in when application is made to the Imperial Parliament. Bearing that in mind when the imperial Parliament has legislated, clause 114 reads:

The Parliament may from time to time admit to the Commonwealth any of the existing States, and may from time to time establish new States, and may upon such admission or establishment make and im

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

How can the representation of either House of Parliament be stated? We have agreed to the representation of every State being in the ratio of two to one, and how is the Federal Parliament to arrange a representation which may be, according to this clause as now amended, the representation of one House only, and that possibly the House of Representatives? That is the point Mr. Dobson referred to, and which concerns us of the smaller States as it affects representation of the smaller States when there may be additions to the Commonwealth by new States.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The answer is that no such bargain can be made without the consent of the smaller States, through the House in which they have the majority.

Mr. WISE:

And subject to the Constitution.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

And they could not come in unless these States like.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. The smaller States cannot ensure a majority.

Mr. DEAKIN:

They have a majority in the Senate from the commencement.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 115-The Parliament may make such laws as it thinks fit for the provisional administration and government of any territory surrendered by any State to and accepted by the Commonwealth, or any territory placed by the Queen under the authority of and accepted by the Commonwealth, or otherwise acquired by the Commonwealth, and may allow the representation of such territory in either House of the Parliament to the extent and on the terms which it thinks fit.

Mr. WISE:

I move:

That the following words be added at the end of the clause:

No federal territory shall be leased for a longer period than fifty years, or alienated in fee simple, except upon payment of a perpetual rent, which shall be subject to periodic appraisement, upon the unimproved value of the land so alienated at intervals of not more than ten years.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Is "territory" the best word to use there? Territory here is given a peculiar significance in the American sense—a great area under a Government which is not a State.

Mr. WISE:

"Lands," then, I shall make it:

No lands, the property of the Commonwealth.

I do not know what reception this amendment will meet with in this Convention, but I am satisfied that there is no resolution that has been submitted to it which will touch the interests of the people outside more nearly than this.

Mr. GLYNN:

Hear, hear.

Mr. WISE:

It is desirable, if we wish to commend this Constitution to the approbation of the democratic multitude, whose votes it must receive, that we should indicate in the clearest possible manner that those principles which they have most at heart are conserved by this Constitution. No one need imagine that I am going now to enter upon any discussion of the question of land values taxation. It would be out of place altogether in an assembly of this kind to assume that there is any representative here who has not fully considered that question from every point of view. All I desire is in a definite form to bring up for acceptance or rejection by this Convention a proposal as to the future treatment of the lands which may ultimately belong to the Commonwealth. And in the amendment I have proposed I endeavor to avoid for all time to come—as we hope we are framing a Constitution now that will last for many generations—all the evils which have attended the reckless alienation of territory since the foundation of these colonies—

Mr. GLYNN:

Hear, hear.

Mr. WISE:

And to secure for the Commonwealth the growing and permanent source of revenue from that State-earned increment in the value of land which comes silently from the mere accretion of population, and from the exercise of the powers of Government. With these ends in view I have drawn an amendment which comprises two fifty years, and the second provides that if alienation is allowed at all, it shall only be allowed upon such terms as will secure that a fair portion of the unearned increment of the land shall go back to the people who make that value by popular exertion. And so I propose my amendment. I think the Convention will admit I have faithfully fulfilled my promise not to enter into a large and discursive discussion. I hope, therefore, that those opposed to this will follow my example in this respect, and not enter into a discussion, which in this assemblage, at all events, would be largely academic. If this Convention rejects the amendment, I may say that those who support it will try and persuade the local Parliaments to insist on its insertion in the Bill, and if I may prophesy—though I know it is dangerous to prophesy, and in nothing more so than in politics—shall prophecy that if this amendment is rejected now every Parliament in Australia will insist on its being adopted, and that we shall have to pass it in the Convention next time.

[P.1013] starts here

Mr. FRASER:
You do not know the Parliaments.

Mr. BARTON:
I would only suggest with regard to my hon. friend's amendment that it—

Mr. FRASER:
He does not mean it. He is only joking.

Mr. WISE:
You will find it is no joke.

Mr. BARTON:
I have only to say this. If after the establishment of the Commonwealth the people are land nationalisers they will do what my hon. friend suggests. If they are not land nationalisers we have no business to make them so against their will.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I think there is a necessity for amending line 6, It states that the Commonwealth may allow the representation of such territory in either House of the Parliament to the extent and on the terms which it thinks fit. I would ask why it should be left to the Federal Parliament to decide? The representation in this instance is to be in both Houses, not in one House or in the other. Why should we not preserve in this question the ratio of representation which has been fixed already in regard to our representation generally?

Mr. BARTON:
We have passed that clause long ago.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I am discussing clause 115.
Mr. BARTON:
My hon. friend is speaking on clause 114.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
My hon. friend does not know his own Bill.

Mr. BARTON:
I thought you were harking back.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
No. I am harking forward. I would suggest to my hon. friend that it is not intended that there shall be any departure from the principle that we have bound ourselves to, and that the difficulty here may be got over:

By striking out all words after "Parliament" in the twenty-second line and inserting "in accordance with the ratio of representation provided in the Constitution."

I am not going to manifest that mistrust in the Federal Parliament which has been shown here occasionally; still I think it is desirable that we should as far as possible safeguard ourselves against the breach of that engagement which has been entered into in a previous part of this Bill. I will move to test the matter the amendment which I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN:
Will Mr. Wise withdraw his amendment to allow this to be put?

Mr. WISE:
Yes.

Leave given.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think this is a very important matter, because I look forward with some hope that in future under federal administration a large portion of this continent will have to be dealt with under peculiar conditions. I do not think that in regard to the administration of these territories, which are very peculiar in themselves, we ought to bind the Federal Parliament. I would suggest to my hon. friend that the matter might be dealt with in this way: instead of bringing in either Houses of Parliament allow of the representation of such territory to the extent and on the terms it thinks fit, leaving it entirely open as to the course to be adopted.

Mr. O’CONNOR:
That is what the section provides.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
So far as I can understand my hon. friend he wants to bring the territories practically into line with the States, which, of course, would be a great mistake. There would be many experiments in administration owing to the peculiar conditions of these territories, and we ought not to tie the Federal Parliament under these circumstances.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I think my hon. friend Sir Edward Braddon somewhat mistakes the position. If the United States plan is followed territorial delegates would simply be entitled to enter the House of Representatives and speak there, but would not be permitted to vote. They are only agents. The territories here would consist of parts of Australia in which there was merely a nominal population. From them persons might be privileged to enter the House of Representatives in order to state their wishes, but these persons could not take any other part in the proceedings.

Mr. BARTON:

They are provisionally governed by the Commonwealth.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Representation should carry with it the right to vote.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Under territorial representation if it follows the plan of the United States, as it probably would, territorial representatives would be entitled to speak in the House of Representatives, but not to vote. I think Sir Edward Braddon will see that his alarm is not well-grounded, and that whatever determination is come to in regard to the representation of territories must be settled by both Houses. The Senate will have an equal voice with the House of Representatives in determining what representation is to be given, when it is to be given, and how.

Mr. BROWN:

I hope that Sir Edward Braddon will not insist on this amendment. It appears to me that we are again doing as we have been doing very frequently during the discussion of this Bill, namely, trying to put into the Constitution things which ought to be dealt with hereafter by the Commonwealth. It is perfectly plain that as regards any territory which may require to have representation in the Commonwealth, Some special arrangement will have to be made such as that indicated by my hon. friend Mr. Deakin. To put into this clause a condition that such territory can only be represented under the terms and conditions to which the complete States are admitted will, I apprehend, be contrary to what the Convention has in view.

Mr. BARTON:

And prevent

Mr. BROWN:

In addition to that, it is showing a large amount of distrust of the wisdom of Parliament. We shall all, through our representatives, have the opportunity of influencing decisions in the future Parliament just as we have done here. Some hon. members occasionally regard this Commonwealth Parliament as a sort of foreign and hostile body which will have to be watched, and concerning which all sorts of precautions will have to be taken to prevent it from doing mischief. Having faith in the wisdom and capacity of the Federal Parliament, we should not load the Constitution with these unnecessary details.

Mr. BARTON:

I ask the hon. member not to insist upon his amendment, which refers to territories and not to new States. It would be impossible for the Commonwealth ever to consent to the admission of territories which might be sparsely populated, and which would, according to the hon. member's proposal, be entitled to six members in the Senate. Territories or districts which are only in a primitive state of development are intended to be dealt with by a clause of this sort. They are in a transition state, and they are governed by the Commonwealth until such time as the States have reached a condition which would entitle them to representation in the Senate. Bryce says:

Besides these full members there are also eight territorial delegates, one from each of the territories, regions in the West enjoying a species of self-government, but not yet formed into States. These delegates sit and speak, but have no right to vote, being unrecognised by the Constitution. They are, in fact, merely persons whom the House under a Statute admits to its floor and permits to address it

This Constitution is on a little more liberal basis than that in this respect: the Commonwealth in the case of the secession of a territory which is cumbersome, gives power to allow the representation of it in either House of Parliament under the terms which the Parliament thinks fit. Instead of the territories being governed in a way that only entitles them to be represented as delegates there is power to give them a certain degree of representation. It is quite as much as they can have the right to expect, and this is a more liberal provision than is to be found in the American Constitution. I trust we shall not have to divide on this.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

Why should the words "either House of the Parliament" be there? What is required is to strike out:

In either House of the Parliament to the extent and to insert:

And it shall be on such terms and conditions as the Parliament shall think fit.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I should not object to the clause so strenuously as I have done if it were clearly shown that representation in this instance did not carry with it the voting power which we generally understand accompanies representation. A representative is as well as being a speaking machine, a voting one, and if Mr. Barton will say in the Bill that this representative or these representatives are not to have votes, then my alarm will be dispelled. This is the fact as regards the representation of colonies under the American Constitution, but we have nothing in the clause to show that it is to be the fact here also.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Wise's amendment was then put

Mr. HIGGINS:

My feeling is in sympathy with Mr. Wise's general intention, but I am embarrassed with the proposal at this stage. There is no doubt our duty is to frame a Constitution for Australasia, and in framing a Constitution we are giving the Federal Parliament power to acquire territory for the purposes of the Federation. It must acquire territory belonging to private persons or to the Crown, and all the resolution can apply to is as to what belongs to the Crown. It must deal with the lands under the Constitution, and I submit to my hon. friend, that his proposal is not constitution-making at all. However advisable it is to have no alienation in fee simple of these federal lands, and although we know there will be an effort to boom the land when the federal capital is fixed, we are departing from the ambit of our instructions in the Federal Enabling Acts if we adopt the proposal now. Our duty is to frame a Constitution, and for us to put in the Constitution something as to what is to be done with the property under the Constitution, is something which I cannot understand. I ask the hon. member to withdraw it. Rightly or wrongly, a great proportion of the people look with apprehension upon these views, and we do not want to frighten the people from coming into the Federation.

Mr. WISE:

It will have the opposite effect.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I feel as strongly as Mr. Wise as to the expediency of the policy indicated in his resolution, but I want to get Federation, and I do not want to deter a large portion of the people from voting "Yes" if we get a working Constitution. Mr. Wise can tell his friends that we shall try to induce the Federal Parliament to accept this system. I think Mr. Barton has struck the nail on the head when he said it was not a matter to be considered in framing a Constitution. In framing the Constitution power is given to acquire Crown or private lands by the Federal Government, but at the same time, what is to be done by the Commonwealth is not a matter of Constitution framing.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I differ from my hon. friend on this question, as I think it is desirable that we should, if we can, put a provision in the Constitution that the lands of the Commonwealth shall always remain the lands of the Commonwealth. We have bad ample evidence of the unwisdom of selling lands in fee simple in all of the States. We have had several very remarkable instances in the colony of Victoria—quite recently, where from time to time land was required for public purposes. All the land has belonged to the people of the State, and when it is sought to be acquired for public purposes, it is always found that the people have to pay very high prices for that which should never have departed from them, and we are continually embarrassed with the difficulty. The railways are notoriously non-paying from a book-keeping point of view, and it is altogether because of the fact that in the early days we alienated a large amount of the public lands, and when we required them for public purposes we had to pay private persons inordinate prices. I feel I should not be doing right in discussing this question at the length it deserves, but I feel bound to urge one or two reasons why it would be right to put it in this Constitution at any rate at this stage, even if it were struck out subsequently. Mr. Higgins points out that in the Constitution Act we have there are provisions for the sale, letting, or otherwise dealing with Crown lands, and therefore it is unwise to to put in this Constitution that they should not be sold. Now clearly there is no departure from the Constitution to which he refers. Supposing we only made a provision for letting the lands we have only done the same thing in a different degree as has been done in the Constitution to which he referred. It has been said that if the people cannot acquire the fee simple of the land they will not develop it to the same degree as they would if they could acquire it. We have been able in Victoria to furnish an object lesson in this connection. We recently passed an Alienation Act to which we attached clauses providing for the perpetual leasing of land subject to a re-valuation every ten years. We find that that land known as the mallee country in Victoria is being taken up very largely indeed under that system, affording to the agriculturist an opportunity of using the land for agricultural purposes, and leaving to the State perpetually such unearned increment as may from time to time accrue. We all know that unexpected developments take place and land is inordinately increased in value, not through any effort of the person using it, but through some extraneous circumstances over which he has no control, such as the discovery of a goldfield, or the development in the locality of some form of production which was not thought to be likely at the time it was alienated. The mallee land of Victoria was thought a few years ago to be absolutely worthless, and the difficulty was not to get people to buy it, but to stop on it at all, in order to destroy the rabbits and keep them from overrunning the adjoining lands. But quite recently, through two inventions, the land has become amongst the most valuable, the most easily worked, and the most remunerative in the colony, and if it had been alienated at the price that could be got for it a little while ago it would have been giving away the land to a few lucky people. If this clause is put in the Constitution now it will give us an opportunity of ascertaining what is the feeling of the Parliaments that will have to deal with the Bill. It will give us an opportunity of learning the opinions of the people through the press.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
This is not a proper use to make of this Convention.

Mr. TRENWITH:
It is a proper use.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
To test the feeling on a fanciful doctrine.

Mr. TRENWITH:
It is for us to learn between now and four months hence what is the desire of the people, and by inserting it now we should have discussion on it in a way.

Mr. BARTON:
Do you not think we would have discussion on it if we do not put it in.

Mr. TRENWITH:
No. Because if we pass it it will be made a clause in this draft which we are preparing with a view of inviting criticism. Our work just now is to deal as nearly as possible with what we think is wise with the knowledge that it will receive serious and extensive public and Parliamentary criticism in order that we might, in the light of that criticism, do what seems most in accord with the public will. It was thought desirable in previous constitutions to put provisions in for what was then the prevailing custom in regard to the sale as well as the letting of public lands. But there has grown up, and is growing up, a very emphatic and widespread feeling that a great injustice was done to the people at the inception of the colony by disposing of their right to the public lands. We are making a Constitution for lands to be dealt with by another body, and if that feeling is as general as I, Mr. Wise, and others think it is, we have a right to put in the Constitution a provision that will guard the public property in land from being dissipated as it has been in the past. I feel this subject is so interesting and so important that it is very difficult indeed—it requires a great deal of self-abnegation—to refrain from discussing it as I should like to discuss it. But it is not proper that I should; and, having in view the shortness of the time, I will not do so. But I would urge hon. members to vote for the clause Mr. Wise has proposed; and if, as they think, it will frighten a large number of persons from coming into Federation, we can eliminate it when the second consideration of this Constitution comes on; or if, as some others think, there is such a widespread feeling in favor of it that this will popularise and even frighten away many that have that guidance from public discussion in the press, upon the platform, and in Parliament.

Mr. WALKER:
I hope that our hon. friend Mr. Wise will allow this to go to a division at once.

Mr. WISE:
I am quite agreeable.

Mr. WALKER:
Or else withdraw it. Those who have been in Australia for many years know that the fact of acquiring land on easy terms is one of the main reasons Australia has such a much larger population now than it had forty years ago. At the present time we have enormous areas in Australia practically uninhabited, and yet these lands have been offered on remarkably easy terms. It is preposterous to make this Convention a debating society for the discussion of this land question, after all the delays we have had.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. WALKER:
If Victoria wants more land, why not let her annex the Northern Territory from South Australia? I believe she could get it for the asking.

Mr. TRENWITH:
There is only one reason, and that is that South Australia will not consent.

Mr. WALKER:
Perhaps the best thing is to give away the land so as to get the people to reside on it and occupy it, and thereby contribute to the revenue through the Customs-house. I hope that without further discussion

Dr. COCKBURN:
I do not think that this is the lace for a dissertation on the various forms of land tenure. Still this is a special case, and not a general one. We are dealing with practically the site of the federal capital.

Mr. TRENWITH:
That, and possibly more.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Therefore the circumstances attending the consideration of this clause are altogether exceptionable. Wherever that capital is fixed there is bound to be a large influx of population, and a rise in land values to a fabulous extent.

Mr. WISE:
Hear, hear.

Dr. COCKBURN:
And we should consider how we can make the best practical arrangement, so that Federation may as far as possible pay its way.

Mr. WISE:
If you leave it to the Federal Parliament the people will rush in and get the land beforehand.

Dr. COCKBURN:
If a scheme can be proposed by which it is shown that the Federal Parliament will retain to itself as the landlord an enormous rise of prices in land, then it will be able to dispense with revenues from other directions. This is an aspect which might guide the people in considering what the cost of Federation will be.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The people cannot rush and get Crown lands when it is a federal capital.

Dr. COCKBURN:
We have to consider this matter simply as an ordinary landlord. The federal authority will be the landlord of the site of the federal capital, and it is for us to consider what is the best possible use to which the landlord can put the land. This does not necessarily touch the question of land nationalisation or of methods of land tenure. Therefore I feel compelled to vote with Mr. Wise, and in doing that I do not admit that I agree with the hon. member in all his views. I vote for the amendment because it establishes the general methods of a sound principle, which is applicable in the present instance, and will go a long way towards settling the question I have just alluded to.

Mr. HOWE:
This land question is really the basis of all public good. So fax as the land laws of each individual State are concerned, I think they should be left entirely to the Parliament of that State. Ever since I took an interest, directly, in the politics of the State to which I belong I have advocated the leasing of our Crown lands, and, I am happy to say, Mr. Glynn, myself, and others, working shoulder to shoulder, have introduced into this country a system of leasing for a term, of leasing in perpetuity, for a fixed rent, or of giving a leasehold with right of purchase, which, instead of giving the principal part of the money to the Government, reserves it to the lessees, so that they may improve their properties, which is as good to them as if they held it in fee. The State which is to be created under this Bill is to have a Parliament which will outnumber any of the Parliaments of the other colonies, and which is to be elected by the people of all the colonies. What right has one State to say to the Parliament representing the whole people that you shall do so and so with your land? The Parliament should be allowed to deal with the land in which the federated government will sit as they like, just as we claim that we should be allowed to deal with the land in our own States. I should resent the Federal Government having the power vested in them of directing any individual State, however small, how it should dispose of its Crown land. We should never give them that right, and at the same time we should not attempt to dictate to the Federal Parliament how they should dispose of their land. You say, "Trust the people"; Mr. Deakin is always telling us to do that. I say, let the Federal Parliament deal with their lands at their sweet will and pleasure. They are appointed by the people, and will have to account to the whole of the people for the way in which they dispose of their lands.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

This discussion is purely academical, and it was intended to be so by Mr. Wise. He is a believer in one capital for the Commonwealth. There is but one possible capital.

Mr. TRENWITH:

There is only one Hobart.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

And inasmuch as it is not at all likely that that capital will have a very considerable quantity of land to dispose of-

Mr. BARTON:

Not even if you have the whole island.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

If we had the whole island we should make it difficult for some impecunious, if largely populated, States to acquire property there. But as a matter of fact there will not be a very large amount of unalienated land to deal with in the capital, and that amount may very well be dealt with in accordance with the ordinary laws prevailing in the Commonwealth from end to end.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Clause, as read, agreed to.

Clause 116.-Alteration or limits of States. Agreed to.

Clause 117. - Saving of rights of States. Agreed to.

CHAPTER VII.-MISCELLANEOUS.

Clause 118-The seat of Government of the Commonwealth shall be determined by the Parliament.

Until such determination the Parliament shall be summoned to meet at such place within the Commonwealth as a majority of the Governors of the States, or, in the event of an equal division of opinion amongst the Governors, as the Governor-General shall direct.

Mr. WALKER:

I am only going to add a few lines to the first sentence. I propose:

That the following words be added after the word "Parliament," "and shall be within an area which shall be federal territory."

That is giving effect to the intention of the Constitution Bill as in clause 104. I may say that my desire is that the federal capital shall be in some place which is not at present a capital city, thereby removing a bone of contention, and giving us an opportunity of forming another centre of population. If the Federal Parliament thinks proper to test the principles which my hon. friend Mr. Wise advocates they can do so. But that, in my opinion, is comparatively a small matter at this stage.

Mr. Higgins:
Is it a small matter?

Mr. Barton:
I trust that the Convention will not find it necessary to add this amendment. It is far better to let that matter be settled in the future. We have a provision in clause 51, sub-section 2—that is the only one which deals with the site of the federal capital—which says that the Parliament shall, subject to the Constitution, have exclusive powers to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to the following matters, including the site of the seat of government. But that does not say that the Federal Parliament is bound to take any piece of territory heretofore not inhabited, or not thickly inhabited, and turn it into a federal capital. At present it will be better to leave the hands of the Federal Parliament free, and I trust most of the hon. members will be of that opinion. We ought to leave the Federal Parliament free to determine the site of the Federal capital. My hon. friend's amendment would make it compulsory upon the Commonwealth to take some area and turn it into a federal capital. It would also practically impose this limitation, that some territory would have to be selected which is not at present a great centre of population. I am inclined to the opinion myself that it would be a good thing, in order to avoid intercolonial jealousies, that the site of the capital should not be in one of the present centres. But subject to that limitation of opinion we shall do well to allow the Commonwealth to deal with the matter itself. We should not tie its hands. It is fair to leave it in the hands of those who will be the citizens of Australia, and who ought to determine it for themselves. In the meantime we can allow the clause to stand as it is. I therefore suggest that this amendment be not carried.

Amendment negatived; clause, as read, agreed to.

Clause 119—Power to Her Majesty to authorise Governor-General to appoint deputies—as read agreed to.

Clause 120—In reckoning the numbers of the people of a State or other part of the Commonwealth aboriginal natives shall not be counted.

Dr. Cockburn:
As a general principle I think this is quite right. But in this colony, and I suppose in some of the other colonies, there are a number of natives who are on the rolls, and they ought not to be debarred from voting.

Mr. DEAKIN:
This only determines the number of your representatives, and the aboriginal population is too small to affect that in the least degree.

Mr. BARTON:
It is only for the purpose of determining the quota.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Is that perfectly clear? Even then, as a matter of principle, they ought not to be deducted.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
The amendment you have carried already preserves their votes.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I think these natives ought to be preserved as component parts in reckoning up the people. I can point out one place where 100 or 200 of these aboriginals vote.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Well, it will take 26,000 to affect one vote.

Mr. WALKER:
I would point out to Dr. Cockburn per capita, if he leaves out these aboriginals South Australia will have so much the less to pay, whilst if they are counted South Australia will have so much the more to pay.

Clause, as read, agreed to.

CHAPTER VIII.-AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.
Clause 121-The provisions of this Constitution shall not be altered except in the following manner:—

Any proposed law for the alteration thereof must be passed by an absolute majority of the States Assembly and of the House of Representatives, and shall thereupon be submitted to the electors of the several States qualified to vote for the election of members of the House of Representatives, not less than two nor more than three calendar months after the passage through both Houses of the proposed law.

The vote shall be taken in such manner as the Parliament prescribes.

And if the proposed alteration is approved by the electors of a majority of the States, and if the people of the States whose electors approve of the alteration are also a majority of the people of the Commonwealth, the proposed alteration shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

But an alteration by which the proportionate representation of any State in either House of the Parliament or the minimum number of representatives of a State in the House of Representatives, is diminished, shall not become law without the consent of the electors of the State.

Mr. DEAKIN:

According to the first subsection any amendment of the Constitution requires an absolute majority of the Senate and the House of Representatives, a majority of the whole of the people of the Commonwealth, and a majority of the States of which the Commonwealth is composed. It is a small matter, but under these circumstances the requirement that there should be an absolute majority of the Senate and House of Representatives is surely unnecessary. As the question of reform is practically remitted to the people, I move:

To strike out in line 2, the words "an absolute" with a view to the insertion of the word "a."

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I think the feeling in regard to this clause has been that it should be made as difficult as possible to amend the Constitution. The idea underlying the clause is to provide that, while an amendment of the Constitution is not made absolutely impossible, the Constitution shall not be so easily capable of amendment that in any fluctuation of public opinion, any change of feeling on the part of the people in some crisis of a temporary character, it might be changed.

Mr. DEAKIN:

A majority of the whole people, and a majority of the States.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Yes; an absolute majority of the members representing the States in the Senate and House of Representatives. I do not think this is too much to ask in such an important matter as an amendment of the Constitution, and, while I would not say the Constitution should be such as could only be amended by force of arms, I hope we shall provide all necessary safeguards against its being lightly amended.

Mr. ISAACS:

I hope these words will be eliminated. I should like to point out the meaning of the clause. There is power given for the intervention of the people on the question of the amendment of their Constitution, but that power is merely by way of veto. Unless the proposed amendment of the Constitution first succeeds in passing an absolute majority of both Houses of the Legislature the proposition never reaches the people for their determination at all.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You mean there is no initiative like there is in Switzerland.
Mr. ISAACS:

There is no initiative, but I mean something more. It is possible for an absolute majority of either House to prevent the people from expressing their views on the amendment of the Constitution. I think that is wrong. If we are to provide for a mere majority of the Legislature to alter the Constitution, then I could understand the complaints of some of my hon. friends that that was too easy a mode, but the decision of the Legislature in this case is not intended to be final, and the passing of the amendment of the Legislature is intended to be the means of ascertaining whether this proposition is of so great an importance, of such great interest, and of such necessity as to require the consultation of the people. I can quite understand that circumstances have not failed to occur in some colonial Legislatures where by some accident a proposition has passed the Houses, but has failed to get an absolute majority. I can quite understand why it is necessary in cases where the voice of Parliament is sufficient in itself to establish a new law amending the Constitution to have an absolute majority, and with much more reason than in the present case. Although we are dealing with the question of amending the Constitution, we have to recollect that it never can get passed into law without the sanction of a majority of the States and people. Now, surely that is safeguard enough.

Mr. HOWE:

An ordinary majority.

Mr. ISAACS:

This is only preliminary to getting to the people, and then you have in the States the amplest power of rejecting a proposal, and in the population you have similar power of rejecting a proposal if it is not in accord with the views of the people. In America there are loud and frequent complaints concerning the difficulty of altering the Constitution. As Mr. Moncure Conway has lately pointed out, there exists an almost intolerable state of things there, "arising," as Mr. Stead has graphically phrased it, "from the iron grasp of the dead hand." We know perfectly well the evils—I need not refer to them again—that have arisen from the difficulty of amending the American Constitution. Dr. Burgess has pointed out that. Taking the figures of one census of recent years, three millions of American people could withstand the undoubted will of forty-eight millions of their fellow-citizens, but if we are going to say here that besides running the gauntlet of discussion in the Legislature we are going to impose the condition of getting an absolute majority of both Houses, we put a wrong and unnecessary condition between the proposal and the people's will. Therefore I strongly support the amendment of Mr. Deakin, and I hope the word "absolute" will not find a place in the final draft of the Bill.

Dr. COCKBURN:

An amendment of the Constitution should not be made too easy, but on the other hand it should not be made too difficult. In America it is too difficult. It requires a two-thirds majority of the Congress and a Convention of three-fourths of the States. This Bill only demands an absolute majority of both Houses and a majority of the States and the people.

Mr. HOWE:

But two large States can stop it for all time.

Dr. COCKBURN:

If the Parliament is to have anything to do with it, it should be in accordance with the deliberate will of the House. What is provided for is an absolute majority, and that only means one more than half of the House. It means that there is to be no catch vote, and it is well to provide against that. I cannot imagine a case where a majority of the House wishes to see an amendment carried that the majority cannot be got together to vote. It may mean a delay of a day or two, but only a day or two. The decision should rest on the deliberate will of the House instead of on a catch vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I do not quite follow Mr. Isaacs in his logic. It seems to me it is a very serious matter to attempt to interfere with the whole machinery of the constitutional Government, and surely it is the initial step that should be surrounded by every possible safeguard. Mr. Isaacs seems to take it for granted that there is some pressure of the people to be brought to bear on the Parliament, and that the Parliament will block the way, but before we attempt a change of the Constitution, causing elections throughout the country which mean heavy expenditure, a great deal of unrest, and a dislocation of all business, such a thing should be initiated only by a very solemn process, meaning at the least an absolute majority of both Houses. That would necessitate the giving of proper notice of the intention to move in that direction. Surely if the matter is of such tremendous importance as to dislocate the whole of the social and business life of the community for a period it should be ushered in by every possible safe guard. I think an absolute majority is not unreasonable under the circumstances.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I would ask Mr. Barton whether it is perfectly clear what is meant by the words:

Must be passed by an absolute majority.

The general provision of our Constitution is that the second and third readings must be carried by an absolute majority. Does this mean that it shall be sufficient that the motion:

That the Bill be now passed, and its title be as read is carried by an absolute majority?

Mr. BARTON:
I think it is sufficient if it passes its final stage by an absolute majority.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am inclined to think that the meaning of a clause of this description would be that the final stage of the Bill should be passed by an absolute majority. As there is room for a little doubt, and parliamentary authorities evidently differ over the point, I would suggest that Mr. Barton should consider it.

Mr. BARTON:
I will certainly do that.

Mr. FRASER:
Surely it is not to be desired that a minority of Parliament should be allowed to alter the Constitution, and I never heard of such a thing.

Mr. ISAACS:
And no one else either.

Mr. FRASER:
If you have not an absolute majority of both Houses you allow a minority to pass; the amendment. The most liberal man on earth would not ask for such a proposition as that. The reference to the United States is a different thing altogether, and has no analogy to our conditions. The 1891 Bill contained the same provision, and why should you make an alteration merely for the sake of creating strife and confusion? The Constitution should not be altered to every gust of wind that blows hither and thither.

Mr. HOWE:
Who blows? The lawyers?

Mr. FRASER:
It is not desirable that an alteration of the Constitution should be effected except at the wish of the majority of the people.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I think this clause should be altered, so that it should be necessary that a Bill altering the Constitution should be carried by an absolute majority of both Houses on its second and third readings.

Mr. BARTON:
Suppose the Bill is carried without a division?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
In Victoria on similar occasions we count the House, and the Clerk has to certify that an absolute majority of members have voted. I move:
To insert after the word "passed" the words through its second and third reading."

Mr. BARTON:
It is not necessary. Supposing they have some different mode of procedure.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
If Mr. Barton does not consider my amendment necessary I withdraw it.
Mr. Deakin's amendment negatived.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I see the referendum must take place within three months after the passage of the Bill through both Houses, and it is proper there should be some limitation as to time; otherwise the question might be allowed to get cold and the educative effect of the debates be lost. This means a referendum of the whole of the Commonwealth, and is an expensive and somewhat troublesome matter. Very often we might have coming on in one or more of the States about the time the referendum was to be taken a general election either for the Senate or the House of Representatives, and it would be well to allow a little more than three months so that both may be fixed for the same time. Would it not be better to make it six months?

Mr. BARTON:
I was prepared to make it four, not less than two nor more than four.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Make it two and six. It does not matter.

Dr. COCKBURN:
It would be a greater convenience to have it six.

Mr. BARTON:
It is possible there might be a popular desire at the time to carry out an amendment of the Constitution, and the whole thing might become stale in six months, and the result would not be so satisfactory.

Dr. COCKBURN:
It might become stale if there were no election pending, but if there were such a desire for the amendment that it passed both Houses and a general election was coming on there would be no fear of it growing cold.

Mr. BARTON:
If it is the wish of the Convention I will agree to it.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I move that amendment:
That the word "six" be substituted for the word "three" in sub-section 1.
Agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
A suggestion has been made to me by Mr. Symon, which puts the subsection beginning "And if the proposed alteration" in perhaps a clearer form. Instead of putting it in the form:

If the proposed alteration or the proposed law is approved by the electors of a majority of the States.

And so on, if it is put in a more direct narration it would be better. I will move:

That all the words after "the" in line 12 be struck out, so that the subsection may be put in this form:

And if the electors of a majority of the States approve of the proposed law, and if the people of the States whose electors approve of such law are also a majority of the people of the Commonwealth, the proposed law shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I submit to Mr. Barton the obvious primary meaning of "electors" is "all the electors," and although I understand that he personally takes the view that "electors" means "the majority of the electors," I fear that he has no authority for accepting it in that sense. I do not wish to go against the draughtsman's view in the matter, but it seems to me that if the consent of "the electors" for the alteration had to be obtained the proposed alteration would not become law unless all the electors of a majority of the States approved the proposed law.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It means if the State by a majority of the electors approves.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I have suggested to the draftsman who is responsible for this that the words "the electors" means all the electors unless you say "a majority of he electors."

Mr. LEWIS:
I should like to call attention of the Committee to the way in which this clause is drawn. The proposed alterations must be approved by the electors of a majority of the States. The people of the States whose electors approve are also a majority of the Commonwealth. The proposed alteration should, in my opinion, be approved by a majority of the States, and also by a majority of the electors who record their votes upon the referendum that may be taken upon the proposed law. That is a very different thing to what is presented here. I need not delay the Committee, because the difference will be seen at once. I have an amendment to the effect that the proposed alteration should be approved by the electors of a majority of the States and by a majority of the electors who vote.

Mr. BARTON:
That would not secure a majority of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LEWIS:
Under this system one large colony might join with two or three smaller ones, and their votes would override the votes of another large colony which had joined with one of the small colonies, notwithstanding that a large majority of the electors in the Commonwealth decided against the proposed alteration.

Mr. BARTON:
The proposition is that if the electors of a majority of the States approve, and if the people of the States, who are also a majority of the people of the Commonwealth approve, then the proposed law shall be presented for the Royal assent. As to the point raised by the hon. member Mr. Higgins, I think, on looking into the matter closely, that the thing is sufficiently stated in the clause. I will ask hon. members to look at the Bill of 1891, which dealt with the question by way of Conventions. The last clause of that Bill provided:

Any law for the alteration of the Constitution must be passed by an absolute majority of the Senate and House of Representatives, and shall thereupon be submitted to Conventions, to be elected by the electors of the several States qualified to vote for the election of Members of the House of Representatives.

Then in place of our sub-section 3, the 1891 Bill read:

And if the proposed amendment is approved by the Conventions of a majority of the States, and if the people of the States whose Conventions approve of the amendment are also a majority of the people of the Commonwealth, the proposed amendment shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

Mr. Lewis will see that according to that section the approval of Conventions of the majority of the States must be equal to the approval of the majority of the people of the States whose members sit in these Conventions.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is different to electors.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think so, because the electors are summoned to vote. The clause reads:

Shall thereupon be submitted to Conventions, to be elected by the electors of the several States qualified to vote for the election of members of the House of Representatives.

So that the electors are placed in the same position in this Bill as Conventions were in the Bill of 1891. The majority of one must be applied to the majority of the other. If the passage by the Convention is the passage by the majority, the passage by the electors is the passage by the majority.

Mr. ISAACS:
Could you not strike out electors in the first line of the third subsection?

Mr. BARTON:
That might remove any lingering difficulty, though I do not think there will be any difficulty. There would have to be a prior amendment. Starting with the third line of the third sub-section it should read:

And shall thereupon be submitted in each State to the electors of the State qualified to vote for the election to the House of Representatives.

I cannot move that now, as we have passed that part of the clause, but at a subsequent stage I shall move to do so. To meet Mr. Isaacs, I will now move:

To alter the third sub-section, so that it shall read: "And if a majority of the States approve the proposed law, and if the people of such majority of States are a majority of the people of the Commonwealth, the proposed law shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent."

Mr. DEAKIN:
Before that is put I wish to direct attention to the point put by Mr. Lewis, which I do not think has been exactly caught. It is worthy of consideration.

Mr. LEWIS:
I suggest that it should be made to read:

If the electors of a majority of the States approve of the proposed law, and if a majority of the electors who vote on the subject also approve of the proposed law, then the proposed law shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

The principles embodied in that amendment and in that of Mr. Barton are radically different.

Mr. ISAACS:
It will give a very unfair advantage to South Australia, which has women voters.

Mr. BARTON:
South Australia would count twice that way.

Dr. COCKBURN:
They only count as electors.

Mr. LEWIS:
I did not consider that phase of the question.

Dr. COCKBURN:
That principle is the right one.

Mr. LEWIS:

How are you to reckon the people of the States? Is it to be on a population basis, men, women and children?

The CHAIRMAN:

The only amendment I can put is that suggested by Mr. Barton.

Dr. COCKBURN:

And this is an amendment on that.

The CHAIRMAN:

Mr. Barton has now suggested a second amendment I do not know which be wishes to propose.

Mr. LEWIS:

If these words are struck out, and Mr. Barton's amendment becomes a substantive motion, the consideration of my amendment will be quite in order.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I was struck by the point raised by Mr. Lewis. It Seems a very fair one to raise, and a very fair one to insist upon if there were a uniform franchise through the Commonwealth. One obstacle is that in South Australia at present there is a different franchise from that obtaining in any other portion of the Australian continent, and the double voting power in that colony and in any which follow its example would be certainly unfair to the remaining States. If the franchise were uniform I do not think that the more populous States should have their abstinence from voting allowed for, as it is in this plan. It might even enable them to negative a proposal which secured, not only a majority of the States, but actually a majority of those persons who took the trouble to go to the poll. This plan would not enable a proposal to be carried unless the States in the majority were also the most populous States of the group. It is right to require a majority of the States as States. But why should you require that the people of the States whose electors approve of the alteration should also contain a majority of the people of the Commonwealth? One can conceive that if you have one State much outstripping the others in population, although Yo

Mr. LEWIS:

Can you defend that?

Mr. DEAKIN:

I do not think it is fair. I can conceive circumstances in which it would not be. But the hon. member's proposal is not fair unless he couples with it a provision that it is only to apply after a uniform franchise has been established.

Dr. COCKBURN:

The proposal will undoubtedly be an advantage to the women of South Australia, as it will class them as electors instead of as infants. Otherwise it is a baby franchise. It will be some year or two before Federation is accomplished, and it will be some time after that before the Constitution is amended, and there will be plenty of time for the franchise to become uniform. I do not suppose there will be any amendments in the Constitution for ten years.

Mr. DEAKIN:

In America they followed pretty soon.

Dr. COCKBURN:

Say six or seven years. By that time the question of women's franchise will have been fought out and won or lost-will be won long before then, so I believe. I think this is a fair matter to be raised, otherwise the interests of the smaller States would not be protected, for it is only the population of the larger States that will count at all. It is a perfectly fair proposition to make, and I shall support the amendment. At the same time I am gratified by the improvement made on the Bill of 1891 by the introduction of the referendum.

Question-That all the words after "if" in the first line down to "alteration" in the fourth line be struck out-put and agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS:

I will now move the insertion of the words I have read.

Mr. DEAKIN:

That is an interference with our State rights.

Mr. SYMON:

That is not just, because you are not getting a majority of the people, only a majority of those who vote -a quarter of the people may vote. I suggest that we ought to reconsider that part of the agreement.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I am inclined to think it will not work well. If you are going to require that the States which consent to an alteration of the Constitution must constitute a majority of the people of the Commonwealth, what chance will the smaller States have of doing anything, even if there is almost equal division of opinion in the larger States? It maybe that New South Wales and Victoria are equally divided, but by a very small majority the alteration is negatived in those States. The alteration is affirmed by a very large majority in the other States, which altogether extinguishes the majority by which the proposal is dealt with in the larger States. There is in point of fact on a balancing of all the electors voting a very considerable majority indeed in favor of the amendment. But because the larger States have not been able to affirm it under the circumstances to which I refer, and it has been carried against them by the most trivial majority, the thing is to be set at nought. Such a thing would be perfectly ridiculous. I think the right thing to do would be to preserve, so far as we can, the principle on which you have established your Parliament-have a majority of the States, and have a majority also of the people. Declare that as regards any alteration of the Constitution, if it is affirmed by a majority of the States, which is equal to an affirmance by the constituencies of the Senate, and by a majority of the people of the whole Commonwealth, which is equal to an affirmance by the constituencies of the House of Representatives, then the alteration shall be made. I understand that the object is to ascertain by means of the referendum what should be done in regard to any alteration of the Constitution. If you get two things, namely, a majority of the State electors who vote on the subject and a majority also of the electors of the whole Commonwealth in favor of the proposed alteration, I think that is all you ought to require.

The CHAIRMAN:
The question before the chair is "that the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted."

Mr. KINGSTON:
I would suggest to Mr. Barton that he should move the amendment in two portions. I am sure he is only desirous of ascertaining the wishes of the Convention in this respect. I would ask him to move it down to the portion which includes "by requiring a majority of the States." On that practically there will be a consensus of opinion on the part of the Convention.
Subsequently Mr. Barton can move the other part, and we can then deal separately with that.

Mr. BARTON:
I should be glad to do anything that is reasonable, but Mr. Lewis's amendment as it stands is one which we cannot accept. That is the one which proposes first that there should be a majority of the States, and then a majority of the electors voting If we have five States joined together, of which one has female suffrage, then the electors count for double those of the other States. Then, in the case of a State which has the one man one vote system, that counts for two, and there is the difficulty. As no one can give me a way out of the difficulty, I think we had better adhere to the proposal in the Bill.

Mr. Lewis's amendment negatived.

Mr. Barton's amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I would like to draw attention to the wording of this clause which reads:

But an alteration by which the proportionate representation of any State in either House of the Parliament or the minimum number of representatives of a State in the House of Representatives, is diminished, shall not become law without the consent of the electors of that State.

It would be better to make it clear that the rights of representation of the State in the Senate and proportional representation in the House of Representatives shall be preserved. I propose:

To leave out "proportionate" in the first line and "either House of the Parliament" in the second line, and insert instead "Senate or proportional representation of the State in the House of Representatives."

Mr. SYMON:

Why not simply strike out proportionate"?

Mr. BARTON:

Perhaps that would be as well.

Mr. DEAKIN:

That will not do at all.

Mr. BARTON:

I want to make it clear that the State shall retain its rights

Mr. DEAKIN:

An objection is that the operation of the quota may reduce the number in the House of Representatives, and could you do that without an alteration of the Constitution?

Mr. SYMON:

If you leave out "proportionate" then the section must mean the representation that the State is entitled to under the Constitution. If it is proportionate then logically it will be proportionate; if it is a fixed quantity then it will be a fixed quantity.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The sub-section reads:

But an alteration by which the proportionate representation of any State in either House of the Parliament or the minimum number of representatives of a State in the House of Representatives, is diminished, shall not become law without the consent of the electors of that State.

By the operation of the quota the representation of a State in the House of Representatives may easily be diminished. One provision appears to override the other, and my hon. friend will admit that that is undesirable. I do not say that the contention of my hon. friend Mr. Symon is untenable, but is it not doubtful?

Mr. BARTON:

I will not move my amendment. I will leave the clause as it stands.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Before the clause is finally settled I will ask Mr. Barton if this clause is seriously intended? The fact is that the proportionate representation of the State is not to be diminished without the consent of the electors of that State. What does this clause mean? Does it mean a majority of the electors of that State? - Is it the intention of the Convention deliberately, in fixing a constitution which may last for hundreds of years, to say that there shall be no change in it which shall alter the equal representation of the Senate unless the State whose representation is to be reduced concur with the alteration? We cannot tell what changes will take place, but supposing there are six colonies in the Federation a hundred years hence, and five of these have many millions of people each, and supposing Western Australia becomes like Gold Town in Max Adeler's book-a sand waste perhaps with only a few people fringing the coast, with ten millions in Tasmania, and 2,000 or 3,000 in Western Australia, do I understand the intention here is to say there shall be no change in the representation of Western Australia without her consent?

HON. MEMBERS:

Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS:

If that is the intention let us know it.

HON. MEMBERS:

We do know it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is simply a case like that in Max Adeler's book, where the hundred thousand people dwindled down to one nigger, who was sitting on a stump and was left with the responsibility of all the bonds to Europe. So it is possible for one colony, according to this proposal, to be wiped out and become as bare as the plains of Babylon, but still to remain in possession of the same representation. wish members to face the position which is the most absurd that any legislation can contemplate.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOX:

I recognise that Tasmania's population may in a short time be ten millions, and I quite accept the proposition laid down in this clause. It is a fair thing, and if at any time it appears to be exceedingly unfair the necessary remedy can be applied by the Federal Parliament making the necessary amendment.

Mr. BARTON:

I still think the first of these amendments is the proper one, namely, to leave "proportionate" out of line 40. That will keep alive the representation of any State in the House of Parliament for the amendment of the Constitution. I shall move:

To strike out "proportionate."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS:

This clause is a vital portion of the Bill, and I should like Mr. Barton to postpone it and consider it.

The CHAIRMAN:

We cannot postpone it now.

Mr. ISAACS:

If necessary, I hope Mr. Barton will move to re-commit. It is not so much a matter for the larger States as for the smaller States. I am not sure that the word "representation" will cover the whole thing.

Mr. BARTON:

If it is found that a re-committal is necessary, and that it will not involve a long debate, I shall consent to it.

Mr. SYMON:

I think the words:

Or the minimum number of representatives of a State in the House of Representatives are unnecessary.

Mr. BARTON:

I agree with my hon. friend, and I will move to strike them out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

That means that the number of members cannot be diminished.

Mr. BARTON:

Except with the consent of the electors of the State. This chapter, consisting of one section, relates solely to the Constitution. The present paragraph means that a proposal to make an alteration in the Constitution to diminish the representatives of any State in either House of Parliament shall not become law without the consent of the electors of that State.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I do not know that it means the same thing. We may wish to guard against the possibility of the House of Representatives becoming unwieldy on account of its numbers, but at the same time we must rigidly protect the statutory number of five as the minimum representation in the House of Representatives of each State and its equal representation in the Senate against reduction except with the consent of the State.

Mr. BARTON:

Supposing an alteration to the Constitution is proposed, the question which anyone would put to himself would be "Is the representation in either House of the Parliament diminished by this proposal?"

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I would like to ask Mr. Barton why, if he takes this view, the words were introduced at all? No doubt the words were introduced to give effect to a certain arrangement which was made as to the proportionate representation of the two Houses. If I have his assurance that these words are surplusage I shall be satisfied.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I think that to strike out the words would be both sufficient and effective. I would like to know from Mr. Barton if he means that it should not become law without the consent of the electors of the State. There is no provision for taking a poll.

Mr. BARTON:

Yes; there is a provision for a poll. It is that it shall not be effective unless the majority of the electors are in favor. It must be passed by the electors of a majority of the States, who are a majority of the people of the Commonwealth. There is only one way of carrying a proposal, and that is by a majority.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I suppose that is a majority of the people who vote, and would like the hon. member to say so.

Mr. ISAACS:

Supposing a proposal were made to alter the Constitution, not to diminish the representation of any State, but to increase the representation of all the others. That is a case hardly provided for. It would do away with equal representation.

Mr. BARTON:

The provisions already adopted make that an impossible contingency.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Look at clause 23. It is not to be altered except on a referendum.

Mr. ISAACS:

You are speaking of altering the Constitution now.
Mr. O'CONNOR:

And you cannot alter that without this amendment.

Dr. COCKBURN:

It may be my misfortune, or it may be my fault, but I think a mistake is being made. I do ask the hon. member is it not conceivable that a time may come when both Houses may become unwieldy, and if that state of things comes to pass will it not be necessary to make a reduction all round; and would not that be an ordinary amendment of the Constitution quite different from altering the proposition or reducing the minimum of representation? I think we are making a mistake in striking out the words.

Mr. BARTON:

There can be no difficulty about this matter unless it is necessary to restore the word "proportionate." Then the words "minimum number of representatives" might be left where they are. The question is made difficult by clauses 23 and 27. In clause 23 there is a provision that there shall be two members in one House to one of the other. Then we go on to arrive at a quota which, until Parliament otherwise provides, is to be the number for each member. Then we provide in clause 27:

Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, the number of members of the House of Representatives may be from time to time increased or diminished by the Parliament.

If the Parliament, that is by the concurrence of the House of Representatives and Senate, wishes to decrease the number of the House of Representatives then the question arises whether the whole of this clause 121 is not necessary in order that that the proportionate representation of any State in either House may be preserved. Taking the proportion of one House and the proportion of the other, and then taking the liberty given to the Parliament to increase or diminish the number of the House of Representatives, although the proportion may be maintained, the one result may be to diminish the representation in both Houses. On reconsideration, therefore, I am a little inclined to think that by adopting the suggestion to leave out the word "proportionate" I made a mistake. If we keep in that word it will also be necessary to keep in minimum representation. As it has been suggested that we should re-commit the clause, perhaps it will be better to pass it now and re-commit it, as I shall probably have other amendments to suggest. I shall probably move—although I am not certain yet—to restore the word "proportionate." I ask leave to withdraw the proposed amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.
Mr. LEWIS:
I think that what is intended is that equal representation of any State in the Senate and the proportionate representation of any State in the House of Representatives shall not be interfered with. Also that the minimum number of representatives of any State in the House of Representatives should not be diminished.
Clause agreed to.
Schedule.

Mr. BARTON:
I propose that we shall simply take the schedule and then leave the postponed and the new clauses, together with the financial propositions, over till tomorrow. The financial propositions are not quite ready yet. I understand they are in print, but whatever there is will have to be considered by the Drafting Committee before it is proposed in the Bill. I would therefore like to report progress. The draughtsmen will have some work to do. I would suggest that we leave ourselves quite open to-morrow, so that if the finance clauses are not ready as soon as we could wish we may proceed with the consideration of postponed and new clauses, and then take finances if necessary.
Schedule, as read, agreed to.
Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT.
The Convention adjourned at 10.10 p.m.
Wednesday April 21, 1897.

Notice of Motion - Address to the Queen - Commonwealth of Australia Bill - Departure of Delegates - The Draft Bill - A Petition - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Mr. HOLDER:
I give notice that to-morrow I will move:
That leave of absence be granted to certain hon. members specified.

ADDRESS OF CONGRATULATION TO THE QUEEN.

Mr. BROWN:
I move:
That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable me to move the following motion:—"That an Address from this Convention to Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, congratulating Her Majesty on the completion of the sixtieth year of Her reign, be prepared for presentation to Her Majesty by the President, and that the following members of the Convention be appointed a Committee to prepare such Address, viz., the Hon. Sir R. C. Baker, the Hon. Mr. Adye Douglas, the Hon. Sir W. A. Zeal, the Hon. Sir J. P. Abbott, the Hon. Sir Graham Berry, and the mover."

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BROWN:
I presume I may take the readiness with which the consent has been given for the suspension of the Standing Orders as an indication that the motion I have read meets with the approval of the members of the Convention. I will, therefore, content myself with moving the motion, leaving anything that may seem necessary to be said on the subject till the time when the address is brought up for adoption.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee (continued from Tuesday, April 20th).

Consideration of postponed clauses.

Mr. BARTON:
I move:
That clauses 87-96 be further postponed until after the consideration of the other postponed clauses.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
Clause 13 also further postponed.
Clause 39.-Every House of Representatives shall continue for four years from the day appointed for the first meeting of the House, and no longer; but may be sooner dissolved by the Governor-General. The Parliament shall be called together not later than thirty days after the day appointed for the return of the writ for a general election.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

The Commonwealth Bill, as it was in the year 1891, limited the duration of the House of Representatives to three years, but the Constitutional Committee, for some reason, have decided to extend that term to four years. Now, I confess that I cannot approve of that alteration, unless some good reason can be assigned for it. To begin with, we have the Senate retiring at three years and six years, and it would be wise, so far as we are able, to keep the elections as near together as may be. If we have a Parliament retiring at the end of three years, unless there happens to be a dissolution at some particular time—which is not very likely to happen in connection with the Federal Parliament—we may allow an election for senators and for representatives at certain times to take place together, and by that means save a considerable amount of expense. In addition to that, our people—the people of Australia—have got used to the period of three years, the period for which their own members are elected; and they would hardly understand why we should increase the term to four years for members of the House of Representatives. It would be thought, and fairly said, that we were simply increasing the term in order that the members elected might have a longer period before they had to go to the electors to have their actions discussed and approved or disapproved. So that, as far as I can see, I would be glad if this "four" years could be altered to "three," in order to make it uniform with our Parliament, and also with the term to which our people have become accustomed. Unless my hon. friend can show some good reason why four years should be retained, I will feel inclined to move:

That "four" be struck out and "three" inserted.

Mr. BARTON:

It was the decision of the Constitutional Committee.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I will move the amendment I have indicated.

Question-That the word proposed to be struck out stand as part of the clause-put and negatived.

Question-That the word "three" pro. posed to be inserted be so inserted-put and agreed to.
Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 43.-Until the Parliament otherwise provides, each member, whether of the States Assembly or of the House of Representatives, shall receive an allowance for his services of four hundred pounds a year, to be reckoned from the day on which he takes his seat.

Mr. GORDON:

I move:

To strike out the word "four," in the third line, with the view of inserting "five."

The ground for the motion is that £400 a year is insufficient. While some local Parliaments are paying their resident members £300 a year, £400 is not enough for a member who has to leave-as most members of the Federal Parliament would have to do-his colony and practically abandon his business or his profession. He would have to rely either upon his private means or his parliamentary salary, which, in this case, would be inadequate. I think, if £400 a year is fixed, the choice for members of the House of Representatives will be limited to those who can afford to leave their business or profession, and to those who are prepared to depend entirely on the small parliamentary salary. While members of both of these classes are exceedingly desirable members of any Parliament, I think it would be a mistake to have the whole Parliament consisting of them, which the payment of the salary proposed would probably lead to. I think £500 is little enough; the £100 makes all the difference to the ordinary professional or business man.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

£400 is quite enough.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

£100 too much.

Mr. GORDON:

I think it is a question on which the sense of the Committee should be taken, and, without further remark, I move the amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think that, having regard to the fact that the Federal Parliament will have much less to do than the ordinary local Parliaments after the first Parliament, £400 is sufficient. I am as strongly in favor of payment of members, on the grounds alluded to by Mr. Gordon, as any man, but I say that the work done in the States Parliaments takes far more time than will the work in the Federal Parliament, after its first meeting. It is not likely, indeed, that the Federal Parliament will sit more than two months in the year. I should like to strike out "four," with a view to the insertion of "three." At the same time, as £400 has been fixed as a compromise, I hope it will remain at that amount as the maximum.

Sir William Zeal:

I consider that £400 is ample payment for the services of members. In addition to that they possess the privilege of a free railway pass. The amount proposed to be paid—£400—is twice as much as the Dominion Parliament of Canada pays its members. I trust hon. members will not support the amendment to increase the amount to £500.

Mr. Trenwith:

I hope that Mr. Gordon's amendment will be carried. We have no right to assume that the Federal Parliament will not have a good deal to do. All our experience teaches us that, as civilisation advances, the requirements of the people increase, and the tendency to ask Parliament to do things, that in the past have been done by private enterprise, is increasing very rapidly. I feel confident that the Federal Parliament, instead of having less to do as time goes on, will have a great deal more to do. I think that it will be found to the advantage of the States to hand over work to the central Government. Of course, I can understand the objection that any sum is too much, by those who disapprove of the principle of payment of members. But the principle of payment of members has been adopted throughout all the colonies. It was adopted after a good deal of resistance on the part of those who disapprove of it, which showed the strong growing public feeling in favor of paying members for the work they do, and of looking upon the position of a member of Parliament not merely as a position of honor, but rather regarding them as State servants who are paid for their work. We are paid not merely to reimburse us for expenses incurred, and to pay members of the Federal Parliament £500 a year would be little enough, considering that during a portion of the year they will have to be great distances from their established homes.

Sir William Zeal:

It will cost them nothing to travel.

Mr. Trenwith:

That is a very popular delusion.

---

Sir William Zeal: Let them keep out of Parliament.

Mr. Trenwith: That is exactly the idea. I say let the people have the widest possible area of selection for Parliament in order that all sections may be represented.

Sir William Zeal:
To keep a lot of idle fellows doing nothing.

HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. TRENWITH:

I am anxious that members of Parliament should not be idle fellows. In the non-payment days a great many members were idle fellows who looked upon a seat in Parliament as an addition to their social position, who cared very little for its worth, and in some instances who paid themselves very handsomely by the opportunities they had.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

You cannot say that with truth. That is a most scandalous assertion!

Mr. TRENWITH:

It is the truth.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Quite scandalous. You have no right to make such a statement.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I do not want to initiate a discussion of this sort, but when Sir William Zeal talks about idle fellows, he brings upon himself, naturally and properly, the rejoinder I have made.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

A most unjust rejoinder.

Mr. TRENWITH:

In some of the colonies the best lands and water-frontages—the very eyes of the colonies, in fact—were mopped up by members of Parliament during the regime of non-payment of members.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

How many of them?

Mr. TRENWITH:

As I said before I do not want to initiate a discussion of this sort.

Mr. WALKER:

What you say may be the case in Victoria, you know.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

It is a gross exaggeration.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I am not speaking merely of Victoria. I lived during the early part of my life in a nice little colony which suffered in the same way.

Mr. WALKER:

Do you mean Van Diemen's Land?

Mr. TRENWITH:

I mean Tasmania. I was pointing out that the instincts of our people tend towards payment of members of Parliament for their work. My hon. friend, Sir William Zeal, interjected that we have free railway passes. I would remark that any person who knows anything about travel must recognise that it carries with it a large amount of expense. Those who are here, away from their homes, know that if they were getting £400 a year for this work, they would be losing money, and they would not even be reimbursed for the expenditure incurred. Those who urge that the amount should be left as proposed in the Bill, are not in favor of payment of members, but are simply favorable to reimbursing members for the disbursements they make in connection with the performance of their duties.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I was always in favor of payment of members.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I feel confident that my hon. friend Mr. Higgins could not have looked thoroughly at the question or he would not have spoken as he did.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
He is losing now ten times as much as he will ever get for being here, but he is bearing it cheerfully.

Mr. TRENWITH:
There are some who could not afford to lose anything at all. Parliament is to be composed, as it ought to be, of representatives of all sections of the community. There must be in Parliament some who cannot afford to lose anything at all, and who must be paid for their services, and if those services are worth having, there ought to be adequate remuneration for them. I sincerely hope that the higher figure will be adopted, not because I believe in extravagance, but because I believe that any lesser sum will not pay members of Parliament for their work.

Question-That the word "four," proposed to be struck out, stand part of the question-put. The Committee divided.

Clause, as read, passed.
CHAPTER I.
Part IV.-Provisions relating to both Houses.
Clause 46.-Any person who directly or indirectly himself, or by any person in trust for him, or for his use or benefit, or on his account, undertakes, executes, holds, or enjoys, in the whole or in part, any agreement for or on account of the public service of the Commonwealth, shall be incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives while he executes, holds, or enjoys the agreement, or any part or share of it, or any benefits or emolument arising from it.

Any person, being a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, who, in the manner or to the extent forbidden in this section, undertakes, executes, holds, enjoys, or continues to hold, or enjoy, any such agreement, shall thereupon vacate his place.

But this section does not extend to any agreement made, entered into, or accepted by, an incorporated company consisting of more than twenty person, if the agreement is made, entered into, or accepted, for the general benefit of the company.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I move the addition of these words:
Any person being a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives who, directly or indirectly, accepts or receives any fee or honorarium for work done or services rendered by him for or on behalf of the Commonwealth whilst sitting as such member shall thereupon vacate his place.

This will practically bring the Commonwealth law into line with the law that holds good in Victoria. I understand that there not only is a contractor debarred, but no person can accept a fee or honorarium. As I pointed out the other night, I see no reason why lawyers or professional men should be in a better position than other members of the community. There is just as much likelihood for abuse to creep in if you allow them to accept fees or honorariums as there is in the payment of contractors. I only desire that, in a matter of this kind, if we legislate against contractors, newspaper proprietors, merchants, and ordinary tradespeople, we should also legislate against any member of a privileged profession from doing that which is admitted to be wrong in others. I will say nothing about corruption, but if there be a principle in the matter, and it is a good principle in one case it is equally good in the other.

Mr. Wise:

I feel a certain amount of hesitation in speaking on a matter which is openly directed against the profession to which I have the honor to belong; but I should be lacking in my duty if I did not disregard any personal consideration which might induce me to keep silence and put before the Convention reasons why the old established rule which has prevailed under the British Constitution, and which has been the practice of the House of Commons and of these colonies—with the sole exception of Victoria—should be adhered to in the Constitution. The distinction between contractors and those who act on behalf of the Government in a confidential capacity must be manifest to everyone. The Commonwealth may require the services of arbitrators, engineers, or professional men of one kind or another, and there has never been in our colony or in England any practice of disqualifying men who are called upon to act in a confidential position towards the Government from receiving their fees from the fact that they hold seats in Parliament. The position of a contractor is entirely different. The interests of two contracting parties are opposed to one another, as each endeavors to secure the best of the bargain; but if a man is employed as a valuer by the Government the interests of the Government are his interests, just as much as the interests of a client are the interests of the barrister; and because of that essential difference between the two classes of cases—because in the one case, if the contractor does his duty honorably to himself, without any disregard of the rules of commercial morality, without any disregard of the rules of delicacy or honor—if he does his duty by himself he will get the best he can out of the Government. In the other case, where a man is consulted by the Commonwealth, where the honor of the Commonwealth is placed in his keeping—whether he is consulted as a physician, or a barrister, or a lawyer, or an auctioneer, or a valuator—in all of these cases there is no divergence of interest.

Sir Joseph Abbott:

Is not the object to keep members from being in the pay of the Government?

Sir William Zeal:
That is the point.

Mr. WISE:

Though this practice has prevailed in the House of Commons, and has been enforced with more or less rigidity, particularly during the last few years, there has never been any rule to prevent men employed in a confidential capacity from receiving their professional remuneration. I make no appeal that a barrister should be treated differently to others.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Yes, you do.

Mr. WISE:

I make no plea for barristers; for I put them on the same footing as engineers and valuers. We have valuers sitting in the New South Wales Parliament. I can assure the hon. member that I am speaking with accuracy, because my seat was challenged owing to my acceptance of a brief from the Government. I went to the Elections and Qualification Committee, and the whole thing was brought up. The Committee brought in a report that there was nothing inconsistent in a man sitting in Parliament, and receiving remuneration for professional services.

Mr. GORDON:

As a barrister only? Mr. WISE: No; as a barrister, or engineer, or valuer.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

They are disqualified in our colony.

Mr. WISE:

I ought to know, because my seat was challenged. If I had known the matter would have been brought up, I could have had the documents here. It is a mistake to exclude professional men from public life.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

Why are they better than commercial men?

Mr. WISE:

Commercial men are not excluded. A large part of the field of professional work is occupied by the Government in its many forms of administration in this country.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

The very reason why they should be excluded.

Mr. WISE:

What would be thought if a commercial man had to give a bond on entering Parliament that he could not trade in his own colony north of Newcastle, or in Victoria in the Western District? It would be thought a hardship.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

That is an extreme case.
Mr. WISE:

To a professional man half the work that comes to him is more or less for or against the in opposition to the Government, and thus influence either the administration or a policy in favor of his client, while he is debarred from earning a fee for doing his best professionally to help the Government out of a difficulty. Yet no one proposes to prohibit members from appearing against the Government. That brings us to apply an illustration. When a professional man goes into Parliament, if not permitted to appear for the Government, he deliberately shuts himself out from half of his practice.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Is there any proof of this ever having been abused?

Mr. WISE:

No proof. It has never to my knowledge been abused in any way whatever. In answer to the cry that we are asking for special privileges, I may say we are only asking to have the same opportunities of practising our profession that we had before going into Parliament. Supposing the Government were the only purchaser of, say, drapery goods, or the purchaser of 50 per cent. of the drapery goods that come into the colony, and there were a large number of persons employed in the sale of drapery, the position of the barrister who is asked to give up appearing for the Government would be analogous to the merchant who would be asked to give up selling to the Government. I would ask no special favor for barristers. Sir Joseph Abbott will agree with me that in our own colony the largest fees paid in one year were not to barristers at all, but to two valuers who were members of the House. The question I say has been formally decided by the Committee on Qualifications in my person, and they reported in my favor. It has been the habitual practice in our Parliament and in England.

Mr. ISAACS:

Did they report in favor of the continuance of the practice?

Mr. WISE:

They did not touch that, and so I do not know their view of that.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

It has always been a puzzle to me why this concession should be given to one branch of the profession alone. It is only a concession which has been recognised with regard to the bar in New South Wales. There we have a distinction between the bar and the lower branch of the profession. No one for a moment would dream of a solicitor who is a member of either House acting as a solicitor for any Government.
Mr. WISE:
   Unquestionably he would.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   No such thing was ever heard of in New South Wales.
Mr. WISE:
   Because they have a Crown Solicitor.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   If it is not allowed in New South Wales to one branch of the profession why should it be allowed to another branch?
Mr. WISE:
   I quite agree with you there.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   The whole object of preventing members of Parliament from accepting remuneration from the Crown is to prevent the Government of the day from buying the services and support of members of Parliament. That point alone should enter into our consideration in coming to a conclusion upon the amendment proposed by Mr. Carruthers. Supposing you had a House full of lawyers-
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Don't.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   What a very easy thing it would be in a country like ours, where Governments are engaged in various matters and where litigation is necessarily extensive, for a Government to divide its patronage and secure a majority.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   Is there any suggestion that that has ever been done?
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   They are no more incorruptible than other people?
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
   But has it ever been done?
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   What has happened in New South Wales? It is a scandal in that colony that a member of one branch of the Legislature draws between £4,000 and £5,000 a year from the Government.
Mr. WISE:
   And saves the Government £20,000 a year.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   That is a matter of opinion. I think it is a public scandal that one man sitting in any Parliament should draw from the country between £4,000 and £5,000 a year. At one time while drawing this amount the gentleman I refer to was a member of the Government.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
He probably would have earned more on the other side.

Mr. BARTON:
Because the other side generally pays better fees than the Government.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Mr. Wise says this has been allowed in the House of Commons for many years, and has never been questioned. It is not likely to be questioned in such a conservative body as the House of Commons, composed, as it mostly is, of professional men.

Mr. WISE:
They are very sensitive of their purity.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I never heard of any adequate reason why barristers should have this immunity.

Mr. WISE:
That is not the case; it does not apply to barristers only.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I attach no importance to the decisions of the Committee on Elections and Qualifications, as I have known the Committees of two different Parliaments to give different decisions on the same statement of fact. The Committees are appointed by the House there is no judge to preside over them, and, though they are the best men of the House, there must always be a majority on one side or the other, and so that tribunal is not impartial. I know of no case-and I have been seventeen years in the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales-where a member of the Assembly, who is a valuator, has received fees from the Government. I do know of one case in which a member of Parliament's seat was questioned on the ground that, as an auctioneer, he occasionally sold property on behalf of the Government.
It was, however, proved before the Committee that the whole transaction was done by his partner, and all the fees were received by his partner. It was a subterfuge, of course. That just shows the value of the decisions of this Committee. That man was allowed to keep his seat. That is the only case I know of in which a man was allowed to receive the fees unless he was a barrister. There is no instance of a medical man being allowed to receive fees.

