OFFICIAL RECORD OF THE DEBATES OF THE NATIONAL AUSTRALASIAN CONVENTION HELD IN THE PARLIAMENT HOUSE, ADELAIDE, SOUTH AUSTRALIA.
Monday March 22, 1897.

Meeting of Convention - Proclamations - Roll of Representatives
- President - Clerk - Notices of Motion - Hour of Meeting -
Adjournment.

The delegates met in the House of Assembly Chamber, at Parliament House, Adelaide, at 12 noon.

The Clerk of the Legislative Council and Clerk of the Parliaments (Edwin Gordon Blackmore, Esquire), attending in the House, read a Proclamation, as follows:—

PROCLAMATIONS.

New South Wales, (L. S.) HAMPDEN, to wit. Governor.

PROCLAMATION By His EXCELLENCY THE RIGHT HONORABLE HENRY ROBERT, VISCOUNT HAMPDEN, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the colony of New South Wales and its dependencies:

WHEREAS by the seventeenth section of an Act passed in the fifty-ninth year of Her Majesty's reign, intituled an Act to enable New South Wales to take part in the framing, acceptance, and enactment of a Federal Constitution of Australasia, it is enacted that when the first elections have been held in three or more colonies a meeting of the Convention shall be convened for such time and place as a majority of the Governors of such colonies may decide, or, in case of an equal division, as the Governor of the senior of such colonies may fix: And whereas such elections have been hold in five of the said colonies: And whereas it has been decided by a majority of the Governors of the colonies to be represented at such Convention, with the advice of their respective Executive Councils, that a meeting of the Convention shall be convened for noon on Monday, the 22nd day of March instant, at Parliament House, Adelaide-Now therefore, I, HENRY ROBERT, VISCOUNT HAMPDEN, in pursuance of the power and authority vested in me as Governor of the aforesaid colony, do hereby declare that a meeting of such Convention shall be held at such time and place as aforesaid.

Given under my hand and seal, at Government House, Sydney, this 18th day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, and in the sixtieth year of Her Majesty's reign.

By His Excellency's command.

JAMES N. BRUNKER.
GOD SAVE THE QUEEN!

Mr. BLACKMORE:
I have to report that I hold similar Proclamations by the Governors of South Australia, Tasmania, and Victoria. The Honorable SIMON FRASER, M.L.C.
The Honorable Sir WILLIAM AUSTIN ZEAL, K.C.M.G. (President Legislative Council).
HENRY BOURNES , HIGGINS, Esquire, M.L.A.

Mr. BLACKMORE:
I respectfully request the delegates to the Convention to attend at the table and sign the record roll of the Convention.
The members of the Convention present then signed the roll.
PRESIDENT.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
It is a very Pleasing duty to me to follow what has been the established precedent in reference to these Conventions. For many years past in the colonies in which they have been held invariably the Premiers of the colonies have been chosen to preside over the meetings of the Conventions, and that is a rule there is no justification in departing from on the present occasion. Therefore it gives me great pleasure to move:
That Mr. Charles Cameron Kingston, Premier of the colony of South Australia, be President of this Convention.
I need hardly remind you that Mr. Kingston is one who took great interest in the Convention of 1891, and devoted his abilities most attentively to those proceedings, which resulted in the framing of the Commonwealth Bill, so that he comes to this Convention with a matured mind and vast experience as a parliamentarian in South Australia, which will, no doubt, serve him in good stead in the position which I hope he will occupy as the result of your goodwill to South Australia and its Premier. I do not anticipate that he will have many disorderly members to deal with, but if he has I think he is the right man to deal with them, and I have therefore great pleasure in submitting the motion. (Hear, hear.)

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
I have great pleasure in seconding the nomination of Mr. Charles Cameron Kingston as President of this Convention. I do not think that there will be any doubt as to his ability to fulfil the functions of that position. Following the precedents which have always prevailed in the Australian Colonies, that the Premier of the colony in which the Convention is being held shall preside, I think the motion will be unanimously carried, and that Mr. Kingston's election will meet with the approval of the delegates. I have therefore very much pleasure in seconding the motion. (Cheers.)

Mr. KINGSTON:
I desire to express my deep sense of the honor proposed to be conferred on me, and to submit myself to the will of this honorable Convention.

There being no other nomination,

The PRESIDENT ELECT (having been conducted to the chair by Sir Joseph Abbott and Sir Graham Berry) said: Representatives of Australasia-
My appreciation of the high honor which has been conferred on my native colony and myself in calling me to preside over the deliberations of this august assembly is too intense for adequate expression. I would that I were more worthy of it, but I rely on the kindly feeling which has prompted my election to this honorable post being continued to sustain me in the discharge of its important duties, and I promise you that no pains will be spared on my part to deserve the confidence so generously bestowed. Again I thank you. (Cheers.)

THE CLERK.

Mr. HOLDER:
I move:
That Edwin Gordon Blackmore, Esq., be Clerk of this Convention.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I second that.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. HOLDER:
I give notice that at the next meeting I will move:
That, unless otherwise ordered, the Convention shall meet daily, Saturdays and Sundays excepted, punctually at 11 a.m., and shall sit till 5.30 p.m., with an interval from 1 to 2.

Dr. QUICK to move:
That a return be laid before this Convention showing-
I. The populations of the various Australian Colonies, according to the latest statistics and estimates.
II. The average annual population of each of the said colonies during the last ten years.

Mr. HOLDER to move:
That the proceedings of the Convention be open to the public except when otherwise ordered.

Mr. HOLDER to move:
That official minutes of the proceedings be kept by the Clerk, and, being signed by the President and Clerk, be printed and circulated amongst the representatives.

Dr. QUICK to move:
That a return be laid before this Convention showing-
I. The present annual cost of naval and military defence in each of the Australian Colonies.
II. The average annual cost of such defence in each of the said colonies during the last ten years.
III. The amount of money expended in each of the said colonies in the construction of fortifications and other defence works, and in the purchase of warships and other implements of warfare now maintained and fit for use.
IV. The amount of interest per year, at 3 per cent., which such money so expended would bear in each colony.
V. The total present annual cost of defence in each colony, including interest on works and war vessels and implements.

VI. How such total present annual cost of defence of Australian Colonies, including interest on works, &c., would be distributed under Federation, if such total cost were charged against the Federated States pro rata according to population.

Mr. HOLDER to move:
That an official record of the debates of the Convention be made by the "Hansard" reporters of South Australia.

Mr. HOLDER to move:
That in the debates and proceedings of this Convention the Standing Orders and practice of the South Australian House of Assembly be observed.

Dr. QUICK to move:
That a return be laid before this Convention showing—
I. The present annual cost of maintaining the following services in each of the Australian Colonies, viz.:—Quarantine, ocean beacons and buoys, ocean lighthouses and lightships.

II. The average annual cost of such services in each of the said colonies during the last ten years.

III. The amount of money expended in each of the said colonies in the construction of works, buildings, &c., connected with such services now maintained and fit for use.

IV. The amount of interest per year, at 3 per cent., which such money would bear in each colony.

V. The total annual cost of such services in each colony, including interest on works and buildings.

VI. How such total present annual cost of such services, including interest on work, &c., would be distributed under Federation if such total cost were charged against the Federated States pro rata according to population.

Dr. QUICK to move:
That a return be laid before this Convention showing—
I. The annual amount of revenue collected in each of the Australian Colonies during the last ten years from Customs and excise taxation.

II. The average annual amount of such revenue money so collected in each colony during the last ten years.

III. The average annual cost during the last ten years of collecting such taxation and administering the Custom and Excise Departments, including interest at 3 per cent. on the cost of Custom-houses.

IV. The net average annual revenue during the last ten years derived from such taxation in each colony.

Dr. QUICK to move:
That a return be laid before this Convention showing—
I. The receipts of each of the Australian Colonies during the last ten years from post offices and telegraphs.

II. The average annual amount of such receipts so collected in each colony.
III. The average annual cost during the last ten years of working and administering the said services.

IV. The net annual receipts or losses of each colony in these services during the last ten years.

V. The amount of money expended in each of the said colonies in the construction of works, buildings, &c., connected with such services now maintained and fit for use.

VI. The amount of interest per year, at 3 per cent., which such money would bear in each colony.

VII. The total annual present cost of such services in each colony, including interest on works, &c.

VIII. How such total present annual cost of such services, including interest on works, &c., would be distributed under Federation if such total cost were charged against the Federated States pro rata according to population.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HOLDER:
If no other business is coming forward, I shall formally move:
That the Convention at its rising adjourn until eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BARTON:
I would suggest that it should be till 10 o'clock. There are a large number of delegates who prefer that the Convention should begin at 10 instead of 11 o'clock. In view of the fact that either the Convention must bring its labors to a termination before a certain time or it will lose the services of several of the Premiers, who it is understood will take a journey, it is desirable that, as we can do some important work to-morrow, we should meet at 10 o'clock. I propose, as an amendment, that:
That the word "ten" be substituted for the word "eleven."

The PRESIDENT:
Has the motion been seconded?

Mr. GORDON:
I second it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I may say I have consulted with the other representatives of the colony of Victoria, and we feel that all the representatives must be anxious that the work here should be done as quickly as its great importance demands; and, while we think that 11 o'clock is rather too late to commence in the day, we feel that, perhaps, for some who have a distance to come, and others who have business to attend to here, 10 o'clock is rather too early. I therefore take the liberty of suggesting to the movers of the motion and of the amendment that we might fix the time at 10.30 o'clock, which will suit the convenience of all and give us an extra half hour. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. BARTON:
As far as to-morrow is concerned, I will withdraw my motion in favor of that of Sir George Turner.

Mr. HOLDER:
I accept Sir George Turner's amendment.
Sir George Turner's amendment accepted.
Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HOLDER moved:
That the Convention do now adjourn.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
Convention adjourned at 12.31 p.m.
Tuesday March 23, 1897.

Petition - Notice of Motion - Days and Hours of Sitting - Minutes of Proceedings - "Hansard" - Standing Orders and Practice - Admission of the Public - Returns: Population, Cost of Naval and Military Defence, Quarantine, Public Works, Customs and Excise Revenue, Post offices and Telegraphs - Suspension of Standing Orders - Proposed Select Committee - Resolutions - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.
PETITION.
Dr. COCKBURN
presented the following petition, signed by the President and Secretary of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Australasia:—

To the President of the Federal Convention of Australasia, in Session assembled:

Sir-On behalf of the executive of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Australasia, which numbers about 8,000 women and has branches in every colony, we have the honor respectfully to forward the following resolution, adopted on February 26th, 1897:—"That this executive, representing the Women's Christian Temperance Union of Australasia, earnestly urges the Federal Convention of Australasia to secure in the Federal Constitution the provision that all voting by electors for Federal Parliaments be upon the basis of equal voting rights for both sexes."

We have the honor to be, Sir,
Obediently yours,
E. W. NICHOLLS, President.
NORA B. HARRIS, Secretary.

Petition received and read.
NOTICE OF MOTION.

Mr. GLYNN:
I give notice that at the next meeting I will move:
That a return be laid before this Convention showing—
I. The estimated capital cost in 1896 on miles open and completed of the railways of each of the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Western Australia.
II. The basis on which such capital cost has in each case been estimated.
III. The capital cost of the rolling-stock of each of such colonies.
IV. The percentage for each colony of the net railway revenue on the capital cost thus ascertained.
V. Estimates similar to those mentioned in paragraphs 1, 3, and 4 for each of the years 1892, 1893, and 1894.

That the Clerk be requested to obtain and lay on the table any reports presented by the Railway Commissioners of the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Western Australia on the questions:

I. Abolition of the break of gauge.

II. Amalgamation under a federal body or otherwise of the railways of all or any two of the said colonies.

DAYS AND HOURS OF SITTING.

Mr. HOLDER moved the following motion standing in his name:

That, unless otherwise ordered, the Convention shall meet daily, Saturdays and Sundays excepted, punctually at 10.30 a.m., and shall sit till 5.30 p.m., with an interval from 1 to 2 p.m.

He said: I think it will be convenient that the Convention should meet at half-past 10; to meet later would be to lose valuable time, and I am afraid that if we met earlier we should have a thin House for the first half hour of the sitting, which would be unfortunate from many points of view. At the same time, while I express that view, of course I should be prepared—as all of us must be—at any time to bow to the decision of the majority. For the present, at any rate, I move the motion standing in my name.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

I second the motion.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

It appears to me that we have been told by all the colonies that there is a great necessity for getting through this work quickly, and I recognise the fact that circumstances have arisen which will require some of the members of the Convention to get away from the colonies at an early date. That being so, is it not desirable that we should sit on Saturday? I cannot see the necessity of excluding the whole of Saturday, but I do see that a great deal of good would arise if we included Saturday as one of our sitting days. I know the very best motives have actuated the representatives of South Australia in laying aside Saturday as a holiday for the Convention, but we have not to consider our personal desires in a matter of this kind, and I think we ought at all events to sit for half the day on Saturday. The Convention can, if necessary, adjourn at 1 o'clock or 2 o'clock, but I shall test the feeling of the Convention by moving the omission of the words—"Saturdays and."
Mr. TRENWITH:

In seconding that amendment it is obvious that four at any rate of the leading members of the Convention-leading in their respective colonies at any rate-must leave here not later than three weeks or a month hence. The work we have to do is of the gravest possible importance; it is work that cannot possibly be hurried without injury, and yet it is work that must be got through with all reasonable expedition. It seems to me so obvious that we must give all the time we possibly can to the work before us, that it is not necessary to support this position by argument, and I therefore simply second the amendment moved by Sir Joseph Abbott.

Mr. REID:

I thoroughly sympathise with the zeal which has prompted this amendment, but I doubt its wisdom very strongly. The strain on members of this Convention, if they do the work as I am sure they will do it - faithfully and honestly-during the times named in this resolution, will be sufficient to tax the resources of any ordinary individual, and I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that it will be necessary for many of us to consider these very difficult matters for hours during the evenings of the week. I also cannot forget the labors which the press will have upon them, and "Hansard," in taking a verbatim account of a sitting which is to last a very considerable time each day. I think experience has shown that if any man is to do his best intellectual work he has enough to do on the motion as submitted by Mr. Holder, that is to say, he has to have intervals for reflection, for consultation, and, with every respect to my distinguished friend, I do think that the proposition from South Australia is a very wise one.

Mr. SOLOMON:

I trust that the amendment will not be agreed to by members of the Convention because I for one, owing to my religious belief, could certainly not take part in the proceedings of the Convention on Saturday, and I think that any member who is placed in that position should not be placed at a disadvantage by sitting on that day. I trust therefore that members of the Convention will agree to the resolution as proposed.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I would suggest that this matter should be left for further consideration. In a few days Ave shall have the attendance of the Western Australian delegates, and then all members will be enabled to take part in the discussion and to consider whether it is desirable that the innovation proposed by Sir Joseph Abbott should be adopted. In the meantime I would suggest that the motion should not be pressed, and if hereafter the exigencies of business require Saturday to be taken, no doubt hon. members will cheerfully acquiesce in the proposal.

Mr. HOLDER:

Before the motion is put I would like to put to the Convention this point: that, as the motion stands, "unless otherwise ordered," the Convention shall sit at certain times. It will always be competent if we have special business to finish to have a special meeting on Saturday, and should the Western Australian delegates on their arrival desire to sit on Saturday, an alteration can be made; but I hope, for the present, the formal business included in the resolution will not be delayed, and that the Convention will agree to the motion.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

In deference to the remarks of Mr. Solomon, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BARTON:

I would like to submit for the consideration of the Convention whether, if we are not to sit on Saturday, it does not become more necessary that we should meet at 10 o'clock each day. Of course, by sitting from 10.30 till 1 on Saturdays, two and a half hours will be gained. That is precisely what will be lost if we sit from 10.30 instead of 10 on other days. That time would be made up if we sat on Saturdays. I do not wish to move an amendment if the sense of the Convention is against it. If it seems good to hon. members that that course might be adopted, the private convenience of members must give way.

Mr. REID:

We will make up for that by short speeches.

The PRESIDENT:

I put it that Sir Joseph Abbott have leave to withdraw his amendment.

Leave given.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. HOLDER:

I content myself with simply moving this motion:

That official minutes of the proceedings be kept by the Clerk, and, being signed by the President and Clerk, be printed and circulated amongst the representatives.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

"HANSARD."

Mr. HOLDER:

I also move this motion:

That an official record of the debates of the Convention be made by the "Hansard" reporters of South Australia.
Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I second the motion.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

STANDING ORDERS AND PRACTICE.

Mr. HOLDER:
I move:
That in the debate and proceedings of this Convention the Standing Orders and practice of the South Australian House of Assembly be observed.

I may inform members of the Convention that copies of the South Australian Standing Orders will be available, so that a copy may be handed to any hon. member immediately. For that reason, among others, it will be wise to follow this course.

Mr. REID:
I regret to Say that I have not had sufficient leisure to study the rules of the South Australian Parliament yet. May I ask if there is a time limit.

The PRESIDENT:
There is no time limit, but there is a power

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think we ought to have a copy of the Standing Orders before we adopt them in ignorance of what arrangements are made in South Australia.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I wish to point out that the Standing Orders of the House of Assembly in this province are very nearly the same as the Standing Orders of New South Wales. I may say that I have studied the Standing Orders of all the colonies, and I am in a position to make that assertion.

Mr. REID:
They are very good, then.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADMISSION OF THE PUBLIC.

Mr. HOLDER:
I move:
That the proceedings of the Convention be open to the public except when otherwise ordered.

I submit this motion, feeling assured that every member of the Convention will wish the proceedings to be as public as possible. We should take the public into our confidence at the earliest possible moment, and, while availing ourselves of the other powers in this Convention, the educative influences that will be exercised by admitting the public to this Convention will be largely promoted.

Sir. RICHARD BAKER:
   I second the motion.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   I desire to ask whether the proceedings of the Convention will include the Convention in Committee.

Mr. BARTON:
   Select Committee?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   No; I understand that in Select Committee it would be desirable that we should discuss matters in private, but what I desire to make clear is whether, when the Convention goes into Committee, the proceedings of the Committee as a whole should be open to the public. I think that should be so; and I wish to know if the words are sufficiently wide. If they are I shall be perfectly satisfied.

The PRESIDENT:
   I take it that the words are sufficiently wide for the Committee of the whole, but not for Select Committees.
   Question resolved in the affirmative.

RETURN-POPULATION.

Dr. QUICK:
   I move:
   That a return be laid before this Convention showing-
   I. The populations of the various Australian Colonies, according to the latest statistics and estimates.
   II. The average annual population of each of the said colonies during the last ten years.
   I may say with reference to the whole of these notices of motion relating to the returns I have been inquiring into the matters lately, and I find a deficiency of information in a classified and tabulated form. I believe the statisticians for most of the colonies would be able to place this information in the form I propose. It would be most valuable to the delegates from all the colonies, and if we were in possession of the information and data it would enable us to consider anything financial.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
   I rise to second the motion, but in doing so I wish it to be distinctly understood that all returns of this nature, or of the nature of those mentioned, in the various motions by the gentleman who has just resumed his seat, must virtually be delayed until the statisticians of the colonies, engaged now on special financial or statistical work, have completed that work. The Convention is not likely to object to the granting of all information which any individual member may ask for, and the more the better; but such information can only be gained at a time when the various statisticians are relieved from the other official duties in which they are engaged. I believe the information now being prepared will be in even better form than that required by the resolutions. Therefore, if the hon. member will be satisfied that the information shall be prepared for the various finance committees by the statisticians, but that the duties of the statisticians shall be first to attend to such work as may be demanded from them on behalf of the finance committees hereafter formed, there will be no objection to the whole of the proposals. In seconding the motion I hope he understands that I make such reservations as I have mentioned. When we form these finance committees they will undoubtedly make great demands upon the statisticians, and these will be officers of the House, and will be called upon to prepare all the tables to be asked for.

Dr. QUICK:
I am quite willing to accept it on that understanding.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

POPULATION.

Dr. QUICK:
I move:
That a return be laid before this Convention showing-
I. The present annual cost of naval and military defence in each of the Australian Colonies.
II. The average annual cost of such defence in each of the said colonies during the last ten years.
III. The amount of money expended in each of the said colonies in the construction of fortifications and other defence works, and in the purchase of warships and other implements of warfare now maintained and fit for use.
IV. The amount of interest per year, at 3 per cent., which such money so expended would bear in each colony.
V. The total present annual cost of defence in each colony, including interest, on works and wax vessels and implements.
VI. How such total present annual cost of defence of Australian Colonies, including interest on works, &c., would be distributed under Federation if such total cost were charged against the Federated States pro rata according to population.

Probably, with the consent of the Convention, I may be permitted to move the rest of the motions standing in my name en bloc.

The PRESIDENT:

I think the hon. member had better move the motions one after another.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

QUARANTINE, LIGHTHOUSES, &c.

Dr. QUICK:

I move:

That a return be laid before this Convention showing-

I. The present annual cost of maintaining the following services in each of the Australian Colonies, viz.:—Quarantine, ocean beacons and buoys, ocean lighthouses and lightships.

II. The average annual cost of such services in each of the said colonies during the last ten years.

III. The amount of money expended in each of the said colonies in the construction of works, buildings, &c., connected with such services now maintained and fit for use.

IV. The amount of interest per year, at 3 per cent., which such money would bear in each colony.

V. The total annual cost of such services in each colony, including interest on works and buildings.

VI. How such total present annual cost of such services, including interest on work, &c., would be distributed under Federation if such total cost were charged against the Federated States pro rata according to population.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE TAXATION.

Dr. QUICK:

I move:

That a return be laid before this Convention showing-

I. The annual amount of revenue collected in each of the Australian Colonies during the last ten years from Customs and excise taxation.

II. The average annual amount of such revenue money so collected in each colony during the last ten years.

III. The average annual cost during the last ten years of collecting such taxation and administering the Custom and Excise Department, including interest at 3 per cent. on the cost of Custom-houses.

IV. The net average annual revenue during the last ten years derived from such taxation in each colony.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

POST OFFICES AND TELEGRAPHS.

Dr. QUICK:
I move:
That a return be laid before this Convention showing—
I. The receipts of each of the Australian Colonies during the last ten years from post offices and telegraphs.

II. The average annual amount of such receipts so collected in each colony.

III. The average annual cost during the last ten years of working and administering the said services.

IV. The net annual receipts or losses of each colony in these services during the last ten years.

V. The amount of money expended in each of the said colonies in the construction of works, buildings, &c., connected with such services now maintained and fit for use.

VI. The amount of interest per year, at 3 per cent., which such money would bear in each colony.

VII. The total annual present cost of such services in each colony, including interest on works, &c.

VIII. How such total present annual cost of such services, including interest on works, &c., would be distributed under Federation if such total cost were charged against the Federated States pro rata according to population.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. BARTON:
I desire to move:
That so much of the Standing Orders be suspended as may be necessary to enable certain resolutions to be moved without notice.

The question of course has been exercising the minds of members of the Convention as to whether the procedure with which the discussion shall be initiated shall be by way of taking the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 as a basis, or upon certain resolutions defining the principles and conditions upon which and the powers and functions with which the federal authority should be constituted. Holding the opinion that the latter is the better course, I have ventured to ask the Convention to make the necessary suspension of the Standing Orders in order that, as the matters are urgent, such resolutions may be taken at once. I do not propose to enter into a discussion now upon the question, and I do not suppose any other member will, except upon the question tha

The PRESIDENT:
I would point out that this resolution will require an absolute majority of the Convention.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

A SELECT COMMITTEE.

Mr. BARTON moved:

That a Select Committee be appointed to draw up, for the consideration of this Convention, certain resolutions relating to conditions upon which and the powers and functions with which the federal authority should be constituted.

I shall have a second resolution to move as to the Committee, but I am under the impression-

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It might be as well for us to hear the second resolution.

Mr. BARTON:

I am under the impression that, instead of nominating certain members of the Convention in my resolution, it would be a far more delicate course for me to leave the matter to the respective delegations to appoint two members from each of the colonies to act on the Committee. With that view I have left the nomination in the second resolution blank. If the first resolution is carried, I will ask the President to leave the chair for say ten minutes while the respective delegations meet and nominate two members and communicate them to me. I shall then embody them in the resolution. The resolutions to be framed will be of vital interest to the colonies in their separate capacities, and this seems to me to be the more judicious course to pursue, and I hope it will meet with the approval of this Convention. As to the first resolution, I am strongly of opinion that we should not take as our guide or as our master anything which has been done in the past. I am one of the strongest supporters of the Convention Bill of 1891, I believe that, with certain alterations in the financial provisions, that Bill is a measure under which the colonies could even now safely federate. Not that I say it is the best Bill that could be framed; but I do believe it is a well-devised and well-drawn Constitution, and a Constitution under which a free people-making such amendments from time to time as necessity will require, and the powers given by the Constitution will allow-might live in perfect freedom and with perfect security. But that is not the question before us now, because the people of the different colonies have laid upon us the charge of framing a Federal Constitution under the Crown. They have not by so much as a hint given us to understand, one way or the other, whether we are to adopt any work or not. This is the first Convention directly appointed by the people, and therefore the inference from that is that the desire of the people is that, as far as possible, this Convention shall originate the Constitution. I am perfectly free to admit that the Bill of 1891 will be found to be of great help to us in the committees, and I am of opinion that after we have discussed certain general resolutions we should appoint committees who should take certain branches of the work, and the result of whose labors should be embodied in the Bill to be submitted to the Convention as a whole. While I am of that opinion, and I say that in the work of such committees a great deal of instruction may be derived from the Bill of 1891, the business of this Convention is to arrive at a conclusion, not under the influence of the previous work, but by its own efforts. I shall be pleased to find that the conclusions of the various committees, afterwards adopted by this Convention, are so nearly like the Bill of 1891 that it will be found to be a good indication of the greatness of the work of those who made it. That will be the best test of the Bill of 1891, and I do not propose that the Bill, as travellers have told us the Abyssinians did with a living ox at a royal feast, should be pegged out and strung up in such a way that the epicures of the moment may cut out quivering strips of it for their own gustative delectation. Apart from that, it is the duty and the charge of this Convention to proceed as of itself to make the Bill which it has to frame, however much it may be added to by various suggestions, and however much it may be found that the purport of the resolutions of your Select Committees will be contained in the Bill of 1891, in which case it would be folly not to adopt the form in which that Bill embodies them. We shall be best following out the mandate of those who elected us by laying down the conditions and powers of the Federation by general resolutions, by which a full discussion of all may be taken, and by afterwards proceeding to arrive at such conclusions, presumably and preferably in Committee, as will enable us to arrive at a form of Bill which will satisfy this Convention and the people afterwards. This is the principle upon which I propose to move this resolution; and, looking at the urgency of the work that has to be done, and the possibility that something may arise to prevent the Convention concluding its labors satisfactorily in the time some of us think it should take, I think I am best consulting the wishes of members in not speaking at great length. I shall content myself therefore with moving the motion.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I quite agree with Mr. Barton that, under existing circumstances, it is better that we should not make the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 the document that we should here deal with, although I think we must all admit in our minds that by far the largest portion of that Bill will be found in any Bill which is brought forward for our final consideration. But the difficulty I have is this: My hon. friend suggests that we should have a committee consisting of two members from each colony. That will mean a committee of eight. I feel that if we have eight gentlemen sitting round a table endeavoring to frame resolutions, holding, as they necessarily must, diverse views on matters which should be included in the resolutions and the form they should take, it must necessarily occupy those gentlemen considerable time before they can complete resolutions and submit them for consideration.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
In addition to that, we should have on the committee gentlemen with a knowledge of financial matters, gentlemen with a knowledge of judicial matters, and gentlemen also with a knowledge of constitutional matters, if we are to frame a Constitution. We must, however, have some foundation, and I think it would be simpler if we appointed one of our number to frame resolutions which we might take as our basis. I should be satisfied, as far as Victoria is concerned, to say that Mr. Barton should undertake the duty I suggest of framing certain resolutions according to his own ideas as to what form the deliberations of the Convention should take. When we get these resolutions Mr. Barton will not, I am sure, feel any cause of offence if we deal with them fully, if we deal with them freely, and if we alter them in every line and every particle in which we think they should be altered, because he will be framing the resolutions at the request of the Convention, and he may, when he hears the arguments brought forward by those holding different views, be led to amend and alter and modify the views he has put in the resolutions. That will be the simpler plan, and it will be the better mode of having something definite before us. It will take Mr. Barton very little time to frame these resolutions, because he knows his own mind. If we have a committee its members must differ on many points, and the work will probably take them a considerable time. I believe something of this system was followed in Sydney, when Sir Henry Parkes took charge. It may be that he discussed the matter informally with other members before he brought forward the resolutions. If we authorise Mr. Barton to do the same thing now it could riot be left in better hands.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I entirely agree with Sir George Turner, and a considerable amount of time will be saved by adopting the course suggested. As a matter, of course we shall have to ultimately send this to constitutional and other committees, which will be committees consisting of greater numbers than two for each colony, and it is not expedient at present that they should be handicapped by any portion of their members having been on similar committees, and so having come to conclusions without having had the advantage of hearing the opinions of their fellow members. The method suggested by Sir George Turner is what was done in the Sydney Convention, and we are satisfied that if Mr. Barton has the drafting of the resolutions which are to be brought before us they will be in form broad enough to allow any member to have an opportunity of ventilating any views he may happen to hold. We know Mr. Barton will be only too delighted to have his resolutions commented upon, discussed, and differed from, and he will certainly understand that he is introducing the matter before us not expecting for a moment that the resolutions which he proposes will be regarded as our final conclusions until they are discussed, fully considered, and settled. I think we shall save a deal of time if we adopt this course.

Mr. SYMON:

I venture to think the suggestion so uncommonly good that I should like to enlarge its scope a little by suggesting for the consideration of the Convention whether we might not entrust Mr. Barton altogether with leading the business of the Convention. The Convention is really in substance, as well as in essence, a Parliament, and if we are at each stage to have the proceedings entrusted to a committee of six, eight, or whatever the number may be decided upon, we shall be like sheep without a shepherd. One of the first things we should think of is to select one of our members to lead the business in the ordinary way in which the leader of the House of Assembly takes the business through. It will greatly facilitate our proceedings, and lead to regularity and directness of purpose which perhaps we should otherwise fail in. It should always be remembered that the Convention of 1891, which is looked upon in many respects as a precedent, was an altogether anomalous assembly, and, by common consent of the members, the leader of the proceedings was the late Sir Henry Parkes. He was entrusted with the duty of conducting the resolutions, and the whole of the business was practically in his hands. Here, of course, a totally dissimilar state of things exists. Our President is largely in the position of a Speaker to conduct the proceedings, while Sir Henry Parkes was not only the President but the Leader of the Convention, so far as its practical business was concerned. I therefore suggest whether Mr. Barton's duties might not be enlarged into those of Leader of the Convention.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I think the carrying of the resolution proposed by Mr. Barton would probably land this Convention in very doubtful procedure. In the first place I think we have been elected in order to conduct our deliberations in the most open manner possible, and it will be a mistake-copying, too, one of those mistakes which has, perhaps, led to the unpopularity of the Convention of 1891—if we provide that the chief work to be done shall be commenced by a secret committee, because practically a Select Committee must carry out its deliberations in secret. In the next place, I, deriving as I do my authority direct from the people, object to delegate those powers to any Select Committee, however able it may be. I do not object to oppose my views to those of any gentleman who puts forth his arguments for consideration; but I do object to oppose them to the views of a committee which may form resolutions as the result of compromise, and whose members are, to some extent, bound to support those resolutions. I think it will leave us open to arguments against our proceedings at the onset if we delegate any portion of our functions to any Select Committee, however able it may be. I am one of those who think we should not make the Commonwealth Bill the basis of our procedure. But we have their work, which, according to the admission of the mover of this resolution, will have to be largely adopted, no matter what our procedure may be to-day, and it is better to adopt those portions of the Bill of 1891 which merit our approval openly and straightforwardly than to do anything which may savor of subterfuge. I use the term subterfuge without any desire of giving offence to any member of the Convention but it really would appear to be a subterfuge if we borrowed the provisions of the Bill of 1891, without admitting at the outset the authority from which these labors have resulted. I would remind the mover of this resolution that there is another colony which is deeply concerned in the work of this Convention. The representatives are not here to-day, and any resolution proposed and carried to-day for the formation of a Select Committee must, to a large extent, deprive the representatives of that colony of their lawful right to participate in the deliberations.

Mr. BARTON:

Though they are not here they have expressed their willingness that we should proceed in their absence.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

They may have expressed that willingness, but they do not, I am sure, expect that we will take any momentous step in their absence. They no doubt anticipated that we would proceed with formal matters, and not with matters of vital importance. Here, however, we have representatives laying down what must be the fundamentals of Federation in the absence of those gentlemen. If we take any names we may choose to form resolutions they have to submit these resolutions, and to a great extent will, commit themselves to support them. More than that. Why should members be deprived of their rights of proposing amendments to these resolutions?

Mr. PEACOCK:

They would not be deprived.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

Members will stand here and propose resolutions, and to that extent they will be handicapped in considering any amendments suggested. Now I hope that any resolution which may be moved giving expression to the opinion of the Convention will be dealt with in an open and popular fashion, and that we will use that material which is to hand, making the best use of it. I refer to the Bill of 1891, which has not been so unpopular as many members imagine. It has been practically adopted by resolutions passed in the various Parliaments of Australia, because I think every Parliament of Australia which was represented has passed resolutions generally approving of that Bill; so that we have evidence that it is not so unpopular as some members have said. I hope that an amendment will be moved which will test the feeling of the Convention whether we will take as a basis the Bill of 1891 rather than proceed by the appointment of Committees.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It seems to me that the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat has overlooked one important matter in connection with the constitution of this Convention. This Convention is practically a Parliament without an Executive. An ordinary Parliament conducts its business in public, but its Executive prepares in private the business that has to be submitted to Parliament in public. We are in the position of having no such Executive, and we are here this morning without the possibility of proceeding intelligently in public. The motion Mr. Barton has moved is with the view of overcoming that difficulty—for the purpose of creating a skeleton which the deliberations of the Congress may proceed to clothe with a body. It seems to be an absolute necessity of our Constitution. The suggestion of Mr. Carruthers that hon. members will be deprived of an opportunity of moving resolutions embodying their thoughts seems to me to be an erroneous one. Whatever resolutions are submitted will be submitted as all resolutions in Parliament are submitted. They are subject to amendment by any member, and I take it that it is quite possible if, as suggested by Sir George Turner, Mr. Barton were appointed to do this work himself, he might draft resolutions having in view the convenience of this Convention, rather than the embodiment of his own views, simply for the purpose of creating a subject for discussion, and that a resolution might be submitted by him which he himself would subsequently aim to amend. Therefore the most perfect freedom can be achieved under the resolution which has been submitted. The question of who are to constitute the committee—whether, as suggested, eight members should be selected, or, as subsequently proposed, one member should be appointed—does not now come in. We are not now discussing the personnel of the committee, but that some executive body for this purpose should be constituted. I submit that if we do not proceed in that manner we will be landed in a great difficulty. We have either to create an Executive for ourselves or adopt a defunct Executive—that is, to use the work of an Executive which is defunct. Mr. Carruthers suggested the propriety of taking up the Federal Convention Bill rather than take the step which is proposed in the resolution. I respectfully submit that we will be much more hampered and have much less freedom if we propose to discuss at once the Bill, with all its perplexing and intricate machinery clauses, than we would be if two, or three, or four resolutions embodying no machinery and no methods of application, but simply principles, were submitted. We will be able then to come to a conclusion which will bring us much closer together than we are now, and will lead to the crystallisation in a general form of the varied and opposite views of the members of the Convention at present.

Mr. Reid:

I have listened with great attention to the remarks which have been made in this debate, and to some extent I regret that it has occurred because for my part I was prepared to abide by a resolution discussed in an informal manner, but since it has come up I feel bound to question the wisdom of the procedure proposed. Mr. Trenwith unconsciously showed an objection to this procedure in his method of advocating it. For instance, he says we must have an Executive. Well, if we must be guided by an Executive, I prefer to be guided by a defunct one (laughter)—because no questions would arise of want of confidence, and it would not be in the position of Governments, which are mostly always inclined, as Mr. Peacock knows, to give a twist to the views of members which we do not wish to impart to our views in this Convention. I have been somewhat puzzled to find myself—one of the severest critics of the draft Bill—prepared to begin work on that measure, while those, who have always lauded up to the skies the transactions of the Convention of 1891 have shrunk from following that course. The Abyssinian illustration of my hon. friend has quite cleared my mind from, the puzzling state in which it was. I find my hon. friend shrinking from the course I suggest from sheer veneration. They now wish to submit this ideal of superior wisdom to the-I need not say rough-but the usual handling of the committee of the whole.

Mr. BARTON:

We fear the Greeks when they bring us gifts.

Mr. REID:

My own impression is that it would be an infinitely more satisfactory course, although it would be done in private, to take openly and publicly the Bill of 1891. My hon. friend will see that he is bound, if he happens to be a member of a secret committee, to take that Bill, or most of it, as a basis of the future Bill. I strongly emphasise the view that was expressed by Mr. Carruthers. I do say that most of the unpopularity which fell upon the leaders of the Convention of 1891 fell upon them because the proceedings were not conducted according to the usual parliamentary methods. Now we have here a Bill which all of us, I think, or which every member of the Convention admits, is admirably suited as a basis for drafting the Bill of this Convention. I entirely reject the notion that we were sent to this Convention to do anything original, to do something entirely out of our own heads. I entirely reject that notion. We were sent here to use our best intelligence and set about our work in the best possible way, and if in the course of considering that question we come to the conclusion that the Bill which is familiar to the Convention, and which has the additional advantage of being familiar to the people of Australia, would form a basis, and a convenient basis for our own Bill, there is no human being in Australia who will complain of our adopting that course. On the contrary, the people of Australia would be satisfied with that course, which would enable them to follow the alterations we may make in that measure. Sir George Turner, after a night's reflection, is beginning to see the difficulty of the course of which he is in favor.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

That is hardly fair, Mr. Reid.

Mr. REID:

I hope not. I do not wish to say anything unfair. Personally, I am prepared to bear stronger things said to me.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I cannot give my views without disclosing what was done at the caucus. I do not want to do that. I have not altered the views I expressed yesterday.

Mr. REID:

That is exactly what I was saying. (Laughter.) What I was endeavoring to say was that he was perceiving the difficulty of carrying out his views, but he would not alter them because he revels in difficulties. When we come to advocate this method of procedure along with the generous suggestion of Sir George Turner, that the whole load should be put upon the shoulders of Mr. Barton, we begin to see that the labors of the committee in drawing up a list of resolutions, if they are not to be idle, and if they are not to produce a string of platitudes which any boy in a public school could draw up after reading these discussions, without containing the vital principles and the mode of the possible settlement of them, will be attended by a deadlock in the committee at the beginning. The only way to avoid such a deadlock will be to bring up a series of platitudes to waste our time in portentous discussion. We had that experience in 1891, when, as the result of many days' debate, Sir Henry Parkes brought up a string of resolutions in which he placed some very debatable points. The members of the Convention will remember that as a result of many days' debate nearly all these debatable points were emasculated, and a string of resolutions was adopted, nineteen-twentieths of which everyone was agreed upon before the debate began. I feel bound to express my opinion upon the point as a matter of record, and regret that the other course was not followed. At the same time I am quite prepared now, as a majority of the Convention are opposed to my view, to get to work as soon as possible. (Hear, hear.) If Mr. Barton will add to his great services in this and other matters connected with Federation by drafting these resolutions, I think we will all owe him great gratitude; because he will be practically taking upon his shoulders the full burden of these proceedings, and if he will consent it will be infinitely satisfactory to the Convention. Of course we will all expect that Mr. Barton, in drafting the resolutions, is not committing even himself to them; he is merely doing us a great service in laying before us a basis which he thinks will facilitate our-discussion. Before sitting down I cordially agree with the suggestion that Mr. Barton should act as Leader of the Convention. The fact that Mr. Barton is senior representative of the mother-colony is of course an element in the matter, but the great point about it is this, that Mr. Barton adds to that highly distinguished position every other qualification for the position. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. BARTON:

The debate seems practically to have closed. I do not want to say anything in reply. I hope Mr. Carruthers will find that there are thirty-nine present besides himself who are incapable of anything like a subterfuge. That is an expression which I think should not have been used in connection with the proceedings of this Convention. I do not want to say anything hard, or that any expression was out of place, because I am sure every delegate from New South Wales will be found, like the other delegations, in perfect harmony. We all wish to express in debate our opinions after mature consideration, and I am sure Mr. Carruthers, after resuming his seat, does not think anyone in the Convention would be guilty of anything like subterfuge if we interpreted the mandate of the people in the way suggested. feel totally unequal to the task of leading the Convention, but if the burden should be laid upon me by my fellow members, then I suppose I must accept it; but I should prefer someone else should accept it, because I have not been in the best of health for the last few weeks. I am sure, however, that I would receive the very generous cooperation of the whole of the members in these responsible duties. There is one duty I can accept in the meanwhile. As it seems to be the wish to proceed by resolution without appointing a Committee, I am prepared to undertake the task of moving a general resolution by way of opening the debate. (Hear, hear.) After I understood it was the desire of the Convention as a whole that general resolutions should be placed before them as a means of opening the proceedings, and as I expected at the time that it would be acceptable to the Convention that a Committee should be appointed to draft these resolutions, I made a draft of resolutions based very much upon those adopted at the Convention in 1891, and, by the courtesy of Mr. Blackmore, I have had some copies printed at the Government Printing Office.

If, therefore, it is desired that we should proceed at once to the work of dealing with resolutions of that kind I could move them almost at once, and if this is the general understanding of the Convention I shall ask leave to withdraw the motion in your hands.

The PRESIDENT:

Would it be more preferable to put the resolution in the form of an application to withdraw the motion, or that Mr. Barton be requested to bring up, for the consideration of the Convention, certain resolutions relating to the power and functions with which the Federal authority should be constituted.

Mr. BARTON:

If the resolution in your hands be withdrawn, I take it that the leave given for the suspension of the Standing Orders will be sufficient to cover my resolutions.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I think it would be better for all of us if we made a request to Mr. Barton, and if that meets with the approval of the Convention I will move that he be requested to frame these resolutions.
Mr. WALKER:
I second the motion.

Mr. BARTON:
Although, as I have stated, I have been enabled to procure two or three copies of these resolutions, it might be desirable, in the first place, that I should have a little time to consider what at present is simply a draft; and, in addition to that, time would thus be afforded for a final copy of the resolutions to be sent to the Government Printing Office, and printed copies placed in the hands of hon. members. If it be the wish of the Convention that that should be done, I should suggest that there is no necessity for a formal resolution, and you, Mr. President, might leave the chair till 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT:
With the approval of the Convention I propose leaving the chair till 2 o'clock.

The Convention at 11.35 adjourned till 2 p.m.

On resuming debate on motion by Mr. Barton.

Mr. BARTON:
I rise to move the following resolutions
That, in order to enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australia, it is desirable to create a Federal Government which shall exercise authority throughout the Federated Colonies, subject to the following principal conditions:—

I. That the powers, privileges, and territories of the several existing colonies shall remain intact, except in respect of such surrenders as may be agreed upon to secure uniformity of law and administration in matters of common concern.

II. That, after the establishment of the Federal Government, there shall be no alteration of the territorial possessions or boundaries of any colony without the consent of the colony or colonies concerned.

III. That the exclusive power to impose and collect duties of Customs and excise, and to give bounties, shall be vested in the Federal Parliament.

IV. That the exclusive control of the military and naval defences of the Federated Colonies shall be vested in the Federal Parliament.

V. That the trade and intercourse between the Federated Colonies, whether by land or sea, shall become and remain absolutely free.

Subject to the carrying out of these, and such other conditions as may be hereafter deemed necessary, this Convention approves of the framing of a Federal Constitution which shall establish—

(a) A Parliament, to consist of two Houses, namely, a States Assembly or Senate, and a National Assembly or House of Representatives: the States
Assembly to consist of representatives of each colony, to hold office for such periods and be chosen in such manner as will best secure to that Chamber a perpetual existence, combined with definite responsibility to the people of the State which shall have chosen them: the National Assembly to be elected by districts formed on a population basis, and to possess the sole power of originating all Bills appropriating revenue or imposing taxation.

(b) An Executive, consisting of a Governor-General, to be appointed by the Queen, and of such persons as from time to time may be appointed as his advisers.

(c) A Supreme Federal Court, which shall also be the High Court of Appeal for each colony in the Federation.

In moving these resolutions, I desire to explain at the beginning that I have not aimed at that definiteness and precision which would embody and give full expression to my own views. I do not think that the stage of our deliberations has arrived at which we should endeavor to commit the delegates to expressions of opinion on matters of detail, or even to certain matters of principle, with respect to which a fuller knowledge of the views and opinions of their fellows might cause them to alter or modify their views. The spirit in which I move, and the spirit in which I have framed these resolutions, is one which seems to me to harmonise with the attitude in which a member who has been elected to this Convention should approach his duties. Anyone will concede this, that if a body of gentlemen were chosen to represent any colony in this Convention, having laid down for themselves certain views, and saying with reference to those views, "These are the terms upon which we will accept a Federation, and if we cannot obtain these, we are opposed to any Federation at all"; anybody will concede that a body of gentlemen coming into the Convention in that spirit would come into it in an anti-federal spirit. It is only necessary to imagine four or five States sending to a Convention four or five such bodies, each animated by those ideas, hidebound by those pre-judgments, to see that the result of any discussion within these walls would be absolutely futile. It would be an impossibility under such circumstances for those agreements to be come to which are presupposed in the very idea of a federal compact. Let fifty men come to a gathering of this kind, and each of the ten representatives of each different colony be bound by one set of views and opinions, then compromise becomes impossible, and without that spirit of compromise every body of ten in those four or five bodies must succeed in all its views, or else that body and the colony which elected it must withdraw. Clearly and obviously that cannot be the spirit in which to approach a gathering of this kind, because it is impossible to approach it in a spirit which makes all negotiations and all concessions, all interchange of views and ideas, and all readiness to see the superior light of reason, altogether out of the question. That being the view and the attitude in which a member should approach this Convention, and that being also my own view and attitude, I drew these resolutions up, having this principle in mind, that if I am to insist under all circumstances upon having my views carried into effect I am aiming at the impossible, and that if I have to approach the duty I have to perform in this Convention in that spirit I would be the most useless member of this body. I take it that every one of us has come to this Convention in that spirit which I alluded to as animating myself. I hope to be guided by the views, opinions, and arguments of those by whom I am surrounded. I hope to listen in a totally unbiased spirit to all the arguments they put forth, and as I expect them in any case in which they may consider my arguments to be superior to adopt my arguments, so I should be an extraordinary being if I were not prepared to adopt their arguments whenever their superiority was so made manifest. It is, therefore, totally obvious that any state of procedure, any attempt at procedure which would result in this Convention at the present stage being bound down by hard and fast sets of opinions with regard to those matters which are outside the mere essentials of a Federal Commonwealth, is an attempt which would necessarily render futile the whole of the operations of this Convention. It is that state of pre-judgment which we are to avoid. What we want at this preliminary stage of our discussion is to hear at full length—to hear, of course, with every fair regard to the possible limitations of time which we may have to observe—the views and opinions of those who come from the several colonies, and who come here on an equal footing. Before, therefore, we can come to well-reasoned conclusions as to what our Federal Constitution should precisely contain, we should have a debate which is so wide in its scope that every form of view and opinion upon the main matters in issue, and on the chief problems which must engage the attention of the Convention, and which must be settled before a Constitution is passed, will be made manifest, and yet that discussion should be such as to avoid entire and final judgment upon those matters which are outside the essentials of Federation, so that the full light of reason may have its full effect on every member, and incline him, perhaps, to the adoption of that which, though not at first part of his own opinions, he finds by listening to others to be better than his own original conclusions. It is in that spirit that I have drafted these resolutions in such a manner that, while they lay down first the essential conditions of Federation, and next the essential powers, authorities, and functions which the Federal Convention should have, they do not travel into that ulterior ground which would invite decision on questions, the decision on which ought better to be taken at a later stage. That is the reason why hon. members will find these resolutions in a state which does not carry us much farther. They carry us to this extent, that if adopted they carry those matters which are essential. These resolutions are only part of a general course of procedure which I will proceed to explain. If I succeed in carrying these resolutions, I shall ask the Convention to agree to another set of resolutions, and I shall move something to this effect—and I do not think it will be out of order if I give the purport of the words contained in a rough draft of the resolutions which may follow these. They read:

I. That the resolutions be referred to three Select Committees with power to send for persons and papers. Committee No. 1 to be for the consideration of constitutional machinery and the distribution of functions and powers; No. 2, for the consideration of provisions relating to finance, taxation, and trade regulations; and No. 3, for the consideration of provisions relating to the establishment of a Federal Judiciary.

II. That each of such Committees do consist of three members from each of the colonies represented; that each of the several delegations do choose the members of its body who are to serve on such Committees.

Mr. FRASER:

Is that your altogether?

Mr. BARTON:

That will absorb nine delegates in each delegation, three for each of these, and the Prime Minister of each colony represented be an ex officio member of each Committee.

III. That Committee No. 2 be instructed to specially consider sub-resolutions Nos. 3 and 5 of resolution No. 1, with a view to their being carried into effect on lines just to the several colonies.

IV. That it be an instruction to Committees Nos. 2 and 3 to report their respective conclusions to Committee No. 1.

V. That upon the result of the deliberations of the said Committees Committee No. 1 do prepare and submit to this Convention a Bill for the establishment of a Federal Constitution, such Bill to be prepared as speedily as is consistent with the most careful consideration.

I have given these resolutions as they suggested themselves to me, as an improvement on the resolutions of 1891, in order to make clear to hon. members now present an idea of the general scheme. I propose to ask hon. members to take the discussion now upon the general propositions without limiting themselves in their expressions of views as to their further extension; but I put it at the same time whether it is the time for laying down matters of detail. To my mind this is not the stage. We ought to leave it open to this extent, that while we agree upon essentials, and express ourselves fully and freely upon all our views, still, so far as our views are not negatived by any principle here laid down, their embodiment in any resolution may stand over for Select Committee and afterwards for Committee of the whole House, when they may be debated with the freest publicity and fullest freedom. I believe we shall by this process best arrive at conclusions; not that, as many of us would like, we shall be able to drive our own particular views to an issue at once, but we shall discuss all these matters, both constitutionally and otherwise, and then we may arrive at views which, though contrary to our present opinions, shall essentially represent the views of those who sent us here to deal with the problems we have to discuss. About these resolutions - and perhaps I ought to say that I promise not to make a long speech-they correspond very largely in the main with the proposals of Sir Henry Parkes at the Convention in 1891. They have been altered only in the direction of brevity and simplicity. They are not much altered in other respects, except that the first resolution lays down clearly at the outset that Federation is necessary "in order to enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australasia." That is a proposition which, from the many discussions that have taken place in public in various parts of the colonies, appears to have been lost sight of. The idea of surrender seems to have occupied a large place in the minds of the people. Federation really adds to the powers of self-government, a fact which seems to have been put aside and left out of consideration. It is an enlargement of the powers of self-government to include within the scope of action the dealing with national affairs which previously we could not touch. It is the very object which has brought us together in Convention. It is an incontrovertible proposition which. has been laid down clearly. Take these resolutions further. Those under the first head are those which prescribe the principal conditions of Federation-those matters which must be granted as guarantees of the security of the federating colonies. The first is that the several colonies are not to be touched in any of their powers, privileges, and territories, except perhaps where a surrender is necessary to secure uniformity of law and administration in matters of general concern. The next is that, after the establishment of Federation, the present inviolability of the territory of each colony shall be still preserved, subject to the determination of the people of such colony themselves. Whether the people choose to make it through Parliament or by way of popular vote, it should be one of the guarantees afforded by Federation, that is, the Bill which the Convention will frame should guarantee that the territory of each colony shall be inviolate, except to the colony itself. The third contains conditions without which Federation would be impossible. The Federal Parliament should have the exclusive power to impose and collect Customs duties. Clearly we could not have border duties. We should have free intercourse by sea, as well as by land, between one colony and another. We have had it argued outside this place that other forms of revenue than Customs should be given up to the Federation. Some persons have argued that the land should be the basis of taxation. I should protest seriously against such a surrender as that. The idea of locality as an inherent essential of the individualism of each province altogether precludes such an idea. The land itself must be left sacred to each colony just in the same way as its chosen which is least imbued with the idea of localism, and that is to be found in federal Customs duties and the abolition of duties between the States. The continuation of such duties is at variance with the federal idea.

The next of these conditions is that of the exclusive control of the military and naval defences. I pass that over as being a self-evident proposition.
The fifth is that the trade and intercourse between the federated colonies, whether by land or sea, shall become and remain absolutely free. I have dealt with that under sub-heading three, in referring to the imposition of Customs and Excise. These are laid down as the main principles-essential to the creation of the Federation. The remainder, namely, Resolution 2, expresses the chief powers and functions which ought to be granted to the federated people, in order to secure the complete freedom with which it is proposed to constitute them. The first is that there should be a Parliament, and next that the Parliament should consist of two Houses. In support of the general way in which it was thought advisable to frame these resolutions it may be contended that I should have left the idea of the two Houses out of the resolutions. I take it that we are a body of gentlemen who have really considered the question, and, inasmuch as we have made ourselves familiar with the literature on the subject, I take it there is no one here who will for one moment imagine that any form of government by a Parliament consisting of one House, could be designated a Federation. The individualism of the States after Federation is of as much interest to each colony as the free exercise of national powers is essential to that aggregation of colonies which we express in the term Federation. If the one trenches upon the other, then so far as the provinces assert their individuality overmuch the fear is an approach to a mere loose

confederation, not a true Federation. The fear on the other hand is, if we give the power to encroach, that is, if we represent the federated people only, and not the States in their entities, in our Federation, then day by day you will find the power to make this encroachment will be so gladly availed of that, day by day and year by year, the body called the Federation will more nearly approach the unified or "unitarian" system of government. We cannot adopt any form of government the tendency of which will be, as time goes on, to turn the Constitution towards unification on the one hand, and towards a loose confederacy on the other. (Hear, hear.) We must observe that principle. or else we do not observe the charge laid upon us by the Enabling Act, which lays on us the duty to frame a "Federal" Constitution under the Crown. So, therefore I take it there must be two Houses of Parliament, and in one of these Houses the principle of nationhood and the power and scope of the nation, as constituted and welded together into one by the act of Federation, will be expressed in the National Assembly, or House of Representatives, and in the other Chamber, whether it is called the Council of the States, the States Assembly, or the Senate, must be found not the ordinary checks of the Upper House, because such a Chamber will not be constituted for the purposes of an Upper House; but you must take all pains, not only to have a Parliament consisting of two Chambers, but to have it constituted in those two Chambers in such a way as to have the basic principle of Federation conserved in that Chamber which is representative of the rights of the States; that is, that each law of the Federation should have the assent of the States as well as of the federated people. In reference to this, I wish to illustrate what I said at the beginning—that I am endeavoring to refrain from pushing my views regarding some matters into definite expression in the terms of the resolutions. There are some of us who think we may secure an effective Federation, although we may not have equality of representatives of the States in the Senate. I am fully and definitely of opinion that the States should be repre- [P.22] starts here sented equally in the States Assembly. I hold that opinion because I believe that the object of that States Council is to preserve the individuality of the several States, and if it is once conceded that by having only one Chamber, and that elected on the proportionate basis of representation, you are so constituting your Parliament that you are in danger every day of derogating from the individuality of the States, it follows that there should be a Second Chamber for the preservation of that individuality in the most effective way possible. But if you must have two Chambers in your Federation, it is one consequence of the Federation that the Chamber that has in its charge the defence of State interests will also have in its hands powers in most matters co-ordinate with the other House. In this resolution I have gone on to say that the States Assembly shall consist of representatives of each colony, and I have not inserted the words which might be expected to be inserted, "an equal number of representatives," although in my opinion that should be the case:—

The States Assembly to consist of representatives of each colony, to hold office for such periods and be chosen in such manner as will best secure to that Chamber a perpetual existence, combined with definite responsibility to the people of the State which shall have chosen them.

These words do not in any way lay down any method of election to the Senate or Second Chamber. This is a matter that will be thrashed out in the Committee and upon the discussion of the Bill. There are some of us who think the only way to preserve definite responsibility is to have the election by the people of the quota of each State to the Senate. (Hear, hear.) There are others who think that could be well and best done by the election of the quota of each State by its Legislature; there are others, too, who think that there should be a difference in suffrage between the electorate which chooses the States Council and the National Assembly. It should not be our purpose now to lay down definite lines upon any one of those subjects, because they are really questions which should be decided only after we become acquainted with each others' views in this debate and upon the discussion in Committee, and when the Bill is being discussed. It is then, and then only, that we shall be fully in possession of the reasons which underlie each others' views, and be able to say how far we can make concessions, and how far we can demand concessions in return. (Hear, hear.) I have said further, "the National Assembly to be elected by districts formed on a population basis," and upon that perhaps there can be no denial. (Hear, hear.) The States Council or Senate will represent, so to speak," one State one vote," if the principle of equality be adopted, in the same way that the National Assembly will exist for dealing with the affairs of the nation as one welded identity. It is impossible to deal with the rights of the federated people through that Chamber in any other way than by representation proportionate to numbers. This was the principle adopted in the 1891 Bill, and I do not see that any variation of that principle can be adopted by this Convention or by any other. This motion says that the House of Representatives is "to possess the sole power of originating all Bills appropriating revenue or imposing taxation." In leaving the resolution in that form, I am not going the full length of my own opinion. I only put that forward as being essential because I believe there will be scarcely a member of this Convention who thinks that the power of amendment should be left to the Senate who will deny, if we are to have responsible government carried on, that the ultimate control of taxation and expenditure must be in the hands of the National Assembly. If we are to have what we understand as responsible government, I am of opinion that if you made similar provision to that made in the Bill of 1891 it would be scarcely possible to carry on government except in that way. I take it under the system of responsible government there is one power, and one only, that places it in the control of the representatives to demand the expulsion of the Government. Government goes on so long as funds are available. If the Executive becomes blind, or weak, or corrupt, what is the result? Obviously until funds are out they may remain in office, in spite of attempts to dislodge them. They remain in office if left in possession of the funds, by which they can defy the voice of the people, and therefore if expulsion is necessitated by the voice of the people through the House that expulsion can only be effectuated in one way, and that is by the denial of supplies. (Hear, hear.) Some people wondered why in the Bill of 1891 there was no actual statement that the Government was to be carried on under the form of responsible government, but words to express that intention are not to be found in any Constitution of the colonies. And why? Because the power of the 'purse is given to the people in the Constitution of the colonies, and the existence of that power of the purse enables the people to indicate distrust of the Government by the refusal of supplies at the moment it becomes bereft of the confidence of the people. Now of course these are mere elementary things I am stating—I quite recognise that but I must claim the indulgence of the House for stating them, because they introduce some of the most important considerations we shall have to deal with in our future labors. I have, of course, assented in the past to the proposition that the House of Representatives should have not only the sole power of origination, but the sole power of amendment; while in the Bill of 1891 there was a provision which empowered the Senate, at any stage of a Bill, not to amend the Bill, but to send a message to the other Chamber expressing its desire that certain amendments should be made, which message that other Chamber could deal with as it pleased. Nevertheless the result of the Convention of 1891 was to confine to the House of Representatives the sole power of origination and amendment of Tax Bills and Appropriation Bills. Now, that is my opinion, but I have not gone to its full length in this resolution because, while I know the immense majority, if not the whole, of this Convention will agree that the origination shall be left entirely with the House of Representatives, there is a very large number of our colleagues who are of opinion that the power of amendment should remain with the Senate. That is a question which, like others, may be dealt with finally hereafter, and I think I have gone far enough in the resolution at this preliminary stage. By this resolution we want to find out what are the views of our colleagues. Then the second sub-head of the resolution speaks of-

An Executive, consisting of a Governor-General, to be appointed by the Queen, and of such persons as from time to time may be appointed as his advisers.

I have used the words:

To be appointed by the Queen.

I am aware there is a difference of opinion about that, not perhaps a great one in this Convention, a difference of opinion, however, outside, because there are some who are in favor of the election of the Governor-General by our people. Now I have good ground for the position I have taken up.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

The Federal Enabling Act says this in section 7:

And the Convention shall be charged with the duty of framing for Australia a Federal Constitution under the Crown in the form of a Bill for enactment by the Imperial Parliament.

I have been actuated in the insertion of the words:

To be appointed by the Queen,

by that section of the Federal Enabling Act. It seems to me that if we are not to act in antagonism to the instructions given by the Act we should provide for the by that section of the Federal Enabling Act. It seems to me that if we are not to act in antagonism to the instructions given by the Act we should provide for the appointment of the Governor-General by the Queen. I am aware that it is said the election of the Governor-General by the people is quite compatible with the relations which exist between us and the mother-country. I am, however, not of that opinion; because I think it would mean the sundering of the strongest, and perhaps almost the last, bond which exists between us and the mother-country.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

If we are to elect our Governor-General, and to appoint the man who looms large in party politics in our own country, we shall be placing in the position a man, who by the necessities of the case, and by the facts of his career, must be a partisan. I think if we continue under the system of responsible government, which is the system we have learned to handle, and know best how to handle-if we continue to go on with responsible government, and yet elect our Governor-General-it will follow that by electing a man from one side, we shall be electing a man who may have a strong temptation to the thwarting of one Ministry and unfairly assisting another. That is not consistent with our position under the Crown. We should be nearer the condition of the South American republics. We should be a republic in everything but name, and if we should reduce ourselves to that nothing would remain for us but, as it was once euphoniously put by a Victorian politician—

To cut the painter entirely.

For if the substance of our connection is gone, there is nothing to be added but com

Mr. PEACOCK:

We shall all be unanimous on that point.

Mr. BARTON:

Then the resolution says—

And of such persons as from time to time may be appointed as his advisers.

There was a temptation there to insert

His responsible advisers.

But I think, if I may say so, I have acted very cautiously and wisely in leaving out such a term. Strong as I am myself that the form of government we should continue to have under Federation is responsible government, and strongly as I shall endeavor to urge it when the right time comes, I do not think it is right to bind the Convention at this stage. That, again, is a matter to be decided by all of us upon the opinions and arguments we hear, and we must recollect we are not framing a Constitution-so far as we are framing one at all-and that we are not legislating-so far as we are legislating at all-for a day. If not for all time, we are making a structure which will last in its substance for centuries. There may be those among us, or who will succeed us, who may think that some other form of government but responsible government should be adopted. It may be well for us to have regard for that in our Constitution. While I think we should frame our Constitution in such a way as we did indeed frame it in 1891, so that almost the only way of bringing it into effect is by way of responsible government, still, throughout this Convention, we must listen to the views and opinions of those who wish to substitute some other reform for responsible government. I for one, as I do not wish my boots made in Germany, do not want my Constitution made in Switzerland. I think our British forms of Government, those we have adopted and adapted, are best fitted for ourselves. Others may be of a different opinion, and in order that before we ultimately decide we may listen to what others have to say, I have not obtruded my views into this part of the resolution. The last portion of the resolution says:

There shall be a Supreme Federal Court, which shall also be the High Court of Appeal for each colony in the Federation.

That, again, I take as an essential, I do not think we shall find more than one or two dissentients to that proposition in the whole Convention. It seems to me that if we are to have Federation in all its strength and power we are forced to the conclusion that the power which will best hold the Federation together, and will best preserve the honor of the Constitution, is the peaceful arbitrament of a Federal Court. What do we find elsewhere? Where countries are in communication with each other, and differences arise, there are diplomatic negotiations. Sometimes there may be arbitration. On the failure of these there is only one form of arbitration, the arbitrament of blood. The difference in countries which have Federation is that, instead of being sundered by war upon differences occurring, the Federation possesses not only a continuous tribunal of arbitration, but it possesses a Supreme Court, a body which shall decide in the peaceful and calm atmosphere of a court, not under surroundings of perturbed imagination or of infuriated party politics, those questions of dispute which arise, and which must arise, under a Federal Constitution, and many of these questions are precisely the questions which will arise between State and State when conducted by separate Governments, questions of boundaries between States, questions of the validity of the laws of the States, and other questions which may arise, and which could only then be ultimately resolved by warfare. With Federation, by so much as you promote the resort to a just tribunal to settle these differences in the calm judicial manner of which I have spoken, by so much do you take away the cause of secession, and by so much do you promote the indissolubility of the terms of the Union. One of the strongest guarantees for the continuance and indestructibility of the Federation is that there should be some body of this kind constituted which, instead of allowing the States to fly to secession because they cannot get justice in any other way, will enable them to settle their differences in a calm judicial atmosphere. What seems to me to be the first function of a Federal Supreme Court is not that it should be a High Court of Appeal, but that it should settle State difficulties. Most of those who discuss this question discuss it from the view that it is simply to be constituted as a Court of Appeal. In that respect it may be valuable, and may save litigants from being dragged thousands and thousands of miles to a distant tribunal, or from being obliged, without the means or opportunity of attending that tribunal, to wait here and see their best interests destroyed. Its chief value will be that it will be an arbiter in disputed questions after Federation has been brought about, and will have the result of preventing the Federal Government being an arbiter, which would mean that one of the parties to the dispute would be a judge in its own cause; and it will substitute for heated discussion, under circumstances less likely to promote a possible determination, discussions of that kind which makes for the solidarity of the Union rather than for its disruption. I need go no further in my attempt to explain the purport of these resolutions. I have resisted all temptations to make long speech in doing so, as I must not forget that very similar resolutions were discussed in 1891, and must not fail to remember that there are in the hands of hon. members full reports of the discussion; and in fact that the reasons upon which these resolutions are based are already in the hands of hon. members and I should not be doing justice to them if I were to unnecessarily elaborate those reasons. I am content to move these resolutions in what, for such an occasion, is a short speech. I ask that they should be accepted as containing proposals which are essential in the framing of a Constitution, but which do not contain all the necessary arbitrary definitions, which will be best thrashed out at a later stage in the light of fuller discussion, and when we will have had the opportunity of knowing each other's opinions, and of modifying our own wherever it may be found necessary. I have already described the further procedure I hope to base on these resolutions, which I trust will include a resolution to refer them to the committees which will be formed. They do not acquire finality by being passed now; the Convention will have the opportunity in the committee of pushing these resolutions to the most definite conclusions. That, I submit, is the right stage for all that kind of work to be done. Our work in the meantime is to familiarise ourselves with each others' views.

Mr. PEACOCK:

You must admit that you have not given us much of your views. If the debate is proceeded with in the same strain we will not know much of each other's views.

Mr. BARTON:

I have stated what I consider to be indispensable in the formation of a Union; but if it is necessary to proceed further I shall be prepared to state with more definiteness what my views are. I do not think I lacked definiteness when I said that the Federal Parliament should have embodied within it a Council of the States, which should be formed on the basis of equal representation of each State. If members want any expression of opinion on my part, I may say that the best way in which to appoint that Senate is as is done in Switzerland, and here I am taking a piece of a constitution made in Switzerland after all. (Laughter.) With regard to this question, I am of opinion that the States themselves could not do better than elect their own quota to the States Council in their own way. As far as my individual efforts will go in my own colony, I may say I am in favor of it being done in this way. Although each State has the right to dictate its own suffrage, inasmuch as this House of the States is to be representative of the State entities there should be no question of locality. I was in 1891 in favor of the various Parliaments electing their own quota to the States Council, but I have had some experience in observing some elections in my own colony since, which has convinced me that the elections should not be by the local legislatures, if you are to have payment of members in the Federal Parliament, or the appointment of any committee which is to be paid by the local legislature. It is likely to lead to transactions which we would be far better without. I am of opinion, therefore, as far as my own colony is concerned, and I would suggest that we should elect our quota to the Senate in some such way as that in which we stand elected now to this Convention. I believe that we should form the colony into one constituency, as the very idea of locality in the election of a body which is to represent the States as separate entities in the States Council is a total abnegation of the motive principle. I am of opinion therefore, as far as my own colony is concerned, that it should take early steps to pass a law after we have federated, to elect its own quota as one constituency. I am of opinion with regard to the suffrage of the federal colonies that that is a matter to be dealt with by the Federation, and I will say why. If anybody were to attempt to dictate to the people of New South Wales, Victoria, or any other colony the mode in which they should frame their suffrage, or the way in which they should elect their representatives, that person would be laughed to scorn.

Dr. COCKBURN:
That is right enough.

Mr. BARTON:
We propose to frame a free nation, but if each State has not the absolute power to frame its own suffrage it would not be free.

Dr. COCKBURN:
In its own affairs, certainly.
Mr. BARTON:

That does not involve an interference in the suffrage of one colony by another colony. One colony may have a £10 suffrage, another a universal suffrage, or an adult suffrage, and there should be no pretence on the part of the Federation to dictate to any colony that it should abandon its suffrage for its own Legislature, or should compel it to adopt the system, say, of one man one vote. The colonies could not dictate to the Federation as to how it should adopt its suffrage, just as the Federation would have not the slightest right to dictate to the colonies. Their rights are correlative, and there cannot be the slightest denial of that. I am of opinion, therefore, that the first Federal Parliament should be elected on the basis of the franchise at present existing in each colony, and after that time the federated Parliament should have the sole right of framing its own suffrage. Now, I am not going to weary hon. members by any further elaboration of my views. Another reason is this, my views are to be found in debates which have already taken place, and I do not suppose there is a member in this Convention who is not aware, either by conversation or by public speaking, of my views. I am also animated by this idea in not endeavoring to take up time too long, by the fact that there are a number of us here who were members of the Convention of 1891, and some of us occupy positions which will force upon us the necessity of speaking. It is equally incumbent upon us not to make our speeches too long because there are members who were not members of the 1891 Convention, and who have been sent in with the others to form a uniform body. Since the election of the representatives of 1891 they are virtually new blood in the matter of Federation, and I think the fairest play that could be extended by us to them is to make our speeches as short as possible, so that the time available may be fully occupied by them in the utterance of their views. I ask hon. members, if I have not fully explained my own views, to remember they are well known, and if I forbear from fuller explanation it is because I think it is far more important than that I should speak that those who have not been heard should have the opportunity of being heard fully in this debate on the essentials of Federation. Holding this opinion, and without the least endeavor to commit this Convention, and with the hope that no amendment may be introduced to bring a matter before us at a time that is premature, I bring these resolutions forward.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I second the motion.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I ask if these resolutions will be put separately or in one motion.

Mr. BARTON:
If the slightest desire to have these resolutions put seriatim is expressed, I, as the mover, shall be only too happy to accede to it. I think, however, they should be discussed in globo, and put afterwards seriatim.

The PRESIDENT:
I will put the resolutions together in order that the discussion may proceed upon them generally. I take it that is the wish of the Convention. I propose afterwards to put them seriatim to the vote.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I feel considerable diffidence in rising to discuss resolutions which I only saw for the first time at 2 o'clock to-day, but at the same time, as I understand it is the wish of the Convention that our deliberations should be concluded as soon as possible, I venture to speak concerning the various matters which have been so ably and clearly put before us by Mr. Barton. I understand that it is the wish of this Convention that no amendments should be moved to the power of originating all Bills appropriating revenue or imposing taxation."

But, in accord with what I understand to be the wish of the Convention, I shall not move any amendment, although I shall express my opinion in reference to the subject-matter to which these words refer. We are here to form a Federal Constitution, and we must not lose sight of the fact that there are very essential differences between any Federal Constitution and any Constitution formed for the government of one country or one colony upon a unification system. Now, the first question that suggests itself to my mind is this: Is the commonly called responsible government system-the Cabinet system-consistent with true Federation? I know that in the debates that have taken place in these colonies during the past six years it has, to a considerable extent, been assumed that we will at all events commence with the Cabinet system. There is one notable exception to that view, and that exception is a gentleman whose opinions are of considerable weight. Sir Samuel Griffiths has said-

If it is accepted as a fundamental rule of the Federation that the law shall not be altered without the consent of the majority of the people, and also of a majority of the States, both speaking by their representatives, why should not the same principle be applied to the no less important branch of the State authority—the Executive Government?

And he goes on to say:

One mode is suggested by the American Constitution, which requires that the first appointment of the Ministers of the State must be made with the approval of the Senate.

Now, to this point—a most important point, it seems to me—I venture to direct the earnest attention of the members of this Convention. I have spent some considerable time in arriving at a conclusion upon this point, because I am fully impressed with the futility of paper Constitutions. I am fully impressed with the absolute necessity that wherever it is possible we should adopt that form of government under which we have lived, that we should adopt that form of government which is engrained in the minds of the people, and that whenever any modifications are proposed such modifications should be genetically connected with the form of government with which we are familiar. A Constitution should be of historical growth, and not be manufactured. Although I am fully impressed with that idea, I am afraid that if we adopt this Cabinet system of Executive it will either kill Federation or Federation will kill it; because we cannot conceal from ourselves that the very fundamental essence of the Cabinet system of Executive is the predominating power of one Chamber. We know that from experience in all these colonies. We know, too, that it would be impossible for any Government to carry on if they were obliged to have majorities in both chambers. What was it that led up to the Federation of Canada? Before the resolutions were adopted in the Canadian Convention, which led up to the Federation, there existed state of affairs which throws a lurid light upon this question. Upper and Lower Canada had been united in one Government, but the divergence of race and religion of the two peoples, the French and the English, who constituted the population of the two Canadas, were so great, that it brought about in effect two Governments and two Parliaments. No Government could exist which had not a majority of the French people, and had not also a majority of the English people. There were in effect two Premiers, two Attorneys-General, and two Houses. The result was that between 1862 and 1864 five Ministries existed, each existing for a short period, and each utterly unable to do anything, and it was this state of affairs which led to the two Canadas desiring a Federation rather than a unification. Will not the same state of things prevail here if it is provided that a responsible form of government in this new Federation should be obliged to have majorities in both Chambers? If they are not obliged to have majorities in both Chambers, and if one Chamber is to be the predominant power in the Federation, what becomes of the whole principle of Federation? Supposing the Executive is the creation—because the Executive is in essence the creation of one Chamber of Parliament in all our colonies—of the House of Representatives in this new Federation, what will be the result? It seems to me, undoubtedly, that the powers of the Senate will wane until it becomes only a dignified appendage of the House of the Representatives. That is not what we want; at all events, it is not what, I want. I do not think it would be safe for any of those amongst us to desire that State rights should be fully recognised, but desire that we should retain those powers of self-government which we now possess, minus the particular matters which will be handed over to the Federal Government. It would not be safe for any of those to enter into a form of Government in which the Executive was the creation of one branch of the Legislature. Such a state of things appears to me to be utterly incompatible with the very essence of Federation. Now, sir, is it possible for us to learn lessons from other countries? There are in existence at this moment Federations in Germany, Switzerland, America, and, to a limited extent, in Canada, without counting other countries, concerning which we know but little. Do we find that in any one of these Federations the Cabinet system of Executive exists? We certainly do not. We know there is a great tendency amongst all of us to have a copy of systems of government with which we are familiar. We are now assembled here to adopt a form of government which is absolutely different from those forms of government under which we live, and, to import into a federal form of government the Cabinet system, is to form a patchwork Constitution, and try an experiment which has never been tried before.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Not in Canada.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Will that hon. gentleman for a moment contend that Canada is a Federation?

Mr. ISAACs:
Yes.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Can a system of government in which one branch of the Legislature, which is supposed to represent the rights of the State, is nominated by a successful partisan leader be a true Federation? As Mr. Goldwin Smith observes, the barefaced proposition that one branch of the Legislature should be nominated by the leader of a party is almost incredible, when we consider that Canada proposed to form a federal form of government. In Canada, through its creation, the Executive appoints the dominant party in one House, and also appoints the Lieutenant-Governor and the judges in the other House. The Ministry have the power of vetoing the Bills of the Colonial Legislatures.
Mr. FRASER:
And so they have in New South Wales.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
The whole of my arguments do not apply in the slightest degree to a unitarian form of government. In Canada the dominant party is represented by the Ministry, who have the power of vetoing the acts of the colonial Legislature, and they have the power of appointing judges and Lieutenant-Governors of the provinces. I am quite sure that no one who has studied this question of a federal form of government will contend that the essence of Federation exists in Canada, and, judging by the newspaper reports, the state of affairs that exists there is anything but satisfactory. Cannot we obtain lessons from institutions of other countries? I am quite willing to admit the advantages of a Cabinet system, and I am also quite willing to admit the great disadvantages that have shown themselves in other forms of the Executive. In the American form of the Executive, what we would call the Ministry are altogether disassociated from Parliament, and that system has not worked well. As probably all the members of this Convention are aware, in America, the Speaker practically performs the duties of the Premier with regard to legislation; and, as all those who have read Mr. Bryce's work will know, great disadvantages have arisen from the American form of Executive. We find that in the Swiss form of government (which, by-the-by, was proposed two or three times by the Ministry of South Australia as a model to adopt even in this colony, where we are not confronted with the difficulties of a federal form of government), the Executive is elected directly by Parliament, and not by one branch of Parliament, but by two branches. Now, I do not wish in any way to dogmatise on this question, because I am perfectly aware of the great difficulties surrounding it. I have only thrown out these suggestions for consideration by members of this Convention, so that when we get to closer quarters the matter may be more carefully considered, and discussed more in detail, and so that we shall not assume as a matter of course that we should adopt that form of Executive with which we are so familiar.

Mr. FRASER:
What is your proposal?

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I make no proposal for substitution at the present time.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Do without an Executive?

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I make no proposal. I am aware, as has been pointed out by Mr. Barton, that we should keep all our minds open before we arrive at definite conclusions concerning the problems we are met to solve. I am pointing out to the members of this Convention how absolutely inconsistent it is that the first principle of Federation should be that the responsible Ministry form of Executive should exist.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Tell us what to do.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Well, if I am asked to give a definite opinion-(hear, hear)-I think we will do best to adopt the Swiss form of Executive. (Hear, hear.) My honorable friend Mr. Barton says he does not want his boots made in Germany, and he does not want his Constitution made in Switzerland.

Mr. PEACOCK:
He is a true Australian native.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Now I want my boots made where I find they fit me best.

Mr. BARTON:
You won't find that in Germany, will you?

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I don't know. If I have in any way shown to the members of this Convention that this important matter is one which should be fully discussed, I venture to think I have done some slight good in bringing this matter forward. (Hear, hear.) Concerning another important question, which, by-the-by, is only vaguely referred to in theme resolutions-the relative power of the two Chambers over our proposed Constitution-I cannot help thinking that it is extremely difficult for some people to get out of their heads the idea that the Senate is a kind of glorified Upper House; they cannot appreciate the fact that the Senate represents the people as fully as the House of Representatives.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It depends how it is elected.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
They can't appreciate the fact that the House of Representatives represents the people grouped as a nation, and that the Senate represents the people grouped in States, but that they each represent the people. If that is so, why should Money Bills originate in one Chamber more than another?

Mr. WISE:
For convenience only.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
If there is a question of convenience, why should they not originate in the Senate?

Mr. WISE:

Because the Treasurer won't probably sit in the Senate.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

That is a matter which has to be decided. In the German Constitution there is no Treasurer, there is a Committee of Finance, and that Committee of Finance is appointed by the States Council, the Bundesrath, and not by the House of Representatives, the Reichstag, at all. So that if we may look for any information in the German Constitution we need not necessarily arrive at the conclusion that the Treasurer is to sit in the House of Representatives. There is no Lower House, and there is no Upper House. I ask—"Why should we assume that one?

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

Therefore, as statesmen, we must look ahead. If we want a federal form of government to continue, and if we wish to prevent a nominal Federation from becoming an actual amalgamation, we must look at the forces behind, and we must give those powers to the Senate which will enable it to hold its own with the House of Representatives. I shall not detain this Convention any longer. I have spoken on the spur of the moment, and I am quite willing to fall in with the opinion expressed by the Hon. Mr. Barton, that we, who were members of the Convention of 1891, and who have expressed our opinions not only orally but by writing, shall allow those members who have not had similar opportunities greater time in which they may put their views before us, because our views are known. I hope that we will approach all these matters in a spirit of compromise. I am quite sure that nothing I have said can be asserted to be in a dogmatic spirit. I have shown what seem to me difficulties, and I do not even wish to suggest a solution of those difficulties. I shall be pleased to do so only after other members have expressed their views on the question, because I hope they may give me more light upon the subject, and that any opinion I may express now may be altered by hearing the views of the other members. (Cheers.)

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WISE:

I feel assured that the desire is that this Convention should proceed with this debate. At the same time it can be easily understood that there is a disinclination to speak on matters of this kind without due consideration. If there is no one ready to go on I suggest that we should adjourn, so that we may have time to consider the admirable speeches to which we have listened.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
These resolutions were only submitted to the House at 2 o'clock, and I shall undertake to move the adjournment of the House. I do not think that the House can be blamed for asking for time for consideration of such important resolutions and speeches. It is unfair to ask members to speak to such resolutions or to reply to the speeches made. I therefore move:
That the debate be adjourned.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I point out, on a question of order, that the debate will come on in the ordinary way at 10.30 tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT:
We have carried a resolution to sit till 5.30, and under ordinary circumstances I should not feel justified without a suspension of the Standing Orders in Putting a resolution which would have a contrary effect. However, I take it that the wish of the Convention is that the Convention should adjourn.

Mr. BARTON:
I move that the debate be adjourned.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
Convention adjourned at 3.30 p.m.
Wednesday March 24, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITION.

Mr. BRUNKER:
I have the honor to present a petition from the Womanhood Suffrage League of New South Wales.

The petition is respectfully worded, and ends with the following prayer:—
Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray—That your honorable Convention will so frame the Federal Constitution of Australasia that the right to vote for representatives to the Federal Parliament shall be possessed by women and men without any distinction or disqualification on the ground of sex.

I move that the petition be received and read.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

The CLERK read the petition, which was as follows:—
To the Hon. the President and the hon. members of the Federal Convention of 1897. The 23rd day of March, 1897.

The humble petition of the members of the Womanhood Suffrage League of New South Wales respectfully showeth:—
1. That in framing a Federal Constitution for Australasia, the determination of the persons to whom the Federal Franchise shall be granted is a question of great importance, and your honorable Convention will probably consider whether or not such franchise shall be uniform throughout all the colonies.

2. That at the present time in New South Wales, Victoria, Western Australia, and Tasmania, women do not possess the right to vote for candidates for election as members of the Parliaments of the said colonies, whilst in respect of South Australia much right has been conferred upon the women of that colony, and that therefore the women of the colonies first mentioned are under a disability from which the women of South Australia have been relieved.

3. That (as the Hon. Geo. Reid, Premier of N.S.W., has said in his article on the "Outlook of Federation"), "In this matter the taxpayers have much more at stake than the politicians," and that the women of the various colonies are taxpayers under their respective Governments, and will be... taxpayers under any Federal Government which may be established.

4. That women are patriotic, and law-abiding citizens, taking an equal part in the religious and moral development of the the people, and doing more than half of the educational, charitable, and philanthropic work of society as at present constituted—that, therefore, whatever federal franchise shall be conferred upon or possessed by male citizens should also be conferred upon or possessed by women.

5. That, in view of the facts and considerations abovementioned, we are justified in appealing to

Your honorable Convention to so frame the Federal Constitution as to give the women of all the colonies a voice in choosing the representatives of the Federal Parliament, so that United Australia may become a true democracy resting upon the will of the whole and not half of the people.

Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray-

That your honorable Convention will so frame the Federal Constitution for Australasia that the right to vote for representatives to the Federal Parliament shall be possessed by women and men without any distinction or disqualification on the ground of sex.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray, &c.

Signed on behalf of the members of the Womanhood Suffrage League of New South Wales.

M. S. WOLSTENHOLME, President.
ROSE SCOTT, Hon. Gen. Secretary.
ADA F. GRIFFITHS, Vice-President.
NELLIE ALMA MARTEF, Recording Secretary.
ELIZA H. MANIER, Hon. Treasurer.
CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I desire to give notice that to-morrow I will move:
That the Hon. Sir Richard Chaffey Baker be appointed Chairman of Committees of the Whole of this Convention.

RETURNS-RAILWAYS.

Mr. GLYNN:
I beg to move notice of motion No. 1:—
That a return be laid before this Convention showing-

I. The estimated capital cost in 1896 on miles open and completed of the railways of each of the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Western Australia.

II. The basis on which such capital cost has in each case been estimated.

III. The capital cost of the rolling-stock of each of such colonies.
IV. The percentage for each colony of the net railway revenue on the capital cost thus ascertained.

V. Estimates similar to those mentioned in paragraphs 1, 3, and 4 for each of the years 1892, 1893, and 1894.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Before that is put I suggest to add after "rolling-stock" the words "in use," because this motion will embrace all the rolling-stock which has been laid on the railways, and I imagine that is not what is required.

Mr. GRANT:

I would like to point out to Sir William Zeal that it will be difficult to get the capital cost of the rolling-stock in use, and therefore it would be better to allow the motion to stand as it is, because I do not know any means by which the capital cost of the rolling-stock in use can be obtained in sufficient time for the purposes of the Convention.

Amendment negatived.

On the question that the motion be agreed to,

Mr. REID:

I think we have almost arrived at the time when we should have some understanding as to how these returns should be prepared. I am in a most amiable mood to-day, but it does seem to me that whilst we are passing resolutions which will involve the preparation of very troublesome returns we have not decided upon any source for the authority of these returns. I understand we have some statists in attendance, and they may be able to agree upon the information, but if they disagree I do not know how we are to get at the return. It is merely a difficulty I suggest to the gentlemen who are moving these resolutions.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

REPORTS ON BREAK OF GAUGE AND RAILWAY AMALGAMATION.

Motion by Mr. GLYNN:

That the Clerk be requested to obtain and lay on the table any reports presented by the Railways Commissioners of the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, and Western Australia on the questions:

I. Abolition of the break of gauge.

II. Amalgamation under a federal body or otherwise of the railways of all or any two of the said colonies.

Mr. REID:

What are we to understand by the term "presented"? Does the motion allude to reports presented to the Parliaments or the Governments? Of course we know the reports have been presented to the Parliaments, and I suppose these are referred to.

Mr. GLYNN:
Presented to the Government.

Mr. FRASER:
They are private.

Mr. REID:
That raises a difficulty. A Government may be in possession of confidential reports from the Railways Commissioners, and I apprehend they are not likely to send them in in response to a resolution of this sort. However, I have no objections to a resolution of this kind being passed, because I do not think it will come to much. (Laughter.)

Mr. BARTON:
To make the return more useful would it not be advisable to also include all reports presented with reference to the question of differential rates, or preferential rates as they are called? It seems to me that it will be important information when we approach the consideration of the railway question. I would suggest to amend the question by adding as a third sub-head the words-

III. The existence of preferential or differential rates.

Mr. FRASER:
Are not some of these reports private? I know it is so in our colony; I know also that members have been refused such information.

Dr. QUICK:
I think the suggestion is a most valuable one. I have been endeavoring, without success, to obtain official information on the subject in our own colony.

Mr. BARTON:
We could furnish some, I know.

Dr. QUICK:
I know the Government of New South Wales has been more liberal in this respect than the Government of Victoria. For State reasons this information was refused me during my campaign. I have since ascertained that the objection then entertained will be withdrawn, and I believe my friend the Premier of Victoria will be willing to concur in the presentation of any reasonable return or reasonable memoranda. I do not mean memoranda which would entail the revealing of State or departmental secrets, but public information which will be of use.

Mr. HOLDER:
About two years ago a meeting was held in Melbourne of the Railways Commissioners representing the different colonies to discuss the question of preferential rates. Would it not be possible to have a report of those proceedings, as it would place the whole matter before us in the clearest possible light, and be of the utmost service in discussing the subject? I would address my question to the Premiers present.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

With regard to that conference, as far as my recollection goes, it was a conference of the Railways Commissioners of the different colonies, and they then gave confidential reports to the Ministries of the various colonies. I should say unhesitatingly that it would be very unwise for the Governments to disclose the matters which were then discussed and the confidential reports which were then given by the Commissioners of the various Governments. We could not then come to any understanding as to what should be done, and the whole matter lapsed. It may be hereafter necessary if we do not federate to have the matter again discussed, and if we disclose any confidential reports it may place one or other of the colonies in a false position. I have no doubt that the Premiers of the

Mr. BARTON:

What I meant by the amendment was that the reports with regard to the differential or preferential rates should be of the same nature as those relating to the amalgamation of the railways and the abolition of the break of gauge. There have been laid before the Parliaments reports of a public character.

Mr. GLYNN:

I have not tabled this motion without examining as to the possibility of the compilation of the reports, and the difficulties are not of a serious character. It is this that has induced me to table the motion. Some of the matters -part 1, for instance, the abolition of the break of gauge-are included in reports which have been presented to Parliament. Some of them, at all events, are public, and it would be useful to the Convention if these reports were placed at the disposal of members. As to the second portion-the amalgamation under a federal body or otherwise of the railways of all or any two of the said colonies-of course my motion only takes the shape of a request that the clerk-and a request which amounts to a mandate as far as the clerk is concerned-should get them from the various Governments. If there is any objection it would be fatal to my motion being carried into effect, but it would be a great convenience to the members to have them. Of course the amalgamation of - the railways will be one of the important points raised at the Convention, and where there is no obligation of secrecy it would be extremely convenient if these reports were laid before us.
Mr. Barton's amendment agreed to.
Main question, as amended, resolved in the affirmative.

FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.

Debate resumed on resolutions by Mr. Barton (vide page 17).

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I am afraid I leaped myself last night or yesterday afternoon in a trap by want of parliamentary knowledge. (Laughter.) When I moved the adjournment of the debate I forgot the rule that the person who moved the adjournment was supposed to open the debate next day. I agree with Mr. Barton that we went to hear the opinions of the gentlemen who were not in the Convention of 1891 rather than the opinions of those who had the opportunity to express their views then. However, following the parliamentary rule, I willingly accept the task which I made for myself. It always appears to be a very difficult thing for a man who has occupied the position of Speaker of one of the Legislatures for a very long time, and whose duty is to listen rather than to indulge in oratory, to be suddenly called upon to indulge in oratory, and I promise the Convention that I am not going to weary them, as hon. members elsewhere weary the Speaker and Chairman of Committees, by long speeches. I shall support the resolutions. Originally I was under the impression that these resolutions were not required, until I heard the speech of the hon. representative of Victoria, Mr. Trenwith. I agree with him that it is desirable that we should show to the public that we have taken every step to shape the Bill which will have ultimately to be referred to the people for their consideration, and their approval or condemnation. Therefore I think it is wise that these resolutions were initiated, and in the form of the origin of the Bill which will ultimately be considered. I have heard some representatives say it is unnecessary upon the resolutions to express their opinions as to details, that the resolutions are so vague that they may be fully accepted; but I would remind these representatives who hold such opinions that at a later stage we will be called upon to appoint committees to deal with the various matters in these resolutions, and I think it is essential that the committees should gather from the debates what are the opinions of hon. members. I therefore hope that the new members to the Convention will readily express their opinions and not hesitate, whatever the length of time they take, to give free expression if they wish to do so. I would remind the Convention that the eyes of Australia are upon them, and we are required to work for the purpose of obtaining information to lead the people to a right position in reference to this very great question. The question of Federation is not a new one, for when the first free Constitution was granted to New South Wales I have no hesitation in saying that had communication then between the old country and the colony of New South Wales been as efficient as it is to-day the probabilities are that there would have been introduced into that Constitution, which was the groundwork of every subsequent Constitution, the power of Federation. That was then suggested by the Colonial Secretary of the day in England, but owing to the possibility of delay the matter was laid on one side, and I think unfortunately put aside, because if the power that I speak of had been given in the Constitution of New South Wales to produce Federation, the trouble, the anxiety, and the heart-burning which have arisen over this question would not exist to the same extent as they do at the present day. As a native of the mother-country of Australia I rejoice indeed to see that the proposal of Dr. Quick, the hon. representative of Victoria, has been in these latter days given effect to. He was the first, I think, to suggest and give real vitality to this question; he it was who proposed that the people should be asked to take a hand in the game, and not politicians alone. The condemnation of the Convention of 1891 and the jealousy which arose over its work was largely due to the fact that the people themselves had no direct dealing with that Convention. Had the members been elected by the people, and had the Convention come to the same conclusions as it arrived at ultimately, the people would have recognised that the members of the Convention were speaking as their direct representatives rather than as the representatives of the Executives of the day. In most of the colonies the Premier of the day nominated the members to that Convention, and, with few exceptions, the nominations of the Executive of the day were accepted. As I heard a representative of Victoria say the other day, there has been a great deal of misunderstanding with regard to the work of the 1891 Convention, and there has been a great deal of opposition to it, directly arising from ignorance of what was done and partly from the fact that the people had not an opportunity of dealing with the matter themselves; and I think Australia ought to be thankful to Dr. Quick, the hon. representative of Victoria, for having brought about what I say unhesitatingly is the present constitution of this Convention. With regard to these resolutions, I think it is a foregone conclusion that we shall pass them, and, although this will be done, it is most advisable for members to give expression to their views on those details which will ultimately arise in the Bill and come before the committees which will be appointed. I favor every one of these resolutions, but I do not say that when the time comes to consider the details which will necessarily be evolved in the committees I will be found voting for every one of these details. I want a Constitution to be given to Australia which will be liberal in its character, and which will not at the beginning produce heart-burnings or discontent amongst the people. The people must deal with the conditions of their own making, and they could only do that by means of this Convention. We have a great work before us, and I am thankful we have a great leader to carry on that work. I am thankful that one who took part in the debates of 1891, and who has since never lost sight of that Convention, although a very busy man in private life, and who has kept the question before our colony, and has in fact assisted to keep it before the other Australian Colonies, has had the great honor conferred upon him by this Convention of being its leader. I am inclined to think there is a little selfishness on the part of hon. members in having chosen Mr. Barton as the leader. (Hear, hear.) They found in him a ready and genial leader, one prepared to undertake and to willingly carry out the work. In selecting him they have conferred an honor on him and on the mother of the Australian colonies. I do not intend to express any opinion as to the form this Federation should take. I think it is very desirable that representatives speaking now for the first time, who have not had an opportunity of dealing with this great question, should do so. We may be told-for I have seen it hinted in some of the newspapers-that members of this Convention are to be attacked for opinions which they have given utterance to elsewhere. Now, I have sitting on my left an hon. gentleman who was very much against what was done in 1891, and I think that hon. gentleman was actuated by motives which influenced hundreds and thousands of others in the colony. He felt that the people were not doing the work, and that it was a work which the people ought to do for themselves. I do not care what opinions Mr. Reid may have expressed in the past. It is immaterial for the purposes of this Convention. We find him staunch, earnest, and loyal to the cause of Federation at the present time. In New South Wales we look upon him as having repented of his sins, and having made a full confession, and we have forgiven him, and I would ask the members of this Convention to do likewise.

Mr. REID:
I think there has been a general repentance. (Laughter.)

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I know that the two questions which will require the gravest consideration at the hands of the Convention are the question of finance and the question of our railways. When these are thrashed out, as I hope they will be, by the most experienced Premiers and by the best financial men which this Convention can furnish to these committees, we will have ample matter to discuss, and then we will have an opportunity of discussing details which are not available at the present time. I feel very pleased as a representative from the old country to find the earnestness with which this question has been taken up in South Australia-to find the earnestness with which it has been taken up in the other colonies; and, above all things, I am delighted that, even at the last hour, Queensland has expressed a desire to have a share in the labors of this Convention. (Hear, hear.) I feel sure that, if Federation is brought about, all the Australian Colonies, sooner or later, will have to come into it. It was, therefore, essential that all the Australian Colonies should be represented in the Convention, and even the remote colony of New Zealand might have done good work to the Convention if she had chosen to send forward some of her public men as representatives at the present time. They need not ultimately have come in. The checks which exist under our Federal Act are such that no colony will be bound by what is done here at the present time. But it is well that every colony should have an opportunity of assisting to frame the Constitution which, I feel sure, if two or three of the colonies agree to all will have ultimately to be bound by.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I am pleased indeed that the honorable the Speaker of New South Wales has told us that in dealing with these resolutions we are not, and ought not, to be debarred from dealing with questions of detail, because I feel that if the committees we are to appoint are to do their duty properly they ought to be able to know the minds of the majority of the representatives here assembled, and, that being so, I feel much regret that the three gentlemen who have already spoken have not given us the benefit of their past experience.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
And the great knowledge they undoubtedly possess, and that they seem to desire that those who are comparatively new to this movement should express their views without having had an opportunity of hearing from those who have had a much larger experience in dealing with these matters than many of us who are present. But as they have taken that position, then I think it devolves upon those who have endeavored to make themselves acquainted with the facts to place, as far as possible, before the representatives their views with regard to matters of detail which have hereafter to be dealt with. The Hon. the Speaker of New South Wales has said that we ought not to attack our friend Mr. Reid for his past opinions. We have come as representatives to this Convention, and will have the benefit of hearing the views of other members, and no member ought to be attacked should he see reason to change his views and should he see that the arguments he has had the opportunity of hearing have shown him that his preconceived views were wrong. The very object of adjourning for four months is for the purpose of getting as much light as we possibly can, and if we change our views we are perfectly justified in doing so. I also regret that Mr. Barton, in bringing forward these resolutions, has not dealt with them in more detail than he appears to have considered wise. However, perhaps it is beneficial that these resolutions should be somewhat vague, because we can then pass them unanimously and have no recorded votes. I do not altogether agree with that, for seeing that we have the right to change our views, it would have been better if we had had some distinct statements which would form a foundation on which to base the various arguments. The first consideration which we all ought to keep before us is to accomplish Federation, if we possibly can do justice to the various colonies we are sent here to represent. We ought to bear this fact in mind: we are not legislating here; we are merely negotiating. Whatever we do we have to take back to the respective colonies, and their Parliaments will take opportunities of discussing the matter and suggesting amendments, and then, having discussed those amendments and having given them the full weight they deserve, we have to go back to those who sent us here and ask them if they are prepared to agree to what we have done. We are free and open in this matter, knowing that we are not passing an Act of Parliament binding the people we represent. One point to keep in view is that we ought to deal with all matters in a fair and equitable manner, and take care that we properly represent the States which will form the various parts of federated Australia. We also by some means should represent the people directly as individuals - as individuals combined into one body. So that whatever laws may be hereafter passed by the Federal Parliament will require assent by two bodies - one as representing the States, and the other as representing the people. Therefore I quite agree with Mr. Barton that it is absolutely necessary that we should have two Houses. I do not think it will be argued, or even attempted to be argued, that only one House will be necessary, and therefore I will not bring forward any arguments why we should have two. Then as to the question of the Governor-General, upon which such stress was laid by Mr. Barton, I agree with him that the appointment should be made by the Queen, and therefore I need spend little time discussing that particular portion. With regard to the senators and the members of the House of Representatives, it will be necessary for us to ascer- tain what qualifications will be required by those we have to send there to represent us. One matter should be definitely and distinctly laid down, and that is that there should be no property qualification required for either of those Houses, or for the electors. With regard to the numbers, I do not know that this is very material. We have before us certain suggestions in the Commonwealth Bill, but I do not altogether agree with these, because the numbers, at all events at the commencement, should be reduced as much as we can, in order that we may make this new body as little expensive as absolutely necessary. It will, no doubt, be wise to provide, as this will be a democratic body, we hope, that those whom we send there, and who will have to devote a large amount of their time to carrying out the work of the Federal Parliament, should receive some reasonable remuneration for the work they will have to do for the people of the colonies. It will be admitted on all hands, I think, that if we are to induce the smaller States to throw in their lot with us we must show that we are not in any way afraid of their action hereafter. That being so, whether it be theoretically correct or not, we must be prepared to allow them to have equal representation in the Senate. If we look at other places we will find, perhaps, that that has not been followed out in its entirety. In America there is an equality; in Canada there is a kind of equality; in the German Empire we find there is not equality; and if we say it exists in Switzerland we must admit it does not exist in the same way that we are prepared to see it here. Although, the larger States might fairly claim to have larger representation in both Houses, seeing that what we must keep before us is the welding of the colonies into one whole, we must be prepared to make some sacrifices. The larger colonies must be prepared to give to their smaller neighbors equal representation in the Senate body. One other important question is how we are to elect the senators and the members of the House of Representatives. With regard to the senators I am not prepared to give the power to the Parliaments of the different colonies to choose those who should represent the people in the Senate. The Commonwealth Bill did make that provision, but when we come to consider the proposal we will find that there are many difficulties. In the first instance, if we gave power to the Parliaments to choose, how is that choice to be carried out? We in Victoria have two Houses. Are we to say to one House, "We will allow you to select a certain number," and to the other House, "We will allow you to select the balance." So far as my view is, I think we should not allow more than six senators from each of the colonies, two retiring every two years, so that our Council would have to elect one senator and our Assembly the other-and we would not agree to that proposal. If we say it is to be a unanimous choice we may have grave difficulties. When one body has passed certain names as being the gentlemen who should be selected, and the other says, "We will not agree with you in that choice," then there will be a block. In America such difficulties appear to have frequently arisen, and Acts of Parliament have been passed that where such a difficulty arises the two Houses should meet as one body to make a selection. That enables the representatives of the Upper House to combine with the members of the Opposition in the Lower House to over-rule the Government party in that House. I know that might occur in our colony by twenty-four members of the Assembly out of the ninety-five agreeing with the forty-eight from the Council; and so they would be able to over-rule seventy-one members who are supposed in their House to represent the views of the people. There being these grave objections to this proposal, I think it will be unwise to place any provision in the Bill which will enable the Parliaments to make this choice. The argument in favor of it is that we will then have a body which will be the elect of the elected. That is a very good, high-sounding phrase, but is it true? We know that in many of the Upper Houses we have no elected body at all, but a nominated body; and I feel perfectly certain of this, that we will not agree to have a nominated Senate. I am sure it will be very hard to persuade the people of Australia-I know it will be to persuade the people of Victoria-that they are to allow anybody to have the right of electing for them those who are to represent their interests in the Senate. We must, of course, provide some means of dealing with the first election, and that, I think, we can fairly do by saying that as we have thought it well to elect this Convention by the vote of the whole of the people in each colony we cannot go far wrong if the Senate in the first instance be chosen on exactly similar lines. Then afterwards, as the States are to be represented as States, I would unhesitatingly give them the power of determining how their representatives are to be chosen. When I speak of States I must have it distinctly understood that I do not refer to the colony as a piece of land, but I refer to those who possess the States-the people for the time being. And holding that view, I say whatever choice be made by the States should be made by the people of the States, and not by any Parliament that might be elected or nominated.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

In our colony I should certainly advocate that while we were fixing the mode of electing or selecting our representatives we should allow the people as the occasion arises to make the selection themselves. That would be my view; it might not be agreed to by others, but I should certainly think the people should choose either by the whole colony in one constituency or divided into a few large constituencies. Preferably I would say have one constituency. At the same time, to prevent any class being shut out from representation, we should endeavor to arrange such a mode of proceeding as would allow of minorities as well as majorities being represented, so that all classes would have full representation in the House. Then as regards the House of Representatives-perhaps we should not call it the Lower Chamber because its members might not consider it the Lower Chamber-I think in all the colonies, and in all parts of the world, the tendency for some years past has been to enlarge the franchise, so that every person who should be represented has an opportunity of being represented.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It would never do to allow in this Federal Parliament that those representatives who are elected upon the most liberal franchise possible should be outvoted by those who would be elected by a very limited franchise indeed. As this may fairly be regarded as the National House, representing the people of the various States as a nation, we ought to have uniformity in the franchise. We must leave it to the Federal Parliament to say what the franchise should be. At the same time, as some colonies have given the right of voting to those who have not that right in other colonies, it would be unfair and inequitable to take from any who have the right, and therefore whatever uniformity is determined upon we shall have to allow the innovation that no person, man or woman, who has the right to vote shall be deprived of exercising that right, even so far as the elections to the Federal Parliament are concerned. I would go the length of saying that everyone who has the right in the various colonies, if they desire to exercise their franchise, should have the opportunity of doing so. I hold myself strong views with regard to the question of one adult one vote; but even though I hold those views, and even though if that principle were proposed here I would have to vote for it, still I do not consider that this is the proper place to settle the question. I think that each colony should be allowed to frame its own franchise, based upon the franchise of the more numerous House, until we have a uniform franchise framed by the federated Parliament, itself. Under some Constitutions the power is given to frame a uniform franchise. It has been done in Canada, and there is a similar power in Switzerland; but I would not lay down hard and fast lines. There is one point on which I think we are all agreed, that is, in having the election in the first instance on the qualification of the electors for the more numerous House, and thereby we follow the only course we consistently can, but we ought to make one declaration, and that is that whoever has the right to vote should vote once and no more. That has been determined in the Parliament of Victoria in discussing the late Federation Bill, and it was determined also in the Parliaments of New South Wales and South Australia. I do not know how the other Parliaments dealt with the matter, but the three colonies I have referred to resolved that they should have the principle of one adult one vote, or one man one vote, as the law of the land might be for the time being. Then we have to fix the proportion of representation according to the number of the population. A suggestion has been made of one member for every 30,000 of the population, but I think, in order to reduce the expense, it should be one for every 40,000 or 50,000.

Mr. BARTON:

One for every 40,000 will give us the right-sized House.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I think that would be ample. I should like it to be distinctly understood that, as far as I am concerned, I do not intend that we shall take 40,000 people wherever we can find them and say, "You shall have one member," as in many of the colonies, and particularly in Victoria, if we did so we would do a grave injury to the country and confer a benefit on the towns. I understand we are to allow each colony to fix what may be considered fair constituencies and allot the colonies one member for every 40,000 of their population. We should also endeavor to make some provision for the settlement of deadlocks between the two Houses. We have found in all the colonies the difficulty of settling questions which may come into dispute, and therefore we should endeavor if we possibly can to lay down some reasonable lines to settle the matter. Both these Houses will represent the people of the colony as their servants, and the people will be the masters. When the two Houses cannot agree the proper course would be to let the people settle the dispute. We might try other means of doing this. We might try both Houses meeting together for the purpose of coming to a vote, but I object to that proceeding. If we have to ascertain the views of our electors at present we have to dissolve the unfortunate House of Assembly, whereas the cause of the trouble may be the other House. Let us have power to dissolve both Houses, and let us ascertain the views of the people, and if they can agree they will send back a majority on one side or the other; and if they cannot agree we may have another deadlock. The only true way of dealing with the matter—it is a novel proceeding and it is a proceeding which is not in force in any English-speaking part of the world, but if we can adopt it in a workable form we should - will be by a direct referendum to the people; not that we should take a mass vote, but should ascertain the wishes of the people by finding out whether a majority of the States are prepared to take a certain course, and see if they contain a majority of the people. If we do that we will get back to bedrock. The best mode to settle deadlocks between the Houses will be to allow both Houses to go back to their constituents, either by double dissolution or referendum, and ascertain if possible what their views may be; but before taking such a step it would be wise and proper to see that both Houses have had full opportunity to confer and negotiate so as to obtain a compromise, and only when such an effort has failed should they go back to the constituents. The next important point upon which I desire to express my views is with regard to the powers to be conferred upon the Federal Parliament, and I may say here at once that I agree almost entirely with the provisions of the Commonwealth Bill. I think they have been very carefully framed, and we may safely give those powers to the Federal Parliament; but we ought to scan them very carefully and see that we are doing no injustice, because we must bear in mind that the powers we give to the Federation will be the foundation upon which the whole structure will rest. While we should be prepared to give them every reasonable power, we must see that these powers do not interfere too much with the domestic legislation of the States. In Canada and the United States entirely different modes of procedure were adopted. In Canada they gave the States certain specified and limited powers, and retained to the Dominion all other powers not specifically conferred on the States. In the United States they gave limited powers to the new body, allowing the States to retain power over all matters which they did not voluntarily give up. That latter course was followed in the Commonwealth Bill, and it is the course that we, if we are sensible, will endeavor to carry out in framing the Constitution for the Federal Parliament. I am prepared to give the fullest possible power of taxation and borrowing to the members of the new Parliament. We must take care that when the necessity arises they have the power to do what is required. If they have not, and if they cannot raise the money, either by taxation or by borrowing, then when they most require to be strong they probably will be found to be weak, and I am prepared to trust them. Seeing that they are elected by ourselves, and represent us, I am prepared to entrust them with the fullest possible powers to raise money either by taxation or by borrowing. We must see that the new body has absolute control over the Customs and Excise duties and bounties. There are other matters which I need not go into. There is defence and quarantine, and similar matters, which will be placed under the Federal Government, and, in fact, we may say all matters relating to the external affairs, internal commerce, defence, and general government can safely be placed in the hands of the new body, and the States can retain all the other powers which they now possess. One question, which is one of great difficulty, and to which we will have to give our earnest attention, is how to deal with the railways of the various colonies. We have differential rates, and if we allow these to continue the result will be that any colony through its railways will be able, if it so chooses, to practically nullify, or nullify to a great extent, any intercolonial freetrade which may be determined upon by the Federal Parliament. If this is so, we must have some means to prevent any one colony injuring another colony's interests or acting contrary to the wishes of the other colonies. The mere construction of ordinary lines is a matter that I do not think we could hand over, for it is closely associated with the land policy of each colony. We build our railways, not for the purpose of getting profit out of them, but to open up territory in our own colony, and for the purpose of settling the people on the land. Therefore, I think, we could not, in justice to our colony, hand over to anybody the requirements of any particular part of the colony. If we come to deal with intercolonial lines, that might be on a different footing altogether. As far as their construction is concerned, I have no fear in saying, that, as the whole of the colonies would probably be interested in the building of any particular line, then the whole of them might be fairly consulted with regard to that matter, and, therefore, we might be able to abolish the want of a uniform gauge which exists at the present time, and do away with the unfortunate cut-throat policy which obtains with regard to the railways in all the colonies. Thereby we would be able to benefit the people of the colony, and be able to make large savings which will go far to meet the amounts we will have to raise under this Commonwealth. Another knotty point we will have to discuss is what are to be the powers of the respective Houses with reference to Money Bills. When we speak of Money Bills we use a term capable of the widest interpretation, and in connection with all these measures with which we are familiar the term "Money Bills" is used for the want of a better denomination. With regard to the ordinary legislation, I have no hesi-purse. In South Australia the Council is allowed to suggest amendments, and, no doubt, the representatives of that colony will give us information on the point as to whether it works well or ill in the general management of their colony. I believe that in Tasmania power is given to the Council to make alterations in Money Bills, but if we look at the Constitution of the mother of Parliaments we will find that the Commons claims to have full control over all expenditure, and imposition of taxation. I will admit at once that the Senate in this new Parliament will occupy a somewhat different position to that occupied by Upper Chambers in our ordinary Legislature. Is the difference so great as to justify us in giving up what is, the law in nearly all the colonies and in Great Britain?

Mr. HOLDER:
A radical change.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is not of sufficient weight or influence to make us do that. I am prepared to listen to all the arguments to show me that my preconceived ideas are not correct, and, if they are of sufficient weight, I will be glad to fall in with them. It is admitted on all hands that the power of initiation should rest with the House of Representatives alone, but to my mind the better course will be to give to the Senate the full power of rejecting any proposal, but not give them the power to interfere with the details decided upon by those representing the people? The Commonwealth is in a somewhat peculiar position in one respect, and it will afford food for reflection for many of us represented here-the lawyers. (Laughter.) We know by one of the provisions that the courts of the Federation have full power to decide as to the validity of all the laws which may be passed. It is said that ordinary Appropriation Bills cannot be amended. It is very difficult for a Treasurer-indeed, I do not know that there is any Treasurer here who will be able to do so-to give us a definition of an ordinary Appropriation Bill, because in nearly every appropriation we have for the year there are matters which may be regarded, as far as that year is concerned, as extraordinary. Then we are asked to provide that the imposition of taxation should be dealt with in one Bill, and that only one matter should be included in the Bill. Therefore, if by some unfortunate slip, both Houses being willing that a certain tax should be imposed, two of a slightly different nature were included in one Bill it might, and probably would, be held by the courts, which are always conservative, that that law was ultra vires. Seeing the difficulties which stand in the way I think it is wise, at all events at the commencement, to see how it will work, and to follow out the old lines on which we have worked, and which have been fairly satisfactory, and to say that there should be that great distinction between the two Chambers, and that the ultimate power of dealing with all Money Bills should rest with the House of Representatives alone.

Mr. PEACOCK:
This is the way to get it all out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is said that we ought to give the power of suggestion. Well, I have had no experience of that, but I do think if I were a member of the Senate, and, after fully thinking over a matter and debating it, the Senate had come to a conclusion and made certain suggestions to the other place, and the other place had treated them as they, might-and possibly would-with contempt, I should feel I was much more belittled than if I had only the power of rejection. Rather than take the responsibility of swallowing what I altogether did not approve, I would much prefer undertaking the responsibility of rejection. So far as I can at present see, the right of suggestion is a power which I do not think it will be beneficial or advisable to give to the Senate. If deadlocks do arise-and they do and will arise on financial as on other matters-let them be settled in the mode we have provided for the settlement of ordinary difficulties. Let the people, as the final arbiters, say what their representative should do, and no harm can be done if the people decide, deciding not only as a people, but as colonies.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
When have these deadlocks arisen?

Mr. REID:
And where?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They have occasionally and unfortunately arisen in the colony of Victoria.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
When?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
During the last few years.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Of what character?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Do not let us quarrel amongst ourselves. (Laughter.) We are in Opposition here apparently. Let us oppose everything from the Government side - (laughter) - and let the Government quarrel among themselves if they like, but the Opposition should never quarrel.
(Laughter.) I desire, however, to pass an as rapidly as I can, as it is not fair to detain the Convention any longer than is absolutely necessary. The next question to consider will be the constitution of our Executive. There we shall have the Governor-General selected for us in the way referred to by Mr. Barton, and if we start with five Ministers we will have ample for the work to be done, instead of the seven, as has been proposed. They will have to hold office during the pleasure of the Governor-General, which means they will hold office so long as they can control the expenditure of Federation—that is, so long as they possess the confidence of the House of Representatives. We are told that if we have responsible government it will kill Federation, or the Federation will kill responsible government. But are we to assume at once that responsible government will kill the Federation? I am not prepared to do that. I am prepared to give it a trial. If we are to assume that, and say we will have no responsible government, but we will allow this new body to start on altogether new lines, we will be entering on a course of which we know nothing. We have the experience of the other mode of proceeding, and we may very wisely and sensibly commence on this particular line. If we find in a few years' time that these difficulties have arisen, then we have the power to alter the Constitution, but in the first instance I consider that the wisest course to pursue is to allow the Government of the Federation, as in those of the various colonies, to be what we all know popularly as responsible government. Give it a fair trial, and if those difficulties have arisen and responsible government is going to kill or injure Federation, then I am perfectly certain that the people will be only too glad to make the alterations and start on another line which experience will have taught us we ought to have begun with.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We must have Federal Courts of Appeal to deal with federal matters, and also have A Court of Appeal to deal with matters from the Local Courts. The only question is whether we ought to make the decision of the Federal Court final. The right of appeal to the highest tribunal in the land is looked upon as the cherished right alike of the poor and the rich. It may be that sometimes the rich use it harshly against the poor, but whenever possible a man has a right to appeal to the highest tribunal of the old country. That is a link we ought to be loth to break. The links are few now. One link is the selection of the ruler for the time being, and another is the right to appeal to the courts of England, and these are links we ought not to lightly break. Before we adopt any measure which would result in a change in either of these two principles we should give careful and cautious consideration indeed to the whole question. As to the election of the Governors in the various colonies, I say again that it would be unwise to give the Ministry the power of appointment or the people the right of election. If we gave it to the Ministry they might desire to give the place to a faithful supporter, or to get rid of a dangerous opponent, and in any case the occupant of the position would be regarded as a party man. If he were a Governor elected by the people he might say- "I am elected by all, and your Parliaments are elected by simply a portion of the people," and difficulties might arise between him and his responsible advisers. It would be almost impossible to have a Governor elected by the people. With regard to that particular course, we should again go by a well-known and beaten track, and not start any innovations. One of the most important questions to be dealt with is finance, and at the present time we have not before us the fullest information we could desire, which we possibly could get by the appointment of committees to consider this particular question. We may look upon the question from a particular standpoint, but if we are to have a lasting basis we ought to endeavor to fully consider and grapple with it, and to get a safe foundation. We have to frame a Constitution fair and equitable to all the colonies. We have to see that it will be useful, not only at present, but in the future, so that it must be elastic, and we have also to see that, while we take from the various States ample money, to carry on the Federation, we must leave ample means to the Governments to carry on their own domestic work. That being so, first, of all we have to, look at what liabilities we are going to place on the new body and what revenue we will give them. We will give them Customs revenue, which will be far and away more than sufficient to deal with the ordinary expenditure, and will leave them a large surplus. I do not know whether any of the Treasurers here have had the pleasure of ever having had a surplus, but it is a dangerous thing to have to deal with. If we are wise we will keep that temptation out of the hands of the Federal Treasurer. Many proposals have been suggested which no doubt will be thrashed out here and afterwards. We can start with this one certainty: that none of the colonies can afford to hand over all of this money without getting a large part of it back. We are all too poor to attempt to do that. This course was pursued in America, and there they have such an overwhelming surplus that they find it difficult to decide what to do with it.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Not now.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Well, they used to have. We are not in a position to do it, and we may dismiss that particular portion from consideration without giving it much thought. Another mode is that adopted in Canada, where they give certain subsidies, which in the first instance were looked upon as fixed amounts. What has been the result? Agitation sprung up, and agitation continued, and when the Treasurer brought in a surplus the States thought they ought to get a little more of the plunder, and if we adopt such a system it must necessarily be so here. We know from experience that our municipalities are always pressing the Government to get as much as they can possibly get for their various works, and if we adopt the Canadian system we will find that the States here will follow a similar coarse and make frequent demands for "better terms." The unwisdom of giving to any Legislature the expenditure of money which is not all raised from the people is apparent, and strong pressure would always be brought to bear on the Federal Government to expend the money they had in their hands. I have seen it stated in one place that we should transfer other departments to the Federation—the Education Department, for instance—but it seems to me that when we are dealing with the powers of the Federal Parliament and the departments of the State, we should not deal with them as a financial question, but on the broad question as to whether it is a good thing that the Federal Parliament should have control of various departments. One other matter is that of allowing the Federal Parliament to have this surplus and divide it. If we allow the Federal Parliament to have the surplus we will have extravagance. We allow them to deal with defences and post office matters, and undoubtedly strong pressure will be brought to bear by every colony to have extra facilities with regard to the post offices and extra money spent on defences, and we can easily realise that when the Treasurer has plenty of money to spend there will be a strong temptation to spend it.

Mr. BARTON:

Defence should cost less under the Federal Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It probably will cost less, but that does not alter the position that the various colonies will demand to have extra money spent in order that the money may be expended in them. There will also be the temptation to court popularity by reducing taxation 'while they have money in their hands, and seeing that there are all these objections I have come to the conclusion that we will be making a grave mistake if we allow the Government to have a surplus with which they can deal as they like. There is only one other course that I can see, and that is that we shall take care that the expenditure we place on the shoulders of the new body shall be at least equal to, if not a little greater than, the revenue we are going to give it. We can start with that, and as the revenue will rapidly increase, even if we are giving the Federal Parliament a little more expenditure than revenue at the start, it will catch up the deficit. To do that I think we should transfer to the new body all the debts of the various colonies. The proposal laid down in the Commonwealth Bill, and which was looked upon as a very good one at the time, but which has since been shown (to be unfair in its incidence. provided for a scheme of payment of expenditure according to population and the division of the surplus on the basis of the amounts contributed by the various colonies. There is much to be said against a division of expenditure on the basis of population. Wine charges on a population basis would be fair and others would be unfair, and the result worked out in figures would show -that some of the colonies would benefit very largely and benefit too at the expense, of the other colonies. We have another proposition, called the accounts scheme, in which it is thought to be wise to keep some sort of accounts of the receipts and expenditure for each colony. On the face of it that seems fair and feasible, but I do not think it would work. We would have to keep distinct records; -we would have to keep a Customs-house on the borders of -each colony, not to collect a tax, but to collect information, because we are told if duty is paid in our colony and the goods are ultimately exported to New South Wales that New South Wales must get the duty which is paid in Victoria. How accounts are going to 'be kept to do that, considering that raw material may be brought into one colony and duty paid on it and then exported after it is manufactured into another colony, I fail to see. How could the proportion of the duty to be taken by each colony be fairly apportioned? I cannot see how correct accounts could be kept, and I may say that I have had some experience as Commissioner of Customs. It would lead to an expensive system of book-keeping, and it would lead to an increase of the expenditure, which would be unwise. There is another objection. It would take away that supervision over the expenditure which is necessary, because if the money is simply collected and the proportion of the expenditure charged to the colony interested, the other colonies, not having the same degree of interest in keeping down expenditure, might agree to any expenditure, reasonable or unreasonable, which the colony more interested proposed to make. Then again, we would have one body-the State-practically finding the money, and another body-the Federal Parliament-expending it, which would necessarily give rise to friction. Again, at any time, supposing a levy had to be made, a State might turn round and say, "You have been squandering the money given you. If you had guarded it properly you could have carried on with the means at your disposal, and we will not give you any more." That position might be taken up by the Government of the day, or by the local Parliament, who might say, "We will not tax our people to repay you money which has been squandered." On full consideration we will find that that scheme is impossible to adopt, though I think from the figures I have seen the colony of which I have the honor to be one of the representatives would have no cause to complain, because a large amount of duty would be credited to it, and it would be impossible to ascertain the full amount thereof to be credited to the other colonies. Then we must not forget that when we have a uniform tariff it will make a difference in the amount of money to be collected. We will have a certain amount which will have to be raised, but although we raise the amounts now, we raise them on varying tariffs which each colony has adopted, and when we take them all into one we may collect more or we may collect less. It will all depend on the basis on which we frame the uniform tariff, and, therefore, it is not wise to say that the amounts we receive from Customs are so much, and to calculate that in the future it will bear the same ratio in each colony. In the post offices also there are certain services which are charged in one colony and not in another. So that one colony will probably lose and another may have to collect more, but in either circumstance the Federal Government will not receive the exact amount which is being collected at present. Another great difficulty is that we lose all our border duties, as they will no longer be collected. The loss has been put down at from £500,000 to £700,000.

Mr. WISE:
£900,000.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There is no doubt the colonies will be able to send goods manufactured in one colony into another, and the colony importing from abroad and at present paying duty will cease to pay. We will be sending from one colony to another a far larger amount of goods than we are sending at present, and where these goods are dutiable at present we will in the future lose that amount. To be on safe lines, we should put the loss down at much closer to a million. There are other matters, such as the interest on the bonded debt to be taken over; and then we will have to provide for all the expenses of the Federal Parliament. We are told that we will save a large amount on our interest bill. Of course eventually we can save a large sum, but we must not calculate that we will save the whole of the difference between £3 17s. per cent. on £180,000,000 and £3 per cent. on the same amount, because in the conversion we will have to pay a large bonus, as we will have to pay the market price of our stock and heavy expenses, and so we will not save the whole of the interest. We will be benefited, however, if we can have this conversion, as we will be able to have a stock in which trustees can deal, as they will be allowed by the Imperial Parliament to invest in the federal consols which will come into existence. We will also get a better price and a better market value, because when we are floating a loan there will be more customers. If we can make an interminable stock we will make great savings; but, looking at all the circumstances, we must remember that in the first instance the savings will be small, and we will have also to provide a sinking fund. I believe that the wisest course is to have as little disturbance in the State finances as possible, and we should avoid friction between the State and the federal authority. If we can we should devise some means by which the whole of the various debts can be taken over, and that appears to me to be the course we should endeavor to pursue. I do not go the length of saying, nor do I concur with the views of those who say, that it is necessary to transfer the assets. It appears to me that the British moneylenders do not lend us money on our railways or public buildings, but that they lend on the general credit of the colonies, and that being so, there is no necessity to transfer the assets. I do not believe that for this purpose we need do it at all; but for other reasons it may possibly be wise for us to transfer the railways, or to give some controlling power over them. In taking over the debts of the colonies, I feel satisfied, at the present time, that we can easily leave the matter of the assets out of consideration. In all these matters we must try to follow out one rule, and as we know that there are richer colonies and that there are poorer colonies, the former must be prepared to make some sacrifice to allow the latter to enter this Federation. I do not mean that the richer colonies ought to be plundered or give up a large sum. but they ought to be prepared to say, "We are desirous, honestly and earnestly desirous, to have this Federation brought about and to bring our smaller States in with us, so that all of us may reap the benefit. We are prepared, to obtain that larger end, to make some reasonable sacrifice as far as we are concerned." We should speak with one voice, and all communications, either from the Federal Parliament or otherwise, should go through the one channel—the Governor-General for the time being. An important point, no doubt, will be the question of the federal capital, and it is a matter which we dare not attempt to fix at this time. It might be argued that it should be perambulating-wandering-from one colony to another.

HON. MEMBERS:

No.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Wandering from one colony to another with no fixed home. I do not believe in that; but I believe if we can leave the question of the uniform tariff to the new Parliament we can safely, and without fear of injustice to anyone, leave the question where the Federal Parliament is to have its home to the Federal Parliament. There is another important point I wish to speak on. We know we must not expect that all the colonies will come in at once with us, and therefore provision should be made in the hope that in the near future colonies which at first remain outside may come in; but we should not make the way either too easy or too strict. This is a matter upon which I am not prepared at the present time to express a decided opinion. It is a difficult matter to be thrashed out. We are going to enter into a bargain, and that bargain should be made binding as far as it should be reasonably binding, but at the same time we must not forget that difficulties will arise in the working of the Constitution, and troubles must ensue. Therefore we should take care that we have some reasonable mode for providing for amendments that may hereafter be necessary. If we make it too rigid we will have a Constitution that will not bend, but will probably break. The States must have a means to ascertain whether amendments may be made, or else we may have a repetition of what has happened in other places, and bloodshed may ensue. If the States desire some amendment which they cannot get the opinion of the other States upon, it may involve their desiring to leave altogether. I do not think we should make a Provision for the States leaving, for once they join they should join for all time, but they ought to know whether an amendment can be made. The Bill which, an a rule, I hold very strongly, provides that any amendment—the slightest amendment—has to obtain an absolute majority of both Houses of Parliament, and then by Convention has to obtain the majority of States. Well, I believe we would be perfectly safe if, instead of having an absolute majority, we left the matter to be decided by a simple majority in each of the two Houses. I would consult the people, but not by the roundabout method of a Convention, for men would be elected to the Convention frequently upon mere personal grounds, not upon the one particular point that might be at issue, but because he was personally popular, or because he was a gentleman who, desiring a seat, was in a position to travel throughout the length and breadth of a colony and advertise himself. If we want to ascertain whether any amendment ought to be made we can ascertain it by referring the matter directly to the people. I would be perfectly prepared to give to the people full control over all these amendments. It may be that if the one House desired to make an amendment the other House would block it. On the other hand neither House may make any move in the direction of amendment, and in either of such cases, if the colonies think the amendment ought to be made, there is no reason why we should not give to the State Parliaments the power to move in that direction. If a large number of States decide in their respective Parliaments that amendments in the Federal Constitution in a certain direction of the States must agree to amendments. Mr. Barton referred to the Swiss, to whom we can look for many useful lessons in dealing with this matter. If the two Houses under the Swiss Constitution agree that an amendment ought to be made, it is referred to the people by way of the referendum. If a majority of the cantons and a majority of the people decide that the amendment is a proper one it is made. Apart from that, under this Constitution 50,000 inhabitants still have the right to call for the referendum to decide whether a change shall be made. It the referendum decides that there is to be a change, both Houses give up their position, and an election takes place. If the new Parliament decides that the amendment should not be made, the matter will probably rest there; but if they agree as to what should be done, it is only when the people approve of the amendment that it becomes law. This is a simple mode of procedure, and one that we might adopt here. We ought not to give power to the federal body to alter the representation of a particular State unless that State agrees to the alteration. Here we have laid down a principle that the people are to frame the Constitution under which they are to live. Those who are to frame the Constitution should have full and ample power when an amendment is necessary to make such, just as they have the power to formulate the Constitution finally. Those, briefly, are the views I hold with regard to the main principles upon which our Federation should be based. There are many other details I would go into if I had the time, but it would be improper to delay the Convention, and I reserve the full right to myself, after hearing the arguments from those who have had greater experience than I have had in this matter, to change the views I am now giving the Convention. I am here only as a negotiator, not as a legislator, and if I find that other opinions that will be advanced during the debate are more acceptable to the people of Australia,

I will be only too glad to help to frame a Constitution in accordance with the wish of the people.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I take advantage of the generous suggestion made by members of the Convention of 1891 that those who have not hitherto taken part in these discussions should be allowed some preference. This has emboldened me

[P.50] starts here
to address the Convention at an earlier period in these debates than I had intended. I think it must have struck every member of the Convention that the clear, straightforward, and practical exposition which we have just heard from Sir George Turner is in itself a complete justification of the procedure by resolution. (Hear, hear.) We have been told that these resolutions will lead to evasion of the matters in difference, because it is impossible in the discussion upon them to come to definite conclusions. But I say that the resolutions are admirably framed to carry out the very purposes of this Convention. On many matters which are embraced in these resolutions we are agreed; upon some and not many, though very vital matters, we differ, and we know from previous experience and from the debates of 1891 that these differences are very marked in regard to some of these questions. Why should we bind ourselves down to a decision at an earlier period than is necessary? (Hear, hear.) I quite admit that our procedure should not in any way restrict debate, or prevent the fullest and most direct expression of opinion, but I do say that our procedure should be so devised as to prevent a conclusion being come to by the Convention at a moment earlier than is absolutely necessary. (Hear, hear.) The different views which will be held upon matters of difference no doubt will find full expression here, and it is for the committees who will discuss these matters from every point of view, with the information thereon which has been derived from the debates, to find some mode of compromise—some way out of our difficulties. It will be for the Convention afterwards, when the result of the labors of the committees is put in a concrete form, to express its opinion and place its views upon record in the fullest possible manner. But it does appear to me that it would be unwise to bind this Convention down to any definite expression of opinion at any period earlier than that of the approval of the draft Bill brought from the committees. I propose to go at once to some of the matters of difference upon which it is necessary that the Convention should know our views—(hear, hear)—and I propose to follow the example of Sir George Turner, and to state expressly and as clearly as I can, my views upon these matters of difference. The most important of them, perhaps, is that which was dealt with in the admirably suggestive speech of Sir Richard Baker, yesterday. (Hear, hear.) I may say at the outset that I hold the opinion that equality of representation in the Senate is an essential condition to this union. (Hear, hear.) I say it is so for these reasons. In the first place, the very principles of a federal union are involved in it. And I say, in the second place, that when one considers the inequality of population in these colonies at the present, it would be impossible to expect the different colonies to hand over the work of legislation and administration of federal affairs in their colonies to a body in which they had not equal representation. I hold that perhaps one of the strongest reasons which have actuated the people of these colonies in pronouncing for the federal form of government rather than any other of the different forms of union is this: that it is necessary for the proper development of the resources of the different colonies, to the prosperity of the different colonies in the inchoate condition in which we are at the present time, that the fullest possible scope should be allowed to the development of local resources; and, therefore, I hold it to be a basic principle of this Federation that we should take no powers from the States which they could better exercise themselves—we should place no power in the Federation which is not absolutely necessary for carrying out its purposes. I agree with the hon.

member, Sir Richard Baker, that it is impossible, upon any form of Federation which has been suggested in these colonies to have an ideally perfect Federal Constitution. That is practically impossible in any country, even in the United States of America, where I suppose the largest amount of representation is given to the States that is given by any Constitution.
There the powers of the two Houses are not equal. The United States Senate has no power to initiate expenditure. But in regard to our own Federation the reason becomes much stronger in favor of that limitation which the hon. member, Sir Richard Baker, says is inconsistent with the federal idea. I admit at once that the form we now propose will not be an ideally perfect Federation, but the form we propose is the best form of federal representation which we can give under the circumstances. And our aim here is not to form an ideal Federation. It is to form a Federation which will work, which will stand the stress of time, which will stand the working of all those diverse pressures and influences which make Federation one of the most difficult forms of government to carry on anywhere. We must be prepared for the play of forces in this Federation, and so arrange its machinery as to give sufficient power to the central authority to secure cohesion in the Union, and yet sufficient freedom of action to the States to allow of their local development. Sir Richard has contrasted the federal form with the responsible form of government Responsible government is the form of government under which all these colonies have hitherto lived and grown; and the question arises, shall this Federation carry on its work on the same method? It has many imperfections, but we should never lose sight of the principle which I suppose has been better enforced by history than any other principle—that is, that no Constitution has ever succeeded which has been a creation rather than a growth; that no Constitution has ever succeeded that has not been a development of institutions which had their roots deep down in the hearts of the people for whom the Constitution has been enacted. Now, I say that responsible government is not only the form of government under which these colonies have grown to what they are, but it is a form of government for which we have hereditary preference it is a form of government which has achieved its present position by reason of sacrifices on the part of those who went before us; it is a form of government the working of which we understand thoroughly; and it is a form of government to supplant which by something else which the people do not understand would mean, I think, the introduction of a dangerous experiment. I think we will find it quite a sufficient task to educate the people of Australia to the working of a federal constitution with responsible government; but if we are to attempt to impose this federal form of government upon the people, and a federal form of government which the people do not understand, and which is contrary to their instincts and traditions, we may well tremble for the efficacy and permanence of any institution of the kind. So I take it as a principle that in the work of making this Constitution, whatever form the Federation may take, it must be a form consistent with the working of responsible government. It follows that, although I believe very strongly in giving the States the fullest possible representation, that representation must be such, and such only, as is consistent with the working of responsible government. That necessarily means a limitation in the power of the House which represents the States. I admit at once that the States must be equally represented in the Senate. That is necessary, because otherwise the position of the smaller colonies in the Constitution would indeed be of an insignificant character. Let us look for a moment at the representation in the House of Representatives which the proposed Constitution would give. Taking the representation of the quota of the Bill of 1891, namely, one for every 30,000 persons, New South Wales would be represented by somewhere about forty-two members, Victoria by about forty-one, Queensland sixteen-and in dealing with this question I do not intend to leave out of consideration Queensland, because we all feel that no federal union can be complete which does not embrace the people of the whole continent, and I hope from what we know is going on, and from the cheering message which my friend the Premier gave last night, I hope and believe that before this Constitution is formed we shall have our brothers from Queensland with us. Well, that will give to Queensland sixteen, South Australia twelve, and West Australia and Tasmania five each. Now, in a House constituted like this it is obvious that the interests of the smaller States would be absolutely in the hands of the larger States, if the voting went by States. Therefore I say there must be some part of the Constitution in which that balance may be redressed. There must be some part of the Constitution in which these small States will have representation as States, because if they have not, even if you assume you can induce them to enter into the Union, you will necessarily have a continual sense of injustice and a feeling that the smaller States are not being properly dealt with, a continual feeling that their interests are neglected in the Federation and even if it were to suit the interests of the smaller States to enter now for some reason into a Federation that did not give them equal representation, it would be creating and leaving in the Constitution itself a germ of unrest which would probably develop into something much more serious. Depend upon it we cannot go wrong in framing this Constitution, and laying its lines, so far as we possibly can, on the ordinary principles of justice, equity, and fairness. And if we lay our Constitution on those principles we must give equal representation to the smaller States. So, for these reasons, I am strongly in favor of equal representation of all the State's in the Senate. Now, I come to the question which is necessarily involved-what powers to give to the Senate-because it makes a very material difference to the interests of the smaller States whether this House in which their interests are represented has co-equal powers with the Representative Assembly or whether it has not.

Mr. HOLDER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

In dealing with that question the principle which must guide us is to give the Senate the fullest possible powers consistent with carrying on responsible government. What does that lead to? In the first place, that it is impossible to have responsible government unless you make up your mind that one House shall be the arbiter of the fate of the Executive Government.

Mr. BARTON:

You cannot carry it on by the confidence of one House alone.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

As Mr. Barton remarks, it is very true you cannot carry on by the confidence of one House alone, but generally speaking you would have the confidence of both Houses in the carrying on of your administration; but if it came to a question of a difference of opinion between the two Houses, it is clear that one House must have sway, and that House must be the House in which the people are directly represented, the House which has control of the purse. For this reason the business of Government must be carried on by an Executive which must have control of the purse and initiate legislation of a financial character; and as the existence of the Government depends upon the will of the Representative House, it depends upon the will of the Representative House, it follows that the other House cannot be given equal powers with regard to those matters which affect the existence of the Government. Sir George Turner in his address spoke of the limitation of the power in regard to Money Bills. Before I go any further in a statement of my views upon that point I would like to make a reference to his views in regard to Money Bills. I draw a very strong distinction between different kinds of Money Bills. We know there is no more fruitful source of discussion between, the two Houses in our different Legislatures—very often
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Is that the principle? It is not the principle on which we act.
Mr. O’CONNOR:
I take it that the principle in all the colonies is this: that where a Bill involving the expenditure of money in order to carry out its purposes even incidentally, even supposing that it is a Bill necessitating the appointment of an officer, that officer has to be paid by the Government, and that alone makes it a Money Bill.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They are money clauses incidentally.
Mr. BARTON:
They do not require a message from the Governor.
Mr. O’CONNOR:
According to the provisions of the Constitution generally, it will be found that there are many cases in which Bills are not for the purpose of imposing burdens on the people, and yet incidentally become Money Bills.
There may be different rulings in the various colonies as to this question, but I think it will be recognised that there are Bills which impose Taxation and incur expenditure, and there are other Bills which merely incidentally require expenditure to carry out their purpose. I draw a strong distinction between those two classes of Bills, and while, no doubt, it is very necessary and right that the House of Representatives only should have the power, not only of initiating, but of amending all Bills which impose taxation or appropriate revenue, the other class of Money Bills should be handed over to the Senate to deal with upon exactly the same footing as the House of Representatives. I take up this position for the reason that it is necessary in the carrying on of responsible government that the initiation of all taxation should be in the hands of the House of Assembly, that all Bills imposing taxation, and all Bills Appropriating revenue should be initiated in the House of Representatives, and, further, that no amendment of any of this class of measure should be allowed to the House which does not control the existence of Governments. For the reason that all these matters, which are absolutely essential for the carrying on of administration, are in the hands of the House of Representatives which controls the existence of Governments, that House alone should have the power, not only of initiation, but of amendment of those Money Bills such as I have described. Of course it is necessary to give the Senate, as representing the States, an absolute veto in regard to Bills imposing taxation and appropriating revenue; but if you give the power of amending such Bills to the Senate, you give them the control of expenditure and appropriation, because our experience of conflicts between two Houses is this: that the power of amendment of Money Bills would mean the power of obstructing the carrying of a Budget until the will of the Upper Chamber prevailed.

An HON. MEMBER:

So you would with a veto.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

No, because if you give a veto that is a matter of policy upon which the Senate takes upon itself to express an opinion, and if it is right or wrong it does not disturb the existing condition of things. There are other matters dealing with this to which I will refer by-and-bye. Therefore I say, so far as the initiation of expenditure and the amendment of Appropriation and Taxation Bills are concerned, I would follow the provisions of the draft Bill. The draft Bill provides-

That there shall be no initiation except in the House of Representatives, and there shall be no amendment to Bills imposing taxation or appropriating revenue in the Senate.

So far I entirely concur with the provision of the draft Bill. It seems to me there is another question which may arise in regard to this matter which requires to be dealt with. Suppose you get to a point where the Senate refuses to carry out the wishes of the other House in regard to some matter of appropriation. Care is taken in the draft Bill to provide that the Bill appropriating revenue shall contain nothing else, so that there will be but one subject dealt with in the Appropriation Bill. Let us assume that in the Senate, by reason of some combination amongst particular States interested, the Appropriation Bill for the year's supplies is continually rejected. There you would have a deadlock in the ordinary processes of government; and I draw a very strong distinction between a deadlock which affects the carrying out of the daily business of Government—indeed its actual existence—and a deadlock which does not affect these matters. Any ordinary measure, or even a taxation measure, may be thrown out time after time by the Senate without stopping the daily working of the machine of Government; but where the Appropriation Bill for the ordinary annual services of Government is thrown out by the Senate you have a deadlock of a dangerous character. I may be told that these deadlocks do not often happen, and if they do they are easily got over. I know they are got over in the different colonies easily enough, for this reason, that living as we do under a unitarian form of government, the Upper and Lower House are subject to the same public opinion. The public opinion of the country has to decide which is right and which is wrong, and sooner or later that House which finds itself not in accord with the great body of public opinion must give way. I admit in that way difficulties are often solved. But the difficulty in a federal form of government is this: If the Opposition in the Senate is composed of a number of States or a particular group of States holding out upon some question particularly affecting their special interests, the public opinion of those States sustains that Opposition' and backs up the obstructive tactics carried on in the Senate.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Have they no responsibility?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

They are not directly responsible to the people. They are responsible to the States.

Mr. BARTON:

They are responsible to the people of the State.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Their particular responsibility is to the State as a State. I am only dealing with a matter in which State interests are specially involved.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

When State rights are spoken of a great deal of confusion often arises, because of the use of that expression in a loose way. State rights are expressly provided for by the Constitution, but it is in regard to State interests in federal affairs that the difficulty arises. I will give a concrete illustration. Suppose, for instance, it is a matter of defence, and the question arising whether a large sum of money is to be expended on the eastern coast or the western coast. There may be a group of States which say that the money is to be expended on the eastern coast, while the other States express the opinion that it ought to be disbursed on the western coast. I assume that a combination of States in the Senate holds out for the expenditure being on the western coast, or, if you wish, on the eastern coast.

Mr. FRASER:
Or not at all.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
In regard to that condition of things, the public opinion which takes up the view of either the eastern or the western States is not the public opinion of the whole of Australia, but the public opinion of particular localities interested, which public opinion would enforce and sustain the party of obstruction in the Senate; therefore there is not the same possibility of an early solution of difficulties as there is in the case of a unified form of government. With reference to the ordinary deadlocks or disputes between the two Houses, there can be no question that they ought to be left to be settled by a spirit of compromise of the two Houses and the public opinion of Australia. (Cheers). On questions of appropriation for the ordinary annual services of government, or questions which affect the turning round of the machinery of the government day by day, it would be unwise to trust to matters of that sort being settled by the public opinion of the people of Australia. I should not deal with this question in this way only that the Bill of 1891 provided that the appropriation for the ordinary annual services for the year should be contained in one Bill, and that nothing else should be contained in that Bill. I am strongly opposed, in general, to what may be called mechanical methods of solving difficulties between the two Houses. But where the existence of the working machinery of government depends upon the carrying of the annual appropriation, it would be an unwise thing to allow for any considerable time the machinery to be stopped by a deadlock on the question of appropriation; therefore it is that I should propose a very different way out of the difficulty to that suggested by Sir George Turner. My view is that there is only one kind of deadlock we should provide for, and that is the one I have dealt with. There should be provision that if the Senate rejects a Bill in one Session it will be sent up next Session. If it is then not passed the two Houses should sit together and pass it.

Mr. FRASER:
Either pass it or reject it.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It seems to me that that would be one way out of the deadlock. If a majority decide that it is not to pass, well and good; but the probabilities are, and you may assume, that a majority of the Assembly are in favor of passing it.
Mr. ISAACS:
With or without amendment?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Without amendment. In that way you have both Houses working together. I admit that it might eventuate in the carrying out of the will of the minority in the Assembly. It might be, for instance, that a minority in the House of Representatives who are unwilling that that kind of appropriation should be made may be joined by a majority in the Senate, and that both together they may disapprove of the expenditure. We cannot help that. It appears to me you must leave it to the majority, whichever way they may decide.

Mr. PEACOCK:
A nice position for a Government to be in!

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I do not see what other way there is out of the difficulty.

Mr. REID:
They will get out of it.

Mr. BARTON:
Perhaps sometimes the public interest is superior to the position of a Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I should certainly be altogether opposed to enacting anything in the Constitution which would make either House at any time merely subservient to the purposes of any Government. (Hear, hear.) The public interest stands higher than that. My only reason for proposing this mechanical method of getting rid of the difficulty is that it is to the public interest that the country should have the question settled one way or the other.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You see the effect of that. A minority would put the Government out.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Exactly; that may be so. The question however is whether it would not be better in the interests of the country that the Government should be put out in that way than that a war should take place between the two Houses which would land the country in a very serious difficulty.

Mr. PEACOCK:
How does that square with your views as to responsible government?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Then a new Government would be formed, which would be able to go to the country.
Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
Go to the country at last.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Of course. But before you do it you must arrive at some way of getting rid of your legislative deadlock. What is the other way proposed by Sir George Turner? I do not know whether he intends his solution to apply generally or only to questions of this sort. His proposal, though commendable from the point of view of its simplicity, would be very costly and very undesirable. Sir George Turner proposes that when there are difficulties occurring between the two Houses there should be a dissolution.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
A dissolution or referendum.

Mr. BARTON:
The referendum as a Court of Appeal!

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
A referendum preferably; a dissolution if I could not get the referendum.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
In regard to a dissolution, it appears to me it would be quite impossible in the first place to say that for every difference of opinion between the two Houses there should be a dissolution.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I would not say that.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
And if his proposal involves a dissolution of the Senate also I am altogether opposed to it. (Hear, hear.) I believe one of the safeguards of the position of the Senate, both in regard to its steadying and controlling influences as a Second Chamber and in regard to its duties as representing the State, is that it should have the quality of permanence as far as possible. I believe it should be brought into direct touch with the people by continual renewal of its members by some such process as that provided in the draft Bill, but I certainly think it should not be in the position that a Government at any time it thought fit might dissolve the Senate and send it about its business. That would be placing a power in the hands of a Government for the time being which it should not possess over the States forming the Federation; so that this proposal to dissolve, if it involves dissolving the Senate, is one which I think is inconsistent with the true principles of Federation, and which it is not necessary to adopt. In regard to the referendum, I think that it is a kind of expedient which may be all very well in a small country like Switzerland, but as applied to the complicated kinds of questions which occur in our politics it would be a very unsatisfactory method of solution. I challenge anyone who takes that view to mention any measure in regard to which the public can give an intelligent and decisive opinion, "yes" or "no," without qualification. In nearly all cases the differences of opinion between the two parties who take opposite sides in a controversy are differences of opinion as to applications, as to methods, and as to a number of other things. It is very seldom you have differences so complete upon the principles of a measure that they can be settled by a "yes" or "no."

Dr. COCKBURN:
This question is the greatest of all, yet it is subject to the referendum.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
So it is that, with all questions which are the subject of differences of opinion between the two Houses, it is impossible to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion by the referendum. As to all other questions, there need be no method provided for settling conflicts between the two Houses; they should be able to settle their differences by that spirit of compromise which has actuated Houses in other places. I have dealt now with the question of the composition of the Senate as between itself and the federal authority. A question has arisen with regard to the mode of election. The mode of election provided by the draft Bill of 1891 is open to many objections, and one of the principal is that alluded to by the last speaker. But in other ways it is objectionable because it appears to me that you do not always in that way, by the election of both Houses of Parliament, however you may arrange it, get at the true expression of the opinion of the country, and it does not always result in the choice of the best men. Two results would follow the adoption of the method of popular election by the colony as one constituency, or by large constituencies. The first would be that your Senate would be a much more powerful body, because it would rest directly upon the vote of the people.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
And the responsibility as well.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It would have, also, a responsibility directly to the people, which would be another advantage. It would have the feeling of responsibility, and also the strength which that position would give, and in addition to that it would also result, I am confident, in the choice of better men than can be obtained under the system proposed in the draft Bill. Coming to the House of Representatives, I shall state very shortly my views, because I do not wish to detain the Convention at great length. Inasmuch as the House of Representatives represents the people as a whole, it appears to me that the mode of choosing those representatives should be left in the hands of the Federal Parliament. That must be done ultimately, but until the Federal Parliament has the opportunity of passing the measure it would be a very convenient thing to allow elections to go on upon the franchise of the popular House in each colony-to go on as provided in the draft Bill.

Mr. BARTON:
And according to the present suffrage?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Yes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
And allow plural voting?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Of course you must have some method of electing your first Parliament. For this Convention to undertake the work of harmonising each of the franchises of the different colonies would be an endless and unwise task. I say that for the first Parliament we may very well leave the mode of election to be that which is the popular mode in the different colonies.

Mr. PEACOCK:
The Act under which we sit sets that out.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
One of the first works of the Federal Parliament would be to enact some form of uniform franchise for the whole of the colonies, and I have no doubt it would be on the broadest possible basis. I pass on now to another question which has been dealt with by the speaker who has just sat down, namely, the question of the amendment of the Constitution. I hold a very strong opinion that an amendment of the Constitution should not be rendered an easy matter. I think the analogy from the method of amendment allowable in the local Legislature is altogether a misleading one. The local Legislature is made by the people of the State, and the people of the State only have any concern in it, but the Federal Legislature is a Legislature founded upon agreement come to by the different States and upon certain terms; and I say we should not allow those terms to be altered except after going through a very solemn process. It should not be in the power of the federal authority, or even the people of the Federation, upon any chance vote or temporary excitement, or the prevalence of any particular kind of interest, to bring about an alteration of the Constitution. It should be a solemn matter, which could be done only when by proper methods it had been ascertained that it was the will of the great majority of the thinking people of the Federation that an amendment should be brought about. That end can be best attained by surrounding the matter with those safeguards which are provided in the Bill. I should be sorry to see that amendment could be made easier than is provided for in the Bill. I should like to say a word now with regard to the Federal Court of Appeal, and I hope I may have the indulgence of the Convention in speaking at somewhat greater length than I intended, because I think it is a matter of much importance that our views should be freely given in regard to questions likely to be in controversy. In regard to the Court of Appeal I take this position: I think we have at the head of the judicial system in the colonies at the present time perhaps the most learned and the highest court of justice that exists anywhere, and we should not lightly give up the privilege of having our cases adjudicated in that court. I quite approve of the provision of making the Federal Court of Appeal accessible to suitors in the different colonies, but I would not make resort to that court obligatory. I would still preserve the right to go to the other court.

Mr. DEAKIN:
To either, but not to both.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Yes; to either, but not to both. The Court of Appeal here would have many advantages. It would be a Court of Appeal that might be an easier and cheaper process than appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. ISAACS:
Which litigant is to choose the Court?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
The appellant. The only person who has the right of choosing the tribunal is the plaintiff.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Very small choice, as a rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
The plaintiff's choice undoubtedly is limited, but I should give him the privilege, if he thinks fit, to go to the Privy Council in England.

Mr. GORDON:
If he has the money.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
If it comes to a question of money, I do not really know whether a Court of Appeal in these colonies would be cheaper than a Court of Appeal at Home. I think the hon. member will recognise that what makes the appeals expensive is not the process of the court, but the expenses necessarily incurred in employing gentlemen like ourselves who, unfortunately, have to live by these courts.

Mr. BARTON:
Why unfortunately?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I doubt very much whether the processes in that direction would be cheapened by the change. But I do say that we have in the English Court of Appeal a very high tribunal—a tribunal which is probably the highest of its kind in the world—a tribunal which has the advantage of knowing nothing whatever of the litigants, nothing whatever of the local circumstances. It is an advantage to have a tribunal like that, and I would have a strong objection to give up our rights of appeal to that tribunal unless we are to have strong advantages on the other side. I propose that for anyone who thinks fit to appeal to the Federal Court here it, should be the final court to both parties; but if he chooses to appeal to the higher court, he should be allowed to do so.

Mr. GORDON:

And drag the other man after him.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

You must drag the other man somewhere. It is a question whether it is wise to throw up altogether our right to appeal to one court for the sake of obtaining the right to appeal to another.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Would it not be better to allow the appeal to the Privy Council by the consent of the court here or by special leave of the Privy Council?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

It might be done.

Mr. BARTON:

Would it not be better to limit the class of cases in which you would allow a man to take the case to the Privy Council?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Yes; that too might be done. We might have limitations, but we should not give up entirely our right of appeal to the Privy Council. I have dealt with some of the most important matters under the head of the second resolution, about which it appears to me there is likely to be any controversy. I have not for a moment attempted to deal with all those questions, nor do I pretend that I have dealt with them in any way exhaustively, but it appeared to me that it would bible, come to know each others' views on these important questions. I propose now to deal shortly with some matters which are included in the first portion of the resolution, and which really involve the basis of Federation. The most important of these questions are involved in the first and fifth sub-heads of the resolution, and which embrace the consideration of how the railways of the Federation are to be treated. It will be admitted at once that the acquirement of the railways by the federal power is not necessary for Federation. Let us remember that the Australian railways occupy an entirely exceptional position. If the railways of the several colonies were in the hands of private companies, would it be contended that in order to have a complete Federation they would have to be acquired by the federal power; but in view of the necessity that traffic and intercourse, between the colonies shall be absolutely free, it becomes necessary to consider what shall be done with regard to the railways. We may take several things as being conceded. In the first place, it is idle to speak about trade and intercourse between the several colonies being free if the rates remain as they are at present, and I think it will also be admitted that all of us are prepared to recognise that in this Federation the interests of any State in the Federation, or any group of towns, are not to be favored, but that every portion of Australia is to have the benefit of the Federation, and that trade is to be permitted to flow in those channels in which it naturally would flow by geographical conditions. Any interference with that course of the trade through differential rates is for ever to cease as soon as we have federated. The only question is as to the best way to bring that about. Some persons have advocated the taking over of the railways by the Federal Government. I am opposed to that. I hold the view that however desirable it might be to have an ideal administration of the railways under our new Constitution, we cannot leave out of eight the present condition of things. We must remember that on this continent, taking it generally, we are without any great waterways. The railways are the roadways of the colonies; they are the only channels of communication, and they are built having regard to local requirements and the development of localities, and from this point of view they will always be better managed under a policy which has local things and local requirements only in view. Now, I suppose examples will occur to anyone who has thought the matter out that, in regard to a large number of railways the question of federal convenience and federal interchange of traffic is of no concern. The great bulk of the railways were laid for the purpose of advantaging localities, and for that reason it appears to me there is no necessity to place upon the shoulders of this Federation the enormous responsibility and the very heavy duties which would be involved in taking over these railways, because it means in the first place taking over some £110,000,000 worth of property; it means managing this great property; it means controlling an immense army of public servants who would come under that control; and although you might to a certain extent relieve the State of the responsibility of controlling the servants by a system of commissioners, such as prevails in Victoria, New South Wales, and other colonies, at the same time that only to a certain extent minimises the evil, and I think it is well to prevent as much as possible the Federation having upon its shoulders the care of any larger number of public servants than is absolutely necessary. I therefore submit that, unless a distinct advantage is shown in the taking over of the railways, unless it is shown that we cannot carry out the object we have in view in some other way, there is no necessity to take this very strong step of acquiring the railways. No doubt as time goes on perhaps it may be necessary for the Federation to construct lines which will be entirely upon the principle of federal convenience. No doubt power may be given to the federal authority to take over railways, and the construction of railways, but, of course, only with the consent of the State concerned, and with an equitable adjustment of value of the line affected, the money spent upon it, and the distribution of profits. But we may only concern ourselves with the existing state of things. What we really want to get at is how are we to arrange that these railways are to be run so that every portion of the Federation shall profit by its geographical position altogether irrespective of railway rates. That is to say, that the rates shall be arranged so that no colony shall be advantaged or disadvantaged by being served by one railway system more than another. The main difficulty is how to bring this about and yet preserve the control for local purposes, in the same way as now. Hon. members who reflect for a moment on the condition of things in England and America will see that there is no difficulty in dealing with this matter. In England, Ireland, and Scotland we know the railways are built under concessions given by the State, which has always placed restrictions against the rights being used in a particular way. Railway companies are not allowed to use their rights so as to prejudice or benefit one particular locality over another; and it has been found necessary to give power to the State to exercise its authority in seeing that the railways are constructed and run in such a way as to reasonably serve every person likely to use them. In America concessions are given in the same way and with the same limitations, but the difficulty has been found in practice both in England and America, in the absence of some authority, which has to decide as to the mode in which rates should be regulated, and whether localities are being advantaged or not by the running of the railways. That led to the establishment of an Inter-State Commission in 1887 under the provisions of the United States Constitution, which have very much the same purport as sections 11 and 12, Part IV. in the draft Bill. I have always held the opinion that sections 11 and 12 give ample power to the Federation to prevent the imposition of differential rates, which have obstructed the free passage of trade through all the colonies.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
That has been disputed.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I am only mentioning it for the purpose of showing that it was under consideration when the Bill of 1891 was last considered, but unfortunately, when the measure was discussed in committee, I noticed that diverse opinions were expressed concerning these clauses.

Mr. GORDON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
If there is one thing more than another we should endeavor to avoid it is the admission of doubtful language into this Constitution. If we are going to make up our minds that there is to be some provision that railway intercourse should be free of its present restrictions we should say so in language which would be unmistakable, and be free from ambiguity. Under similar provisions in the American Constitution a federal law was passed in 1887, which gave into the hands of a powerful Inter-State Commission the control of all questions relating to inter-state communication by railway, the Commission being also a tribunal. It gave to this tribunal first of all the duty of looking into the affairs of all the railway companies, examining their rates, and prohibiting the imposition of rates which gave to one State an advantage over another State. It contained a number of other powers—very large powers—which it is not necessary for me to enlarge upon at present. Although the exercise of these powers involved the abrogation of rights existing between railway companies, they scarcely interfered with the carrying out of the existing contracts, and must have very largely interfered with the value of investments in these railways, the advantages of the powers given to this Inter-State Commission were so obvious that the people of the United States passed it, while the whole thing worked in such a satisfactory way as to bring about equally satisfactory results. In England it was found necessary to establish a Commission very much on the same lines, and the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, which was passed in 1878, and provided for a Constitution on a similar basis. The Lord Chief Justice or the Lord Chancellor—I am not sure which—is one of the members, while a high dignitary in Scotland is an ex officio member, and there are other members possessed of expert railway knowledge who are appointed by the Government. This Commission is very much on the lines of the body established in America.
It sees that no advantage is given to the railways or to the inhabitants of one locality over those of another; and in that way it preserves the running of railways right through the United Kingdom on continuous lines, yet by different companies, in such a way that justice is done to every portion of the country served by those lines; and it takes precautions that one locality does not get an advantage to the detriment of another. Now, I can see no reason why we should not deal with the question on exactly the same lines. I can see no reason why in the first place we should not place in our Constitution a distinct prohibition against anything like the imposition of differential rates for the purpose of advantaging one colony over another or one locality over another. We should make provision to prevent preference being given to the ports of one colony over the ports of another colony, and we should make it plain that in the running of our railways there is to be no disadvantage accruing from residence in a particular locality or a particular colony. If a provision of that kind is placed in the Constitution, under it no doubt a Commission such as I have suggested may be appointed, and that Commission should be charged with the duty of administering that law, and also charged with a duty of another kind which will be very important in carrying on the railway work of these colonies. It will be admitted, perhaps, that one of the greatest difficulties in dealing With the question of railway communication hitherto has been the difficulty of arriving at any conclusion in regard to the break of gauge. That question has been agitated between the Governments of the different colonies and the Commissioners of the different colonies for many years, and they have never been able to arrive at a conclusion upon it. I think we may fairly hope that if the duties of this board are made of an advisory nature in regard to questions of that kind we shall very shortly have some method by which, upon a fair and equal distribution of the expenses of the operation between the different colonies, we shall have some solution of this difficulty of break of gauge. No one who reflects on the immense importance—not only for trade purposes, but for military purposes—of having a line of railway without a break can undervalue the importance of some such object being effected. My view of dealing with this railway question is that we might deal with it very much on the same lines as the railways in the United States and England are dealt with, and that this question of the transfer of railways, involving immense—in fact, unknown—responsibility, might very well be left alone. The principle which should guide us in this, as in all other matters, is that we should take all the responsibility that is necessary, that we should shrink from no responsibility which is necessary, but that we should take none upon ourselves that is unnecessary, and the objects and purposes of which are not absolutely essential to the Union. I should like to make a short reference to the financial question, which has been dealt with so clearly by Sir George Turner. I do not pretend for one moment to have the ability or the experience to express an opinion in controversy to what he has said. But I would like to say that, in regard to the consolidation of the public debts, it has always appeared to me that that consolidation would be of very little advantage to these colonies unless they can secure by such consolidation a very substantial reduction in interest. And it is a question to be very seriously considered whether the public creditor would regard it as an advantage to have the whole of the debts of these different colonies—practically secured as they are now by public works in the different colonies—handed over to a Federation which will have behind it the credit of the whole community, but which will not have those substantial guarantees of interest-producing assets.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
One stock instead of seven would be the main thing they would look at.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Of course I see the advantage of that; but, on the other hand, the question of the value of the security will be taken into consideration. That, however, is a matter upon which we shall rely very largely on the information we get from the financial committees, and from discussion in those committees. It is one of the most important questions we have to consider, and one of those upon which most of us feel diffident about expressing any definite opinion until we obtain that further information. I quite agree with the principle laid down by Sir George Turner, and that is that you must place in the hands of the federal authority the fullest powers of taxation. You must trust it with the fullest possible powers, and trust to the exercise of that supervision and control which the people must always exercise over any Government constituted such as ours. It is also obvious that, having handed over the full power of collection of Customs to the federal authorities, they must have a very much larger sum than they can possibly dispose of.

One of the disadvantages pointed out by Sir George Turner was the holding of a large balance, and the trouble then would be in the distribution to the various colonies. But I have no doubt that that distribution will take place equitably. I have expressed my views fully and as directly as possible upon the questions likely to be traversed. I feel sure that other members of the Convention will follow the same course. No doubt in the course of this discussion differences of opinion, and very strong differences of opinion, will be observed, but I hope that that spirit of compromise, which I am sure animates every member of this Convention, will be in evidence.

Mr. SOLOMON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. O’CONNOR:

The sense of the heavy responsibility of the great work we have in hand, and the feeling that that work is only to be accomplished by the exercise of the utmost possible spirit of compromise in our deliberations, will enable us to arrive at some definite conclusion upon these matters of difference. The work we have been sent to do here really involves that, and I have no doubt that by the time we get into Committee the work of the committees themselves, both by discussion in this chamber and by personal discussion, will have become easy. As to the final results, of course it is hard to foretell; but if the spirit which animates this gathering only continues to the end, the result will be a compromise of those difficulties which will result not only in a firm enduring basis of union, but in a Constitution which will be not only worthy of the federated Australia, but also of acceptance by the people who have sent us here to do this work. (Cheers.)

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I heartily indorse the admirable advice offered to us by the distinguished gentleman who is the Leader of this Convention that we should approach this subject with the full determina tion to accomplish Federation, and not with any idea of carrying out any preconceived and hide-bound notions of our own. But in doing that I think we have to bear in mind that, without giving regard to any notions of our own, we have to consider those notions which exist very largely in full strength in some of the States which we hope to see parties to this Union. We have, to accomplish Federation, to provide such a Constitution Bill as shall be acceptable not only to one or two or three of the States, but to all the States collectively. We are sent here by the people not to pass a Constitution, but to draft one which shall be tendered to the people for their acceptance or rejection, and we shall fail entirely in our mission, as I see it, if we have to offer to them a Constitution Bill which three or four of the colonies will utterly decline to have anything to do with. One of the points of danger that I see in our course is that we may make this Constitution Bill unpalatable to the people and the smaller States by reason of hesitation as to giving the Senate such full power as the smaller States demand for the preservation, not only of their State rights, but of their State interests. We have been told, and I think it is generally conceded, that the Senate is to have equal representation, that every State entering the Federation is to be represented by an equal number of members; but that, I think, will be of very little use to us of the smaller States if it is to be accompanied by a merely empty power which will serve no purpose whatever. It is claimed by the leading representative of Victoria that the Senate shall have no power whatever in amending Money Bills. In some of these colonies, at any rate in Tasmania, rightly or wrongly, the Legislative Council claims the right and exercises the right of amending Money Bills, and are we to deny to this Senate the power which is used and exercised not infrequently, rightly or wrongly - I believe wrongly - but which is exercised by the Legislative Council? I think that if we recognise the very broad distinction between this Senate and the Legislative Councils, and the difference of the relations between the Senate and the National Assembly, as compared with the Legislative Councils and the Houses of Assembly, we shall see at once that there is not any sort of comparison which should lead us to confine and limit the powers of the Senate as we would desire to limit and confine the powers of the Legislative Councils. The smaller colonies will have as their sole security against infringements of their rights and their interests that Senate in which they will have equal representation, and in which I claim they ought to have very considerable power. I believe, Mr. President, that even in the Convention of 1891 a larger measure of power would have been conceded to the Senate but for the fact that it was then claimed that the members of the Senate should be chosen by the Parliaments of the different colonies; and inasmuch as in two Parliaments of the continent of Australia the Legislative Councils are nominee bodies, the objection prevailed against giving a Senate chosen by a nominee body any large measure of power. I think that we are now agreed—that even Victoria, through the voice of her Premier has agreed—that the Senate shall be elected by the people on such franchise as may be prevailing in each particular colony. That being so, the Senate being equally representative of the people with the other branch of the Federal Legislature, there is no reason to my mind why we should hesitate to give very considerable power to it. On the question of the franchise, I hope we shall see the Senate made an elective body, elected by each of the colonies as one electorate.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

And on the popular franchise, the franchise in each colony of its House of Assembly. As regards the House of Representatives, or National Assembly, while I quite recognise the force of the argument that the franchise of that House should, be committed to the Federal Parliament, I think we have to bear in mind the fact that the franchise passed by the Federal Parliament might very well be one which would come into conflict with the local franchise for the election of our House of Assembly, and, unless that be regarded as an immaterial difficulty, the better course would seem to me to be that each colony should in the matter of the election of its representatives to the House of Representatives elect them on its own franchise, whatever that may be. And on this point Sir Samuel Griffith, who is a distinguished advocate of Federation, has written very strongly, and, as I think, very convincingly. He concludes his arguments against a federal franchise with this paragraph:—

The history of the United States affords at least one example of the working of the system of non-interference. An attempt to impose a uniform franchise as a condition of Federation would in all probability seriously delay its accomplishment, and a still more serious objection—sow the seeds of future dissension and discord.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Was he not speaking then of putting it in this Convention Bill?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I read him as speaking generally on the federal franchise. Whatever the local franchise may be, whether it be the exceedingly broad one of South Australia or the sufficiently liberal one of Tasmania, one can very well understand that the people of each colony would desire to have the right reserved of maintaining its franchise if in its wisdom it thought proper to do so. In Tasmania we have a franchise which does not extend to women, but which gives a vote to every man who deserves it.

Mr. ISAACS:

What is the test?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

A vote, is given to every man who deserves it, in this sense—that he is a taxpayer, that he is a man who is his own breadwinner, and that he is earning sufficient to keep himself. He is entitled to vote, though he might only contribute to the taxation through the Customs, on the principle that all taxpayers are entitled to a voice in the representation of the colony.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

How many votes can one man have?

Mr. REID:

As many as he deserves.

Mr. ISAACS:

The theory apparently is that he deserves as many as he can get.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

One man by the extent or location of his property may have a dozen votes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

But it is not because he deserves a dozen votes, but because, by accident, his property happens to be distributed over different electoral districts, that he has a plurality of votes. It is a difficulty which could very readily be got over, and it has been got over in the case of the election of representatives to this Convention, by treating the colony as one electorate. Sir George Turner, in regard to the Senate being restricted to the power of veto in respect to Money Bills, said that no such difference between the Senate and Legislative Council would justify this. Well, I hope that on further consideration of this matter he will see that there is such a difference as will justify a very considerable difference in the treatment of the Senate as compared with the Legislative Council; and I hope also that he and others who are earnest in the cause of Federation, even though they feel as Sir George Turner has spoken in regard to the limitation of the Senate's power, will bear in mind that the smaller colonies have to be induced to come into this Federation by some assurance at the outset that their rights and interests will be safeguarded through the Senate. For my own part I am convinced that we may trust ourselves with perfect security to the National Assembly when Federation is accomplished, and we have this large Assembly representing the Commonwealth when all local jealousies and all parochial interests and feelings will die out, and there will be an honest and loyal endeavor on the part of every member, or at least a majority of the members, of the Assembly, to deal fairly with all States, large or small; but it may not be easy to persuade the people of the smaller colonies to accept or reject this Bill, and convince them, as I am convinced, that it is perfectly safe to entrust ourselves to the hands of the National Assembly. They know, as we all know, that in the National Assembly the two large colonies will outvote the smaller ones by something like two to one, and that any one of the two colonies, New South Wales or Victoria, will have just as full a representation as the four smaller ones collectively.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

It is more than that. They have seventy-seven to thirty-four.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

We have, I think, to give the fullest consideration to that, and to be actuated in all our dealings with this great question by a desire to earn the confidence of the people and to ensure the inclusion in the first Federation of all the five colonies on the continent and Tasmania. We must give some consideration to the question of meeting the difficulty of deadlocks between the two Houses. Sir George Turner prefers the referendum, and I think myself it is a very admirable method by which the popular voice can be obtained when the two Houses of a provincial Parliament differ on matters of great public moment. For many simple questions that arise in our local Parliaments the referendum, I have no doubt, is the best solution of a difficulty; but the referendum will not do at all in the case of a deadlock between the Senate and the House of Representatives in the Federal Parliament. If it were made a referendum to the people it is obvious that the smaller States must go to the wall.

Mr. ISAACS:
No.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
The great preponderance of population is in the larger colonies, and a referendum must go against the smaller colonies.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I do not propose that.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
If I understand it, the alternative is to have it of the States and also of the people of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There is one referendum, but you must have a majority of both.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Victoria does not know what referendum it means.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
That appears to be the case.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That will bring you back to the same difficulty as before.

Mr. BARTON:
Then you would have the same opinion as the representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Then the dispute would be in favor of the objectors. The objectors would succeed.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I hope very sincerely that Sir George Turner will be able to show us a method that we can adopt, and which will commend itself as being an effectual solution of the difficulty. At present, although I am in favor of the referendum on general principles, and see how it can be wisely adopted upon simple questions, when people can answer "aye" or "no," I do not see that the referendum will get us out of a difficulty in the case of differences between the Senate and the House of Representatives. The alternative of Sir George Turner is a joint dissolution, and if we are to adopt, as I think he advises, our present constitutional form of government, a joint dissolution would not be the proper method to take in that particular case. Another idea has been suggested, and an idea that would suggest itself naturally to everyone, and that is of both Houses sitting together, but, obviously, I think that in that case the smaller States would be bound to see the same objection as to the referendum or any other method which brought population into the scale as against the intelligence, the wishes, and the interests of the smaller States. If the two Houses sat together and the larger States in the House of Representatives were in accord upon any point, the two Houses sitting together would be utterly incapable of carrying any point in favor of the smaller States. I do not care to be urging always the claims of the smaller States for consideration, as if it were something in regard to which I had a personal wish, but if I ask for consideration for the smaller States, it is for the one great reason that I want the people of the smaller States to come in. That is all. I am not speaking as for myself, but I am speaking - as I believe I am entitled to do - for all the people of those smaller States upon whose good will and vote the success of the Federation movement depends. I imagine there will be little difference of opinion concerning the election or appointment of the Governor-General. We are to frame a Constitution under the Crown, and if we are to carry out the injunctions of the Federal Enabling Act, there is only one course open to us, and that is to proceed as we have hitherto done by acting under a Governor-General appointed by the Crown. Following that comes the question how the Government is to stand in its relation to the two Houses, and whether we are to proceed under our ordinary Constitution as we know it - that Constitution which is familiar to us - or adopt some other method. If we are to adhere to our ordinary constitutional methods I see myself no way of effectively dealing with this matter except by making the Ministry of the day responsible, and responsible alone, to the House of Representatives. I cannot understand how, unless we adopt the valuable suggestion made by Sir Richard Baker, and proceed on some method other than the one with which we are familiar, we can effectively carry on the business of the Federal Parliament. It is clear to my mind that we could not have a Government in power which had not the confidence of the House of Representatives, which for the main part will have committed to it the charge of the public purse. Although there is considerable scope for argument amongst those committees which will be appointed to discuss questions, this is not one of those points as to which we should encounter any great difficulty. One of the great questions we have to deal with is necessarily finance, and it is impossible, even if it were expedient, to speak on this subject at any great length, or go into details before the Finance Committee give us that full information on which it may be possible for us to base our opinions. In connection with this great question of finance I should hope we shall follow the advice of Sir George Turner, and go for economy in the Constitution of the Federal Legislature.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

And also in connection with the whole of the federal machinery. Sir George Turner would have the number of senators reduced from eight to six, and the number of members of the House of Representatives from one in 30,000 to one in 40,000 or 50,000. I think we might go even further than that, and reduce the number of senators to four for each State, and the number of members in the National Assembly from one in thirty thousand to one in fifty thousand. And if we did that, and also reduced the amount which it was proposed by the Convention of 1891 to pay the several members, i.e., £500 to £250 per year, we should secure a reduction of £60,000 at one fell swoop—we should secure a reduction from £84,000 to £24,000 a year.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You must not forget they have to live away from their homes for many months.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

For three months. No doubt the first sitting of the Federal Parliament will be a long one, because in that Session they will have to frame a federal Customs tariff, but, after the first sitting, no doubt the transactions of the Federal Parliament will be of an exceedingly simple character, and occupy a very small amount of time. There is this also to be borne in mind, that we might very well depart from the provisions of the Bill of 1891, or rather the determination of the 1891 Convention, in regard to allowing members of the States Parliaments to be elected as members of the Federal Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I can conceive of no reason whatever why a member of one of the States Parliaments should not be eligible for membership in the Federal Parliament, provided that the Sessions were held at different times, as I imagine they would be. There would be no objection in point of time, and there would be every reason to argue in favor of it, not only from the point of view of expediency, but also of the capability of representatives. And if it were held that no member of a States Parliament should be eligible to be a member of the Federal Parliament, in some of the colonies there would be a difficulty encountered, because either the States Parliament would have to be denuded of a considerable part of the talent upon which it depended, or else the Federal Parliament would be supplied with an inferior body of representatives. There are not many men, as far as my knowledge goes, seeking public life over and above the actual demand for representatives in the colony. In the case of Tasmania, at the Convention election, out of thirty-two candidates twenty-five are members of Parliament of one House or the other, and, of the remaining seven, all but two had been members of Parliament or aspirants for that honor. That shows, to my mind, that there is, at any rate in Tasmania, that slowness on the part of the public—that want of leisure, perhaps, on the part of the people—which prevents them from coming forward and acting as public servants in the Parliament of the States or in the Federal Parliament. I think there might very well be some cons-siderable saving effected in respect of the Federal Court of Appeal. I do not know whether I have been accurately informed, but I have it in my mind that Sir Samuel Griffith had put down the cost of the Federal Court of Appeal at something like £16,000 a year. Now, there seems to be an opinion here, judging by the "hear, hears" that accompanied some of the suggestions made in the direction, that we should retain our present mode of appeal to the Privy Council. There is every reason, at any rate, why in South Australia they should desire to do so, because South Australia has the distinguished honor of sending to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council its own Chief Justice. If we are to retain that form of appeal, although we give some other, I put it to hon. members of this Convention whether it would not be advisable to obtain through the Chief Justices of the different colonies some form of Federal Court which would answer all local purposes without being a very considerable charge upon the people of the colonies. And, proceeding in the direction of economy, I would point out that in the event of our loans being consolidated—and I apprehend that that is the only way we can arrange satisfactorily for the handing over to the Federal Government of the collection of all our Customs duties—the payment of the interest on the debts of these different colonies would be made by the Federal Parliament. Having regard to that, I think we ought to consider what the position is, and what we shall attain as the consequence of handing over this charge to the Federal Government. We should undoubtedly, as I see it, effect an early saving of a very large amount of interest by the conversion of our States bonds into a Commonwealth stock. There can be very little question about that, even if the value of the security as a Commonwealth security rather than a provincial one did not affect very largely the price at which we should have to convert. But we should also by that proceeding effect a very considerable saving in the cost of management.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I presume, almost as a matter of course, that, Federation being accomplished, there would not be an Agent-General for each of the colonies, but a High Commissioner for all, and by handing over to him the duty discharged to a very great extent by the Agent-General of South Australia (Mr. Playford) I believe the management of the payment of interest and so forth would save that large part of the charge which now falls upon the individual colonies to the extent of £400 to £500 for every million of debt. In the consolidation of these debts I can see no reason whatever why any difficulty should arise in regard to the transfer by the States to the Federal Parliament of their railways, or any other public works whatever.

Mr. GLYNN:
Hear, hear.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
These debts are raised not upon this or that particular public work but upon the public credit. The security is the consolidated revenue of each colony, and, that being so, it will be sufficient that that security should remain what it is, the security of the good faith of the Commonwealth, which surely should be equal to the security of the good faith of the individual colonies concerned. It would be impossible for some colonies to hand over in any way as security all of the public works upon which borrowed money has been expended. We in Tasmania could not very well hand over a lot of our roads which have been constructed out of public money. If a receiver were appointed, I do not know that he could go and receive anything out of these roads, although he might wear his boots out walking about them.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That would be a debit, not an asset.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I think that the general feeling of this Convention is that it is desirable that we should not hand over to the Federal Government so large an amount of revenue as would lead it on in the paths of extravagance. The suggestion of Sir George Turner is that we should hand them over something less than they have actually to spend, and so let them start with a deficit.

Mr. BARTON:

A pity they could not treat us so in return.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

That possibly is a method which suggested itself from local causes to Sir George Turner—from the local coloring which favors the idea of a standing and continual deficit as a wholesome corrective.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

So it is a corrective for all extravagance.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I think that, as Sir Samuel Griffith has pointed out, the necessity of at any rate withdrawing the temptation to extravagance from the Federal Government has a natural sequence in the consolidation of the debt and the handing over of the payment of interest to the Federal Government. We give them our Customs duties, which amount to about £7,000,000, and ask them to pay away interest on the national debt, which is £7,000,000 at present, but is reducible, possibly, by a considerable sum. It has been estimated that it may be reduced by £1,000,000 by a wise system of conversion, and if we do that and keep the Federal Government sufficiently supplied with money for defences which might not be the amount we now spend, but something less, we should make ample provision for federal necessities.

Mr. FRASER—They will supply this by taxation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

It may be done by taxation applied by the Federal Government and Parliament, or by contribution of the different States. I do not think any difficulty would arise from that, because we already contribute our quota towards the support of various defence forces, and some of us contribute something towards the deficiency between revenue and expenditure of the postal and telegraph service. Whether it was by contribution or by direct taxation raised for a specific purpose is not very material. It would necessarily follow under a system of Federation not only that there should be a federated defence—and as to this there is a common agreement throughout the colonies, whether people believe in Federation or not—but also that we should have as a necessary corollary to Federation intercolonial free trade—the fullest possible trade opened up for us throughout all the colonies entering the Federation; and I hope that this free trade, which some of us have longed for for many years, will be an immediate accompaniment of Federation, and adorn and crown it from the very start. I do not think it is incumbent upon us at present to select the federal capital. I believe there are those who are in this difficulty—that they have promised three or four different centres that they shall all be the federal capital; and unless we are to have a perambulating central Government it is difficult to see

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
On the top of Mount Wellington?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
And that very large question of the amendment of the Constitution is one that I think may be left for calmer deliberation than we can bring to bear upon it here at this moment—for deliberation after we have consulted more closely together, and heard all the arguments this way and that in favor of any particular method by which that Constitution may be amended. We shall, I imagine, recognise to the fullest extent that it is not desirable to make any amendment of the Constitution easy of accomplishment. It should not be a Constitution that can be changed lightly at the will of this or that section of the community, but something that can only be changed after the wisest and fullest consideration, and after due deliberation by a body which shall possess the complete confidence of the great mass of the people throughout the colonies. Having offered these few remarks on the whole question, I would only say that I fully indorse all that is contained in the motion of the Hon. Mr. Barton, with this reservation, that in subclause 3 there should be some proviso. The sub-clause reads:—

That the exclusive power to impose and collect duties of Customs and Excise, and to give bounties, shall be vested in the Federal Parliament.

I quite agree with that, but I think it ought to be expressed that so much is stated with the understanding that the concession should be accompanied by something more, that is to say, that in yielding up to the Federal Parliament the imposition and collection of these duties, we should also impose on the Federal Government and Parliament the obligation of paying the interest on the consolidated debt.

Mr. BARTON:
That is a controversial matter you can consider in Committee.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Then I would make this remark, that I think the motion requires amendment in the first major clause:

That, in order to enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australia:

Now we meet here under an Enabling Act which speaks of the framing and accepting and enactment of a Federal Constitution for Australasia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That is evidently a slip of the pen.

Mr. BARTON:
It is a slip.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I do not know whether it will be necessary to move a formal amendment.

Mr. BARTON:
No.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Then I will not move one, but I hope to see the word "Australasia" substituted for "Australia."

Mr. BARTON:
If it may be done I will be pleased if the word can be altered with the consent of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT:
That leave be granted to amend the resolution.

Leave granted.

Mr. GLYNN:
I am sure that it will not be expected from every member of this Convention to travel over those points in connection with Federation upon which I deem we are in accord. When the matter of the resolution as against going into Committee on the Bill of 1891 was mooted, I ventured with some deference to make a suggestion that perhaps the essential and most important matters might be embodied in a resolution for treatment in Committee, as I think that there are only four or five important matters which can lead to differences of opinion between the members of the Convention, and it will be advisable to direct our criticism to those and those alone. I assume that on such matters as the equality of representation in the Senate there can be no vital difference of opinion. I do not think we will fall in with the Canadian or the Germanic Confederation of having a disparity in the representation. I assume that our ideas of Federation are fairly embodied in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, and, from public opinion, I judge it is necessary to have an equal representation of the colonies. We do pay some respect to public opinion, and hope with the great motive power of public opinion to make Federation a reality; and it would be absolutely impossible to draw in the smaller States if they were to come in as subordinates, which a disparity of representation would involve. There are such matters as the appointment of a Federal Supreme Court of Appeal upon which we are in perfect agreement. A useful suggestion has been thrown out by the last speaker, that perhaps we should take advantage of the Chief Justices of the colonies. I confess that it is an idea which struck me also. The proposal in the Bill of 1891 was to create a judiciary of four members, with a Chief Justice, at a considerable expense; but we must not be too slavish in following others. When the American Confederation was formed there were fourteen States banding together with a reserved territory which, I think, has since provided thirty or thirty-four additional States; and it was the possibility of a diversity of relations, and the growth of complications in the way of commerce and trade, which were likely to be exceedingly numerous, that made it necessary to create for federal purposes a tribunal that would settle all moot points which might spring up from time to time. Of course with some diffidence I venture to think that there is not the same possibility of intercolonial differences in Australia, with its seven States, and little room for territorial expansion, as in America, and that the likelihood of them is exceedingly remote. It is not advisable to create a tribunal at a very large expense and for its functions to approach to almost zero. We might follow in the lead of England, where the Courts of Appeal are constituted not only of the High Court of Justice, but of Divisional Judges.

Mr. SYMON:

Like the old Court of Exchequer.

Mr. GLYNN:

Yes, as my honorable friend, Mr. Symon, reminds me, like the old Court of Exchequer. So that upon this point it is possible there will be considerable economy. The Federal Judiciary, I take it, is essential to Federation. As regards the conversion of debt, undoubtedly we cannot expect much saving from that as the result of consolidation. It has the merit of absorbing, through the payment of interest, that surplus of which Sir George Turner is so fearful, and it has the incidental advantage of giving a uniformity to our stock. I do not for one moment think it will give a greater idea of our solvency, because there never has been the smallest dread of repudiation. Here there was absolutely none. Of course there have been differences in the prices of the bonds, but that has been due to temporary disturbances in the colonies, or excessive expenditure in public works amounting to overloading. Stock which stood at £93 a few years ago is now at a premium in the English market. There have been fluctuations, but it was apparent only in the price; and, if we take a series of years, the stock has not declined, but has risen with the progress of the colonies; unless there has been some cause operating to the contrary, as I may say, without being invidious, was the case in Victoria, where from 1886 to 1890 seventeen and a half millions of public money were spent, causing, of course, subsequently, a temporary recession in the value of the stock. We cannot expect very much in the way of conversion except when the bonds mature; for, as has been pointed out by Sir George Turner, if you convert bonds before they mature you will have to pay for it. When Mr. Goschen in 1884 converted between 500 and 600 million pounds of stock, the bonds were either absolutely due at the time, or were bonds which could be converted at twelve months' notice, and Mr. Goschen's skill as a financier was shown in his correct anticipations as to the extent to which bondholders would agree to the conversion. As regards this matter of a deadlock in a particular colony, it might be regarded as a small matter. I believe in the principle of allowing the Upper House to amend Money Bills. I listened to the very clear speech of Mr. O'Connor. It was excellent in matter, and admirable in its manner of treatment, and of a moderation of temper, towards which I wish I could approximate, but unfortunately I cannot do that because I suffer under, shall I say, the disadvantage of having been born in the country from which he is a descendant of one remove. He would not give the Upper House co-ordinate powers, and in that I differ from him. The Senate, as a body, is distinct from the Upper House in a consolidated form of government. The origin of the distinction in England was, of course, that the right of taxation was reserved to the people. The Upper House did not represent the people; it represented a particular class of people who, as a portion of the people, had representation in the Lower House, and, as a class, had a distinct power in the State. We are not bound to follow the anomaly, and it is important that there should be greater vested power in the Senate that would take place under a consolidated system. It has been said by Bagelot that undoubtedly by giving the Senate co-ordinate powers with the Lower House it would open the way to many deadlocks. We must not follow too closely the opinions of pedants on this point. Are we called upon to anticipate the probability of deadlocks? If we are, I trust very largely to the good sense of the people. I say, further, that if a deadlock occurs in connection with a money matter in the Appropriation Bill, and if the Upper House insists upon interference, and a deadlock ensues, it will open up the way to a revolution. Their fear of such a thing occurring will operate as a sanction to prevent it. As regards other matters referred to by Mr. O'Connor, and with reference to deadlocks over a point of policy, my answer is this: If it does occur the result of the deadlock is simply to postpone public opinion on that point for the time being. Should there be a temporary deadlock I do not think there would be much evil resulting from that, and I still trust to the good sense of the people to rectify matters.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I only spoke of it in regard to the ordinary annual appropriation.

Mr. GLYNN:

On that point the question of Money Bills comes in again. If they are blocked, the whole of the machinery of Federation will be clogged. The evil resulting from that state of affairs would be so great as to act as a deterrent against the possibility of it occurring. Mr. O'Connor spoke about allowing the two Houses to sit together. If you once begin this course of joining the two Houses together you will have it open to evils similar to those which attended the system in Switzerland. As regards the question of the appointment of the Executive, I have to differ from Sir Richard Baker, the representative of South Australia, though I am still open to conviction after further argument. I find that responsible government, so far from being, as he suggested, out of sympathy with the vital principle of Federation, is being advocated for introduction there, upon which point I would like to read what Simon Sterne says in his book on the constitutional history of America. That author advocated a resort to responsible government. Mr. Sterne said:

The further advantage expected to be derived from having the Cabinet or Ministry connected with the popular branch of the legislative body is that in that way some more responsibility will attach for the legislation of the congressional session to the Government in power. One of the serious defects of all American legislation is the almost entire absence of responsibility connected with legislation.

As regards the difference in sympathy with the people towards these respective systems - the Cabinet system and the system of responsible government, and the one suggested to have a fixed Executive like that adopted under the Swiss Constitution-I agree that we ought to follow the course of the Constitution in England. It has been said by a writer on the constitutional question:

You might as well adopt a father as make a monarchy. The special sentiment belonging to the one is as incapable of voluntary creation as the peculiar affection belonging to the other.

The great merit of the English constitutional system is that there you have a united Cabinet. You cannot have that under the Swiss system of administration. You also have the fusion of legislative and executive powers. This very writer upon the American Constitution to whom I have referred shows a degree of responsible government which would cover that and ought to be introduced into America. Then you have—which is a very great quality of the British Constitution—the power of accommodation to any emergency that may arise. If the Government in power is out of sympathy with the people an adverse vote in Parliament will immediately effect a change; but under the American system, if at the time of the outbreak of the Civil War a President had not been in power who for I may say also that, as regards the objection of my friend Sir Richard Chaffey Baker to the continuance of the Cabinet system, it seems to me to carry him a little too far, because it is really applicable, to some extent, in our consolidated systems here. The very fact that we have an Upper House shows there is an assumed necessity for a certain class being represented in a different manner to those of the Lower House; but we refuse the Upper House any control over the appointment of Ministers except such as the trend of the debates in that House can exercise on the opinions of members of the Lower House. On this point Sir Richard Baker referred to the experience of Canada, and I think he mentioned that between 1862 and 1864 there were several changes of Ministry; but that occurred prior to its present Federation. It occurred under the consolidation of the Canadas, so that his argument really tells from the opposite point of view; but as a matter of history the changes which took place then resulted from the fact that Upper and Lower Canada were to be equal in point of representation, and that Upper Canada, as its population increased, sought in 1840 for a redistribution of seats, and the majority that would turn the scale one way or another was too small to render permanence of Ministerial position probable. As the result of this unfortunate state of affairs, a coalition Ministry was formed on the basis of the introduction of Federation, so that Sir Richard Baker's argument, instead of applying against the Cabinet system, really tell for it, because the evils that occurred did not occur under the federal system.

Mr. BARTON:

It was not used as against the Cabinet system, but to show the impossibility of dealing with both local and national affairs in one Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN:

The comparative weakness of the Canadian Federation is due to its being too much impregnated with the monarchical element. Freeman says:

On the whole, the general teaching of history is to show that, though a monarchical Federation is by no means theoretically impossible, yet a republican Federation is far more likely to exist as a permanent and flourishing system. We may, therefore, in the general course of comparison, practically assume that a Federal State will also be republican State.

Of course that would not tell against our Federation, because we really set up a crowned republic. The Canadian system is a peculiar one. It really is more of the old and gradually becoming obsolete form of monarchical government than you will find under the system which is represented in the United Kingdom itself. Federation, as far as we know it in its true sense, under responsible government was not granted to Canada till 1847, though the first Federation was in 1840. Coming to the question of the suffrage, Mr. Barton, in his very clear and able speech, says that the question of disparity in the suffrages of the States is not one that would affect the Federal Parliament at all as a whole. I differ from him on this point. In the older countries of the world they are coming gradually to uniformity of suffrage. Divergences in the franchise have been the cause of trouble between England and Ireland and the cause of constitutional troubles in England. Could it be said that it would have no effect upon the Federation, as a whole, if one State elected its members on a different franchise to the others? In a Federation you have consolidation to some extent if you have the direct powers of the citizens over taxation and executive control; therefore, I say it is a matter which affects all the States, whether one or more of their number returns members on a less liberal franchise than the others.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Mr. Barton agrees with that.

Mr. GLYNN:

I understood that Mr. Barton's argument was that the question of diversities of suffrage was one which the federated government need not really, and logically could not, trouble about.

Mr. BARTON:

What I argued was that it rested with the Federal Parliament to fix the franchise for the federated people.

Mr. GLYNN:

I understood that he said it was not a matter for this Convention at all, because they should not dictate to the other colonies as to the suffrage upon which each should send its representatives to Parliament.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

The first Parliament?

Mr. BARTON:

I said the first election should be on the existing suffrages, and then the federated Parliament should fix the suffrage for the federated people.
Mr. GLYNN:

Then I pass the question by. Mr. O'Connor referred at considerable length and with considerable force to the question of railways. Upon this question I differ from him. I think we ought to take over the railways; and at the risk of trespassing further than I intended upon the time of the Convention, I will endeavor to advance evidence incidental to my argument. We cannot raise the issue in the abstract between State and private ownership of the railways, as the principle of State ownership has been accepted by the colonies; but indirectly it arises, as under a Federation the individual colonies would be private owners in respect to the central body, and therefore whatever objections can be urged against private ownership in general would apply with equal, if not greater, force to the separate ownership of the States. The experience of England has been reflected by reports from experts which should guide us here. Whatever has been urged against the system of separate management as against amalgamations or State control will tell in respect of the Federation and the individual States, should they retain the railways. Mr. O'Connor, in support of his opinion that the solution of the question is parliamentary control without ownership, referred to the working of the English Railway Acts and the Inter-State Railway Commission in America; but what is the case in England? The Act to which he referred was I think the Act of 1888, and was one which I respectfully submit to this Convention the States, if federated, would not tolerate. The States would never tolerate an Act of the Federal Parliament which would interfere with local opinions and policies on the question of rates and management if the present system of separate ownership be continued. They might as regards intercolonial trunk lines, but the lines from which they get their results and do greatest injury through differential rates are local lines. I say it is exceedingly unlikely that an Act as stringent in its power and interference with private ownership as that passed in 1888 would be tolerated here.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I did not advocate it, but only referred to the principle of it.

Mr. GLYNN:

My argument amounts to this: that you cannot give effective control over these matters such as Mr. O'Connor advocated by Act of Parliament. In England and America the control system has failed, and I think amalgamation is preferable, because it would promote economy and get rid of the differential tariffs and destroy secret rebates. Upon this point let me quote to the Convention a work on "National Railways," published in 1895 by James Hole. He states:
The Inter-State Commerce Committee has so far been able to exercise very little control over the American lines, and it is now said to be a thing of the past except in name. It seems rather a body for collecting statistics of the railways than to possess any power to check their aberrations. It reports that the increase in railway capital for the year (to 30th June, 1890) is 538,079,233 dollars, of which at least 250,000,000 dollars is due to the increase of capitalisation on lines already in existence, and states that whether or not this represents the true increase in value of railway property is a pertinent question. Very pertinent indeed, we should say.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Who is Hole?

Mr. GLYNN:
He is a man who has had, shall I say, the audacity to study the subject and put his views into print, and I think his opinion must therefore be presumably entitled to some weight, more, at all events, than any unsupported one of mine. As regards English experience he says:

In the Act of 1888 a proviso was passed that there should be no preference of the foreign over home produce, yet the report of the Railway Rates Committee of the Central Chamber of Agriculture (April 5th, 1892) says: -"Your Committee desire to draw special attention to the fact that, notwithstanding the provisions of the Act of 1888, they have received reliable information that instances continue to exist of preferential charges in favor of foreign."

Now, let me refer to one who at all events is a high authority, that is Sir Henry W. Tyler, who gave evidence upon this aspect of the question of State ownership before a Committee of the Lords and Commons which sat in England in 1872. By the way, this committee states in its report that competition must fail to do for railways what it does for other trades, and no means can be devised by which competition can be permanently maintained. The evidence of this expert, who had nineteen years' experience as an inspector of railways, was to this effect:

No one who is not actually engaged in the working of the railways, or in watching the details of their working, can have any idea of the unnecessary cost, labor, and obstruction to traffic which arise from the diversities of interests and management of various companies.

He said that they stood upon their legal rights, and defied control. Again, the suggestion by this expert was that the State ought to take over the railways, that amalgamation would be the best thing for economical purposes and generally in the interests of the public weal. He said that you could take advantage of the existing boards at the outset. That principle would be analogous to what one might suggest for the colonies. A local board could take control of the local management for the purposes of the Federation, and then the railways could not, as they do now, mutually destroy one another. This expert says:

Their attention being devoted not to competing with each other, but to the organisation of improvements, not for the benefit of their individual lines, but for the general public.

I need not refer at any greater length to the success of the systems in America and England. We know railways are an absolute public necessity, capable of being a monopoly, and therefore should not be in private hands, as shown by experience in England and America, and to some extent in India, where the system has led to considerable waste; and latterly in England for the purposes of economy they have been amalgamating management, and the greater number of the companies are now managed by twelve big boards representing combinations of various companies. As regards America, from the point of view of the subserviency by these companies of the interests of the public, the Farmers' Alliance, whose sphere of influence extended right through the United States, a few years ago complained of the evils to which I have made reference in this quotation, and demanded:

That the means of communication and transportation shall be owned by, and operated in the interest of, the people, as in the United States postal system.

Now, I might perhaps refer to some of the advantages of the system of central control. The authority to whom I have referred-Hole, on National Railways-said:

An amalgamation of competing lines is the only way to prevent a war of rates and consequent ruin to capital involved. But amalgamation not controlled by the State is another name for public robbery.

He recommended, and every other witness recommended, amalgamation on the score of economy. He suggested that:

It would be a great step in advance to have all the roads unite; put all cars into a common stock, and let them be distributed, record kept of movements, and mileage paid through a general clearing house.

Mr. FRASER:

That is done in England.

Mr. GLYNN:

It is gradually being done during the last thirty or forty years. It has not yet been effected in England, because there exists there over all the lines of England twelve different bodies of management. To some extent they are bodies similar to those which we would have under the Federation, and I think I am entitled to rely on the balance of evidence being in favor of the amalgamation of the control of our federated railways. I think I can say, therefore, without expressing my opinion emphatically, that from many, points of view federated Australia would benefit by placing the railways under a central federal control; it would promote economy; it would get rid of the multiplicity of accounts, to which reference has been made, and which we have here; it would prevent the waste consequent upon differential tariffs; it would lead to a uniformity of gauge; it would reduce the mileage of purely political lines to the true requirements of the district; and it would minimise the possibility of the railway vote becoming a power in politics. I have heard it stated that under Federation the railway vote would be greater than now, but the answer is clear. The power of a great number of unions is small. We know that the unions in England are losing their influence through the extension of their numbers, and it would be the same here. The effective power of the railway vote would be less in the Federation than it would be in relation to local politics under our present system. Supposing that some trouble arose in South Australia, through their power of combination the men would be able to attract votes to whatever extent might be possible, with far more effectiveness than in a federated body, because you would have a check on the discontented South Australians in the power of the other colonies. When the big strike took place here several years ago, we know that it was a failure; and when the strike occurred at Broken Hill, it did not lead to a general strike; and for this reason I believe that, instead of increasing the vesting of the control of the railways in a central Government, would decrease the political power of the railway vote. It is admitted that our great trunk lines are already federated, and, as Sir George Turner has suggested, this control might be given to the central body, but that the smaller lines might still be under local management. It is, however, in connection with these smaller lines that the trouble exists.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Would you hand over all our suburban railway lines?

Mr. GLYNN:

I see no absolute reason why not.

Mr. BARTON:

And the cable tramway in King-street, Sydney?

Mr. GLYNN:

It is not a railway.

Mr. BARTON:

It is part of our railway system, and is under the Railway Commissioners.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Would you take over the Melbourne trams?

Mr. GLYNN:
The remedy is very easy, and can be settled in Committee. What properly does not belong to the Commissioners' control can be left out. We have an example of railway federation in Switzerland, where, in 1890, they initiated a policy for the purchase of the cantonal railways. I think it was rejected on a referendum, but it resulted in the resignation of a president. Again in Austria-Hungary, you have a pooling of the railways.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Would you have the Federation to buy the railways?

Mr. GLYNN:
Yes. Before I sit down I will suggest, of course with a certain amount of deference to other opinions, my ideas as to how the purchase can be brought about. The Prussian Government has the control of 14,000 miles of State railways, and the greater portion of it has been secured by purchase. The Germanic Federation in their articles have taken power to construct railways.

Mr. WISE:
I think you will find they take the railways over.

Mr. GLYNN:
I am sure about Prussia, and I saw that the Germanic articles give the power to construct lines and add to existing lines, even if there is local objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
There is the military system.

Mr. GLYNN:
We have the military system here. You are going to give the control of the military to the Federal Government.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We are not going to have a standing army.

Mr. GLYNN:
Then the question of break of gauge is mixed up in this railway question. It is really connected with the military system. Members of this Convention will remember the reports which were presented by Generals Edwards and Hunter upon the question of the break of gauge in reference to the military question. Both point out that the difficulties caused by breaks of gauge are enormous in time of war through transhipment of horses and ammunition and duplication of trains. We have reports from
Mr. Eddy, and in 1889 he says:

I beg of all to give this matter most careful consideration, and let us by-and-by be looked upon as benefactors in connection with our railways, and not twenty years hence—when the bill has to be paid for altering, and possibly twenty or thirty times as great as it would be to-day—charged with shortsightedness.

It has been asked whether I would advocate the purchase of the lines, whether we should take over the national debts of the colonies or not. The taking over of the lines must be done by purchase. It is really a matter of counting the price, and it would be a question of settling differences. The solution I would suggest is that the cost be ascertained by the federated colonies on some uniform basis. That might be done for the five years before the year of purchase. The percentages of the net revenue on such ascertained capital cost for each of these years might be taken and a mean struck between the five percentages, and whatever sum such mean would represent on the cost so ascertained of the year of purchase might be taken as the net earnings, or income, to be purchased. Such income would, of course, be a terminable one, as repairs and amount to reconstruction in an ascertainable number of years. The purchase-money would be the present value of that income for the life of the railways, at the rate at which federal stock can be floated at par. I merely suggest this as a possible means, which may be open to many objections which I cannot see, of purchasing the railways. I believe it should be adopted, for any Federation which did not include it would be incomplete. At the same time I will say this, and it is a feeling, I think, which animates every member of the Convention, that though we may differ on certain points I hope that we will approach the different questions in a spirit of compromise, and one that will be accepted by the people of the colony. Though I may hold opinions different from other members, I will, without sacrificing essential matters, agree to any fair proposal after sufficient argument has been used to convince me, while I will subordinate in matters fairly open to compromise the question of State rights to the greater question of Federation.

Mr. FRASER:

On the invitation of the gentlemen who so ably conducted the debates of the Convention in 1891, I rise as a new member to make a few observations. I would not have the assurance to do so were it otherwise, because I see there are members present who I think should take precedence over me. I am not going to dwell in the least degree on matters that are not necessary. I am going to confine myself, if possible, to the disputable point or points upon which I may be able to throw some light. The resolutions proposed by our able leader have my hearty support; but, while agreeing in that respect, I would have preferred to have gone on with the Commonwealth Bill straight away.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER:
We are getting on very well so far, and there is no reason to complain. In the published address which I issued to the electors of Victoria I gave my opinions, and they are pretty well known. It goes without saying—and I am glad to find a unanimity of feeling on a great many more points than at one time I had hoped for—that we will federate under the Crown. It also goes without saying that there should be two Houses of Parliament. I remember the time when there used to be a discussion on that, but it is not the case now. As for the Senate of the Federal Parliament, it is acknowledged now that there must be an equality of members, and that the Senate must have some power to protect State rights and other rights. With regard to the question that has been raised concerning the popular vote, that might probably be carried on in one direction in one colony and in an opposite direction in another colony. This is a matter of State rights, pure and simple. I remember at one of my meetings explaining to the electors about the referendum, and I put a case like this: Supposing Victoria increased her population to, say, 3,000,000, they would of necessity have in the House of Representatives 100 members, who would have control of the whole States if the referendum were general all over the colonies. At first it was spoken of in that way, but subsequently it was altered so as to give the States State rights by voting as States.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I have never shifted on that point, you know. I enunciated it just the same as I gave it to-day. The Argus said so, you know.

Mr. FRASER:
I am very glad to hear that. I always thought otherwise. But we have all a perfect right to shift our position just as we see the necessity of it. I have come here with a full determination to give way in every possible respect except on such points as my judgment will not allow me to. We are fairly well agreed on the matter of State rights, so that I need not dwell on that. But I would point out that where one colony through, perhaps, an enormous gold find, might swell its population to 3,000,000, it would then be entitled to 100 members in the House of Representatives, and of course it could simply swamp the whole of the other colonies and carry everything before it. Therefore the States must be protected in their State rights as in their other rights. It is only fair we should look at it as it would affect us, supposing we were the weakest colony of the group. So much for State rights. On the matter of the election of the Senate, I hold somewhat different views to those that have been enunciated here. In my published address to the electors of Victoria, I stated that I would give them two alternatives—the first to be by election on the basis of the ratepayers' roll, or the alternative as provided in the Commonwealth Bill. I prefer the first of my proposals, namely, the election by the ratepayers of the various colonies. I prefer that, and I would not have one electorate for the whole colony. There are, I think, very strong arguments against that. I can only just name some of them. In the matter of retirement or the death of a member, or of the retirement of a member by effluxion of time, or from any other cause, the whole machinery we have just had in force would have to be brought into operation to elect one senator, at a cost of something like £15,000 in our colony. That is quite unnecessary, and therefore I would urge that the senators should be elected by provinces. I am speaking for our own colony, because I quite agree with the statement that we have no right to dictate to the other colonies how they should conduct their own affairs in regard to this matter.

Mr. PEACOCK:
They are our affairs.

Mr. FRASER:
They are our affairs after the Federal Parliament is created, but not before. Afterwards they could agree that there should be a uniform mode of election, of course. Accepting the hypothesis that there will be eight senators, and I prefer that number to any other, because if you reduce the number below eight, and there are one or two absentees, the House would be too small to deal with. I think eight is quite a good and suitable number. Then I would divide the colonies into eight provinces. That would be a better system of representation than that of the whole colony constituting one big electorate. It would be a far better and truer system of representation, much less expensive, much less difficult to work in every way. So far as I can see, the colony of Victoria is in favor of that system. I quite agree that the House of Representatives should be elected without plural voting, and, of course, as far as the Senate is concerned, plural voting should be done away with. So far as plural voting is concerned, in Victoria, and in this colony also, it is a mere bugbear.

Dr. COCKBURN:
We never had it here.
Mr. FRASER:

Out of all the seats in the Assembly in Victoria there are only one or two seats affected by it, and those not to any appreciable extent. It is a bugbear, and I should willingly go for the election by one man one vote, or, as in this colony, one adult one vote. It is fair that the representatives should be elected one in 40,000. We are passing a Bill for a very long time, and therefore we should look forward to the time when the colonies instead of having five millions of people, as at present, should have fifty millions. But a small number of representatives would not be a drawback at all. In our colony the mandate of the people was for the reduction in the number of members of the Assembly, and I think it would be an advantage for that reason and for others that we should commence in a moderate way with the number of members of the House of Representatives. My friend Sir Richard Baker yesterday referred to the Canadian system as not being Federation. I think the Australian Colonies will be very fortunate indeed if they manage to get one as good. At any rate, I only returned from that part of the world a short time ago, and I can say without fear of contradiction that the five millions of persons in that country are perfectly satisfied with their own form of Federation. Were they to re-enact it they could make some alterations, but the very alterations they would propose are in this Bill—the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. As Sir George Turner said, the powers given to the provincial Governments were specified, and the powers given to the Federal Parliament were all the rest. I hope we propose to do exactly the reverse. To specify the powers of Government to the Federal Parliaments will be much less difficult to do than to specify the powers of the provincial Parliaments or State Parliaments, and thereby get over the initial difficulty. The difficulty in Canada—my own country—partly owing to the school question. But the people of Canada have got over that difficulty at the general elections, and are now perfectly satisfied with the Federation, and not one in a million would dream of going back. Overcoming immense difficulties, they have built a private railway to the Pacific of over 3,000 odd miles, although they have been assisted by the commonwealth by land grants and other things; but the progress they have made and the advancement of the Dominion is so great that they would not dream of going back, nor would any country, I hope, that has the good fortune to federate. As to the opinions of Mr. Goldwin Smith, which were quoted by Sir Richard Baker yesterday, that gentleman is thoroughly disrated in that part of the world, and he is not worthy of being listened to. Why, a few years ago he predicted that the States of Canada would rush into union with the United States. Did they do so? No; but those in favor of such a step were relegated into obscurity. It is astonishing how public men change their opinions. (Laughter.) I have been in public life for twenty-seven years, and have noticed that when the wind veers round they come round to their senses; and so the public men in Canada who talked of joining the United States either had to swallow their own words, or to suffer rejection at the hands of the people. You know the history—that the Canadians are as loyal to the British Crown, yes, even more so than many sections of the British communities. So far from Canada not being a Federation, I say the people there are satisfied with what they have got. No doubt their system is on more conservative lines than the Federation we want, because, for instance, a senator in Canada must have 4,000 dollars free of all encumbrance, and he is nominated or appointed by the Government for life. On that point I was very glad to hear the views of Mr. O'Connor. No doubt such a power of appointment gives the Dominion Government too much prestige, and I am sure that where a Government is in power for twenty years, it must have exercised improper patronage during that time. The Macdonald Government held office for over twenty years, and then the Premier died, and Sir Mackenzie Bowell took his place. Give me a system of Government where there is a change pretty often, but not too quickly. I think that this colony has had a change about once a year.

Mr. Peacock:

No.

Mr. Fraser:

Oh, they have a permanent Government now, of course. (Laughter.) I remember, though, that some years ago when I was constructing a railway north of Spencer's Gulf there seemed to be a change of Ministry every year or so.

Sir Richard Baker:

That is rather an exaggeration, I think.

Mr. Fraser:

I am merely stating what I thought was approximately the fact. I think it well that a Government should be in power for two or three years. If we can get rid of the difficulty of the ins and the outs we will make a great gain. When the outs get in and the ins are ejected, the trouble is to get the others out. There is too much of that, and if we can get rid of that form of government it will be a good thing; but I see no hope of it, as the people of the colonies, like the people at home, are accustomed to responsible government. I agree with Mr. O'Connor, that there is no chance of adopting any other form. We might prefer some other system, but it is not practicable, and we must be content to do what we can. I was also very glad to hear Mr. O'Connor on the matter of a deadlock. Without repeating his words, I may say I almost agree with every word he has said on that subject, and that will suffice. With regard to decentralisation, I remember the time years ago when we elected two members of the House of Commons, because we considered at that time that the Government of New South Wales were treating us very improperly in that part of New South Wales which is now Victoria. We elected two members of the House of Commons to the House of Parliament in New South Wales to mark our disapprobation of the treatment we supposed we had received, and it had the desired effect of getting separation. What we want is that the growth of these Australian Colonies shall be just as nature intended; that there shall be no artificial means of forcing any town or towns against other towns. The growth should be just as nature intended it, and if we allow that we do what is just and best for all concerned. I will say a few words about the railways. I have had to do with the railways for a great many years, and ought to know something about them. In my published address I said I would not favor pooling the railways at all, except in so far as I would give control of the railways for the exigencies of defence purposes; and I will say, moreover, that I suggest to this Convention that they should not entangle the Bill they are about to frame with any difficulties. If they create difficulties they will be difficulties that it will be hard to get over, and it is most difficult to pool the railways. There is no necessity for it at all for Federation. If any section of the members here will insist upon the amalgamation of the railways, a difficulty is created at the outset that it will be hard to get over. I will state two or three cases. I have sent wool from Charleville to Brisbane at £2 per ton. I have sent wool from Bourke to Sydney at very low rates. I can send wool from Bourke by water—make no mistake about it, though you forget your water systems of Australia; they are not to be left out of your calculations.

Mr. WALKER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER:
The water system of Australia is not to be ignored as we are ignoring it.

Mr. Howe:
You would not allow us to do much.

Mr. FRASER:
It is a great loss to Australia that the great waterways are not utilised. Let me say that wool is brought from Bourke, and even higher up, from Brewarrina, right down the Darling and up the Murray to Echuca. What railway can compete with the water?

Mr. WISE:
How much rebate is given by the Victorian Government to bring it down?

Mr. PEACOCK:
This is something for Committee.

Mr. WALKER:
Sixty-six per cent.

Mr. FRASER; All the colonies are equally guilty.

Mr. WALKER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER:
Nevertheless the producers get the benefit of the low rates.

Mr. REID:
The New South Wales producers do not get it down very cheap.

Mr. FRASER:
New South Wales wool can be carried at £2 a ton from Charleville to Brisbane. I grow wool at many places in Queensland. It I am compelled to send my wool by any particular route what must I do? I can easily send it to Murray Bridge, the cheapest, because it is the natural, outlet for Murrumbidgee, Edward River, and Lower Murray wool, to Murray Bridge. The colonies should, I say, enter into the question perfectly fairly to each other.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER:
It is quite easy to strengthen clauses 11 and 12, to which Mr. O'Connor and others have referred, in such a way that, so far as practicable, the differential rates shall cease. They cannot cease altogether, because some colonies can carry more cheaply than others. The colony of New South Wales cannot pretend to carry wool across the Blue Mountains on the zig-zag so cheaply as it can be carried over level country, in other colonies. The pooling of the railways presents a difficulty it will be difficult to get over, and there is no absolute reason for it. It may be said that we in Victoria are losing by our railways every year. We are closing some of them. I assume the colony of New South Wales would not approve of taking non-paying lines, though if she is willing to take them I would not say nay.

Mr. PEACOCK:
At prime cost?
Mr. FRASER:

That would be the difficulty. In Canada the railways belong to private owners, with the exception of one short line known as the Intercolonial line running through a part of Quebec down to Nova Scotia, and those belonging to private capital are worked the more fairly. The railways would be worked more economically by the local people than by federal regulation. The more distant the management the greater the expense, and the larger the number of lines the greater is also the cost. Then, with regard to the rolling-stock, you cannot mix it, because the gauges are not the same. It would be a very expensive thing for the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria to change their gauge. We have quite enough loads to bear without carrying out such a work. Certainly the main trunk lines might be altered, but then the rolling-stock could not be worked on them. I see grave difficulties in the way of pooling the railways, and I see no necessity for it. I look upon the railways as public works, like an ordinary road or bridge, as they take the place of the roads. In the event of the extension of railways in England it has to be approved by Parliament, which imposes certain limitations, such as maximum and minimum rates. You would properly fix a maximum and a minimum rate which would effect what is required. In the extension of railways here how would the Federal Parliament deal with it? The railways are colonial and not intercolonial, and therefore there is no necessity to amalgamate them at all. If you pool them you must get the net receipts from them to pay the interest. The interchange of railway stock is a common thing with private railways, as it is far better and cheaper to run a truck on than to discharge and reload. Credit and debit accounts of the trucks run on each line are kept, and it is then a simple matter of adjustment. The financial question will be one of difficulty with the Convention. No doubt great savings can be effected. I was looking at the returns, and I find that we in Victoria have some £8,000,000, and New South Wales somewhere about the same amount, coming due within the next six or seven years. I do not anticipate that we can make great savings at first by the conversion of our debts, as the persons holding our debentures will not give us much advantage, unless it is near the time for them to mature. When, however, the time of expiry comes due we will, no doubt, by consolidation be able to effect great savings, and, unless some specially favorable opportunity presented itself in the meanwhile. I would almost advise waiting until that time. We could then issue a new loan on favorable terms, as our old debenture-holders would compete, and we might effect a saving of 1 per cent. in the interest. I see that in the colony of Victoria we have some £8,000,000 falling due before 1901. In the colony of New South Wales it is pretty much the same, and in the whole of the colonies there is about 22 1/2 millions coming in between 1901 and 1905. That is a very large sum of money, and the few years will soon pass over, and a very large saving can be effected. This is a point that should not be lost sight of, for the saving would be very great indeed. I agree with Sir George Turner that it is not necessary to take over the assets. In my opinion, if four partners were going to take over a huge property, and there was a very wealthy partner, he would ask himself whether the other three partners would be able to bear the burden; and I hold that there is no doubt that all the colonies could pay their debts. However, I do not say that there should not be some adjustment. Some of the colonies may have borrowed too much, and there should be an adjusting line, but there is no necessity to take over the assets. The assets, after all, are not the security the debenture-holder looks at. He looks at the credit of the colony and the honor of the taxpayers to pay the interest as it becomes due. Therefore, I think consolidation of the debt might be made very properly, and provision should be made for it in the Bill. I see the debts of the four colonies are about £135,000,000 Victoria £47,000,000, New South Wales £57,000,000, South Australia £23,000,000, and Tasmania £8,000,000. It must be remembered that the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was framed at a time when all the colonies, or at least our colony, were booming; but now we must be prepared to save, and economy must be the watchword in framing the Bill. The payment of the members of £500 as fixed in the Bill must be cut down at all events to £300. In Canada it is £200. In the Bill we must economise to a great extent, because the colonies have reached a plane, and for some years to come we will have enough to pay the interest upon our indebtedness, and we have to do that without borrowing. It is easy to pay our debts while the colonies are borrowing like they were in the past, but I feel sure the colonies have set their face against borrowing for some time. In the matter of the judiciary I agree with Mr. O'Connor; we should not break the link with the mother-country. I entirely agree with the statement that there may be cases in which colonial judges may be influenced without their knowledge; and it is well to keep the link in any case, and it is well to give the final appeal to those who wish to have it as at present. The Chief Justices of the various colonies might very properly form a Federal Court of Appeal on the matter. There are several other matters I had intended to speak upon, but as it is so late now I will refrain.

HON. MEMBERS:
Go on.
Mr. FRASER:
The Federal Parliament would take over everything of a national character, and the powers and privileges of the local Parliament would not in the least degree be abridged. That is where Canada has made a mistake, and it is where we are not likely to fall into an error. I do not think there is any necessity for me to say any more, and I will conclude with saving that I am not going to agree to anything that will act as a bar to the adoption of Federation, and should there be anything done to hamper its progress we ought to set our faces against it. We will have quite enough of a load to carry to get Federation through, and we are only in the initial stage now. If we handicap it and weigh it down with difficulties we will be running a great risk in connection with this great question.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
Evidently the members of the Convention are tired of their labors to-day, and I propose that the debate be now adjourned.

The PRESIDENT:
I would point out to the Convention that 5.30 is the hour fixed by resolution for the daily termination of the sittings of the Convention.

Mr. BARTON:
That does not prevent the adjournment of the debate.

The PRESIDENT:
No. If this debate is adjourned, there will be no other business for the Convention to go on with. If no other representative desires to speak, I would suggest that the motion be submitted for the suspension of the resolutions.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
A very bad beginning, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT:
It is not for me to decide whether that should be carried or not.

Mr. HOLDER:
If necessary I will move that the sessional orders be suspended in order to enable me to move that the Convention do now adjourn.

Sir J. W. DOWNER:
The motion before the House at the present time is that the debate be now adjourned, and that is not in the slightest degree antagonistic to our sessional orders. When we have done with it any hon. member may move something to get the Convention out of a difficulty for three-quarters of an hour. (Laughter.) The motion is perfectly in order.

[P.84] starts here

Mr. BARTON:
In seconding the motion for the adjournment, I would point out that the sessional order states: "That, unless otherwise ordered, the Convention shall meet," &c. It is perfectly open to the Convention to make a different order at any time. I think that the better form of this order would have been that we should meet at 10 a.m. or 10.30 a.m.-I should have preferred 10 a.m.-that Mr. President should leave the chair at 2 p.m., and that is all. Then the House would have been master of its own procedure.