Mr. ISAACS:
I desire to express my absolute approval of Mr. Carruthers' amendment.
We should be careful to do all that is possible to separate the personal interests of a public man from the exercise of his public duty. We should bear in mind that it is not only important to secure that so far as we can in actual fact, but, in every way possible, we should prevent any appearance of the contrary being exercised. It has been well pointed out that in Victoria we have a provision carrying out the idea embodied in this amendment. In clause 19 of the Constitution Amendment Act of 1890 the fullest provision is made in this regard, and whilst we have already affirmed with regard to other people in clause 46 that no benefit under agreements with the Government shall be obtained by a member of Parliament, we would, unless we adopted this amendment, be drawing a distinction and making an improper and vicious exception in favor of the legal profession. I have no hesitation in saying that, in my judgment, the bulk of the legal profession do not want any such exception. And there is immense force in the observation that it would be a dangerous thing for the public if this were to be allowed to exist. We know that there are, by the exercise of much good sense amongst the people at large, a great many members of the legal profession in the various Parliaments; but on a crucial division at a critical moment in the history of a ministry it might be either a fact-having regard to Franklin's observation on the taint of original sin—or it might lead to a suspicion where the fact did not exist, that a member had been biased or inclined at a delicate moment by a brief, or the promise of a brief. We know that some of the ablest members of the legal profession are in the various Parliaments, but I think that when they accept the position of a member of Parliament they ought to be prepared to make a sacrifice and not to take briefs for the Government.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

That is not the point.

Mr. ISAACS:

It is an answer to one of the points that has been made—why should a lawyer when he becomes a member of Parliament be deprived of a portion of his livelihood? The public are interested in seeing and ensuring, so far as it is possible to ensure it, that no member of Parliament shall for his own personal profit allow his judgment to be warped in the slightest when he is called upon to decide on questions of public moment. I give the strongest support, so far as my mind carries me, to this amendment, and I hope it will be carried unanimously.

Mr. REID:

I hope we will not waste any more time upon this matter, which is after all not a very large one. I confess that on a fair consideration of the facts I am going to support the amendment of Mr. Carruthers.

Mr. FRASER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

At the same time I might say that in New South Wales it would have been an absolute calamity to the people of the country if during the past twenty years they had not had the opportunity of availing themselves of the services of certain eminent counsel who happened to be members of the Upper Chamber. This was owing to peculiar local circumstances; but in the Assembly no barrister, except in the case of my hon. friend, which was an exceptional one, has taken work for the Crown.

Mr. WISE:

It used to be a common practice.

Mr. REID:

It must have been away back in the dim past. I have no recollection of it. I have been in the New South Wales Parliament since 1880, and during that time no barrister who was a member of the Legislative Assembly took a brief for the Crown, except my hon. friend in an exceptional case.

Mr. WISE I did it deliberately to test the question.

Mr. REID Then my hon. friend took the brief to test the question, I myself refused a general retainer from the Commissioners of Railways because, as a matter of principle, the more free a man who represents the people is from transactions with the Government the better it is for himself and for his public usefulness. I am, therefore, cordially in sympathy with the amendment. I think that in cases heard in the federal courts there can be no such inconveniences as have arisen in New South Wales. The area of choice will be much larger, and under the circumstances I concur with the general proposition that barristers should be subject to the same restrictions as members of other professions.

Mr. WISE:

I have here the return to which I referred, showing that in New South Wales fees were paid on several occasions to arbitrators, and also to commissioners, who were sitting in Parliament. The ground on which it was held this could be done was that their interest did did not conflict with the interests of the Government.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I shal

But this section does not extend to any agreement made, entrusted with, or accepted by an incorporated company consisting of more than twenty persons, if the agreement made is entered into or accepted for the general benefit of the Company.

That affords a facile means for getting out of the difficulty by an ant of incorporation. In our own colony a gentleman was lately unseated because he had an interest in a contract for the supply of chaff and hay. The amount involved was only £10 or £12, I believe. At the same time we know that for years in our own Legislature there has been sitting a member, much respected and deservedly respected, who has held and enjoyed a contract through the medium of an incorporated company for the manufacture and supply of locomotives—a contract involving hundreds of thousands of pounds. By limiting the matter in the way proposed we are straining at the gnat and swallowing the camel. In a matter where it is of little importance, say the supply of a bag of flour by a storekeeper to the Government, where it is not worth while to form a company, we prohibit it; but if the thing is big enough—if the profit likely to be derived by the person chiefly interested is sufficiently large to induce him to nominally associate himself with other people and go through the form of incorporation, he can do what he likes.

Mr. SYMON:

He has to resolve himself into twenty people.

Mr. KINGSTON:

He can get ten or twenty others to lend their names.

Mr. WISE:

That has been done in New South Wales.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Ought it to be done?

Mr. WISE:

Certainly not.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Well, we must strike out the words, as I suggest.

Mr. GLYNN:

Unless that is done some will vote against this.

Mr. WISE:

In that case there was no popular prejudice against them, and it was looked upon as a smart commercial act.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Of course we have here representatives of all classes. I am pleased to know that we have here a number of the profession to which I have the honor to belong, almost a majority, and if we carry this amendment we will be able to lay the flattering unction to our souls that the profession did it. They will do it in the public interests. The hon. gentleman Mr. Carruthers ought to undertake the task I have suggested. I hope we will make the thing fair all round, giving neither preference to the legal profession, nor the commercial community, nor any other profession or class.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I quite agree with the proposal that we should debar individuals of all classes from entering into these contracts, and I quite agree that we should prevent the formation of dummy companies for the same purpose. If it is wise to restrict individuals it is wise to restrict a company of a certain number of persons, though I would point out that twenty has not yet been fixed as the number. We have in Victoria, as my hon. friend the Attorney-General reminds me, what we call proprietary companies, which must not exceed twenty-five members. I would be willing to make the number twenty-five in this instance.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Why should we do for a company what we will not do for individuals?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
For this reason, we would prevent a member of Parliament from becoming a member of a company. We are going too far altogether. A member may hold a number of shares in a company. That company may honestly and bond fide, without his knowledge at all, enter into some small contract with the Government, and the result is that he must lose his seat. Surely my hon. friend never intends to run mad over a proposal of this kind. While it is reasonable and proper to prevent an individual from forming a dummy company, surely we would look ridiculous if we said a member of Parliament must not be allowed to enter into any bargain with the Government as a shareholder in any company under the penalty of losing his seat. Take the case of the Metropolitan Gas Company in Victoria, which has hundreds of shareholders. The company supplies our parliamentary buildings with gas, and is it to be said that a member of Parliament who is a shareholder in the Company, and could not possibly be benefited in any way by the contract of the Government, except in the way of adding to the dividend he would receive, must either give up his interest in the company or lose his seat in Parliament. If we go a step further than preventing the dummy company, surely we would look ridiculous if we said a member of Parliament must

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think there is a great danger involved in the proposal of my hon. friend the President. There is too much of a tendency at the present time to create professional members of Parliament, and we all know that in these countries great services are undertaken by the State. The ramifications of State business enter into the whole length and breadth of industrial life. Therefore, bow could any man be assured that any company in which he had a share would not at some time or other come under the ban of this particular clause? Again, you would practically shut out of public life all the active-minded men engaged in the commerce and industry of the country, became every man engaged in commerce and industry who goes outside the little rut of his own particular business is generally a gentleman of that kind of calibre who makes a good public man. His interests are so widespread throughout the community that it would be impossible for him to know when they might touch the public business. To ask a man when he enters public life to sell out every share he has in a limited liability company would be an outrage. Furthermore, there are some people who cannot sell out their shares. We all know that during the last few years what are generally assets have become liabilities. Therefore to put such restrictions on the individual would really mean, to a great extent, a ban on public life. With regard to the other part of the question, it seems to me, speaking as a layman with regard to the profession of the law, that it is a very serious step to take to deprive the Crown of the best services of the best men in the country. Furthermore, I should have liked to have heard a little more argument to show that this exception on the part of the bar has been misplaced. I fail to recollect any case in which any real and substantial charge has been made against the high honor of a professional man for taking briefs owing to improper relations with the Government. Hon. members must recollect that the Government is also the head of criminal jurisdiction, and there might come a time when the greatest criminal might possibly get off because the Crown failed to get the best legal services.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

The Crown always has its own prosecutors.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Yes; and we all know well enough that these positions are simply the stepping-stones to higher positions at the bar. I do not pretend to know much about the legal profession, but I know all the same that we have had from time to time some of the ablest men in the legal profession members of Parliament, and I am so anxious to see the highest possible status maintained in our Federal Parliament that, just as in the case of men trading in the mercantile world, so in the case of men in the higher branch of the legal profession, no ban should be put upon them in their desire to enter public life.

Mr. FRASER:

I contend that no ban would be put upon the members of the legal profession. It is only right that there should not be the semblance of wrong-doing or suspicion of it attached to Members of Parliament, and I heartily support the amendment of Mr. Carruthers. If the profession is so limited, and the ablest men in it are so restricted in numbers that the Crown may lose the advantages of their services, the only course open for these men, if they are associated with public life, is to retire from it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is the object.

Mr. FRASER:
A man must choose either one thing or the other. If they will be in Parliament and rest under this suspicion-I am not going to say they will be guilty of this-of getting briefs from the Crown, then I say they must choose between either remaining in Parliament and not receiving these huge briefs, or going out of Parliament and attending to their professional work. I quite endorse Sir George Turner's statement. A man might hold a share in, say, the Bank of New South Wales, or, in fact, any company, from which he might not be able to sever himself, might not be able even to sell it or dispose of it. Shares are not so easy to dispose of nowadays. That investment might debar him from entering public life, or render him liable to serious consequences. I hold that the proper thing to do is to carry the amendment.

Mr. BARTON:
What you suggest would bring about the desired result-a bad Parliament. You say: keep these able men out of Parliament.

Mr. FRASER:
I do not wish to reflect at all upon the members of the legal profession, who are most valuable, able, and conscientious men.

Mr. DEAKIN:
And so say all of us.

Mr. FRASER:
So say I. I have had to rely upon their judgment frequently, and I have never found them wanting.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Not wanting in fees.

Mr. FRASER:
They are never wanting in giving good advice to me. They tender good, honest, and bona fide advice.

Mr. REID:
Especially as to the evidence they should give.

Mr. FRASER:
I was going to say I was not sure that Parliament would be any the worse if there were fewer legal members in it. I assure you there is a strong feeling outside in our colony, that there are too many lawyers in Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS:

The people do not show it by the elections.

Mr. PEACOCK:

You are quite right.

Mr. FRASER:

Mr. Peacock, who knows the feeling of the country in Victoria as well as any member of this Convention, says I am quite right, and the probability is that they will not send so many next time. The political pendulum goes and returns, and it will return again. At present it has gone too far in the direction I have alluded to, and I hope the amendment will be carried.

Mr. SYMON:

There has been so much said, and some of it in such exaggerated terms, as to what is called the semblance of wrongdoing, that I feel obliged to present myself to the Committee as a monument of the system as to which a great deal of abuse has been predicated, but as to which no instance of abuse has actually been related. I happened to be in Parliament for some time, and whilst there, I confess I was abandoned enough to be induced on more than one occasion to hold retainers both for and against the Government, and I am not aware that in consequence of these retainers I have deteriorated.

Mr. FRASER:

You are an exception.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

A simon pure.

Mr. SYMON:

I am obliged to my hon. friend, but I doubt whether in this instance it is the exception which proves the rule. I am not aware that the circumstances I have mentioned ca the federal capital will be, but it is fairly certain where it will not be. It is not likely to be in any great centre of population. I do not want to utterly destroy the hopes of some members, but we are pretty well assured it is not going to be in any great centre of population, of commercial or of legal enterprise.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Is Adelaide such a centre?

Mr. SYMON:

Adelaide is the most promising of all the fairly populated centres in the competition for the federal capital, but whatever exceptions there may be in the rule embodied in the amendment with regard to the individual colonies, cannot apply where we are dealing with the case of the Commonwealth. If the federal capital is to be within federal territory severed from the rest of the States—at some distance from the centres of population and business, everybody who is elected to the Federal Parliament will have to go there. Now, I think the lawyers will be privileged enough over the rest of the members of the Parliament if they have the opportunity of practising in the Federal High Court, without having the additional privilege of holding Government retainers and Government briefs. Other people will be represented in the Parliament, and I hope there will be an industrial representation, and what a handicap the lawyers would have over the other members! I do not think we should make an exception in their favor, as there will be sufficient opportunities of their earning a livelihood if it has to be earned during the time that Parliament is sitting, by practising before the High Court, without acting on behalf of the Government. It has been suggested that the field of choice will be limited. It is frequently limited in a State, but in the Commonwealth there will be the whole bar of Australia to choose from, and therefore that argument does not apply at any rate with the same degree of force that it does in a State. For these reasons, and for others adduced by other members, I shall support the amendment; but I hope that the amendment with regard to the other portion of the clause will not be pressed. The Federal Parliament, if they see abuses creeping in in consequence of shareholders of public companies being members of Parliament, can impose limitations which will bring these abuses to an end. In the case put by Sir George Turner and others, the evil does not exist to the same extent—there is little or no possibility of individual corruption—but there are cases in which it may exist, and these must be provided for specially. In other cases it would be impossible for a man, if he were a shareholder in a bank, to take a seat in Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON:

I am going to vote against the amendment, and I do not care to do so without shortly explaining my views. I do so because I think the interests of the people are paramount. Mr. Reid has rightly stated that it would have been in his colony a public calamity if the choice had been limited, and for that reason I think Mr. Wise can fairly claim his vote. I quite agree that it may be a public calamity to the small colony I represent if the Government is debarred from retaining the services of the leading men who may happen to be members of Parliament. The gentleman who makes £5,000 a year out of the Government of New South Wales does so by virtue of the fact that he is the best man in his profession, and why should the people be debarred from having his services. Now, sir, I will use another argument. We all recollect the accident to the Brighton express train in Victoria, when a great number of people of all classes were seriously injured. If Dr. Fitzgerald and other eminent doctors had been members of Parliament, were the Government to be debarred from telegraphing to them to attend these unfortunate people? If, in Tasmania, we decided to remove the bar at Strahan Harbor, on the west coast of Tasmania, or carry out some great railway matter—we have an honorable member here with us, Mr. Grant, a gentleman living on his means—should we be debarred from giving him a fifty-guinea retainer to advise us what to do? I think the public ought to be considered in this matter before anybody.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. DOBSON:

I differ from the hon. member in the way he is trying to do it. Supposing Mr. Symon is a senator in the Federal Parliament, and Mr. Barton is a member of the House of Representatives for New South Wales, and during the very first Session the enormous question arises of State rights, will not the Government be desirous of giving Mr. Barton and Mr. Symon retainers? I think it would be a right thing to give retainers to the beat men, and I am not going to belittle my profession by saying there would be corruption. Is the Commonwealth to be debarred from securing the services of these gentlemen because you are going to distrust their profession and belittle the Federal Government?

Mr. TRENWITH:

I feel the amendment is a desirable one, and I shall vote for it; but I would be sorry to do so if I took it to be a reflection on the legal profession. I do not say that a colony suffers from lawyers being in Parliament, because I think the public have confidence in them, but it does seem to me an anomaly that one class of contractors shall be debarred and another class of contractors exempted. That is the difficulty I see. A barrister undertaking to perform a service is just as much a contractor as a man with a number of horses and drays who undertakes a work, and if it is proper that a person having a contract from the Crown should be a member of Parliament it seems to me to apply to every contract. The argument of my honorable friend Mr. Dobson, based upon the assertion of Mr. Reid, that during the past twenty years it would have been a calamity if the Parliament of New South Wales could not have had professionally the services of some of its ablest members, seems to me to be no argument at all as now applied to the New South Wales Parliament, because the circumstances are so altered. Probably it would be no argument at all now as applied to New South Wales, because the number of able lawyers that New South Wales has now is altogether out of proportion to the number it had in its earlier history. The other argument of Mr. Dobson that, assuming that two of the most able members of this Convention—Mr. Barton and Mr. Symon—should be members of the Federal Parliament, one of them a representative of one of the Commonwealth Houses of Parliament, and the other a representative of the other, we should therefore necessarily be deprived of their services, it seems to me to be a gratuitous assumption that need not necessarily follow. I remember an instance in Victoria where an important case had to be conducted before the Privy Council, and the Attorney-General of Victoria went to England and pleaded the case on behalf of the Government. It seems to me that if we had these extremely eminent lawyers in either House, probably one or other of them would be acting in the capacity of Attorney-General for the Commonwealth Government. Therefore, in the case suggested by Mr. Dobson, we should not necessarily lose their services. But if their services were utterly beyond our disposal and were unattainable, there are, no doubt, still other members of the Australian bar whose services could be obtained, and the cause of the Commonwealth Parliament would not suffer. On the broad principle, if there is possible danger in employing one member of Parliament as a contractor for the Government, there is equal danger in employing another member of Parliament as a contractor for the Government, and what is right in one instance cannot be wrong in another instance.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I move:

That the Committee do now divide.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. GLYNN:

On a point of order, I would like to point out

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member can not speak at this stage.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I understood that Mr. Carruthers asked that the amendment I suggested to him should be put before the last sub-section.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member Mr. Carruthers never asked leave to withdraw his amendment. I understood Mr. Kingston made a suggestion that something should be done.
Mr. KINGSTON:
   And the hon. member assented to it himself.
   The CHAIRMAN: He may have; but nothing was-proposed in Committee.

Mr. KINGSTON:
   He undoubtedly assented to it.
   An HON. MEMBER: Let him withdraw now.
   An HON. MEMBER: He cannot; a division is ordered.

Mr. KINGSTON:
   I would suggest that the wishes of the Committee should be consulted.
   The CHAIRMAN: There are certain Standing Orders, and I am here to uphold them.
   Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KINGSTON:
   I will ask Mr. Barton whether he will give us an opportunity to further consider this clause.

Mr. DEAKIN:
   Move something now.

Mr. SYMON:
   Move that it be struck out.

Mr. KINGSTON:
   I cannot, because Mr. Carruthers' amendment has been added to the clause. It was undoubtedly the understanding of Mr. Carruthers that it should be moved after the second paragraph, and I would respectfully suggest that the opportunity should be taken by the Committee to give effect to its wishes.

   The CHAIRMAN: I must object to its being assumed that any private understanding between members has any binding effect upon the chair or the Committee.

Mr. FRASER:
   Mr. Barton will no doubt agree to reconsider the clause if an amendment is necessary.

Mr. BARTON:
   I shall be happy to recommit any clause where there seems to be a probability of reconsideration resulting in any alteration. Where it in not likely that there will be any substantial alteration I think public interest requires that there shall not be a reconsideration. Later on I shall move that certain clauses be reconsidered, and if the majority are in favor of reconsideration, I shall propose that the reconsideration be decided upon without debate. Some of the clauses should be reconsidered for substantial reasons, but others only to make alterations in form and detail.
Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 83.-Upon the establishment of the Commonwealth, all officers employed by the Government of any State in any department of the Public Service the control of which is by this Constitution assigned to the Commonwealth, shall become subject to the control of the Executive Government of the Commonwealth; and thereupon every such officer shall be entitled to receive from the State any gratuity, pension, or retiring allowance, payable under the law of the State on abolition of his office.

Mr. BARTON:

I have an amendment to this clause. Hon. members will recollect that there was a doubt whether the addition to the clause, beginning

And thereupon properly conserved the rights of civil servants; and where claims were accruing but were not existing rights, and it was contemplated that the officer should remain in the service of the Commonwealth, there was a desire that provision should be made that he should be, entitled to have his claim pro tanto against the State which he had served, and have the remainder of his claim satisfied by the Commonwealth as for the remainder of the term of service entitling him to a pension. I have endeavoured to put that into shape in the following amendment:

To leave out all words after "thereupon" and put in their place: "such officer shall, if he is not retained in the service of the Commonwealth, be entitled to receive from the State any gratuity or other compensation payable under the law of the State on abolition of his office; but if he is retained in the service of the Commonwealth he shall be entitled to retire from office at the time and upon the pension or retiring allowance permitted and provided by the law of the State on such retirement, and the pension or retiring allowance shall be paid by the State and by the Commonwealth respectively, in the proportion which his service with the State bears to the whole term of his service."

Where the office is abolished then the payment is thrown on the State.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Is that right?

Mr. BARTON:

I think it is, because the Commonwealth has no reason to be saddled with payment for services which it does not require. The Commonwealth is, after all, only the creation of the States, and it is the act of the States which makes this Constitution, and therefore also it is the act of the States which makes the abolition of the offices of servants not required by the Commonwealth.
Mr. SYMON:
When would the amount be paid to the officer, supposing he was transferred to the Commonwealth, and elected to remain in the service of the Commonwealth?

Mr. BARTON:
He would be entitled to any gratuity or pension of the State-abolished office at once, but if it were retirement by the Commonwealth he would not be entitled to pension or retiring allowances until his retirement.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The Drafting Committee seem to have amply provided for those particular rights of public servants. But is it not also necessary to provide that any other existing rights of public servants should be preserved to them? For instance, it is provided in Victoria that public servants cannot be dismissed unless they have had an opportunity of being heard before some tribunal appointed by the Governor-in-Council, or by a Public Service Board if there is one. Why should not that right be preserved to them? Why should not words be added here to say that any other rights existing under the provisions of the Public Service Acts of the different colonies shall be preserved as they are, at all events until the Federal Parliament have had an opportunity of dealing with the question?

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think this is the clause for that; it should be the subject for a new clause.

Mr. DEAKIN:
There are only a few words used in the Bill of 1891: all existing rights of any such officers shall be preserved. That covered these rights, and they might be held to cover the right to a fortnight's holiday in the year.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
But that would not cover the right you mention.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Would not that be a matter for the Federal Parliament?

Mr. BARTON:
I think the Federal Parliament may be safely trusted in this.

Mr. DEAKIN:
But until the Federal Parliament legislates surely all the rights they have should be kept alive without distinction.

Mr. BARTON:
I would suggest that you provide that all existing rights be preserved. As the clause is set out they would cease to have effect unless expressly provided.

Mr. ISAACS:
You want to preserve their rights to their present salaries.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think that.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The Federal Parliament may be occupied with the tariff and other important questions for two years, and during that time they would probably be unable to pass any Public Service Act. And yet a great variety of matters must arise which would require to be dealt with on some plan.

Unless my proposition is adopted the heads of the Federal departments and Ministers generally will be quite at large. There will be nothing to give them any help in settling the little problems as they arise. I fail to see that my amendment would hamper the Federal Parliament in any way. If there is no objection I will move to add at the end of the amendment of my hon. friend:

But all other existing rights of any such officers shall be preserved.

Mr. BARTON:
Those are the words in the 1891 Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN:

They go further than the 1891 Bill. The word "other" is inserted before "existing." I will put my amendment in this form:

And all other existing and accruing rights of any such officers as shall remain in the service of the Commonwealth shall be preserved.

Mr. BARTON:

Your amendment would be wider if you left out the word "other."

Mr. DEAKIN:

I will leave it out.

Mr. BARTON:

I think we have provided for accruing rights, have we not?

Mr. DEAKIN:

Perhaps so, but it will not matter if we put it beyond question.

Mr. ISAACS:

I think it is highly important that we should have some provision such as is suggested by my hon. friend Mr. Deakin. I think it is important to put in the word "accruing." It is a principle we have adopted in Victoria. When gigantic establishments like the post office and customs are taken over there must be some hundreds and thousands of officers taken over, some of whom have rights now existing and others who have rights accruing. In Victoria when we have passed new Public Service Acts we have been very careful not to take away from a man any real interests he may have acquired when he joined the service, irrespective of whether those interests have ripened into actual rights or remain in an inchoate state. When we transfer men to the Commonwealth it behoves us to do them no injury. We ought to preserve to them not only their existing, but their accruing rights.

Mr. REID:

The Bill defines their status in the Commonwealth. How can we interfere with that?

Mr. ISAACS:

We have done a great deal more in this Constitution than merely adhere to essential principles, and we ought to preserve to these men their rights.

Mr. PEACOCK:

The Federal Parliament will not take these men over with these rights.

Mr. ISAACS:

I think we will be doing more harm than good if we ignore rights. As States when we are entering into this bargain we must preserve honor and fairness towards our public servants, as well as towards our other creditors. I think the words proposed ought certainly to be inserted.

Mr. GORDON:

A provision of this kind will render the whole Civil Service of the Commonwealth unworkable. If we take over the civil servants of South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales, West Australia and other colonies, each with different Civil Service Acts, with different provisions as to leave, some with pension and some without, we shall have confusion made worse confounded.

Mr. DEAKIN:

So you propose to abolish all their rights.

Mr. GORDON:

Certainly not. Let all their rights be preserved. As Mr. Peacock interjected, the Federal Government is not likely to take over officers with all these burdens; they will take new men, and present officers will be prejudiced in the matter of re-employment by the Commonwealth.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Make a clear sweep of all the State civil servants.

Mr. GORDON:

How can you have men working alongside each other, doing the same work, with varying privileges? Would it be fair that a man from New South Wales doing the same work as a man from South Australia-sharing equal responsibilities-should have the prospect of a pension ahead of him, whilst the other was shut out from any such prospect? That would be the result because we have no pensions in South Australia. You must have one general Civil Service Act over the whole Federation. All the servants must start on the same ground plan, and if you introduce inequalities such as will be introduced by five different Civil Service Acts, governing men who are doing the same work, there will be endless confusion and dissatisfaction.

Mr. TRENWITH:

That confusion is incidental to every transition stage.

Mr. REID:

Would you prevent the Commonwealth Parliament from having an absolutely uniform civil service law?

Mr. GORDON:

There must be a uniform Act, as otherwise the thing would not be workable. If we are to have anything like a satisfactory state of things in the federal service it must be fair play all round. Everybody must start on the same plan, and it will not do to give some men more privileges than others while both are doing the same class of work. You cannot shoot into the federal service civil servants from all the colonies each man having separate individual rights.

Mr. TRENWITH:

While it would be that difficult for some time, as indicated by Mr. Gordon, to adjust the different conditions running side by side, it would be unjust not to make some provision to maintain the rights already in existence. We should be doing different to what any conscientious company would do. I have in my mind now the recollection of a purchase of a railway effected by the Victorian Government from a local company, which made it a condition of purchase that the servants in the employ of the company should be guaranteed the same conditions under which they worked in the service of the Government.

Mr. BARTON:

When the East India Company was taken over by the British Government full provision was made in the Act dealing with that for the protection of the servants of the company. The same thing was done in the case of the transfer of the Victorian Savings Bank.

Mr. TRENWITH:

You cannot wipe out existing rights, and you make the Civil Service Act operate from the time it was introduced. In Victoria we have some civil servants who are entitled to pensions. We subsequently abolished the principle of paying pensions, but we did not wipe away existing rights.

Mr. GORDON:

Would it not be unjust to the servants working alongside each other?

Mr. TRENWITH:

If we decided that £100 a year or £500 a year is a proper salary for an officer, the man who gets that salary is suffering no injustice from the fact that somebody else receives £600 a year.

Mr. PEACOCK:

He would naturally try to get up to the £600 a year.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Decidedly. Whatever the system we have, men will try to get the best remuneration they can for their services. Various States have now a large number of servants with whom they have entered into contracts for periods defined by Act of Parliament. If these servants are to be taken over, it is incumbent upon the States in justice to the people.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

There is no obligation to take them over.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Whether they are taken over or not there should be an obligation to treat them fairly, and where such servants are required there should be an obligation to take them over with the condition under which they were serving the State which originally employed them. If this is not done there will be a manifest injustice to a very large number of citizens of Victoria, and, without imputing selfishness or want of patriotism to the civil servants of Australia, I have no hesitation in saying we shall be inducing a large number of citizens to vote against Federation in defence of their own rights and their living, and in defence of justice.

Mr. BARTON:

If we do not provide for their just rights?

Mr. TRENWITH:

Yes.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

A very strong point.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It would be a great misfortune if we did anything to hurt the feelings of the civil service; but we shall be inducing a large number to vote against the Federation if we do not make some provision of this nature.

Mr. BARTON:

We may look a little higher than the question—although I agree with Mr. Trenwith—of whether the absence of provision for the rights of the civil servants will make this Bill popular. If there is one thing which must be paramount in framing a Constitution of this kind it is that it must be just, and I take it this Convention would be doing a great injustice if it did not provide for existing rights. I have waivered in my opinion about this matter, because I thought at one time it would be quite sufficient to provide, inasmuch as the Commonwealth is a new creation, for the discharge of the obligation of the State in respect to the services of the servant up to the time of his becoming a servant of the Commonwealth; but, inasmuch as the whole right of the civil servant is to serve, provided his conduct continues good until the time when his pension would accrue under the law of the State, then I think it is only fair that the Commonwealth should have to provide so much of the pension or retiring allowance up to the time of the fruition of what was his inchoate right. I think our Bill will be largely judged by those who have any thought in them by the manner in which we provide for justice in the transfer of the various officers and the powers which must take place on the establishment of the Commonwealth. I am glad to find Mr. Trenwith is not one of those spurious democrats who call out for the destruction of rights, and who call themselves democrats with about as much right as the assassin calls himself a patriot. We have to provide for the enormous changes, in the social life of Australia which are to take place, and if we do things that give rise to the cry of injustice, we not only imperil this Constitution, but we throw a stain upon it which all the efforts of the Commonwealth will not remove. There is no obligation to take over these servants. I should like to point out that in the first part of the amendment it is provided that where the Commonwealth does not continue the services of an officer he is only entitled to his pension or retiring allowance upon abolition of office.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They take them over all the same.

Mr. BARTON:
There is a technical transfer under the Bill, but then that transfer is subject to determination at once, if necessary, and subject of course to the conservation of all existing rights. There is no obligation on the Commonwealth to continue the services of persons not required by the Government.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There is an obligation on the State to see that there is no injustice.

Mr. BARTON:
There is no obligation on the Commonwealth to continue the services of officers which the proper administration of the department does not require to be continued. Where the services are inchoate, and where the Commonwealth finds that its necessities require a continuance of the services of an officer the right of that officer becomes a perfect one under the Commonwealth and must be dealt with. That part of his service which was a contract with the State must be dealt with by the State, and that part which becomes a contract with the Commonwealth must be dealt with by the Commonwealth. As to the argument that this will create pension or superannuation laws I would point out that if the Commonwealth does not provide for such it will become clear that these are expiring rights, and that there must come a time when they will die out, and therefore they are no burden on the Commonwealth. It is in the hands of the Commonwealth to provide for a pension list or not.

Mr. FRASER:

They may not take over the civil servants at all.

Mr. BARTON:

The two departments which will be taken over employing the most officers will be the Customs and post and telegraphs, and in connection with the latter most of the officers, I presume, will be taken over. Owing, however, to the abolition of the border duties many of the Customs officers must disappear, and, although there may be a distribution of the officers, it is generally admitted that their rights must be conserved. These rights, however, will gradually die out under the Commonwealth, and there can be no continuation of them, because there are only one or two colonies where these contracts, as I prefer to call them, exist, and it will be very easy to earmark officers, say, from New South Wales or Western Australia, and say that they are subject to these existing contracts.

Mr. GORDON:

My contention is that on the States should be the liability of the payment of any compensation or retiring allowance which they have contracted to pay. It is our duty to see that the civil servants do not suffer through the establishment of Federation. The burden I have referred to should be on the States, and not on the Federal Government, which should take over its servants clean and clear of any pre-existing contracts. The States which made the contracts should fulfil them.

Mr. PEACOCK:

The States will be. The Commonwealth will not take over all these people with these rights.

Mr. GORDON:

I think there should be some computation as to what their claims are, and that these should be discharged by the States, as otherwise it will turn out, as suggested by Mr. Peacock, that the Federal Government will only take over those officers to which no liability attaches, and probably men would not be employed on that ground alone. If there is a clear and unencumbered start, everybody would be on the same footing; but if the Federal Parliament have the option of taking over A, who is entitled to a pension, or B, who has no such claim, surely they will take B.
Mr. DEAKIN:
In my opinion it should be an obligation on the Commonwealth to take over all the civil servants of the departments taken over, and I have proceeded on the assumption that this must take place from the outset. The argument for economy of administration by reduction in their numbers may be urged in regard to some departments until we see the proposed financial scheme, which, as I understand it, will require the services of at least as many persons as we would dispense with on our borders by abolishing the Customs-houses. If accounts are to be kept as proposed on the per capita basis there will be no immediate reduction of the services taken over, and farther, I reiterate that in my opinion, the obligation of taking over the whole of the officers of the transferred departments ought to be imposed on the Commonwealth from the commencement.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I hope we shall make ample provision for the civil servants who are to be dealt with. I have heard with some alarm the suggestions made by the honorable member Mr. Gordon, suggestions which seem to point to the wholesale sweeping away of civil servants.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Nothing of the kind,

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
That is how it sounds to me—a very large sweeping away of the civil servants from their situations, and also the destruction of their rights and privileges.

Mr. GORDON:
The hon. member is distinctly misrepresenting me, and placing a ridiculous interpretation on my words.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I am re-

lieved to hear that the hon. member did not mean that.

Mr. GORDON:
Nor did I say it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
The impression conveyed to my mind was that the hon. member thought of sweeping away the services of various States, and having one homogenous service, which would almost necessarily dispense with many who are now employed, and I say that in order to get a better service it would be monstrous to sacrifice the existing rights of those now in the service.

Mr. FRASER:
Nobody proposed it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:
I am glad to hear that.

Question—That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause—negatived.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
As I follow the amendment it means that the Commonwealth, after taking over the whole of the officers, have the right to retain or not to retain them; that if they retain them until they come to the age of sixty—

Mr. BARTON:
Or whatever age it is under the law of the State.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They get their pension, and that if they do not retain them the State has to pay compensation for abolition of office. But as the amendment is worded they may retain them for any length of time they like, or dispense with them. There is no limitation of the time when they would have the right to say we shall not retain you any longer. I could understand it if it were said that they did not propose to retain them within, say, twelve months.

Mr. BARTON:
Look at the word "thereupon." On that the title arises at once that fixes the time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It seems to me that as it stands, a State may be called upon to pay a large sum for compensation for the loss of the services of an officer.

Mr. BARTON:
If necessary this clause can be reconsidered.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I do not think that the burdens should be placed upon the State at all.

Mr. BARTON:
If it is proved that the amendment will have the effect suggested by my hon. friend, I shall not hesitate, on further consideration, to move for the recommittal of the clause for the purpose of amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: We will now deal with the amendment moved by the hon. member Mr. Deakin.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Words very similar to these were inserted in the Civil Service Act of Victoria, in 1883, with the result that they led to great difficulties and friction between Governments and employes. Indeed no words have been so productive of difficulty. I admit the justice of the contention of my hon.
friend Mr. Deakin, that existing rights should be preserved. But we have by no means come to the solution of the difficulty. Under our Victorian Act we have a certain rule as to the order of promotion and transfers from one department to another. If the rule in the Victorian Act is that you must promote within a department by seniority and fitness, and if you have not got that rule in the same form in the other colonies, how can you apply it to the case like that alluded to by the hon. member Mr. Gordon, where you have men in the Customs of South Australia coming into the same department with the men in Victoria. Why, it will lead to legal questions which I shudder to contemplate. It will afford litigation and cases, no doubt, for the lawyers, which I am quite sure it is our business to avoid. Although it is a difficult matter, I do not propose at present to move any amendment. It can only be solved by a careful attention to details, and I am suggesting that in dealing with rights and privileges, the rights and privileges that are meant to be conserved should be defined, and that if it is intended that a man shall not have his former right to promotion within a department, say, that he was entitled to under existing law, it should be so understood. I am sure that general words of this sort will lead to trouble and confusion.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I take it that this amendment must necessarily be read to apply go far as the circumstances will permit. It is quite clear that any inchoate right that any member of the public service will have to promotion in the State department cannot obtain exactly under the Commonwealth. That is not a right we could seek to engraft on the Commonwealth. Men who join the public service under the Commonwealth, if they are men of ability, will have new fields of promotion open to them; that must weigh with those who pass out of the State service into the larger service of the Commonwealth. We do not want by any such words as these to convey the merely petty or technical rights, but the assurance that substantial justice will be done.

Mr. BARTON:

This will tend to give the Commonwealth the service of the best public servants.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I recognise the force of the hon. member's contention, and trust he will give us his help to provide that substantial justice shall be done to all public servants, and that substantially the rights and privileges they enjoy now will be preserved to them under the Commonwealth.

Mr. Deakin's amendment agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.
Clause 86.-On establishment of uniform duties of Customs and excise, trade within the Commonwealth to be free.

Mr. BARTON:

It would be better to postpone this until we get to clause 92, which deals with equality of trade, and this clause and that have intimate connection. It is difficult to say whether it should come under the head of - States or Equality of Trade." I move:

That clause 86 be postponed until after consideration of clauses 87 to 92.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON:

I should like to know whether, as the print of the new clauses begins at No. 89, the Committee of Treasurers considered that Nos. 87 and 88 were sufficient as printed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Yes.

Clause 87.-Until uniform duties of Customs have been imposed, there shall be shown, in the books of the Treasury of the Commonwealth, in respect of each State:

I. The revenues collected from duties of Customs and excise, and from the performance of the services and the exercise Of the powers transferred from the State, to the Commonwealth by this Constitution:

II. The expenditure of the Commonwealth in the collection of duties of Customs and excise, the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the State to the Commonwealth by this Constitution:

III. The balance (if any) in favor of the State:

From the balance so found in favor of each State there shall be deducted its share of the expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of the original powers given to it by this Constitution, and this share shall be in the proportion of the number of the people of the State to those of the Commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth. After such deduction the surplus shown to be due to the State shall be paid to the State mouth by month.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

I wish to call attention to the necessity for a slight amendment in sub-section 3. At present it reads that the balance, it any, in favor of the State shall be distributed in a certain way, as discovered by the remaining portion of the clause. That balance is supposed to be an annual balance; and, seeing that each State will require a monthly proportion while the annual balance is being discovered, it will be better to make the sub-section to read:
The monthly balance (if any) in favor of, the State (shall be paid to the State month by month).

Mr. Barton:

The last words of the clause make it all right, as follow:
After such deduction the surplus shown to be due to the State shall be paid to the State month by month.

Sir Philip Fysh:

It first of all presumes in sub-section 3 that a balance shall have been discovered. That balance may not be discovered by the Federal Treasurer until a whole year has expired. Therefore we want an interim balance, so that for the first year while the Federal Treasurer is discovering the position each local or State Treasurer may have a sum of money paid to him on account.

Sir George Turner:

Would not the last words in the second paragraph of the new clause 89 meet the difficulty? They read:
The federal authority shall each month pay to the several States, as nearly as practicable, the proper portion of the amount due to the same respectively.

Sir Philip Fysh:

I wish in connection with the balance to make the terms agreeable by saying:
Monthly balances in favor of any State.

Mr. Mcmillan:

Is not the general intention clear under this other clause?

Sir Philip Fysh:

I think not. It has been a difficulty with me all the way through that each local Treasurer will require certainly month by month a contribution on account of the unexpended balance which shall be discovered at the end of each year. I move:
To insert the word "monthly" in sub-section 3 before the word "balance."

Mr. Barton:

Before that is put I wish to make a verbal amendment. I move:
To insert after the word "excise" the words "and in."
That will bring it into conformity with the rest of the clause. I have no objection to Sir Philip Fysh's amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Barton (moved by Sir Philip Fysh) agreed to.

Mr. Barton:

I move:
To insert after the word "the" and before the word "proportion" the word "numerical."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON, I move:
To strike out the words "the number of."
Those amendments will make the clause more grammatical.
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOBSON:
May I call the hon. the Leader of the Convention's attention to the last sentence of this clause? There it provides that the surplus shall be paid to the States month by month. I think Sir Philip Fysh is quite correct, that the words do not tally with what is intended. It reads as if there would be a balance struck every month. So far as I know the balance will be struck yearly or half-yearly.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You have the words "month by month."

Mr. DOBSON:
I do not think the balance will be struck monthly. Would it not be much better to say that a yearly or half-yearly balance will be struck, and that interim payments will be made in the meantime?

Mr. BARTON:
There will be a balance each month, small or large.

Mr. DOBSON:
But some months there might be a balance on the wrong side.

Mr. BARTON:
The sub-section says "if any."

Mr. DOBSON:
I think it will be much better to say whether a balance is to be struck yearly or half-yearly, and in the meantime interim payments could be made according to what the balance would be at the end of the year.

Mr. HIGGINS:
May I indicate to the Drafting Committee that, as this clause only refers to the time until uniform duties are imposed, it also provides that the distribution of the balance is to be in proportion to the people of the States as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth? Is it proposed to have the statistics of the Commonwealth as distinguished from the statistics of the States Immediately upon the enactment of the Constitution?

Mr. BARTON:
Yes. Census and statistics have been referred to the Commonwealth, and the Federal Government would have to take steps to have statistics established.
Mr. Higgins:

It is not to be left to each State, to say what its statistics are?

Mr. O'Connor:

No. The idea is expressed in the words "by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth."

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 88.-During the first four years after the establishment of the Commonwealth, notwithstanding anything contained in the last section, the total yearly expenditure of the Commonwealth, in the exercise of the original powers given to it by this Constitution, "I not exceed the sum of pounds; and the total yearly expenditure of the Commonwealth in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the States to the Commonwealth by this Constitution shall not exceed the sum of pounds.

Mr. McMillan:

I would like to say at this stage that it was clearly understood in the Finance Committee that, although we agreed as to the whole of the conclusions at which we arrived, every individual member would be perfectly free in the Committee debate to adhere to or dissent from the conclusions of the sectional Committee. I hold very strong feelings with regard to this clause, which attempts to confine within certain bounds the expenditure of the Federal Government; and in saying that, I am just as determined to be introduced which any Federal Government in an awkward financial position would not be able to get round. Furthermore, I do think that after the utterances we have heard in this Convention with regard to our trust in the Federal Parliament, and when we consider that we are not handing over our affairs to a foreign power, but simply handing them over to ourselves in our larger corporate capacity, I do think that this is to a great extent an abnegation of the principles of federalism. Therefore I would like the Convention to very carefully consider whether we should put a condition like this upon what is not merely a delegated power. I know its powers are delegated, but it is practically the national Government of Australia, and therefore it is almost impossible to say what exigencies may occur, rendering necessary this expenditure. I would further say, that if it is the desire of the Committee to pass this clause, the expenditure should be on the average of what will now be three years. I think that is the term of the Parliament, is it not?

Sir George Turner:

Yes.
Mr. MCMILLAN:

This clause is intended to apply for the first three years, the idea being that, in the flush of federal glory during the first Parliament, there will be a desire to glorify the position and to create a large and unreasonable expenditure. Therefore the clause should, at any rate, if it is passed, signify that the average expenditure should not be more than a certain sum, because hon. members can easily conceive that during the first year of the Federal Government there may be very little expense at all outside certain preliminary arrangements with a view to carrying out the first part of the Constitution. And you might be in this position, that what might be fair on the average for the three years would not be fair for one year, because the expenditure that you would reduce the Federal Government to in the first year might not be exceeded at all-in fact, they might only expend half the amount-and it would be necessary to throw that balance, at any rate, into the next and subsequent years. But while I feel as strongly as Mr. Reid and Sir George Turner can that it is necessary to put before our people the fact that there is going to be no excessive extravagance, and that nothing is to be done to increase unnecessarily the taxation of the people, still, I say, on broad principles, that a clause like this will be a blot on the Federal Constitution. I need not say more, it is only an expression of opinion, but, at the same time, I shall feel absolutely compelled to vote against the clause.

Mr. REID:

I hope everyone will emulate the admirable brevity with which Mr. McMillan has just expressed the view which we know he strongly entertains. I will imitate him, and say only a very few words. I put aside all ideas of previous Constitutions and ask myself the question, "Will this provision recommend the Constitution more to the people of Australia?" I know there is a widespread fear that this Commonwealth is being projected on a princely scale, and that the expenditure will be enormous, and you cannot get that idea out of people's heads except by some precise statement as to the limits of federal expenditure. I admit it is difficult to frame that estimate, but if you frame an estimate and leave a liberal margin above all you can think of, then I say the advantage of that scheme is this: That the financial foundation of the Commonwealth shall be laid on a prudent scale. It is during the next four months that these amounts can be clearly scrutinized in all the colonies, to see whether or not they can be altered when we meet again, if there is any necessity to do that. If cases of emergency do arise they will be fully provided for by the power the Commonwealth will have to raise money, and that power can be given irrespective of these amounts.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

I sympathise with the purpose which Mr. McMillan has in asking that the word "average" should be used in front of the word "expenditure." The expenditure relates first to the sum of £300,000, which is the new expenditure to be incurred by the Federal Parliament, and £1,250,000 is the sum that stands in relation to the expenditure transferred from the various States to the executive authority of the Federation. It is very true, as my hon. friend puts it, that for the first year a goodly portion of either of these expenditures is not likely to be incurred, particularly in the case of the £300,000. If then there be a smaller expenditure in the first year and an increasing expenditure in the second, third, and fourth years—provided we have in relation to the £300,000 the sum total of £900,000 for the first three years—we shall have accomplished our object, and we shall also have met the objection which Mr. McMillan has placed before the Convention. It must be apparent to hon. members that for the first year a great portion of the expenditure will simply be building up month by month, and so for the first year a goodly portion of the £300,000 might not be spent.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I do not think there is any objection to the insertion of the word suggested.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

We will take it for granted then that the Treasurers are agreed upon this point, and that Mr. McMillan is right. I do not, however, follow the hon. member in his objection that this would be a blot upon the Constitution. I prefer to follow Mr. Reid, who raises the very proper objection that we have been acquainted with since the 1891 Convention, or about that period, that there would be very extravagant expenditure over this Federation. When the 1891 Bill was placed before the people of Australia, the foremost objection to it was in connection with the expenditure of the Central Government. The first item which met our gaze was £600,000 for federal new expenditure. Since that Bill was before us we have seen the paper which was written by Sir Samuel Griffith and read before the University of Brisbane, in which he points out that in addition to the £600,000 there would necessarily be added £330,000 more in connection with navigation, and other services which will be taken over by the Federal Government. If, therefore, we are to permit the people to imagine that in connection with this Constitution we are committing them to some unknown expenditure said to be limited now to £300,000, but which in the 1891 Bill was given at £600,000, and according to Sir Samuel Griffith's estimate was £930,000, we shall be doing a great wrong to the work we hope we are securing by bringing about this Federation. Let us therefore indicate not only to the people of Australia, but to those who will form the Federal Executive of that great Constitution—which we are determined to start, at any rate, upon something like economical principles—that our means are limited, and we can only do that by naming a maximum sum for each of these services. Now, the only question therefore is whether these maxima sums are sufficient for the purpose. Before the Parliaments of Australasia deal with this Bill, and send to the next Convention their various amendments, they will have before them the printed figures of this Convention, indicating how these amounts of £300,000 and £1,250,000 are made up, and it will be for the statisticians or officers of the various Parliaments to indicate how far the amounts will meet the requirements or how far they will be short. It will be very convenient and simple at the next Convention to reduce or add to the figures, but, above all things, let us lay down the lines that we intend the Executive Government to start their economic principles upon.

Mr. PEACOCK:
What amount do you suggest?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
The amount suggested is £300,000 as the amount of the Federation expenditure. That amount bears a very economic comparison with the £600,000 which was included in the £2,232,000, the original estimate of the 1891 Convention. So far as the second expenditure is concerned, for services transferred, namely, for the collection of Customs, for defence, for the loss upon postal services, and all other matters in connection with navigation which are taken over, they are simply a transference from the several States of the expenditure now incurred, to the Federal Executive, when it shall relieve the local Parliaments of those various expenditures. There can be, therefore, with respect to the second item, no particular objection, because it not only covers all the items or departments taken over, but includes an actual margin of £163,000 for emergencies. We, therefore, only have to deal with the question of the £300,000, which also includes an emergency margin of £60,875. This is a problematical item, I admit, but the figures which, have been thought out by the statisticians of the various colonies, and have been agreed to by the Treasurers-can only be problematical in so far as you doubt the wisdom of the gentlemen in compiling them. If they be insufficient, as has been pointed out, the Federal Executive will have it in its own power even to break the Constitution to meet the difficulty. The question of emergencies, to which Mr. McMillan referred, does not come in with respect to the £300,000. Any emergency expenditure must be in excess of that £300,000. It has been provided for in the Bill passed up to this point, and I will allude to one matter as a possible matter of emergency, importance, and urgency, namely, the assumption that we may get into difficulties and may have to increase the defence vote. Is it to be charged against the Commonwealth Bill that, although we have laid down £1,250,000 as the total to be expended, which includes defence, £750,000, the Executive must refrain from incur, ring the responsibility which they should incur of increasing the amount in the face of such an emergency as the need to defend our shores. It must be apparent, therefore, that the £1,250,000 has no reference to emergency expenditure, which is provided for in another part of the Bill. I think, under the circumstances, we shall be wise in following Mr. Reid, and agreeing to these clauses, and in agreeing to both the amendments that are forthcoming.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
We intend to follow him.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
I am glad to hear it.

Mr. PEACOCK:
You are not opposing it, are you?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
No; I am supporting it, because, like Mr. Reid, I desire that not only myself, but also all my colleagues, may be able to go to our constituencies, when we would advise them as to whether this Bill should be accepted or not, and say "You know your loo, and for the next three years your expenditure will not be more than your proportion of the £300,000." The general consensus appears to be in favor of passing the clause, and therefore I shall say nothing further. Mr. REID: There is a question as to whether we should have four years or three years.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Make it three years.

Mr. REID:
I will move:
To strike out the word "four" with the view of inserting the word "three."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. REID:
I beg to move:
The insertion in the first blank of the words "three hundred thousand."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Will you put in the word "average"?
Mr. REID:

It is no use setting up a thing and knocking it down again. We have provided a margin in the £300,000 of £60,000 more than we could think of, and in the £1,250,000 it margin of £150,000, and the amounts will be subject to revision during the four months.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

We should put it in.

Mr. REID:

I can understand Mr. McMillan going for the word "average," as he is against the whole clause.

Mr. PEACOCK:

We will stick to the Treasurers.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I should like the word "total" omitted, and the word "average" inserted. You may not get in working order during the first six months after the establishment of the Commonwealth, and you may be overlapping expenditure, which would cause a great many difficulties. When you consider that they can do what they like after the three years and that the real expenditure will come after that period, it does not seem to me a good thing to limit them to such an extent.

Mr. REID:

May I point out what could be done under that? The Treasurer, during the first year, could extend the amount indefinitely, and make it up during the remainder of the period.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I will not press my amendment.

Mr. Reid's amendment agreed to.

Mr. REID:

I propose:

To insert in the blank in the last line of the clause the words "one million two hundred and fifty thousand."

Amendment agreed to; clause as amended passed. Clause 89.-During the first five years after uniform duties of Customs have been imposed the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the States for any year shall not be less than the aggregate amount returned to them during the year last before the imposition of such duties.

But in the books of the Treasury of the Commonwealth there shall continue to be shewn the particulars required by section 87, and an account shall be taken of all imported dutiable goods passing from one State into another State for consumption therein, and the amount of duty chargeable thereon shall, in the books of the Treasury, be accounted as revenue collected in the State into which they pass, and not in the State in which the port of entry is situated, so that the proportion may be ascertained in which each State shall receive its share of the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the States; and the aggregate amount shall be distributed accordingly month by month.

Mr. REID:
On this clause will come in an arrangement which was arrived at by the Treasurers, but for the present I will deal with the first part.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Propose to omit the clause. The first part is re-inserted.

Mr. REID:
In compliance with a suggestion of the Drafting Committee, I want to propose certain verbal alterations in the first part.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Take the new clause paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. REID:
That is what I propose to do. In this clause the first sub-section is the same as in the Bill, but the Drafting Committee have suggested verbal alterations. In line 3 of the first sub-section I propose:
To insert the words "in proportion" after the word "less."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Sir Philip Fysh has something to say before that.

Sir PHILIP FYSHE:
I propose to call the attention of the Convention to the meaning of this first part of the clause, and thereon hangs a very important question, particularly as relating to the smaller States. It will be apparent from the reading of this section that the suggestion very properly put to the Financial Committee by Sir George Turner-and the suggestion was respected by that Committee -that the purpose is to secure to the Treasurers of the various States during the five years in which we are bringing our tariffs-free-trade in New South Wales, protection in Victoria, and a revenue tariff in Tasmania-

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Your tariff is just as bad as ours.

Sir PHILIP FYSHE:
What is the use of that interjection?

Mr. PEACOCK:
He is trying to take you off the track, Sir Philip. Take no notice of it.

Sir PHILIP FYSHE:
I do not wish to discuss the question of protection and freetrade, but let me say that with the protective duties in Victoria raised on a few articles giving exemption to a large number of articles produced in Victoria, the amount per head of population is 40s., and that the tariff of Tasmania raised for revenue purposes only, and which has very few exemptions and no percentage ad valorem on goods above 20 per cent., produces the same revenue of 40s. per head. I wish to call attention to the wise provision Sir George Turner wishes to make in the interests of every State-the smaller States and the larger States, and the smaller States need it much more than the larger—that there shall be during a certain period a sum returned to them not less than they were receiving in the year prior to the imposition of the new duties. In we leave the word "aggregate" in this clause we leave it in a doubtful position because on the assumption that £5,000,000 may be the aggregate sum found by the Federal Treasurer to be the balance which is divisible amongst the States; it is so divided on the first year, but its division through all the other five years will depend much on the subsequent portions and provisions of this clause. If you will agree to give back to each State from the Federal Treasury for five years a sum not less than it received on the year prior to the imposition of the new duties, you will then carry out, so far as all the smaller States are concerned, the very desirable provision which Sir George Turner submitted to the Financial Committee. But if you make a proportion of that aggregate, if you qualify that aggregate by saying that it shall be divided after the first year in any proportions less than, or more than the division of it in the first year, you may place the smaller States in the unfortunate position of being unable to meet their expenditure. I am obliged to anticipate the later clauses of the provisions in order to give emphasis to and to make clear what I am saying. It will be apparent as we go on, that while a uniform tariff-as it has been shown by the figures of the Sydney statisticians-may give to New South Wales 50s. per head of population, that uniform tariff collected in Tasmania will give but 30s. per head of population, and collected in Western Australia will give 160s. per head of population. I need not go on with examples. But, taking these two examples of New South Wales and Tasmania, you have a uniform tariff which, based upon the whole populations of the Commonwealth, will give 40s. per head of population, but taken on the populations of the smaller and larger colonies, and in connection with their power to consume dutiable articles-would place New South Wales in the condition of receiving in the first year 50s. per head of her population, whilst Tasmania only would receive 30s. per head of her population. What then becomes of the aggregate amount? When you divide that aggregate amount in the proportion of the provisions hereinafter made, i.e., in proportion of 50s. New South Wales to 30s. Tasmania, we shall, instead of getting back what we received from our Customs revenue in the year prior to the imposition of the new duties - which amounted to nearly 40s. per head - get back for the first year only 30s. per head, and you will place South Australia and Tasmania - never mind the other colonies, I take these two as smaller colonies - in the awkward position of receiving back for the first and second year, at, least, a sum altogether inadequate to meet their annual expenditure.

Mr. REID:
How can you tell until you knew what the tariff is?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
We have the figures.

Mr. WISE:
Those figures are utterly unreliable.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Pure assumption.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
There is a measure of doubt in the figures brought forward by Mr. Coghlan, of New South Wales, but only a measure of doubt. You may, I believe, accept them in the main, subject to the facts which may hereafter appear. But it must be apparent to every hon. member of this Convention that if you have a freetrade tariff in New South Wales, where all the goods, we will presume, enter that country for home consumption on the basis of the value of their being manufactured, it will give to that colony a much larger amount of imports for home consumption than would be the case with respect, say, to Victoria, which imported her goods chiefly as raw material without the hand of man being exercised upon them. We have as a consequence these very important facts - facts which I believe the members from Sydney will rely upon.

Mr. WISE:
I do not believe them to be facts.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
You have the figure of your statists, capable men, and none more capable than Mr. Coghlan. For the three years 1893, 1894, and 1895 the mean value of imports for home consumption in New South Wales was £10,700,000, as against the mean value for those three years of goods imported into Victoria of £6,900,000. Challenge the facts as much as you may. I have been associated with commerce as well as being the Treasurer of a colony, and I submit that there will be found a very large disparity between these two imports, and therefore upon that basis we come back to the point that we shall in Tasmania and in other of the smaller communities find that during the first few years of these five provided for hereafter instead of having a revenue to our credit which is at present about £340,000 per annum—because it gives some £2 per head of the population—we shall, upon a uniform tariff-bearing in mind that the uniform tariff will exclude all intercolonial products, by which we expect that the Commonwealth will lose a million—have a product of only about 30s. per head. Therefore, until you level up Tasmania from her 30s. by a gradual rise of 2s. a year for five years, we shall be in the very awkward position that the Treasurer will not know how to pay his way.

Mr. REID:

How do you know the federal tariff will not be such as will give you the same?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

If the hon. member asks me whether the federal tariff will produce the same, I must reply that the federal tariff will, if it is uniform, until it has been in existence for some years give us less than now. Even if it be a most extravagant tariff it will give us less than we get now.

Mr. FRASER:

Are you going to move an amendment?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

Yes.

Mr. FRASER:

Then do it quickly.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

I have trespassed on the time less than any member. I am responsible to my colony, and I must be in a position to advise whether she should enter the Federation or keep aloof.

Mr. ISAACS:

These things are too important to be dealt with in a slovenly way.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

I deprecate unnecessary speech. I attach very little value to very much of the speaking to which we listen in public life, because we arrive at our own conclusions mostly regardless of such speeches. I am willing to submit an amendment, but surely if I am going to ask a number of intelligent men to agree to it, I must give some reason for the opinion I hold that the amendment is necessary. My amendment, therefore, will rest upon the word "aggregate," which I suggest should be left out, and the clause altered so that it will provide that the amount for which the Federal Executive is responsible to each State shall be the amount which that State received during the year prior to the tariff. That would accomplish the object which Sir George Turner hood in view.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I had to give way in order to get a compromise.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Each Tines on anything like the same proportion, but that proportion which will make Tasmania lose £100,000 as against a loss to the other colonies of even £300,000 or £400,000 is altogether disproportionate. And, therefore, with respect to the term "aggregate," I must test the opinion of the Convention as to whether the clause shall not read thus:

During the first year after uniform duties of Customs have been imposed the amount to be paid to each State for any year shall not be less than the amount returned to each State during the year last before the imposition of such duties.

Then we shall know our positions.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Does not the omission of the word "aggregate" come to the same thing?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Practically. We shall then only want consequential amendments.

Mr. PEACOCK:
How would you deal with New South Wales, which has a freetrade tariff?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
"Aggregate" applies to the amount to be distributed on the year prior to the imposition of new duties.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Suppose New South Wales, having adopted a freetrade tariff, will receive any proportion on a freetrade basis she will be undoubtedly a very small receiver, while those of us who maintain our high tariffs undoubtedly will be proportional receivers of a much larger portion, but larger though the proportion may be, it still leaves us in the unfortunate position that the amount coming to Tasmania, if it is to come to us in the proportion set out in the remaining portions of these resolutions, will be so small as compared with what we are getting now in our normal condition of a separate State, that you practically keep us out of Federation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
In the first year of the uniform tariff, New South Wales will pay a far larger sum than in the year before.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

Perfectly true. We go on to state that the expenditure of the Federal Executive shall be distributed in proportion to population. In the year 1891—the figures are stated by Sir Samuel Griffith—the departments now proposed to be transferred to New South Wales cost £1,050,000 a year; but Sir Samuel Griffith points out the blot of charging expenditure in proportion to population, and said in effect:

Now then, work upon this, the 1891 Bill, and you will then charge New South Wales in proportion to her population £650,000, or a difference in favor of New South Wales of £400,000.

Let us give them the advantage of all the economy that has taken place since. Every colony has put in the pruning knife and cut down its expenditure—New South Wales as well as Tasmania and Victoria. But even then with this expenditure of New South Wales totalling £1,040,000 a year—and now £840,000—there still remains the big disparity that, while you take away from New South Wales the expenditure of £840,000, you cannot charge her with the expenditure per capita without serious inequity to others. Under the Federal Commonwealth she will pay from £100,000 to £200,000 less, while we in Tasmania, not having adopted your expensive defence works—the difference being 1s. 4d. per head now paid by Tasmania against 2s. 10d., I think, being paid by Victoria—while we are collecting our Customs duties at 2½ per cent. cost, and New South Wales spends 4 per cent., you will by throwing upon us a proportional expenditure at per head of the population, a part of the difference between the cost of these defences in the two countries and the difference between the cost of the collection of Customs duties in the two countries bring about this result: that Tasmania will lose £97,000, or rather will pay £97,000 a year, that is £82,000 for her portion of the new expenditure and her portion per head of the population of the expenditure transferred, plus £15,000 which she is now making on her telegraph and postal system.

Mr. REID:

That is outside the present question.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

This is part, and parcel of the whole thing. While we, therefore, are being placed in the position of bearing a portion of this expenditure, the other colonies are being reduced. You will place us in the unfortunate position that, while you take over the present expenditure of Tasmania—amounting to about £45,000 a year—our estimate of the proportion of the expenditure based upon population is £97,000, or a difference of £50,000. But coming back to the point with which I started, we have to lose in order to get intercolonial freetrade £40,000 now collected in colonial products, which we are willing to give up. But this is too big a proposition. It is wise that those who are outside the financial circle - outside the Financial Committee, outside the four Treasurers who have met during the past few days - shall see the other difficulty, that if you are going to charge the expenditure in proportion to wealth - that is in proportion to the amounts which are received from the respective States from Customs - what a burden is thrown upon Western Australia. So that whichever you do, whatever alternative you take up - I will not waste the time of the Convention by going through the five alternatives - but whatever you take up, you come to the position which Mr. Holder put before you some time back, that you have to cut the Gordian knot by some very rude method. But do not cut it by a method so rude or arbitrary against the smaller States as to leave them out in the cold, leave them no alternative but to stay out of the Federation. The question of staying out of the Federation, I presume, only means an absence from the Federation for the first five years, because whatever we may lose in the first, or second, or third year, it will be a diminishing quantity, thanks to our friends from New South Wales, who propose a diminishing quantity. We shall, at the end of five years, I hope, be in a so much stronger and improved position, our trade will be increased and our revenue increased, that then possibly we may come in, because we shall at the end of five years be placed on an equality with New South Wales, on the per capita basis of dividing Customs revenue. For example, if New South Wales is capable of consuming a larger amount of imports - imports of intoxicants and narcotics - per head than Tasmania, and I admit it, then during the five years they will gradually, by the automatic operation of this sliding scale, be receiving less and less, between the 40s. per head average receipt of Customs and the 50s. the probable collection in New South Wales per head, or a difference of 20 per cent. deduction annually from the 10s. difference between 50s. and the mean of the Commonwealth 40s. They will receive less and less year by year, while Tasmania will be receiving per head of population more and more, till at the end of the fifth year we shall all be receiving 40s. per head of the population, and will be in the same position as New South Wales. But you have left me in the meantime high and dry in a position that it would be utterly impossible for Tasmanians to accept. I therefore suggest that, instead of the aggregate, there should be annually returned to each individual State during those five years a sum not less than that which it would have received on a division under clause 87 made by the Executive in the year prior to the imposition of the new duties. I will therefore move:

To strike out the word "aggregate" in line two.

Mr. REID:

The difficulties of my hon. friend will be as nothing to the difficulties of the Commonwealth Treasurer, if this proposal is carried. It seems to me that if such provisions as these are put into this Constitution you will make it impossible for any human being to devise a financial policy for the Commonwealth at all. It will load the Commonwealth with a disastrous bungle from the first. Supposing, for instance, that the Treasurer for the Commonwealth dealing with six millions of people has to frame a Customs tariff so as to produce to Western Australia two or three years hence a revenue which it might have had for a particular year previously. When the Treasurer is making his financial policy, you will compel him to load the Commonwealth with such a gigantic system of taxation that the people will recoil from it with horror. My hon. friend's assumption is based on a contingency the nature of which we cannot tell. Why should he jump at the conclusion that the financial proposals of the Commonwealth will be such that Tasmania will be getting back less than it did before? How can he tell that until he knows what the tariff is and what the facts of trade are. A difference in tariff makes all the difference in results. No man will essay the task of moulding the financial policy for the Commonwealth without having regard to the circumstances of the States. But if you bind him down rigidly that with reference to the circumstances of one small part of Tasmania he must construct an edifice hundreds of feet higher than is required, you foredoom the finances of the Federation to failure. I do not think that any people with anything to lose would be a party to that. I am strongly opposed to the clause, but I look upon it as one which has been practically accepted by a majority of the Convention, and I am not going to take up time in disputing the wisdom of the Committee. We have been talking over these things for some days, and now the time has come to arrive at a solution of them. And in order to arrive at that solution I am accepting things which I do not approve of. But just as we are arriving at a conclusion upon the principles of give and take, my hon. friend Sir Philip Fysh makes his appearance with a stipulation which throws it all out of gear. I cannot go the way my hon. friend wants me to go. I must have some regard to the financial anxieties of the different States; but any Treasurer of the Commonwealth worthy of the name will care for those interests infinitely better than any Constitution can provide, if he is worthy of his position. It does not at all follow that the people of this Commonwealth are going to consent to a gigantic system of Customs taxation, but if the people favor direct taxation it will be open to the Commonwealth to build up such a system. Who wants to compel the Treasurer of the Commonwealth to formulate a gigantic scheme of taxation? I do not, and I think it would be a positive danger to the Commonwealth to compel him to do any such thing. If you work out in figures the sort of total that might be expected under this amendment, I think even those inclined to support it would look aghast at the sort of financial policy which would be forced upon the Commonwealth. With the odds against me, I am trusting implicitly to the Commonwealth in this matter. The proposal that has been suggested is really equivalent to saying: "In this thing it is absurd to say you must not be guided by the interests of the Commonwealth, or by considerations of what would be a wise policy, or with regard to the symmetry of the federal edifice necessary for this great people; but you must find out the abnormal state of things, say, in a gold-digging community, and adjust the whole fabric to that fleeting condition of things." My hon. friend must not think that I have any lack of sympathy with the financial peculiarities of any country. No matter who the Treasurer may be, he will be as anxious as any one of us to see that nothing is done to land the State in a difficulty. I think we may consider that my hon. friend has put the case from one point of view, and that I have given the other. I hope we will not have a long-debate, for we are now only on the threshold of the discussion on these financial proposals.