The PRESIDENT:

I would point out to the representative who has just spoken that that is a matter which no doubt was very properly considered by the Convention when the resolution was submitted and carried, but that so far as I am concerned I take only the resolution before me, and as to the wisdom or otherwise of a different course being adopted it is not for me to say anything. I take it that the position by the resolution is that the Convention has indicated its intention of sitting till 5.30 p.m., and, although it has been put by another representative that the motion as now submitted is not in exact contravention of the resolution, still at the same time-taking a view of its natural consequences-the Convention generally cannot fail to see what the result will be. However, if it be the desire of the Convention to terminate its sittings now, I will put the motion which has been moved.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

No; let the debate be adjourned.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Before that motion is put I feel that probably I cannot object to an adjournment with any effect, because if no member is prepared to go on with the discussion it would be an absurdity for us to sit here looking at each other.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is too dark to see our papers.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

If that is the only difficulty I dare say the South Australian Government, who have been so kind to us in making provision for light for us in other places, will make provision for light for us here; but, seeing that many of us have come very considerable distances, we ought to be prepared to go on with this debate. Surely hon. members have made up their minds what positions they intend to take, and I fail to see why we cannot go on discussing this matter till half-past 5 o'clock. If no member will go on, of course we are bound to adjourn, but I feel bound to place my protest against this proceeding on our records, and to ask that it shall not occur again. We fixed our hour of adjournment at half-past 5 o'clock, and hon. members ought certainly to come prepared to sit till the proper hour.
The PRESIDENT:
According to our Standing Orders no debate can be allowed either upon the motion for the adjournment of the House or the motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Of course if I have been out of order I willingly withdraw everything that has been said.

Mr. BARTON:
I most willingly do the same thing.

The PRESIDENT:
I have allowed some latitude on this matter owing to the natural want of familiarity of the majority of members with the local Standing Orders. I now propose to put the motion.

Question resolved in the affirmative, and debate adjourned till to-morrow.

Mr. WALKER:
I beg to give notice

The PRESIDENT:
The time for the receipt of notices of motion has expired. Notices of motion were called on after the receipt of petitions, shortly after the meeting of the Convention.

Mr. ISAACS:
By leave.

The PRESIDENT:
A suspension of Standing Orders will be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. SYMON:
May I ask a question? It was intimated yesterday when a question was put that in adopting the Standing Orders in force in this colony every member of this Convention should be furnished with a copy of them. I think probably these little irregularities which have been pointed to would not arise if that course had been followed.

The PRESIDENT:
I am sorry if that has not been attended to, as I was under the impression that it had.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HOLDER:
I move:
That the Convention do now adjourn.

Question resolved in the affirmative.
Convention adjourned at 4.46 p.m.
Thursday March 25, 1897.

Notices of Motion - Message from the Queen-Chairmanship of Committees - Federal Constitution - Suspension of Standing Orders - Leave of Absence to Members.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. WALKER:
I beg to give notice that to-morrow I will move:
That a return be laid before the Convention showing-
(a) The total public indebtedness of each of the Australasian Colonies, giving in tabulated form the due date and amount of each loan, with rate of interest it carries, also mentioning in each case the date of latest return to which the statistics apply.
(b) The State debt per head in each of the Australasian Colonies.
(c) The annual interest charge per head on said State debts, showing each colony separately.

Dr. QUICK:
I beg to give notice of my intention to move:
That there be laid upon the table of this Convention a precis of all available official reports showing-
I. The nature of the country lying approximately between the Oodnadatta Railway Station, in South Australia, and the Pine Creek Railway Station, in the Northern Territory, its suitability for settlement or otherwise, the length of the line that would have to be constructed to connect these two railway systems, and the probable cost per mile.
II. The nature of the country lying between Lake Torrens and the nearest railway in West Australia, its suitability for settlement or otherwise, the length of line that would have to be constructed to connect the South Australian railway system with that of West Australia, and the probable cost per mile.
III. The nature of the country lying between the Northern Territory railway and the nearest railway system of Queensland, its suitability for settlement or otherwise, the length of line that would have to be constructed to connect the two systems, and the probable cost per mile.

MESSAGE FROM THE QUEEN.

The PRESIDENT:
I have the honor to announce the receipt, through the Right Honorable the Secretary of State for the Colonies and His Excellency the Governor, of a message from Her Majesty the Queen, as follows:—

I have received Her Majesty's commands to desire you to acquaint the Federal Convention that she takes special interest in their proceedings, and hopes that, under Divine guidance, their labors will result in practical benefit to Australia. I desire to add my own cordial wishes for a successful result, which will conduce to the dignity and strength of the Empire.

Date, March 25th. J. CHAMBERLAIN.

I think this is a fitting moment to call for three cheers for the Queen.

[Three cheers were then given by the delegates.]

CHAIRMANSIP OF COMMITTEES.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

As we all hope by Monday next, at latest, to be in Committee, and at work upon the details of the proposals which we are now debating generally, it will be necessary for us to decide as to who shall preside over our deliberations in Committee, and therefore I have pleasure now in moving:

That the Honorable Sir Richard Chaffey Baker be appointed Chairman of Committees of the Whole of this Council.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I beg to second that.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

Before that is put I wish to make an observation. I am aware that it is not usual for any gentleman whom it is proposed to appoint Chairman of Committees to make any remarks, but the procedure adopted in this case is not usual, and therefore I venture somewhat to depart from the ordinary routine. In the first instance I wish to state that I submit myself to the Convention. In the second I think it is only right that I should also state that if the proceedings are unduly prolonged it may be necessary that I should ask to be relieved from the position to which I may be appointed, seeing that at the end of May I have to contest an election for the Legislative Council.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

We are not going to be here till May.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.

Debate resumed on resolutions by Mr. Barton (vide page 17).

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

Although I was one of those who rather objected to the procedure proposed by my friend Mr. Barton, still the Convention having agreed in its wisdom to adopt that procedure, I intend to accord to him a very loyal support, so that success may result from his leadership. We have every reason to congratulate ourselves that the mantle of the great apostle of Australasian Federation, Sir Henry Parkes, has fallen on so worthy a disciple, and I think that his marked and consistent advocacy of this great cause during the past four years, making it the sole aim of his political life, is some guarantee that he will devote the whole of his great abilities to the accomplishment of this great work. As a representative of the mother-colony, New South Wales, which has large interests at stake in this matter, which have compelled her to look at the matter from a very different standpoint from some of the smaller States, I desire to express the sentiment of the people that we wish to see justice extended to all the colonies interested, be they large or small, and we desire to extend to the smaller colonies, where we differ from them, the utmost conciliation and the utmost consideration. I cannot, however, lose sight of the fact that it will be better at the onset of this Convention if we reach away from platitudes, if we perhaps restrain the desire to be extremely polite and courteous to one another, and, having exhibited the utmost of politeness, come to those topics which will be found to form the crux of this matter. I believe that the spirit of compromise is the spirit which should actuate us, but we must not forget the fact that the compromise effected here has to be accepted by the people of Australia, and although we may disperse, having satisfied ourselves and each other that we have got as much as we can in the way of compromise, we must not forget that we have to induce the people to accept the compromise. I am much in the same position as the Premier of Tasmania, who voices his own opinions in many matters, but tells the Convention that practically he fears the difficulty of persuading the people he represents to accept those opinions. We must not lose sight of the fact that in our solicitude to frame a Constitution framed on compromise there is a great power behind us which it is difficult to educate, and which will be the final arbiter of the Constitution. So far as New South Wales is concerned, there is an extreme desire in that colony that Federation should be accomplished. We desire to have gathered up that wandering brood that once owed allegiance to and formed part of the colony, and we are prepared to a large extent to give up many things which we deem to be almost necessary to our existence, but we are not prepared to make sacrifices which will thwart the ultimate will of the people to mould their own destinies. Whatever Constitution we frame here breath of life. We cannot expect them to do that unless the Constitution is acceptable to them, and acceptable on the broad grounds of humanity. We may argue about State rights, but the people concern themselves mostly, not about inanimate things, but about flesh and blood, and any Constitution must be one which has its deepest and best regard for the rights of flesh and blood rather than of the inanimate objects which exist in the State. All the rights of the State therefore to my mind must be subordinate to the supreme rights of the people themselves. It will be a very difficult task to persuade the people of Australia-the people of New South Wales-to sacrifice any of the supreme rights of the people, even if it be necessary as a compromise, in order to induce the various States to come into this compact. Again, while we have some students here of the different forms of Federation which have been adopted in other parts of the world, I think we must avoid any slavish imitation of those precedents which have been created for us in times gone by, and in countries where even human slavery has been tolerated. We may set up our ideal, but before we conclude our labors we may have to accept something that is not theoretically perfect, and possibly have to accept something which will include all the good things in various Constitutions. It was a very happy thought on the part of the mover when he inserted these words in the preamble:

That in order to enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australasia.

I have found, and I dare say all hon. members have found, a great misapprehension with regard to the outcome of Federation. That misapprehension will be largely removed by the adoption of the words in the preamble, setting out that Federation will really enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australasia; and, while I congratulate my friend on having given this happy turning to the preamble, I would suggest we might also extend that preamble by inserting the words:

And to extend the influence of the people of Australasia.

Because, to my mind, one matter which is most material in regard to the future of Federation is not merely to increase the powers of self-government of the people of Australasia, but also to extend and widen the influence of the people of Australasia. Inseparably connected with the safety of the country, with its defences, and with its finances, is the wider influence of Australasia in Australasian waters. I can show to the Chamber by arguments incontrovertible that the relative amount of expenditure on defence will be proportionate to our influence in Australasian waters. As foreign powers obtain a footing upon the threshold of our doors it will be necessary to increase our armaments and increase our defences, and with the necessity of increasing the armaments we will have to dip our hands more deeply into our pockets and provide more money for the defence of our country. One of the results of our isolation and disunion in the past is that, while in Australasian waters there has been a gradual weakening of our influence, there has also been an increase in the influence of foreign powers which may become our enemies. It is noticeable that whilst we are striving to increase our influence by means of Federation, and have representatives here from the southern island of Tasmania, we have no representatives from the greater island of the north - New Guinea. We should, perhaps, look with deep forebodings if the island of Tasmania were in the hands of a foreign power, but do we not know that two-thirds of the island of New Guinea is in the possession of two foreign powers, which might be involved in war with the old country at any time. One of the things we should aspire to and one of the things in which we should educate the public is the acquirement of the whole of New Guinea, which never ought to have gone into other hands. It may not be out of place for me to say at this juncture, although it may be a little bit beyond the resolutions, that whilst we all hail with delight the fact that our Premiers are going to visit England to pay their respects to Her Majesty the Queen, in a few days now, I venture to express the hope that the federal sentiment may be served to some good purpose, and that one of the results of that visit will be the making of arrangements whereby it will be possible for us to gain again what we never should have lost those two portions of New Guinea which are in the hands of foreign powers, and are practically not used by them at all. I have seen it stated that it might be possible for us to obtain Dutch New Guinea for £1,000,000. It would be to thwart the people in the management of their own finances. I agree with my hon. friend, Mr. O'Connor, that the Federal Parliament should have absolute control of taxation, so that it might raise its revenue by any method it pleases, for the reason that it is necessary to have unlimited power of taxation for defence or war purposes, and for the reason also that we should not frame a Constitution which refuses the people of Australasia hereafter the right of moulding their own system of taxation and to rule themselves in their own finances. We have instances to show how the innocent intentions of the authors of Constitutions have been perverted. Let us look to America, where a gigantic system of protection is in force, and is in force in direct opposition to the very words of the Constitution, which provides:

That the Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.

And under the plea of those words it has imposed the most gigantic system of protection the world knows. But, on the other hand, the moment an attempt was made to impose direct taxes the Supreme Court of the United States held that direct taxes were impossible under the Constitution because of two limitations, one of which was:

That no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

So that the will of a majority of the people of the United States has been thwarted by these pitfalls in their Constitution, not designedly placed there by the framers of the Constitution, but possibly put in without proper foresight of what the future might bring forth. I dare say hon. members will admit that as this Convention is constituted it has been almost impossible for us to avail ourselves of the services of the financial experts of Australia. We have one or two here—perhaps hon. members will not take offence if I thus limit their numbers—one could count them on his fingers; but the financial experts of Australia have been precluded from coming into this Convention, because many of them are Government officers, and a large proportion are gentlemen in the service of institutions which could not spare them for this occasion. What we require is not so much the wisdom within the doors of the Convention as the advice of the experts of Australia outside the Convention.

Mr. FRASER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

We want, not schemes, but more data, more information, and more facts.

Mr. FRASER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

We need these things before we can devise a system of finance likely to stand the test of time. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the Convention of 1891 dealt largely with this question of finance, with the result that the authors of the scheme have been the first to condemn it. We do not want a repetition of that. Whilst people are warm on the subject of Federation let us be careful that in our haste we do not sacrifice wisdom, and I would strongly recommend—without waiting till we reach that stage when we get into Committee on the Bill—that there should be a Select Committee appointed, whose functions should be to obtain evidence and information with regard to the probable financial difficulties we shall have to face.

Mr. BARTON:

That is provided for in the resolutions I am to move after this is disposed
Mr. CARRUTHERS:

I presume also that the resolutions will provide for the committee reporting. I have a strong objection to a committee which will usurp the functions of the Convention in reporting recommendations. I should like them to examine into matters and get information, and let it be available to the members of the Convention. Not a day should be lost before steps should be taken to collect the information on the financial problems, so that we may at the proper time have before us facts and figures and data which we have not now. Any system of finance to be popular should be one which aims at economy, and throughout the whole of our federal ideas there should be an anxiety not to increase the machinery of government in Australia, but to diminish it. There is no country, I suppose, on the face of the earth that is so over-governed as Australasia.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

With 4,000,000 of people we have seven Governors, seven Agents-General, fourteen Houses of Parliament, seven Postmasters-General, and several distinct Supreme Courts, whilst the whole work for over 40,000,000 of people in the United Kingdom is done by one Parliament and one head for all of these. It does seem to me manifestly wrong that we should attempt in any way to multiply rather than to lessen the machinery of government, and it will be doing good service if our efforts are directed at every point not to increase the expenditure of Australasia, but rather to diminish it—not to multiply governments, but rather to diminish them. Let the people have less intricacy in the forms of government under which we live; and this can very well be done in many directions which may be pointed out—the abolition of six out of the seven Agents-General and the appointment of one Governor-General, for example. I have no extreme anxiety to see in our Constitution a provision to impose upon the colonies seven Lieutenant-Governors receiving salaries, when the present Lieutenant-Governors, the Chief Justices, so admirably fill the positions, which are to a large extent formal. I was very glad indeed to hear Sir George Turner speak so strongly in favor of having the Customs barriers on our borders absolutely removed. I was very glad to hear that sentiment so heartily reciprocated by our friends of South Australia.

Mr. BARTON:

It would be no Federation without that.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

There will be no Federation acceptable to the people of New South Wales which does not remove all the Customs-houses from our borders. I am glad that the hon. members have been so kind as to put before us this aim and purpose of Federation. In New South Wales we have always strongly felt that these fetters and obstacles have been among the chief means of creating an anti-federal spirit throughout Australasia. I hardly expected to hear so much delight expressed by our friends at the prospect of having these barriers removed.
It reminds me of the couplet from the old play-Perhaps it was well to dissemble your love,
But-why did you kick us downstairs?
For many years the people of New South Wales have been anxious for the removal of the barriers, and no colony will more heartily rejoice at having intercolonial freetrade throughout the length and breadth of Australasia than New South Wales. But whilst we are endeavoring to do that we do not want to change the venue of the conflict from the Customs-house to the railway station. We know the warfare that has been going on between our own colony and Victoria.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We know who started it.
Mr. CARRUTHERS:
Since the Customs barrier was erected by Victoria a ladder has been put up by that colony at the wall to help us to climb over, in the shape of differential rates. We also have been trying to get the trade of Riverina, which geographically belongs to Victoria. If something be not done wisely in reference to the railways the anti-federal spirit will continue to be exhibited. The same spirit of antipathy engendered and fostered by the Customs-houses will be engendered and fostered by the Railway Departments. We shall not be doing our duty to the people of Australia if we do not place before them those difficulties with which we have to deal.
It seems to me that the better plan will be to place our railways absolutely under federal control. I do not believe in the half-hearted system which is not going to allow the Federal Government to interfere with State-owned properties.
Mr. SOLOMON:
Hear, hear.
Mr. CARRUTHERS:
If we are going to place the railways under dual control we shall have friction, not so much perhaps between individuals and the State as between the Federal Government and the States. My friend Mr. O'Connor largely objects to see the necessity of dealing with the railways, because if they were owned by private individuals he sees no necessity then for putting them under federal control. But the difference between State-owned railways and privately-owned railways is of such a character as to cut the ground from under his argument. If people owning railways privately maintain a cut-throat policy they have to pay the loss out of their pockets, and the producers and others who use the railways get the gain. But where State-owned railways come in, whatever tends by policy to cause a loss to the railway tends to tax the people, because this loss must be made up out of the pockets of the people or must be made up by overcharges to consumers who have no opportunity of using other lines. The disparity between the two is that in one case the loss comes on private people, while in the other it falls upon the taxpayers of the country. Any policy which allows New South Wales to rob Victoria of the earnings of her railways tends to impose additional taxation upon the people of Victoria, and anything which allows Victoria to rob the people of New South Wales of the earnings of her railways tends to impose additional taxation upon the people of New South Wales. It has been well put by a journalist that if you federate without federating the railways it is like a man marrying a girl and leaving her at the church door. It seems to me that the analogy is a good one. Why should we leave to the future the difficulties which we are seeking to overcome by Federation to-day? I urge, therefore, that the Federal Constitution Bill should either provide to take over the railways, or provide some machinery by which thorough inquiry might be made and ultimately federal control—or such control as the Federal Parliament may approve—assumed over railways. A suggestion has been made by one of my colleagues from New South Wales to abolish the differential rates, but when the effect of that is explained to the people of New South Wales they will be the last to approve of it without a Federation of the railways. The differential rates policy applies to various towns of the colony as well as to the towns on the border. If that policy were adopted we should have a large extent of the railway traffic in the Riverina district and towards Queensland driven into a neighboring colony, and so should lose the benefit of it without any compensation. But if we federate the railways the traffic will go to its-natural outlet, probably to Victoria or sometimes to Queensland, but we shall have this compensation that as citizens of the Commonwealth we shall have an interest in every bale of wool and every ton of goods and every passenger carried over the railways, no matter where they are carried to. We shall share in the profit that comes from the increased use of one line, and we shall share also in the loss which accrues owing to the diminished use of another line. I am strongly in favor of two committees—one to deal with the finances and take evidence, and another to deal with railways and take the evidence of the railway experts of Australia, so that we may have before us the views of those who have devoted a lifetime to the study of these subjects, and may tell us the probable consequences of one of three courses—either of leaving the railways alone, or of federating them, or of having some control over them without interfering with the border rates. The last point on this topic is the much-vexed question of State rights. I am prepared at the onset to say that I see nothing for it but to concede to the smaller States equal representation in the Senate. It may be, from my standpoint, illogical, but I say, so far as the, possibilities of Federation are concerned, there is no possibility of accomplishing this unless we concede to the smaller States that power which they now enjoy in Australasia of equal representation. Therefore, having regard to the possibilities of Federation, I feel bound to assent to the proposal that there shall be equal representation of the States in the Senate. But, having said that, I go with the Premier of Victoria that the powers of the Senate must be restricted unless o

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I am willing to accept that position; but, on the other hand, so long as the burden of maintaining the States is borne by the larger States they must hold the financial control.

Mr. PEACOCK:
That is the way to put it.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
It seems to me that is the only position which can be taken up if you look at the matter from a logical standpoint. If taxation and representation are to go together, it is a corollary that representation as well as taxation should be proportional. It is absurd that you should give to a House which may have a majority of representatives from the smaller contributories power to control the finances of the whole Federation. Has it not been well pointed out that the power of veto of a Taxation Bill practically gives a power to direct the form of taxation. And if the Senate has the power of amending Money Bills, or finally vetoing them, it will have the power to mould the finances of a country.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
There would be the continual saying of "No" to the financial proposals of the Government, a continual refusal to reform the finances. That is practically the imposition on the country of a continuance of an unfair system of finances. Therefore, if you give the power from time to time to thwart the will of the majority of the people by rejecting money and financial Bills, you will give through the Senate a right to the minority of the taxpayers to mould the finances of the country. The proposal seems to me to be indisputable, that those paying the taxes and finding the money should have the right to mould the finances of the country.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Hear, hear.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

It will be intolerable if the 2 1/2 million of people living in New South Wales and Victoria find the bulk of the money necessary to support Federation only to see the financial policy of the country governed by a minority of the people who might hold the majority in the Senate.

Mr. HOWE:

There is another side to the question.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:

It has been well put that you must have a Constitution which will bend, not break. But any Senate which will thwart the will of the people will either have to bend or break. If there is no provision for the bending there will be a break. More than that, if we graft the system of responsible government on our Federal Parliament, we must allow the power of the purse to remain in the popular Chamber. It will be manifestly absurd to have the will of the people thwarted by the decision of the Senate. It has been proposed to deal with deadlocks by the Norwegian system of the Houses sitting together. I prefer rather to listen to the suggestions of the member for South Australia (Mr. Glynn) and of the Premier of Victoria. You must to a large extent avert deadlocks by the common sense and goodwill of the people. I venture to say that deadlocks will be averted in nine cases out of ten by the exercise of that good will and good faith which are so signal a quality of the people of Australasia. But if we are to provide a means of ending deadlocks, I am in favor of the adoption of the referendum. I think the occasions for its use will be few and far between. I have been one of those who recognise that the will of the people when directly appealed to will be expressed in a common-sense fashion to the surprise perhaps of those who think that the people lose their heads and run riot in their ideas. It is proposed by Mr. Barton in connection with the Commonwealth to establish a federal judiciary, and that this is necessary no one will deny; but he also proposes that there shall be a High Court of Appeal, which shall be a final Court of Appeal for litigants in Australasia.
I, however, object to a Court of Appeal which is to take the place of the Privy Council. If you adopt the suggestion that it should be established, and its decision is not made final, it is simply creating another hurdle for litigants to jump. Law is costly enough at present, without imposing another bar to litigants securing a final decision. But in any case there will still be the right to petition the Privy Council, so that, on the ground of economy to litigants, it will be an expensive arrangement, as it provides an additional Court of Appeal. Of course, we know there is a great difficulty in establishing such a court without the consent of the Imperial Parliament, which rarely will be given, and which has not been given in the case of Canada. You will find that litigants can petition the Privy Council. And even if we succeed in doing away with the right of appeal to the Privy Council we will be setting up an inferior tribunal in place of a superior one, and one selected from the limited bar of Australia at the expense of the country for an existing one chosen from the wide range of jurists of England at her expense. As to the expense of taking litigants to a far distant court, litigants are never taken there. It is simply a matter of postage stamps.

Mr. Barton:
I did not say that litigants were always taken there. I said that they were either dragged thousands of miles to a distant court, or had to remain here and see their dearest interests destroyed.

Mr. Carruthers:
I quite understand that my friend was speaking figuratively; so am I. It is a question of money to send, not them, but their cases there; and whether the litigants remain in Melbourne, Sydney, or Adelaide, it does not matter much how far distant the court is. The expense of going to an Australasian final Court of Appeal would be just as much as would be involved in going to the Privy Council, because members of the English bar can be engaged at no greater expense than lawyers can be engaged in Australasia. Then as to the question of delay. Are we not quite well enough aware that our Supreme Courts have delays as well as any court in the world? If we look at the arrears of work in the various colonies we will see something of it. In our own colony the court is not only a year, but two years behind in some cases. I can therefore see no reason for setting up an inferior tribunal in place of a superior one, either upon the pretext of economy or upon that of saving time. My friend the Premier of Victoria was good enough to hope that we should defer until a remote period, possibly to put outside of the consideration of this Convention, the question of the site of the federal capital. I do not want to throw the apple of discord into our proceedings.
Mr. DEAKIN:
An orange of discord.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
But I do say here, so far as the wandering brood of New South Wales is concerned, the mother-colony stands in a different position to them. We have seen those who have sprung from our loins setting up their own households in other parts of Australia; we are the senior, the mother-colony. We have the largest population, and are ahead in the race for life in other respects. While we have been hardly pressed we have never been passed, and we feel, therefore, prompted by different feelings from some of our neighbors on this question of capital. We have been selected, not by ourselves, but by the Imperial Government, as the key for the first line of defence; we have the head of the Church of England, selected not by us, but by the people of Australia.

Mr. PEACOCK:
We have the head of the Salvation Army. (Laughter.)

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
We are quite willing that this question should not be one to divide us at the onset, but it would perhaps be false modesty upon the part of the representatives of New South Wales not to remind the Convention of the claims which have been created for us by time, by history, and (if we may term it) by tradition; and I hope therefore that whatever consideration is given to this subject, it will not settle the question in a way that will shut out any portion of New South Wales from advancing its claims to be the site for all time of the seat of Government. I do not wish to say any more on this question now, or to overstep the bounds of prudence. I notice one omission in this resolution to which I would like to ask Mr. Barton in his reply to refer. Every provision is made here for the union of the States, but no provision is made—and I dare say it is intentionally not made, but I want to get this question thoroughly thrashed out in this Convention—for a possible dissolution or secession.

Mr. ISAACS:
There is no possible dissolution or secession.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
It is better to understand our position. Is there to be a power of secession?

HON. MEMBERS:
No.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
Well, then, hearing these answers, it behoves us to draft a Constitution that will never provoke those feelings which will build up forces that will have to be repressed by the exercise of force. We must not have a Constitution of that rigid character which it will be difficult to amend. You are not going to have the power to secede or dissolve, and therefore it behoves us to frame our Constitution in that elastic way that we can amend it in consonance with the growing aspirations of the people who should have the power of governing themselves in their own way. If, however, as I have said before, you have the Constitution so rigid that you cannot either secede or amend it, it is just possible civil wars and disasters similar to those which took place in the United States would eventuate in the Australasian Colonies. I am therefore strongly in favor of framing the Constitution with such elastic provisions, more especially with regard to amendments, that when it is found not to express the desires and ambitions of the people of Australasia amendment will be simple and easy. If you do not provide for that you will create a great danger, and instead of the blessings of union there may be greater evils than those of disunion. We have to avoid the perils of disunion, and strive to do our utmost to mould a Constitution which will promote the peace and welfare of the people of Australasia.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I hope the House will bear with me if, speaking as I do with some indisposition, I do not succeed in keeping the debate up to the high level it has already attained. I feel some difficulty in dealing with the resolutions as they have been framed. I am sorry that we have to debate resolutions which are so weak, so vague, and so inconclusive, and in saying that I hope I will be understood as not in the least way speaking with any churlishness or failing to recognise the great services that Mr. Barton, the representative of New South Wales, has rendered to the cause of Federation. I feel that they have been so drawn as not to be debatable, and yet at the same time we are to speak on matters that are debatable. I have never known yet in any deliberative assembly any such course to be adopted, where, you have resolutions containing generalities and yet members have to speak on details. The position is that we have advanced a good deal since 1891. These resolutions are framed very much upon the basis of 1891, but they are even more colorless than the resolutions adopted then in some particulars. Are we to be told that we have not got something more definite and concrete since 1891, and that the resolutions that were sufficient for that year are sufficient for 1897? I hoped we should have specific resolutions placed before us-resolutions that would deal directly with specific matters on which discussion (which should be short, sharp, pointed, and crisp) could be based, that would save us from making speeches which would sail round all the aspects of Federation. No one more than I recognises the value of the speeches that have been delivered up to now on this question, and no one more than I recognises the thought and care given by those who have spoken to this great subject. In saying that I do think that these resolutions are not worthy of a House to which is delegated the responsibility of framing a Bill for the purpose of Federation. In this matter I feel there is a sort of generous abnegation on the part of those engaged in the formulation of the Bill of 1891. They appear to say-"Let us not speak, but let us have these new men who had nothing to do with it before speak." Well, I confess that having heard Sir Richard Baker, the representative of South Australia, I should have liked, as he was a member of the Convention of 1891, to have heard him speak, not only on the subject to which he addressed himself so efficiently, but also to all the subjects. As I understand it, he is precluded at this stage by this form of resolution from speaking now on the other subjects.

Mr. BARTON:

Might I mention, Mr. President, that there is nothing in these resolutions which prevents any hon. member from addressing himself at large to any question which can arise out of them.

The PRESIDENT:

I beg to say that the whole of the resolutions are open to debate, and not only the resolutions, but any matter which might be suggested by way of amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think I have been misunderstood. I say that Sir Richard Baker is now precluded by the rules of debate from addressing himself at this stage to the points which he omitted. That is an evil result, because Sir Richard Baker had to speak, as was apparent, without any opportunity for arranging his remarks. At all events I think those engaged in the important work of 1891 are a little mistaken in thinking that the other members of this Convention are not anxious to hear their views on, all matters.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think we should like to hear them speaking in some way upon the details as well as speak upon those details ourselves.

Mr. DEAKIN:

We have done so already.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I think my honorable friend Mr. Deakin over-estimates the extent to which the outside public have read the debates of the Convention of 1891.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Personally, as in duty bound, I have read those debates, but I am quite sure that, in regard to the members of that Convention who are here now, most of the public do not understand their views, and yet we shall not hear their, views in this Convention until we have had the work of the Select Committees, and until, to a large extent, compromise has been the order of the day. We want to know the views of members of this Convention before we get to that stage. Of course, I understand the reason why the present procedure has been adopted. The reason is to avoid having members commit themselves before due time; but the result is that, in place of members committing themselves by their speeches to one thing after another, we have members committing themselves to a dozen things in one speech; so that I cannot see there has been any gain, but I can conceive that the electors will be very indignant to know that we are going back to the vagueness of 1891. With regard to these resolutions, I do not intend to sail all round the Federation subject; but I want first to point out that in the very first of the sub-divisions of the resolution there is an expression used which is either unmeaning or unnecessary. It says:

That the powers, privileges, and territories of the several existing colonies shall remain intact, except in respect of such surrenders as may be agreed upon to secure uniformity of law and administration in matters of common concern.

What is meant by saying that the territories are to "remain intact except in respect of such surrenders as may be agreed upon to secure uniformity of law in matters of common concern"?

Mr. WISE:
The federal capital must be culled.

Mr. HIGGINS:
This does not express it in the slightest. In the resolutions of 1891 they had words which had some meaning, and in place of "territories" they had "territorial rights," which gave a meaning to them. It speaks of these as principal conditions, but I deny that these are the principal conditions. There are conditions which are far more radical than the conditions here mentioned. Then, as to the second part of the first resolution, there is to be no surrender of territory except by the consent of the State which has the territory. That was put down as an unobjectionable point, and yet it was the very point that Sir Charles Dilke, in his criticism of the Bill of 1891, found most fault with; that is to say, that there ought to be no alteration of the territories unless with the consent of the State concerned. We have very large States, and we have some very loose links connecting territories—such as, for instance, that of South Australia and the territory north of it—and it is highly important to understand whether there may be any alteration of territorial boundaries without the consent of the Federation itself. We should like to know how the representatives of New South Wales would look if they found that the colony of Queensland were to divide into three different parts and return twenty-four senators as against the eight senators of New South Wales.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:

That would be representation of the minority with a vengeance. In regard to the second part of the resolution, I do not like at all the meagre provisions as to the Senate. The resolution says that the Senate is to be "chosen in such manner as will best secure to that Chamber a perpetual existence combined with definite responsibility to the people of the State which shall have chosen them." I am not at all sure, unless we know how the Parliament is going to be elected, what is to be the franchise, and so forth, that we should commit ourselves to a House which is to have a perpetual existence. That would depend upon other circumstances. "Perpetual existence." I understand that to mean that the members would go out in rotation of every two or three years. I say that more details should be forthcoming, because by perpetual existence we may be giving to that Assembly the potentiality of ruling our Commonwealth. I should like to have it altered so as to read—

Chosen in such manner as will best secure to that Chamber direct responsibility to the people, in place of the vague words—

Combined with definite responsibility to the people.

There is one speech which of all others has induced me to rise. I had intended to let these resolutions go without much discussion as far as I was concerned, because it appears to me that we are talking upon a false basis; but the speech of Sir Richard Baker appears to me so well worthy of attention that perhaps I may say a few words upon it. Sir Richard Baker has made an attack upon responsible government for the purpose of this Federation, and, widely as I differ from him, I admire the straightforward and direct manner in which he went to the heart of the subject at once. This House is indebted to him for pointing to the important matter of States rights in such a clear fashion. He put it in a nutshell when he said—
We cannot have responsible government with responsibility to two Houses.

I think that this is as true a statement on this subject as can be made by anyone. But the corollary he draws is "Therefore do not have responsible government." The corollary I propose to draw is "Do not have responsibility to two Houses," and there is just that distinction between us, and the sooner we come to that distinction the better. I do not make a fetish of responsible government. It may be that in the womb of time there will be improvements upon it; but I like to use the thing I find rather than strive at unfound novelties. I like to go to what the people are used to, and this is one of the broad reasons in favor of responsible government. Responsible government has worked well in the colonies; the people are familiar with it; we know the ways of responsible government; the mother-country has worked under it; and I hope this House will be chary about allowing any departure from responsible government. I agree with Mr. Carruthers that we must not have a Constitution so rigid that we cannot make alterations from time to time which may be considered necessary. We must not make the Constitution so rigid as that of the States. We must be able to make alterations without having to resort, as they do in America, practically to a civil war. In the meantime let us start with responsible government and let us remember that there are great advantages in responsible government from the mere fact that the Ministry is able to act with more promptitude in national emergencies, in place of having to go to the Senate, as they do in the United States, to get a statute passed, and also because there is a leadership in the House. You have particular men deputed to frame Bills and submit them, saying, "These are necessary for the country"; whereas in America the President recommends Bills, but the President is elected by the people almost direct, and there is no proposal to have any official like the President in this Federation. Sir Richard Baker said also, in very weighty words, "The Cabinet system will kill Federation, or Federation will kill it." I think in that he is mistaken. I say that in order to make that proposition have any reasonable vraisemblance he has to define Federation to suit himself. What is Federation? According to Sir Richard Baker it is Federation if you have equal powers for both Houses. Therefore he says if you have not got equal powers for both Houses you have not got Federation. That is a kind of argument in a circle. But it is not of the essence of Federation that you should have equal power in both Houses. I ask where Sir Richard Baker finds authority for the statement that there can be no Federation without equality in both Houses. The answer I got when I was interjecting about that was that in Canada they have the nominee Senate, but that is not against the essence of Federation. What I understand to be the essence of Federation is what is put in a pamphlet issued by Sir Richard Baker, where he points out that the essence of Federation is that a citizen has got two citizenships—he is a citizen of the Federation for federal purposes, and a citizen of the State for State purposes. You must understand that the question of how the different Houses are formed is not an essential part of Federation. As to the United States there is no analogy. In the United States you have not responsible government, and you cannot apply the rules to them which you apply here. I am very glad to find that Sir Richard Baker recognises the impossibility of reconciling responsible government with the giving of the power to amend Money Bills to the two Houses. Of course he says:

Let us have the power to amend Bills and throw over responsible government.

I was greatly struck yesterday with the observations of Sir Edward Braddon on this point. He put, with a degree of moderation, the view of Tasmania as a smaller State at present. He said:

The government must rest upon the House of Representatives.

If the government must rest upon the House of Representatives you must give the House of Representatives sole power of the purse, else you cannot make the Government rest upon that House. Sir Edward Braddon's view was, I understand, that you must give the Senate power to amend Bills, and you must give the House of Representatives sole power of controlling Ministries. You cannot, however, reconcile these two things. If you give the sole power of appointing and controlling Ministries to the House of Representatives, you must refuse to the Senate the power of amending Money Bills, because the whole of our system of responsible government turns upon the way in which you deal with Money Bills. Money Bills will not wait. Mr. O'Connor's distinction of Money Bills is very important.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You only apply that to Appropriation Bills.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Still, though Mr. O'Connor's distinction may be right in theory, it may be almost impossible to carry it out in practice. Money Bills will not wait. You have to pay your creditors and your servants, and if you have a Senate that can block, block, block, that Senate can block, block, block until the Ministry is forced to bring down a measure that suits the Senate. Why, what has happened brought in a Bill to impose a land and income tax. The Upper House said:

[P.98] starts here
   No; we will reject it as a whole.
   The Ministry then, against its will, and feeling itself under pressure of getting taxation for the purposes of the finances, was forced to drop the Land and Income Tax Bill, and bring forward an Income Tax Bill, which was soon passed. I hope it will be understood that having the President of our Upper House with us I am not making an attack, but making a point.
By giving the power to refuse, you give the power to dictate what sort of taxation you will have. There is one matter which incidentally bears on two of the subjects I want to deal with shortly. It is said to us who do not favor giving the power to amend Money Bills to the Senate that if we express our views on the matter we destroy Federation, that we simply put a damper on Fo put an impossible case, suppose the Premier of New South Wales said,
"I want to spend a million on defence works at Port Jackson" - of course there is nothing more popular than the expenditure of money on a city. In that impossible case Hobart and Perth would be very indignant, and would ask "Why is the money to be spent there simply to give employment to New South Wales laborers?" In that case would not Victoria be quick enough to interfere, and say, "We will back up Tasmania and Western Australia. We will back up the small colonies."
Mr. HOWE:
   Supposing a large sum is to be expended in Victoria simultaneously?
Mr. HIGGINS:
   It would be a case of "pull, devil; pull, baker." You must trust to the Federation. After all, it is the people for whom we legislate-flesh and blood, as Mr. Carruthers has remarked, and not things. By the way, I might state with regard to the United States having the power to amend Money Bills that it has been commented on in Dr. Bryce's book, and there is a short passage that I will read, although I am sure it is a book familiar to most members. It says:
   The United States is the only great country in the world in which the two Houses are really equal and co-ordinate. Such a system could hardly work, and therefore could not last if the Executive were the creation of either or of both, nor unless both were in close touch with the sovereign people.
   The Executive in the United States is the creation of the people by the election of the President by a college chosen by the people. You find also in the United States that they have a uniform manhood suffrage, which we have not got here. We are about sixty or seventy years behind the United States in that respect. All the struggles about a property vote were fought out there between 1830 and 1850, and ended, as it will end here, in the only objects of legislation being the people, and the heads of the people will have to be counted to find out what must be the course of legislation.

Mr. FRASER:

They have not got woman suffrage there yet.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Another point I wish to address myself to is this: It has been said by some speakers that there must be equal representation in the Senate. I feel bound, as far as I am concerned, to say that I do not recognise it. I feel that a number of delegates have spoken in favour of equal representation for the purpose of getting Federation; and at the same time I know that there would be a strong feeling of discontent throughout the colonies among those who call themselves liberals, if there is equal representation of the large and small States.

Mr. LEWIS:

A stronger dissent from the other side.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The hon. member speaks as a representative of Tasmania. I think there is no doubt whatever that the representatives of the smaller States, in urging that there should be equal representation, do not do so in any spirit of selfish grasping. They only want what is just, and to do that they are aiming at getting what they think is proper, having regard to the whole circumstances; and I can only hope that they will recognise that those of us who speak against equal representation are animated by the same spirit. What amuses us is that these representatives of the smaller States seem to assume that they will always remain small States.

Dr. COCKBURN:

It is the principle.

Mr. HIGGINS:

If I were a representative of a small State at the present time I would feel so proud of my country as to believe that in a few years it would have left all the other colonies behind.

Dr. COCKBURN:

It would not alter the principle.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It does surprise me to find those who are ready to assume that Tasmania will always be in the rear as a colony. We do not know what the whirligig of time will bring about. In a few years New South Wales may be a sheep walk and Tasmania the busy hive of industry.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

We know that.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Having awakened the interest of the Premier of Tasmania to the great change that will take place between New South Wales and Tasmania, does he now urge the large State as against the smaller State?

Dr. COCKBURN:

We are talking about the principle.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I come to the principle now. The position is this: I recognise that they are fighting for a principle, only, as I honestly think, a mistaken principle; and if I am wrong my error will appear the more clear from the fact that I have expressed myself clearly upon it.

Mr. SOLOMON:

I thought you were inviting interjections.

Mr. HIGGINS:

As to equal representation in the Senate, I think we are in danger of being ready to acquiesce in a false principle as if it were a right principle, apart from its being a question upon which there may be a compromise; and if we start by acquiescing in a false position we will be led to a ridiculous result. I want first to show whether this is a correct principle or not. In Canada they have not got equal representation for the purpose of the Upper House; the two large provinces, Ontario and Quebec, have twenty-four senators; the Maritime States, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Manitoba have between them twenty-four; Manitoba and British Columbia are represented in a descending scale to two and one. In Germany you have a Federation in which Prussia has an overbearing number with seventeen, Bavaria has six, and the smaller States have a descending number down to two or one. But in arranging the number of senators for each State the distribution is not in strict accordance with population, the smaller States being, given some advantage.

Mr. BARTON:

That was a Federation engendered more by domination than by consent.

Mr. HIGGINS:

We are dealing with what exists. The genesis of the German system has nothing to do with the question. Let us look at the experience of the United States—the great exemplar on this question—and let us ask ourselves if the small States found protection, or need for protection, in having a Senate composed of an equal number of members. I will refer again to Mr. Bryce's work, because I think he is the author with whom, upon this subject, most of the members of the Convention are familiar. In the first volume of his work, page 94, speaking of the arrangement whereby each State should return an equal number of members, he says:
There has never been, in fact, any division of interest or consequent contest between the great States and the small ones.

Again, at pages 181 and 182 Mr. Bryce observes:—

What is perhaps stranger, the two branches of Congress have not exhibited that contrast of feeling and policy which might be expected from the different methods by which they are chosen. In the House the large States are predominant: nine out of thirty eight-less than one-fourth-return an absolute majority of the 325 representatives. In the Senate these same nine States have only eighteen members out of seventy-six-less than a fourth of the whole. In other words, these nine States are more than sixteen times as powerful in the House as they are in the Senate. But as the House has never been the organ of the large States, nor prone to act in their interest, so neither has the Senate been the stronghold of the small States, for American polities have never turned upon an antagonism between these two sets of Commonwealths. Questions relating to States rights, and the greater or less extension of the powers of the National Government, have played a leading part in the history of the union. But although small States might be supposed to be specially zealous for States rights, the tendency to uphold them has been no stronger in the Senate than in the House. This arrangement was long resisted by the delegates of the larger States in the Convention of 1787, and ultimately adopted because nothing less would reassure the smaller States, who feared to be overcome by the larger. It is now the provision of the Constitution most difficult to change, for "No State can be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its consent" - a consent most likely to be given. There has never, in point of fact, been any division of interests or consequent contests between the great States and the small ones.

Where does the protection of the smaller States come in there? The truth is that the true protection for the small States lies in the limitation of the power given to the Federal Parliament. The true protection of the smaller States lies also in insisting that no subjects which cannot be better dealt with by Federation are to be given to the Federation, and that all those subjects which can be best dealt with by a colony, as a colony, should be still left to the colony. Take, for instance, the labor traffic in Queensland, and that is a question which affects that colony alone. Suppose Queensland were coming in, it would be reasonable for them to suggest this, "We cannot go into Federation with you unless you protect our rights with regard to the labor traffic." Hon. members will understand that I do not in any way lay down my own views as to the provisions regarding that traffic at present. If there is a subject over which they fear they cannot coalesce with us, they must put that subject out of Federation, or put a qualification dealing with labor traffic in the Constitution Bill. What I want, therefore, is for those hon. members who feel strongly about State rights to point out some probable instance of the larger States, as a whole, being able to combine, or willing to combine, against the small States as a whole. I want them to give me some definite concrete instance in which them is a likelihood of the small States being swamped and unjustly treated by the larger States. Where is the instance? Apart from the general sense of justice over a large mass of people, you will find that the larger States, whichever they may happen to be in future years, will tug as hard as they can, and that the small States will really be able to hold the balance very often between the larger States in the representation. I have not been able to get any instance of the smaller States being unjustly treated. I put this case to myself:—Supposing there were a number of Oddfellows' lodges, and those lodges formed a joint association, and that they said - "For the purposes of the association we shall vote in the association room; for the purposes of our lodge we shall vote in the lodge room." And supposing then that some of the lodges had a fewer number of members, and that those smaller lodges said - "But we will be swamped in association matters by a majority from the larger lodges, and therefore we must have in association matters a preferential, a better system of voting than the others." Why, the others would say - "No, you have perfect liberty to control yourselves in your own lodge for lodge purposes, but for your association purpose - for our joint purposes - the majority must rule." Whatever we may say against government by majority, government by minority is much worse, and must be much worse; and, after all, when it comes to the final issue, it is the number of heads and the number of people whose lives and liberty are subject to the Federation that we must go by. But I think really it is about time to descend from generalities about State rights, and for those hon. members who say there ought to be equal representation to show some probable cases in which an injustice could be done to them. As Sir Richard Baker puts it in his pamphlet, and I think it may be used as a strong argument:—

There must be a dual citizenship. In a Federation the people are citizens of two different nationalities, if I may so express myself. They are citizens of the States and also of the Federation. Both the States and the Federal Governments act directly on them. In the particular form of union, which in contradistinction to Federation is called Confederation, the government of the central body acts upon the States as States, and not upon the individual citizens of the States as citizens of the central Government.

There you have a dual citizenship—for the purposes of the Federation, the Federation acts directly upon the citizens; for the purposes of the State, the State acts directly upon the citizens. Why, in the name of goodness, should not a citizen act directly on the Federation for the purposes of the Federation, and why should not he act directly on the State for the purposes of the State. There is real grave danger, having regard to our conditions, in giving such huge power of equal representation. In the United States they have forty-two States. A small State is one in forty-two. In these Australian colonies, supposing all six federate, including Queensland, we will have only six States. A small State in America will have only one forty-second of the power in the Senate, so that any whim of that small State can easily be cancelled by the other small States. But in this Federation the small State will have one-sixth of the power, and seven times as much as the power of a small State of America.

Dr. COCKBURN:

There were only thirteen to commence with.

Mr. HIGGINS:

That is true, but there are forty-two now, and because the United States have been able to add State after State from their vacant territory the evil has not been so pronounced. Even in America there has been discontent with this equal representation. The people of New York say, and with good reason, that with their five or six millions of people they are only returning two senators, while Nevada, with 30,000 has the same right to return two senators. Nevada is only a pocket borough for the silver kings.

Mr. GLYNN:

They have only one House.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The small States can be worked more easily by a clique than a large State, and there is danger in allowing them to have equal representation. I feel that I should not be justified in detaining this Convention very long, and I wish to be explicit in saying that whatever concessions or compromises may be made hereafter it must be recognised that throughout the colonies there is a large mass of people who do not like the system of equal representation, and who say that this is one new method for stifling the will of the people—of stifling the voice of the majority—and what amazes me is to find gentlemen who call themselves Radicals in a small colony advocating this in preference to rule by the majority. If they know how the stiffest Tories are leaning all their hopes upon equal representation in the Senate they will see how falsely they are being led. There is a greater danger to States rights in another direction under the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, and that is to allow the selection of the senators by the local Parliaments. Because they have the senators elected by the Parliaments in the United States, Federal politics are brought down into the arena of local Parliaments. The State elections are continually disturbed by contests between Republicans and Democrats, and false issues are put before the State Parliaments. Supposing a man is standing for the representation of Nebraska, he would be asked, "Sir-If you are elected which senator will you vote for?" and if he is returned he has to vote for a certain senator. The result is that the Federal politics are more and more put in the place of State politics; and I say this is one of the greatest dangers which the United States has to fear, that the State politics may be overshadowed by the Federal politics, and in place of the State working out for itself its own destinies upon fair issues, the issues which should be before the State may be confused by issues which are matters for the Federal Parliament alone. I wish to refer again to a passage on page 95 of Dr. Bryce's book. He says here, speaking of these issues:—

In this respect this connection is no unmixed benefit, for it helps to make the national parties powerful and their strife intense in these last-named bodies. Every vote in the Senate is so important to the great parties that they are forced to struggle for ascendancy in each of the State Legislatures by whom the senators are elected.

Then, again, on page 96, he says:

Sometimes when a vacancy in a senatorship approaches the aspirants for it put themselves before the people of the State. Their names are discussed at the State party convention held for the nomination of party candidates for State offices, and a vote in that convention decides who shall be the party nominee for the senatorship. This vote binds the party within and without the State Legislature, which immediately precedes the occurrence of the senatorial vacancy. Candidates for seats in that Legislature are frequently expected to declare for which aspirant to the senatorship they will, if elected, give their votes.

He then speaks in a note of how there was an effort made by a number of men to alter this system so as to throw the election of senators directly upon the people. Then on pages 537 and 542 he shows how the legislature in each State is profoundly affected and has deteriorated in composition by the interference of Federal politics through that system. He says on page 542:

The Federal senators are chosen by State legislators. The party, therefore, which gains a majority in the State Legislature gains two seats in the smaller and more powerful branch of the Congress. As parties in Congress are generally pretty well balanced, this advantage is well worth fighting for, and is a constant spur to the efforts of national politicians to carry the State elections in a particular State.

Then, on page 537, he says:

One of these is that the political importance of the States is no longer what it was in the early days of the Republic. Although the States have grown enormously in wealth and population, they have declined relatively to the central government. The excellence of State laws and the merits of a State administration make less difference to the inhabitants than formerly, because the hand of the national government is more frequently felt. The questions which the State deals with, largely as they influence the welfare of the citizen, do not touch his imagination like those which the Congress handles, because the latter determine the relations of the Republic to the rest of the world, and affect all the area that lies between the two oceans. The State set out as an isolated and self-sufficing commonwealth. It is now merely a part of a far grander whole, which seems to be slowly absorbing its functions and stunting its growth, as the great tree stunts the shrubs over which its spreading boughs have begun to cast their shade.

In short it is this: that, owing to the State Legislatures having to elect the Federal Senators, the Federal parties will influence the State Legislatures, which means the introduction of Federal issues into such elections, and it means therefore the deterioration of State politics—the growth of Federal politics and Federal power at the expense of State politics. As to the franchise, I am of opinion that it should be a federal matter.

Mr. HOLDER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is not a State matter. It is a matter which I should like to see settled in the Constitution.

An HON. MEMBER:

As to the Senate?

Mr. HIGGINS:

As to the franchise of both Houses, that should be in the Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Some say in the plausible phrase:—

Let each colony settle for itself the franchise.

Mr. SYMON:

Only for the Senate?
Mr. HIGGINS:
   It has been said with regard to both Houses.
Mr. SYMON:
   There has been no proposition like it.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   I have heard it. I should be the last to interfere with any State settling its franchise for its State purposes, but when it comes to this—that that State is to join in electing members to make laws for us, to make laws for other colonies—the other colonies have a right to have a voice in the franchise. Therefore what shall be the federal franchise is purely a federal matter. I go a little further, and I say I hope to see that we are to fix the franchise in the Constitution.
Mr. HOLDER:
   Hear, hear.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   Of course, it will be said—
   Leave that to the Federal Parliament.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
   Hear, hear.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   If you have it left to the Federal Parliament to fix the franchise you will find it hard to get a broad franchise from it.
Mr. HOLDER:
   Hear, hear.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   Therefore I will lend a helping hand to anyone who will try to put into the Constitution the franchise for both Houses. At the same time I am willing to have provision made for amendment of the Constitution to any reasonable degree, so that any alteration can be made hereafter if it be found expedient. I may say, incidentally, that the minimum franchise I can agree to is that of manhood suffrage.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Surely the Federal Parliament is certain to be elected on that basis?
Mr. HIGGINS:
   I would like the hon. the Premier to tell me why it is sure to be elected on that basis. Suppose it is left to the different colonies. In Victoria, Queensland, Western Australia, and Tasmania you have not a uniform suffrage, though I am glad that in New South Wales manhood suffrage exists, while in South Australia women also have the franchise.
Mr. SYMON:
Would you abolish womanhood suffrage?

Mr. HIGGINS:

Not for South Australia. I am in favor of womanhood suffrage, but the colonies have not generally adopted it yet; and, though I am a strong advocate of it, I say the best way of getting it is through manhood suffrage. Get a liberal franchise on the basis of manhood suffrage and womanhood suffrage will follow. It is only a question of expediency. We who claim to be Liberals in this matter demand that we should have in the Federal Constitution a provision for uniform manhood suffrage for the purposes of election to the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Would it not shut out women altogether?

Mr. HIGGINS:

With all respect, I say no. If you have uniform manhood suffrage in the Constitution for both Houses as soon as the question of womanhood suffrage is ripe for decision you can ask for an alteration of the Constitution so as to extend the federal franchise to women.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

In the mean time you shut out the women of South Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I do not shut them out of anything they at present possess. At present they have the advantage of being able to vote at the elections for Parliament in South Australia, and they will still keep that power. I do not close them out of any power they possess at present, but to achieve Federation I should not insist upon making it a condition of Federation that there shall be women's suffrage for all the colonies. The other colonies have to fight the matter out for themselves a little more, and, having done that and having adopted it for their own State Legislatures, it will be time for us to ask to amend the Constitution. I do no

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

They have the right to legislate on certain subjects now, and you take that away from them.

Mr. SOLOMON:

They elected us to this Convention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

And made a very good choice.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Yes, a very good choice; but I wish to say again that the women are not giving up anything which they possess at present.
Mr. ISAACS:
Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I have said "No," and my hon. friend says "Yes." All that I can say is "No" again. For the purposes of the State Legislature they will still possess their present right. They know that their best wisdom is not to make this an essential for the purposes of Federation. The surest wisdom is to adopt the franchise of New South Wales, which I wish we had in Victoria, and then, when the matter has become riper, make the alteration.

Mr. GRANT:
They can vote on taxation legislation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They have a voice in the election of the Legislature by which Customs duties are levied.

Mr. HIGGINS:
We must not refuse to recognise that the women in electing the delegates for South Australia have elected them for the purpose of making an agreement with the other colonies, and not to insist on all that South Australia requires. That is all that is implied. I should like to see the Senate elected by the colony as a whole and the House of Representatives by districts. It has been said that a Senate elected by the colony as a whole will be so powerful that it will claim the right to amend Money Bills. If there should be certain advantages given to the smaller States in the Senate it will represent a minority of the people, and a House which represents a minority of the people should be kept subordinate to the House which represents the people as a whole. I should like to speak about the finances, but I do not intend to. I feel that it is the largest of all the subjects; and, although I have given it the most thought, I feel that it is a subject on which I do not want to commit myself, but I wish to get more details first.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You should give us the benefit of your knowledge of finance.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I am sufficiently modest to know that my knowledge of finance would do no good to the Premier. I have spoken under some indisposition, and, having dealt so long on matters of the Constitution, I should not do myself justice in going on further; but I can only say that the question of finance and the question of railways are those upon which I think we, as representatives of the people, are entitled to hold our views in reserve. I want more data, more information, more figures—in fact, we are omnivorous for figures upon this question of finance; and I feel I do not want to hamper myself in future discussions in the Committee of the whole by giving expression to my views upon the question of finance. I think the views of the House are not ripe upon the question of finance, and, although I feel strongly with regard to the question and the inequity of the proposals in the Bill of 1891 upon the financial question, I do not intend to deal with it at the present stage. I feel we should be very chary about committing ourselves in reference to finance. I want to be very guarded as to the mode of dealing with deadlocks. As far as I am concerned, I would like to see a deadlock avoided, not by the joint sitting of the two Houses, but by a system of referendum if necessary; and, if we cannot get that, by a joint dissolution of the two Houses. I am completely against the System of a joint sitting, and I am against the idea of those who represent the people as a whole being treated as no more influential than those who represent a class of people.

Mr. GORDON:
What class?

Mr. HIGGINS:
I say this—that those who represent a class of people do not come in upon the same level terms with those who represent the people as a whole, and with the system of joint sitting I can never be in favor. If the Senate is to represent a minority, as it will do under equal representation, it is not fair to put those who represent the people as a whole upon the same level.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
You propose to give a similar franchise for both Houses.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If you give a special advantage to a small State in the Senate you will have the Senate representing not the true majority, but the minority; and therefore I say, as the Senate represents a minority, it will not be truly representative of the people as a whole. Even though the franchise be upon the same basis, the House will not truly represent the majority. I hope I have not wearied the House. I have raised opposition, which is a great object to achieve in this debate; and I understand a representative of New South Wales will, in the course of time, trenchantly attack my observations and show how utterly unreasonable my conclusions are, I ask the House to bear with me if I have not spoken altogether as, I should have done.

Mr. WISE:
Although I do not find myself in accord with every, view and conclusion that have been arrived at by my hon. friend, I trust that he will find when I have sat down that, in combatting his views, I have imitated the temper with which he has spoken, and his admirable lucidity. I say nothing about his preliminary complaint as to the form of procedure, because it appears to me that the hon. gentleman himself has answered his own arguments by the character of the speech he has delivered, and shown how it is possible, on these resolutions, to touch with sufficient fulness on all the points of controversy, and to do so without emphasising too early those points of difference, which must ultimately be solved, but which ought not to be brought into too much prominence until the time is ripe for their solution. I will at once come to grip with my hon. friend over the question of equal representation. As I heard him elaborate his arguments I could not help recalling an incident at the Philadelphia Convention of 1789, when a gentleman put, I will not say with equal force, but with great force, the views urged by my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, the representative of Victoria-that is to say, he insisted that it would be improper and absurd that 180,000 men in one part of the country should have equal representation with 750,000 in another portion of the country, and he concluded an emphatic speech by saying that such a proposal would be unjust. So curiously does history repeat itself, that we find the same arguments being used here to-day. He was succeeded by a delegate from Delaware, who, oddly enough, was called Mr. George Read.

Mr. ISAACS:

A bad start. (Laughter.)

Mr. WISE:

Thus does history repeat itself in great things as well as in little, and this gentleman said: "The hon. member who preceded me has been candid. He has said that there should be no Federation if the States come in on equal terms. I will be equally candid. I tell him I never will confederate upon such terms." It seems to me that we are much in the same position to-day that the framers of the Constitution of the United States found themselves in in Philadelphia little more than a century ago; and this has, more than anything else, brought me round to the view that there ought to be equal representation in the Senate, namely, that it is a practical necessity if we desire to see the Federation of Australia. I am not sure that there is not some theoretical justification for this. Each of these States has a history of which it is proud, and traditions to which it clings, perhaps more closely than people in a larger State, because they have lived closer to the men whose deeds they cherish in their memories. They have a separate national existence, and I am not sure that there is not something more than mere sentiment in the desire that they should not lose their identity in a larger Federation. It is a practical necessity of Federation that equal representation should be granted. I do not understand how anyone can object to this principle of "One State One Vote," who is an advocate of the democratic principle of "One Man One Vote." It seems to me it would be just as illogical to say that one State, because it contributes a larger portion to the revenue than another, should have larger voting power than another which contributes less, as it would be to insist that it man who happens to have forty times more wealth than another man should have forty times more voting power. This recognition of that essential equality which underlies the whole principle of Federation we are now asked to give by having an equal representation of the States in the Senate. If that equality is conceded, we are then face to face with the problem so clearly stated to us by Sir Richard Baker. And I would like to express my great obligation to him for the address he delivered the other day.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Mr. WISE:
Speaking for myself, it compelled me-although the subject was not unfamiliar-to put all my ideas upon this subject back into the crucible, and to think the matter out again. And I am afraid the result has been to lead me to a conclusion different to that which he desired. If it be the case-and Sir Richard Baker has convinced me that it is-that, to use his own phrase-
The Cabinet system is incompatible with it true Federation, because you can never have a responsible Government which has to be responsible to two Houses.

Then I, for one, am driven to make a choice between a true Federation and responsible government. And like my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins-and here I agree with him-when driven to make that choice, it seems to me it is of greater importance that we should preserve the practice of responsible government, than the logical cohesion of the federal idea. This is one of those cases where the logical formulae of political speculation ought to give way to the historical and practical necessities of our own day.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. WISE:
And therefore I recognise at once that the Union we are about to enter upon is not a complete Federation, not a logical Federation in the sense that every measure that is passed has to approve itself to a majority of the inhabitants and a majority of the States. Still recognising that, I feel it to be a duty to do the best we can to keep the federal idea as little weakened as may be possible. Recognising, then, that responsible government will vail, and believing, as I do, that it ought to prevail, we are driven to the necessity of establishing the predominance of one of the two Houses, and that predominance appears to have been secured in the draft Bill of 1891, as modified by the proposals of my hon. friend Mr. O'Connor—with whom I am so much in agreement that I shall speak very briefly on this point—in providing that Money Bills should originate in the National Assembly and that the States Assembly should have no power to amend the annual Appropriation Act. But, with that exception, I fail to see any reason why the States Assembly Should not have co-ordinate powers with the Representative Assembly. Give the States Assembly or Senate the power to alter the Appropriation Act and you at once make that body a portion of the Executive. You make it responsible for the preparation of the Estimates of the year and you take the executive government out of the hands of the responsible Ministers, who are to look no doubt to the House which is to be predominant—starting on the assumption that one House must be predominant—and that House by reason of experience we accept because it is the House which represents the people in their numerical majority. I had hoped that the hon. member who has just resumed his seat would have spoken at more length on the reasons that weigh with him why the States Assembly should not be allowed to amend Money Bills. I frankly admit that to me this contest about amending Money Bills has rather an antiquarian than a practical interest. I know that is a vital, living, and important question in Victoria, and I had hoped—and I hope still—that before the debate closes some representative from Victoria will put the Victorian view of this question as forcibly as possible, so that those who, like myself, are in a difficulty as to what arouses so much interest in that colony in a question that seems to us to be on

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

You cannot have responsible government with two Houses of co-ordinate powers.

Mr. WISE:

I do not think so. You cannot have responsible Government and the power to amend the Appropriation Act, but if the power of the States Assembly or Senate to amend the Appropriation Act is taken away, then the Government remains responsible to the House of Representaves.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Would you allow Customs Bills to be amended?

Mr. WISE:

I do not see why not. I am glad of the interjection, as it suggests something of interest to the Victorian representatives. It is well known that New South Wales has large deposits of iron. I believe iron, as the raw material of most manufacturing industries, is admitted free into Victoria. Suppose New South Wales, backed up by Queensland, in order to protect the industry, were to impose a duty of £5 per ton on all pig iron, I venture to think that the Victorian delegates to the Senate would like to strike out that item. Take another illustration. One does not readily occur to me as applicable to Australia; but in other parts of the world there is fish-curing, for instance.

Mr. GORDON:
Queensland sugar.

Mr. WISE:
And the prevention of the introduction of salt would rain that industry.

Mr. ISAACS:
You are assuming that it has passed the other House.

Mr. WISE:
I am.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That is the first step.

Mr. WISE:
I do not think that many real conflicts will arise over the Money Bills. The constitutional conflicts to-day take place far more over social questions than they do over Money Bills, and surely it is a little inconsistent to say that your States Assembly may amend or defeat a Bill that may strike at the very root of any social question, as, for instance, parents and the custody of their children, or establishing what some call freedom of contract, or striking a deadly blow at any industry or disorganising industrial relations, and yet when a Bill for the payment of a single official comes up to say that the men chosen to represent the State - men who have been ripened in judgment by experience, the pick of the whole of the colonies-shall not have the power to amend it in the most insignificant particular, although in larger matters they are given full power. Therefore I trust we shall not be scared by the ghost of dead controversies which lived in Victoria some years ago, and which have not taken on flesh very much in recent years or in any other colonies, and which possibly only walked in Victoria owing to special circumstances, likely enough never to occur again. It is not very hard to define the distinction between Appropriation Bills and what we call Money Bills. Sir George Turner asked me just now if I was in favor of allowing the States Council to amend a Taxation Bill. I will give an illustration from our own colony within the last three years. We sent up a measure for direct taxation, which excited a deal of class conflict. That Bill, when it reached the Upper House—I only give this illustration as an illustration, not admitting there is the slightest analogy between the Upper House and the States Assembly—when it reached the Upper House, from its peculiar structure, there was doubt as to whether it was a Money Bill or not. This may be difficult to understand, as it was a Bill to impose taxation, and it would therefore seem obvious that it was a Money Bill. However, for certain reasons arising out of the measure being divided into Bills, there was a doubt; but the President of the Council ruled it was a Money Bill and a Bill imposing taxation, and that therefore no amendment was possible. Our Council was then compelled to throw it out, although many of those who spoke in favor of throwing it out would have favored passing it if it could have been amended. In consequence of that the country was put to the expense of a dissolution, and six weeks afterwards, when the ruling had been reversed, the Upper House passed it with the amendments they were willing to have made before-seventy-two of them—and all of these amendments were made with general approval and accepted by the Government with the exception of five, and as to these a conference was held at which a compromise satisfactory to all parties was arrived at. These amendments were a great advantage to the Taxation Bill amended by the Second Chamber.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That could easily have been got over by the Assembly sending up a Bill as desired by the Council.

Mr. WISE:
Perhaps some of us thought that way also.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Perhaps it did not suit the Government.

Mr. WISE:
I would like to refer to the suggestion of Mr. Higgins as to having a uniform electoral franchise declared in the Constitution. I came here strongly impressed with that idea, and I urged in various addresses that that should be done. Further reflection, however, has satisfied me that it is hardly practicable. Suppose, for instance, the Convention passes a clause to be inserted in the Constitution providing that the suffrage for the first Parliament should be adult suffrage. What measures could be taken to ensure the issue of electors' rights to the women of the colonies which do not possess the franchise? Suppose, for instance, the clause is a one man one vote clause, who is to prescribe that the electoral machinery of the colony that has not got that system shall be so altered as to provide for its effective working?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We did it for these elections by saying no man should vote more than once.

Mr. WISE:
I agree with Sir George Turner that it must be left to the Federal Parliament, but before the Federal Executive is in existence who is there to ensure that any regulation we make here with regard to the electoral machinery of any particular colony will be effectively carried out?

An HON. MEMBER:
Each colony would have to pass a Bill.

Mr. WISE:
Is that practicable?

Mr. HIGGINS:
They might refuse.

Mr. WISE:
If they refuse we are in this position: that we have raised up a fresh obstacle to this Federal Commonwealth coming into existence. I believe we shall get a more liberal franchise from the Federal Parliament than from this Convention, but that is an argument rather ad hominem, and one which is not entitled to much weight. It has been said the principle of establishing a federal franchise is a good one and practicable, but at present I have heard nothing to show that such an object, even if desirable—and I have felt fully the force of the arguments urged in favor of as liberal a franchise as possible—can be achieved without raising great obstacles to the union we are sent here to consummate.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is worth making an effort.

Mr. WISE:
I find that I have inadvertently omitted to do justice to part of the argument of my learned friend Mr. Higgins. He very forcibly insisted, and he drove the argument home very clearly, that the true protection of the States interests was to be found in the limitation in the Constitution Act of the powers of the Federal Government. While I entirely agree that it is undoubtedly a great protection of the interests of all the States, both small and large, it does not seem to answer the argument that was in the mind of the hon. member when he used those words. The danger to the States interests that the smaller States fear is not, as I understand it, the encroachment of the Federal Government upon the powers which the Constitution limits to the States, but the improper exercise by the Federal Government of its powers in Federal matters to the injury of the States.
Mr. HIGGINS:
Can you give an instance?

Mr. WISE:
I have endeavored to give one with regard to a possible duty on iron. Some have been given in the course of this debate and others in the debate of 1891. I might mention such matters as an excessive expenditure on defence in an improper place or the expenditure of large sums under the pretence of serving national purposes when the real reason was to secure doubtful votes in a section of the State.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
Would not the House of Representatives be the best to safeguard that?

Mr. WISE:
In answer to my honorable friend's interjection it appears to me that it is to prevent anything like log-rolling in the House of Representatives, not so much in the interests of the State, but of the Ministry of the day, that the States desire to protect themselves. Instances will occur to members, and it would unduly protract my remarks were I to give more. I would like to say further that there is one matter, namely, his proposal of limiting the powers of the Senate with regard to the amendment of Money Bills, which my honorable and learned friend Mr. O'Connor seemed to me to leave a little obscure. I understood him to mean that the Senate should have no power to amend the annual Appropriation Act. He is silent, and probably designedly so, on another important matter. Would he or would he not give the States Assembly power to amend the Loan Appropriation Act. It is a matter which has to be faced, but on which I at present express no opinion. It must be considered by those who advocate giving power to the States to protect themselves, and also by those who desire to see more uniformity in the representation of the States.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is more important than the other matter.

Mr. WISE:
It is indeed important, as it may be used as an engine of oppression, yet it may be essential for the due exercise of the government of the Commonwealth.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It comes under the same principle as Money Bills. The borrowed money has to be spent.

Mr. WISE:
It may be a more effective engine of corruption in the spending of loan money in different localities, and may cause more serious trouble than perhaps the appropriation of the consolidated revenue. I pass now to the consideration of the proper steps to be taken in the event of there being a hopeless deadlock between the two Houses; and I would preface my remarks by expressing a doubt as to whether it is after all necessary to provide any way out of a deadlock. Is it historically true with regard to these colonies at at any rate that deadlocks have always proved disadvantageous to a community in which they occur? Is there not a good deal to be said, and truly said, in favor of the view that deadlocks have too often occurred from an undue exercise of power which was not always approved of by the people. There is another consideration of a more general character which must never be forgotten, that there is only one way after all to absolutely avoid a deadlock, and that is to create a despot. If you have the government of a single man, a deadlock cannot possibly occur, but I understand a deadlock is the price we and every free country have to pay for the benefit of constitutional government. If you have constitutional government there must always be some risk of the powers—the counter-balancing powers—that constitute a Government falling out of gear, but the true remedy, as proved by experience, is to trust to the self-governing instincts which the British possess, the sense of justice, and the power of public opinion. At the same time there can be no question that in entering upon a Federation we are introducing a new element, and the proposal that was made by Mr. O'Connor does certainly appear to me to be open to the objections raised by Sir Graham Berry, whose interjection was not answered. Mr. O'Connor proposed that if the interests of a majority of States were so seriously affected that the States Assembly felt it its duty to throw out the Appropriation Bill, and per capita, and the question should be resolved by a majority of both Houses. It was asked by Sir George Turner—Suppose you had a minority in the Lower House which was turned into a majority by the reinforcement it received from those of a similar way of thinking in the Assembly of the States? And Mr. O'Connor replied that in that case the will of the States Assembly would prevail. "And what then?" asked Sir Graham Berry, but the question was not answered. How could the Ministry carry on if it found itself in a minority in the Lower House? I fail to see any answer to it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It would not be a majority in that House; it would be a minority. No minority in the House of Representatives, coupled with a majority in the States Assembly, should override a majority in the House of Representatives which gave its confidence to the Ministry.

Mr. WISE:
Exactly so. If the Appropriation Bill is not passed what is the Ministry to do?

HON. MEMBERS? Resign.

Mr. WISE:

What is the next Ministry to do?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

They must go to the people.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

My answer was that they must go to the country.

Mr. WISE:

Then what becomes of the theory of responsible government? This is one point in which in actual practice the theory of responsible government may be altered. It does not appear that the suggestion of Sir George Turner to avoid a deadlock gets over the difficulty, because if you refer the matter to a referendum, and a referendum be taken of the States, the assumption is that the matter is referred to the referendum because the interests of a majority of the States are so seriously affected that their representatives threw out the Appropriation Bill; the probability is that the representatives actually represented the opinions of their States, so that the referendum, unless the State senators misrepresent the opinion of the State, will lead to precisely the same result. After all we are driven, for my part somewhat reluctantly, to a state of absolute uncertainty as to whether there is any possible way out of a deadlock.

Mr. SOLOMON:

The dual referendum comes in there, according to Sir George Turner.

Mr. WISE:

That complicates the matter still more. I only throw out these observations in order to obtain a further elucidation of a most difficult problem, and I entertain the idea myself that it is preferable to run the risk of any misunderstanding that may arise rather than invent any mechanical contrivance to settle difficulties regarding which there will be a temptation to put the contrivance in force before exhausting all conciliatory means. I would like now to say a word or two in reference to other clauses of these resolutions, and I do not by any means concur in the censure passed by my friend Mr. Higgins, the representative of Victoria, as to the framing of resolution No. 1A. It seems to me to be admirably adapted to raise all the topics in controversy and to be framed as deliberately and successfully as any one of the thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England, to commit no one to anything, yet allow everyone to raise to his own satisfaction any question he pleases. I would like to say one word upon the first sub-heading of resolution No. 1. It states: "That the powers, privileges, and territories of the several existing colonies shall remain intact." There is one point, referring to the territories of the State that I have not yet heard any comment upon. These are large-sized States to federate, and, in the case of two of them, there is a dangerous predominance in population and wealth. There is another difficulty connected with this subject, which perhaps presses more upon myself and those who hold similar fiscal opinions to myself than upon others, and that is that in the Bill as drafted now there is no practical alternative source of revenue for the Federal Commonwealth to the Customs, and I say this: though the Bill of 1891 conferred absolute power of taxation, and no doubt our Bill will follow suit, because it would be practically exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, for the Federal Government to levy direct taxation, there are some of us who do not look forward with satisfaction to a continuance of the existence of the Customs duties. It has occurred to me, and I throw this out merely as a suggestion, that if the Federal Government at the outset had a substantial portion of the continent as federal territory, that that would give two advantages. It would offer a field for experiment which would be of the greatest interest, and be ultimately successful—an experiment which would result in giving to the Federal Government the revenue from a gradual growth in the value of lands, a form of raising revenue, towards the securing of which there has been a steady movement throughout the continent. There is, belonging to the four colonies of Western Australia, South Australia, New South Wales, and Queensland, a great tract of territory in the interior which is practically unoccupied. Even those portions which are occupied cost far more to govern than they return, and I would suggest whether it is impossible that a concession should not be made by each of these four colonies to hand over the greater part—if not the whole of that territory—to the Federal Government as a federal endowment.

Mr. GORDON:
Without consideration?

Mr. WISE:
Well, the consideration would be that they would take over the charge of governing it.

Mr. HOWE:
Take over the liabilities.

Mr. WISE:
Yes, take over the liabilities. Let them use it as federal territory, and let it be governed as the territories are governed in the United States. It appears to me that would have this advantage: supposing there were to be a great mineral discovery-as is quite practicable and likely-in territory now unoccupied and belonging to any one of these four States, and that that were to lead to such a rush of population as we have seen lately happen in South Africa; the consequence would be that a particular State, which might already have undue predominance, would have its power considerably increased, to the peril of the whole Federation. If it were federal territory, however, the Federal Government would, as soon as the population justified it, carve out such territory as a new State, and would at the same time, by every increment in numbers, by every natural development, by every improvement in the forms of government, be deriving a revenue and forming a permanent endowment which would ultimately enable it to dispense with Customs duties. It is with a desire to give an opening for a large experiment in land nationalisation—which is a cant phrase often misunderstood—and also with a view of securing the more effective development of the interior, without causing any risk to the Federation by giving undue predominance to already powerful States that I make this suggestion.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Do you think a Constitution containing that provision would be likely to be assented to?

Mr. WISE:
I premised it by saying that it should be done with the assent of four States. What I would suggest is that the Federal Government should be given power to take over the territory and administer it. Before passing from that topic the arguments in favor of my proposal would certainly be strengthened if the Federal Government undertook to build the Transcontinental railway. It is clearly right that if the federal form of government added to the value of the land by State expenditure, the State-earned increment should go back to the Federal Government, and not to any particular State through which the railway happened to run. I come now to the fifth sub-head of Resolution 1, which reads:

That the trade and intercourse between the Federated Colonies, whether by land or sea, shall become and remain absolutely free.

I entirely concur with the views which fell from my hon. colleague, Mr. Carruthers, as to the necessity of the Federal Government taking over the railways. I do so chiefly upon technical and practical grounds. We all agree, I understand, that the competitive rates must go. We all agree that the railways are not to be used as protective barriers to intercolonial trade. Where we differ is as to the practicability of arriving at either of these objects without the Federal Parliament absolutely taking over the railways, managing them under one system, with one gauge, and under one head. My honorable and learned friend Mr. O'Connor has urged that all that is desired can be effected by means of an Inter-State Commission. But in reply I would remind him, as the South Australian representative, Mr.
Glynn, has already done, and therefore I will not dwell upon it, that the Inter-State Commission in the United States and the corresponding tribunal in England have not succeeded in accomplishing their object, and if there is that want of success by a powerful tribunal, backed with the authority of the law of a settled community in dealing with private companies, what hope can we have that the tribunal newly called into existence by a Government, which has only begun to feel its feet, will be able to coerce the powerful States, which would be members of the union and own the railways. And if they could coerce, is it a safe thing to enter this Federation with much a cause of permanent friction between the several States? Is it judicious to demand that the States should surrender their settled policy, which has been maintained for their own special advantages, and submit the determination of their policy to a newly-constituted body which will direct the railways in the interests of the whole community? Is it safe or practicable? If it is, I shall be glad to welcome that way out of the difficulty. We had an illustration on the first day of our meeting of the difficulties with which the Inter-State Commission would be met. One of the representatives, Mr.

Walker, asked a question with regard to the returns furnished by the Railways Commissioners to their respective colonies in relation to competitive rates. There was a most ominous refusal at the hands of one of the delegations, on the ground that they were confidential.

Mr. FRASER:
That refusal is not confined to our colony.

Mr. WISE:
It makes it worse if the other colonies take the same view.

Mr. HIGGINS:
We are more frank, you see.

Mr. WISE:
How is the State Commission to find out what preferential rebates are being allowed if the railway management refuses the information?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
The Commission must have power to make inquiries.

Mr. WISE:
And if the Government refuses? There are many ways of defeating inquiries, as the Commissioners of the United States found. Mr. Grant, of Tasmania, could give us some interesting information on that point.
There are many ways of keeping railway accounts to show a different state of things to that which really exists.

Mr. GORDON:
That's rough on Grant. (Laughter.)

Mr. WISE:

Are not the difficulties, great as they may be-and I admit that they are great-in the way of the Federal Government taking over the railways less than the difficulty in submitting them to the control of an Inter-State Commission. Besides, the taking over of the railways will serve another purpose. We cannot hope to bind these colonies together in an indissoluble tie, to remove the causes of difference, and cement their union unless we open up new channels of communication in addition to removing the obstacles which obstruct the old ones. I believe we shall make little progress with Federation until we turn the railways from weapons of defence into instruments of consolidation. By doing this we will at once get rid of difficulties in the way of trade, and make it possible to build new railways, which at present we dare not do. In my colony the worst effect of the existence of competitive rates is that we are practically prohibited from giving the settlers of the western districts the benefit of railways which they otherwise might have. We dare not run lines further west, although we have reason to believe they would pay handsomely. So far as New South Wales is concerned I am satisfied we can afford, even as a mere matter of calculation of pounds, shillings, and pence-although I do not argue from that point-to give to Victoria the trade of the district which geographically belongs to her, and do the same with regard to South Australia and Queensland; and yet, if we were allowed

Mr. FRASER:
Would you do the same thing with Tasmania?

Mr. WISE:
I think Tasmania should be treated apart.

Mr. WISE:

An HON. MEMBER:
And Western Australia too?

Mr. WISE:
Yes, and Western Australia too. It has been asked why it should be necessary to take over more than the trunk lines, and on that question I do not offer any opinion of my own, but I will accept the opinion of the railway experts, that it is important that they should be taken over as a matter of technical convenience. It would be very inconvenient to run the trunk lines under one system and the branch lines under another; but on that question I have had no experience, and I am willing to be guided by those who know. Then there is a further consideration. Everyone agrees that the telegraphs and post offices are to be handed over to the Federal Government, but has it been quite clearly recognised that the bulk of the telegraph lines are built along the permanent ways of the railways of the colonies, and that the letters are conveyed in the railway carriages that run along these permanent ways of the system that belongs to each colony?

Mr. HOLDER:
We should not take it for granted that the post and telegraph offices will be handed over.

Mr. WISE:
It has been taken for granted.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Perhaps the South Australian post pays and the New South Wales does not.

Mr. WISE:
Perhaps the service is not so good as in New South Wales. I only urge upon the very attentive consideration of the Convention that grave inconvenience may arise if the power that is entrusted with the carriage of the mails and the duty of administering the telegraphs does not own the land in which the telegraph-posts rest and the land on which the permanent way is built, and over which the mails are carried. For the purposes of defence it is practically impossible, so I understand from military and railway experts, to work out any federal scheme of defence unless the gauges are similar throughout the colonies. To move a force from one part of the continent to another would require delay-

Mr. FRASER:
That is not so.

Mr. WISE:
Not only in moving the men from one platform to another, but in transhipment. I understand it is requisite not only to move the men from one part of Australia to another, but any efficient system of defence would involve that there should be a movement with the men of a large body of war material, wagons, guns, and other things. The transhipment of these must accompany any Federal force from one part of the continent to another, otherwise the efficiency of the force would be retarded. For these reasons, if for no others-I only mention those which apply to the purposes of the Commonwealth - it is desirable that the railway gauges should be made uniform. There is a final reason connected with finance which the Finance Committee should well consider, and I have no doubt they will do so and bring up evidence to support their views. A difficulty in the way of the finances of the Federation has already been pointed out by Sir George Turner. The Federal Government may have a larger revenue than it knows how to spend, and there is a further difficulty that the amount required for the expenses of the Government may become too great. If the railways are taken over, I believe it is no exaggeration to say that the annual saving in management and in running them—that is to say, if we have one system between Brisbane and Adelaide—will certainly amount to half a million, if not three-quarters of a million per annum.

Mr. BARTON:
On what principle have you arrived at that?

Mr. GORDON:
Is that allowing for break of gauge?

Mr. WISE:
There should be one gauge.

Mr. FRASER:
That will cost millions of money.

Mr. BARTON:
Ten millions, it is said.

Mr. WISE:
Placing the cost at four millions, I was going to say three-

Mr. FRASER:
It would be nearly double.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Do you want another contract?

Mr. FRASER:
You will have to consider the question of rolling-stock.

Mr. WISE:
That is a matter of adjustment. If it costs £4,000,000—and the actual cost is a matter for investigation by the Finance Committee with an annual saving of three-quarters of a million it would not take long to work off the amount which it would cost to convert the gauges. So, as a financial expedient, and to assist in adjusting the relations of the finances of the Commonwealth, and of the several States, the taking over of the railways is to be commended. I shall refrain now from further enlarging upon this topic because the matter has been already admirably gone into by a gentleman of experience upon the whole of this subject, Mr. Nash, the commercial editor of one of the Sydney papers, and his pamphlet is in the hands of the members of the Convention. Before I leave this question of the railways, I would like to say what I might have spoken upon more appropriately when dealing specifically with the federal territory. I would urge that as the Federation must have a federal territory if only in connection with the capital, it is desirable, for many reasons, which there is no need for me to elaborate now, that a clause should be in the Constitution to prevent the Federal Parliament or Government from selling an acre of the federal territory, so that we shall avoid the terrible evils which have resulted in this continent from the wholesale alienation of the land. There is a line of an important character in the first resolution to which my friend, Mr. Carruthers, was the first to call attention. That is a very important and a very significant form of expression:

To enlarge the power of self-government of the people of Australasia.

The preamble of the Draft Bill of 1891 says, in these terms:

Whereas the Australian Colonies have agreed to unite.

The difference between these two forms of language is one of far-reaching importance. Our form not only is something more than the assertion that the union is different from a union of States, but it is a declaration that the Constitution which we are about to frame emanates from the people, and that it is for the benefit of the people as a whole that its powers and functions should be exercised. No student of the constitutional history of the United States will fail to recognise the importance of such a declaration, and I trust that if questions arise under our Constitution as they arose frequently in the United States before the civil war-as they still, though less frequently, arise-as to where is the seat of sovereignty under the Federal Government, or as to what are the indicia of citizenship, these words will prove as useful towards their elucidation as the corresponding words in the preamble of the United States Constitution, "We, the people of the United States . . . do ordain and establish," have proved in the hands of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States towards settling Similar questions in that country. I trust that the Committee which will frame the Constitution will make this clause the preamble of the Bill, and thus assert that the powers of the Federal Government, although limited in their objects, are in respect of those objects supreme, and that the people of the whole continent have it in their power at any time to limit or extend these powers. It would lead me into a discussion too technical and too legal were I to refer even incidentally to the decisions which have been given by the Supreme Court of the United States in this connection. In reference to the judicature, I would state that I entirely disagree with the proposal which was made, I think, by Mr. Glynn, that the Federal Supreme Court should be composed of the Judges of the various States. I would point out that there is this grave objection to this proceeding-namely, that such a proposal, if carried into effect, would make the Federal Government dependent upon the Governments of the States, and that it would lead to this contradiction that while the Federal Government would require to have the absolute right to appoint its subordinate officers, so that it would not allow the States Government to appoint even a subordinate officer, it would place in the hands of the States the power, perhaps for temporary political convenience, to appoint those officers who in the ultimate resort would be entrusted with the destinies of the whole country. No Commonwealth would be secure if it depended for its existence upon officers appointed by anyone except themselves. If you once admit that all federal officers may be appointed by the several States the argument fails, but I venture to think that you will have no true Federation unless the Federal Government appoints its own officers and men in whom it can trust.

Mr. GLYNN:
That tells against international arbitration.

Mr. WISE:
I am afraid I cannot follow the analogy. What I am urging is that we ought not to expose the Commonwealth to the risk of having to submit the final adjudication upon matters affecting the Commonwealth—the ultimate interpretation of the Constitution—to judges who may be chosen, not that any judges have been chosen up to the present time, but if any of the colonies decrease in power, as Mr. Higgins suggests that they may do, we may have very improper appointments made to the local benches, and even to the high position of local Chief Justice.

Mr. GORDON:
You might as well assume federal bias as State bias.

Mr. WISE:
Federal bias is better than State bias if you want to carry out federal objects.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
You cannot ask a judge to serve two masters.

Mr. WISE:
I will not deal further with the question. The interjection of Mr. O'Connor has summed up my ideas on the subject. Then there is the matter of the civil servants: and I would like to throw out a suggestion whether it might not be possible to insert some clause to prevent a danger in connection with the Civil Services. There will be undoubtedly an important and extensive Civil Service. If the Post and Telegraphs are taken over that will give a very large number of federal civil servants, and the Customs will considerably increase the number. Now, there must be retained in the Federal Executive the power to dismiss any servant, but it seems to me that power should not be exercised except for cause shown. A provision that the Federal Government should have to lay before the Federal Parliament the reasons for dismissal of servants would be some check upon arbitrary dismissals.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Would you put that in the Constitution?

Mr. WISE:
I can see no other course. It has taken 100 years for the United States to pass a Civil Service Act, and now it is not of very much value. If we get a party system, and follow it out in the appointment of civil servants, we will be initiating a system of corruption which would gain strength every day.

Mr. ISAACS:
Do not the evils in America arise from the position of the President?

Mr. WISE:
I know that the party system gains strength from causes which do not exist here, but we cannot hope to be entirely free from it. Therefore, I propose that this should be inserted:
That all civil servants should hold office during good behaviour, or until they resign or are d

Mr. GORDON:
You secure them like the judges?

Mr. WISE:
No; because judges are not dismissed for cause shown.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That will apply to telegraph messengers.

Mr. GORDON:
The two Houses will have to agree to the dismissal of a junior officer.

Mr. WISE:
I prefer that the power of dismissal should rest with the Executive, but the Executive should not have it in their power by the appointment of a commission to shirk their own responsibility, or have it in their power to work injustice to the Civil Service, and still less should they have the power to make places in the Civil Service as a reward for services rendered. In my speech I have endeavored to take up the threads of the argument used in the course of the debate rather than make a set speech. I have to thank the Convention for the attention it has given me, and I join Mr. Carruthers in expressing the belief that if we carry on our deliberations as we have begun, and show a readiness to make compromises where compromises are possible without sacrifice of principle, we will, before we conclude, produce a measure more adapted than was the Bill of 1891 to the requirements of the people of Australia.

Mr. HENRY:

I rise with some diffidence, after the brilliant speech to which we have just listened, to contribute my mite to this important discussion. I understand we are invited to give our views on these general resolutions with the object of furnishing material to Select Committees in framing reports for this Convention. That seems to be the only justification in rising to address the Convention at this time. Mr. Barton has very generously intimated that it is desirable that the new members should speak at greater length than those who had been connected with the previous Convention. As one of those who happen to be amongst the later appointments, I appreciate the kind feeling which prompted that suggestion, but I respectfully differ from him as to the utility of doing this. If the object of this discussion is to educate the members of the Convention in the House, or the public outside of the House, or to influence votes on the questions that are likely to be raised, it would be more desirable that we should hear at greater length those members who, presumably, from their riper experience and familiarity with this subject, are in a better position to educate the members of the Convention and the public outside than we are. Since it has been thrust upon us that we must express some opinions for the guidance of committees I venture to offer my mite on the subject. After what has been said concerning the important constitutional questions that have been raised during the debate, I do not purpose, even if I had the knowledge and the necessary ability, to enter into them at any great length. If I did so I should be repeating, only probably in worse language, the arguments already used. I do not wish to waste the time of the Convention in such a manner, for when we come to closer quarters, in Committee, we can express all the opinions to which we may desire to give expression. Hon. members of this Convention have been deeply interested in the debate as far as it has gone, but when we came here I did hope we would have come to closer quarters, but since we have begun in this way I have listened with great interest and with advantage to the speeches so far delivered.

Mr. GORDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HENRY:

I hope that the subsequent discussion will be equally as profitable. What justifies me at the present time in addressing the Convention is that I have taken a great deal of interest in the financial question. Mr. Carruthers said it was inopportune at this stage to advance any opinions on financial questions because we have not sufficient information, whilst Mr. Higgins went so far as to say that he did not care to express any opinions on finance, although he had thought out the subject, lest he should commit himself to any expression of opinion on that point. Now, I am in accord with Sir George Turner, and I say that whatever opinion I may express on this important question of finance I should not feel bound by it if hon. members can show me a better way out of the difficulty than I see.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HENRY:

I think that is the true position, and if we are not to express our opinions on this important question, what guidance will the Select Committee have in framing their report? I certainly think the sound position is: when an hon. member has opinions, that he should not fail to give expression to them in this Convention. As to the resolutions with which we are dealing, I was very pleased to notice that the very first item was in reference to the enlargement of the powers of self-government. Mr. Barton very wisely and very well put this to the Convention, and I think he stated that it had not been sufficiently brought before the public and the electors of Australia during the late elections. Well, I am very proud to know that in little Tasmania this particular view of the question was insisted upon on several platforms. We recognised that we were proposing to join in creating a government which we would clothe with certain powers and functions, which that Government could discharge better in many respects than we could as separate States, and with certain powers also which we could not discharge at all. I am glad to know, especially in view of the remarks of so eminent an authority on Federation as Mr. Barton, that we in little Tasmania have taken this view of the case.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

Not "little" Tasmania.

Mr. HENRY:

My hon. colleague objects to the term "little."

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HENRY:

In reference to the all-absorbing question of equal representation in the Senate by all the States, I am glad to notice from opinions expressed in this Convention that the principle of equal representation in the Senate will probably be embodied in the Constitution Bill.
Mr. SOLOMON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HENRY:

As to the other question of great interest to all of us, namely, the power of the Senate to amend Money Bills, that will also no doubt be considered in due season, but I was very much pleased with the suggestion thrown out in that brilliant speech by Mr. Wise, which might very well be taken as a compromise between those who desire to see the power of the Senate to amend Money Bills introduced into the Constitution Bill and those who are opposed to such a proceeding. That compromise, if I understand it aright, is that the Senate shall have no power over the annual Appropriation Bill, but may deal with all other Money Bills. As I have promised, I will not weary hon. members with other questions which have been so ably discussed, but in reference to the franchise for the Senate, I am in accord with those who would submit that question to the will of the people. As to the House of Representatives, we are all prepared to accept representation in the Chamber on a population basis. For my part I shall join with those who desire to see a federal franchise for federated Australia. There has been a great deal said about the Cabinet system. I am in accord with those who would abide by those institutions which are ours, which have been the growth of centuries, and with which the people are acquainted. As showing how a particular system may adapt itself to a country in which it has grown up and answer there, yet be unsuited to another country with different traditions, I would point to the opinions of Numa Droz, an eminent Swiss statesman and writer, who, while approving of the referendum for his own country, declares it to be unsuited to a country with responsible government. It will, therefore, be wiser in my opinion to abide by the Cabinet system, to which the English people have been accustomed. It would be much better to abide by the system we understand, and leave it to the future to alter it if necessary. One speaker has said that there was an evolution taking place in politics as in everything else, and these evolutions will in all probability bring about a change in the Cabinet system; but we must be careful in employing systems we know nothing about. As to the establishment of the supreme Court of Appeal, we must have such an institution. As to the amendment of the Constitution, I will only say that I believe any amendment should be made difficult and not easy, so as to secure greater stability. I was very much interested in the admirable remarks of Mr. Wise on the subject of deadlocks. I think it is far wiser to bear with the evils in connection with the strifes between the two Houses than try to overcome deadlocks by methods with which we are not acquainted. This brings me to the important question alluded to in the third and fifth sub-sections of this first clause:

That the exclusive power to impose and collect duties of Customs and Excise, and to give bounties, shall be vested in the Federal Parliament:

and:

That seems to me to raise the whole matter of finance. It has been said that the question of State rights or equal representation is the crux of this business we have in hand. I do not for one moment underrate the great importance of that question, but I hold that we will come to a definite issue by vote on that as on other constitutional questions. But when we come to the subject of finance we come to what I regard as the crux of the whole business, and it is the solving of that problem that is really the great difficulty that lies before us. Hon. members who are familiar with the 1891 Bill will know the plan that was proposed then. I think the initial mistake made in that Bill was in conferring on the Federal Government the power to touch the Customs, postal, and telegraph revenues of the several colonies before we had a uniform federal tariff. That mistake should not in my judgment be repeated, because it led to endless difficulties and disputes and brain-worrying calculations about adjustments of the revenues and charges. The wiser course for us is to provide that no control of our Customs revenues or any other department shall be exercised by the Federal Government until the hour when the Federal Treasurer tables and carries a resolution in the House of Representatives for the imposition of Customs duties. From that time the real duty of the Federal Government should commence. Members who have given consideration to this subject know how difficult it is to reconcile the differences that arise in connection with the distribution of amounts between the several colonies as proposed in the Act of 1891; and the wiser plan is to make a clean sweep and allow the colonies to go on collecting their revenue and meeting their obligations until the hour when the Federal Government levies taxation. On this point my mind is quite clear. There are a great many industries, there are producing interests-manufacturing and trade interests—which will be seriously, and in some cases injuriously, affected by the great change which will take place when we have the uniform tariff which we must have under Federation. It is only fair that we should look to these individuals who must suffer. As an instance, in the colony I have the honor to represent we have wheatgrowers, and there are a considerable number of men whose interests are tied up in wheatgrowing. It is tolerably clear to many of us that the wheat-growing on the continent of Australia on the scale it is carried on will necessarily cause these men to put their wheat-growing lands to other, and, I hope, more profitable uses ultimately, and in view of the proposed alteration there should be fair notice given. If we enact that this Constitution Bill shall not come into force or take effect until one, or two, or three years have passed, whatever time may be thought sufficient notice, so as to give these men reasonable time in which to provide for the change which the uniform tariff will force on them, we will only do justice.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
How will they be assisted unless you say the uniform tariff is not to come into operation for a number of years?

Mr. HENRY:
You do not understand me. I did not make myself clear, but I will answer that question. This is how I propose it should be done. With a view to give the producers and small manufacturers, and also the traders who will have large stocks that will be affected, notice of the change, I say that under this Constitution we should not make the change until, say, January 1st, 1900. That is, that the Federal Constitution Bill should not take effect until the 1st January, 1900, or such date as may be determined on. Very well-

Mr. MCMILLAN:
That is concerning the Customs, I suppose?

Mr. HENRY:
Yes. If the Bill is to take effect on January 1st, 1900, the necessary arrangements would be made for electing the Parliament, which would then meet, and, under the machinery provided in the Bill, would elect its Executive. Then it would adjourn or prorogue, and the work of the Executive would be to frame a tariff and also to appoint organising officers for the whole of Australia, so that when the resolutions imposing the Customs were carried in the House of Representatives, by sending beforehand to the various Government officers the tariff under seal, everything could be ready to commence the collection of the tariff on, say, December 31st, 1900.

Mr. GORDON:
Are all these people to work for two or three years for nothing? Where is the money coming from to pay their salaries?

Mr. HENRY:
I do not intend that any work should be done until January 1st, 1900.

Mr. GORDON:
You must have revenue of some sort.

Mr. HENRY:
Certainly.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
What difference does it make which body collects the Customs duties?

Mr. HENRY:
It makes this difference, that it involves difficult and complex calculations as to who shall share, how the cost is to be distributed, and how surplus revenue is to be distributed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You will have it when the uniform tariff comes into force.

Mr. HENRY:
I know that, and I will deal with that point in time; I have now merely outlined my plan. It appears to me that there is no other way in which the question can be properly dealt with. Now, Sir George Turner has raised the important question as to how the surplus will be dealt with under the Federal Government and with a uniform tariff, but I say this: that from my point of view there is a duty laid on this Convention that the States' revenues shall be protected, that no action on the part of this Convention shall seriously dislocate or endanger the State finances.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. HENRY:
I suppose that will be admitted by all. To me it appears if you take away from the States the whole of their Customs revenue, which you must of necessity do when you have a uniform tariff-and without that uniform tariff we can have no Federation worth the name-when you take that away and make no provision for the return of a definite sum, you endanger State finances to such an extent that the State could not prudently enter the Federation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Unless you take away equal liabilities.

Hr. HENRY:
I am coming to that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I will not say another word.

Mr. HENRY:
I say our Customs revenue in Tasmania, and in the aggregate in all Australia, is practically absorbed in the payment of the interest on the public debt. It takes the Customs revenue of all Australia to pay the interest on the public debt, and I say emphatically-though, like any other member, I am open to be shown a better way out of it—that if the Federal Government takes over the means by which we pay the interest on our debt it must take over the obligation to pay the interest on that debt. Now we come to the question as to how we are going to compel the Federal Government—how we are to lay the obligation completely and thoroughly on the Federal Government, of paying that debt. I confess that I have some difficulty in arriving at this. Hon. members who are at all familiar with the subject will know that while we lay the obligation on the Federal Government we lay it equally on the various colonies at per head of population. While the interest per head per annum of which Tasmania would be relieved would be £2 1s. 4d., Western Australia would only be relieved of £1 14s. 5d.; and while South Australia would be relieved of £2 13s. 1d. Victoria would only be relieved of £1 13s. 6d., and it is therefore obvious that there must be an adjustment of this interest bill among the colonies. There is no member in this Convention who objects more strongly to anything in the shape of book-keeping between the States Government and the Federal Government than I do, as it is so opposed to the true federal spirit. The debt, however, as I see it, must be taken over by the Federal Government, and consequently there would have to be an adjustment between the colonies in respect to the Customs. Perhaps I ought to explain that I think it is imperative that the obligation should be laid on the Federal Government of setting aside a sum equal to the interest bill, and that is the solution of the difficulty. If we are to lay the obligation effectively on the Federal Government of providing a surplus, we must fix it that they must provide one not less than the interest bill. I see a great danger of allowing the question of the surplus to remain open. It is a matter which will require very close consideration. It perhaps is more a matter for discussion by the finance committee; but still I feel that it is my duty, since we are here to air our views, to refer to the matter. I think it would be interesting to hon. members to show how this works out in practice. I have increased confidence in asking consideration to this scheme, because I am fortified by the opinion of our statistician, Mr. R. M. Johnston, that it is thoroughly equitable in its operations. The result will be that while New South Wales will receive £44,000, Victoria will receive £243,000, and South Australia, will pay £277,000. (Laughter.) I hope my friends from South Australia will not laugh too hard at this, because I will assure them, and Mr. Gordon will be sufficiently acquainted with the finances of his own colony to know, that it is better for them to pay this sum of money to the Federal Government and be relieved of the payment of the interest than to continue as at present, when their annual interest bill so much exceeds their Customs revenue. The £277,000 they would pay is less than the difference between their Customs revenue and interest. Tasmania would pay £26,000. In this proposal the contributions by the several colonies—would be balanced by the payments to the other colonies, so that the Federation would sit as a mere arbitrator. After some study of the subject I think this plan has the advantage of being elastic, and that it will adapt itself to the changing conditions which we are all confident will take place in the expansion of trade, and in the increased prosperity of the colonies, which will come in any case, but will be greatly accelerated by Federation. With increased prosperity our burden of Customs duties will be lightened by so much per head. Upon the other hand, I have no doubt whatever that by consolidating our public debt the interest on our loans will be reduced, and I am entirely in accord with the practical view of Sir George Turner upon the subject, as I am upon many others, when he told us that he did not consider a conversion scheme would mean a great saving. It is certain, except in the event of a European financial crisis, the result of a war, or other cause, that as our bonds mature there will be a considerable saving in interest. The advantage will come from the consolidation of the debt and through the Federal Government taking over the debt. There have been opinions expressed as to the fear of the Federal Government having an undue surplus. I hope to have the privilege of serving upon a finance committee with other hon. members, and I think I will be able to demonstrate to them that this proposal will obviate that risk, and if the Federal Government has any surplus beyond what is required for distribution to the colonies, as against interest or payment for general charges, it should be paid to the colonies pro rata. That is the best check. I will go on to say something with reference to the question of the railways. Of course you all know that in our little colony— I use the expression again— (laughter) we have not the same difficulties or conflicts in connection with our railways that you have here on the continent. We, however, will take part in this discussion, and it becomes our duty that we should give our best and closest attention to this very important subject. No one more than I sees the necessity of doing away with conflicting railway tariffs in the same way as I see the necessity of abolishing the border Customs duties. I recognise that necessity fully, and I think what we desire can be accomplished without a federation of the railways being brought about. Regarding the fear that has been expressed that to attempt to federate the railways might interfere with the great question of Federation, I consider there is much force in that contention. I would respectfully suggest that a much wiser thing to provide is that the Federal Government should have the power, with the consent of the States, to take over the control of the railways. From my own point of view I regard the railways of a colony as intimately bound up with its industries, and I also say that the local Government is more likely to know how best to promote the industries of the State than the Federal Government. These are, shortly, the views I have on this subject; but at the same time I must say that my mind is quite open on this question, and I should be only too glad to join in recording my vote in favor of whatever I may see will be of advantage to Australia.

Mr. FRASER:
Some of our railways in Victoria are owned by local bodies.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
And some of them are anxious to get rid of them.

Mr. HENRY:
I may state frankly that we might have been influenced by a selfish consideration, and have looked to the possibility of carrying out a uniform gauge which is going to cost so many millions of money, being a federal matter. I am, however, told by my hon. friend, Mr. Walker, that Tasmania is to be left out of the question of cost. There is just one point, Mr. President, that I have heard referred to in a very mild form. It has been suggested that if the Federal Government takes over the public debt, then the railways should follow; indicating that the railways of the colony are to be regarded as an asset as against the national debt. I am at variance altogether with that opinion. Money lent to us by British capitalists is lent on the credit of the colony, and the ability of the people to pay the interest. I totally disagree with the view that the railways of the country are to be regarded its an asset to which the English capitalist looks for the payment of his interest. The question has been raised with regard to the posts and telegraphs. I have always been under the impression that this must be a federal business. Looking up the returns for the last three years in the larger colonies of Victoria and New South Wales I find that their expenditure is considerably in excess of the revenue in connection with these departments.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Not in our post office.

Mr. HENRY:
I take the three together. We must take them together.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We come out about square.

Mr. HENRY:
I have the returns here for 1893, 1894, 1895, and I find that-I need not give the totals, but I will give the mean annual loss for three years-in New South Wales the loss was £107,000 odd, in Victoria the loss was £154,000 odd.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I would like to see where you got the figures from.

Mr. HENRY:

They are compiled by the statistician and no doubt are perfectly reliable, notwithstanding the doubts of the Premier of Victoria, Sir George Turner. In South Australia there was a surplus of £24,000.

Mr. GORDON:

There is management for you.

Mr. HENRY:

In West Australia there is a loss of £9,000 odd; and in the colony of Tasmania, which on this occasion I must not call "little," there is a loss of £3,000. This is one of those questions where—if there is any virtue in the fine sermons we have heard about conciliation, and compromise, and dealing with things in a truly federal spirit—it will have to come into operation, because I fail to see how the Federal Government can deal with this as we have dealt with the interest question in any future arrangement amongst the colonies. It is obvious that there can be only one set of postage stamps. There cannot be several sets, one for each colony, and there will be no mea South Australia will each have to bear a share of the loss of these two great colonies. Yet I say as a representative of Tasmania that we should not hesitate about allowing the Federal Government—on merely financial considerations—to take over the Postal Departments of the colonies. It is inadvisable in any sense to attempt any distribution in that direction. We must enter into the arrangement in the hope that what appears as a loss on the Postal and Telegraph Service of the colonies to-day may be reduced. In West Australia the expense of the service, no doubt, will be increased with the expansion that is taking place there. This is one of those questions in which the true federal spirit, which I believe animates this Convention, will see that we must adopt some plan without attempting impossible calculations as to what share each colony should have. Now I come to a subject of very great interest, and that is as to whether the Federal Government should have the power of direct taxation. I have heard the views of hon. members expressed on this subject. For my own part I certainly view with great apprehension the conferring on the Federal Government the power to send the taxgathering officer into our colony—that is the direct taxgatherer. Just imagine New South Wales having the infliction of a Federal taxgatherer and a State taxgatherer, each collecting a tax such as their beautiful land and income tax! Our people groan now under a very heavy income tax.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
If you come over to Victoria you will know what taxation is.

Mr. FRASER:
Yours is not so much as ours.

Mr. HENRY:
Ours is 1s. on realised wealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We will give you ours in exchange.

Mr. HENRY:
I view with some anxiety the proposal to give to the Federal Government the power to send their taxgatherer in addition to the local taxgatherer. In working this scheme of distribution of interest it will be necessary to meet any claim the Federal Government may make. South Australia is all right, as she would have to pay only £277,000 if this scheme is carried out, and it is a very good arrangement for South Australia; but we must have the power in the Constitution Bill to levy a tax on South Australian citizens if the South Australian Government think they should pay; or on any defaulting colony. For defence I join in giving power to the Federal Government for such a purpose, but it should only be exercised, in my judgment, after the States Government had failed to pay this taxation as provided in the Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
For defence purposes?

Mr. HENRY:
For defence purposes. The emergencies would be so sudden that they would not be able to consult. If Sir George Turner had the task cast upon him, as Treasurer of the Federal Government, when the emergency arose he would not hesitate to say that he (Sir George Turner) would raise the necessary money, and trust to the people to make up the amount afterwards.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That is very thin.

Mr. HENRY:
One hon. member has called for valuable returns as to the expenditure of the various Governments for a long period of years in connection with defence. I expect it will be found that one colony will have expended more than another. I see the amount varies very much per head of the population for the last three years, but so far as the taking over of any war materials is concerned I think the solution of this difficulty will be in this direction: that it may become the duty of the Federal Government simply to take over the war material, the warships, or fortifications at their value when taken over. As I take it that whatever money any colony may have expended on defences in the past will be no guide for the Federal Government as to what sum they should pay now.

Mr. FRASER:
The returns are incorrect. We have had appropriations for years and years which have not been returned.

Mr. HENRY:
It would be no true guide to the Convention in this matter. The true principle is to empower the Federal Government to take over munitions of war and all the defence arrangements of the colonies at an ascertained value. There is a provision in the 1891 Bill for taking over the Customs and other buildings, and the same can be extended to the defences. The States Government would then be relieved of the interest on their value from the time the transfer took place.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We paid a lot out of revenue for defence works.

Mr. HENRY:
That makes it better. You will be able to reduce your deficits.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We will have no more deficits.

Mr. HENRY:
That is a happy state of things. We will all be happy when the time comes when surpluses will have taken the place of deficits. I think I have occupied the time of the Convention quite long enough: but I should like to say, in reference to a remark made by Mr. Carruthers, who favored giving the Federal Government powers of direct taxation, while he was totally opposed to the creation of extra machinery in the working of the Government, that there will necessarily be extra machinery, but in many ways the Federal Government will be able to lessen the machinery. I only trust that the machinery necessary for gathering direct taxation in the several colonies will never have to be set in motion in federated Australia. With these few remarks, I will take my seat.

Mr. SYMON:
I sincerely thank hon. members of the Convention for the kindly cheer with which they have encouraged me on rising to offer my views on the many important questions which have been raised in this discussion. It lessons the natural feeling of hesitation which presses on one in offering his views to so distinguished an assembly as is now gathered within these walls. I am also encouraged by the kindly and generous invitation of Sir Joseph Abbott to those who have not had the honor of a seat in any earlier Federation Convention or Conference to offer their views with fullness at an early stage of our proceedings. At the same time I am prompted to join with my hon. friend Mr. Higgins, and also the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, in thinking that perhaps it would be at least equally advantageous if we had had a little more plentifully the views of those who have been engaged in previous conventions or conferences. They are our natural leaders, although perhaps on the present occasion with an advantage which is not usually attached to leadership—that we are not bound to follow them. At the same time they are the veterans in this great and momentous business, and they would be able to indicate to us the merits of past efforts in the cause of Federation and to point out to us the pitfalls—to use the appropriate expression of Mr. Carruthers—which they, after mature consideration, recommend us to avoid. We have had one advantage in substitution for that to which I have ventured to call attention, in that we have been enabled to ascertain the views of hon. members of this Convention from the larger colonies, and we have been able to ascertain to some extent what it is they are prepared to concede to us who have the honor to represent what are numerically the smaller colonies. We had from the hon. members Mr. Carruthers and Mr. Higgins what I call, if I may, with perfect courtesy, the bane; and we have from my honorable friend Mr. Wise, in that exceedingly eloquent and lucid and fair speech which he delivered this afternoon, the antidote.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Hear hear.
Mr. SYMON:
Mr. Carruthers went a considerable length, but, if I may be permitted to use the expression, my friend Mr. Higgins out-Heroded Herod. Really, as a humble representative of one of the smaller States, I feel that what he invited the smaller States to do was to open their mouths and see what the larger colonies would send them.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Shut their eyes.
Mr. SYMON:
Yes; and shut their eyes. I omitted, in my desire not to be too emphatic, that part of the old adage. But he gave us one crumb of consolation, and that was that at any rate we should be in the position of seeing—in the Senate this was, and perhaps also in the people's House of Representatives—fair play in those Titanic contests which may—I hope they may not—take place in the Federal Parliament between the two great colonies. We should, in point of fact, be elevated to the useful—perhaps not very dignified—position of bottle holders under these circumstances. Now, with all humility, that is not the view I venture to accept as that which ought to be presented to these numerically smaller colonies for their acceptance.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:

I have the greatest faith, in common with every member of this Convention, whether for a large or a small colony, in the people of Australia. I believe myself in much of what has been said, that we may trust to the justice of the people. On the whole the people are a very good people, and very often, if left alone, their instincts and their objects are right; but at the same time I cannot forget-and I commend this to my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins-that in that noble history of the great federal movement in America it is recorded that the statesmen who assembled to frame the Constitution on that occasion did not forget that all men, even those of the British race, have a fair share of original sin. And I fancy myself that we have added to that a good deal of acquired sin; and when we are considering, as it seems to me, the framing of a Federal Constitution which is to be lasting, and which we hope will stand the test of time, we must, as far as it is within the limits of ordinary human foresight, provide against all possible contingencies and all possible wrongs. We may not - perhaps it is almost too much to expect that we will succeed, but, so far as we can, it is our duty to put this trust a little in the background, and endeavor to provide for the incidents which may be associated with ordinary human nature. And I also venture to commend this to my hon. friend, Mr. Higgins, who expressed his views with characteristic lucidity and force, that what is our position to-day may be yours to-morrow.

Mr. HIGGINS:

That is my point.

Mr. SYMON:

I am glad to hear it is my learned friend's point, and I will endeavor to clinch it for him. It is true that the two great colonies of New South Wales and Victoria, which we here and in the other colonies both admire and esteem, are transcendent at this moment in wealth and population; but are you sure that that state of things will last for ever? Are you sure that they may not be outstripped in the race for wealth and population by some of their smaller neighbors at this moment? A sense of modesty prevents me indulging in a too sanguine prophecy with regard to my own colony, but look at what is happening at this moment in the West, where population and wealth are increasing by leaps and bounds, and if the prosperity which has recently been inaugurated continues, and is permanent, there is no member of this Convention who can determine where it will end, and whether at no distant date you may not find Western Australia excelling in this respect the colonies lying to the eastward. I would be sorry to say one word suggesting the diminution or the possible lessening of the great progress and prosperity of these eastern colonies. My own belief is that, with Federation, they will increase in prosperity and multiply in population to a degree that can hardly be conceived. I believe we all wish that, but, at the same time, when you are considering the relative rights and powers in the Senate and the House of Representatives, you must look at it from the point of view that the possible balance may be altered in the course of a very few years. It seems to be the opinion of some that the smaller colonies would combine, because of their smallness, to achieve their ends to the detriment, it may be, of the larger colonies, but by and by the position may possibly be reversed, and therefore I submit that it would be well to look at it from that point of view.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Do you think the larger States would combine against the smaller?

Mr. SYMON:
I am not so sure. I would not like to predict. I believe, however, were I to diagnose the position at present, I would say that those healthy rivalries between the two States would prevent that unhappy state of things which the hon. member would lament as much as I. Having made these preliminary observations, diverging a little from the path I had ventured to mark out for myself for the sake of brevity, I would like to say that I am sure every member is indebted to Mr. Barton for yielding to the eloquent and generous persuasion of Mr. Reid, in accepting the arduous position of leader of our business. I am also greatly indebted

[P.127] starts here to Mr. Barton for the able and luminous speech in which he unfolded the resolutions which he has submitted to us, and especially for the fairness and moderation with which he expressed his views. Perhaps we may admire the skill with which he suppressed his own views, until some of us, especially my friend sitting below me, thought he was perhaps too reticent.
Undoubtedly it is time draw back that all of us should have open minds that must be filled somehow, and I would have been glad if Mr. Barton, who took such a conspicuous part in the Convention of 1891, had dealt a little more in detail with the subjects involved in the Convention.

Mr. BARTON:
I shall have another opportunity.
Mr. SYMON:

I know we will all look forward with anticipation, and the effect of that observation upon myself is almost to make me wish that that happy time had arrived. I do not propose to criticise, as was done with much skill and great profit to us all by some preceding speakers, the language or limitations of the resolutions, because when they are passed it is, I think, universally understood that we are not to be in any way bound by them, that the principles they contain are not to be considered as binding upon the Convention until they are embodied or passed as part of the Constitution which we are summoned here to frame; but I do think-and in that respect I was very glad to hear the remarks of Mr. Carruthers-that they are admirably conceived to secure that interchange of ideas which is desirable, to bring our thoughts into contact, if not into harmony, and to indicate at least the direction in which the views of hon. members of the Convention tend, for the purpose of guiding us in dealing with the matter in committee, and afterwards in dealing with it in a draft Bill. It seems to me that this is a great gain. Of course, we assemble here strangers, some of us, at least personally, to each other. There are assembled here statesmen whose names are household words throughout the length and breadth of Australia. We who are not personally acquainted with them have heard of their coming here with a certain degree of awe, and the interchange of views and ideas will get us to nearer acquaintance and, if possible, to a common platform. At any rate, we can understand in what respect we agree and in what respect we differ now that the controversial elements have been eliminated in a great measure from these resolutions. If we are occupied by what remains, and by the views expressed in discussing them, great assistance will be afforded to the committees entrusted with the duty of formulating a Bill, which we are to consider in detail. I should like to make only two remarks upon the form of the resolutions. I agree with the hon. member, Mr. Wise, and also with the hon. member, Mr. Carruthers, that it was a happy inspiration on the part of Mr. Barton to introduce into the first resolution the words-

In order to enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australasia.

Mr. BARTON:

I am afraid I must disclaim being the author of that happy inspiration. I will mention in my reply from whom the suggestion came.

Mr. SYMON:

Whoever inspired those words is entitled to great credit. They explode - that seems to me the one special value they possess-a very prevalent fallacy, and they do it in a simple form. They are words that the people of these colonies will readily understand, and which they will readily remember. There can be no doubt there is an impression abroad that in some vague undefined way Federation will curtail the liberties of the people of this great continent. Something, they think, has been taken away, whereas, in point of fact, the people give up nothing. They are merely called upon to enter into a partnership, by dividing the powers which they possess, and the functions which they exercise, one part being exercised by one particular body and the other by another.

Mr. FRASER:

Much larger powers.

Mr. SYMON:

I think it would be unwise to introduce the amendment suggested by the hon. member Mr. Carruthers to this effect:

Also in order to extend the influence of Australia.

Not that I object or think that that expression does not express another of the purposes which will be served by Federation. The phrase that is used here is not exhaustive, though it is true. If we proposed making it exhaustive we should have to introduce additional amendments, and it would be better to leave it as it stands and allow that to be a prominent and conspicuous feature for the elucidation of the subject rather than encumber it with other things equally true, but not so absolutely necessary to be expressed. I think also it would be a mistake, if I may put it so, to introduce this or any other purpose to which I have called attention into the preamble of the Constitution unless you make the preamble reasonable and complete; and unless you adopt something like the formula agreed upon by the framers of the United States Constitution, setting out a splendid statement of the objects and results of Federation, it would be a pity, I submit to this Convention, to import the words suggested alone into the preamble of the Constitution. I should have liked, however, in common with the hon. member, Mr. Wise, to have seen a sixth subparagraph to clause 1 of the resolutions. I should have liked to see that sixth subsection express as a principal condition the absolute permanence of the proposed Union. We are all agreed, as was shown by the cheers which greeted the suggestion made by Mr. Wise, that we intend this Union to be permanent and indissoluble. But I do think that holding that view, as the Convention does, it would be well that it should be clearly and definitely expressed at every point wherever it is possible. My recollection is that one of the main causes of the fratricidal war of secession in the United States of America was that it was not clear, it was not contained in express terms within the four corners of the Constitution, that no State should be able to secede. The claim was made by State after State in what was afterwards known as the Southern Confederacy for years before the war of the secession, and the contention always was that the Union was a compact between the States, and that any State, on being dissatisfied or thinking that its rights were assailed, was entitled to retire. Therefore we should make, I think, in common with the other hon. members whom I am proud to follow in their views on that subject, a considerable mistake if we do not make it absolutely clear—and we cannot begin too soon, it seems to me—that this Union is to be permanent, and that there shall be no secession.

Mr. ISAACs:
There cannot if it is an Act of the Imperial Parliament.

Mr. SYMON:
Well, I am not so very sure about that. I do not like to pit my opinion off-hand against so distinguished an authority as my hon. friend the Attorney-General of Victoria; but whether it is so or not, I think that, having no doubt—as this Convention has no doubt—on the subject, it is well that it should be expressed for the guidance of those who are not proficient in constitutional law or conversant with the effect of Imperial legislation. My hon. friend Mr. Carruthers put a very important point this morning as to the beneficial results which might flow from the contemplated visit of the Premiers to London on the occasion of one of the greatest celebrations that this Empire has ever seen. He said it would afford them an opportunity of dealing with some of these great questions such as the possession of New Guinea, in which Australia as a whole is greatly interested. I should like, if I may be permitted to say so, that the Premiers should be enabled to do what I think a far more important and a far more useful thing than even that. I should like the Premiers when they leave the shores of South Australia on this contemplated and historical visit, to go home with the first complete draft of this Federal Constitution in their hands, and I think the presentation of that draft, completed as it leaves the hands of this Convention at its first sitting, will be one of the most precious and most acceptable parts of the Imperial celebration in which they are to have a share. I hope, therefore, that we shall all bend ourselves and our energies to put it in their possession if it be possible. I come now to one or two matters with which, with the permission of the Convention, I should like to deal. I do not profess to be a financial expert—those of my profession never are!

Mr. ISAACS:
What, never.
Mr. HIGGINS:
What about our Premier?

Mr. SYMON:
We have no power to keep control over money.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We keep some.

Mr. SYMON:
My friend Sir George Turner is the fortunate exception which proves the rule. But there are other matters of moment, and there is one I may be permitted to refer to first, because, although not a financial authority, this is one upon which I do humbly claim to have some slight knowledge. It is that of the federal judiciary. I was gratified to a very great degree by hearing what my honorable friend Mr. Barton said on that subject, and, if I understood him rightly, and I hope I did, he expresses, I think, almost wholly my views on that matter. That a federal judiciary is to be created is the unanimous opinion of this Convention, and therefore it seems to me that the criticism pressed with great power and ability by the hon. member Mr. Carruthers, in connection with making it a court of final local appeal with regard to possible expenditure, loses all its weight. "A charge upon the people of this country" was the expression which he used. Now, if you are to have a federal judiciary, I cannot for the life of me see where the additional charge on the people of this country is to come from if you give it the power at the same time of decision finally upon all appeals from the courts of this country. The functions of that tribunal will be twofold. It will be charged, in the first place, with the duty of interpreting, according to the general principles of common law, the Federal Constitution itself. Now, that has always been regarded, as I think history will declare, as the most noble as well as the most distinctive feature of the Constitution of the United States. It has been that element which has been alluded to as giving the arbitrament of calm judicial decision over the arbitrament of the sword. The settlement of disputes between the different States of the Union by a tribunal of that character is that which I am sure all Australia would wish to see. That tribunal in the United States in that respect has been, of course, the subject of criticism. Its powers have been threatened with limitation; but it remains to this day one of the most striking features of the American Constitution, and one which. I venture to think, is neither likely to be limited nor given up without a very severe struggle indeed.

Mr. BARTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
We know that in connection with the criticism to which it has been subject one great and strong President, Andrew Jackson, a man of very arbitrary will, said on one occasion:

John Marshall—the Chief Justice at that time of the Supreme Court of the United States—has pronounced his judgment; let him enforce it if he can.

But, like many other positions of difficulty that present themselves, nothing ever came of this kind of defiance, and the Supreme Court has gone on its way interpreting the provisions of the Constitution for the benefit of the United States. Now, I thoroughly agree with what has been said, that we ought to give to the federal judiciary the power of final appeal from the Supreme Courts of the different States. I do not think that we should send our suitors with their causes 12,000 miles away to have them adjudicated, and when my hon. friend Mr. Carruthers says that for the purpose of giving it this power of appeal we should require the consent of the Imperial Parliament, I do not believe myself that that would constitute any difficulty whatever, because I feel sure that if we expressed in the Constitution the wish of the people of Australasia to have this court of final appeal their own and in their midst, the Imperial Parliament would grant it. Then I venture to protest against the objection which has been made that such a tribunal as we propose would be an inferior tribunal. I believe we should have, and that we have now, the materials for constituting as distinguished and as powerful a Court of Appeal as is necessary for the purpose we have in view, and I do say that if the United States, with its smaller population at the time of union, was able to constitute a powerful Supreme Federal Court, it is saying very little for the federated colonies of Australasia if they shrank from the task of constituting a powerful Court of Appeal here. Besides, we must remember this: that we have just recently sent to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council a judge from Australia, and I venture to think that, great as are the qualities of the judge whom we have sent, there are others as distinguished on the judicial benches of this continent, and that we should be able, if need, to send a larger quota to the Judicial Committee, who would do honor to its ranks, and if we are able to do that, surely we are able to place them with equal advantage on the judicial bench of our Federal Court. I feel that suitors of this country ought not, to use an expression of Mr. Barton's, to be dragged 12,000 miles for their appeal, and the solution offered by Mr. O'Connor of having a sort of optional Court of Appeal would only, it appears to me, work ill. I think there should be only one court of final appeal. If you have two, who is to have the option and choice of the court to which he is to go? The appellant will go to the court to which the respondent does not want to go. The respondent may like to go to the Privy Council, and the appellant may say, "I prefer the local article." I may say we have in this colony a sort of optional appeal, what is called a Local Court of Appeal, which occupies such a position in the estimation and confidence of the public that I do not think its functions have been called into operation for at least ten or fifteen years.

Mr. HIGGINS: Who compose it?
Mr. SYMON: It is composed of the Executive Council plus the Governor.

Sir RICHARD BAKER: And minus the Attorney-General.

Mr. SYMON: Yes; minus the Attorney-General of the day. With that high estimation for the law which characterises many people, the only member of the Executive who is supposed to know anything at all about law is excluded from that august tribunal. It endeavors to arrive at substantial justice. I do not place that court for a moment, so far as its constitution is concerned, in comparison with the Federal Court of Appeal. What I desire to point out is that we will be making a very grave mistake if we give an optional appeal. Better for us to leave things as they are and have no recourse to an intermediate court than to constitute an intermediate court of appeal liable to the difficulties which have been indicated, and liable also, it may be, to abuse. The observations made by Mr. Wise are very cogent in answer to the suggestion as to appointing judges of the several colonies to seats on the federal judiciary. It would have the effect which he has pointed out, and besides it would have this effect—that it might be rendered liable to the imputation on the part of suitors from one colony or from another that they had not got justice because of the local prejudices of the judge of one colony being used to their detriment. We must have justice not only free from suspicion, but above all possibility of suspicion, and if we constitute a court of federal judiciary it would be infinitely better, it seems to me, to detach it altogether from the separate colonies and constitute it, as in the United States, by itself, above and out of reach of all the other courts of separate jurisdiction. Now, I am myself filled with as high an admiration for the renown and distinction of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council as anyone can be. I appreciate also very greatly the argument that it is a link connecting us with the mother-country, which we all love so well, and to which we owe so much; but whilst I give full effect to these considerations, my belief is that we should do better, and we should inspire confidence in the people of Australia, if we gave them a Court of Appeal here in our midst to which they could go for the final administration of justice. They would be saved the expense not alone of postage stamps and cablegrams, which, of course, may be necessary, but which are not all; they would be saved inconvenience, and it is an inconvenience to have these cases investigated and dealt with 12,000 miles away from them. They would be on the spot to instruct those who had to conduct them, and they would have far greater satisfaction in the result, whatever it might be, and for these reasons, not considering for a moment the immense delay—which is not the mere delay of the court, but the delay of communication—of getting their cases investigated, I feel sure if our Constitution includes something of the nature I have indicated in regard to this federal judiciary it will give great satisfaction, and it will be one of the elements which will induce the acceptance of the Constitution we are framing. The next point to which I wish briefly to refer is that we want a wise, well-balanced Government, fit for a free people. How are we to get it? My hon. friend Sir Richard Baker doubts because of the difficulty as to responsible government; there are some who doubt unless you have a Senate elected on a uniform franchise by direct vote in all the federated colonies; and there are some who doubt unless you have a uniform adult suffrage for the federated colonies included in your Constitution. Now, with regard to the uniform federal franchise, there is, it seems to me, great force in an interjection of some members, which roused my hon. friend Mr. Barton to the only vehement passage of his speech in which he declared against that imposition, if I may use that expression, upon the colonies of a uniform adult or other suffrage as a condition of Federation. I think that he rather exposed a joint in his armor, which some of my friends to the left were not slow to take advantage of, when he said that that would be beyond the competency of this Convention. If the other colonies are agreed that there shall be a uniform suffrage, and if they feel themselves in a position to give effect to that view, it seems to me that it would be perfectly competent for the Convention to do so under the Federal Constitution, because here it is all Australia dictating to itself. It will be the people of Australia assenting to this condition of our Federation; but whilst I am, if possible, in favor of a uniform franchise, I do not see how we in South Australia are to ask the other colonies to agree to it as part of the Constitution unless they feel themselves that they have the mandate from the electors to do so.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

  Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:

  We, of course, enjoy the blessing of adult suffrage, and my learned friend
Mr. Higgins puts it that we ought to have under the Constitution a uniform franchise, and that it should be fixed by the Constitution; but whilst saying that he was driven to the conclusion that it must be manhood suffrage. He must therefore eliminate South Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Not must.

Mr. SYMON:
If you are to have a manhood suffrage it must be either adult suffrage, so as to include South Australia, or it must be manhood suffrage, under which you take the vote away from the women of South Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Adult suffrage would go on for the States purposes.

Mr. SYMON:
What he wants to do is to have a uniform franchise under the Federal Constitution, and not to leave it to the Federal Parliament established under the Constitution, as I think it ought to be. We cannot have a uniform franchise without one of two things. South Australia must either relinquish adult suffrage-

Mr. HOLDER:
She will keep it for State purposes.

Mr. SYMON:
We are not dealing with that now.

Mr. SOLOMON:
South Australia would not accept Federation unless she keeps the adult suffrage.

Mr. GLYNN:
They would lose to the extent of the surrender of their powers.

Mr. BARTON:
They cannot be surrendering when they are gaining.

Mr. SYMON:
The first election must be on the diverse suffrages existing in the different colonies.

Mr. FRASER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
Future elections must be upon some suffrage. Is it to be adult suffrage or is it to be manhood suffrage? If it is manhood suffrage then you take away from this colony necessarily women's suffrage, or you superadd to the existing franchise in the other colonies female suffrage, which we enjoy. It appears to me you cannot have a uniform franchise upon any other hypothesis. It must be either abandonment by us, the narrowing of our franchise, or the enlarging of the franchise in the other colonies, and therefore the very able arguments which we have listened to from Mr. Higgins show, I think, conclusively, the impracticability of introducing into the Constitution which we hope to frame a uniform federal franchise. Therefore the only conclusion to arrive at is that it is a matter which should be left, as Mr. Barton says, to the exercise of the attributes of freedom which will belong to the Federal Parliament, and the Federal Parliament permitted to determine whether there should be a uniform suffrage or not. I apprehend myself that if the Federal Parliament undertook the task the representatives from this colony, assisted by all the forces which they could gather from the representatives of the people in the other colonies, would take care to see that it was made upon the widest possible basis, and, at any rate, in such a way that South Australia would not lose the privileges she at present enjoys, and that the franchise of the other colonies should be expanded to the position of South Australia, and not that ours should be narrowed to the position of theirs. This is the view I take upon this subject, and I cannot see myself why at this stage there should be any particular solicitude upon our part, however we may appreciate the privilege which the women of this colony have secured, to force, if I may use that expression, a similar privilege upon the women of the other colonies, who, if I gather rightly from Mr. Higgins, have not quite reached that advanced stage, or, at any rate, have not successfully demanded the privilege at the hands of their representatives in their own Parliaments.

Mr. BARTON:

No substantial number have demanded it.

Mr. SYMON:

That is an additional reason why we of South Australia should not insist upon the other colonies adopting it. Probably hon. members of the other colonies may say that we upon these benches ought to yield to their statements that they have no mandate of the people from the other colonies to give adult suffrage, and that should be a conclusive argument that there should not be uniformity at least in that direction, bearing in mind that we should proceed upon the lines of least resistance, and cause as little local disturbance in the other colonies as possible. I venture to ask my hon. friend to refrain from pressing his view of the question, seeing that the great voice of the Convention will probably be against him. Some of those who advocate the introduction of this enlarged franchise which we enjoy into a Federal Constitution are strong advocates... of the existing Federal Council. They look upon that Council as a tabernacle of the federal spirit. I do not wish for one moment to lay unkindly or unhallowed hands on that tabernacle, but I do wish to point out to my hon. friends who take this view of the matter that this particular tabernacle of the federal spirit is not founded upon any suffrage at all. If the federal spirit is fairly housed there, I think we may consider with some satisfaction that it will be equally well housed in the temple we are about to build on a broad suffrage without the necessity for uniformity. I should like to any one or two words concerning the very able speech of my hon. friend Sir Richard Baker, as to the difficulty of engrafting upon the federal system responsible government. I venture to express my views with very great diffidence on this point. I know my hon. friend has given great study to this subject. He has also, I know, viewed the whole question from a very lofty and patriotic standpoint as a representative of South Australia, and as one interested in the views which more particularly affect the smaller colonies; but I do venture to think, with all deference, that he has made a mistake in the attitude he takes up. I am myself for responsible government. I wish to cling to the English model wherever I can. It is the freest government under the sun, and try as we may, and animated as we are by a federal spirit or by a spirit of compromise, you cannot eradicate party spirit or government by party in these days from the political life of the British race. It is a system with which we have grown up. We have it, as I think one hon. member said, as part of our political history, and I venture to think that with all the disadvantages, whatever they may, be, it has worked not only well in the interest of the political freedom of Englishmen-

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

But never in a Federation.

Mr. SYMON:

I will come to that in one moment. I should like to think that, in dealing with this subject, we may follow upon the lines which were pursued by the great framers of the Constitution of the United States, and I think probably that if there was one point more than another upon which they were steadfast, and one line of conduct more than another by which they were guided, it was by a desire, in framing their own Federal Constitution, to adhere as closely as they could to the then existing federal system of English Government as far as they understood it. We have developed immensely since that time.

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:

The English form of government has grown wonderfully; it has expanded all in the interests of the freedom and power of the people.

Mr. REID:
   Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
   And one of the earliest, as it has been one of the most significant, of advances has been in the direction of this very system of responsible government. I prefer not to use the term "Cabinet government." I think that expression is misleading, because the whole point is whether we are to have a Government responsible in the ordinary English sense, and not merely a "Cabinet," which, of course, is an expression which might be used in the sense in which it is used in the United States.

Mr. REID:
   Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
   The people there do use, or misuse, the term in describing the heads of the Executive Government under the President. My hon. friend put the proposition that you cannot have the responsibility to two Houses. That, I think, is as clear as noonday; but the consequence of that is not that you are to give up responsible government altogether, but that you must place the responsibility of the Government in one House. Without dwelling upon that, let me address myself to another point which has not been so much referred to. My hon. friend put it that the existence of representative government-

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
   Responsible government, not representative.

Mr. SYMON:
   I beg pardon; the existence of responsible government is inconsistent with the federal theory. Now, with great deference, I deny that. It appears to me that the better way perhaps of stating the proposition, and the way I should like to state it, is that the absence of responsible government is not essential to the federal system. It is not essential to the federal system that there should not be responsible government. It is true that the United States have not got it; it is true that Switzerland has not got it. But the answer to that is that they never had it. In the case of the United States they never had the opportunity of having it, and if I may venture on a statement that I hope will not seem too bold, I believe that the United States would have had it if it had been as well known and understood as now.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   They branched off too soon.

Mr. SYMON:
If it had been then, as it is now, essentially a part of the British system of government, as now we are acquainted with it. I hope I am not on these points in a minority within the ranks of our own delegation; but whether I am or not, I feel and appreciate the advice given by Mr. Carruthers this morning, that we must express our differences with the utmost freedom, for unless we do so it is impossible for arguments to be addressed to controvert them, and it is by the arguments which may be used in their refutation that we may be convinced of our mistake, if we are mistaken. The statesmen who framed the Federal Constitution of the United States were only acquainted with what really, as it then existed, was a kind of personal government of the King of Great Britain, and as the result of that the President of the United States was fashioned in the likeness of the king. If they had waited 100 years more they would have fashioned him more in the likeness of the Premier-of the Premiers of these colonies.

Mr. PEACOCK:
That would have been a job!

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
What a beauty he would have been!

Mr. SYMON:
Certainly, although it would be difficult in one potentate to combine the excellencies of the Premiers of these colonies. I do not like troubling the Convention with quotations, but I should like to read one sentence from an admirable book with which I am sure all the members of this Convention are familiar. It is entitled "The Critical Period of American History," by John Fiske. He is an American writing upon the condition of things anterior to and coincident with the framing of the Constitution at the Philadelphia Convention. At page 298 he says:

Had our Constitution been framed a few years later this point—that is as to the position of the Executive—would have had a better chance of being understood. As it was, in trying to modify the English system so as to adapt it to our own uses, it was the archaic monarchical feature, and not the modern Ministerial feature, upon which we seized. The President, in our system, irremovable by the National Legislature, does not answer to the modern Prime Minister, but to the old-fashioned King, with power for mischief curtailed by election for short times.

That is absolutely, I think, the position in which it stood, and the result of that was that these American statesmen who sought to establish a Council or a body of Ministers had no more thought to shape them after the manner of the Ministers on the modern English system of government than of flying to the moon. What they contemplated was a kind of Privy Council. They provided for the election of their President, and to all intents and purposes during the four years of office he is an absolute monarch, and they gave him power to select his Executive Ministers or Cabinet, or what you will, a mere Privy Council, who are to advise him without any responsibility to the people's representatives. But let me read one more passage from that excellent book by Mr. Bryce. At page 380 he says:

These observations may suffice to show why the fathers of the Constitution did not adopt the English Parliamentary or Cabinet system. They could not adopt it, because they did not know of it, because it was immature, because Englishmen themselves had not understood it.

Now, there is a singular commentary upon that in the fact that the people of the United States have since been struggling to some extent towards what I may call the light. I think I have established by these quotations my statement that in all probability if the framers of the American Constitution had been aware of the merits of the system of responsible government—then only in its infancy, if it existed at all, in England—they would have incorporated it by some means or other, or in some shape or other, in their Constitution. But there was the war of secession, and the Confederated States framed their Constitution on that of the United States, and although they did not take quite the leap that was necessary from irresponsible Ministers to responsible government, they made at least one slight step towards it by providing that the responsible officers of State should have a seat on the floor of either House, with the privilege of discussing any measures pertaining to their own departments. That was at least a groping, if I may so express it, towards the light, and towards the contact—I will not say the responsibility—between the Executive Ministers of State and the people's representatives, which is the original essence of responsible government. But there is a precedent. We have one instance in which responsible government is engrained upon a Federal Constitution. I will quote it with apologies to hon. members who have an objection to colored races. It is a precedent from Hawaii. I admit it is not on all fours with our case, because there they have only one House.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

That gives away the whole position.

Mr. SYMON:

I am not so sure of that. What we have to do here is to endeavor to graft it upon a Federation which shall consist of two Houses; and the fact that it may co-exist with a Federation seems to me clear from this very excellent precedent from the enlightened people in Hawaii. Hon. members will find a note on page 563 of Bryce's book, in which he says:

A singular combination of the Presidential with the Cabinet system may be found in the present Constitution of the Hawaiian Kingdom, promulgated 7th July, 1887. Framed under the influence of American traditions, it keeps the Cabinet, which consists of four Ministers, out of the Legislature; but having an irresponsible hereditary monarch, it is obliged to give the Legislature the power of dismissing them by a vote of want of confidence. The Legislature consists of two sets of elective members—nobles (unpaid) and representatives (paid), who sit and vote together.

I do not wish to press that any further than it need be pressed. I only use it for the purpose of showing that the principle of responsible government is not inconsistent with the federal system. The only difficulty, I venture to think, is how to apply it. Now, I admit these difficulties. I admit the difficulties which my honorable friend has pointed out, but I do not accept his remedy. The adoption of the Swiss system is taking what I may call an alien method.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

Is not Federation altogether an alien method?

Mr. SYMON:

No; I am afraid I cannot agree with that. I call it an alien method because, as far as I am aware, it is not in use under any other English-speaking Government. I do not like it because of its foreign garb. Although there are difficulties, I am encouraged and cheered by the reflection that men of the British race are accustomed to rise superior to and overcome difficulties of Government as they arise, and I think they can be overcome in this instance. As we are to have representative government, and a people's House, I am in favor of the Federal Government being responsible to the Federal Assembly. It seems to me that is the only course upon which the Constitution can fairly rest. Underlying Sir Richard Baker's objections is undoubtedly the difficulty as to State rights, or what are called State interests. It is from a deep desire that there should be a powerful Senate in the interests of the separate States that he presses his objections. Now, it seems to me that we may have a sufficiently powerful Senate without the necessity of bringing into the question of the responsibility of the Government the voice of the Senate. It would be impossible to have, as the hon. member said, a government responsible to both Houses. And I am entirely with him in making the Federal Senate as strong and powerful as we possibly can for the protection of those State interests which may or may not be adequately guarded in the people's Chamber. Now I think in regard to that the Federal Senate may be reduced, as has been suggested, to the number of six from each colony. That there should be equal representation for each State seems to be accepted by all except Mr. Higgins, who has some hesitation on the point.

Mr. HIGGINS:
You will find there are more presently.

Mr. SYMON:
No doubt he will be fertile in finding a good many, but I have no doubt he will find himself one of a very small minority in this Convention on any question of unequal representation of the States in the Senate. Now, if we have equal representation of the States in the Senate we shall have there a check upon the preponderating influence of the larger States in the people's House. Then, too, if the principle of representation according to population is placed upon a different basis, my own view is that the standard should be a fixed number for each State with a certain additional number for so many thousand all round, which will give a much fairer basis than taking 30,000 or 40,000, or even 50,000, as the standard according to which we are to regulate the representation. But I agree myself with Mr. Higgins that we must trust in this respect a good deal to the just good sense of the representatives in the people's House. Then, if the mode of election adopted be the franchise as may be determined by each State, we shall have the direct representation of the people, if they decide that the federal franchise shall prevail, and that the members of the Senate shall be elected upon the popular basis.

Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
I have some doubt myself whether election by the Legislatures of the States has not a good deal more argument in its favor than has perhaps been given effect to. I am not at all sure that election by the State Legislatures would not in some respects be a very good thing, and I am not at all sure that the criticism which has been offered as to the introduction into local politics of the question as to whom a candidate will vote for as a senator, would have a bad effect. For instance, in this colony, where we have elections every three years, the people should be able to influence the selection of the candidates for the senatorship at these elections. That would not, it seems to me, have the effect of depreciating local politics and aggrandising federal politics, as my hon. friend suggests. I know that there are abuses in the United States, and undoubtedly they are grave; but you will have federal politics in the ascendant whatever method of election you may choose, and the danger is that if you seek, on the other hand, to subordinate federal politics to State politics, you may weaken that House which we in the smaller colonies wish to be made specially strong. Then I am not quite at one with my honorable friend who seeks to withdraw from the Federal Assembly the power of originating Money Bills. I think that if we agree to a System of responsible government that power ought to to be left in the House of Representatives.

[P.137] starts here

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not think anyone suggested that the sole right of originating them should be withdrawn.

Mr. SYMON:
It was.

Mr. ISAACS:
I did not catch the suggestion, then.

Mr. SYMON:
At any rate, my view is that it should not be withdrawn, and I was tender the impression that Sir Richard Baker said that it follows as a natural corollary that it should be withdrawn. Of course if you are not to have responsible government the argument altogether fails, but if you decide on having responsible government it seems to me you would be destroying the only lever which would be left to the House of Representatives which they could bring to bear upon the Government of the day. It would be necessary that the House of Representatives should be able to say to the Government, if they had not their confidence—We decline to allow you to originate a Bill asking for money. We decline to allow you to ask the Legislature for money at all if we have no confidence in you." Whilst I submit this to the Convention, at the same time I do not think that it is necessary that the power of amending Bills should be withdrawn from the Upper House.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
The two things can go together. You can still give the House of Representatives the power of originating Money Bills without taking the power from the Senate of amending them. There seems to be a general opinion that the Senate should have the power of rejecting; then why strain at a gnat when we are swallowing a camel?

Mr. HIGGINS:
It is a different thing to exercise the power to reject and to exercise the power to amend.

Mr. SYMON:
I am sorry that I cannot follow my friend in that. I think we might adopt the phrase which was used at the Convention in 1891 of partial veto and total veto. If the Senate is to be given the power to reject, and is strong enough to take that position, it will by its rejection throw the whole machinery of Government into confusion at once; but if it had the power to lay its finger on any particular item, and say, "You concede us that," and if the concessions were made, and the business of the Government could go on as comfortably as heretofore, it seems to me, as a matter of compromise and moderation, it would be much better and more prudent to give the power of amendment in detail or partial veto than it would be to confine their power to total rejection, if you have any apprehension that the smaller colonies in the Senate will band together, when they have any object in common, in order to coerce the larger colonies with their bigger representation in the other House. It resolves itself, therefore, into a mere question of convenience. No doubt, as has been pointed out, it might be troublesome to have a Senate going through all the items, as Sir George Turner indicated, in a Tariff Bill, or through items in other Bills that we might easily conceive of; but while if, the Senate insisted upon its rights, it might involve inconvenience in that way, I feel sure we can depend upon the justice and good sense of the representatives in that Chamber not to exert that power further than would be absolutely necessary, or so as to wantonly disarrange the whole functions of Government; and the possession of the power by the Senate in that respect would place in their hands a duty as well as a power which I think we may very confidently believe they will justly exercise. Mr. O'Connor drew a distinction between the rejection and amendment, or partial veto, which, at first sight, impressed one a good deal. He said that in a Taxation Bill, for instance, there might be an amendment made which would deprive the Government of half the revenue they anticipated. If so, the Government would be in a better position than if the Senate entirely rejected the Bill, because in both cases it would mean the rejection of their policy-in the one case wholly, in the other case partially. In the partial case the Executive might consider that they could go on with the Bill as it came back from the Senate; in the other there would be no alternative but to have a deadlock brought about, or to provoke in some other way a conflict between the two Houses.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You practically have the control over the Government.

Mr. SYMON:
With the rejection of the Bill you have at least a deadlock, subject of course to conferences or compromises, and, in the other case, by the omission of one item you may be able without any bitterness or trouble to arrange so that business can go on. There is only one other matter to which I would like to draw the attention of this assembly, and that is with reference to the railways. I am going to interpret clause v. of the resolutions in the same way as my hon. friend Mr. Wise, that the trade and intercourse between the federated colonies, whether by land or sea, should become and remain absolutely free. How can it be possible to have it absolutely free unless the Federal Government has absolute and unfettered control over the railways? Why, under these circumstances, intercolonial freetrade would be, shall I venture to say, a sham unless the railways-those great avenues of trade-were put under the control of the federal authorities. I was not aware until the remark was made that there was any intention to place the Post and Telegraph Departments under the control of the Federation. If those lines, which by means of electricity convey the business messages and goodwill from the people of one part of Australasia to another portion of the continent are to be federalised, I for one do not see why these rails of steel, which by means of your locomotives convey our parcels and merchandise, should not also be federated. You might refuse to federalise the River Murray, and say that the colonies through which the river and its different tributaries pass should be controlled by the respective States. Who is there that would suggest such a course as that? If the great water artery were left under the unfettered control of each State, then we should have another just as mischievous, or I should rather say as prejudicial a position. I have no wish to labor this point or to elaborate the arguments which have already been addressed to the Convention, and which may be repeated in greater detail when we are disposing of the Bill in Committee. I put it to my hon. friend from Tasmania who spoke last in this way: Supposing Tasmania consisted of two States, Hobart and Launceston, and suppose each of these had a separate line of steamers, one to Hobart, and the other to Launceston, and suppose the Hobart line carried its freight to Hobart at half the cost that is charged to Launceston, with a view of diverting the trade from the mainland to the southern instead of to the northern port, surely it would be desirable, if these two States amalgamated, that such a condition of things should exist no longer. If it would be desirable to do away with this sort of thing, I venture to submit it is equally desirable to do that with the railways, so as to prevent the same sort of thing happening with them.

Mr. HENRY:
 Why could that not be done by differential rates?

Mr. SYMON:
 There are two methods of carrying that out. The one is by federalising the railways, placing them entirely under federal control, which I interpret to mean taking them over, or by giving the federal authority, or some Commission constituted by the federal authority, power to interfere with the different States so as to prevent differential rates. If it can be managed to have a Commission which can regulate these freights, which can put a stop to differential rates, as suggested by Mr. Gordon at the Convention of 1891, and strenuously fought for, I am quite agreeable that that course should be adopted; but I do not believe it is practicable. The arguments which have been used by my hon. friend Mr. Wise seem to me to be conclusive that such a course would not really work. He pointed out that it might apply to privately-owned railways with advantage. It has been shown to this Convention that even in the case of privately-owned railways in England——at any rate in the United States——a Commission in one case and the Bill of 1888 in the other had been found to be inefficacious. But in Australia the railways are State-owned. If you gave power to the federal judiciary, or to a branch of the federal judiciary, or to a Commission in the nature of a judicial body to interfere with these rates, you would immediately constitute a continual source of irritation and discontent on the part of the States who were being interfered with.

Mr. HENRY:
Give them the right of appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mr. SYMON:
Supposing you gave them the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, where would be the sanction by which the decisions of the Supreme Court could be enforced? How is the Supreme Court to enforce an injunction against New South Wales? How is it to enforce an injunction against Victoria to restrain them from making these cut-throat rates?

Mr. GLYNN:
The same difficulty would arise.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Under the State Commerce Act of America the remedy is against the officers of the corporation; so it should be here against the officials of the railways.

Mr. SYMON:
I am not saying that that is not what might be called a sort of modus vivendi——that it is not a method by which the State Court could operate. But, in the first place, you could not carry into effect very well the judgments or decrees of the Supreme Court against the State.

Mr. ISAACS:
Can you ever assume that the Government of a country would disregard the opinion of the Supreme Court?

Mr. SYMON:
I am not so sure about it.

Mr. GORDON:
What about Andrew Jackson and John Marshall?

Mr. SYMON:
At any rate the decrees and judgments of the court are not worth much unless they carry with them some effective sanction.

Mr. GLYNN:
It would be a dispute between the States.

Mr. SYMON:
If you could do as is generally clone in the United States, I might refer to the history of the proceedings in the United States, where nearly all the questions which have arisen in respect to the construction of the Constitution have arisen and do arise between individuals. The Supreme Court of the United States will not give judgment upon any abstract question as to the construction of the Constitution unless it comes before them on a dispute between two persons.

Mr. GORDON:
What about the recent case of taxation?

Mr. SYMON:
That was between two persons. Hon. members will understand that I am not wishing to construct barriers to any arrangement that will get over this difficulty. I am endeavoring to offer remarks which may be suggestive to hon. members' minds with a view to consideration. The view that strikes me is that if you have interference by a Commission, or by a federal authority without a Commission, over what each State will consider belongs to itself, you will have a constant source of friction.

Mr. FRASER:
Undoubtedly.

Mr. SYMON:
Therefore I see no middle course between taking over the absolute control of the railways or leaving them to the uncontrolled administration of the colonies, as is now the case. That state of things I should be sorry to see. I believe it would be inimical to Federation. I do not say it ought to be looked upon as essential or an absolute condition of Federation. I do not say that the federal control of the railways should be a sine qua non, but I reserve to myself the right, as a humble representative of South Australia, of taking that position if necessary, because I honestly believe we may as well obliterate that well-expressed sub-division 5 from these admirable resolutions as to allow the railways to remain as at present.

Mr. GORDON:
    Hear, hear.

Mr. SYMON:
    The people of Australia have everything to fear from the uncontrolled power over the leading lines and the feeders of them by the States. We want all our waterways and railways to be free. There are a number of other matters that I proposed to allude to, but I have already detained this Convention beyond, I think, my fair share of its time, and I would only ask permission to say, in conclusion, that I echo entirely the very grave and weighty words in which my honorable friend Mr. Barton counselled conciliation and concession. I am sure his appeal found an answering chord in the hearts of every one of us. The spirit of Federation is undoubtedly the spirit of compromise. At the same time, I agree with some of the speakers this morning that that is not to be interpreted as meaning that we are to give up too readily the principles which we cherish. It is not to be interpreted as meaning that we are to surrender, so to speak, our discretion. Therefore, I have spoken freely upon those few points to which I have called attention, and for my part, while giving full effect to the spirit of compromise, I shall struggle long and I shall struggle hard, for not only those things which I conceive to be essential, but for whatever I believe may improve and strengthen the edifice which we propose to rear. I start with the determination to listen to everything, and to give up nothing until I am convinced it ought not to be longer fought for. I say further, that when the end of our labors comes, when the fabric comes finished from the loom of this workshop, I shall be prepared to give my assent to it, and to accept it, although it may contain some things which I have fought against, and although it may omit some things which I have fought for. When that time comes I shall ask hon. members to say as Benjamin Franklin said: "Let us doubt a little of our own infallibility, and put our names to the instrument." Let us take it with all its imperfections full upon it, so long as there is nothing fatal to the liberties of the people for whom we are seeking to frame a Constitution. I do not suppose if we were angels from heaven we could frame a Constitution which would be perfect or agreeable to everyone of us. Franklin declared that though he did not approve of some parts of the Constitution of the United States, that splendid monument of statesmanship, he would sacrifice to the public good whatever opinion he entertained of its errors. This is the spirit which I humbly commend to this Convention. The problems are great and vital problems of constructive statesmanship. Destruction or demolition is a very easy task, but the glory of statesmanship is to construct. That, I venture to think, is our mission; that is the charge laid upon us by this Enabling Act under which we sit. I hope we shall succeed. In spite of the difficulties which I have not been slow to emphasise, I fear no failure. "If we succeed," the Athenian general said to his troops, "if we succeed we shall make Athens the greatest city of Greece." If we in this Convention, representing, as we do—at any rate representing, as I hope we shall do before we finally dissolve—the people of Australia, if we succeed there will arise in Australia a new and beneficent power, great in her civilisation, great in all the arts of peace, and, above and beyond all, great in the comfort and happiness of her people.

Mr. HOLDER:

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

SUSPENSION OF THE STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. HOLDER:

Before we rise there is it formal motion I wish to submit, and which requires the presence of an absolute majority of the Convention. I want to move the suspension of the Standing Orders, because under the Western Australian Enabling Act, and also under the Acts passed in the other colonies, if members are absent for five days their seats become vacant, and as the Western Australian delegates have been absent four days, should any one of them be unable to attend to-morrow, or through misfortune be absent any longer, his seat will be vacant. I also desire to suspend the Standing Orders to meet the case of one of the Victorian delegates who is, we all regret, absent on account of ill-health. Therefore I move:

That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable me to move a motion.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I second the motion.

Question put and passed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO MEMBERS.

Motion by Mr. HOLDER:

That leave of absence for the four days, March 22nd, 23rd, 24th, and 25th, on account of distance, be granted to the representatives for Western Australia; and for the two days, March 24th and 25th, on account of illness, to a representative of Victoria, Mr. Trenwith.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I second the motion.

Question put and passed.

Convention adjourned at 5.33 p.m.
Friday March 26, 1897.

Western Australian Delegates - Messages of Congratulation - Petition - Indebtedness of the Australian Colonies - Returns: Railways - Resolutions to go into Committee - Federal Constitution - Suspension of the Standing Orders - Notices of Motion - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

WESTERN AUSTRALIAN DELEGATES.

The PRESIDENT:

I have to report to the Convention the receipt of the Western Australian Proclamation as to the time and place of meeting and the certificate of the election of representatives, together with a copy of the Western Australian Act, and, as I notice the Western Australian representatives are in their places, I think I shall correctly interpret the wishes of the Convention when I say that we extend to them a most hearty welcome. I will ask the Clerk to read the certificate of election, and afterwards to ask the representatives to sign the roll.

The Clerk read the certificate of election.

ROLL OF DELEGATES.

The following representatives subscribed the roll:—

The Colony of Western Australia.

The Honorable Sir JOHN FORREST, K.C.M.G., M.L.A. (Premier, Colonial Secretary, and Colonial Treasurer).

The Honorable FREDERICK HENRY PIESSE, M.L.A. (Commissioner of Railways).

The Honorable JOHN WINTHROP HACKETT, M.L.C.

WILLIAM THORLEY LOTON, Esquire, M.L.A.

WALTER HARTWELL JAMES, Esquire, M.L.A.

ALBERT YOUNG HASSELL, Esquire, M.L.A.

ROBERT FREDERICK SHOLL, Esquire, M.L.A.

The Honorable JOHN HOWARD TAYLOR, M.L.C.

MESSAGES OF CONGRATULATION.

The PRESIDENT:
I beg to report to the Convention that I have received telegrams of congratulation to the Convention upon its meeting, and wishes for its success, from the Australasian Federation League of Victoria; the Australian Natives' Association, in annual conference, in Victoria; the Central Queensland Territorial League; and the district council of Kingston.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I would like to know if these documents are to be entered in the proceedings or not. At the last Convention all similar documents were entered in the proceedings. I do not know whether that course will be adopted. I think it should, as a matter of record.

The PRESIDENT:
I would suggest that a notice of motion might be given in respect to them. At present it seems to be only necessary to hand them to the Clerk; but, of course, it is competent for any hon. member to move that they be entered.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I beg to move:
That these several documents be entered in the proceedings of the Convention.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

PETITION.
Mr. BARTON:
I have a petition to present from ten members and adherents of the Primitive Methodist Church, being citizens of the colony of New South Wales, requesting:—
That in the preamble of the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth it be recognised that God is the supreme ruler of the world and the ultimate source of all law and authority in nations. That there also be embodied in the said Constitution, or in the Standing Orders of the Federal Parliament, a provision that each daily Session of the Upper and Lower Houses of the Federal Parliament be opened with prayer by the President and the Speaker, or by a chaplain. That the Governor-General be empowered to appoint days of national thanksgiving and humiliation.

The petition is respectfully worded, and I move that it be received.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

INDEBTEDNESS OF THE AUSTRALASIAN COLONIES.
Mr. WALKER:
I beg to move:
That a return be laid upon the table of this Convention showing—
(a) The total public indebtedness of each of the Australasian Colonies, giving in tabulated form the due date and amount of each loan, with rate of interest it carries, also mentioning in each case the date of latest return to which the statistics apply.

(b) The State debt per head in each of the Australasian Colonies.
(c) The annual interest charge per head on said State debts, showing each colony separately.

Mr. BARTON:
I second the motion.

Mr. LOTON:
I notice in clause (a) we are asked to agree to a return showing the total indebtedness of each of the Australasian Colonies. I do not know whether there is any necessity to include New Zealand.

Mr. WALKER:
I wish New Zealand to be included.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

RETURNS-RAILWAYS.

Dr. QUICK:
I beg to move:
That there be laid upon the table of this Convention a precis of all available official reports showing:

I. The nature of the country lying approximately between the Oodnadatta Railway Station, in South Australia, and the Pine Creek Railway Station in the Northern Territory, its suitability for settlement or otherwise, the length of the line that would have to be constructed to connect these two railway systems, and the probable cost per mile.

II. The nature of the country lying between Lake Torrens and the nearest railway in West Australia, its suitability for settlement or otherwise, the length of line that would have to be constructed to connect the South Australian railway system with that of West Australia, and the probable cost per mile.

III. The nature of the country lying between the Northern Territory Railway and the nearest railway system of Queensland, its suitability for settlement or otherwise, the length of line that would have to be constructed to connect the two systems, and the probable cost per mile.

Mr. BARTON:
I second the motion.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

RESOLUTIONS TO GO INTO COMMITTEE.

Mr. BARTON:
Before the Order of the Day is read I would like to give notice, with the concurrence of the House, of resolutions for Monday to go into Committee, in order that they may be on the Notice Paper for the convenience of hon. members. I take it that I may give notice now.

The PRESIDENT:
I think it would be more regular if a suspension of the Standing Orders were moved.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I should be glad if the hon. member would allow this to remain till later in the day, as I wish to consult him on it. The notice can be given after lunch.

Mr. BARTON:
In New South Wales we can give notice at any time.

The PRESIDENT:
I ruled in this matter a day or two ago, and I think it would be more regular if the hon. member did as I have indicated.

Mr. BARTON:
If the hon. member will confer with me I will leave the resolutions till afterwards.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I will do it after lunch.

FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.

Debate resumed on resolutions by Mr. Barton (vide page 17).

Mr. HOLDER:
It is with very great diffidence that I rise to take part in the debate in this important Convention. I recognise that this body is the first Australasian Parliament, and as we sit here we sit under the scrutiny of over 3,000,000 of people, and that our work at the end will be subjected to the approval or disapproval of the electors of these States. I rejoice exceedingly in the presence of the representatives from the great colony of West Australia, and I hope that, ere we come to the conclusion of our duties, we shall also have amongst us representatives from the other great Australian colony of Queensland, whose future, I believe, will be second to that of no other colony in the group, unless it be the colony of New South Wales. I regret for many reasons the course of procedure that has been adopted on this occasion. I think time would have been saved, and the debate would have been more direct and pointed, had we a motion before us proposing to go into Committee upon the Commonwealth Bill. However, it is too late now to move in that direction. We have gone so far along the path that we are now treading that it would be more convenient to keep on treading in it. I propose simply to make that passing remark before proceeding to debate the resolutions before us, except with the utterance of this preliminary observation, that I had not intended to speak at large on this occasion. Had the motion been to take the Commonwealth Bill into consideration in Committee, I should have reserved my remarks until the Committee stage had been reached on the various clauses of the Bill. Seeing that we are asked not to pluck the fruit from the tree, but to go back to the roots, to resolutions almost identically the same as those on which the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 was based, and seeing that we were directly invited by the speech of Mr. Barton, the representative of New South Wales, to express our views as a guide to the Constitutional Committee, which presently will begin its work, and feeling as I do so strongly upon several points, I will address myself to them. Much has been said about the desirability of compromise, but it appears to me that the time for compromise is not yet. It probably will come, almost certainly must come, before we have finished; but to-day what I imagine will be most helpful to the Constitutional Committee and tall have no difficulty in securing the assent of a majority of this Convention. The first of these principles is this: that we are assembled to obtain a Constitution which will give us a true Federation, and I would like to add that what I think we want is it true, democratic Federation.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLDER:
We want something which shall have two parts, which shall be democratic in the fact that it is based on the people's will, and that in it every personal unit of the population shall be recognised and his individuality preserved, and that, on the other hand, shall be a true Federation, in that each State unit shall also have its individuality preserved and its independence assured. I do not think we can afford to dispense with either of these two things. We cannot afford to dispense with the guarantee of the personal individual rights of every citizen of the Commonwealth, nor, on the other hand, can we afford to dispense with the individual or separate rights or interests of each of the separate States—if my hon. friend Mr. O'Connor prefers that term. We cannot neglect to provide for their due recognition. The next principle I shall lay down is this: That in dealing with this federal authority we should confer on it no powers which it cannot exercise more wisely and well and effectively than the States can exercise those powers. I would even go a step further, and lay down as the principle which should govern our conduct: To the States all that is local and relating to one State, to the Federal authority all that is national and inter-State. I wonder whether I can secure the absolute adherence, no matter where it may lead us, of a majority of this Convention to that principle: To the State everything that is local and relating to one State, to the Federal power everything that is national and of inter-State importance. I pass from these two general principles to a discussion of the only other preliminary I shall have to touch, and that is the question of the appointment of the representative of the British Crown in the person of the Governor-General. I do not take it that the words of the Enabling Act requiring us to frame a Constitution for a Federation "under the Crown" bind us in the matter of whether or not we shall elect our own Governor-General, because I take it that the legal bonds which bind us to the mother-country, to the great British Empire, are chiefly, first the right of veto which the Imperial authorities have over any Acts our local Legislature may pass, and which the Federal Legislature may pass, and next the right of the Imperial Legislature at any time to pass legislation which may affect us, or which may revoke any legislation affecting us. These are the great legal bonds which bind us to the British Empire. But above all this, the greater and wider, and, to my mind, much more important bonds than the legal bonds are those of kinship, of language, and of sympathy that must always bind us to the motherland. The mere appointment by the Crown of the Governor-General is not a real bond. That this is so is recognised to-day in that we have presiding, now and again, in the position of Acting-Governor of one or other of these colonies, gentlemen who so preside by virtue of their position upon the legal bench. In the appointment of the Governor we have only one link, and that link is again and again missing when gentlemen, owing to their legal position, temporarily occupy the office.

Mr. SYMON:
By vice-regal appointment.

Mr. HOLDER:
Yes, of course; the Commission from Her Majesty lies dormant until it is actually called into existence by the absence of the Governor; but we can at this moment, if the necessity arises, appoint a new occupant to the Supreme Court Bench, and that would qualify him to fill the office of Acting-Governor if need required it. Therefore I think it is clear that to that extent it lessens the argument that the main link that binds us to the mother-country is the appointment of the Governor, and shows that it is an argument which has not half so much weight as some of the speakers would have us believe. But I take a very strong position against the election of the Governor-General by the Federation, not because I believe... it would mean losing a link which binds us to England, but that we should have a man of such power and authority, derived directly from the people, that he would certainly clash with the other powers and authorities we propose to set up under this Constitution. We have four wheels to the State coach—the electors, the two branches of the Legislature, and the Executive—and on these four wheels the State coach will make good progress; but if we bring in a fifth wheel, so strong in power, so based upon the popular will as that it might override or supersede the power or authority of one of these four, at once we should be landed in a most serious difficulty. No comparison could be made by fair analogy with the position in the United States. The President there is very different from anything we propose to provide for in the Governor-General here. We should hesitate very long before we confer upon a Governor-General the powers which are vested in the President of the United States. The President is more powerful in many respects than the Queen of England herself. He combines in his own person, powers, and authorities we would not dream of conferring on anyone. Instead of a Governor-General, we might have in our midst a man who might, for the whole term of his office, defeat the people's representatives and the Executive, and do just as he pleases. So the President of the United States can to-day, not only because of the Constitution, but because of his election by the great body of the people. I hope that we shall not make the mistake of providing for elective Governors, because of the serious risk we should run.

Mr. GLYNN:

There is a unanimity of opinion against it.

Mr. HOLDER:

Yes; and I shall not repeat the arguments which have been used in support of the appointment by the Crown. I pass on, then, to notice the next question, which is the question of the two Houses of the Federal Legislature. After the very able speech which the member for Victoria, Mr. Higgins, made yesterday, I cannot refrain from going one step behind where he began to show the necessity that exists for the constitution not only of two Houses but of two Houses possessing certain characteristics. We would not be content with one House, because under neither of the two possible alternatives would that be satisfactory. We cannot be content with a single House elected on the population basis, because that would be unfair to the smaller States. We could not content ourselves with one House on the basis of States representation, because that would be unfair to the larger States. We are bound, then, to go for two Houses, one of which shall represent the people as units of the whole Commonwealth, and the other the State units which must have equal power with every other State. If we are to have this State authority maintained by the existence of a Senate, and if we are to have called into existence a Senate for no other purpose than to preserve the rights of the separate States as States, we must take care that the Senate shall be able to preserve those rights. Much has been made of the importance of equal representation in the Senate, but it seems to me that fully as important as the question of equal representation is the question of the relative powers of the two Houses. Equal representation of the States in a manifestly inferior House would be of no value to the smaller States. We might as well have no Senate at all. So far as equal representation of the smaller States in the Senate goes, if the Senators are to have one of their hands tied behind their backs, we may as well throw it away. Therefore I think we must insist upon having a Senate to guard the interests of the smaller States, as we shall have a House, of Representatives to guard the interests of the whole of the Commonwealth. We must insist upon the possession by the States House—and I prefer the wording of this proposal to that of the Commonwealth Bill—we must insist upon such powers being given to the States Council as will enable it to withstand any encroachment on its rights by the National Council. There can be no analogy drawn between the two Houses of Parliament as they exist today in the colonies and the two Houses to be created under the Bill. In the present case one House represents the people, and the other represents classes of the people, but in this instance both Houses will represent the people generally; and therefore I object to the form used in speaking of the House of Representatives as the people's Chamber. It is no more the people's Chamber than the other is. It is simply a Chamber where the people are to be represented, irrespective of grouping, while the other will be a Chamber where the people will be represented with regard to their grouping. Nor do I like the terms Upper and Lower House. I much prefer that we should keep to the resolution, and speak of one as the States Council and the other as the National Assembly, and recognise that both represent the people. I recognise fully the extreme importance of the argument advanced by Sir Richard Baker, who in his speech pointed out a matter which demands our closest attention. He put it that facing this very question of State rights is the probability that either the responsible government system will kill Federation or Federation will kill responsible government. It is essential to true Federation that we should have these two Houses possessed of co-ordinate rights, power, and authority; but can we have two Houses with co-ordinate authority if we are to have the Cabinet system? I believe we recognise that the Cabinet system with responsibility to two Houses is quite impossible.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Hear, hear.
Mr. HOLDER:
   The moment we permit responsibility to one House we raise that House, whichever it may be, to a higher position than the other, and we at once destroy the balance between the two Houses, which it seems to me is essential to the true Spirit of real Federation. I put this question to the test—this question of the responsibility of the Cabinet to one House, and also at the same time the question of the rights of the Senate to alter or amend Money Bills in this way. We are told that to the National House only should the responsibility of the Cabinet be, that to the National House only must be given certain powers relating to Money Bills. Supposing that we, the representatives of the smaller States, were to work the other way, and to claim that to the Senate, and to the Senate only, should be the responsibility of the Cabinet and the right to deal with certain Bills—

Mr. HIGGINS:
   You would have the smaller number of people governing.
Mr. HOLDER:
   Certainly not. We should have the same number of people governing. The test I want to put is this. Would those from the larger colonies, who arc content to do violence to the true principles of Federation by giving superior power to the House of Representatives—would they be content to do another and no greater violence to the true principles of Federation, by giving these larger powers to the Senate? Of course not; because they would not think of placing undue power and undue influence in the hands of the smaller States. This is the way we, representing the smaller States, look at the proposal to place undue influence and authority and power in the hands of the other House in which States rights will not be fully guarded. It may be said there is no need to guard their rights, that the great colonies will do no harm to them. I agree with the remark made yesterday, which is so apropos that I must quote it:

   No; the larger colonies will do no wrong to the smaller States if they cannot, but if they can they may.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   Are you able to give an instance?
Mr. HOLDER:
   Certainly they will not if they cannot, and I want to provide that they cannot, and then there will be no reason to fear that they may.
Mr. HIGGINS:
   Can you give an instance?
Mr. HOLDER:
I will give an example or two. It may be said that I am straining my illustrations, but I want to give illustrations which will tell right home at the present time. Suppose, for instance, in exercising the rights over the rivers which were to be given under the Commonwealth Bill to the Federation, a Bill might be proposed to borrow and expend money to lock the Darling.

Mr. REID:
The Darling is not an intercolonial river; it happens to be in New South Wales.

Mr. HOLDER:
I am aware of that.

Mr. REID:
And you take what you can out of it.

Mr. HOLDER:
Its waters come down and flow past Victoria into South Australia, and I am suggesting—and the interjection rather helps me than otherwise—that this is one of those questions on which the question of States rights may easily be raised. It may be proposed to borrow and expend money to lock the Darling, so that its waters may be available for the use of the settlers on its banks and of others who may settle there. Then serious injury may be done in some degree to Victoria, and in very much greater degree to South Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Would not Victoria help you?

Mr. HOLDER:
She might, but we do not want to be left in the position of suppliants to another colony.

Mr. ISAACS:
She might in any case.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Victoria and South Australia might make an arrangement mutually satisfactory.

Mr. HOLDER:
Should not South Australia have her rights in that matter protected? I take another illustration. The Federal authority is intended to have power to provide lights, and to have power over navigation and matters affecting shipping. Supposing the Federal authority, for the purposes of the trade of the eastern colonies, wanted to open up a large port at Esperance, regardless of the interests of Albany and Perth, ought not Western Australia to have some right to enter a protest or raise some objection against such a course as that? Should she not, without coming cap in hand to the other States, or without the necessity of anything in the shape of logrolling, have an absolute right to protect herself in a matter which comes so much within her scope and influence? It seems to me that these are illustrations indicating a possible conflict between the States and the Federal Parliament; and, in view of such possibilities, regarding them solely as distant possibilities, we should provide absolute strength in that House whose business and whose only reason for existence will be the protection of the interests of States one against the other. To set up a Senate which will have no power of the purse will be to set up an absolutely worthless body. The member for New South Wales, Mr. Barton, in the able and lucid speech in which he presented the resolutions to the Convention, clearly indicated the importance of the power of the purse, and if we give the power of the purse and the control of the Executive to the House of Representatives we might just as well have no Senate at all.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLDER:

If we are to have the Senate for the protection of State rights, we must have a Senate as strong as the House of Representatives.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Will you have responsible government?

Mr. HOLDER:

I come to that point now. Mr. Higgins asks me whether I would have responsible government. I only say that if Federation must kill responsible government, or responsible government kill Federation, I would rather kill responsible government than Federation; and in that sentiment I think I will be supported by a large majority of the members of the Convention. I put it again. If we must kill one or the other I say we can better dispense with responsible government, much as I would regret doing it for many reasons, most of all because we have tried responsible government.

Mr. REID:

You do not need to do that. You can make the Government responsible to the Senate. That would meet your views.

Mr. HOLDER:

I would not advocate that, because it would not be fair, as it would place an undue power in the hands of the States House, and I want no undue power given to either. Let us hold the balance evenly in the interests of true Federation, and then we need not fear. Let the balance be uneven, and we shall be like a man palling a boat with uneven oars—we will make little progress. A majority of the Convention would accept no proposal which would make the Senate the more powerful of the two Houses. I do hope that we shall not, by any skilful argument or suggestion in favor of maintaining responsible government, be led away from the true principles of Federation or from a clear recognition of the purposes for calling into existence the States House. I am not sure that the conclusion to which Sir Richard Baker arrives is an absolutely final one. It looks to me very much as if it maybe true that we must choose between Federation and responsible government, and I think nothing can absolutely demonstrate which is to be chosen, save practical experience; and I think, therefore, the framers of the Commonwealth Bill acted wisely when they left that question open. Let us try whether these two are compatible or incompatible. If we find they are compatible, let us go on. Under the Commonwealth Bill we can possess the advantage of true Federation and the convenience we have gained under representative government; but if as time goes by we find that the representative of South Australia, Sir Richard Baker, is right, and we must give up one, let the one to be given up be responsible government, and let us put in its stead the Swiss system, or some other system which by that time experience may have demonstrated to be convenient and wise. Let us not to-day do anything that will tie our hands unduly in the future. The representative of New South Wales, Mr. Barton, protested against hide-bound views and speeches. I protest more strongly against a hide-bound Constitution. There is a very great deal indeed in what Mr. Carruthers said yesterday. He showed clearly that there was to be no secession, and there must be none. We cannot provide an easy back door out, for in a lasting Federation there is no secession. But there must be a ready and easy way to, make amendments in the Constitution. It must be elastic and susceptible, not to a wave of public feeling which may be purely temporary, but where there is a growth of public conviction it must be possible to alter the Constitution when we have framed it. What I am afraid of now is that, in providing definitely for responsible government, we may find that clinging to responsible government may lead us to greater sacrifices than it would be to surrender it. I go on now to the question of the franchise of the two Houses, and I regard it as extremely important that the franchise question should be settled within the four corners of the Constitution itself. What are we being asked to do? Five colonies are meeting here to-day, and we are asking them to come into a partnership, and dare we—dare the larger colonies, much more dare the smaller colonies—I will say why, presently—dare we ask them to come into a Federation, a very important term of which is left to the unknown future?

Mr. DOBSON:

No; the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HOLDER:

I contend that whatever the franchise may be—whether it may be one man one vote, as Mr. Higgins advocated yesterday, or whether it be, as I infinitely prefer, one adult one vote—whatever the franchise may be, in the four corners of the Constitution we must have the first franchise set out, subject to amendment. Possibly the Federal Parliament may alter it from time to time, but in the four corners of the Act of the Constitution the franchise of the partnership should be included.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You cannot alter it if you make it on the broadest basis.

Mr. HOLDER:

I am not afraid that the Parliament will make it less broad than we shall begin with, and that is why I want to set it upon the broadest possible basis.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Do you mean for the first election?

Mr. HOLDER:

Yes, for reasons I will indicate in a minute. It might be said three plans have been suggested for meeting the difficulty. One is that every State shall determine its own franchise for federal affairs; another is that the federal franchise shall be uniform, but shall be left for the Federal Parliament to settle; and the third is that the federal franchise shall be settled with the Constitution. The first is that each State shall settle the franchise for itself; and in support of this it is sometimes argued that it is not the business of one colony what the franchise of another may be. Is it not? Let me point to this fact. Taking once again the Commonwealth Bill as the basis of our discussion, we should see in the House of Representatives twelve members representing the colony of South Australia, and I think about eighty-four representing the two great colonies of New South Wales and Victoria. Do you not see in a moment that the electors of South Australia have seven times more interest in the franchise of those two colonies than they have in their own. It does not matter much to her on what basis our small minority of twelve members are elected, but it does matter to us, and to all of us, what the basis is upon which the eighty-four members from the other colonies are elected. It is equally our business to know that; indeed, it is more our business than theirs. It does no matter much to Victoria and New South Wales what our franchise is. Returning their members on their own franchise they can vote our twelve men down every time. While the question of the Federal franchise being stated in the Constitution is not a matter of great importance to the large colonies, because they can practically determine the issue themselves, it is a matter of extreme importance to the smaller colonies proposed to be represented in the Federation. I pass on to the next suggestion, that it should be left to the Federal Parliament to settle, the members being in the first place elected under the franchise of each colony. So far as we are concerned, the results in that instance would be eminently satisfactory. Our twelve representatives to the Federal Parliament would be elected upon adult suffrage - one adult one vote. As against our twelve would be representatives for Tasmania elected - I am speaking now of the franchise for the more popular branch of the Legislature - upon a property qualification.
Mr. DOBSON:
   It is democratic enough for anybody.
Mr. HOLDER:
   No one can vote for the Lower House unless he possesses an income of £60 a year.
Mr. DOBSON:
   No, £40.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   It has been reduced since to £40, apparently.
Mr. HOLDER:
   I am only basing my argument on the figures which are before us. I still claim that I am right in stating that there is a property qualification in Tasmania, if it be but £40 a year. I think I rightly understood Sir Edward Braddon to say that in Tasmania one man could have up to twelve votes.
That is a franchise upon which a certain portion of the Federal Parliament is proposed to be elected under this plan. In Victoria we see a difference, there being manhood suffrage; but there is also plural voting there, and I am glad to receive the assurance from Sir George Turner that his opinion is that Victoria will provide, as she did in her Federal Enabling Bill, that no elector shall possess more than one vote.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   I say more than that, that we ought to provide in this Constitution that the same thing should apply in all the colonies.
Mr. HOLDER:
   I welcome that as a very material concession. In the case of New South Wales we should have manhood suffrage without any qualification at all. It must be apparent that the franchise upon which the first Federal Parliament is elected will dominate the franchise which that Parliament legislates for, as being the Federal Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN:
If that is correct reforms would never have come.

Mr. HOLDER:
Reforms come very slowly. They have to be fought for inch by inch, and they have to be waited for long years before they come.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Do not go to extreme measures.

Mr. HOLDER:
I am not going to extreme measures. I am simply putting the points as they appear to me, and while I do not believe for a moment that this is the time for compromise, there may come a time when, at the point of the sword or the mouth of the cannon, speaking figuratively, we may have to accept compromise and offer a compromise before it is asked for, why lay down arms before the battle begins? If he favors womanhood suffrage, why not stick to his guns and help the rest of us; and who knows that this Convention may not signalise itself and the year of the diamond jubilee of Her Majesty by enacting for the great Federation that is coming, one woman as well as one man one vote?

Mr. TRENWITH:
It is not a battle.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I will help you, but at the same time I cannot close my eyes to facts.

Mr. HOLDER:
I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that in all probability Federation will be vetoed in this colony on the popular vote, if the Federation proposes to disfranchise nearly one half of the electors.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Why not make it one vote for one man and woman wherever woman suffrage exists?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Why force your franchise on Victoria?

Mr. HOLDER:
I must have spoken quite in vain about ten minutes ago, for Sir William Zeal asks: "Why force our franchise on Victoria?" I want no such thing. Victoria may have, for all her own State affairs, just what franchise she pleases, but when it comes to Federal affairs-when the members axe to be elected not to legislate for Victoria alone, but to legislate for Australasia-I am speaking of a matter which is not a Victorian question, but an Australasian question. So it appears to me, and so I think it must appear to the thought of everyone who has followed me.

An HON. MEMBER:
You dictate to us.
Mr. HOLDER:
I do not dictate. It appears to me most unlikely that South Australia will come in unless this is conceded; and I make no dictation, but simply urge the point which appears before my mind. I am not going to discuss the question of what the federal franchise should be. I have not expressed my view why womanhood should have a vote, for Committee is the stage at which the matter should be discussed. I should then also have a word to say as to the very admirable and conscientious way-since women have had a vote in South Australia-they have exercised the franchise. I will go on now to the question of the powers and functions to be exercised and enjoyed by the federal authority. And I remind hon. members of the rule I laid down in the beginning: to the State, everything that is local and of interest in one State; to the Federation, everything that is national and of inter-state concern. Now, applying that rule, we can very materially cut down the powers to be entrusted to the federal authority in the Commonwealth Bill. I would point out to hon. members this fact, that whatever we give to the federal authority the States divest themselves of. It is almost impossible to make the authorities concurrent. Further, it is much easier to give than to take back. I think we may safely assume that the States will never get back any power entrusted in the beginning to the federal authority. I do not think they ought to get anything back; but this fact should make us cautious. Let us scrutinise every detail that we propose to give to the federal authority, so that we may hand over nothing more than is necessary should be handed over. We can always add to the authorities handed over, but we cannot take back again.
Mr. GLYNN:
Why not? We can go to the Imperial Parliament, an Act of which can do anything.
Mr. HOLDER:
We do not want to be going to the Imperial Parliament every now and again to review our Constitution. I do not see any reason why we should hand over the posts and telegraphs. Are they not matters in which each State deals for itself, excepting extra-colonial cables and postal services.
The services on this continent and in Tasmania are matters of local interest and local concern. If there is one thing more than another which we should avoid bringing into Federation it is undue centralisation. We, and possibly the other colonies, have felt in the past the mischiefs of centralisation, and we ought to have no more of it than we can help. Is it not centralisation in the extreme if we get a requisition from Central Australia to have two mails instead of one a week, and we have to go to the federal authority to find out whether we can give this extra mail service? Supposing we wanted to change a letter carrier in Adelaide or the suburbs, or say in Brisbane, would it not be absurd to have to go to the federal authority before we could appoint a new letter carrier, or make an alteration in the beat in which he travels? These are matters of purely local interest, and we had better leave them to local control.

Mr. GORDON:
What would you do if one colony refused to carry the mails of another?

Mr. HOLDER:
That would be, as Dr. Cockburn says, practically a declaration of war against another State. I am quite sure that the States will be able to exchange mail matter, and deal with it as purely a local question. I say the same in connection with the railways. We have had railways constructed, not with a view to profit only, but with a view to develop the country. We have railways to-day working at a loss, yet we prefer to work them because certain portions of the country without them would be undeveloped, and perhaps could hardly be occupied. What is the case in South Australia is no doubt the case in other of the colonies. Are we prepared in this colony to hand over there lines of development, these lines which we have built for a certain specific purpose to the federal authority, whose great aim will be not to develop the States-

Mr. FRASER:
Oh yes.

Mr. HOLDER:
No. What interest would the federal authority have in developing a certain State?

MR. FRASER:
Every interest.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
What is the use of Federation?

Mr. HOLDER:
Many thing, could be managed a great deal better by Federation, but in reference to the railways we are not prepared in this colony, and in the other colonies too, to hand over to a federal body, whose only object would be to make them pay, these lines which we have designed and constructed for a specific reason. They are our local concerns, and we cannot but make local matters of them. In reference, however, to the railways, and to the post, and telegraphs, too, we must be careful to provide against a wrong being done by one colony towards another. We must provide against any colony imposing postage upon the people of a neighboring State that it does not impose upon its own people. We must provide against a State charging rates for that State other than it would charge the people of another State; and we must be careful in providing that there are no differential rates imposed for the purpose of promoting the industry and trade of one State to the detriment and injury of that of another. Reference has been made to the question of making this principle prevail only in the case of the intercolonial railways, but it is not a question of inter-colonial railways at all. Let us abolish to-morrow the Customs-houses of South Australia, and have no duties against intercolonial products and manufactures, and it will be quite possible to provide by a railway tariff that all goods the product or manufacture of other colonies should pay double freight, and we would lose all the benefit of intercolonial freetrade by this. It may be said I am using an extreme illustration. To-day, in the colony of Queensland, and for years past there, a higher rate of freightage on the railways has been charged for flour, bran, and pollard gristed in another colony than has been charged for the same goods gristed in Queensland. In Queensland already the influence of protection is being largely increased to the detriment of the other colonies by these differential rates. What is being done in Queensland may be done in other colonies, if they please; but we must provide that there shall be no undue favor given to any State, and no undue damage done by the action of one State to the trade and commerce of another.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

How can you enforce it?

Mr. HOLDER:

Mr. O'Connor put it very clearly the day before yesterday, when he was speaking on this point, and I shall be very glad to follow him in Committee if he thinks fit to propose an amendment to give effect to his views. I do not like the idea of surrendering these railways to the federal authority, but all the advantages to accrue from intercolonial freetrade will be lost unless we provide against differential rates. There are many matters which may be handed over with great advantage to the federal authority, such as Customs and Excise, for instance. There are no subjects which have a broader or a more national interest than these, and of all others these are the ones which we should first entrust to the care and control of the federal authority. Defence, also, is a subject which must be vested in the Federation. Lighthouses, quarantine, and matters relating to shipping regulations, are all subjects which will find their way naturally into the hands of federal authority; but for the rest, let us keep within our own power all we possibly can. Now I come to the question of finance, and I shall not detain the Convention long, for a reason which will appear presently. I believe that if we are going to face the financial question in the spirit in which many are inclined to face it, we have a most difficult problem before us—in fact, one so difficult, that it may take many months to solve the difficulties connected with it. I have looked at it very closely, and the more closely I look the more difficulties I see. I have read many articles on the question, including the very able articles by Mr. Nash, of New South Wales, and the more I read and study the more difficulties crop up. The greatest difficulty is this—that circumstances change so rapidly. We may adjust things to-day after most earnest consideration, and to-morrow we wake up to find that the statistics on which we based our work—and they may be the statistics of no longer back than six months ago—are no longer applicable, and all our work will have to be done over again. Look at the phenomenal advance which has been made by Western Australia during the last year or two, and we may learn that any settlement to the financial question cannot be a final settlement, but must be open to review almost day by day. And that leads me to the very difficult problem connected with the account system, for which the hon. member for Victoria, Dr. Quick, is one of the ablest advocates. That account system seems to me to possess one or two serious drawbacks. In the first place it involves a most costly system of accounts, and there will be room for infinite friction between the federated colonies. Besides that, we do not want further hampering or fettering of our inter-State commerce, and the moment we say to the collectors of Customs on the various borders—"You shall charge no more duties, but everything else you do to-day you shall do tomorrow," we lose, I was going to say one-half, but I think I may say nine-tenths of the advantages that should come to us from the abolition of Customs duties. I have looked up a few figures which seem to me to be illustrative of this way of dealing with the financial question. Some have proposed, instead of making the difficulty smaller, to make it greater, not even to take Federation as it stands in the Commonwealth Bill, which is now generally admitted to be impracticable, but to make it more difficult by pooling the railways and public debts. What are the facts? The public debts of the Australian Colonies amounted on December 31st, 1896, in New South Wales, to £44.59 per head of the population; in Victoria, to only £39.92 per head: in South Australia, to £64.78 per head; in Western Australia, to £34.21 per head; in Tasmania, to £48.67 per head; and in Queensland, which is the largest, to £67.50 per head—or an average for Sir JOHN FORREST:

There has been no increase since December.

Mr. HOLDER:

I am very glad to hear it, though I understand there is likely to be an increase. The highest colony is Queensland, with £67.50. I know of no system of taking over the debts which would harmonise differences like those. The thing is impossible. We should want to refine things down to a better basis than the difference between £34 and £67. It has been said that, roughly, the Customs duties and the debts of the colonies balance. So they do as a mass, but let us look at the matter in detail. Let us see how the Customs and Excise revenue comes in. The smallest amount is in South Australia, including the Northern Territory, where the Customs and Excise duties provide per head of population £1 11s. 7d. per annum. That is the minimum, and we come to the highest in Western Australia, where similar duties provide £6 11s. 8d. per head of the population per annum. That may be said to be abnormal, and I admit that it is, but I will come to that which is not abnormal. I take the colony of Queensland, where there is nothing abnormal, and I find that the amount received under similar circumstances is £2 12s. 9d., so that you have a range of from £1 11s. 7d. in South Australia to £2 12s. 9d. in Queensland, and yet the difference between the debts of the two colonies is not great. How can you harmonise such differences by any rule of thumb? If it is done it must be adjusted from day to day by a system of book-keeping, and that involves friction between the States and the Federal Parliament, and the maintenance of a host of statisticians and clerks, which must very considerably add to the cost of government. Mr. Henry points to this fact, which I suppose is within the thought of all of us, that these calculations are based on the figures of the present; but who can say what will be the results of the coming uniform tariff?

Mr. GLYNN:

Are you not leaving the economic benefits out?

Mr. HOLDER:

I am showing the difficulties in the way of settling the matter by any rule of thumb. This problem, I think, is almost insurmountable.

Mr. WALKER:

How did America manage it?
Mr. HOLDER:

We are not in the position of the United States, and I should be sorry to see anything like what occurred there introduced here. We are told that some modified form of the plan adopted in the Commonwealth Bill may be adopted. Mr. Henry yesterday suggested that there should be certain fixed subsidies paid to the States, but that would make the States dependent for their existence on the Federal Parliament, which is most undesirable. What happened in the United States? They had enormous surpluses, and they ladled out the money in enormous pension lists and all sorts of extravagances, and the result of this spendthrift policy is seen to-day.

Mr. BARTON:

The United States were never directed in the Constitution to distribute any surplus.

Mr. HOLDER:

No; but if we provide for a statutory sub-division, we simply make the States dependent for their very existence on the Federal Government. If we do not adopt that policy we leave it open for allotment from year to year, and there will be no question productive of more antagonism between the States than this. The two subjects I have already mentioned will be as nothing compared with it. As I have raised so many difficulties, I may only fairly be asked what do I propose? I think the difficulties are altogether insurmountable, and that the only possible course for us is to cease to seek to untie the Gordian knot or unravel the tangled skein, and cut it at once. If we cut it we save a vast amount of time, difficulty, uncertainty, and friction by a very simple provision. Let us simply avoid all these questions. Let every State collect the Customs and Excise duties under a uniform tariff, and let them manage their own internal affairs in such matters as are not handed over to the Federation. Let the federal authorities make an annual levy upon the States per capita, which levy shall be paid quarterly in advance, and we have at once avoided the difficulty.

Mr. DEAKIN:

A mere confederacy.

Mr. BARTON:

Then you get out of the difficulty of making the States dependent upon the Commonwealth by making the Commonwealth dependent upon the States?

Mr. HOLDER:

I think that is subject to modification when I have explained my plan. The first answer I make to the interjection is this, that I would let each State collect its own revenue, and as to ascertaining what the cost would be, it would be a simple matter, because the Treasurer of the Commonwealth would have annually to prepare his budget. That would show the true federal revenue; it would show the true federal expenditure, which would be very much larger; and it would show the amount of the levy which each colony would have to pay quarterly in advance until the next budget came round. Every State would collect its own Customs and Excise duties under the Commonwealth tariff.

Mr. LOTON:
How would a State with no Customs duties pay?

Mr. DOBSON:
How would you enforce the payment?

Mr. REID:
The question is knotty enough without interruption.

Mr. HOLDER:
The representative of Tasmania has asked me how I would enforce the payments, and, in answering that I will answer the interjection of Mr. Barton. Just now Mr. Barton said that the plan I suggested would make the Federation entirely dependent upon the States. It would if the States were left to pay or not as they pleased, but if it were provided that these levies were to be paid, and, in the event of non-payment at the due date of the levy, the federal authority could enter and collect the revenue from the Customs or otherwise, there would be no fear of any State repudiating its debt.

Mr. REID:
And will the Commonwealth not repudiate its obligations to the State if you do that?

Mr. HOLDER:
I am not afraid of that. I do not want that the States should be dependent for their existence upon the Commonwealth. If there must be any dependency there would be less danger in making the Federation dependent upon the States than the States dependent upon the Federation. We all believe in the plan of giving certain specified powers to the Federation, and that the residue should belong to the States. We contemplate that a State should be a body possessed of other powers, and in some instances greater powers, than those given for national purposes to the Federation.

Mr. BARTON:
How is that kind of union to be stronger than the articles of the Confederate States in America?

Mr. HOLDER:
We have entered upon a different condition of affairs than those that prevailed at that time. There were then not the national conditions that we propose to call into existence now, and the whole conditions of national life in the States were quite inferior to those here to-day. Is it to be believed that any State is likely to repudiate its obligations to the Federation?

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Is human nature not the same then as now?

Mr. HOLDER:
Yes; but things are different in the proposed Constitution from the Constitution which was a pure confederacy.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
How would you check federal expenditure? The federal budget might absorb all your Customs revenue.

Mr. HOLDER:
If the federal authorities required for purely federal purposes certain moneys it would have to be paid, and the various States would have to pay it. How much would be required would depend upon the Houses. Each State would elect its representatives who would look after its interests, and each State would elect its senators who would be pledged against extravagance. I do not think we need fear that any State would be trampled upon in the way suggested. The plan which I have outlined appears not to be acceptable to the Convention. But we must either get round the difficulty or we must face it. If it be a difficulty, as I think we shall find, it may be insurmountable; but if we cannot face it let us get round it, and avoid dealing with it. No one would be more pleased than I if our hon. friends Mr. McMillan or Mr. Walker can place before us a solution of the difficulty, and if not they must come in with me. I have only one point more upon which to make a few remarks. It is with reference to the question of the formation of a Supreme Court of Appeal. The argument has been used during the debate that we ought not to try and set up a Supreme Court of Appeal for Australasia because we have not the talent at our disposal. My answer to that is this: Just recently we have seen a judge of one of the Australian courts, and that not in the largest colony either, called to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If he can add information and strength to that body, then I think we have proof that we have within our own borders some not unworthy to be compared to others who are to be found on the Privy Council in England. Some arguments used seem to suggest that ignorance of the facts and surrounding circumstances conduce to a wise decision. I do not agree with that view. The more fully the Court is aware of the surrounding conditions and circumstances under which the dispute has arisen the more wisely will it be likely to arbitrate in reference to any dispute. I hope that one of the results of Federation will be the formation of a Court of Appeal to which litigants can take their pleas. I feel that I have expressed the sentiments which occupied my mind, and the more I hear from others the more impressed am I with the difficulties of our task I have no fear that we shall be unable to surmount them, but I believe that by fairly meeting them in some way or other we shall overcome the obstacles and shall frame a Constitution for Australasia under which her children can live for generations to come united, strong, and free.

Mr. LYNE:

I should not have attempted to take up the time of this Convention, but as I had not the privilege of being one of the Convention in 1891, I deem it my duty to place on record on the present occasion my ideas in the same manner as other gentlemen in this assemblage have done. I take it that the resolutions which have been tabled and which are before the Convention at the present time are intended to elicit from its members their ideas as to what should be embodied in the proposed draft Bill, and if that is not so I think those resolutions would absolutely fail in their object, and though with the expectation of repeating many of the arguments, dealing as I must of necessity with subjects that have already been discussed by other gentlemen, I am bound to take the course indicated. I remember—it is now a long time since—when one of the first Conventions was held, I think in Melbourne, one of its members, and a leading member—Mr. James Service—said that the lion in the path, as far as the Federation of the colonies was concerned, was the fiscal question. It seems to me that has altogether died a natural death as between the colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE:

If I take the speeches which have gone before, I find that the lions in the path at the present time are more than one, but the principal is that of State rights. I take it that is to be the trouble in connection with this Convention, and next to that the cession of the railways to the Federal Government, and last, perhaps not least as I think has been shown by the gentleman who has just resumed his seat—the question of pooling or amalgamating the debts and assets of the various colonies. These three things seem to me to point to the troubles before us in this Convention, and I shall attempt as shortly as possible to deal with those matters seriatim. I recognise that the speech just delivered by Mr. Holder is one that has raised many difficulties - difficulties which will be found hard to overcome. But though agreeing with him in some respects, I must be allowed to altogether disagree with him in many others; I think the majority of this Convention will disagree with him in many of the statements he has made. First of all, he raised the question

Mr. HOLDER:
  Hear, hear. Certainly.

Mr. LYNE:
I come next to the question of States and State rights. Unfortunately I had not the privilege and pleasure yesterday of listening to some of the able speeches delivered, but I took the opportunity of glancing through them as reported, and I find that the smaller States proposing to enter this Convention have a very great deal to say about State rights. It was an ingenious argument used by Mr. Holder, when he said that the smaller States, especially in the matter of the franchise, had more to consider as against the larger States, than bad the larger States against the smaller. I reverse the picture absolutely, and assert that the larger States have more to consider in connection with the franchise of the smaller States than was put in the proposition of Mr. Holder. It seems to me that what some of the smaller States representatives want is not only to govern their small States as they are doing now, but also to have a very much larger finger in the pie of governing the larger States than they are entitled to. I take it that in this particular the larger States must have the predominant power in the Federation. And if you refer to the history of the creation of the Senate of the United States of America, you will find, I think, that it was not first created as the portion of the Parliamentary machinery which it afterwards became.

Mr. TAYLOR:
  Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE:
I find that when the originators of the Senate decided to elect that body they were in this position, that they had very little, scarcely anything, to guide them in the formation of their Constitution-a very different position to that we are in to-day-they are groping to a large extent without any guide; and when the Senate was created, as it was subsequently created, it was mainly as a check upon the great power of the President.

Mr. ISAACS:
  Hear, hear.
Mr. LYNE:
I find that no one in the Convention of 1787 set out with the idea of such a Senate as ultimately emerged from their deliberations. Although it had technically been created as a branch of the Legislature, it was thought of as being first a body with executive functions only. And this, at first, it was. Now that being so, if we create a body such as we propose at present, we do not take the idea embedded in the minds of the members of the Convention of 1787 as to what the powers of the Senate should be. It is no use talking round this question and shirking the duty which devolves upon us, because it would be only wasting time, and for that reason I wish to say that I have always, as long as I have given the matter a thought, been against equal representation in the Senate; and I shall adhere to that unless convincing argument on the other side is used.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
We might as well go, then.

Mr. LYNE:
I should not like Sir Philip Fysh to pack up his portmanteau.

Mr. REID:
He has to stop and finish this contract somehow. (Laughter)

Mr. LYNE:
We had better approach this question in a straightforward manner, and say at once what we are prepared to do, and what ideas we have upon the subject. In referring to the powers of the Senate as they exist at the present time in America, what are those powers supposed to be? They are not equal with those of the House of Representatives. They are described by Bryce in a manner with which I entirely concur. The powers of the Senate I take it should be to:

Correct the democratic recklessness of the House of Representatives and the monarchical ambition of the President.

An HON. MEMBER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE:
Another idea of the power of the Senate:

To restrain the impetuosity and fickleness of the popular House, and so guard against the effects of gusto of passion or sudden changes of opinion in the people.

An HON. MEMBER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE:
It is also given as another reason that:

The propensity of a single and numerous assembly to yield to the impulse of sudden and violent passion is restrained.

I say the Senate, in the first place, should not be constituted on equal representation. What right has Tasmania to have as strong a power in the administration of New South Wales as New South Wales.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

What right has Rhode Island to have equal power with Sydney?

Mr. LYNE:

I do not agree with that, either. I do not agree with Tasmania having equal power with New South Wales, and I question whether it is wise for Tasmania to enter the Federation at all. A few hours ago I was reading a letter appearing in one of the morning papers in which I saw it stated, with a good deal of force, that the first thing Tasmania should do would be to join Victoria and go in with Victoria as part of the Federation. That may be wise for Tasmania to do.

An HON. MEMBER:

And overpower New South Wales.

Mr. LYNE:

You cannot overpower New South Wales. I do not think it is a wise thing to adhere to equal representation in the Senate, provided you are to give the Senate reasonably strong power. If you are to make the Senate a nonentity no harm can be done in giving equal representation, but you must do one of two things. You must either give proportionate representation in the Senate, or refuse power to the Senate to stop the will of the people. One or the other must be done, because where would be the use of having a House of Representatives to spend time in preparing and passing legislation when the smaller Chamber had more power, would use it, and could absolutely block any legislation which the House of Representatives sent up? I have heard an argument used by many that there should be one Chamber only, but I do not agree with that argument either. I am favorable to having two Chambers, and the second Chamber should only have the power stated in the above quotations, that is, not to stop legislation, but simply to stay it; and if, after a clear demonstration and expression from the people, certain legislation is required, then the Senate shall be called upon to give way. I read with some degree of pleasure the speech delivered by Sir George Turner, wherein he said he was favorable to the referendum in case, between the Senate and House of Representatives, a deadlock arose. I concur in this expression, but not to the extent he did. I think we can devise means by which a crisis may be prevented from having the ill effects a crisis usually has. The method I refer to is what is known as the Norwegian system. My friends of the smaller States will say, "If you do that you will overpower the smaller States": but that can be avoided. The way it is applied in the country to which the system belongs is that, when the two Houses are sitting together, a measure must be carried by a two-thirds majority; the possibility of a crisis is then alleviated at any rate, if not absolutely prevented, and the States reasonably protected. Only in important cases that could be laid down with clearness could I agree, so far as I am personally concerned, to the intervention of the referendum. I do not think, after the experience we have had at the late elections, the referendum will be so popular as it has been in the past. I look upon it as one of the most conservative measures that can be introduced.

Mr. Reid:
Hear, hear.

Mr. Lyne:
It has been thought by those of the other way of thinking that it was a liberal measure. I think that, so far as the late elections are concerned, those who call themselves the Liberal Party in the various colonies have been almost wiped out.

Mr. Barton:
That was no referendum.

Mr. Lyne:
I am speaking of those who call themselves democrats, of the Labor Party, a party which in New South Wales thought it could dominate any election of the whole people, but which has not been able to return a single member of its way of thinking. I say the time has arrived when the referendum will not be so popular as it has been in the past. At the same time I recognise it is a way of getting at the feelings and opinions of the people, and that is what I understood the Premier of Victoria so strongly desired when he advocated a resort to the referendum. I take it, for instance, that in such a case as the alteration of the Constitution, and other such seriously important matters, the referendum could be brought into play, not, however, till every system that is now used, or may be imported into this Bill, had been used, to prevent the loss and annoyance of a crisis. That being the view I take of it, I think the smaller States need not be alarmed that they are to be injured by my proposal to leave the great power in the hands of the people. I read the statement made by Mr. Carruthers, that what was desired was unification, in the same way as it exists in the British Constitution. I do not think, however, these colonies desire unification at the present time; they desire, I think, a system of Federation that will be fair to all parties, and they do not desire any system that will be unreasonable, and under which some of the larger colonies are going to lose a great deal. I say, and I emphasize it, that of all the colonies which will lose, if loss it may be called, for the first few years, it is the mother-colonies of New South Wales, which will lose more than all the other colonies put together.

Mr. PEACOCK:
How?

Mr. DEAKIN:
Gain more.

Mr. LYNE:
I must be permitted to think that she will lose more, though Mr. Deakin may think otherwise.

Mr. WISE:
There is one thing-she can afford it much better.

Mr. LYNE:
That may be. If Queensland comes into the Federation, and I hope she will be represented here, she may say that with her large territory she can afford it much better than New South Wales; but I say New South Wales is going to lose more than all the other colonies put together. I dare say members of the Convention have read the interesting pamphlet published by Mr. Nash on the financial position, which, I think, clearly demonstrates what New South Wales's loss would be. He says further-

If New South Wales is coming into the Federation, she will have to be prepared to give a very great deal. And the question is whether she is going to get anything in return.

Mr. HOWE:
She will.

Mr. LYNE:
Probably she will by-and-by. I know Mr. Barton will say that she is to have all the industries form the other colonies concentrated in Sydney, because she has her coalfields.

Mr. BARTON:
Not necessarily Sydney.

Mr. LYNE:
That may be by-and-by. It is a matter we have to look forward to,

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE:
I think she will be called upon to give up more than Mr. Douglas thinks. She is the wealthiest colony in the group, and has perhaps other advantages, which will commend themselves to gentlemen present, but I think we are here to conserve to some extent the interests of the States we represent as well as deal with questions in reference to the other States. As to the question of the franchise, one gentleman said, Why not have one House and one House only? I think there should be a difference between the franchise of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and what that difference should be, not as Mr. Barton suggested, that the whole of each colony might elect its senators as one electorate; because I think if that is done it will be found only those who are men of means, and who can command wealth, will be able to get into the Senate.

Mr. BARTON:
The election just held was the cheapest ever held. I never spent less.

Mr. lyne:
That was in consequence of the representative character of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. Barton:
No.

Mr. deakin:
It will be cheaper in large constituencies.

Mr. lyne:
I may turn to an example to the contrary. I think they had something of the kind in south Australia a few years ago, and representatives to the Upper House were elected by the colony as one electorate. I believe exactly what I state is likely to occur took place here, or why did this colony alter her system from one electorate to several?

Mr. higgins:
Not because of the expense.

Mr. lyne:
I am told that it was because of the expense, and because only wealthy men could contest the elections.

Mr. Barton:
That was in the Conservative days of this colony.
Mr. Lyne:
If it was in the Conservative days of this colony why does she not return to it?

Mr. Gordon:
Population had too much power in the Upper House.

Mr. LYNE:
Do you not desire that population should have power?

Mr. GORDON:
A fair power.

Mr. LYNE:
I think they should have all the power.

Mr. BARTON:
They mean that the city would have too much power as compared with the country.

Mr. LYNE:
Certainly. If you take the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria you will find the larger proportion of the population in and around Sydney and Melbourne, and these two will dominate the remainder of the colony.

Mr. PEACOCK:
That was not our experience at these elections.

Mr. LYNE:
This election is entirely different to the elections which will take place for the Senate; and I am stating now my opinion only, and I give to you what has been experienced, demonstrated as it has been in this colony by practical result, which should go a great deal further than any theory you can advance to prove what is likely to take place. I would like to see the senators elected from as many districts as the number of senators each colony has to return.

Mr. BARTON:
It would not then represent the State as a whole.

Mr. LYNE:
I think it would. My opinion is that there should be a difference between the House of Representatives and the Senate, and this difference, that the voting age should be raised so that instead of any elector of the age of 21 being allowed to exercise the franchise, he should be 25 or 30 before he is privileged to vote for senators. That would make a great deal of difference, and still carry out the principle of one man one vote. Now, as far as the franchise is concerned, I hope that this Convention will agree to it being equal for all the colonies, not only for the House of Representatives but also for the Senate; and in view of the remarks of Mr. Holder—I agree with some of them in this particular—I cannot see how it is possible the first election is to take place other than upon the present franchise—a franchise which was described by the Premier of Tasmania as "a sufficiently liberal one." I do not know what he thinks is "a sufficiently liberal franchise." Where there is a £40 property qualification I do not consider a liberal franchise exists. You may depend upon it the qualification over all these colonies under Federation will be universal suffrage. And I would go further—

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

Everyone can earn £40.

Mr. LYNE:

A great many at the present time cannot. I also think we ought to provide in this Bill what the franchise in the future, after the first election, should be for the Senate as well as the House of Representatives; and I would like to say, in answer to the remarks made by Mr. Holder, that, as far as I am personally concerned, I would like to see it further extended, as you have extended it in South Australia, to women. That question ought to come up during this Convention. It is beside the question to imagine that, if we are to have uniform federation, we can have representatives from various States elected upon a different basis. We should enter upon all these questions at the present time, and deal with them as they come before us. There is no use trying—

Mr. DOUGLAS:

What became of the lady who contested the election in South Australia?

Mr. LYNE:

I suppose she had not the requisite qualification, or she would have been elected. That is beside the question. It is reasonable to expect the franchise to be even throughout the whole of the colonies. If it is not so, trouble will arise from the very start. We must frame a Constitution from which there shall be no secession, and one that will prove a binding contract between all the colonies, or else the same troubles which arose in the United States, when States desired to withdraw from the Federation, will arise here. We must also have a Constitution that can largely be built upon in the future by custom. The Constitution of Great Britain is not upon any hard and fast lines, but expanded by custom and usage. We must, therefore, have a Constitution sufficiently elastic to be built upon, and made stronger and more suitable in the future than we can possibly expect to make it at present. That being so, we are called upon to exercise the greatest discretion and the greatest consideration. It is singular, perhaps, that we are carrying on this question almost at the same stage in our history as it was conducted in the United States of America. We are about 100 years old. So were the States of America a century old when they began to think upon their union in the same way as we are. It would not be out of place at the present time to point out that on that particular occasion, when the Union was being considered, the representation that was given to the Senate was this:

Originally Congress fixed the ratio of members to population, and the House accordingly grew; but latterly, fearing a too rapid increase, it has fixed the number of members with no regard for any precise ratio of members to population. At present the total number is 329, being, according to the census of 1880, one member to 154,325 souls.

The original number was one member to every 30,000, but afterwards that was increased to 50,000. If the franchise is extended to women, I propose we should have one member to every 100,000; but if we do not extend that to women, then we should have one member to 50,000 only.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is not a question of the number of voters, but the population.

Mr. LYNE:
I thought I made myself clear on that point.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You are thinking it is one to so many electors. It will make the same number of votes.

Mr. LYNE:
The Premier of Victoria is right if it applies to the total population. I was only applying it to the number of electors. I will take it on the basis of population, one member to 50,000, which would return near eighty members as the House of Representatives; that would not make the House or the Senate, with an average of six members from each State at the beginning of our Federal Parliament, too large. If there is one thing more than another that the Australasian Colonies are afraid of it is that we will have a large House, too extravagant and too expensive in its character. The desire is to reduce that House to as small a number as would be compatible with the work it has to do. If, as has been suggested by Mr. Holder, it is not to have the control of the Posts and Telegraphs or the Customs, will there be need for a large House? Now, it seems to me, if we did not band over either of these to the Federal Parliament, we might just have a few gentlemen sitting together as a Federal Council.

Mr. BARTON:
It is a question whether you would even want a Senate or a House of Representatives.

Mr. LYNE:

If Mr. Holder's ideas were carried out you would hardly want either. I think he would hand over the question of defence, the question of quarantine, and the question of a Federal Supreme Court.

Mr. HOLDER:

And the framing of a new Customs and Excise Act.

Mr. LYNE:

Framing one, but not collecting the duties. They would not have much to do after the first framing had taken place. All the work then would be handed over to the various States to do it for the Federal Government. We do not want much in the shape of a Federal Parliament, if that is all they are to do. But I desire to speak of a Federal Parliament which will have work far in excess of that referred to by Mr. Holder. I still want to see a Parliament not too large in numbers, with a Senate certainly not more than half the size of the House of Representatives. If we have for the former equal representation in the various colonies as suggested-some six from each colony-there will be about thirty or thirty-six, say at the outside forty-two, members. There would then be about eighty in Representatives. That is a fairly large House, and yet not large. But if we went further, and allowed the number of members to increase according to the increase of population, we do not know to what extent that might go. We had a little experience of this in New South Wales a few years ago, when an amending Bill was brought in allowing an increase in the number of members according to the population of the various electorates. As a result our House was brought up from about ninety members-before we knew where we were-to a House of one hundred and forty-one. Of course we had to reduce this number, and get back nearer to the stage where we were before. In any Bill we may frame at the present time we must fix the maximum number.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Make the House of Representatives bear a certain proportion to the numbers of the Senate.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE:

The Senate should bear the proportion to the House of Representatives as one-half. That is a fair thing to do.

Mr. PEACOCK:
You mean the other way about.

Mr. LYNE:

No; I do not. I want a Senate about one-half the size in number of the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives to be elected upon a certain basis to be described in the Draft Bill, neither House to be increased, but a maximum to be fixed by an amendment of the electoral basis for the House of Representatives. At the present time we have in New South Wales a limited number of representatives; but there is no limit as to altering the districts. There is, however, a limit to the number of representatives who can be returned, and by that means only is it possible to restrict the number of members that will be returned for the House of Representatives. Also, by doing that, you restrict the number of members to the Senate. My idea of the proportionate representation in the Senate is to allow the smaller States a minimum number of representatives, but not to equal that of the more populous ones. The proportion would be in comparison to the number given to the larger States. I had thought of a minimum of four to the smaller States, and that they should remain at that minimum until their population arrived at the stage when they would be entitled to an increase.

Mr. WALKER:

How many?

Mr. LYNE:

They would have a maximum of eight. At the present time the colony of Victoria would be entitled to seven or eight, New South Wales to seven or eight-I think to eight-and the other colonies of Tasmania, South Australia, and Western Australia would be entitled-two of them to four, and the third, perhaps, to five, the last-named being South Australia.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

Very good!

Mr. LYNE:

It is all very well for the smaller States to say "very good" in that sarcastic way. They cannot have everything their own way. (Laughter, and hear, hear.) If any of the States have a right to have their own way, it is the larger States. I hear what Mr. Douglas has said; but what would happen if Victoria and New South Wales, for instance, decided to federate? The smaller States would have to come in. (Laughter.)

Mr. DOUGLAS:

They are free and independent.

Mr. LYNE:

It is all very well to say free and independent; but they would be compelled to come in if Victoria, New South Wales, and, say Queensland, federated.

Mr. BARTON:

Is that the spirit in which we are to consider it?

Mr. LYNE:

No; I am not saying that that is the spirit in which we should consider it, but I am saying, in answer to interjections, that such things could take place. I am not saying that they are going to take place, because I am prepared to give consideration to the full to the claims of the smaller States.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

Very little.

Mr. LYNE:

If a very little, a very just one. These gentlemen may have to thank us for less than I suggest before the thing is done. But that is by the way. I do not mean to say that the arguments used by the various speakers will not affect my ideas beyond those I have formed at present. If we did not come here to consider the views put before us we had better not have come at all.

Mr. HOWE:

You are well pronounced, at all events.

Mr. LYNE:

For this reason I give expression now to my ideas, because they are individual opinions, and let them be combated by others. Equal State rights would be extremely unjust to the larger colonies of the group. There is another thing. If we are to have equal representation I would curb the power of the Senate. I would not allow it to amend Money Bills or reject Money Bills.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE:

I am very glad to have the concurrence of Mr. Douglas, because that would help to do away with the objection to equal State rights. Of course they have always the power of rejecting any measure sent up from the House of Representatives, but Mr. Wise said he would give the power to amend Customs Bills. It is not a power given to some of the Legislatures at the present time, and, as it is in some respects a tax on the people, the Senate should not have the power of amending line by line a Customs Bill. That would take away their power to a very large extent. I turn now from the construction and the powers of the Senate to another question, which is one of those, I take it, likely to be fought very hard in this Convention, and that is the question of handing over the various railway systems throughout the colonies. My opinion is that they should not be given over, and I do not think it will meet with the concurrence of the States, at the present time at any rate, to hand over these railways to a federal control. I find the total cost of the railways throughout the colonies amounts to £94,834,000, and that they are yielding, taking the average, 2.97 per cent. It was stated by some of the representatives yesterday that it would cost £4,000,000 to equalise the gauge. Why, it will cost nearer £20,000,000; and I will show how. Of course, I am speaking approximately. We have invested nearly £100,000,000 in the railways; we have the 4ft. 8 1/2in. gauge in New South Wales, the 5ft. 3in. in Victoria, the 5ft. 3in. and 3ft. 6in. in South Australia, 3ft. 6in. in West Australia; of course, Tasmania is out of the question. Queensland, if she comes in, has the 3ft. 6in. gauge, and will anyone who understands anything at all about railway Construction tell me, if you are going to increase this gauge increase cuttings and tunnels to convert a 3ft. 6in. into a 4ft. 8 1/2in. gauge, it will cost only four millions or even ten millions?

An HON. MEMBER:
Are the tunnels not large enough?

Mr. LYNE:
I know in New South Wales they are not for a double line.

Mr. HOLDER:
You have the 4ft. 8 1/2in. gauge there now.

Mr. LYNE:
In some of the colonies they are not. There are several things to consider. You have to equalise the grade, in a great many instances to duplicate the gauge, and to alter the curves. In Queensland, the gauge is 3ft. 6in.; the cuttings and tunnels there are not large enough for a 4ft. 8 1/2in. gauge. Nor are they in some parts of South Australia.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Broadening the gauge and altering the curves.

Mr. LYNE:
There are tunnels and lines up and through mountains in various places, with sharp curves, and those who know anything about railway construction will not tell me they will not have to alter the curves. If it is to cost only £4,000,000 it should be done at once without hesitation, but I say in my opinion it will cost three or four times as much as has been suggested to do the work. One reason why I object to the amalgamation, or handing over of railways, is because I think they are a subject for State rather than federal control. It will be more in the interests of the State Governments to extend the State railways than it would be of the Federal Government to do so. I am not speaking of Victoria or South Australia, because they have extended their railways more than we have in New South Wales, where we are only on the fringe of extension to properly develop the country. We have only 2,600 miles of railway, when we should have 10,000 or 12,000 miles, and these works would be better carried out by the State than the Federal Government. There is one other thing that comes to my mind: the resolutions infer there is to be no differential rate, or, as I may more properly term it, preferential rate over the railways of any of the colonies and also the waterways. Now, I should like to ask the framer of that resolution, Mr. Barton, how he is going to prevent a differential rate over the waterways of the different colonies when the steamers are held by private companies? Is it possible to prevent a differential rate? Take New South Wales, which has differential railway rates to Bourke, to compete with the water carriage from Bourke to South Australia. By this amalgamation of the railways, and by doing away with the differential rates, you prevent the Government of New South Wales obtaining any of the produce from Bourke as it does now. By federating you tie her arms behind her back, and you allow the owners of the steamers, by fixing low rates, to carry the wool and the wheat down the river to Victoria and South Australia.

Mr. FRASER:
To Morgan.

Mr. LYNE:
I say to South Australia and Victoria; I do not particularise any spot. It seems to me to be an almost impossible thing to deal satisfactorily with this differential rating question. Mr. O'Connor very trenchantly put before the Convention the possibilities of dealing with the differential rates in the same way in which they are dealt with in the United States. If you are to do away with these differential rates, I think that is the only thing that can be done. By the appointment of an inter-State commission, giving it certain powers, it would be a simple matter to deal with the question, and would avoid the necessity which might otherwise exist, of handing over the railways to the Federal Parliament. These are questions which will be taken up in Committee, and the details gone into. There are, however, other aspects of this question. I have spoken of differential rates by private companies by land, and have left out the rates between colony and colony by sea. This might act just in the same way. If the railways are run from Sydney to Brisbane, from Sydney to Melbourne, from Melbourne to Adelaide, and perhaps from Adelaide to Perth, differential water-carriage rates might absolutely ruin the whole traffic of the railways under the Federal Government. How is that to be overcome? These are questions which I cannot answer at present. If we are to do away with the differential rating system, and to abolish the intercolonial tariffs, how are we to have the essence of Federation while a railway barrier exists between the colonies? This is one of the first things to consider. How are we to deal with the differential rates between the colonies, and not have the protective system under it while free waterways exist, which allows of a differential rating system? There is another question which was brought to my mind by the remarks of Mr. Holder—the question of State rights. How these small States would deal with us, and almost wring our necks if they had the opportunity! Take the question put by Mr. Holder as to the waters of the Darling. Are we in New South Wales to be prevented from dealing with the waters of the Darling, including flood waters, because the smaller States think they want these waters? The waters are in New South Wales, and we are not going to give up the right of utilising them on behalf of the producers of our colony.

Mr. GLYNN:
They are subject to the rights of the States lower down.

Mr. LYNE:
They are not subject to any rights of theirs.

Mr. GLYNN:
You claim that they are not, but they are in law.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Do not let us discuss the legal question.

Mr. LYNE:
Victoria filches a little from us at the present time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
No, no.

Mr. LYNE:
The water belongs to New South Wales, although Victoria has the southern bank of the river.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
The bulk of the water comes from Victoria.

Mr. BARTON:
The Constitution Act of New South Wales gives New South Wales the bed of the river.

Mr. DEAKIN:
We arrived at a draft treaty over that.