Mr. HENRY:

I think that my hon. colleague, Sir Philip Fysh, in proposing this amendment, overlooks the fact that the surpluses arrived at under the 87th clause are accrued under separate tariffs, whereas the surpluses we are now dealing with in the 89th clause are arrived at under a uniform tariff. Does the hon. member propose that each colony, after the uniform tariff comes into force, should receive back the surplus as contributed under separate tariffs. It is obviously indefensible to put in any such claim. If I understand him right, Sir Philip Fysh is asking this Convention to consent to strike out certain words with the object of introducing other words, and that they will secure for five years a return to the several colonies of a surplus equal to the last year under separate tariffs. It is obviously unfair, under a uniform tariff, to expect the same contribution from the Federal Government as would be received under separate tariffs. That is the assumption. Notwithstanding the figures that have been thrown at us by the hon. The [P.1063] starts here

Premier New South Wales, I believe that in all probability the contribution per head of the population under a uniform tariff will be as nearly equal as possible. Therefore it is obviously unfair to expect, when the conditions are altered, that is, when we change from the separate to the uniform tariff, that the returns shall be the same in each case. Besides, I should like to point out to this Convention and to Sir Philip Fysh that, while under the separate tariffs, roundly the New South Wales Customs tariff would be £1,500,000, Victoria, with her smaller population, would have something like a million more. On the face of it we cannot expect that New South Wales shall receive back the same proportion when the closing year of the separate tariffs period comes, when her amount is £1,500,000, while Victoria is nearer £2,500,000. It is unfair, and I am somewhat surprised that after we have thrashed the thing out in the Finance Committee, anyone should stand up and propose such an unjust thing. Even if the word "aggregate" were struck out it would not affect the sense of it, because this clause, as I understand it, provides that a sum not less than a particular amount, that is, the surpluses of the preceding year, in the aggregate, shall be secured to the States for distribution upon some equitable plan. That is the object of the clause. It is the safety-valve of the revenue of the several States. Without throwing on the Federal Government a specific and definite obligation, no matter what their revenue may be and how they raise it, of providing a sum of money sufficient for the requirements of the States, it will be unsafe for the States financially, to enter into the Federation, because this clause, which differs very materially from the 1891 clause, is essentially a safety clause for the States revenue. Under the 1891 proposals any State entering the Federation had to trust to the judgment or goodwill of the Federal Parliament Treasurer as to the surplus they might get back, and they might have had nothing. Such a result would certainly be a serious dislocation of the State finances and no State having regard to the safety of the State finances could have entered Federation. This is an important view, and it is a point that impressed me in considering the whole problem, especially in connection with such a small colony as Tasmania, heavily burdened as we are with direct taxation, the income tax, taxation on land, and other taxes, all of which are so heavy that to put an additional burden of £50,000 upon us would be disastrous to the general interests of the colony. Unless there is a specific obligation cast on the Federal Government it will not be safe for the States to enter this Federation. I am not clear that the words "in proportion" proposed to be added will really effect the purpose desired. As to the serious loss indicated by Sir Philip Fysh that Tasmania is to sustain in entering this Federation, while this clause protects our State revenues, I have no apprehension about Tasmania entering into the federal bonds under the proposals here. I should like to say a great deal in connection with this question, on which one is tempted to speak, but I have regard to the patience of this Convention, and trust they will aquit me of having wearied them. However, I should like to direct Sir George Turner's attention specially to the fact that in the fourth line of the section it is provided:

The aggregate amount returned to them during the year last before the imposition of such duties.

It occurs to me that it is quite possible that no surplus may be returned at all.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

There is bound to be a surplus.

Mr. HENRY:

There maybe no surplus to return.

Mr. DEAKIN:

You mean that they may keep it in their pockets.

Mr. HENRY:

No; they may not have it. I will assume that the Commonwealth is established on January 1st, 1900. Is it not possible that before the close of that year a Customs or excise resolution may be tabled which would mean the coming into force of the Customs tariff and before any surplus was returned. It must be made clear that it is the surplus for the preceding year that is referred to.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Would not the imposition of the duties date from that resolution?

Mr. HENRY:

But the resolution might be tabled before the year had elapsed.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Then you get a proportion of the year.

Mr. HENRY:

I only want it made clear. I do not like the words "in proportion," as I would like to have some definite amount secured to the States.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I will say very little, but I consider that this is the most important of the financial clauses, as it not only affects the colony of New South Wales, but the future federal Treasurer. The clauses coming afterwards contain a mechanical arrangement which will be easily worked, but if our position was difficult with the term "aggregate" placed in this clause it would be ten thousand times more difficult with it left out, because members will recollect that in the year 1895 we received from Customs duties £2,200,000, and that we will now be reduced to £1,400,000, and it would not be a great stretch of the imagination to assume that the tariff of the future may be equal to our small tariff of 1895. I feel very strongly with regard to the position in which it places the representatives from New South Wales. I would point out to the Treasurers of the different colonies that, although I have the fullest sympathy with their fears for the future, if they look at it from a broad point of view there is no danger whatever. If we had six colonies admitted to the union, three being freetrade and three protectionist, I could understand that there might be some danger of the tariff not possibly yielding the same volume, but when we practically only have one freetrade colony in the group, and that the majority will be so largely in favor of the defence of the local Treasurers, surely there is scarcely any danger that the volume of revenue will not be raised. I do not see that it is possible to have a doubt with regard to that position; but if we take this clause -and I take it for granted the word "aggregate" will be retained-if we pass this clause we do dictate, if not the character of the tariff, to a great extent the volume or amount to be got from it, and it is a very serious thing, we will have people criticising our position and these financial clauses, and deducing certain results from them to which result and which opinion we will scarcely be able to make any adequate reply. Therefore while I feel we must compromise-and this was agreed to in committee on the basis of compromise-still I must, as a delegate for New South Wales, enter my protest against this clause, because I believe the true principle to be adopted under such a set of circumstances, and which may safely be adopted by colonies that form a majority of the group, is that which I have stated. Is it likely that by a wave of the wand we are going to alter the conditions at present existing in the majority of the colonies? Do not we know that that is the sacrifice of New South Wales? That is what we have to pass. Do we think for one moment that we are going to have an absolutely freetrade tariff in the future?

Mr. SYMON:

It may be under this clause.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Oh, yes; it may be. We do hope the leaven of New South Wales will sufficiently leaven all the other colonies so that after a time freetrade may be established. But can any man in his common sense say that the people of these colonies are going to change their fiscal faith because they are going to enter into a Federation? Therefore, whether I divide the House or not, I must put on record that I disapprove of this clause binding up the Federal Treasury to create a revenue equal in volume to the present revenue.

Mr. HOLDER:
If you are only one colony against three, you have more than a third of the representatives.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
We are one colony against the lot. There is no doubt of that.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
This debate has shown quite the contrary.

Mr. DEAKIN:
There is a freetrade section in every colony.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I say this with all sincerity, that the true and broad-principle mode of dealing with this question is to leave it to the honor and integrity of the Federal Government.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
When I suggested the proposal that a certain amount should each year be returned to the State Treasurers, I did so with the object in view that the State Treasury should have an opportunity of knowing that during five years they would not get back less than they had in a particular year, and also with another object in view, that the people of the colonies might also know that their State Treasurers would not be in such a position as would force the Treasury of the State to impose additional taxation, so that the passage of this Bill by the various colonies would be facilitated, the one protecting the State treasuries, the other facilitating the passage of this Bill by the people of the various colonies. My first view was that the amount to be returned to each State should not be less than the amount it had received the year before the uniform tariff, but when my hon. friends the representatives of New South Wales pointed out the difficulties, I saw that there was great force in the argument they used. The very first difficulty—the fact of inserting this clause at all—would be very injurious to them in their colony in endeavoring to pass this Bill, because they would urge, with a great show of reason, that it meant imposing on all the colonies a protectionist tariff, could be fairly answered by saying that although the clause compelled the Federal Treasurer to find a certain amount of money, it left his hand absolutely free as to the mode adopted to find it. He might find it by a low tariff, a freetrade tariff, a protective tariff, or by direct taxation. All the clause says is that each year he must provide a certain amount of money to be returned to the State Treasurers. But then another objection was pointed out, that whilst New South Wales under the freetrade tariff was collecting a small amount, as soon as the uniform tariff was imposed, no doubt they would contribute a very large sum, and they would be entitled in the division to be considered in the aggregate amount only in view of the lower amount they had contributed the year before. I admit that that was unfair to the colony, and, by omitting the word "aggregate, that will be obviated. I believe the colony will lose a considerable amount of money. I felt that I was justified in limiting that loss, and not forcing upon New South Wales a far larger loss. And, although I felt that the State Treasurer of Victoria for the time being would not have certainly as much as I should have liked, I felt bound to agree to a compromise. Therefore, I am bound now to support the clause as it is drafted. But we must not forget this is not final, that the proposal which has been submitted will be carefully considered by the various Parliaments, by the people, and the press of the different colonies. Objections will be raised to it, and it may be that those objections will be so strong and forcible that, when we meet in four months' time, we may very well see the necessity of making some fair alterations. All we desired in bringing down this clause was that some rough and ready manner should be agreed upon, so that we could do something that would be equitable and fair to all the colonies in this very complicated matter. Although, of course, I would have rather received the full amount, I must be prepared to accept the lower amount.

As to the suggestion of Sir Philip Fysh, the course of procedure he desires to map out for Tasmania may not be carried out in its entirety. He seems to think that the colonies may lose a certain amount amongst themselves, and that Tasmania will be able to stand quietly by until the other colonies have federated-until they have overcome all the difficulties, until the inequalities of the various amounts are settled-so that each may receive a proportionate amount, according to population, and that then Tasmania will be able to step in and say, "Everything is all right, and we are with you." But that is not how it can be done. Whatever may have have been possible in that direction by the Bill as we had it before us, the Bill has now been altered, and if Tasmania sees fit to stand out at the initiation of Federation because there is a small loss, she may find in five years' time that the Federal Parliament will say, "You chose to stand out at the beginning, and if you desire to come in you will have to contribute something to make up for the loss we have sustained, and which you have not lost because you stood out." My hon. friend will see that Tasmania will not be able to walk into Federation like that. I do not desire to detain the Convention, but I urge this as a fair compromise. It is not all some of us would like, but we have agreed to it as one of the sacrifices each colony must necessarily make to gain the larger end; and I hope the Committee will agree to this subsection.

I would merely like to point out that, so far as I can understand, this may have the certain effect of keeping Tasmania out of the Federation.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We very much regret it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Mr. Reid and Sir George Turner have both spoken of the States making up any deficiency in revenue by direct taxation. In the case of Tasmania that would effectually bar her entry into the Federation.

Mr. REID:
I never spoke of such a thing. I spoke of the possibility of the Federal Treasurer resorting to direct taxation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
That possibility is quite sufficient to act as a beacon and a warning to some of the smaller States—towards Tasmania, at any rate. In Tasmania, if I know anything about it, it is absolutely impracticable to obtain any more by direct taxation. It means, therefore, that if things are so financed that we will have to depend upon increased revenue from direct taxation for our local requirements, we shall have to refrain from entering this great Federation. I think that would be deplorable, and it might easily be avoided.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You will not stand out.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
The people may.

Mr. REID:
We will pay £20,000 a year for you if you are hard up.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
£20,000 a year will not see us through it.

Mr. REID:
You shall have another £10,000 afterwards if you like.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
This liberality is a liberality of words only. I should not like to have to depend upon liberality of that sort. We of Tasmania do not seek to come into the Federation as paupers, trusting to the charitable dole of New South Wales. What seems to me to be the initial mistake of these arrangements is that we are not insisting on it when we give up the Customs that the federal authority takes over our obligations on the consolidated debts.

Mr. WALKER:
Then move that the debts be taken over. Sir EDWARD BRADDON: I am willing to do that. Then there would be some security for its. We would then have a guarantee that the federal authority would conduct affairs with the utmost regard to economy, which is not absolutely certain if they are given a large revenue out of which they may spend what suits them and return the balance. If we had had that initial process, the handing over of the obligation to pay the interest on the debts as a quid pro quo for the Customs revenue we yield up, we might have had some security. We are utterly without that now, and, so far as Tasmania is concerned, she cannot look to improving her position or acquiring the revenue she requires for local purposes by any addition whatever to direct taxation.

Amendment negatived.

Paragraph 1, as read, agreed to.

Paragraph 2.

Mr. Reid:

I move:

That the second paragraph in section 89 be omitted, with a view to insert the following words:

1. Subject to the last paragraph, for a period of five years after the imposition of uniform duties of Customs, the total amount of duties of Customs and excise collected in each year in any State, or estimated as hereinafter provided, as the case may require, shall be repaid to such State of the Commonwealth after deducting from the amount in proportion to the population the share of the State in the total expenditure of the Commonwealth not provided for by other means of revenue. The repayment shall be made month by month, to the several States in as nearly as practicable the proper proportions due to the same respectively.

2. For the purpose of ascertaining the proportion of revenue from Customs and excise collected in each State there shall for the first year after the imposition of uniform duties of Customs be shown in the books of the Treasury of the Commonwealth the total amount collected in each State for duties of Customs and excise.

3. During such first year the duty chargeable under the uniform tariff upon goods which are imported into any State (whether duty has or has not been actually paid thereon), and during that first year exported to any other State for consumption therein, shall be deemed to have been collected in, and shall be credited to, such other State only, and all duties of excise paid in respect of any goods manufactured in any State, and so exported to another State for consumption therein, shall be deemed to have been collected in, and shall be credited to such other State only.

4. For the purpose of estimating the amount of the Customs and excise arising in each State during each of the four years next after such first year an average shall be taken by dividing the total Customs and excise collected in the whole Commonwealth during such first year by the total population of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, and the result shall be deemed to be the amount contributed by each person.

5. Where the amount credited to any State during such first year is in excess of the amount of the average so ascertained, there shall in each of the next four years be deducted therefrom one-fifth part of the excess; and where the amount so credited is less than such average there shall be added to the amount one-fifth part of the sum by which the amount so credited is less than the average; and the sums so ascertained shall be the estimated amounts to be repaid in each of the four years to the States respectively.

In moving the addition of these words in place of the second paragraph in clause 89 I may say at once that I have accepted this scheme in the spirit that has been shown, I am happy to say, not only by the Treasurers of the different colonies, but by every member of the Convention. Even where we think perhaps that the interests of our respective States have been jeopardised we must not be too exacting, or else if we did it would be absolutely impossible ever to come together. I am very happy indeed to recognise the spirit that has been shown by the Treasurers and by every member of the Convention to endeavor to approach some understanding. And under the circumstances, though I do not say for a moment that the solution is satisfactory to me, I have no hesitation in saying that it is a solution which will enable me at any rate to do my best to persuade the people of New South Wales to accept it. The working of this proposal on a sliding scale has been tested by the Treasurers, and we have no doubt whatever that it will work out automatically and exactly, and the benefit of the sliding scale will be that just as those whose receipts are above the average will come down in the distribution, the States whose receipts are below the average will go up in the distribution. On the one hand it will be a protection to the States whose receipts will be considerably above the average, and at the same time alleviate the position of the States whose receipts will be below the average. I hope hon. members will accept what we have at some trouble arrived at. So far as mere verbal or trivial corrections are concerned they can well be left to another occasion. The question is this: we have a scheme which gets over the difficulty with the minimum of inconvenience in connection with border traffic during the first five years. In the original scheme accounts would be kept and great inconvenience would be caused to border traffic throughout the Commonwealth. We all understood the strong expressions of opinion against this, and recognised that it was a most undesirable state of things. One of the benefits of this suggestion will be that that evil will only be maintained for one twelve months after the Constitution is established, so as to satisfy the people of all the colonies that the basis will be a fair one.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That will be for twelve months after the passing of uniform duties-not the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID:
Twelve months after the uniform duties are imposed, because it is only in the actual operation of the federal uniform tariff that we can properly see the just position of the several States. Under all the circumstances, admitting that it is even regrettable that we should have to do it for twelve months, I hope we will all come to the conclusion that we have arrived at the minimum inconvenience in order to promote a change which may be generally satisfactory.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Before entering into the question of the proposal made here by the four Treasurers, which I think on the whole is an excellent one, and which makes me feel that it would have been better if the original committee had been four or five instead of the number it was, I would like to ask the framers of these clauses whether there is not some essential want in them. I notice here it says:

Subject to the last sub-section, for a period of five years after the imposition of uniform duties of Customs the total amount of duties of Customs and excise collected in each year in any State, or estimated as hereinafter provided, as the case may require, shall be repaid to such State after deducting therefrom, in proportion to the population, the share of such State in the total expenditure of the Commonwealth which is not provided for by other means of revenue.

I take it that that is the special expenditure of the Commonwealth for the new machinery.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
And for any loss which might occur on other sources.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
But is that clear? It appears to me there should be some reference to section 87, or else some reference to the other expenditure. If I read it aright, it seems to leave out altogether the other expenditure. The result of that would be that the other expenditure would be lumped.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It says total expenditure purposely.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I am quite willing to leave it so then. But I would just like to say a word or two-if I may be allowed to do so without taking up much time-with regard to the proposal of the Treasurers. I think, on the whole, it is one which is acceptable to this Convention, and at the same time it is a great sacrifice for New South Wales.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
It is an equal sacrifice for Victoria.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
If I give one or two illustrations of what I mean I trust it will not be taken as unnecessary cavil, but I think it is well that we should see, at any rate, what we are doing. In a freetrade country like New South Wales it is not at all improbable that with the idea of a tariff of it certain character being imposed there will be large importations in the last year of the old regime, and those importations will tell very much upon the volume of importations into New South Wales during the first year of the new regime. On the other hand, with regard to Victoria, she may possibly speculate that the tariff may possibly be less—that it will not be Morel—and, whatever the tariff may be, the commercial instinct in a man in a colony like Victoria would be to stay his hands.

Mr. HIGGINS:
You have no commercial instincts there.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
You have legal instincts evidently. The probability is—of course no one can foresee the future—that the first year will be a very bad year comparatively for New South Wales, and that it will be comparatively a very good one for Victoria. There is no doubt in my mind that during the first year of the new regime—after the imposition of a uniform tariff—and the last year of the old tariffs everything will be extremely unsettled, and we are making a great sacrifice in stopping the book-keeping at the one year. In Committee I would have been quite willing, as I proposed, to take the bookkeeping for two years, and to accept the second year as an average. However, I am prepared to a

Mr. HOLDER:
I only have two or three words to say in addressing the Convention on these clauses. They are very long, and at first sight are apt to frighten hon. members, but I think it is better that they should be drawn as they have been, rather than that they should have been unduly condensed, for the idea is not merely to convey in legal form what has been done, but to convey it in such a form that the general public will be able to understand precisely what is intended. I wish to put it to the Convention that the task committed to the Treasurers was a comparatively simple one after all, because it was only to deal with a period of five years. By common consent we had agreed that up to the date of the uniform tariff coming into operation the distribution should be on a certain basis, and that after five years from that it should be per capita. We knew what would be the case at the end of the five years, and it appeared to us necessary to ascertain by actual figures, and not by any estimate or ingenious device, what would be the case at the beginning of the period mentioned. Having then located, by the collection of statistics in the first year after the coming into operation of a uniform tariff, the proper amount which each State will have contributed, and other matters, it then became only a mathematical calculation how to bring the lowest up to the average and the highest down; and, though the process is a slow one, I think it is far happier to do it by slow degrees, so that at the end of five years the lowest should not go up with a jump nor the highest come down with a jump. Not only for the purposes of accuracy, but for the convenience of the State and the levelling of their financial methods, it is easier that this should be spread over the five years. My hon. friend Mr. Reid has put the matter clearly, and I will not detain the Committee any longer than to say that, on behalf of South Australia, we will heartily accept the scheme. I will not say what we so commonly hear from others, that we are going to make a big sacrifice. We expected by entering the Federation that we would have to pay something for it, and if we have to pay we shall not complain.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I would just like to say one word with reference to New South Wales. It may be that she is making big sacrifices, but none of us can tell what effect the uniform tariff will have on any colony, and New South Wales gains an advantage under this, because she will be able to have her expenditure taken on a population basis. We know from pamphlets we have seen, that that would be of no little benefit to that particular colony.

Sub-section 2 negatived.

Paragraphs proposed by Mr. Reid inserted.

Clause as amended passed.

Clause 90.-After the expiration of five years from the imposition of uniform duties, all surplus revenue over the expenditure of the Commonwealth shall be distributed month by month among the several States in proportion to the numbers of their people, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID:

I move to insert after "duties" these words:
Of Customs each State shall be deemed to contribute to the revenue an equal sum per head of its population and.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GLYNN:
I should like to ask for a little information. Does Mr. Barton think sufficient provision is made for the protection of the power to substitute direct taxation for Customs duties during the first five years? This is the first clause in which direct provision is made for the return of surpluses produced by Customs and other sources of revenue. The clauses we have dealt with seem to provide rather specifically for the deduction from the Customs revenue of general expenditure, and for dividing in certain ratios the balance left. Nothing is said about the allocation of the surpluses during the first five years produced by the addition of general sources of revenue to the Customs revenue and deducting the general expenditure. I am in doubt whether, in case the Customs duties were reduced, the power of at once raising revenue by direct taxation, so as to make up the difference is preserved, as there seems to be no direct provision for the return during the first five years of any surplus arising otherwise than from the Customs duties.

Mr. REID:
The special provisions we have just inserted can only refer to Customs, because they refer to the transit of goods; but this clause is general, because with reference to direct taxation such difficulties as transit do not arise. If there is a surplus from direct taxation it would no doubt be returned, and it is quite open for the Commonwealth to decide the method of returning it. There is absolute freedom to devise the financial system upon any basis it likes.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 91-Audit of accounts-agreed to.

Clause 92-Preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one part of the Commonwealth over the ports of another part of the Commonwealth, and any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth, or by any State, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth, or by any State, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth shall be null and void.

Mr. GORDON:
I move to amend this clause:
By adding the following words after the word "Commonwealth" in the 24th line: "or having the effect of inducing trade or commerce in any particular direction within the Commonwealth unfairly, and in particular by one part of the Commonwealth offering greater inducement than other parts wherever the inducement offered returns no direct profit as regards the particular trade or commerce induced to that part of the Commonwealth offering the inducement"

It is a rather difficult proposition to put in writing, but it supplies a test of what a preferential rate is. The real test of a preferential rate is, does it involve loss to the colony offering it?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Not necessarily so.

Mr. GORDON:
I think so. No prudent manager of railways should impose a rate which would be a loss to the railways.

Mr. SYMON:
It may be a gain to the community.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The particular rate may be a loss, but it may be made up by the return traffic.

Mr. GORDON:
Just so; thus, you may have a rate which is called a differential rate, but which is really a preferential rate, because it is imposed on a little-used part of a line, and the loss may be made up on another portion of the line. The test of what is a preferential rate is this: Is there a loss on the particular traffic induced by this particular rate? The clause as it stands in the Bill provides that a rate shall be both made and used for the purpose of attracting the trade of a neighboring State before it can be interfered with. That is altogether too vague, and would involve a difficult and curious investigation as to the reasons which led to the imposition of the rate. The true test is: does it involve a loss on the particular part of the line over which the goods are carried? We cannot prevent differential rates, but no differential rate should involve a lose on the traffic in respect to which this particular rate is imposed.

Mr. FRASER:
You cannot decide that.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The question is: Is the rate a non-paying rate.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Nearly all new railways are started at a loss.

Mr. GORDON:
I do not think all new railways are started at a loss.

Mr. TRENWITH:
They more often are than not.

Mr. GORDON:
We could make an exception in the case of new railways.

Mr. GRANT:
Make it "no reasonable profit," instead of no direct profit."
Mr. GORDON I have "no objection to the word "reasonable." I try to make all my propositions reasonable.

Mr. HIGGINS:
They are all so vague.

Mr. GORDON:
The best test that can possibly be applied as to what is a differential is: does it impose a loss on the railways? A subsequent section of the Bill stipulates that the rate must be both made and used for the purpose of attracting trade from a neighboring State, but that is altogether too ambiguous, and we should never get to the bottom of it.

Mr. GRANT:
I can see no objection to the amendment provided the words "no reasonable profit" are substituted for "no direct profit," as it would be very difficult for the Inter-State Commissioners to determine what is a "direct profit." All railway men would be able to agree as to what would be a reasonable remuneration in respect to a freight on any particular class of goods.

Mr. TRENWITH:
How would it be if there was no profit? Our Victorian railways are entirely non-paying.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Do not mention that.

Mr. GRANT:
The Inter-State Commissioners, who would doubtless be railway experts, would be able to determine what is a reasonable profit on the freight of any class of goods, and therefore there can be no objection to the amendment. I think also that the clause would be improved by inserting the word "unduly instead of "unfairly."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You want to make a lot of work for the lawyers.

Mr. GRANT:
We are dealing with a difficult matter, one that has required all the intelligence of our best men. The gentlemen controlling the railways are men of great intelligence and able to do the best for their own States, and we should make this clause so general that it would be of universal application, and so that there would be no loophole by which advantage could be given to any one system of railways. I think a great improvement would be made if the amendment of my hon. friend Mr. Gordon were agreed to, and would simplify the matter if an Inter-State Commerce Commission were dealing with it.

Mr. GORDON:

I accept the suggestion of Mr. Grant to substitute "unduly" for "unfairly," and the word "reasonable" for "direct."

Mr. WISE:

I think the acceptance of this amendment may land the Convention in a considerable difficulty. We propose later on to establish a Commission of experts to deal with all these derogations from freedom of trade which we desire to abolish, and it appears to me undesirable to limit their powers by attempting to lay down definitions in this Constitution too minutely. Following the scheme of the Constitution we ought to have the largest terms, and leave them to be interpreted by the tribunal appointed for that purpose.

Mr. GORDON:

This is abroad principle.

Mr. WISE:

The broad principle is that preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one part of the Commonwealth over the ports of another part of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GORDON:

That will not cover preferential rates.

Mr. ISAACS:

What is the meaning of "part of the Commonwealth?"

Mr. O'CONNOR:

It means one colony.

Mr. BARTON:

The hon. member refers to:

Ports of one part of the Commonwealth over ports of another part.

Mr. WISE:

I contend that these minute directions should not be placed in the Constitution. The directions proposed are ineffectual and will be mischievous. Supposing we have a low rate for a long haul, from Sydney to Bourke - and it is admitted you cannot run any railway system unless you grant low rates-the inhabitants of Dubbo, or of any of the intermediate towns, may complain that undue preference is being given to Bourke. That would be a question for the Commission to inquire into, and they will decide whether or not the preference is undue. There are recognised technical rules as regards railway systems, but I need not go into them now. Hon. members will see them in the works dealing with the Inter-State Commission in the United States. This particular clause would relate to their powers, and it is quite clear that for a low rate for a long haul to have any effect, the goods must pass the towns I have mentioned. Are the States prepared to give up the rights they now possess? Is the Government of Victoria prepared to give up the rights they now have and put settlers in outlying districts at a great disadvantage over those living nearer Melbourne? Certainly New South Wales is not.

Mr. GORDON:
Sir Samuel Griffith said he doubted if the Bill of 1891 touched preferential rates, and this is almost the same as clauses 11 and 12 of that Bill.

Mr. BARTON:
It is a provision, in another shape, of clause 5 of section 9 of the United States Constitution, that reads:

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

We substitute the words "part of the Commonwealth." In another place, the words "State or part of the Commonwealth," mean, I take it, territories as well as Commonwealth. Perhaps this might be amended accordingly.

Mr. FRASER:
Clause 92, to my mind, is perfectly clear. It means that the railway department, or any other department, shall not give preference to one port over any other port in the Commonwealth. It does not mean that there shall not be differential rates of carriage, because that is necessary in many parts.

Mr. ISAACS:
What does it mean?

Mr. FRASER:
It means, for instance, that you shall not favor Sydney as against Geelong, if you like, or Sydney as against Melbourne. It means that you must not favor ports in your own colony, as against those in the same colony—the port of Melbourne as against the ports of Geelong, Warrnambool, Belfast, or any other.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Does it interfere with our Riverina trade?

Mr. FRASER:
It does not. It does debar you from making as low a rate as possible to Echuca or Swanhill.

Mr. ISAACS:
Will you stake your reputation on that as a lawyer?

Mr. FRASER:
I say that is the meaning.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is very serious to us.

Mr. FRASER:
I see no danger in it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I am not satisfied with it at any rate.

Mr. WISE:
I move:
To leave out the words "part of the Commonwealth," with the view of inserting "State or territory."

I agree with the desire of Mr. Fraser that preference ought not to be given to one port over another in a State, provided that advantage is extended to every inhabitant. I do not see, however, why Victoria should not say there shall be lower port charges at Melbourne or Geelong.

Mr. GORDON:
I ask leave to temporarily withdraw my amendment, to enable Mr. Wise to move his.

Leave given.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I think the amendment suggested by Mr. Wise is extremely desirable. The words "part of the Commonwealth" are so extremely vague that they might lead to conflicts, not only between State and State, but between parts of a State and parts of a State. Clearly we have all along gone on the lines of leaving to the States the most complete autonomy wherever it is practicable, and the experience of the States with railway development, in reference to the differing distances that loads have to be hauled, renders it imperative that they must have varying rates according to varying circumstances in their own colony. Everyone who knows anything of railways knows you can carry goods over long distances at a low rate per ton, and make a profit; but that you cannot carry goods over shorter distances, at the same rates, without making a lose. Therefore, you must leave each State within its own bounds to make such conditions as the exigencies of the State demand. All that we have a right to provide is that the railways are not used to derogate from that condition we have made—that there shall be freedom of trade between the States. Anything more than that is infringing what we have been so strenuously struggling for-State rights. I have had a good deal of experience of the difficulty of adjusting rates of carriage in order to meet the exigencies of railway management, and I feel confident that this amendment is necessary in the interests of the States, of local autonomy, in order to prevent a too great staining of the Constitution for the purpose of purely local considerations inside the States. I have in my mind a possible difficulty that may arise between the town of Geelong and the town of Melbourne. Clearly this Constitution is not designed for the purpose of adjusting differences that may occur between various sections of the States, but rather to prevent difficulties arising between the States themselves, and the amendment suggested by Mr. Wise will add clearness to the clause.

Mr. BARTON:
I will be content with the amendment if it takes this form:
Leave out "part of the Commonwealth" in both lines, and insert. "State."

Mr. WISE:
I will move it in those terms.

Mr. BARTON:
And at the end of this clause, if I may mention it now, it will be scarcely necessary to keep the words:
Between the different parts of the Commonwealth, because the phrase in clause 86,
Throughout the Commonwealth,
In reference to freedom of trade and commerce is sufficient.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
This is a very important clause, of which it is very difficult to understand the effect, and I desire to draw Mr. Barton's attention to the difficulties which I am afraid may arise in connection with its effect. He will be aware of the competition for traffic which is taking place with regard to Riverina, and the doubt in my mind is as to whether this will altogether shut out the rates which have been existing for some time with regard to that particular trade. He knows as well as I do the cut-throat policy which has been pursued with regard to that particular part of the Commonwealth, and while we may be perfectly prepared to leave to the Federal Parliament or to the Inter-State Commission, if brought into existence, the right to go fully into all the facts in connection with that particular portion, and endeavor to devise a scheme which would allow the trade of Riverina to go to its natural port, I do not want any words in this clause to shut out the Federal Parliament or Inter-States Commission afterwards from dealing with the question. I confess I am not very clear as to the real effect and meaning of this section, but it might be considered in such a way as to prevent that question from being dealt with hereafter. If my hon. friend could enlighten me I should be very glad.

Mr. BARTON:

I think the words:

Preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one part of the Commonwealth over the ports of another would apply to such a case as Sir George Turner speaks of. It would prevent what might be called preferential rates. In other words, it would not interfere with the commerce of any part of the Commonwealth going to what may be called its natural, or geographically its most suitable port, because that could only be prevented by rates which would be in their nature preferential.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Or differential.

Mr. BARTON:

Take a case like this: if the principle of lower haulage for greater distance pro rata is observed and not infringed upon, that gives every facility for traffic going to its nearest or most convenient port.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Not necessarily.

Mr. BARTON:

I think it does sufficiently.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Fairly.

Mr. BARTON:

If, on the other hand, a State, not content with the geographical position which in its consequence brings certain traffic to it, wishes to give to persons outside its bounds advantages which it does not give to its own citizens for the purpose of drawing that traffic, then I should say it was an endeavor to give a preference to one part of the Commonwealth over another, and an infringement of the provisions of this section. So that, supposing Victoria and New South Wales adopted the principle of lowered rates for increased distances, and there were points A, B and C in New South Wales or Victoria-it is not material which-A being the port, B a place 15 miles away, and C a place 200 miles away, a principle could be adopted of charging less for the increased haulage between A and C than between A and B, less pro rata. But I take it that if C were outside the boundary of a State, then this provision would operate to this extent—that if it were made less in the aggregate to carry from A to C than from A to B, a nearer point, it would have a preference. But if, on the contrary, a reasonable principle is observed, such as was laid down by the Inter-State Commission in America, as stated in Mr. Dabney's book, the principle of less charge according to distance, but so that the aggregate charge for the further point is not absolutely less than for the nearer point, I think matters would be all right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

The difficulty is that in New South Wales they have very long distances. In Victoria the distances are very short. The natural port of the Riverina is unquestionably Melbourne. That cannot be controverted; but, by the system which can be adopted in New South Wales keeping within its own territory, it can make differential rates. Then rates can be so framed as to come within this distinction, and yet divert that trade from its natural Course.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not think so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I think it could, but if the trade were left absolutely free, it would go to its proper port—it would go to Melbourne.

Mr. BARTON:

Has there ever been a preferential rate in New South Wales except in self-defence?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I think there has. I think there has been an effort to get the trade from Queensland, and Queensland had to prevent it by putting on an export duty.

Mr. BARTON:

I am not saying there are no preferential rates under both systems. I am saying preferential rates have been lowered to counteract other preferential rates.

Mr. ISAACS:

On the ground of provocation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We must go a step further. I, myself, recollect that Victoria opened up the whole of the Riverina, its whole trade. After that had been done, then New South Wales became anxious for it - started railways, and carried goods at such rates as to compel Victoria to cut her rates. It is a very serious position we will have to face, and which will have to be taken into account by our Commissioners. A great part of the trade and commerce goes to Sydney annually which ought to belong to Melbourne. And, therefore, if the effect of this is, as I have read it, and as my hon. friend appears to tell us, New South Wales will be at liberty, on its very long distances, to charge rates which will enable it to attract the trade of the Riverina to Sydney. I am afraid this will be a serious blot on the Bill, and will render it very difficult to deal with in our own colony. I would be willing to leave it to the Federal Parliament to settle and put it on proper lines, but I do not like this Inter-State Commission. The matter must be settled in such a way as will allow trade to go to its natural port. Unless we can have some provision such as that I am afraid there will arise a very serious difficulty which it will be very hard indeed for us to get over.

Mr. FRASER:
Undoubtedly neither Victoria nor New South Wales under this clause could encourage the trade beyond its own State boundaries by offering a lower rate to those outside than to those within their own actual boundaries. New South Wales, by hauling wool or other produce from Hay to Sydney at a less rate than to Cootamundra, would undoubtedly have an advantage. As Sir George Turner has said, to our borders the distance is short, and we could not offer a lower rate to those beyond the Murray than we charge to our own producers. That is unquestionably a fact, and we may as well understand that and deal with it with our eyes open. We cannot charge more to our own producers in Echuca than we charge to the men across the Murray. The rates must be the same. At present everyone knows that the rates are cheaper to those across the Murray than to those on this side of that river.

Mr. BARTON:
Sixty-six per cent.

Mr. FRASER:
No; 60 per cent. is the extreme.

Mr. BARTON:
In a return laid on the table of the House, it appears that those rates are 46 and 66 per cent. cheaper.

Mr. REID:
That is what you call making trade flow to its natural channel.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Of course that is wrong.

Mr. FRASER:
I say that the haulage rates in New South Wales in cases of competition are lower than those in Victoria. But we need not throw stones.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear. They are all alike.
Mr. FRASER:

Queensland, of course, has reduced her rates much lower than those of any of the colonies, and she has also put an export duty on wool crossing the border in order to divert the trade to her own railway lines. The only point that Sir George Turner need attend to is that we dare not—if this clause is passed—offer lower rates to the people across the Murray than we charge to our own people. Still the traffic would, I think, come to our own colony because the distance is so much shorter.

Mr. REID:

I do not wish to contribute much to this matter, because it has been talked of a great deal.

I quite admit that the position of Victoria in this matter is one in which they are entitled to a great deal of admiration and a certain amount of sympathy. There is no doubt that through the superior enterprise of the merchants of Melbourne many years ago they engineered, or rather pioneered, commercially speaking, our territory, and made a very resolute attempt to practically take possession of it—in a commercial sense. I have never begrudged them, but we have been learning to imitate their enterprise, and we are endeavoring to recover commercially that which belongs to us. Owing to resistance on the part of Melbourne enterprise, and aggression on the part of New South Wales—which consisted in trying to get back that which someone else had appropriated—there has been a conflict. I will not say one harsh thing about Melbourne administration at all. The present administrators of the railways find themselves hampered a great deal by what was done many years ago, and which would not have been done to such an extent if we had been a little more enterprising within our own colony. But now we are burying the hatchet and becoming one people commercially.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

And "one country, one destiny."

Mr. REID:

Not one country exactly. This is a proposal for Federation. I would have been glad to have gone further, and make this Federation a nation, if it were possible, but that is not the point. I am quite agreeable to the two colonies being left to fight the matter out. We are quite able to fight the matter out without the assistance of Federation, if fighting is the order of the day.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

But you say we have to bury the hatchet, we shall have nothing to fight with.
Mr. REID:
We do not want to fight, and so anxious were we to adjust the difficulties that we had a conference between the two Railway Departments, and they came to a settlement which did not suit Melbourne enterprise, although it was a very fair settlement. Of course that was set aside. Is this Constitution to put its foot down upon this fighting or not—this fighting which is to draw the trade out of one State into another State?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That is not the point. Draw the trade from its natural port, you mean.

Mr. REID:
You give yourself away there, because if Melbourne is the natural port of the Riverina commerce it is a wonder that the New South Wales producers can get their produce taken down to Melbourne at 50 per cent. less than the rates charged to the Victorian people for their produce.

Mr. ISAACS:
You forget the Sydney rates.

Mr. REID:
The original difficulty arose from the fact of Melbourne taking up the contract to practically commercially manage New South Wales from the Murray to Bourke. That was too big a contract for you, and you are going to lose it. We are prepared to fight you, but we want to come into this Federation, where we will have some independent body to act fairly between us. I think my hon. friend must have overlooked these words in section 95:

Rates or regulations of any railway in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The Finance Committee never agreed to that nor to any such thing.

Mr. REID:
I was not on the Finance Committee and I do not know, but I do not wonder that some one has blundered, considering the extraordinary proceedings of that committee. I absolve any one who thought anything about what we are doing.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You always upset everything we do.

Of course I do, but in this matter I had nothing to do with it. I took no part in it, and I took no part in the drawing up of the resolutions.
Mr. WISE:
   It is all for the protection of Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Indeed it is not.

Mr. REID:
   How can there be a cessation of these hostilities between the railway systems if it is allowable to impose rates for the purpose of drawing traffic from one State to the railway of another State? How can such a state of things go on and peace be still maintained? It is impossible. Those who object to power being given to the Inter-State Commission to prevent rates being used to draw the traffic from the railways of one State to those of another object to all regulations on the subject, and if the regulation which they make is not to be observed, what is the use of it? We are prepared to adopt either course. We are prepared to remain as we are, using our own weapons of offence or defence, or we are prepared to hand over to a power the duty and obligation of preventing the fight, and it is more in the spirit of Federation that we should do so; but it is no use handing over this power unless you hand it over thoroughly.

Mr. DEAKIN:
   On what principle are they to go?

Mr. REID:
   Neither you nor I can tell that. I am prepared to trust our railway management to this superior authority, but I do not wish to put any limitation upon this tribunal at all. Any rate or regulation which violates the spirit of this clause I leave full power to the Inter-State Commission to annul.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Are you willing to take out these words?

Mr. REID:
   Which words?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Those which you read, and which were improperly put in.

Mr. REID:
   Certainly. I do not for a moment propose to give this Commission any power over the management of the railways, except when that management is being used unfairly to interfere with its natural course of business. It is absurd to say you will give them further power than that, unless you give them all the power and hand over the railways. We are not going to do that, and since we are not going to do that those who object to handing over the railways do not object to the establishment of an independent and fearless body to prevent the war of railway tariffs. We cannot go further when that war is being prevented; we cannot go further and give them the power practically of regulating the internal management of the railways.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Will the hon. member allow me to put a question? On his plan of abolishing the war of railway tariffs, would he make it possible for the Government of New South Wales to carry goods the long distance from Albury to Sydney at a cheaper rate than they could be carried from Albury to Melbourne?

Mr. REID:

There rules. It is impossible, looking at the rates, to say that anything of the sort is going on, so many things have to be taken into consideration. Where the management of the lines is vested in a certain power that power must be allowed to run the railways on business principles, but I am willing that these business principles shall be regulated in such a way as to apply equally. I am prepared to have a tribunal to see what is fair is done.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

And give them unlimited power.

Mr. REID:

That is impossible, if you do not give them the management of the railways altogether. It is a contradiction of terms. You must limit the exercise of their discretion to matters affecting the rival interests of the particular colonies, and you must limit them from interfering with the ordinary management of the railways.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Do not you want to take away our weapons and keep your own?

Mr. REID:

I do not think it would be a weapon for New South Wales, as it would be an independent board. I am willing to leave the whole to the Inter-States Commission to decide as to what rates in effect are preferential.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

What is a preferential rate?

Mr. REID:

An expert in railway management could tell you that.

Mr. HIGGINS:

You claim to do as you like in your colony and prevent us doing as we like.

Mr. REID:

The Commissioners are not going to have a blind eye to what is done in New South Wales and a keen eye to what takes place in Victoria. The real aim is that we should leave justice.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You tie their hands in those things in which they can do justice to Victoria.

Mr. ISAACS:
You tie their hands in Victoria and leave them free in New South Wales.

Mr. REID:
A most absurd interpretation has been placed on these words.

Mr. WISE:
Let them go out of the clause and we will get all we want.

Mr. REID:
The Drafting Committee put the words in for some good reason, and I have such a reverence for that Committee that I will not unnecessarily interfere with their work. I will appeal to Sir John Downer to say whether they were put in without good reason.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Certainly not.

Mr. REID:
Then I will stick to them. Mr. DEAKIN: It appears to me to be of the greatest importance to understand the Premier of New South Wales. It is possible we may be in entire agreement with him, and may be differing only about a matter of words. It is equally possible we may be differing about a matter of substance. Each colony has an interest in this question. South Australia, for instance, has the Naracoorte railway running to the sea, practically along and touching the western border of Victoria. Under this clause it is feared, or might be feared by South Australia, that while the South Australian railway authorities would be forbidden from making any preferential rates in order to enable it to obtain traffic from Victoria, because it was in another colony, we in Victoria would be allowed to make the charge from Serviceton to Melbourne less than their charge to Kingston, although it is ten times the distance. The fear of the Premier of Victoria is that each colony in such a case as this will be prohibited from carrying the goods of its neighbor, although the latter may carry those goods ten times the distance at the same rate. Each colony is to be restricted to its own produce, and it will be still possible for each to retain the traffic arising in its own colony by charging special rates. Victoria might choose to carry goods from Serviceton to Melbourne at a cheaper rate than they could reach the sea if taken through South Australia, although our distance is ten times as great. That is an anti-federal proceeding, and ought not to be permitted.

Mr. REID:

Would you charge the name for your produce as for South Australian produce?

Mr. DEAKIN:

Yes, for the same distance. Does the Premier of New South Wales mean that the Inter-State Commissioners should be endowed with authority to consider the railway circumstances of New South Wales and determine "Here is a general mileage rate which is charged in New South Wales. It is not the same rate per mile for 200 miles as it is for the first mile, because there is a natural tapering off of the charges, but no such tapering is to be permitted if made in order that New South Wales can compete with the railway of another colony"? If that is the principle I can understand it.

Mr. REID:

Just as I answered your fiftieth question I had forgotten the other forty-nine.

Mr. DEAKIN:

No one would be more able to follow forty-nine questions than the hon. member if he so desired. Does he wish to give an Inter-State Commission power to revise rates which shall obtain all over the colony, making allowance for the natural tapering, but no further allowance to be permitted on any line to a greater degree than that which obtains all over the colony? If that is the principle I can understand it.

Mr. REID:

I can tell you my principle in a word or two.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

May there not be different conditions affecting different lines?

Mr. DEAKIN:

There may be. You might have coal on one line, and get it at a cheaper price. But, as the Premier of New South Wales says, experts and experts alone could take those details into consideration. I am trying to simplify the problem by discovering what principle the Premier of New South Wales is willing to have embodied.

Mr. REID:

The principle which I believe governs the whole clause is that it is wrong to have any railway rates or regulations made or used having the effect of drawing traffic to a railway in one State from the railway of a neighboring State.

Mr. BARTON:

The bottom of the matter is simple honesty.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I will explain it directly.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The words to which my hon. friend Mr. Reid called attention appear to my friends to relate only to the traffic from one colony being carried by the railway of a neighboring State. It imposes a restriction upon the railway of one State so far as it may seek to take traffic from the railway of another State, but it imposes no conditions upon the rates to be charged in regard to its own traffic by the railway of that other State. It is not governed by any consideration whatever for the railways of the first mentioned State.

Mr. O’CONNOR:

It is mutual.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Of course if you make it mutual then we are at one.

Mr. WISE:

It is mutual.

Mr. DEAKIN:

It reads as if it might not be mutual. While it may put a limitation on the rates to be charged upon the Naracoorte line in South Australia, it puts no such limitation between the Victorian border and Melbourne. If it is a mutual limitation, then we are agreed. I have read it independently of other hon. members on this side.

Mr. WISE:

It is mutual. I must confess I could not see what you were contending for.

Mr. BARTON:

Would my hon. friend like to leave out the words quoted?

Mr. ISAACS:

Leave it to the Parliament to say what the powers of the Inter-State Commission shall be.

Mr. REID:

That cannot be.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I agree with the Premier of New South Wales that we must have in this Bill a statement of some principle upon which the Inter-State Commission is to act. If that principle is perfect mutuality in this matter, then I can quite understand it. Of course if one railway system is worked cheaper and better than another, then the better managed system is entitled to all the benefits which it can gain in these ways. I do not want to see any common mileage charge. Each State should have the full advantage of its circumstances.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
What part of the Bill says that there is no mutuality?

Mr. DEAKIN:
According to this clause, the Commission is to have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary.

But it shall have no powers in reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any State.

Mr. REID:
That is all right so far.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Then comes the exception.

Mr. REID:
Just so.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The clause continues:

Except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Does that not apply to States all round, to one as well as another?

Mr. DEAKIN:
It appears to me to be capable of an unilateral construction. You start by speaking of a particular State, and you say that State is not to take traffic from the railways of a neighboring State. You seem to imply by this that each railway is to be limited to the traffic of its own State, and is not to take the traffic from a neighboring State, though that State might better serve that traffic than it would be served in its own State. For instance, some of our Wimmera country would certainly be served by t

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I cannot see any other.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
It seems transparently in favor of freetrade.

Mr. DEAKIN:
That is all I want.

Mr. REID:
We all want the same thing. Let us during the next four months see if we can come to an agreement.

Mr. DEAKIN:
We should do so now. I say candidly that what should obtain is, that, taking the distance from Serviceton to the sea in South Australia, the rate charged on that railway should be exactly the measure of the rate charged for a similar distance on the Victorian railways, only making a distinction for the fact that from local causes one railway might be worked a trifle more cheaply than the other. If South Australia can work her lines more cheaply than we can, let her charge a lower rate. If South Australia had a coalfield in that part of the colony she could work her line more cheaply. Apart from such local considerations and tapering rates, Victoria has no right to charge less for fifty miles than South Australia does.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

You cannot have uniform charges without taking over the railways.

Mr. DEAKIN:

That is why I have become a convert to the proposal. I think that is really what we want. In any case I go further than this clause. I think that power should be given to the Inter-State Commission, after taking into account the varying conditions of the various State railways, to arrange that the rate of carriage on all the Australian railways should be the same for the same mileage.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

The clause is altogether unfair to Victoria. If the proposal some of us have made were given effect to we would assure what all the colonies desire, equal mileage rates for equal distances. This does not interest alone New South Wales and Victoria. South Australia and Queensland are equally interested. I have always contended that it is unfair that Victoria should set up unequal competition with South Australia and take away the trade which geographically belongs to her and which should go to Kingston. We also say it is wrong that Queensland should institute such a state of things as enables her to take wool from the south-western portion of her boundary into Brisbane at a cheaper rate than it could go by its natural channel to Sydney. These proposals submitted would not achieve that. They have larger aims, and propose to drive Victorian trade out of Riverina and prevent her carrying traffic on any lines in that territory.

Mr. BARTON:

How can the hon. member say that?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I say it distinctly.

Mr. BARTON:

How can the hon. member attribute to any committee of this House any design of that sort?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

He means that is the effect.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I should be the last one to attribute to the hon. member anything but the utmost good faith and fair dealing. But the proposal in the Bill is opposed altogether to the finding of the Finance Committee, and I cannot understand how it has appeared. It was absolutely vetoed and fought against by members of the committee. Perfect mutuality and perfect fairness should be the maxim on which the railways should be worked.

Mr. BARTON:
What words does the hon. member wish omitted?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I should like to excise the whole clause.

Mr. BARTON:
And have an Inter-State Commission to do nothing?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I will not support the clause; it is the most absurd proposal I have ever heard. Expert officers from the civil service of each colony should form an Inter-State Commission; these officers could be assembled to deal with cases as they arise. They could then be disbanded, and if other circumstances arose calling for further consideration a similar Commission could be summoned.

Mr. BARTON:
Does the hon. member propose to have as occasion arises an intercolonial conference, and that only?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I propose to start with an Inter-State Commission to be composed of an expert officer from each State.

Mr. BARTON:
Is not that likely under this proposal?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
No; it is proposed these men should be appointed during good behavior by the Governor-General, and only to be removed upon an address from both Houses of Parliament, and likewise to have such remuneration as Parliament from time to time determines.

Mr. BARTON:
The reason of that is that nobody shall be allowed to twist their tails.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I think their tails might be twisted just as well one way as the other; but when hon. members cannot trust competent and reputable officers of the various colonies to do their duty it will be a sad day for the Governments of the colonies. What we propose is that if the New South Wales Government charge certain rates, say for the carriage of wool from Hay to Sydney, we should be allowed to take wool from Hay to Melbourne at a similar rate mile for mile. It seems to me that proposal is perfectly fair. I would give to South Australia a like concession, which New South Wales should concede to Victoria and Queensland to New South Wales. I am quite sure if Mr. Eddy, the eminent Railway Commissioner of New South Wales, had the charge of the whole of these railways this absurd competition would cease in a week.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

And we should not require all the elaborate machinery suggested.

Mr. REID:

You will have to have somebody to deal with difficulties which will arise in determining these matters, and that somebody will have to be independent. Supposing a Melbourne Commissioner came to meet other Commissioners as an Inter-State Commission, and agreed to something which was just and right, but which Melbourne merchants and politicians denounced as ruinous to Victoria, what would his position be?

Mr. BARTON:

He would be looked on as a traitor to his colony.

Mr. REID:

As certain patriotic gentlemen have unjustly been regarded here.

Mr. BARTON:

He would be bundled out of his office.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Men from outside the colonies could be chosen if required.

Mr. REID:

That would never work.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

It would be impossible to carry on the government of the colonies if such overbearing conduct on the part of Ministers of every State is to continue. I believe this difficulty might be dealt with if all the railways were under one management, but the present system complicates it. The proposal that all districts should be served from ports which are their natural outlets seems to me fair and reasonable; in other words, as I pointed out, that the south-western portions of Victoria should be served from Kingston; if the district could be served at a cheaper rate, the southern part of New South Wales should also be served by Victoria, and thus the trade of south-western Queensland would naturally gravitate to Sydney. That would be the case if these railways were federated, and that is one—a great-reason why I am in favor of Federation. By the plan proposed one colony would be able to make what charges it liked and continue the present gross inequalities and cut-throat business indefinitely. Federation cannot be accepted on these terms. It would be quite useless to attempt to get Victoria to agree to it. We came here for the purpose of federating and endeavoring to bring about, a fair tariff. I am aware that people residing in these localities get the benefit of the present ruinous competition but the Governments are now losing heavily, and it is time this warfare was stopped. The proposal in this clause is almost identical with the words used by Mr. Eddy before the Finance Committee; but it is in direct antagonism to the finding of the Committee, and I am much astonished to see a resolution drafted which was not only condemned by the Finance Committee, but was positively vetoed by them. I point out that the distance between Melbourne and Sydney is 574 miles. There might be a dividing line at say 300 miles, the traffic from that to be carried at the same rate per mile in both colonies. If this was done the inequalities now apparent would at once disappear. If this plan is not given effect to, the present deplorable state of things—undue competition—will be intensified rather than diminished.

Dr. QUICK: This clause is undoubtedly one of the most important parts of the financial clauses of this Bill, and I think it is desirable that any doubt or ambiguity which may exist as to its possible effect should be removed before it is accepted. I have been carefully considering the effect of clause 95 coupled with clause 92, and have been consulting with some members of the Convention, including several members of the Drafting Committee, as to its effect. They seem to agree that it is desirable that cut-throat railway competition should be stopped by this Bill, and the only question for us to consider now is whether this clause will have that effect. Some of my hon. friends from New South Wales seem to draw a distinction between preferential railway rates and differential railway rates, but I submit that railway rates which may be called differential in their form and design, through being carried to the extreme may become preferential in their effect. I want to know whether these differential rates carried to the extreme would be covered by this Bill? If so I would he quite satisfied. I would invite the attention of hon. members to a very able paper written by Mr. Forsyth, of New South Wales, in which he illustrates the effect of differential railway rates. He says:

Now, so long as differential rates are permitted on the railways, this destructive competition can be as easily carried on under cover of a railway tariff as a Customs tariff. Some of the differential rates at present in force amount to over 100 per cent. Take as an illustration the freight of greasy wool on the western and southern lines: Bourke to Sydney (or wool from to the south and west of Bourke), 1-37d. per ton per mile; Dubbo to Sydney, 2-96d. per ton per mile; Bathurst to Sydney, 3-64d. per ton per mile; Hay to Sydney, 1-69d. per ton per mile; Junee to Sydney, 2-91d. per ton per mile; and Goulburn to Sydney 3-7d. per ton per mile. This shows that the differential rates required to compete with the Darling River traffic and the Victorian railways are more than 100 per cent below the general wool rates. A similar difference exists in the wool freights in the Albury, Quirindi, Jennings, and Narrabri districts. The differential rates on outward freights for ordinary merchandise from Sydney to competing districts are not so great as the inward freights; but they are more than 50 per cent. below the mileage rates, and together with the inwards rates cause a great reduction in the railway revenue, or what is equally bad, cause the general rates to be increased to make up the lose on the differential ones. Perhaps nothing shown the unfairness of differential rates more-whether intended to have this effect or not -than that they protect the trade of Sydney at the expense of the inland towns, as under the maximum rate a truck load of goods to Bourke is charged the same amount of freight from Bat.

I submit that these differential rates may be carried on in the name and form of differential rates, with the result that they become preferential in their effect.

Mr. BARTON:

That is an additional reason for the appointment of this Commission.

Dr. QUICK: I want to be satisfied that this clause will prevent that. So far as Victoria is concerned, I am quite willing that the system of carrying goods from Echuca to Melbourne at one rate and from Riverina to Melbourne at a reduced rate should cease, but it must be conditionally that Now South Wales and South Australia will not put on it differential rate so tapering and attenuated in its form and shape that it becomes a preferential railway rate. I want to know whether, if we carry this clause in its present shape, it will prevent New South Wales from adopting these differential rates, so tapering and attenuated in their form as practically to draw away trade that under normal conditions would gravitate to Melbourne. I want to see all doubts removed by this section.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

It cannot be more liberal than it is.

Dr. QUICK: I am not so doubtful as some of my hon. friends are, but if we are agreed on the principle that differential and preferential railway rates should cease, then we ought to remove all doubts by putting in words to express it. Then we will be satisfied.

Mr. TRENWITH:

The difficulty about this clause is two-fold. First of all it does not appear to be quite clear as to what we desire. Then there seems to be some doubt as to what is provided in this clause. The Hon. the Premier of New South Wales in dealing with this question uses language that we must all approve if we could be quite clear as to what he meant. He said, for instance:

What we want is to deal justly in connection with the railway rates.

We admit that that is an abstract proposition from which none of us can dissent, but we are not quite clear as to what is in the hon. gentleman's mind as to what is justice in this connection. Again, the Hon. the Premier of New South Wales said:

Can we imagine an Inter-State Commission composed, as it is, must be, of able and eminent men, giving anything but a just decision?

The Commission will be an arbitration board on these questions, but it all depends upon the way things go before the arbitrators as to what their verdict will be. This clause provides for the submission of proposals which will prevent railway rates of such a character as will nullify our decision that trade between the colonies should be absolutely free. There is just a possible doubt about that. The language of the clause is this:

The Commission shall have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary for its purposes, and as the Parliament may from time to time determine; but shall have no powers in reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect, and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State.

The question is whether under this clause railway rates that were fair and equitable would, from the geographical conditions of neighboring States, or a portion of a neighboring State, naturally gravitate from the railways of that State to the railways of its nearest neighbor. Take the Riverina district, which the hon. the Premier of New South Wales has described as having been hypothecated by clever Victorian merchants. He said that by our enterprise we took possession of this traffic. and that New South Wales was now only endeavoring to get back its own. May I, with all respect, suggest to him that this traffic was created by Victoria, and although it is situated in New South Wales territory, it was practically Victorian money and enterprise that developed it.

Mr. REID:

Surely the soil that produced it should, have some say in the matter.

Mr. TRENWITH:
The question is: Is it federal or anti-federal to make such provision as will draw the trade away 100 miles from its natural port instead of allowing it to gravitate 200 miles to Melbourne, and whether under this clause it is possible for New South Wales to create differential rates of such a character as to make it more preferable to send goods from Riverina-400 miles to Sydney, rather than 200 miles to Melbourne? While it is quite right that New South Wales should have all the advantages of exceptional natural circumstances, it would be extremely anti-federal and contrary to the spirit of this Constitution throughout if they were able to make regulations with reference to one district within their own borders which would have the effect of drawing to Sydney trade which, without this regulation, would certainly go to some other port. I want to know whether it will be possible on the line to Corowa to provide a rate of carriage for 400 miles to Sydney lower than the carriage in some other direction in New South Wales for 200 miles.

Mr. GLYNN:
Not unless you have a uniform reduction in all the rates.

Mr. TRENWITH:
That is what I wish to know.

Mr. REID:
One colony might push the tariff up in order to compel another colony to do likewise.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I think it would be absurd to assume that the Inter-State Commission, or any authority, would render it imperative that all colonies should have uniform rates, because there are so many varying conditions, but it would be equally absurd, if we want intercolonial freetrade, that one State could on one line in its own territory have a rate altogether out of accord with the rates on other lines, because it happened that that party could be better served by another colony.

Mr. REID:
That would be a preferential rate.

Mr. WISE:
Would the Inter-State Commission allow it?

Mr. TRENWITH:
The point in my mind is that the clause is evidently not sufficiently clear to convey adequately and beyond all doubt what is the intention of the Convention, and something should be done to make it indisputable. As Dr. QUICK put it, differential rates should not be so constructed as to become in their operation preferential rates and to act in a manner detrimental either to the interests of the producer or to the interests of the railways of it neighboring State.

Mr. REID The Convention knows the position in which I am placed. There is clause 69, in which I believe there may be some attempt to make it compulsory that the Commonwealth should take over the debts of the States. I wish to point out that that will completely upset the arrangements that have been arrived at, and I shall be compelled to repudiate them if this is carried. Under these circumstances it is of great consequence that this matter should be decided before I go. It is only a reasonable remark to make, as I should like to vote on such an issue, which in of vital importance to the whole movement. I hope some friendly arrangement can be made by which this clause can be postponed until after the consideration of clause 96. I look upon the matter I have referred to as the only vital matter left, and I should like to be here when it is decided.

Mr. BARTON:

If it meets the wish of the Convention, I will move:

That clauses 86, 92, 93, 94, and 95 be postponed until after the consideration of clause 96.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Clause 96-The Parliament may, with the consent of the Parliament of any State, take over the whole or any part of the public debt of the State, and the State shall be liable to indemnify the Commonwealth in respect of the amount of the debt taken over, and thereafter the amount of interest payable in respect of the debt shall be deducted and retained from time to time from the share of the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth which would otherwise be payable to the State, or if there be no surplus revenue payable, or if such surplus revenue be insufficient, then the amount shall be charged to the State wholly or in part. Upon any conversion or renewal of the loan representing the debt any benefit or advantage in interest or otherwise arising therefrom shall be applied to the reduction of the debt.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I should like to make an explanation. It is possible there may be some misapprehension as to the meaning of the Finance Committee in the drafting of this clause. Some say it exactly represents what they thought was intended; others say it does not. The whole thing now is open for discussion, and if any mistake has been made it can be rectified.

Mr. REID: The only thing is whether it was necessary to get the consent of all the States to taking over the debt of one State. Is not that it? I

Mr. DEAKIN:

It does not say so.
Mr. REID:

It was only the question of consent.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I think Mr. Reid ought to say what he has to say on this clause.

Mr. REID:

I have nothing to say if no proposition is made to alter the clause by making it compulsory to take over these debts. So long as no proposition is made I have nothing to say.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I quite understood Mr. Walker would move an amendment of which he has given notice, a very important motion, which would open up discussion and is of considerable importance, and has great bearing on the whole financial problem.

Mr. WALKER:

I gave notice of an amendment to this clause, but a prior notice with regard to the railways having been negatived I could not ask that it be proceeded with. It was contingent on another one. However, if it is the wish of the House, I shall be happy to move it.

Mr. REID:

There is no necessity to move it, then.

Mr. WALKER:

Out of regard for the Premier of New South Wales I wish to hasten the business. When I came to this Convention I thought I might have had the honor of a place on the Financial Committee.

Mr. REID:

So you should.

Mr. WALKER:

I have listened to the explanation by the Treasurers of their plan, and I hope it will turn out as satisfactorily as they suppose. I shall reserve my right to move in the matter at the second sitting of the Convention, four months hence.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I have every desire to expedite the departure of my friend the Premier of New South Wales, and I will not detain the Convention. This is an important matter, and provides something which is unwise. My own personal view is that it should he made compulsory on the Federal Government to take over all the debts, and deal with the whole question. However, in view of the position taken up by the Premier of Now South Wales, I do not feel inclined to press that very strongly, because he has said that, while he was prepared to agree to the scheme we have adopted in connection with financial matters, he cannot see his way clear to agree to have it compulsory on the Federal Parliament to take over the debts of the States. Therefore, although I think it would be wise to compel the Parliament to take over the debts, I do not feel justified in pressing my views to a division on the matter. Parliament may, however, take over all or part of the debts of any State with the consent of that State. I think that is very unwise. I do not think they should take over the debts of one or two or three States.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Or a proportion.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No; I do not believe in proportion. It would be impossible to say which they should take over—the short dates, or the long dates. I simply say that if we are to give the Federal Parliament power to take over the debts, let it be the power to take over all the debts at the time the transaction is carried out. Otherwise, I think that if the debts of one State are taken over there will be a reduction of interest, or else they will be worth more because they belong to the Commonwealth, and this will give an advantage over the debts which are not taken over. If the clause is so amended so as to make it optional to take over the debts of the States, then I will not object.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I have always had a very strong feeling that the Commonwealth should take over all debts. I agree with Sir George Turner, that it is a very inexpedient thing to leave to the Commonwealth the power to traffic with the different States in respect of their debts. I can understand that it would have the effect of putting the State in a position of advantage that it is not entitled to. This is not a matter to be dealt with piecemeal at all. It may be a matter which the House ought to consider whether or not we do not think it would be a proper basis of this Federation. in spite of the difficulties which Mr. Reid feels at the present moment, that we should make some provision for taking over the debts.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:

Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

We all know what we are doing. We are handing over to the Commonwealth a large revenue with a certain surplus. We are surrounding it with wise provisions, and we are thinking over preventing the inconvenience that the different Treasurers may find will result from what has been done, but at the same time the Commonwealth actually gets possession of the money and the physical control of it, and, although they may have the responsibility, we all know, in instances of this kind, that responsibility does not always mean a performance and a due observance of this responsibility. If the debts had been taken over there would not be any of the trouble in connection with the matter, and it would have been an immense strengthening of the Commonwealth. No one who is wanting the Commonwealth to be powerful and strong could have urged any method which could have attained his wish better. Its position would then become pre-eminent because by the very extent of its liabilities it would, as a matter of course, be entitled to the right to have corresponding obligations recognised by all the colonies. Leaving out for the moment all question of the benefits that might flow ultimately from the debts being consolidated, and the Commonwealth instead of the States be-becoming the debtor, the mere fact that the Commonwealth represented the whole of liabilities of Australia would make the Commonwealth a power throughout every State in Australia, and give it the right to levy taxation-which would be necessary in order to enable it to pay the interest that would have to be paid--and would dignify and establish the Commonwealth in a way which could obtain in no other way. I feel, of course, there is something to be said on the other side, and I do not want to say everything that can be said-I do not think it is wise-on the other side. I believe that ultimately the Commonwealth will have to take over the debts. In this power that is given the inevitable result will be that the Commonwealth will take over the debts.

Mr. BARTON:

In due time.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Yes; I feel myself reluctant to do anything that would cause Mr. Reid any personal inconvenience, and make his position with regard to the future of Federation difficult. Still I think it would be well if we struck out some words.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I have sketched out some alterations, which would make the clause read:

The Parliament may take over the whole of the public debts of the States at the establishment of the Commonwealth, and the States respectively shall indemnify the Commonwealth in respect of the amount of the debt taken over, and thereafter the amount of interest payable in respect of the debts shall be deducted and retained from time to time from the respective shares of the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth which would otherwise be payable to the States, or if there be no surplus revenue payable, or if such surplus revenue be insufficient, then the amount shall be charged to the respective States wholly or in part. Upon any conversion or renewal of the loans respectively representing the debts, any benefit or advantage in interest or otherwise arising therefrom shall be applied to the reduction of such debts.

Mr BARTON:
Without the consent of the States?

Mr. FRASER:
That is all very well; but you must say that the debts taken over are the present debts. It will not be proper or fair to allow that the debts five years hence—which may be increased perhaps £20,000,000 by one colony and not by another—should be taken over likewise.

Mr. SYMON:
This is not wholesale.

Mr. FRASER:
It would be better to make the present debts the debts to be taken over.

Mr. GLYNN:
After the debts are taken over they will have to borrow through the Federal Parliament.

Mr. FRASER:
You must draw a line somewhere, or there will be a danger of colonies becoming unduly extravagant. We had better confine ourselves to the clause in the 1891 Bill, which says:
Subject to the consent of all the colonial Parliaments.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Then any one House can block the whole thing being done.

Mr. FRASER:
But there is a great danger of log-rolling, and all sorts of evils.

Mr. BARTON:
They might be good terms as to five States and bad as to the sixth, which would have a right to resist them.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
The essential difference between those who desire to make this compulsory and those who desire to make it not compulsory on the States, and at the option with regard to time of the Federal Parliament, is that the Federal Parliament, by taking its own time, if there is any policy of conversion, may be able to get much better terms for the debts of a colony than if it was made compulsory now and its securities rose very much in the English markets.

Mr. FRASER:
There is no danger in that case. They will not part with their debentures until the due dates.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I am not going into details, but there is no doubt that it is far better as a financial arrangement to give the Parliament of the Federation power to do this, leaving it to make all arrangements which will be most favorable to our securities.