Mr. LYNE:
I am only putting forward this case from what I know, and I know that technically the rights belong to New South Wales. How they are to be enforced is another matter. I have tried to put before the Convention my ideas as to the railways, and I think if we are to have Federation at the present time, we must have it without bringing the railways into the question at all. I am satisfied that if the railways are included in the Convention Bill, there is not much prospect of obtaining the sanction of the people of New South Wales, to whom it has to be referred. I do not know what the feeling is in Victoria; but I suppose it is much the same as in New South Wales. Now I come to the question of finance, and, like the gentlemen who have preceded me, I do not intend to deal with it minutely. I do not think it is possible at this stage for any representative to deal with the question of finance in a manner in which it will have to be dealt with by the Convention in committee later on. In those able articles to which I before referred, Mr. Nash deals in an exhaustive manner with this question of finance, and he shows most conclusively, I think, on the present basis, what the troubles will be, and how much each colony will have to give away. I entirely differ from Mr. Holder in his conclusion that the revenue should be collected by the States, and handed over to the Federal Government. If we are to have a Federal Government let it be a strong one, and how can it exist if any particular State refuses to collect its revenue? You would place it in a secondary position instead of making it a superior power. I certainly advocate that we should give every power that we possibly can to the Federal Government, and that we should hand over the collection of the Customs and the regulation of the tariff to it. I am somewhat doubtful whether the collection of the excise duties should also be handed over, as the conditions in the various colonies are different; but at this moment I will not debate that matter. We will take the Customs in the first instance, and Customs only. I am not like my friend Mr. Wise, who introduced his little fad regarding the non-alienation of the land. That matter should not be left in the hands of the Federal Parliament. Mr. Wise proposed to give the Federal Parliament a large territory to try its hand upon, to experiment on. While I do not propose anything of that kind, let the Federal Government have its capital, and its capital only, with the country around it, if necessary; but not anything like the representative of New South Wales, Mr. Wise, proposed, by giving it Port Darwin and the north-west of South Australia. Against the expression of Mr. Wise, the British idea is in favor of the alienation of land, and a landholder in any British community will not be satisfied unless he has the alienation of his estate, though it may be small. However, that is beside the question. I propose to give to the Federal Government the power to regulate and collect Customs duties, and return to each of the States the balance not needed for carrying out federal purposes. That places in the hands of the Federal Government a superior power to the power that it would have if it allowed each colony to collect the Customs and hand over at will whatever amount they desired. I shall not go into details, as it is unnecessary, and would take too long; but I would give to the Federal Parliament the power to collect the Customs duties, and hand over the balance to the States in the simplest manner possible. I would like to say one word before resuming my seat in reference to the proposed capital of federated Australia. Of course, every representative, I suppose, would like to see the capital in his own colony.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
   No.
Mr. LYNE:
   I am glad to hear that Tasmania would not. We have gained one thing.
Mr. REID:
   They are lying low.
Mr. LYNE:
   For my part I think it can be conceived for a variety of reasons why the capital should be in the mother-colony. I am quite prepared-
Mr. GORDON:
   Which is the mother-colony?
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
   Tasmania.
Mr. REID:
   Cook would not stop to look at it.
Mr. LYNE:
   New South Wales is the mother-colony. This is a subject, I think, that should be decided by the Convention. Let us act with our eyes open. We do not want to be left to the tender mercies of the smaller States in reference to the capital. I do not want to say much about it, but I am justified in giving that opinion, and argument will show that it should be in the mother-colony. The Convention might decide in what territory the capital should be placed, and the exact position be left to the Federal Parliament. I think a compromise of that kind could be effected. I do think in framing the Constitution, in the first place, it should guard the rights that will be included in it, that it should be able to expand sufficiently in the future, by usage, to allow every stranger to come in, and not be so hampered, so dwarfed, that we will have any dissension or trouble, such as has taken place elsewhere. Unless we can adopt a system, such as I think we are trying to do at the present time, based mainly upon the Constitution of which we know something—the British Constitution—we may perhaps be groping in the dark. If we can do, as I hope we shall, take the Constitution of Great Britain and graft on that Constitution something that will suit the Australian Colonies—perhaps a little more democratic—I think we will be able to do our great work in the way it is desired to be done; if we can engrat, as I have no hesitation in thinking we can, upon it some of the results of experience gained in the United States, it will give satisfaction to the greater portion, if not to the whole, of the Australian Colonies. I do not fear the ideas that have fallen from Sir Richard Baker in this matter. I do not think any British community will take up a Constitution that does not provide for a Cabinet elected in somewhat the same way as unwritten British Constitution provides. I put upon one side altogether the ideas he advanced—that he would revert to the system adopted in Switzerland. Switzerland is a small State, and it may satisfy people there to have the Constitution as it is; but I do not think it would suit Australia. We must have

Mr. ISAACS:

At the outset of my observations, I desire to express, what I am sure we all feel, the deep sense of obligation to my hon. friend Mr. Barton, for his ready compliance with the invitation to provide a convenient basis as a starting point for our deliberations. His ardent and unwearied devotion to the Federal cause removed all doubts as to his willingness to accede to that request; his abilities and experience entirely warranted the anticipation that his efforts would be successful. For my own part, I confess that when first I heard these resolutions read I entertained a strong feeling, even now not wholly removed, as to whether they possessed that definiteness and particularity which, without descending unnecessarily into detail, appeared requisite for enabling us at the earliest possible moment to arrive at a distinct and authoritative—though not necessarily final—expression of our mutual opinion upon the various questions that will engage our attention. The excellent example set by my hon. colleague, Sir George Turner, and generally pursued so far, and which I hope will be continued to be followed, has to a large extent removed the doubts I felt. The admirable manner and conciliatory tone adopted by Mr. Barton, representative of New South Wales, has also to a large extent disarmed the criticism to which the mere form of the resolutions would, under ordinary circumstances, have inevitably exposed them. There is only one thing more, perhaps, he could have added to the weight of obligation he has placed us under, and that was by expressing in the beginning, as fully as he desired others to do, his own convictions on the various subjects under consideration, so as to enable us to obtain the benefit of his matured thought and convictions; so that we should have had not only a starting point provided by him, but also some indication of his own views. However, we have started on our course, and it is our duty to make the best of the position. We undoubtedly will find difficulties in the way, and I cordially indorse the views so generally expressed by the representatives of the Convention that compromise must play a very prominent part in our transactions, if we hope to attain success. Our mission is to succeed, if by any possibility success is compatible with honor. Failure on our part to arrive at some definite solution will almost assuredly be construed as synonymous with incapacity. The difficulties we are sure to encounter will, I trust, be met in such a manner as to justify the observation that they exist only to be surmounted; and my chief regret in the present instance is that, owing to the vagueness of the resolutions before us, we are not able instantly to come face to face with the problems that await us, and without a moment's loss of time to grapple with the obstacles of more or less serious importance that sooner or later must challenge our advance. I hope that this debate will produce an agreement founded upon honest conviction. So far as that is not possible, concessions must pave the way to concord; but in this connection I shall be perfectly frank. I wish to say, what a majority of the Convention must feel in their hearts, that there are bounds even to compromise. There are limits which no honest man, representing the people behind him, dares to pass. There is all the difference in the world between compromise and surrender.

Mr. PEACOCK:
   Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS:
   If that observation is doubted, I would like to ask the man that doubts it, if he is a Tasmanian, whether he is prepared to yield on the question of equal representation in the Senate?

Mr. HENRY:
   If the verdict is against us.

Mr. DOBSON:
   We must bow to the majority in this Convention.

Mr. BARTON:
   Why not outside?

Mr. ISAACS:
If he is a South Australian, is he prepared to disfranchise the women of his colony; if he is a New South Welshman, is he prepared to give way on the question of proportional representation in the people's House; if he is a Victorian is he willing to allow a property qualification for the electors? Now this establishes, I think, beyond any possibility of doubt, the position we must take up; that while we are prepared to admit the necessity—not only the advisability, but the necessity of compromise—for that is very evident from the diverse opinions which have been expressed all round the Chamber, there are limits which cannot be passed. There is a line up to which concession may become at any moment a sacred duty, but to pass that line would be treason; and therefore, when we are asked solemnly and gravely to abandon the principle of responsible government, when we are invited to surrender the latest-born, but, as I think, the noblest child of our constitutional system—a system which has not only nurtured and preserved, but has strengthened the liberties of our people—then, I feel in my heart that we are asked to reverse a century of development; that we are asked to deny an absolute and fundamental principle of our political existence—that we are asked, in short, to do what not only is inexpedient but utterly impossible. To stand here, sent as we are by the people of these colonies, and to forget the struggles and the triumphs which have made our constitutional system what it is—at once the pride and the hope of millions of our fellow subjects in various parts of the Empire, and the admiration, nay, the envy of other nations, both unitary and federal, who have striven in vain to imitate its excellencies—would be to earn for ourselves—I say it with all respect—and to justly earn, the contempt and the execration of those whose trust we bear to this Convention.

Mr. GORDON:

Oh!

Mr. ISAACS:

I am sorry there is any man sitting here who can think so lightly on so important a subject. I feel we have no more right to concede that than any man has to concede his honor; and it is not within the limits of our mandate to go back on our course of development. We are here to increase the powers of self-government, not to take part in a race of retrogression. I have no doubt that expression of dissent was prompted by a full consciousness of the result of responsible government, namely, the corollary that we must have one House supreme. To that I shall presently direct your attention. But I would like to ask, if we are not to have responsible government what is to be the alternative? We are told that the Swiss E Executive. It is another way of having irresponsible government; and I do not know where it would begin or where it would end. We would be creating for ourselves, contrary to the whole course of English Government, masters-masters of the people-who would be none the less our masters because upon occasions we had the privilege of choosing them. Therefore I take it as an incontrovertible axiom that responsible government is to be the keystone of this federal arch, and if it is so we have advanced a long way in the solution of the difficulties which confront us. We are then prepared for the very first position upon which to frame our Constitution: and here I may be permitted to say one or two words. Many of the opinions which have fallen from my hon. friends in this Chamber have seemed to me to be rather directed to the ordinary circumstances of legislation-an indication of ideas upon measures that might be suited to the transient requirements of the country, and would require to be changed from time to time with the altered conditions of our political existence. And if we bear in mind, as I think we shall in the end, that it is after all a Constitution we have come to frame, a covenant of brotherhood, something constant, the embodiment of permanent political principles under which this nation can live and grow, then I think we shall have a reliable standard by which to decide whether we shall include many of the questions raised here during the last few days. As to how that Constitution is to be framed depends to a very large extent upon the ideal which each man here forms of the nation Australia should be. I am not at this juncture going to dilate upon that, except so far as to say that certain observations which have fallen from some of the representatives have led me to the conclusion, and I regret to say it, that their hopes and aspirations are rather in the direction of a Confederacy than a Federation. That seems to me to be an error, and an error which was exposed a century ago, and from which we must free ourselves if we are to make any advance in the solution of the questions that here await us. I am aware that the principle I am endeavoring to lay down will lead some of those hon. gentlemen logically to the conclusion to which I am endeavoring to bring them; and if they are at all prepared to adopt Federation in the true sense, they must come to the same conclusions as those which we are endeavoring to reach. Now, Sir, I have heard also strong encomiums passed upon the preamble of this resolution, that it is to increase the self-government of the Australian people. I would like to impress upon those hon. gentlemen who have so eloquently drawn attention to those words that it is necessary to regard their various propositions by the light of this preliminary expression. I would like each of those hon. gentlemen to consider in every instance and say, "If I am loyal to the sentiment expressed in these opening words, let me test the proposal before the light. Is it or is it not an increase of self-government to abolish what is known as the Cabinet system. Is it or is it not an increase of self-government to adopt the referendum"? and so with every proposition made round the Chamber. I believe these words will afford an excellent touchstone to the propositions we have heard asserted and controverted. When we have arrived in our minds at a definite idea of what is to be the basis of the Constitution, we are in a position to measure the worth of the various proposals. The Governor-General has been referred to. Many of the questions which are of great importance here have been so lucidly and clearly dealt with by my colleague, Sir George Turner, that I do not intend to dwell upon them. I intend to direct attention to two or three of what I believe to be the more crucial points that will arise, and therefore, although I shall say nothing upon the other questions, I wish it to be understood that I coincide with the views so eloquently expressed by Sir George Turner. That we should have two Houses of Parliament is beyond the region of debate. With regard to the House of Representatives, it is equally certain that that should be on the basis of proportionate representation. There is no difficulty in regard to that Chamber. It is when we reach the question of the Senate that our trouble will begin. I was very much astonished, and I say it with all deference and most unfeigned respect, to hear it stated in one or two quarters that the Senate was not intended to be an Upper Chamber in the United States, What is the authority for that? You have only to read the debates of the Philadelphia Convention to Flee that it is not correct; you have only to read the works of Mr. Justice Story, Mr. Chancellor Kent, and other recognised American publicists to see that there is no justification for that statement. A moment's reflection upon our historical knowledge of how the United States Senate came into existence will show the fallacy of the contention that it was not intended to be an Upper House where measures would receive that second and calmer consideration generally attributed to an upper Chamber. I remember reading in a paper by a noted American historian a very short and homely anecdote, which demonstrated beyond the possibility of doubt what the intention in providing for the Senate was. When the Fathers of the American Constitution were discussing as to whether there should be a bi-cameral system or not, because there was a natural prejudice in some persons' minds with regard to the House of Lords, one of them asked another, "Why do you want a second Chamber at all?" And the reply was in a very homely fashion by way of a question, "What do you do with your tea when it is too hot?" "Oh," he said, "I pour it into the saucer." "Then," was the instant answer, "the Senate shall be the saucer of this Constitution."
Sir RICHARD BAKER:

Roger Sherman proposed the present Constitution as a compromise between the claims of the larger States and the smaller ones.

Mr. ISAACS:

He did, it is true, but that is not the complete truth. I shall show how that compromise was arrived at as briefly as I possibly can, and then I shall challenge any representative to say whether I am right or wrong in the contention that the original idea of the Senate was to be an Upper Chamber. The fact of equal representation was only arrived at at a later period, and it was by way of compromise. My hon. friend, Mr. Symon, yesterday, referred to what perhaps is the keynote of this contention. He pointed out how the position and powers of the President were regarded by the framers of the Constitution. He did not, however, carry his historical account quite far enough, because it relates to the Senate equally with the President. We all know that at the close of the War of Independence there were a number of States which had been under the rule of the British Empire, and when these States had achieved their independence they found themselves in a position of isolation from the rest of the world, and they formed what is known as the Confederation. In that Confederation there was not, as we understand it, a federal system in the United States—they had a weak form of Government. The States were predominant; the confederate bond was extremely unstable. A few years' experience demonstrated to them that a change was necessary, not only to their prosperity but also to their very existence. Their credit abroad was nothing; their power at home was almost a nullity; for internal government and outward communication they were weak in the extreme; and at last the genius of Hamilton and Bowdoin led to the Philadelphia Convention, This Convention was projected, and it met under circumstances that rendered it certainly irregular, and probably illegal, but its justification was its necessity and success. There was no doubt the Americans cherished in their hearts the traditions of the race from which they sprang—and they saw no danger in providing for the strong Federal Government, which was to supplant the weak confederacy, by adopting, so far as their circumstances would permit, the British Constitution as it was then known and understood. Of course they could not have an hereditary ruler. They knew, however, George III. was a personal ruler; that his Minister, Lord North, was a mere automaton; that the Ministry of that day could not, as the Ministry of the present day does, regard itself as dependent upon the goodwill of the people and not of the Sovereign; and, as was said in an extract quoted yesterday, the Cabinet system was either utterly unknown, or so immature as not to be recognisable. Therefore they provided a Constitution bearing as much resemblance to the Government of Great Britain as possible. It is true a Privy Council was suggested, also in analogy to the British Privy Council, and it was carefully considered and debated on several occasions. I refer to this additional circumstance to show how closely they tried to keep to the British Constitution; but this proposal was ultimately rejected. They decided upon the bicameral system, they resolved to have two Houses of Parliament; and Roger Sherman himself referred to the rights and privileges of the House of Lords as justifying his claims with regard to the Senate. They decided upon having a Senate and a House of Representatives before they decided what the representation should be. They had to elect the Senate; but they decided to get as close as possible to the House of Lords, making its existence perpetual. They would not appoint its members for life, as they intended to place the Chamber, to some extent, under the control of the people, and they therefore had a process of election with successive retirements. The question arose between the two parties of that Convention as to how the representation was to be based. They had in that Convention, as I hope we will not have here when we have threshed this matter out, two distinct parties, viewing the position from wholly inconsistent standpoints. They had the Nationalist party, and they had the Confederate party. The first aspired to form of the people of the United States with respect to their common affairs, one great undivided people, leaving to them as grouped in their various States the management of their own local affairs, but for common concerns to be and to continue one indissoluble nationality. On the other hand, the Confederate party, led by Randolph and Sherman, clung stoutly to their Confederate system. Jealous of their newly won liberty, they distrusted any control even of those by whose side they had won their independence, and were resolved to sell their reluctant adhesion to the new plan of Federation at the most costly price. The proposal on the one hand was to have both Houses based on proportional representation, and on the other to have both Houses resting upon equal representation of the States. After it was decided to establish two Houses, a resolution was submitted to the Convention that the representation in the Senate should be by equality of States. This was rejected by six votes to five. A resolution that the representation in the Senate should be proportionate to the population was next carried by six votes to five. Then the matter was referred to a committee, which brought up its report in accordance with the previous determination of the Convention. Again, an attempt was made by the Confederate party to have equal representation in the Senate, and on that vote the State of Georgia divided, and its vote did not count. The voting was thus even-five to five. The Convention had lasted some considerable time, and matters had reached a perilous condition; indeed a deadlock—for even then they had deadlocks—became so imminent that Franklin and Sherman proposed that the proceedings should each day be commenced with prayer, so that they might have the assistance of Divine Providence in their divided and opposing councils. Fearing, apparently, that this would create alarm amongst the people, it was abandoned, and a Select Committee was appointed from all the States to devise a compromise. Their report was brought up, and the question was again submitted to the Convention, and it was only because the State of Massachusetts divided that equal representation was carried by five votes to four. I think I have now made abundantly evident the important fact that the intention of the Convention was to have a Senate first, and that equal representation came afterwards. Sherman, who came from Connecticut, proposed this compromise. The Nationalist party endeavored to get both Houses established on the basis of proportionate representation the Confederates on the other hand desired both Chambers to be founded on equal representation. A middle course was agreed to after desperate contention, and thus what is known as the "Connecticut Compromise" was arrived at, much to the disgust of those who wished to begin the political career of the United States on the basis of a pure nationality. I emphasise that point, not merely as an historical fact—not merely for its own sake—but mainly for this purpose, that we must not have it in our minds that equal representation in the Senate was accepted as a correct principle. It was a compromise, and being accepted as a compromise, it should not be regarded as a principle upon which to rest further conclusions, and therefore it does not carry with it the corollary that the Senate should have equal power.

Mr. WISE:

If they had not carried equal representation in the Senate, would there have been one nationality in America to-day?

Mr. ISAACS:

I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that, though no one at this hour disputes they are one nationality, it has taken the decisive interpretation of a civil war, costing America not only limitless treasure and measureless suffering, but a million of the lives of her bravest and most patriotic citizens, to establish for ever the fundamental truth that the people are indeed a nation, and not a mere collection of States. But it is only since that fratricidal struggle and that decisive civil war we hear little, if anything, at all as to whether America is one nationality or not.
Doubtless many reforms in the direction of amendment

Mr. WISE:

The Confederate States did not introduce it in their Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS:

The Confederate States had to start the Constitution in hasty and peculiar circumstances, and the very basis of their existence and the foundation of their quarrel was the contention that the States were never more than a Confederacy, and could secede at will. We must also recollect the condition of the Confederacy Constitution at the present time. Now I recognise, as of course we all must, that the insistence by some of the States upon equal representation in the Senate is a fact that we have to reckon with, and I am prepared to concede that, because it is plainly inevitable. I will give in my adhesion to that because it would be waste of time to take any other course; and for another reason, I can sympathise strongly with what are called the smaller States in the fear that they might be placed at a disadvantage. I will give my reasons for saying so. I think the fears are groundless, but I hope I, will not be considered presumptuous when I say that it is not unreasonable for men to entertain that belief. With regard to the question of equal powers, if we once dispose of the idea that the original intention was to base this Senate upon equal representation, we have got rid of the fundamental principle upon which equal powers for the Senate are claimed. It was pointed out by what I may term the master minds of the Convention that there was no danger to the smaller States, because the State rights, considered as rights in a lawyer's sense, are undoubtedly guarded and preserved by the Constitution, and, as Mr. Wilson, of Pennsylvania, almost in the words of one of the representatives here, said, it is not the question of State rights that was so much at issue, as the question of State interests. I repeat it is not an unreasonable thing for men to believe that they may be overpowered by the weight of numbers. The first answer to that is that men do not vote according to the size of their States. Do you find all the people in one particular State voting one way? Not at all. What is there diverse in the interests of these various States? What is there that would lead New South Wales and Victoria to coalesce against any of the other States? How do the interests, industrial, political, or social, of what are called the larger States conflict with similar interests in other States? Why, Sir, artisans in one colony have interests identical with the artisans in another; merchants in one with the merchants of another; and woolgrowers in one with the woolgrowers of another; while the interests of the people are those of one people.
An HON. MEMBER:
What about the lawyers?

Mr. ISAACS:
Lawyers are always the same way. (Laughter.)

Mr. PEACOCK:
That is quite true. (Laughter.)

Mr. ISAACS:
Except for the time being, when they are urging their particular client's cause. I would like to ask any hon. member if he can give a conclusive and clear answer to this question. How is it probable, almost on the verge of possible, that there should be any combination of States, large or small, against others smaller or larger? I recognise that a fear of something unknown, something in the distance, something which is barely possible, might keep out of this Federation the smaller States, unless equal representation is agreed to. But still conceding this we have to ask ourselves this question: For what purpose will States get equal representation? To prevent their interests as distinguished from their rights being imperilled or defeated by larger States. They have that safeguard when they have equal representation, and if it were not for that circumstance-it is the only one that is urged - there could be no objection even to have proportional representation in the Senate. If that safeguard stands there to guard against that particular evil, what else is there to require protection against? It is only as a means of protection that the safeguard has worked well, and yet we have heard-illogically, it is true-advocates of that equal representation, who, having secured the admission of that safeguard, turn round and say, "We want something further as a means of active interference and in order to manage the business of the nation equally with the House of Representatives." In other words, they ask for a shield and they strive to obtain a sword. Not only is the fundamental axiom of their position nonexistent, but I think when the concession itself is considered in its effect and operation and is followed up, they are not quite consistent in asking for anything further. I would like to press this upon my Tasmanian friends. Do they consider that Tasmania, with a population of 166,000-

Mr. REID:
No. 166,500. (Laughter.)

Mr. ISAACS:
Tasmania has about one-eighth of the population of New South Wales, and its population would provide practically one-eighth of the money that New South Wales would provide for carrying on national concerns? Is it right, or fair, or just that, besides having a safeguard to protect its own peculiar interests which may arise at any time, it should ask for a power to deal with the revenues of the whole nation as great as would be granted to New South Wales?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

How can you draw a line?

Mr. ISAACS:

One cannot draw a line till the occasion arises. All legislation will affect them, but will only affect them equally, in the majority of cases, with the other people of this continent, and in that we should be guided by the population. But it is where their interests are peculiarly at stake that they are to have this equal representation always ready for use in order to peculiarly guard these interests, and they have to judge for themselves when the occasion arises if there is a necessity to do it. Are hon. members resolved in their minds whether the votes of senators shall betaken en bloc or per capita? Have they decided whether Tasmania shall vote one and New South Wales one?

Mr. HOLDER:

Vote per capita.

Mr. ISAACS:

What is the reason of that? Simply because they are there as a National House. They are the contribution of the nation from that particular State to deal per capita with every particular question that arises, and they have the power of voting together when they think the distinctive interests of the State as a whole are imperilled. Then they can vote en bloc if they choose, but on ordinary occasions we may find three Tasmanian representatives voting one way and three another.

Mr. HIGGINS:

As a National House they ought to have equal representation.

Mr. ISAACS:

I would like to point out, before I leave the question of the American Constitution, that it bears on the face of it not only a provision to vote per capita, as indicating that it was not to be intended purely as a House of States, but that there is also provision made that the House of Representatives alone should initiate Money Bills—or rather Bills to raise revenue. Why was that provision put in? Why was that principle conceded if the Senate was to have the same power as the National House? It is plain that the main idea was to have the bi-cameral system, and to have that system, by analogy, as closely as possible to the British Constitution; and that, merely in order to guard the interests of the smaller States, a provision for extraordinary emergencies was placed in it, namely, that of equal representation. And then, because those States unpatriotically would not come into the Federation on any other basis, the Nationalist party was forced to give way, and to yield to the Connecticut Compromise. And, if we turn to the debates, what do we find was Roger Sherman's opinions about representation at that time? His ground was that the people should have as little to do with the Government as possible. Those were the opinions held a century ago by a series of States which recognised the lawfulness of property in their fellow man—which had not advanced as we have advanced—and can we be astounded if their conclusions were not such as we, at this latter-day stage of political development, ought to arrive at? If we turn to those who have had experience in the working of these institutions, if we turn to men like Mr. Bourinot, who, I suppose, has taken as deep an interest in the working of Federal institutions as any man alive—a man who, in Canada, has a peculiar insight into Federation matters, and lives on the borders of the great Federal Republic. He tells us—

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Canada has no Federation.

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not understand that statement that Canada has no Federation. It has been recognised by nearly every writer on the subject that Canada is a distinct and real Federation. It is a Federation on the centralising principle.

Dr. COCKBURN:
It is foreign to the idea of Federation.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is a Federation upon the centralisation principle, just as the United States is a Federation on the decentralisation principle, the principle I hope we shall follow. On the other hand, if we read the pages of Bourinot we find out distinctly that the want of the Cabinet system as a responsible government is one of the disadvantages of the United States. Professor Sidgwick also tells us that, in his opinion, a co-ordinate Second Chamber is an alien element in Parliamentary Government when fully developed.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS:
There can be no doubt that the principle of equal powers of the Houses of Legislature is foreign to the principle of responsible government.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS:
We cannot have the two. In that respect I cordially agree with my hon. friend Sir Richard Baker; but if we are called upon to elect between the two, whether we are to have responsible government on the one hand or Federation on the other, I say distinctly that, having regard to our history, our traditions, and our expectant future, there is no room left for hesitancy. I have dealt with that matter rapidly, quite as rapidly as the importance of the subject demands; and I pass on to the question of the power of the Senate in regard to Money Bills. I wish also on this point, because it is extremely instructive, to refer to the debates of the Philadelphian Convention. When it was determined that the Senate should have an existence and equal representation, the question was considered as to its power to originate and amend Money Bills. It was at first resolved in the open Convention that Money Bills should originate in the first branch of the Legislature, but should not be altered or amended in the second House. The Committee of Detail returned that clause, dealing with it in the manner so determined. Then again arose a struggle between the Nationalist and Confederate parties, and, as the result, there was again a compromise. The Confederate party wanted the same powers given to the Senate, both in regard to rejection and amendment, as were possessed by the House of Representatives. The Nationalist party fought stoutly for the same position as existed between the House of Commons and the Lords in England. Once more there was a compromise, and we see that compromise take the form now insisted on as a principle. The provision was that the Senate was not to originate Money Bills, but they might alter or amend them. Because we find that men placed in their peculiar circumstances, without the enlightenment we have from the growth of our Constitution, accept a compromise, is that a reason why we should accept that compromise now? Is it a reason why we here should condemn the validity of a principle that might by the single vote of a single State have been decided the other way? I think not. The more we look into the matter, and the more we see how the Constitution was framed, the less validity must we be disposed to attach to what was a mere compromise and not a principle. Mr. Symon also referred to the question of election of the Senate. I have not heard much about that at this Convention, and I have not been able to gather the sense of the House as to whether we are prepared to have the election by the people. I believe we are. I believe there will be little or no controversy on that point, but to those who, like Mr. Symon, are in doubt. I would like to say, and to say it to every member of this Convention, that the most instructive and most convincing reading on the matter is a paper published by Senator Mitchell in the Forum of June, 1896. I think so much of that paper that I consider it is quite worthy of being put into print and circulated among members of the Convention. It is written with great power and knowledge.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

What paper?

Mr. ISAACS:

The Forum.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

What date?

Mr. ISAACS:

June, 1896, volume 21. I have the book in Adelaide, and will bring it down to-morrow and hand it to any representative who desires to read it. It is a paper that teems with instruction. It is I believe the latest possible information on the point. It is three years later than Bryce, and has the advantage of showing how far the later United States legislation on the subject has operated. The writer shows that the history of recent years discloses conclusively the bad working of the system of election by State Legislatures. He shows that State Legislatures have frequently failed after numerous struggles, and very turbulent ones, to elect at all. He shows that a few years ago, the Legislature of New York was engaged for the greater part of a session in endeavoring to elect its Senator for the Federal Senate; that, in 1882, the State of Oregon was the whole Session, and at last arrived at a decision; that, in 1893, three States-Washington, Wyoming, Montana-were engaged the whole Session, and failed to elect. There was a new Act passed in 1866 to have uniformity of elections, but this was not in practice found to be sufficient, and another Act had to be passed; but even that did not sufficiently meet the difficulty. In 1895, from January to May, Delaware, after turbulent attempts, did elect a senator, but so irregularly that the United States Senate had a petition presented to it asserting the invalidity of the choice; and, at the time of this senator's writing, the election was disputed on the ground of invalidity. In Kentucky they spent a whole session in a vain endeavor to elect; and three States, Washington, Montana, and Wyoming, were for nearly two years without a representative, owing to the failure to elect. This, as pointed out, cannot arise in a popular election at all; but beyond that there are other reasons why the people of the United States consider there should be a change. First of all there is utter disorganization in the elections of State Legislatures. Candidates are asked when standing for the State Legislature who they will vote for as federal senator; and, as pointed out so graphically in that article, men are elected, not because of their knowledge of State requirements, or because of their skill in finance or other matters on Federation; but, because of their soundness or otherwise, on the question of the Senatorship for the Federal Senate and-

Mr. DOBSON:

They are elected by the people according to that.

Mr. ISAACS:

The hon. representative must know the system of wire-pulling there is in America.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS:

Their system of election is totally different to ours. We have no system of "bosses," as they have there; but it would divert me from my course to go into that. There is a change and an important change proposed, and I propose to read shortly—because I know it is an anxious matter to the Convention—a few words with which Mr. Mitchell's article concludes. He says:

The Legislature of no less than ten States, including those of Indiana, Wisconsin, and Ohio, have recently memorialised Congress for the change. The emphasis given to this popular sentiment in various ways is having effect in Congress. The first proposed amendment touching this subject was submitted to the United States Senate by the writer of this article at the first session of the Fiftieth Congress of the Senate in December, 1887, no action being taken. It was again introduced by him in the Fifty-first Congress, and the first speech in support of this proposed change ever delivered in either branch of Congress was by the writer of this article in the Senate, April 22, 1890. In the House of Representatives at the first session of the Fifty-second Congress, no less than seventeen different resolutions were presented upon this subject, and at that Session, January 16, 1893, one of those resolutions proposing an amendment to the Constitution passed the House of Representatives by more than a two-thirds vote; while in the Fifty-third Congress three similar amendments were presented in the Senate, and twelve in the House, by as many different members, and on July 21, 1894, one of these passed the House, the votes being—Yea 141, Nays 60. At the present Session of the Senate, after full discussion, the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections reported favorably, as a joint resolution proposing this amendment to the Constitution, and it is now pending on the Senate Calendar.

An HON. MEMBER:

Mr. O'Connor has an amendment proposing selection by the whole State by popular election.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It must be by the whole State, it cannot be by half a State.

Mr. ISAACS:
The feeling in favor of the election of the Senate on a popular basis is fast gaining ground in America.

Mr. LYNE:
According to what you say it is practically an elective assembly now.

Mr. ISAACS:
Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. LYNE:
I think it is.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is an assembly elected by what we would know as rings.

Mr. LYNE:
Will not that apply under any system?

Mr. ISAACS:
At all events let us make it directly and actually an election by the people.

Mr. CLARKE:
Or by the newspapers.

Mr. ISAACS:
The question of the franchise I shall only briefly refer to, because my hon. colleague, Sir George Turner, has devoted considerable attention to it. I would only like to say, as to the expression of satisfaction of the Hon. Mr. Holder, that a compromise may be arrived at in this way:

That the Federal Parliament shall have power to prescribe a uniform franchise subject to this qualification: that any person having the right to vote at present for the State Legislature shall not be deprived of the right with regard to the Federal Parliament.

That was proposed by Sir George Turner in the first instance.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Would you allow plural voting?

Mr. ISAACS:
No; I want to absolutely and distinctly say I am against plural voting.

Mr. WISE:
Logically you have to admit it.

Mr. ISAACS:
Certainly not. We are willing to give a voice to every person who now has a voice, but we do not see why that person should speak twice; and on this subject I would point out to those representatives who have said that by depriving the women of South Australia of their right to vote in this matter you are not taking away any right from them, that their argument is not accurate. Amongst the many subjects with regard to which the women in South Australia have the right to exercise the franchise is one that touches them as nearly as it does the male portion of the community. Why have not women an equal interest in laws of marriage and divorce as men? These are two of the matters, I apprehend, that will be transferred to the Federal Parliament. Shall the women of South Australia be told that these subjects are to be taken from their cognizance? I venture to think that no delegate for South Australia would consider it for a moment. We must, no doubt, compromise on the subject of uniformity, and we must not stand too closely on the logic of the matter. The question of deadlocks has been referred to, and we have been asked if there is any necessity to provide a remedy for them. It is admitted by those who ask this question, that deadlocks are possible. We know that they have occurred, and we know further that they are disastrous, and I do think that there should be some means of putting an end to a strike in the legislature. After all, we must have a safety-valve, and we are not going to provide all this elaborate machinery without a safety-valve; and if our view is correct, that the Legislature, whatever dignity and power it possesses, gets it by the goodwill of the people, we must recognise that the people are superior to the Legislature, and that their convenience and rights must be first consulted. I do not consider for a moment the argument that it will compromise the dignity of Parliament. Parliament has no dignity except such as it receives from its masters. The Houses of Parliament are merely the agents of the people; and I can conceive no businesslike objection to a principal, when he hands over his business to two agents to transact and they cannot agree upon any subject, stepping in and settling it for them. In our own affairs I think none of us would take exception to such a course.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

The principal represents the same clients.

Mr. ISAACS:

I am asking that the people should be allowed to settle their own affairs which their agents cannot settle.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

When they attempt to override one branch of the Legislature?

Mr. ISAACS:

Neither one branch nor two branches together have any rights against those of the people; and it is the business of the people to see that its business is transacted in Parliament, and if that business cannot be transacted by the two organs to which it has been entrusted, is their business to come to a standstill?

Mr. BARTON:
Would you appeal to the people of the Commonwealth or to the States?

Mr. ISAACS:
There would be an appeal in this way. May I for an instant go back to the present system? What is the final remedy for a collision? You have a dissolution. You have all the expense, turmoil, and trouble of an election by the people, and the people are supposed theoretically to decide the question at issue. We know that they do not, in many instances. We know that elections are often won and lost upon purely personal grounds. We know they are frequently won and lost on by-issues, but when the representatives come back to Parliament the theory is that the people have decided the question. I want to make the theory conform to the practice. If we must have the trouble of an election, let it be done in a way that will least disorganise the business of Parliament, and secure the necessary answer. If we must have an election, whether it be by a dissolution of one or both Houses, then I say the election should be taken simultaneously throughout Australia, and Victoria shall decide for itself "Aye" or "No"; New South Wales shall decide for itself "Aye" or "No"; South Australia and each of the other colonies shall decide for itself "Aye" or "No"; and if you find, in the case of a proposed law, that a majority of the States, large or small, are in favor of it, you have then the answer of the States in the affirmative; and then you must ask the further question, "Do these States so composing the majority contain also the majority of the people of Australia"? If they do not, there is an end of the question, because you must have two things coincident; but if you have a majority of the States and the majority of the people, there is no reason why the law should not pass.

Mr. BARTON:
If it does not come to that, what is the result?

Mr. ISAACS:
The law does not pass.

Mr. WISE:
What would you propose if there was a numerical majority only in one State, the other States being so divided that the majority was given only by the one State?

Mr. ISAACS:
Does the hon. representative mean that there was an absolute tie in the other States?

Mr. WISE:
I mean that the majority in one colony was for it, and in the other colonies against it.

Mr. ISAACS:

In such a case it would not pass, because you have not a majority of the States. It is exactly the same protection for the large and small States by way of referendum as they have in the Legislature.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Does that not already exist in the case of Appropriation Bills?

Mr. ISAACS:

I do not mean to put it that in the case of every dispute between the two Houses it is necessary to go to the people. It is not to be an automatic and compulsory referendum of all questions under all circumstances. If the two Houses come to the conclusion that it is a matter that can wait, let it wait; but if it is so urgent that there must be some decision one way or the other, then there must be a resolution to refer it to the people; but it is not given as a matter of course upon every difference between the two Houses. It is only a safety-valve instead of the present absurd practice of saying to the popular Chamber, as in a colony is said to the Legislative Assembly, "No matter whether you are right or wrong, no matter whose fault it is, no matter what your opinions of the merits may be, you have either to submit to the other Chamber, and subordinate what you believe to be the people's will, or penalise yourself by an election."

The election too, not infrequently takes place upon totally different grounds from these and even when you come back and present to the other Chamber the verdict of the people, even then it may be disputed, and there still is no necessary settlement. Therefore, we say that although this process which we propose, subject to modification, of course, is only in the crudest possible state, it is sound in principle and ought to be adopted. I would like to say a word to those who think that we should not go to Switzerland for a Constitution. I would like the hon. member Mr. Barton to consider again—for I am sure he is familiar with all the literature on the subject—that fascinating book by Freeman upon the growth of the English Constitution. The author commences with his journey to Switzerland, gives graphic pictures of the legislation there, and compares it with other legislation. I have not got the book with me, but the meaning which, as I remember, he endeavors to convey is, that, in order to describe the development of the English Constitution, he has to go back to the institutions of the old Teutonic tribes and still surviving in Switzerland. He goes on to show its that the direct and personal process of legislation by the people is there still in work, and proves that it was the original Teutonic mode of legislation, and that the representative system of procedure in the nationality to which he has the honor to belong was brought into it at a later stage, and was the result of a gradual and prolonged struggle of the people against feudalism for the right of self-government. We, therefore, go to no foreign country for the fundamental basis of the procedure we suggest, but to the ancient traditions of the race. We are gradually taking away the crust that lies over the original germ of self-government, and we are coming back to original principles.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Hear, hear.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Not shared by all the nationalities.

Mr. ISAACS:
This principle is fast becoming the practice throughout many of the American States. With regard to the amendment of the Constitution, I desire to say that no more difficult problem can present itself to the framers of a Constitution than to make provision for its own amendment. I think it is imperative on us to recognise that we must make some provision for changing circumstances and altered conditions, so as to provide the means of meeting the new requirements of our nation while guarding against undue precipitancy, and at the same time without imperilling or endangering the necessary local autonomy of the States upon the basis of which they enter into the federation. A question has been suggested which bears directly on this matter. If we are to take our minds back to the framing of the American Constitution, and ask ourselves what were the relative positions of the American and British Constitutions at the time of the framing of the American Constitution, we should derive a most instructive lesson. We know that the famous fifth article of the American Constitution was supposed to have solved the problem. We know how it has failed, and how, at the most critical hour in the history of the Great Republic, it failed to respond to the Nation's call made upon it, and resulted in that terrible interpretation with which we are all familiar. Only a few years afterwards-about 1794-there were some famous trials, which hon. members of my own profession will remember. They took place in Scotland, where Thomas Muir and others were tried, convicted, and transported for sedition. What was the sedition? Their crime was one of which, I venture to say, at this day many of the members of this Convention are guilty. Muir's terrible offence was the advocacy of short Parliaments and universal suffrage. Three learned Judges tried the case, and the presiding Judge declared in effect that the British Constitution was the most perfect thing in existence, that it was idle to talk about universal suffrage, that landed interests alone had to be considered, and that no person out of Parliament had any right to demand alteration.

[P.181] starts here

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
That is 100 years ago.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is 100 years ago; and we are asked to go back to what was done 100 years ago to frame this Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:
Not at all. Who has pretended that?

Mr. ISAACS:
Some arguments we have heard amount to that. Such was a judicial interpretation of the British Constitution. What is the state of things now-a-days? We know that, in 1832, while the American Constitution, from its rigidity—and rigidity is necessary to a certain extent—was incapable of amendment without enormous, almost insuperable, difficulty, that the British Constitution was, in 1832, without internecine war, practically revolutionised. By the Reform Bill of that year the political centre of gravity was altered, and by that, and the consequential advance in 1867 and 1884, the Government of the Empire has been transferred from a few thousands to many millions of the people. There has been an alteration which would be utterly impossible in the American Constitution; for Dr. Burgess tells us that, according to the census taken in 1880, three millions of the Americans could, under the powers given in the Constitution, have successfully resisted and defied the declared will of forty-five millions of their fellow citizens; and surely that is intolerable, and a mistake we must not follow here. Therefore I cannot follow the provisions of the Commonwealth Bill in this respect, because if hon. representatives look at the provisions of the Commonwealth Bill they will find that the people have no power whatever to change the Constitution unless there is a two-thirds majority in the Senate willing to accede to it. All the people could do under that scheme would be to veto any amendment agreed to by the Senate and the House of Representatives. Therefore there must be some safety-valve, some way of getting over the heads of the representatives, who are only the servants of the people.

Mr. GLYNN:
They have the popular Convention method as an alternative in America, and do not use it.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is so cumbersome that they cannot use it. Under the provisions of their Constitution they need majorities in such a way, and under such circumstances, that practically the power is useless. Dr. Burgess points out that with tremendous effect. He reminds us that there has been no great amendment, although it was eminently desired, except under the extreme pressure of the civil war. We know that the real amendments—the only amendments strengthening the Constitution, extending the liberties of the people, and recognising their rights—were made at the close of the civil war, when Northern troops were in the Southern States. That is not an example to follow here. In Committee I will refer members to the most eminent publicists who have deplored the rigidity of the American provisions in regard to amendments. It is well known and admitted in America that those provisions are not sufficient. It was recognised by Chief Justice Marshall, of the United States; and in Committee I shall have much pleasure in referring members to the eminent authorities to whom I allude. I do not propose to detain the Convention at any greater length. I have referred to just a few matters which seem to me most urgently demanding our attention. I wish to repeat the remark that, in other respects, I adhere to the views expressed by my hon. leader. I should be guilty of idle affectation if I ventured for an instant to disguise or conceal the deep sense of responsibility that I feel in common with other members of this Convention. We hold in our grasp for good or for ill the gathered aspirations of the whole of our fellow citizens. We stand here clothed, in the presence of these momentous questions, with the highest and most perfect trust ever conferred upon Australians. It is not in our exclusive competency to carry those aspirations to their fruition, but it is—if we are not wise—within our power to delay, or perhaps utterly defeat them. Therefore we should remember to bring to this great work that sentiment of justice which pervades the whole community, that determination which is characteristic of our nation, and, above all, to temper our keenest efforts with the sweet spirit of moderation. I have no fear of failure. I believe that if we enter upon this work in the spirit which undoubtedly animates those whose dearest hopes we are here to represent, we shall soon see the union of Australia an accomplished fact, and that we shall be able to carry this transcendent question from the region of effort and attempt to the realm of achievement. I hope most fervently that this may be the result; that when the portals of the twentieth century, upon whose threshold we now stand, shall open, they shall receive a nation of united purpose and unsevered will, reverent of the past, resolute for the future, strong in our fealty to the splendid Empire of which we form a part, and of unswerving fidelity to those imperishable principles of democracy through which alone we may learn and practise the noblest lessons of
Dr. QUICK:

I feel that I shall speak at considerable disadvantage in following the very brilliant oration which has been delivered by my hon. and learned friend, Mr. Isaacs. Indeed, I cannot but confess that I rise with feelings of considerable embarrassment, if not awe, at the magnitude of the work of addressing a gathering of this importance. I shall not in any way endeavor to emulate, much less excel, the luminous addresses which have been delivered. In fact, I think that some of the addresses which have been delivered up to the present have largely, if not altogether, exhausted most of the matter which is reasonably debatable. At the same time I think a large amount of what has been said has been purely of an academical rather than of a practical character. Before I make my few remarks, which I hope will consist of practical observations and criticism, I desire to express my acknowledgments to the Hon. Sir Joseph Abbott, of New South Wales, for his kindly references to my services in the direction of promoting Australian Federation. I do so merely for the purpose of drawing attention rather to the very great and noble efforts-Herculean efforts, I may say-of Mr. G. H. Reid, the Premier of New South Wales, because, but for his efforts, I am quite sure that this Convention would never have been called together.

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear.

Dr. QUICK:

And he was loyally and ably supported by Sir George Turner, the Premier of Victoria; by Sir Edward Braddon, Premier of Tasmania; by Mr. Kingston, Premier of South Australia; and by Sir John Forrest, Premier of Western Australia. I feel that at this stage of our debate attention ought to be drawn to the advance of time and the value of time. Therefore, in my remarks, I shall not endeavor to say anything more than draw attention to a few of the essentials of Federation and express my views thereon. In the first place we have to consider what our work is, and what are some of the conditions of the success of that work. Our work, of course, is to draft a Constitution; and one of the first conditions of the success of our work is not that it must be ideally perfect, but that it must be a practicable and workable scheme. The second is that it must be a scheme of Federal Government which will square with the existing conditions of Australia at the present time; that it must be capable of growth and expansion, yielding to the altering circumstances of Australian life in the future; and lastly, and above all, that it must be a scheme that will be not merely acceptable to us as delegates, but acceptable to the whole of the people of humanity.
Australia. I think it would be taking a very limited and circumscribed as well as the smaller colonies to come into the Federation. He must not be of the impression that the larger colonies will come into the Federation, or join Federation, at any price. Not at all. But at the same time I am of this opinion, that while we, as representatives of the large colonies, ought not to ask the representatives of the smaller colonies to accept a Constitution which would be repugnant to the views and interests of their constituents, that they also in their turn ought to consider our position in reference to our constituents, and not ask us to accept a Constitution which would be repugnant to their instincts, and which would be bound to be rejected by the referendum. Therefore, I think that anything in the nature of a compromise must take into consideration the interests of all colonies, and not merely the interests of one set of colonies. It may be, that in considering hereafter the possible lines of a compromise or settlement which may be possible to be arrived at or agreed to, some colonies may lay greater stress upon some subjects than other colonies. For instance, speaking for Victoria, at least so far as I am able to gauge the public opinion of that colony, I believe that there the most critical and most vital question of all to be determined is the question of the franchise upon which the Federal Parliament is to be elected, and that unless a franchise of a liberal and democratic character is made the basis upon which the Federal Parliament is to be elected, there will be a considerable danger of our work here, however symmetrical and theoretically perfect it may be, resulting in failure. I say to my hon. friends representing the smaller colonies that I, for one, lay the very greatest stress upon this question of the franchise; and not merely the franchise of one House, but the franchise for the election to both Houses. I do not know whether I shall be on the Constitutional Committee or not, but I venture to suggest to the Constitutional Committee that before they proceed to consider the question of the powers and functions of the Senate they must, as an initial stage, determine what shall be the mode of its constitution and creation; because, according to the liberality of the franchise upon which it is created, according to the mode in which it is created, whether it is responsible to the people as a whole, more or less will rest the solution of what powers may be conferred upon that body.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

Dr. QUICK:
I have been considering, during the progress of this debate, what are some of the essentials of Federation which have been referred to and discussed up to the present. I do not propose to discuss, in my few remarks, any of the details of Federation; but I simply propose to refer to some of the essentials of Federation, and dividing those essentials, roughly speaking, into two kinds, so far as they have been disclosed during this debate, I find there are a large number of essentials of Federation which have been practically agreed to, and, therefore, they need not be discussed at any length whatever. There are, on the other hand, a number of the essentials of Federation about which a difference of opinion has arisen. Now, at the outset, I will enumerate what it seems to me at present have been almost, if not quite, unanimously agreed to:

Firstly—There should be a Federal Parliament, consisting of two Chambers.
Secondly—There should be a National Chamber representing the people.
Thirdly—There should be a States Council representing the States.

I had in the word "equally," but it appears that there are two members of this Convention who have dissented from the principle of equal representation of the States in the Senate.

Mr. HIGGINS:

There are more than two.

Dr. QUICK:

Two have spoken—Mr. Higgins, who spoke yesterday, and Mr. Lyne, the leader of the Opposition in New South Wales, who spoke to-day. I may remind my friends from the minor colonies that, although there have been only two Speakers in this Convention whom I have heard dissent from the principle of equal representation of the States in the Senate, there are at the same time a number of our constituents who have dissented from it, and I know, for my own part, I have had considerable difficulty in enforcing that principle, and in explaining it to the satisfaction of some of my constituents. I support the principle of equal representation of the States in the Senate undoubtedly and loyally, and yet I believe it is really a waste of time to discuss Federation unless as an initial step we concede that principle. But I remind my friends from the minor colonies that it is by no means conceded unanimously in some of the larger colonies. It will be our bounden duty, if it is inserted in the Constitution, to advocate and support it before our constituents, and I am prepared to do so, and will do so loyally.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Hear, hear.

Dr. QUICK:

Again I remind the smaller colonies that the principle is not unanimously conceded.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
   Hear, hear.

Dr. QUICK:
   And they will need all the support we can give them. I hope that they will remember this when it comes to their turn for helping us with reference to any fundamental principle on which we lay great stress. The fourth essential to Federation, which I think has been practically agreed to, is:

   That there must be a Federal Executive to give effect to the will of the people as expressed by the Federal Parliament.

   That may, of course, raise to some extent the question as to the form of the Executive; whether it should be an Executive dependent on the will of the Federal Parliament from day to day or from week to week, or whether it shall be an elective Executive, as suggested by Sir Richard Baker; because I would point out this, that even an Executive elected by the Federal Parliament would be one that would come within the essence of responsible government, namely, a government dependent on the will of the people as expressed in the Federal Parliament. At any rate it would not be a principle which would be repugnant to our notion of democratic government. I mention this to show that it is open to argument and to consideration-this question which has been raised by Sir Richard Baker. Of course I, for one, feel bound to support the principle of responsible government; but at the same time I came here to learn, and to consider propositions, proposals, and arguments as they may be put forward by hon. members. I would like to know whether the adoption of the system of elective Ministries would in any way solve the question of the powers of the Senate; whether it would in any way be accepted as a solution of the difficulty of the minor colonies? I have heard only one member of a smaller colony argue in support of it, and that was Sir Richard Baker. Of course if the other members representing the smaller colonies do not accept that as a suggested solution of the question it is hardly worth while discussing it. Therefore, at the present stage, I would desire to hear the opinions of the representatives of the smaller colonies upon the point. I would like to know how they regard the question of elective Ministries, and whether they would be prepared to accept it as a solution of the question of the functions and powers of the Senate, and whether it would in any way be regarded as a solution of the difficulty. If it would not, we need not pursue the discussion or waste time in discussing it further. The fifth essential to Federation which has been agreed to is:

   That there should be a judiciary to interpret the federal law and settle conflicts between State laws and federal laws.

We now come to the consideration of that federal essential about which there has been distinct differences of opinion in this Convention. Now, first, as to what should be the franchise for the people's House? Shall that House be a House elected by the whole of the people or by a section of the people? This, in my opinion, raises the greatest and most important question of all; because, unless you have a democratic government you reduce the chances of success or hopes for the adoption of any Constitution whatever. We have here before us lists showing the diversity of some of the franchises which exist in the various colonies. There is no uniformity of franchise. There is, upon the contrary, a very serious divergence of franchise. Now, as pointed out by the hon. member for South Australia, Mr. Holder, this morning, the people of Victoria are as much interested in the federal franchise of New South Wales as they are interested in the federal franchise of Victoria. I wish to have the attention of Mr. Barton, because I understand he wishes to take notes for his reply; and, as I may not sit upon the Constitutional Committee, I am anxious to impress upon him one or two points. I am pleased to observe that he has affirmed the undoubted right of the Federation to fix down as a principle that the Federation should be master of its own franchise, and that the federal franchise should not be attacked or in any way interfered with by any outside body. That being so, I would like to know why Mr. Barton has not seen fit to give effect to that principle by making provision that the election of the first Federal Parliament should be upon the federal franchise. He says:

I am of the opinion, therefore, that the first Federal Parliament should be elected upon the basis of the popular franchise existing in each colony.

Now, I desire to impress upon the hon. member, and others who may concur with him, this fact—that I believe that is a substantial departure from, and a serious violation of, the federal principle which he set forth, namely, that the Federation should be master of its own franchise; and I want to know why he does not propose to put in some provision determining the nature of the franchise upon which the first election is to take place.

Mr. BARTON:

That is making a franchise for the Federal Parliament, not by it.

Dr. QUICK:

This is the body which will be the fountain-head of the Constitution. It will be the fountain from which the Constitution will proceed, as it is practically the first Federal Parliament. It is a body that is charged with the duty, certainly with the power, of fixing the federal franchise; and I think it is not only within its power to fix the Australian federal franchise, but, if it is to secure proper safeguards, the people ought to know upon what general franchise the first Parliament is to be elected. Of course I am aware that he suggested that after the first federal elections the franchise might be fixed by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID:
Then you would want to have an election as soon as it was fixed upon the new basis.

Dr. QUICK:
Yes. The people, before they go into Federation, will want to know what is the franchise basis for the Federal Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
How can you do that without an Executive?

Dr. QUICK:
I will explain that at a later stage; but I wish to impress upon my friend the principle for which I am contending. There may be difficulties, but we are here to solve them. I believe it would take a considerable time before a federal franchise could be adopted by the Federal Parliament, especially if there is a difference of opinion between the House of Representatives and the Senate; and it is quite possible one of the first differences between the House of Representatives and the Senate would be upon the question of the franchise. Judging from the difficulties we have experienced in Victoria in carrying anything like an enlargement of the franchise, we may expect similar difficulties to occur in the first Federal Parliament, and the result may be that these provincial franchises, if they receive express recognition in the Constitution, may continue in operation for a quarter of a century.
There is no guarantee for the early adoption of a federal franchise for the Federal Parliament.

Mr. LYNE:
Is it possible to alter it before the first election?

Dr. QUICK:
I will deal with that point presently. I do not wish to do my hon. friend opposite the injustice of saying that there will not be difficulties in the way.
The only difficulties that confront us are those of agreement. There are no technical difficulties that I can see, and there are no constitutional difficulties, while there are precedents for the adoption of the course which I suggest. I might remind my hon. friends that in the Imperial Act, 13 and 14, Chapter 59, by which Victoria was separated from New South Wales and erected into a State colony, provision was made in that Act for the franchise upon which the first legislators from the colony of Victoria were to be elected, and at the same time power was reserved in the mother Legislature of New South Wales to provide the necessary electoral machinery. That Act was repealed when Victoria received a new Constitution, embodied in 18 and 19, Victoria, Chapter 55, in which a new franchise was created as follows:

Every man of the age of 21 years, being a natural born subject of Her Majesty, or being a naturalized subject or a legally made denizen of Victoria, having resided in the said colony for any one year previous to the date of the registration of electors, who shall have a freehold estate in possession, situate within the electoral district for which his vote is to be given, of the clear value of fifty pounds sterling money, or of the clear annual value of five pounds sterling money above all charges and encumbrances in any way affecting the same; or shall have a leasehold estate in possession, situate as aforesaid, of the annual value of ten pounds sterling money above all charges and encumbrances affecting the same; or shall be a householder within such district, occupying any house, warehouse, countinghouse, office, shop, or other building or premises of the clear annual value of ten pounds sterling money; or shall, in consideration of any payment to the public revenue, be entitled under any law now or hereafter to be in force, to occupy for the space of twelve months or upwards any portion of the Waste Lands District for which his vote is given, or be in receipt of an annual salary of one hundred pounds sterling money, shall be duly registered, and be entitled to vote at the election of a member or members of the Legislative Assembly.

There are thus no technical difficulties in the way of placing in this Federal Constitution the first federal franchise, subject to certain machinery regulations to be carried out by the colonies or provinces within which the first election takes place. The difficulties that stand in the way of the adoption of a federal franchise are simply inherent to those which exist in every assembly similar to this. It may be that it will take a considerable amount of time and, perhaps, labor in evolving a federal franchise to which all the colonies will agree, and perhaps that was the reason which prompted Mr. Barton to abstain from including this in his resolutions.

Mr. BARTON:

I may say that one reason is that it would be difficult to put into the Constitution what would amount to an Electoral Act for each colony.

Dr. QUICK:

I have already anticipated this objection by pointing out that in the Victorian Separation Act, as well as in the Victorian Constitution Act, the necessary arrangements for electoral machinery were left in the first Act to New South Wales, the parent colony, and in the second Act to the colony.
of Victoria, whose restricted Constitution was being superseded by a larger grant of constitutional government.

Mr. BARTON:

The other reason was that the federated people have the right to fix their own franchise, and we ought not to impose any franchise on them until the time comes to fix it.

Dr. QUICK:

This is practically a Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID:

We have to prescribe a franchise in some way.

Dr. QUICK:

By his own statement he would fix a federal franchise by stipulating that it shall be in accordance with what exists in each of the provinces. How could it exist if it were not created or stipulated in some way by a federal instrument?

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Make use of the machinery already in existence.

Dr. QUICK:

Yes; but you do not create a uniform qualification, but a diverse qualification. Therefore, I say it is undoubtedly a departure from the Federal principle which Mr. Barton properly recognised—a departure I can only account for by the suggestion that he anticipates, there may be difficulties in this body here evolving a federal franchise. But, at any rate, I submit that every effort ought to be made to evolve a federal franchise, and to put it in the Federal Constitution, subject to the electoral provisions to be made in the colonies, such as districts, &c., which after all is a mere matter of detail, and might be accepted subject to amendment hereafter by the Federal Parliament should it see fit. At any rate, I submit this for the consideration of my hon. friend when he begins his work to deal with the franchise; and, even if he cannot adopt an absolutely uniform franchise because of certain difficulties which exist, at any rate to adopt a principle which might be common to all franchises, and that principle is the principle of equal voting. Surely no one can suggest for a moment that there would be any difficulty in putting a principle such as this in the Constitution, namely that no person, however qualified that person may be, by any law now or hereafter to be in force, shall vote more than once at any federal election.

Mr. HIGGINS:

The Federal Enabling Act provides that.

Dr. QUICK:

That is a principle which exists in the Act of Parliament under which we were elected. Therefore, I contend, if we cannot get a federal franchise completely, at any rate, that that principle ought to receive expression in the Federal Constitution, and if it does not receive that expression, in my opinion a most fatal error will be committed.

An HON. MEMBER:

How can that be done?

Dr. QUICK:

There can be no doubt as to the practicability of making such a provision in the Constitution, and at the proper time I shall be prepared to formulate my plan. I do not wish to anticipate matters of detail—matters of machinery that can be put in the Constitution not merely as a declaratory clause—because we are not here merely to pass declaratory resolutions—but as a substratum law enforced by a legal sanction. But I wish here to engage specially the attention of the representatives of the smaller colonies. This principle of equal voting might not be considered a vital matter in their colonies. It might be it is not a burning question in their colonies, it might be that some people lay too great stress upon it, it might be that, as Mr. Fraser says, "it is a bogey."

Mr. FRASER:

So it is.

Dr. QUICK:

But, bogey or not, there are large masses of people in the large colonies who believe it involves a principle of vital importance, and where you have large bodies of people entertaining that view you must not disregard their views.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

I am with you.

Dr. QUICK:

Again inviting the attention of the Premier of Tasmania, he said that this principle of plural voting crept into his Constitution Act by a coincidence. No doubt it did. Therefore what he and his fellow citizens got by a coincidence, and not by deliberative legislative design, they ought to have no difficulty in yielding, to the demands of other colonies. I hope, when the proper time comes, they will be able to yield to us what we consider a matter of vital consequence, if they wish any concession from us in other matters which they consider of vital importance.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I am quite ready.

Dr. QUICK:
So far as I am concerned, I lay the utmost stress, and attribute the utmost importance to this question of the franchise; and particularly that, for my part, I have pledged myself to my constituents to do what I reasonably can at this Convention not to allow this principle to be shelved or referred back to the provincial Parliaments, because the democracy of Victoria would not accept it. They have been endeavoring to have this principle inserted in the Statute-book for many years. It has been sent to the Upper House year after year and thrown out.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
You have universal suffrage. What more do you want?

Dr. QUICK:
I am not going to argue that question with the President of the Legislative Council. Bills to abolish plural voting have been thrown out time after time by that august Chamber. I am not suggesting that we should interfere with the franchise of the provinces. Reserve, if you like, the plural voting for the provinces, but let the basis of the Federation be equality of voting.

Mr. BARTON:
It would be a very good thing to do that in Victoria to start with.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
How are you going to deal with the South Australian difficulty?

Dr. QUICK:
A principle of this kind put in the Constitution would not in any way enlarge the franchise or reduce it, but merely equalise the voting power of every qualified elector.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That is the difficulty.

Dr. QUICK:
I am prepared to support it as an electoral principle applicable to all kinds of franchise now and hereafter to be in force.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Why does not Victoria have it then?

Dr. QUICK:
The people of Victoria want it, but the Legislative Council, in its wisdom, does not want it. I pass on to the next question of federal essentials upon which there is no doubt a difference of opinion, namely, the constitution of the Senate. What shall be its mode of election? Shall its mode of election be fixed by the Constitution, or shall it be left to the option of the States? I submit to Mr. Barton that, in the proposal he has made to refer the mode of election to the Federal Senate to the various provinces, he is to some extent acting in a manner contrary to the federal principles. I submit that this Constitution ought to provide the mode of constituting the Senate, and that it ought not to leave the constitution of the Senate to be drafted or created by the provincial Legislatures. There again you would lead to diverse methods of electing the Senate. This is a matter of such great importance that the Constitution ought, as a federal principle, to fix the mode of electing the Federal Senate. This will be the first time in the history of federal legislation that it has been proposed to delegate to the provincial Legislatures the determination of the mode of creating and constituting the Federal Senate.

Mr. BARTON:
You mean the way in which we shall elect the representatives? Is it not the plan adopted in Switzerland?

Dr. QUICK:
It may be so in Switzerland, but it certainly is not so in the United States or in the Commonwealth Bill. It is certainly a departure from the precedent of the United States Constitution, and from that important and admirable instrument which my hon. friend Mr. Barton helped to frame, the Commonwealth Bill; because our hon. friend will remember that that Bill determined upon a uniform method of constituting the Senate, namely, the election of the senators by the State Legislatures. That affirmed the principle that the Federal Constitution should keep and retain its hold upon the way in which the Federal Senate is to be elected. Now, however, it is proposed to leave the way optional to the States. I submit that that is not the proper and safe mode. I agree with my hon. friend that the Senate should be elected by the whole of the electors in each State or province as one large constituency, and that there should be no special regard for districts or localities; but I regret that he has not seen his way clear to put it into the Constitution.

It is early yet.

Dr. QUICK:
I hope it will not be lost sight of. I am glad my hon. friend is giving attention to this important proposal, because I attribute great weight to his recommendations at this Convention. The next essential is as to the power of the Senate—whether the Senate shall be placed upon equal terms and have equal powers with those of the House of Representatives in Money Bills. Now, on that point again, I go back to what I said at the beginning of my remarks. I say that the powers of the Senate will depend upon the mode of its election; and when I see the constitution of the Senate, and the mode of its election, I shall be prepared to say what powers I would give it. If the Senate be elected upon a democratic basis by the same federal electors as elect the House of Representatives, that will be largely paving the way to making any reasonable concessions to the representatives of the smaller States, who wish to increase the Dower of the Senate.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Very fair.

Dr. QUICK:
I should then see no reason for not conceding large powers. But if the Senate is elected by a section of the people, as was suggested, I think, by Mr. Fraser, then I say, "How can you put a House representing a section of the people on the same footing of equality as a House representing the whole of the people?" Surely my hon. friends from Tasmania would not for one moment recommend that as a just political principle. If you want to increase the power of the Senate, you must concede a liberal franchise. When you settle that you go a long way towards settling any dispute between us as to the equality of the powers or functions of the two Houses. I think I have now enumerated most of the essentials of Federation about which there are any serious differences of opinion in this Chamber. I do not intend to take up time by referring to the large number of subjects relating rather to the powers proposed to be conferred upon the Federation. Many of them have been most admirably dealt with by other members, and I shall not presume to take up time by referring to them. I shall therefore bring my remarks to a conclusion by expressing the hope that the result of our deliberations will be to evolve a Constitution that we cannot merely support here, a Constitution that we will not merely give our formal assent to here, and then go back to our colonies and speak against it—for what would be the good of a Constitution of that kind? We want to evolve a Constitution here that we can give our honest and loyal assent to, and afterwards go back to our colonies and urge our constituents to accept. It will be folly for us to adopt a Constitution here merely pro forma, and go back to our colonies either coldly appreciative or actively hostile. I hope the result will be a compromise which all will be able to accept honestly, faithfully, and loyally, and afterwards recommend to the people to receive, adopt, and give effect to.

Mr. DOBSON:
I have been called upon by you, Mr. President, somewhat suddenly, as, according to the list of speakers which you bad on your table there are two or three other gentlemen who should have preceded me, and if they wished to change places with me they ought, at least, to have asked my consent. However, the gentlemen from the magnificent colony from which I come are always willing to step into the breach and make themselves useful, especially in this grand cause; and, therefore, I am willing to get up and contribute my quota to the debate. I think I owe it to Mr. Barton to say that he has reconciled if he has not converted me to the plan—that of proceeding by resolution rather than taking up the Bill of 1891, and going into Committee and discussing the Bill clause by clause. I did not appreciate the educational influence which a debate of this kind would have upon ourselves, and the effect it would also have in educating the people of these colonies, who, sooner or later, will have to approve or reject the result of the work which we are now doing. All our work is in front of us, and we have yet to get into Committee; so that I am satisfied it will take us a considerable time to finish the business. Although some members may think we are now wasting time, I cannot think that any debate which gives us one tithe of the able speeches and arguments we have heard is a waste of time in dealing with a subject like this. We have heard about conciliation and compromise, and I take compromise to be the foundation of all our party government; and so it must be in making a Federal Constitution. I was rather struck, however, with the forcible and neat way in which Mr. Isaacs said that compromise and conciliation must have their bounds, and that anyone who went beyond certain bounds would be, to some extent, a traitor. I think that hon. gentleman, with that command of language which I wish I could imitate, has rather put the question too forcibly; because, if we are to put a limit to compromise beyond which our consciences will not let us go, we might as well give up conciliation and compromise. If we go into Committee, we may have to invoke the Divine aid, as was done on a former occasion, to enlarge the hon. member's limit of compromise. I hope whatever is done we may be able to frame a Constitution which will be acceptable to all. I quite understand that there may be some questions of conviction and conscience on which some will have to give way before we can give our accord to every clause of this Bill. Every one of us, I take it, cannot surrender his judgment entirely to others, but he can assent to the Bill and go to his colony and make the best of it, and ask his people to accept it, even if he does not approve in his conscience of every one of the clauses. Therefore, I hope members will rather enlarge their views of what is meant by the power of conciliation and compromise. I should like now to allude to a matter which has given me much perturbation since the federal movement has been initiated. That has been the fatal blunder we committed in starting the movement with two colonies standing aloof. I am glad that, so far as our friends from West Australia are concerned, the difficulty has been removed. We have yet to deal with the question of Queensland, and I could have wished the Premier of New South Wales had told us the exact purport of the telegram he had received from the Premier... of that colony, and had taken us into his confidence as to the reply he intended to send. I thought, with most of the other members of the Convention, that the suggestion of Sir Hugh Nelson was that we should nearly complete our work, leave our Bill still in Committee, and then adjourn for a couple of months to enable our Queensland friends to get here. I now gather from the remarks of our friend the Premier of Queensland that that is not what he requires, but that he will be content if we finish our work now, and enable Queensland to discuss the Bill in her Parliament and be represented when the Convention meets to finally put the Bill into shape. I honestly believe any other course would be fraught with danger, and sincerely hope that this Convention will not adjourn until we have completed the work entrusted to us.

Mr. LYNE:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DOBSON:
I believe we should do all we possibly can to give our Queensland friends every possible voice we can in the framing of this Bill, subject to not delaying our work.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DOBSON:
With regard to the absence of our friends, I am reminded of what Bismarck said:
If you miss the psychological moment it never comes to you again.

Before passing on to deal with some of the subjects which come before us in the Bill of 1891, I want to say a word or two about the resolutions Mr. Barton has brought before us. I have to express, as other members have done, my satisfaction with the way in which the first line of the resolution reads, that what we are doing now is:
To enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australasia.

That is a text with which each member of the Convention can go to his people, and which he can hold up before them as a thing which will give them larger powers. I do not care whether the Bill is on an ultra-democratic, a democratic, a liberal, or a conservative basis. It will be one which will enable the people of Australasia to acquire a larger measure of self-government, and that in itself I take to be a very great blessing. I should like to refer to the clause which deals with territories, although I belong to a colony which will possibly not stand breaking up into one or two States; but when you think of the possibilities for the expansion of the Australian Commonwealth, and then limit the colonies for the future to those boundaries which separate them from one another now, our limit takes a narrow range indeed. The time may come when rich discoveries may be made of a mineral character, or manufactures may spring up in colonies where they are now little dreamed of, and which may absolutely dwarf the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria, and give other colonies the lead in the industrial race. Therefore our Constitution ought to make ample provision for the division of the States, and for allowing separation, the same as a portion of our friends in Queensland are agitating the English Government to provide for. I take it that one of the foundations of what is called Federal Government is to take very good care that you reserve for the States all those things which are of individual advantage, all those powers which they can better carry out for themselves, and to retain for themselves absolute control over these powers; but at the same time to give to the Federal Government all those powers of common or general concern which a united Government can manage much better for the good of the people than the individual States. Some of the people, and some of the representatives too, are very much afraid that we will give to the Federal Government too much power; but if, as suggested by Mr. Holder, you hand over those matters of general concern to the Federal Government, and retain those of local importance for the States Governments, you absolutely get back far more than you give, and I think here, if Mr. Peacock will promise not to laugh, I will quote a line from a poetess, but I think Mr. Peacock is not in the chamber.

Mr. ISAACS:
Here he is; just in time.

Mr. DOBSON:
The poetess I am about to quote is Mrs. Elizabeth Browning. I think in one of her magnificent poems, "Aurora Leigh," when the hero and the heroine are fixing up their little love affairs, she makes one of them, I forget which, say:

You should give up everything and take all.

That may appear to be a paradox, but it is true, and, as applied to Federation, it is absolutely correct. You are going to give up a great many of your powers, but you are going to get back in every sense of the word, an ampler, a better, and a more effectual administration of your affairs. As stated by Burgess, whom the hon. member Mr. Isaacs quoted:

The purpose of the Legislature is to ascertain what the law ought to be, to determine not what the will of the people commands, but what the reason of the people and the common consciousness requires.
Mr. PEACOCK:
Who is to judge of that?

Mr. REID:
Tasmania.

Mr. DOBSON:
I desire to point out here that such remarks as I am able to make will be based on that view: that it is not the object so much of the Legislature, to find out what is the mere surface will of the people, but what their reasons and their common consciousness demand.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is like the old Roman Consul:
Silence, Romans! I know what is expedient for our country better than you know yourselves.

Mr. DOBSON:
When the hon. member Mr. Isaacs hears my illustration of Dr. Burgess's principle, I think he will admit that that does not apply. I think we will do well to consider not so much the will of the people as to get at what is really the reason and intelligence of the people. Now the object lesson which I will give to hon. members is the question of one man one vote. Here I am going to quote again, not poetry, but George Eliot, who said: England is a country very much governed by phrases.
And a truer remark was never made by a novelist. I will tell the hon. members of one phrase which continued for a long time to govern the apparent will and votes of the people of Victoria, and that was "one man one vote." When it was introduced it got a very considerable start and it was very difficult to catch it. You could not successfully face a meeting of the electors without going in for it. It continued for many years until, at last, it was overtaken by another phrase of "one vote for manhood and another for thrift," and the elections came on in which that question, among others, was one of the principal issues laid before the people of Victoria; and I do not think hon. members upon th

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Is property, thrift?

Mr. DOBSON:
There is a common opinion all the world over that the people are divided into two classes, those who have and those who have not; and those who have, although some of us have been born with a golden or silver spoon in our mouths, have generally acquired their property by thrift, hard work, industry, and by the sweat of the brow or brain; and the people who, have, require, in my idea, far more consideration than those who have not.

Mr. LYNE:
Is that what the small States will give us?

Mr. DOBSON:

I am dealing with the general principles which govern my ideas, and if they do not coincide with those of Mr. Lyne so much the better, for "in the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom." Let me give you another illustration of Dr. Burgess's principle. We all remember when Mr. Grover Cleveland was elected President of the United States on what we may call a freetrade ticket, and we know that the people of Victoria mere very much astonished to see that their pet idea, protection, should go under, and now you see Cleveland and freetrade going out and protection coming back. It is easy to find out what is the will of the people expressed in gigantic caucuses, in conventions, or in election meetings of 5,000 people; but it is far more difficult to find out what their reason demands. I now want to speak of the crux of the matter—the Constitution which our Legislature is to have. I here desire to thank Sir Richard Baker for having given us one of the most thoughtful and useful speeches on this subject we have yet listened to, and the question he has asked has not been properly answered. Many hon. gentlemen have partly dealt with it, and others have held it up and sailed round it, and I should like to see the speakers who remain, especially my honorable, logical, and eloquent friend, Mr. Deakin, deal with it. Sir Richard Baker's question was this: "Is our system of responsible government consistent and compatible with the federated Constitution we are now trying to enact?" I am inclined to think that no one can safely answer it in the affirmative. I do not honestly believe that responsible government is consistent with a Federal Government. What is to happen then, supposing it were not so? Although hon. members who have spoken on this point have taken a view contrary to Sir Richard Baker, they all seem to have forgotten that one whom we all look upon as an admirable and safe guide in this matter has dealt fully with the point. I refer to Sir Samuel Griffith who, in an address delivered before the Brisbane University, reminded us that the Cabinet system and the number and powers of Ministers who sit in Parliament, and who, as a result of motions of want of confidence, lay down their portfolios, are no part whatever of the written Constitution, but have grown and developed from the Constitution. He then goes on to deal with the point brought before our notice by Sir Richard Baker. Sir Samuel says:

My own opinion is that the practical result would be that it would come to be recognised that the Federal Government must command the general confidence of both Houses of the Legislature, and that less importance would be attached to defeats on minor matters in either House.
There is a great authority on Federation absolutely disagreeing with almost every speaker who has spoken on this point. I therefore urge every speaker to address himself to this matter, because although I do not believe with Sir Richard Baker that either Federal Government will kilt responsible government or that responsible government will kill Federation, I believe that unless you adopt the Swiss system, with some modifications, Federation will to a great extent modify your system of responsible government so as to make that system develop and become adapted to its own federal requirements. It may be a generation to come before we get these immense developments to which reference has been made.

Mr. LYNE:
Would you elect ministries by the, State or by the people?

Mr. DOBSON:
As the Swiss do it.

Mr. LYNE:
How can you and Sir Edward Braddon get on together under those circumstances?

Mr. DOBSON:
Sir Edward Braddon and I will get on very well together at this Convention, and we shall be able to give and take. When you take the risk of engrafting the principle of responsible government upon a Federated Government, think of what you are doing. Federal Government will have eliminated from it almost every party question except taxation, and when once you decide to give over to the Federal Government sufficient revenue for its needs its right to levy taxation will not be enforced once in a generation, and the great cause of party strife-taxation-will then be removed. But if the Cabinet system is adopted you will absolutely be inviting the members of the Federal Parliament to turn themselves into party politicians the moment they enter the floor of the House; you will invite them to create party objects, and to make party strife; you will invite them to look with envy upon the first men who sit on the Treasury Benches; and they will set to work at their caucus meetings to see not what is beat for united Australia, but with what little game and plan they can knock Ministers off the Treasury benches. For these reasons I believe this topic is about the most important which will engage the thoughts of the members of this Convention. Possibly I am using exaggerated words, because I take it that Sir Samuel Griffith has to some extent in the Bill of 1891 provided for this. That Bill leaves the clauses concerning the Executive so general that you can have another system other than responsible government. I take it we shall commit a blunder if we do not still further try and enlarge these powers dealing with the Executive, so as to give the men employed to preside over the energies of a federated Australian people an opportunity to develop and work out for themselves such a system of Executive Government as will adapt itself to the requirements of the Federal Government. The next question I propose to deal with very briefly indeed is that of equal representation in the Senate. I admire the courage of my friend Mr. Higgins for arguing this point, when he knows that the great bulk of the members of the Convention are against him. I would point out that if Tas. mania is only eight times smaller than New South Wales, New York is eighteen times larger than Rhode Island, and the Canton of Berne is forty-two and a half times larger than the smallest canton in the Swiss Republic. It will be seen therefore that in those two instances there is a much greater disproportion than we shall have in the representation of these colonies.

An HON. MEMBER:
That is just what New York complains of.

Mr. DOBSON:
I do not think we ought to put complaints against absolute facts, and as a matter of fact this equal representation in the Senate has lasted for over a century with eighty-four senators and 500 odd members in the House of Representatives. That shows the wisdom of Mr. Lyne's suggestion that we should have some limit to the number of members.

Mr. ISAACS:
The hon. member will recollect that the Constitution provides that you cannot alter the suffrage of a State in the Senate without that State's consent.

Mr. LYNE:
Or else it would have been altered long ago.

Mr. DOBSON:
I think the suggestion by Mr. O'Connor as to the number of members is a good one. Coming now to the powers of the Senate, if each State is to have equal representation, what is the use of the equal representation in the Upper Chamber unless that body is to have some power? It goes without saying that if the State rights are to be preserved, if the people in the States are to be protected, the Senate must certainly have considerable power. While I do not claim for it the power of initiating Money Bills, I certainly do claim for it the power of amending Money Bills. I do not see how a Federated Government is to be carried on very well without it. The first important Bill which will get to the Senate House will be a Bill to impose uniform Custom duties against the outside world. Do hon. members contend that the Senate is not to have power to amend any item it likes in that bill? Is it not to have the power to amend one single item of the 300 or 400 items that compose the Bill? I do not argue that it should have the power to increase duties or to increase taxation. I would leave that to the initiative House, the National Assembly.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Why?

Mr. DOBSON:
Because we must give something away to our democratic friends. I think democracy is running a little mad, but I desire to acknowledge the forces that surround me. We cannot kick them over, and we must give them something sometimes; but I must see that they do not kick me.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Why only sometimes?

Mr. DOBSON:
All times, if you like. We all know that one of the features of democracy is its wilful extravagance. I am glad no hon. member denies it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We are all so thunderstruck that we cannot find breath to deny it.

An HON. MEMBER:
You want then a strong Upper Chamber.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The Upper House cannot check the extravagance.

Mr. DOBSON:
Then yon allow democracy to kick you. That is about it. You all know how strongly sociology is making its way among the people. You all know the dangers of the State taking up every industry, and wetnursing it. You all know how many departments have been instituted-departments of agriculture, produce depots, and so on.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DOBSON:
And departments for finding markets and helping industries. And we shall find that the democrats will be setting themselves to get Federal Departments in the interests of labor. You will have them asking in democratic style for a vote for £10,000 when £5,000 would be sufficient, and, unless the Senate has power to alter such a Bill, they would be driven to reject a measure they approve of because they have no power to check its extravagance. Is that not a good argument why the Senate should have the power to amend Money Bills? I had the honor of dining last night with Her Majesty's representative. We met in a comfortable house with a member of the grand old aristocracy. Here I stand in a palace of luxury, a palace of expense, a palace of democratic extravagance, and yet South Australia has a large amount of taxation per head, an income tax, and other vexatious little burdens which the people could well spare. Thus we see how desirable it is to arm the Senate with strong powers.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Can you not give New South Wales a turn?

Mr. DOBSON:
One of the first things to be done by the Federal Parliament would be to bring in a Bill to borrow £100,000 to build a Federal House of Parliament, wherever the federal capital might be. Some of the Opposition benches will seize the first opportunity to talk about the democracy of the Australian Colonies, and move to increase the amount to £500,000, with an eye to giving work to an increased number of people. You have, under government by party, strifes and disputes of all kinds. Are you going to have all the evils of representative government, when, by adopting the Swifts system, you may avoid them?

Mr. SOLOMON:
Under the Swiss system you may have just as many evils.

Mr. DOBSON:
I do not think you could possibly have all the evils that attend party strivings. We have heard a great deal—and I am glad of it, because it shows how proud we are of the representative institutions of Great Britain - of the advantages of responsible government and the party system, but have not we all felt at times ashamed of the party system, and a little ashamed of ourselves, too. According to my hon. friend on my right, we are covered with shame all round, and that is just what I want to bring this Convention to. You may be proud of representative institutions, but there are times when we may well feel ashamed of some aspects of them, and I want to save our grand Federal Government from the evils that attend our party systems, and to keep it free from them so,
Mr. ISAACS:

It is a very good argument to show that the people should interfere personally.

Mr. DOBSON:

Well, the hon. member has given us an illustration where the State Parliaments of America have the power to elect senators, and the people are so cunning that they drive a coach and four through the Constitution, and so really the people, and not the State Parliaments, elect the senators.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You say we ought to take the example of America. Why not follow that?

Mr. DOBSON:

I accept the example of America when it suits my argument. I would say, let the first House of Representatives be elected on the franchise of the States Parliaments, and afterwards the Federal Parliament can fix its own franchise. But the people of South Australia do not seem willing to trust the Federal Parliament. Hon. members talk a great deal about trusting the people. I do not always trust the people. I very often think the people are not to be trusted, because their wills are formed for them by orators and politicians; but whether I trust the people or not I am going to make up my mind to trust the Federal Parliament. I have heard one hon. gentleman say he will not trust the Federal Parliament to settle the franchise, and I have heard another say he would not trust it to give back to the States that portion of the finances to which they are entitled. If we are not going to trust the Federal Parliament we had better pack up and go home. That is one reason why we should do everything to set that Parliament on a pinnacle above the States Parliaments. I object to the idea of putting into this Bill a uniform franchise for the Federal Government. We shall never agree upon it, and there will be more wrangling at the Committee table on that than on anything else. Why not trust it to the Federal Parliament? Are we going to bring the people of the colonies which have not adult suffrage into line with those which have, or are we going to make the women of South Australia and New Zealand give up their rights in order to make a uniform franchise all over the colonies? This is an exceedingly knotty point, and I think it may very well be postponed and left to the Federal Government. It is suggested that this Convention should fix the franchise upon the lowest and broadest scale which the wit of man can devise, viz., one adult, one vote, instead of waiting to see what the Federal Parliament will enact with the experience of this decade and the result of the working of the present various suffrages before it. I do not believe in any such course. I believe there will be a reaction over this question of the franchise; and, although it is very difficult for a democratic country to go back unless you send it back before a policeman's baton or a soldier's bayonet, I believe they will want to go back. So far from the people in Belgium becoming more democratic and going in for the one man one vote principle, they are going back, and have lately established for themselves a form of voting which many may think is a very bad thing. They give a man who is 25 years of age a vote, and a second vote if he takes unto himself a wife, and a third vote if he has any educational or professional qualification; so that in the franchise there they recognise education. They acknowledge all those things which the advanced democrat, but not the true democrat, eliminates.

Some members talk about governing united Australia upon principles which they would not listen to for a moment in connection with the conduct of their own private concerns. I do not think any members who pose as or who are advanced democrats, would agree to enter into an industry or company, and give to their working men and every one engaged in the industry, no matter how ignorant, the same equal voice in the management of it, and expect to extract dividends out of a competitive market.

Mr. ISAACS:
To whom does the country belong?

Mr. DOBSON:
The country belongs to the people; but the people who are most entitled to our consideration are the people who are thrifty and intelligent, and have something to pay our liability.

Mr. ISAACS:
Life and liberty go for nothing, then!

Mr. DOBSON:
Has the hon. member read that admirable book by Mallock-I might say, those two books of his-in which he so elaborately places brain and intelligence before Simple manhood, that is, before a man regarded simply as a being with a head, a stomach, and two legs? I do not believe entirely in making our Federal franchise as broad as we can, nor in the claim that the government should be broad Wed on the people's will. There is something besides the mere will of the people; there is intelligence. So far as I can make out by reading, if you have a Lower House elected by the people, and have a Senate elected by Parliamentary representatives, who are one remove from the people, you have the best basis for obtaining sound and lasting progress. I do not believe that both Houses should be elected by the same suffrage. I cannot understand any member advocating the bi-cameral system, and having all these disputes about the powers of the two Houses-and here I find I am at issue with the Premier of Tasmania-and then falling back on a franchise which is exactly on a dead-level, the same for both Houses. Mr. Trenwith has pointed out to me that I do not quite realise what a conservative element it is if you have the Senate elected by one whole electorate. I admit the hon. member is right, that that to some extent is a conservative element, because I know that in Tasmania a man desiring election, for the Senate must be a well-known man, or a man who has in private life distinguished himself greatly. But I desire a fusion of liberal and conservative notions.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Ho, ho!

Mr. DOBSON:
Oh yes, they are liberal in regard to taxation, I can tell Mr. Peacock, but not in giving ignorant people the power to govern.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That is just what you do.

Mr. DOBSON:
Oh! no. If you want to have a more conservative Senate than you get from election by one electorate, why not introduce the conservative element of age? Say that every man should vote for the Senate if he is 25 years of age. Then you would let him sow his wild oats. By the time he is 25 he would begin to be more intelligent, to take an interest in politics, and to read the newspapers.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They get worse as they get older.

Mr. DOBSON:
I agree with the hon. member that as we get older some men get naughtier.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Speak for yourself.

Mr. DOBSON:
I think the man who is 25 years of age is more inclined to take an interest in politics than the boy who is 21; and with a desire to meet my friends who are advanced democrats in some way, if they will give me one or two conservative elements I might agree that we should elect the Senate on a popular basis, for if this

[P.198] starts here

Senate is to be a powerful Chamber, it can only be strong because the people trust it. On the question of deadlocks, I have been taught by my daily paper, the Mercury, to leave deadlocks alone; and the gentleman who writes there is a good political economist. He was brought up in the colony of Victoria, and was writing for a paper there when those serious deadlocks occurred some thirty years ago. His idea is to let deadlocks alone, and leave them to be settled by the common sense of the members. If you can use that argument with reference to the upper and lower Chambers of a State, you can use it with ten times the force to a Federal Parliament, because party politics do not enter so much into a Federal Parliament. If the powers of the Federal Parliament are limited and seldom require to be exercised on the questions of finance and taxation, you will have very few deadlocks indeed, and it is a poor look-out if we cannot leave it to them to settle the few deadlocks which will occur in their own way. But supposing you do want to provide means for meeting the difficulties of a deadlock, the people's referendum under certain wise regulations would be a very good thing. You can hardly have the two Houses meeting together and voting as one unless you pay great attention to the numbers of each relatively which sit in the two Houses. It would be no use for the two Houses to vote together if there were eighty-four senators and five hundred in the Lower House, as they have it in America.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
We must limit the number of members of the Houses.

Mr. DOBSON:
I think, as Mr. O'Connor suggests, we will have to limit the number of members, or otherwise we will have a faulty Constitution. I think that Mr. Isaacs or Dr. Quick suggested that, in applying the referendum, you should get a majority of the States and a majority of the whole of the voters.

Mr. ISAACS:
Not exactly.

Mr. DOBSON:
Those who are entitled to vote, you mean. I understand some members said that in getting rid of a deadlock by the referendum you would see if there was a majority of the States in favor of any particular proposal, and also a majority of the whole of the voters.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is not quite accurate.

Mr. DOBSON:
I understand if you get a majority of the States and of the people it would be decided in accordance with that. It is an exceedingly good idea and well worthy of consideration.

Mr. ISAACS:
You are not quite correct.

Mr. DOBSON:
In speaking on the question of finance and trade, I find myself dealing with subjects which can only be effectively threshed out at the Committee table when we have all the figures and facts before us in a concrete form. I would like to say, however, that I certainly think that the Constitution Bill should if possible fix some date on which the uniform tariff is to come into force. You have also to recollect that our producers throughout the whole of the colonies, and especially in the colony to which I belong and in Victoria, consist of two classes; those who have an exportable surplus, and who, after supplying their own limited markets, must find an outside market, to these producers freetrade is the breath of their lives; and on the other hand there is the class of producers who do not quite supply local requirements, and to whom protection is the breath of their life. They say they cannot live without protection, as their industry has been created and established by that system. Therefore you have to consider both classes, who say that they require exactly opposite treatment. The Constitution Bill should consequently fix a date for introducing this uniform Customs tariff with absolute free trade between the whole of the colonies, so that all our protected industries should have reasonable notice that they will have to face the competition of the sister colonies. The important question then come in of whether we will follow the example of New South Wales, and allow some of the duties to go by degrees. If New South Wales, with all its rich resources-its magnificent land revenues-could not afford to at once take the duties off such articles as sugar, as the sugar industry has been established by protection, what would be the case if the colonies knocked off all the duties in one fell swoop, so that trade should be free? I, as a freetrader, would like to see it done if there would be no injustice; but while some people will gain enormously Feeding a dog with his own tail.

We must do this as justly and considerately as we can; but all these things can be left to the committee stage.

Mr. TRENWITH:

That would be making both ends meet.

Mr. DOBSON:

There is one question which has given me some little trouble and perplexity, and it is that I find the Constitution of Switzerland, according to the work of Mr. Garran, provides for numerous State guarantees. I am sure it is natural that in a Federation of people speaking four different languages they would be afraid of what was going to happen, like the farmers in my district are, and that they would demand certain State guarantees, as did some of the American States, before they agreed to union. What I am thinking of is this: Suppose some of our people of a protectionist turn of mind say, "We will not go into the Federation unless you give us a State guarantee that the protective duties will not be removed except by degrees," or suppose some say, "we will not join unless you give us the duty on one particular article;" and others exclaim "we will not join unless you give us protective duties upon two articles." I hope this will not arise, and that we will take the plunge and jump the chasm. I find that I am speaking very glibly about producers who have been served by artificial conditions, and who will have all these local aids removed; but my sense of justice requires that they should be treated as gently as we possibly can. I have a word to say on the question of railways, and here Mr. Symon, who delivered a perfect and admirable speech, rather perplexed me upon the question of differential rates. He told us there were two ways of dealing with the railways; one was to take them over and federate them, and the other was to abolish differential rates. The hon. member sought to point out that the second proposal to abolish differential rates was ineffectual and could not be carried out. I think we shall have to leave the railways alone, but give the Federal Government power to take them over, besides having a clause, preventing one State trying to deprive another of its natural trade by differential rates. I am told that as against States this clause cannot very well be enforced, but that as against private owners you can do it. My experience as a lawyer is exactly contrary to this. If you were to draw an admirable agreement to put a stop to differential rates between private owners, you would have no possible chance of knowing, if one of these private owners were dishonest, whether the agreement would be carried out. But though you cannot apply that clause effectively to dishonest private owners, you can apply it effectively to the State. Is it going to be contended that one of our States is going to turn robber and be a thief towards another one? That is really the only alternative.

Mr. LYNE:
What would you do with waterways?

Mr. DOBSON:
I have not studied waterways, because the question does not arise in Tasmania. I cannot conceive that States as well as private individuals are going to turn dishonest. If that is so, perhaps Mr. Barton will be able to show ways under which the Federal Parliament would be able to deal with States guilty of the practice to which I have referred.

Mr. SYMON:
Put the State in prison.

Mr. DOBSON:
Not exactly.
Sir, GEORGE TURNER:

Put the Premier in gaol for the time being.

Mr. DOBSON:

Whilst I think that the 1891 Bill forms a very admirable basis for framing our Federal Constitution, I cannot help thinking that each one of us will have very good mental exercise if we put that measure entirely out of our thoughts absolutely and entirely, and begin de novo on the question of finance. With regard to giving up duties to the Federal Government, I have seen a scheme advanced in which Customs duties are left absolutely free to the State. Supposing you fix the services you are going to give over to be the Railways, Defence, and Post and Telegraphs, then see how much of your national debt has been spent in providing and creating these public works and these services? The sum of £95,000,000 has been spent on the services named. Taking the interest upon that sum at 3 per cent. it amounts to £2,850,000. Add the annual expense of carrying on those services, namely, £5,844,000, and you get a total cost of £8,694,000. Then the receipts from these four sources I have named total £8,089,000, leaving only a small deficiency of £600,000 odd. As the Post and Telegraph Departments and the Railways are increasing by leaps and bounds, and as each colony is increasing its receipts from these sources, long before the Federal Bill has become law you will find that these services will yield sufficient revenue to more than pay all expenses. They will be paying interest on £95,000,000, leaving roughly half your debt not taken over.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

What rate of interest did you calculate? You said 3 per cent. interest, and we pay nearly 4 per cent.

Mr. DOBSON:

The figures I am quoting now I took from the Sydney Morning Herald, but the hon. member is quite right, the average is about 3 3/4 per cent. But it does not matter what it is. I am perfectly certain that the receipts for these services would, before the Federal Parliament meets, more than pay the expenses. I only mention this to show that there are several ways of dealing with the finances. If we all follow in the path of the Bill of 1891, and do not try to get new thoughts, we shall make a mistake. Now is our opportunity to profit by that Bill, and to read it in the light of the last six years. It is quite likely that in one colony their contribution of Customs duties might be a trifle more per head-possibly sixpence or a shilling—because they might have a mining population who eat better food than does a working population generally. But when you get a uniform Customs tariff I think a great many of these disparities will disappear. I think we have all more or less exaggerated the direct financial benefits which we shall derive from Federation, and when we are before the electors and striving to support a grand cause it is only natural we should fall into the language of exaggeration. I think, on the one hand, we have greatly exaggerated—I know some writers have—the amount we should save by the consolidation of our debts. I do not see how we can usefully convert long-dated debentures. I have read with very great pleasure the admirable paper by Sir Philip Fysh in which he gets over the difficulty by creating a sinking fund, but I do not know how that would work out, and even that reduces his saving from a half per cent. to less than a quarter per cent. I am perfectly certain that scores and hundreds of writers and thinkers on this question have all exaggerated the saving we should gain. Conversion can only take place as our debentures come due, and the greatest saving of all would not be in the consolidation of stock, but must come simply from the natural drop in the value of money. I may say that some months ago I wrote a letter to Mr. Goschen putting several questions to him, but his answer was that he was so much taken up with his own department that I must excuse him not replying. I hope that we have also exaggerated the cost of the Federal Government, and we must try and get a saving effected by attempting to reduce the number of members and their salaries. We shall have to tell our electors when we hold up this Bill for their acceptance that some additional expense will be entailed upon them, and that in addition to their heavy taxation they will have to contribute towards the expenses of the Federal Government. It is impossible to see where we can, by local savings, make up for the expenditure on Federal Government. In Tasmania we cannot. If we reduce the number of members of Parliament we shall have a Parliament so small that we shall have only one Chamber, and we all know what a difficulty it is to carry any reduction of members. In another way we have exaggerated the saving. We shall have one general representative of Her Majesty in the Federal Parliament, but I do not think that such large colonies as New South Wales and Victoria will be content to have the Chief Justice as their Lieutenant-Governor. They would like their Hopetouns, with pleasing manners and long purse, and their Brassey’s; and hardly one colony will agree to appoint its Chief Justice with the moderate salary of Chief Justice, with a possible £500 or £1,000 added. The Federal Government is going to cost us something, and the people may as well make up their minds to the sacrifice. We shall possibly have great difficulty in getting their consent to it. In dealing with the powers of the judiciary it is proposed to establish a Federal Court, which shall act as the interpreter of the Constitution, and as a court of appeal from the citizens of the various States of Australasia. I do not think there is any question as to the ability of the eminent men who sit upon the colonial benches. That is illustrated by the fact that one of them has gone home to take his seat on the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council. It would be a mistake to take away the privilege of allowing any citizen of a State to appeal to Her Majesty, but the appeal should be so safe-guarded that the rich litigant could not drag the poor litigant across 12,000 miles of sea simply because he had a bigger purse. That ought to be provided against. I do not see any use in taking away a privilege which we have placed in our Constitution, and which some day some man who has a gigantic principle or a large sum of money involved may desire to put into force. If the Federal Court decided against a State the State might very well think the Court was prejudiced; and therefore I think, when the Federal Court has decided against a State right for which the people have been fighting in every possible way, the State should have the right of appeal to Her Majesty's Privy Council. I desire to say one word more on the question of the amendment of the Constitution. While it may appear to be a mistake to make an amendment of the Constitution too easy, I think, on the other hand, it would be a mistake to put too great a barrier in the way of the people having their will, provided that will is in accord with reason and controlled by a strong Senate. Therefore, I think the provisions in the 1891 Bill a little too cumbersome when we come to deal with amendments. There is another question which has not been spoken on yet, unless by the Premier of Tasmania, and that is whether members of local Parliaments should be allowed to sit in the Federal Parliament. As I understand, the Bill of 1891 forbids that, and I think that is an exceedingly wise provision. I do not think any man - I do not care who he is - has time to attend to the affairs of the State Parliament, and to give the time that will be necessary for him to give to the affairs of the Federal Parliament too. In our four millions of people we have numbers of men who are quite as capable and able to govern the people as the men who are in Parliament, when they have been brought into contact with politics and have had a little experience. We shall make a vital mistake if we try to put all the offices and prizes of public life in the hands of a few professional politicians of the Commonwealth, and not encourage private citizens to come forward and take their places in the Parliaments of their country. I am utterly opposed to allowing a man to serve in both Houses, because his duties in one Parliament would be sacrificed in favor of those which he owed to the other. I must apologise for the rather disjointed manner in which I have delivered my remarks.

That is owing to the fact that I was called upon to speak before I had an opportunity of getting my notes in order. If I have added one new point to the debate I have done my duty. I have not prepared a peroration, but will close by saying that if we succeed in framing a Constitution to make one united people in Australia we shall assist the great movement in the old country for Imperial Federation; we shall help the mother-country towards union and the establishment of a great federated empire; we shall help Mr. Chamberlain in the discussion of those large schemes which he has indicated for the industrial prosperity of the united people of Greater Britain and, having welded the mother-country and her colonies into one mighty nation under the Union Jack of Old England, we shall make manifest to the other nations of the world the power and civilization of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Mr. SOLOMON:

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

SUSPENSION OF THE STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. REID:

In the absence of Mr. Barton I beg to move on his behalf:

That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable me to give notice of motion.

I do this because the time for giving notices of motion has expired. The motions are those which Mr. Barton referred to at an early period of the sitting.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I second that.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Mr. REID:

On behalf of Mr. Barton I beg to give notice that, contingent on his resolution being carried, he will move:—

I. That the resolutions on the conditions under which and the powers with which it is desirable to create a Federal Government be referred to three Committees, with power to send for persons and papers: Committee No. 1 to be for the consideration of Constitutional Machinery and the Distribution of Functions and Powers: Committee No. 2 to be for the consideration of provisions relating to Finance, Taxation, Railways, and Trade Regulation: and Committee No. 3 to be for the consideration of provisions relating to the establishment of a Federal Judiciary.

II. That such Committees do consist of four, three, and two members respectively from each of the colonies represented; that each of the several delegations do choose the members of its body who are to serve on such Committees; and that the Prime Minister of each colony represented be ex officio a member of each Committee.

III. That Committee No. 2 be instructed to specially consider sub-resolutions III. and V. of Resolution 1, with the view to their being carried into effect on lines just to the several colonies.

IV. That it be an instruction to Committees Nos. 2 and 3 to report their respective conclusions to Committee No. 1.

V. That, upon the result of the deliberations of the several Committees, Committee No. 1 do prepare and submit to this Convention a Bill for the establishment of a Federal Constitution, such Bill to be prepared with as much expedition as is consistent with careful consideration.

P.203 starts here

VI. That in each Committee a majority do constitute a quorum.

VII. That such Committees have leave to sit at any time.

ADJOURNMENT.
The Convention adjourned at 5.27 p.m.
Monday March 29, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WALKER:
I have the honor to present a petition respectfully worded from 2,145 electors of New South Wales, members and adherents of the Presbyterian Church. I propose that it be received and read.

The CLERK read the petition, as follows:
That in the preamble of the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth it be recognised that God is the Supreme Ruler of the world and the ultimate source of all law and authority in nations. That there also be embodied in the said Constitution, or in the Standing Orders of the Federal Parliament, a provision that each daily Session of the Upper and Lower Houses of the Federal Parliament be opened with Prayer by the President and the Speaker, or by a chaplain. That the Governor-General be empowered to appoint days of national thanksgiving and humiliation.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I have a similar petition from members of the Church of England in the diocese of Sydney, signed by 2,502 members.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I desire to present a petition similar in effect, signed by some 10,000 adults in Victoria.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I have a similar petition from 794 members of the Congregational Church in New South Wales.

Dr. QUICK:
I have a petition of a similar nature from 100 members of the St Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Bendigo.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I have a similar petition, signed by 2,264 adults in Victoria.

Mr. BRUNKER:
I have a petition from the Baptist Church in New South Wales. It is respectfully worded, and contains a prayer. I move that it be received.

Petitions received.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I have a petition from the mayor and aldermen of the Borough of Wentworth, concluding with the following prayer:

That you may decide in favor of this district as the site for the Federal territory, and your petitioners will in duty bound, &c.

Petition received.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I present a petition from the Council of the Church of England Temperance Society of New South Wales, asking that each State should be allowed to prevent the importation of intoxicating liquors and opium within its borders.

Petition received.

"HANSARD" REPORTING.

Dr. QUICK:

I would like to ask a question, if I am not out of order. I have received several communications from Victoria asking where copies of the daily "Hansard" records of the debates of the Convention can be obtained. I would suggest that arrangements should be made for the sale of copies. If some announcement to that effect were made it would result in the names of many subscribers being sent in.

The PRESIDENT:

I believe that arrangements have been made, with the concurrence, I may say, of the Premier of Victoria and others, to place a number of "Hansards" at the disposal of the various Parliaments. Any other arrangements which may be desired by the representatives for the purpose of giving further publicity to the proceedings I will be happy to have made.

Mr. BARTON:

Upon the subject of "Hansard," if I may be permitted to make a suggestion, I would like to do so. I have heard complaints from several hon. members about the slowness with which they are receiving corrected copies of "Hansard." If I may go so far into debatable matter, it is to say that the gravamen of the complaint seems to be this, that hon. members desire to make comments upon the deliveries of their predecessors in debate, and they find in looking through the reports that there is a difficulty about that, inasmuch as they are not corrected; and without saying more than is needful upon that point, I must say they do need a great deal of correcting, because in some passages the real meaning of the debater is rather hard to decipher. Under these circumstances they feel in this difficulty, that if they make comments they are not quite sure that they are taking their predecessors in debate in the right sense, so that it causes considerable uncertainty. The corrected copies should be furnished with more celerity. I have thought it the right plan to address you upon the subject.
The PRESIDENT:
It is not impossible that the delay to which Mr. Barton refers may be attributable to some delay on the part of the representatives in correcting and returning their proofs. Whatever the cause, an endeavor will be made to prevent any reason for complaint in the future.

NOTICE OF MOTION.
Mr. BARTON:
I beg to give notice that to-morrow I will move:
That the Convention shall, at 5.30 p.m. this day, suspend its sitting until 7 p.m., at which hour the Convention shall be resumed and the transaction of business continued.
I give notice of this motion more for the purpose of using it, if necessary, so that if there is a reasonable chance of terminating the debate to-morrow night advantage can be taken of it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I would go on to-day.

Mr. BARTON:
I think we can spare the members to-night.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Contingent on the resolutions moved by Mr. Barton being submitted to the Convention, I will move:
That all the words after "That" in the first line be omitted, and the following words be inserted in lieu thereof, "this Convention do now resolve itself into a Committee of the whole to consider the Commonwealth Bill, 1891."

MODE OF PROCEDURE.
Sir JOHN FORREST:
Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I beg to move the adjournment of the Convention for a special purpose. I desire to appeal to hon. members to expedite the proceedings of the Convention as much as is possible. More particularly I appeal to hon. members on behalf of the delegates from Western Australia. The representatives of Western Australia have come a long way under great disadvantage at a very critical time in our political life, and we are bound to return upon the 14th of April. A general election will then be in full swing in Western Australia, and it is absolutely necessary for myself and the other representatives to be in that colony after that date. In fact the writs for the general elections will be issued before that date, and it seems to me, although it is very interesting and very edifying no doubt to listen to hon. members upon the general principles of the Constitution Bill, a great deal of time may be saved if we deal with the questions one by one rather than deal with the whole scope of the Bill in set speeches. If hon. members will fall in with the view I have put, many of us who would have liked to speak at some length upon the general question of the Constitution Bill may, to some extent, defer the observations we desired to make till the time when these subjects come forward in detail one by one, and considerable time will be saved to hon.
members. I merely throw out the suggestion. Probably it will be thought somewhat selfish on my part, but at the same time I have personally so many engagements that, as I have said, it is impossible for me to be here after the 14th of next month. I am very anxious indeed that we-I mean the Western Australian delegates-should be able to take part in those portions of the Convention which are very debatable and controversial. Nine-tenths, no doubt, of the subjects which will be discussed will be generally agreed upon, but at the same time there is the one-tenth which will form very debatable ground; and I should very much like-speaking for myself and the representatives of Western Australia-that we should have an opportunity, before being bound to leave for our own colony, of expressing our views on these controversial and difficult subjects.

The PRESIDENT:

To enable the matter to be discussed, I understand the hon. member to move:

That the Convention at its rising adjourn till half-past 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

Question put.

Mr. PEACOCK:

I will second the motion of the Premier of Western Australia for this reason, that, in addition to the remarks that that gentleman has offered to the Convention, I think there is a disposition all round now-having heard all the delegates occupying prominent positions in the various colonies-that we should get into the Committee stage as quickly as possible, so as to report to a Committee of the whole. I can offer these remarks freely for the reason that I have not yet debated this question. There is no doubt that, had we time, there is not one delegate but would desire to place on record his views on this great and important question. But remembering that in addition to the facts which Sir John Forrest has brought forward-that the Western Australian delegates must leave at an early stage - that our Premiers must be leaving shortly, I am prepared, and I believe others are prepared, to waive the right to speak here on the general question so as to get to work with as little delay as possible. It would be a serious blow to the whole movement if unfortunately at this stage of our proceedings we had not finished the draft Bill by the time the Premiers had to leave to visit the old country. I feel it would do the cause a great deal of harm if unfortunately yourself, the Premier of New South Wales, the Premier of Victoria, the Premier of Western Australia, and the Premier of Tasmania were absent from our deliberations when we finally finished our work.

Mr. BARTON:

That is not likely.

Mr. PEACOCK:

I am afraid so, if we debate this matter at full length. I am not going to say that any time has been lost in the debate which took place last week, because every one of us has been educated a great deal by the speeches delivered, and the air has been considerably cleared, so that we are able now to come to much closer quarters with the subject. It is for these reasons, in addition to those mentioned by Sir John Forrest, that I second the resolution.

Mr. BARTON:

I can only regret that my hon. friend Sir John Forrest was not able to be present when the earlier discussion on the mode of procedure took place, because if he had been I am quite sure he would have agreed with me that all that was predicted in favor of the present mode of procedure has been realised. Two modes of procedure were suggested—one to go at once into a discussion of the draft Bill of 1891, taking it clause by clause; the other—Sir JOHN FORREST:

For that there would have been a majority.

Mr. BARTON:

Possibly there might have been, and I should then have regretted that the Convention had adopted an unwise course. The other mode suggested was that we should proceed as we are doing, by way of resolution, and the majority, being in favor of the course, it was adopted. I do not want to delay, proceedings by saying one unnecessary word, but I do say that the procedure by, way of general resolutions was adopted to avoid this assembly committing itself to a definite proposition which might have taken away, to a certain extent, the subsequent freedom of action of hon. members, by deciding on the various points embodied in the draft Bill of 1891. It was believed that by taking this more general course the views and opinions of hon. members would be evolved in such a way that the course of proceedings of this Convention in Select Committee would be considerably smoothed and expedited. I have not the remotest doubt, from the debate as far as it has gone, although there have been only, three and a half sitting days, that all that was predicted of it has been realised.

An HON. MEMBER:
It is a mistake.

Mr. BARTON:
And it will have the effect that when we go into Committee our labors will be very much expedited. The hon. member may rely on this, that the course now taken is the shorter one, and will result in the Bill being more expeditiously produced and better representing the views of the Convention than would follow on adopting the course he proposes. I ask him to take this assurance from me as a keen watcher of these proceedings.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Double debate.

Mr. BARTON:
The advantage of the course taken, I think, is that it will avoid a great deal of double debating, as hon. members express their minds fully upon all the questions that arise, and as they are now doing that, they will content themselves in Select Committee with a very short expression of their views when they express them at all. I suppose that something like 60 per cent. of the decisions evolved from the resolutions before the Select Committee will be arrived at in a very short time for each. If we had taken up the Commonwealth Bill we certainly would have had to endure a substantial discussion upon nearly every clause. But now the debate will be upon those points which are really essential; and, even if each of our members reviews those points, the debate in Committee will be shorter than it would otherwise have been. I may mention that the sittings of the 1891 Convention began on March 2nd, and it was only on the 18th of March that the House resolved itself into such committees as it is now proposed to appoint. Sixteen days-that is to say, counting Saturdays and Sundays-elapsed before the House got into Committee. On this occasion I believe eight or nine days will be occupied at the most before these Committees are reached-a saving of eight days. In 1891, the Committees being appointed on March 18th, the Bill was brought up on the 31st - again a lapse of thirteen days. On this occasion there is every reason to expect that ten days will be the time occupied. Before the hon. member and his colleagues leave for Western Australia there will be a Bill, and perhaps some debate in the Committee of the whole House upon the clauses of the Bill, so that they will be able to reasonably represent the views of their constituents in Western Australia. I mention these things, as there is no doubt that, instead of taking, as on the other occasion, thirty-eight days, there is every reason to expect that on this occasion there will have been occupied something like thirty days at the outside, counting Saturdays and Sundays - probably not more than twenty sitting days.

Motion negatived.

FEDERAL CONSTITUTION

Debate resumed on resolutions by Mr. Barton (vide page 17).

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I have some slight feeling of delicacy in rising to address the Convention at all after the urgent request of Sir John Forrest that we should proceed to Committee as early as possible. I, who have been here throughout, will assure my friend, who was not here, that at all events, so far as I am concerned, the debate has been fraught with infinite instruction, and has had the effect of completely revolutionising one of my central ideas on a most important branch of the question we have to consider. I will promise Sir John Forrest, however, and the members of the Convention will be equally pleased to hear it, that I will address myself as shortly as possible to the central points which will probably form a matter of discussion and difference; will avoid all rhetoric of every description; and will limit my remarks to the shortest possible space of time. Taking the proposals themselves, and going right to the subject at once, so far as the Governor-General is concerned, we need have no discussion. Such differences as were created at the 1891 Conference on the motion of Sir George Grey, with which some members of the present Government sympathised, have been so eloquently answered by another member of the Government who has taken part in the discussion, that I think it is not necessary for me to say any more on the subject. Leaving that, we come to the question of the authorities which the Federation is to exercise, and the constitution of the Parliament which is to represent it. I think the shorter way will be to take the question of the representative bodies and incidentally deal with the powers of the Federation, because, after all, the conflict which took place in 1891, and the differences of opinion that exist now, are practically on the manner in which the Federation could be formed on fairness and right, doing justice to everybody. Every member who has spoken has emphasised this view, and although some in detail may, in the opinion of myself amongst others, have rather departed from the principle upon which they spoke, I am perfectly certain everyone spoke conscientiously, wad that there is one desire to bring about Federation upon terms that will be satisfactory and just, and prove well in the future. So far as the representative bodies are concerned, all are agreed that there should be a bicameral system. On that there is no question. All are agreed that there should be a body representing the people, and all are agreed that there should be a body representing the States; and all agree - it would be so whether they agreed or not - that our mission here is not to amalgamate the different colonies into one Government, but to produce a Federation. This is the central point we have to keep in view in all of our discussions. On all other questions we have to ask ourselves to what extent they lead us away from our mission, destroy the independence of the colonies, and make for unification when we intend only union. Bearing that in mind, we have to consider what is to be the constitution of our Houses. So far as the House of Representatives is concerned, there is practically not much difference of opinion, although some. All are agreed that the members of the other House should be returned by the most popular vote that can be obtained. The difference arises from the definition of what is the most popular vote, South Australia considering that the most popular vote is adult suffrage, others considering that it is manhood suffrage, and others again considering that some property qualification ought to be imposed. And on this we, who are returned here under the Bills which the various colonies have passed - with the exception of Western Australia - we who have been returned on adult suffrage, will, I am sure, in justice to ourselves, say that the experiment has not worked badly up to the present time. Now, leaving that just for a moment - I shall return to it afterwards - and coming to the more important question of the constitution of the States Council, I do not want to repeat the argument which has been urged often enough, and which everyone knew before it was argued at all, that there is no possible analogy between our local institutions, our Legislative Councils and Houses of Assembly, and the States House and the House of Representatives to be established under this Constitution.

Mr. DOBSON:

Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

On that, I think there is no difference of opinion, but gentlemen who have in words expressed that sentiment, have expeditiously proceeded to demolish it by their subsequent utterances. Remembering that this is to be a Federation, and not a single Government, we know we are going very much in the dark; we know we are trusting very much to future developments, and that, although we have some precedents to assist us, there are none of them precisely analogous. And it is possible some of them may be warnings rather than precedents. The United States, which is the nearest analogy, is by no means a perfect one. It has been pointed out - and I do not want to repeat it at undue length—that the circumstances were different, that responsible Government as now understood was not then known, that the American Constitution, which was founded largely on the writings of Montesquieu -

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Was worked out on the assumption that it was impossible—the power being so much in the king—that the House of Parliament should exercise an independent judgment whilst they had that indirect influence of the king through his Ministers over its deliberations. Had Montesquieu written now he would have written differently, because he would have observed that, though the people took long to find out what their powers were, they found them out at last, and the result was that, not by any resolution or Act of Parliament, but by the ordinary processes of evolution, the present state of circumstances, that is, responsible government, has come about.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
But whilst we remember that, and therefore must see clearly enough that the American analogy is by no means a perfect one, being founded on a different condition of the Constitution, still it is impossible for us to avoid examining and considering how their Constitution has worked; but whether we consider the American Constitution or more modern Constitutions—whether we take the American, the Swiss, or the Canadian—the very foundation on which they all proceeded was that the only possible way of preventing Federation ultimately resulting in amalgamation was to have the House representing the States at least coordinate with the House representing the people.

Mr. ISAACS:
That was not so in Canada.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I withdraw the Canadian part. As far as America and Switzerland are concerned they sought to have a House at least co-ordinate in authority with the House of Representatives.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is not so in America.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I am going to say something about that, because it has been said several times. I say that it is so in America, and more—

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

The Americans, following the British precedent before them, and wanting to make something as analogous to the Commons and the House of Lords as possible, provided that Money Bills could alone be introduced into the popular branch of the Legislature.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

Taxation Bills.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

At the same time they established a body with an Executive and bestowed on the Senate executive powers, gave them the control of foreign concerns, and internally gave them control of all Government appointments; and, as a result, the American Senate naturally invited into its midst all the more brilliant intellects of the country, and by that more than from any other cause became the pre-eminent body.

Mr. HIGGINS:

They were almost all lawyers.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

That would probably be the reason, and I am obliged to my hon. friend for reminding me. So that I say, although it is true that there was this limitation on the rights of the American Senate, they gave them power which more than compensated for this reduction in their authority, and even in making that reduction they gave them such absolute power of alteration of Money Bills as to make the introduction of Taxation Bills into the other House a mere matter of arrangement and convenience between the two Houses rather than a substantial derogation from its authority. As far, then, as the American precedent is co

[P.209] starts here

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

It was Mr. Higgins.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Well, it was Mr. Higgins: and at the same time he quoted Bryce to show the injurious effects of mixing up in this way the election of the Senate and the House of Representatives. I have the greatest respect for Mr. Higgins, and I humbly follow Mr. Bryce when Mr. Bryce happens to agree with my own views, but it is singular that this very argument drove me to an identically opposite conclusion. If the Senate is supposed not to represent the people, and it is supposed to be a class House in which the people take but little interest and have but little voice, it should, therefore, not have such authority as the House of Representatives; but we find, as Mr.
Higgins has obligingly reminded us, that is not so at all, but that every constituency, in returning its members to the House of Representatives-the popular House-keeps the lordly Senate in view; and, knowing its importance and knowing its dignity, pledges its members as to the manner in which that body will be constituted.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think you have mistaken the argument. It is that in the election for the States House you mix up federal issues-not in the election for the House of Representatives.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I say the more you keep the Senate in touch with the people the more it represents the people.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I was referring to the election of the Senate by the State Parliaments.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Precisely; I should have said State Parliaments; and it is a strong argument for the view adopted by the Convention of 1891 that the election of the Senate should come from the State Parliaments rather than from the general body of the people.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
How would you deal with the case where a portion of the House is nominee and not elected? It cannot come from the people then.

Mr. BARTON:
I have known a nominee House to represent the people better than an elected House.

Mr. ISAACS:
In their own opinion.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I am not at the present moment discussing the wicked way in which some colonies in Australia elect their representatives, the corrupt methods they adopt, or anything else. I am simply dealing in a spirit of humility with Mr. Higgins and his authority, Mr. Bryce, for the purpose of showing that the arguments which they use in order to establish the fact of the bad manner in which this mode of election of the Senate works in America brings me to an absolutely different conclusion to theirs; and that the question is always actively considered, not merely when the Senate is being appointed, but when those who appoint it are being appointed, and that the appointors are merely delegates to return certain men, is a strong argument against Mr. Higgins, and not in favor of him, and is also a powerful argument in Support of the method proposed in the Bill of 1891. Nevertheless, although I agreed with that view at that time, and can still see much force in it, the the discussion here and such thought as I have been able to give to the point has altered my opinion. I think now it would be wiser that the Senate should be elected by the people, and I say that to a large extent to try and meet my friend Mr. Deakin, who took a very vehement view upon this subject in 1891, and who told us eloquently and frankly that his great objection to the powers of the Senate was that it was not directly representative of the people. Considering the matter seriously, I ask myself what is it weakens nominee members? They are appointed by the Ministry, and the Ministry may be said to represent the Parliament, and the Parliament in turn to represent the country, so that it may be said the Ministerial appointments are appointments made with the approval of the country. When the appointment is made by Parliament you only shift the matter one further step up or down, whichever way you choose to put it. With election by the Parliaments you have it nearer the people, but when you have it through the representatives of the people and not direct from the fountain head it is through the people and yet not from the people; therefore I have come to the conclusion of Mr. Deakin, that in order to make the States the important body it should be, it must be put in perfect touch with the States it represents, and should be entitled to co-ordinate authority, which I am sure Mr. Deakin will now concede.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Mr. Deakin does not say "yes" to that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

It should be placed upon a basis so popular that when it speaks it shall speak with the voice of the people, and we shall have no necessity to go back to barbarous times in order to bring from primitive tribes the referendum or any device of that kind, because you have the certain consciousness that you have the voice of the people already expressed, and sending the matter back to them would only produce the same result. So I congratulate myself in having been able to come to the same conclusion as many gentlemen who are quite as honest and conscientious as I am on this subject, and in seeing now quite clearly that it will be better-in order to put the States Council in the position of authority that it must occupy if amalgamation is to be prevented-to return it on the most popular basis, and so not only to let its members speak with that firmness and authority with which they will speak when they come direct from the people, but to prevent expensive and unsatisfactory expedients in order to obtain the voice of the people in away that will not be so beneficial. Now, whatever difference of opinion there may have been as to the best way to form federations, every combination of States that ever has federated has always agreed - as I have said before - that the powers should be at least co-ordinate, Here we have to take even more care than they did in America, because we have no foreign affairs to give to the Senate-we have no executive authorities we can bestow upon them. They will from the very nature of their creation, and from the very nature of their powers, be in a position of less authority and dignity than the Senate of America, and that very circumstance ought to make us more careful to take care of the authorities we bestow upon them. It is very difficult in discussing this subject-especially if one does not want to talk all day about it-to consider the constitution of Parliament without considering the constitution of the Executive. The Premier of Tasmania said that he believed in responsible government because we were accustomed to it, that he also believed the Government should be responsible to the House of Representatives alone, but that he also considered it was absolutely imperative that the Senate should have the authority of amending Money Bills in the same way as they did any other Bills, although they should not have the power of initiating them. Mr. Higgins congratulated the Premier of Tasmania on one portion of his utterance, but pointed out what appeared to him to be a necessary inconsistency in another part. He was delighted, he said, when he heard the Premier of Tasmania say that the Government must be responsible to the House of Representatives, but surprised when he heard him say that the States Council should have the authority to alter Money Bills-

Because that would be inconsistent with the Executive being simply responsible to the House of Representatives.

I agree with every word which Mr. Higgins has said in that. What is the good of talking about equality of the Upper House if you have a Government which is solely responsible to the Lower House? Mr. Wise says-

Prohibit them from interfering with the Appropriation Bill, but nothing else.

Why do you legislatively say they shall not touch any Bill? You do it for the purpose of declaring that their powers are not co-ordinate with the other House. Although the letter of your Constitution may seem substantially to put the two Houses fairly on even terms, you will have a general understanding which will be superior to the letter of the Statute, and which will weigh more than the letter of the Statute, even to overriding it, and as a result you will have the Upper House becoming what the general understanding meant it to be, and it will gradually lose its power and dignity. I want to know where the danger is of giving equal powers to the States Council. The Hon. Mr. Carruthers told us that he did not consider for a moment that the two Houses should have equal powers. He thought they made sufficient concession when they allowed the smaller States to have equal representation in the Senate, and whether they had any particular authority he appeared to consider comparatively immaterial. His view was that the authority must be in the Lower House, and a very singular reason he gave coming from a Liberal. He said, putting it rather cautiously-

If taxation should import representation, and the two should be proportional, how can you call this proportional with the little States with their smaller population possessing as much power as the larger States with their greater populations?

I ask the Hon. Mr. Carruthers is he favorable to representation on that basis? Is that the basis which any liberal colony adopts, that the representation in the franchise should be proportionate to the taxation of its numbers? If so, where is his argument against plurality of voting? The truth was that the hon. gentleman, for the purpose of assisting the discussion on this subject, used arguments absolutely destructive of his well known resistance to plurality of voting. My contention and opinion are that the method adopted in the Commonwealth Bill was the wisest method as far as the Executive was concerned. The appointment should be simply with the Crown, as in the British Constitution, which has worked itself out. Leave this to work itself out. What is responsible government? We are killed by phrases now-a-days. We get a term into our minds and we cannot get away from it. Every government ever formed was responsible to some one or other. In England they may have been responsible to the king. They may have been more amenable to the Lords, but ultimately they became solely amenable to the Commons. There was always responsibility, and who could dream or think that the Government established under the Commonwealth Bill would not be responsible? Responsible, to whom? It is impossible, to use the words of one speaker, that the Government could be responsible to two Houses. I will ask those who say that if they have seriously thought over it. In South Australia at the present time, with the small franchise which exists and with payment of members, the members of the Upper House are becoming more and more influential, more and more determined, less and less solely amenable to the mandate of the Lower House-quite equal to vetoing anything that that House does.

An HON MEMBER:

Do they do it?
Sir JOHN DOWNER:

They do so without the smallest hesitation and without those terrible deadlocks, by exercising this constitutional check, which is the very essential of their being. Lower that franchise a little more, as it probably will be as time goes on, and their authority will become greater and greater. The independence of the members will be more and more, their strength and determination will vastly increase, and who can say that, before long, Ministers will not be responsible to the Legislative Council as well as to the House of Assembly. I know that in other Parliaments, notably in New South Wales, there is not so liberal a form of representation. But that will come, no doubt. The feeling is growing all over the colonies. It will be resisted and resisted, but the ultimate result will be the same. And even in internal government, who can say how long Ministers will only be responsible to one branch of the Legislature. The very essence of that responsibility is gone in democratic communities. The principle that those who pay the taxes should alone vote them, which gives the Commons their power, does not at all apply here as it does in the precedent which we have departed from in substance, but are following in theory. It is only a question of time. It took hundreds of years for the Commons of Great Britain to discover the powers that were reposed in them simply by the provision that the King should impose no taxes without their consent, and that it should be done annually. And as time goes on our Legislative Councils will find out their powers, and although Ministers will continue to be responsible, they will have more to reckon with than they do now. I was very much struck with an illustration by one hon. member, the Premier of Victoria, as to something done in Victoria, I think. A Bill was introduced for a land and income tax, was sent up to the Legislative Council, and I think he said it was blocked, blocked, blocked,

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

New South Wales.

Mr. PEACOCK:

It occurred in both colonies.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

They sent it up again. Then he said-

At last we were desperate, and withdrew the Bill. We sent up a Bill with the income tax alone, and it was passed.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

That shows the Council was right.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

I do not care whether the Council was right or not, but it showed that the Council thought it ought to be able to veto any Bill. It showed the power of the Council when it had to be exercised. It was sent up in that form to force the Council to take something they did not like in order to get something they did not mind, and the Council determined to have an independent voice in the matter, and the Council prevailed.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Yes, unfortunately.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
No, I think it was well, because I think it would be well in every community, even in internal concerns, that the provision of the Commonwealth Bill should practically be carried out that only one subject of discussion should be in one Bill. The resolutions generally bind us to nothing specific, and wisely so, but they do mention one thing that might better have been omitted, and that is-

The National Assembly to be elected by districts formed on a population basis, and to possess the sole power of originating all Bills, appropriating revenue, or imposing taxation.

These are very eloquent words. They are words that were in the Queensland Act of Parliament, on which there was an appeal to the Queen in Council, and on which it was held that these words not only gave an exclusive right to the Lower House of introducing Bills, but prevented the Upper House from amending them either. These are the identical words; and I think it would be much wiser to leave them out, and not to bind ourselves down to a matter which is capable of great discussion. Some members say—Trust the people. I say—Trust the people. You have two peoples, or one people with a dual citizenship. Trust them to exercise both of them justly and right, and your trust will not be abused. If you have them both returned on the most liberal franchise— and I am assuming they are to be returned on the most liberal franchise—you have no more right to suppose that the citizens will be false to their citizenship of the Federation than false to their citizenship of the State. I believe that will be the only way you will bring about Federation. When you are trusting the people, making the franchise as liberal as possible, and giving the two Houses co-ordinate jurisdiction, then, I say, leave the responsibility of the Executive to work itself out. At first sight it would seem to be responsible to both Houses. Ultimately it will be so. If it be not so, every derogation of the dignity of the Upper House will be a loss to the individuality of the States, and every derogation from the dignity of the representatives will be a loss to the dignity of federated Australia. These are the principles on which I think you can work out a Constitution. that will be fair and just to all; and I object to the limitation about the introduction of Money Bills; I object to any understanding that the Executive is to be simply the mouthpiece of the House of Representatives; I object to Money Bills being solely in charge of the House of Representatives, and, although I was delighted with Mr. Wise's speech on the subject, because be explained how very much the importance of this matter was over-estimated, still that does not lead me away from the main point, that the very object of putting this limitation on the authority in the Bill is for the purpose of making the House of Representatives superior, and for the purpose of making the Government responsible to them alone. It is probable, whether Bills are originated in the House of Representatives alone or not, that the results may not be materially different. It is possible, but it may not be so. The limitation, as I have pointed out, is in America more than made up by immense powers, which attract all the best men to the Senate. The limitation here is without the superior advantages which the Senate there offers, and the effect of the limitation would be gradually to throw money matters and other matters more and more into the hands of the House of Representatives, and gradually to weaken the authority of the States Council. Now in Switzerland, which I only referred to incidentally, they recognised this, that the States Council must be quite as important as the National Assembly. There was no difference at all between the powers of either. The Americans followed the English precedent as it existed at the time, the Swiss followed the American precedent with such alterations and adaptations as they considered the altered circumstances required, and they did what every Federation except Canada has done - they recognised the impossibility of preserving the integrity of the States unless the powers of the Senate were absolutely equal to the powers of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HIGGINS:
They have not got responsible government.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
To the responsible government point I attach very little importance, because I think that will work itself out. It may not be the responsible government we know now, but there will be responsible government safely enough. All I say is: you trust the people, give them the freest institutions, let their voices be heard, and you will be safe.

Mr. ISAACS:
How do you, propose to make the Government responsible if they are in for a fixed time and cannot be removed for that period?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I am not aware that I have said they should be in for a fixed time.
Mr. ISAACS:
That is the Swiss plan.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I do not go for the Swiss system at all.

Mr. LYNE:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Although an Australian, I am at heart an Englishman. I am very glad to see other nations copying our lines and following our example; but, so far as they are concerned, Constitutions must be a growth, they cannot be statute made. Other countries are adopting our laws with such alterations as their own national peculiarities and traditions require. That is good for them. It does not follow it is good for us. The Swiss approached the matter with great thought and scientifically framed a Constitution which they thought would copy the American system, but would avoid its abuses, and, to the extent to which that method is responsive to the Swiss character, it will be effective. We, however, do not want to go there. We only know responsible government through the evolution of centuries; but in this instance we will have it evolved not in centuries but in days. The result of this will be a good understanding between the two Houses, great mutual respect, and peace and happiness. These at least are my opinions on that question. Now as to the railway question, because I do not want to speak at great length-

Mr. GRANT:
Would you have the same franchise for each House?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I would say about that that I would like to see the same franchise throughout Australia; but I want Federation, and, as I understand that Federation is something done by mutual agreement, I should not have the impertinence to dictate to the nation I wish to make an agreement with the precise terms on which the franchise should be framed. I should be perfectly satisfied that both Houses should be elected on our franchise, but I would not dictate it. I would only dictate that they should be both elected on the most liberal franchise that any colony has. I would leave it to the Federal Parliament to settle what the ultimate franchise should be; and I have no doubt that it will be satisfactory, and that a universal franchise will be adopted. We have not only to consider what proposal is best, but our views should be based on what is most expedient and what is practicable. If the colonies are all agreed that we shall settle the franchise, I would agree to it with the greater pleasure, but if the other colonies, or any important portion of them, consider that it is a matter for themselves to settle, I would agree with them; and I would not jeopardise the great cause of Federation by a stupid insistence on that which is impracticable. As to the question of the railways, I wish to say very little, because my friend Mr. O'Connor has exactly voiced my sentiments. I think the Commonwealth Bill has almost at present sufficient provisions to deal with the matter. I think that Part IV., sections 11 and 12, substantially deal with the question. As far as giving legislative authority to the Senate, and not sufficient powers of jurisdiction to the Courts, are concerned, that is a matter which can be easily altered later on. This will be an Imperial Act, and the Imperial Parliament may waive the royal prerogative as far as it pleases, and can make the Crown as amenable to the Courts as any of its servants are now. There is no substantial difficulty about that, but I distinctly disagree with the proposition that we have arrived at a sufficient stage to handicap the cause of Federation by taking this big subject into consideration. It will create endless disagreement; endless time will be taken up in attempting to carry it into effect. It may be done eventually, but then only sub modo. It can never be done absolutely, because we know there are so many railways which were never constructed with the idea that they would pay in the ordinary mercantile sense-constructed for the purpose of making valuable territory that is now valueless, and although we may get very little return from them, we get from the whole the return as a going concern-land and railways-and not from the railways alone. I think that nearly all the colonies of Australia will hesitate in the present state of their development to hand over their railways, and thus become helpless in authority and prevented from dealing with matters which are entirely of local concern. It is true in reference to the railways that in some places-a long way off, I hope-the railways are managed in a very unfair way, and by differential rates very unfair results are obtained and unfair injury is done to one colony by another. Now, the Commonwealth Bill has quite sufficient power for that as far as legislation is concerned, and a little alteration will make it quite sufficient as far as jurisdiction is concerned, but I think that is all we are ripe for, because I think it would be unwise at the present state of our effort to overweight this cause of Federation. Mr. Carruthers said the originators of the financial scheme of the Commonwealth Bill had admitted that the scheme was a failure. I suppose Mr. Carruthers means Sir Samuel Griffith, but Sir Samuel Griffith was not the originator of the financial part of the Commonwealth Bill. It was settled by Mr. McMillan, and amongst others, Sir Thomas McIlwraith, Sir Philip Fysh, and Mr.
Munro-in fact, by the Treasurers of different colonies; and I want to know, therefore, if Mr. Carruthers relied simply upon what Sir Samuel Griffith said when he made the remark that those who originated it condemned it. I find that Sir Samuel Griffith has formed his opinion upon statistics based upon the present tariff.

Mr. DEAKIN:
They are all hypothetical.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
They are worked out on the present system that works out unevenly, and is it any real basis to make calculations by reference to a system which you are passing legislation to alter? The very primary object, the great foundation of this Convention, is the desire to promote intercolonial freetrade, and to have a uniform tariff, and to make calculations upon a basis which we are called upon to alter, has only to be mentioned to show their unsuitability. At the Sydney Convention one of the Queensland delegates said Queensland would be placed in a monstrously unfair position as against South Australia. I mention this to show how fallacious these figures are when you come to examine them. The delegate said Queensland would be taxed 15s. 4d. per head, while South Australia would only have to pay a tax of 8s. 4d. per head; but he forgot that while Queensland would be taxed 15s. 4d. per head they would have had their post office taken over which they were working at a loss of 5s. per head, and we would have lost our post office which we were working at a gain of 2s. per head, and so the result would be 8s. 4d. per head upon both sides. I only mention these as very handy figures to show how very difficult it is to take these figures in the rough, without careful calculation, and make deductions from them. This financial question will give to the gentlemen competent to deal with it (which I do not profess to be) a great deal of trouble, but I believe in the end it will be found that the Commonwealth Bill will only be varied to this extent: that whilst the expenses of government will still be charged according to the population, the return of any surplus will also be according to population. But I hope there will not be any surplus at all.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

One of my strong reasons-in addition to its being a hindrance in the way of Federation-in opposing the handing over of the railways is that it will give the Federal Government too much money. I do not think that the Gordian knot in reference to the debts of the colonies is such a difficult thing as my friend Mr. Holder imagines. The Customs, of course, will give the Federation a large surplus, and that will have to be returned unless you do something else. Mr. Holder says that the proposal to take over the debts is impracticable. I do not think so at all. I do not think that the Gordian knot which my hon. friend referred to is a matter of such great difficulty as he appears to think. I think we can easily so arrange the finances of the Federation that whilst I do not, like the Premier of Victoria, want to see them short of funds, care should be taken that they do not have too much. On the whole I think I would rather they had a little too little than a little too much.

Mr. TRENWITH:

They cannot go on with too little.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

These are all the remarks I wish to offer to the Convention. I am sorry I have detained members so long-longer than I intended. This subject has been one of anxious thought to many of us for many years, and I do not profess to have come now to absolute and final conclusions. I believe that if we take the phrase of the day-this time meaning it, and not merely saying it - and make both Houses liberal, and trust the people, the result will be that our Federation will work out with that fairness and peace that everyone of us desire.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

With Sir John Downer, I feel some diffidence, after the remarks that were made on the formal motion for adjournment this morning, in addressing this Convention at all, and if I thought it was the general wish that the debate should close, or that I should not address it, I should be very willing to give way. Now, it seems to me that, after all, some benefit may accrue from this general debate, and those of us who have something to say that we think will throw light upon the work of the Committee, I think, are entitled to have their say. In the very able, concise, and practical speech of the Premier of Victoria there was one sentiment with which I cannot altogether agree. He said that we were here more in the light of negotiators than of lawmakers. Now, I think if he had said the exact opposite, he would have been nearer the truth. Hon. members will recollect that in the year 1890 there was a tentative effort made towards this great movement of the Federation of the Australian Colonies. But the men who represented the different colonies at that Conference were Ministers of the Crown under Executive appointment; and in the year 1891, as the outcome of the movement, a Convention was held which was the result of a series of resolutions in the different Houses of Parliament. At that time, we met together, not under any Enabling Act; but on the present occasion we are met here, not to do tentative work, not under any unnecessary suspicion of each other, but by a mandate from our Parliaments, which has been assented to by the people, to absolutely frame a Constitution. Now, I recollect that at those two previous meetings, at which I had the honor to be present, there was some sort of nervous feeling amongst the members lest any unpleasant words, lest any want of judgment, or any appearance of passion might have broken up those meetings into their original elements. Therefore we sat under some kind of restraint. The characteristic of the present meeting is this: We have no fear of any such result. I cannot imagine that we should meet together in this Convention in accordance with the mandate of the people, and return to our several colonies, without carrying out that mandate. It does seem to me that the most practical way in which any member can assist the ultimate workings of this Convention is to say clearly and freely the difficulties he sees in the path of our undertaking. I must say that I am seized more and more of the enormous difficulties that we have to surmount; and I think it is best to make a short statement of those difficulties, for this reason: if the people of the Australian Colonies imagine for one moment that they are going to have a scientific system of Federation, they may wait till the crack of doom. The more we voice forth in this preliminary debate, which I presume will be read throughout the length and breadth of the Australian Colonies, the terrible difficulties we have to encounter, and the more we see them, we will find that it is not a matter of a scientific basis, but a question of practical statesmanship we have got to meet, and the more will the people be satisfied that we have done the best under the circumstances. We have to face, in the first place, the federation of a number of contiguous communities, of which we have no other such example in the world. In the American Constitution, when it was framed, they had to face a somewhat similar position, but there they had instead of six States thirteen States, and the number of States increased by leaps and bounds during the succeeding years. Here we have a number of States, every one of which has all the possibilities of national life, and every one of which can carry out its own national destiny almost independent of the rest; and we also have to face the necessity, while we make it upon a broad democratic basis, of making a strong Central Government which will prevent any of these atoms dominating over the rest. There is no doubt that as the colonies stand now-and belonging to the mother-colony of New South Wales, as I do, I will speak frankly on this - with the increase of population of that colony, with its great territory and its great resources, it-may become, in a short time a dangerously dominating factor in the Australian Colonies. We must see, not to the more immediate present, but to the long future, because we want, not a temporary, but an indissoluble union, and I trust that that which was left out of the preamble of the American Constitution will be included in ours. Now, I do not intend to weary this Convention by quoting a lot of unnecessary figures, but I will try to get rid of a few at the start; and I think it would be well to give a few figures to show the divergence which exists in the different colonies. The first figures I will take deal with the existing tariffs. If we had a tariff like New South Wales it would bring in £3,285,000.

Mr. DEAKIN:
For what area?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I mean for all the colonies?

Mr. DEAKIN:
Does that include Queensland and New Zealand?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
No, only the five which are represented here; although I may say that I trust that all our deliberations and all our schemes will be based on the hope of Queensland being represented very soon; and if there is sacrifice necessary then it should be made with a view to that colony being included, because we do not want in the future any colony to have to negotiate for certain conditions. We want one uniform Constitution under which all may live. I have said that the Customs and Excise duties, according to the New South Wales tariff, would be £3,285,945; with the Victorian it would be £7,310,781; with the South Australian, £6,294,249; with the Western Australian, £4,922,214; and with the Tasmanian, £7,748,759. Now, I mention these figures and those I shall subsequently refer to for this reason. We have heard a great deal about compromise; but we must not only have compromise, but sacrifice. When you consider the variety of production of these colonies, the difference in their wealth, varied powers of consumption, all of which will be found in that valuable and interesting book, Coghlan's "Seven Colonies of Australasia, 1895-6," you will clearly see, as I said before, that we can have no scientific basis and no mere compromise, but sacrifice, must be considered. This involves other important questions—it involves the question of the position of the freetrade policy of New South Wales, and I will give figures to show how difficult the task of the finances may be. The total existing tariff of the different colonies represented at this Convention is £4,292,000, according to the latest statistics compiled by our statisticians.

An HON. MEMBER:
Is that all the duties?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Of that amount spirits realise £1,522,000 and specific duties £1,516,000. Now, here is the question: you have to make up the gap, and if you went upon the all-round principle of ad valorem duties it would take 22 1/2 per cent. ad valorem to make up the gap. Clearly, that is a very serious thing for New South Wales with her freetrade policy. Therefore some great sacrifices must be considered.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Can you give the items of each colony?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

No; but I can get them afterwards and lay them upon the table of the House.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

How much of that does New South Wales contribute?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

In the Convention of 1891 we had another colony represented, and there has been an enormous fall in the receipts from Customs of the different colonies. The amount surprised me, and I referred to Mr. Coghlan again, as I thought he had made a mistake. These figures show a tremendous change and how absolutely difficult it is to embody a scheme on any scientific basis. Now, we will take the wealth of the different colonies. No; I will pass that over, as I do not wish to deal too much in figures. A great deal of interest is taken in the question of the surplus, and I only refer to that incidentally now. There was a very stupid mistake made by the Finance Committee of the 1891 Convention, of which I was a member, but the intention was clear, and if they had worked it out in the same arithmetical way as Sir Samuel Griffith did they would have avoided the mistake. I take Sir Samuel Griffith's figures, which are from the Year Book of 1896, and I take Mr. Coghlan's "Population of the Seven Colonies, 1895-6," and I can give my figures in detail to any member who may like to see them. I will, however, just give an instance to show the absolute impossibility of getting at a definite result. When you work out the problem it brings out this result: that the surplus to be distributed would mean per head to New South Wales, £1 8s. 7d.; Victoria, £1 13s. 5d.; Queensland, £2 1s. 7d.; South Australia, £1 5s. 7d.; Tasmania, £1 10s. 2d.; and West Australia, £4 16s. 8d. I think these figures are sufficient to show the absolute impossibility of coming to a conclusion at the present time. It shows us that there are two things that are necessary in looking at the work before us. First, that we have got to make the best of a very difficult task, with the judgment and wisdom we possess, and trust to its working out; and also that in some of the questions now insoluble we must trust to the wisdom and judgment and patriotism of the men who will form the Federal Parliament in the years to come. There are some things of a more humorous character which attract one's attention. We have got here some gentlemen on the opposite benches of Victoria who hold advanced political views. We have here, too, gentlemen from South Australia who also hold equally advanced views; but if you change them from one colony to another they differ materially on federal questions. Victoria desires to a very great extent to emasculate the Upper Chamber, but these gentlemen from South Australia want to keep it in full possession of its privileges, as an essential condition of Federal Government. This shows that even among ourselves there are divergences in political views—democrats or tories, whatever we may be—which make it necessary for us to come together to make the best of a very difficult matter. We talk about a democratic federation; but it is the plan for one map to dub himself a democrat and another a tory, and if you ask him for a definition of either he cannot give it. I trust this question of an extreme democracy will be made subversive to the idea of bringing out a good and sound and workable system. I did not intend, as there has been a large amount of debate on this question, to offer my views, as naturally a layman in the midst of such a company of distinguished lawyers—we have heard speeches from some of them which would be a credit to any assembly in the world—in the midst of this atmosphere so profoundly legal, I feel some little diffidence in giving my views; but I have heard some arguments which were so absolutely subversive of the true principles of Federal Government and the bi-cameral system of Government, that I should like to say a word or two upon them. Now the first thing is that we must have two Houses; and I think that in this matter we have been inclined too much to consider the second Chamber entirely as a States House, without considering that the principle of bi-cameral government is also introduced. Now, I take it that, no matter how extreme or democratic many hon. members may be in this Convention, if we were going to have a unified form of government, we would have a Government with two Houses of Parliament. Therefore we must not lose sight of the characteristic necessities of that kind of Government. Now take, for instance, its practical working. There will be two sets of questions that will be debated in the Federal Parliament. In the first place you will have questions, no doubt, which refer to the particular interests of the States, and on these questions, whatever they may be, this Second Chamber will be essentially a States Council; but are there not to be questions on which disagreements may occur which refer to the interests of the people as a whole? Are there not questions which may be considered by a popular Assembly which has got out of touch with the people and the country, and which requires the firm and moderating hand of another Chamber to keep it in check? Therefore I feel strongly that in all these questions about the Senate - which is, I believe, the best term we can use - we must keep fairly in view the necessities of bi-cameral government. Now, I give in my adhesion with my friend Sir John Downer to the fullest possible franchise for electing the members of the Senate; and I am glad that this was practically acknowledged by nearly all the candidates in New South Wales who have the honor of a seat here to-day. I say that because I am glad it was acknowledged and approved of before we were elected ourselves; otherwise it might have been said that as we were the elect of the people we were more anxious to see it adopted now that it had been tried. I think that, with only one or two exceptions, candidates for the Convention in New South Wales were all in favor of electing the members of the Senate by the vote of the people as a whole. Now we must recollect that we talk a great deal about the interests, the democratic interests, connected with the government of the country, but you want to have your government a good government, and you want to have it a strong government. You might have 100 men elected by Legislatures to one branch of the Federal Parliament, and these men might represent the various interests, yet you might not get as much brains boiled down in the whole lot of them as would make a statesman, and therefore you must recollect that if this Senate is to be a Chamber not merely representing States rights, but to be a great moderating assembly - an assembly in which the judgment and wisdom and patriotism of the country is represented - you must make that Chamber of a character which will insure that judgment, and which will introduce within its walls men of that character. If you attempt to emasculate the powers of that House, and to degrade it into a mere recording angel of the other assembly, then you will not get men of intelligence and character to enter it. It should be the blue ribbon of political life; it should be represented by men who have won their spurs in other assemblies; it should be represented by men of high character who could not enter political life perhaps under any other circumstances; it ought, in fact, to be the Chamber where judgment, and wisdom, and moderation should rule. There is much less chance of this dreaded deadlock if you get that class of men who feel the responsibility of their position, and who have experience and wisdom, than if you attempt to degrade the Senate and admit a lower grade of men into it, because you must recollect this, that in Parliament we are not like a lot of alien policemen watching one another, and we are not some wonderful contrivance to satisfy the plutocrats and the capitalists; but the two Houses of Parliament are simply machinery for carrying on good government. It is all very well to talk about finances and the insoluble questions which will meet us here, and which will meet us in the future, but it is not so much a question of the difficulties which meet us, but the calibre of the men who will have to solve them. If it is necessary in a bicameral system of government to have coordinate powers in the Second Chamber, it is doubly necessary in a federal system of national government, because I believe more in the expression "national" government than "federal" government, and in the midst of all these difficulties which will face us it will be more the sentiment of national union than any other which will solve the problem. There is another thing which it may be as well to debate alongside this question of the Senate, and it is the question of deadlocks. In the first instance, however, I will say what I mean by the dignity and co-ordinate powers of the Senate. I do not think that is a matter of practical government-and we can only judge of the future by the present-that you can give the power of amendment to the Senate in the ordinary Appropriation Bill-of the Bill which has innumerable items for carrying on the public service of the country. That Bill is based on the provisions of Bills of taxation, in which I believe the Senate should have practically co-ordinate powers for two reasons. It seems to me that, outside the Appropriation Bill, which I cannot say logically should not be open to amendment except on practical grounds, in matters of all other other kinds it is a ridiculous thing to say that you may veto but you cannot give suggestions. Now, we know that proposal was made, and it was embodied in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, by which, forsooth, the Senate would send an ad misericordiam appeal to the Lower House, and, cap in hand, ask them to be good enough to take into consideration the suggestions they had to make. Is that not an undignified and slavish way of dealing with a co-ordinate House? We come to the question of deadlocks, and I think this has been made a tremendous bogey. Now, if we do away with deadlocks we tire liable to do away with the one great thing likely to prevent the corruption of the popular branch of the Legislature.

Mr. ISAACS:
In America the corruption is the other way.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I have the greatest admiration for my hon. friend Mr. Isaacs, and for his magnificent speech, showing so much legal learning and knowledge of constitutional history, but I say the more we keep to our own conditions the better; and in dealing with responsible government we are simply trying to make a government based upon the present system, which will include the federal idea. Mr. O'Connor has suggested that you should have a second Session of Parliament if there was a deadlock over an ordinary Appropriation Bill, but you cannot wait for another Session of Parliament for an Appropriation Bill, and if you had another Session of Parliament it would result in a farce, for all a Government would have to do would be to prorogue for two or three days and meet again. I wish hon. members to see that the vetoing of the Appropriation Bill would be one of the, extreme steps of the Senate - that it would be practically, if they were in the wrong, inviting a revolution in the country. There is a very thin line between a deadlock and a revolution. There is no doubt if it were proved by experience that it often occurred it would be necessary to have some mechanical appliances, but I do not see that under the present circumstances we should anticipate them. In matters of deadlock the plan to solve the difficulty to be practical must be one to gain time. Outside the Appropriation Bill there is no piece of legislation introduced into Parliament that cannot bide a wee, and there is nothing more dangerous than the hasty piling up of legislation simply for the purpose of doing something. Let us see for a moment what are the elements we have to face. I myself thought at one time that in this election for the Senate there should be some property qualification, and I thought every man who voted in a block vote should pay some tax, but I am willing to waive that. We have now new proposals or the election of a Senate, and this has been one of the most interesting pieces of political evolution during the last two or three years. We have got a Senate the members of which are elected by a block vote, instead of by a log-rolling Parliament. It will strengthen rather than weaken it, for we get down to the bedrock of democracy. We should believe that in the election for the Senate the best men-the men who have given good service to the country, who have long records of public work behind them-will be selected, and we will have the right stamp of men to carry on the legislative work. If we have these men do you think it is likely they would attempt to do the only one thing that can throw the country into confusion-throw out the Appropriation Bill? We must not consider that these men going into this Council are lunatics, and I say no man, unless he were a lunatic, would dare to throw out an Appropriation Bill unless he felt he had an utterly corrupt Assembly to deal with. Again, according to the Bill, every three years one-half of the senators will retire for election. Every three years, as often as the popular branch of the Legislature, these hon. members will go for election, and they will go back probably at a time when these burning questions are upon the tapis. Do you mean to tell me it is credible - if there is an extreme tension between the two Houses upon some vital and important question-when those men go back to their constituencies, who are practically the same people as the other constituencies, they will not have the sense to gather up all the public opinion of the day, so that when they go back-renewing one-half of their own House - they will not so permeate the other half with their views as to make it impossible to continue opposition to the will of the people? It seems to me that by a happy concurrence of circumstances, such as those which affected the making of the American Constitution, we have now evolved a kind of Senate and machinery which do away with a great many of what are called the democratic objections. Now, it seems to me there is practically no essential difference in this matter-outside the Appropriation Bill-between a Money Bill and any other Bill whatever.

Mr. LYNE:
Would you give them power to amend Taxation Bills?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Certainly I would give them the power to amend Taxation Bills. Take a Loan Bill, for instance. Supposing you had a recklessly extravagant Government - and we must take every possible contingency that might occur in the future-supposing you had a Parliament with a corrupt Ministry, supposing you had that little game going on which might be possible under certain circumstances in regard to the expenditure of public money under different States-the game of "Scratch me and I'll scratch you"-and supposing there was a Bill introduced which required a loan of ten millions of money when it was clear that probably five millions of money was nearer the amount that should be raised, do you mean to tell me there is any common sense in sending that Bill up to a House and asking them either to veto it or pass it when they are willing to pass £5,000,000, but not £10,000,000? The thing is really absurd. As I have said before, this process of suggestion is inimical to all that condition of prestige, dignity, and power which should distinguish this Chamber, which makes this Chamber practically the recognition of our national existence, the one continuous Chamber to which we will look for the continuity of our national life, and the one Chamber which, I believe, should contain all the best elements of the nation which may be wanted at any time to keep us from absolute destruction.

Mr. BARTON:
That depends on whether it represents the people.
Mr. HIGGINS:

But a Loan Bill is not a Taxation Bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

The same logical argument about the people applies to every Bill. You might just as well say that the whole argument of the hon. member simply leads to one Chamber, that you must put nothing between the will of the people, that you must have no check upon the Government and no safeguard against a corrupt House. I say most distinctly, and feel it as one of the strongest of my political faiths, that no country and no nation is safe that gives up absolutely into the hands of one man or one Assembly the whole of its rights and privileges. Now, with regard to the House of Representatives, I need not say anything further. That House must have the initiation of Money Bills, and I believe with those who say it, that where you have responsible government, as we understand it, that House must in certain matters dominate; that is to say, while the other House upon all matters must have co-ordinate powers, the House which has the purse must have the Executive. For instance, in spite of what was said by Sir John Downer, can you imagine the Treasurer being in the Upper House in the Federal Parliament? Can you imagine all the machinery of the Government which goes on from day to day, and which must be made in one Chamber and not in two, being outside the popular branch of the Legislature? Therefore, it does seem to me that if you have responsible government at all the price you pay for it is, to a certain extent, the power of initiation in one Chamber and the sitting of the principal members of the Executive in that Chamber which holds the purse strings. You cannot, if you want an ideal government and if you want to carry on the government on the principles to which we have been used in years gone by, ignore the principle to which I have just alluded. There is no doubt that there is great difficulty in the Federal Government in regard to this matter of responsibility, and there may be dangers in the future to face where the selection of Ministers may be, to a great extent, from one or two colonies. Sir John Macdonald—who had the fathering, and, if not the fathering, the nursing, of the Canadian system of government—was sufficiently shrewd to make a sort of mosaic of his Ministry or Cabinet by selecting men representing different States and interests, and so successful was he—and I think it is a very dangerous thing to be so successful—that for fourteen years that eminent statesman carried on without any interruption. Therefore the position of Canada in some matters at the present time, until we see it work a little longer, is no exact analogy for us. It comes back to the same thing. A great deal will depend, not exactly upon the interests represented, but upon the character of the men who represent them. A great deal must depend upon the judgment and wisdom of the men who form the first Federal Parliament. While dealing now with constitutional matters I would like to say a word or two about the franchise. I think it is a very reasonable thing, for those who take up the view, that the first franchise should be upon the most liberal principles, because they contend that the first work of the new Parliament will be work that may fix the destiny of the people for a long period of years. The first Parliament, which will sit for three years, will have a great work to perform. It will have the making of the tariff, the assimilation of different laws, and will do probably a larger amount of concentrated work in those three years than will ever be done in the future. I see great reason for having as nearly an ideal franchise as possible for the first Parliament. You can have no Executive until you have your Parliament, and unless you have some arrangement with the different States to carry out honestly and fairly the system you lay down I do not see how you are going to have your Parliament elected except on the franchise at present existing in each State. No doubt they would be free to say we will have the principle of one man one vote. That might be done, but, on the other hand, it would be very difficult. Certain arrangements would have to be made, and if it were done you could not be perfectly certain it was honestly carried out. I should be glad to agree to a franchise which would be decided on by Parliament hereafter. Now, there are just a couple of things I would like to say with regard to the powers to be handed over to the Federal Government. There seem to be two principles on which to decide what powers are to be handed over to the national government. In the first place, you must hand over what is necessary to give it sovereign power. I take it that we want to establish a strong, stable national government, which will reflect our national life, and by which we will be able to confront the whole outside world. In the next place, we must not have anything taken from the States which they can properly carry out as their own local work; and deducible from these it seems to me there will be one other difficulty which we shall have to face. Look at the matter from a proper scientific basis, and it seems to me that once you give over power to the Central Government it will be very difficult to restrict it by this Constitution. In other words, to give an illustration, if we give over the railways to the Central Government, it seems to me that to put in the Constitution specific restrictions upon their powers to deal with the railways would be difficult upon a scientific basis. At the same time our work will bristle with unscientific things which are necessary for the work we have to do. With regard to Customs and taxation, we all agree that the powers should be given over. I must dissent from the very interesting speech by my hon. friend Mr. Henry in thinking that a moment could be lost from the time this Constitution comes into power or the general election takes place. Not a moment should be lost in giving over those necessary powers.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

Hear, hear.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

And as to allowing a long time to people to get used to certain conditions and not hurry them, it is kinder to be often hurried, so that matters may, soon reach the new level. At the same time there will be an enormous difficulty in dealing with the tariffs. You will have a certain surplus to give back, and this surplus will have to be of a definite character. You will have a certain central revenue to provide for, and you must make the Customs sufficiently large and expansive to work all these different things. Therefore it seems to me that we ought to have, for the first five years, a tariff upon very broad principles, and leave it for the future to find out all those differentiations-if I may use the term-which may guide us to a purely freetrade or a purely protective tariff. The tariff of the first Parliament will have to be met by certain broad, liberal principles to carry on the finances of the country, and not with any distinctive policy. The post and telegraph departments are, of course, to be given up. There is no logic in giving them up, but, as a matter of necessity and convenience and safety. We do not expect to get any revenue out of them. It would be absurd to expect a surplus from the Central Government. With the necessities of modern life we want quickness of transmission and absolute secrecy of postage.

Mr. DOBSON:

When will you fix it that the tariff of the new Parliament should come into operation?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I do not think any Parliament will cause any tariff to come into operation at once. They would probably make it come in twelve months after it passed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You would have that effect because when you increase the duties would it not have the effect of swamping the country by the goods imported in the meantime to avoid the duty?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It might; but I have found that there is not such a tremendous amount of such operations carried on as most people imagine.

Mr. TRENWITH:

That is not the question before us.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It is not; but very often a question of immediate financial need takes place, and, under that, consideration is not given to the traders, because the Treasurer feels that every day he is losing that which would come in under the new tariff. I do not think he would be, but what he lost in one way he would probably gain in another. Now, I come to a question which is one of the most practical and one of the most interesting, of the whole of the matters before us. That is the question of the surplus. Now, this question is very intimately bound up with the railways. I should like first to refer to the error made in the Bill of 1891. In that Bill the following will be found, and I consider myself as responsible as anyone else for it. In the Bill of 1891, in the portion dealing with finances, it says:

And the surplus shall, until uniform duties of Customs have been imposed, be returned to the several States or parts of the Commonwealth in proportion to the amount of revenue raised therein respectively.

Of course, if that were done it would simply mean the ignoring of the differentiations of expenditure. In my addresses to the electors of New South Wales I put as concisely as I could what I thought the words should be:

Each State would be credited in the first instance with the whole of the revenue derived from taxation on services taken over by the Federal Government. It would then be debited with either the actual expenditure on such services or the amount each State would appear to have saved, according to its latest Blue Book of annual expenditure.

In addition it would be debited with its own proportion of the cost of the Central Government pure and simple. Supposing the revenue that you get from one State was £2,000,000; supposing the expenditure was £500,000; then there would be £1,500,000 returned to that State, less its proportion, according to population, of the expenditure of the Central Government. Supposing its proportion was £200,000 then £1,300,000 would be returned to that State; and there is no doubt that as the matter stands at present you could not have a fairer or more equitable system, because it exactly puts each State, apart from its contribution to the Central Government, where it was before. But when you come to look at what would be the result in the future if you admitted a population basis, the whole thing would fall to the ground. Many gentlemen have said:

Let things go on for the first twelve months or so till the Federal Parliament has made its own tariff, and then divide the surplus on a population basis.

I will tell you what would happen if you did that—New South Wales would gain £319,500.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Is that considering a uniform tariff or the present tariff?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I am taking it this way—the average per head of population at present means a range of figures, as I have already pointed out, from £1 8s. 7d. to £4 16s. 8d. The average per head is £1 13s. 7d. Therefore the simplest way is to take the distribution for each colony on the basis of £1 13s. 7d. per head, and I will show what the results would be if that were done on a purely population basis. I will take the first case fully. New South Wales would get now, under the system I have outlined, £1 8s. 7d. per head, and, by the average system, £1 13s. 7d.; therefore New South Wales would gain £319,500, Victoria would gain £9,800, Queensland would lose £184,200, South Australia would gain £143,000, Tasmania would gain £27,500, and Western Australia would lose £319,300. These figures show clearly that you cannot have any definite arrangement at the present time, and it seems to me that I am asking for a temporary solution of the difficulty when I suggest that we must take as a basis the time when the Commonwealth Bill comes into operation. In the first place the whole of the revenue from each State which would be handed over to the Federal Government would be credited to that State. It would then be ascertained what would be the amount saved arising out of the expenses of management, and from the balance thus accruing would be deducted the special charges for the Central Government. The scheme I suggest is the only way in which we can keep the finances in touch with each State Parliament.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Are yours hard and fast lines?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I say for a period. If hon. members look at these figures they will see that they can lay down no scientific rule, but you must give to these State Parliaments and Treasurers a specific sum that they will be absolutely able to calculate upon. Therefore, as I said early in my address, we must resort to unscientific expedients.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Why not give them exactly the sum they will surrender by the loss of their Customs and post office revenue?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I might do that exactly, but you cannot without paying the cost of administration. After the Central Government has calculated what it has spent itself, it would return to each colony the balance, after deducting per head the charge for the Central Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
How would you ascertain what proportion they have contributed?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
By a bookkeeping system in the first place, or by their own Blue Books, from which it can be ascertained for any colony in the group.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
From the present Blue Books?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Yes; or by the Blue Book for the year previous to the Commonwealth coming into existence. Now, as regards this fearful attempt at national accounts, this terrible analysis of all classes of expenditure; much, as a business man, I am fond of this sort of thing in some ways, I say it would be impossible, as a federal matter on true federal principles, to bring about such a system, and I imagine that another item of expenditure would be necessary if it were adopted—a vote for a lunatic asylum. Now there is another error into which some of my friends, for whom I have the greatest respect, have fallen, and it is this, they have got elaborate plans for covering up this surplus. They say that if you eliminate a certain amount of the States expenditure and pass it, with the liabilities or without the liabilities, to the Central Government, you get rid of this vexed question; but suppose you cover up that surplus, you only do so for a time. Do you think that the population, the revenue, and the material progress of the different States are going to stand still? In five years after you cover it up it will come to the front again. There is no analogy in our position and the position of the United States, and if you say that this surplus, which will be a continual matter of bickering and ill-will, can be covered up in this manner, you mistake the whole thing.

Mr. BARTON:
Does not the cost of government usually increase as the Customs revenue increases?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
There is a large amount of surplus Customs revenue which has practically nothing to do with covering up the expenditure on particular matters handed over to the Central Government, and this revenue, of course, you cannot discriminate in regard to the different points. As the country increases in connection with the development of its land, and the populations are doubled and the money is required, the States will say: "We are giving you double Customs revenue, and our people are paying double for certain services." Under present circumstances, as far as it is possible to forecast, I say that this thing must be continually cropping up and causing trouble.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Unless you give them the railways.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

This brings me to the question of the railways. Now I want to lay this down, that you have to debate every question on its merits, and that it is a bad thing politically, as in other things, to try to get out of one difficulty by getting into a bigger one. Before I touch on the question of the distribution of the surplus Customs duty, I may say parenthetically that I will call attention to the condition of the railways a little more closely than has been done by any member up to the present time. As a man of business, and

An HON. MEMBER:

And partially Queensland.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I will preface what I am going to say by remarking that I would put in the Constitution the power, subject to the adhesion and will of the States, to take over the railways and make them a federal property.

Mr. BARTON:

A clause in the Bill of 1891 covers that.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I wish to point out from a political point of view, as I said a short time ago, it is a very difficult thing, once you give over power, to restrict it. Once you give over the railways to the Federal Government, you give over a great power. You are dealing with a sovereign national power, and I doubt very much—although I am willing, as I said, not to stand upon any doctrinaire views—I doubt very much, if we put in the Bill that we give over the railways, we can impose restriction upon them afterwards. There are other things. Suppose you have a large inter-network of railway communication, do you not think that the very working of these railways by a central political power would interfere with the character of the local life; and do you think it is a wise thing to have a great body of servants running over the whole of the colonies—not like the postmasters—but a great army of servants practically dominating the highways of the country, and quite independent of local opinion? Do you not think it is dangerous, and do you not think it is a great political power? Would anyone like to see the enormous railway systems of the United States under one executive? There are now 70,000 postmen in the hollow of their hands, but would anyone like to see half a million of men dominated by a central power? I say this Convention is not competent to draw up any scheme of the kind. We might sit here for twelve months and not arrive at a solution. The difficulty would be to make safeguards. There is a close connection between the settlement of land and the making of railways. In New South Wales we have two-thirds of the territory unalienated from the Crown, and we get two millions of revenue from it; and we want to make that land, which in many places is a desert, to flower like a garden; and we think that large schemes of irrigation ought to be the handmaiden of a railway system. In times gone by irrigation should have gone hand in hand with the railway system, and from that very point of view at the present moment I am strongly of the opinion—much as I like this general control under one head—that it would be unwise to place the railways under the Federal Government. There is another reason. It is a simple thing to say, "Give over the railways to the Federal Government," but we cannot give over the railways without giving the Parliament power to construct in the future and, in the first place, as a matter of common sense, is it likely that a central body is better able to judge whether lines are needed in provinces than the provinces themselves? Some people have said:

Oh, give over the railways to the Federal Government, and then make your own branch lines on your own account.

That is to say, make a branch line on your own account that would not pay for ten years, perhaps; and then when it begins to pay hand it over to the Federal Government, or, as one proposal puts it:

The Federal Government should build the railway, and charge you annually with the lose,

Take a practical case. Supposing your railways pay 3 3/4 per cent. on the capital, you can raise money at 3 1/2 per cent., and you want to construct a railway into part of your own territory for productive purposes. If you borrow your money at 3 1/2 per cent. and your railways yield 3 3/4 per cent., you can afford to lose for ten years on that branch line; but if you make and own an isolated fragment you lose year by year.

Mr. LYNE:

What about uniformity of gauge?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

No doubt there are many ideal things we should like to see in Australia. No doubt we should like to see an ideal Federation. But before I come to the break-of-gauge question I would like to ask any of the hon. members who know of the unfortunate bickerings, the log-rolling, and the heartburning which occur in our local Parliament when the Minister of Public Works brings down his railway budget, is that going to be any better, but will it not be intensified in the case of a fight between the two Houses in regard to the construction of any line of railway under a Federal Government?

Mr. FRASER:

Does not your standing Railways Committee propose these works?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

That is all very nice, but the Government has to initiate them. Our Standing Works Committee has been very wrongly used. It is simply a check for the House on the Government, but unfortunately Governments have been too prone—when their followers were anxious to get some of their beautiful lines of railways—to say:

Oh, very well, we will hand it over to the Public Works Committee, knowing very well they would never hear of it again. But the Government must ultimately take the responsibility, and the Government under a federal system would make all its lines on federal principles. It would make its lines to pay, and if you wanted a non-paying line you would have to construct it yourself.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Could you not refer the question of making these unproductive lines to the States Parliaments?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

No; you could not do that. I feel that I have already occupied more than my fair share of the time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Well occupied.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I have not altogether finished with the question of railways, and I come to that interesting matter, railway rates. There are three distinct kinds of rates now understood amongst the railway managers. First there is mileage, next there are differential rates, and lastly there are preferential rates. If the whole railway system of a country, or series of colonies, could be worked on the basis of mileage, it would simplify matters very much; but at the same time I am advised by railway experts that it would be impossible to carry out any system of railway on business principles unless you had differential rates. It will be clear to everybody that as you advance in the civilisation of and the opening up of new country, you must give inducements of a differential character to enable people who take up their abode there and relieve the congested condition of centres of population to compete with those nearer the market. With preferential rates we have a different matter before us. They simply mean this, that you try to induce trade through your territory by giving greater advantages to your neighbors than you give to your own people. I think there should be a very specific clause in our Constitution Bill absolutely abnegating that principle, and I think that in the Constitution there should be power, subject to the consent of the individual States, to take over at any time the railway systems, which will practically satisfy all those who are advocates of one uniform system.
It does not follow that the future should be a political system at all. I look upon the Central Government as a great negotiator in regard to questions between States, and there is no doubt that we should have in it one high centralising power instead of a lot of disconnected atoms, able to deal with the different colonies on the basis of common sense and mutual interest in bringing about settlements for the benefit of all. I look forward to the time when this great railway system shall become a similar network to that you have in the United States, and one central system outside political control will dominate the whole of the railways of Australia. Now, I come to the question of gauge, and this again is a matter for the future. If it is to be found as a great national object that we should make a uniform gauge for military and other purposes there is no reason why a grant should not be made by the Central Government for this and other purposes according as the necessity arises. What I mean to say is that the question of uniform gauge is not one that is absolutely set aside by our not handing over to the Constitution the control of the railways to the Central Government. It is a matter that will have to be done gradually. It will probably be commenced with a grand trunk line for military purposes, and then no doubt ultimately the 4ft. 8 1/2 in. gauge will dominate the whole of the Australian system.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Is not far too much made of it by military men?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I do not know. It does not matter so much for the transport of troops; but for the munitions of war it means a terrible waste of time to have to transport them from one system to another. I hold, as I said before, that this is not a matter which this Convention can deal with beyond the boundaries
I have indicated. When you have this Central Government, with the ablest men connected with its administration from all parts of Australia, we shall have a better basis to act upon than any basis we have at present. I shall not touch on the question of trade being diverted along the waterways of the different colonies. We can better leave that matter to the Committee. I now come to the question of the debt of the colonies.
We must recollect that the debts are divided into two parts. First you have the great railway debt of the colonies, which at the present time, taking Queensland into consideration, is £110,332,778, but outside of that is a debt of £69,412,307; and it is a very proper thing to keep these debts separate. These debts of £69,412,307 differentiate themselves into two parts. Of course a great mass of these debts have been incurred for reproductive works, but when you speak of reproductive works you use a big word and a loose term. That divides itself again into what you may call interest-bearing assets, and others; because in many cases, under democratic rule, many things which were self-supporting have been swept away, and are now a complete charge on the State Government. Speaking of the surplus which will have to be handed back to the colonial governments, and which is bound up to a certain extent with the debt of the colonies, I would point out that as the debts come near to maturity, for those covered by a high rate of interest there will have to be some capitalising at a certain rate, and then it may gradually be taken over in that way by the Central Government; but, when we talk of giving over to the Federal Government the whole of the debts for the purposes of consolidation, we scarcely see what a tremendously large order that is. When you consider the various rates of interest dominating in connection with these debts, and when you consider the different times when they mature and all the differentiation, you will see that the task of making a complete scheme now is utterly beyond the power of the Convention. It is very well to talk about consolidation and having a process of conversion by which you can save half a million a year. You would no doubt save money under a certain scheme if you created a sinking fund, but I do not believe any one of the colonies would, for the sake of waiting twenty years, increase the capital debt for all time. Who will tell us upon what terms-we can go to the English creditors? Better wait until we have our Federal Government formed. When you have your Central Treasury, and your Central Executive composed of the beat talent and knowledge of Australia, and when you have your Agent-General, or whatever you may call him, for all the colonies-when the English people hear you speak with the voice of one people-you may be able to draw up a scheme for the conversion of your debts. I must say that the only common-sense scheme up to the present time is to allow these debts to die a natural death, to let them mature, and then you can borrow at a rate perhaps far beyond your present dreams. In order to show the position I had a return prepared, from which I find that in New South Wales we have between this time and 1912 £13,082,150 of debt maturing, the interest on which ranges from 6 to 3 per cent., but it is mostly 4 and 5 per cent., although some of it is 4 1/2 per cent. We have 3 1/2 per cent. stock maturing between 1912 and 1924 to the extent of £29,346,200; so that between now and 1924, which is not a long period in the history of a nation, we have, out of a total debt of

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Can the States afford to give up that surplus and allow it to be capitalised?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
If the States have to pay so much interest, and if they can capitalise it at the rate of that interest, it will be quite the same operation, but if you form your Federal Government now-and I trust you will—you will not get the Federal Government to buy up at the present rate; but it is possible that, as time goes on, some arrangement, which may entail a little loss to the Central Government and a little to the States, may be entered into. The only way I can see of putting an end to that surplus will be by the purchase of a certain amount of the debt and making it a debt of the Central Government. At the same time it will give rise to a great deal of complication and trouble when we have two classes of debt, and I do not shut my eyes to that difficulty for a moment. It is a difficulty which must be met in the future. It is scarcely possible for the Central Government to carry on without incurring loans for different purposes, and this loan would be a federal debt, and it would be exasperating to see a great difference between the quotations of the stock of the Central Government and those of the different States; so that, while I speak as I do with regard to the practical purposes of the present, I hold myself absolutely free as to any scheme which may be generated in the future. I am sorry that I have taken up so much time. I have nothing further to say, and I do not think I am equal to a peroration, as I have a bad verbal memory; but I do hope that, as the result of compromise and sacrifice in this great Convention, we shall be able to build up a federal power or national government which shall be a strength to this country, which shall reflect from its centre all the best elements of our national life, and which will be so strong and indissoluble as to make us one nation for all time to come.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
I am afraid that, before I resume my seat, our friends, the representatives of the various Governments, will arrive at the conclusion that, during the past week, in accepting the hospitality of our friends in as happy a manner as I could, I have been too prodigal with my voice, for I have found that, however much I have lubricated it, I believe before I close it will not have the mellifluous tone I desire it to have. Still, voice or no voice, I deem it my duty to express my convictions on the various subjects which are before the Convention. And, in doing so, I shall attempt to offer no dogmatic conclusions, but to offer those facts or those opinions which have been coming to one who, since the 1891 Convention in Sydney, has been groping, possibly in the dark with respect to very many of those questions-but while groping in the dark, and not having found the way clearly out of some of the problems—yet sees daylight ahead of them; and I hope we shall not go from this Convention without having prepared for the people that for which I believe they hope, and after which they aspire—a deed of partnership which shall be regarded as the national will of the Australian federated people. But I find it desirable before I launch out into generalities, or rather, in avoiding generalities, if possible, to follow the admirable direction which has been given to our thoughts this afternoon and this morning by my predecessor and friend, Mr. McMillan. I had thought up till this morning that really some of the most difficult questions with which we have to deal had not been touched upon, or, if touched upon, not in such a manner as possibly we should desire, and in such a manner as to carry weight, if not conviction to those whose servants we are—the people of Australia. My friend Mr. Henry essayed to do so, but he arrived at his conclusions without having given us the figures which led him to them; and therefore, to that extent, a great portion of his conclusions will perhaps not be so useful as I had hoped they might have been. If I talk about being useful in this sense, I fear I am rather bringing hon. members to anticipate that which can hardly arise. I am not prepared to bring conviction home to their minds upon the various fiscal problems which are before us.

I do not think, up to the present time, there has been any solution offered.
We shall only find the solution of the fiscal problems in the experiment which is, here, or in the experience which must come to us by time, if even that time be soon or in two years. There is such an ever-changing position in our Blue Books and the information contained therein; there is such an ever-changing population of the people, and with it an ever-changing state of our fiscal matters, of our Customs, and various other revenues, that to attempt now to state for the information of the people what may be the result of a Federation, even although this Convention advances lines upon which your financial representation shall be drawn up, we shall arrive at conclusions safe for to-day but absolutely unreliable for to-morrow. I have watched during past years the changes which have taken place in the colony of Tasmania, with which I am so proud to have been associated for so long a period of years, and with whose life and progress I have been connected. I have therefore been able to watch, and I have seen during three or four years statements which have been made with respect to the accounts between the Federation and the State which would be alarming in the extreme, and yet perfectly equitable. The statement made in 1891-when our Customs revenue was 25 per cent. higher than it was in 1894-the statement and account between the two parties would have shown to Tasmania that she was in a happy, a thriving, and prosperous condition, and might possibly have led her to presume on surpluses the Federation would have given back to her, and she, thinking she had many good years before her, might have been led into public works and other extravagances. But only a few years have rolled by, and a great change has taken place, and we find, after making up a balance on the same lines - on the figures represented by the consumption of the people in 1894-what a miserable failure there would have been. Then, if we turn to our friends in Western Australia, and look at their proportion of Customs duties, we find that, owing to the influx of population which has been credited to them month after month at the rate of 1,000 a week, without enlarging their Customs tariff, they are receiving £5 12s. per head per annum; whilst, so far as this colony is concerned, in 1894 the amount was £1 9s. per head; as far as New South Wales is concerned, it was £1 19s. per head; as far as Queensland is concerned, it was £2 12s.; and, so far as Victoria and Tasmania are concerned, it was about 40s. per head. Here you see we have a variety of circumstances associated with the various colonies, showing to you at once that there is no common basis upon which the accounts between the two can be stated, unless we are going to do one of two things. We shall either have to adopt the system of accounts, the bookkeeping which my friend Mr. Henry so much objects to, or the system against which I have already presented several figures. We began with Sir Thomas McIlwraith's proposal in 1891. Sir Samuel Griffith followed, I followed those two, and since then we have had Mr. Nash, Dr. Quick, Mr. Henry, Mr. Owen and our friend Mr. Walker here, all of whom have tried to elucidate the problem of giving to the people the balance they have considered reliable for the time. But there comes my difficulty, that in attempting to portray how fair it might have been, or how equitable might have been the figures of Dr. Quick, or Mr. Walker-and I believe they have been founded on equitable bases-they failed from having no instructions from a properly constituted body as to what should be the basis of the calculations so made. Until the Convention will make a line of demarcation and tell the Financial Committee on what lines it should proceed, I hold that it is impossible for the Financial Committee to begin work. It commenced work in 1891 without any such instructions. It came to conclusions, but with those conclusions we have never been satisfied. And if I may appear to cast difficulties in the way, though my great desire would be to clear them away, yet I want, in casting these difficulties in the way, to show the members of the Convention that the matter lies very much in their own hands, if they will give the proper time to their consideration. I hope my friend Sir John Forrest will not only concede to me and others that this matter is important, but will realise that I have no desire to weary our friends from Western Australia. We are glad to have them here. We all want to get our work done as quickly as possible, particularly as some of our friends are going to leave us. We have our own Parliaments waiting for us, and we had better solve this problem of our financial position before we leave this chamber; but we can solve it only by a series of resolutions given to the Financial Committee. First of all, the question which I believe drew us to this chamber to-day is the question of whether we are to be one people financially or not, the question of whether we will get rid of the border duties, or whether we will have this perpetual war of the tariffs; and I hope the presence of members to-day is an indication that we are determined to break down the border Customs, so that at any rate, as far as that is concerned, we may be entirely one people. The question is, how are we going to return Customs receipts to colonies at so much per head of population, or in proportion to the amount which is collected in each State. I hardly followed Mr. McMillan when he said he differed from the Bill of 1891. I would like to follow Mr. Holder, and cut the Gordian knot. I am so thoroughly a federalist that I would be prepared to say, "Let us consider ourselves a new people gathering together for the purposes of the future, disregarding the advantages which each has gathered, the advantages which have come to New South Wales by reason of her hundred years of life, so that we may federate with others who have had a shorter existence."

That would be a federal start, but we can hardly expect that to-day. We know the foundation of the movement is selfish personal interests, and we know that only the leaders of public thought can minister to the federal spirit, and advise the public, and lead them on into the consideration of all the advantages of Federation. We hope that we will no longer be parochial, but will be one people united together in finance, defence, and everything else. I fear that the proposal for keeping State accounts - bookkeeping between each State and the Federal Parliament-will be the only solution, much as I dislike it, and it may be necessary to keep officers on the borders, not to check and examine our brother's luggage as he passes to and fro, but to learn what revenue belongs to one State and what to another. Much as I dislike that, I fear we have not yet arrived at any better method.
When we have arrived at that stage the proper solution will be to give back to the State in the proportion in which the duties have been collected in that State. That would be a true Federation. Although you may have a uniform tariff, even then you will find a dissimilarity between the consumption in one State and the consumption in another.

Mr. BARTON:
Not for long.

Sir PHILIP FYS:
Take Queensland, for instance, with its great number of the working classes, with their freer habit of drinking whisky and smoking tobacco; although this may appear to be a detail, it is a very important detail, seeing that the duty on tobacco and spirits is nearly one third of the whole of the Customs duties of Australasia. And when we remember that the spirits consumed in one country amount to six gallons per head, whilst in another country they may only amount to three gallons per head, we can easily see that even at the same rate of 12s. per gallon on spirits, the consumption in one country will very much exceed the consumption in another, and make very disproportionate the amount received for Customs duties in each district. For such reasons as these, as far as Western Australia is concerned, I conclude with regret there is no hope of that colony joining in Federation at the present moment.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Let her representatives speak for themselves.

Sir PHILIP FYS:
It is our duty to anticipate possibilities, because, if you are going to refer these matters to your Financial Committee, that committee should know whether there is any prospect of Western Australia being included, because it makes so serious a difference whether she be or not. But if she is going to be included, and will come in on terms of equality, let us know it in order that the Financial Committee may better be able to see what is equitable between the States, and between a colony which is growing in population so rapidly and those which are developing more slowly. Then it becomes absolutely necessary that your committee should receive instructions under the head of "excise." We are a people at present who can consume 170,000 tons of sugar per annum. I have it from Sir Hugh Nelson that, in the course of the next four or five years, Queensland will be able to overtake the whole of that demand. With an average tariff of £5 per ton on sugar-in some places it is £6 per ton, and in Western Australia it is nothing—this item is a very important one to deal with, producing as it does £850,000 of revenue per annum. If, therefore, we are to have a uniform tariff, what instructions are you going to give your committee with respect to the question of excise?

An HON. MEMBER:
That tariff can be put on some other article.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
We cannot afford to forego £850,000 of revenue on sugar. We cannot afford to forego the revenue we are now receiving from brandies and spirits manufactured in the colonies, and therefore if we are going to deal in a spirit of equality at all with our neighbors who manufacture these articles, it must be on the lines of giving to them certain advantages which will bring them within the Federation.

Mr. GLYNN:
You shift the receipts from one line to another.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
How can you shift a receipt of that nature? Are we going to give to Queensland a direct bounty of £850,000 per annum, and let the remaining States be bereft of so important an amount of revenue.

An HON. MEMBER:
We virtually give it to our people, not to Queensland.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
We do give it to our people, but we cannot afford to do it.

Mr. FRASER:
Beetroot sugar will be grown all over Australia in a year or two.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
I think it will be better—although I do not mind an interjection or two—to let me proceed on my own course, and from those who differ from me in this matter we should be glad to hear how they are going to cut the Gordian knot and overcome the difficulty as to how the Federal Parliament is going to do with a smaller amount of revenue from Customs, to the extent of £850,000, which amount represents the duty on sugar at the present moment? I am putting these items before the Convention, not to elicit a difference of opinion, expressed by way of interjections. That may be worth something. I do not think that, in proceeding with these resolutions, a "Hear, hear" from an hon. member or silence on the part of a great number is going to convey to Mr. Barton or the Financial or Constitutional Committees instructions as to the purposes of this Convention. Therefore I have gone into these matters to point out how exceedingly difficult is the problem as to the clearest course we should take. An important question arose with regard to the Post and Telegraph Department, and I was sorry to hear Mr. Holder dealing with the matter in such a provincial spirit. He overlooked the great advantage it will be to the whole of Australasia to have a uniform stamp instead of the different stamps that we have to purchase now when travelling. Is there anything more likely to weld us together as one family than by sending out our children throughout the length and breadth of the land, whereby we federate the colonies and have a domestic interest in each? Is there any better way of federating than to know that, wherever we travel in Australia, the same Queen's head, on whatever it may be, tracks us? By that means we should secure not only the convenience of the public but would set another seal on the proposal that we should have uniformity, and be as nearly as possible one great co-partnership. Then I come to the question of losses on these departments, which it was said totalled £200,000. I have seen a return prepared by the statisticians during the past few days pointing out that during four years the loss was £370,000 a year; but since then we have, by economy in most of the States, and by the extension of business, reduced the loss to something less than £100,000. If £100,000 or £150,000 a year loss is debited to New South Wales and Victoria, whilst South Australia and Tasmania are now making a profit over their post and telegraph business, what instructions will you give to the Committee as to the basis under which they are to be taken over? How is it going to be adjusted? Will they be taken over regardless of whether a profit or loss exists? Standing in South Australia, I am reminded of what its Government has done, and to them we owe our thanks for the very great energy they displayed in putting up an overland line from here to the North. Though done by an individual State, it was a federal work, and South Australia only has been the loser, but I am glad to know now that she no longer is a loser. If we take over her debt, there remains also that sum which she has willingly contributed to the advantages of the people of Australia in the past. Then we come to that serious question of railways; and I may say that I am only glancing very rapidly over these heads. I was very gratified to find, after listening to the thoroughly federal spirit in which Mr. O'Connor addressed himself to the matter, that he and Mr. Wise had re-echoed the sentiment that we are to regard our railways as not giving local advantages to anyone—that the railways incidentally belong to the State in which they are constructed, but should not be utilised to give to one State an advantage against another—which would not be Federation—and therefore I trust the spirit which announced such a statement as this on the part of my friends from New South Wales will be taken up by all of us. Let us see whether it is not advisable that the railways should be regarded from the commercial rather than the political standpoint. In a small colony like Tasmania, with respect to the railways, I can speak of political pressure which has been baneful, but take the troubles of Victoria during the last few years and her present position of embarrassment in connection with the losses on the railways, or take the splendid position of New South Wales with her 3.34 per cent. profit on her railways, and see the position there. Where are the reports of Mr. Eddy and the reports of the Commission which sat in Victoria a short time ago? We have one friend from Tasmania here, who sat on the Commission, Mr. Grant, and we know from the published reports what the conclusion was. There need be no secrecy in connection with the matter. The conclusion of the Commissioners was, and I believe the conclusion of Mr. Eddy tallied with their idea, that railways should be regarded as commercial, and not political undertakings. So soon as they become commercial enterprises so soon will they be more advantageous to the people as a whole. I do not speak of the railways as wanting them to be thoroughly self-supporting, nor as necessarily recouping all of the interest paid upon them; but I look upon the railways as the adjuncts to the success of the people, as auxiliaries to the success of individual producers and others who receive back by the saving of time they effect and the means of social intercourse which they afford; and if we in Tasmania lose 2 per cent. on the railways we have this knowledge that we could better lose 4 per cent. than be without them. If we took a poll of the people to-morrow and asked if they would return to the old system they would say "no," because of the conveniences the railways afford and the saving of time. It could easily be computed that from the fares charged, rates of mileage, and other charges, even in the construction of our railways the collateral or auxiliary advantages to the people far more than recoup the loss made by the State. I do not desire that the producers shall be in any way denuded of the advantages they have been receiving, but I desire that these shall be separated from the railway and these political levers which have been far too long associated with them; and therefore I think we might adopt the suggestion of Mr. O'Connor and take over the railways, or, if we do not take over the railways as a debt, take up the responsibility of the interest, but we must take care, in connection with the tariff, that we do not in the Constitution give a promise of intercolonial freetrade to the people, while under the railway system they may be robbed of the advantages which they expect to receive. Therefore, if there should be no better way, let us give in our adhesion to the proposal of Mr. O'Connor, and constitute Commissioners who shall settle our tariffs. That involves a very serious point, as to how far the State can be relied upon to carry out the tariff which will be imposed by the Federal Government. It was a question which was involved in the early days of the American Confederation, when the States, notwithstanding their agreement, and when it was to their interest to support the war, refused to pay their share of the cost and stood aloof. It is a difficulty with respect to this point, but I think our railways might be readily associated with us. Our Federation begins immediately with railways costing £110,000,000. I have cut out Western Australia, as being outside the continental system, and Tasmania, being an island, for the same reason. These railways are producing an average return of 3 1/4 per cent. per annum. on the cost of construction, and therefore the Federation takes over a live asset which, if necessary, could be disposed of to any English company at, probably, thirty years' purchase. The Federation would thus get a good asset for the liability it takes over, and it will have the further value of giving to the people the advantages of a federated system with an equal tariff, as much so in connection with the railways as in connection with the Customs. I think I may pass on now to the next point, and that is the question of the cost of defences. We shall probably be all agreed that the whole of the defence expenditure up to the present time shall be borne by the Federation. If you do anything more than proceed on the lines of the Convention of 1891 you must instruct your Financial Committee that the expenditure in connection with the construction of the various fortifications shall be taken over. You are also going to take over matters affecting quarantine and shipping. If we are going to be the lighters of our maritime highways, a Federal Marine Board will be as absolutely necessary as the existing Marine Boards of the various colonies. If we are going to take over the responsibility of lighting the beacons and wharves, as was proposed in the Bill of 1891, you must give instructions to the Finance Committee to make provision for taking over the cost of those lighthouses, etc. These works must be the responsibility of the Federal Government, if it takes the revenues which are to be raised therefrom. I may now pass to the ques-

Civil Government and a Federal Parliament. It embraces the Lieutenant-Governor, it embraces payment of members, it embraces a judiciary, and all these expenses; but it is very certain, from the investigations that subsequently took place, that the £639,000 is altogether an extravagant estimate. I cannot follow Sir Samuel Griffith when, in addition to the £639,000, he has added for Lieutenant-Governors' salaries and the Governor-General something like £230,000. I think he must have overlooked the fact that £639,000 had already been provided. It is very certain that, in connection with the Financial Committee, they ought to receive our instructions as to what they are to do with the various expenses which are to be incurred in the payment of members. I presume that is hardly a question for discussion. I have not heard anyone raise the issue. I take it for granted that every member who attends the Federal Convention will certainly have to be recognised as a professional or other man leaving home for business, and must be recouped for the expenditure and loss he incurs. It is very well to attend local Parliaments without pay, and with us we get no pay. We do refund some small amount of expenditure necessary in travelling to and from Parliament; but if the delegates from Tasmania, Western Australia, and South Australia had to follow our New South Wales friends to Moss Vale, or our Victorian friends to Mount Macedon, we should expect them to be paid. Or come to Hobart if you please—I have no desire to see you there, as it is hardly the point or place to be discussed, except for a holiday, and I should like to see our friends there then, especially Mr. Barton.

Mr. BARTON:

It depends whether it is summer or winter.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

If members are to travel long distances you must have a class of politicians who are ready to give themselves up to that particular class of work for two or three months, and they must be paid. If we give the Financial Committee instructions as to what the Lieutenant-Governor is to be paid we should state in the Bill how that Lieutenant-Governor is to be elected. I shall ask Mr. Barton to bear with me a moment while I refer to a subject of great interest to his mind, though I speak with no authority, the federal judiciary. I remember, however, the speeches of 1891, and the federal spirit which caused Mr. Barton to say:—

Australia should be self-contained.

There are only two or three appeals annually to the Privy Council at home, and our friends dealing with the law have told us that we have upon the benches in Australia men equal, if not superior, to those who sit on those benches at home-
Mr. BARTON:
They have improved in that respect in England since.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
And that we should not have a system of dragging litigants across the sea to settle a few points elsewhere. If we want to cut down expenses is it not possible, for a number of years at any rate, to have our own Chief Justices as the Federal Court of Appeal. Then we have put down £750,000 as the cost of defence, while we also have a constabulary costing us upwards of £800,000 a year, or altogether £1,550,000 for two forces which are in no way combined, though they might possibly be. Some of the members may remember having read that very interesting article in one of the magazines during the past year, written by a military man who had served in th

No; this is only a tentative measure. Let us see how this takes on. There is no hurry, and, so far as Tasmania is concerned, we must sink half the advantages we must realise, but if you wait for that period of Federation to which we are sanguine the time is drawing near, and if you watch for that time and we get consolidation of debts and unification of debts at 3 per cent., you will be able to deal advantageously as one people. The seven debts will be backed up by the guarantee of the seven States, and when you are in that happy position you will be able to go to the financiers at home and offer them this joint guarantee; you may offer what to you may seem a small advantage, but what is a great advantage, of a larger debt instead of a smaller debt, incongruous though it may appear.

The series of advantages which would come to these colonies by having a unified debt of £220,000,000 thrown upon the English market and dealt with like English consols are dealt with would give an advantage almost at once. I am not speaking only from my own experience, or my own knowledge. I have put forward my own proposals, and I am happy to say I have been encouraged by home friends and financial authorities—encouraged over and over again, right up to within the last month, by those who know the signs of the time, and they say-

If you unify your debt into Australasian console at the rate of 3 per cent., or 21 per cent., and give length to it as well as substance, you will realise all the advantage which the £600,000,000 of the national debt of England is doing.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Tell us how you would do it.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Let me go my own way. I say that the unification would give the advantage of a larger debt of £220,000,000—or, take the six colonies, £170,000,000—and instead of separate debts, where we compete against one another in the money market, watching that one does not get in before the other, or giving to the syndicates at home 2 per cent., which represents the sum they always expect as the margin between your price and the face value—when we have this one debt we will experience what Mr. Goschen told the people in 1888 had been his experience—that when you offered to the people redeemable stock at short dates the rise in the market was but 4 per cent, while in respect to irredeemable stock of the same face value the rise in the same time was 16 per cent. He quoted that as a reason in favor of long dates. Now I want to speak of the debts of Australasia, and to say that if we as a Federal Government are to take them over there comes the very serious question as to how each individual State is to be permitted to double-bank the debt already in existence. Supposing we are taking over the payment of the interest on the debt. it is certain that all the States must to some extent be prepared to give up a certain proportion of their State rights in respect to unlimited indulgence in debt. Take the example of Tasmania. Presuming that the £7,500,000 of debt is consolidated with the Australasian debt, it would be imprudent for that colony—it would be detrimental to the interests even of the federated debt—that she should be allowed immediately to pile up a local debt which would appear as a second mortgage upon her properties. Although we do not speak of mortgaging property in connection with the national debt, the lender takes as his mortgage the personal covenant of the people to pay the interest. It is only a personal covenant, without a territorial or realty mortgage; but if the people have given their personal covenant to the Federal Parliament for their debt, they should not be permitted to incur a new debt. There should be some check upon it; and I shall ask members of the Convention if it would not be an exceedingly wise thing for the States to bind themselves with respect to new debts. It might not suit Western Australia to do so at present, but I should hail it with great satisfaction if Tasmania bound herself, much as I wish each State to retain as many rights as possible, and the Federal Parliament to take only those which they can manage to the advantage of the colonies. It would be to the advantage of the colonies if, before they borrowed any more money, they had to prove their case to the Federal Parliament, just as the shire councils have to do whose debts are guaranteed by the Victorian Government.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No, we do not.
Sir PHILIP FYSH:
What about the waterworks?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
They are national debts.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We lend the waterworks money.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
There are debts in connection with Victoria and each of the other colonies, which are local within the States, in respect to which the local Government are guarantors of the interest and therefore of the debt. How much better it would be that when we as States desire to float a loan for any work, the approval of the Federal Parliament should have to be obtained for it. If the States, without that approval, were still determined to go into debt, they would be thrown back upon their own responsibility and resources. An hon. member has asked me how I propose to convert the debt. I will finish my remarks upon debt-consolidation by saying that in the references to the subject in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 members will recollect that the little word "may" appeared. There was no promise made for the Federal Parliament to take over the debt, but there was power to do so when it was convenient. I hope we will be able to get into a better position than that during this Convention, and will be able to give some hope to the Financial Committee that if they bring in a practical proposal, instead of the word "may," the Constitution will include the word "shall," so that the proposal I have in view shall take place as early as possible.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Most of your debentures are held in England, how can you say "shall" to those holders?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
The hon. member has misunderstood what I was speaking about. I was not speaking of conversion, but of consolidation. If the Federal Parliament would take over the debts henceforth you would have seven names behind the interest instead of one.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
And the debentures will go up in value as a consequence.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Undoubtedly. The hon. member has admitted the whole of my case in reference to consolidation. One of the advantages of the consolidation will be the increased facility it will give for conversion.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
You can never have conversion unless your stocks stand high.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

Mr. McMillan put the case fairly to you that if the Federal Parliament does not exercise the power unwisely, injudiciously, or without forethought, when it goes into the market it will find trustees at home who are willing to invest at a reasonable price at the time when the debentures are falling due, because if it gives them nothing else, it will give an equivalent in value to-day for the stock which is upon the market. I am so astonished to find newspaper and other writers writing of conversion as though it was something by which we were going to rob our creditors at home, as if they were such fools that they were incapable of taking care of themselves. There was no scheme of conversion ever put forward that did not give an equivalent when it was optional with the holders. Mr. Goschen in 1888, to all those holders who had a year to run, offered a premium of 5s. to induce them to come in, and although the 5s. did not represent the full amount of difference in the interest, they did come in. Now I am speaking of cases in which it was optional with the Treasurer. It was optional with Mr. Goschen, because the periods had run out for which the interest was guaranteed. But it was not so with respect to the thirteen millions held by the Bank of England, and when Mr. Goschen was asked what about that thirteen millions he made a very significant remark, which members will be surprised to hear repeated:

It is too early yet to talk about force of law.

That latent power was quite sufficient for the Bank of England, with its thirteen millions, and as a matter of Imperial policy, it was its duty to come in. Although it had time to do it, it did not claim the equivalent, and did come in. There have been in this century, in the twenties, in the forties, and in the eighties, three major conversions. The first conversion - Vansittart's - was 152 millions, the second - Goulburn's-249 millions, and the last conversion-Goschen's-500 millions. Then there were three minor conversions-Robinson's, Childers's, and Gladstone's. We call them minor conversions because so little of them were taken up; and in "Hansard" we have the full reasons given for this. I must mention that almost simultaneously with the submission of Gladstone's scheme to the people there were European troubles, and we know when these are brewing they impede financial or fiscal reforms. With respect to the others, people were invited to come in under the terms of the Act which stated:

All those who do not within a certain period give notice that they will not accept, shall be taken to have accepted the terms.

Whether through carelessness or indifference, there was only about 3 per cent. under Vansittart's scheme who did not accept; under Goulburn's only 2 1/2 per cent.; and you know how unique was the result of Mr. Goschen's conversion of 1888. I have pointed out that we are told that as we consolidate and give therefore better security, and as we give a larger amount of capital to work upon each of these three being great advantages to those who were consolidated and converted—we believe we should realise some of there advantages in the course of our pursuits. The Imperial or National Debt stood for a long time at about £800,000,000, but during the past thirty-nine years over a quarter of that debt has been paid off or redeemed by balances of revenue over expenditure, which, through the instrumentality of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, has been used in that way. But upon the top of that there has been £200,000,000 taken up by Government departments, such as the Post Office Savings Bank, and so they have reduced the debt to an investment stock of about £400,000,000, or just one half of what it was thirty-nine years ago. I have it on the best financial authorities in connection with this conversion that we have come to this condition, that for years past, although the English people have been accumulating half a million of money a day, or £180,000,000 a year, there is no increasing stock for them to invest in safely, but, on the contrary, an absolutely diminishing stock. You put yourself, therefore, in the position that if the colonies during the next five or ten years go to the English market for two hundred millions of stock, unified in the way I have described, we can place Australian stocks in equally as high favor as the Imperial consols, and in a superior position to those of any other part of the world. I should like to remind members of the splendid position we have already reached with our seven separate debts. In May last I had occasion to value the effective rate of interest on the bases of the Stock Exchange prices of May, 1896, and I found that for Imperial 2 3/4 per cents., which are to fall automatically in 1893 to 2 1/2 per cent., the effective rate of interest was £2 2s. If you went into the market and bought at the prices of the day—about £112— the value you would be receiving for the money, after getting up an annuity to pay for the premium, was £2 2s. The position of the United States was £3; the position of the great Germanic Confederation was £3 1s. 3d.; and the position of the Australian Colonies under the Crown, enjoying the advantages of associations with the largest and most important commercial centre of the world - Australasia, small though she may be, only equal in population to Canada, only equal in population to the people of America when she took up her Constitution in 1787 - theirs was 3,900,000 and we are 4,200,000 - yet we stood in the most advantageous position of being, so far as the effective rate of interest was concerned, next to the mother-country at £2 18s. 3d., and happily for Tasmania, she stood at £2 16s. 6d. So that here you have your colonies already standing next in importance to the Imperial consols, and when you carry out the purpose, which I hope is in the minds of many besides myself, I am perfectly satisfied our stock will be as popular as Imperial consols, with every possibility of our gaining money for our use at as low a rate as Imperial consols carry. I think the conversion, if effected, would bring about a saving of about £800,000 per annum. I have taken care to publish a statement with respect to this conversion, and I can really not occupy the time of the Convention by doing more than call attention to the fact that, in December, 1895, the debt of the colonies, including New Zealand, was £210,000,000, on which the interest amounted to £8,100,000. A capital value of 3 per cent. par would have added £25,500,000 to your debt, but by it you would have reduced your interest to £7,000,000, or you would have saved about £1,000,000, and you would have had to have put by £225,000 a year, or nearly a quarter of a million as a redemption fund, and you would have to make proper provision year by year for the premium which you would have to give to the holder as an equivalent for what he was holding. This would have brought about a saving of £837,000 per annum for all Australasia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Do you allow anything for expenses?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
No; but what is the position of the holder of the stock? He was holding a face value of £3 10s. per cent., for I worked it out at that figure, and I was to give him £110, according to the market value at 3 per cent. on which the Government would put by a sinking fund. Proprietors and trustees immediately would have received a face value of £110, which would have given them £3 6s. per cent., and which would have left me a margin of profit. I have pointed out that in the course of fifty years we would have to pay it off, but it would place the people in the position of being in possession of money at 3 per cent. for public works on which we have been paying 5 and 6 per cent. This is a matter for the future Treasurer to consider. was glad to find Mr. McMillan speaking as he did, but these matters must be brought to the front, and the purchase can only be carried out when you have one people, and so soon as you are in that position so soon, I am satisfied-unless there should be some serious change in the financial matters of the old world-will you realise the advantage of saving that £800,000. Not only that, but it is generally admitted by all writers on fiscal matters that you will certainly save 1/2 per cent. by reason of your unification. I will not pursue that matter any further, and I have just opened it in order to give members an opportunity of considering it. I have explained that I desire that a tentative instruction should be given to the Financial Committee before it proceeds to work to bring up a report on this matter. No body of men selected from this Convention can attempt to bring up a report unless it knows the minds of the great majority of the members; and to bring up a report before the various statistics are provided for us which the statisticians are preparing, and which would be recommendations possibly of the Financial Committee, would not be worth anything. I can see the element of discord in the Financial Committee before we start-how one is leaning in the direction of no accounts to be kept, another tacking on the railways, and another something else; and these incongruities must be settled before the Finance Committee can undertake its work. Turning to the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, I see around me friends whom at that Convention in that year I met for the first time. I am glad to see them here again. From South Australia there are yourself, sir, with Sir John Downer, Sir Richard Baker, Mr. Gordon, and Dr. Cockburn; from Victoria, Mr. Deakin; from Western Australia, Sir John Forrest, Mr. Hackett, and Sir James Lee Steere; and from Tasmania we have also a large sprinkling of the members of the 1891 Convention. What does this mean? Does it mean that there is any mandate from the people that we shall come here to destroy the Bill of 1891? I hear some hon. members talk as though they were sent here specially to destroy that Bill, and yet they come and address themselves to this question. The people, to a large extent, expected to have the main features of the Bill, and sent us to see how far it could be amended. I consider, however, that we have made considerable progress during these six years, and have far more hope to-day of bringing to a happy fruition this Federation than ever before. We are indebted for the resolutions of 1897 to our friend who took so prominent a part in the 1891 Convention, Mr. Barton; we have given him the highest post of honor as Leader of this Convention. We have had the benefit of his thought and his conclusions, arrived at satisfactorily, stage by stage, solidifying them as he went on. I congratulate him on the fact that New South Wales, who did not appear to be leading in this particular movement, has come to the front of the movement at last, and taken seriously the whole matter into her hands. In respect to the resolutions, we see only the offspring of the 1891 resolutions. What change have we from Sir Henry Parkes's resolutions? I have looked around for the Premiers who were at that gathering, We miss Sir Henry Parkes and Sir Samuel Griffith, Sir Harry Atkinson, Mr. Munro and Mr. Playford, and Sir John Forrest, and I only remain of the seven Premiers then present. I well remember what took place in respect to the resolutions of 1891. They were framed in Sir Henry Parkes's office in a spirit of liberality. Now, these resolutions of 1897 are almost akin therewith. Mr. Barton certainly has put in one clause with respect to the recognition of the territory of the States, and he has amended another in one respect as to the power of the Senate by striking out words which were inserted in 1891. The 1891 Bill said the Senate should have the power to reject, but not to amend, but Mr. Barton's proposal is silent as to the Senate having any power to reject or to amend. Round these points-and they are the only two-we have had a great deal of discussion, on one point particularly, and I feel it to be my duty to roughly run through several of these great points of difference, because I should be exceedingly sorry for the Convention and Australasia to regard Tasmania as being at all represented by what I must tell Mr. Dobson was the illiberal spirit of his speech with respect to what should be the method of representation. I am so thoroughly at issue with him on the subject, and so many in Tasmania will be at issue with him, that I must say we do not understand his principle of one vote for manhood, one for thrift, another one for double thrift, and another for some particular advantage our great grandmother left us in her will. We do not believe in anything of the kind, but we do believe in one man one vote, though it so happens we have one man and twelve votes. Still we come here as the representatives of one man one vote. In Tasmania we have many electorates, and as in a great many the elections occur on the same day, only in a few is a man able to exercise his vote in more than one, and we practically reduce it to one man one vote. But I am reminded by my own experience that the system is a bugbear, a bogey, that it makes no difference whatever. I have taken out the numbers, 1,200 voters of one House and 1,500 voters of another, who have more than one vote. I have known them to record their votes, and if my friend Mr. Nicholas J. Brown were here now he might recall the positions when he and I were in antagonism, and I would give him the benefit of being a true conservative and take for myself whatever disadvantages there is in being a true liberal-I do not think we know much of radicals in Tasmania. I will state what was discovered, and it was what Disraeli discovered when the Ballot Bill was introduced. The liberals thought they were going to intercede for the working classes and agriculturists, and free them from their fetters. But they found they were not in fetters. The ballot Aid not cast for the liberals, but for the conservatives. There is in fact no homogeneity to be discovered with respect of any body of men; and even here, where you have organisations of trades unions carried on as you have, you may have homogeneity for particular purposes, but as a rule these bodies are politically heterogeneous. Mr. Brown and I divided the men who have twelve votes. I have no doubt about it that when the time comes we shall give up our present system gladly. We are running in the direction of voting as our neighbors do. If we have been a good old tory country in the past, how can we continue to be so when Victoria is constantly sending her miners over to us imbued with the knowledge that they have voted on manhood suffrage, and when we are sending our manufacturers to them to learn the advantages to be obtained from that system? These people are so intermingled that so surely as there shall be agitations in one colony which appear to give advantage to the people so surely shall the people in another make the same cry, and the cry shall meet with some response from the Ministry who are servants of the people, and who shall give way, and give the most liberal franchise all round. So far as that is concerned I hope to agree with the proposal put forward by Mr. Barton. So far as the Federal Parliament is concerned we will elect members to it in our way until the Federal Parliament shall step in and give us a new and better way.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
The elections will be upon a popular footing.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
We will elect the members in our own way, and of course it will be on a popular footing; and directly we become a federated people I hope the Federal Parliament will give us an Electoral Act, so that we may be elected under one qualification; and here I do not think Mr. Holder foresaw what would be the result if the other States took up the same provincial position which he took up. I use the term with apologies to him, because he is a man so broad, and brought up in a liberal school I would emulate, but in speaking of Federation I try to get rid of the parochial idea, and forget South Australia, Victoria, Tasmania, and know one name only, and that Australia. That is the spirit of Federation, and if Mr. Holder wants to impose his franchise upon all the others, whether it is one man one vote or includes woman suffrage, he must not take up that position. I hope that the federal franchise will embrace us all so thoroughly that the South Australians will not be disfranchised, will not be so seriously left out in the cold that they will no longer have the federal instincts and aspirations. I can contemplate what might be a cause of contention if we each took up separate lines of argument. Now I come to one of the most important lines of argument we have to discuss, and that is responsible government. Now, I followed our friend Mr. Isaacs right through that academic, historical speech of his, and enjoyed it immensely, but I kept on remarking "That is not how I read Bryce," and I found myself on one or two occasions remembering the hon. member as an advocate and arriving at the conclusion that he was biased by his client. I am not an advocate, I am not biased by my client, unless you say that my client is my thoughts. My thoughts have led me in the direction of believing that we must have a Government responsible directly to the people or to the House of Representatives. I remember well what Bryce tells us on this point. He says the Constitution was being framed, at a time when the Hanoverian kings were demanding that which lost King Charles his head—the re-establishment of the divine right of kings. They knew nothing of ministerial responsibility except to the king. So much was this so, that even the great Pitt himself demanded at last that he should be at liberty to introduce a measure for Catholic emancipation—the righteousness of which was delayed for another fifty Years because of this irresponsibility to the people, but the king demanding that the matter should never be heard of again, took upon himself the serious responsibility of trying to see that this was so. Now we know that the king can do no wrong. Someone must take the responsibility for him, whatever he does. Knowing this circumstance of which Bryce wrote, the framers of the American Constitution established three powers - the Congress, the President, and the Ministry—and these were three separate powers keeping check upon each other. The Ministers were not collectively responsible to the President, but only individually; and so in that way the three powers would act as a corrective of each other. But had those people—the framers of this Constitution—the sixty years' experience of responsible government that we have had since the Reform Bill of 1832 how would they have framed it? I am perfectly satisfied that those individual members in this Convention who may not like the reform of responsible government, and who have taken on with the thoughts of such men as Freeman so ably quoted by Mr. Clarke at the last Convention, would not find the system they advocate work out in practice satisfactorily. It sounds very nice, but we know that if we had a body of irresponsible men as Ministers they would very soon be too powerful, and neglect the interests of the State, looking after their own interests rather than the interests of the people. The British people are so fond of these old institutions under which we live that they will never take up with the innovation which is sometimes suggested. They like to have someone who is immediately responsible. Their Constitution is a "codeless myriad of precedents," where "freedom broadens slowly down from precedent to precedent," till at last we have come to the position that, as far as human matters can be perfect, we are attempting to perfect the ministerial system, and our people like it. I believe we shall have to live under it. I believe further that it will have a responsibility mainly to the House of Representatives, and that we cannot place the two Houses—as has been suggested under the Norwegian sy

Mr. HOLDER:
That is not more the people's House than the other.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
I beg pardon. You have been liberalising the franchise of your Legislative Council, I know.

Mr. HOLDER:
This will be the same franchise for both Houses.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Supposing it is. You cannot elect them on exactly the same system. You may have the same franchise, but as far as Tasmania is concerned we should get a very different class of men for our Senate elected by Tasmania as one electorate to that which we should get for our House of Representatives were they elected by several electorates.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Which will be best?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Both will be best. There must be a check, and you cannot have parliamentary work checked except by a Second Chamber, and you cannot have that without friction; and when there is friction there is no absolute need of deadlocks. Therefore I am rather at issue with Mr. Isaacs, for I say there need not be any deadlocks. As Mr. Bryce has observed, the Senate of the United States has stood the test of 100 years and has grown in the estimation of the people. Now it is elected by Congress.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is not elected by Congress, and it is not run in the interests of the people.

Mr. BARTON:
It is elected by the State Parliaments.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
I mean by the Legislatures of the States, as we proposed under the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. I should prefer to follow that practice. We gave way in 1891 with respect to the power of the Senate to amend, but we hope to change our position now, and to give the Senate full power to amend Bills. We can only wisely do that by making the Senate a popular branch of the Legislature. You have made the Upper House more powerful in Victoria, and stopped deadlocks, and we have made it more popular in
I agree with both Mr. Wise and Mr. O'Connor that if we could limit this amendment by the Senate of the Appropriation Bill, it would be far better. There are many other points I wish to touch upon, only they would take up too much time. There are the powers of Parliaments, questions of compromise, the question of election, and the House of Representatives. There is one matter to which I must refer, and that is State rights. I hold as strongly and sturdily to the position as do the members of the United States Legislature to the principle that State rights must be thoroughly conserved and reserved. As to the question of what we shall give to the Federation in our deed of partnership, that is a work which can be far better done by a Federal Parliament than by the Federal States.

Mr. Higgins:

That is a true protection of the States.

Sir Philip Fysh:

Our protection is to follow the American system. I would have nothing to do with the Canadian system. We must reserve fully our rights, and in the schedule of the Commonwealth Bill will be a list of the powers handed, over to the Federal Parliament. Well, Mr. President, I will not proceed any further; but I have been so imbued with the federal spirit that from time to time as I have gone among my own constituents I have tried to inspire them with a little ardor, and make them think the cause is theirs, and in Tasmania we have men who think the cause is theirs. A large majority of the people there if asked tomorrow "yes" or "no," would vote "yes" with respect to Federation. I hope we will do that which is beat in the eyes of the people and for the colonies; always remembering we are a nation rising out of the wilderness, a people endowed with gifts and institutions which cost our forefathers in the old country years of struggle to secure; that we are a spectacle to the world of what human effort is capable of. Think of what our forefathers have done in building up this great empire. We are the sons of men whose deeds have made the empire. How they fought together, and bled together, as Englishmen, as Scotchmen, and as Irishmen; and suffered in order that they might hand down to us, their children, the blessings of civil and religious liberty! And I ask what are we going to do for the generation which is to follow us? We may say we have built up a great people and country, and be proud of our achievement, but what we have done is but an earnest of what they will do. We have, however, handicapped them with seven colonies and seven voices which are not heard, seven defences not organised, seven Parliaments and seven warring
Sir JOHN FORREST:

I do not propose to address this august assembly at any great length, because I feel that I am probably not so competent to address it as it has been addressed by some of the speakers who have preceded me; but I desire to say a few words in regard to the subject, and especially on a few important points. First of all I feel, speaking on behalf of my colleagues of Western Australia, I should like to congratulate you, Mr. President, and the people, of South Australia, upon the honor that has been conferred upon you, by being elected President of this Convention. I feel quite sure that a wise selection has been made, and we can rely with the utmost confidence on your judgment in guiding the deliberations of this Convention. I have listened with much attention during Friday and to-day to the speeches which have been addressed to this Convention. I should like at once to say that the observations made by me this morning were made with no intention of deprecating the debate which has already taken place. I think it would have been impossible to have undertaken this great work without some introductory debate such as we have had the pleasure of listening to. My observations were directed to the prolongation of the debate on the series of resolutions which my friend Mr. Barton has proposed, because I think that this debate is based on resolutions on which I think we are all agreed, and we may very fitly deal with the Bill of 1891 rather than with mere abstract expressions. I had the honor of being present in 1891 at the Sydney Convention, and, of course, in common with all others who were there, I have an advantage which those who were not present at that Convention have not, because we spent a considerable time in discussing all the points which are being raised on the present occasion. It is only right, therefore, that those who are here for the first time should have the privilege of speaking, and we should have the advantage of listening to them on many of the points, especially on those about which there is any controversy. I am glad to find that there is a general feeling through this Convention-I was under the impression that there was not—that the Convention Bill of 1891 should be taken as the basis of the measure which we intend to frame. Of course it goes without saying that it would be impossible to construct any measure of Federal Government unless five-sixths of the clauses in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, either in the words of that measure or words to the same purport, found a place in it, and therefore it is idle for any of us to talk about ignoring the Bill of 1891. I should like specially to acknowledge, and I am sure every one else will do so also, what we owe to those great men who took part in framing that measure in 1891, but who are no longer amongst us. Some have gone to Undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns, and others are elsewhere; and I have only to mention the names of the late Sir Henry Parkes and Sir Samuel Griffith as being amongst those who are absent. Everyone will admit that it is a matter for sincere regret that they are not with us to assist in the work we are undertaking. Many others also who took a prominent part in the consideration of that great measure are absent. Of the speeches that were made on Friday, one I wish to specially refer to is that of Dr. Quick, which I listened to with great attention. I was struck with this feeling: that it was useless importing into this Bill everything that he thought was necessary in the Federation Bill, for if we all desire to import into a Bill of this kind everything that we think should be there, I feel certain that we shall not arrive at any conclusions at all. It would be impossible for every member to expect that clauses should be inserted in a Bill of this sort which would meet their particular views, and I lean very much to the attitude taken by Sir Henry Parkes and others in 1891, that we should deal in this Bill with the general questions, leaving as far as possible all minor matters to the jurisdiction and control of the States. For instance, there is the great question of the franchise upon which the members of the House of Representatives and the Senate are to be elected, and it seems to me that the plan we adopted in 1891 of leaving the House of Representatives to be elected on the franchise of the more numerous body of the States Legislatures was one that should commend itself to most persons. At any rate, it commended itself to me then, and I have seen no reason to alter my opinion at the present time. I do not propose to deal with many points to-day, and I deal with a few more readily because I am aware that, having urged upon the House this morning that no time should be lost in getting to the crucial parts of the Bill, it would ill befit me to make a long speech in regard to questions which can be dealt with quite as well in Committee, as on the present occasion, With regard to the Constitution generally, I am of opinion that it should be based upon the system that we all know so well, and are all accustomed to. That is the system of responsible government. We have lived under it and understand it. It is a Constitution we have grown up with all our lives, and is the Constitution of the great mother-country, and I see no reason why we should run away to the United States or to Switzerland for a Constitution. I prefer to stand by the old British Constitution. Let us try to work it out. I believe with Sir John Downer that there will be an evolution in these matters, and probably constitutional government as we understand it to-day may not be understood as such ten years hence. As it is, the change has been considerable during the last few years, and so it will probably as time goes on, but that we may leave to the statesmen and Parliaments of the future. Speaking as to the representation of the State which is smaller at the present time in population than any other, but which, I hope, will be one of the largest in population in the future, we must look to the future, and we must insist here that equal powers should be given to the Senate in all respects except perhaps as to the initiation of Money Bills. I think perhaps we may dispense with that. I have no objection myself to leave to the Lower House, as we call it, the initiation of Money Bills, but I am not indisposed at the present moment to concede also-I am merely speaking for myself-that the Appropriation Bill should not be amended by the Upper House. I have had, of course, as you all know, some experience of Political life, and speaking as the result of my own experience I should be indeed sorry, after having had the trouble of getting the Appropriation Bill through the Lower House, to commence de novo and go over the same ground again in the Upper House; and perhaps that may influence my views on this point. It seems to me however, that if Federation is to be a real Federation of these colonies, it would not be reasonable—I will not put it any stronger—for the larger colonies to expect that the Lower House, in which colonies such as I represent which have but a few members, should have the sole power of taxation over all the properties of the smaller States, and that the Senate which we send there to look after our State rights should have no power in regard to Taxation and Loan Bills except to reject them. It might be undesirable, nay, even impossible, for the Senate to reject a Taxation Bill. The Government might require the money, and everyone might concede that fact, so that I think the States Council should have the power to reduce the amount. That I think is a reasonable proposition, looking at it from the point of view from which I look at it, seeing the small representation these States would have in the Lower House.

Mr. LYNE:
Has your Council the power to amend now?

Mr. BARTON:

You had a little trouble about it last year, I think.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

We say they have not. In our Constitution at the present time we have imported the provision of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, by which the Upper House can return at any stage a Money Bill to the Lower House with a suggestion, whether it is an Appropriation Bill or any other Bill, and if the Lower House does not choose to amend that Bill as suggested by the Upper House, the only power left to the Council is either to accept the Bill or reject it. The next subject I propose to deal with is the mode of election of the Senate. We have heard a good deal, and I have noticed that a great change of opinion has come over some of those members who sat with me in 1891. At that time the Convention was almost unanimous that the mode of election should be the mode adopted by the State Legislatures of the United States of America, that is, that the Senate should be elected by the State Legislatures; but I notice that there seems to be a disposition to give up what was almost the unanimous opinion of that Convention, and to adopt some other scheme which may be very good theoretically, but for which, however, there is no precedent, unless perhaps it is the precedent of the elections to this Convention. Now, I am very glad to find that there is a generally expressed opinion that the people have been most wise in the selection of the representatives to this Convention. I am glad to admit it, but at the same time I do not think we should base too much upon one event. I think we want a little more experience than one election before we can form a definite opinion, and therefore I would have liked to have heard the reason why those who voted with me in 1891 for the election of the senators by the State Legislatures—and there were only six who voted against it—have changed their opinions.