Mr. FRASER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I quite see the difficulty that if you have to negotiate with each State one State may block the whole policy. Personally I am quite willing to agree to Sir George Turner's amendment, and think it would be far better in the interests of our securities than any immediate arrangement.

Mr. DEAKIN:
In 1891 I was in favor of the taking over all the State debts by the Commonwealth, and I still hold the same opinion. At the same time it presents itself to me as only one portion of a much larger financial transaction, because with it you are faced with the question of the assets and another difficult question—the regulation of future State borrowings, and the control, if any, which the commonwealth should exercise over them.

Mr. REID:
Without that control they might enter upon a new career of reckless borrowing, having got rid of their old debts.

Mr. DEAKIN:
But I feel that not only out of consideration for Mr. Reid, but on account of the perplexity of the subject, which would require to be dealt with as a whole, including the questions of assets and future borrowings, and other conditions, we are bound to accept at the present time and at this stage of this Convention some such tentative proposal as Sir John Downer alluded to. But I hesitate to accept the amendment proposed by Sir George Turner. The first part of his amendment is the proposal that the Commonwealth shall have the power to take over the debts without the consent of the States. There I am inclined to agree with him, but when he goes a step further, and says you must take all the debts or none—

Mr. SYMON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Then surely he is seeking to impose too great a restriction upon the Federal Parliament and the Federal Government. It seems to me that unless a very large policy is entered upon it will be impossible for the Commonwealth to take over the whole of the debts at once, and yet it might be desirable for it to take over apart of them.

Mr. SYMON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. DEAKIN:

It is suggested that the same proportion of debt in each State should be taken over say, per capita. I could understand that being advisable, but I cannot attempt, nor can any hon. member attempt, to forecast all the circumstances under which variations of this proposal may or may not become advisable. Under these circumstances it appears to me we ought to trust the Federal Parliament to the utmost. Possibly we ought to enable it to deal singly with any one State, to take certain proportions of its debts, or all its debts, or all the debts of all the States. There are dangers which will have to be considered in connection with these matters, but which we cannot hope to decide here. It seems to me that my hon. friend has added a certain restriction which, equitable as it may appear under present circumstances may become, by the action of the States themselves, utterly inequitable in the future. It is just possible that some State will plunge heavily and borrow enormously.

Mr. FRASER:

Where would they get the money from?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Then the Commonwealth would not take over any part.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I do not think there will be difficulty in any of the Australian Colonies obtaining any reasonable sum they may ask. And yet they might disturb the balance, so that, although you have a permanent debit against that State, for all the interest paid on its behalf you would still have difficulties in the way. I do not pretend to say what distinctions should be made, but I object to any tying of the hands of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. WISE:

May I suggest that the object of the Premier of Victoria maybe attained by adopting these words:

The Parliament may make laws for taking over and consolidating the whole, or any part of the public debt of any State or States.

What more is wanted than that?

HON. MEMBERS: That is the same thing.

Mr. WISE:

It is the same thing, but it is put in five words instead of ten. That makes it very short, but it is exactly what Sir George Turner does not want.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I want the whole or none taken over.

Mr. WISE:
I submit at all events, if they are going to stand by the clause, that it is very clumsy as it stands, and that it could be improved by the adoption of what I suggest. If the clause is passed in this way we will be able to understand it.

Mr. SYMON:
I am not going to enter into a discussion as to the desirability or otherwise of taking over the public debts of the States, or as to whether it should be done under the provisions of the Constitution, or be left till later. So far as I understand the position, there is a consensus of opinion that it is undesirable either to include it in the Constitution or make it compulsory on Parliament. It is suggested that it should be made necessary to obtain the consent of the other States before taking over the debt of a State. I shall follow in the footsteps of Mr. Deakin. I think it is undesirable, if we simply vest the power in the Commonwealth, that it should be obligatory on the Commonwealth to get the sanction of the States. Sir George Turner wishes to limit the power of the Commonwealth to taking over all the debts. My hon. friend Mr. Wise will achieve his purpose and shorten the clause very much by not putting in "that the Parliament may make laws," but by leaving it simply in this way:

That the Parliament may take over the whole or part of the debt of any State.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I think my hon. friend rather misunderstood Mr. Deakin after all, because Mr. Deakin did not, as I understood him, say that the Parliament ought to be allowed to pick and choose amongst the various States, and to say where they think this is worth taking, "We will take it," and where it is not worth taking, "We will not take that." What Mr. Deakin said was that he did not want to compel the Commonwealth to take over the whole of the debts, but that he would allow them to take over an equal proportion of all the debts of the States, treating them alike, and in that instance he would dispense with their consent.

Mr. GLYNN:
That is not his meaning.

Mr. SYMON:
That is not what he said, it may be what he intended.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is what I understood he said. However, I would agree either to the proposal which Sir George Turner makes, or to the modified proposal which I think Mr. Deakin intended, whether he said it or not. But to allow the Commonwealth to say to one colony, "Your debt is not good enough, we will not take yours," and to another colony, "Your debt is good enough, we will take yours," and to please itself about it, would be simply intolerable.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It would never do.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

It would be a source of constant disruption and unpleasantness between the States and the Commonwealth, and would work out exceedingly badly in the future. I would suggest to Sir George Turner that he might amend his amendment by saying that the Federal Parliament might take over the whole of the debts of the States, or something less than the whole, being a proportionate part of all, so that all may be treated alike.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It would be better to take over the whole of the debts of the establishment of the Commonwealth. I think that is the wiser course.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

There is no doubt about it, and that is what they will have to do.

Mr. FRASER:

To my mind, the proper thing to do is to take over the whole of the debts or an equivalent part of the debts of each State, with the whole of the States' consent. If you get the whole of the States' consent, then undoubtedly it would be a legitimate and proper thing to take over the whole or a proportionate part of their public debts, so long as the part is fairly proportionate to the whole. If you do not confine yourself to that view you will be adopting a course which will create any amount of bickering between the States and the Federal Parliament hereafter. Another view is that you can take over the whole of the debts, except the debts which have been created through the extension of railways. It will be a very proper thing to my mind to leave the debts created by the construction of railways to the States themselves. The interest on a railway debt is paid by the net results from the lines, and the colonies are able to pay their debts.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I think that unless the debts are taken over as a whole the clause bad better remain as it stands. I think it would be unfair to give the Federal Parliament power to go to a State and say, "We are going to take over 30 or 40 per cent. of your debt." You must either keep the clause as it is, requiring the consent of the State for the whole or part of its debt being taken over, or if you are going to give full power to the Federal Parliament to take over the debt at its own option, it must be the whole debt. I do not think it would be fair to give power to the Federal Parliament to deal piecemeal with these debts, unless you put it on some certain principle.

Mr. DEAKIN:
So much per head.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Unless you put it on the principle of simply covering the surplus revenue with the interest capitalised.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
This is it varying amount, you know.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
It would be far better, on the whole, to make the taking over of the debt subject only to the consent of the States, and then let the Federal Parliament deal with it on a reasonable and scientific principle. I ask Sir George Turner whether, on the whole, taking everything into consideration, it would not be better to leave the clause as it is. I think this would be a, more satisfactory way of carrying out the principles we have adopted, to say that we should not interfere unnecessarily with anything connected with the State. It may be said that the public would contend that this is a matter of local concern, and there is no doubt that when the question of debts of the States comes before Parliament the question of the consolidation of the railways may also come before it, and the time for dealing with this in a large and comprehensive way will be when these various questions, which have not been absolutely remitted to them, but which they have the power to deal with, are before the Federal Parliament. I am inclined to think that the safest and best plan will be to retain the clause as it stands.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I do not think we are called upon at present to decide in this Convention whether the whole of the debts ought to be taken over or only a proportion of them. The question we have to decide is whether we ought to tie the hands of the Federal Parliament so that it cannot take over anything less than the whole. Sir John Downer has shown that there can be no picking or choosing in this matter. But then the proposal of Mr. Deakin is that you ought at least to give the Federal Parliament power to take over a ratable proportion per capita from all the States at the same time, and I can see no objection to that if the Federal Parliament sees fit. I therefore hope that the clause will be made to read thus:

The Parliament may, with the consent of the Parliament of any State, take over any ratable proportion of the public debts of the States in proportion to the population.

It would accord with the growing feeling, of which I happen to be aware, that there should be an application of the surplus—as soon as we have ascertained how much it is likely to be—to the payment direct to our creditors of a ratable portion of the interest, which the surplus would be sufficient to cover. I think it would mean—and expert financiers will correct me if I am wrong—that it will greatly reduce the cost of paying the interest in London, and will make other savings. During the debate there has been scarcely any reference made to the point that if the debts are taken over there should be some restriction on the amount of borrowing.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I referred to it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I shall not go into this large question now, but at the very least, if the Federation does take over the whole or any part of the debts, it ought to be able to impose terms and conditions to prevent the States borrowing beyond a certain sum without the sanction of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN:
You must take over the assets.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I have not mixed up this matter with the question of assets at all. I am strongly as anyone in favor of taking over the railways, but I do not wish to deal with that subject now. Anyone looking at the question carefully will see that there is no necessary connection between the taking over of the assets and the taking over of the public debts. Supposing the Federal Parliament takes over the whole or any part of the debts, it would never do to allow the State to go on borrowing on the security of the assets which the Federation has to look to for its own indemnification. It would therefore be a fair thing to give the federal authority power to take over the whole or any part of the public debts on such terms and conditions as it thinks fit.

Mr. HOLDER:
The security of the Commonwealth would be their Customs and excise duties.

Mr. HIGGINS:
But supposing they had no other security, and the State wanted to go on borrowing ad libitum?

Mr. HOLDER:
It would borrow on its own assets.

Mr. HIGGINS:
On the faith merely of its revenue. We do not borrow on the security of any definite assets, but, at the same time, when the Federation accepts the primary liability to the English creditors it should be able to insist on terms and conditions before taking over the debt, and of course if terms and conditions are imposed it ought not be allowed to take over the debts without the consent of the individual State. However, sir I would like to offer as a suggestion to my friend Sir George Turner, who has moved the amendment, that he should add words to carry out what Mr. Deakin suggests, such as:

A ratable proportion of the public debts on such terms and conditions as the Federation thinks fit.

I do think that it would be important to give the power to the Federation, and also the power to impose terms and conditions in regard to future borrowings.

Mr. KINGSTON:

It would be a mistake to try to specify the precise terms on which these debts should be taken over, and therefore I sympathise with the suggestion that the latter part should be struck out, and the term might be left for adjustment to the time when the occasion for taking over the debt crops up. I sympathise with what has fallen from Mr. Fraser with regard to the propriety of taking every care to prevent this power being abused, and I think when we recollect the present debts of the colonies are £170,000,000 or £180,000,000 we cannot be too careful. I would suggest that a power of this sort ought not to be exercised without the consent of all the States. There is no doubt that as a general rule it may be put that there is the Federal Parliament representing the Commonwealth generally, and that nothing unfair is likely to be done to the advantage of one State or prejudice of another, but it does seem to me that when you open up a field like this for financial operation—a field of £180,000,000—we should be more than ordinarily careful, for it is possible that an arrangement might be made to secure a majority both in the Senate and House of Representatives which, in connection with a matter of this sort, might be unfair to an opposing and powerless minority. Therefore we should make the clause read as follows:

The Parliament may, with the consent of the States, take over the whole or any part of the public debt of all or any of the States.

By carrying the clause in a form such as that you will give the ampest power to the Federal Parliament to make any arrangements, and at the same time, by requiring the consent of all the Parliaments, you will provide against any possible abuse of this large power which in its exercise is likely to be attended by abuse, unless most carefully guarded.

Mr. DOBSON:

I think it would be a calamity if the Convention settled this without a division, because not only is this an important point to the Convention, but it is perhaps the most important part of the Bill to the people of Australia, seeing that the candidates for this Convention, both the successful and and the defeated, as well as the newspapers, held up to the people what we would gain in the rate of interest if the debts were consolidated. I hope Sir George. Turner's amendment. will be carried, not making the consent of the State necessary. This is one of those operations which must be performed at the right moment, and you must take the advice of your bankers and advisers in England, and it would be monstrous if we had to consult fourteen different Houses of Parliament where not only one State could stop it, but one single man in either House could stop the operation.

Mr. KINGSTON:

One man?

Mr. DOBSON:

One single man in any colony by voting against it can stop the Federal Parliament taking over the debts of that colony. The amendment striking out "or any part of the debts" should not be carried. I was particularly struck with the remarks of Mr. Higgins, and I often have wished that in our Constitution Acts there was that short provision in the American Act.

That the borrowing powers of each State should be limited.

I have had the temerity to suggest that extravagance is committed by the democrats, and the right to borrow unlimited sums is a power which you would give to the House which has uncontrolled financial powers; and then you talk about doing away with deadlocks. My objection to many democratic measures would cease, or I would give way with better grace, if we had in the our Constitution a provision preventing any Government, whether Federal or State, borrowing any sum far out of proportion to its assets and revenue. I should like to check the extravagance both of my liberal and democratic friends in this relation. In. reference to the remarks of Mr. Fraser, I would ask him not to be too confident as to what the London market will do in buying up our debentures. At the present time New Zealand is converting £100 1914 debentures for which she is paying £121. I believe that the New Zealand Government will, however, only make a small profit, as she has to provide a sinking fund. Sir Philip Fysh may be right after all, and if we could save 1/4 per cent. throughout the whole of Australia that would be a considerable gain. In regard to the latter portion of the clause, I think it should be struck out. All our people are looking forward to the saving in interest as part of the gain or recompense for the loss we have to pay for federal government. It is doubtful under this cumbersome and expensive Constitution if Tasmania—which has the desire—will have the power to enter the Federation, and therefore it is not helping us over that stile. Another objection to the clause is that some of the States—Tasmania I know—have a sinking fund. We have a small one of our own, and we do not want to be saddled with two sinking funds. I hope before Mr. Reid goes we shall have a division upon it.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not want to detain my hon. friend, who is anxious to catch his train. I would like the Convention to consider a little before it passes this clause, the question of enabling the Parliament to take over the debts without the consent of the States. I was rather in favor of the Constitution providing for the taking over of the debts of the States. The financial provisions which have been arrived at by the Premiers of the various colonies and adopted by this Committee could not, I take it, have been arrived at if this Constitution now provided that at once the debts as a matter of necessity could be taken over. If that had been the provision, there would have been something arranged in the Constitution as to the terms and conditions as a matter of principle on which they should be taken over. But if that is to be left out, then the terms, conditions, and principles would, unless the consent of the Parliament is obtained, be entirely in the hands of the Parliament of the Commonwealth. I have not been in favor of tying the hands of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, but in a matter of this kind there is a good deal to be said in favor of obtaining the consent of the States as to the terms on which the debts shall be taken over, in the same way as we should obtain the consent of the States as to taking over the railways or other properties. I can see a difficulty. One can easily imagine a combination of States taking place by which a majority of the States would derive an advantage by taking over the debts, and these terms might be such as to inflict great financial loss on the other States.

Mr. DOBSON: Could that be done?

Mr. BARTON:

I do not say it could, but I think it might. One sort of terms and conditions might suit one class or colonies but not another. Take it this way. Suppose the debts and the railways were taken over. It is possible to imagine that the terms on which they might be taken over would be simply the amount involved in the construction of the railways. Another principle might be to take them over on the basis of so many years' purchase. Now between two large colonies you might have a difference of £14,000,000 or £15,000,000.
Mr. DOBSON:
You cannot suppose such an inequitable mode.

Mr. BARTON:
I think a clause might be inserted empowering the Commonwealth at a certain time, with the consent of the States, to take over the railways, but if it is right-looking at the close connection there is between the debts and the assets representing those debts—take over the debts without consent, then it would be equally right to take over the railways without consent; but if the Convention is of the opinion that the railways should not be taken over without the consent of the States, then the two things are so inter-woven that it is hard to resist the conclusion that the debts should not be taken over without the consent of the States. It is almost impossible to resist the conclusion that the two things should be treated on the same principle. The taking of them over is so much a matter of conditions and terms that the conditions and terms should be arranged with the consent of the States involved. It is easy to imagine a combination of States which would regard the taking over of the debts on a certain principle as fair and just, but though it might be of considerable advantage to those States to have them taken over in that way, other colonies might be of the opinion that the principle on which it was proposed to take them over would be against their interests. Of course, I agree fully that the Parliament we are about to create ought not to have its hands tied, but I believe if we were to provide that the debts should be immediately taken over we would need to lay down terms, conditions, and principles as to how they should be taken over. Then the States represented here would-be parties to those principles. But if we are to leave it over, and allow the Parliament of the Commonwealth to take them over without consent, then the principle which should regulate the transaction would be lost.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Would you have the whole of the States consent to the taking over of the whole or any portion of the debts?

Mr. BARTON:
No; I do not think it would be quite necessary to have the consent of the whole of the States. But I do not think the debt of any one State should be dealt with without its consent. But perhaps it would be desirable to provide for the consent of the whole of the States, as was done in the 1891 Bill. If not, then it would be a very unfair thing to say that a plan could be agreed upon in the future in the Parliament by which the interest of a State, or of two States, might be entirely ignored, according to their way of thinking, and be carried out very much to their loss, and possibly to a disastrous
Mr. HIGGINS:
I thought you were against taking over one and not another?

Mr. BARTON:
If a transfer takes place it should take place altogether, and therefore with the consent of all the States.

Mr. FRASER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:
But if the Constitution provides for dealing with matters in a different way from that, still, as regards any State concerned, its own consent ought to be obtained to the transfer in the future. Thus if we were making a provision now for immediate operation we should have to require the consent of that State and its people in taking this Bill, because in taking this Bill by the referendum they will decide for themselves whether the provisions in it are equitable in their judgment or not. They would have to take such a principle as this into grave consideration. But it is quite conceivable that if such a proposal as is in Sir George Turner's amendment were submitted to the will of the colonies it would be found entirely objectionable. We have to look at this matter in this way: that we are entitled now to exercise our will about this matter, and to withhold our consent if we think fit, and, further, we should do so, unless the principle on which these things were to be done were clearly laid down for an immediate transfer. Therefore, is it not advisable to retain as much of that principle as possible, in order that there might be a general consent of the States? One of the State's debts perhaps might be taken over at one time and one at another, but I would much prefer one transfer with the consent of the whole of the States. I should like to suggest to Sir George Turner that the amendment in its present form would not be sufficient to provide for conversion, or consolidation, or renewal. There is a subsequent part of the amendment indicating that it is intended to give such a power. It would be better to insert words in the earlier part of the amendment, so as to give, in addition to that power to take over, power to convert, consolidate, and renew.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I do not see any necessity for it. Once you take the debts over, you have power to convert or consolidate.

Mr. BARTON:
In making an ovation between the lender and the person who is the debtor, supposing that the debt is transferred, in ordinary cases the borrower is entitled to be consulted before there is a new contract with him. I am not, particular its to the form of words; but I think if this provision is to be effective it ought to be made clear that there is all ovation between the Commonwealth taking over the debts and the lender who owns the bonds.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I will adopt the words.

Mr. HENRY:

I merely rise for the purpose of saying that, in my opinion, it would be the simplest way of adjusting and making safe the finances of the States and the Federation by taking over the public debts. I believe it would answer a very important purpose in securing a considerable reduction of our burden. Seeing, however, that we have adopted certain financial arrangements which make our State finances safe, I am content to join with those who will leave these questions to the Federal Parliament. I certainly think it would be much wiser to leave the federal power to arrange with any particular State, and not make it compulsory for the whole to be consolidated at the same time, its proposed by Sir George Turner. Neither do I think it an improvement to adopt the suggestion of Mr. Kingston and require the consent of every State. It is wiser to leave the whole thing in the hands of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID:

One State might, by some means, make better terms than others.

Mr. HENRY:

Quite so. There might be log-rolling. It will be wiser to give the Federal Parliament power to make arrangements with any State as circumstances arise, relying on the judgment and the good faith of the Federal Parliament to see that no injustice is done to any particular State by any arrangement with regard to a portion of the public debt. I call see that it will always be it question for the Federal Parliament in future borrowing, as well as in dealing with the existing public debts, as to what surplus revenue the States will have. It will depend entirely on the population and prosperity of a State as to whether it would be justified in going to the Federal Parliament and asking power to borrow for particular public works. These are things which it is impossible for the Convention to enter into and determine. The less we attempt to tie the hands of the Federal Parliament by trying to make terms for States whose conditions we cannot possibly know the better. There is a great deal to be said in reference to the whole question of future borrowing by the States. I think there is a very important distinction between the conditions of the Australian States seeking Federation and the United States. As we all know, we have in the past, and we must in the future, borrow largely for public works such as railways. No such necessity arose in the United States, and I cannot see how it would be safe to attempt to tie the hands of the States in the matter of future borrowing for the development of their lands and industries. Where we have to borrow, we must borrow for public works. Of course, I admit that if a State desires in the future to get the benefit of cheaper borrowing, it will naturally seek power from the Federal Government, and the Federal Government will raise the money for any State purposes. But that will depend on the Federal Parliament, and will be governed by the prosperity and population of the State, and as the States progress so will they go to the Federal Parliament and ask for financial aid.

Mr. HIGGINS: Would you allow the Federal Parliament to fix terms and conditions?

Mr. HENRY: I fail to see how it is possible for this Convention to determine what the borrowing power of the Federal Parliament shall be. If a State seeks the aid of the Federal Parliament to secure more advantageous terms in the money market, then it rests with the Federal Parliament to decide, but I would not debar States from borrowing on their own revenue. It is not the assets, so called, such as railways, &c., that are the assets against the public borrowing. It is the revenues of the colony and the willingness and ability of the people to pay taxation that are the real assets. But that is beside the question. In reference to the clause under our notice, I hope that the suggestion of Mr. Barton will be adopted, and that Sir George Turner may see that it is wiser for the States to be consulted before any portion of their public debt is taken over, and for the Federal Parliament to be allowed to take over the debt of any one State.

Mr. HOLDER: This is one of the most important questions we have discussed, and is important enough to deserve much more time being devoted to its consideration than we can bestow upon it now. There are four points to which I would direct attention, and I shall do so very briefly. The first is that we have an alternative presented to us as soon as we look at this question, that alternative being whether we shall declare in this Constitution from its coming into operation that the Commonwealth shall be responsible for the interest and principal of the public debts, or whether we shall empower the Federal Parliament to make arrangements to take over such of the debts as it may think wise. I have been astonished during the debates in this Convention to hear members advocating the former of these two plans. I want to put it as briefly as I possibly can, that to put a provision in this Constitution that upon its coming into operation the Federal Government shall be responsible for the interest and principal of the public debts of the various States, is simply to make an enormous present amounting to millions sterling, for the effect would be to raise the value of all outstanding stock or bonds by probably 2 per cent. to the bonded stockholders, and to throw away the only advantage that the federal authority in future may hope to bargain for to the profit of the States on this question of conversion. And if there be anything in conversion, as I believe there is, it must depend upon the Federal Treasurer of the future being able to say to the bondholders, "If you like to surrender your bonds of one colony for this new stock having behind it the security of the whole Commonwealth, then we are prepared to negotiate." So I hope we shall hear no more whatever of the suggestion which some have made that the Bill should operate to make the Federation take over the whole of the responsibility as soon as it becomes law. The next point I come to is as to whether we should so provide that the surplus likely to be gained by each State should be balanced by the annual value of the debts taken over. Anyone upon looking at the matter will see that it amounts to a permanent endowment of the States by the Commonwealth. Suppose that South Australia has to receive half a million sterling per annum of the returned surplus. If the Commonwealth takes over the public debt, the interest on which would amount to half a million, it could never throw back any portion of that debt. It would practically be taken over for all time, and the Commonwealth would have to endow South Australia to the tune of half a million a year. That is saying with a vengeance what the federal tariff of the future should be. This is a very great question. Are we prepared to tie the hands of our successors for generations to come in that sort of fashion? The next point is as to the products of conversion. Besides the advantage and the benefits accruing from the exchange of local stocks for federal stocks, the question of the fall of the price of money at the time the exchange is made is also an important factor. Of course, the interest now is much lower than when the debts were incurred, and we cannot get the benefit, or anything more than an extremely small portion of the benefit, of the reduced interest until the time approaches for the stock to fall due. The people who are our creditors know well the value of money, and they will not give up what they hold to-day unless we make it worth their while to do so. We must give them a quid pro quo, and in addition something more to make the operation worth their while, and whatever we give them we lose. There is just one more point, and that is that I hope we shall not tie the hands of the Federal Parliament in this matter by adhering to the last three and a half lines of this clause. Let us leave the whole matter free, so that the State can make the best bargain for itself. I shall not object to the later amendment proposed by Sir George Turner.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I move:
To insert after the words "take over" the words "on such terms and conditions as the Parliament may think fit."

Mr. KINGSTON:
I should like to point out that if we are not going to retain the latter part of the clause fixing the terms on which the Federal Parliament may take over the State debts, and we accept this amendment, the effect will be that the Federal Parliament, without the consent of the State, may take over the State debts on any terms it pleases,

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That is a very good objection and I will not press it.
Amendment withdrawn.

Sir George Turner's amendment to strike out "or any part" agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: It is now proposed:

To strike out the rest of the clause after the word "public," with a view of inserting "the debts of the State at the establishment of the Commonwealth."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

And I move to insert a further amendment:

And may from time to time convert, renew, or consolidate such debts, or any part thereof.

Mr. WISE:

You can stop at the word "part" now.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Yes; the clause can end there now.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I understood after striking out the words "or any part" that it was the intention of Sir George Turner, as suggested by Mr. Deakin and Sir John Downer, to substitute the words "or a ratable proportion." If it is not his intention, I shall not move it, but I thought it was the general feeling that they should be inserted.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I refrained from moving the insertion of these words, knowing that the proposition may not be sustained when we come to consider the matter a few months hence, and I do not want to complicate it. We have only given the Federal Parliament one option, whereas a full consideration of this question requires that we should retain a number of options.

Mr. FRASER:

I think it would be much safer not to give the power of conversion at all. There is not a possibility, much less a probability, of the Federal Parliament making a profit out of the conversion of the stock, and there might be a Treasurer in power who, knowing nothing about finance, might be induced to convert it at a great loss to the nation.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I would appeal to Sir George Turner now that he has got rid of the words "with the consent of the State," to allow full latitude to the Federal Parliament to take over the whole or any part of the public debts. I think the clause, as it now stands, will be severely criticised, as it is tying the hands of the Federal Parliament. I would ask him to accept this compromise as he is always willing to accept a fair compromise.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We have already struck out the words "any part," and I feel, although I cannot claim to have the same knowledge of financial matters as Mr. McMillan, that it would be a grave mistake to do as he suggests.

The CHAIRMAN: We cannot reverse the decision of the Committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Could we not, by consent, revise the words as we are approaching the end?

The CHAIRMAN: There would be no end to the proceedings if we were to reverse our decisions.

Mr. SYMON:
We might insert after the word "State" the words "I or any part of such debt."

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
If you take over a part of the debt you will simply throw doubt on the remainder of the security, which would damage that stock.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I move:
To insert in lieu of the words "any part," the words "a ratable proportion."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I will withdraw my amendment for the time being.

DEPARTURE OF DELEGATES.

Mr. BARTON:
I believe it is the sense of the Convention that as the Premier of New South Wales and the Speaker and one of his colleagues are going away tonight, we should rise for a short time in order that honorable members may see them take their departure. I am not prepared to forego dealing with the Bill to-night, as I want to see such progress made that the amended Bill may be in print to-morrow.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You will find it difficult to do that if you adjourn for any length of time.

Mr. BARTON:
I was proposing to adjourn until ten minutes past 9.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You cannot expect us to stop here until past half past 11 or 12 o'clock.

Mr. BARTON:
We have to deal with this Bill, and our numbers are being gradually reduced. A quorum is twenty-six, and the remaining labors of the Convention will have to be attended by all the remaining members in Adelaide.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   You will finish on Friday.

Mr. BARTON:
   Not unless you take particular pains. There will be some work after this that will require an adjournment of the Committee.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Is it necessary that we should go to see them off.

Mr. BARTON:
   I do not want to lose any time as the hon. member knows, but I understood it was the sense of a majority of the Convention that we should adjourn, and felt bound to mention the matter. If the hon. member is against the suggestion, looking at his position in the Convention, I will withdraw it.

Mr. DEAKIN:
   I trust not. Sir George Turner's utterances are due only to his desire for greater expedition in our work, and we in Victoria know how relentlessly he drives us when there is work to be done. Such considerations are out of place at a moment like the present. We owe so much to Mr. Reid in the origin of this Convention and for the fair and conciliatory spirit in which he has invariably addressed himself to the business of this Convention that we can assuredly offer him the slight tribute of offering him a public good-bye. That at least is due to him and due from us to him.

Mr. KINGSTON:
   I agree with the sentiments that have fallen from Mr. Deakin, and think that we will unanimously pay Mr. Reid this small mark of our high esteem and appreciation of his enthusiastic and eloquent advocacy of Federation, his sound reasoning, his geniality, his unflagging industry, and his unfailing courtesy.

Mr. BARTON:
   No one is more sensible than I am of what Mr. Reid has done for the cause of Federation, and especially in connection with the carrying of this Federal Enabling Act, not only in the interests of the people of his own colony, but for the whole of the people of Australia.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
   I only desire to endorse what has been said by my hon. friends Mr. Deakin and Mr. Kingston. We owe a great deal to Mr. Reid. He has initiated this movement, and he has forwarded it in the most admirable manner by his tact as much as by his eloquence, and it is only a small compliment to bid him good-bye, and send him forth rejoicing.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:

When I interjected I certainly was under the impression that my hon. friend the Premier of New South Wales would be more pleased if we kept to our work than if we went to see him off. As that is not so, I would not attempt to stand in the way of this Convention bidding good-bye to my genial friend, and I must express the warm hope that we shall meet him again in another part of Australia-I shall not say what part -to finish the good work which he has taken such great pains in carrying out.

Mr. REID:

I had not the remotest conception of the adjournment of the Convention for the purpose of bidding me good-bye. At the same time I felt in a difficulty, because I should have been sorry to leave this Convention without personally exchanging greetings with every member of this body. Since the Convention has distinguished me by this kindly act, I can only deeply appreciate the compliment it has been pleased to pay me. I may be allowed before I go, through you, sir, to express to the public of Australia my profoundest satisfaction. as one of those who helped to bring this Convention into existence, at the conciliatory and patriotic spirit which has been shown throughout the whole of the transactions by the various delegations from the Australian colonies. I confess I came here with misgivings, but I am glad now to be able to state that our proceedings have been of such a character that I feel more confident than ever that we are really at last on the brink of that glorious-transformation which will enable us and all the people of Australia to rise to the true dignity of the destiny which lies before us.

The sittings of the Committee were suspended until 9.10 p.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

Consideration of clause 96 resumed.

Amendment to strike out "or any part" and insert in lieu thereof "or a ratable proportion" agreed to.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It will be necessary to alter "debt" into "debts" and "State" into "States."

The CHAIRMAN: I will see that these verbal amendments are made.

The next amendment is:

To insert after "State," in the third line of the clause, the words as at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I would like to know what is "a ratable proportion"? How can you arrange to take over all the 3 per cent., 4 per cent., 5 per cent., and 6 per cent. debts? It will be necessary, under the proposal, to have a schedule.

Mr. GLYNN:
What is the object of limiting the amount to be taken over to all the debts "at the establishment of the Commonwealth"? If the debts are taken over there must be a corresponding asset. There can be no fear of over-borrowing by the States. If we limit the amount to be taken over now, when you wish to take the railways over you will be unable to take a corresponding portion of the debt. The railways are an asset which will have to be purchased in a proper way, and the proper way would be to set off against them at proportional part of the debt so long as any debt exists. If you take over the debts against the Customs revenue you will practically have them balance up to a certain date and can make allowances as far as they do not; but supposing you want to take over the railways twenty years hence, after the debts have increased in the meantime by 10, or 15, or 20 per cent. beyond what they are at present, why debar yourself of the power to set off that increase against the purchase-money paid for the railways, because when the railways are to be taken over they must be bought, and we will undoubtedly have to take on a liability of some sort or pay cash; so that if you debar yourself from the power of taking on the increased liability after the coming into existence of the Commonwealth you will have to pay cash or issue new stock in exchange for the railways.

The CHAIRMAN: I might point out that this clause has nothing to do with the railways.

Mr. GLYNN:

I was endeavoring to show that this matter is incidental to it. The proposal will not take over any debts that are not in existence at the time of the establishment of the Commonwealth. That is a mistake, because if you buy the railways hereafter it would be an advantage to be able to take over against the railways the total debts at the time of purchase.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Is not there a clause that the States can remit certain things to the Commonwealth?

Mr. GLYNN:

That is not the point. I again say that there is no reason to debar yourself from saying on purchasing the railways that, instead of paying for them either in cash or stock, we will take over portion of your debt. But if you do as is proposed, you do debar yourself from doing that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

With regard to the words:

At the establishment of the Commonwealth

I did not propose to so limit the power of the Parliament when I proposed the amendment in the first instance, but it was suggested that the States after the establishment of the Commonwealth might enter into reckless borrowing, and I consented to place those words in the clause. I see no objection to them, and I hope that after the establishment of the Commonwealth the mode of borrowing will not be by States as States individually, but through the Commonwealth only.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

Had you not better make the amendment read:
As existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I shall alter it to that form.

Mr. HIGGINS:

In pursuance of that amendment, for which I was secondarily responsible, I should like to add words to explain the phrase:

Ratable proportion

as follow:

The proportion to be calculated on a population basis.

They will go in here very well.

The CHAIRMAN: You had better put them at the end of the clause.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have no objection to that.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I cannot see how this amendment of Mr. Higgins's can be carried out, because every one of these debts fall due at varying times and they carry different rates of interest. It only complicates matters and renders Federation ten times more difficult.

Question-That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause-put, and negatived.

Question-That the words proposed by Sir George Turner to be inserted be so inserted-put and agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I now propose, in order to test the feeling of the committee:

That upon any conversion or consolidation or renewal of the loans representing the debts, any benefit or advantage in interest or otherwise accruing therefrom shall be applied to the reduction of such debts.

We have placed that part of the clause in the proposition for the purpose of endeavoring to commence a means of paying off the very large amount we owe in these colonies.

[P.1101] starts here
In a very few years we will have a saving of a million a year in interest, and ultimately perhaps a million and would say "You have raised this amount on loans you have taken over from us, and it is only fair and just we should have some hand in the spending of it." I want to take away these temptations and endeavor to start a means which eventually will wipe out the debt we will owe at the time of the Federation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

The amendment of the hon. member is no doubt an admirable one, but I should like to draw his attention to the fact that any gain made to the Commonwealth by the saving of interest through consolidation would have of necessity to be applied to revenue exigencies of the Commonwealth and the several States concerned. There is that point to be borne in mind. It is, I admit, of great importance if we could manage it, that the consolidated debt should be liquidated in this way. But we have also to think of our means of meeting current expenditure, and those means might be very considerably affected by the appropriation for this particular purpose of the saving effected.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

If they did not get a saving they would have to raise the money by some other means.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

And it would be better, and in some cases would be the only means possible by which they could raise the amount required, that this should be taken out of the saving effected on the interest charge.

Mr. GLYNN:

I really cannot see what is the object of this provision. It seems to me that when the loans have matured there is no profit made. How are you going to estimate the advantage that has been reaped by the Commonwealth? You stop paying a certain rate of interest, and issue, instead of the old bonds, bonds which pay a less rate of interest. On what principle can you say that a certain sum has been made or has not been made? What portion are you going to set off against the increased state of solvency resulting from the change of the State as a debtor to the federal body as a debtor. The proper method it appears to me would be to convert the loans on paper at once.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

You could not do that.

Mr. GLYNN:

If you have bonds—say 5 and 6 per cent. bonds—which have three or four years to run you can estimate the present value of those bonds. Estimate them on paper and then you know what you are doing. If you wait till the loans mature how are you going to estimate the value of the conversion?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
You just take what you get.

Mr. GLYNN:
The proposition is that you are to allow the State the value incidental to the conversion, but from the time the loans have been taken over till they have been paid off on their maturity, the federal body has been paying the high rate of interest. The proper method, it seems to me, is the moment you take over the debt to nominally convert that on terms of the present value of capital, and then you know exactly what you are doing.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
My chief objection to this proposal is that we are attempting to affect a policy twenty years ahead. Under ordinary circumstances very few of these loans will determine till about twenty years more, on an average. What the process will be is that you will have to save, out of your revenue, a sinking fund for the liquidation of those debts. When your loans fall in you simply have to pay so much less interest, and, after, all these old ideas about sinking funds are very illusory. While they reduce the debts on the one hand they may increase obligations on the other. There may-be a policy for the reduction of the public debt known to financiers in the future besides this very crude way introduced into this clause. It is a very great pity for us to multiply these hard and fast arrangements, which ought to be matters for the Federal Parliament.

Mr. FRASER:
I agree that the amendment of Sir George Turner is not practical. There is no doubt, as Mr. Glynn has said, that when the debentures mature the only businesslike way of dealing with them is to pay them off.

An HON. MEMBER: By borrowing money?

Mr. FRASER:
Yes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
At a lower rate of interest.

Mr. FRASER:
If you pay them off now the result of the transaction will be that you will pay a much less amount in interest than you paid under the old arrangement. We assume, of course, that the Federal Parliament will be able to borrow money at a cheaper rate of interest. The sinking fund as proposed in this amendment will not answer the purpose.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I do not propose a sinking fund.

Mr. FRASER:

The amendment of my hon. friend will not meet the object he desires to accomplish, but I do not think it will do any harm.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I think we had better strike this out. It is a most dangerous thing. You have got £100 on which you have to pay interest at 5 per cent., and you float a loan at 3 per cent. and you get £98 for it. If you come to reckon up the difference between 5 per cent. and 3 per cent. you will find that you have made a profit although you lose £2. You may depend upon it that in the future they will so fix their rate of interest that they will not get a premium.

Mr. FRASER:

To float as near as possible to par is an axiom of finance.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

To say that you are actually making at present a loss on your capital, and that you are to apply any benefit from reduction of interest to the sinking fund, seems to be making this fund illusory. It would be much better to leave this to the Commonwealth.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I desire to put in a definition of "ratable proportion," and would suggest these words:

The ratable proportion of the debts of the several States to be taken over is to be calculated on the basis of the populations of the several States as ascertained by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

It is true that different debts have got different rates of interest. The Commonwealth, in taking into account the debts to be taken over, will not treat any State unfairly by taking one State's debts bearing 4 per cent., and another State's debts bearing 5 per cent. There should be power given to the Federation, and I think we may trust it, to take over on the population basis the ratable proportion of the several debts of the several States.

Mr. HENRY:

This is a somewhat important amendment, and I desire to understand it. Does it mean that if one colony is entitled to say £40 per head no other colony can exceed that? It might mean that £40 per head shall be the limit. What effect will it have on the population basis?

Mr. HIGGINS:

I thought all members had gone into the question and understood it.
Supposing one colony has borrowed £30 per head, another £40, another £50, another £60, and so on, it would be possible to say we will take over £30 per head, the lowest scale of borrowing on the population all round. It is possible to say we will not go so far, but will only take £10 per head on a certain class of debts. Supposing we only take over 4 per cent. debts to the extent of £10 per head all over the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON:

Supposing there is a colony without 4 per cents.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Then they cannot do it.

Mr. KINGSTON:

There is not much advantage in it.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I only quote 4 per cent. as an example.

Mr. HOLDER:

So much per head.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Yes.

Mr. ISAACS:

That is not the amendment.

Mr. BARTON:

You ought to add to the amendment:

At the time taken over.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Yes, I will.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I suggest that we should pass this clause pro forma, and that the Drafting Committee should reconsider it.

Mr. BARTON:

I will ask the hon. member to continue spelling it with a "G."

Mr. KINGSTON:

I hope that the Drafting Committee will give the clause some attention, as I am sure when we have finished with it there will be ample scope for them to exercise their ability on it in the way of amendments.

Amendment agreed to; clause as amended passed.

Clause 92.-Preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one part of the Commonwealth over the ports of another part of the Commonwealth, arid any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth, or by any State, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth, or by any State, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth shall be null and void.

The CHAIRMAN: There are a number of amendments proposed to this clause. The one before the chair is that proposed by Mr. Barton, who has moved:

To strike out in the second line of the clause the words "part of the Commonwealth" with the view of inserting the word "State."

Mr. GRANT:

I hope that the words will not be struck out, as they give the clause that general application which we all desire. The amendment proposed by Mr. Gordon will meet all that Sir George Turner desires, and will make it impossible for any colony to take advantage of another in the matter of railway rates. I do not think it would be possible, without going into detail, to frame a clause which would be restrictive on the managers of the railways. We know in connection with private railways that no matter what regulations are made, or how solemnly mutual contracts are entered into, they are invariably broken. We cannot frame any clause which will have the effect of preventing one colony taking advantage of another unless we do it in the most general terms. I think Mr. Gordon's amendment will thoroughly meet the case. The first part of the clause does not seem to have any special application to railways, as the words employed injured colony to the Inter-States Commerce Commission, which will be a most useful body, no doubt composed of experts, who will be thoroughly competent to deal with any matter brought under their notice. Consequently both Victoria and New South Wales may safely leave that Commission to do justice between the two. If we do not attempt to go into any details, but leave the clause as general as possible, so that it will apply to Queensland or Western Australia, or any States wishing to join the Federation in time to come, it will be better than attempting to give it a local bias in the interest of the more powerful colonies. I trust the words "one part of the Commonwealth," will be retained rather than "State," because the latter has a more limited application. A reason for retaining "one part of the Commonwealth" may be found in its application to inter-State ports, and give the board some control, so that one port may not be preferred to another by any rates made in its favor. In rival ports the equality of trade may be interfered with by railway or other regulations or rates. I think this board of control, which will consist of representatives of all the States, should be empowered to inquire into any special grievance which may arise in a State. The necessity for an authority of that kind is so obvious that I trust the Convention will look at the clause in the widest possible manner and give it effect so that the whole of the benefit may be derived from equality of trade, which should be absolutely free. In a preceding clause No. 86, we endeavored to make trade absolutely free, and I think this clause will be a sequence of that one.

Mr. FRASER:
I must protest against this alteration. A "part of the Commonwealth" is of much wider significance than the word "State." It will include States. I submit that to the legal gentlemen here. If you put in "States" it will not include "part of the States of the Commonwealth."

Mr. BARTON:
Except territories, there cannot be any part of the Commonwealth that will not be a State.

Mr. FRASER:
I do not see the advisability of putting in States. It will narrow the significance of the phrase.

Mr. BARTON:
I have adopted in this amendment the form in which the clause stands in the Constitution of the United States, and I cannot remember the reason why it was departed from in 1891. There is no danger of what the hon. member fears. I have adopted it at the suggestion of one of the members opposite. There has been a decision in the corresponding clause in the United States Constitution which will explain the whole clause. This clause is a limitation upon the powers of the Congress in the regulation of commerce, and is intended to prevent what otherwise may result in the discrimination of one State against another. It is to prevent the Congress in the United States from making any law for one State which may result in the discrimination of the State against the others in matters of trade and intercourse, and to bring it in the form which is so clearly explanatory. The position in the United States is sufficient for our purpose, because there is really no reason why the legal interpretation should not be the same as in the United States. The suggestion from one of my friends opposite is a good one, and calculated to carry out the object of the clause.

Mr. SYMON:
I think Mr. Barton is mistaken as to the reference to the United States. There the word is "State."

Mr. BARTON:
My amendment is to put in the word State.

Mr. HIGGINS:
May I ask my friend Mr. Barton if he is satisfied that clause 92 taken with 95-they must be taken together-will have the effect not only of preventing the system at present in vogue of having different rates at the same station of departure which are distinctly preferential, but also of preventing a system of differential rates which will allow of the rates being so attenuated or so small as to practically effect the same purpose? I understand that there is a smaller charge for wool from Bourke to Sydney than there is to Sydney from half the distance. I want to know whether it is contemplated under clauses 92 and 95 to allow of rates which are absolutely lower for long distances than for short distances. It is all the difference in the world to us, because I think the representatives from Victoria have no desire to in any way keep up this fratricidal war if it can possibly be helped. As to this matter, none of us can throw stones. That which Victoria does against New South Wales, New South Wales does against Queensland; that which Victoria complains of against New South Wales she does against South Australia. I find here that there is a Border Tax Act in Queensland which puts an export duty of £2 10s. per ton upon all goods as they cross the border into New South Wales. Here is the way it is put by Mr. Gratton, of Brisbane:

I forward herewith for your information two copies of our Border Tax Act, which was passed for the purpose of defeating the object of the differential rates, which were quoted by the railway authorities in New South Wales to divert traffic within this colony from our own lines.

I say this not for the sake of taunt, but to show that we cannot throw stones at one another. The railway authorities have been driven into a system of trying to cut rates so as to divert the traffic into their own lines and into their own ports. So far as I am concerned, I voted in favor of the railways being absolutely federal property, so that the whole thing could be managed for Australia as a whole. We have been beaten, and I, accept the vote, and now we ought to tie their hands so far that the Federal Court shall declare null any rates that may divert the traffic from its normal course. I should be glad to consent to any clause that would have the effect of treating as an Australasian matter the whole system of traffic on the railways. That is the only way to do it. At the same time we must be very careful of the working of the clauses, because it must obviously appear-and I appeal to my friends from New South Wales who are anxious to do justice in this matter—that they cannot ask the Victorians to throw away their only weapon of defence in regard to the Riverina trade unless they throw away the weapon of offence they have in regard to the same trade. Of course the principal question between New South Wales and Victoria is as to the Riverina trade. There you have a place wedged in between two colonies. It happens to belong to New South Wales. If you simply say that Victoria must not put on rates of the sort it does at present, saying that in New South Wales wool from Echuca shall not pay less than Victorian wool from Echuca, you rob us of the only system of defending ourselves.

Mr. BARTON:
When did you have to defend yourself against New South Wales?

Mr. HIGGINS:
I will not go into bygones. It is true that if wool is sent by the main line through Wodonga, and it happens to go to Victoria, an extra rate is put on it because the line is in New South Wales territory.

Mr. BARTON:
We cannot justify preferential rates. I do not defend them. It is my object to get rid of them.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is not of much importance who first committed the offence. I will admit, for argument, that Victoria was the first, though if there was no war of rates that wool would go to Victoria.

Mr. WISE:
It depends from where it comes.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I am speaking in general terms.

Mr. WISE:
If grown near a railway, in the natural course of things it would go by that railway to Sydney, but if grown away from a railway it would go to Victoria.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Mr. Wise has the same object as Dr. Quick, and there should be no difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to what should be done. If we are to understand that you are going in for differential and long distance rates, but wish to be free to so attenuate the long distance rates as to practically make them preferential rates, we cannot follow you.

Mr. BARTON:
You would be able to do the same thing.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Our difficulty is that our distance is not 500 miles, as yours is. It is 200 miles.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Do you want a differential rate to be made on the same principle as if a railway were not going towards a border?

Mr. HIGGINS:
I admit you must have long distance rates. You must have tapering rates. You must help the producer. I want to help him with regard to the ports. The worst instance I can call to mind is that of the Bourke and Dubbo, rates. It is not a fair long distance rate to charge double the rate from Dubbo that you charge from Bourke, which is double the distance.

Mr. BARTON:

I quite agree. I have said several times that if B is nearer to A than C is, it is a preferential rate and against freetrade to charge less for carrying goods from C to A than from B to A.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I am afraid clause 95 is so drawn as to have in effect a prohibition of the Victorian system without having a prohibition of the Bourke to Dubbo system. I want to leave it to the Commission, if you are to have one, to have the power to stop, not only the Victorian, but to stop also the Bourke to Dubbo, system.

Mr. BARTON:

So it will.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think that really Dr. Quick has done great service in this debate by his short speech, reducing the matter to simple terms. It so happens that it was the precise line on which I had determined to work in this Convention. Get the railways as well as the rivers if you can under federal control, but if you cannot, then at least try to make the railways as federal as possible.

Mr. FRASER:

We have struck out rivers.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I suggest that as we have come so near a rapprochement, and we understand one another's views fairly well, and as there is no desire on either side to take advantage of the other, and as it is to the interests of South Australia and Queensland as well as of Victoria and New South Wales, to have these railways dealt with on a broad federal basis, we might so word this as to prevent the Bourke and Dubbo system.

Mr. BARTON:

There is no doubt about it as it stands.

Mr. SYMON:

No doubt at all.

Mr. BARTON:

The only motive you can have in altering the clause is to prevent the very state of things which is met by this clause.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The Bourke and Dubbo system is this: Dubbo is half the distance to Sydney that Bourke is; yet there is a lesser rate from Bourke to Sydney for wool than from Dubbo to Sydney.
Are you sure the actual aggregate charge for the carriage of a bale of wool from Bourke to Sydney is less than that from Dubbo to Sydney?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Absolutely less. have that upon very reliable information.

Mr. WISE:
If it is desired to draw traffic along that railway from a railway in Victoria then the Inter-State-Commission would declare it to be bad; but if it is a purely local charge the Inter-State Commission would have nothing to do with it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think I have done good service in getting from Mr. Wise what I really believed right through. This is a mere question of misunderstanding, and the more you put things into plain language and come to close quarters with them the more likely we are to come to an honest determination. All that I want is to understand clearly that it is not to throw away the power of the Victorian Railways Commissioner to protect his claim to the Riverina trade unless the New South Wales Commissioner also throws away that weapon which has been so effective in getting that trade.

Mr. WISE:
It will result in each State giving up something.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It will also effect the result that no doubt your New South Wales rates for long distances, say 500 miles, will be less than the rate for the 200 miles or 250 miles between Riverina and Melbourne, but what we object to particularly is that you should be putting on rates which are absolutely less, not relatively less, for long distances than short ones.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
If the same long-distance rate prevails all over New South Wales why should you complain?

Mr. HIGGINS:
As far as I can ascertain, in answer to that question, you cannot well have a zone system when you have rivers to deal with. You cannot very well have a uniform long-distance rate.

Mr. BARTON:
You cannot have a uniform long-distance rate under any circumstances, unless you want the country to remain a desert.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Mr. O'Connor was not speaking of a uniform mileage rate. But you cannot have a tapering zone rate absolutely for all parts of New South Wales, as you have river competition and other conditions coming in. I assume that you cannot have the same rate for all distances of 200 miles, for all distances of 300 miles, or all distances of 400 miles. Very well, there are such complications in the matter that I think it had better be left to experts. Let them lay down a rigid rule. As long as you have expert persons, whether the Inter-State Commission or not, absolutely directed to do what is best, without regard to the interests of the port, but with regard to the interests of the producer, I am content. And I think you can best regard the interests of the producer if you simply think how can he best get his stuff to the market on reasonable terms, not giving him the preference over other producers. I would only farther suggest this: that if Mr. Barton is, as I understand he is, convinced from the American decision that this section 92 will allow us to deal with the Bourke and Dubbo system-

Mr. BARTON: I did not say necessarily the Bourke and Dubbo system.

Mr. HIGGINS:
And if in this clause there were an alteration which my hon. friend Mr. Gordon suggested in speaking to me, if in line 3 the word "or" were substituted for "and" it will answer the purpose. It would read thus:

In reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect, or made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State.

Mr. BARTON:
I want to know what objection there is to clause 92 as I proposed to amend it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I say I accept the hon. member's assurance that it will have the effect of stopping such systems as that of Dubbo and Bourke.

Mr. BARTON:
The hon. member must not accept my assurance in too broad a sense. I tell him that I consider it is against the policy that is laid down in this clause, that there being three points-A a port, B an intermediate distant place, and C a further distant place near the railway of another State-it is an improper interference with the railways of that other State and with the freedom of the trade to carry goods from A to C at a total charge that is less than that charged from A to B. If the charge from A to C is less than the money charged for carrying from A to B, then I say if it has the effect of interfering to draw traffic to a railway from the railway of another State and it offends against the principles of free inter-State commerce, and should be prohibited. What I mean by that is fairly expressed in the case of Sands v. Maristee River Improvement Company (123 U.S. 288). In Mr. Baker's digest-a very good book-a short statement of this principle is given as follows:

Where a river is wholly within the limits of a State, it (the State) can authorise any improvement which in its judgment will enhance its value as a means of transportation from one part of the State to another. The internal commerce of a State—that is commerce which is wholly confined within its limits—is as much under its control as foreign or inter. State commerce is under the control of the general Government.

That is to say, if commerce is inter-State commerce, and if there is a connection between two States and traffic passing along the railway lines, there cannot be any rate made which will have the effect of drawing trade from the railway of one State to the railway of another. If there is, it is against the principle laid down by the United States Courts even in the construction of the general power to regulate trade and commerce. But if the regulation or right has to do solely with the internal traffic of the State itself, and has not the effect of derogating from the freedom and intercourse expressed in this Constitution, then each State is free to deal with its own traffic. Clause 95, after giving certain powers of adjudication, says that the Commission

Shall have no powers in reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State.

What is aimed at therefore is a rate which is not merely preferential in effect. Let Victoria and New South Wales each make preferential rates within their own boundaries and for the purposes of their own internal traffic; but the moment these regulations of traffic are so conducted that they have the effect of preference and the Inter-States Commission can see that they are made for the purpose of drawing trade to either State from a neighboring State, they are interdicted by the Inter-States Commission. What is really aimed at is what is aimed at also in a letter from the Victorian Railway Commissioners on August 13th, 1894, when, in reference to a protest against differential rates by the New South Wales Railway Commissioners, they say:

Adverting to your letters of the 19th June last and 25th ultimo, with respect to the rates on wool to and from Riverina, I am directed by the Acting Commissioners to say, while expressing their regret at the delay which has occurred, that as before stated, the circumstances have not been such as to admit of their dealing further with the matter than was done in their letter of the 15th June last, which they are sorry to see was regarded as an evidence that the question had not been treated in a practical manner, and as also manifesting a lack of reciprocal feeling.

In view of the fact that any alteration this season would have caused disturbance to business arrangements already entered into, the Acting Commissioners regarded their reply as the only one they could give, and also as sufficient. The same applies also to the request that the goods rates should be altered.

The Acting Commissioners regret that they cannot but look upon the request made as tantamount to a demand for a complete surrender, without equivalent, of the principles upon which this Department has worked to retain possession of the trade in question, and for which it was the first to afford facilities.

While they admit that the geographical situation is a factor in the question, they would point out that other competition than that of your colony has to be met.

Finally, they would say, with regret, that they are not in a position to make any alteration at present; but, as previously intimated, they will be glad at the end of the present season to confer with your Commissioners as to the rates to be charged in the future.

Now we see the meaning of a preferential rate made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic from one States railway to another railway. Of course the principle is not only to retain, but to invade. I cannot help making this remark. I am quite sure, in a perfectly friendly way, that the whole attitude of our friends over there reminds me of a well-known remark made by a party to a marriage, who said, on leaving the church, "Now, recollect that what is yours is mine, and what is mine is my own."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You want to take away from us what we have had for years.

Mr. BARTON:

When you talk about taking away from Victoria something she has had for years, your argument would extend to this: If I possess myself of somebody else's money, it would be a good defence to say that I had kept it in my pocket for a certain number of years. If a thing is obtained by rates, which under these principles are unfair-rates which take away the traffic from the railway of one State to another State-then we say that the power should step in and interdict it. This is in accordance with the principle I have quoted from this American authority, who states:

The internal commerce of a State—that is, commerce which is wholly confined within its limits—is as much under its control as foreign or inter-State commerce is under the control of the general government.

If it is seen that by a certain internal regulation the trade or commerce of a State is drawn away from one State to another—trade which it ought to have—then the Commission steps in and interdicts the whole thing. It is all very well for my hon. friend Mr. Higgins to say that we should not throw stones at each other. I am not doing it, nor have I any desire to do it; but when he talks about the preferential rates of New South Wales I only wish to draw attention to the fact that as between that colony and Victoria there are no preferential rates. We claim perfect freedom in regulating our own internal traffic, but the moment the Commonwealth finds that we, or any other State, are making regulations which draw away the trade from the railways of one State to those of another State it interdicts it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You claim to have the whole of the trade, and geographically you are not entitled to it.

Mr. BARTON:
That is an unfair interpretation on what I have tried to put fairly more than once. Let the geographical conditions operate, and let us remember that New South Wales has railways extending for a longer length as she must do in developing her territory than Victoria. We have made these railways upon which we have expended our money, and when we have extended them into our own territory we are entitled to the legitimate traffic that flows from them. We are entitled to make our own rates for the carrying of our own traffic to such an extent as will not interfere with the principle of intercolonial freetrade. In this book there are many instances mentioned dealing with the same principle as we are arguing. I have simply quoted one because of the explicitness with which it states the matter.

Mr. ISAACS:
The question is, does it apply to regulations entirely within the State.

Mr. BARTON:
Yes; to principles operating entirely within the State. No internal regulation can have the effect of derogating from that power when they come into conflict which is reposed in the Government of the Commonwealth to regulate trade and commerce, and preserve the equality of it. That equality must be preserved, but if there is no conflict, and the thing is dealt with in one State simply for the management of its own internal traffic, and not for the purpose of derogating from this

Mr. HIGGINS:
Do you think it ought to be allowed to secure its own internal traffic to go to Sydney even if it really should go to Victoria?

Mr. BARTON:

Members seem to have lost sight of the question they are discussing. Each State is primarily entitled to the traffic within its territory, but there is a salutary condition imposed that where the inter-State traffic is interfered with, and where regulations are made so as to interfere with it, then these things must be interdicted. If there was a portion of New South Wales which had no connection with the Victorian railways—take that portion between Sydney and Armidale—and if there happened to be a rate imposed there which was simply a development rate for the purpose of giving a chance to the settlers, no Commission would interfere with it under the United States Constitution; but apart from this, if it affected inter-State trade and commerce and intercourse prejudicially, so as to prevent the freedom of trade operating, that would be the very point which this Commission would be appointed to deal with. We want to put a stop to things like this. Mr. Reid quoted a case in which, on one of the Victorian railways—from Echuca to Melbourne—a bale of wool could be carried from a point 250 miles in New South Wales territory to Melbourne by the Echuca line for 2s. 9d., while the grower, if he happened to be in Victoria, would have to pay 6s. 1d. to carry his wool over the line.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

The same thing exists in New South Wales.

Mr. BARTON:

I wish the hon. member would remain quiet. He was very quiet while Mr. Higgins was quoting instances, and I hope he will be while I am. We must have something like federation in these matters. Let us take the return traffic on the line from Melbourne to Echuca. We find that a ton of sugar intended for consumption at a distant point in New South Wales is carried for 11s. 9d., but if it is intended for a railway-ridden Victorian who owns the railway he has to pay £0 13s. 5d. Let us apply the same to general merchandise. Ever since 1894 the regulation has been that if the goods are intended for a distant consumer in New South Wales he pays 22s. 6d. a ton, but a Victorian has to pay rates ranging up to £4 8s. 7d. I say nothing about the rebate allowed to the carriers of the New South Wales wool. Is it not easy to distinguish between a regulation of that sort giving an advantage to a citizen outside your own bounds over your own citizen, and at the same time tending to impoverish the railways of your neighbor, and a regulation dealing with internal traffic intended to develop the country? If the latter goes farther than that the Inter-States Commission must step in and see that it is left to that.

Mr. FRASER:
I cannot allow this matter to go without some explanation.

Mr. BARTON:
It needs explanation.

Mr. FRASER:
The low rate to Hay is undoubtedly a preferential rate to secure the trade of that district. The rate to Cootamundra, which is some 254 miles less than to Hay, is 3d. per ton per mile, and there is no increase in the rate to Hay. Will anyone contend that that is not a preferential rate? I do not say that each colony is not right in gathering all its own traffic. I concede that point, but I assert all the same that if New South Wales is going to gather all its traffic in this way Victoria should not allow her geographical advantages to be stripped from her.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Alter the geography.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Hand us over the territory.

Mr. FRASER:
There is no doubt that New South Wales has a perfect right to fix its own rates, and Mr. Eddy was particularly careful in his evidence before the Finance Committee to point out that the Inter-State Commission should not have the right of fixing the rates within a State's own territory. Of course if it is; conceded that New South Wales can fix the rate to Hay at any rate they like, it will divert the trade to Sydney, although geographically it belongs to Victoria. The rate for 300 miles in New South Wales must be the same as in Victoria for the same distance, otherwise Victoria will lose her geographical position. I see there is very great danger in passing this clause. There is not much danger in clause 92, because I do not think it will apply. The crux of the whole thing is in clause 95.

Mr. SYMON:
According to my friend Mr. Fraser we have come to the crux of the whole matter, and I am not sure that the convenience and time of this Convention have been met by debating clause 95 on an amendment in clause 92. The debate for all that has been, though exceedingly interesting, a little bewildering. Quite a mass of railway matters have been brought into it. We have heard of the battle of the gauges. Now we have the battle of the rates. It has been said that no one can read "Bradshaw's Railway Guide" for an hour without becoming insane, and if that is so, what may not be our fate?

Mr. DEAKIN:

You are judging by those who quoted.

Mr. SYMON:

My friend puts a conclusion to my sentence which I should not myself have put. It would have been convenient if hon. members putting the case for Victoria had given us the benefit of some amendment which would have carried into effect their views on this question. We would then have debated it in some concrete shape. With regard to clause 92, to come back to it for one moment, the amendment that is proposed is to strike out "part" and insert the word "State." Now, at first sight, I was inclined to think that that was a desirable amendment, and there is no doubt that in the American Constitution it is "State." An alteration appears to have been made from the Bill of 1891 to adopt the words in the clause, and it does seem to me after consideration that we had better adhere to the words as they stand, that is to leave the words

"Ports of one part of the Commonwealth," &c.

The effect of Sir George Turners amendment is to narrow the operation of this clause. That would be a mistake. I submit that to the members of the Committee, because it might possibly-we cannot conceive very well how-but it might possibly interfere with that freedom of trade which the object of this clause is to secure. For instance, take our own colony, we do not desire to interfere with the trade of any colony so far as it is only local, but preference might be given to one State or to one part of the Commonwealth with the effect of derogating-to use the word in the marginal note-from that freedom of trade which we desire not merely to see throughout the Commonwealth, speaking of it as a whole, but in and through every part of it.

Mr. ISAACS:

To that extent it would be bad.

Mr. SYMON:

How would it be bad?

Mr. ISAACS Why should you interfere with the internal management?

Mr. SYMON:

We only interfere with the internal management so far as it relates to the freedom of trade. We want to allow the stream of trade to flow in its natural channels, just as we expect water to seek its own level. Possibly we cannot tell how these details will operate in the future, but that stream of trade may be interfered with by preference being given to one port of a State as against a port in another part of the State. I am not sufficiently an expert to forecast what these trade regulations may be, but I do say that you must prohibit the Commonwealth or any State interfering so as to give preference, not merely to ports of one State against another, but to the ports in any one State. That seems to me fair, and you will only unduly restrict the clause by substituting the word "State" for the word "part." You may be opening a door for the derogation of that equality or freedom of trade which is at the root of this Constitution. That is the amendment of Sir George Turner. The amendment proposed by my friend Mr. Gordon seems to me to be a little too wide, and I would suggest for his consideration whether it might not be withdrawn, so far as this clause is concerned, with a view of his endeavoring to obtain his purpose, which is to promote the trade of the various colonies to the fullest possible extent, by some amendment to clause 95. It is impossible to tell what is undue or unreasonable, and all these are vague expressions which might cause confusion and give no practical result. In the subsection are the words:

Over the ports of another part of the Commonwealth, and any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth or by the State or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by the State having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce.

What enquiry would be necessary to determine that?

Mr. WISE:
All these are matters for the Commission and not for the Constitution.

Mr. SYMON:
Exactly so; and it is introducing matters of detail, and matters of very vague detail, in a provision of the Constitution which should be left to the Commission, if it is worth its salt.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
What of clause 95?

Mr. WISE:
That is for the protection of your people.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Oh; thank you! we expected it.

Mr. SYMON:
I do not now wish to refer to other matters which have been debated, but in regard to the operation of clause 95, when we arrive at that there are one or two observations which I would like to make upon the point as to one State reaping the advantage of having greater efficiency of management and greater opportunities of securing cheap labor and promote the interests of its citizens so long as it does not indulge in preferential rates, which are really dishonest, with a view of appropriating to one colony what it is not
Mr. ISAACS:

I am not going to discuss the railways. We have been discussing this clause and really talking at clause 95. I do not agree with Mr. Symon with regard to the alteration of the word "State." I prefer Mr. Barton's amendment, and for this reason: if we have it as suggested that preference is not to be given to the ports of one State as against the ports of another State, we have done all that we desire or are entitled to do in regard to this Constitution. If we say that no preference is to be given to the ports of one part of the Commonwealth against the ports of another part of the Commonwealth we may be going further than we should. It would mean that Tasmania would have no right to give preference to the port of Hobart against the port of Launceston if she thought fit, even though it would not affect the trade of Tasmania with any other State.

Mr. SYMON:

She could do that.

Mr. ISAACS:

It depends on what construction you put on this clause. At all events it would have the effect of interfering with the internal arrangements of a State. In framing a Constitution for Australia what right have we to interfere with local self-government to that extent?

Mr. FRASER:

We only want trade to go to its natural outlet.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Do you not think when it comes to a question of commerce we should be all one?

Mr. ISAACS:

Yes, if we are going in for unification.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You would have the fence, but leave the slip-panels down.

Mr. ISAACS:

If you carry out the extreme principle now advanced you should not confine the clause to ports, but make it apply to towns and cities.

Mr. GORDON:

I shall support the hon. member if he moves that amendment.

Mr. ISAACS:

I shall not move it, because it is contrary to our mission here.

Amendment to insert "State" agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall make consequent amendments all through the clause.

Mr. GORDON:
I ask leave to withdraw my proposed amendment,
Leave given.
Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 93.-The Parliament may make laws constituting an Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce upon railways within the Commonwealth, and upon rivers flowing through, in, or between, two or more States.

Mr. HOLDER:
I should like to ask Mr. Barton to look at this clause and see whether it is just as it was intended to be in one respect. It says:

An Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce upon railways.

I do not know what provisions of the Constitution there are which relate to trade and commerce on railways. What are they? If there are none I should like to have these words left out, and some words put in that the provisions of the previous clause as to equality of trade shall be maintained.
Mr. BARTON:

There is no provision relating to trade and commerce upon railways. That is not the meaning of the clause. The clause is that the Commission is constituted to execute and maintain upon the railways in the Commonwealth and upon the rivers the provisions of the Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Why not transpose the words?

Mr. BARTON:

I have no objection to doing that. I propose:

To leave out the words after "maintain" down to "upon," and insert them after "the States" at the end of the clause.

Question-That the word proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause-put and negatived.

Question-That the words proposed to to be inserted be so inserted-put and agreed to.

Mr. FRASER:

I contend that it would be a very unfair thing indeed for this Convention to go so much beyond the scope of its duties as to say that private boat-owners on the rivers shall be subject to an Inter-State Commission. Why they might carry firearms on their boats to protect their rights. I think it is grossly improper to direct what boat-owners shall do. There are hundreds of them.

Mr. WISE:

It will not touch private boat-owners.