Mr. GORDON:

There are three here now who voted against it.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

I am glad to hear that, and probably they have changed their opinions since. At any rate, there were only six out of about fifty who voted against that mode of election. Now it has been stated during this debate that one of the reasons why so much objection is taken to the State Legislatures electing the members to the Senate is that some have nominee Houses. I should think that might be easily got over. If the nominee Houses are not thought well of by the people and are not considered sufficiently liberal I suppose it is easy for the people of the colony to alter the law in regard to it. I have not heard of any determined attempt upon the part of those Ministries who preside over the destinies of the colonies having nominee houses to get rid of them or change them if they are not satisfied with them.

Mr. REID:
We like the frying pan better than the fire.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
In Queensland and New South Wales they are part of the Legislature of the country and make laws for the Government of the country, and the liberty of the people is entrusted to them, and I have yet to learn that they are not as high-minded, patriotic, and honest, and as good a set of men as any men elected. If they are not, do you think the people in those colonies would allow them to remain and take their share in the legislation of the colony, if they are not satisfied with the way they are doing their duty? Sir John Downer, in his admirable speech this morning, told us if the election of the Senate was by the people that the Senate would be much stronger, in fact it was the only way he saw in which to make the Senate that strong body which he desired it should be. Well, as I just now stated, in the Convention of 1891 only six persons thought that way, and I do not think even they went so far as to say in what way they desired they should be elected; but, at any rate, they disapproved of the plan we adopted. I would like to point out that in the United States of America the Senate has been elected by the Houses of Legislature for over 100 years.

Mr. PEACOCK:
It has worked very badly.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
It is easy to say that, but if it has worked badly why have there not been greater attempts on the part of Congress and the people to alter the system.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Their Constitution is so rigid that they cannot.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
They can if they make a determined effort. The Senate of the United States is a far more distinguished body than that of the House of Representatives in America. If it is elected in a way which is so much disapproved of, how is it that it still retains its prestige? Why has it got the executive power? Because it has held it, and exercised it satisfactorily. It was not that in the beginning the House had this power, so much as on account of the character of the men elected to it, and yet it is a body nominated by the State Parliaments.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Those should take who have the power, and those should keep who can.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

It is the strongest, ablest, and most august body in the United States.

Mr. DEAKIN:

It has just thrown out the Arbitration Treaty.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

I do not care about that. I think, for the reasons stated, that in these early days we should be willing to take a precedent which has been established for the last hundred years, and which found favor in the Convention of 1891, when only six delegates voted against it, rather than run after something which seems in theory very good, and which the other day, on one occasion, mind you, appears to have worked well. I would ask hon. members to be cautious in this matter, and to take more notice of experience than of mere theory. We have experience in one case, and in the other no experience and no precedent to follow. I am not altogether opposed to the proposal which Sir John Downer now favors. I should not object to the senators being elected by the whole colony, because I think those who have distinguished themselves and have won their spurs in the service of the country would have a better chance of being returned than those who have done nothing for the country; but I think there are a good many disadvantages in that mode of electing. The first is that the people would not, except in the case of well-known men, know whom they were voting for. It would give rise to combinations, and cliques, and societies in order to run persons on particular tickets, and the voter would not know whom he was voting for unless one or two prominent persons were among the candidates. I should like the elector to know whom he was voting for, and he should know something of his antecedents and his claims to the confidence of the people. It would be almost impossible in a large colony to personally canvass or visit the various settlers, and the canvassing would be done by societies and cliques, which, to my mind, would be very objectionable. At the same time I admit with pleasure that the elections which have recently taken place for this Convention have been very successful.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

They will go on improving.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

But I would prefer the experience of 100 years in America to one election in Australia. However, that matter can perhaps be better dealt with in Committee. There is another objection to the mode of election in the colony as one electorate. You would have the Houses, I think, too much alike.
Mr. LYNE:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
That, I think, would not be a good thing, although I am prepared to admit that the duties of the two would not be exactly the same, and that the duties would be looked upon by members of the two Houses from a different standpoint. Therefore, perhaps, the objection I have just raised might not be so great as it at first appears. The plan we adopted in 1891 commended itself to me because we had a long-established precedent, and looked at today it seems to me that if you take the larger colonies of Victoria and New South Wales with 100 members of Parliament-after making due allowance for all sorts of combinations and for log-rolling-can anyone suppose that 100 men, representatives of the people in both Houses of Parliament, meeting together to choose three or four men to be members of the Senate, would not discharge that duty fairly, honestly, and well? I think they would. Public opinion is too strong, and men's sense of right and honor is too strong to allow of them voting for persons to serve this friend and that friend. My idea is that they would feel their responsibility, and return the very best men the country could produce. I think I have already referred to the powers of the Senate, and expressed the opinion that they should be co-ordinate with those of the House of Representatives. The Senate should have equal powers in regard to all Bills, except the Appropriation Bill, which they should not have power to amend, but should have power to reject.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Even Taxation Bills?

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Taxation Bills certainly. The Senate should have coordinate powers in regard to all Bills, except the Appropriation Bill, which, as was so lucidly placed before us by my hon. friend Mr. McMillan, would stop the business of the country, and is altogether unlike any other measure because there is no other measure which cannot afford to wait a little while without doing any very serious damage to the country. There is another matter to which I would like to draw the attention of those who consider themselves very democratic. I myself, in my own country, am considered a liberal, but when I come over here somehow people look at me as if I were a conservative. But I would like to say this from the point of view of hon. members who are what they may call democratic, their proud boast at the present time-in fact, almost their sole argument-is to talk about the people's House; but which would be the people's House if one House was elected by the various constituencies of the colony, and the other House was elected by the whole colony voting as one electorate? There would be a great dispute then between the members of the two Houses as to which was the people's House.

Mr. HOLDER:
Both.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
They would both be, and the House elected by the whole people of the colony would have the best right to be termed the people's House.

Mr. HIGGINS:
With equal representation of the small States it would not be the people's House.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I am sure there would be some plan found by which one side would argue that the Senate ought not to be considered the people's House. However, the other side would certainly maintain that they had more right to be considered the people's House than the Lower House.

Mr. TRENWITH:
The other side will maintain it.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
In regard to the franchise I am of opinion that the plan adopted at the first election for the House of Representatives should be that which finds a place in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. I cannot understand how anyone who really desires that we should come to any definite conclusions on this occasion should object to that. The franchise of all these colonies, if I may except Tasmania—and I think that may be included—is manhood suffrage. We have manhood suffrage in all the colonies, but in Victoria, Western Australia, and Queensland there is plural voting.

An HON. MEMBER:
Do not forget Tasmania.

Mr. LYNE:
They give a man twelve votes in Tasmania.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
The franchise in Western Australia is exactly the same as in Victoria; we have plural voting in both cases.

Mr. FRASER:
Which has no effect.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I think it has some little effect. I should not be inclined to say it has no effect, or else I would do away with it. We look at it from a practical point of view, and we think that where our interests are we should have something to say in the matter. We think that where we have invested our capital and other people's capital in far-away districts, we should have something to say as to the persons those districts should return. With that view we have adopted plural voting. I do not for a moment say it has no effect in Western Australia. It has some effect, especially in the far-away districts where the population is very sparse. While I am in favor of the franchise for the Lower House being that provided by the state for the election of the more numerous House, I should not object to give to the Federal Parliament the power to frame whatever franchise they might think desirable. It would be impossible at the present time for us all to agree here in regard to the franchise which is to find a place in this Bill for the Lower House. We are willing that South Australia should have her own franchise, and every other colony should have its own; so in the same way we desire that Western Australia should have her own. It would be a most confusing thing if at the present time we tried to frame a franchise that would be applicable to all. I think that is altogether unnecessary now, and we might fairly leave that to the decision of the Federal Parliament hereafter. I would like to say one or two words with regard to the financial question, which is the most difficult of all the problems we have to solve. I admit that the financial question is a troublesome one; though it does not appear to be so difficult the more you examine it. The plan adopted in the 1891 Bill requires a little alteration, but it was not unreasonable in many respects. The revenue received or due to a colony, less the expenditure of the upkeep of the Central Government and of the departments, should be returned to the colony, and vice versa. If it were not for the re-exporting no great difficulties would arise. We will take, for instance, raw materials imported into South Australia and exported into Western Australia. The duty on them would have been collected in South Australia and the goods used in Western Australia. Under the system I propose the duty should be transferred to the colony where the goods are used, but it would be a difficult thing to follow the goods; indeed, it would be almost impossible. To do so would necessitate the erection of Custom Houses on the same lines as we have at present. The only plan I see to get over the question is to take an average for several years and then readjust. By that means you would give and take. Some would gain and some would lose. If it were not for the re-exporting it would be easy. When goods came into a colony and were re-exported, I cannot see how they would be traced, and how the revenue could be transferred to the proper colony. With regard to the control of the railways, I must disagree with those who desire that the railways should be under the control of the Federal Government. It might suit a colony such as Victoria or New South Wales, where they have so many means of communication, for the Federation to have control, but for Western Australia it would be altogether out of the question to allow an outside control in a matter which does not concern in any way the other colonies. We are isolated. We are almost like an island in the Indian Ocean. When we come to these colonies we have to travel 1,000 miles by sea. We have no other means of communication except by a long and tedious journey overland, and to put the control of the railways in the hands of people who do not care a straw about them is most absurd. The railway system of our colony is mixed up with the daily life of the people. It is the life-blood of the whole community. The railway and the land work together, and they are the main factors in the prosperity and life of the people. The railway is a means of transit for the farmer who works the land. We have no other means of communication. Seeing how closely the railways and the land system are interwoven it would make life and government intolerable if we had no control over the management of our lines. To a lesser extent the same applies to the post offices. I should not object to hand them over to the central authority, but I see no advantage in a colony like Western Australia handing over the post offices to the central authority.

Mr. LYNE:

What would you hand over?

Sir JOHN FORREST:

That is for you to say. The post offices and telegraphs are intimately connected with everyone. What would have happened if during the last three or four years our post offices had been under the control of the central authority? It would have saved the Government a lot of trouble. Thousands of miles of telegraphs, and tens of thousands of miles of postal routes have been established at great cost. The whole of the resources of the Government were required to keep pace with the times, and would the clamor and noise of the people have reached the central authority as it reached the Government in Perth? No. No central government far away removed from the centre of operations would have been able to cope with the difficulties that have arisen during the last three years as the local government were able to. I come to the observation of the member for New South Wales who asked what are we to leave to the Central Government? I have asked this question myself several times and I have had to confess to myself that there are few things that the Central Government can do as well as the local Government, but still there are some things which the Central Government can better perform, and the great one is to administer matters of defence. There is no doubt that the Federal Government is far better able to take charge of military matters than the local Governments. Then as regards the Customs I am prepared to say that this is a matter which I would leave to the Central Government. I do not think that they are better able to judge what is taxable in the interests of a colony than the Government of that colony, and especially in the case of a colony isolated as the one I have the honor to represent is. Still, I recognise that this and the general power of taxation must be left to the Central Government, although I do so somewhat reluctantly. Then the Federal Parliament should have control of the postal and telegraph departments, though I am quite certain that it would be all against the interests of Western Australia to have it so. Quarantine is a fit subject for federal control, and so are harbors and lights, but at the same time I do not think the Central Government would look after the lights on the various coasts half so well as the local Governments. They would not know so well where the lights were required, and those in charge of the lights would not perform their work so efficiently as if under the eye of the local authorities. While I am prepared to assist in passing this Bill, and while I believe in a Central Government, I am at a loss, and I honestly confess it, to satisfy myself where the gain comes in for the colony I have the honor to represent. Still, though we may have to sacrifice something in the first instance it will be for the eventual good and happiness of the whole, so I am prepared to throw in my lot with the other colonies of Australia. I will give an instance to members from which they will be able to judge from my standpoint. Of course it will be said that the year I take is an extraordinarily abnormal one; that may be so, but facts are hard things to get over. I will give the year 1896, and I have taken a paper prepared by the Government Statist of Western Australia, which shows that if the Federal Government had at the beginning of 1896 taken over the Customs, post and telegraph, money order, defence, and harbor and lights departments of Western Australia, we would have made a first loss of £857,979, or a proportion of 35 per cent. of the total revenue. There is a fact for me to have to face.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Does that include the return of the surplus?

Sir JOHN FORREST:

No.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Then it would not be all loss.
The money, however, would have to be handed over, and of course we would afterwards get some of it back.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You might get back more than you paid.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not wish to gain anything for my colony which the others would not gain. So long as she would not lose by the transaction I am perfectly satisfied, because I believe that eventually it must be to the good of all of us. One thing it will do to perhaps many of us engaged in political life. It will lift us up politically, and we are influenced by this to some extent, for even those in the large colonies must feel at times the contracted nature of the public life. It will be a great thing in Australia to lift up politics out of the mud into which they sometimes get. It will be of great benefit in being able to make for the whole of Australia general laws. We must always remember, as Mr. McMillan has said, that we are not in the same position as the States of America - those thirteen States which are now forty-two States and some "territories." We have immense territories here which contain all the elements of empire in most of our boundaries, each one of us. In Western Australia we have a small population with 3,000 miles of coastline; we have a revenue of two and a half millions of money; we have a population of about 140,000 people, and a territory of 640,000,000 acres of land. A great deal of it is not good, but I may say that is not an index, as a great portion of our prosperity of late years has come from quarters we had thought not fit for habitation, and that may happen again. Perhaps that which is barren now may be the home of teeming millions. Most of this territory is in the hands of the Crown. Western Australia is larger than most of Europe, is eight times larger than Great Britain, and bigger than France, Germany, Italy, and Austria all put together. So surely there is room for an empire; but we are all one people. We all belong to the same nation, and we do not want to live under different laws, to be separated by hostile tariffs and by imaginary lines drawn across a map, separating one colony from another. I do not propose to say anything more, on this occasion. I have only touched upon a few of the points, but we shall have another opportunity in Committee of discussing other portions. I hope we may get on with the business as quickly as we can. There are only a few points, which I can count on the fingers of one hand, for discussion. All the rest we are agreed upon. During the next fortnight I hope with my colleagues that we shall be able to do something, and not have to say to ourselves when we return to our colony that we have been over to the Convention, and just when we got to the work we had to return and leave it unfinished. I desire also to inform hon. members that in order to expedite business, and in order to get to work on the Bill as soon as possible, no other member from Western Australia intends to speak on the present occasion. I am sure my thanks are due to them, for I am sure some of them would have liked very much to have spoken; but they will have an opportunity of doing so when the Bill is in Committee.

Mr. SOLOMON:

Before discussing the main points of the resolutions before us, I desire to express my thanks to the hon. member representing New South Wales, Mr. Barton, for presenting these resolutions in the precise form that he has done. At first I was inclined, with many other hon. members of the Convention, to think that perhaps it would have been better if we had taken the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 as the basis of our work, but now I think that perhaps we have economised time by taking the resolutions submitted by Mr. Barton as the basis for our debate. More especially so, as during the course of the debate I have had the pleasure of listening to many members who have not hesitated, any more than I shall myself, to express themselves on the details of the resolutions, and also on the more important points involved in this Federation question. I also can indorse with pleasure the remarks of the Premier of Western Australia, when he said how much all of us were indebted to those gentlemen who formed the Convention of 1891 for the concise and masterly piece of work they have given, not only to us as a guide, but to the whole of the Australian people as a guide to what Federation ought to be, and a guide which I think we will to a great extent follow. I think, in no ungrudging spirit, the thanks of the members of the Convention who were not members of the Convention of 1891 will be readily accorded to the Premier and others who were, and whose work will be taken as the basis of any measure this Convention will frame, not perhaps in its entirety, but certainly as regards the bulk of its machinery clauses, and probably three-fourths of its general clauses. Coming to the resolutions submitted by Mr. Barton, the first one, which deals with the protection of the present powers and privileges of the various States, is perhaps one of the most important. In this perhaps we have really the very highest of our federal aspirations, not that the States should be absorbed in one Central Parliament, but that the States for various common purposes, principally of a commercial and financial nature, should surrender just as much of those public matters and public departments as can be better, more efficiently, and more economically managed by a Central Government than by seven isolated Governments. And, after all, this Federation scheme, if we come to divest it of its sentimental aspects altogether, seems to me to be nothing more nor less in plain English than a partnership-a partnership which several States enter into, not with any sentimental ideas of kinship, but because there are several commercial and financial matters of interest to all their people, and for purposes of defence, which is perhaps the only sentimental part of it, which can be better dealt with by one Central Government than by six or seven Governments. And as we enter into ordinary partnerships in everyday life, partnerships in which sometimes very large interests are at stake, a considerable degree of caution and care surrounds the basis of those partnerships, so that the conditions will be equitable to all parties, conditions that will prevent friction in the future, and avoid questions arising that may lead to trouble or dissolution, or desire for dissolution of to be admitted now, and I am proud that it is so, that the position of Governor-General is not to be made the subject for the election of the people, but that the Governor-General shall be nominated by Her Majesty the Queen in precisely the same manner as the Governor is now nominated. Now, as to the question of the two Houses, there is no doubt a large section of this Convention is at one in regard to this question, and although it has been suggested that some other form of Constitution might be more fitting it is admitted that the Constitution we are so well acquainted with, and what we term responsible government, is the better form, and as a majority of the Convention are in favor of the two Houses I would not delay upon the question. Sir Richard Baker, one of the representatives for South Australia, raised the question of the advisableness or otherwise of adopting this responsible government as a basis of our Constitution, and he raised many doubts in the minds of members of this Convention by the new light he threw upon the question and, although I am prepared to admit the view taken by Sir Richard Baker is worthy of thoughtful consideration, still I think from our experiences of the past, the experiences of the mother-country and the development of her Constitution over hundreds of years, that it should be sufficient for us at this stage to take that for our copy. It is far better to take the Constitution which the mother-country has adopted, the Constitution which the whole of the self-governing colonies of Australia have adopted, and which is so familiar to the whole of the people, than to launch out into new experiences. The constitutions of Switzerland, America, and Canada, all have admirable features, and no doubt all of them have faults; and these are Constitutions that arise out of circumstances which do not prevail at the present time in Australia. Here in Australia the colonies which are about to federate, although they have been under separate governments, have not like the now United States of America, been under governments, the forms of which were in many instances agonistic to one another. The people of the Australian Colonies have never been at one another's throats in the horrors of warfare. They have been under a common Crown; they have always had the protecting power of England around them; and they have had the lessons of the mother-country to guide them. They have Constitutions which have been in fact almost on the same lines, except as regards the franchise. In adopting Federation, it would be wise to move on lines with which we are acquainted, and to have a Constitution that we know something about; for though there may be some evils in the system we have followed, it is better to put up with them than to fly to others which we know not of. The question of the constitution of the two Houses and their manner of election is one upon which there will perhaps be the greatest amount of debate, and at the same time it is one of those which the Constitutional Committee, when it is appointed, should have the fullest possible knowledge of the opinions of the various delegates upon. The question of the powers of the two Houses seems to be one upon which we are likely to clash. It is first of all admitted, at least admitted by the majority in the Convention-and therefore it is not necessary for me to enlarge upon it-that in the Senate, or rather, what in the resolutions which are before me is termed the States Assembly, but a better name for which I think would be the States Council, the States as States, or colonies as colonies, shall be equally represented. This has been conceded even by the larger colonies, larger numerically, who may be inclined to think that, as in the House of Representatives, so in the States Assembly, population should have a greater amount of consideration. Having conceded this point as to equal representation of each colony in the States Assembly, it is also sought by some of those who recognise the equity of this concession that the powers of the States Assembly should be limited in regard to dealing with Money Bills. Now as this federal scheme is after all a commercial partnership, and as the power of the purse will perhaps be the greatest power which either body of the Legislature can wield, I think this point with regard to the control of the finances of the Federal Parliament is perhaps the most important that we have to deal with. It is all very well for hon. members to say that it would be impossible to permit both Houses to have the same powers in dealing with financial questions. It is all very well for some to urge that it would be impossible that the control of the Executive, their appointment and their dismissal, should be in the hands of the House of Representatives, while, on the other hand, the power of amending Money Bills in detail should be conceded to the States Assembly. But it appears to me that without this power of amending Money Bills in detail the power to protect States rights is nothing but a delusion and a snare. It is all very well for our hon. friend Mr. Isaacs to talk of the smaller States-

Asking for a shield, and eventually demanding a sword.

But if this power of dealing with Money Bills is denied to the Chamber in which the States are represented, the shield that he would give to them is a shield of painted cardboard and the sword a sword of tin.

Mr. BARTON:
They would not ask for a shield unless somebody else had a sword.

Mr. GLYNN:
They want the tin.

Mr. SOLOMON:
However much we may be inclined to trust the numerically larger colonies in most matters in regard to the Commonwealth, however much we may be prepared to concede that they should have a slightly larger representation in the people's House, we still must - for the protection of the small States-insist on having co-equal powers in the Senate in regard to dealing with financial questions, not perhaps in regard to the origination of Money Bills, because this we might well concede to the people's House; but in regard to the amendments in detail in such Money Bills, or of such Bills as seek to deal with the funds to which all the States have contributed. In these matters, if we want to protect the smaller States against unwisely-used power on the part of the larger States, we must endeavor to come to some reasonable arrangement to increase the powers of the Senate. As to the constitution of the House of Representatives, the point as to the number of members which each colony is to have seems, to some extent, to have been conceded by many speakers. Not many have alluded to the enormous predominance of members which the two larger States will have in that House; but a great many have seemed by their silence to admit that the terms of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, in which it was proposed to give each State proportionate representation in the form of one member for every 30,000 of its populations, should be adopted. I can see no reason why that should be adopted; but, on the other hand, I can see very grave reasons why it should not be adopted. Irrespective of whether the powers of the Senate or the States Assembly are increased in regard to Money Bills, I say that whether the representation is on the basis of one member for every 30,000 of each colony's population, as proposed in the Commonwealth Bill, or of one member for every 40,000 of its population, as proposed by the Premier of Victoria, Sir George Turner, the predominance of members in this Lower Chamber is far greater than the smaller States can justly and fairly accede to. Again, the number of members some 120 odd-in this Federal Parliament, which is only going to deal with perhaps half a dozen important subjects, seems to be too large for the purposes of good work and for the purposes of economy. Of course destructive criticism is much more simple than to suggest a means of alteration, but at the same time, in the face of considerable opposition from gentlemen in this colony to whom I have propounded a different scheme, I will endeavor to show members of this Convention, that there is a better scheme for representation in the Houses of Representatives than that included within the four corners of the Commonwealth Bill. I have previously described this Federation as a partnership, and a partnership to a large extent for commercial purposes. Thinking over the manner in which the shareholders in that partnership should be represented, it struck me that as in all large joint-stock companies we do not have representation precisely on the scale of the number of shares held by each individual partner, but on a sliding scale, so in reference to this Federation scheme we have a partnership which is to consist of six or seven colonies having varied populations-some of these colonies having immense tracts of territory, others having very small tracts of territory-and it is proposed in this partnership that the territories which have the largest population, irrespective of their area, should have absolute representation in the people's House in proportion to their population. I ask hon. members, especially those from the other colonies who have given their adherence to this scheme, how they would like precisely the same scheme to be adopted with regard to the election of their Houses of Assembly in their respective colonies, and how they would like, that while the city and suburbs would have such largely-increased representation in their local Parliaments, the country and the outside districts, where the producers-the bone and sinew of the colonies-dwell, should be represented by a miserably small proportion of members? This would not work well, either in regard to the city and suburbs of Melbourne or of Sydney, and some of the members who now believe in this particular federal scheme would be the first to jump at the idea of representation on a population basis in their own local Parliaments. I am sure a scheme such as we adopt in private partnerships, in joint-stock companies, etc., where the shareholders do not have votes in proportion to the number of shares they hold, but on a sliding scale, would be much more equitable, and give us a more workable House. The proportionate representation in the National Assembly should be on a sliding scale, as follows:—First 100,000 of population, six representatives; second 100,000, three representatives; third 100,000, two representatives; any additional 100,000, one representative.
Mr. HIGGINS:
You are dealing with the Senate.

Mr. SOLOMON:
No; the House of Representatives. Under the Commonwealth Bill, and according to the latest statistics I have in my hand, New South Wales, with 1,300,000 population, would be entitled to forty-three representatives; Victoria, with 1,200,000 population, to forty; Queensland, with 480,000 population, to sixteen; South Australia, with 360,000 population, to twelve; Western Australia, with 150,000 population, to five; and Tasmania, with 165,000 population, to five or six. Under my scheme New South Wales would have twenty-one members, Victoria twenty, Queensland twelve, South Australia eleven, Western Australia six, and Tasmania six, making a total of seventy-six members. You will see that under the Commonwealth Bill it is provided that New South Wales and Victoria would have eighty-three members as against thirty-nine members for the rest of the colonies, while on the other hand we find that even under this sliding scale scheme, which I think is the more equitable one, Victoria and New South Wales must have forty-one members out of seventy-six members of the House, while the other four colonies would only muster thirty-five members if they combined together. Surely these are principles which are to be considered fairly, first of all on the question of a workable House of seventy-six members, and next on the ground that greater economy would be effected than in a House of 120, and the preponderance in my scheme would be quite sufficient to give to larger colonies. Mere population alone should not be considered. Surely the possibilities of such a territory as that which has been described by Sir John Forrest are worthy of some consideration, and I will submit, with all deference to the Convention, and especially when in Committee, the proposal that there is no need whatever for us to take the Commonwealth Bill idea of how we are going to have representation, and I will offer the suggestion that we should fix some sliding scale which will not give such an immense predominance to two States as eighty-three to thirty-nine representatives from the other colonies. If the small colonies are really and in fact represented on an equality of basis in the Senate, and if the question of the amendment of Money Bills is conceded to the Senate, then perhaps there is not so much importance in the overwhelming numbers which certain States will have in the House of Representatives. If, on the other hand, this power to amend Money Bills, and control to some extent the finances of the Federation is denied, it behoves all of the representatives of the smaller States to be specially careful of the Constitution and the number of representatives given in the Lower House.

Mr. ISAACS:

What you really want is a confederation.

Mr. SOLOMON:

I cannot see that such an argument can be drawn from my remarks. What I really want is Federation on wise and just lines that will be fair to all of the colonies. Surely members will concede that no colonies should preponderate. It is fair and reasonable that there should be a desire for the small States to be properly represented, and to prevent two or more States having a large preponderance of the representatives.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Who is to predominate?

Mr. SOLOMON:

The majority will predominate, but there should not be an unfair predomination. What I wish to prevent is two colonies, owing to the fact that they have two and a half millions of people, having control of the finances and legislation of the Federal Parliament simply because they have these two and a half millions of people against the one and a half millions in the other colonies.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

There is a probability of their being on opposite sides of the House.

Mr. SOLOMON:

I do not think the people of this or any other small colony would count very much upon that probability. The probability is that these two colonies, which join each other by boundaries, and whose railways are a perfect network, will have more in common and more to protect than the whole of the other small States combined. Not for one instant do I propose that they should have only the same amount of representation in the House of Representatives. I did not suggest it, but I do suggest that the sliding scale which I have given is a fair and equitable one. As a matter of fact it still gives them the predominance of five or six votes. What I maintain is that the scale provided for in the Commonwealth Bill is not fair, and that, with all due deference to those who oppose equality of power in the two Houses, unless the Senate has co-ordinate powers with the House of Representatives with regard to money matters, the greatest care must be exercised with regard to the representation of the colonies in the House of Representatives. Next we come to the question of the various departments to be handed over to the Central Government; and on this point I find as the debate has proceeded, that difficulties which I had never imagined have been shown to exist, and that in regard to the railways and the consolidation of the bonded debt, experts in financial matters have demonstrated so many difficulties that the more I look at the question the more I see the necessity of leaving the consideration of these great subjects to the Committees which will be appointed by the Convention, which will have the assistance, which members have not, of the statistical experts. Sir Philip Fysh gave us a most valuable and interesting contribution to our debate, which was perhaps one of the clearest and most practical, with the exception of that of Mr. McMillan, that the Convention has had the pleasure of listening to on the subject of the finances. His speech bristled with matters about which there are difficulties. He started by telling us that even if we consolidated our debt of some £180,000,000 we would have to give up so many benefits to the present bondholders that at the finish there would seem to be very little left in the way of advantage to the colonies. I do not say that his figures are correct, as he seems to have taken a rather pessimistic view in dealing with this great subject. The question of the consolidation of the bonded debt is, perhaps, one of the most important that we will have to consider, and I admit that we cannot in one Act, whether by Act of Parliament, or by Act of the Federal Parliament, say to the bondholders, "You shall hand over your bonds at a certain price, and we will give you other bonds at a certain rate." If we desire the bondholders to give us any proportion of the advantage we must be prepared to treat them fairly, and to give them the market value for their bonds.

[P.259] starts here

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Suppose they will not make any terms, you cannot coerce them.

Mr. SOLOMON:

It is hardly advisable to start by supposing anything of the kind. When we have thought out a scheme to offer to the bondholders, which will give them a fair and equitable price for their bonds, perhaps by means of an additional currency of the present bonds, or by the issue of fresh bonds altogether, it will be time enough for them to say whether they will accept it or not. To begin by shaking hands with difficulties we have not yet met is not the way to consider this matter. Sir Philip Fysh, giving a supposititious case, put it that we might have to give bonds having a currency of fifty years and bearing interest at 3 per cent., and then pay the present holders the market price of their bonds; and he put it that if we did this we should perhaps gain a million per annum. But of that million £250,000 would go into the sinking fund for the premium we should have to provide for the bondholders, and another £250,000 would go for interest on that premium and other expenses.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

That is if we agree to sell.
Mr. SOLOMON:
I do not think there is very much doubt of that. You can offer these bondholders equal, if not better, value.

An HON. MEMBER:
Better security.

Mr. SOLOMON:
A better security as a whole, and a stock that would be worth so many sovereigns whenever they took it, as the Consols are taken; and if you can offer these terms to the bondholders they will accept them.

Mr. GLYNN:
In a hundred years' experience in England they have never done it.

Mr. SOLOMON:
They have never been offered the same terms. If the hon. member will wait he will see the terms I would offer. At the present time the colonies are holding bonds of various dates up to forty-five years, and if those bondholders could exchange their bonds, especially as to the earlier-dated bonds offered on the London Stock Exchange, and have in their places bonds bearing interest at 2 3/4 or 3 per cent. with a longer currency, they will be perfectly willing to come in, especially if they have an additional currency as well. What is the cry of the money markets of England and the Continent? They cannot find decent securities for their money. With the accumulation of money in England and the Continent, they are anxious to find legitimate investments even at 2 1/2 per cent. or 2 3/4 per cent. What a small amount the total indebtedness of Australia is! It is only a matter of 200 millions. And on 112 millions of it the colonies are receiving—I allude, of course, to the railways—over and above working expenses, 3 per cent. This would be one of the securities which the bondholders would have behind their new issue of bonds. I do not profess to be a financial expert, I do not profess to be able to feel the pulse of the London or Continental money market, but I am sure of this, that if the Treasurer or the financial agents of the Federal Government are sufficiently liberal, and do not attempt to get an advantage over the bondholders, they will have very little difficulty in bringing the new issue into favor.

An HON. MEMBER:
Where will the safety come in?

Mr. SOLOMON:
The safety will come in in the long-dated bonds.
An HON. MEMBER:

If you make a loss.

Mr. SOLOMON:

There will be less expenditure during the term of years during which our bonds are current. It would undoubtedly be a great advantage to the whole of Australia if we could consolidate her present debt at a much lower rate of interest, and with regard to the future loans the new bonds which they issued at a lower rate of interest would be taken as a guide for the rate of interest to be charged for future loans. And surely when these colonies are federated we do not expect that our borrowings are to entirely cease. We surely expect with these immense territories, hundreds of millions of acres of which have been hardly trodden by the foot of man, that we shall require from the English or other moneylenders some large loans for the construction of railways and other public works for the future development of these territories. We do not think it likely that our population is to remain as it is now, or that the immense tracts of country which have remained practically idle will remain so, and we can hardly expect that our revenues to be derived from the taxpayers will not only be sufficient to pay our interest and our contribution to the Central Parliament, but also sufficient to construct those immense lines of railway which will be required to develop the interior portions of Australia.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Our national debt is already very large.

Mr. SOLOMON:

Still, at the back of our debt of £180,000,000 we have our railways, which have cost £112,000,000 in round figures; we have in addition the whole of our buildings, our Customs Houses, our telegraph offices, our lighthouses, our bridges, our main roads, and a host of other public institutions, all of which are really good security for every penny of our national debt. There is no fear now, and there never has been any fear, of the colonies repudiating any portion of the interest they have to pay.

Mr. BARTON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. SOLOMON:

And that in spite of three or four years of as hard times in regard to our leading producing industries as the colonies have ever experienced. I think, Sir, at this stage I might ask leave to continue my remarks to-morrow.

Leave given.

Mr. BARTON:

That the debate be adjourned.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
ADJOURNMENT.
Convention adjourned at 5.30 p.m.

[P.261] starts here
Tuesday March 30, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. REID:
I beg to present a petition to this honorable Convention from the Salvation Army in New South Wales. It is signed by 1,029 persons, and prays for the recognition of God as the Supreme Ruler of the world in the preamble of the Federal Constitution. It is in due form, and I beg to move that it be received.

Mr. BARTON:
I desire to present a petition from 1,084 members and adherents of the Australasian Wesleyan Methodist Church, citizens of New South Wales, praying that in the preamble of the Constitution to be framed there should be a recognition of God as the Supreme Ruler, that each daily session of the Upper and Lower House of Parliament be opened with prayer, and that the Governor-General be empowered to appoint days of national thanksgiving and humiliation. The petition is in due form, and contains a prayer.

Mr. BRUNKER:
I have a petition from 1,500 members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of New South Wales praying that there may be an acknowledgment of God in the Federal Constitution, and in the opening ceremonies of the daily sessions of the Federal Parliament. The petition is respectfully worded, and contains a prayer. It is signed by 1,500 residents in New South Wales. I beg to move that the petition be received.

Mr. BRUNKER:
I have a petition from 1,500 members of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of New South Wales, praying that there may be inserted in the Federal Constitution a clause reserving to each colony the right to legislate as to the importation, manufacture, and sale of alcoholic liquors and opium. I beg to move that the petition be received.

Mr. CARRUTHERS:
I beg to present a petition from 292 adherents of the Primitive Methodist Church of New South Wales, similar to that presented by Mr. Barton. The petition is respectfully worded, and concludes with a prayer. I move that it be received.

Petitions received.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Mr. BARTON:

I give notice of motion for to-morrow, it of course being contingent on the debate not being concluded to-day:

That the Convention shall, at 5.30 p.m. this day, suspend its sitting until 7 p.m., at which hour the Convention shall be resumed and the transaction of business continued.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

Before the business of the day is called upon, I wish to call attention to a question of practice and procedure which is somewhat important. In the original resolutions as moved by Mr. Barton there are some words to which I have strong objection, but I did not move to excise those words because I considered it was understood that the committees which are to be appointed are to have a free hand, and that the resolutions which are to be referred to them are not in any way mandatory, but that the committees can consider, discuss, and arrive at any conclusion they think fit. I mention this matter so that it may be beyond discussion when the committees have been settled; that it may not be asserted that we were a party to these resolutions, and that the committee cannot alter them. I wish to call attention to that point, and ask your ruling.

Mr. BARTON:

Is there any particular portion to which you allude?

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

Yes,

and to possess the sole power of originating all Bills appropriating revenue or imposing taxation.

In the short speech which I had the honor to make to this Convention I stated that though that has been the ordinary parliamentary proceeding, I would have moved to strike these words out, but inasmuch as I understood that these were only preliminary resolutions, not intended to be binding on the committees appointed to consider them, I refrained from making any amendments. I wish to ask you, and perhaps Mr. Barton may also be able to state whether in his opinion I am right or wrong in the conclusions to which I have arrived.

Mr. BARTON:

I shall not attempt to anticipate any decision of the Chair, but I would only say that my leaning is altogether on the side of the greatest freedom on the part of committees, so that they may have, by their own decisions, and by the work of the drafting committee whom they shall appoint, so free a hand as to enable everything that has been evolved during this debate, as well as during the sittings in Committee, to be considered on the question of whether it should be embodied in the Bill. That is the design with which I moved the resolutions, and if your ruling goes in favor of the matter being left quite open to the Committee by the resolutions being referred in the manner intended, then I shall be all the more pleased.

The PRESIDENT:

I could have wished that my attention had been previously drawn to this matter, but what I take it is this: that the duties of the Committee will be fixed by the instructions which are given by the House in relation to their appointment. These instructions at the present moment form the subject of a contingent notice of motion, and I am under the impression that if the notice of motion is carried in the form in which it appears on the paper with reference to the appointment of the committees, the Committee will have a fairly free hand in connection with the preparation of the Constitution, though, of course, that can be made more clear if desired by the Convention when the resolutions for the appointment of the Committee come on for discussion.

Mr. BARTON:

Hear, hear.

SITTINGS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. BARTON:

I desire to move the following motion standing in my name—

That the Convention shall, at 5.30 p.m. this day, suspend its sitting until 7 p.m., at which hour the Convention shall be resumed and the transaction of business continued.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.

Debate resumed on resolutions by Mr. Barton (vide page 17).

Mr. SOLOMON:

Last evening, when the time arrived for the adjournment of the Convention, I had almost finished dealing with that portion of our business which relates to the consolidation of loans. It seemed to me during the discussion of this most important point, in listening to the speeches of the hon. member for New South Wales, Mr. McMillan, and the hon. member for Tasmania, Sir Philip Fysh, that both these gentleman took rather a pessimistic view of the possibilities of a consolidation of our bonded debt for the whole of Australasia which would lead to any degree of saving. I am inclined to think that both those hon. gentlemen, and some others, including the hon. member, Sir William Zeal, are disposed to omit the consideration of the most important fact that, in issuing new bonds for the whole of the debt of Australasia, we will give several advantages to the present bondholders—first of all, the advantage of having one bond with a greater degree of security; and secondly, that we may effect a considerable saving by making these bonds of longer date than the existing bonds which we ask them to return. However, I admit I am not in the position of some hon. members to discuss this question as fully as I would like, because up to the present time none of us have before us the work of the statistical experts, which would show us the amounts of the various bonds becoming due, the dates at which they mature, and the amount of interest which is payable on these bonds. Without the whole of those details with reference to all classes of bonds, which so far are not on our files to guide us, it would be impossible to fully indicate what the probable saving might be by the consolidation of the whole of our loans. Therefore I am of opinion that perhaps it would be better to leave the discussion on this part of the financial question until after the Financial Committees have dealt with it, and until light has been thrown upon it by statistical experts. The next question of importance, perhaps, is the handing over of the various railways to the Federal Parliament, and the arguments that have been used in favor of this system have principally been based upon the supposition that, in the first place, great economies could be made by doing away with lines which at present only duplicate the work, and, in the second place, that control could be obtained over the various lines which at present are not paying owing to the establishment of differential rates. It has been pointed out that it would be useless to have intercolonial freetrade and remove the whole of the border duties between the colonies if, on the other hand, the railways were permitted to have differential rates which would deprive us of all the advantage of intercolonial freetrade. On the question of handing over the railways to the Federal Parliament it seems to me that the majority of the members who have spoken are not inclined to give them to the Federal Parliament, which will not have sufficient revenue from Customs alone to pay for the expenses of the Commonwealth and also to pay the interest on the whole of the loans. It seems to me that, supposing the difficulties in regard to handing over these railways are decided to be insurmountable, it will then perhaps be better to adopt the system shadowed forth by the Hon. Mr. O'Connor, I think it was, that these matters should be dealt with by a system of account-keeping, so that each colony should be credited with the net amount of the revenue, of its railways, and still retain the full control and management of them.
Mr. O’CONNOR:

It was not I who advocated that.

Mr. SOLOMON:

Then I am mistaken. I know it was one of the members of the Convention who shadowed forth that that should be the system adopted. Whether it is so or not, it appears to me that it would be an excellent system. In the first place, it would give to the Federal Parliament three millions or thereabouts of revenue. In the next place, without any interference with the local control of the railways of the different colonies, it would still give to the Federal Parliament a sufficient degree of control, enabling them—that is, if supported by sufficiently definite clauses in the Bill—to deal with the question of differential rates. There are two clauses in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 which some members of this Convention have alluded to as being quite competent to deal with this question. In my opinion, and in the opinion of a great many other members, those two clauses which deal with the restriction of trade are too indefinite to permit interference by the Federal Parliament with the rates to be charged on any of the intercolonial railway lines. At the same time many advantages could be gained by handing over the whole of these railway lines, though, on the other side, interference with the colonies and with proposed future lines for local purposes of development, might be somewhat harassing. Still it would have been better perhaps in the history of nearly all of the colonies if the construction of some of the railways had been under some central governing power. I have only to look at our own colony of South Australia to see that in two portions of the railway system, that at the north end of the southern system and that at the north end between Palmerston and Pine Creek, we have an annual loss of £120,000, and these lines, perhaps too hastily constructed, are a fair example of a great many lines in other colonies. If the whole ded to ripen public opinion for some degree of Federation which will remove these difficulties. It seems that all of the colonies, without exception, are to a great extent of opinion that a uniform tariff should be established, and that the whole of the Customs revenue should be the first portion of the revenues of the Central Federal Parliament. What this revenue of the whole of the Customs will possibly yield it is indeed a very difficult matter to prophesy. We know, for instance, that there will be a considerable amount of loss as compared with the present revenues through Customs, owing to the removal of the border duties. That loss will of course be represented by the whole of the duties imposed at the present time between one colony and another on their respective products and manufactures. Then again we had pointed out to us by one of the speakers yesterday, Mr. McMillan or Sir Philip Fysh, that, supposing Queensland is able to supply the whole of the demand of the colonies for sugar, there will be a loss of duty on this one line of £180,000 a year. Of course at the present time we know Queensland is not in a position to supply the whole of the markets of the colonies. It was said by Sir Philip Fysh that this would be virtually making a present of this £180,000 to Queensland, and I interjected that instead of giving Queensland any great advantage for her products we would really be making a present, not to that colony alone, but to the whole of the taxpayers, from one end of Australia to the other. After all, what has been the great demand of the democratic section for many years past? Intercolonial freetrade on the one hand, and the removal of the duties on the necessaries of life on the other. And if, by establishing intercolonial freetrade, we can give a market to our neighboring colony of Queensland for her sugar, and can find a free and open one for the reception of our wine, jams, preserves, and products of a more temperate clime, and at the same time give the people of the whole of the colonies free sugar, we will be doing a good stroke of business. As to the manner in which this £180,000, and the other £800,000 lost in connection with the duties on other lines of products, is to be made up, is a question which may be safely left to the Federal Parliament. If we attempt to go into all these small details, and to provide for every contingency, we will land ourselves in tremendous difficulties. The main points for us to consider are how far we will trust the Federal Parliament in the administration of the various subjects, and in this category I think the majority of the Convention will place the dealing with the tariffs. It is difficult to estimate how these tariffs will work out, and, although Mr. Reid may throw some light on the subject when he speaks, it is difficult to prophesy how far the colonies will come into line in connection with a uniform tariff. New South Wales has the freest tariff in the whole of the colonies, and on the other hand Victoria has the most oppressive. To bring these two colonies together on a uniform tariff which will meet with the approval of both, and of the other colonies, without too much sacrifice of revenue, will be a problem for the Federal Parliament. As to the amount which is likely to accrue from the Customs, it has been put severally at £6,000,000, £7,000,000, and £8,000,000. Supposing we take it at the lowest sum, we find there will be undoubtedly a large surplus, after paying the expenses of the Federal Parliament, and the question arises-and on this there has been considerable debate - as to how it is to be dealt with.
On the one hand we have the suggestion in the Commonwealth Bill that it should be repaid to the different colonies pro rata, and on the other it is proposed that it should be repaid in proportion to the population, and not in proportion to the contribution. The difficulties of both these systems have been discussed. Then we find another view of the question, as indicated by Mr. Holder, who said that he saw so much difficulty in drawing any line between the two courses that we should not deal with this monetary question, and that each colony should pay its contribution to the Federal Parliament. This would be a simple an easy mode of getting out of the difficulty; but the point raised by other speakers that the difficulty of collection might lead to disruption, and perhaps to civil war, appears to me to set aside the strength of Mr. Holder's argument. In my opinion it would be much better to adopt the course indicated by some members, and that is to transfer the bonded debt, or a portion of it, to the Federal Government. The latter course I certainly would prefer; and then the surplus could be utilised by the Central Parliament in the payment of the interest upon the bonded debt. It is also suggested in the Commonwealth Bill, and has been suggested by the resolutions, that the Central Parliament shall have, in addition to the control of the Customs revenue, further powers of taxation. In what direction this further taxation might be I am unable to imagine.

Mr. BROWN:

Excise.

Mr. SOLOMON:

Undoubtedly excise is definitely dealt with in the proposals as to Customs duties; the imposition of uniform tariffs and dealing with excise come under the same head. Of course it is suggested that the excise duties could be extended, but in case of extreme urgency—in case of a sudden demand for large sums of money for defence, or some such purpose—it seems to me there would be very great difficulty in at once obtaining the necessary funds, and therefore I am inclined to think that so long as the funds of the Commonwealth are safeguarded by proper representation in the States Assembly, it will not be at all dangerous for the Commonwealth to have a surplus in hand, a surplus which might readily be invested in State bonds and kept against such contingencies. Again, on the control of the railways, there is one point I appear to have missed, and that is this: if the whole of the colonies decide to federate, South Australia will bring into the Federation an immense tract of country known as the Northern Territory, a tract of country having a small length of non-paying railway line on the north, and a small length of railway line in South Australia at the south end. It has for many years been the desire of many South Australians to construct the railway between these two points—Oodnadatta.
on the south, and Pine Creek on the north—for the purpose of opening up this vast tract of country, the resources of which at the present time are absolutely unknown to the people. As to the value of that tract of country, it is impossible to speak, but our experience at the north end of the colony, in which we have found rich deposits of all kinds of minerals, and the experience at the south end, in the Macdonnell Ranges, points to the probability of there being equally rich deposits of gold, silver, and other minerals in that belt of unknown country, as have been recently discovered in hitherto unknown portions of Western Australia. It seems to me that if the Central Government were to take over the whole of the railways there would be little difficulty in building this 900 miles of railway as a national undertaking. At the present moment the position taken by South Australia's Government and South Australia's people is that first of all they will not do the work themselves, as they do not feel inclined to involve the colony in an immense increase of bonded debt to construct this line, and on the other hand they will not accept offers from British capitalists or others to construct the line on the land grant system.

\textbf{Mr. FRASER:}

Have they had them?

\textbf{Mr. SOLOMON:}

Undoubtedly they have. I should be extremely sorry, as representing the north end of the country, if the proposal to take over the railways is not adopted, as it would bring with it the possibility of constructing that line, which would bring immense possibilities to that country. The question of the post and telegraph departments and their being placed under the control of the Central Parliament does not appear to me to be of anything like so great importance, because, after all, there is a good deal in the argument of some of the speakers that the administration of a post and telegraph department involves so much detail work with outlying districts, especially in the larger colonies, that very little good could come from removing the seat of control from local bodies to the Central Parliament. At the same time it appears to me that some medium course might be adopted, so that, while, on the one hand the control of local post offices and small local telegraph lines might remain in the hands of the colonies, the control of what might be termed national lines, such as the telegraph line between Adelaide and Port Darwin, which is for the benefit of the whole of Australia—and I was pleased so hear Sir Philip Fysh pay a justly deserved compliment to the originators of that scheme—might be handed over to the Central Parliament, so that all questions in regard to ocean mail services, questions in which the whole of the Australian Colonies are equally interested, might also be dealt with, not by promiscuous conferences of Ministers and officers controlling the post and telegraph departments as now, but by the Central Parliament, and so that the calling of tenders for our ocean mail service might be better managed by the Central Parliament than by the local bodies. As to the question of the military and naval control that seems to me to require no argument whatever. It appears that most of the members of this Convention are at one in this opinion, that the whole control of the naval and military forces should be placed in the hands of the Central Parliament. I was at first somewhat inclined to be timid as to the possibility of the central Federal Parliament launching out in a heavy expenditure for a large standing army, or for a vastly increased naval force; but if the main points which I have alluded to before, and which I strongly advocate as to the control of the finances in the States Assembly, where the rights of the States will be protected, are conceded, we need have little fear with regard to that head. But this is certainly one of the items which, without that concession, without the right to control the expenditure in the Assembly where the States are equally represented, might at some future time prove a great danger. Next in importance is the question of the establishment of a Federal Court of Appeal, and it has been suggested that this Federal Court of Appeal should not be a final Court of Appeal, that while establishing it we should still give to litigants the full right of appeal to the Privy Council. I think it would be a farce to establish any Court of Appeal in such circumstances, and the only way in which a difficulty which might occur could be met appears to me to be that this Federal Court of Appeal should be absolutely final in all matters except such as relate to disputes between States. There might be a difficulty where disputes might occur between States-for instance, with regard to the river ways, which have been alluded to-and these disputes might lead to heated feeling and to heated arguments, and the States where the disputes occurred might be indisposed to trust them for settlement to the local Court of Appeal. In that case undoubtedly the best and most proper course would be to leave the appeal open to the Privy Council in England. In speaking yesterday afternoon in regard to the Constitution of the Federal Parliament I dealt entirely with the question of the number of representatives which each State should have in the respective Houses, but I omitted one point upon which I now desire to say a few words. I believe the representatives in both these Houses-in the House of Representatives, where the people are to be represented as a whole, and in the States Assembly, where the people are to be represented as States-should undoubtedly be upon the broadest possible franchise, and in the hands of the people. The Commonwealth Bill of 1891 laid it down upon the one hand that while the House of Representatives should be elected by the people upon the same franchise as that for the popular House in the colony, on the other hand the election of the Senate should be left in the hands of the local Legislatures. This appears to me to be a dangerous and most unpopular scheme. From what I can learn of the opinion of the electors of this colony at any rate, all of them would seek to have the fullest possible voice in the selection of their representatives to represent them as a State in the States Assembly. There has been some question raised as to the desirability of a uniform franchise for the first Parliament, and it has been pointed out by some that it would be wise that this should be laid down in black and white in the Bill we are here to formulate. Now, I am inclined to think that such a course would lead to a tremendous lot of trouble, and therefore I would say that the proposals of some members of this Convention that instead of its being laid down-instead of our attempting to dictate to the other colonies as to a uniform suffrage of the first Parliament-we should leave each State to decide upon it for themselves. I am sure for one thing, that if the representatives of South Australia were to go back with a Bill drafted in such a form as to provide that the election of both Houses of the Federal Parliament should be only upon manhood suffrage, and not upon adult suffrage, we would have very great difficulty in persuading the people of South Australia to accept such a Constitution. Whether South Australia has gone in advance of the times or not in providing for adult suffrage, and giving her women as well as men a vote, is a matter for reasonable discussion, but having once given adult suffrage to the people of South Australia, it is little use to attempt to go back upon it. To my mind the best and safest course, if we desire to have the Federation approved of by the people, is to leave to each State the manner in which the representatives for the Federal Parliament shal which are of grave importance. Like other members of the Convention, I have no desire to force my opinions as to representation in the Lower House-or as to the sliding scale and other questions-upon the Convention. I throw these matters out merely as suggestions for the consideration of hon. members, and with them I shall be equally willing to discuss all those points which have been raised fairly, and for the purpose of establishing this Federation on some reasonable terms-not upon any terms-which will be accepted by the people, and to give and take in the kindest possible spirit.

Mr. REID:
I beg to congratulate you, Sir, as one of the prominent leaders of the Federal movement, upon the most distinguished position to which you have been elected. Personally, I would have preferred your more active participation in the business of this Convention upon the floor of the House, but I am entirely reconciled to your present position owing to the fact that we can hope to have the full benefit of your assistance in the various committees which will probably be appointed. I have never concealed from myself the grave difficulties of the task which is before those who desire the Federation of the Australian Colonies. Those difficulties are large when we consider the geographical conditions of the colonies, when we consider that the six colonies occupy a small island and a vast continent, that five of them divide a coastline of 8,000 miles, that each has a metropolis which is a seaport, each capital distant from 500 to 1,000 miles from its nearest neighbor, all possessing more or less instincts of commercial rivalry. It is also another element of difficulty in our case that we have six separate systems of Government, which are marked by radical political differences, that we have five or six fiscal tariffs which also present inequalities-inequalities so serious that if you attempt to apply even a uniform tariff to them all they remain still of the utmost gravity. The difficulties which surrounded earlier federations were not so great in these respects as ours.

Dr. QUICK:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
The United States federated under a pressure which happily does not overshadow our present deliberations. They were flanked by two powerful hostile nations-Great Britain on the St. Lawrence, and Spain in command of the Mississippi-and the perils of the Confederate States were eminently calculated to double the desire for compromise. Our happier fate it is to endeavor to work out this problem under circumstances which will enable us to pursue our deliberations with the utmost freedom, and yet I do hope that, although no danger of war overshadows us at the present time, we will never forget that such dangers may come upon us at any moment.

Mr. FRASER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
At any moment we may be compelled to rush into an alliance which may lack those elements of wisdom and deliberation which are now within reach of the Australian Colonies. Consequently I feel that we should have just as earnest a desire to complete our union as if those great dangers which attended the confederation of other countries were upon us. Another grave difficulty which confronts us arises from the great diversity of revenue, of population, and of development which marks the various colonies, but I, as one of the representatives of the oldest, and in some respects, perhaps, the richest of the Australian Colonies, do not come into this Convention with any desire to make too much of such considerations. Development is altogether too immature to enable us definitely to pronounce where the ultimate greatness of the Australian people will rest. Colonies which to-day are insignificant in their population are possessed of territory so vast, and so full of possibilities, it is quite possible that in days to come they may occupy the position of leadership, which it is the privilege of New South Wales to occupy to-day. It seems to me that although in matters of finance it will be necessary to pay some attention to figures, and to reach exactness as closely as we can, when we deal with the broad constitutional principles which are to be placed in this Federal Constitution we must lay absolutely aside any thought of our local politics, of our varying degrees of development, the number of our population, or the extent of our influence; we must absolutely forget our boundaries, and bring a common judgment and conscience to bear upon these matters, because what is expected of us by every elector, who sent us here is not that we shall make a good bargain, but that we shall bring into existence a system of government which will prove equal to the varying conditions of the future, whether of prosperity or adversity, of peace or war. I bring my own mind into this matter absolutely upon those lines. To secure the best principles for this Constitution is the one great duty which we have to discharge, and when we have found the right principles, we must then exercise our ingenuity in adjusting the details so as to meet with the least amount of opposition in the respective colonies which we represent. Before coming to what I regard as the most difficult points of our work, I should like to glance at one or two matters. In the first place, I think every member of this Convention will agree with me that wherever we possibly can we must put the stamp of economy upon this federal machine. It is one of the calamities of our task that these several colonies are already grievously overweighted with expensive official administration, which cramps the pioneer energies of Australasia. We have already six or seven complete and pretentious systems of government, the proportion of which should absolutely disappear when this Federation is happily consummated, and one of the greatest inducements to my mind to the taxpayers of Australia to pray for Federation is the fact that when the larger affairs of Australia are centralised in a Federation, the local affairs can be placed upon an infinitely more sound and economical basis. That I regard as one of the far-reaching, substantial advantages of the work in which we are engaged. If we hope that the virtues of economy shall be brought home to the official authorities in the different colonies, we will do well to set them a good example; and one of the defects, to my mind, in the draft Bill of 1891 was the appearance of, I would not say extravagance, but of altogether too expensive a financial basis for the Houses of Parliament. If Parliaments are to bring home to the people economy, they must begin by Setting their own house in order, and I say at once that this Federal Parliament, instead of having a membership in the two Houses of 168, should be brought down to a membership in the two Houses of something like ninety-six; instead of a basis for the States Assembly of eight for each colony, I would suggest, with my friend, Sir George Turner, that the basis should be six; instead of a basis for the House of Representatives of one representative for every 30,000 I think that was it-of the population, I would suggest one representative for every 60,000 of the population, giving the smaller States the maximum which the Federal Bill allows.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The minimum.

Mr. REID:
Yes, the minimum; maximum to them. That would be a change which certainly should recommend itself to the representatives, I will not say of the smaller States—because that term always seems to me to be entirely mistaken—I will say to the smaller populations, because in the Draft Bill the Lower House—and again I do not object to those familiar phrases to which we are accustomed—had an advantage of seventy-two members over the Senate. Under my suggestion, however, there would be a difference of only twenty-four. My reasons for this basis are simply these, that, having regard to the work which it is proposed to allot to the Federal Parliament, it should not contain a larger number of members than ninety-six. Then, again, without seeming to belittle the system of payment of members, I think that the annual allowance might well be fixed at £300, with a certain allowance for travelling common to all Federations, which are generally of great extent.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That would come to as much as £500 without travelling expenses, as proposed in the Commonwealth Bill.

Mr. REID:
Oh, no.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
More, I should think.

Mr. REID:
The allowance I would strictly limit to something like £50.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It would depend on where the Parliament sat.

Mr. REID:
The free railway passes help one along very comfortably.

Mr. TRENWITH:
They do not pay hotel bills.

Mr. REID:
Of course, if my friend Sir Joseph Abbott has his way, and the capital is fixed somewhere in the internal wilds of New South Wales, I admit that my figures would be inadequate. I see, however, the chance of saving something like £50,000 per year on the figures of the draft Bill. I make no difficulty about equality of representation in the Senate. As to the franchise of the Senate, I think, in the interests of those who wish to make it a strong national body, that they should not follow the American method.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
We have had some experience of the results of the system of election by the legislature of men to positions of emolument in New South Wales which, I think, none of us would like to see repeated in connection with the Senate of a united Australia. In the interests of those who wish to see this Senate an honored and powerful body, I respectfully submit that the franchise should be Broad based upon the people's will.

As to the objection that under such circumstances we should have a uniform franchise for both Houses, I would point out that the difference between an election such as I would like to see for the Senate, making the whole community an electorate, will be considerable enough when its results are compared with those of a system which divides the colonies into a number of districts. Then I also think that we would do well to face this question of the franchise provisionally, leaving to the Federal Parliament the power of alteration, of course.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
The Federal Enabling Acts contain a provision which, added to the clause in the draft Bill which prescribes for the basis of election to the House of Representatives the rolls for the more numerous House of the State
Mr. REID:

Under that provision no person was allowed to vote more than once.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

Add that provision to the provision in the draft Bill and you have an interim settlement of this matter, which gets over the South Australian difficulty completely, and leaves the electoral systems of the various colonies untouched except for this one purpose. Now, my reason for making a point of this is that the first Federal Parliament in many respects will have far more important work to do than any of its successors. If there ever was a time or ever can be a Parliament to which as broad a franchise as possible should be applied, that Parliament is not the second Parliament of the Federation or the third, but the first; and so I put that matter into a position of importance, and in doing so I am encouraged by the result of the experiments in the various colonies under the Federal Enabling Acts.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

I think every member of this Convention will admit that, although it was but one, single experiment, which we must not forget, still as an experiment it was eminently satisfactory, at any rate to the moderate men of these colonies. Passing away from that point I come to a question which I am glad to say is diminishing in size and cloudiness under the admirable speeches which have been delivered up to this point in this Convention. I mean the question of State rights. It has always seemed to me that those who spoke too much at large on this question from every point of view entirely forgot the scope which this Federation is to assume; that is to say, if we are going to proceed on the lines of the Bill of 1891, which I am prepared to do. If you go over the list of subjects which that Bill prescribes for the Federal Parliament, and if you follow, as I am prepared to do, a valuable provision of that Bill that what is not expressly handed over to the federal power remains vested in the several colonies, taking those two points together, you can absolutely examine the whole scope of the federal powers. It may have any number of developments in the future, but all those developments must follow within the lines of its powers, and when you look at those powers, I think this question of State rights ceases to press so seriously as it used to do upon the various representatives of these colonies. Every State right which is a legitimate right must be placed in the Constitution. Only there will a right lie safe. When we come to the distinction which my friend Mr. O'Connor so happily drew, by a change of terms, when we come to the question of State interests, then I confess that if there is anyone - and I do not think there can be in this assembly-who is prepared to indulge in the enterprise of expressing in the terms of a federal compact safeguards which will be adequate to the protection at all times of all States interests, he is a gentleman whose activity I envy, but whose labors will be absolutely fruitless.

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear,

Mr. REID:

When we come to the flexible varying interests of the future, it is absolutely impossible to do more than to lay down sound general principles. In the application of these sound general principles we all, whether we represent a population of 1,200,000 souls or a population of 150,000 souls, must equally and absolutely rely upon the wisdom and justice of those who will administer the federal power; so I say to the States who have rights, let us recognise them in the deed, and to those who have interests, let us all, large or small, trust to the justice of the Parliament and the Executive of the Commonwealth. Those States that are in fear of being overshadowed by the combination possible between Victoria and and New South Wales indulge in a conjecture which experience, unfortunately, has never justified. So far as I can judge of the possibilities of the future, if any combination be possible it is not that. The combinations of the future, as far as they seem to me to touch the vital powers of this Federation, will be combinations with reference to matters of finances. It will be a calamity of the future if any Government submitting Estimates, whether an Appropriation Bill or other Estimates, submits Estimates framed on a basis unjust to any State in the Commonwealth. I do not at present wish to touch the crucial points; I am preferring to deal, before doing that, with some matters which are of sufficient importance to mention, and upon which I may be able to add something to what has already been said. As I have said with reference to the powers of the Federation, subject to a few minor alterations, I entirely accept the scope of the draft Bill of 1891. There is a possibility of confusion in the construction of the clauses which confer these powers and the clauses which refer to State legislation on subjects of the same kind, which must be regretted. Clause 52 of the Bill does not give exclusive power on the long list of subjects therein mentioned to the Commonwealth. It gives concurrent authority to legislate; the States Chapter contains the power for State legislation on these subjects until other provision is made; and there is another clause which provides that when the law of a State and the law of the Commonwealth conflict the law of the Commonwealth shall prevail. Now, we must have a Bill so drawn, that that illimitable field of ingenuity for the legal profession which might arise in the federal courts on questions as to whether State laws and federal laws were inconsistent, is avoided. We must make it clear that the moment the Federal Parliament legislates on one of those points enumerated in clause 52, that instant the whole State law on the subject is dead. There cannot be two laws, one Federal and one State, on the same subject. But that I merely mention as almost a verbal criticism, because there is no doubt, whatever that the intention of the framers was not to propose any complication of the kind. I come to a very important chapter in the draft Bill, and I think hon. members will see I am following the structure of the draft Bill. Much as I have criticised that Bill, I have no hesitation in saying that if fifty Parliaments sat for three months they could not construct a better basis for our deliberation than is ready to our hands. In my opinion, and I am not criticising this stage of the procedure, because it was common to all our proposals, and is serving an admirable and useful purpose, but after this general interchange of opinion I must say I will deeply regret if we are not prepared in the open light of day before the public of these colonies to enter upon a revision of that draft Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN:
As to finance also?

Mr. REID:
No, we must have a Financial Committee, because that Bill left that subject in a condition which, we all admit, forms no basis for settlement; but as to every other matter, we all admit that that Bill is a perfect basis for amendment and settlement. I think-and knowing as I do that the strong prejudice which followed the Bill of 1891 is owing to the fact that most of its vital compromises were fought out in the dark-I think it will be a thousand pities if we, not the delegates of a Parliament, but the representatives of the people, fight out these compromises in the dark. We will afterwards have to fight them out in the open, and I say, "Let us fight them out in the open all through." But in this I somewhat digress. With reference to this matter of a Federal Judicature, there is one criticism which is not a verbal one, I think, that I wish to make. There is one example in the Constitution of the United States, which we would do well to follow. The Supreme Court of the United States is not a court created by Parliament, as the draft Bill proposed our Federal Court should be. It is a court embedded in the Constitution itself, and it is essential to the just exercise of federal powers that this Supreme Court shall be strong enough to do what is right—strong enough to act as the guardian of all the rights and liberties of the States and people of Australia. I am glad that Mr. Barton agrees with me in this respect. It is almost a verbal criticism, but there is more behind it than a verbal criticism.

Mr. BARTON:
I think it is very important indeed.

Mr. WISE:
The mistake was admitted.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Especially as to the power of increase of the judiciary.

Mr. REID:
It was admitted some time afterwards. Now I come to the very important question as to whether the Supreme Court is to be a Court of Final Appeal for Australia or not. I at once confess that I heartily approve of the solution of that matter contained in the draft Bill. It should be, in my humble judgment, a Court of Final Appeal if it is to be a Court of Appeal at all. At the same time there is a provision in the Commonwealth Bill, which perhaps is scarcely necessary, because it is one of the inherent rights of the subjects of Her Majesty the Queen, that it is within the competency of Her Majesty in Council, in the event of any appeal, to bring about a review of the decision of the Federal Court in the highest tribunal of the Empire. With that provision, I am in favor of a Court of Final Appeal. If it is not to be a Court of Final Appeal, then as a Court of Appeal it is simply adding another pitfall.

[P.273] starts here

Mr. TRENWITH:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
It is simply adding another pitfall to the unfortunate persons who are compelled to litigate. The difficulty might be got over in a clumsy, perhaps, and, to my mind, unsatisfactory method, in this way: that it might be used as a Court of Appeal if both parties agreed that its decision as between them should be final; but that is a mere clumsy sort of expedient which I do not suggest, and I say broadly if it is to be a Court of Appeal it must be a final Court of Appeal, or it should not be a Court of Appeal at all.

Mr. TRENWITH:
So far as we can make it.
Mr. REID:
Yes; I quite agree with the hon. gentleman. Here is another matter which I might incidentally mention, following on the lines of the Bill to which I have referred. To my mind there is a matter which calls for serious consideration in connection with the question of intercolonial freetrade. It is a universal admission that one of the main motives for Federation is the destruction of our intercolonial fiscal boundaries.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
I believe that is generally admitted, and certainly it is a matter in the very essence of the contract, but unfortunately on this vital matter the provisions of the draft Bill left us in this position: that the hostile tariffs might remain in existence for an indefinite period, for many years perhaps, because until a uniform tariff is agreed upon the old state of things continues, and we see at once that unless the Federal Parliament is tied down to some reasonable period within which this work must be completed, the temptation on the part of the State that did not like the proposed tariff so well as its own, to prevent uniform tariff legislation, is apparent. We must not put temptation in the way of any State to play a false part to this union, because without this free intercourse of the people of Australia, without the destruction of these tariff walls between us, I say all this Federation would be a sham. We must provide in our Constitution a liberal time within which this uniform tariff, which means this intercolonial freetrade, shall commence. Giving a reasonable time to the Federal Parliament to perform this most difficult task means, under any circumstances, one or two years, during which these fiscal differences will continue. I merely suggest, therefore, whether it is not possible in some way to bring about the benefits of intercolonial freetrade to some extent upon the establishment of the Federal Constitution. But this is a matter attended with difficulty, and I am certainly not here to raise difficulties, but rather to endeavor to smooth them. After these observations, I come to the Scylla and Charybdis of this federal enterprise. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind that this Federation will become an accomplished fact if we can hit upon a solution of the difficulties as to executive responsibility and the difficulties as to the rights of the two Houses over Money Bills in such a manner as to commend our work to the people of all the colonies. That is the great difficulty which faces us, and Sir Richard Baker, who has rendered many eminent services to the cause of Federation, never rendered a greater service than when he, in a few simple words, raised those issues in a most statesmanlike and conciliatory manner. Considering the strength of the views expressed by him and some other hon. gentlemen who sympathised with him, I hail as one of the happy auguries of our labors the attitude they have assumed. They have recognised, as we all must do, when we come to close quarters upon the vital principles of this Constitution, that we are landed in a great difficulty. Study history as you will, it does not completely cover the ground we have to deal with. All that we can do is, as the result of our study of other Federations and of British and colonial Constitutions, to arrive at an agreement upon this point, and if we do not our labors probably will be all in vain. What model are we substantially to follow—not on every detail, not to the length of every adjustment or compromise, but what historical model, amongst all the historical models, will we prefer to take as the one that must be followed more closely than any other?

Mr. ISAACS:

The British.

Mr. REID:

I should think so. I think there can be only one answer to that question. I say it with great respect, because these are most difficult matters, and no man is more likely to be wrong than the man who expresses his opinions in too positive a manner. I confess that one of my difficulties has been a habit of putting my opinions in too positive and pugnacious a way, and my anxiety, like every other member of the Convention, in addressing this assemblage, is to endeavor to get rid of that defect and to express my views with due submission to the better intelligence of this great body. I admit that the subject is altogether one so difficult that it becomes us to approach it in an attitude of the deepest humility. But as a result of my studies I have come to the conclusion, in the first place, that it is absolutely impossible to take the Constitution of the United States as our leading model. The reasons for that conclusion are so obvious that I will simply glance at them. In the first place the Americans, doing their best in those days, thought a King was indispensable, but took care to keep his Ministers out of Parliament, because at that time - this view was taken by my gifted friends Mr. Isaacs, Sir George Turner, and Sir John Downer - it was the fact that the King had his pliant tools leading Parliament which gave him most of his power for mischief, and the people of the United States, not having reached that stage at which the monarch had become dependent on the Parliament, got over the difficulty by putting the monarch and his Ministers outside of Parliament. It appears to me that if there is one merit by which the British Constitution is distinguished above every other Constitution in the world it is the lesson which it affords of firm, flexible, incessant, popular control over the instruments of executive power. We may say Great Britain is not a Federation. That is true, but no Federation this world has ever known has had to provide and maintain institutions of law and order over a larger number of countries and races than the British Parliament, and in this sense I speak of the two Houses alike. One of the glories of that Parliament is that it is a whispering gallery for all the just grievances of all the races which are subject to the rule of Queen Victoria.

Mr. TRENWITH:

A whispering gallery?

Mr. REID:

Whispering in the sense that there is no outrage so distant from the seat of the Imperial power, that there is no wrong vested in ever so humble a subject of the throne, that has not there a chance of being heard. Yes, it is more than a whispering gallery, this British Parliament, because it has shown singular efficiency in redressing the wrongs of the various divisions and races of that vast Empire. I fear the American President, with all his absolute power over his Ministers, with powers transcending in many respects the powers known to monarchs in these days, has not been equally successful in redressing the wrongs of many thousands of people in the United States; has not even been powerful enough to protect the faithful servants of the State from one of the most cruel systems of organised injustice that ever disgraced a people; has failed even in the relationship between the head of the Executive and those humble, faithful instruments. All these were given over to the rings. That solemn judgment which the genius of the authors of the American Constitution thought they had established for the election of the man clothed with these vast powers—to what has it degenerated? There is no doubt majesty in numbers, but behind the millions of voters there is a system of wires, held perhaps sometimes in the worst hands, which make a mockery of the free choice of the American people, which attaches, it may be, to the exercise of that free choice marks of everlasting reproach. I rejoice to think that amidst all the struggles for power and place—and they have been fierce enough—which have been waged in Great Britain, the powers of the Constitution have proved admirably adapted to protect the purity of the judicial bench, inviolability of tenure in the public service, and to maintain a system of efficient and economical government which, considering the vast and varied responsibilities of the British Empire, has, in my mind, been one of the marvels of history. I say, with due submission to my friends from all parts of Australasia, let us, as far as we can, follow upon lines which, after all, have constituted the strongest ties of the empire, and which have helped to maintain, with singular steadiness, the power of Great Britain during centuries of crises in the surrounding countries. There is another great reason for adopting the British Constitution as our leading model, and it is this: that it is the model of the Constitutions of the colonies comprised in this Federation. That is a substantial argument in its favor. Then, if we take the British Constitution as our model, the Executive must be responsible to one House.

Mr. ISAACS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
The homely saying that No man can serve two masters applies absolutely to this proposition. Divided control means weakened responsibility. In order to maintain that rigid responsibility, without which responsible government is worse than useless, the controlling power must be clearly vested somewhere. Well, then, I think we are forced to the conclusion that the Executive of the Federation must be responsible to the House of Representatives. Now the next great difficulty is as to Money Bills. No reader of the history of the British Constitution can help seeing that this, after all, is the most important point in any Constitution. The power which holds the purse no doubt is the power which predominates everywhere, and I do not wish to advance my argument by concealing its significance, and so if we are to follow the British Constitution the power of the purse must be in one set of hands. The stability of the British Executive and the stability of British finance began when that state of things began. Finance has this double significance: it is not only the most vital matter amongst constitutional powers, but it is also the most vital matter of every day life to the people at large. I sympathise entirely with those honorable gentlemen who happen to represent colonies whose power in the popular House will be so limited, with their anxiety to see how they can accept that principle, and yet leave in the Constitution somewhere power strong enough to prevent gross injustice.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
It would be wrong in a matter where single control is so essential to expect a power to interfere in trifles. But I admit that we must here deviate from the British Constitution and give the Senate powers which have ceased practically to belong to the House of Lords for a long period. We know well that for some time past the House of Lords has given up any pretence to financial control, any pretence to amending the Appropriation Bill or throwing it out, any pretence to amending a Taxation Bill or throwing it out; and when my honorable friend, whose gifted speech I greatly admired-I allude to the representative from New South Wales, Mr. Wise-thought that these matters about Money Bills were among the antiquities, he was quite right as far as Great Britain is concerned, but they are anything but antiquities to the gentlemen representing the smaller States who are drafting this Constitution, because the whole question is brought up in the most acute form, and it is a vital question. I admit that to face this federal difficulty in a Federal Constitution we must deviate from the strict lines of the British Constitution. The question is, how far can we deviate with safety, not to the larger States, not to this colony or that, but with safety to the proper working of the federal machine, which is not a local matter, which is a matter vital to hon. members, because if we construct a machine which will not work we had better have left the work alone; so that is a vital point, and I say at once I am prepared to meet my friends to the farthest possible point of conciliation, until I come to a proposition which, in my judgment and conscience, and speaking of the Federation as a whole, will not work well for the Commonwealth. If the Senate were allowed the power of amending Money Bills, the financial control resembles that exercised in the two Houses of the United States Congress. There both Houses have equal powers with reference to Money Bills. I wish for a moment, and only for a moment, to dwell upon the working of that system. The successful working of that system was only possible under one condition - a treasury so full that the two Houses working as hard as they were able to do could not get rid of the money. In such circumstances both Houses displayed wonderful unanimity in squandering the public revenue, absorbing a gigantic surplus amounting to $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 a year.

An HON. MEMBER: Not now.

Mr. REID: Some years ago the ingenuity of these two Houses in passing Money Bills was so enormous, and their activity so indomitable, that tens of thousands of money Bills went rattling through them both to recognise the valuable services of a number of doubtful individuals, rendered in the dim past if rendered at all; and in that way the nation was saddled with a pension system of $150,000,000 a year. No wonder their finances ran out. If we could think that the system would soon die with the veterans there might be perhaps room for forgetfulness, but there was, I believe, an ingenious provision that if an old veteran happened to contract a matrimonial alliance with a young maid of seventeen the pension lasted during her life as well. So long as money is plentiful, I do not know that any harm would be done by giving both House sa chance of spending it, but the finances of this Federation will not bear. I hope, such experiments. The taxation imposed upon this Federation, from my view, should be strictly limited according to the interests of the States as a whole. In any case the expenditure should be strictly limited, as in that matter the States have as large an interest as the Federation, because, under anything like the sort of Customs tariff which my friends opposite from Victoria would like to establish, it would be essentially vital to the States that a very large sum should come back to them. Now let me press this principle upon those who are in favor of the amending of Money Bills by the Senate as a principle of right and justice-if you nationalise the area and incidence of taxation you must nationalise the power and representation of the taxpayer. The fallacy of the contention for equal power in the Senate over Money Bills is-I think, with great respect-very easily disposed of. If our federal finances were based upon an equal contribution into the Federal Treasury by each of the States that form the alliance my contention would disappear. The States would be absolutely entitled to equal power - not in one House, but in two Houses-of voting away the taxation as derived from the States as States; but, inasmuch as the whole burden-and we must remember that, so far as the people of Australia are concerned, the whole burden of this Federation rests upon those who provide the money-of finding the money is placed on a national basis, it cannot be handled on a provincial basis. I put that as a principle based upon honesty and fairness. But, again I wish to deviate, in fair recognition of the position of the States.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

I admit that there should be a reserve power in this Constitution which should enable the Senate, based on an equality of States, to veto an unjust Bill -

Mr. ISAACS:

To prevent any injustice.

Mr. REID:

To prevent a wrong; and therefore I say that States should have-not as an antiquated maxim of the British Constitution, never to be used, but as a really living right put in the Federal compact in black and white-the right of exercising their power to reject any Bill which to their minds is permeated by any serious wrong or injustice.

Mr. HOWE:

And the whole machinery is thrown out of order.

Mr. REID:

Now I come to that. In the first place the machinery can only fall into disorder over finance. Finance is the steam power which works the federal engine. So long as the finances are not subject to any indefinite collapse the Federation will work: but I admit I have always contended that one of the vital points about this machine should be that it must contain within itself something which will enable it in times of enormous strain to work on, because if we construct a machine knowing, as we must, that in the days to come it will have to bear enormous strains, if we construct a machine which affords no solution of such a crisis, we construct a machine at the risk of its breaking down at the point where it should be strongest. We presume that the Federal Government will have an ordinary degree of business ability and good sense. We are sure the Senate will possess all these qualities. Now let me remind hon. members that the federal finances are not altogether so full of such burning elements as provincial finance not altogether; to some extent they are. What is the motive of a common-sense Government in submitting Estimates? It knows there is an absolute power of veto against injustice. It knows that the weaker States in the Lower House are the strongest in the Upper House, that while they are as seventeen to sixty-one upon the basis I have mentioned in the Lower House they are as thirty to twenty in the Senate. Now, especially when you consider the precise amount which is to be contributed by the smaller States at present—New South Wales may be a small State some day—when you consider the amounts that are at stake in order to secure that each State will have as much money spent in it as it contributes, I do not think there is much danger that the Federal Parliament will act with gross injustice to the smaller States. Allow me just to mention that I have prepared a scheme of federal expenditure which may be useful by-and-bye to the Financial Committee. I include the postal and telegraphic charges. The Federation will pay something like £3,028,000, and taking off the expenditure for post and telegraph services, which will be made up by revenue upon the other side of the account, that large total is reduced to £1,518,840. This will partly be met by large savings in the annual expenditure of the various States. But let us take the amount each colony will have to pay to the annual expenditure. New South Wales will have to pay £628,000, Victoria £568,000, South A

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Mr. REID:

Yes; so that the three smaller States, having eighteen senators would contribute something over £300,000, against nearly £1,200,000 contributed by States represented by twelve senators. To get over this fear of injustice, although it seems to me out of place in a Constitution, I would be quite willing to have a stipulation in the federal compact that the whole amount contributed to the federal exchequer by the smaller States should be spent within their own boundaries.

Mr. TRENWITH:

How would you do with defences then? Military experts think that certain points should be specially defended.

Mr. REID:

That might be, but, as representing one of the larger populations, I wish to say at once that in all financial matters within the bounds of reason I wish to act in the most generous way towards the other communities, because I do not at all forget that, small as the contribution of these States is, so far as their population goes it is an equal contribution with our own. If the expenditure was on the federal basis each State would pay £303,000 to this annual expenditure; so I say, if the smaller States are willing to base finance on the equality of the States and to pay an equal share with us, I give up all my contentions about Money Bills; but if, on the other hand, they prefer the national basis, then I think the national basis of the British Constitution should follow our financial arrangements, with this living power given to the States, that they should have the power of throwing out any Bill—whether of taxation, or even perhaps of appropriation, if there is a provision against a deadlock—if in their opinion that Bill is of such a character that it would be grossly unjust to let it pass. Now, I do not believe in our little estimates of expenditure there will be the slightest danger. Let us remember the financial problem involved in defence, and here it is that the larger populations and the wealthier States make a substantial sacrifice in entering into this compact. Above all other points, what is the central point which this alliance is to secure? It is to secure that the whole strength of population, of wealth, of resources in all the colonies shall be pledged in defence of the integrity of every acre of Australasian soil. We, in New South Wales, with, our twelve or thirteen hundred thousand people, with our capacity for raising without any effort a revenue amounting to nine or ten millions a year, we pledge every man within our boundaries and every pound of our power of raising money to the last shilling in defence of your great coastline of Western Australia, of your great coastline of South...
Australia. It is a serious undertaking, it is a substantial sacrifice, because, after all, above all questions of finance comes the question of strength to vindicate your rights, comes the question of resources to maintain the integrity of your island; and there is, I say, a sacrifice real and substantial in that term of the bond that we do not pledge ourselves on a population basis or on a Federal basis, but we pledge ourselves to the last shilling of our resources.

Mr. FRASER:
You would do that without Federation.

Mr. BARTON:
You could not do it so effectively without Federation.

Mr. REID:
I ask my hon. friend, Mr. Fraser, who, although a man of very keen commercial spirit, is not destitute of a keen sense of honour, would that be a worthy part to play?

Mr. FRASER:
On our part?

Mr. REID:
On our part; and it is a part we would play probably without reference to finance. But that being the attitude we are assuming, it will be seen that after all our position is one not destitute of a sacrifice to Federation.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear. That is the point.

Mr. REID:
Now I wish to clear away another matter. I entirely sympathise with those hon. members who wish to put an end to the vague state, politically understood, of the expression "Money Bills." I entirely agree that in this Federation the class of Bills which should not be amended in the Senate should be of the smallest possible number. For instance, the Appropriation Bill, the Taxation Bill, and the Loan Bill, and I say frankly at once, for I do not believe in keeping things behind, that of those three, if it meant saving Federation, I would be willing to give up one-the Loan Bill. As far as the Appropriation Bill and the Taxation Bill are concerned, I say that we safeguard the smaller States by giving them the power of redress against injustice - a power which is not a figment or a fiction, but a living reality-to throw out a Bill which they feel will justify that course. Now we must come to some provision which, if the two Houses happen to get into obstinate conflict, will save an unfortunate people from the ruin which would eventuate, and the financial collapse which would result in the future. There must be some such provision, in my humble judgment, and I have always thought so, and I am of the same opinion now. The question is, "What should it be?" There are several suggestions. There is the suggestion of the two Houses sitting together, which would much more strongly recommend itself to the representatives of the smaller States if the difference between the two Houses, instead of being seventy-two, as is stated in the Commonwealth Bill, was only twenty-four, as in the scheme I suggest. That, I think hon. members will see, is a very serious change in the overwhelming preponderance of the Lower House.

Mr. DEAKIN:

What numbers do you propose?

Mr. REID:

I propose that the Senate for the six colonies should consist of thirty-six members, and the House of Representatives for the same number of colonies, of sixty members, or one for every 60,000. Now the difference between a combined sitting of 124 members of the Lower House and forty-eight of the Upper, and sixty of the Lower meeting thirty-six of the Upper, is a very serious one for the smaller States. That is one proposal which I do not at all feel enamoured of, but which I am willing to accept on the condition that we must have some provision to afford to the Lower House, and to the whole of the Australian communities, a guarantee against a deadlock, in which we might not be the sufferers, but which might cripple the financial and industrial prosperity of the whole of those communities.
We must keep in mind that the people have a common interest in this machinery, if it is to work at all, being so constructed that at some unhappy moment it will not explode and scatter destruction on all sides. There must be within the machine some latent power which, on a given pressure, will protect the Australian people from that catastrophe.

Mr. FRASER:

After a lapse of time.

Mr. REID:

When an explosion comes a lapse of time is very immaterial to those near it.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Mr. Fraser means, would you allow a lapse of time, that is, some time to intervene between the coming of the conflict and the settling of it?

Mr. REID:

Certainly. In the first place we are not ignorant of the various ways of Parliamentary compromises which can be resorted to under our Standing Orders, and we may hope that there will be no more serious difficulties than present themselves at present to us; but, certainly, there should be no interval. For instance, a Bill should be rejected in two consecutive sessions.
I do not disguise from myself the fact that, say in the case of the rejection of an Appropriation Bill—which I do not suppose will happen, but supposing it did happen—it would be in the power of the Executive to prorogue Parliament and re-assemble for another session in two days, so that the measure might be dealt with in a week. That would not afford much time, but still it would afford some time for reflection and perhaps for a modification of the Bill. There is another suggestion which has been made, and that is the dissolution of the Lower House. This is an old-fashioned method, which has never been satisfactory in the settlement of these matters; it is an old-fashioned clumsy form in which the referendum exists under the British Constitution, a most unsatisfactory thing, and the result must be that things would be left very much as they are. Let us suppose that the representatives of South Australia, Tasmania, and Western Australia were bitterly opposed to a Loan Bill or an Appropriation Bill, on the ground that it was grossly unjust to those colonies, their senators could probably go to their colonies with a tolerable degree of safety on the question. It would be like a member of a local Parliament going to his constituents on the subject of a bridge which they had been agitating for years, and being simply shouldered back to Parliament again to protect, their rights and interests. I do not think, even if we dissolved both Houses, that that would be a satisfactory solution, and above all I do not wish to dissolve this Senate. If those who wish to put this Senate on a strong basis will only harmonize with the strength of the Senate the elasticity of the system, so that there shall be in certain matters scope for the predominance of the representatives of the people in matters of taxation, and for the principle I have mentioned, then I say no man will be found more anxious to see that Senate placed in a lofty and immovable position.

An HON. MEMBER:
Destroy it.

Mr. REID:
If the Senate to be placed in an immovable position, it must not ask to be an immovable dictator of the Commonwealth. That must not be. So I go with those who wish to make a strong and stable Senate; but on the question of taxation, which is, as I have said, collected on a national basis, the national representatives should in justice predominate.

Mr. HOLDER:
How about the referendum?

Mr. REID:
I say, with all respect to the referendum, which I am quite willing to arrange for in our Provincial Assembly, and which is a system for which I have the highest possible respect-a system which I think in some form or another will be amongst the reforms of the future-that I must submit when I consider the enormous area of the Federation, and the scattered state of its population, that there never was a more unfavorable arena for the referendum than this. It may be justified, and it was justifiable when the people were asked to give authority to representatives to frame a National Constitution; but I should be sorry to see that organ used for the determination of internal matters which might be of small moment. Suppose that there was some bitter conflict over a sum of £20,000 or £30,000 in a Loan Bill, which might be a small matter to the more populous colonies, but a larger one to the smaller, it would perhaps cost three times the amount involved in carrying out the referendum. I must, however, admit that if Parliament had come to a deadlock, it might be worth many times £20,000 to remove the strain, because then the very life of the Federation would be at stake, so that, on reflection, if no better method can be found, I would disregard the expense, because a safety-valve is absolutely essential in the manufacture of a Constitution. There is no good machine ever invented, which is subject to pressure or strain, that is not so designed that, in the event of carelessness, or stupidity, or madness on the part of those who are using it, there springs into action some latent contrivance to save the apparatus, and with it the life and property in its neighborhood, and we, in framing this piece of political mechanism, must not disregard the cardinal rule which the humblest mechanic adopts.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is an extreme power held in reserve for extreme cases.

Mr. REID:

It would be a power, which even the strongest Government would Shrink from employing. If I may be allowed, I would draw an illustration to show how even a man so impulsive and pugnacious as myself may be overweighted by the sense of responsibility. Members may recollect that the Government of which I was a member found itself engaged in a cardinal conflict with our local Senate over a certain Bill which we considered vital. Well, I did not fulminate in the House, I simply dissolved it, and went to the country to get the requisite power to pass that measure. When I got the power, instead of seeking to overbear the other Chamber, instead of insisting-backed up as I was by the popular verdict upon every letter of the thing which the public had approved of my demanding-I im
Mr. O'CONNOR:
You would have got nothing if you had not adopted the wise course you did.

Mr. REID:
My honorable friend is perfectly right, but is imperfect in his history.

Mr. BARTON:
The Premier called my honorable friend and the Council "old fossils," just as if they had been the referendum.

Mr. REID:
I do not think they are old fossils.

Mr. BARTON:
They are platonic fossils.

Mr. REID:
I made and published my conciliatory proposals before I went into conference. I went into the conference with those proposals, while my honorable friends from the other Chamber were sent in sworn almost on the Bible not to surrender, but they did surrender; and there is a bit of unwritten history in that, and while I was flushed with victory my honorable friend was pallid with defeat. Now, in our Constitution there is a safety-valve against a deadlock, and, as I say, this safety-valve was not applied to the difficulty to which I have referred. I have too proper a sense of the importance of preserving the influence of the Second Chamber to endeavor to go to such an extreme as to use that safety-valve. To lightly go to such an extreme, without exhausting the other modes of settling a difficulty, or finding it impossible to arrive at a reasonable compromise, would be the act of a madman. And I say in reference to this Constitution it must be, on a broader scale, on a nobler scale than our local politics. The whole wisdom of the Convention, I trust and believe, will be far above allowing the possibility of risk to the strength and harmony of the Constitution. But we cannot be blind to the teachings of experience. We know that such calamities do occur. We do know that they are a distress to the community in which they occur. If there is one thing which we ought to strive above all other things to effect, it is the peaceful and harmonious working of the Constitution. With some security of some kind against the danger of a fatal strain I would be perfectly content to concede the right on proper occasions to the Senate to reject Money Bills. Now I want to leave that question, and say a word or two upon the financial difficulties which stare us in the face. I have had prepared a scheme of federal expenditure as closely as I could fix such a problematical matter, which shows that the total expenditure of the Commonwealth, working on the basis of the draft Bill, will be £3,028,000 a year, of which £1,618,000 will be for the postal and telegraph service, which will be made up, or nearly so, by corresponding revenue. The estimated revenue from posts and telegraphs on a uniform tariff equal to that of Victoria, South Australia, and Tasmania would be £1,626,800; the mint would yield £39,000; navigation and shipping, £181,000; Appeal Court, bankruptcy, patents, and other services, £24,300-making a total of £1,871,100, leaving £1,156,000 to be raised by federal taxation. Taking the freetrade tariff of New South Wales as it will stand on July 1st next, that is, mainly a tariff from narcotics and stimulants, and taking the average imports of the five colonies for the three years 1893-4-5, which is a very fair basis to take, the tariff of New South Wales on the basis of intercolonial freetrade would yield an annual revenue of £3,258,000, leaving a surplus for return to the States of £2,100,000. On the Victorian tariff of January, 1896, the surplus for return to the States would be £5,240,000; on the basis of South Australian tariff of 1894 the surplus would be £4,499,000; on the basis of the Western Australian tariff of 1895, the surplus would be £3,123,000; on the basis of the Tasmanian tariff of 1894 the surplus would be £5,730,000.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
 Including border duties?

Mr. REID:
 As if there had been intercolonial freetrade during the three years. Then a difficulty, and it is a serious one, comes up, and no matter what uniform tariff you impose on these Australian Colonies, the result of that uniform tariff on different colonies will be most unequal.

Mr. GLYNN:
 Would it upset your figures?

Mr. REID:
 No; only their application. I will show how inequalities would arise. These figures would be the result of a uniform tariff on the facts, but the figures I am about to mention would represent the inequality of returning the Customs duties on a uniform basis of population. For instance, if the uniform federal tariff were the present tariff of Victoria, on the facts of these three years I have mentioned, on the basis of intercolonial freetrade, this result would be brought out: if the money were afterwards distributed on the basis of population - Western Australia would suffer a loss of its own money paid by its own people of £271,200 a year; on the basis of the South Australian tariff Western Australia would suffer a loss of £365,980 a year; on the basis of the Tasmanian tariff Western Australia would suffer a loss of £244,285 a year; and on the basis of the New South Wales tariff Western Australia would suffer a loss of £127,000 a year. The loss inflicted upon New South Wales by a uniform Victorian tariff in the distribution would be £668,545, whilst Victoria would gain £811,925, a difference of £1,480,470 between these two colonies if the money was distributed on the basis of population. I have got other figures, with which I do not want to weary the Convention, but they follow similar lines. They show, no matter what tariff you take to serve as a basis, an inequality which will add to the trouble of our Financial Committee. Upon the financial point I think we must try to arrive at a definite basis of financial expenditure; that is, the ordinary annual expenditure of the Federation, with a fair margin. Unless you get that there will be no certainty either in federal or provincial finance, because the finances of the States will all hang upon the finances of the Federation if the Federation collects the Customs duties.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
   How would you estimate it?

Mr. REID:
   That is the point. It is a very difficult thing to do. I quite admit if this were a Government with vague general powers such as a nation has it would be absolutely impossible, but with a limited Federation, in which the sphere of the Federal Government is tied down to definite services and subjects, I do not know that the question is quite insoluble.

An HON. MEMBER:
   What about a time of war?

Mr. REID:
   Of course a state of war or danger would be met by the unlimited power which the Commonwealth will have in taxation, whether Customs or otherwise. We must give it unlimited power to meet emergencies, and, having given that, then if it is possible to limit expenditure in normal years, it would be possible to give some certainty to the provincial finances. because otherwise a province will never know what its finances are until two years or so after the federal year is over. The interest upon the various public debts is more than enough to absorb any surplus which any colony is likely to get from the Federation. As to the question of railways, I confess to a change of opinion. I was strongly of the opinion that unless the railways were handed over to the Commonwealth-a course which I felt to be full of difficulties-it would be impossible to give the Commonwealth any power of control over the local railways; but I have become-in the spirit which we ought all to feel in wishing to remove everything unfederal, or the exercise of any anti-federal power—convinced that as part of this great work upon which we are engaged some power should either be indicated or established to prevent abuses. It is impossible to prevent differential rates with the working of our railway systems. I am going to this extent, that the one thing which I think no railway system should be allowed to do after Federation is to have two rates for the same goods between the same points—one rate for the goods of the inhabitants of one colony and another rate for the goods of the inhabitants of another colony.

Mr. BARTON:
I have some clauses prepared to cover that.

Mr. REID:
I will go to that extent. I think we ought to do so. There is no doubt that New South Wales and Victoria have been involved in painful competition over that matter, and we must put an end to it. Each State must have full right to fix its own rates, but in fixing its own rates there must not be one rate for the produce of one man and another rate for the produce of another man.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Suppose that results in a loss to a colony; will the Federation recompense that colony?

Mr. REID:
If it is possible for a colony to work this system of differential rates profitably, by making large rebates to other people in another colony, it shows there is an opening for reducing the rates to its own people who pay for railways. Each colony will be put in precisely the same position. If it is a hardship to Victoria it will be equally hard upon us, because we will be compelled to quote a uniform rate quite irrespective of our desire to compete with Victorian railways.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
If a colony suffers any great loss it may make it up through taxation.

Mr. LYNE:
Would you not agree to any long distance rates?

Mr. REID:
It would be impossible to assert a power to interfere with the management of the railways, so long as there are not two rates charged to two individuals between two points for the same goods.

Mr. BARTON:
Or preference given to one port over another?

Mr. REID:
I really feel I have trespassed on the indulgence of this Convention at too great length. However, I am very grateful to hon. members for the attention which they have bestowed upon my speech. I shall always be proud to remember that the other Australian Governments asked me two years ago, when the Federation movement was in sore straits, to take the leadership, and put the mother-colony in the van. I loyally accepted that task, and I hope the Government of New South Wales have loyally acted up to it. We have been strengthened by the co-operation of the Governments and the Parliaments of the colonies represented in this Convention in the most thorough and loyal manner. I have never concealed the confidence which I feel in the wisdom and stability of the Australian constituencies. They have placed on us a very solemn and momentous task. Whilst I have expressed freely and fearlessly my opinions, I will not have the slightest hesitation to go as far as reason and justice will allow me to go to meet the various difficulties which may be suggested by other members of the Convention, for it really is, after all, in the courtesy of our intercourse, in the kindliness of our differences, in the breadth and liberality of our views, in our perfect readiness to yield to superior argument, and above all in our indomitable resolve to crown this movement with success, that the full significance and grandeur of this Convention will reveal itself. We, I hope, will faithfully discharge the trust committed to us. I hope we will truly voice the patriotism and brotherly instincts of the Australasian people. I hope that, since they have called us to this task, we will be enabled to fashion a fabric of national government which shall be strong enough to withstand the shocks of time, which shall be elastic enough to overtake the mightiest possibilities of this grand new world of ours, and which will be just enough to do no wrong to any man.

Mr. DEAKIN:

It is but natural that, in addressing an assembly of this description, we should be at every turn confronted with memories of its predecessor in these colonies. The Convention which sat in the City of Sydney in 1891 gave a first tentative form to the proposals for federation with which we had been familiar for many years. It is but natural that presence in such an assembly should remain one of the recollections - the deepest recollections-of a lifetime, and it is perhaps inevitable that at every stage of the proceedings which we are here witnessing one should be struck with the similarities and differences between the two gatherings. To these even frequent allusions may not be out of place, since the aim of both gatherings was the and his adhesion meant a great deal-to the principles of responsible government, as exhibited in the British Constitution. From an entirely different standpoint, under precisely similar circumstances, with very different arguments, the present Premier of New South Wales has arrived at exactly the same conclusion; and, taking into account the masterful ability of his speech, the position he occupies, and the influence he rightly wields, I believe we shall discover that his speech of to-day presents just such another turning point in the development of the thought of this Convention. It should fix the form of the future Federal Executive, and its relation to its Parliament. Another happy parallel in our proceedings has been the unanimity with which the Hon. E. Barton was chosen to fill the high office of Leader of the Convention, enjoyed by the distinguished federalist Sir S. Griffith in 1891. Our work is safe in his capable hands. I must confess that the urgency with which the necessity of compromise has been put forward is rather apt to provoke in the minds of many a reflex determination not easily to part with our own opinions or yield to anything like a general flux of thought. I have not yet been able to note any general departure from what I have understood to be the customary modes of thought and opinions of those who have addressed this Chamber, but I do begin to feel, or think I feel, one of those undercurrents of feeling which sway even thoughtful and deliberate minds, and cause them to be drawn together by one common influence. My own opinions seem more malleable, and more capable of modification than I supposed while listening to speeches which I do not hesitate to say, so far as my poor judgment enables me to speak, are no whit inferior to those which ushered in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. Those speeches have been delivered here in accordance with exactly the same procedure as was followed there, but have exhibited, in many cases, an entirely different standpoint—a changed atmosphere, an emergence of new points of view. Following speech after speech, starting in most cases from different, and sometimes from antagonistic, standpoints, it has become possible to gather what, if I understand it aright, is the general sense of this Convention on some grave issues which we are called upon to reconsider. recognise that the old problems of 1891 have every one emerged, but almost all with new faces.
The natural processes of political thought in later years, and the discussions which we have listened to here combine together to present these old problems, to me at all events, in many cases in a new light. Had it not been for this, I should not have ventured to trespass upon the limited time that remains to us. If the point of view at which I have arrived be not new to others, I may be pardoned for the belief that it is by the presentation even of merely personal views that others may be, as I have been, largely, assisted. In the Commonwealth Bill it was my misfortune to be in the minority, and sometimes a small minority, on certain important points. On one or two of these points it appears to me that there is a prospect now that I may happen to be with the majority.

Mr. GORDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Nevertheless I would like to clear the way by admitting that were it a question to-day, as it was in 1891, of accepting the Commonwealth Bill or postponing Federation even for a few years, I should, without hesitation, accept the Commonwealth Bill. At the same time, as this Convention is assembled under a fresh mandate, delivered directly from the peoples of the several colonies, giving us immediate and direct authority to speak for them to the best of our power, I hold myself in no sense bound by any vote or speech in that Convention of 1891.

[W.286] starts here

Willing as I am to accept the Commonwealth Bill, I recognise the obligation, now laid upon us as a distinct obligation, to draft the best Constitution possible under the circumstances in which we find ourselves. I had at one time noted portions of those speeches of my predecessors in this debate which most appealed to me, with some idea of commenting on them should the opportunity arise, but I am about to abandon them because, though I am anxious to ex-press my indebtedness to many members for particular arguments on particular points - that personal obligation cannot stand against the general sense of urgency that is upon us to approach, after this thoughtful, useful, and essential discussion, the consideration of the details to which we must necessarily give form and shape without further delay. To pass without further preliminary to the first problem which confronted us in the Convention of 1891, in identically the same words in which it is presented to us here, I join in expressing, with my brother delegates, our acknowledgments to Sir Richard Baker for the searching speech in which he followed the opener of this debate. We were confronted with exactly the same problem in 1891, but on that occasion the challenge came from the lips of a member who was rarely heard in that Convention, but whose speeches contained the essence of the views of those who agreed with him, delivered in classic form and nervous English which few of them could hope to rival. Mr. Hackett, on the 12th of March, 1891, told us that-Either responsible government will kill Federation, or Federation, in the form in which we will be prepared to accept it, will kill responsible government.

I am the more reminded of this, because at that time, those who, like myself, differed from the standpoint of Mr. Hackett, had the great advantage and satisfaction of having on our side the mature judgment and experience of no less a person than Sir Richard Baker. He had issued a manual which we had in our hands in 1891, in which, on pages 44, 45, and 46, he expressed his then opinion in regard to the possible forms the Executive of the Federation might assume. He pointed out to us that the Americans were not satisfied with the mode of conducting public business. Hon. members will see what he said on page 44—

Some of them have cast longing eyes on England, and advocate the introduction of responsible government as the only cure for the evils under which they are suffering.

He now recommends for our approval the Swiss form of Executive. Then he was able to say:

In the first place we knew very little about it. It is said to work well in Switzerland, but even if that is so, it would be the rashest of assumptions to conclude that it would work well in Australia.

He went on to add:

The soil, the climate, the physical and political environment of Switzerland, the history, feelings, and sentiments of its people are so different from ours, and must exercise so important an influence on the working of its political institutions that any conclusions drawn from them is, to say the least, hazardous. In the past, experience has shown that all political institutions which have been lasting are of slow growth; that the ideas and sentiments which give rise to such institutions, and ensure their utility, must be as it were engrained in the people; and that imported and transplanted exotics have never flourished.

I should seek in vain to express in language equally concise and well chosen the objections which operate upon my mind, and, probably, upon the minds of others, in regard to the application to our Federal Government of the system of the Swiss Executive.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

You forget that, in the second edition of that book, I said I had altered my mind after hearing the objections.

Mr. DEAKIN:

If I had remembered that, I would have done the hon. member the justice of stating it, but it does not affect the purpose to which I wish to put this quotation, where finally he sums up:

If the Swiss experiment is to be tried, let it be tried somewhere where it does not succeed; and let us adhere to the system of responsible government, under which we have been born and bred, and which, with all its faults and imperfections, has worked at least as well as any other system adapted to Republican institutions.

Now whilst we are all aware that the hon. gentleman has changed his opinion, and no doubt has in his own mind good reason for changing his opinion, it is unfortunate that he did not favor us with a statement of a single reason which has led him to depart from that weighty argument then placed before us. He told us that he favored the Swiss Executive. He might have told us that he admired the beautiful scenery of that interesting country, but as to how he proposed to transfer its glacial Alpine heights and acclimatise them upon the sunny plains of Australia, he left us entirely in the dark. Consequently I feel justified in sparing the time of this Convention by putting in his own words, much better than I can express it, what seem to be unanswerable objections to the recommendation which he made to this Convention. In addition to that I might add that, as the hon. the Premier of New South Wales indicated this morning, we find the ground of choice by no means free and clear for such an innovation. In point of fact, those who ask us to accept the Swiss Executive do so forgetting that it would be introduced as an intermediary government above colonies which will preserve responsible government as we have always known it-so far, at all events, as we can at present judge. The peoples in these colonies have been trained wholly under responsible government and live in those colonies under that form of government, having above them the Imperial Government of England based upon exactly the same lines, upon the same principles, and upon the same traditions. It is actually suggested that between these responsible governments-the Imperial Government above and the responsible governments of the States below-in an Empire which has known no other form of government-we should interpose an entirely novel form with which our people are absolutely unfamiliar. Surely Federation, as we know it, is surrounded by problems enough, and difficulties enough, which must be surmounted in order to win the adherence of the people of the several colonies, without adding to these sometimes unpalatable proposals this entirely unexpected, and, to my mind unnecessary innovation of requiring them not merely to vote aye or nay for union, but of voting for the union to accept also what is to us an entirely new and untried system of government. Of course, the facts are, as the authorities upon the Swiss Government remind us, that the constitution which, in its present form, does not date back half a century, is slowly changing its form. We are told that their ministers, who previously were extremely limited in their departmental authority, are acquiring more and more influence. We are told that the inclination to elect the Executive as one whole on party lines is becoming more and more manifest. I may add to those who think to force the Swiss form of government upon this country, upon a people politically earnest and politically alert, your mere paper constitution would be twisted between their fingers in twelve months back into its present shape. Your Executive would be made answerable as a whole to the electors-

Mr. BARTON:

Supposing the Parliament were elected of sixty protectionists, and forty freetraders, what escape would there be from the protectionists electing the whole Ministry?

Mr. DEAKIN:

I know of no escape. I am obliged to the hon. member for the illustration; and it appears to me that while Sir Richard Baker laid us all under an obligation, as Mr. Wise has said, compelling us to return upon ourselves, and re-think our conclusions, we need no longer debate the possibility, at this time at any rate, of the adoption of a new form of government—a new form which we could not induce or compel the people of Australia to accept. The influence of party government upon the working of our institutions was first indicated by the late Mr. Macrossan in 1891. It is a most fruitful influence hitherto ignored in this debate, and to which I shall recur. I am perfectly aware, as Mr. Dobson reminded us, that responsible government, as we use it, may not be theoretically perfect as a form, nor may it effectually prohibit the manifestations of human nature-political human nature especially—as we are more or less acquainted with it. Apparently, because that hon. gentleman has seen party spirit degraded to small and petty things, he would contend that what we need is a mere change in its form. I would venture to reply that no change of form known to us, and no form I am acquainted with in the civilised or uncivilised world, can confine, or is capable of seriously altering, the political spirit under which the inhabitants elect to work it. The Constitution of the United States, which has a supreme Senate, and an independent Executive, certainly has not shown us any improvement upon party Government as we know it in the mother-country and here. We all recognise that, not only would it be impossible for us to frame an ideally - perfect, and scientifically - flawless Constitution, but that if we did devise it any people would speedily reduce it in its operation to their own level. Be the form adopted what we will, the reliance which we place upon the future of Australia will never be based upon the form of its Government, but always upon the intelligence, the conscience, and the judgment of the people. True, we find in responsible Government - to say no more - the promptest, the most sympathetic means of expression and execution of the popular will consistent with deliberate consideration of the problems to be solved. We find that the closeness of touch existing between the executive Government and the people as a whole has not only in the past been found the best guarantee for those liberties, the gradual conquest and co-ordination of which have made the honor and the glory of our mother-land, but this closeness of touch with the Executive has become an essential in these colonies, and must be also in the Federal future before us. Any proposal to place the Executive above or beyond Parliament and two or three removes from the vote of the people, as it is certainly contrary to our present practice, would, I think, be equally foreign to our political aspirations. Then as to the constitution of the national House, nothing, I take it, need be said; but as to the constitution and powers of the Second Chamber, here again, as in Sydney in 1891, much has been said, and possibly something remains to be said. The argument, as it affects my mind, is not one which I might employ were I sitting in one of the legislative Chambers of our colony either supporting or opposing Ministerial proposals of the day. I realise, as we all realise, that we are under an implicit obligation to look at both sides of each problem, and to place ourselves as far as possible in the position of those from whom we are compelled to differ. I take it we are anxious not to differ; we are anxious to agree. We are not here to differ; we are here to agree. But we are also to remember that our individual or collective agreement is perfectly idle and futile unless it be an agreement that carries with it the approval of those whom we represent. An authority, to whom we have often referred since 1890, an authority to whom our indebtedness is almost incalculable, is the Hon. Mr. Bryce; and here, it will not be out of place if I express the obligation we owe to Mr. Garran, of Sydney, for his excellent literary labors on this question. His work is one of the most lucid and well digested political handbooks which we possess on this important subject. I was saying that the position we are placed in as representatives is this: that we should accept only those proposals upon which we can carry our constituents.

Mr. Bryce reminds us-and were he not so great an authority it would be an extremely hazardous proposition to quote; in fact I should hesitate to quote it from an authority less high-that if the United States Constitution had been submitted to the United States people at the time it was framed it would certainly have been rejected. The Canadian Constitution when it was framed was not submitted to its people. We are placed in an entirely different position, therefore, to the founders either of the Canadian or of the United States Constitutions. We are compelled, and fortunately so, to submit these proposals to our constituents—a condition that enormously increases the burden of the task which devolves upon us. Our duty, therefore, is to discuss in the fullest manner possible the whole of our difficulties in order that our motives and proposals may be clearly understood. We are under obligation to assent to no scheme simply for the sake of arriving at an agreement here, when we know within our own minds that to propose such a scheme to our own people would be to ensure its rejection. Anxious as we are to conciliate and study each other's susceptibilities, we must not mislead. We are bound to look forward to ultimate results, and steer so as to avoid a final disaster. Of course it would be possible to use arguments of this kind having something in them of the nature of a threat, but my colleagues will do me the justice of recognising that this is far from me. It is because our proposals have to be remitted to the referendum in the more populous and the less populous States that I have been casting about in my mind to see if it were not possible to find some line of argument and compromise which would enable us to go to our several constituents and place before them a scheme which they would all accept. It is absolutely necessary that this Convention should carry the more populous States; it is equally necessary it should carry the less populous States, and, if possible, carry them both together. In 1891 we adopted the referendum in order to obtain the popular verdict upon that Constitution. In this instance our Enabling Bills have been printed for it in advance. Let me ask my colleagues to place themselves in the position of representatives of the more populous States particularly, while I indicate to them a consideration which also obtains in regard to the less populous States. What is the principle upon which our present form of government is erected, and upon which it is worked from day to day? What is that principle to which we appeal because it constitutes our final arbiter in all political discussions, and to which we must appeal in the last resort? I am not here to argue as to whether it should be the sole arbiter. The sole arbiter, the sole Court of Appeal, which constitutionally we have come to recognise in this country, or in the mother-country, is the rule of the majority. Upon the ultimate rule of the majority the British Constitution swings as upon a pivot, and upon that principle it rests. Our whole history is the history of a struggle to give more and more effect to that principle, and the whole occasion of the existence of our parties, whether in the colonies or in the mother-country, is the division between those who frankly and fully accept the principle of the rule of the majority, and those who, for one reason or another, accept it only with qualification.
Mr. DOBSON:
Do you accept it without qualification of any sort?