Mr. FRASER:

If you have this clause, it will enable the Inter-State Commission to fix the rates on the rivers. This is a very important matter to South Australia. It is important that the rates on their rivers shall be as cheap as possible, so that the whole traffic may follow its natural course. Why should we interfere with the river rates?

Mr. WISE:

It is only to prevent a State starting boats of its own, and charging rates to cut the traffic of other States.

Mr. ISAACS:

To defeat equality of trade.

Mr. FRASER:

If that is so I am satisfied.

Mr. HENRY:
I would like to call the attention of Mr. Barton to the question of wharfage, which I raised before, and which I understood him to say that he would consider in dealing with the Inter-State Commission. We have provided against infringement of the equality of trade, and it is in my knowledge that there is a danger, unless it is provided for in some way, that Harbor Trusts and Marine Boards may impose rates which may be protective. I would like to know whether it is possible to give the Inter-State Commission power to determine between the rival harbor trusts or Marine Boards in reference to their rates.

Mr. BARTON:

Perhaps I had better, as in a former case, cite one of the American cases which puts the matter very clearly. It is a decision on the power given to the Inter-State Commission to regulate trade and commerce. In the first place, it is laid down:

No foreign or Inter-State commerce can be carried on with the citizens of a State without a wharf, or other place within its limits, on which passengers and freight can be landed and received. The fact that each landing-place is used in a State does not confer upon such State the right to tax the capital of the companies engaged in such commerce, unless the same is within the jurisdiction of such State. The only interference by a State with such commerce which is permissible is confined to port regulations, and such measures as will ensure safety and prevent confusion in landing and receiving freights and passengers.

Again the same authority lays it down:

A city, or town, or a navigable river may exact a reasonable compensation for the use of the wharf which it owns without infringing the Constitutional provisions concerning tonnage, taxes, or regulations of commerce.

Taking the principle of these two cases together it seems clear that a State can exact its own charges for the service it renders by allowing the use of wharves, and I suppose it may make in certain cases differential charges; but not in such a way as to derogate from freedom of trade between the States. If, however, such a regulation infringed that provision, it would be declared to have no effect.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 94.-The members of the Commission:

I. Shall hold office during good behavior:

II. Shall be appointed by the Governor-General by and with the advice of the Federal Executive Council:

III. May be removed by the Governor-General with such advice, but only upon an Address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same Session praying for such removal:

IV. Shall receive such remuneration as the Parliament may from time to time determine, but such remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I call attention to the provisions of this clause. It appears to me that this Inter-State Commission can have only a very limited amount of work to do. It may possibly be called upon to adjudicate on a case once only in twelve months. But here it is suggested to permanently appoint this Commission—I think there should be one member appointed from each State—and these members should be appointed temporarily, and not to have a tenure of office for life.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

How do you make out it will be one from each State?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

You could, if desirable, get men upon the Commission who do not live in the community in which the Commission is adjudicating, otherwise they might be biased by their surroundings and by the Government which appointed them. If, for instance, a dispute arose between South Australia and Victoria the proper persons to be appointed to this Commission would be persons resident in Western Australia and Tasmania. That would secure justice being done. I move:

To strike out sub-sections 1, 2, 3 and 4, with the view of inserting the following:-Shall be officers of the Civil Service of each State to be appointed by the Governor-General from time to time, as required, and to deal only with such matters as may be specifically referred to them. One officer only to be chosen from each State.

[P.1115] starts here

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

They would not be any good at all. They would not be independent.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

The hon. member is entitled to his opinion and I am entitled to mine. And I put my knowledge of this matter against his.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Do not get cross.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I am not in the least cross. But my amendment is, I think, an improvement upon this clause. I do not know what hon. members think, but are they going to overlook the fact that there will be numbers of officers appointed who will be paid high salaries and have no work to perform? They have to be kept in their positions for life, and can only be removed on presentation of an address from both Houses of Parliament.

The CHAIRMAN: Before I put this amendment I venture to Suggest to the Committee to allow me to alter the wording of this amendment to make it correspond with the wording of every other clause. I refer to the words "Governor-General in Council."

Mr. DOBSON:
I will support the amendment of my hon. friend Sir William Zeal because it is in the direction of economy. Had I been in the Chamber when the previous clause was proposed, I should have moved its rejection. We are making our Constitution a great deal too cumbersome, and I see no advantage to be gained by the appointment of the Inter-States Commission commensurate with the cost that will be incurred. In nineteen cases out of twenty the men who conduct our local railways would be able to settle all these questions among themselves. It is absurd to think that on questions of rates men like Mr. Eddy and Mr. Mathieson could not agree; but, supposing they could not agree, the point could be referred to the Federal Court, and not to the Inter-States Commission. We are bringing into existence to preside over the High Court a body composed of men who will be highly paid, and who will have the confidence of the whole Commonwealth, and yet you are giving them little to do. Why should we not refer these matters to the Federal Court, whose decisions should be absolutely final? The tribunal will consist of men of judicial and political experience, and in cases of this kind they would have before them the most skilled and expert evidence, allied to which there would be their own judicial knowledge to decide the points submitted to them. I shall support the amendment.

Mr. SYMON:
I think this clause ought to be struck out. Of course, I protest against this method of dealing with such important matters as the control of the railways; but, as the Convention is not disposed to go the whole length of placing the railways under the control of the Federation, we undoubtedly must have something in existence, which will prevent these wars of rates which everybody has deplored. I should like to point out that in clause 93 power is given to the Parliament to:

Make laws constituting an Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

That is conferring upon the Parliament practically the power to do everything in connection with the constitution of this Inter-State Commission, and it seems to me Parliament should not be restricted in any way in relation to the tenure of office of the gentlemen whom they may appoint. If you leave clause 94, in effect you may give these gentlemen office under the Constitution which cannot be changed without an amendment of the Constitution. It would be infinitely better to leave 93 as it stands, and wipe out 94, so as to leave the Parliament a free hand to deal as fully as possible with the establishment of this Commission, its continuance in office, and its powers. If you do not do that, it may be that the Parliament may change its policy or it may decide to take over the railways, and you may be exposed to this extraordinary position that you may have appointed men with a life tenure of their office. You may be exposed to the difficulty that it may be impossible to remove them. I suggest that it should be struck out.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I hope the Committee will not come to a hasty conclusion upon this matter.

Mr. DEAKIN:
We have not shown a disposition to come to a hasty conclusion upon any of these matters.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
This question has been raised for the first time, and it is well worth considering whether the proposal should be acceded to. It is an important question whether we should have this commission at all, and I purpose stating the reasons why this expedient has been adopted. It must be evident to members that the practical working of this principle of freedom of trade throughout the Commonwealth will be a very difficult thing indeed, unless it is in the hands of some skilled body of persons. This is not a matter of theory. It has been the experience of America and England and every other country where continuous traffic from one State to another, or one country to another has to be carried on, and the discussion here to-night should convince anyone that there are so many difficult questions involved in determining in particular cases whether a rate does interfere with freedom of trade or not. It would be impossible that that question should be left to the determination of a lawsuit in the ordinary cumbersome way in which proceedings of the law are carried on. If this restriction of freedom of trade is to be of any value at all, there must be some way of carrying it out. The Finance Committee recommended this mode of seeing to the executive of the law, and in doing that they followed the example of England and America. In America, for many years until 1878, the railways endeavored to work under the general provisions of the Constitution, but it was found that it was a simple mockery to refer to the Constitution, because there were so many ways of evading it, as the only mode of bringing evasions to book, was the process of law. It was necessary not only to do that, but to have a tribunal to fix the rate. That can only be done by some body such as this, and it was, therefore, thought well that the body should have power not only to adjudicate on this question of rates, but should have power to fix rates, and alter them where they are an infringement of the Constitution. I do not say that it is not an arguable matter, but it is worthy of consideration. If you are to have this body to perform these duties, that body should be composed of men holding office under such a tenure as to be above political, State, or Federal influence.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No matter whether they are right or wrong, Parliament cannot interfere.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Unless for misbehavior.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

That is a very serious position.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

If it is necessary to place the Railway Commissioners in that position surely it is necessary in the case of the Inter-State Commission.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We appoint our Railway Commissioners for a fixed term.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I was thinking of New South Wales.

Mr. TREWITH:

It is done by Parliament.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I know that it is.

Mr. TREWITH:

Cannot you trust the Federal Parliament then?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

If it is necessary to have this body, it is necessary that it should be constituted in the same way that the judges are, and for that reason we place these men above all influences. The question is a very simple one. In the first place, do you think it possible to carry out the principles of this Constitution regarding the equality of trade without some body of this kind, not only to adjudicate, but to fix and alter the rates, if necessary?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We have already determined that there shall be this Commission.
Mr. O'CONNOR:

Then it must be in some such form as here described. I hope that Sir William Zeal's amendment will not be entertained for a moment.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

By leave, I will withdraw my amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. TRENWITH:

The Parliament will be elected tinder the Constitution which provides that there shall be absolute freedom of trade, and surely we have a right to assume that the Federal Parliament will desire to achieve that end. From time to time the Parliament may deem that other means should be adopted to deal with the matter, but if you carry this you will tie their hands. We have handed the management of the railways over to Commissioners, practically abrogating our right to manage them, but in this matter you may tie the hands of the Federal Parliament in a manner which may be found to be most irksome.

Mr. GRANT:

I hope the clause will not be passed, because, in the event of the federation of the railways, which many of us earnestly desire, we may tie the hands of the Federal Parliament, and give a most costly Commission a long life, or else have to pay them an enormous compensation to retire after their services had ceased to be of much value. The Federal Parliament would certainly be in a far better position to constitute that tribunal some time hence, if found necessary, than we are now. Therefore, I hope the clause will be struck out.

Clause struck out.

Clause 95.-The Commission shall have such powers of adjudication, and administration as may be necessary for its purposes and as the Parliament may from to time determine; but shall have no powers in reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway front the railway of a neighboring State.

Mr. WISE:

The Prime Minister of Victoria, Sir George Turner, used an expression which I desire to use and act in the spirit of—that in this matter we ought to be perfectly frank with one another—and I will endeavor to put my idea of what these words mean as clearly as possible. It appears to me the meaning is so clear that I am convinced that I am either looking at it in a right view, or my view has not been put before those who think differently. If we were bargaining here one against the other, I would be giving away a strong point for New South Wales, because—I say it publicly as I have Raid it privately—if the words after "determine" are left out Victoria will be in a far worse position.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We are satisfied.

Mr. WISE:
I have no objection, but it will work to our benefit and against yours. If there is no necessity for me to explain how I will not do so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I would be glad to hear the hon. member.

Mr. WISE:
The view I take of it is that the clauses run in this way: The previous clause provided that there shall be no regulations or rates that interfere with the freedom of trade between the States. Then we have provided for the appointment of a Commission to execute the Constitution. The Constitution only gives power to deal with the traffic between States, and confers no power whatever on the Commission to deal with the internal commerce of any State, and in order to give that power where the internal commerce of the State is being so managed as to indirectly affect the commerce of another State the words after the word "determine" have been added, and I have, I think, the concurrence of the hon. member, Mr.
Higgins, that if the words after "determine" were not there, Parliament could pass no law authorising the Commission to interfere in any way with any rate that might be made by the Railway Commissioners of New South Wales to any point within their own territory, and dealing only with the products of that colony.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Unless it derogated from the other parts.

Mr. WISE:
No matter what it derogated from. I have authorities from the United States to that effect. Let me repeat. The Constitution only gives power over the trade between States. A Commission is appointed with regard to trade between States. The first words of section 95 only give Parliament power to pass a law to determine the powers of the Commission within the Constitution, and inasmuch as the Constitution confers no power whatever to deal with the internal commerce of any State so long its the traffic is passing from one point in the State to another point in the same State any Act of the Commonwealth giving the Commission that power would be void. I know nothing whatever of the drafting of the clause, but I apprehend that in order to prevent that for which we are guided by the decisions in America, the words after "determine" were inserted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Why state:
But shall have no powers in reference to the rates and regulations of any railway in any State except?
Mr. WISE:
It is unnecessary.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You assume there is power.
Mr. WISE:
It is to remove any feeling of insecurity and prevent the cry that the Commission is going to interfere with purely local rates that it has been given the exceptional power to deal with the cases where the rates are preferentially drawing the traffic from one State to another.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
How does it get at New South Wales drawing the Riverina trade from Victoria?

Mr. WISE:
I am not all expert, but can give instances, for although I am not an expert I have studied the question for many years past. We are all agreed that the greater portion of Riverina geographically belongs to Victoria. I am prepared to say that, a great portion of the trade should go entirely to Victoria. But there is an enormous bulk of trade which Victoria gets improperly that would give us more than we would lose.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Hear, hear. That is so.

Mr. WISE:
There are two considerations which determine the natural course of trade. One is geographical proximity, the other is traffic facilities.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Including freights.

Mr. WISE:
Sir George Turner need not think I am going to slur over that, but I will leave that for a moment, I put this case. The distance from a point upon the Hay line to the River Murray is, I suppose, 150 miles. I speak subject to correction. If you take a point equi-distant from the Hay line and the River Murray, and assume that the means of traffic between each place are similar, it is a matter of indifference whether the traffic from that spot-75 miles from the Hay line and 75 miles from Echuca-goes to the one or the other. Assuming that there are no reductions of freights on the Hay line it would be a matter of geographical indifference. Then suppose you take a place five miles from the River Murray, and consequently 145 miles from the Hay line. Anybody can see at once that the natural drift of traffic five miles from the River Murray would be to Melbourne, and if the rates on the Hay line were so low that the Railway Commissioners were able to carry the goods of the man 145 miles away from their own railway and only five miles from the Victorian railway, that would be clear evidence of a design to draw traffic from Victoria to the New South Wales railways. Then reverse the position, and I can speak from my own knowledge on the point. There is a place named Uardry on the Hay line. The then owners of that run were among those who petitioned the Government of New South Wales to construct the line from Junee to Hay. There was a considerable clip, and the prospect of carrying that clip was a good inducement for them to build the line. The railway station is four miles from the woolshed on the Uardry run. That same woolshed is six or seven miles from the river. No sooner did the iron horse come into the Uardry run, and a railway station was erected four miles from the woolshed, than the Victorian Government granted to the Uardry owners a rate so low that it paid them, instead of carting the wool from the shed to the station, four miles away, to cart it seven miles to the river, then run it 822 miles down the river until it reached the Victorian Railway Station, and send it to Melbourne. The practical result was that the Victorian Government undertook the transport of the wool from the woolshed to the river and down the river, and also paid the insurance and freight for nothing. Anyone can see that that is a rate designed to draw trade, although Uardry is geographically nearer Melbourne than Sydney. It is only four miles off the railway, but is seven by road and over 800 by road and river from the Victorian Station. I have taken these two instances, which are extremes. An expert can tell, by the evidence before him, under what category you must place all cases between those two extremes. That is why I said to Sir George Turner, who was not inclined to think I was speaking seriously, that I am right. If I am right, I am not making this bargain for my own colony, but I am doing what I consider to be best in the interests of Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Supposing the place is 500 miles from Sydney and 200 from Melbourne, would you fix the same rates?

Mr. WISE:

It all depends on the circumstances of every case. There are two considerations which determine the natural drift of trade. The one is geographical proximity, and the other is facilities for transport. The sole object of the clause is to provide that facilities of transport shall be such as are given in the ordinary course of trade, as would be given under fair circumstances if the whole system were owned by one company, and to prohibit such facilities for transport being given for improper and unreasonable purposes. and for the purpose of drawing away traffic, which but for these facilities would go into other colonies. Whether a particular case would come within the meaning of this clause or not is for a tribunal of experts having, all the evidence before them to decide. The test given by Mr. Deakin is a fair one, namely, that a long distance rate should be the same mutatis mutandis to all places within a colony; not absolutely the same, because there may be a special river competing in one district, or the difficulties of hauling over a mountain range in another. Therefore I question whether it is in the interest of the whole Federation to strike out these words, which when struck out will expose this clause to the danger of criticism in Victoria, because when the matter is investigated it will be seen that the omission of these words will abolish all those weapons Victoria is using now to secure the New South Wales trade.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Oh, no; it will not.

Mr. WISE:

The whole question turns upon the meaning of the words "inter-state commerce." Commerce which goes from one State to another is inter-state commerce. And if one railway system attempts to draw trade from one State into another, it comes at once under the cognizance of the Inter-State Commission, but if your trade starts from a point and goes to a point within your borders—if the two terminal points are both within your borders and if the goods are the product of your own colony—the Commission could not touch it but for the subsequent words of this clause. By the insertion of these words we give for the first time to the Commission a power which the Inter-State Commission in America has not—power to investigate the rates charged upon the New South Wales railways on New South Wales goods to see whether or not these rates infringe the general principles of this Constitution. My sole desire has been to prevent misunderstanding on this matter, and to explain it as clearly and fully as possible, and not to advocate the particular interests of any particular colony.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I thank my hon. friend for the trouble he has been at to explain this question, which, it must be admitted, is a very serious one, not only for the railway traffic of Victoria, but for the city of Melbourne; because, if what I fear can happen under this particular clause, it means a very serious loss indeed to the whole of our colony. The advantage which New South Wales has is that having such a long line of railway practically within their own colony they will be able to have practically the advantage of preferential rates without their being so termed, whereas we in Victoria could not have them, because they would be termed preferential rates and be forbidden. My friend Mr. Wise has put the matter very fairly, and I am not prepared to say at the present time whether these words should remain. They are at any rate unfortunately expressed.

Mr. DEAKIN:
They put a negative instead of a positive.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They assume on the face of them that this Commission will have power to deal with all rates and regulations of any railway in any States, and then say that this Commission shall not deal with the whole, but only with a certain portion of them. I certainly was misled into thinking, from the way in which the clauses were framed, that the Commission would undoubtedly have power to deal with all the rates, and then that it was intended to take part of that power away from them, and only leave them a portion of it. My hon. friend assures me that that is not the reading of it. I am not prepared at the present time to say whether these words are required or not, and I therefore shall not move to strike them out, but I shall reserve to myself, at the adjourned Convention, after hearing from experts the real effect of these words, the right, if I find they ought not to be there, to urge as strongly as possible that they should be removed. I know from past experience in regard to railway matters, that even when our Commissioner was ready, from a railway point of view, to enter into a bargain with a Commissioner from another colony I have refused to sanction the bargain, because I recognised that, while it would be advantageous to the railways it would be disadvantageous to the colony.

Progress reported; Convention resumed.

THE DRAFT BILL.

Mr. BARTON:
There is a general desire to see this Bill as far as it has gone, and it will greatly assist hon. members to have a clean print to-morrow morning. I know that a motion on the matter would be informal at the present stage, but if it is the wish of the Convention, that is, if I can take your leave, Mr. President, I will give instructions to obtain a clean print.

The PRESIDENT: Certainly.
Mr. BARTON:
Then I will arrange that the Bill be printed to-night, showing the amendments so far as they have gone.

THE STATE OF BUSINESS.
Mr. BARTON:
Sir George Turner desires me to make a statement as to the course of business. It will be this - we have to deal with clause 95; then we have two postponed clauses, 15 and 86. After that there will be the clauses for reconsideration, a list of which I have read. After that we have one or two new clauses to propose, and then any new clauses which hon. members may desire to propose.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We ought to be able to finish to-morrow night.

Mr. BARTON:
Yes. If hon. members will give me the Bill at 12 o'clock to- [P.1121] starts here morrow I will let them go till Friday morning.

RETURN.
Mr. HOLDER:
I beg to lay on the table a return to the order of Dr. Quick, and move that it be printed.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
ADJOURNMENT.
The Convention adjourned at 11.38 p.m.
Thursday April 22, 1897.

Address of Congratulation to the Queen - Order of Business - Leave of Absence to Delegates - Commonwealth of Australia Bill. - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

ADDRESS OF CONGRATULATION TO THE QUEEN.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
On behalf of the Committee appointed yesterday to prepare an address to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen, I have to bring the address up and move that it be received and read.

Motion agreed to.

The Clerk of the Convention read the address, which was as follows:

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty: May it please your Majesty: We, your Majesty's loyal subjects, representatives of the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania, and Western Australia in the Federal Convention of Australasia assembled, approach your Majesty with assurances of sincere attachment to your throne and person. We present to your Majesty our loyal and cordial congratulations on the length and glory of a reign unexampled in the history of your people, and we fervently hope that a federal union of the Australasian Colonies under the Crown will be a lasting and noble monument of the sixtieth anniversary of your Majesty's beneficent occupation of the throne.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I am not quite sure whether it is necessary to move that the address be adopted. I have not got the words before me of the resolution of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT:
I think it will be sufficient if the hon. representative were to move that the address be adopted.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Then I move:
That the address be adopted.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I second that.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARTON:
I should like to remind the Convention that I got permission to have the Bill printed last night. A proof has been corrected and sent back to the printer. The copies were to have been here at half-past 10 o'clock. They cannot possibly be long delayed, and in a few minutes hon. members will have them in their hands. In the meantime we may be able to go on with the business in hand.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO DELEGATES.

Mr. HOLDER:

I move:

That leave of absence for the remainder of the session be granted to the Hon. J. N. Brunker, the Hon. J. H. Carruthers, the Hon. G. H. Reid, the Hon. W. J. Lyne, the Hon. Sir Joseph Abbott, Mr. M. J. Clarke, Mr. S. Fraser, and Mr J. H. Taylor, on account of urgent private and public affairs; and to Mr. Solomon on account of illness.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I second the motion.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee (continued from Wednesday, April 21st).

Clause 95.-The Commission shall have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary for its purposes, and as the Parliament may from time to time determine; but shall have no powers in reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State.

Mr. HOLDER:

This is a matter in which I have taken a very considerable interest in the past, and I listened with close attention to the speech which my hon. friend Mr. Wise made last night. His argument has impressed me very much, yet I think there is just one matter he has overlooked which might have induced him to change his views very materially. Last night Mr. Wise pointed to the latter part of the clause, and suggested that that gave powers to the Inter-State Commission, which, without these words, they would not have. If these powers are the largest they have, I should be the very last to take them from the Commission. On the contrary, I desire that they should have not fewer but more powers. The largest power that the Commission will have will surely be that which will arise under section 92, which gives them authority to give effect to this portion of the Constitution as well as to other portions, and it will be their duty to see that no law or regulation of commerce or railway traffic shall give advantage to one port of a State in the Commonwealth above another port in another State of the Commonwealth.
If the Commission has power under clause 92, with the words to which I have referred, to prevent any preference being given to one State above another State, the Commission will have power to regulate the tariffs on, say, the through railway between Melbourne and Sydney, so that it would be impossible for New South Wales to carry goods from Albury to Sydney at lower rates than Victoria could carry them from south of Cootamundra to Melbourne. Lower rates would be preferential rates. If that be so, the concluding words of the section will limit the powers of the Inter-State Commission. It is because I hold that view that I would like to see the clause cease at the word "determine." Mr. Wise will see the bearing this has on the question, and to repeat what I have already said, if the powers of the Commission include all that is referred to in section 92 then the latter part of the clause is not an extension but a limitation of the powers, and ought not to remain.

Mr. Wise:
I agree that the Inter-State Commission will have power to carry out all the authority conferred by every part of this Constitution, including what is contained in section 92. I still adhere to the view I expressed last night, that the concluding portions of section 95 had to a certain extent enlarged that power, so as to extend not only to dealing with rates which prefer ports, but to all classes of rates of the character described in the concluding portion of section 95.

Mr. McMillan:
It seems to me that the time must come when we must face the difficulties of this railway question. We had for hours last night to listen to what was practically a sparring match between New South Wales and Victoria, and I think that our legal friends in the Convention might now take up a judicial attitude instead of specially pleading over this matter. Perhaps it would be better to have the position of New South Wales and Victoria exactly stated. Speaking generally, what Victoria desires is to get back her natural geographical area in the Riverina, district.

Sir William Zeal:
She never lost it.

Mr. McMillan:
That is a matter of opinion. At any rate we may have helped her very much to get it by our own operations in that particular district. The difficulty with Victoria is that under clause 95, if she is prohibited from making what are called preferential rates, and if she is not to give up the trade in Riverina coming along her own railways, she will have practically to make the same rate throughout the whole of her territory as she gives to those outside Riverina. We know well enough that you cannot have any uniformity of railway rates throughout Australia. We know there are peculiar difficulties in each service, and to apply the same scale of charges in Victoria as in New South Wales, for various reasons, would be impossible. We come to the question with regard to what is a preferential and what is a differential rate. I think it may be allowed that purely differential rates for long distances may have no connection with the question of taking the trade from a neighboring colony. Therefore the question we have got to face is this: is it possible for there to be a reasonable differential rate on the basis of the long distance from Sydney in the Riverina district without interfering with the equality of trade. This, after all, as explained by experts, is more or less a question of railway management. It may appear to many that great losses accrue from this system of management, but we are informed that even at the present time, with these differential rates for the Riverina district, it pays the New South Wales railway system to deal with it on the present basis.

Mr. FRASER:
So it pays Victoria.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
On the other hand, if you say to New South Wales, "You must make differential rates on a certain basis, and you must make your railway rates going towards Victoria on a certain basis," the result will be that you may have a large portion of our lines which were projected into that part of our territory to meet the desires of the producers because no other colony could project them, and the result may be that all of the pods in that part of the colony may be diverted to Victoria and Melbourne, and New South Wales might have to pay the loss on that particular part of her railway system. It seems to me that you cannot put into this Constitution, by any elaborate words which the wit of man can devise, anything that can meet the varying conditions of this complicated question. The question is, are you going to give absolutely full powers to this Inter-State Commission to decide on general principles as to whether this equality of trade has been interfered with or not. I confess that this a very serious question for New South Wales, and I would point out that there are certain elements connected with one's associations with one's own colony which may lead people, under certain conditions, to divert trade to their own capital, and it seems to me we may be doing a great hardship to many settlers of New South Wales by asking them to turn a somersault, and direct their trade from Cootamundra to Melbourne instead of to Sydney. If you follow out this question to an absolute logical conclusion, it means that more or less from a central point between Melbourne and Sydney all the trade, from the position taken up by Victoria, should be diverted to Melbourne. If there is any sense at all in the thing it means that from somewhere this side of Cootamundra the whole of the trade should be diverted to Melbourne. There is no doubt there are charges now made on the lines going towards Victoria from New South Wales, near the border, which are specially made to prohibit the traffic, and there is no doubt that these charges are absolutely anti-federal, and I am advised that the Railway Commissioners have been very anxious to remove such cause of complaint.

Mr. WISE:

On both sides.

Mr. McMILLAN:

At the same time, if we are going to leave that differential system in the hands of an inter-State body to deal with it equitably, there is no doubt that Victoria must give up what are allowed by all to be preferential rates, no matter what may be the effect on her own colony. Therefore, it seems to me that there must be to some extent general powers given to this Inter State Commission, but at the same time it will be a very serious thing—I am speaking plainly, without absolutely suggesting a remedy—if it is thought that we are giving large discretion to a Commission which would have absolute power to deal with this question on general principles. I would suggest therefore that we leave the clause as it is.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

That would never do.

Mr. McMILLAN:

Subject to the direction of opinion that may take place between this and the next meeting of the Convention, I allow with Mr. Holder that it does limit the opera

Mr. DEAKIN:

I think we are very much indebted to Mr. McMillan and Mr. Wise, who spoke before him, for the perfectly candid and straightforward manner in which they addressed themselves to this question. It is by such frankness that the best understanding can be arrived at, and whatever differences of opinion there may be as to expressing one conclusion can be left for the Drafting Committee to deal with. We can leave it to our friends, who can find in that some means of pleasantly occupying their idle hours.

Mr. BARTON:

If the hon. member will find the idle hours I shall be pleased.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Very soon. It will be noticed, however, that the position is a little complicated, owing to the fact that the views of the two hon. members as to the effect of this clause are diametrically opposed, Mr. Wise's opinion being that it is an expansion, and Mr. McMillan's that it is a limitation of the powers to be given to the Inter-State Commission by the other clauses in this Bill. That is a matter which we must presently resolve. Meanwhile, in order to see that I understand Mr. McMillan, perhaps he will allow me to put a case. If the railways of Australia were wholly taken over by the federal authority, I presume the system to be followed as between the several centres would be that at a middle point like Cootamundra-

Mr. MCMILLAN:

If the railways were federalised the whole thing would be settled.

Mr. WISE:

All this proves the advisability of taking over the railways.

Mr. DEAKIN:

If the railways were federalised then from Cootamundra, taking that as the middle point between Sydney and Melbourne, the rates would be practically the same to each capital. That would be obtained because the tapering which takes place in charges for long distances would commence from Sydney and Melbourne respectively, and balance at the midway point. That would be the position if the railways were federalised. Mr. McMillan appears to understand the proposal in this Bill to differ from that considerably—he says the tapering would continue from Melbourne to the New South Wales border, but beyond that the Victorian Government will have no power to make any tapering. It can make no allowance for goods carried for the Victorian lines between Cootamundra and Albury, because our boundary is at Albury. If I understand the hon. member aright when he speaks of the tapering rate from Sydney to Albury, he means a rate tapering only to the same extent on this line as everywhere else in New South Wales.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Just the same as if it went into the desert.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Under these circumstances he quite frankly realises that the abolition of preferential rates in Victoria will be greatly to the advantage of New South Wales. Then the hon. member puts clearly on the other side what will be the one advantage to Victoria which we do not at present enjoy. In his opinion, under this clause, it would no longer be possible for New South Wales to charge exceptional rates for goods coming to us from Cootamundra to Albury, such as are charged now. He says that under the Inter-State Commission the charge from Cootamundra, to Albury will he the same as for any similar distance in New South Wales, not the tapered rate, but a universally higher rate for the shorter distance. It will only be able to charge the same freight from Cootamundra to Albury as would be charged to some point the same distance from Sydney.

Mr. BARTON:
Each point is a different starting point, and therefore the rate which may be differential will not be preferential.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The same differential rate all over the country. The same rate also for any distance from Albury as for the same distance from any point in the colony; and so far as that is the policy there will be some gain to Victoria. But there is a greater loss, because our attempt to adopt differential rates for goods carried to us from beyond our borders is to be forbidden. Preferential rates really are differential rates not limited to distances within our own colony. Now we are to be limited by our boundaries.

Mr. BARTON:
The Inter-State Commission in America would allow a rate which was a mere rate for development, and did not interfere with Inter-State traffic.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Just so. Then Mr. McMillan frankly says if you give Victoria this concession in regard to rates from Cootamundra to Albury and vice versa, as against the prohibition of preferential rates in Victoria, the advantage is very large to New South Wales. He not unnaturally claims that New South Wales is entitled to have that advantage within its own territory. The question is, does that embody the view of the remaining members of the New South Wales delegation, and if it does, does it embody the views of this Convention as a whole. Unless the railways are federalised, I fear we cannot gain the substantial benefits that would accrue from having them federalised. We cannot, as far as I can see, repose in any outside body a controlling power to enter into the railway system of any State and dictate to its management what rates shall obtain, or that the same rates shall obtain as if the railways were the property of an Australian nation. If that cannot be done, is the proposal suggested by the hon. member the nearest approach to the federation of the railways that we can have. I do not think that I am well enough acquainted with the subject to definitely say that it is.

Mr. BARTON:
It must not be forgotten that the Inter-State Commission would have no power to adjudicate unless a complaint was brought before them.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I am aware of that. It seems to me that the problem we have to solve is that just at the moment this is the utmost advance towards a federal control of the railways; but I say that we may devise something during the next three or four months that may carry the matter further, even while leaving it in the hands of the Inter-State Commission. I recognise the difficulties. I see that, while you leave the railway systems attached to the States you must allow the States to assist and foster them with all the powers they possess. I shall be glad, on further consideration, to see some proposal by which this Convention, even if not seeing its way to the federalisation of the railways, may take a longer step in advance towards complete federal control.

Mr. WISE:

Is the hon. member in a position to inform the Convention what were the reasons why the Victorian Government rejected the agreement arrived at between their Commissioner and our Commissioner for the purpose of getting rid of these rates, or does he not see that if the Railway Commissioners were able as experts to arrive at an arrangement, the Inter-State Commission could do the same?

Mr. DEAKIN:

I was not a member of that Government. Fortunately or unfortunately I am entirely in the dark as to the reasons which guided the Government, except so far as they were indicated by Sir George Turner last night. Sir George Turner pointed out that the Railway Commissioners had looked at it merely as a matter of railway management. He said other interests were greatly affected, and it was a consideration of those interests which led them to reject a proposal made on a purely railway basis. I do not propose to enter into that now. I have indicated the tentative state of my own mind. The problem will be closely studied by all of us during the recess. I understand Mr. Barton sees no objection to the proviso under discussion being retained in a positive instead of a negative form, if it be retained at all. Probably the simplest course would be to strike it out for the present.

Mr. BARTON:

The idea is to make the clause mean that the powers of the Commission "shall extend only to cases," and so on. Then Mr. Holder wants the words "and made and used" changed to "and made or used."

Mr. MCMILLAN:

If this question has such difficulties, it will help Mr. Deakin's scheme for taking over the railways.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I do not regard it as my scheme by any means. I am only a recent convert. I do not claim any credit for it. During my election campaign I said that the idea, though excellent in principle, seemed to me to be impracticable. This discussion only shows how difficult it would be to exercise any control upon federal principles unless we take over all the railways.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You may convert others, for the newest converts are generally the greatest enthusiasts.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Mr. McMillan made a suggestion, following Sir George Turner practically the suggestions were the same as to how we might remove a good deal of difficulty. If we can come to a clear understanding of what our respective views are now, we shall have time before we meet to ascertain the views of our Parliaments. I had prepared an amendment - a proviso removing a possible construction of the existing words. It would make the last part of the clause read:

Except in cases of rates or regulations made for the purpose of creating any preference or advantage over any port or railway of one State over any port or railway of another State.

Mr. GORDON:

It has been very interesting to all of us, and elucidatory of the whole question to have statements of the case between New south Wales and Victoria, as to whether the railways of Victoria have been taking business from the railways of New South Wales, or whether the New South Wales railways have been taking business from the railways of Victoria.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

We were especially asked that we should confine ourselves to New South Wales and Victoria as illustrative of the question.

Mr. GORDON:

I am not complaining, the discussion has thrown light on the whole question, but it is not simply a question as between railway and railway. One little paragraph from the report of the Sydney Railway Commissioners shows that there should he much wider outlook than as between merely the railways of Victoria and New South Wales. They say:

The preferential rates appear to have been initiated about the year 1870. Up to that time South Australia had done practically the whole of the Darling River business; but in the year named the Victorian Commissioner for Customs made a report to the Victorian Government on the prospects of diverting the Darling and Murrumbidgee traffic to Melbourne. The then Victorian Minister for Railways favorably entertained the proposals, differential rates were established, and a commission of 6d. per bale was offered to any carrier who was able to bring 10,000 bales of wool from the Darling during one season. This commission was gained by a Victorian f

Of course it had to cease, because from the same report it appears that the Victorians, while charging £6 12s. for a certain class of their own goods from Melbourne to Swan Hill, carried New South Wales goods a longer distance for £2 3s.

Mr. FRASER:
Not a longer distance.

Mr. GORDON:
I find the hon. member is right; it is the same distance, but it was the same class of goods. They charged from Melbourne to Echuca, on New South Wales goods 30s., and charged their own people £4 13s.; from Melbourne to Albury, for fourth-class goods, they charged New South Wales people £3 6s. 10d., and their own people £5 16s. 8d. That was undoubtedly a railway matter as between Victoria and New South Wales, but what of our river trade which has been cut off by this cut-throat system? It is a question not only between railway and railway, but between railway and river.

Mr. FRASER:
Certainly.

Mr. GORDON:
The result is that the natural outlet for a great deal of this trade—the Rivers
Murray, Darling, and Murrumbidgee, which enter the sea in South Australia—has been absolutely neglected. A great deal of the wool trade and general goods-carrying must be diverted to either one or other of those railways in the natural course of things, but if there were fair rates on those Victorian and New South Wales railways a great deal of it would come down the river from stations further up, because once the wool is on the river water carriage is exceedingly cheap, and owing to the expense of unloading and handling twice, and the greater expense of land carriage over water carriage, the rivers are the proper channels for the traffic.

Mr. FRASER:
It does now.

Mr. GORDON:
More would come down but for this unhealthy and improper competition. The clause as drawn here restricts the powers of the Inter-State Commission to:

Cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State.

It says nothing whatever about an improper diversion of river traffic.
question whether in this case the Inter-State Commission would have power to investigate the question of preferential railway rates designed to cut off the river trade.

Mr. FRASER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON:

I am glad the hon. member, who has had great experience, not only of general business, but also of that particular traffic, agrees with me. I put it that possibly the Victorian and New South Wales Railways Commissioners might agree together to make a special rate which would suit them both and yet kill the South Australian river traffic.

Mr. FRASER:

They would not do that. You cannot kill the water traffic.

Mr. GORDON:

They have done it at present any way. Our steamers are rotting on the banks of the river by dozens.

An HON. MEMBER:

Too many snags in it.

Mr. GORDON:

If the hon. member will only give South Australia fair play with regard to the river question she is prepared to do her duty in the matter of keeping snags out.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Even out of the Convention!

Mr. GORDON:

But while some other reasons may have operated to injure the trade which would come down the River Murray, these exceedingly cut-throat rates have been the principal cause. So far as I can see the amendment of Mr. Holder would prevent this particularly dangerous limitation. The only real test as to whether a railway rate is preferential or not is whether the traffic is carried at a loss to the railway carrying it; that is the test as between railway and railway. Then if any railway tapped any of our river districts, and such a rate was imposed as would land the railway charging it in a loss on that particular traffic, that is unfair competition with the river.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Experts may not be able to determine what is a loss. What appears to he a loss may not really be a loss.

Mr. GORDON:

Of course, some scope must be given for railway management. Experts should be the best judges. Looking at the matter from a common-sense standpoint. I think this generalisation may he considered correct, that if any railway touching a river carries goods at a loss, in order to divert the traffic from that river, it should he prevented.

Mr. GRANT:

Use the words "reasonable profit."

Mr. GORDON:

Mr. Grant suggests reasonable profit. I have no objection to that, though it would open the question as to what is a reasonable profit. The matter would be left very much to the Inter-State Commission. They would be like a jury, and would have to decide on the facts. If it were a new railway, some allowance would have to be made, but once a settled state of things were established the test which I have submitted, and which I think is a sound general principle, should be applied. One part of a railway may pay and another part may not. Goods carried long distances may be carried at a loss, which is made up by traffic at the other end, where the population is thicker, and traffic and trade greater. But the real test would be, is the railway diverting traffic from a river by carrying a particular line of goods at a loss? The more I look at this the more I regret that I did not adhere to the amendment I suggested yesterday, or some modification of it that would supply this test. That is the touchstone of the whole thing.

Mr. FRASER:

Who could say that the traffic was being carried at a loss?

Mr. GORDON:

The Inter-State Commission sitting as a jury.

Mr. FRASER:

They could not do it.

Mr. GORDON:

We must give them very large powers. It should be viewed from a commercial standpoint. We cannot do everything, but we can do all we can under the circumstances. We ought to adopt some basic proposition which would guide the Commission in its decisions, and the one I have suggested meets the case. This is, of course, a very important matter to New South Wales and Victoria, as we have heard in the long discussions, but it is a great deal more vital to South Australia. We have a great natural artery running to the sea.

Mr. WALKER:

Have you a good port?

Mr. GORDON:

We have an excellent port at Goolwa, and for thirty years all the wool of these rivers came down to South Australia, and the return goods went up.
But no river in the world could stand rates such as I have quoted to-day. It is simply monstrous. All I contend for is that our proper geographical position should be assured. For Federation to be of any service to South Australia we must be absolutely secure in connection with the commercial part of the bargain. Unless we are so secured, except for the advantages we should have in defence, we have nothing whatever to gain from Federation.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Commercally you have everything to gain and nothing to lose.

Mr. GORDON:
Not everything to gain.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Commercially.

Mr. GORDON:
I frankly admit-it would be fatuous to deny it—that South Australia has a great deal to gain commercially. But whether or not we get the benefits of Federation depends upon whether the commercial bargain is fair or not; in short, whether we are sufficiently protected against our more powerful neighbors. It would be idle to conceal that if Victoria and New South Wales combined together to make preferential rates we are not rich enough to contend with them. We are perfectly powerless unless we get embedded in the Constitution that the contract on commercial lines shall be absolutely fair to South Australia, which has natural geographical advantages with its ports, its river, and an extensive littoral. We cannot conceal the commanding position of our ports.

Mr. DEAKIN:
No; they are on the map.

Mr. GORDON:
Exactly. What I am so anxious about, and what I am sure hon. members from the other colonies are equally anxious about, is that, as far as possible, every colony shall have all the advantages to which it is justly entitled under this Federation. Victoria, of course, will gain from South Australia—

Mr. DEAKIN:
Intellectually we gain.

Mr. GORDON:
Yes; Victoria will gain from South Australia intellectually. We each want our share of the advantages which will ensue from the general compact. Our share of the advantage will be the advantage of our geographical position. We are not prepared to fight our more wealthy and powerful neighbors in a war of tariffs, so that we must have embedded in this Constitution some provision that South Australia shall receive those natural advantages to which she is entitled by reason of her geographical position. I do not want to detain the Committee unduly, but the matter is so important to us that I am bound to point out that this clause, confining as it does the operations of the Inter-State Commission to the railways, will not meet our case. Not only must there be equality of trade between railway and railway, but equality of trade between river and railway.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I think it is wise that we adjourned the discussion on this very important subject last night, because we have an opportunity of starting fresh this morning, and starting perhaps on somewhat different lines. Mr. McMillan says that the object of Victoria is to get back her natural position in Riverina. I do not think that is so, but what we desire is to keep the natural advantages to which we are entitled by the geographical position of Riverina. We do not desire to allow the other colony by a system of differential rates, which in reality are preferential, to take away from Victoria the benefits of the trade of Riverina to which, it is apparently admitted all round, we are entitled. What we ought to desire to do may be put in this form: that whatever are the natural advantages of a port no State should be allowed to interfere so as to draw trade from its natural channel; that absolute justice should be done to all parts of the Commonwealth, leaving out imaginary boundary lines; that the people in all districts shall have conceded to them the advantages of their natural position; and that no obstruction to the free flow of traffic in its natural channel should be allowed. These words are taken from some reports which have been presented and laid before the House. It appears to me that this clause in its present form will have an effect which in all probability those who brought it forward do not desire. It is a peculiar circumstance that, while the Finance Committee made a certain recommendation, the Drafting Committee have inserted this clause, which has given rise to a very large amount of debate. The Finance Committee resolved:

That in order to deal effectively with all railway matters arising between the States, and to enforce the principles of equality of trade laid down in the Constitution, there shall be established by the Federal Parlia

For the purpose of giving effect to that resolution the Drafting Committee have prepared this clause and the proviso to it which has given rise to all the difficulties in connection with this discussion. Mr. Wise last night assured us that the object of the latter words was in reality to enlarge the scope and authority of this Commission, and that unless we had words in the Constitution similar to those which have been proposed the Commission would be unable to deal with the rates in the various colonies which are really preferential, although they might appear nominally to be differential. The matter is a serious one, not only for Victoria, but for South Australia and New South Wales, and our only object should be, as the representatives of the various colonies in this Convention, to devise some scheme which would be fair and equitable to the people of all the colonies. I admit this is a somewhat difficult object to attain, one reason being that we have not expert knowledge ourselves which would enable us to deal more effectively with the difficulties, but we ought not to tie the hands of this new body in such a way that it will not be able to take advantage of any expert information which it may have amongst its own members, or able to obtain from evidence given to it. The clause states:

The Commission shall have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary for its purposes and as the Parliament may from time to time determine.

That appears to me so far to leave the whole matter in the hands of Parliament, which at the beginning can say: "We will give to this Commission certain powers and authorities." Later on, Parliament, finding these powers and authorities are not sufficient to carry out the object in view, can increase them. If, again, Parliament discovers that these powers and authorities have been given in an improper way, and that they are exercising an improper influence they can alter them. If we are prepared to leave to Parliament to decide the large questions of freetrade and protection, or the amount of duties to be imposed, and to make alterations in them from time to time, why should we be afraid to leave it to the Federal Parliament to say from time to time what powers and privileges this body should exercise? Our energies should be bent on investing the Parliament with the full authority to give to this Commission the fullest possible powers and authority by which justice would be done to all parts of the Commonwealth. The powers of the Commission are thus stated:

The Commission shall have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary for its purposes and as the Parliament may from time to time determine; but shall have no powers in reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State.

Unless the rates or regulations are made and used for a certain purpose the Commission has no power to interfere with them.

Mr. HOLDER:
You have to prove the motives they had in making them.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Before the Commission can deal with them somebody has got to be satisfied that not alone are they preferential in effect, but something else. that they were made and used for the particular purpose. How can that possibly ever be proved? Victoria would charge New South Wales with making and using certain regulations for the purpose, but it would be utterly impossible to prove that in the manner in which it would have to be proved. Who is to be satisfied? Is it the Commission, or the Supreme Court, or the Parliament. There is not one word as to who is the person who is to be satisfied with regard to these particular matters. Not alone must the rates be made and use I for the purpose, but at the time they are made there must be the intention to improperly act. These rates may in all honesty he made for the purpose of differential rates, although they actually may be preferential in effect as regards another colony. While we might be able to show that there was an improper preference given to New South Wales goods against the railways of Victoria, unless we could go a step further and show that in addition to being preferential in effect they were actually made for the purpose of drawing the trade, and were actually being used for that purpose, we would absolutely fail. It seems to me in reading these words that we are placing ourselves absolutely at the mercy of New South Wales. We are in a difficult position now, but we have the power to fight. If New South Wales takes a certain course we can retaliate. If she takes away from us the trade which properly belongs to us in the Riverina district we can retort by taking away from her the trade from Bourke, which is in New South Wales. While we have that power we can make a fair bargain, but if we give away that power there will be a cut-throat policy, without any power on the part of Victoria to retaliate. That is a position we should not be placed in, nor do I believe that New South Wales desires to place us in that position; but I believe the effect of these words would be to place Victoria absolutely at the mercy of New South Wales with regard to traffic which we fairly claim we should have a large share of. If we proceed further we find that the regulations must be made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic from a neighboring State. In the case put by Mr. McMillan, New South Wales would fairly argue that her rates were not made for the purpose of drawing trade from Victoria, but for the purpose of retaining the traffic in New South Wales. That argument could be fairly used, and it would be a difficult one to answer while we in Victoria make the rates and cannot deny that they are made for the purpose of drawing traffic from New South Wales. The proper course will be to leave this subject to the Federal Parliament to deal with in such a mode as the members may think just and equitable to the colonies. It is probable, then, that some scheme will be adopted by which the receipts from the competing lines will be pooled and a division made upon a basis that will be just to the various colonies without doing injury to the persons residing in the particular localities. If we carry goods from these districts at rates far below what we should carry them for it means a loss to the revenue, and the other portions of the colony would have the difficult task of making up that loss. We should be prepared to charge all portions of our colony a fair rate, and we should so arrange it that where there are disputed territories and conflicting interests they should be worked in such a manner that the receipts should form one fund, and each colony interested should receive a fair proportion of that fund. Mr. McMillan suggests that we should leave this clause as it is, and that in four months' time we should reconsider it. That is giving a fair start to the clause, and if we allow it to remain we will have great difficulty in striking it out. Members who have not studied the question will say: "The Drafting Committee have put these clauses in the Bill for some purpose, and we had better allow them to remain." If we allow them to pass now we will have far greater difficulty in striking them out in four months' time than our friends from New South Wales would have in reinserting them. Mr. Wise said last night that he had not the slightest objection to striking them out, as they were put in for the benefit of South Australia, and Victoria, and when our friends are desirous, not only of being just, but also generous they will he equally just and generous if in four months' time we come to the conclusion they should be reinserted. The wisest course is to strike out the whole of that provision which has been put in for the good object of benefiting Victoria, as we are perfectly willing to trust to the generosity of our friends, when we come back in four months' time, if we find we have made a mistake. We are perfectly willing to trust to the Federal Parliament, because if they make a mistake they can easily rectify it, but if we place the words in the Constitution it will he very difficult to get them struck out. Even if we leave them in they should be qualified by the words:

Until Parliament otherwise determines,

So that Parliament may have the chance of dealing with the matter. I will move:

To strike out the words "but shall have no power in reference to the rates or regulations of any railways in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State."
The CHAIRMAN:
That may cause a difficulty if the Committee determined to retain the words, because then Mr. Holder will be prevented from moving his subsequent amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Then, as a test I will move:
To strike out the word "but."
If that is carried it will mean that the remainder of the words shall be struck out.

Mr. BARTON:
I intend to support the amendment moved by my hon. friend, but before it is carried I simply wish to state the effect of it. Clause 95 does not in itself cut down in any way the large powers of execution and maintenance of the provisions of the Constitution relating to freetrade, with regard to the railways and the rivers. In its second part, which my hon. friend wishes to leave out, it is a restriction on the powers of the Inter-State Commission, and if these words are left out which my hon. friend has moved to omit, then that restriction vanishes, and Parliament, whatever laws it makes with reference - to the powers and adjudication of the Inter-State Commission, must keep within the powers of clause 93, and therefore what will have to be maintained is this: Under the same provisions in the United States Constitution as are laid down here the State is entitled to the control of its own internal traffic.

Mr. GORDON:
I would like to ask the hon. member whether this does not amount to this, that the Commission has no power to interfere with railway rates that in effect might be preferential?

Mr. BARTON:
No. It has the effect of the maintenance of the States' individuality-that the State is absolutely sovereign with regard to the internal regulation of its own traffic, just as sovereign as the Parliament is with regard to its general powers in maintaining equality of trade; and therefore, unless there is a conflict between that internal regulation and the sovereign power of the Parliament, the State stands supreme.

Mr. GORDON:
Can I get the benefit of the hon. member's opinion, because I know Sir Samuel Griffith and Sir Henry Wrixon thought the words in the Bill of 1891 equal in strength to these, and that they would meet the position?

Mr. BARTON:
Sir Samuel Griffith and Sir Henry Wrixon were of opinion, I understand, that what are called differential rates would not be prevented. In 1891 the terms differential and preferential were not fully understood. The terms were used indiscriminately, but they are now better understood. A preferential rate will be against this Constitution, if it is preferential as affecting any Inter-State commerce or intercourse. A discriminating rate between one State and another will be bad, but within the limits of a State, a rate preferential in effect, but not

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am sure the hon. member Mr. Barton will do everything in his power to show us the effect of any amendment proposed, and I would like to understand this as much as possible, because it seems to me that it is a most important matter to all. It has been well put by, I think, my friend Mr.
carruthers, that freetrade is the main object of federation; and there is no use in transferring the scene of strife from the Customs House to the railway station. What I want to put is this. If we adopt this amendment will the position be this: that a State can do what it pleases for the purpose of securing to its own ports the trade and traffic which originates in that State.
Could not New South Wales adopt such a rate that, although Melbourne may be much nearer to the locality, it may render it utterly impossible for Melbourne to secure one ounce of the trade which originates north of the Murray.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not say that. When the hon. member has finished I will say what I mean.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am glad that that is not the position. What I understand is that in this Federation we want to do all we can for the purpose of securing that the trade shall flow in its natural channels; and I do not see, when we are proposing to call into existence a body of experts, who will be prepared from time to time to consider all questions arising in the carrying out of an important principle such as that, that we would not do well to lay down in colloquial language a rule for their guidance by saying that the principle on which they should be bound is that, while nothing shall be done in derogation of freedom of trade, as we have already provided, nothing shall be permitted to have the effect of diverting any trade or traffic from its natural channel. This board surely will be The Commission shall have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary for its purposes, and as the Parliament may from time to time determine, for the purpose of preventing diversion of trade or traffic from its natural channels.

Mr. FRASER:
That is plain enough.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am inclined to think it is plain enough. It will certainly affirm a principle which is very dear to those who are warm advocates of Federation, and I should like my hon. friend Mr. Barton to explain what will be the effect of the amendment suggested by Sir George Turner, and whether he would have any objection to giving power to the experts to do whatever is necessary for the purpose of giving practical effect to the principle I have referred to, that nothing shall be done for the purpose of drawing trade away from channels into which, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, it should naturally flow.

Mr. BARTON:
I must apologise to the Convention for taking up so much time in speaking, because I want to get on with the work. I thought I had made myself clear on what I consider the legal position. As regards traffic north of the Murray, it seems to me that a Commission called into existence for executing mandatory powers such as relate to trade and commerce will have to decide within its mandate and within the provisions of clause 92 as to what is equality of trade and commerce; and if it does, and there is a rate which is repugnant to equality of trade and commerce between the States, between different parts of the Commonwealth, this Commission will abrogate that rate or declare it null and void.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
If clause 92 is a just clause then we ought to carry it out.

Mr. BARTON:
Then, with regard to a further portion of my friend's speech, the whole of the decisions of the United States seem, so far as I have been able to examine them, to be perfectly clear on this point, and to maintain two principles. The one is that there shall be freedom and equality of trade within the Commonwealth and between State and State, and that subject to that every colony is supreme in the internal regulation of its traffic, so that if there were a rate which diverted trade from its natural channels, but only from natural channels for the purpose of the State within its individuality, and did not infringe the equality of trade and commerce within the Commonwealth, that State would be entitled to have its rates observed and recognised. Two principles are recognised, the equality of trade and the maintenance of State individuality. When the two are in conflict the principle of equality of trade must prevail, but a State may make a diversion within the bounds of its own State, and it has entire competence to make internal regulations. If members will study the American decisions they will see this is perfectly clear. I shall not support an amendment to give the Commission power to interfere with all rates, diverting trade from natural channels, because that would have the effect that within a State where there is a rate which simply exists for internal traffic and does not interfere with equality of trade within the Commonwealth, there would be a derogation from freedom of trade. It would be depriving a State of the control of its own internal concerns. No State would submit to that. I claim that we have entire right to regulate our own traffic, but we must not interfere with equality of trade within the Commonwealth, which is paramount.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Otherwise you must give up the Riverina trade.

Mr. BARTON:
We propose to give a Commission power to deal with the question, and they would do so fairly. I will quote from Kent's Commentaries bearing on this point:

It had been decided in the Court of Errors of New York, in 1812, that five several statutes of the State, passed between the years 1798 and 1811, inclusive, and granting and securing to the plaintiffs the sole and exclusive right of using and navigating boats by steam in the waters of the State for a term of years, were constitutional and valid Acts. According to the doctrine of the court in that case, the internal commerce of the State by land and water remained entirely and exclusively within the scope of its original sovereignty.

That was without infringing on the doctrine of freetrade. Then:

It was considered to be very difficult to draw an exact line between those regulations which relate to external and those which relate to internal commerce, for every regulation of the one will, directly or indirectly, affect the other.

That is why there should be an impartial authority constituted to determine between them. Then look at page 479:

In the construction of the power to regulate commerce, the court held that the term meant not only traffic but intercourse, and that it included navigation; and the power to regulate commerce was a power to regulate navigation. Commerce among the several States meant commerce intermingled with the States, and which might pass the external boundary line of each State, and be introduced into the interior.

For instance, there may be inter-State commerce between States A and C, with a State B between them; then commerce between States A and C is as much subject to regulation by the Inter-State Commission as is traffic between A and B or B and C. Then further:

It was admitted that the power did not extend to that commerce which was completely internal, and carried on between different parts of the same State, and which did not extend to or affect other States.

That is the principle.

The power was restricted to that commerce which concerned more States than one, and the completely internal commerce of the State was reserved for the State itself.

That is why my hon. friend's suggested amendment would be an infringement of that principle, because there may be many matters of railway freight in a State itself, or matters with regard to rivers or lakes in a State itself, which are so completely disjuncted from the general intercourse between State and State by way of commerce that the State has power to maintain control of them, although they may within the State divert trade from its natural channel; but whatever a State may do in that particular, it would have no right whatever to so divert goods from their natural channel as to infringe the principle of freedom and equality of intercourse between one State and another in the Federation. It would infringe the admitted principle that the powers did not extend to that commerce which was completely internal and carried on between the different parts of the same State, and which did not extend to or affect other States. But, if the clause is left as it is, or Sir George Turner's amendment is adopted, the principle will be entirely intact, and the powers of the Commission would then extend as fully to matters dealing with the navigation of rivers as to matters dealing with rates on railways. That is the principle which would really maintain things on an equality of trade. It may be Sir George Turner would rather have the clause as it stands, but if he presses to have the rest of the clause left out, then I give him my assurance that, as far as my legal opinion is worth anything, the result of his leaving them out will be to leave the provisions for equality and freedom of traffic between State and State intact, and to be maintained by the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. GORDON:

If Sir George Turner's amendment is carried, and Mr. Barton's opinion is correct, it might lead to this condition: supposing Victoria has a town five miles within her own border, which in turn is five miles from a South Australian port; and supposing she has also a port within her own border 100 miles away from this town; then she will be allowed to charge as much for carriage over the five miles between the town and the border, in order to prevent goods going to the port five miles outside her border, as she will for the 100 miles from the town to the port within her own border. That is a concrete case, and in such a Federation as we are seeking to establish it would be simply unjust to allow such a state of things. That could not happen under the clause as it stands, but it could if Sir George Turner's amendment is carried, and the autonomy of each State in matters within its own borders is absolute. Her own traffic cannot be called inter-State traffic, and she can put on an absolutely prohibitive rate.

Mr. HOLDER:
She cannot do it under clause 92.

Mr. GORDON:
Mr. Barton's opinion is that she can.

Mr. HOWE:
It would derogate from freedom of trade.

Mr. GORDON:
I ask the opinion of the Attorney-General for Victoria as to whether or not I have properly conceived the effect of Sir George Turner's amendment.

Mr. WALKER:
I imagine that my hon. friend Mr. Barton meant to convey that the rate for carrying goods in New South Wales between Sydney and Albury would not be any different than for the same distance in any other part of New South Wales. There would be no preferential rate to draw business to Sydney. I believe that is what Mr. Barton meant.

Mr. SYMON:
I have listened with pleasure to what Mr. Barton has said in his exposition of the law as it has been applied in the United States in connection with a similar state of things. His words on that subject have been exceedingly weighty, but I confess they do not carry conviction to my own mind. I am disposed to think that the amendment of Sir George Turner will not have the effect that my hon. friend anticipates. The whole object of this section is to secure freedom of trade between the different States. Section 92 says:

Preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over the ports of another State, and any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth, or by any State, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth, or by any State, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth shall be null and void.

Now it seems to me that no State should impose traffic rates which would have the result pointed out by my hon. friend Mr. Gordon. That would be, although within the ambit of the State, a system of rates which would have the effect of derogating from this equality of trade. Then it would be within the jurisdiction-

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Will you put that case again?

Mr. SYMON:

My hon. friend Mr. Gordon's case?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Yes.

Mr. SYMON:

The case put was this: Supposing there is a town in Victoria five miles from the border of a neighboring colony, and another place 100 miles from that border, and that Victoria were to charge the same rate for goods from the place five miles distant as from the place 100 miles distant, would this be within the competence of Victoria or would the Inter-State Commission be entitled to interfere. That is, I think, in substance, what my hon. friend put. And he said if that were the case it would be distinctly in essence a preferential rate. But if the principle suggested by Mr. Barton were observed it would be entirely within the trade jurisdiction of the State imposing such a rate. Now, I think, on the contrary, it would be within the power of the Inter-State Commission to deal with it, if it had the effect of drawing trade which would not otherwise go to Melbourne, for instance, from the adjoining State. The effect of leaving in the words:

"but shall have no powers with reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect," and so on, to the end of the clause, is really to take away the power which the general enacting words at the beginning of the clause give. I think it is rather strongly against Mr. Barton's argument. It is really taking away power which would otherwise rest with the Commissioners.

Mr. BARTON:

What would be taking away their power?

Mr. SYMON:

It is a defeasance or limitation upon the power already vested in them.

Mr. BARTON:

Do you say that the clause is a restriction on the Commissioners?

Mr. SYMON:

My hon. friend has given a great amount of care and research to these American authorities, and I confess that I have not, but at the moment they do not seem to me to bear much on the point under consideration. The clause says:

The Commission shall have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary for its purposes, and as the Parliament may from time to time determine.

That as is stands gives the Commission the fullest power, subject to Parliament, of dealing with every question that might arise under section 92, which deals with the question of derogation from freedom of trade. But then, the clause goes on and takes away something that is evidently considered to have been given by the earlier words, for it says:

But shall have no powers in reference to the rates or regulations of any railway in any State, except in cases of rates or regulations preferential in effect, and made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to that railway from the railway of a neighboring State.

Mr. BARTON:

My hon. friend agrees that that is a restriction upon the powers of the Commission?

Mr. SYMON:

Yes.

Mr. BARTON:

So I say, too.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Mr. Wise said the opposite last night.

Mr. BARTON:

No; it was a restriction, he said, which would benefit New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON:

While it does undoubtedly curtail the powers of the Commission it implies that but for that curtailment the Commission would have all these powers. That is to say, the earlier words of the clause would give the Commission the ampest possible jurisdiction for the purpose of regulating this equality of trade.

Mr. BARTON:

If you leave the latter portion of the clause out you give the Commission entire power to maintain equality of trade.

Mr. SYMON:

Yes, and by inserting these words you restrict their power. Then comes an exception upon an exception, and in order to limit the first exception, this second exception is that the Commission are to have no powers in reference to mere State laws affecting railway rates, unless those rates or regulations are preferential in effect. Now if you leave out both these exceptions it seems to me that you are leaving undisturbed and undiminished in the Commission the amplest power of dealing, not only with railway rates, for instance, upon goods passing from State to State, but of dealing with rates also made by a State in relation to its own internal traffic, if the effect of those rates is to disturb equality of trade.

Mr. BARTON:

But at the same time that leaves entirely untouched internal regulations so far as they do not affect equality of trade.

Mr. SYMON:

I quite agree, but that is not intended to be touched.

Mr. BARTON:

I think there can be no objection to leaving the words out now that the matter has been discussed.

Mr. SYMON:

I felt a little oppressed with the warnings given by my hon. friend, because I am very anxious about this. Victoria seems to desire running powers over New South Wales railways-we do not go quite so far as that. We want to protect our traffic. We do not want to annex New South Wales, but we do humbly ask that New South Wales shall not annex portion of South Australia. Take the case referred to by Mr. Deakin, of the railway from Naracoorte to Lacepede Bay, which taps the traffic on a portion at least of the Western District of Victoria. If Victoria gave preferential rates, in the sense my hon. friend Mr. Barton has so clearly defined, to the people of the Western District of Victoria so as to take the whole of their wheat to Melbourne, that would be indefensible, and that is a thing that is intended to be put a stop to. South Australia would have a right to complain because they say naturally that the outlet is Lacepede Bay, and to that port wheat should go. There may, however, be a concurrence of different circumstances operating with regard to Victoria. There may be more efficient railway management, cheaper railway supplies, more perfect administration, cheaper labor, if you like, and a number of other things that would come under the heading of "management." Though I have little knowledge of railway matters, I cannot shut my eyes to the perfectly just principle that your rates may diminish according to distance. If Victoria were able, taking all the circumstances I have mentioned into consideration, to have a rate for a distance from Melbourne to the western border uniformly with the rates for similar distances elsewhere within her territory, but which would have the effect of taking wheat from Dimboola, to Melbourne on the same terms as to Lacepede Bay, she is perfectly entitled to impose those rates, and we have no right to complain.
Mr. BARTON:
She is entitled to the full benefits accruing from the superior advantages she possesses.

Mr. SYMON:
It is a just right on the part of the State to deal with its own affairs. Everything beyond that-with which we ought not to interfere-is provided for, and the principle which is to be directed and applied by the Commission is this that the moment you find rates which are founded upon a different principle, apart altogether from superiority of management, and instituted with the object of taking away the trade from that colony to which it would naturally flow, then you have preferential rates, and that the Commission can well deal with. It appears to me that there would be an advantage in striking out the words after "determine," because by their retention you are imposing too great a limitation on the discretion of the Commission, which should be left untrammelled in its operations. It will be for the Commission to determine what are differential rates, and to apply the powers with which they are invested to deal with them.

Mr. BARTON:
Our friends on the other side say it may be an advantage to New South Wales, and we think the effect may be of advantage to Victoria. Let the whole thing go now, and let it be thrashed out in the four months intervening.

Mr. SYMON:
It is like establishing a court, and putting in the same Act rules of procedure which, instead of regulating the procedure, may limit or hamper the jurisdiction.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think we are all indebted to my hon. friend Mr. Barton for the frank way in which he put his views on this point, and we should be equally frank in putting forward our views. I am in favor of striking out of the clause the words after "determine." It will have to be considered most carefully hereafter, but I think Mr. Barton has been misled by American decisions, which are very clear and explicit upon the American Constitution as framed. I have looked at the American Constitution, and find that the clause which corresponds with clause 92 of this Bill is not the same as clause 92 at all. The clause in the American Constitution, section 9, subsection 5, says:

No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state.
That would stop the Brisbane Duties Act, by which they levy £2 per ton on wool going to the New South Wales railways. Carrying on and elucidating the same ideas, it says:

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

We find this clause with regard to preference wedged in between the prohibition of export duties and the prohibition of clearance duties, and I need not appeal to any one to bear me out that the fact of this clause with regard to preference being wedged in between the prohibition against export duties and the prohibition of clearance duties would affect the meaning of the intervening words. Then, on the other hand, we have in clause 92 words which are not found in the American Constitution at all.

We have words which state that:

Any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth or by any State or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth, or by any State having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth, shall be null and void.

They have not that provision in the American Constitution, but they have a clause which provides that:

No State shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any impost or duties on imports or exports except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; and the net produce of all duties and imposts, laid by any State on imports or exports shall be for the use of the Treasury of the Inter-States.

Then they have a clause which says that all duties are to be uniform, but they have not by any means got in the clause the provision which we have that all regulations ever made by the railway authorities which shall have the effect of derogating from freedom of trade and commerce, are to be null and void.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

What is your opinion?

Mr. HIGGINS:

My opinion is that clause 92 will go further than the effect of the American decisions goes. I say that the words Mr. Symon has referred to - making null and void all laws derogating from freedom of trade and commerce-will go further than the American words go. There is nothing more misleading than trying to apply the construction of words in the laws of another country to the same words in this Bill, when we have not the same collocation in the surrounding provisions. We must, as far as possible, keep our minds free from American decisions, and try to express our own meaning independently. It is so obscure that it becomes a mere matter of legal determination, and I do not think we should leave it to that.

Mr. GORDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I regret very much that Mr. Gordon did not press his amendment last night. That having been allowed to pass, I will not attempt to revive it, but I do hope that we shall adopt the suggestion of Sir George Turner for the present. The effect will be that the Commission can provide machinery to carry into effect the wholesome principle that preference shall not be given to the ports of one colony over the ports of another.

Mr. GRANT:

I support the amendment, because I think it will give the Inter-State Commerce Commission greater power in determining what are the correct principles of railway management in connection with equality of trade in every respect. I think that their decision will be based on what is just and fair rather than on abstruse legal opinions. The clause should be as general as possible, and all power should be given to the Commission, which will no doubt be partly composed of railway experts thoroughly versed in railway management, to apply those principles to the economical working of the railways.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Are you sure they may not be lawyers?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

They will not be financiers.

Mr. GRANT:

I do not think they all will be lawyers. The railways in the past seem to have been treated more as State machines created for political purposes, rather than commercial undertakings, which should be worked at a profit

Mr. ISAACS:

It appears to me that the excision of these words will be to enlarge the powers of the Inter-State Commission, and leave whatever powers they may have under the Constitution undiminished for carrying out the provisions of that Constitution. But I wish to say, and in the shortest possible terms, that I have serious doubts whether the Inter-State Commission will, under the terms of the sections as expressed, have all the powers that it is fondly hoped and expected it will have.

Mr. GORDON:

I have a prior amendment, if the hon. member would withdraw his for the time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Certainly.
Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. GORDON:
It is to strike out all the words after "purposes." That will comprise the words:

And as the Parliament may from time to time determine.

The Parliament means both Houses, and both Houses must join in conferring these powers. If there happens to be a majority in Parliament declining to give any power at all to the Inter-State Commission things will remain as they are. If they decline to give them any powers the whole scheme fails. Suppose South Australia and New South Wales are two of the stronger colonies, and they combine with regard to a railway system that would injure another colony, and they represent the strength of the Houses, and they say "we will not give this Commission any power at all, so that they cannot do anything." Under a position like that injustice might be perpetrated.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is not to trust Parliament at all.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That is going too far.

Mr. GORDON:
I will test the opinion of the Committee on it. This is the point I take, that inasmuch as the whole thing might depend on the will of Parliament, and inasmuch as the majority of Parliament representing the stronger or weaker States, as the case may be, might be indisposed to remedy an injustice, the provision which leaves the whole thing at the will of Parliament may be ineffective to meet the dangers we anticipate. If we are going to leave it wide, let us leave it as wide as possible.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I would like to point out that my hon. friend is afraid Parliament will not give this Commission power to act. If that is so, would it not follow that the Parliament would refuse to appoint them.

Mr. KINGSTON:
We ought to make that other clause "shall."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The hon member fears that the Parliament may constitute an Inter-State Commission, and might refuse to give them power to act.

Mr. GORDON:
I would rather go back and make it "shall."
HON. MEMBERS:

No.

Amendment to strike out all the words after "purposes" negatived.

Amendment to strike out the word "but" agreed to.

Sir George Turner's amendment-to strike out all the words after "determine agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 86.-So soon as uniform duties of Customs have been imposed trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall he absolutely free.

Mr. DEAKIN:

This clause was postponed at the request of the Premier of New South Wales when I was about to move an amendment. My object was to retain in the several States the power they at present possess of prohibiting the importation of any article which they conceive to be injurious to health or otherwise obnoxious, if at the same time they prohibit the sale of any such article within the State itself. I now propose to move that the following variation of that amendment be added to the clause:

Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prevent any State from regulating the importation of opium or alcohol under conditions which are applicable as nearly as possible to the laws relating to opium and alcohol within the State.

I have singled out the articles named because it was said my previous amendment was too wide. In order that no objections can be raised on the ground that it in any way affected the fiscal issue, and in order to meet the objection of my hon. friend Mr. Glynn, who pointed out that it would not be desirable to require an absolute prohibition, inasmuch as these articles might be required for medicinal purposes, I have altered its last clause too. Then there is the further criticism offered by my hon. friend Mr. O'Connor, as to whether this specific proposal in regard to opium and alcohol might not be taken to imply a diminution of the police power of the States, which in the American Constitution has been held to be reserved to them. The Supreme Court of the United States decided, after mature consideration, that the police power was not ample enough to cover such a regulation of imports into a State, in view of the wider power of regulating commerce transferred to Congress. It is because I anticipate that the courts here would hold a similar opinion, and decide that the police power reserved to the States, under this Bill, was not ample enough to permit the States to prohibit the introduction of these drugs as articles of commerce, except for medicinal purposes, that I have moved this amendment. What I seek is an affirmation of the principle: the preservation to the States of a liberty which they now enjoy. Providing this principle is affirmed, I shall be only too happy to submit to any alteration of the phraseology in which the amendment is couched, or any change in its position in the Bill which may be necessary. It was suggested to me that I should move the clause here, and I have done so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

What about the loss of duty that would take place in consequence of that, and which the Federation would lose if this applied in one State and not in another?

Mr. DEAKIN:

That indicates one of the reasons why the Supreme Court of the United States held that this power of regulation could not be retained by any State unless specific provision were made for its retention. That is why I ask that this power should be granted here. It is true there may be a diminution of federal revenue, and consequently a diminution of the sum returned to the State prohibiting, but this amendment faces that contingency, and says that if the people of a State desire to forfeit revenue by limiting the sale in that State, they may do so.

Mr. SYMON:

Would that not give the State power to interfere with the federal tariff?

Mr. DEAKIN:

The States have the power I ask for at present, and they should not be deprived of it simply because the Federal Government and they themselves in consequence might lose a considerable revenue.

Mr. SYMON:

Might not the State be allowed to prohibit by a heavy duty?

Mr. DEAKIN:

That is impossible. Duties can only be imposed by the Federal Government, and must apply to the Federation as a whole. My object is to allow a State to prohibit the sale of these drugs absolutely except for medicinal purposes.

Mr. SYMON:

Would it be enough to prevent importation into a State?

Mr. DEAKIN:

There is a leading case, "Lesiey v. Hardin," in which it was held that liquor might be introduced in an "original package" and sold unbroken in a prohibition state. It was to meet this difficulty that what was known, as the Wilson Act was passed in 1890 in the United States. This is purely a question of State rights, and might be settled in each State according to the will of its people.

Mr. ISAACS:

I am heartily in sympathy with the desire of the hon. member. I want, however, to draw attention to the clause as it stands. It is not only unnecessary, but it is very dangerous. It goes much further than it is intended, and there are some expressions which, taken in connection with other portions of the Bill, are extremely large and alarming.

The clause reads:

So soon as uniform duties of Customs have been imposed trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth,

That will include internal trade and intercourse; it is not

Among the States,

as in another portion of the Bill, and the clause proceeds:

Whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation shall be absolutely free,

That is free of everything.

Mr. GLYNN:

What is the objection to that?

Mr. SYMON:

It is only the assertion of a principle.

Mr. ISAACS:

It is a very wide assertion of a principle, and goes further than is intended. Taken literally, it means "free of everything, even of a licence." You cannot charge any licence fee in connection with any trade. In clause 50, sub-clause 1, there is the amallest power of the Commonwealth to regulate trade and commerce with other countries and amongst the several States. That expression "trade and commerce" has been defined by various American decisions as of the widest possible meaning; commerce is traffic and more than traffic - intercourse. It has been held that the words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Will it prevent a poll-tax on commercial travellers?

Mr. ISAACS:

This particular clause is not in the American Constitution, and the words are very wide indeed. I think the words

Throughout the Commonwealth

should be

Among the States.

We certainly want to secure intercolonial freetrade, and to do all that is necessary to secure it, but to say that trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth shall be "absolutely free" I think goes further than we intend.

Mr. Barton:
How would that affect bounties?

Mr. Isaacs:
Bounties do not prevent trade being free.

Mr. Symon:
Surely!

Mr. Barton:
If they have a protective effect are they not against free trade?

Mr. Isaacs:
They give a preference, they disturb equality, but they do not prevent anything coming in. This provision is really pointed at the border duties. It is intended as an indication of our adhesion to a principle that we shall not have any duties on the border to prevent the free introduction of goods, that is, that we shall have nothing that bars freedom of entry into any State of goods from any other State.

Mr. Symon:
Do you not take the ports as well as the borders?

Mr. Isaacs:
Certainly; they are on the borders. Customs duties are the same on goods whether they come over the Murray or round by boat.

Mr. Barton:
The border is never understood in that sense.

Mr. Isaacs:
That is only a question of words. What we intend to do is to prevent any State from charging importation duty on goods coming into its territory. If we use the words:

Throughout the Commonwealth,

I feel no shadow of doubt that these words will be construed as much larger than the well-known phrase expression:

Among the States.

We know what we intend, but these provisions are to be subject to judicial interpretation hereafter.

Mr. Kingston:
What is the precise thing you fear?

Mr. Isaacs:
Trade and intercourse of all kinds and throughout the Commonwealth by internal carriage or ocean navigation is to be absolutely free. Then supposing a carrier were asked to pay a licence fee, and he should say "I am not going to do anything of the kind; I can carry on my trade without paying any duties. It is absolutely free," there would be much force in his contention, and indeed I should very much doubt whether if a licensed victualler were to say "My trade is absolutely free" anything could be done to insist upon his paying a fee.

Mr. BARTON:

May I ask the hon. member this-supposing a State makes regulations which are an infringement of trade within its own borders-I am not taking any railway case; differential rates are not in themselves an infringement—but take a case of internal regulation which restricts trade.

Mr. ISAACS:

Merely among its own people?

Mr. BARTON:

Merely among its own people.

Mr. ISAACS:

I think we have no reason whatever to interfere with the internal management of the State so long as the effect of that management does not extend to intercourse with another State.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Would you allow an octroi duty, or tax on goods coming into a city?

Mr. ISAACS:

If it was purely confined to the State which levied it, and had no influence on foreign trade, that State should alone determine it.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

That is one of the greatest curses in France.

Mr. ISAACS:

So it may be, but it is for France to determine. We are not here to legislate for the internal management of the States, except as they, infringe the rights of other States. If we attempt to legislate for the internal management of the States we shall be launched on a very wide expedition. I say we ought to adhere to subsections 1 and 2 of clause 50:

The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries and among the several States

"Other colonies" ought to be in there, I think.

Customs and excise, and bounties, but so that duties of customs and excise, and bounties shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth; and that no tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one State to another.

Mr. BARTON:

Could not they make duties on Customs which would be uniform throughout the colonies, and yet chargeable on the borders of the States?

Mr. ISAACS:

Not if the exports are from one State to another. How could they in face of this sub-section? This is a distinct prohibition against the Federal Parliament imposing duties on goods exported from one State to another. They could not put duties on goods coming from one State to another either by land or sea.

Mr. BARTON:

Do you think Parliament would not impose duties throughout the Commonwealth, and levy on the borders?

Mr. ISAACS:

I do not think Parliament would attempt to do any such thing.

Mr. BARTON:

If an octroi duty could, surely a border duty could.

Mr. ISAACS:

In America they simply say in effect: "There shall not be any duties between the States," and we say:

No tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods exported from one State to another.

How can they put on a duty as between States in face of that? It is a distinct and definite prohibition. Then in clause 105 it is provided:

After uniform duties of Customs have been imposed, a State shall not levy any impost or charge on imports or exports, except such as may be necessary for executing the inspection laws of the State; and the net produce of all imposts and charges imposed by a State on imports or exports shall be for the use of the Commonwealth; and any such inspection laws may be annulled by the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

The States are prevented from levying any impost on imports or exports, and the Federal Parliament is prevented.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Where, except in clause 86?

Mr. ISAACS:

There is a distinct prohibition that no tax or duty shall be imposed on goods imported or exported from one State to another, and how then can you assert the power of the Federal Parliament to impose duties.

Mr. BARTON:

Will you refer to the second part of clause 92?

Mr. ISAACS:

That strengthens my view, and contains an announcement of nullity upon any laws which derogate from freedom of trade. That does not actually give power but it puts what is known by lawyers as a "sanction" upon law made in contravention of the Statute itself. It should be read, too, with the sub-section of clause 50, and carries the matter very little further than sub-clause 2 of clause 50 and clause 105. But I am afraid if you use the words they carry the matter much further. If the opinion is adhered to that the words of this section do not have the effect which I put upon them, then we should have the test of time. There is not the slightest doubt that these words will be tested hereafter and those who adhere to the opinion that they are not open to the interpretation I have placed upon them will have their opinions either justified or falsified by an authoritative tribunal. Personally I am thoroughly convinced that no provision will be more quickly tested in a Court of law than this.

Throughout the Commonwealth

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I do not think there is a more necessary provision in the whole Constitution than this, because it contains on the face of it, immediately after the law regarding the imposition of the uniform duties, a declaration that trade and intercourse shall be absolutely free when these uniform duties have once been imposed. There cannot be any question that if that prohibition was not in there, there would be a power to impose these octroi duties, duties of any kind imposing restrictions on commerce, and so long as they were not charges for services rendered by the State, there would be no power to prohibit them. There could be no objection on any ground to market dues, to wharfage dues, or to any charges of that kind which are charges for services rendered. But all these matters would not touch in any way the kind of due which has been suggested by Mr. McMillan, and which is in force in many parts of the continent. What we intend in making this declaration of freedom of trade throughout the Commonwealth is that inasmuch as every part of the Commonwealth is open to the trade of every member of the Commonwealth, that every member of the Commonwealth shall be absolutely free from trade restrictions of any kind. I fail to see that this clause can be construed in the way the hon. member indicates. For instance, with regard to the State imposing laws restricting the sale of liquor. Would that by any possible twisting of the construction---

Mr. SYMON:

You mean regulating the trade of liquor.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Yes, or regulating it. Would that, I ask, by any possible twisting of the construction of the Act, mean that that would enable a publican to say, "I am entitled, because of this provision in the Bill, to have my trade absolutely free"? This clause must be read in connection with its position in the Constitution, and its position comes immediately after the laws regarding uniformity of Customs duties. When you read those clauses and you take the law relating to prohibiting the State from imposing Customs duties you mean that as far as any restrictions by means of Customs duties or charges upon commerce are concerned they are absolutely free. The hon. member wishes to restrict this by substituting "several States" for "Commonwealth." I do not think this is necessary as a restriction, and it would not be advisable, because there is no possible case you can put in which any misconception could arise. Mr. Kingston put it very pertinently when he asked the hon. member to what particular objection he was referring. The hon. member could give none except in reference to publicans' licences, which, it is quite clear, is no answer to the question.

Mr. SYMON:
Do you think this will interfere with the State charging for licences to cabdrivers?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
No. This is a mere regulation, and the meaning of it is that the passing commerce of a State should be absolutely free. It amounts to nothing more than a declaration, without which it would be impossible to say that the Commonwealth itself could put on border duties between the several States. I take it that the Committee will not be in favor of disturbing the section in the words in which it stands now. I would like to say a word with reference to my hon. friend Mr. Deakin's amendment. I am opposed altogether to the insertion of any such amendment in this Constitution. In the first place, I think it would be a very undesirable thing to single out these two articles of consumption and make a special law in reference to them. As to one of these articles of consumption we know well enough that it is one of those things the mere touching of which always arouses an amount of very strong public feeling in different quarters which we should try to avoid.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is just my argument on this clause.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Although I thoroughly sympathise with Mr. Deakin's efforts to place a State in a position to deal with this matter exactly as it thinks fit, I would point out that there is no necessity for the insertion of any such provision to give it that power. It is quite true that it has been decided in America, in the cases to which he has made allusion, that a law prohibiting the importation of liquor in unbroken packages is against the Constitution, and so, without some such section as this, it would be against the Constitution to prohibit the introduction of alcohol into a State, as it would be stopping the freedom of trade, but there is nothing to prevent the State from prohibiting the sale of liquor within its borders. It cannot, under the Constitution, prohibit the introduction of liquor within its bounds, but it can make a law regulating its sale to the extent that it shall not be sold except for medicinal purposes, and such laws in the United States have been declared to be valid. Surely Mr. Deakin's purpose will be served if, while he cannot prevent the introduction of liquor, he can make a law to prohibit its sale in the State.
As far as Mr. Deakin's object is concerned, it appears to me that it may be as well attained by reason of the powers which a State now has rather than by seeking to gain larger powers which would infringe the principles of the Constitution. There is another objection to it. There are a large number of powers which must remain in the hands of the States for their own protection, for the conduct of all matters in the State which relate to the health and morality of its inhabitants. For instance, there must be power to deal with all questions of diseased meat, the question of dealing with fruit pests, and the importation of fruit. In relation to these questions, the, State has the fullest powers, and if you make a special exception in regard to these matters of alcohol and opium, you may be restricting very largely those powers. It would be very undesirable that the State should be interfered with in any way on these questions, and on this ground there is a strong objection to his amendment. There is another point of view, which we cannot afford to disregard, and that is in what position would the federal authority be placed if at any time a State might take it into its head to prohibit the introduction of alcohol, and thereby cut off a large source of revenue from the Commonwealth? Whatever may be our forms of taxation in times to come, I suppose that a large amount of revenue will always be derived from alcohol, and would it be wise to put it in the power of a State or several States to cut off that large source of revenue? It appears to me to be on these grounds undesirable from every point of view to introduce this amendment, especially as the hon. member's object can be attained by the exercise of the power to prohibit the sale of liquors within the boundaries of a State.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I hope there will be no refusal to Mr. Deakin of the power he desires. No doubt there is something in the argument of Mr. O'Connor that it is just as well to let sleeping dogs lie. Still, the question is one of importance, and I do think that the States should have the power of keeping out of their territory any articles which the majority of the people consider cannot be introduced without injury to the inhabitants. Mr. O'Connor has put it that the power of prohibiting the sale of these articles within the State will meet all that is desired, and at the same time he has urged that if you give them this larger power the revenue of the Commonwealth might suffer. Still, if the sale is effectually prohibited, I do not think there will be much difference as regards the revenue as if you prohibit its introduction. There will be more difficulty in detecting people in the sale than if you take the ordinary power of stopping it at your borders. I would again direct Mr. O'Connor's attention to the desirableness of transferring paragraph 4 of section 82 to section 86. The paragraph reads:

Upon the imposition of uniform duties of Customs all laws of the several States imposing duties of Customs or duties of excise, and all such laws offering bounties upon the production or export of goods shall cease to have effect.

While the clause provides that trade between the colonies shall be absolutely free, it would simplify the matter if the two were embodied in one clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

There is a matter I desire to mention to Mr. Barton, but would be glad to have as many present as possible, and for that purpose I call attention to the state of the House.

The House having been constituted,

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I desire to ask my hon. friend Mr. Barton what steps he proposes to take with regard to closing our labors. I understand there are many members who are very anxious to get away to-morrow afternoon, and if they have to go it will be much to be regretted, because in all probability we would be left without a quorum. It would be a lasting disgrace on this Convention if we did not finish our work, and I think those who wish to go should sacrifice themselves. At any rate if we apply ourselves diligently to our work, and keep our speeches as short as possible, I do not see why we cannot finish to-night; as I have asked before, let us sit right through the night and we will finish. I know my hon. friend will have to revise the Bill, but as far as the matter of mere wording or drafting is concerned, we may well leave that in abeyance until the adjourned Convention.

Mr. DEAKIN:

We must have a meeting to-morrow.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Yes, we must meet to-morrow. My hon. friend will have a lot of work to do when we have finished in order to see that the copy of the Bill of which we approve is a complete copy of the work we have done. We will have to see that errors are rectified; but if we sit through to-night my hon. friend will have an opportunity to revise the work, and then if we meet for an hour or two we ought to be able to accomplish our work.

Mr. BARTON:
If we sit to say 2 o'clock to-morrow morning what opportunity will the Drafting Committee have to revise the Bill?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We could meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock instead of half-past 10. The only way is to sit to-night and finish the work even if we adjourn for a few hours afterwards to enable the Drafting Committee to put our work in proper shape. I would be perfectly satisfied to leave the question of mere verbiage over for consideration at the adjourned Convention.

Mr. BARTON:
I would tell my hon. friend that it is not a question of drafting; it is a question of avoiding ambiguities and inconsistencies.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Even if there are some patent ambiguities occasioned by the amendments we have made the public well know the reason, and there will be ample time before the next Convention.

Mr. BARTON:
I should like to point out that when this Bill has been agreed to in Committee, and reported to the Convention, and passed as far as we have to take it, it has to be submitted to the Parliaments of the various colonies, and it will also undergo a searching investigation by the press, so there should be as few inconsistencies and ambiguities as possible. It is not a question of mere drafting; it is a question of making the Bill understood by those who read it. If brevity has to be sacrificed clearness is the first essential. The Drafting Committee will have to be conceded an opportunity of bringing the Bill, before it is finally reported and adopted by the Convention, into such a form that it shall mean what it says and say what it means. That is the first thing to consider. The next thing is this: My hon. friend need go back only a few minutes to recall how difficult it is to get a quorum of this Convention, and what better chance will there be to get a quorum late at night? I have been anxious to sit late on previous occasions, but there is a difficulty now, when this Convention is thinned in its ranks, of getting a quorum, especially when it is found necessary to ring the quorum bells after the adjournment for luncheon.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They know they ought to be here.

Mr. BARTON:

We all know we ought to be here. Every man ought to be here in his place.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

So a good many have been.

Mr. BARTON:

Sir William Zeal is of course an exception, and there are many others who may be excepted. But the proof of many not being here is the ringing of the quorum bells. As long as I can maintain a quorum I shall sit tonight, but if there is to be a division on any clause and a danger of the House being counted out then it will be my duty to adjourn. Now, all this I think arises from the fact of our not having sat late when we could have done so without being driven to it.

Mr. PEACOCK:

There was too much talk at the outset.

Mr. BARTON:

I was always in favor of sitting late at night, but I was persuaded out of it. I would like to state that the President has told me that there will be no difficulty in getting a special train on Saturday or, if necessary, on Sunday.

Mr. DOBSON:

Could we get a late train to-morrow night if we finish.

Mr. BARTON:

Yes. I would like to say that it will be necessary to give the Drafting Committee a few hours-not after a late sitting, but after a few hours' natural rest-to put the Bill into such a form as that it shall definitely pass.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I think if hon. members will refrain from speaking at length there is no reason why we should not be so forward with our work at an early period to-night that we will not impose on the Drafting Committee such labor as we have no right to impose upon them.

The CHAIRMAN:

We have before us clause 86, to which Mr. Deakin has moved to add certain words.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I wish to say a few words-

HON. MEMBERS:

Divide! divide!

Mr. BARTON:
The hon. member has not been one of the offenders.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It would be simpler for me not to speak on this matter, because it may do me no good to speak. It seems to me that to place in the Constitution such a proposal as my hon. friend suggests would be absolutely in derogation of the freetrade throughout the Commonwealth which we propose to introduce. It will be seen by everybody that if a State had a power to do this it might interfere with the inter-state traffic because you could not put an embargo on goods coming in without having a system somewhat analogous to our present border espionage. You would render every train liable to be ransacked and the very difficulties we are trying to do away with would again be introduced.

Question-That the words proposed to be added be so added-put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Clause 86 agreed to. Clause 13.-If the place of a member of the Senate becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service the Houses of Parliament of the State he represented shall, sifting and voting together, choose a successor, who shall hold office only during the unexpired portion of the term. And if the Houses of Parliament of the State shall be in recess at the time when the vacancy occurs the Governor of the State, with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint some person to fill the vacancy until the beginning of the next Session of the Parliament of the State.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

To leave out after the words "choose a" all the words down to "term" inclusive, and insert in their place the words "person to fill the vacancy until the expiration of the term or until the election of a successor, as hereinafter provided, whichever first happens."

Then there will be some other slight amendments in the other part of the clause. I shall read the clause to show how it will stand if all the amendments are carried:

If the place of a senator becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service, the Houses of Parliament of the State he represented shall, sitting and voting together, choose a person to fill the vacancy until the expiration of the term or until the election of a successor, as hereinafter provided, whichever first happens.

And if the Houses of Parliament of the State shall be in recess at the time when the vacancy occurs, the Governor of the State, with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint a person to fill the vacancy until the beginning of the next session of the Parliament of the State or until the election of a successor, whichever first happens.

At the next general election of members of the House of Representatives, or at the next election of senators for the State, whichever first happens, a successor shall, if the term has not then expired, be chosen to hold the place from the date of his election until the expiration of the term.

That is the clause which has been drawn by Mr. O'Connor to meet the views of Mr. Isaacs and others as to procuring election if possible at the next general election of the House of Representatives or the periodical election for the Senate.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I propose:

That in the 20th line the words "shall be" be omitted and the word "are" inserted in lieu thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I propose:

That in line 23 the words be added "or until the election of a successor, whichever first happens."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I propose:
That the clause be amended by the addition of the following words:—'At the next general election of members of the House of Representatives, or at the next election of senators for the State, whichever first happens, a successor shall, if the term has not then expired, be chosen to hold the place from the date of his election until the expiration of the term.

Amendment agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I move to insert the following new clause to follow clause 11:
For the purpose of holding elections of members to represent any State in the Senate, the Governor of the State may cause writs to be issued by such persons in such form and addressed to such returning officer as he thinks fit.

Mr. ISAACS:
Does that say the Governor of the State? In clause 40 it is the Governor-General.

Mr. BARTON:
But the reason is that the elections for the senators are made in the State, and are subject to such laws as the State may impose, subject to the Constitution. The proper person to look after such elections is the Governor of the State.

Mr. ISAACS:
The representatives are elected in the State, too. I do not quite see the distinction.

Mr. BARTON:
There is a distinction, I think. The representatives in the House of Representatives are to deal with the whole country, without any limitation of States. No doubt they will look after local wants, but they are not the representatives of State entities as senators are. I think the new clause is one founded on reason.

Mr. ISAACS:
I think for both the Federal Houses the Governor-General ought to issue the writs. Otherwise the clause seems to me to introduce a distinction which, besides being anomalous, is rather to the prejudice of the Senate. I am prepared to accept as loyally as anybody the decision of this Committee as to the position of the States, but I am afraid the provision proposed will be an argument against the States—that the Senate is not the National House in any sense, that it is confined to the separate representation of States and the fact that the governors of the States issue the writs—whereby you introduce a difference which, to my mind, might be prejudicial to the influence of the Second Chamber. I should have thought that the Governor-General should issue the writs for both the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I think it is quite right as it stands.

Mr. BARTON:
Clause 11 states:
The failure of any State to provide for its representation in the Senate shall not affect the power of the Senate to proceed to the dispatch of business.

That shows clearly by implication that we cannot resist that it is for the State itself to provide for its representation in the Senate.

Mr. HOLDER:
The writs at present are issued by the Governor in Council, and I do not see why the practice should be departed from. I move:
To insert "and" after "Governor."

Mr. BARTON:
I hope my hon. friend will not press this amendment, which will be made the subject of a long discussion. The issue of writs is entirely the prerogative of the Crown. It is an incident and a consequence of the prerogative to summon Parliament, which is as much a prerogative of the Crown as the power of dissolution. It is customary in every Constitution, though there may be some exceptions, to prescribe it in this way.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Do you not draw a distinction between the two Houses?

Mr. BARTON:
Clause 40 deals with this. It reads:
For the purpose of holding general elections of members to serve in the House of Representatives, the Governor-General may cause writs to be issued by such persons, in such form, and addressed to such Returning Officers, as he thinks fit.

The writs shall be issued within ten days from the expiry of the Parliament, or from the proclamation of a dissolution.

Mr. HIGGINS:
This makes the Governor independent of the Ministry.

Mr. BARTON:
Precisely. In connection with the first clause under the heading of "Executive" we had a long discussion on this very point. My hon. friend Mr. Reid proposed an amendment, and a discussion ensued for an hour and a half, after which Mr. Reid withdrew his amendment. The question was then settled definitely by the Convention, and surely we are not going back now to debate a point that has been settled. If we do the result will be that we shall be kept indefinitely here for days.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You make the system alike in both cases.

Mr. BARTON:
Yes.

Mr. HOLDER:
I will move my amendment, but I will not press it to a division.
Amendment negatived.

Mr. ISAACS:
In clause 10 it is provided:
The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the members of the Senate. Subject to such laws, if any, the Parliament of each State may determine the time, place, and manner of choosing the members of that Senate.

Until such determination, and unless the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the laws in force in the several States for the time being, relating to the following matters, namely: The manner of conducting elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, the proceedings at such elections, Returning Officers, the periods during which elections may be continued, and offences against the laws regulating such elections shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the several States of members of the Senate.

As it stands, having regard to the previous sections, Parliament will not be able to provide that the Governor-General could issue writs. I want that to be clearly understood.

Mr. BARTON:
What does it matter?

New clause 11A, as read, agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I have to propose a new clause to follow clause 48 in this form:
Until the Parliament otherwise provides all questions of disputed elections arising in the Senate or House of Representatives shall be determined by a Court exercising federal jurisdiction.

We have not said "the High Court" here, because there is power in the Constitution to invest any court with federal jurisdiction, so that this clause will work in this convenient way that the Court of a State invested with federal jurisdiction may determine such a matter in any States
Mr. KINGSTON:
Is it f

Mr. BARTON:
Yes; vacancies and qualifications are left in both Houses.

Mr. SYMON:
Is it "disputed returns" or "elections"?

Mr. BARTON:
"Disputed elections." We consider that the more general term.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I will ask Mr. Barton why in the case of elections to the Senate the dispute shall not be heard by the Supreme Court of the State where the case arises?

Mr. BARTON:
I think I explained that matter. The Parliament may at any time invest the Supreme Court of a State with federal jurisdiction to determine a federal matter. The clause only provides for the matter to be determined by a court exercising federal jurisdiction.

Mr. WISE:
I would like to know if Sir George Turner proposes to move his clause with regard to deadlocks. It seems to me it might come properly after clause 53.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Not yet.

Mr. BARTON:
Mr. Isaacs, too, has suggested to me to make an amendment in the clause I have proposed. I move to amend the proposed new clause by inserting:
After "by" the words a "Federal Court or."
Amendment agreed to; new clause 48A, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. WISE:
I move the insertion of the following new clause to follow clause 53:
If the Senate reject or fail to pass any proposed law which has pawed the House of Representatives, or pass the same with amendments with which the House of Representatives will not agree, and if the Governor should on that account dissolve the House of Representatives, and if after the said dissolution the House of Representatives again paw the said proposed law in the same or substantially the same form as before, and the Senate again reject or fail to pass the said proposed law, or pass the same with amendments with which the House of Representatives will not agree, the Governor may dissolve the Senate.
I will confine my remarks to a very few minutes, as I have already published a memorandum on the subject. I will simply say that in framing this clause I have had in view two objects: one to preserve the independence of the Senate in all matters affecting the State interests, and to secure the dominance of the popular vote in all party questions which do not separate themselves into questions affecting the interests of one group of States against the interests of another group. In my view the advantage of this proposal is that it holds in reserve a weapon for ensuring the direct and immediate responsibility of the Senate to their constituents, and will, I apprehend, work in this way: if after a dissolution of the House of Representatives the election result in the return in the majority of the States of members favorable to the Bill which the Senate has rejected, the Senate would at once give way, because it would be apparent that if they did not, the senators would lose their seats at the dissolution. If, on the other hand, the election shows that the voters in a majority of the States are in favor of the course proposed by the Senate, then no Ministry would recommend a dissolution of the Senate, because it would be apparent that the measure was not disapproved by a majority of those who would return the senators to their positions. In other words it is an automatic method of providing that the senators shall accurately reflect the opinions of the electors of the States. In my opening speech I indicated that I was not in favor of making provision for meeting deadlocks, but my opinion was changed by listening to a speech on the subject by Sir Graham Berry. He pointed out that we are giving the Senate new power, and that the subjects of legislation may raise grave social questions, and are ensuring to it a continuity of existence which might lead to marked divergence between the views of the senators and those of their electors. There would be a tendency in a body composed of strong men, who had won their spurs in the political field, to grow out of touch with public opinion. It will be seen at once where the interests of the State are concerned, or where two States are attempting to override three others, that this proposal does not offer a way out of deadlocks except by demonstrating that the two States do not express the views entertained by the electors of the smaller States. I am not in favor of providing further means for overcoming deadlocks, as I consider that the majority of the States should be able to resist legislation which they regard as fatal to their interests as States. In other matters it seems to me a way out should be provided, and I suggest this without further amendment or complication. There must be a consequential amendment to clause 12:

To add at the commencement of line 2 of clause 12 "or meets after a dissolution."

This provides that when the Senate meets after a dissolution, the provisions of clause 12 come into effect. I have faithfully observed my promise not to detain the Committee more than five minutes, and I trust others will follow my example.

Mr. BARTON:

Deadlocks have nearly always arisen as we know them in the past from the mixing up with taxation laws of subjects not properly included in them, from the mixing up in one Bill of more than one matter of taxation which should be dealt with in separate Bills, and from mixing in any Appropriation Acts other subjects which do not deal with the ordinary annual expenditure of the year. Every one of these things is provided for in this Constitution by subsections 2, 3, and 4 of clause 53, and so provided for that proposed laws, even receiving the assent of the Governor-General and offending against the provisions of these sub-sections, would be invalid and unconstitutional, and would be so decided to be by the High Court of Judicature. Now I cannot understand why it is so often urged against this Constitution that there is no such provision, because if you provide against the sources of deadlocks you have provided against deadlocks.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

New sources might arise.

Mr. BARTON:

I prefer to go on the experience of the past. We know that it is in these matters of mixing up questions of taxation together instead of keeping them in one Bill, and of tacking to an Appropriation Act some extraneous subject of expenditure, for instance, that a Bill is lost, and when it is endeavored to force it on a Second Chamber, deadlocks arise. We know that deadlocks have arisen from these causes, and I submit that the practical provision against deadlocks is that Bills embodying these provisions which have in the past been causes of deadlocks should be breaches of this Constitution, and therefore may be declared inoperative by the High Court of Australasia. These matters have all been provided for in this Bill. There may be new causes, but I put it that so far as we can ordinarily do, so far as experience guides us, this Constitution has sufficiently provided against deadlocks, and looking at the ordinary range of human affairs no other provision is necessary. I am not referring to those matters which may be settled on amendment, message, or conference. These subjects will be open as in the past, but in these three provisions carefully made for preventing the origination of deadlocks we have provided sufficiently, and may rest with them, whether we are asked to adopt the referendum or the Norwegian system, or any other.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Some hon. members perhaps may remember that at a very early stage of the Committee I circulated an amendment to clause 6 which would give the Governor-General in Council power to dissolve the Senate as well as the other House, but at the request of Mr. Barton, the leader of the Convention, I allowed the clause to pass, on the understanding that it was to be recommitted. Therefore I feel justified in dealing with this proposal of my hon. friend Mr. Wise for the dissolution of the Senate if, after the House has been dissolved, the Senate still fail to agree. I feel strongly that the words of Sir Graham Berry in his speech to this House have not been given due weight to. There is no man who understands the working of two Houses better than he; and I believe, as time goes on, the people will attach more and more weight to the words in which he pointed out the radically new conditions which will exist between the two Houses under this Constitution. We have here provisions for suggestion being given by the Senate to the other House. The Premier of New South Wales has shown that the system of giving suggestion involves this: that the Senate will, and indeed should, consider the full details of Money Bills, that it is their duty to go into them because they have the power of giving suggestions, and that being so, and if these suggestions are not acceded to, there is a great danger of a deadlock arising, a danger which never arose before. It is quite true, as Mr. Barton says, that deadlocks in the past have arisen on questions of tacking and so forth, and that we have to deal now with a totally different set of relations. But we have to deal now with the position in which the Senate are invited to give suggestions, and that if these suggestions are ignored there will be a great temptation to the exercise of the full power of veto, and, although history shows that deadlocks have arisen from those other causes, still we are now introducing new causes-causes which are almost certain to be fertile in deadlocks unless we take great care. The Premier of New South Wales stated most explicitly that he would not consent to this Constitution unless the will of the people were eventually to rule; and unless some machinery be provided which will let the will of the people eventually rule there is no prospect of the Constitution being accepted by the people of Australia as a whole.

Mr. DOBSON:

You cannot say that.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have given my opinion at any rate for what it is worth. We are introducing new and dangerous conditions-conditions which never have been tried on a large scale before, and we are in great danger of being fixed with deadlock and unworkable government unless there are some means like that to which I have referred. I am aware that some object to any mechanical contrivance for the purpose of preventing a deadlock. But all the contrivances in this Bill are mechanical; all the powers given to the Senate and for creating the Senate, all the powers given to the other House and for creating the other House are mechanical. This term "mechanical" is one of those cant phrases which are continually springing up in our politics. I feel that the ordinary objections which lie against a double dissolution will not apply to the case of a Senate elected by the widest popular franchise and a Senate which is directly responsible to the people. It has not been the practice to dissolve our Upper Houses in the colonies, because these Upper Houses are not leaning upon the people, but upon a class of the people—rightly or wrongly I am not going to say, but it is a fact. Here we have a Senate leaning upon the whole people, upon the same franchise as the other House. We have a Senate with new powers given to it, with equal powers to a much larger extent than the Upper Houses of the colonies have. All those reasons now have gone to prevent the application of the system of double dissolution to the ordinary Upper Houses. I shall have to vote against Mr. Wise's proposal for the reason that I do not think it is sufficiently strong. He says in effect that if the Senate fail to pass a proposed law the Governor could dissolve the House of Representatives and then if after that dissolution still the Senate refused to pass the proposed law the Government might dissolve the Senate. That is a very tedious, long-drawn-out process. Having regard to the fact that at the same polling-booth the same electors may deal with the Senate and the other House I do not see the least reason why both Houses should not be dissolved together, and so ascertain the will of the people together.

Mr. WISE:

Instead of voting against my clause why not propose an amendment, and if that is lost vote for the clause.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I was going to move an amendment in clause 6, but I shall move now in your amendment:

To strike out the words "and if."

Then it is not contingent upon the dissolution of the House of Representatives. Not only would there be a saving of expense by these same electors being able to put two papers in the box at the same time, but there would be the ascertainment uno flatu of the will of the country at a time when that will has to be ascertained without any unnecessary delay. As the Constitution at present stands, the House of Representatives has to last for three years, and it may be dissolved. Then it is provided that each member of the Senate is to have six years' service under the Constitution as it at present stands. Suppo

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:

And the more rapidly you get the opinion of the people, the better.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

And the less likely you are to have deadlocks.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Exactly. If the Senate thought they could put the House of Representatives to the trouble and worry and expense of a dissolution, and felt "well, we shall not be dissolved until the House of Representatives has had the trouble of going to the country, and we can consider our position then, and force, perhaps, a better compromise," there would be a great temptation to that veto or deadlock, which ought to have been avoided. I feel that there is a great deal of cant also talked with regard to the will of the people being variable and inconstant, and so forth. The greatest protection we have right through all Constitutions is the inertia of the people. It is very hard to get a new idea to circulate through and permeate the people, or to get them to say yes or no to a principle. That apprehension of the will of the people being variable and inconstant, and their being liable to sudden gusts, is altogether wrong; we have a stable and settled community which has acted in a stable and settled manner hitherto, and has never shown itself in matters of legislation to be liable to sudden impulses of which it repents; the only thing at all like it are the recent booms in the last ten years or so in expenditure upon railways and the rest. Sir William Zeal will admit that our Upper House was as eager, if not more eager, for expenditure upon railways than-

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

No, we were not; we threw out a lot of your Bills.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Threw out our good ones and passed the bad ones.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

What about the Dunkeld railway?

The CHAIRMAN:

Does the hon. member think that has anything to do with the question?

Mr. HIGGINS:

No, perhaps not. But I do object to the repetition of the everlasting cant with regard to the will of the people being inconstant and liable to sudden gusts and impulses in matters of legislation. We take every precaution in having two Houses, and intermediate Stages, and discussion in the Press. Who can point to any instance of legislation by the Houses of the main principle of which the people repented afterwards? It is using the phraseology of ancient times, when the people used to meet in body, and had no representatives, and applying it to modern times when we have that representation. But this is not the time to go at length into the matter.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The hon. member, might, without being rude, accept my assurance that I am not going to speak at length; there was no occasion for the "hear, hear"; and for my part I shall see that if he wishes to speak he shall suffer no interruptions of that sort.

Mr. FRASER:

I have listened attentively to the statement made by the leader of our Convention, and I agree with him that so far as I can see—and I have been in public life for a very long time, and I hope I can say I have not been a self-seeker, because I have refused to join many Ministries, my own private business being so great that I could not attend to it. My mind is free, and, I hope, without bias; but, in my public life, I have seen many questions upon which the public were extremely hot this Session, and in less than two Sessions went quite the other way.

Mr. TRENWITH:

You have thrown a wet blanket over them.

Mr. FRASER:

There is no wet blanket about it. In this Bill the people are the supreme rulers of both Houses, and the maximum limit the Senate can have for standing in the way of the people is three years.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Six years.

Mr. FRASER:

I am absolutely correct. The maximum limit is three years. The real limit will probably be less than two years, because a question like this—a deadlock only arising once in fifty years—under this Bill I hope it will never arise, because the causes are taken away, if both Houses are honest with one another—as I say, the maximum term is three 3 years, but the probability is that the real limit will be less than two; can anyone say that two years is a very long time for a nation to wait over a question which is exciting a great deal of interest? Half the senators have to go before the electors every three years.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Supposing a man gives an obnoxious vote and has five years to run?

Mr. FRASER:
He has got half the members retiring every three years and going before the electors of the various States. Do you mean to tell me that half of the senators going to their constituents would not compel the Senate, if they were in the wrong, to obey the behests of the people at large? I certainly say it would, and no mechanical contrivance could do better. I think this in as good as any I have seen; but I will put another case. Suppose, for instance, that the House of Representatives sent up a Bill which was a tack. I have seen a good many tacks in my time.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That cannot be done under this Constitution.

Mr. FRASER:
Can it not? Oh, yes, indeed! I can only say I have known Governments-all Governments are supposed to be pure, and all that-and from their point of view, they may be. They think they are acting in the interests of the people, but very often they are doing a downright wrong. Suppose the House of Representatives sent up a Bill to the Senate which has a tack, and which is in contravention of the Statute we are about to pass-

Mr. TRENWITH:
Then the High Court settles it.

Mr. FRASER:
Supposing again that the Speaker of the House of Representatives says it is not a tack while the President of the Senate says it is a tack?

Mr. BARTON:
Then the Senate rejects it.

Mr. FRASER:
Then the Senate rightly rejects it. What is the next process? That, according to this amendment, the House of Representatives may be dissolved, and upon its dissolution the Senate may be dissolved, and dissolved perhaps illegally. As the whole of the people are to decide these matters, and as there can only be a delay of about two years before one-half of the Senate have to appear before the electors, when these who had given an improper vote would be sent to the right-about, I can see no necessity for an amendment of this kind. In the past deadlocks in Australia have not done much harm. There was a deadlock in Victoria very many years ago in respect of the Governor. I was a young politician at the time, and naturally enough took the popular side, which everyone now admits, was the wrong side.

Mr. TRENWITH:
How history repeats itself!

Mr. FRASER:

Everyone, both writers and thinkers, now acknowledge that the popular side was the wrong side, and that it did no good. The popular side, however, was redhot at the time, but now the majority of them are quite in accord with the feeling of the then minority.

Mr. O’CONNOR:

The hon. member who has last spoken has pointed out a most serious objection to this amendment. He puts it that there are a number of ways in which upon questions of the construction of this Bill the Senate might come into conflict with the House of Representatives, and that it is not because you have prohibitions in the Constitution against the introduction of Bills in a particular way that both Houses will agree with the interpretation of the Constitution. Probably the House of Representatives will always take the view which leans towards their powers, and probably the Senate will always take the view which leans towards their powers. Doubtless we will have the same conflicts in regard to the construction of this Constitution that there are now about Money Bills between the two Houses. The hon. member put a very apt illustration, but I will take the case of an Appropriation Bill. An Appropriation Bill which provides for the ordinary annual services of the year cannot be touched, but then it must provide for that and nothing else. And it may be very difficult to decide whether it provides for that or for something more than that. Supposing there is a question upon which a majority of the House of Representatives have a very strong wish; a Bill is accordingly sent up to the Senate embodying in the annual Appropriation Bill something which the Senate thinks ought not to be there; the President rules that the Bill must be rejected on the ground that it is unconstitutional; the Speaker of the House of Representatives decides that the Bill is constitutional; the Bill is rejected by the Senate because it is unconstitutional; thereupon there is a dissolution, and the Bill is afterwards sent up to the Senate again, and it is again rejected. Then if this amendment is carried the Senate may be dissolved, and this means that this question which is the one affecting the construction of the Constitution, and which ought to be decided by the Federal Court, is to be submitted to the majority of the people of the country. In that way you give the go-by to this Constitution, the limitation of the powers of which is for the strengthening of the powers of both Houses.

Mr. ISAACS:

Under your system who decides that question?
Mr. O'CONNOR:

I say that if it is a question of the Appropriation Bill that must be decided by either House—if it is a matter, such as the hon. member referred to, dealing with a Bill to tack, that ought to be decided by the Federal High Court. In either case the power is one that should not be thrown into the hands of a popular majority. You are submitting a question of that kind to such an unfit tribunal as the majority of the people, no matter what we may think of them or how we may respect them, and the end to be gained is that they might decide in one way, where upon the Senate might paw the thing into law, while when it is placed before the High Court it might be dealt with in quite another way. That shows how dangerous it is to place such a power in the hands of a popular majority, and to take from the proper authorities that power of interpreting this Constitution is wresting from them the only safety and Security which the States which enter this Federation possess. Although I circulated a notice of a proposed clause which I intended to move in the case of a deadlock arising in connection with the Appropriation Bill, after listening to the discussion on this point my opinion has completely changed. I say now that to place a weapon of this kind for the ending of deadlocks in the hands of either House, or any authority in the State, would be to stifle that free discussion on questions of difference in which alone the people of the Commonwealth must look for the best result of collective wisdom. Whatever methods you adopt for getting rid of deadlocks, you must bring this result about: The party in the State which feels its power in its hands will be anxious to use it, and will at once use it for the purpose of bringing about that deadlock, which will result in a solution in favor of the party that holds the power. There can be no question that if a strong party in the country hold a view in favor of a particular measure and it is carried by large majorities, they would very soon seek to overcome the resistance of the Senate by having a dissolution-sending the Bill up again, and dissolving the Senate. That brings me to one of the strongest objections to the proposal. I quite assent to the proposition that where you have a House elected by the people -whether the House of Representarenewed in such a way that it will not get out of touch, and you secure that quite enough by a Senate half of which in renewable every three years. The ordinary life of the House of Representatives is three years, and you secure the admission of one-half new blood into the Senate by a process of triennial retirement of half its members. That is quite enough to keep the Senate in touch with the people on all ordinary questions. It is only in some sudden access of popular feeling on some particular question that the Senate is likely to be out of harmony with the general body of the people, and one of the greatest safeguards we have in the Senate is that it is not liable to be immediately dissolved. In whose hands is the power of dissolution? It is in the hands of a majority of the House of Representatives—that is in the hands of the Government of the day; and if the amendment of Mr. Wise is adopted, you are placing this very strong weapon in the hands of the Government of the day, to coerce the Senate to take any view they may think fit. Can anyone doubt that it is coercion?

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is used the same way with all the Lower Houses.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

The hon. member is under a misapprehension as to the position the Senate ought to occupy. It ought to be in such a position of solidity and stability that it would not be in the power of any wielder of the power of a majority in the country to get rid of it at a moment's notice. If the power is in the hands of a majority it will be exercised in this way. The Government which has a majority will go to the country knowing that they have a majority; they will come back with all the flush and strength of that majority to the new House. The new House will send the Bill up again, and what is the position of the Senate then? They must either recede from the position they have taken up, or else practically commit the "happy dispatch." That is to say, the majority of the House of Representatives has the power, holding the sword of dissolution over the Senate, at any time to compel it to forego its views, and if you think that the House representing the States, and which should enjoy stability, security, and continuity, should be placed in such a position you will follow Mr. Wise's example and vote for the clause; but if hon. members wish to see the Senate a strong and stable body, and also sufficiently in touch with the people on all important questions, they will leave the Bill as it is.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I desire to see the Senate made as strong as possible, and a body endowed with the fullest powers that we can commit to it, and because I desire to see it strong and desire to justify the powers with which it is charged, I should be inclined to favor the motion of Mr. Wise. To justify the Senate having the powers I wish to confer on it, we should bring that body into direct touch with its own electorate, and we should make it directly responsible for its actions to the whole people of these colonies, of which it is as fully representative as the other branch of the Federal Parliament. I cannot see the risk which Mr. O'Connor sees in this, inasmuch as I believe that if the members of the Senate worthily and properly represent the opinion of the several States, they have nothing whatever to fear from a dissolution; but if they do not represent the interests and feelings of the States concerned, it is right and proper that there should be a change in the representation.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I rise to call attention to what seems to me a mistaken view which has been presented to the Convention, first of all by Mr. Barton, with reference to deadlocks. He pointed out that deadlocks had only occurred in the past from differences arising from the improper presentation of legislation to the Second Chamber. That is to say the inclusion in the Appropriation Bill of something which should not be properly included. These are certainly the deadlocks which have attracted the most attention, because of the acute nature of the inconvenience arising, but there have been continual deadlocks arising from other matters, which have been extremely irksome to the people, and which have prevented progressive legislation. There was a deadlock last Session in the Parliament to which I have the honor to belong. There was a deadlock about which the whole of the people were very much concerned. The representative House adopted a measure of social or industrial legislation called a Factories Act for the purpose of regulating the conditions under which people should work. The Second Chamber refused to carry it in the form it was thought desirable and felt to be necessary to make it effective, and then began a very serious legislative deadlock not arising from any complications connected with the Appropriation Bill or any improper tacking.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
You have got over it.

Mr. TRENWITH:
We have passed a Bill which is so emasculated that it is difficult to work, and is inoperative in some directions in which it was known that it would be inoperative. I pointed out in the discussion in the early part of this Convention that we had a deadlock with regard to the important matter of our franchise, which has existed ever since I have been intimately connected with public life or political questions. It is held by a large majority of the people of Victoria that there should be equal political power for every citizen. That has been affirmed again, and again, and again in the popular Chamber, where the people are fairly equally represented, and it has been prevented from becoming law by the actions of the Second Chamber, and there is no means in the Constitution by which we can compel obedience to the popular will.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Then you do not want a Second Chamber.
Mr. TRENWITH:

That is another question which I do not propose to enter upon at this stage.

Mr. BARTON:

I think we admit that we want a Second Chamber in the Federation. I have said in this connection there should be two Chambers, and I have said also that ultimately—that is, when the Second Chamber has performed its proper function of delaying hasty and ill-considered legislation—ultimately the people's will should prevail. That is my position always—ultimately; not immediately, when there is any reasonable cause for delay; not if you will very soon, but at any rate ultimately and without unreasonable delay, the people's will should become law.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

And the States must submit.

Mr. TRENWITH:

No; this amendment, at any rate, does not provide that the States shall submit. This proposal for a double dissolution provides that the States shall prevail if there is any conflict between the majority of the people and the majority of the States. I have no hesitation in saying that is wrong; but it is better to have the danger minimised than to have it in its most acute form, and Mr. Wise's proposal does provide the means by which, if a majority of the States and a majority of the people desire something, the Senate cannot prevent its achievement. Now, I have shown in our own colony, where a majority of the people are, at any rate, desirous of legislative reform, that it cannot achieve because of the lack of some mechanical process. I do not object to the term mechanical process; I think it is a good thing if we can get any mechanism that can perform a work—and for lack of some mechanical process we cannot obtain, not a knowledge of the people's will, but the realisation of their wishes. Now, this proposal is that when a conflict arises that is incurable by conference or any other method that the people's will may be obtained by a double dissolution. We have now a process by which we aim from time to time at a decision as to what is the people's will, the process of penalising the Representative House. If that would do the work, I see no reason why we should go further than that; but our experience teaches us that it does not do the work. It inflicts hardship on the representatives of the people, and therefore on the people themselves, who return a Parliament in exactly the same position as before the dissolution took place—one House in accord with the people and the other not.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
What is the good of that?

Mr. TRENWITH:

My hon. friend asks, "What is the good of that?" I say it is good for giving a decision as to what is the people's will, but it is inadequate because it does not clothe that will with legislative authority. Then if the double dissolution took place we would team the people's will and we would have a mechanical means of clothing with legislative authority that clearly expressed will. Therefore I am in favor of this double dissolution.

My hon friend Mr. Fraser says we have done well enough, that these colonies have got along well enough in the past. Our presence here shows that is not correct. These colonies have not done well enough in the past; hence this Convention. That is in one connection. These colonies have not done well enough in the past, because these colonies have been chafing during the last twenty-five years to my knowledge under what they consider to be improper conditions in reference to their franchise, and slowly and painfully, and sometimes almost violently, they have had to seek alterations in the conditions surrounding them, with the result that there has been a gradual—a too slow and too gradual-broadening out of the franchise; and if we could have had legislative machinery such as is here proposed we could have had what we have obtained during long years much more quickly and much earlier; and if we are to create a new Constitution we ought to guard against all the causes of friction, all the causes of excitement, and all the causes of division amongst our people that have been presented in the working, of the Constitution with which we are acquainted. There has been a division in each of the colonies over the fact that when the people had taken pains to go to the polling-booth to select representatives through the machinery by which they were environed they were unable to obtain the meaning of their will, and that has created strong and angry feelings; and it is only because of the law-abiding and, long-suffering nature of the British people everywhere that we have not had violence in these colonies in connection with constitutional questions. Hon. members know that in the old country there was violence.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

When?

Mr. TRENWITH:

In 1832, and there would have been much more violence only a provision somewhat similar to what we now propose was availed of. The power to increase the Peers was not used, but it was threatened. The power to increase the Peers is very similar to the power to dissolve the Peers, because it is possible by the infusion of new members to alter the nature of its decisions. Hon. members know that in 1832, after the struggle for very many years to do away with the rotten system of representation that had prevailed—the rotten boroughs—there was such excitement in the winds of the people that there was some violence, and there would have been more had not the king adopted a principle that we are now proposing to apply—that is, a modification of it—the power of altering the personnel of the House of Lords.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

The House of Lords was not altered in 1832.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It was altered, although it was not altered, if you will allow the expression. It was threatened with an increase of numbers sufficient to compel it to comply with the will of the people, and in the exercise of a discretion that was wise in the circumstances those members who had been frequently and persistently resisting the will of the people remained away from the divisions and allowed the will of the people to become law. I must ask hon. members to excuse me for speaking so long.

Mr. BARTON:

Let this speech do for the referendum also.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I say with these evidences of the desire on the part of the people for more freedom, for greater facilities for giving effect to the popular will, we ought to make provision in this Constitution by which the will of the people can become law. If we do that we shall be doing something which will make it more certain that this Constitution will be adopted by the people.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

We have listened for nearly half an hour to the hon. member.

Mr. DEAKIN:

He has not been a quarter of an hour.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

He has introduced matters that have nothing to do with the question. I happened to be alive in 1832,

Mr. TRENWITH:

You know then that Lord Wellington's windows were broken if no other violence was done?

Mr. DOUGLAS:

We are raising up an image in order to knock it down again. What have the present arrangements to do with deadlocks? We are going to adopt a new regime. We are adopting a Constitution to meet circumstances different to any we know. Why should we anticipate difficulties? The motion will not end the difficulty which is imagined. There is no finality about it. It says a House is to be dissolved under certain circumstances. It does not say what is to be the result if the Senate is of the same opinion as before, after a dissolution has occurred. Mr. Higgins's proposition is a fallacy from beginning to end, and it is only wasting time to consider it.
When a difficulty arises let us attack it; let the Parliament, which will be sufficiently matured, find the remedy. We are anticipating a difficulty which may not arise for fifty years. We hear talk of the people of the country. Who are they? The Senate represents them as much as the House of Representatives. Because you live in a larger community, are you going to put us down to suit you? We have as much independence of character as you have. It is all stuff and nonsense to say Victoria has done this and that.
What made Victoria a colony? The little gold they had. We have people the same as they have, and we have agreed to take the same qualifications, yet we are told we do not represent the people. We are told that in England such and such took place, but the gentlemen who tell us that know no more about English history than they do about Grecian and Roman history. The old system in England has to a great extent proved to be the glory of England. From these small boroughs such men as Pitt and Canning were sent to the House of Commons. Things may be better now than they were then. The County of Middlesex has one eighth of the population of England, but it has not one eighth of the representation in the House of Commons. That is not the system of election. It is to get the views of the generality of the people throughout the country, and not of a particular district. Take the case of Victoria, Melbourne and suburbs could return half the members of Victoria. Would that be a right way of proceeding? Not a bit of it. Then do not talk to people here about people being crushed in these matters. We ought to go upon lines entirely different from those which have been spoken about. We are trying, it seems to me, to create a new form of Government, different from anything that has existed. We will not take the United States, we will not take Canada, we will not take Switzerland or Germany, or anything else. Do not let us be put aside by these bugbears about deadlocks. Let us go on as we have gone.

Mr. TRENWITH:
You are picking out the evils of all, and the virtues of none.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I will not have anything to say to you. Right will take its course in spite of all opposition.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I do not intend to make a speech upon this occasion. But I wish to make an explanation. I am not going to decide absolutely on this question at this stage of the Convention, and intend to vote against every proposal that is brought forward. I think it would be far better for the different suggestions which have been printed, and which will doubtless be re-printed, to be fully considered during the next four months. I do not think it would be wise at this stage of the Convention.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It is Wise.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
To put in a concrete scheme in this far-reaching and important work. The great difficulty in solving this deadlock is to have a mechanical arrangement which will get out of an extreme difficulty without at the same time being a scourge in the hands of one House against the other. Because there is such a thing as creating a deadlock, and if you are not careful you will put in the power of one House-I am saying this without prejudice-

Mr. TRENWITH:
A double dissolution scourges both Houses.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
But then the people who set the works in motion do not mind that double dissolution.

Mr. DEAKIN:
They rather like it.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
There is such a thing as creating a deadlock to get a certain result, therefore, with all respect to men older than myself, I suggest that it would be far better for these different schemes to be thoroughly thrashed out during the next four months; and that we should now close this Bill without any concrete solution of this difficulty.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I do not intend to make a speech, but I wish to indicate my vote. The suggestion of Mr. Higgins appears to me to be admirable under a perfectly unified form of government, but not appropriate to such a Federal Government as we are about to establish. I regard Mr. Wise's suggestion as superior inasmuch as it enables the Senate from the election following on a dissolution of the House of Representatives to learn the feeling both of a majority of the people and of a majority of the States. The dissolution of the Senate would thus be avoided except in rare cases. The continuity of this body should be preserved as far as possible. Therefore its dissolution is a step which I hope will be rarely resorted to, and only in extreme emergencies. I regard Mr. Wise's suggestion as infinitely more in accordance with the spirit of the Federal Constitution which we have met here to establish.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

If the Senate had the same power as the House of Representatives, and if it were returned by the same voting qualification, I should think there was a good deal to be said in favor of the proposal that a dissolution of one House should be coupled with a dissolution of the other. But we have heard throughout—not from Mr. Wise, who has been rather going on the lines that their power should be equal—but from other gentlemen who are strong on this branch of the subject, a strong protest against any equalisation of the powers of the two bodies. But their proposal now is to dissolve the Senate, after having weakened it, when on every possible ground of reason it ought to have been equal in authority with the other House, by making it a House declaredly intended to be inferior—whether it will be only the result can show by experience; and the prognostications of my worthy friends here may prove to be mistaken. But after all there is the undoubted fact that it has not been made co-equal with the House of Representatives, as it has been in every case where a proper Federation is established, and now we are asked to provide another bit of pressure for the re-

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

That is not fair.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I am sure that it is not the kindest thing to say that they are incapable of understanding the difference.

Mr. DEAKIN:

You want to kill us with kindness.

Mr. ISAACS:
Either fools or rogues; is that it?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I should be sorry to say that anyone of them comes within that category, but there undoubtedly is constantly running through our discussions in this Convention a most singular mixing of things that are in their essence different, and always a mixing up by those who mix up for the purpose of obtaining advantages for the larger colonies. Therefore, I say, it is not an unfair suggestion to make that either their interest has beclouded their intelligence or else they are acting rather ingeniously than ingenuously. As I say, if you make the powers of the Senate just the same as in the case of the House of Representatives, the Executive might as well come from the one as from the other. They might well represent both and that being so, and there being no reason to suppose that they would wish to favor one body more than another, it would not be an unreasonable thing if the Executive sent them both to the country. When it was thought that there was such a division of opinion—which they call a deadlock—that it became necessary to ask the electors which opinion was right, and when you have taken away that true essential of the federal position, and so weakened the power of one body as to make it inferior to the other, then the authority is put in the hands of the Ministry—which is responsible to one House—to further hamper the other by sending them to their constituents for an absolutely objectless purpose, as far as I can see, for you may depend upon it the same people would go back. It would only subject them to further inconvenience, and bring an unfair pressure upon them to make them do that which they did not want to do.

Mr. ISAACS:

I must confess that I regard this as a very anxious moment for us all. I think that there is no part of our deliberations upon which we have been engaged which is fraught with greater consequences than this, and speaking as I do for the colony which I have the honor to represent in part, I say that I believe the greatest importance is attached to the presence or absence from this Constitution of some provision with regard to deadlocks. It has been the subject of serious consideration for a very long time. Throughout the whole of the election campaign, my hon. friends who are associated with me know perfectly well that the most vital interest was taken in this question, and I have read, as others have read, the expressions of public opinion in the press—more especially in that portion of the Victorian press which reflects, with the greatest accuracy, the opinions of the people—and, I feel no doubt whatever that there will be a serious danger as to the acceptance of any scheme of Federation that does not provide for some mode of settling disagreements between the two Houses of Parliament. And it stands to reason that that is perfectly right. We all know and appreciate the immense force of the sentiment that has brought us here together. We know that that sentiment will do much to carry us over many difficulties and many objections. We know that there is a well-settled sense of the utter absurdity that mere geographical lines or physical features should continue to sunder the fortunes and feelings of people who are really one in heart as well as interest; but behind all this sentiment there is the stern practical sense that pervades every British community. And when we go back, as we shall in a day or two, to the colonies which have sent us here, and present to them the Bill we have fashioned, the first question that will be asked is, "How is this going to work, and what will it cost?" And if we tell them there is no provision for deadlocks it will be fairly said-

Mr. BARTON:

You cannot tell them that. There is a provision against deadlocks in the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS:

There is none in the true sense. There is a penalising provision against one House, but no provision in the proper sense of the term. This Constitution contains more like an invitation to deadlocks that we ought to provide strenuously against. We shall be confronted with this question-"In all this marvellous mechanism-cumbrous, costly, and complicated-what care has been taken to provide for harmony between the two branches of the Legislature." We shall be told that we have confided all the energies of this great people in relation to their future national development to the two branches of the Legislature, which are not framed as they are in a unitary Government upon a sense of harmony. The majority have rested these two Houses upon foundations of mutual hostility, mutual jealousy, and mutual distrust. We have endowed these Houses with power to support the antagonism to which they have been invited, and we shall in addition to that, disregard - if the advice of my hon. friends opposite is to be followed-the very plainest precepts of public safety: in short, we shall be endeavoring to test, by actual experiment in this Federation, and at fearful risk, the philosophic problem of what is to happen when an irresistible force comes into conflict with an immovable object. We have been told that absence of tacking is the preservative against the occurrence of deadlocks. In the past when there was a possibility of tacking, was it the mere fact to claim that for its measures the approval of the great volume of the population of the Commonwealth, does any hon. gentleman believe-do you think that the smaller States will be able long to withstand such a pressure?

Mr. SYMON:
They ought to.

Mr. ISAACS:
They ought to in one sense, but the needs of men and the requirements of a great country will not stand to criticise too closely the mere letter of a Constitution. In pregnant and unanswerable words Lowell reminds us that "Man is more than Constitutions." What was it led to the American war? Was it not in a great measure the equal division of the Senate on the slavery question and the exercise of the legal power to withstand the great body of the people? As to the smaller States I should look with some anxiety and concern at the verdict of the whole nation obtained under the dissolution of the House of Representatives. This proposal by Mr. Wise is better for the smaller States than a single dissolution, because it is an announcement in the Constitution itself that the Senate has a right to wait until the separate verdict of the States has been obtained. But that controverts a principle laid down in the Constitution that the Senate is to be a continuous body. It is a sword hung up continuously over the head of the Senate that if they do not bow to the will of the House of Representatives after a dissolution of that body that the Senate must be put to the expense, the trouble, and the turmoil of an election themselves. That is a position I should not wish to see the Senate placed in. The whole question of any dissolution is attended with a dislocation of parliamentary business, with a disarrangement of the whole of legislative procedure, and with the knowledge that the principal question at issue stands in no certainty of being decided by the people at all. I think that the double dissolution is the lesser of the two evils. I am prepared to vote for it, but I shall vote first for the resolution of Mr. Higgins for this cogent reason: that it is one expense only. The question could be decided with one effort, and it has this further recommendation: that when there is a dispute between the two Houses no one can tell till the verdict is given which of the two Houses is right and which wrong. Why should it always be assumed that the House of Representatives is wrong? It may be the fault of the Senate, and it may be the fault of the House of Representatives, and there is no more reason for sending one House to the country than the other. I shall not at this juncture detain the Committee by explaining in detail the question of the referendum, because if this proposal is not carried I shall certainly propose it; but a dissolution, either single or a double, will expose the Senate to an extreme pressure by reason of the threat to that House, as well as to the House of Representatives, that there will be a personal disability imposed upon them unless they give way—a personal temptation to weaken in the support which they should conscientiously and honestly and fearlessly give. In the papers which have been circulated by Sir George Turner and myself there are four opportunities allowed for negotiation and friendly reconciliation. No member of either House is penalised in the smallest degree. The rights of the States are carefully preserved; no measure is to be carried unless a majority of the population and a majority of the States, large or small, accede to it; and you will find in the papers we have circulated remarkable instances of people having voted in large numbers in the most detailed, careful, and intelligent manner. This is not a question that concerns us as large or small States. It is one that concerns us all in our desire to prevent disturbances and disagreements among its people. I am sure if we go back to our populations and tell them, however huge and magnificent the structures may be which we present to them—if they come to the conclusion that the political hour cannot be truly marked by it, they will say they prefer the smaller timepieces, which have worked fairly well in the past and which they now possess. I desire to express my earnest hope that some such proposal as this will be carried. Regarding this matter as of the first importance, I hope that the difficulty of deadlocks will be averted by the presence in the Constitution of such a provision, and from its very presence I think that it will be seldom required. I heartily support the clause.

Mr. SYMON:
My hon. friend began his speech by trotting out the same old bogey as to the inability of the colony of which he is one of the foremost representatives to accept a Constitution which does not contain some such provision as this.

Mr. ISAACS:
I did not say inability. I referred to the strong feeling there was on the subject in Victoria.

Mr. SYMON:
Refusal then. He is so wedded to this dear old bogey that at the conclusion of his speech he again referred to it in connection with a metaphor about a timepiece. It seems to me that if we introduce anything in the shape of the clause proposed by Mr. Wise, we shall be disarranging the works of the timepiece, whether it is a small or a large one, and preventing the people from ascertaining the true political hour, whether we adopt this Constitution or not. I am sorry that I did not see Sir Edward Braddon in the Chamber while my hon. friend was addressing himself to the subject, because I think that the arguments which were used by Mr. Isaacs must have convinced him of the danger of the position he took up in supporting... this amendment, on the ground that he wants to see a strong Senate. What did my hon. friend say? He truly declares that you have got in this Constitution the power of dissolving the House of Representatives, but adds that upon the dissolution of the House of Representatives on any political question the Senate is bound to give way. He said that he did not believe that the Senate could long withstand the result of a dissolution of the House of Representatives throughout the Australian Commonwealth. I take leave to entirely dissent from that proposition. The Senate would he entirely abdicating its functions if simply on account of a dissolution of the House of Representatives it abandoned its position unless it was sure that the election which followed upon the dissolution indicated not only the view of the majority of the people, but of a majority of the States.

Mr. DEAKIN:
That is the way Mr. Wise puts it.

Mr. SYMON:
It is not the way in which it would work.

Mr. WISE:
Yes.

Mr. SYMON:
I will come to that point in a moment; but Mr. Isaacs lets the cat out of the bag. He wants some scheme, either that proposed by Mr. Wise or some other, which will be an instrument in the hands of the States with the larger population to coerce the Senate, constituted as it is for the purpose of protecting and representing the interests of the States. Now, Sir, not content with the feeling that that of itself would be a sufficient power, he goes further and says I want something more. In case that should be insufficient I want the power placed in the hands of the Executive of the day, responsible only to the House of Representatives, to dissolve the Senate-to penalise them still further, to coerce them into obedience to the will of the House of Representatives, even though a majority of the people in the smaller States utterly dissent from it. If that is the measure of the power which is to be confided in the Senate as representing the States as individual entities within this Constitution-I do not want to lead any lion into the path so far as the smaller colonies are concerned-then this Constitution ought not to be accepted.

Mr. ISAACS:
Do you say I said that?

Mr. SYMON:
The hon. member said it would lead to the coercion of the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS:
I said I would support the other.

Mr. SYMON:
The hon. member must be consistent. He wants a dissolution of the Senate in order that it may drive them to an ignominious surrender.

Mr. WISE:
The Senate would never surrender unless it were out of touch with the people.

Mr. SYMON:
I will come to that in a minute. That would be a most unsatisfactory procedure, because you have responsible government that is responsible to one House.

Mr. WISE:
It should not be unsatisfactory to the smaller States.

Mr. SYMON:
You might have the members of the Senate defeated on a side issue. The Government might cloud the whole merits of the dispute under a war between the two Houses. The people might be told this was an attempt on the part of the Senate to dominate the House of Representatives. It would be impossible to keep clear the one issue as to the merit of the particular question, and, even if it were possible to do it, it might exactly suit the policy of the particular section who happened to be in power at the time to introduce the difficulty as one between the two Houses. But it does seem to me this matter of deadlocks has been greatly exaggerated. All these projects are the outcome of a rage for some mechanical instrument or contrivance to rigidly provide for a state of things which is admitted to be extremely unlikely to arise to affect the Senate. We are attempting to adhere to the guiding lines of the British Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There are deadlocks there.

Mr. SYMON:
When have there been deadlocks there?

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
The supremacy of the Commons is, at any rate, admitted.

Mr. SYMON:
And the same principle, I venture to humbly submit, exactly applies to our Constitution, with this additional advantage in the Constitution we are framing-and that is the security for the public will operating upon an unchangeable body-that there is a salutary provision for periodical revision. Although it has really never happened, I can conceive of a deadlock of the worst kind occurring between a popular Chamber and a body like the House of Lords, unchangeable, unalterable, or a nominated House holding appointment for life. But in the ease of a body like this Senate, half of whose members go to their constituents every three years, contemporaneously with the House of Representatives, I cannot see any possible difficulty to the working of a Constitution under such a system as this.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Why should you penalise one popular House for insisting upon its views and not the other?

Mr. SYMON:

You are not penalising one popular House. I object to the term "penalise." I dislike it.

Mr. ISAACS:

It is a fact.

Mr. SYMON:

It is not a fact, nor is that an appropriate use of the expression, if my hon. friend will excuse me for saying so.

Mr. ISAACS:

Oh,

Mr. SYMON:

It is not a penal dissolution. If the Government feel that the proposal or the law which they are laying before the Parliament has the will of the people behind it, and the House of Representatives differs from it, then the Government advise the Governor to dissolve the House of Representatives with the view of ascertaining or confirming the opinion which they embodied in their measure.

Mr. HIGGINS:

You have not shown yet why it should not apply to the other House?

Mr. SYMON:

First of all the Ministry is not responsible to the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS:

Is that the only reason?

Mr. SYMON:

There is the further reason that you have given the Senate in this Constitution what is called perpetuity. It is perpetuity in a sense, but, in order to secure that the Senate representing the States shall be in touch also with the people, it is provided that half of its members shall go to the people every three years, and if that is done there is ample provision to secure its, giving expression to the popular will, so far as the Senate is established for that purpose, and also to keep up its position as the special representative of the States. I was very much struck with the remark of my hon. friend Mr. Trenwith, when he said that we had not been accustomed to these difficulties or deadlocks, and these constitutional disturbances were not very much to be feared in English-speaking communities, because of the long suffering nature of the British people. There can be no doubt that there is a great deal of truth behind that remark. It expresses a leading characteristic of the Constitution under which we have lived. It is susceptible to the expression of the people's will, and it is not by dissolution, but through the press and public opinion expressed in various ways that we owe the smoothness of the working of the British Constitution; and it is to that we owe the confidence which the English people throughout the empire repose in it. I may be pardoned for quoting from a French constitutional writer some sentences in which he sought to explain to his countrymen this peculiar feature of the British Constitution:

People are fond of talking about the stability of the English Constitution. The truth is that this Constitution is always, so to say, in a state of motion and oscillation, and that it lends itself in an extraordinary manner to the play of its different parts. Its solidity comes from its pliability. It bends, but does not break. It stands not by the strength of its affirmations, but by the studied vagueness of its preservations.

Again, he says, referring to the powers alluded to by Mr. Trenwith, of forcing new Peers into the House of Lords to do what the Government considered to be the will of the people:

All these powers are still untouched, and ready to hand for the day when a despotic majority might take a fancy to crush its adversaries. To all this no answer can be made, except that all the political organization in England rests on a parti pris of optimism and confidence. The English feel the vigor of their public spirit; they have experienced the vigilance of a free press, and the power of associations and public meetings. They flatter themselves that their political customs need no safeguards in the form of statutes.

It does seem to me we shall do much more harm than good in seeking to introduce rigid rules on the subject of possible conflicts between the two Houses, which no human being can predict will arise in the natural order of things. I think the better way is to follow the advice suggested by Mr. McMillan and leave this subject alone, at any rate for the present. No one can deny the great importance of the subject, and while Mr. Isaacs says it is an anxious moment for him, I think I can say it is an equally anxious moment to the smaller colonies if it involves a diminution of the power we shall have in the Senate. It would be more desirable that we should, after debating this question, leave it to be dealt with at the final meeting of the Convention. None of the propositions really meet the case, and if we deal with it now we may hamper a solution of it at a later stage.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I shall support the amendment of Mr. Wise. It does not introduce any new element into the Constitution. I am perfectly prepared that the Senate should exercise its powers as regards resisting legislation so long as it represents the wishes of its constituents, but the way we have it at present is this: that whilst the House of Representatives, desiring to discharge the law, may he correctly interpreting the desires of the constituents, the best evidence as regards this fact cannot be obtained except by a dissolution which affects them only, and sends them to the constituents, while the Senate is a power entrenched in an impregnable position, so far as regards all possibility of being moved or sent back to their constituents, to find out whether they accurately represent the views of their constituents. It is all very well to say it is not a penal dissolution, but the effect is to expose the members of the popular House to an undoubted punishment, and to render them liable to lose their seats though they may be correctly interpreting the wishes of those who sent them there, and leaving the authors of the trouble absolutely untouched, and in a position where they can remain as long as they like without giving way to the wishes of those who sent them there. One would think that a proposal of this description was novel. Nothing of the sort. We have had in our history various troubles at different times in connection with these matters-no power existing to dissolve the Legislative Council, and the only way to procure a declaration of the people's wishes being to send the House of Assembly to the constituencies. The result was unfortunate trouble with the Legislative Council. It was cured by the adoption of the very principle which my friend Mr. Wise seeks to give effect to in his amendment. If hon. members will take the trouble to consult our Constitution Amendment Act of 1881, they will see that it was passed for the express purpose of dealing with questions of this sort, and that there is there given under certain conditions a power to the Governor not only to dissolve the House of Assembly, but also to dissolve the Legislative Council, or, if he pleases, to issue fresh writs for the supply of a certain number of seats in the Legislative Council. It has never been used; the moral effect has prevented anything of this sort. If we put such a provision in our Constitution, the same effect will be secured. It will be absolutely unnecessary to put it into force, but the very fact of its being there will prevent that trouble, and the Senate will not dare to act out of accord with the views of those who sent them there.

Mr. ISAACS:
Has there been more harmony in the relations of your two Houses since that provision was made?

Mr. KINGSTON:

Undoubtedly.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The effect of my amendment on Mr. Wise's new clause is that there shall be a double dissolution of the Senate and the House of Representatives at the same time. Mr. Wise, I understand, only wants to have a dissolution of the House of Representatives in the first instance.

Mr. ISAACS:

I move the insertion of the following new clauses that I had the honor, in conjunction with Sir George Turner, to circulate for consideration:

1. (I.) If either House of Parliament shall, in two consecutive Sessions of the same Parliament, with an interval of at least six weeks between, pass and transmit to the other House, for its concurrence therein, any proposed law which such other House either fails to pass without amendment, within thirty days after receiving the same, in the second Session, or within such period passes, with any amendment not agreed to by the House transmitting the proposed law, the provisions of the following sections of this part shall apply.

   (II.) The proposed law passed and transmitted in the second Session may include any amendments agreed to by both Houses in the first Session.

2. The House in which the proposed law originated may pass a resolution that, in its opinion, the proposed law is of an urgent nature, and may transmit the resolution and the proposed law with any amendments agreed to by both Houses up to the time of transmission to the other House, with a request for further consideration.

3. If within thirty days of the transmission of the proposed law as last aforesaid, or if the Session shall end before the expiration of such period, then within thirty days of the commencement of the next Session of the same Parliament, the other House shall not pass the proposed law without amendment, or with such amendment as the House transmitting the same agrees to, the House in which the proposed law originated may resolve that the same be referred to the direct determination of the people.

4. If such last-mentioned resolution is passed, a vote of the electors of the Commonwealth as to whether the proposed law, as last transmitted as aforesaid, shall or shall not become law shall be taken, unless in the meantime

5. Such vote shall be taken in each State separately, and if the proposed law is affirmed by a majority of States containing also a majority of the population of the Commonwealth, it shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Royal assent, as if it had been duly passed by both Houses of Parliament, and on receiving the Royal assent it shall become law. If not affirmed as aforesaid the proposed law shall not become law, and shall not be again proposed for a period of at least three years.

Clause 6.-No such vote shall be taken unless more than six months will elapse before the expiry of Parliament by effluxion of time.

I should like to point out to those gentlemen who have perhaps done me the honor to read these clauses, in very brief words what the proposal amounts to. In the first place I quite agree, on thorough reflection, with the objections raised by my hon. friend Mr. Symon, that the power ought not to be left just to the Ministry of the day, who might be naturally prejudiced in favor of the House of Representatives. I want to have absolute equality in this respect between the Houses. All I desire to see is that there shall be some means of reconciling differences of the most pronounced and prolonged nature between them. This provision is one which I think provides all the requirements necessary to prevent any hasty determination on the part of the sovereign body. In the first place it provides that if either House of Parliament shall, in two consecutive sessions with at least six weeks between them—failing a sufficient period for consideration—pass and transmit a Bill which is not agreed to absolutely, or with such amendments as are concurred in by the first House, the originating Chamber may pass a resolution that in its opinion the matter is urgent. That is done in the most inoffensive manner, but it is presumably a case which may be considered as of supreme importance to the community, a course which a legislative body may feel bound to take in the widest interest of all—the interest of the people. It passes this resolution and transmits it with the proposed law to the other House, a Bill which is not agreed to absolutely, or with such amendments as are concurred in by the first House, the originating Chamber may pass a resolution that in its opinion the matter is urgent. That is done in the most inoffensive manner, but it is presumably a case which may be considered as of supreme importance to the community, a course which a legislative body may feel bound to take in the widest interest of all—the interest of the people. It passes this resolution and transmits it with the proposed law to the other House, a Bill which is not agreed to absolutely, or with such amendments as are concurred in by the first House, the originating Chamber may pass a resolution that in its opinion the matter is urgent. That is done in the most inoffensive manner, but it is presumably a case which may be considered as of supreme importance to the community, a course which a legislative body may feel bound to take in the widest interest of all—the interest of the people. It passes this resolution and transmits it with the proposed law to the other House, with a request for further consideration. Up to that point there are three opportunities for harmony, for reconciliation and, in between, as hon. gentlemen know, there are all the ordinary Constitutional facilities for friendly negotiation, conference, and discussion. The amendments that are made by one House and agreed to by the other Chamber may be embodied in the successive Bills proposed, so that the points of difference are reduced to a minimum. When that is sent up to the other Chamber whichever one it happens to be - it has a further opportunity to consider it, and then if it does not determine it so as to put an end to the differences existing, a resolution is passed by the originating Chamber in its discretion, that is if on full reflection and by the light of public opinion it thinks the matter of sufficient importance to take the vote of the people direct. That vote is still not to be taken if the objecting House, after consideration, sees that the measure is one to which it ought not to give its assent. If it is the House of Representatives or Senate that is concerned, neither is placed under any personal disability or subjected to any personal peril; it is free to act without having a sword over its head. A vote is taken in a manner which is eminently fair to small as well as to large States.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
No.

Mr. ISAACS:
If the hon. gentleman can show me that I am wrong I shall be pleased to alter my opinion. In this final vote, each State is taken separately. Tasmania is taken by itself, and so is Victoria, New South Wales, Western Australia, and South Australia. Supposing there are only five States in the Federation and South Australia, Tasmania and Western Australia are against a certain law, no matter how great the voting power of the two larger States which support the Bill it cannot be carried into law. You have here the same principle of protection as is provided in the Houses of the Legislature. What could be fairer to smaller States? If there is not a majority of the States voting for the law, then there is an end of the matter. If, however, there should be a majority of the States in favor of it, then you have of course to give equal protection to the larger population. Having your majority of, the States and a majority of the population there is no reason whatever why the law should not pass. It is also provided that:

Such vote shall be taken in each State separately, and if the proposed law is affirmed by a majority of States containing also a majority of the population of the Commonwealth, it shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Royal assent, as if it had been duty passed by both Houses of Parliament, and on receiving the Royal assent it shall become law. If not affirmed as aforesaid, the proposed law shall not become law, and shall not be again proposed for a period of at least three years.

Hon. gentlemen will see that the same principle is preserved in this clause as is established in the Houses of the Legislature, the question to be determined by the referendum being whether members of both Houses faithfully reflect the will of the constituencies. It has been said that this is a blow at responsible government, but it is not so. Responsible government, as has been admitted on all hands, means the responsibility of the Ministry of the day to the Lower Chamber. It is never intended that there should be a referendum in the case of a dispute between the Ministry and the Lower House. It is only in the case of a momentous and prolonged dispute between the House of Representatives and the Senate that it could ever be applied, and unless the Ministry of the day have a majority in the House of Representatives it is plain there never will be a dispute at all. Therefore it has no connection whatever with the question of responsible government. It is said, too, that it is a blow to representative government, that men in Parliament will forsake their responsibility and throw the burden and duty of determining these matters upon the people; but, with great respect to the gentlemen who urge this objection, I say it is utterly misplaced, for the reason that they are, without reflection, repeating objections to what is known as the Swiss system. In Switzerland, while there is a referendum, it is in the majority of cases only resorted to after the two Houses have agreed, and the Bill does not become law until the people have also assented to it. I can understand in such a case, that members of Parliament, if asked to pass a Bill which they knew would not become law until the people had also expressed their affirmation of it, would say they would not trouble about it, as it was only tentative, and would leave it to the people who would ultimately give their decision. That would be an abandonment of the responsibility of Parliament, but here, if the Houses agree, they accept the full responsibility of their action. It is only in case when the Chambers do not mutually pass a Bill that the referendum comes into operation.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Would it be competent for a private member to get the referendum under this?

Mr. ISAACS:
Not unless the House granted it.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
On the motion of a private member?

Mr. ISAACS:
There is nothing expressly introduced to prevent it here, but I have no objection to doing so. I wish to point out that so far from diminishing, this seems to heighten in the greatest possible manner, by reason of the momentous consequences, the responsibility which any member would feel who advocated the application of this procedure. It is not open to the objection that it is provocative of expense, because no House that values its reputation or the seats of its members would dream of plunging the country into the expense and turmoil and dislocation of public business which a universal election would cause; but if trouble does arise between the two Houses, as our Constitutions are at present framed, the remedy provided is a dissolution, and that dissolution causes exactly the same trouble and turmoil and expense as the referendum, with this difference, that you penalise members and do not ensure a verdict upon the only point at issue. What I propose is that, instead of a dissolution, let the business of Parliament go on without interruption, and permit the ordinary legislative functions of the Chambers to proceed as usual, but if the matter is so urgent as to require in the last resort, the "Aye" or "No" of the States as States, and the people as people, let it be taken. I think the mere presence of it will prevent any necessity for any resort to it.

Mr. KINGSTON:
It will not have the same influence on members as a dissolution, because it will not affect them.

Mr. ISAACS:
To a great extent it will affect them, because they know they accept the responsibility of involving a large expense to the country. In America they have practically a referendum every four years, at great expense to the country. We know that in Switzerland this matter has gone on increasing as the years have rolled by. First in the cantons, then in 1848 in the Federal Constitution, and then in 1874 it was lifted to a still higher position than before. In America it is used by millions of people; every State save one has it in its Constitution, and if members will look at the examples of voting by the referendum which I have furnished them with they will find instances where people have voted carefully and intelligently, not in any party spirit, because the numbers indicate that, but on questions of importance, on questions affecting the Constitution, and questions outside the Constitution—in one case whether a Bill should be accepted or not, in one case whether the election of the United States senators should be by the direct vote of the people, in another whether there should be an educational qualification for voters, and in another whether the debt should be refunded. Members will thus see that this process for ascertaining the direct will of the people is applicable to nearly every form of dispute that is conceivable. I believe that it would tend to improve the political education of the people, and I believe in these days, when we have so many educational advantages, scientific improvements, the press, the telegraph, steam, railways, and various other productions of this century, bringing men, however actually distant, into close political and social contact, that we have an easy, facile, and direct method of ascertaining the unmistakable will of the people on any subject, and we should be throwing away these advantages, which are of comparatively recent growth, if we do not adopt this obvious and honest means of reconciling the two Chambers. Representative government as we possess it is of recent growth. It is only since 1832 that the people have been really represented, as before that there were rotten boroughs and Lords of Parliament and moneyed men who possessed under their control many seats in the House of Commons. It is only since the Reform Bill, which was strengthened and largely completed in 1867 and again in 1884, that we have had one representative government in Great Britain; and when we consider that after all our parliamentary contrivance is itself mechanical, we are justified in adding to it another mechanical contrivance to prevent the first from becoming useless or clogged. Therefore, in the shortest time possible. I commend this proposal to the serious consideration of members. I need not refer at length to the various references made to the question in the House of Commons and House of Lords, but Mr. Labouchere in 1882 said that even in England the people would probably prefer the direct consultation of the people themselves rather than the deluge of debate in Parliament. The Marquis of Salisbury and other leaders of men have frequently lent their powerful advocacy to the movement, and even Mr. Lecky, conservative as he is, points out that the matter is one that not only ought to be considered seriously, but should be entertained favorably.

Mr. DOBSON But not in a Federal Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS I do not see that there is any difference in that regard. I will only quote these few words from Mr. Lecky:

If the electorate is to judge policies, it is surely less likely to err if it judges them on a clear and distinct issue. In such a case it is most likely to act independently, and not at the dictation of party wire-pullers. It is to be remembered, too, that the referendum is not intended as a substitute for representative government. All the advantages of parliamentary debate would still remain. Policies would not be thrown before the electorate in a crude, undigested, undeveloped state. All measures would still pass through Parliament, and the great majority would be finally decided by Parliament. It would only be in a few cases, after a measure had been thoroughly discussed in all its bearings-after the two Houses had given their judgment-that the nation would be called on to adjudicate. The referendum would be an appeal from a party majority, probably made up of discordant groups, to the genuine opinion of the country. It would be an appeal on a question which had been thoroughly examined, and on which the nation had every means of arriving at a conclusion. It would be a clear and decisive verdict on a matter on which the two branches of the Legislature had differed. It is argued against the referendum that many of the differences between the two Houses are differences not of principle, but of detail. A Bill is before Parliament on the general policy of which both parties and both Houses are agreed, but one clause or amendment, dealing with a subsidiary part, produces an irreconcilable difference. The popular vote, it has been said, would he an instrument wh

Mr. GLYNN:
Was Lecky not writing from the view of a conservative?

Mr. ISAACS:
Perhaps he was, but if the people are conservative, they have a right to be conservative; and if liberal, they have a right to be liberal. Again he says:

By this simple method the referendum might be put in action, and as the appeal would he to the existing electorate no insuperable difficulties of machinery would be likely to arise.

[P.1173] starts here

After summing up the arguments he says:

The foregoing arguments show that the referendum is not a question to be lightly discussed. It might furnish a remedy for great and growing evils which it is very difficult to cure, and it would do so in a way which is in full accordance with the democratic spirit of the time.

Elsewhere he urges with moving force that it is a means of enabling the people to decide on measures rather than men, a phrase we should not easily forget.

Mr. O’CONNOR:
He proposes that as a strong conservative.

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not care. I am willing to accept it as a liberal measure. He says further:

The experience, however, of Switzerland and America shows that when the referendum takes root in a country it takes political questions, to an immense degree, out of the hands of wirepullers, and makes it possible to decide them mainly, though perhaps not wholly, on their merits, without producing a change of Government or of party predominance.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Is there not a difference between applying it generally and applying it to a dispute between the Houses?

Mr. ISAACS:
You really want it for great disputes between the Houses and not as a general expedient. The capital fact is that the people will want to know if this great piece of legislative machinery we are now fashioning is to be in a measure rendered useless, or worse than useless, because it has all the elements of collision and none of reconciliation.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It has never been applied.

Mr. ISAACS:

If the hon. member looks at the printed document which I have circulated he will find important amendments where the Houses have differed and the matter has been decided by the people. That document was circulated for the purpose of answering such arguments as that of the hon. member, and I am glad he has asked the question. I trust we shall adopt this means. I am sorry Mr. Wise's proposal was negatived, but I think this is better and fairer to both large and small States, and I hope we will succeed in passing this, so that both Houses will prove true and faithful servants of the people, and never as two monstrous serpents imperil in their struggles the young giant of the nation.

Mr. DOBSON:

If the referendum, as Mr. Lecky favors, had been applied in the early days to Home Rule, when Mr. Gladstone first advocated it, the will of the people would have required the separation of the United Kingdom.

Mr. ISAACS:

How does the hon. member know?

Mr. DOBSON:

Three or four years afterwards, when the whole thing had been thrashed out, the will of the people decided by an enormous majority against it.

Mr. ISAACS:

The answer to that is, I give the utmost facilities for fully thrashing it out.

The CHAIRMAN:

I take it that the sense of the Committee on these clauses will be taken by the voting on the first clause.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Mr. ISAACS:
We will carry it next time.

Mr. SYMON:
I move the following new clause to follow clause 78:

No person holding any judicial office shall be appointed to or hold the office of Governor-General, Lieutenant-Governor, Chief Executive Officer, or Administrator of the Government, or any other executive office.

I need not say that the great tribunal we have constituted is to be, above all things, the interpreter of the Constitution, and the laws made under the Constitution and to deal with all the laws of the States in their relations to the Commonwealth, and to be the arbiter between the Executive and the people. We all wish, and have sought by this Constitution, to secure the independence and purity of the judges constituting the High Court, particularly in view of the momentous functions they will have to discharge. We all wish that justice shall be administered throughout the Commonwealth unspotted and unsuspected.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Will the clause apply to State judges?

Mr. SYMON:
The clause is sufficient to do that. Though desirable that such a principle should apply in the case of the States and their courts, it is particularly desirable in the case of the Commonwealth and the High Court.

Mr. LEWIS:
I think we should go a little further and say that no judge of the Federal Supreme Court should be capable of being elected to be a member of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BARTON:
That is provided already.

Mr. LEWIS:

I think we might go a little further and say that no judge of any State shall be capable of being elected to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. DEAKIN:

What about State rights?

Mr. LEWIS:

That is the law in Tasmania now.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I object to this proposed clause. It seems to me that it is aimed in particular against a practice which has obtained in the States with very great advantage to all concerned. If it is a good thing in connection with the provincial Governments, it may be equally good in connection with the Federal Government. We know perfectly well that in every colony of Australia the position of Lieutenant-Governor is conferred upon the Chief Justice or senior judge of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WALKER:

It is the President or the Upper House in Queensland.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I think the course which has been more generally adopted is infinitely preferable; and, if I recollect rightly, there have been some differences in Queensland which might have been avoided had the course I am now referring to been adopted. There is no doubt whatever that the duties have been admirably discharged. They are to a very great extent of a judicial character. On a variety of occasions Australian Chief Justices have been called upon to act in the place of absent Governors, and in no case whatever have I ever heard of anything which would warrant the suggestion that any evil has resulted from the combination of the two offices; on the contrary, the greatest satisfaction has been given to all interested. I think it would be casting a reflection on a practice which has generally obtained-in Australia-if we were in our Federal Constitution to absolutely prohibit a course which has been almost invariably adopted by the Imperial Government.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

At the risk of detaining the Committee I wish to say that I see no justification whatever for attempting to tie the hands of the Queen in the appointment of a Governor for this Commonwealth. You must have a dormant Commission, and unless you have the appointment of the Chief Justice or senior judge for the time being, some other person must be appointed. If we are to debar the occupants of the judicial bench, because their interests might clash with those of the Commonwealth, ought we then to leave it open to appoint the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or the Premier of the Commonwealth for the time being? And there are many others whom we might debar if we are to debar the whole judiciary. Why should we put any clog at all on the appointments? Surely we can trust the home authorities to see that the appointment they make is in the interests of the Commonwealth, and not improper or likely to do any injury. But if we are to put this block on the Constitution we ought to go further, as I have indicated.

Mr. BARTON:
There is not the same reason why a person in the Legislature should not be a branch of the Legislature.

Mr. ISAACS:
Not two branches though.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is just as great a risk, because it very often might happen that the Acting-Governor might feel it his duty to disagree with the advice tendered by the Ministers, and it would certainly be very peculiar if the Ministry tendered advice with regard to action taken in the Senate, and the President of the Senate was the gentleman to whom the advice was tendered, and he had to act on it. I propose:

That after the word "judicial" the following be inserted: "Or any executive or legislative officer."

Of course I will vote against the whole clause in any form, but if we are to have it then we must have it in the largest possible form.

Mr. GORDON:
That would exclude the Commander of the military forces.

Mr. ISAACS:
I think there is great force in the views of those who say that there should be no limit placed on the prerogative of the Crown to appoint all executive officer or legislative officer. The judicial officer is placed above all possible control, where he can defy any power in the Constitution. He has no reason to hope or fear from any person; and yet he is to be excluded. And we are to allow other persons, who from their position will be swayed by various considerations, to hold any office which needs one who is beyond all suspicion of partiality. Supposing the Speaker of the House of Representatives or the President of the Senate had submitted to him the question of a dissolution, what a position the Government would stand in, whereas if the Chief Justice decided the question no one would object. We will open ourselves to ridicule if we pass the provision.
Mr. SYMON:
My hon. friend does not seem to appreciate the position of a judge in a Federation. He seems to have forgotten that we are establishing a Federation.

Mr. ISAACS:
The word "Federation" is an answer to everything; it is like the word "Mesopotamia."

Mr. SYMON:
There are four judges with the Chief Justice, and you might weaken the court if you withdrew one of them. The Judge might have to sit in judgment on his own executive acts. When you look at it that is absolutely anomalous. If you have a Federal High Court it would be constituted so as to determine the validity or invalidity of executive acts. You should therefore keep it aloof from the executive. Instead of the provision being a blot on the Constitution it would be a blot on Federation to adopt the Constitution without it, or permit any Judge to hold whilst performing judicial duties the highest executive office.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is the objection Sir George Turner has to it.

Mr. SYMON:
Sir George Turner's amendment is practically reducing the whole thing to ridicule. You may just as well say that Her Majesty shall have no power to appoint a Lieutenant-Governor at all. I say let us have this tribunal free from the executive.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I would suggest that the senior Governor of the States should be chosen. Sir George Turner's amendment negatived.

Question-That the clause proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put. The Committee divided.

Mr. WALKER:
I have to propose the following new clause, to follow clause 82:
The Parliament shall take over the whole of the railways of the several States, excepting Tasmania and West Australia, if they desire to be excepted, and each State shall be charged with any deficiency or credited with any net profits on the working of such railways.
Mr. PEACOCK:
That has already been proposed.

Mr. WALKER:
I was just going to intimate that I will move that the consideration of this clause be considered four months hence. (Cheers.)

Clause withdrawn.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I intend to propose that the following new sub-section be added to clause 50:

XXXIIa. The taking over by the Commonwealth, with the consent of the State, of the whole or any part of the railways of any State or States, upon such terms as may be arranged between the Commonwealth and the State.

XXXIIIa. Railway construction and extension with the consent of any State or States concerned.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I now propose the following new clause, to follow clause 95:

The control and management of all railways of the Commonwealth shall be in the hands of a board, the members of which shall be appointed by the Governor in Council for such term and at such remuneration as the Parliament may from time to time fix, which remuneration shall not be reduced during their continuance in office, and who shall be removable only for misconduct or incapacity, and by the Governor in Council, upon an address from both Houses of Parliament in the same Session, praying for such removal.

There is a growing feeling with regard to this railway question amongst some members, and it seems to me that one of the great obstacles in front of this movement has been the idea that the railways might be handed over for purely political purposes by embodying in this Constitution a clause which will necessitate a board of a non-political character. I think if this project gains ground it will be more acceptable to the people of the States. I move for the insertion of the new clause.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I hope the clause will not be adopted, for the reason that we have had some experience of irresponsible boards, and there is a growing dislike to them based upon the experience of their working. I will not occupy time in discussing it, but I felt bound to express my reason for objecting to the clause.

Question-That the new clause proposed to be inserted be so inserted—put. The Committee divided.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I desire to put in a new clause to follow clause 100. This is one of those omitted by the Constitutional Committee. It provides that:
All references or communications required by the Constitution of any State or otherwise to be made by the Governor of the State to the Queen shall be made through the Governor-General, as Her Majesty's representative in the Commonwealth, and the Queen's pleasure shall be made known through him.

I propose to move the insertion of that clause. It is in no sense antagonistic to States rights. It was supported by yourself, Sir, in 1891, and by other ardent defenders of State rights, and it is necessary to the proper administration of federal business. One of the difficulties the colonies have labored under in the past is that they have spoken with individual and often conflicting voices. There have been six or seven voices on what are matters of foreign policy, or are matters that affect Australia as a whole. This clause indicates the channel through which all communications would have to pass, but in no sense limits the power of any State to make any communication or statement it pleases to the Home Government. All required is that those communications should pass through one channel. By this means a unity would be given to the relations between Australia and the mother-country, and it would also be made possible for the Governor-General as such to be in constant touch, not only with the affairs of the Commonwealth, but with the affairs of the several States. It is certain that the Home Government would occasionally require the advice of the Governor-General in addition to that of the Governors of States with regard to measures that were submitted from the several States. I do not intend to make a speech, for I take it that one and all have pretty well decided whether to support this proposal or not. It is warmly commended to us by so high an authority as Bourmot. To me, as well as to a majority in the Sydney Convention, it seemed to be absolutely essential to a proper national administration of Australasian affairs. While it imposes no burden upon t

Mr. BARTON:
This clause was in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
The hon. member for Victoria has not explained, so far as I could understand, the object of sending through the Governor-General. What is to be the nature of the communications to be sent through the Governor-General?

Mr. KINGSTON:
It means sending every Bill through the Governor-General.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Why should the States be deprived of doing what they do at present of sending the communications through their own Governor direct to the Home Government? The object of this Federation, as I understand it, is to take as little as possible from the States.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
And to allow the States to govern themselves as far as they can without the interference of the Federal Government.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Why should you deprive a State of the assistance of communicating through its own Governor on any matters that it thinks fit and proper? The Home Government would be in possession of the federal law, and would know exactly what is going on in the colony. Why should the States be prevented from communicating with the Home Government at all?

Mr. KINGSTON:
On local affairs.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Precisely. This matter was considered in the Constitutional Committee, and it was thought well to strike out the clause in the 1891 Bill. The general feeling, however, is in favor of communicating through the Governor of the province, and, if I recollect a right, that was advocated very strongly by the Victorians in 1891. Unless Mr. Deakin can give us some very good reasons why they should be sent through the Governor-General I shall vote against him. Why, if a State wishes to make an alteration in the Constitution, should the document be sent through the Governor-General?

Mr. ISAACS:
I never differ from Mr. Deakin but with considerable regret. It is impossible for him to put a view he holds without cogency and force, but in this instance I have the misfortune not to entertain the same opinion as he does. It seems to me it would introduce confusion between the Government of the Commonwealth and the Government of the State. As we stand now the Governor-General will transmit all federal matters, and the Governor of the State will transmit all communications which appertain to the State as distinguished from the Federation. I can understand many cases arising which would lead to actual dispute between the Federation and the State, and I do not see why the Governor as representing the State distinctively should not be the medium of communication between the power that appoints him and the State over which he happens to preside. We should be lowering the dignity of the various States if we were to say to each Governor that though he is the representative of the Queen for the colony that he should not be at liberty to communicate direct. I know of no good reason why the clause should be re-introduced.

Mr. MOORE:
It is surprising to me that one attempt after another is made to destroy the political individuality of the States. I hope the views expressed by Mr. Isaacs will be endorsed, and that the Governors of each State will have the power of communicating direct with the Queen. Every attempt of this kind is simply to weaken the power of the State, though when we met here it was intended that we should, as far as possible, maintain the political individuality of each State, and that we should only transfer to the Federal Government that which would be required for federal purposes. I am sure this is an attack on the power provided by the Constitution for the maintenance of State rights. I hope that the hon. member will not press his motion.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I most certainly will.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Theoretically this clause would be quite correct in a Federation which should have only one channel of communication with the outside world, but there should also be a clause providing that for matters within the State there should be no necessity to refer to an outside authority at all. If this clause is put in, the other should follow. I have already endeavored to lay down the principle that in a Federation there should be no necessity to refer to an outside authority with regard to such local matters as a change of constitution. But the Committee has rejected that; and that being the case I shall vote against this clause. If Acts which are purely local have still to receive the Royal assent it is not right that they should have to go through the Governor-General. They should not require any outside Sanction as the State Parliaments will no longer have power to deal with external affairs, but as the Committee has already decided that local Acts should still be subject to the Royal assent, then they should not necessarily be sent through the channel of the Governor-General.

Mr. Howe:

Do I understand the mover of this clause to intimate to the Committee that he has a majority?

Mr. Deakin:

No, certainly not. I have not the least idea of the numbers. I said that as we had all made up our minds it was unnecessary to go into an elaborate explanation.

Mr. Howe:

I inferred from that that you were sure of a majority. This clause will be an unnecessary interference with State rights.

Mr. Kingston:

Hear, hear.

Mr. Howe:

We have surrendered certain powers and functions to the federal authority, and surely this right should remain to the State without our having to communicate through the Governor-General on matters that really do not concern the federal authority at all. Further than that, it is red tapeism pure and simple. It will be a mode of delay. We might have some vital matter, important to the State, and if we have to send despatches through the Governor-General it might be delayed for several mails. I shall vote against the inclusion of this clause.

Mr. Barton:

I should like to make a quotation to this House from two speeches. The first was made by an hon. member who seemed to put the matter very clearly.

Mr. Isaacs:

Who was he?
Mr. BARTON:

The hon. member who is in the chair will be able to inform you. He said:

I do not think there is in this Convention a stronger advocate of State rights and State interests than I am; but still I strongly support the clause as it stands, for it seems to me that one of the very fundamental ideas of a Federation is that, so far as all outside nations are concerned, the Federation shall be one nation, that we shall be Australia to the outside world, in which expression. I include Great Britain; that we shall speak, if not with one voice, at all events, through one channel of communication to the Imperial Government; that is, as it has been put, we shall not have seven voices expressing seven different opinions, but that Her Majesty's Government in Great Britain shall communicate to Her Majesty's Government in Australia through one channel of communication only.

I should like to add to that a few expressions that fell from Sir Samuel Griffith:

I have always maintained that one of the principal reasons for establishing a Federation in Australia was because the governments were always pulling in different directions. Australia speaks with seven voices instead of with one voice. Now, the hon. gentleman, that is, Mr. Gillies, wishes that Australia should continue to speak with seven voices instead of with one voice.

Mr. GILLIES:

Only on matters appertaining to themselves!

Dr. COCKBURN:

On matters appertaining to themselves they should not want to communicate with the Imperial Government at all.

Sir SAMUEL GRIFFITH:

I maintain that Ministers in Australia are to be the Queen's Ministers for the Commonwealth, and any communication affecting any part of the Commonwealth which has to be made to or by the Queen, should be made with their knowledge. Without that we shall not have the voice of one Commonwealth in Australia. I maintain that this argument is quite indisputable. The hon. member's argument amounts to this: somebody will not like it; some people object to it, and it is not absolutely necessary. I admit that it is not absolutely necessary; but I say it is necessary if we are going to establish a real Commonwealth in Australia.

Mr. MOORE:

That would be unification pure and simple.

Mr. BARTON:
An hon. member behind me says that would be unification pure and simple. One of the strong principles of a Federation is that it shall speak through one channel of communication with the outside world. The speaker goes on:

I think the idea is that there is to be but one government for Australia.
That is not unification, but one government for Australia as regards the outside world.

And that we shall have nothing more to do with the Imperial Government except the link of the Crown. We recognise the Crown, but do not desire to have the Governments of Australia all trying to attract the attention of the Secretary of State in Downing-street.

Mr. GILLIES:
We cannot prevent them from having Agents-General.

Sir SAMUEL GRIFFITH:
Certainly not; but the Agents-General will be limited to their functions as commercial agents.

Mr. GILLIES:
Will they?

Sir SAMUEL GRIFFITH:
They will no longer be diplomatic agents. I maintain that Australia in to have only one diplomatic existence, and, therefore, only one diplomatic head, and one diplomatic mouthpiece in any other part of the world. Those are my reasons. I hope the matter will not be considered a light one. I think it is very important indeed.

I have quoted, I suppose, from two of the most strong, definite, and clear champions of State rights, and it would be futile for me to add another word.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I thoroughly agree with the idea that the Federation should speak with one voice on behalf of Australia generally, but this belief is qualified by another, that it should only speak in national affairs, and that it should leave State and local affairs to the management of the States themselves, and not interfere in the slightest degree. I have though

Mr. ISAACS:
A circumlocution office.

Mr. KINGSTON:
A circumlocution office! It would be bad enough if it were only a circumlocution office, but I am inclined to think that it is not intended as a mere idle form, but that the Governor-General and the Federal Government shall have the opportunity of communicating their views to the Colonial Office. Either one of two things. At the best a waste of time, at the worst a course of action calculated to produce great friction between the State Governments and the Federal Government. I have simply spoken of these documents going from the States Governors through the Federal Government to the Colonial Office. But the reverse holds good—back they would come through the Federal Government to the various States, and fancy—the point has been put to me by another member, for which I am obliged—our receiving advice as regards matters purely of local concern, say as regards the assent to our Bills or the disallowance of a Bill, or the appointment of a Governor, not first hand from the authority with which we have a right to communicate, but coming through an authority to which we owe no allegiance, and which, though supreme within the orbit of its own jurisdiction, should not be permitted to interfere in matters with which it has absolutely no concern.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I think it has been generally recognised that the States are in this Federation to retain their complete autonomy, and I do not know any member of this Convention who has held this view more strongly than Mr. Deakin. Mr. Deakin has held, and held rightly, that every matter which can better be left to the States than transferred to the Commonwealth for its control should be left to the States, that in that matter the States should be masters of their own destinies and their own proceedings. I cannot conceive of any more serious blow that could be dealt at the Government of these States, and therefore at the autonomy we desire to preserve for them, than by allowing this interference as between the home authorities and the State through the Governor-General upon purely State matters. It might very well be that the States would have to refer some amendment of their Constitution. They would in such a case under this proposal have to refer that amendment of their local Constitution for the Royal assent through the Governor-General. I think that would be not only to the detriment of the interests of the States, so far as their system of government was concerned, but that it would be an exceedingly ridiculous, roundabout, and cumbrous procedure.

Proposed new clause negatived.

Dr. COCKBURN:

I wish to move two new clauses to follow clause 103. Their object is to prevent anybody from occupying the dual position of a member of a State Parliament and a member of the Federal Parliament. Such a position must necessarily mean a divided allegiance. The State Parliament may for the time being be opposed to the Federal Parliament. Then, again, the local Parliaments may be sitting at the same time as the Federal Parliament, or it might be that a State Parliament would have to hurry through its work in order to enable some of its members to get to the scene of their other work in the Federal Parliament. Mr. Higgins has clearly shown that one of the reasons of the degradation of the State Parliaments in America lay in the fact that they were mixed up with federal politics. Unless a provision of the nature I am about to submit is inserted, the work of the State Parliaments will have to be made subordinate altogether to the work of the Federal Parliament. I therefore move the insertion of the following new clauses, which formed part of the Bill of 1891:

A member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall not be capable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of any House of Parliament of a State.

If a member of a House of the Parliament of a State is, with his own consent, chosen as a member of either House of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, his place in the first-mentioned House of Parliament shall become vacant.

Mr. Higgins:

As my name has been mentioned in connection with this, I would just like to say one or two words. I feel strongly how the State Parliaments in America have been degraded by having federal politics introduced; but, to my idea, though I may be wrong, the work of the Federal Parliament will be very much less than we imagine, and I am perfectly prepared to leave it to the electors of the State Parliament to say whether they will trust their affairs in the hands of those who occupy seats there. It will be a great inconvenience as well as a loss to the electors of the colonies if they are not able to assist in the moulding of the Federal Parliament and its legislation. I hope that perfect liberty of choice will be left to the electors so that they may select men whom they think can best do their duty.

Sir Edward Braddon:

I hope this clause will not be inserted. This was argued out very fully in the Constitutional Committee, and it was shown pretty clearly that it would not only have the effect of limiting the selection of members of the Federal Parliament, but to a considerable extent would cause a deterioration in the efficiency of the States Parliament. I think we should leave it to the judgment of the people of the States, who, after all, are the arbiters in this case, to say what should be done.

Proposed clauses negatived.

Dr. Quick:

I have a new clause to propose, to follow clause 120 under the heading "Miscellaneous." It reads:

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, if any person votes or attempts to vote more than once at any election held under this Constitution, he shall be guilty of an offence against the electoral law of the State in which he votes, or attempts to vote, and shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding three calendar months, and the provisions of this section may be enforced in any court having jurisdiction in respect of electoral offences in the State.

It is provided by section 9 that no person shall vote more than once for the election of senators, and, according to section 29, no man shall vote more than once for the election for the House of Representatives. Clause 10 provides:

The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the members of the Senate. Subject to such laws, if any, the Parliament of each State may determine the time, place, and manner of choosing the members for that State. Until such determination, and unless the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the laws in force in the several States for the time being, relating to the following matters, namely: The manner of conducting elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, the proceedings at such elections, returning officers, the periods during which elections may be continued, and offences against the laws regulating such elections shall as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the several States of members of the Senate.

Then clause 41 enacts:

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the laws in force in the several States for the time being, relating to the following matters, namely: The manner of conducting elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, the proceedings at such elections, the returning officers, the periods during which elections may be continued, the execution of new writs in case of places vacated otherwise than by dissolution, and offences against the laws regulating such elections, shall as nearly as am practicable apply to elections in the several States of members of the House of Representatives.

The object of this clause is substantially to meet special cases in Victoria, Tasmania, Western Australia, and Queensland, where there is no local law providing penalties for voting twice. In New South Wales and South Australia this provision would hardly be necessary, but it is absolutely essential that some provision of the kind should be made for the colonies I have mentioned, otherwise equal voting will be practically a dead letter. For instance, supposing in Victoria any person votes twice for an election of senators, or members of the House of Representatives, there is no law under which he could be prosecuted and there is no guarantee that a local law will he passed. This Constitution must be independent of the possibility or probability of any such local law being passed. Otherwise there will be a doubt, and a feeling of insecurity as to the reality of this provision. I have proposed this to meet a special case, and it may be unsymmetrical to put it in any Constitution, but I cannot see any way out of it. Some provision is necessary to meet the case of three colonies, and unless something is done the law abolishing plural voting will be a dead letter.

Mr. BARTON:

At first I thought it would be necessary to have some provision of this sort, but now I think it is unnecessary. In the clause it is prescribed that an elector "shall have only one vote"; as to the Senate and as to the House of Representatives I intend to move, on the recommittal of the clause, that the matter shall be turned into a direct prohibition; that is, that "no elector shall vote more than once." A breach will be a Statutory misdemeanor, and the offender can be punished, this being an Imperial Statute, in the same way as he would be for a breach of any other Imperial Statute applying to the colonies, such as the merchant shipping laws. Lest there should be any doubt in connection with the giving of a vote, when there is a distinct law against it, there is a passage in Russell on "Crimes," which the legal members of the Convention will be satisfied with. It is in the fifth edition, page 192:

Where an offence is not so at common law, but made an offence by Act of Parliament, an indictment will lie where there is a substantive prohibitory clause in such Statute, though there be afterward a particular provision and a particular remedy given. Thus, an unqualified person may be indicted for acting as an attorney contrary to the 6 and 7 Vict., c. 73, a. 2, although sec. 35 and sec. 36 enact that in case any person shall so act he shall be incapable of recovering his fees, and such offence shall be deemed a contempt of court, and punishable accordingly.

That is to say, although the Statute provides a distinct means of punishment, yet if by the disregard of the prohibition a misdemeanor is committed, a court can convict the offender of that misdemeanor and may fine or imprison him. The passage continues:

And it is stated as an established principle that when a new offence is created by an Act of Parliament and a penalty is annexed to it by a separate and substantive clause, it is not necessary for the prosecutor to sue for the penalty, but he may proceed on the prior clause on the ground of its being a misdemeanor; and wherever a Statute forbids the doing of a thing, the doing of it wilfully, although without any corrupt motive, is indictable.

Wherever the Statute, as I intend to ask the House to make it in this case, says that no elector shall vote more than once, there is a distinct prohibition, and voting more than once wilfully will be a crime and misdemeanor, and the courts will be able to punish by fine or imprisonment. They will have the distinct power. There is in all of these colonies an electoral law, and power to alter it, until Parliament otherwise provides, and if there are not distinct provisions for punishment for such offences, it is still in the power of the State law to subject the offenders to such punishment as it prescribes. But even if that were not done, the case is distinctly met by the Statutory prohibition, which will be imposed by the form in which we propose to put it, and, I think, my hon. friend will agree that his new clause will not be necessary.

Mr. ISAACS:
I suppose you propose to put in words to make it a misdemeanor.

Mr. BARTON:
If necessary; but where the statute expressly forbids it is a misdemeanor without further words.

& Without any corrupt motive is it indictable?

Mr. BARTON:
Although there may be no corruption in the doing of the act, if it is done intentionally it is indictable.

Mr. HIGGINS:
What words do you propose to put in?

Mr. BARTON:
I propose to alter the words "each elector shall have only one vote" to "no elector shall vote more than once," and that being a distinct statutory prohibition will meet the case.

Dr. QUICK:
In view of the proposed amendment I beg to withdraw the proposition.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I only wish to point out that at our last elections in Tasmania we adopted the Hare-Spence system in the cities of Hobart and Launceston, and we provided a penalty of £50.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I did not think you had any wicked people over there.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
We thought they might come from Victoria. Clause withdrawn.

PREAMBLE.
Whereas the people of [here name the colonies which have adopted the Constitution] have agreed to form one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and under the Constitution hereby established: And whereas it is expedient to make provision for the admission into the Commonwealth of other Australasian Colonies and possessions of Her Majesty: Be it therefore enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in the present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

Mr. DEAKIN:

On the question of the preamble I have already called the attention of Mr. Barton to a change made in the opening expression. In the original Bill it was:

Have agreed to unite in one Federal Commonwealth.

But here it is:

Have agreed to form one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth.

The introduction of the word "indissoluble" is a decided improvement; but in other respects I beg to suggest that the words "agreed to form" are, to use an expression of Mr. Barton in referring to another matter, not so stately an opening as:

Agreed to unite in one federal Commonwealth.

If I may be permitted to refer to clause 3 we find the words:

Shall be united in a Federal Constitution.

Both of these are legal expressions, and it appears to me, if I may be so bold as to offer a suggestion to gentlemen who have far more experience in drafting than I have had, and to whose judgment I willingly bow, that they are legal rather than expressive, they do not appeal to the common understanding to a layman.

Mr. BARTON:

To save time, I may say that I will willingly accept the amendment.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I do not propose to move an amendment, but I merely suggest it.

Word "form" struck out and "unite in" substituted.

Mr. GLYNN:

I have an amendment which I move, not on my own unsupported initiative, but at the suggestion of other members of this Convention. It is:

That before the word "have" on the second line of the preamble the words "invoking Divine Providence" be inserted.

I only wish that I could with ease command language appropriate to the solemnity of the amendment, for the occasion is one unique in its character, and calling for the exercise of perfect choice of words, and the use of them in a spirit of deepest reverence. But I trust the Convention will overlook my personal shortcomings, and accept my assurance of a desire to approach the subject with becoming delicacy. We must, I am sure, all agree, whatever may be the decision of the Convention as to the propriety of passing the motion, that we cannot ignore the evidence afforded by the petitions of a widespread desire that the spirit of the proposal should be accepted; we cannot pass over in silence the almost unanimous request of the members of so many creeds, of one aim and hope, that the supremacy of God should be recognised, and His blessing invoked, in the opening lines of our Constitution. It is from a belief that we should give expression to that desire in the Convention, and that a consensus upon the great central fact of faith and feeling, strengthens, rather than weakens, the security of liberty of thought, that I move this amendment. Let me state some of the reasons that should operate for its acceptance. We have taken the first great step towards Federation. The draft of our Constitution is practically complete. Never was the birth of a nation blessed by the conjunction of such auspicious stars, never did the opening of a national life give such promise of endurance and strength, as mark the coming of Australia. The American Union was, in its primary objects, a defensive alliance—the issue of fear; begotten of a sense of danger from isolation and diversity, and a keen consciousness of necessity in the struggle for life. Stripped of the romance of rebellion and the glamor of success, the movement which was crowned with the Constitution of 1787, was not the outcome of a wild and ennobling impulse

[P.1185] starts here

of patriotism, a fight for a great ideal. It was, as Mr. Lecky reminds us, in words which I cannot remember, but whose effect I can give, the method of commonplace and calculating men, of commercial instincts and narrow ambitions. The Swiss Federation was not the product of a splendid foresight and love, but the fruit of 600 years of dissension and dangers, the expression of a reluctant sense of an indispensable condition to the permanence of national life. But ours is the creation of desire, the product of prudence and passion—of passion for the larger life and nobler aims, and prudence that can build before the breaking of the storm. The foundations of our national edifice are being laid in times of peace; the invisible hand of Providence is in the tracing of our plans. Should we not, at the, very inception of our great work, give some outward recognition of the Divine guidance that we feel? This spirit of reverence for the Unseen pervades all the relations of our civil life. It is felt in the forms in our courts of justice, in the language of our Statutes, in the oath that binds the sovereign to the observance of our liberties, in the recognition of the Sabbath, in the rubrics of our guilds and social orders, in the anthem through which on every public occasion we invoke a blessing on our executive head, in our domestic observances, in the offices of courtesy at our meetings and partings, and in the time-honored motto of the nation. Says Burke:

We know, and, what is better, we feel inwardly that religion is the basis of civil society.

The ancients, who, in the edifices of the mind and marble, have left us such noble exemplars for our guidance, invoked, under a sense of its all-pervading power, the direction of the Divine mind. Pagans though they were, and as yet but seeing dimly, they felt that the breath of a Divine Being-

That pure breath of life, that spirit of man, which God inspired, as Milton says—was the life of their establishments. It is of this that Cicero speaks when he writes of that great elemental law at the back of all human ordinances, that eternal principle which governs the entire universe, wisely commanding what is right and prohibiting what is wrong, and which he calls the mind of God. He says:

Let this, therefore, be a fundamental principle in all societies, that the gods are the supreme lords and governors of all things—that all events are directed by their influence, and wisdom, and Divine power.

Right through the ages we find this universal sense of Divine inspiration—this feeling, that a wisdom beyond that of man shapes the destiny of states; that the institutions of men are but the imperfect instruments of a Divine and beneficent energy, helping their higher aims. Should we not, Sir, grant the prayer of the many petitions that have been presented to us, by recognising at the opening of our great future our dependence upon God—should we not fix in our Constitution the elements of reverence and strength, by expressing our share of the universal sense, that a Divine idea animates all our higher objects, and that the guiding hand of Providence leads our wanderings towards the dawn? In doing so we will be but acting on what a great statesman called, the uniformly considered sense of mankind. He continues:

That sense, not only like a wise architect, hath built up the august fabric of States, but, like a provident proprietor, to preserve the structure from profanation and ruin as a sacred temple, purged from all the impurities of fraud, and violence, and injustice, and tyranny, hath solemnly and for ever consecrated the Commonwealth and all that officiate in it. This consecration is made that all who administer in the government of men, in which they stand in the person of God himself, should have high and worthy notions of their function and destination; that their hope should be full of immortality; that they should not look to the paltry pelf of the moment, nor to the temporary and transient praise of the vulgar, but to a solid permanent existence in the permanent part of their nature, and to a permanent fame and glory in the example they leave as a rich inheritance to the world.

It was from a consciousness of the moral anarchy of the world's unguided course, that all races of man saw, in their various gradations of light, the vision of an eternal Justice behind the veil of things, whose intimations kept down the rebellious hearts of earth's children. It was this that made them consecrate their national purposes to God; that their hands might grow strong, and their minds be illumined, by the grace of that power divine through which alone, as Plato says, the poet sings:

We give like children, and the Almighty plan, Controls the forward children of weak man.

Under a sense of this great truth, expressed some thousand years ago, I ask you to grant the prayer of these petitions; to grant it in a hope, that the justice we wish to execute may be rendered certain in our work, and our union abiding and fruitful by the blessing of the Supreme Being.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

There is no doubt the sermon of the hon. gentleman would have been exceedingly interesting provided it had been given in another place, but why we should be called upon to invoke the Divine blessing I cannot understand. To do so is not the proper way of carrying out the religious idea at all. Certain ceremonies are adopted in certain old countries because it has been the custom. In several modern constitutions which have been adopted—for instance, those of the United States and Canada—this ceremony has not been provided for. Nothing can make religion more ridiculous than to have the form without the substance. Prayers in the House of Commons are a mere farce. We are asked to put in words which would create difficulty, annoyance, and vexation, and instead of doing good would do harm. It will not make people religious to put two or three words like these into an Act of Parliament, and it will not make this Parliament religious. We might as well say that all business here or elsewhere should be commenced with prayer. And we might go further and say that we should go on our knees during the prayer. Instead of doing good to persons this would have the opposite effect. Nothing does more harm to religion than to make an outward show of it. I hope we will not put in words to make it appear that we have invoked the Divine blessing on our proceedings. All that has been done since the Bill of 1891, that was drafted six years ago, has gone on very well, and we shall go on very well for years without these words.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not want a motion of this kind if it can be avoided, and I still think it would be a wise and gracious thing of my hon. friend not to press this motion. It is not with any feeling of irreverence that I say this, but because I think there are some occasions on which the invocation of the Deity is more reverently left out than made. There are, no doubt, a large number of electors who will go to the poll, when they vote to agree to this union, invoking Divine guidance. Still it is not our place to enquire, after the vote is over, into the hearts and minds of the electors. It is not for us

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

It is surely not according to the religious convictions of anyone that we should attribute feelings to others as to which we are in perfect ignorance? We cannot know that anyone will have those feelings before the action has occurred; we should not know the feelings that anyone had had even if the action had already occurred. How can it then be either logically, or truly, or fairly said that the electors of Australia have invoked the Divine guidance? We put these words into the mouth of the Imperial Parliament -we, the Convention, who have had no instructions upon this point, except that there have been certain petitions presented, are inviting the Imperial Parliament to declare that persons 12,000 miles away had invoked the Divine guidance. Can we honestly and truthfully assure the Imperial Parliament of that? If not, why suggest to them to use these words? I am not suggesting for a moment that there will not be a very large number of electors who before going to the poll will offer up some kind of prayer, according to their religious convictions, and no man will honor them the less for doing that; but can we inquire into the proportion of those who do or do not do this? Can we attribute to those who do and to those who do not that the one or the other are in a majority, or affirm that those who create this Constitution have, before they created it, gone to the foot of their Creator and asked for Divine guidance? What is the ordinary feeling of a man on going to the poll? He will probably go in the spirit of opposition to somebody, and meaning to support somebody else; if he does that under the electoral law of New South Wales he will probably scratch somebody's name out. I do not think when a man scratches out the name of his adversary he is invoking the Divine guidance, except in the sense that he may want to place the person to whom he gives his support into a position that will be the direct antithesis of that in which he wants to place the other person.

An HON. MEMBER:

That is no argument.

Mr. BARTON:

I am told that that is not an argument. It is an argument in the sense that we cannot predicate—any more than we can predict—of people what their views and intentions are. The whole mode of government, the whole province of the State, is secular. The whole business that is transacted by any community—however deeply Christian, unless it has an established church, unless religion is interwoven expressly and professedly with all its actions—is secular business as distinguished from religious business. The whole duty is to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's. That is the line of division maintained in every State in which there is not a predominant church government which dictates to all civil institutions. In these colonies, where State aid to religion has long been abolished, this line of demarcation is most definitely observed, and there is no justification for inserting into your secular documents of State provisions or expressions which refer to matters best dealt with by the churches, and which every righteous citizen will deal with in his church and at his time of worship, and not intrude into those matters which are themselves secular, and in themselves cannot be anything but secular. I should like to see debate avoided on a matter of this sort, and it was only with the greatest reluctance that I undertook to express my own opinions. It is because I should think that I was not doing justice to myself if I allowed this to pass without comment that I have risen. It is not in any spirit of irreverence, but rather in a spirit of protest against the introduction of such a motion on such an occasion that I have risen. I am quite sure there is no hon. member of this Convention who to conciliate the support of any denomination or any class would take the action that is now being taken. If that is generously allowed, and it may be fully allowed, then clearly others may debate this matter without being misunderstood, and no irreligious feeling must be attributed to those who, not agreeing with the proposal, claim as strong a right to maintain their religious convictions and express them at the proper time. We ought to avoid a long debate, and have no division. The best plan which can be adopted as to a proposal of this kind, which is so likely to create dissension foreign to the objects of any church, or any Christian community, is that secular expressions should be left to secular matters while prayer should be left to its proper place.

Mr. WALKER:

With all due deference to my hon. friend Mr. Barton, I cannot forget that I presented a petition from several thousand inhabitants of New South Wales asking that there should be some recognition of the Divine Sovereignty in this Constitution. It is within the knowledge of most of the members of this Convention that in the Church of England there have been prayers that the deliberations of this Convention might tend to the benefit of the whole of these colonies. I know that has also been done in other churches, and therefore I do think that in a sense it is true there has been a public, desire for God's blessing upon our work. I would remind this Committee that at the opening of the Convention, or shortly after, the President read a telegram he received from the Secretary or State for the Colonies, on behalf of Her Majesty, in which, if I remember rightly, there is an allusion to the guidance of Divine Providence. It seems to me only fair that this motion should be considered. I may say that I have the authority of the Premier of New South Wales, Mr. Reid, also that of Mr. Carruthers and Sir Joseph Abbott, for saying that, had they been here, they would have supported Mr. Glynn in his proposal. It seems to me that there will be no harm in mentioning here that at the Convention in Bathurst the following clause was carried unanimously:

That this Convention, acknowledging the government of this world by Divine Providence, commends the cause of Australian Federation to all those who desire to promote the material, moral, and social advancement of the people of Australia.

We are all aware that even on the coins that we circulate every day with Her Majesty's image on are the words "By the Grace of God, Defender of the Faith"; and I do think we are only consistent in making some acknowledgment such as in the words proposed by Mr. Glynn. I trust that this Committee will not divide, but will accept the proposition unanimously.

Mr. GLYNN:

Before the matter is put, I quite recognise the fair spirit in which this proposition has been accepted by the Convention. I agree with Mr. Barton that the question is one which should not be debated, but I have done my duty in having, at the request, reflected by these petitions, of a very large body outside this Convention, and of members of this Convention, some of whom have left the colony to-day to return to their homes, brought forward this resolution. I would be very sorry to push it if hon. members think it is a matter of propriety and should not be considered at the present time. I did not act on personal initiative in bringing this matter forward, but wished not to pass over in pure silence the numerous petitions regarding this question which have been presented to the Convention. Now having mentioned the matter, perhaps I should ask permission to withdraw. I do so because this is the beginning of the work, and I do not want a motion of this sort to be put with the possibility of unripe discussion. Our voices ought to be unanimous either in favor of its acceptance or rejection. I ask leave to withdraw the amendment, and the feeling adduced would be an excellent test of the possibility of a provision of this sort being accepted later on if that permission were granted me.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That lets it go forth to the outside world that we are all against it going in.

Mr. GLYNN:
If hon. members wish me to push it, no one is more willing to do so; but I understand it is the sense of this Convention that it will be better to let the matter drop at present. If I accurately interpret the feeling of this Convention, the best test I can make is to ask leave to withdraw the amendment. If not, one vote, refusing a withdrawal, will settle the matter.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I shall object to that. Without wishing to controvert what Mr. Barton has said, I may remark that I have had very strong representations made to me by my constituents to support this request, and I cannot do any other.

I wish to move:
That clauses 9, 12, 23, 25, 29, 36, 47, 48, 52, 54, 67, 82, 84, and 121 be recommitted.

I move:
That clauses 73 and 107 be recommitted.

Mr. HOWE:

I move:
That clause 13 be recommitted.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Clause 1.-The legislative powers of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament, which shall consist of Her Majesty, a Senate, and a House of Representatives, and which is hereinafter called "The Parliament," or "The Parliament of the Commonwealth."

Mr. BARTON:

I find that the term "Her Majesty" appears in this clause, and as "the Queen" is the expression variably used now

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Clause as amended passed.

Clause 8.-"Privileges, &c., of Houses."

Mr. BARTON:

I move:
To strike out "respectively" from the second line.
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:
To strike out "and of the committees and members thereof respectively," and insert "and of its members and committees.
Amendment agreed to.
Clause as amended agreed to.
Clause 9.-Senate.
Clause 9.-The Senate shall be composed of six members for each State, and each member shall have one vote.
The members for each State dull be directly chosen by the people of the State as one electorate.
The members shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the members chosen by each State shall be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General.
The Parliament shall have power, from time to time, to increase or diminish the number of members for each State, but so that the equal representation of the several States shall be maintained and that no State shall have less than six members.
The qualification of members of the Senate shall be in each State that which is prescribed by this Constitution or by the Parliament as the qualification for electors of members of the House of Representatives, but in the choosing of senators each elector shall have only one vote.

Mr. BARTON:

I propose:
To add at the end of the clause the words "and if any elector votes more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Mr. HIGGINS:

I would call attention to one difficulty. If there are a dozen men who vote twice and are guilty of a misdemeanor there is nothing to show that the votes are not to be counted notwithstanding.

Mr. BARTON:

I will put my amendment in a different form. I will first move:
To strike out the word "only."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I will now move:
To insert after the words "have one vote" the words "for as many persons as are to be elected."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I will next move:
To add at the end of the clause the words "and if any elector votes more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Dr. QUICK:
I would suggest that Mr. Barton put in "more than once at the same election."

Mr. BARTON:
It is only multiplying words.
Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN:
Do I understand that the word "senators" is to take the place of "members of the Senate"?

Mr. BARTON:
Yes.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I would ask Mr. Barton if he is going to insert a provision here?

Mr. BARTON:
About regulations?

Mr. KINGSTON:
Yes.

Mr. BARTON:
No, not here. There is a proper place for that. Dr. Quick has a motion on it. I do not think it is in this clause.

Dr. QUICK:
No. "Miscellaneous."

Mr. BARTON:
We think it will not be necessary.
Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 12.-As soon as practicable after the Senate first meets the members chosen for each State shall be divided by lot into two classes. The places of the members of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the third year, and the places of those of the second class at the expiration of the sixth year, from the commencement of their term of service as herein declared, so that one-half may be chosen every third year.

For the purposes of this section the term of service of a member shall begin on and be reckoned from the first day of January next succeeding the day of his election, except in the case of the first election, when it shall be reckoned from the first day of January preceding the day of his election.
The election to fill the places of members retiring by rotation shall be made in the year preceding the day on which they are to retire.

Mr. BARTON:

In that clause I wish:

To omit the last phrase of the first paragraph, "so that one-half may be chosen every third year," and insert in its place, "and afterwards there shall be an election every third year accordingly."

I wish to convey the idea that these elections will take place every three years right on from the first time. A suggestion was made by the hon. member Mr. Deakin that we should make some provision whereby the members who were lowest on the poll should be those to retire first. But none of them would retire for three years, and there is no guarantee that any of them would be lower in the confidence of the electors after the expiration of three years. We thought that once members were elected to any Assembly they should be treated all alike, and that to make any discrimination after their election as to the number of votes cast would be foreign to the policy of any legislative body. We thought, therefore, that the retirement should be by lot.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 13.-How vacancies filled.

Mr. HOWE:

I would ask the Leader of the Convention to kindly indicate the amendment in this clause.

Mr. BARTON:

I move verbal amendments to make the clause read:

If the place of a senator becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service, the Houses of Parliament of the State he represented shall, sitting and voting together, choose a person to fill the vacancy until the expiration of the term or until the election of a senator as hereinafter provided, whichever first happens. And if the Houses of Parliament of the State shall be in recess at the time when the vacancy occurs the Governor of the State, with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint a person to fill the vacancy until the beginning of the next Session of the Parliament of the State or until the election of a successor, whichever first happens.

At the next general election of members of the House of Representatives, or at the next election of senators of the State, whichever first happens, a successor shall, if the term has not then expired, he chosen to hold the place from the date of his election until the expiration of the term.

Amendments agreed to and clause passed.
Clause 14.-The qualifications of a member of the Senate shall be those of a member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WALKER:
I move:
To strike out all the words after "Senate."
If that is carried I shall move to make the age qualification 25 instead of 21.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
The age of a candidate for a seat in the Senate was designedly made the same as for a candidate for the House of Representatives, and both alike are elected by the full suffrage of the people. Such a hard-and-fast rule as Mr. Walker proposes might exclude some modern Pitt.

Mr. WALKER:
It might also include some well-known athlete or footballer who for the time has got the voice of the people. To say that such a man should be able to get £400 a year for six years is a mere farce.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Make it a misdemeanor to be a footballer.

Amendment negatived; clause as read agreed to.

Clause 23.-The House of Representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the several States, according to their respective numbers; as nearly as practicable there shall be two members of the House of Representatives for every one member of the Senate.

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, each State shall have one member for each quota of its people. The quota shall, whenever necessary, be ascertained by dividing the population of the Commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by twice the number of members of the Senate, and the number of members to which each State is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the State as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by the quota.

But each of the existing colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmanian, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the province of South Australia, shall be entitled to five representatives at the least.

Mr. BARTON:
There was some doubt as to whether the words:
until Parliament otherwise provides,
governed the remainder of the paragraph as to the method of ascertaining the quota.

To make it clear I will move:
To strike out of lines 22 and 23 the words "each State shall have one member for each quota of its people," and insert in lieu thereof the words
"For the method of determining the number of members for each State there shall be one member for each quota of the people of the State, and"

Mr. ISAACS:
That will make one sentence of the subsection?

Mr. BARTON:
Yes.

Amendment agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 25.-When upon the apportionment of representatives it is found that after dividing the number of the people of a State by the quota in respect of which a State is entitled to one representative there remains a surplus greater than one-half of such number, the State shall have one more representative.

Mr. BARTON:
I have a verbal amendment to make in this clause. I move:
To omit the words "in respect of which a State is entitled to one representative," because the meaning of "quota" is sufficient as given in the previous clause 23.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I move now:
To strike out "number" and insert "quota."

Mr. ISAACS:
Is not that more than a verbal amendment? It seems to be a distinct alteration of the meaning.

Mr. BARTON:
The mistake was that after the introduction of the word "quota," the word "number" was left in, when it too, should have been altered to "quota." The word should be "quota," and not "number."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 29.-Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each State that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification for electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State. But in the choosing of such members each elector shall have only one vote, and no elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, shall be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising such right at elections for the House of Representatives.
Mr. BARTON:
I wish to insert here, after the words "only one vote," the same words as were inserted at the end of clause 9.

Dr. QUICK:
Care should be taken to distinguish the provisions in this section from that in regard to the Senate, because under this section an election may take place in single or plural electorates, according to the local law.

Mr. BARTON:
If you say "for as many members as are to be elected," it will meet the case of single or plural electorates. Supposing the colony is in one division, or there are a number of electorates, according to the divisions made in the colony, then a person can only vote in either case in one electoral division; if they are single electorates he can vote for one member only, but if two are to be elected, his one vote can be given to two candidates.

Mr. ISAACS:
I am afraid that, supposing the colony of New South Wales has a representation of twenty-six members, and is divided into twenty-six different electorates, if you word the clause in this way an elector may be able to vote in all twenty-six electorates, which is what we wish to prevent. He should not vote more than once.

Mr. WALKER:
Do you want single electorates?

Mr. ISAACS:
We want to provide some words that will not allow him to vote in more electoral divisions than one.

Mr. WALKER:
Supposing there are several members wanted?

Mr. ISAACS:
He can, of course, vote for the full number in that electoral division.

Dr. QUICK:
I think the following words would meet the case:
And in the choosing of such members no elector shall vote more than once.
That is following the words in the Federal Enabling Act.

Mr. BARTON:
We have used this term in a previous clause:
Each elector shall have only one vote.

Dr. QUICK:
That does not meet the case of single electorates.

Mr. SYMON:
Would it not be better to make it read:
Each elector shall have only one vote for as many members as are to be elected in every one electoral district.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Then you might have plurality of voting.

Mr. ISAACS:
No.

Mr. BARTON:
If he can only vote once he cannot vote in two electoral places. How will this read:
Shall have only one vote for as many persons as are to be elected in the electoral division for which he is qualified.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You then make him vote for the whole lot. Would not that stop plumping?

Mr. BARTON:
He would have one vote for each member to be elected.

Mr. HOLDER:
Why not make it:
Shall only vote once.

Mr. BARTON:
I think we have got it in a better form.

Mr. ISAACS:
Are you going to leave out the word "only"?

Mr. BARTON:
Yes.

The CHAIRMAN:
There is a small matter here. In the second line are the words:
The qualification of electors.
And in the fourth line:
The qualification for electors.

Mr. BARTON:
It should be:
The qualification of electors
in both cases. My amendment will read:
For as many persons as are to be elected in an electoral division for each colony, and if any elector vote more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
    You allow him to qualify for more than one electorate?

Mr. BARTON:
    This stops a man from voting more than once.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
    The amendment says he can vote once in the electorate in which he is qualified.

Mr. BARTON:
    That does not matter; he can only vote in one, even if he is qualified in a dozen electorates.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
    The word "the" should be used instead of "any."

Mr. BARTON:
    I am not going to discuss such a trivial matter as the words "the" or "any."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
    That is not the proper way to treat us.

Mr. BARTON:
    After my hon. friend made such a powerful appeal to me this afternoon to try and push on, I do not see why we should quarrel over the words "the" or "any."

Mr. KINGSTON:
    I do not wish to take part in any quarrel-

Mr. BARTON:
    My hon. friend is a mere lamb.

Mr. KINGSTON:
    But I rise for the purpose of pouring oil upon the waters, lest they should become troubled. We attach a good deal of importance to the declaration that the principle of one man one vote should be embodied in this Constitution, so as to do away with plural voting. I would ask Mr. Barton if there is any necessity for the alteration proposed. He has the clause in very nice shape as it is. The mode in which he had fixed the provision up previously commended itself to the good sense of a large majority, and I trust he will not alter it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
    I hope that Mr. Barton will accept the advice that has been just tendered to him. The clause as it previously appeared-without paying particular attention to prepositions or anything of that sort-laid it down that one man was to have one vote. While we stick to that we stick to the thing we desire to see secured, and we do not wish one man to hold one vote for any number of electoral divisions in which he may have qualifications.

Mr. BARTON:
I would remind my hon. friend that the amendment exactly provides for what he wants.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I trust hon. members will be considerate to Mr. Barton, and that there will be no attack.

Mr. BARTON:
We are quite ready for any amount of attack.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Mr. Barton has a very difficult position to fill, and I trust hon. members will recognise that.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If they were all as kind as you.

Amendment agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
Hon. members will recollect that there was an amendment carried in this clause at the instance of my hon. friend Mr. Holder, to this effect:

No elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, shall be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising such right at elections for the House of Representatives.

There are a number of members who did not sufficiently consider that this applied to the preservation of any suffrage after the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth, and preventing it being interfered with by the Parliament of the Commonwealth. There are some hon. members who are in favor of preserving the suffrage existing at the date of the Commonwealth, and not interfering with it, so that any person who has for instance a vote under adult suffrage or female suffrage, should not have a vote taken away while it lasts. On the other hand the various States may amend their electoral laws after the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth; and some members who voted for this provision have told me that they did not sufficiently consider that after the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth the State might alter its law. Supposing female suffrage were taken away by South Australia, there is no reason why it should.

No elector, entitled to a qualification existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State shall, whilst that qualification continues, be deprived by any law of the Commonwealth of the right to vote at elections for the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Why not make it the suffrage at the time the uniform law is made. Whatever the qualifications are at the time the Federal Parliament makes the uniform law, they should be preserved.

Mr. BARTON:
Perhaps the hon. member did not catch what I was saying—that before or after the establishment of the Commonwealth a State may make a suffrage which would be totally distasteful to the rest of the colonies. I am not speaking of adult suffrage. Supposing we take some extension, which may include persons of age whom the other colonies would certainly not include, or might include persons who are not of age. These are the only extensions beyond adult suffrage which are likely to be made if ever made. I am not going to say what anyone's anticipations may be upon the question, because we all have our own opinions; but my hon. friend has not seen this, that if the extension is made by the Parliament of the State, before or after the establishment of the Commonwealth, and before the Commonwealth has made a law, the Commonwealth cannot make a uniform law unless it grants all over the Commonwealth such an extension. That would practically prevent the Parliament of the Commonwealth, if such an inapt extension were made in one State, from ever making a uniform suffrage, unless the suffrage in this offending State were by the State itself regulated back to something reasonable. It cannot be the intention of hon. members to tie the hands of the Federal Parliament in that way. No one wants to interfere with the adult suffrage in South Australia, but surely it is the right of the Commonwealth to make such a uniform suffrage as would not compel it to grant every extension that should be wilfully and captiously made by any State.

Mr. ISAACS:
Will you indicate what the alteration is? I did not catch it.

Mr. BARTON:
I wish to make the test on the day of the establishment of the Commonwealth. That is the true sense of the matter. I have put the case of an extension. Put the converse. Supposing a State took away the suffrage in a particular case, what would be the result?

Mr. PEACOCK:
Before the Commonwealth legislation?

Mr. BARTON:
Yes; as Mr. Holder expressed it, I have endeavoured to carry it out. Sir George Turner will see by the amendment of Mr. Holder, that if a State, having conferred a certain suffrage, before or at the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth, took it away before the Parliament of the Commonwealth legislated, yet, notwithstanding the taking away of that suffrage, under the amendment as it stands the Parliament of the Commonwealth could not touch the claim of the person to vote who had once acquired the suffrage, because:

No elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, shall be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising such right at elections for the House of Representatives.

So that, if a person who had the right to vote at the date of establishment of the Commonwealth for his own Legislative Assembly, which alone, under the Act, gives him power to vote for the House of Representatives, has had it taken away from him in his own State, he can still claim to exercise it, and vote for the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth. That is not the intention which any member had, and for that reason I proposed the amendment. Under it, the right would go on whilst it continues; but, if it happens to be taken away by the will of the State, the voter cannot set up a claim to vote for the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLDER:

I do not mind accepting the words which Mr. Barton suggests, provided that if the State withdraws any franchise which they have given, that withdrawal shall have effect in this matter. The effect of the amendment will be what I desire, and what I think the majority of the Committee desire. I will take a moment in putting the point to the Committee. There is a stage up to which the franchise is purely a State question, and the regulation of the franchise is within the power and authority of the State. The moment that ends is when the Federal Parliament passed a law fixing the franchise. What I want is that so long as the State is free to fix the franchise, any franchise they give shall be protected afterwards. I will put it as clearly as I am able. We will suppose that the Federation comes into operation two years from this date. What some members want is, that during those two years the different Parliaments shall be perfectly free to alter the franchise, and whatever they do shall be protected. But the right to alter the franchise will not cease two years from to-day, but will continue up to the time that the Federal Parliament makes a franchise. What I want to know is, why should we draw a line where none should be drawn?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
By protecting everyone up to the establishment of the Commonwealth no injustice would be done.

Mr. HOLDER:

The right of the State to alter the franchise continues not up to the time of the formation of the Commonwealth, but up to the time that the Federal Parliament frames a franchise, and I want all the rights granted up to that time preserved in the future.

Mr. PEACOCK:

If the Federal Legislature has legislated?

Mr. HOLDER:

No. I want the States to have their rights with regard to the franchise unimpaired up to the day when the federal franchise is indicated, and that whatever the franchise shall be at that date it shall be preserved, and so that no person having a right up to that date shall have it taken from him, and that this shall apply not only to South Australia but also to other colonies who may widen their franchise before a federal franchise is provided.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

That is what the amendment carries out.

Mr. HOLDER:

No. it does not. I am afraid I must have one more attempt at it. Mr. O'Connor says that the amendment carries out what I have twice stated, but I say it does not. The amendment operates to stop the power of the State to grant a permanent franchise when the federal authority comes into being, but I say the power of the State to make a franchise is, according to the Bill, up to the time when the federal franchise is adopted. I recognise that there is some danger that the States may withdraw the franchise, and just as we admit the right of the State to extend the franchise, we must recognise its right to curtail it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I think there is some little misapprehension with regard to what is desired in this matter, although it ham been very clearly put by Mr. Holder. The other night Mr Holder said:

What I wish is that these rights Should be preserved which have been acquired up to the time that the Commonwealth makes its franchise.

That appears plain. My friends have not carried that out because they have only given rights up to the establishment of the Commonwealth, and there may be a period of two or three years before a uniform franchise is adopted. What would happen is this: In South Australia at the establishment of the Commonwealth the women have the franchise, and they would have the right to vote, but the women of Victoria would be refused that right although they might be entitled to it before the uniform franchise is brought into operation. To strike out the words "at the establishment of the Commonwealth," and insert "at the time of the passing of the uniform law" will meet all the difficulties. I trust my friend will make that alteration.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think what is desired could be easily achieved by an alteration of the words there. The words are:

And no elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth or who afterwards acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State shall be deprived of a vote. It should be "at the time Parliament provides the franchise." It is only a small alteration of the words. There is a probability of some change of the franchise in Victoria if the House of which Sir William Zeal is an ornament is agreeable.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Those who form the uniform franchise know what it is all over the colony, and they know Parliament will have the power to make a uniform franchise on the basis of the most liberal franchise in the colonies. Suppose a colony has got a franchise which it wants the other colonies to adopt, and it says to the Federal Parliament-"Well, you can only make it uniform franchise according to our basis. If you do not, do it on that we will establish another franchise still lower, and then you will not be able to form one except on the still lower basis. And they can use this as a constant threat and intimidation until actually, in self-defence, the Legislature would be bound to give in to perhaps one of the weakest sections in order to get a uniform franchise. If you fix it by the Constitution it will be all right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It does not follow they are to give to everybody else the rights these people have.

Mr. BARTON:

Is it not enough to give them the right that exists?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

If they fix a uniform franchise they must not take away the right of any colony to its own franchise, and if they fix a uniform franchise it would logically follow that a uniform franchise must be the franchise of that particular colony.

Mr. BARTON:

The Parliament cannot fix a franchise for the Commonwealth unless it is uniform.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I am only putting the point of view whether it is not best to fix the status at the time the Commonwealth is formed.

Mr. HOLDER:
I would ask you, Sir, to divide the amendment, so that if necessary we may have an opportunity of voting on:
"While the qualification continues."

The CHAIRMAN:
I Will put the insertion of the words first. If they are inserted the rest of the clause can be struck out.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Before the clause is put I think we had better make up our minds as to whether we are going to restrict the right of federal qualifications existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:
And continuing.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I accept that principle, which I think is fair. But there is still one point in which the hon. member Mr. Holder goes beyond the intentions of the House at the last meeting.

Mr. HOLDER:
No.

Mr. HIGGINS:
What I understand Mr. Holder wants is that the Federal Parliament shall preserve rights which exist at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HOLDER:
No.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Do not the hon. member's words mean that?

Mr. KINGSTON:
No.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If the words of Mr. Barton are inserted I would suggest that in place of the words:
Existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth,
these words should be inserted:
Existing at the time when the Parliament makes provision for the franchise.

Mr. HOLDER:
That is going back to mine.
Mr. SYMON:

I take it that the time at which those rights are ascertained is the time when the Federal Parliament takes the matter up by establishing a uniform franchise or making other provision and the only apprehension which is suggested, so far as regards the extension of the suffrage, is that it may be conferred upon persons under age. If you have adult suffrage the only extension would be downward in age, and that, I think, is not an apprehension worth guarding against. On the other hand, I do see, if we limit the operation of this section to the establishment of the Commonwealth, it might exclude some other colony from getting the benefit under this Constitution of adult suffrage if adopted before the Federal Parliament dealt with the franchise. While we do not want to force any colony to accept it, we do not want to put any colony in the position that it shall not enlarge its suffrage. I will support Mr. Holder's amendment.

Mr. ISAACS:

As Mr. Barton's amendment stands now, I should like to ask whether it will be limited to the particular individuals who want to possess the right, as it says:

No elector who has the right shall be deprived.

Mr. SYMON:

So it does.

Mr. ISAACS:

That was not intended.

Mr. BARTON:

In deference to Mr. Isaacs I have made my amendment read:

No qualification existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State shall, while that qualification continues, be taken away by any law of the Commonwealth at elections for the House of Representatives.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. HOLDER:

I now move:

To insert after the word "shall," the words whilst the qualification continues."

Amendment agreed to; clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 36.-Upon the happening-of a vacancy in the House of Representatives, the Speaker shall issue his writ for the election of a new member.

In the case of a vacancy by death or resignation happening when the Parliament is not in Session, or during an adjournment of the House for a period of which a part longer than seven days is unexpired, the Speaker, or, if there is no Speaker or if he is absent from the Commonwealth, the Governor-General, shall issue a writ.

Mr. BARTON:
This is a clause altered in the passage of the Bill, and in which it was left to us to make consequential alterations. I move:
To strike out the words from "in" down to "Speaker" where first used, inclusive.
That will make it read:
Upon the happening of a vacancy in the House of Representatives, the Speaker shall issue his writ for the election of a new member, or, if there is no Speaker or if he is absent from the Commonwealth, the Governor-General shall issue a writ.
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
It is also suggested to alter the word "a" at the end to "the."

The CHAIRMAN:
I shall make that as a consequential amendment.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 47-If a member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives accepts any office of profit under the Crown, not being one of the offices of State hold during the pleasure of the Governor-General, and the holders of which are by this Constitution declared to be capable of being chosen and of sitting as members of either House of the Parliament, or accepts any pension payable out of any of the revenues of the Commonwealth during the pleasure of the Crown, his place shall thereupon become vacant, and no person holding any such office, except as aforesaid, or holding or enjoying any such pension, shall be capable of being chosen or of sitting as a member of either House of the Parliament.

Until Parliament otherwise provides, no person, being a member, or within six months of his coaxing to be a member, shall be qualified or permitted to accept or hold any office the acceptance or holding of which would, under this section, render a person incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member.

But this section does not apply to a person who is in receipt only of pay, half-pay, or a pension, as an officer or member of the Queen's navy or army, or who receives a new commission in the Queen's navy or army, or an increase of pay on a new commission, or who is in receipt only of pay as an officer or member of the military or naval forces of the Commonwealth, and whose services are not wholly employed by the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:

When this was going through Committee the following paragraph was inserted between paragraph 1 and 2 as a new second paragraph:

Until Parliament otherwise provides, no person, being a member, or within six months of his ceasing to be a member, shall be qualified or permitted to accept or hold any office the acceptance or holding of which would, under this section, render a person incapable of being chosen or of sitting as a member.

If another division is taken I shall be found as before voting against the amendment inserted at the instance of Sir William Zeal. There was a considerable debate about this, and a close division, 18 to 15; and one or two members who voted for it have intimated to my hon. and learned friend Mr. O'Connor, that on reconsideration they did not think they should have voted for it, and that if it were recommitted they would vote the other way.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Rather unfair when so many have gone away.

Mr. BARTON:

But I do not even know whether those numbers are here. It was under the circumstances I mentioned that I agreed to recommit the clause. I shall make no motion myself, and if no one makes a motion that clause can pass as it stands.

Mr. ISAACS:

Has Mr. Barton considered the point that under this clause as it stands a member of a State Parliament would not be debarred from becoming a member of the Federal Parliament, but a minister of the Crown would be.

Mr. BARTON:

I have considered the matter, and thought it better not to make provision for it. Because if a Minister of a State Parliament is debarred, as in receipt of an office of profit under the Crown, from being in the Federal Parliament, that is nothing more than what is right.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

I think we should launch ourselves into a very extraordinary state of things if we had a Minister in one Parliament as the Minister of a State, who might take such a course as next day in the Federal Parliament might cause him to be called upon to be at the head of a Federal Ministry. Those positions cannot be held together. Then why not leave things untouched?
Mr. KINGSTON:
I entirely disagree with the views expressed by my hon. friend. We permit a member of a local Parliament to become a member of the Federal Parliament, and why should we attach a disqualification to a member who stands so well with his fellow members that he has been raised to a Ministerial office. But I recognise that this is not the time to thrash the matter out.

Clause as read agreed to.

Clause 48.—If any person by this Constitution declared to be incapable of sitting in the Senate or the House of Representatives sits as a member of either House, he shall, for every day on which he sits, be liable to pay the sum of one hundred pounds to any person who may sue for it in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. BARTON:
Sir William Zeal pointed out that there ought to be a penalty of disqualification, and I will propose the following amendment:

That after the word "Representatives" in the second line there be inserted "or disqualified or prohibited from accepting or holding any office."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There is no penalty for accepting it, is there? He simply loses him seat.

Mr. BARTON:
For every day he holds office he is liable to pay £100.
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I propose:
That after the word "House" in line three of the clause there be inserted "or accept or hold such office."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I propose:
That after the word "States" there be inserted "or hold such office."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
That was under clause 82. It comes later on.
Mr. MCMILLAN:

I propose to introduce two sub-sections in this clause simply to give the Parliament of the Commonwealth power, with the consent of the States, to take over the railways of the different States. I therefore move to insert the following new sub-section as 32A:

The taking over by the Commonwealth with the consent of the State of the whole or any part of the railways of any State or States upon such terms as may be arranged between the Commonwealth and the State.

Mr. DEAKIN:

On this sub-section I take the opportunity of saying that at an earlier stage t

Sub-section agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I now move to insert the following new sub-section as 32B:

Railway construction and extension with the consent of any State or States concerned.

Mr. WISE:

I would like to mention so that it may be considered before the next Convention meets that there does not appear to be any sufficient power in this clause to take over public works situated within one State, but which in the opinion of the Federal Parliament can be properly utilised to the advantage of the whole Commonwealth. I do not think there is power either expressly or impliedly given to construct within the boundaries of any State such public works with the consent of that State as may be for the common advantage of the whole Commonwealth. I throw out these observations so that this matter may be considered during recess. No doubt when it comes up before the several Parliaments attention will be given to it, and it is possible that some amendments on the Bill may then be moved.

Sub-section agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 52.-Proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or moneys, or the imposition of any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARTON:

I have asked for a reconsideration of this clause, because a question has arisen with reference to it. I do not want to in any way unsettle the previous determination, but just bring it forward to see whether or not we perfectly understood the meaning of it. There is no party object in this, nor is it done to put the larger States against the smaller. Clause 53 states that laws imposing taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only. The clause reads:
Proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation, &c.

Inasmuch as laws imposing taxation can only have the one object, and that is levying taxation, one would think that we should have limited this clause to this wording:

Proposed laws having for their object the imposition of taxation, &c.

There appears to be an inconsistency here, and I do not think I need say anything more about it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
What suggestion do you make?

Mr. BARTON:
If it were put into this form:
Having for their object the imposition,
I think that would better meet the case. There can only be one object of a Tax Bill and that is imposing taxation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Supposing you make it read this way:
Proposed laws for the imposition of any tax or impost, and proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, and so on.

Mr. BARTON:
Perhaps that would be better. It will make the meaning clearer.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I could sympathise with any attempt made to restore the clause to its original shape. But its present form having been decided by a full Committee, it would scarcely be the proper thing to alter the principle of it now in this House.

Mr. BARTON:
I would riot attempt to make any alteration in substance. I have not made any proposal myself, and I will refrain from doing so.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 54.-It shall not be lawful for the Senate or the House of Representatives to Pass any vote, resolution, or proposed law for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or moneys to any purpose which has not been first recommended to the House concerned by message of the Governor-General in the Session in which the vote, resolution, or law is proposed.

Mr. BARTON:
I move
To strike out "concerned," and insert "in which the proposal for appropriation originated."
Amendment agreed to.
Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 57.-A proposed law reserved for the Queen's pleasure shall not have any force unless and until within two years from the day on which it was presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent, the Governor-General makes known by speech or message to each of the Houses of the Parliament, or by proclamation, that it has received the assent of the Queen in Council. An entry of every such speech, message, or proclamation shall be made in the journals of each House.

Dr. COCKBURN:
This is a clause copied from a clause in the Canadian Constitution with regard to the reservation of Bills for the Queen's assent, but its exercise has fallen into disuse, and since 1878 the instructions to the Governor-Generals of Canada have not contained a list of the Bills which have to be reserved for the Royal assent. The result is now that no Bills are reserved, and I think it would be a pity to introduce an obsolete clause into this Constitution. I should like to ask Mr. Barton whether he does not think it would be best to strike it out, or at least to alter it in such a way that it will not be possible for the veto to be exercised simply by delay. Unless in two years the Royal assent is declared, the measure becomes null and void, and the clause practically provides for veto by pigeon-holing. Such a power as the veto should be exercised directly, and I should like either to excise the clause or so to alter it as to make the veto, in cases of reservation, a power to be exercised directly, and not simply by the effluxion of time. I think, as the clause has fallen into disuse in Canada, there is no reason for having it here.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
What will be the effect of striking it out?

Dr. COCKBURN:
We will be in the same position as Canada. It in a question of great importance. The present practice is very undesirable. We may pass a law and hear nothing about it, and the result may be that in two years it becomes null and void because no action has been taken by the authorities in Downing-street. When the veto is exercised it should be exercised directly, and I will vote against the clause.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is all a matter of the Governor's instructions.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I ask that the voices may be taken on the clause.

Mr. BARTON:
These two clauses stand together as constitutional provisions since 5 and 6 Victoria, chapter 76, and they exist as clause 57, with the exception that the word "Bill" is substituted for "proposed laws" in the Constitution of Canada. It is perfectly true, as stated by Dr. Cockburn, that in the instructions to the Governor-General of Canada there is no list of laws that are to be reserved, but it is competent for the Governor-General to reserve any laws, and there are many which he would reserve. The reason that there is no particular trouble about the reservation of laws in Canada is very plain. Canada is within a few days' sail of England-fast boats can cross in five or six days-and before it is necessary to give assent to a Bill it is easy for the Governor-General to send a despatch describing the character and nature of the law, and to obtain his instructions by despatch in return. In these colonies it might take six months, and it is necessary for the Governor to reserve Bills which he could not describe by cable, and to communicate with England. An our circumstances are different to those in Canada, I think we should agree with the clause, and if the Governor-General receives similar instructions, and if the law falls into desuetude, so much the better.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
The authorities in Downing-street cannot be accused of not forwarding legislation when it is necessary. I can give an example arising out of the Electoral Act passed for the last general elections in Tasmania, which received the Royal assent, not on a copy of the Bill but on a cablegram describing its provisions.
Clause agreed to.

Clause 67.-On the establishment of the Commonwealth the control of the following departments of the Public Service shall be assumed and taken over by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth shall assume the obligations of any State or States with respect to such matters, that is to say:
- Customs and excise:
- Posts and telegraphs:
- Military and naval defence:
- Ocean beacons and buoys, and ocean lighthouses and lightships:

Mr. BARTON:
The amendments to this clause are verbal. I wish to move:
To insert after the word "Service" the words in each State."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I move:
To strike out the words "be assumed and taken over by" with a view of inserting "become transferred to."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
Then in the fourth and fifth lines of that clause I move:
To leave out the words "and the Commonwealth shall assume the obligations of any State or States with respect to such matters."
Agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I move:
To insert "the obligations of each State in respect of the departments transferred shall thereupon be assumed by the Commonwealth."

Mr. HIGGINS:
This is a matter I called attention to before, but I only wish to understand what really is meant to be done. Is it seriously meant that fixed debts bearing interest which are put down to debit of defence, military, or naval, that these fixed debts are to be taken over by the Commonwealth? I indicated before that this was the fear as between the States. I want to know, is it intended or is it not? I take it that "obligations" means debts.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
The intention is only to take the obligations which the department has directly incurred—that is contracts that are subsisting, debts which have been incurred, but that would not apply to a debt which had been incurred for the particular work. In that case the money is borrowed generally, debentures are issued, or in some other way. That is not a debt that would be taken over.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
"Obligations" is a bad word to use.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
There is no other word that really covers everything. It is not only a liability, but also an obligation of any kind. There can be no difficulty about obligations.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is obligations in respect of certain matters.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
No; that has been altered in respect of the departments transferred.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is even stronger.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Will the States be relieved by a clause of this description referring to naval defence as regards all their liabilities. For instance, there is the liability to the Imperial Government on account of the Australian Naval Squadron?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
As I understand that liability it is a liability by all the colonies. I think there is a joint agreement by all the colonies. That agreement is entered into by no particular department, but by the State for naval defence. There is no doubt that it belongs to this subject, but the position of the agreement is this: It expires at the end of the year. The ten years are up at the end of this year, but it continues notwithstanding for two years' after notice has been given. I take it that that is a matter in which some arrangement would be come to between the States and the Commonwealth and the Imperial Government. That is a matter which you could not provide for in it Constitution like this. Probably before the Commonwealth is established some arrangement would be made between the Imperial Government, the Commonwealth, and the States, by which obligations or contracts will be continued. I support the insertion of the words:

The obligations of each State in respect of the departments transferred shall thereupon be assumed by the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is very ambiguous.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Let it go.

An HON. MEMBER:
It can be altered at the next Convention.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GORDON:
I would ask Mr. O'Connor whether or not an obligation in connection with these departments would imply an obligation on the part of the Commonwealth to fulfil contracts of servants of the departments?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I take it that any contract which is in existence must be taken over. But I do not think that a civil servant is in the position of a contractor.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 73.-No appeals to the Queen in Council except in certain cases.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. This clause on a previous occasion passed without debate, and without the opportunity being presented to me to move an amendment.

An HON. MEMBER:
Oh, do not speak now.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I propose to be brief and merely to move to allow of the continuance of appeals to the Queen in Council.

Mr. PEACOCK:
If you do that in this clause you must do it all along the line.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Is it not better to leave this over to the adjourned Convention? It is not fair to discuss this seeing that so many members are away.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Very well. I have established the fact that I have entered a mild protest against that clause as it stands in the Bill.

Clause as read agreed to.

Clause 74.-Within the limits of the judicial power of the High Court the Parliament may from time to time:

I. Define the jurisdiction to be exercised by the federal courts other than the High Court:

II. Prescribe whether the jurisdiction of the federal courts shall be exclusive of, or concurrent with, that which may belong to or be vested in the courts of the States:

III. Invest the courts of the States with Federal jurisdiction within such limits, or in respect of such matters, as it thinks fit.

Mr. BARTON:
At the suggestion of Mr. Symon, I move:

To strike out of the first line the words "of the High Court."

Mr. SYMON:
Leave out all the words in the line.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think we need to do that.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 82.-The Parliament shall have the sole power and authority, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, to impose customs duties, to impose duties of excise, and to grant bounties upon the production or export of goods.

But this exclusive power shall not come into force until uniform duties of customs have been imposed by the Parliament.

Uniform duties of customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Upon the imposition of uniform duties of customs all laws of the several States imposing duties of customs or duties of excise, and all such laws offering bounties upon the production or export of goods shall cease to have effect.

The control and collection of duties of customs and excise and the payment of bounties shall nevertheless pass to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth upon the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:
I promised Sir George Turner that this clause would be reconsidered.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I only desire to protect existing bounties. I understand that Mr. Holder wishes to go farther than I do.

Mr. BARTON:
The effect of the law is to protect them.

Mr. HOLDER:
I am not inclined to move at this stage, but I shall do so at a later meeting.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I shall follow your example.

Mr. BARTON:
I move:
To insert after the words "of the" in the last line of the clause the words "Parliament of the."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think the existing contracts for bounties will be protected by the operation of the law, but I think mining bounties for mining machinery and other purposes should be specified. I move:
That the following new sub-section be added "This section shall not apply to bounties or aids to mining for gold, silver, or other metals."

Amendment agreed to; clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 84.-All lands, buildings, works, and materials necessarily appertaining to, or used in connection with, any department of the Public Service the control of which is by this Constitution assigned to the Commonwealth, shall, from the establishment of the Commonwealth, be taken over by and vest in the Commonwealth, either absolutely, or, in the case of the departments controlling customs and excise and bounties, for such time as may be necessary.

The fair value thereof, or of the use thereof, as the case may be, shall be paid by the Commonwealth to the State from which they are taken over. Such value shall be ascertained by mutual agreement, or, if no agreement can be made, in the manner in which the value of land, or of an interest in land, taken by the Government of the State for the like public purposes is ascertained under the laws of the State at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:
This clause as it stands, as military and naval departments have to be transferred, would not include vessels, which would no doubt have to be transferred also. I have used the comprehensive term vessels, which will comprehend everything that is likely to go over.

Mr. PEACOCK:
You do not want the vessels to go over?

Mr. BARTON:
I do not mean "upset." I want the first part of the clause to read:
All lands, buildings, works, vessels, materials, and things necessarily appertaining to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That's broad enough.

Mr. BARTON:
I move:
To insert the word "vessel" after the word "works."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I move:
To omit the word "and" before the word "materials," and insert after the word "materials" the words "and things."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I now move: To strike out the word "assigned" and insert "transferred."
Amendment agreed to.
Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 107.-State not to coin money.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Will this clause prevent a State from coining money by arrangement with the Home authorities and the Royal Mint?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Of course it will.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Then it is preventing something which has been recognised as possible and practicable by British authorities.

Mr. BARTON:
We have given over under clause 50 currency, coinage, and legal tender to the Commonwealth, and it is a proper consequence to say that no State shall go on coining money. Where there is any existing mint the probability is that it will go on coining for the Commonwealth.

Clause as read agreed to.

Clause 121.-The provisions of this Constitution shall not be altered except in the following manner:—

Any proposed law for the alteration thereof must be pased by an absolute majority of the Senate and of the House of Representati

The vote shall be taken in much manner its the Parliament prescribes.

And if the majority of the States approve the proposed law, and if the people of such majority of States are it majority of the people of the Commonwealth, the proposed law shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

But an alteration by which the representation of any State in either House of the Parliament or the minimum number of representatives of a State in this House of Representatives, is diminished, shall not become law without the consent of the electors of that state.

Mr. BARTON:

There is a little difficulty in this clause, but I would like to mention one thing first. I was asked to strike out the word "proportionate" in the first line, but I have come to the conclusion that I did wrong, and that the word ought to remain. But before that, there is one important point about which I would like to have the attention of members, especially those interested in women's suffrage. A very important point was raised by Mr. Lewis. He pointed out that as the clause stands, "and if a majority of the people of the States which approved a proposed law are also a majority of the people of the Commonwealth," the provision might operate so that a minority of the Commonwealth might in some extreme cases rule the roost, simply because a vote having been carried by majorities in the three States which constituted it, their people might be a majority of the Commonwealth; although there might be cases in which the majority ruling would not be voting for the referendum as electors. That raised a great trouble. Mr. Lewis suggested a way out of the difficulty—that it if the proposed law is approved by a majority of the States, and if the electors who approve the alteration are a majority of the Commonwealth," then it shall be carried. But it was pointed out that it would not be fair to make it operate as things stand, because until the Commonwealth adopted a uniform suffrage, the result is that the electors of South Australia would count twice—for men and women both. There is only one way out of this difficulty, and that is to make the clause read like this:

And if a majority of the States and a majority of the electors of the Commonwealth approve the proposed law, the proposed law shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent, and until the qualification of electors for members of the House of Representatives becomes uniform throughout the Commonwealth the votes of male electors only shall be counted for the purposes of this question.

I admit the difficulty at once, and this is the only way out of it that I can see. There is no taking a vote from any woman in South Australia.

Mr. ISAACS:

How are you going to find out the votes of women as distinguished from those of men? You will have to use different voting-papers.

Mr. BARTON:

It will be a difficulty, I admit.

Mr. GORDON:

They are known approximately now.

Mr. BARTON:

A provision might be made to prevent ballot papers on these questions being given to women. Something like this will have to be done, or else we will be thrown back to the original provision. This is a very serious difficulty, and I have not seen any way out of it, except the way I have suggested. Of course, my proposal may have to be modified, and I am not putting it as final. It is one of the most important clauses in this Constitution. The difficulty is not removed by the clause as it stands; it is not removed by Mr. Lewis's suggestion, because under the hon. member's proposal the women of South Australia would vote with the men, and South Australia would therefore have double voting power as against any other colony. The remaining proposal is the one I have just made, which, in accordance with Mr. Isaacs' suggestion, would have to be modified with reference to discrimination being made at the ballot-box. I do not suppose the question to be asked at the ballot-box would be that in Artemus Ward's book, "Air you a man?"

Mr. TRENEWITH:

What is the objection to taking the total population of the States?

Mr. BARTON:

I will come to that in a moment. What I wish to say now is that under the proposal there is no deprivation to the women of South Australia. They have at present their right to vote for all the concerns of the State. If the Commonwealth is created they have all their electoral rights conserved to them under this Constitution. The only thing would be that whether they were allowed to vote or not, the voting would have to be so regulated that South Australia would only be allowed her proper strength in taking the referendum.

Mr. HOLDER:
Divide her voting power by two.

Mr. BARTON:
But the question arises: are we to single out one State and say that until a uniform suffrage is adopted its voting strength shall be divided by two?

Mr. ISAACS:
Would the hon. gentleman mind giving an example of how it is unjust to take a population basis.

Mr. BARTON:
There is a paper which has been drawn out which seems to elucidate the matter very clearly. Take a referendum vote which is carried by a majority in Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania. The population of these three States is a majority of the Commonwealth. Now suppose that in Victoria 51,000 voted for the proposition, that 21,000 voted for it in South Australia, and 15,000 in Tasmania, while in New South Wales and Queensland, which are perhaps dead against the proposal only 5,000 in each voted for it.

Mr. TRENWITH:
That is it very improbable contingency.

Mr. BARTON:
Against it in Victoria 49,000 perhaps voted, in New South Wales 95,000, in Queensland 25,000 in South Australia 20,000, and in Tasmania 14,000. In that case Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia would carry the vote on a majority in each State by narrow majorities. In the three States having a majority of the population there would be cast 97,000 votes by the three States, while against the referendum there would be 203,000 votes. Under the clause as it stands the result would be that, inasmuch as there is, in three States out of five, a majority of those who voted in favor of the thing, you have a majority secured, and you also have a majority of the population secured, because those three States between them contain such a majority. Yet on that voting there has been a majority of more than two to one against the proposal. That is not at all an impossible case, and we are here to provide for contingencies. If we take a combination of three States on some grave question the result might come in that way. This is why I brought this so prominently before hon. members, so that we may find a way out of the difficulty.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Some days ago I was one of those who was struck, on consideration, by the fact that it was possible to be confronted by such a problem as has just been presented to us. We ought to realise that the proposition of my hon. friend Mr. Barton means an entire change in principle in the Bill of 1891 as to the making of amendments in the Constitution. This is one of the most important provisions of the Bill. As adopted in 1891, it ran:

And if the proposed amendment is approved by the Conventions of a majority of the States, and if the people of the States whose Conventions approve of the amendment are also a majority of the people of the Commonwealth, the proposed amendment shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

Under this scheme a very large State, by mere abstinence on the part of its electors, might render the vote of a large majority of those who went to the poll fruitless. It does not provide for the rule of the majority. On consideration it appeared to me that this was unjust, and that the suggestion made by Mr. Lewis, the hon. member for Tasmania, was just, inasmuch as it provided for the complete carrying out of the axiom requiring a majority of the States and a majority of the people's vote. The only difficulty in the way of Mr. Lewis's proposal was the franchise of South Australia. I differ from Mr. Barton in believing that the votes of female electors of South Australia must be taken into account. Both male and female votes must go to form the majority of the State. But when the question arises whether in addition to having a majority of the States you have a majority of the people. Then in order to put South Australia on a fair basis you must omit the female votes, because the majority has to be a majority upon a uniform franchise.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That is begging the question if you are agreeing to this proposal, because it assumes that you count the male votes only.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I agree with the amendment because it appears to me to be a great improvement on the proposal of 1891. That was inequitable, while this is equitable. With regard to the counting of the votes in South Australia there could be two separate ballot boxes, one for the male and one for the female votes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That will not do. They would be sure to make many mistakes. Have different colored papers.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Different colored papers would perhaps be simpler, but even then you have to trust to the administrative integrity of the returning officers not to give the male voting papers to females. There are two or three means by which this could be done. We must be satisfied that only the male votes are counted in the majority of the electors until adult franchise is adopted in the remaining States.

Mr. HOLDER:

I am sorry I was unable to be here when this clause first came up. More than a week ago I circulated a printed amendment, providing for the very matter which Mr. Barton has brought under our notice. I was busy with the other Treasurers in dealing with the financial question when the matter came up, or I should have given some facts and figures which I had prepared. I have not overlooked the difficulty of the female vote. I should have suggested a referendum on the basis of the clause as it stands in print, and this was the result that I worked out. In Victoria, Tasmania, and South Australia there might be a majority of votes cast in favor of the question referred say 186,000 in favor and 82,000 against. In New South Wales and South Australia let us suppose the voting is 130,000 for, and 160,000 against. There is a majority of the States therefore on the affirmative side, but, seeing that the population of Victoria, Tasmania and South Australia was only 1,478,000, while the other States which gave the majority against the proposal had 1,659,000, although three States voted for it, and the majority of voters voted for it, the question would be lost. The totals I conceived to be given were 266,000 for and 242,000 against, and still, although there was a considerable majority of voters in favor, and three States in favor against two, it must, under the Bill as it stands, be lost. That is quite intolerable, and we should be prepared to accept a more equitable plan by which the majority of States and voters who vote shall carry it.

Mr. WISE:

Three words of alteration will do the whole thing.

Mr. HOLDER:

The best plan will be to provide that where there is adult suffrage the result shall be divided by two. That will do away with the necessity for having different colored papers for male and female voters or to have a ballot-box for each. To divide the "ayes" and the "noes" by two would overcome the men difficulty connected with the matter, and neither section of the voters would fail to influence the result.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I think we are all agreed that until we have uniform voting we will have to devise some means by which we will count the male votes only. I would suggest that we provide in the early part of the clause that any proposed law shall be submitted to the male electors of the several States qualified to vote, and make a proviso that when the qualification of voters throughout Australia is uniform it shall be submitted to all persons

Mr. ISAACS:
That makes the women suffer because the other States have not given them the right to vote.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That is the cause of the whole difficulty.

Mr. DEAKIN:
We must allow women to have their vote to ascertain whether there is a majority in the State.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
If you adopt the method proposed by Mr. Holder you do not get an accurate estimate.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It would be a very substantial one.

Mr. ISAACS:
It would be a rough and ready way of meeting the difficulty.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
If your object is to eliminate the woman's vote why ask them to vote at all? Why cause them the trouble to come to the poll?

Mr. ISAACS:
We do not want to eliminate her.

Mr. TRENWITH:
In order to obtain the opinion of the women you allow them to vote with the men and divide the result by two.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I think in this matter that we should be largely guided by the views of South Australia, and if Mr. Holder thinks that his plan will be most acceptable I shall offer no objection to it.

Mr. WISE:
There is a much simpler way of meeting the difficulty, and one which will meet the case put by Mr. Higgins. It is to insert after the word "if" the words "a majority of the electors voting and." It would require the Bill to be passed by a majority of the States, and that that majority should be a majority of the whole. With the exception of South Australia it becomes negligible.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I am sure the suggestion by my hon. friend, Mr. Holder, that instead of making any provision for excluding our women we should put the votes together and divide it by two is a fair one to the other States. In fact South Australia may be considered to be making a sacrifice for their sakes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is the only sacrifice it makes in the whole thing.

Mr. TRENWITH:
They Sacrifice their women.

Mr. KINGSTON:
There are not so many women as men on the roll, and I doubt if the proportion of those who vote is quite equal to the proportion of males.

Mr. DEAKIN:
More superior from what I have seen of them.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Equal in value, no doubt. So soon as the other colonies adopt this suggestion there will be no difficulty in the matter. The South Australian suggestion appears to me to be very fair and very liberal indeed. I am much struck with what has fallen from Mr. Wise. You can reckon that it is as broad as it is long. You do not find all the women voting on the one Side. The votes on one side will to some extent counteract those on the other.

Mr. ISAACS:
If it does not make any difference to you, we would prefer the halving.

Mr. KINGSTON:
We would prefer to have effect given to Mr. Wise's proposal.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Anyone in favor of woman suffrage would support an inducement to put themselves on an equality with South Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON:
They ought to level up.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes; but it is out of the question. I should not object to have these votes counted, but I think Mr. Holder has proposed a rough and ready way of dealing with the difficulty which we ought to accept. Apparently it will meet the views of South Australia as well. Theme figures which Mr. Barton has read, and which were handed by me to Mr. O'Connor, were not mine; but, curiously enough, they were the, figures worked out by an intelligent spectator in the gallery. I think that intelligent spectator has prevented us from falling into a gross error.

The CHAIRMAN:
There is no amendment before the chair at all.

Mr. HOLDER:
Following upon what Mr. Wise said just now, I would suggest that the sub-section should read:

And if a majority of the States approve the proposed law, and also a majority of the persons voting, the proposed law shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

Mr. BARTON:

It has been suggested that the difficulty could be overcome by the following amendment, which I will move:

To strike out sub-section 4, with the view of inserting the following sub-section: And if a majority of the States and a majority of the electors voting approve the proposed law, the proposed law shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent; but, until the qualification of electors of Members of the House of Representatives becomes uniform throughout the Commonwealth, only one-half the votes for and against the proposed law shall be counted in any State in which adult suffrage prevails.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

It is irregular, I know, to go back with the clause, but as this is the last stage of our proceedings I should like to move:

To insert after "submitted" the words "in each State;" to strike out "several" in the next line and to alter the next word, "States," into "State."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

To re-insert the word "proportionate" in the first line of the fourth sub-section.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

To strike out at the and of the clause "the electors of that State," and insert "a majority of the electors voting in that State."

Amendment agreed to.

14th April, 1897.

The President of the Federal Convention, Adelaide.

Sir—I have the honor, by direction, to forward the following resolution carried at a recent meeting of the executive of the Literary Societies, Union—

That the executive of the South Australian Literary Societies' Union, representing 1,000 members, views with satisfaction the assembling of the Federal Convention in Adelaide, and earnestly hopes that the result of its deliberations will be for the permanent advantage of the whole of Australia.—I am, &c.,

J. LANGDON BONYTHON,
President of the Union.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

Mr. BARTON:
I move:
That the draft Constitution Bill be recommitted for the purpose of reconsidering clauses 5, 9, 30, 84, 87, and for the insertion of a new clause.

In tabling this motion I assure the Convention that there is no intention to make any substantial alteration in the Bill.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

In Committee.

Clause 5.-The term "The States" shall be taken to mean such of the Colonies of New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, Tasmania, Victoria, and Western Australia, and the Province of South Australia, as for the time being form part of the Commonwealth, and such other States as may hereafter be admitted into the Commonwealth, and each of such Colonies so forming part of the Commonwealth shall be hereafter designated a State."

Mr. BARTON:
I move
In line 15 to strike out the word "other," and insert the words "Colonies or States."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
In the same line I move:
To insert after "into" and before "the" the words "or established by."
Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
I propose
To omit in the next line the words "colonies so forming part," with a view of inserting in lieu thereof "parts."
Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 9.-The Senate Shall be composed of six senators for each State, and each senator shall have one vote.

The senators shall be directly chosen by the people of the State an one electorate.

The senators shall be chosen for a term of six years, and the names of the senators chosen by each State shall be certified by the Governor to the Governor-General.

The Parliament shall have power, from time to time, to increase or diminish the number of senators for each State, but so that the equal representation of the several States "I be maintained and that no State shall have less than six senators.

The qualification of electors of senators shall be in each state that which is prescribed by this Constitution or by the Parliament as the qualification for electors of members of the House of Representatives, but in the choosing of senators each elector shall have one vote for as many persons as are to be elected, and if any elector votes more than once he shall be...
guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. BARTON: I move:

To omit the words "have one vote for as many persons as are to be elected" in line 36, and to insert in lieu thereof "vote only once."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 30—Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each State that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification of electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State. But in the choosing of such members each elector "I have one vote for as many persons as are to be elected in any electoral divisions for which he is qualified to vote, and if an elector votes more than once he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and no elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, shall whilst the qualification continues, be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from exercising such right at elections for the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARTON:

In this clause I move the same amendment as before, for the purposes of the House of Representatives as for the purposes of the Senate. I move:

To strike out "shall have one vote for as many persons as are to be elected in any electoral division for which he is qualified to vote," and to insert "vote only once."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS:

In this clause Mr. Holder moved an amendment that we discussed last night, preserving the rights of persons who have at present the right to vote. That right is conserved as regards the House of Representatives, but is it also conserved as regards the Senate?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Undoubtedly.

Mr. BARTON:

Yes, because the qualification for the Senate is the same as for the House of Representatives.

Mr. ISAACS:

The qualification is given in clause 30, and we wish that no person shall be deprived of his vote. It is not making a qualification, but conserving a right outside the qualification. I do not think the right is properly conserved, but if the South Australians think the rights of women voters is sufficiently guarded, I am satisfied.

Mr. BARTON:
   It is enough for present purposes.

Mr. HOLDER:
   We might stop at the word "right," in the last line but one of the clause.

Mr. BARTON:
   That would be saying where an elector otherwise acquired a right of voting for the Legislative Assembly of his own colony the Commonwealth could not deprive him of the right of voting. I think the provision at the end of clause 9 will cover the case. If it does not we can amend in September.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Hear, hear.
   Leave us something to do then.
   Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 84-The Commonwealth to have exclusive power to levy duties of customs and excise and offer bounties after a certain time.

Mr. BARTON:
   I wish to omit the third paragraph for the purpose of converting it into a new clause to stand after clause 87. That will bring it into its proper position.
   Amendment agreed to.
   Clause as amended agreed to.

Mr. BARTON:
   I move:
   To insert the following new clause to follow clause 87:—"Uniform duties of Customs shall be imposed within two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth."
   Clause inserted.

Clause 97.-The Parliament may take over the whole, or it ratable proportion, of the public debts of the States as existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, and may from time to time convert, renew, or consolidate such debts, or any part thereof; and the States respectively shall indemnify the Commonwealth in respect of the amount of the debts taken over, and thereafter the amount of interest payable in respect of the debts shall be deducted and retained from time to time from the respective shares of the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth which would otherwise be payable to the States, or if then be no surplus revenue payable, or if such surplus revenue be insufficient, then the amount shall be charged to the respective States wholly or in part. The ratable proportion of the debts of the several States to be taken over is to be calculated on the basis of the populations of the several States as ascertained by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON:

There is a little amendment necessary in this clause. Where a surplus does not exist it provides for the amount of interest in respect to the debts to be charged to the respective States. The Commonwealth has to pay month by month to the State, but if there is no provision that the State has to pay in case there is no surplus the section will be insufficient. I move:

To insert the words "and paid by" after the words "charged to."

Amendment agreed to.
Clause as amended passed.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

The report be adopted.

Motion resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON:

Mr. President-In moving

That the draft Constitution, as passed by this Convention, be now approved.

I have to congratulate you and the members of the Convention on the termination of this part of our labors. No doubt we may have to undergo labors, if not at, long perhaps as anxious, or even more so, in the second Session of this Convention, but I think that you are to be congratulated upon the fact that under your presidency such remarkable work has been done as has been done within the last month, and that the members and the colonies that they represent are to be congratulated also upon the reasonable prospects of Federation which I think are indicated in the form in which the Bill is now before the country. (Cheers.) No doubt there are matters with regard to which each delegation in its turn is disappointed, but this work of Federation is a work in which sacrifice must be made in order that general pin may ensue. We all lose something; we all gain something, not only in the method and manner of Federation, but our gain is limitless, if we are to consider, as we must, what the outcome of Federation will be to all these colonies. I am not going to make a long speech, but if we can only realise to ourselves that, with the broadening of the mind, the quickening of patriotic impulse, the wider view of affairs, the greater feeling of intercolonial amity and friendship, that attend a meeting of this kind, we are some way on the road to understanding what the results of Federation itself may be to each and all of these colonies. It is in that sense and with that feeling that I congratulate you, sir, and this Convention. You, sir, have presided over our deliberations with marked ability and success. The work that has been done under you by this Convention has been characterised on the part of members by an anxious desire to produce a Bill worthy of the reputation of every member of this Convention, and by a still more anxious desire that Federation shall not be imperilled by an extreme pushing of any one view or opinion. We all know that extreme advocacy of views and opinions, if carried to excess, is by its very extremity a peril to the cause; and we must realise, therefore, that where any particular view has not been carried to its extreme, we may have the consolation of seeing that those who do not agree with us are more likely, by the moderating effect of this Convention, to enter the Federation which we hope must ensue. I beg to move:

That the draft Constitution, so passed by this Convention, be now approved.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I have much pleasure in seconding the motion proposed by my hon. friend Mr. Barton, and in doing so I join with him in congratulating you, sir, upon having had the privilege of presiding over this body and of watching the important work which it has done. I think we ought not in passing to forget to add a word of praise to the Chairman of Committees, for the very able way in which he has carried out his duties. (Hear, hear.) There are others, we ought not to forget. There are the officers who have worked at times when they ought to have had holidays; and while at the first meeting we heard some little complaints with regard to "Hansard," I think that those who have looked at the later reports will be perfectly satisfied that, as soon as the gentlemen forming the "Hansard" staff better understood their duties, their reports were very satisfactory.

Mr. BARTON:

Very much improved. (Hear, hear.)

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I am glad to think with my hon. friend, that we have not pushed our own particular views too far. We met here with the view of endeavoring to compromise as far as possible; and while many of us had to press points which we thought were necessary for the interests of our respective colonies, I feel now that we will one and all use our earnest endeavors to persuade the people of the various colonies that the bargain that has been made—though perhaps some slight amendments will be suggested hereafter—is one that every colony will take advantage of as far as it can. It cannot be said that all the colonies have always have voted solidly together, because on important questions members have seen fit to vote in a manner different to that in which other members for the same colony have done. Had it been otherwise it would have given rise to suspicion, for it might have been said that members voted one way simply because 'they represented particular colonies and had not carefully studied the questions. I believe, though, that all the votes were given honestly, and in the belief that we were doing the right thing in the interest of what we soon hope will be United Australia. Although a feeling of suspicion might exist because votes were not, said on particular questions, I do think that a wise step was taken by casting the votes, not en bloc, but in the manner I have indicated, not for the interest of any particular colony, but for the greater interest of the whole of the Commonwealth. I would refer especially to the vote which was taken with regard to the question of the Senate, and, although some of the small colonies did not vote solidly on that occasion, I think it was very wise that they did not; because I feel certain that if the larger colonies had found that a solid vote was given on that question by the smaller colonies against the larger ones, only one result would have occurred, and that is, so far as equal representation of the colonies in the Senate is concerned, the larger colonies would have had to vote against it. I am very glad that votes were given in the way I have indicated, and I trust that when we meet in Sydney we will carry on work in the same friendly manner, and do the work as well. as we have done it here; and, if we do, I feel sure when we have finished our labors we will have a Bill which we will be able to take back to our colonies and honestly ask the people of Australia to vote solidly in favor of it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I cordially endorse all that has fallen from the leader, Mr. Barton, and Sir George in the way of congratulating yourself, Mr. President, and the Chairman of Committees, Sir Richard Baker, for the way in which you have discharged the onerous duties committed to you. And now is as convenient an opportunity as any other we will have to renew the expressions of confidence we have already given forth in the leader of the Convention.

Several HON. MEMBERS:

Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

To Mr. Barton, I am sure wisely, we committed the charge of this Bill at the outset of our proceedings, and he, I am sure we all unanimously hold, has discharged his duties in a way to ensure to the fullest extent the confidence of the Convention.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Also to Mr. O'Connor and Sir John Downer.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Yes; we owe much to the other members of the Drafting Committee. We owe a great deal to them, because when members who have not had the work of drafting cast upon them, and who may have thought we had reason to complain of the long hours we have been occupied in our work, have been relieved of our work, members of the Drafting Committee have been sent back to their chambers to keep abreast of the labors of the Convention. I wish to express in the strongest terms the sense of obligation we rest under to these gentlemen. As regards the work of this Convention, of course it is only tentative, and, I cannot help saying, is in some degree imperfect. I could have wished that the Bill we were going to put forth before the people should have been such as would have denied criticism instead of inviting it.

Mr. PEACOCK:
That is impossible.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Anyway that is what I should have preferred. However, we have to meet again, and at that adjourned meeting I hope the work which has been so well done, and which has been done in such an admirable spirit, and which has been done I am sure by hon. members generally with a full sense of the importance of the occasion, and with a desire animating them all to ensure Federation, that that work will receive its seal at the adjourned Convention, even if it receives, as I hope it will receive, a considerable amount of amendment.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Having had very little to say during the great work which this Convention has done, it may not perhaps be out of place for me to make a few remarks, in the first place I thank Sir George Turner for the appreciative sentences which he uttered concerning myself, and the Convention generally for the cheers with which they were greeted. As Sir Edward Braddon has said, the work we have done is tentative; and we are not yet arrived at a stage in which it would be proper to offer criticism on the result of our labors. It is said that bystanders see most of the game, and perhaps the statement is correct. At all events it in probable that those who do not take part in the discussion, but are in a position to watch the various actors and to consider the various speeches, perhaps more clearly see the workings of what has been going on. And as Chairman of Committees, I feel I am fully justified in stating that there has been a gradual—if I may coin an expression—rapprochement amongst the members of this convention towards the principles of a true Federation. It seems to me to be a most hopeful sign that as our deliberations have progressed those members who came here strongly imbued with extreme ideas have gradually become more moderate, until I venture to think that if now the opinions of every member of this Convention were reduced to writing and put on record they would be seen to more closely approach the ideal of a Federation than when we commenced our labors. I say, sir, that that is a hopeful sign, and it is my sincere trust and hope, as one who has taken great interest in this movement for a considerable time, that when we meet again that rapprochement will be continued, and we shall be more of one mind even than we are at present.

Mr. Holder:

I wish to add a word of congratulation to you, sir, upon the work which has been done under your presidency; but I specially rose to express on behalf of the South Australian members of this Convention—and I know at the same time that the feelings which they have are shared by all the other representatives—their thanks to the Hon. Mr. Barton for the way in which he has carried out the very onerous duties entrusted to him. We all felt when we chose him to do the work that he would be capable of doing it, but all the expectations that we formed then have been surpassed by the great ability he has shown. By the tact and skill he has displayed in managing the work, and by the general assistance he has rendered to the whole Convention in gradually perfecting this measure, he has earned our deepest gratitude and placed us under a very heavy obligation; and not only us, but also all those outside whom we represent. I share heartily in the hope which has been expressed that the work done by this Convention may find favor in the eyes of those who have to review it. I look forward to the time when in the various houses of the legislature throughout the colonies our work will first come under review. I hope all those members of this Convention who have seats in those houses will be able fully and freely to assist in passing measure; and that when the final stage comes of reference to the public vote, we may be able to heartily recommend to the electors of the various colonies the scheme that we have framed. I agree with the remarks as to the satisfactory nature, on the whole, of the measure we have before us. I am glad there is yet another stage, and I hope that when that stage has been reached we shall be able to congratulate ourselves not only upon the measure which we have before us to-day, but on something which is even more perfect than that; and that not much time will elapse before we finally see our work crowned by the inauguration of that Federation we have labored to bring about.

[P.1215] starts here

Mr. DEAKIN:

I rise, not for the purpose of reiterating acknowledgments of our indebtedness with which I heartily concur, whether they relate, Mr. President, to your own discharge of your duties or to the deep obligations we all lie under to the leader of this Convention and to his associates on the Drafting Committee. I desire to add only one other word of thanks, in which, without arrogance, I may claim to speak for every visiting representative to this city, for the superb hospitality, the unwearying kindness, the inexhaustible attention which we have received in this colony on every hand from our first hour to our last. I do not know how adequately to express the admiration I feel for your parliamentary organisation, its splendid chamber or its officers, from those who sit at the table of the House to the many in its antechambers. Never has it been my privilege to enter a public department in which the same efficiency was discoverable in every quarter. Having lamely endeavored to express what many feel and could better express, may I follow the line of thought which has been suggested by the remarks of more than one speaker who has preceded me. It would not be an incorrect expression to say that this Convention is about to go into recess. Yet it would be wholly incorrect in another aspect, because the duties and responsibilities of members of this Convention by no means cease from now till the 2nd September next. On the contrary, the stage of public criticism, of press criticism, and more especially of parliamentary criticism, in each State will afford unequalled opportunities for our continuance of the work which we have commenced here. These may prove of the highest value and advantage to this great cause if the members of this Convention convey to their several colonies a full and fair presentation of the varied views which have been advocated here. They are not called upon for a mere repetition of their own opinions when these are the views which their respective colonies already share. It is quite unnecessary, in my opinion, for the Victorian representatives in this Convention when they return to their local Parliament, to defend their antagonism to the extensive powers in relation to finance given to the Senate, or their assertion of the absolute wisdom and necessity for some provision against deadlocks. There will be little need for them to reiterate their opinions on these subjects, because those opinions are already shared by, the great majority of their bearers. And so in every other colony. But if we take upon ourselves, so far as our capacity will permit, the task of translating to our fellow members in our own Parliaments the views which are uncongenial and unfamiliar to them—for instance, in Victoria, the views held by the representatives of the less populous colonies as to the necessity for entrusting great powers to the Second Chamber, and as to the danger surrounding some methods of removing deadlocks—we shall be doing work which needs to be done, and which we ought to be best qualified to do. If the representatives of each colony will look upon themselves as representatives of this Convention charged with the duty of conveying to their own Parliament and their own people the views opposed to their own—views which in common with theirs have helped to shape this Bill—they will still continue to fulfil federal duties no less important than those discharged in this Chamber. For my own part I hope that, when entering the Parliament of Victoria I shall do so with a sense of responsibility and obligation to the members of this Convention with whom I have had the misfortune to differ, to be discharged only by a faithful citation of their arguments. I can best express my sense of the spirit with which they have met us, and of the amity which seems destined to be born of this Convention when I draw from that, not only a happy augury for the future, but the further resolution not to increase the differences of opinion which exist in this Convention, but, so far as possible, to explain and minimise them. Our Parliaments may then send us back to the next meeting of this Convention, not in any sense as delegates, but distinctly as representatives. Here members have urged again and again that the time for compromise had not come; assuredly at the next meeting of this Convention, if ever, the time for compromise will come and must be seized or it will pass away forever. Consequently, if we can obtain such an expression of opinion from our own Parliaments as will enable us to meet our fellow representatives with a full appreciation of their difficulties, we ought to be in a position to arrive at an honorable settlement of all our differences. The adjourned meeting would then be hold under better auspices than attended this meeting. I can imagine no more propitious season at which such a consummation could be brought about than this year, the Diamond Jubilee of Her Majesty's prosperous reign. The proofs we have had of the interest felt in other parts of the Empire in the meetings of this Convention should encourage us to approach our task from the broadest standpoint of patriotism. We are here as citizens of Australia—the federated Australia yet to be—but we also meet as citizens of an empire whose future fortunes must always be associated with the organisation of its great dependencies abroad. We have had an illustrious example of the success of such a union in Canada, and we have had a warning example of an opposite character in the dangers and difficulties now surrounding the British colonies in South Africa. The circumstances of our own States should furnish a sufficient impulse to us to follow the example of Canada and not that of South Africa in performing our part towards the consolidation of that Empire within the scope and sweep of whose world-wide dominion our own future development in most amply secured. The best prophecy of the growth of a Federal spirit in this gathering appears in the perfectly disinterested votes which prevented what would otherwise have meant the absolute defeat of the prospects of the movement in the more populous colonies. To you, sir, to Mr. Glynn, and to the three members of Tasmania, by whose aid we are enabled to submit, If not a perfect scheme, at least one which can be fairly considered by Now South Wales and Victoria, I personally tender a sincere tribute of thanks.

Mr. SYMON:
That is not a very politic remark.

Mr. DEAKIN:
My statement springs from a deep sense of public obligation. It cannot be impolitic. It to the tribute of an individual representative speaking his own mind, though I believe the sentiment expressed will be widely shared in all the colonies. Of this we shall know more when we meet again. Our responsibility in this Convention has not ended. venture to repeat to this meeting the conviction that our federal task, far from being suspended now, will be continuous from this hour until we assemble in Sydney next September.

Mr. DOBSON:
I think there is one duty left to be done, and, as I am leaving Adelaide this afternoon, I am reminded of what took place on our arrival five weeks ago. The morning we arrived at the Murray Bridge I found a copy of one of your leading journals on my breakfast table. I had the pleasure of perusing this journal, and since we have arrived here the proprietors of that paper have sent us copies regularly. We owe a deep debt of gratitude to the press for the way in which they have dealt with the subject of Federation, and also for their uniform courtesy, and the aid which they have given to us. I trust I join my

[P.1217] starts here

congratulations with those of other members, and I desire to thank you and your Ministerial colleagues and your members of Parliament, and the citizens of Adelaide generally for their uniform courtesy, their extreme thoughtfulness and kindness, and unbounded hospitality. During the next six months the press will be able to play a greater part in bringing about the Federation of the colonies than any of the delegates present, public men, or legislatures. I am quite sure they will be able to rise to the occasion, and will understand that this Constitution must be based upon ideas which alone make for progress, and that true progress comes by a fusion of democratic and conservative principles, and when you have that fusion I believe then, and only then, you will have a sound and enduring Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:

I should like to make an explanation. It would be generally expected by members that votes of thanks would be passed to you, Mr. President, to the able Chairman of Committees, and to the Clerk of this Convention and his assistants, for their industrious and zealous work, but the reason why that proposal in not being made is that it is considered advisable that expressions of that kind should be deferred to the proper place at the next sitting of the Convention. I should like to express my acknowledgments to Sir George Turner and other members of the Convention who have spoken so much, and so much too kindly, of my work done as Leader of the Convention, and I can assure them their expressions were not heard by me unmoved. I have endeavored at all times to advance the cause which I think now every leading public man in Australasia has at heart, and I think the cause has been advanced. It is a satisfaction to me to recollect that, at a little gathering in the Town Hall, Melbourne, while on the way here, when the New South Wales delegates had the pleasure of being introduced to their colleagues from Victoria and Tasmania, I expressed the conviction that the work of this Convention could be got through within the period of a month, and it is exactly a month to-day since we opened our sittings. I should like to say this: Some of my colleagues in this Convention have expressed their thanks to the members of the committee associated with me in the preparation of the Bill, and I wish to express emphatically my thanks to them also. Their collaboration has been marked by an extreme feeling of patriotism, a deep sense of honor, and a thorough feeling of the importance of the work assigned to them, and their industry has been equal to the ability with which they have helped me in labors by no means slight. If there is any member of the Convention who thinks, in the warmth of debate, I may have discharged words in my expressions which seem to be too warm for the occasion, I can only say in the words of Shakespeare:

O Cassius, you are yoked with a lamb
That carries anger as the flint bears fire;
Who, much enforced, shows a hasty spark,
And straight is cold again.

The PRESIDENT:
Before putting the motion I should like to say a few words. I desire to acknowledge the kindly references of the Leader of the Convention, Mr. Barton, and other speakers, to the South Australian Government and also myself in my capacity as President. As regards the Government, I can only say we have endeavored, so far as we could to give expression to what we were sure was the wish of South Australia, that the representatives of the other colonies should be warmly welcomed, and I can only regret that the industry of the Convention has been such that we have not had the time or opportunity for this purpose that we could have desired. As regards my duties in this chair, I desire to tender my warmest thanks to the members of the Convention for the courtesy and kindness they have shown me, and which has made my office one of the pleasantest, as it has been one of the most honorable that man could occupy. I recognise that an additional honor has been conferred upon me by entrusting me with the duty of presenting to Her Most Gracious Majesty the congratulations of this Convention. That duty, with the permission of Providence, I will most faithfully discharge. I will only add this, that I am sanguine, equally with other speakers, that we have made a most substantial advance towards the accomplishment of Australian Federation, and I look with confidence to the result of the adjourned meeting which is to be held shortly. Again, members of the Convention, I thank you.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON:

I beg to move:

That copies of the draft Constitution and the minutes of proceedings of the Committee

I hope in due course, through the proper channel, these proceedings will reach the hands of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies; because I believe whatever may lead to our legislative independence, so long as it affirms the relation of of amity and loyalty which exists between all these colonies and the mother country will be viewed with extreme favor by all those interested in the dear old land, in the strengthening and welding together, and in the continued affection between one part and another of the whole Empire.

Question resolved in the affirmative.