Mr. DEAKIN:
If the hon. member will ask that question a little later I will try to answer it. That being the guiding principle of the whole of our political actions, and the determining factor in all British Governments—the principle more than any other that the people have been accustomed to put their political reliance upon—have the delegates present realised the difficulties in which we are placed upon the very threshold of any scheme of Federation by the proposition that that principle should not only be departed from, but absolutely reversed?

Mr. WISE:
If that principle were in full force in Victoria, Melbourne and the suburbs would return nearly half the members.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The hon. member's remark refers to another branch of the subject. It refers to the electoral conditions of the country and to the divisions we make of the colony in order to recognise the different interests. There is a difference with us as there is with most colonies, I think, between the numerical strength of a constituency returning a member in the country, and the numerical strength of a constituency returning a member in town.

Mr. WISE:
So it is with us.

Mr. REID:
There is no difference with us.

Mr. DEAKIN:
That difference with us is based upon a distinction between the sacrifices imposed upon the respective voters. It is scarcely a qualification, and practically the principle of the rule of the majority is not departed from. That being the case, if our hon. colleagues realise the position, they will see how we shall be placed when facing our constituents to discuss with them the basis of the second Chamber for a Federal Government, because that second Chamber is to be based on the principle of the rule of the minority and not of the rule of the majority.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
No, the rule of the majority of the States.

Mr. DEAKIN:
A majority of the States representing probably a minority of the people—the rule in the States Council of a minority of the nation.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Mr. DEAKIN:

Less imaginary than the picture which has been continually drawn showing the populous States uniting together to oppress the less populous States. That is highly improbable, and I will give reasons, if my colleagues will follow me. I wish them to realise the difficulty at the outset. When we go to our constituents to propose to them the adoption of the principle of equal representation in the Senate, we must have the whole force of the political training, the prepossessions, and the instinct of our people against us. We shall have the almost insurmountable difficulty of asking them to reverse the principle of political action under which they have lived, under which they have learned their politics, and under which they have conducted their own affairs. I want that realised, because it has been assumed in this discussion that the principle of equal representation is conceded without argument, because it represents no sacrifice. It will, however, require a great deal of argument, and it certainly represents a great sacrifice.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. DEAKIN:

My hon. colleagues were ready to put cases, about which I shall say a word or two in a few moments, extreme cases under which the populous States were to unite together to oppress those which were less populous. We shall be confronted on the platform with equally extreme cases put from the opposite point of view—as indeed I have noticed them put from various platforms in the recent elections—pointing out that under such a proposal as that of equal representation in the Senate it would be possible for the populous colonies to carry a particular measure at their general elections by hundreds of thousands of votes, and yet that measure could be rejected in the Senate, not only by an absolute minority, of the people of the nation as a whole, but by an almost insignificant minority. Deducting the minority in the Upper Chamber who would agree with the majority in the populous States, it might come to this: that hundreds of votes in the State election of members for the Senate might negative the decision which had been carried.
by hundreds of thousands of votes in the election of members for the popular House. This illustration is not a whit more extreme than some of those which have been put to us. I put it, in order that all may fairly realise what we shall have to meet when we stand on the platform and advocate equal representation in the Senate.

Mr. GLYNN:

The same thing takes place here.

Mr. DEAKIN:

We have an instance of its working. This Convention is a Council of the States, and we are here with equal representation. We are here as a Council of the States, and the people will very justly, properly, and reasonably, look at the result of our decisions as indicating what they may expect from the Council of States when it is permanently established. It was a happy spirit of conciliation which pervaded the speech of the Premier of New South Wales from his first word to his last-and I trust that that self-same spirit will actuate the whole of this Convention. We should be anxious, and deeply anxious, to be able to show to the constituencies of the more populous and the less populous States that all these problems have been fairly and frankly considered; and that the populous States are asked to make a sacrifice, a great sacrifice, an unexampled sacrifice for Federation. It is one which they will be justified in making for that great cause. I have never varied from the doctrine that equality of representation in the Council of States is the only possible means of representation. We are, therefore, thoroughly justified in asking our colleagues to realise that there is too much disposition to suppose that this sacrifice has been made by us already, and there was no question of any difficulty in having this conceded. So far for that point, which was passed over lightly in Sydney, and probably too lightly. Beyond that, when we have conceded equal representation in the Senate, we have by no means finished with the concessions proposed to be made to the Council of States. I prefer using the expression "Council of States" to any other. In the States Council we propose to give continuity and a fixed tenure, and render it superior to all possible dissolution. By those three conditions alone it is elevated into a position of sup should draw to its ranks the best men in the community; yet we cannot afford to see that Chamber placed in such a position of vantage as will necessarily cause the Constitution to commence its career, not with any fine balance, as required in the theory of Sir Richard Baker and Sir John Downer, but with its balance heavily weighted in favor of the Council. It appears to me that, when we have agreed to that, not only must responsible government be preserved, but that the Executive of the day must be responsible, primarily and mainly to the National House. We have even then barely redressed the balance if you are comparing House and House and measuring the power of resistance that will exist in a Council protected against dissolution and with a lengthy tenure of office against the propelling power of the National House. A Council strengthened in these respects will be in possession of a power of resistance such as we have never witnessed in these colonies before-and we have proved that much less exalted Upper Chambers exercise more than sufficient power of resistance—but this one will have a power equal, if not superior, to the driving force which should exist in the other Chamber. The Council of the States will be represented on the Executive, will have great influence on the Executive, will be capable of causing it to re-shape, re-model, or lay aside its measures. It will have all those powers by which such Assemblies have sometimes been able to make an Executive quail and surrender, at the price of penalising its supporters. Under these circumstances, even when we have made the Executive chiefly responsible to the National House, in my opinion, you have not yet arrived at the working adjustment required for an efficient Federation; and it is from this standpoint that I approach the question whether there should not be, and must not be under any Federation with responsible government, what has been sometimes termed a predominant Chamber. Must there not be a chamber of initiative, a chamber in which the most important Bills are first analysed and sifted. Its predominance should not be sufficient to render its driving force irresistible. Some brake is essential, as our experience has proved; and it should be an effective brake, capable of responding to those who, under this proposed Federal Constitution, would have the power of applying it, namely, the whole body of the people as grouped in the States; but it must not be a brake so powerful as to render the vehicle of the Constitution absolutely immovable. Checks and balances are essential, but motive power is, after all, even more essential than such restraints. There are the weighty reasons urged in the statesmanlike speech of Mr. O'Connor: the absolute necessity which exists that the Queen's Government should be carried on, that the public creditor should be paid, faith kept with the public service, the honor of the country preserved untarnished. In this Federation, the Government having charge of the Customs and excise, in a sense controls the trade and commerce of the country, and if an absolute deadlock occurred, its servants being unpaid, might absolutely prohibit all import and export until the dispute between the two Chambers was settled. It is with that possibility of rare, let us hope impossible, conflicts of that kind before us that, it seems to me, a well-balanced Constitution requires of necessity that these measures on which the Government and country live, so to speak, from day to day the Government shall not be capable of being paralysed by a Chamber which is not capable of being brought into immediate contact with its constituents at the time the difficulty arises. Of course it must be recollected at every stage of the argument upon all these points that the States are only parting with a small part of their powers of self-government, and that the Federal Government has but a strictly defined and limited sphere of action. The delicate problem, whether it is possible for responsible government to exist with two co-equal Chambers, has not been essayed in any Federation. The only case approaching it is in the French Republic. Since it has been established that republic has passed through one serious crisis involving the resignation of one of its Presidents and a threatened civil war. It was on the occasion when President MacMahon endeavored to support a Government against the wish of the Chamber of Deputies, who had the power of the purse. The end of that struggle was not the despotism or its alternative, a revolution, which might have arisen, but the retirement of the gallant soldier.

Mr. WISE:
Was that not got over by a dissolution of the Lower House?

Mr. DEAKIN:
The Lower House was dissolved, but the people returned a majority in favor of the policy advocated by their predecessors, and rather than face the humiliation of surrender, or risk a coup d'etat, the President resigned.

Mr. WISE:
It shows that public opinion will always prevail.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It may be an evidence of public opinion prevailing, but it cast on the public the duty of deciding between civil war and the untimely expulsion of the President. Since then the late Cabinet, a Radical Ministry, has been driven from office by the action of the Senate alone. Are we prepared to accept such contingencies in Australia? In his most taking and persuasive speech Mr. Wise stated that he considered the possibility of deadlocks the price paid for the privileges of constitutional government, but to me it seems the price paid for neglecting to secure a perfect means of self-adjustment in that government.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is all the difference between guessing and ascertaining public opinion.

Mr. DEAKIN:
The money power naturally belongs to the National House in all Anglo-Saxon communities. The United States, when they faced the question of coequal Houses 100 years ago, made its Senate the chief of the two legislative bodies, and, although the Executive was placed outside the House of Representatives, the power of initiating Money Bills was strictly confined to the inferior House. Even without the Executive Government dependent upon it, without equality of powers, the inferior House—because it was the National House in the United States—was entrusted 100 years ago with the sole power of initiation. This arose from no antiquarian reasons, but from the very living and present reasons, set out so convincingly by the Premier of New South Wales, that I do not propose to develop them at any length. It appears to me that the representatives of the less populous States decline to distinguish sufficiently between the money powers and the general powers to be conferred by a Constitution. Now the distinction is no mere fantasy. It should be recognised in the forefront of the Constitution. In the exercise of both powers there are instances in which it is possible that State interests may be put in jeopardy. State rights cannot be put in such jeopardy; they are enshrined and preserved under the Constitution and protected by the courts to be established under that Constitution. But as regards State interests, what proportion of the business of the Federation will involve their consideration? If hon. members ask themselves how many measures presented to the United States Congress are questions which are even supposed by the imagination of any suspicious member to involve State interests, hon. members, I venture to say, will not only search their Bryce, but search the records of Congress in vain to discover more than the most insignificant fraction. Hon. members representing the less populous States fail to remember that what is proposed to be granted them is co-ordinate power over the whole legislation of the Federation, not only over that which relates to State interests—which, however important to the States, if and when their interests are impinged upon, involve but an insignificant fraction of the business of the nation—but under the Federal Constitution in order to secure the States against the rare possibilities of any injury they are given co-ordinate power over all legislation.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

Why should not one Chamber be equal with the other?

Mr. DEAKIN:

I do not quite understand the hon. gentleman's interjection.

An HON. MEMBER:

He means as regards general legislation.
Mr. DEAKIN:
I should say that one Chamber should be equal with the other in general legislation, but that I would not give co-equal powers to the Chamber a majority in which often represents a mere minority.

An HON. MEMBER:
May not State interests be involved in Money Bills?

Mr. DEAKIN:
State interests may arise in regard to Money Bills, but possibly in a smaller proportion than in general legislation. Take the ordinary services of the year, the payment of the public service, the payments of creditors, and the various disbursements which are made throughout the country—in how many of those items are State interests likely to be affected? You may say the erection of a new post office or of a new telegraph station here or there will affect some particular locality, and you may say that through that locality in an indirect and petty fashion some State interests may now and then be touched upon. But it is surely perfectly true that ninety-nine hundredths of the Appropriation Bills will hardly touch State interests, even in that trifling way. In regard to Taxation Bills how are State interests to be affected? It is the people of the States who are taxed, not as citizens of the States, but as citizens of the nation, because in the proposed Federation taxation would be absolutely equal upon each and all of them.

Sir Edward BRADDON:
You are begging the whole question.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I am begging no question in this regard. The first principle of true Federation is that taxes are levied, not upon States, but individuals, be they resident in Tasmania, New South Wales, Victoria, or any other part of Australia. No distinction is made. How, then, can it be said that this equal levy can affect any State interest? What is affected is the interest of the taxpayer as a federal taxpayer, and only as a federal citizen. In this one matter there is no dual citizenship.

Mr. BARTON:
But, as you argue, to tax under the Commonwealth by so much do you diminish the taxation power from which the States have to draw their only income and from the same persons.

Mr. REID:
That leaves the argument as it is.

Mr. DEAKIN:
My argument is that every State has all its citizens taxed in the same way.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
Supposing you had an excise duty on any article particularly connected with one State?

Mr. DEAKIN:
I will deal with excise separately. First with regard to taxation. Undoubtedly it affects all taxpayers in the same manner.

Mr. HOLDER:
An excise on sugar would not.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I will deal with excise directly. I do not see why this point should be confused. If you tax every taxpayer alike you deal with each one as the citizen of the nation, and he gains nothing or loses nothing by belonging to any State. Every State and every citizen in every State has the same motives for resisting or supporting this taxation, and it can be no question of the more po others. State interests do not arise, as all have the same, and, as States, no one interest is opposed to another. The matter of excise is continually relied upon. It is said that the Federal Government may impose excise upon one particular industry, because that one particular industry may be carried on in one colony and not in another. That is absolutely so. It is just one of those possibilities which justifies what otherwise would be unjustifiable-our constituents reposing in the Councils of the States the absolute power to veto Money Bills as well as all other measures. It is just because the Federal Parliament might, by the imposition of excise or a bounty, affect State interests, that we take the absolute precaution, and in order to guarantee them against even a fractional injustice, we give the Senate power over the whole range of Money Bills. Here, as in the former case, the generosity of the gift implies a large concession from the populous States. Passing on next to the amendment of Money Bills-the crux in 1891 as now I dare say my argument is somewhat imperfect, but, as it appears to me, not only do reason and experience absolutely require that financial responsibility should rest in one Chamber, but justice requires that it should do so. That Chamber represents the majority of the people as a people. It is a national Chamber. Who pays the taxation? Who pays the majority of the taxation? The majority of the people.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
The ratepayers.

Mr. DEAKIN:
No, not the ratepayers. It is claimed in our colony, whether true or not, that those who are not ratepayers pay a greater portion of the indirect taxation than they should, and it is largely on indirect taxation that the Federal Parliament must rely for revenue. Put the converse of our position. Are the members in this Convention prepared to put the power of taxation—if the right of amending Money Bills means anything it means the right of absolutely shaping and directing taxation—in the hands of the minority? Dare either protectionists or freetraders permit the States Council to alter their tariff? Could any greater peril be provided for the future than permission to the few to tax the majority?

Mr. GLYNN:
Why give the veto?

Mr. DEAKIN:
Well, a veto is more than a mere negative. It is a negative pregnant, so to speak, but much more pregnant and dangerous if it be a veto in detail as well as a veto of the whole. It might mean an interference with the fiscal policy of the country. If the Senate decided to take the important step of rejecting the financial policy of the Executive, what would happen? It would thus challenge the policy of the Government, and the Government would consult the electors. This may be regarded as penalising them for introducing a measure in accordance with the views of the people; but, if the Government is returned at the election, it will be clear that the policy of the Government is approved, I take it that the Council of the States will have fulfilled its office. It will have satisfied itself that the majority of the people who find the money have decided that it should be raised in the way suggested by the Government.

Mr. LYNE:
Would you give a second power of veto after a dissolution?

Mr. DEAKIN:
I am afraid the power of veto must remain absolute; otherwise, in times of excitement, it might lead to coercion and disruption. I would leave to the Upper Chamber the absolute power of veto, and trust to the good sense of the community, and to the final fairness of public opinion, to bring it into harmony with the popular Chamber. In any Constitution which is expected to prove workable and discharge its duties from day to day, so as to retain the goodwill of the people, the introduction of a power to the second Chamber to alter and thus to direct taxation, and Lo alter Appropriation Bills, would mean the introduction at the very outset of its career of a piece of mechanism which would be likely in the end to lead to disastrous conflict. A strong permanent and influential Council of the States is an indispensable element of a federal Constitution, but it is no derogation from its dignity to require that, in order to ensure safe practical workableness, it must undertake the high offices of revision and reconsideration, rather than of initiative or detail in finance. Here there cannot be a perfect similarity of duties between the two Chambers. When two men ride the same horse one must sit behind. Now, there is one matter to which I would like, if I could put italics in my voice, to call special attention. I have been arguing on the lines I have followed until now because I think it is the only fair way of meeting those with whom I desire to argue. I have hitherto accepted their manner of looking at these difficulties instead of my own. I personally hold a very different view as to the way in which this Constitution is likely to be worked, as the consequence of framing it in unfamiliar form, operated upon by the different forces which experience has taught us are certain to come into play upon it. The assumption throughout in this Convention is that the States Council is to be the guardian of what are termed State rights or State interests. Mr. Higgins, in the course of an able examination of this part of the question, read from Mr. Bryce a passage which showed that after 100 years of American experience they had never been able to distinguish between the Senate and the House of Representatives as the guardian of State rights. Have my hon. colleagues weighed the full force and significance of that most important negative fact? Here is a Union which was rent in pieces by a question of State rights; for it was upon the discussion of State rights that arose the conflict which re-wrote some clauses of the Constitution in the blood of a million Americans, which for five years threatened the very existence of the Republic. It was the crowning culmination of a long struggle waged between South and North upon more than one question, upon a variety of issues: not merely slavery, not merely freetrade and protection, but all were at last focussed in one principle - the right of the States to secede and to govern their own affairs, which is the most absolute State right. Have hon. members realised the force of the fact that these rights were never more claimed or protected in the senate than in the House of Representatives, or that it was even supposed that either House was the guardian of State rights? Although our special Senate is to be created nominally to protect State interests and rights, as a matter of fact and history, if we trust to American experience, we can say that State rights will never be more dependent upon the State Councils of Australia than they will be upon the House of Representatives; and they will be fought for as earnestly in the House of Representatives as in the States Council. As a matter of fact this is another instance in which the wise and great founders of the American Constitution find the event falsifying their prediction. The Senate was intended to protect the States in all such struggles as those in regard to the Kansas dispute and the Mason and Dixie line; yet the Senate was never one whit in advance of the House of Representatives in defending State interests. The key to this matter, I submit, is to be sought elsewhere. It is the key to the whole position, and the perfect antidote to all the fears of the less populous States of which we have been hearing so much ever since 1891. The complexion that will be given to our politics, especially as responsible government is to be preserved, must necessarily be exactly the same complexion that we find in colonial Parliaments to-day; that is to say, so far from it being natural or customary for the more populous States to combine against the less populous States, such conflicts are never likely to arise; they never have arisen in America, and they never ought to arise here. From the first day that the Federation is consummated - Heaven hasten that day - the people will divide themselves into two parties, not as in France of entirely opposite views and invincible antagonisms - Legitimists, Republicans, and Bonapartists; but parties only divided by the line of "more progress and faster," and "less progress and slower," in other words, Liberals and Conservatives. The instant Federation is accomplished the two Houses will be elected on that basis. State rights and State interests, I venture to say, will never be mentioned because they will never be imperilled. Both sides, in order to secure support, will make the first plank of their platform the maintenance and defence of State interests. If the representatives in the National Assembly from the less populous States are relatively few, on such issues they will always be compact, and need I ask whether the experience of our Legislature shows that compact bodies, however small, are likely to be ignored under our system of party Government? Is it not the small compact parties, sometimes called factions, held together by a common principle, who often hold the fate of Ministries and Executives in their hands? I say that, if ever State interests were imperilled, the votes of the representatives affected in the National House-small in number although they might be on that subject would be unanimous-would be eagerly sought for by both sides. From the first day of Federation, as far forward as we can venture to see or prophesy, the politics of our Federation will be determined without the least regard to the more populous or the less populous States. The very first watchwords will undoubtedly be protection and freetrade. State interests will not be questioned or mentioned. The whole continent will range itself on one side or another of this question. It will divide every district, every city, every hamlet, and many households. There will be two distinct camps, and each camp will be anxious to secure votes in every State by the most absolute of pledges to study all its interests.

Mr. BARTON:
   I thought we were going to say good-bye to all that.

Mr. DEAKIN:
   When that question is settled by the passing of the tariff, there may be some slight alteration in the grouping of members, because, unfortunately, all liberals are not protectionists, though they clearly ought to be.

Mr. REID:
   On the principle of standing on your head.

Mr. DEAKIN:
   Well, if it came to standing on his head, I can understand the reluctance of the hon. member to engage in an exercise of that description.

Mr. BARTON:
   My hon. friend may contrast the operations of standing on his own head, and dancing on nothing.

Mr. REID:
   Our friend Mr. Peacock stands on his laugh.

Mr. DEAKIN:
   When that dividing question, which does not in all of the colonies accurately represent the difference between liberal and conservative, is withdrawn, inevitably the two parties will at once emerge-those who consider they should march in agreement with the advanced political thought of their time, and their rivals who think it too soon to take that particular step, and who desire to go more slowly.

Mr. DOBSON:
   You may go "like a crab, backwards."

Mr. TRENWITH:
   Well, you ought to know.

Mr. DEAKIN:
   Whichever way parties may move, one thing is certain, namely, that their division into the more populous States on the one side, and the less populous States on the other side, is the last possible eventuality of a thousand eventualities which are more likely to occur. We shall have party government and party contests in which the alliances will be among men of similar opinions, and will be in no way influenced by their residence in one State or another. The guardianship of State interests is so secure under these conditions that their protection in any special way becomes comparatively immaterial. It is not a matter of speculation as to whether there will be these alliances between the populous States. When we have adopted responsible government, we have necessarily adopted party government, and we have to be guided by experience as to how it works. It may be hard to prophesy what all the results will be, but, though neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet, no man need fear that whatever political struggles arise will very rarely indeed, even remotely, relate to State rights or interests. There is always the possibility of the referendum being applied in the event of a question of this sort being raised, and if representatives of the less populous States choose to demand the referendum requiring a vote to be counted by States as well as by the nation, I have no doubt that this Convention would lend an attentive ear to a reasonable request; at least, as far as I am concerned, they have only to make that demand to have it conceded. They would then have the most absolute guarantee possible, not only for the protection of their interests, but for the preservation of a State veto by popular vote upon all disputed issues. My object is that the members of the less populous colonies in this Convention may be able to go back to their constituencies, and be sure of winning their adhesion to the new Constitution, just as we wish to go back to our constituents with a similarly successful result. Let me offer an illustration of the real and relative impor

ably could be hidden in South Australia so that you would have to look a long time before finding them. Supposing they were deposited in Western Australia you would never find them at all, if we are to judge from the description which Sir John Forrest gave of the extent of his colony yesterday. If we sufficiently recollect this fact we shall see that no comparison is possible between such colonies as we possess and the States of the American Union. There, by their number they neutralise and balance one another, but there is practically no balance of power probable here. It is easily conceivable in the course of time that Western Australia, as her Premier has said, might outstrip us, and, judging by her area, might easily outstrip all the other States placed together; and what would then become of us in face of the overwhelming alliance possible between Western Australia, with her millions of people, and the great territory of South Australia, with her millions? Where would the unhappy colonies to the east be considered? The point I wish to put is this: that so far from our Federal Government over-aweing the States, it is more probable that the States will over-awe the Federal Government. Take the colony of New South Wales, with her immense resources and possibilities and present position, and remember if the Federation does not acquire her railway system what a difficulty there will be in imposing those conditions which Mr. O'Connor and others desire to see imposed in regard to the prohibition of differential rates, uniformity of gauge, and other questions of railway administration. Have members asked themselves what they can expect if a great and populous colony declined to be bound by the dictates of the Federal Government? As it seems to me each of these colonies is yet but the germ of, and a comparatively minute germ of, the States which they may reasonably hope to become-enormous in territory, populous, and wealthy. If it appears to anyone of those great powers, larger than European empires and populated almost to the same extent, that the Federal Government is not yielding to its demands, such a State may easily be a greater danger to the Federal Government than the Federal Government could be to the State. I recognise the almost insuperable difficulties that surround the transfer of the railways to any Federal Government; but still I feel much more impressed than when I entered the Convention with the importance of having these enormous agencies of production, if at all possible, at some time, and the sooner the better, placed in the hands of the Central Government. It may be, as Mr. McMillan said, that there is great danger in transferring so vast an organisation to the Federal Government, but the Federal Government would have the national interest first and chiefly to consider, whereas the States can scarcely be prevented, if they ought to be prevented, from more or less directly competing against each other by the construction of rival lines-lines which, in the opinion of the Federal Government, might be considered unnecessary. It follows upon these reflections that, gigantic as are our difficulties in taking over the railways, it is a matter which is well worthy of our most mature consideration. Whether they be taken over or not, it appears to me certain that the Federal Government as proposed to be created, with its limited scope and its authority chiefly on the seaboard, will be a comparatively feeble power when opposed to the great States growing up in this continent. It is for this reason also that we should calmly and cautiously scrutinise every proposal regarding the finances which involves any future bargaining between the Federal Government and the States Governments. I do not intend to enter into a consideration of a subject which must be attempted exhaustively hereafter. We shall require as a solution of the problem that it shall be a solution arrived at as in America, which will deal with the finances of the colonies as they are at present, which shall cause them to lose nothing, not a single penny, by the creation of a Federal Government, but which will leave to the Federal Government the whole of the future increases of those vast sources of revenue intended to be transferred to it. Those increases Federation will hasten. We need not fear to give to the Federal Government a large revenue. We can require them to assume the existing State debts; and in regard to an ultimate surplus those who have had anything to do with the administration of post offices, telegraph lines, and railways will have no fear of any surplus being found with the Federal Government for any time. Rates of postage, or of railway carriage, can readily and cautiously be reduced as any surplus permits. For my part it appears to me that one of the tasks which will devolve on those who form the Federal Government will be the due, cautious, deliberate - but unceasing - development of those vast unoccupied tracts in the north-west of Western Australia, if she be willing to part with them, and of the Northern Territory of South Australia, which is, I believe, willing to part with it. There are great areas of this continent larger than kingdoms which require to be dealt with, not perhaps as States, but as territories, and which will provide means for a wise expenditure of the federal surplus for many years to come. With all these tasks before the Federal Government, I think there is little fear of rendering it too wealthy. I have one word further to say with regard to the finances. Whatever the Financial Committee may do, and no doubt they will scrutinise their accounts figure by figure and decimal by decimal, we as a Convention ought not to lose sight of the future. We should say to ourselves that, whatever the bargain struck may be-and it must be largely an impromptu, or rule of thumb, settlement-we will, with a common tariff and absolute intercolonial freetrade, secure such a wonderful development of our national resources as will enable us not only to carry easily the cost of the new government, but will re-introduce a tide of prosperity-not transient, but permanent-into Australasia. New South Wales, I think, with all due deference to one of its representatives, has the most golden prospects. Her commanding natural position, her superb port, the wealth and population with which she commences her career, mark her out as certain to gain the greatest advantages flowing from Federation. If I turn to the colony in which I stand, whose Customs revenue bears the least favorable proportion to its debt, and which has started the heroic enterprise of connecting the south with the north and settling her tropical lands-with her territory enlarged by the trade of one portion of New South Wales, which she is rich enough to spare and yet find much more equally rich within her own territory, and with a part even of Victoria nearer to her seaboard than our own-I say that to South Australia will flow the second advantage of this union. But I do not now pretend to distribute the advantages among the colonies. I do not ignore the fact that Victoria hopes by the permanent advantages which will be given her productiveness to reap her reward for the undoubted sacrifices which she will be called upon to bear. Tasmania, with the markets of the continent thrown open to her and with her attractions, will have a future before her which she has longed for for many years, and which she has not yet been able to obtain. As for Western Australia, the Federal Government, whether asked to take over the railways or not, may make a connection that will bring our mails from Albany, and also undertake the development of the north-west territory of that colony. There are prizes for all to gain. The Hon. the Premier of the western colony would not confess to her reaping any advantages; but we have only to realise his shrewd business knowledge and tact to be sure that in one remote corner of that capacious brain of his is worked out a sum showing the substantial advantages of Federation to Western Australia. Why is he here? Those who know that hon. gentleman know that it is far from him to take distant tours during a general election for nothing. But, whatever the Finance Committee may propose, the Convention as a whole should take large views, and, seeing that there is indisputable gain to each and all, should not scrutinise to the last farthing or decimal any proposition which does not bear upon its face the stamp of absolute injustice. To sum up finally, with the National House and responsible government it appears to me that Australia as a nation will have nothing to fear; while with the States Council and, if they choose to demand it, a States referendum conceded, the States and their interests will have equally little to dread. As for the strain which is certain to be imposed in the future upon this Constitution, when these colonies, having then their tens of millions and their great potentialities, are sought to be brought into line by the Federal Government and show some sign of resistance and a too independent self-reliance, the same law-abiding quality which has brought the United States of America through all its trials and difficulties may be trusted to supply the centripetal force capable of keeping us together, provide the Constitution to be drafted be framed on sound lines within which centrifugal tendencies are not unduly fostered. I trust that all of us recognise that upon this Convention rests the responsibility of framing a Constitution for all time—that upon this Convention, and upon this Convention alone, rests the whole burden of Federation at the present moment. It is perhaps possible for us to fail altogether in our high aim, and we may easily fall far short of its final achievement; yet it is certain to be long before such another opportunity can present itself. The electors have set a great machinery in motion. The people of the whole continent have been moved and have responded. They have sent us here, and it would be the most unfortunate circumstance in our history if by any chance we could believe that, called into being under such auspicious circumstances, this Convention separated without drafting a Constitution which upon the face of it would commend itself to just and thoughtful minds. Political opportunities of this sort if missed rarely return again in the same generation. It is now known as an historical fact that the great power in the east of Europe whose despotical government constitutes perhaps one of the greatest menaces of the progress of political liberty in that portion of the world—the Empire of Russia, which remains a despotism today—had a comparatively liberal Constitution drafted and only awaiting its Emperor's signature to be affixed to it on the very day of his death. That untoward event has sufficed to check ever since, and evidently will bar for many years yet to come, the prospects which that magnificent nation then enjoyed of securing, after years of desperate agitation, an instalment of representative institutions. Should we fail in our task, it is as easily possible that decades may pass by before another such opportunity as this can present itself. The absence of Queensland from this Convention, once most ardent in its aspirations for union, is but the last of a long series of dangers of the cross currents of provincialism which we have still to encounter; and if the opportunity now offered does pass by we cannot but remember that we have failed in a task which has been twice successfully accomplished under circumstances less favorable, although from external causes more pressing. The United States of America when founded constituted a far smaller area than that which we propose to bring into this Federation; it possessed a smaller population; it possessed less attractive prospects. The Dominion of Canada as established was smaller in area, smaller in population, and less hopeful in outlook. Where they have succeeded why should we fail? Is it possible when the Australian people for the first time have emerged as an Australian people, represented in an Australian Assembly to draft an Australian Constitution, that its great promise should disappear unfulfilled? Why should it if we are at once true to ourselves and loyal to each other? Rather than that any word of mine should have chilled or have deterred any of those who have come here in the hope that by mutual concessions an acceptable Constitution may be framed, I would that my tongue should have been withered at its roots. If any word of mine can have brought discord where there should be harmony, or can have repelled when it should have attracted—if any of my arguments have had that effect—it is my bitter misfortune; it has been farthest from my intention. The Constitution we seek to prepare is worthy of any and every personal sacrifice, for it is no ordinary measure, and must exercise no short-lived influence, since it preludes the advent of a nation. Awed as I feel by the fact that we come from, that we speak to, and that we act for a great constituency, awed as I feel in the presence of those who sent us here, I am more awed by the thought of the constituency which is not visible, but which awaits the result of our labors—we are the trustees for

POWER OF SELECT COMMITTEES.

The PRESIDENT:

I must ask that order be maintained in the gallery, however eloquent the provocation. I may say that since this morning I have had the opportunity of considering the point of order that has been raised, and am now prepared to rule definitely on it. I rule, therefore, that if paragraph 5 of the contingent resolutions be carried in the form in which it appears in the paper, although the attention of the Constitutional Committee will be directed to the original resolutions, still no limitation whatever will be imposed upon their discretion in framing the Federal Constitution. I believe that this ruling will give effect, not only to the literal meaning of the contingent resolution, but also to the intention of the Convention with reference to the tabling and discussion of the original resolutions.

FEDERAL CONSTITUTION-RESOLUTIONS.

Debate continued.

Mr. CLARKE:

I rise with very great diffidence to continue this discussion. We have heard an eloquent speech from Mr. Reid, and we have also heard an eloquent speech from Mr. Deakin, and it is very difficult for any ordinary speaker to continue the debate when the echoes of such eloquent voices are still ringing in this Chamber. If I may be allowed to substitute the name of Mr. Deakin for that of Brutus, I might say—

I am no orator, as Deakin is,

But, as you know me all, a plain blunt man.

I intend to speak my sentiments on this question very plainly, and I think it is the duty of all of us to give very plain expression to our views. In saying this I do not wish to detract in the slightest from the value of the speeches we have heard, because it is an acknowledged fact that when Mr. Reid and Mr. Deakin speak they cannot help being eloquent. I was one of those who at the start thought we ought to proceed without delay into Committee on the Bill of 1891, and, although I hold the same view still, I do not for one moment regret that I have been given the opportunity of hearing the very many excellent speeches that have been delivered in this debate. I think, however, a great mistake has been made, for if we want to grasp the real difficulties of the situation it would have been much better if this assemblage, instead of listening to the speeches of those whom I may call juveniles, had been favored instead with the ripe experience and matured thoughts of the leaders of the Convention of 1891. I think it would have been much more instructive if we had heard the views of the great leaders of the federal movement in these colonies.
The matters upon which I wish to speak are few in number, and I shall endeavor to make my remarks concerning them as brief as possible. I am glad to be able to say that, although a number of members have spoken, only two of them have disputed the rights of the smaller States to equal representation in the Senate.

Mr. LYNE:
Four.

Mr. CLARKE:
Only two unconditionally have repudiated the right of the smaller States to equal representation in the Senate. One of these, Mr. Lyne-who, by the way, Tasmania has lent to the mother-colony-has denied the rights of the smaller States to equal representation, and he has promulgated a scheme under which the two larger colonies would have sixteen representatives between them in the Senate, while the three smaller colonies combined would have only thirteen—that is to say, the two larger colonies together would have a majority of three in the Senate and an overwhelming majority in the House of Representatives. That is a system which no doubt would very admirably suit New South Wales and Victoria, but it is a system which the smaller colonies would not entertain for one single moment. Mr. Higgins also has disputed our right; and when I heard these gentlemen denying in calm and deliberate tones the right of the smaller States to equal representation in the Senate, I began to ask myself: On what basis have we come to this assembly at all? The answer is that we come here as coequal States. Has there ever been a federal assembly in Australia at which the right of the colonies to be treated as equals was not recognised by each of them having equal representation in the assembly?

Mr. HIGGINS:
We are not in partnership yet.

Mr. CLARKE:
I know we are not, but we want to get into one. And when this great movement was put on a proper footing by an arrangement among the Premiers to take the people into their confidence, how were the colonies invited to take part in this federal gathering? Were we asked to send members here on the basis of population? If that had been one of the terms, do any of you think the representatives of Tasmania would be here to-day?
No; but the invitation given to us recognised our right as co-equal States, recognised the right of Tasmania as a State equal in all the attributes of sovereignty to any of the colonies in the group. This brings me to a question put by Mr. Higgins. He asks why should 160,000 people in Tasmania have the same voice in the Senate as the much larger population of New South Wales? I shall tell him it is because Tasmania is a State just as much as Victoria and the mother-colony are States, and because she possesses in the same degree the same attributes of sovereignty. I do not propose to follow Mr. Isaacs into an historical discussion upon the Connecticut compromise. We can afford to leave out historical discussions at the present time. It is true that the proposal made at the Philadelphia Convention which secured for each State equal representation in the Senate has been known as the Connecticut Compromise; but whether various schemes of representation were proposed during those deliberations or not, the one which was ultimately adopted and embodied in the Constitution of the United States became, to my mind, one of the principles of that Constitution, and on this point I beg leave to differ from Mr. Isaacs when he says we cannot base our claim on any principle. At all events, if we cannot base our claim to equal representation upon any historical principle, we can be at least original enough to discover a principle for ourselves, and I think the smaller States can lay down this principle, that unless the right of equal representation is conceded, they will have nothing to do with any scheme of Federation.

Mr. BARTON:

Is it not rather previous to say that?

Mr. CLARKE:

No; because I think it is the one of the vital principles of Federation. I should like to know from Mr. Lyne and Mr. Higgins, who have denied the right of the smaller States to equal representation, what sort of an union it is they want. They say that 160,000 people in Tasmania are only entitled to the same voice in the Senate as 160,000 in Victoria. I join issue with them at once, and say their argument is bad, because we are not going into this Federation simply as so many units of population. We are to be treated as separate political entities, and not treated as so many units of population. In accordance with the scheme of Mr. Lyne, and the arguments used by him and Mr. Higgins, a man is simply a man wherever he is, and 160,000 people in Tasmania would have no more voice in the Senate than 160,000 in New South Wales. The argument used by these gentlemen blots out altogether our existence as a separate colony. It blots out our own separate sovereignty and our separate State life, and, if carried into effect, would establish not a Federation, but a unification of these colonies, and reduce the State Parliaments to the position of municipal bodies. I desire to say a word in reference to the election of the representatives of the Senate. In my opinion each State should be one constituency, and if we adopt this system we will do away with the possibility of gerrymandering that so disgraces public life in America, and has even found its way to Switzerland. If the various local Parliaments have the right, either in the matter of electing members to the House of Representatives or to the Senate, of cutting up the colonies into electoral districts, it will open the way to that political corruption which has taken place in America, and which has disgraced public life there—the system of gerrymandering. I am, therefore, in favor of making each colony one electorate for the Senate. I have listened with very much pleasure to the speech delivered by Mr. Deakin, and I heard him declare that he is in favor of the rule of the majority. I am in favor of the rule of the people. I do not want a majority of the population in any particular colony to return all the members for that colony. I want to see the wishes of the people take effect, and in order to carry out the wishes of the people, and make Parliament a reflex of the opinion of the people we must introduce some such system of election as the Hare system. Under that method of election the views of the minority are taken into account, and it would be a fatal mistake—as we are establishing a Federation and want to establish it on proper lines—if we do not introduce some system by which the opinions of the minority would be respected to some extent. I therefore think that the Hare system of election ought to be adopted, both in reference to the Senate and the House of Representatives. Under the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 it was proposed—in reference to the House of Representatives—to give power to the local Parliaments to cut up the colonies into various electorates. I think that the Federal Parliament, however, ought to retain control over this matter, because we know the same power was given to the local Legislatures in America, and in the course of time the corrupt system of gerrymandering grew up, under which the various local Legislatures cut up the States from time to time into electorates to suit their own political purposes. The Federal Parliament ought therefore to retain control over this matter, so that at any time it could step in if the local States attempted to do any wrong. As to the franchise, I consider there ought to be a uniform franchise for both Houses. I recognise the great difficulties which have been pointed out in reference to this subject during the course of the debate. If we put into the Federal Constitution a provision that adult suffrage shall be the suffrage on which both Houses shall be elected it is possible that some, like my friend Mr. Dobson, whose conservative speech on Friday last seemed to many members like an echo of the olden time might find it very difficult to accept Federation on such terms. On the other hand, if we leave it to the Federal Parliament to frame a federal franchise it is quite possible that the women of South Australia would be running a great risk. On the whole, I am in favor of Mr. Isaacs' suggestion that manhood suffrage should be adopted as the federal franchise, with a proviso that in any colony where women have a vote for the local legislature they should not be deprived of their vote for the election for the Federal Parliament. With regard to the powers of the Senate, I think that it ought to have power to amend Money Bills except the annual Appropriation Bill. Members of this Convention seem to be greatly taken with the distinction drawn here last week between the different kinds of Money Bills. If they would only take the trouble to look at the debates of 1891 they would find that the very distinction which evoked so much praise here a few days ago was drawn by that very able statesman, Sir Samuel Griffith. Members of the Convention who object to give the Senate power to amend Money Bills are yet in favor of giving the Senate power to reject them in toto. The opinions of Sir Samuel Griffith are so weighty on this point that I would like, with the permission of the Convention, just to read a passage from the speech delivered by him on March 17th, 1891. Sir Samuel said:

As far as the ordinary Appropriation Bill is concerned, I do not think that the matter is worth fighting about. Most of the argument used has been made to apply to Money Bills generally—a class which none can describe in a few words, for almost any sort of Bill can be made into a Money Bill. Most of the argument has been applied to these in order to show that the ordinary machinery of government could not go on if the Senate could interfere with Money Bills. Why? If that means that the ordinary machinery of government could not go on, if the Senate interfered with the Appropriation Bill, I could understand the argument. But it must be remembered that it is not proposed to deny the Senate the power of veto. Surely if the Senate wanted to stop the machinery of government the way to do that would be to throw out the Appropriation Bill. That would effectually, stop the machinery of government. I, for my part, am much inclined to think that the power of absolute rejection is a much more dangerous power than the power of amendment; yet it is the power that must be conceded. We all admit that; and in a Federation there is much more likelihood of that power of rejection being used than there is of the power of amendment being used. It is said that the Upper Houses in the Australian Colonies are coerced by putting things; in the Appropriation Bill. So they are in the United Kingdom. Why? Because they are part of the same community, living in the same place, and elected by or chosen from the same class of people; but let it be borne in mind that in the Federal Constitution the members of the Senate would come from different parts of Australia, and be charged with the duty of protecting the rights of their own States, and if they saw that those rights could be protected only by rejecting a measure absolutely, and not by any smaller or milder action, I am sure that they would not hesitate to reject it and take the consequences.

I think that the views of this veteran statesman ought to commend themselves to the

Mr. LYNE:

What class of Bills comes under the definition of Money Bills?

Mr. CLARKE:

That is a thing I am not competent to say; neither do I think that any member of the Convention is competent to define what is a Money Bill. I am satisfied with the distinction drawn by Sir Samuel Griffith, and I think we could get out of the difficulty if the members of Victoria and New South Wales were to look at the matter in the same way as Sir Samuel Griffith, and give to the smaller States the power to amend Money Bills, except the annual Appropriation Bill. Mr. Higgins gave us an illustration of what happened in Victoria. He told us that the Government of the day introduced a Bill dealing with the imposition of an income and land tax, and that the Upper House in that colony was favorable to an income tax, but disapproved of a land tax. As it could not amend it, it was obliged to throw out the whole measure.
question of deadlocks, I do not think there is any necessity whatever to introduce any provision into the Constitution to deal with the Subject. The members whom the people of Australia will send to the Federal Parliament will, I hope, be reasonable men, with a high sense of the responsibility of their position, and of the magnitude of the interests committed to their charge. We do not want at the present time to frame a thoroughly perfect machine of government. No constitution was ever yet perfect, and none ever will be. Mr. Gladstone has written on the subject, and I cannot do better than read one or two sentences from his remarks. He says of the English Constitution:

More, it must be admitted, than any other, it leaves open doors which lead into blind alleys, for it presumes more boldly than any other the good sense and the good faith of those who work it.

Then he says:

If, unhappily, these personages meet together on the great arena of a nation's fortunes, as jockeys meet upon a racecourse, each to urge to the uttermost, as against the others, the power of the animal he rides, or, as counsel in a court, each to procure the victory for his client, without respect to any other interest or right, then this boasted Constitution of ours is neither more nor less than a heap of absurdities.

He goes on to say:

The depositories of power will all respect one another, will evince a consciousness that they are working in a common interest for a common end, they will be possessed together with not less than an average intelligence, with not less than an average sense of equity and of the public interests and rights. When these reasonable expectations fail, then it must be admitted the British Constitution will be in danger.

These reasonable expectations have never failed in the old country, and I hope they will never fail in Australasia. The representatives of Victoria want to introduce a system of referendum to the States and to the people.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Some of them.

Mr. CLARKE:

I should say some of them. This, to my mind, seems to be an admission that, in their opinion, the reasonable expectations to which Mr. Gladstone referred will not be found in these colonies, and that the men whom Australia will send to the Federal Parliament will be less qualified to guide the destinies of their country than their brothers at home.

Mr. ISAACS:

There is a safety-valve in the British Constitution.

Mr. CLARKE:
There is no safety-valve in the British Constitution like the referendum. However, if those representatives of Victoria who wish to insert this admission of inferiority into the Constitution insist on it, I am willing to concede it if they abandon their objection to giving the Senate power to amend Money Bills, with the one exception to which I have referred.

Mr. ISAACS:

It is no concession at all.

Mr. CLARKE:

If we adopt the system they want it will not bring us any nearer to a settlement.

Mr. ISAACS:

Why do you call it a concession?

Mr. CLARKE:

Because you want the referendum, and I am willing to concede it on the condition I have stated.

Mr. ISAACS:

I am not asking for it in the interests of Victoria alone.

Mr. CLARKE:

I was much struck in reading the reports of 1891 with the speech that was made at that Convention by Sir Richard Baker. I think Mr. Deakin said today that Sir Richard Baker had changed his mind on the subject since the last Convention, but on referring to the debates of 1891 I find that on the 18th of March he advocated the same principle that he advocated here a few days ago—the principle of the Swiss Constitution. His speech is reported on pages 465 and 466 in the report of the proceedings of that Convention, and it is a very able argument. It was very forcibly laid before the Convention of 1891, and I am glad to say that it was laid before us a few days ago with equal emphasis and lucidity. I appreciate the difficulties which Sir Richard Baker has pointed out. I admit that we must start with responsible government, but we must also have the system of two Houses co-ordinate in every respect, except with regard to the one matter to which I have referred. We cannot hope, as I said before, to frame a thoroughly perfect Constitution, but the genius of our people will, in the course of time, evolve what is necessary to make the principles of responsible government and of two almost co-ordinate Houses work well together. With regard to the matter of the Federal Supreme Court I think it is a very moot point whether we should permit appeals from its decisions to the Privy Council, and on that matter I shall reserve my opinion until we get into Committee. I think, however, that we should adopt a different procedure with reference to the establishment of a Supreme Court to that which is set out in the Commonwealth Bill. Instead of giving the Parliament of the Commonwealth power to establish a Supreme Court we should embody it in the Constitution itself, so that it should not be in the competence of that Parliament to establish a second Supreme Court if it thought fit. I agree to a large extent with Mr. Wise with regard to the manner in which the judges should be appointed, but, on the other hand, there is a danger in allowing the Federal Assembly to appoint the judges. This point is very clearly set out by Dicey in his "The Law of the Constitution," in which he says-

Judges, further, must be appointed by some authority which is not judicial, and where decisions of a court control the action of Government there exists an irresistible temptation to appoint magistrates who agree (honestly it may be) with the views of the Executive. A strong argument expressed against Mr. Blaine's election was, that he would have the opportunity, as President, of nominating four judges, and that a politician allied with railway companies was likely to pack the Supreme Court with men certain to wrest the law in favor of mercantile corporations. The accusation may have been baseless; the fact that it should have been made and that even Republicans should declare that the time had come when Democrats should no longer be excluded from the Bench of the United States tells plainly enough of the special evils which must be weighed against the undoubted benefits of making the courts rather than the Legislature the arbiters of the Constitution.

There is one matter to which my friend Sir Edward Braddon has alluded, and that is the question whether or not members of the Federal Parliament should be eligible to sit in the local Parliaments and vice versa. I consider the matter might be very well left to the local Parliaments. Let us leave it perfectly open for any pan, who is of course qualified in a proper way, to become a member of the Federal Parliament, and if the local States at any time find, after experience, that it is inconvenient or wrong for a man to sit in both Houses it will be open to them to pass laws disqualifying him from sitting in the local Parliament. I think it could very well be left to the local States to deal with these matters should the necessity arise. I do not intend to say anything on the question of finance or the railways further than this, that, in my opinion, we ought to retain to the States as large a measure of home rule as possible; but while extremely anxious to do this, I wish to so frame the Constitution that the Federal Parliament should not be put in the position contended for by Mr. Holder. That gentleman, in his able and admirable speech, suggested a scheme of confederation which resembled in its utter inefficiency the system which was originally in vogue in America, and which it was found so necessary to alter. I do not propose to address this Convention at any further length, but I desire to compliment the various gentlemen who have spoken upon the admirable manner in which they have conducted this debate. They have shown a true appreciation of the difficulties of the situation, and a spirit of compromise as to many matters which, I hope, will result in the establishment of the great principle we all have in view. Let us cultivate this spirit more and more, and show the people who sent us here that we know the seasons when to take occasion by the band, and make the bounds of freedom wider yet.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

Mr. President—With the view of shortening the debate, I wish to make a brief statement, and that is that my hon. colleagues, the representatives of Tasmania, who have not addressed themselves to this Convention have, applied to themselves the self-denying ordinance, and have agreed not to speak on this occasion. Mr. Brown, with that object, has yielded place to Mr. Clarke.

Mr. WALKER:

I was one of those who hailed with satisfaction the chance of coming to visit this beautiful city of Adelaide, as it seemed to me only fair in the interests of Federation that we should have an opportunity of meeting in another capital. Hitherto meetings have been held at Sydney, Melbourne, and Hobart, and I trust that when we have an adjourned meeting for the final revision of the Constitution, that by that time, Queensland being within the Convention, we shall meet at Brisbane, and thereby prevent any anti-federal spirit existing in Queensland. It is only my intention to speak very briefly on a few of the constitutional points, and to enlarge to some little extent upon the financial aspect of this question. I have derived very great pleasure from hearing the speech of Sir George Turner, which was so very practical, but I shall restrict my remarks as much as possible, because I think that Mr. Barton and other hon. members who will be entrusted with the drafting of this Constitution, have by this time a pretty good idea of the consensus of opinion upon most points. I may say with regard to Tasmania—we have heard allusions to "little Tasmania" more than once—that, although Tasmania is not very large in area, it is twice the size of Switzerland, a country with three millions of inhabitants, and rather larger than the country I have the honor to come from, Scotland; and if Scotland is able to support 4,000,000 people, with its rigorous climate, surely Tasmania may hope in time to have quite 4,000,000 also. When I was there the other day, an elderly retired merchant informed me that he was not without hopes that in close upon five years Tasmania would have a population not far short of New South Wales to-day. Believing as I do in equal representation of the States in the Senate—we have no idea what the population of the various States will be within the next fifty years—and although on the face of it it might look rather singular that New South Wales or Victoria should have the same representation in that House as the less populous States—I think the time may come when we shall be very glad that we had adopted this plan. With regard to the number of members of the two Houses, our friend the Premier of New South Wales said he was willing that the National Assembly should have one member for every 60,000. It seems t

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Did he not say that if there were free trade it would be four millions?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Taking the New South Wales tariff as it will be in July next.

Mr. BARTON:
With certain duties remitted.

Mr. WALKER:
Four millions of money is a small revenue for the Federal Government; and I was particularly struck, therefore, with the magnificent speech of our honorable friend Mr. Deakin, in which he evidently thought there was a considerable waste of power. We should, I think, give the Parliament some work to do, and that work I take it should include the full control and management of the railways of Australasia. We speak about intercolonial freetrade. To carry that to the necessary issue we should undoubtedly transfer those railways, and thereby fulfil the fifth clause in the first resolution:

That the trade and intercourse between the Federated Colonies, whether by land or sea, shall become and remain absolutely free.

I do not believe that the railways will be absolutely free so long as their control is left in the hands of the States. I do not think goods will have proper and expeditious conveyance from one part of the country to another until there is a uniform gauge, but I will not anticipate that part of my remarks. With regard to the franchise I recognise the force of the remark that the House which has the broadest franchise will be the predominating partner—the good old British idea that responsible government representing the largest number is the correct principle in government. It appears to me hon. members are straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel in allowing the Senate to veto a Bill, but not to accept at the same time any amendments in the same Bill. I admit that I retain a free mind on this matter, awaiting further guidance. I have been largely educated in federal principles since this Convention met - in listening to the magnificent speeches we have heard and in noticing the tone of them. Surely in these respects we have reason to be proud of the Convention. Now, as regards a matter we have heard little about-as to the federal capital. It seems to me that we must distinctly mention in the Constitution that the federal capital must be on federal territory, and must not be one of the existing capitals. With regard to the position, we are not called upon at present to say, as that, undoubtedly, ought to be settled by the Federal Parliament. There is a great deal of force in the idea that it should be placed comparatively accessible to the two colonies with largest population, probably between Sydney and Melbourne. I have heard some hon. members suggest some place on the dividing line between New South Wales and Victoria, and it is possible that may be acceptable hereafter. I met an old South Australian this morning, and he had rather a novel idea. He suggested that the federal capital of Australia ought to be London. He said all the Premiers were going there shortly, and he thought it would be a favorable opportunity for all the federal representatives of the people to accompany them. We ought to recognise in Federation that defence is a very important matter. The first consideration undoubtedly is to be able to defend ourselves. On this point I thoroughly agree that the total cost of defence, as well as quarantine, should be borne by the federal authorities. There is one colony which is not represented here which we hope will be seen here later—that is Queensland. One member, Mr. Higgins, referred to the necessities of Queensland. He seemed to have the idea that some provision would be required by that State for maintaining the control of its present system of colored labor within certain districts perhaps for some short time further. I need scarcely say that, having lived in that colony for twenty-five years, and having travelled over it from one corner to another, I know there are places in Queensland where, had it not been for the employment of colored labor, many white people would not have been where they are now; that is to say, where colored labor is employed very large business is, in consequence, done by white people. No doubt if we were at some future date to meet at Brisbane we would have an opportunity of seeing for ourselves that the employment of a certain proportion of colored labor is, in certain localities, necessary for the profitable carrying on of the sugar industry. We could visit Bundaberg, and see how happy many of those men are. We could see there magnificent plantations and a splendid refinery, and if we walked the streets on a Saturday night we would be impressed with the comfortable appearance of many of the

Mr. HOLDER:

If members go there they will come back stronger against colored labor than ever.

Mr. WALKER:

I beg to differ from Mr. Holder. Now I come to the question of federal finance. In glancing through a paper, kindly supplied to me by Sir John Forrest, on "The Cost of Federal Finance," by Mr. Owen, the Government Actuary of Western Australia, I find an extract from a work which has already been very worthily praised by Mr. Deakin. The extract is from "The Coming Commonwealth," by Mr. Garran, in which he says-

The conditions which a perfect system of federal finance should satisfy are: That such a system shall-

1. Be fair to all the States, not only at the date of union, but in view of their probable growth and other contingencies.

2. Be so far final as to offer no encouragement to constant tinkering or agitation for better terms on behalf of one State or another.

3. Be nevertheless so far elastic as to be adaptable to changing conditions.

I hope in anything I have to say today I shall not depart from any one of these excellent principles. In regard to statistics bearing upon this matter one cannot but deplore that the States do not end the financial year on the same day, and I trust that when Federation is accomplished the States will see it is consistent with States rights to make their financial years end at the same time. It will undoubtedly simplify correspondence between the Minister of Finance in the Federal Government and the local Treasurers. The proposed union, I take it, will have a commercial basis. There can be very little doubt but that the Customs revenue must be transferred to the Federal Government, and hereafter, when the Financial Committee meets, we shall, no doubt, have a strong discussion as to the basis on which net proceeds from Customs will be divided. To the average man who has not investigated the matter, it seems fair and just that the Customs duties should be distributed on a population basis all over the territory, but, unfortunately, when we come to look into it there must be a great deal to be said in favor of distributing in some proportion to be ascertained as to how much is contributed by each State. I admit that since the Bathurst Convention, where I had to speak on the financial question, I have had to modify some of my views. Adhering to the lines of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. I tried to follow out the idea of paying drawbacks on dutiable goods sent across the border between each colony, so that each colony might have the benefit of the duties on these goods, but, as has already been pointed out, it is practically impossible. When you import an article into Melbourne and afterwards export it in its manufactured form it is simply impossible to say what portion of the duty is represented in the value of the manufactured article. Under these circumstances I recognise Mr. McMillan has grasped the position, and I am quite willing to follow in his footsteps in this matter. Now, with regard to the position between the Federal Government and the State Governments I take up the ground that this is largely a book-keeping matter, of one State having to pay so much and another State to receive so much. The position I take up is this: that the Federal Government will credit each State with its due proportion of the Customs and excise duties. If the railways are placed under the control of the Federal Government it will also credit each State with the net income, and upon the other side, if the consolidation of the debt takes place, it will debit each State with its proportion of the expenses of the Federal Government, and the amount of its interest on the consolidated debt, and thereafter hand the balance over to them in monthly instalments if so arranged. I took the opportunity of working out from Coghlan, a few months ago, a table which I will show to any one who likes to see it, and by it each colony on the previous basis I have mentioned comes out with a surplus. If in the case of the railways New South Wales gains a larger profit, New South Wales will reap the benefit, and as the railways are now going ahead in Western Australia, that colony will have the benefit. I may be asked at this stage what do you estimate as the total cost of the Federal Government? You will have to transfer to the Federal Government the cost of defences, quarantine, lighthouses, buoys, and so forth, and also charge them with the interest on the cost of fortifications in all the colonies. I think the annual expenditure transferred will represent about £700,000, and the cost of the Federal Government should be covered by about £300,000; so that the total cost need not exceed £1,000,000, or, say, at the rate of 2s. per head of the population for new expenditure. As against that you may say, what advantages shall we have, irrespective of prestige? If time permitted it would not be difficult to show these, and one of them will be that hereafter there will be the saving of interest on the consolidated debt.

Mr. HOLDER:
We will lose a million by the adoption of intercolonial freetrade.

Mr. WALKER:
To remedy that we shall have to instruct the Treasurer to produce a tariff that will give us as much as we now obtain by the outside and other duties.

Mr. BARTON:
Well, that would increase the burdens of the people.
Mr. WALKER:

Before going further into details in connection with the railways, I may mention that in regard to posts and telegraphs South Australia has a profit of something like £47,000 a year, whereas New South Wales has a loss of £69,000 a year. It would be manifestly unfair to South Australia, therefore, that her profit upon this department should be taken and put into the common purse to pay practically the loss of New South Wales. To get over that difficulty I take it that after we have had a few years' experience of a uniform postal rate, we shall be able to see the relative profit and loss of each colony, and if South Australia still shows a profit we shall have to capitalise the amount and credit her therewith.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

New South Wales gains £60,000 by your system of defence.

Mr. WALKER:

I am thoroughly in favor of proceeding upon a proper business basis, and of not allowing any one place to have an advantage at the expense of another.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Are the books in the South Australian Post Office kept on the same principle as the books in New South Wales?

Mr. WALKER:

Of course, if a Federal Government is formed there will be one system of books in the departments in every State. The matter will rectify itself in a short time. Now you may say, "Where comes in the benefit?" Because, as my hon. friend Mr. Reid has said:—

We shall have to justify the cost of this Government to those who sent us here.

A strong anti-federalist in Sydney the other day, whose name I need not give, speaking to me, said:

So I see you are going to increase the cost of government still more to an already over-governed community.

& J think we can give some little comfort. With regard to the non-political control of the railways, I was glad to notice that Mr. McMillan, though opposed to handing over the railways to the Federal Government, recognised that in course of time, when we have a uniform gauge, the cost of procuring such should be borne by the Federal Government. Otherwise, if the question of a uniform gauge is left to the States, I fear we shall never have a uniform gauge. I do not want to go into details on this matter, because I believe the Premier of New South Wales and the other Premiers will see their way clear to allow their Chief Commissioners and other high railway officials to give evidence before the Committee to be appointed to look into finance and trade matters. As a non-expert I should be quite willing and be perfectly satisfied to accept the recommendations of the experts. Until I see them I hold to the opinion that it will be in the interests of Federation that there should be a federal non-political control of the railways. Many persons are under the impression that under the Federal Government the railways will be pooled. No one believes that under Federation the States will be pooled. Then, why should they entertain the idea that the railways will be pooled? It will really practically amount to this: if we consolidate the debts of these colonies the railways will be hypothecated by each State to the Federal Government as a security with the addition of the Customs duties to make provision for each State's share of the interest. Another advantage, which is a small one in the minds of some people, is that when the railways are under federal control we may hope to see all rolling-stock made in these colonies and extensive workshops built to meet the demands. I am told by a railway expert that if all the railways were placed under one board there would be such a large amount of work to be done that it would pay well to have the railway workshops established here. I am aware that it would be a very difficult thing to show any great advantage at present time to Tasmania or Western Australia to come in under the railway board, but it seems to me that in connection with each of these colonies we can leave the matter in abeyance until they apply to be brought in. So anxious am I to see Western Australia connected with other portions of Australia that I hope the Federal Government will see their way clear to have a railway line connecting that colony with Port Augusta. Then when that is accomplished no doubt they will begin to see that there are advantages to be gained in being in the Federation, at any rate from a railway point of view. With regard to the advantages of uniformity I will take the liberty of giving you a quotation from a report made by Mr. Eddy at the opening of the Hawkesbury Bridge, New South Wales. Mr. Eddy said:—

The opening of the bridge over the Hawkesbury by His Excellency the Governor, Lord Carrington, on May 11th, marked a great event in the railway history of Australia, as it enabled passengers and goods to be conveyed by railway between four of the capital cities of the continent, but it is much to be regretted that, although this is true in regard to the continuous railway system, yet the inconvenience, delay, and expense of transhipment has to be suffered by all traffic owing to the lines having been constructed on three different gauges. The question of a universal gauge is of such vast importance to this great continent, both from a commercial point of view and also from a military standpoint, that we cannot too earnestly urge upon the Government the necessity of pressing the question upon the Governments of the other colonies, as we feel certain that if the break of gauge is allowed to continue the consequent inconvenience and cost will in a few years be so great as to render the adoption of a universal gauge imperative. Every year the change is delayed the mileage of rolling-stock increases and the cost of altering the gauge becomes greater. If the question could be settled at once, and the change carried out in about four years' time, and all additions to the rolling-stock constructed with a knowledge that at the end of that period it would have to be adapted to the requirements of the universal gauge, the cost of making the alteration would be found to be comparatively trifling if divided between the four colonies affected.

With regard to the delay arising from fixing the break of gauge, I find that in Ohio, after trying all sorts of mechanical appliances, they altered 10,000 miles of line from the 5ft. gauge to the 4ft. 8 1/2in. gauge in one week.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
How long will it take to alter the rolling stock?

Mr. WALKER:
I am not an authority. I believe on the Great Western line in England they altered the gauge in thirty hours.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That was only moving a rail.

Mr. WALKER:
It has been said that in America they have an Inter-State Commission, and if Federation takes place here, I propose that we should have a Federal railway, and it may also be necessary to have a States Commission representing the Federal Government and the State Governments. However, I shall not go into that subject now, but I shall be prepared to state my proposal fully to the Committee next week. An excellent suggestion has been made by a member of the Upper House of this colony, regarding the difficulty of looking after the money received by the Federal Government, and which ought to be returned to the respective States. He states-

Why not have a Federal Finance and Audit Department, permanently established, beyond the reach of the Federal Government, which will receive and allot all Federal revenue—at any rate, all the revenues that the Federal Government is not directly empowered to receive, such as Customs, &c.? It seems to me, in the institution of such a department, with a clear, business-like, and commercial statement of how the State accounts were to be kept, we have provided against all surplus, against any attempt of the States to badger the Federal Government, or cajole them, and take away any opportunity for the Federal Government to act extravagantly with the money of the States.

We hear a great deal about the Federal Government having too much money, but I must admit that it seems to me it is generally the deficits that trouble the people, and not the surpluses, but still there seems to be a general opinion that the Federal Government is going to have too much money. I have a suggestion to make as to the way in which that danger may be removed. The way I propose is that we should try to consolidate our debts. However, Sir Philip Fysh has spoken on that subject, and I do not intend to follow him, or Mr. McMillan either, at present. I am one of those old fashioned people who think it will probably be better to consolidate the loans as they mature. Mr. Nash has told us that if we consolidate our debts at the present time, something like one million could be saved; but I am inclined to think it would be better to wait until our respective loans mature. I presume and hope that when the Premiers of the colonies go home to England shortly, as they intend doing, they will see the English authorities, and endeavor to have the Australasian consols placed on the list of stocks in which trustees are empowered to invest the funds under their charge. If by the consolidation of our debts we could in time save 2 1/2 millions a year, this would enable us to largely reduce our Customs duties, and free the people of heavy burdens which they at present have to bear. I desire to acknowledge my indebtedness to Dr. Quick for a paper which contains a large amount of valuable information in reference to the consolidation of our debts. With regard to this consolidation, we know that in everyday life, when we value a security, we want to know what return it brings in. When we know what return it brings in, we have some idea what its capital value is. The debt of these colonies, which we trust will federate, is something like £180,000,000, out of which £110,000,000 in round numbers represents the cost of the railways; but if we transfer to the Federal Government the Customs, producing £6,000,000 plus another £3,000,000, which is about the railway earnings, we give it an income of £9,000,000. With such a guarantee to offer the British investor, surely the Federal Government would have no difficulty in effecting a great saving in interest. I am aware that it is not probable that at the present time the Convention will agree to take over the railways, nor perhaps will it be desirable to do so without some delay, but I should like to see a clause in the Constitution making it mandatory on the Federal Government to take them when it is deemed by it desirable to do so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Without the consent of the States?

Mr. WALKER:
Yes. With regard to Australasian consols, it seems to me that when we have to offer them they should be interminable, except at our own option, say after forty years.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Twenty-five years would be long enough.

Mr. WALKER:
Of course, we must recognise that trustees and others like investments which will not be disturbed for many years, and you will get a better price if it is a long time before you can redeem them. It seems to me that when we have these Australasian consols we should issue them with the right to redeem them after a certain time, as it was because such a power was retained by the Imperial Government that Mr. Goschen was enabled to make such a grand success of his conversion of the National Debt. We know in connection with the colony of Western Australia that if they have merely to rely on the federal tariff for revenue they could not possibly afford to come into the Federation. It seems, therefore, to me, that in the Constitution power must be given to treat that colony in an exceptional manner for some time. How that is to be done it is difficult to say, but, at the first blush, it would appear that the best way would be to give them permission to have a little extra tariff on their own account, as otherwise they could not afford to lose the revenue.

Mr. LYNE:
A tariff within a tariff.

Mr. WALKER:
I do not see otherwise how you can do it. I presume that it is understood that the name of the new Government is to be the Commonwealth of Australasia, and not of Australia, as I believe if once we federate, sooner or later, the great colony of New Zealand will come in.

Mr. BARTON:
Not for along time.

Mr. WALKER:
As has already been said, if we could agree to this scheme of Federation, nothing could better celebrate the record year of Her Majesty's reign. I am aware, Sir, that I have not done justice to this theme; but, on the other hand; I hope I have not trespassed too long on the attention of the House. It appears to me there may be railways undertaken for strategic purposes by the Federal Government, not only that one to Western Australia, but one to connect us with Port Darwin. There is a magnificent harbor there, and sooner or later we ought to make use of it. We ought to have a naval depot there for contingencies that may arise.

Mr. SOLOMON:

It would have been there instead of at Thursday Island if justice had been done.

Mr. WALKER:

I should say at both, as unfortunately we are not owners of New Guinea. Had we obtained by cession or otherwise the portion belonging to the Dutch, who do little colonisation, and the portion belonging to Germany, New Guinea would have been an appendage of Australia. Port Darwin is too magnificent a port to be allowed to remain idle. If we ever make this Transcontinental railway it will be an important station on the postal route to England and the East. We must, of course, proceed in the spirit of compromise, and as a representative of New South Wales I shall be sorry if after such a splendid commencement as we have made we should allow private views to prevent the public having something from our work. I feel disposed to support my honorable friend Mr. Reid about responsible government, but I want to reserve my opinion. I have heard so many good speeches and am not a lawyer that I want to think the question out so as to vote in a proper way when in Committee. I think the States Council should have power to amend Loan Bills, whether or not they should have power to amend Taxation Bills. If you give them the power to veto a Taxation Bill and not to amend it it seems to me like straining at the gnat and swallowing the camel. Very often a short amendment would have the desired effect. I thank the Convention for the quiet way they have heard my remarks, and I trust we shall proceed with our work and get into Committee as soon as possible.

Mr. GORDON:

I propose to make a very short speech in addressing myself to these questions which have been so fully and so ably discussed. I shall jettison everything in the way of rhetorical embellishment, both for reasons of brevity, and, I am not ashamed to confess, because I know that my poor wares of this kind would be overshadowed completely by the admirable productions we have had from honorable members during the course of this debate. But with one's natural love for his offspring, no matter how humble, I would ask the Premier of New South Wales if, when as captain of the ship he happens upon the flotsam and jetsam on the "Unknown sea of Federation," he will rescue it for the sake of memories of other days.
When I heard one hon. member describe the resolutions as a text, and when I heard the Hon. Mr. Barton himself say that one part of them was an inspiration, the combination of text and inspiration inclined me to be a little shy of dealing with them in a mixed assembly.

But I must be a little courageous with regard to one matter of which I have been reminded by the Hon. Sir Richard Baker. In the last line but one of sub-section A of the resolutions I shall move before I sit down

That the word "for" be inserted after the word "Bills," making it read:

To possess the sole power of originating all Bills for appropriating revenue, or imposing taxation, so as to make it perfectly clear that the sole power of origination shall be confined to Bills specially of that class and shall not be extended or be claimed to be extended to Bills which only incidentally require some provision from the national exchequer.

Mr. BARTON:

I should like to say, Mr. President, that that was really my intention, that it was purely a slip that the word "for" was not inserted. The word is in the Constitution Bill dealing with that, and with the concurrence of the Convention I think that word should be inserted now.

HON. MEMBERS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON:

I take it that will be done then. I would like, with the permission of this distinguished assemblage, to confine, my remarks to a few general observations, which will nevertheless have a particular bearing. Admittedly, any attempt to deal with this question is one of very great difficulty. No one can be otherwise than daunted by its difficulties and its magnitude. The well-known dictum of Freeman, that the federal form of government is a delicate and highly artificial structure which ill bears transplanting to soil not properly prepared for it, was never more signally justified than by our present deliberations. One of the greatest of our difficulties is, in my humble opinion, the doubt whether or not the soil, as represented by the necessities and desires of the people of the colonies, is properly prepared. In the evolution of history, as in the same law in nature, a premature step or a step too quickly taken means in the end delay, not progress. Judging from the comparatively small interest taken in the recent elections, as well as from the tenor or this debate, I think it is very much open to doubt whether there is such a general desire for Federation as will make the erection of the delicate federal structure altogether an easy matter. Men of the British race are very slow to transfer their allegiance to new governmental masters, to change the forms of government the working of which they know, to which they are accustomed, and upon which they have relied. It must be remembered that the results of our deliberations have to be referred to the people. There are reasons which we should not entirely overlook which cause many, to regard the Federation movement with extreme caution, and with some apprehension as to its effects upon their immediate interests. The ordinary citizen is compelled by his necessities to take somewhat short views. Intercolonial freetrade will undoubtedly change the manufacturing centres, and with them the residences of the masses of labor must also change. This will be an immediate but not a permanent disadvantage. We have to show to the people of the colonies who will be affected in this way that this immediate dislocation of trade will be of ultimate and permanent advantage to them, as I believe it will be. Even in the case of the American States, pressed as they were by dangers from without and dissensions within-bankrupt as a Confederacy and bankrupt as States-the men of genius who led the Federal movement had the greatest difficulty in securing the adhesion of the people to their proposals. This difficulty is ten times enhanced in these colonies, where no such urgent reasons exist; where each of the colonies stands high in the credit of the world's markets, equal in that respect if not better than many of the ancient European countries. These remarks are in themselves trite, but they are necessary to the short argument which I shall make, and the point of which is, that in the Constitution we are about to formulate, we should make the smallest draft which can be made consistently with cohesion, upon the allegiance of the people of these States to the Governments under which they at present live. They are the governments to which they are accustomed; they are the governments they have themselves moulded into effective legislative machines under which a greater share of political liberty is experienced than in any countries the world ever saw. Young as they are, the colonies have histories and traditions to which they have become attached, and they are justly proud of the social and political conditions which their genius has largely created. It is an easy gibe to call this attachment parochial. I have heard that objectionable word used a good many times in the course of this debate. Cannot hon. members see that this admirable attachment to existing institutions is the best guarantee of loyalty to the new government we seek to create, when once fealty is given to it? Do not let me be misunderstood.

I have no wish to decry the national ideal which has been adorned and exalted with so much moving rhetoric during this debate. I have worshipped a little at that shrine myself, though never, of course, in language so graceful or so noble as I have been privileged to listen to here. But when the music of these speeches we have listened to has died away, I have asked myself more than once, as each member no doubt has, what answer shall I give to the people when they ask what benefits they will get under the new government proposed? How much, in addition to their present advantages, is this government going to promote the liberty and happiness of the people of these States beyond the happy stage they have at present reached, and which they have reached by the exercise of those very powers which they are now to surrender to a new government? For it must be evident that if, in addition to the powers and utilities proposed to be conferred by the Commonwealth Bill, the States surrender also their railways they will have little or no control either over their social development or over those commercial arteries through which, as Sir John Forrest said, the lifeblood of the colonies flows. We are raising a new government in Australia, the exact operations and effects of which, I venture to submit, there is no man in this Assembly able to predict. Though we have every belief in its success, it is entirely an experiment.

Mr. Howe:

We have the experiments of other countries to guide us.

Mr. Gordon:

We have the experience of very few Federations, and of none under similar conditions. If I had to say now whether I would rather see a United Australia in the same condition as America is now, or whether I would rather have the separate States of Australasia in the condition in which they are now, I would not hesitate to hold up both hands for the maintenance of the present conditions.

Sir William Zeal:

If a European war broke out, and Great Britain stood alone, where would you be then?

Mr. Gordon:

I do not share the fears of the hon. member as regards the safety of Australia in the event of a European war. As a Minister of Defence for three years I have studied this question pretty closely. Some of the most eminent naval and military authorities point out that there is no power in the world at present that in the event of a war could afford to detach an invading force that the Australian Colonies, with even their present means of defence, would not be able to eat up in a month. The same might also be said of a naval attack. No European nation has squadrons to spare which our present defence by the Imperial men-of-war and the local gunboats is not sufficient to meet. The danger from flying cruisers along our enormous coastline would always exist.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

How could you prevent the Japanese from taking Port Darwin?

An HON. MEMBER:

How could you protect the commerce?

Mr. GORDON:

The hon. member may not have the confidence in the English Government that I have. I have every hope that England will continue to protect us to the same extent as now. The commerce of Australia is part of British commerce, and so long as Great Britain is mistress of the seas she will protect it. When she ceases to be mistress of the seas I think we may all hand in our checks, whether we are federated or not.

Mr. HOWE:

All the more reason why we should federate.

Mr. GORDON:

If England ceased to be mistress of the seas Federated Australia would not be able to protect its commerce against naval powers which overcame the greatest navy the world has ever had. But all these questions are hypothetical, and are leading me away from the point I wish to make.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Are you speaking against Federation?

Mr. GORDON:

If the hon. member will allow me I hope I will convince him I am not against a Federation which involves a reasonable surrender by the States. I am attempting to lay down, perhaps out of abundant caution, one or two principles by which I humbly think we should be guided, and by which I think the people will expect us to be guided in framing this Constitution. Many hon. members are protesting against surrendering more power than is necessary, but while they are protesting with their mouths their hearts are not in the business, and they are agreeing to surrender everything. They are stripping themselves of their clothes, and the only thing that will be left to them will be the tattoo marks which expressed their early attachment to their States. The genius, at any rate of South Australian politics, has been local government; but proposals which embrace, amongst other things, the surrender of railways, telegraphs, and post offices take us back to a huge system of centralisation. I agree entirely with Sir John Forrest in his concise and businesslike remarks on this head. So far as South Australia is concerned, we have nothing to gain in the way of additional social advantages as distinguished from purely commercial advantages by Federation. We are already in the very van of social progress, while some of the other colonies are halting behind us. But we have, I admit, a good deal to gain commercially from a fair compact with our neighbors, just as we have a good deal to give.

Mr. FRASER:

But nationally you gain.

Mr. GORDON:

Undoubtedly Australia will gain in national strength, but at the same time there are powers proposed to be surrendered, which the colonies can, I submit, control better themselves.

Mr. ISAACS:

Surely this question was determined when the Enabling Bill was passed?

Mr. GORDON:

I have not the hon. member's rapidity of argument and conclusion. If he follows me he will see that I am only speaking by way of attempting a limitation of the surrenders which it is proposed to give to the Federal Government. I say when we submit to the contract we make here we shall have to prove to the people that the powers we surrender can be better used than heretofore. They will not be content with eloquent assurances that it is all right. We must demonstrate to them that the proposals are advantageous. And now let me with great rapidity look at some of the proposals in the light of the proposition that the draft upon the allegiance of the people to their States Governments should be as small as possible, and that the disturbance to local conditions should be as little as possible. I shall make my articles of belief brief and categorical. I see no great advantage in handing over the post offices. The advantage so loyally mentioned by Sir Philip Fysh of having the same Queen's head upon all Australian stamps does not seem to compensate for the creation of a large body of federal servants in each State beyond the control of the State Government, and owing their allegiance to the superior power; and further, I fully coincide, as an old post office Minister, in the remarks made by e time being they are employed. There must, however, be vested in the Federal Government ample authority to prevent both preferential railway rates and the building of competitive railway lines. Some hon. members may remember that I ineffectually sought to have this power incorporated in the Bill of 1891. It is encouraging to find that opinion has changed. It has been argued that the provision will be inoperative because a similar authority over railways in America and England has failed. But I point out that there is only a seeming analogy between the cases. Both in England and America the lines are owned privately. Their proprietors are bound neither by any bond of honor between themselves nor by any obligation to the Governments. They are purely commercial adventurers. In the case of the colonies the contracting parties will be sovereign States, whose public honor will be pledged. To doubt their adhering in good faith to any contract they solemnly agree to is to poison at its very source the fountain of justice and good faith upon which the Commonwealth, if it is to stand at all, must stand. I have no doubt whatever that any contract entered into between the States would be fully and amply maintained, and that the difficulties which in America and England have been found in dealing with private companies would not exist. The hon. the Premier of New South Wales has made a very handsome recognition of the necessity for the vesting of this power in the federal authority. The hon. gentleman is representing the colony which could best of all maintain its position in the fight of railway tariffs. We are all grateful for the concession he makes. But I hope that the hon. gentleman in reconsidering the question will be disposed to go a little further than he has stated he is prepared to go, and will agree to the federal authority having the power to prevent, also, the building of any railway which would have the direct, unmistakeable effect of diverting trade from its proper outlet. Of course, the judge in this matter would be the federal authority. The hon. member will see that I have in my mind's eye the railway that is threatened to be built from the Barrier to a distant point in New South Wales. All the experts who have inquired into the matter agree that it would never pay. If the railway were built it would be only for the purpose of taking away the trade from the South Australian ports—Port Pirie and Port Augusta. Mr. Reid rather qualified his adhesion to the principle I wish to lay down, but I do not doubt that, on consideration, he will agree that any measure should be prevented which would have the designed effect of diverting trade from its natural channels within the Commonwealth. I am exceedingly glad to be supported in my view on these questions by so eminent a railway expert as Mr. Grant, the representative of Tasmania. I only repeat that once the agreement is entered into there will be no breach of it. If we are to anticipate breaches of faith in such matters as this, our troubles will not end with the wedding bells, but will only begin with them. And now just a word on the financial problem. I think I should be more than human if I did not remind hon. members that I was the only member of the 1891 Convention who boldly ventured to say that the financial proposals of the Commonwealth Bill were clumsy and inequitable: and such is now the view of those best qualified to express an opinion. I am glad to know in regard to this financial problem, that some of those of more mature experience than myself who supported the proposals in the Bill of 1891 so vigorously, have since reconsidered the question, and now partially support the view which I took. I have struggled in vain to master the subject in connection with our present proposals, and to find a solution of the difficulties. I have read and re-read the disquisitions of Sir Samuel Griffith, Dr. Quick, and notably Mr. Nash, who has entered upon a long, exceedingly coherent and sustained examination of all the financial propositions, but I have come out of the study more confused and confounded than ever.

Mr. REID:
You should read them after you study them.

Mr. GORDON:
I am dealing merely with what appear to be little more than conjectures on this question, and if we place the conjectures of the experts in juxtaposition, I do not know that a prettier problem was ever submitted to an innocent amateur financier. In addition to these attempts at its solution, I have listened to the very able speeches made by Mr. McMillan, Mr. Walker, and other acknowledged masters of the art of financing, but I have come out more confounded and confused still, and I venture to think that everyone else is in the same position.

Mr. REID:
Only a method of bookkeeping.

Mr. GORDON:
Mr. McMillan practically admits with regard to the schemes of the other financial experts that madness lies that way; and he admits that even his own scheme it is only a milder form of lunacy which is to be periodically tempered by intervals of lucidity. Each of these financial experts launches himself upon a troubled sea in a financial cockle boat of his own design, most of them taking in water and none able to make a port. Out of all this confusion which exists in the minds of the men who, if there were any solution, would be the men to find it, comes the clear, simple, understandable, and workable proposition which I advocated in 1891, and which has since had the indorsement of eminent authorities, not the least of whom is the hon. member, my old colleague, Mr. Holder. You may be assured that what he states to be right in matters of finance is not far from wrong.

Mr. GLYNN:
You have been colleagues.
Mr. GORDON:

That is why I know so well the value of his opinion. No scheme which has been propounded and which involves the collection of the Customs duties by the Central Government gives either satisfaction or justice all round. It contains the germ of discontent, and, as Mr. McMillan has suggested, might lead possibly to revolution. Let us examine the problem. The object to be achieved is to secure a contribution per capita from the people of each State towards the expense of the Federal Government. Except for considerations which I shall presently mention, the obvious way of achieving this is for each State to collect the tax and pay it over to the Central Government. We are told, however, that this scheme is inherently vicious because it makes the Federal Government dependent to some extent or, as others say, wholly dependent on the State. For the sake of argument I will admit that, but I do not propose that there should be no ultimate and direct resort for the Central Government as was the case in the American Confederacy, which broke down because the Government had no power to enforce its demands upon the individuals of the Commonwealth. But what is to prevent our giving the Federal Government the power, if any State makes default, to assume not only the collection of the Customs duties, but to impose any other form of taxation upon its people it chooses to exercise. I am sure that every State is so secure in its belief in its own honor that it would grant any penal power to the Federal Government in case of default. The American Confederacy had no such reserve power upon the individuals of the States to secure their quotas of either men or money. Where, then, if this is granted, is the argument that this scheme is vicious, because it allows no direct control by the Federal Government over the individual of the State? It vanishes into thin air, and those members who have been so impressed by the essays of Hamilton will, I beg with much respect, reconsider the whole matter. The weakness of the American Confederacy was that the compact between the States gave the central authority no power over the individuals of the State. The Confederacy asked for quotas of men and money, and when the States, either through inability or unwillingness, failed to comply with the requests, the only way to enforce the request was by actual entry into the defaulting State. They had no power over the individual units of the State. I propose to improve that by giving the Federal authority unlimited power of taxing individuals, that power to be held in reserve.

Mr. GLYNN:

How would it work in intercolonial free trade?

Mr. GORDON:
We know what the population is, and the contribution would be per capita.

Mr. GLYNN:
How would you know the amount each State received?

Mr. GORDON:
If it is agreed that the contribution should be per capita you must ascertain how many people there are in each State. The calculation would be a simple matter.

Mr. WALKER:
How do you divide the Customs receipts?

Mr. GORDON:
Let each State receive its Customs receipts as it does now.

A MEMBER:
They would go over the border.

Mr. GORDON:
Every scheme has its disadvantages, and if the hon. member can show a scheme with fewer disadvantages I would adopt it.

Mr. WALKER:
By your scheme the goods come into Victoria and are consumed in New South Wales.

Mr. GORDON:
Admittedly there are inequalities, but there is no scheme that avoids them. There is no scheme that has less elements of future discontent and quarrelling than this. It contains the advantages of practicability, of directness, and of being understood by the people.

Mr. DOBSON:
Can you quote an authority?

Mr. GORDON:
With very much submission I advocate this scheme, and if it is to be dismissed on the ground of inequalities between the colonies, then it should be shown that these are greater than the admitted inequalities of any other scheme; because I maintain, with much respect, that it cannot be dismissed on the grounds on which it has hitherto been dismissed, namely, that it will not allow the federal authority to operate upon the individual; for I propose that the fullest powers shall be given to the federal authority.

An HON. MEMBER:
What power?

Mr. GORDON:
The fullest powers of taxation. I believe, as I have said, that every colony is so confirmed in its belief in its own honor and reputation in connection with the engagements entered into, that I do not think there is any fear of either of the States repudiating their obligations to the Federal Government.

Mr. GLYNN:
How would it be in the case of the federal authority being in default?

Mr. GORDON:
These sovereign States, with the credit in the markets of the world, are not likely to make default.

Mr. REID:
In your experience you have known more than one Taxation Bill suffer for a very small default.

Mr. GORDON:
I cannot catch my hon. friend's allusion. The American Confederation had no such reserve as I propose to give the federal authority. But would any colony dare to repudiate its liabilities to the central authority without ruining its credit in the markets of the world?

Mr. GLYNN:
They were six years' interest behind.

Mr. REID:
What! the Australian Colonies?

Mr. GLYNN:
No; the American colonies.

Mr. GORDON:
Yes; the Confederacy was absolutely bankrupt. Too much has been made of the example of the outworn States of America. Even if it were proposed to give no more powers against States than the Confederacy had - though no one proposes so narrow a foundation - our colonies are in a

Mr. DOBSON:
Supposing it is a refusal to pay on some religious dispute.

Mr. GORDON:
I cannot agree that that is a reasonable contingency. I am afraid that the religious views of the colonies are not strong enough to enable them to take such a pronounced step. The fact is that none of the colonies would repudiate their obligations, and any colonies that did would become revolutionary on other grounds. It is as easy to suppose that any colony would revolt as that it would repudiate its obligations to the central authority. Mr. Barton said that if the States would not trust the Federal Government why ask the Federal Government to trust the States? I do not think that is the question. I have no more doubt of the honor of the Central Government to the States than I have of the honor of the States. Our difficulty is to find a method to discharge the obligations which these bodies must incur to each other, which shall be simple, efficacious, and not irritable. I know, of course, the reasoning of Hamilton on this question, but while there was great force in his theories, as applied to the conditions of his time, they do not apply to the circumstances of our colonies.

Mr. DOBSON:
If the Federal Government has a surplus, can you not trust it to deal with the money under the Constitution?

Mr. GORDON:
One great difficulty under the distribution of surplus scheme will be for the people to know exactly what they have to pay. I submit with much confidence that the balance of advantage is much in favor of the simple, direct, and easily understood scheme which I advocate. It has for all practical purposes the constitutional strength of the other proposals, and it is infinitely simpler. It conforms to my proposition that State conditions should be disturbed as little as possible. On the question of the consolidation of loans, it occurs to me in passing that no allowance has been made in the calculations which we have listened to for the greater rate of interest which the States will have to pay for their State loans, for I suppose the States will have to finance for local purposes. Directly you elevate the Federal Parliament into the position of a first-class borrower, you reduce each of the States into the position of an inferior body.

Mr. WALKER:
They can borrow at 3 per cent. through the Central Government.

Mr. GORDON:
In reply to that I say that if this distinguished assemblage is anything like what the Senate is going to be—although I cannot conceive that this highly Conservative body is anything like the assemblage which will represent the final views of the people—that you would not get the Senate to authorise the borrowing of money for many such social schemes as have been carried in South Australia, and to carry on which money would have to be borrowed. I doubt whether we would have got our village settlements scheme through such an assemblage as this, nor do I think we would have established our State Bank.

Mr. WALKER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON:
There is the view of one hon. member at once, though he knows little about the special circumstances of this colony. The hon. member, who has not devoted much attention to this village settlements scheme admits he would object to the borrowing of money through the central authority for such purposes as I have mentioned. Here you would have a strangling grip on the policy of a colony such as South Australia, if, as appears likely, the States Government would have to pay heavier interest than it does now for schemes which the Federal Government would not approve. I protest with the strongest language of which I am capable, against every artery through which the life of local government flows being handed over to the Central Government. My hon. friend Mr. Walker might be in the Federal Assembly, and he says he would veto such institutions as our State Bank and Village Settlements, which I regard as among our most useful institutions.

Dr. COCKBURN:
   Hear, hear.

Mr. DOBSON:
   Time will show.

Mr. WALKER:
   So long as you have a surplus coming to you, you can do whatever you like with it.

Mr. GORDON:
   If the hon. member knows anything of our finances, he must know that the surplus coming to the colonies after payment of current charges is not sufficient to enable them to establish such schemes as the village settlements.

Mr. WALKER:
   A good job too.

Mr. GORDON:
   Again the hon. member condemns one of our institutions of which we are most proud; one which cleared our streets of many who were starving.

Mr. SOLOMON:
   A most expensive charity.

MR. GORDON:
   The hon. member cannot divest himself of the idea that he is leader of the Opposition. The village settlements scheme is one of the most beneficent and useful schemes established in any country in the world. I wish I could show many hon. members the people on these settlements who had no homes of their own before they went there. I have been somewhat diverted from my argument that the saving to be achieved by the federal authority borrowing is to be somewhat discounted by the higher rate the colonies would have to pay for their State borrowing. For there must still exist some things upon which the States must borrow upon their own account. I instanced the village settlements, and the hon. member replied, "Why, come to the Central Government, and we will give you the money." I asked if he would give us money for the village settlements, and he said "No."

Mr. WALKER:
We have given you one village settlement-Broken Hill.

Mr. GORDON:
And we have taken great care of it; but I protest against Broken Hill being considered a village settlement of New South Wales. It was started and developed by South Australia. It is distinctly South Australian, and it would never have been exploited by the somewhat easy-going New South Wales.

Mr. BARTON:
Do you want it?

Mr. GORDON:
I have left myself little time to discuss the constitutional questions. With regard to the question of responsible government, I am not going to take up much time with regard to it. I do not by any means regard it with such sacred awe as does Mr. Isaacs. I am sorry if my irreverent interjection disturbed his glow-

Mr. REID:
I do not wonder that some of the Ministries only lasted a month.

Mr. GORDON:
I only hope that the hon. member's tenure of office in New South Wales will be as long as one of the Ministries I refer to. I am sure it would be for the benefit of New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS:
Was it carried?

Mr. GORDON:
It was proposed, and had many supporters. There is also a very large body of educated public opinion in England against responsible government, whose cry is "Americanise our great institutions." It is supported by Sir Henry Maine, a publicist and brilliant essayist. The hon. member overstated even the extreme opposite opinion when he said that anyone who opposed responsible government was execrable.

Mr. ISAACS:
You put it a little stronger than I did.

Mr. GORDON:
Execrable was the word. There is a strong feeling in South Australia in favor of the Swiss method of electing Ministers, and there is the solemn assertion of a Parliamentary Committee or Commission in New Zealand which absolutely condemns party government. Responsible government is on its trial. It is not ancient. It has really sprung into force within the lives of our grandfathers. While sorry that I interrupted Mr. Isaacs, I think that, on consideration, he will see that his suggestion was not justified by the present state of political opinion. The conversion of Sir Richard Baker is clearly due to the fact I have just mentioned, that twice in the Legislative Council I have advocated this system. He was in opposition at the time, but like a man of reason and a man of courage, having listened to arguments which no reasonable man could hear and resist, he changed his opinion.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I forgive him, then.

Mr. GORDON:
While I am not advocating by any means the assertion in the Bill that the Federal Government should be worked upon any other than the responsible government system, I protest against any particular system being imposed on the Federal Government. I contend for freedom. As Mr. Wise so well put it: the genius of the Federal Parliament will be equal to any necessity that may arise and will mould the machine which we entrust to their hands in a manner that will redound to the credit of Australia and the advantage of its people. I have never been able to see any fatal result to all that is best in responsible government in a recognition of the individual as distinguished from the corporate responsibility of ministers.

Mr. ISAACS:
Responsible to whom?

Mr. GORDON:
Responsible to both Houses of Parliament. Just a word on the question of the powers of the Senate. A great deal of interesting history has been quoted as to the genesis of the American Senate and the intentions of its founders. I do not think this helps us very much. The flowers of a hundred years have bloomed and perished on the graves of these gentlemen, and the political machine they constructed has acquired an importance which they may or may not have intended.
Mr. ISAACS:

Because it was asserted, then, that it was not intended to make the Senate of the United States an Upper House.

Mr. GORDON:

Whoever made that assertion uttered one which is comparatively idle as affecting the point at issue. The genesis of the American Senate has not much more to do with our present position than the evolutionary struggles of our anthropoid ancestors have to do with our actions in this Convention. We have to consider the Senate as a going concern, and to gather what lessons we can from it as it exists to-day. Equal representation in the Senate is necessary, and this is I think generally conceded. I lay it down as an absolute proposition that if we are to make this a fair partnership we must have equal representation in the Senate. We have had two excellent speeches from an intellectual point of view from Mr. Higgins and Mr. Deakin, but both of whom appeared to look at the question with one eye shut. The remarkable ability and the great learning of those two gentlemen enabled them to conceal the fact that they had not fully mastered the federal idea. Neither of them has been able to see the essential difference between an Upper House in a homogeneous State and a Senate in a Federation. I am quite unable to follow the hon. members, who are both generally logical, and combine with logic rhetorical brilliancy. When they have time to think about this important difference they will, I hope, come round to my view of the question. There is nothing in Mr. Higgins's argument as adduced from Mr. Bryce's book to the effect that the equal representation in the American Senate has been of no service in preventing infractions of States.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I say there were no differences of interest. You might as well say there was no steep hill because there was a brake in the wheel of your buggy. The brake turns out to be unnecessary.

Mr. GORDON:

If I am at all misrepresenting what the hon. member has said, there is no one more sorry than I am. I understood him to argue that the equal representation in the American Senate had not been of use in preventing differences in the States.

Mr. HIGGINS:

No differences of interest arising between the large or populous States and the small or less populous States.

Mr. GORDON:

The conditions here are not similar to those in America. In America the Government does not own the railways, telegraphs, and post offices.

Dr. COCKBURN:
The post offices.

Mr. GORDON:
Well, they do not own the railways, which are the most fruitful source of revenue, and therefore highly probable sources of trouble. The conditions under which the Senate and the Lower House have to operate here and in America are, to my mind, essentially different. Our conditions compel us to take the greatest care of our State interests, to take the greatest care that the constitutional compact shall be so arranged that every germ of dissension amongst us may be avoided as far as possible. Mr. Deakin, in his somewhat sweeping statement with regard to the liability of the population of the larger colonies for the financial needs of the Federal Parliament, forgot that the Parliament will have powers to impose taxation in any way it pleases. Supposing the Federal Parliament imposed a land tax, would the landless millions of Victoria pay that? No. It would be South Australia, Western Australia, and New South Wales that would have to pay it, so that the conclusion he drew that the whole of the financial responsibility would fall on the populous colonies was wrong, and cannot be sustained on a complete examination of the partnership arrangement proposed to be made between the colonies. Land is the principal subject for taxation, and not the people. The people can avoid the tax by going away. The land always remains, and so long as land is a subject to taxation by the federal authority the colonies owning the largest landed estates bring in security for their full share of the federal debts.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Land more than the man?

Mr. GORDON:
As the ultimate resort for taxation I should say yes. I just desire to point out to my hon. friend that we give an asset which is responsible for every federal debt in the landed estates which we have developed at a cost of so much money and many lives. I am not going to labor the question of the privileges of the Senate. I am free to admit that sweet reasonableness has been displayed by the leaders from the larger colonies. No man who wishes to face these troubles, and be fair all round, can conceal the difficulty which lies wrapped up in the question of the powers of the Senate, and all will admit that on the whole the disposition of both sides has been so reasonable that no doubt a solution will be arrived at. I am the more nervous on this question of a strong Senate when I find myself standing shoulder to shoulder with such a lion of democracy as Dr. Cockburn, and a gentleman whose political opinions are such a curious survival as are those of the hon. member Mr. Dobson. It makes me just a little suspicious of the position—of course not suspicious of either of them as far as their honorable intentions are concerned, nor of their desire to benefit their country. While fighting, as in duty bound, for equal representation and equal powers in the Senate, I think that there is a good deal in the contention that the annual Appropriation Bill should not be amended if it were possible to define in the Constitution that the Appropriation Bill should contain absolutely only the charges proper to the carrying on of the Government, and that there should be no tacking on of loan money items. With this suggestion: I think it a question in which give and take may fairly obtain. There are two essentials—equal representation in the Senate and for that body practically co-ordinate power with the House of Representatives. All those who recognise what are the essentials to a true union will admit these essentials. They are necessary for the protection of the liberties and the purses of the States. I shall advocate a Federal franchise upon the basis of adult suffrage, but if I cannot get that I shall be content for my part with, at least, manhood suffrage everywhere and adult suffrage in the States which possess that admirable franchise. I advocate a Final Federal Court of Appeal for Australia—final in all matters except those involving Imperial concerns. No case should be remitted to the Privy Council except on a certificate of the Federal Court that it was of this nature. On such a certificate it should at once go on to the Privy Council without further cost. My hon. friend Mr. O'Connor was mistaken, I think, when he said that no Colonial Court could hope to equal the Privy Council in ability. I venture to think that I could select from the Bar-leaders present in this assembly, to go no further, a bench as strong and as independent as any which has ever sat in any part of Her Majesty's dominions. I will not further trespass on the exceeding good nature of hon. members. I will only add the hope that when our epitaph as nation-builders comes to be written it will be:

"They builded better than they knew."

Mr. TRENWITH:

I rise with very great diffidence to address myself to the question we have to consider at this stage of the debate. The debate has been all through an exceptionally able one, and this day is perhaps the most distinguished of all the days that the Convention has sat. The debate to-day, I am sure, may be said to have reached its highest altitude, and unfortunately for me, at any rate, in having to speak at all, my views in the main have been expressed, some obligation to state my views in view of the fact that this discussion is taken in Committee. The speech that I have just listened to has interested me in some measure, and I feel a good deal in doubt as to whether to take it altogether seriously. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman was really stating his views or whether he was out for a night and was entertaining himself and us. Certainly those views which he claimed to hold seriously were, to my mind, of a most extraordinary character. With a modesty that must be peculiar to himself he declared he was, of all the men who had discussed this important question, the only one who had discovered a real solution of the financial difficulty. He certainly mentioned incidentally that the study of this subject had a tendency to create insanity. However, he positively assured us, at any rate, that he was all right up to now. The scheme he proposes is that the contributions to the federal authority should be made upon demand from the various States per capita, and that if any of the States should be dissatisfied with the amount of the demand and should default, that then, and not till then, the central authority might step in and take action in reference to the individual State. It seems to me so obvious that this is impracticable that I cannot believe it was submitted seriously, that the central authority should have to ask for a certain amount of money from the States which, of course, to meet the requirements of the central authority, must be paid promptly; but of the amounts of which the States would have had no knowledge until they were asked, and consequently were literally unprepared to meet them. Supposing they were prepared to meet the in some instances, and some one or more did default, then the central authority would step in and take action to obtain it from the individual citizen. Does he mean that as it is a per capita demand, a per capita claim, the central authority has to ask each individual citizen to pay his or her share? Because if he does there is no doubt there will be a great deal of inconvenience on the part of many citizens in complying with the demand. Or does he mean that in some general way the central authority is to institute proceedings to raise the amount in default by some form of taxation; if he does that, whenever such a contingency arises, the central authority will then have to create all the necessary machinery.

Mr. BARTON:
The Commonwealth will have to seize the assets of the defaulting States.

Mr. TRENWITH:
And when it ceases to be in antagonism, and agrees to comply voluntarily, will all this machinery have to be disbanded? It does seem to me to be a difficult scheme to understand. The hon. gentleman said that there is no scheme without an objection. This particular scheme appears to have one objection, and that is that it is absolutely unworkable. He commenced his speech in a manner which astonished me more than his conclusion, by declaring that Federation was undesirable and impracticable in the interests of Australasia. It was suggested to me when he was speaking that his position here must be very like that of the fly in the amber, the sole consideration of which was how in the world he got there. The hon. member commenced by saying that it was extremely doubtful whether these colonies are ripe for Federation yet. Then he followed that by illustrations of the impossibility and difficulty of grafting Federation upon these colonies. Defences would be handed over, if handed over at all, with very considerable danger and possible difficulty; post offices certainly should not be handed over, because the interests of the States would suffer; and railways under no conditions should be taken over by the central authority. The substance of it all is that if the central authority is constituted it shall have nothing to do; if that is ultimately decided his financial scheme will suit admirably. But it did occur to me that we were called here because the States of Australasia were ripe for Federation, because they were longing for Federation, because they were expecting that we would prepare legislative machinery under which they could federate with advantage, and that the time for discussing why we should federate and the benefit of Federation was passed. That question has been answered a hundred times by the declaration that we have discovered that there are some things that we cannot do at all separated, and some others we can do much better federated. The Act under which we are authorised to be here declares in effect that the colonies represented here at any rate are ripe for Federation. The hon. member himself, I understand, took part in the discussion on an Enabling Act here to declare that the people should be called upon to elect a Convention. Clearly it was trifling with the people to ask them to elect a Convention and at the same time to honestly hold the opinion that the colonies were not ripe for Federation. We are here authorised, commanded, to do what we can in the light of the experience of the world to prepare a Federal Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:

And we have undertaken to do it.

Mr. TRENWITH:

We have undertaken to do it, as has been aptly suggested by Mr. Barton, and I hope in the spirit of liberality. We shall have grievous differences—some of them very hard indeed to reconcile, some perhaps impossible to reconcile; but every man owes it to his own honor and to those who sent him here that he shall by every means in his power endeavor to reconcile them. We are here to frame a Constitution—not for South Australia, not for Victoria, not for New South Wales, not for any colony singly, but for all the colonies of Australasia—a Constitution that will not give to one an undue advantage over another.

Mr. BARTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH:
And we ought, if we can, to consider ourselves not representatives of any particular State, but rather as representatives of Australasia—

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Entrusted with the duty of doing the best we can for Australia, and making a Constitution that will give all the advantages that are possible from central government and federal management of such things as cannot be managed locally to secure to the representative States the most absolute and complete autonomy with reference to domestic legislation, and to create, if I may so express it, a nation of sovereign States with a sovereign Central Government within an area prescribed for it. This seems to me to be the consideration to which we must bend our attention, and to which we must bend our energies, and it brings us naturally to the consideration—what form of government? It seems to me that is the first question. Subsequently we shall have to consider, having decided what form of central government, what objects of government we shall hand over to the central authority. In view of the jealous, and properly jealous, manner in which the peoples of the various States have consideration for the importance of the power of their States, it seems to me that it will be wise to hand no more over than is absolutely necessary, at any rate for the first time to time that Parliamentary government is on its trial, and that it is not by any means settled yet whether it is the best form of government that can be adopted, I think it will be generally admitted that there is no better form of government known to us.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
It has been on its trial for a long time.

Mr. TRENWITH:
And I think it will be on its trial for many centuries yet to come. This involves the consideration of what sort of Parliament? The world furnishes illustrations of different Parliaments—Parliaments of one House, Parliaments of two Houses, Parliaments elected by all the people,
Parliaments elected by some of the people, and it seems to me, at any rate for this Central Government for which we are commissioned to provide machinery, it would be wise to have a Parliament of two Houses. I have said, and I feel very sure, that, with reference to our State Governments, we could have been governed better by one House than we have been by two; but we have to consider that we are dealing now with an altogether larger constituency to what is presented in any of our colonies. We have practically two units of representation. We have first, and most important of all it seems to my mind, the people of the various colonies; and then we have the various colonies themselves as separate States. And I think, in accord with everything that has been previously urged here, that we must have a People's House-and I prefer to call it the People's House-and a States House. How shall these Houses be fashioned? becomes the next consideration. Shall they represent the people in proportion to their numbers, or shall they represent the States equally without regard to population? It is not necessary to argue that the People's House, at any rate, should represent the States in proportion to their population, because that is generally admitted, but the hon. member for Tasmania, Mr. Clarke, said this afternoon that there had been no disputing practically with reference to the right of the States to be represented equally in the States Council. Now I think that contention was inaccurate. I think there has already been some objection urged to the justice of that form of State Council. Certainly my hon. friend Mr. Higgins voiced that objection, but what I desire to urge is that even those who have admitted that, for the purpose of Federation, it will be desirable to grant representation to the States in the States Council, are not all agreed that that is a perfectly equitable and just arrangement; but they make that concession, to put it in the words of Mr. Deakin,

They make that sacrifice.

Mr. LYNE:

No.

Mr. TRENWITH:

They make that sacrifice out of regard for their opinion of the importance of Federation.

Mr. BROWN:

They may want it themselves twenty years hence.

Mr. TRENWITH:

The question we are dealing with, as Mr. Holder put it when Mr. Higgins was dealing with it, is a question of principle. We ought to, as far as we can, dissociate our minds from the fact that we represent individual States. For my part, I feel I represent my native country, Tasmania, just as much as I represent Victoria—that is to say, I believe Victoria sent me here to represent Australia in this matter, and to endeavor to secure a solution of the difficulty that will be for the benefit of Australia without regard to individual States: and the assumption upon which hon. members act in connection with this subject is to my mind fallacious. It is urged we must have equal representation of the States in the Senate, or else we will not get Federation; and some go to the length of saying that all the Federations of importance in the world have equal representation in the Senate. That seems to me to be where the fallacy is. So far as I know there is only one Federation in the world where there is equal representation in the Senate, and that is the United States of America. It is urged that it is so in Switzerland, but it is not so. There are twenty-five separate governments in Switzerland, and there are only forty-four senators. There are half cantonments, all of which are to all intents and purposes complete cantonments. So far as Switzerland is concerned they are independent States, having separate governments, but sending one instead of two representatives to the Switzerland Senate. Thus, I think my contention is correct, that even Switzerland, which I admit approximates to equal representation in the Senate, does not possess equal representation in the Senate. In the others, which may be said to be examples of the present day federation - Canada and Germany - there is not even the pretence to equal representation of the States in the Senate. The small States in Canada are bunched together and, for federal purposes, called single States. Germany—of course, everyone knows, may be said to be among the most successful of recent federations—is perhaps the most striking example in history of the immense advantage of federation. Germany—within the recollection of almost everyone here—was a number of isolated petty principalities, and Germany has almost, as if by magic, sprung into the position of a first-class power in Europe since it was federated, and there they have no equal representation in the Senate.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Since it became an Empire.

Mr. TRENWITH:
Since it was federated; and in Germany there is no equal representation of States. They vary from sixteen in Prussia to one representative in four or five of the smaller States. What would be an equitable adjustment of this difficulty—because it is a difficulty, and I am here for my part to bridge over difficulties, to meet them, and, where I can to remove them—it seems to me, would be a compromise between equal representation and proportional representation, something on the lines suggested by Mr. Solomon with reference to the people's House. That is, that some clear and substantial representation in Senate should be given to every State, and that after that a proportional representation should be adopted. However, in order to get the advantages of Federation, I would be willing to go the length of giving equal representation in the Senate if, in conjunction with that condition, there were provided some proper means of securing that ultimately, when a difference should arise between the People's House or the House representing all the people as people and the States House, and after time for deliberation has been given, and the people have had an opportunity of clearly looking at the matter in dispute—the people's will should become law. Now, there are several modes suggested for bridging over difficulties between the two Chambers. I, like my hon. friend Mr. Reid, am not particular whether they are called the Upper or Lower House, or whether they are called the People's House, and another place, or what they are called, but, certainly, the House that represents the people on the basis of population must be fairly and properly described as the people's House, and the House which represents the States equally, without regard to population, cannot possibly be called the People's House, no matter how elected.

An HON. MEMBER:
If elected on the popular basis?

Mr. TRENWITH:
Not even if elected on the popular basis. Let me take an illustration, and I do so without any desire and without any likelihood of giving offence. But take the two extremes at this Convention. We have New South Wales with its 1,200,000 odd inhabitants, and we have Western Australia with its 130,000 odd inhabitants. Both colonies are represented in the Senate, we will assume, by ten representatives. The representatives of Western Australia each of them, or the voters in Western Australia each of them, would have ten times more control over public affairs than a single voter in New South Wales. How can you call such a House the people's House?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH:
It has been artfully and ingeniously endeavored to be shown that if you elect the Senate by the popular vote-adult sufferage, if you will—it is impossible to have a House more representative than that is—that is to say, if you elect it to represent the people of the country in the country—but if you elect it to represent the people of the country in conjunction with another Senate of equal number, representing a greater number of people, it cannot be called the people's House of both those colonies. In the other respect the House of Representatives can truly be called the people's House of both colonies, because it represents every unit in each of the States equally. Now, the question of the franchise is, to my mind, an extremely important one, and I am pleased beyond measure at the tone of the debate on this question so far, because it shows the immense educational work that has been done in that connection within recent years. I see around me gentlemen of transcendent ability, who, only within the last half-a-dozen years, declared that it would be disastrous to allow the Senate to be chosen by any other body than the Parliaments of the various colonies. I see now that there is scarcely one of them who does not approve of the Senate being elected on the broadest possible franchise. My own impression is that it should be elected by the whole colony as one constituency. My reasons for that are twofold. The first is that that would give the highest possible satisfaction to all the electors—a very important consideration in connection with the question with which we are dealing. It would give a much more suitable House to have imposed upon it the duty of criticising the work of the House of Representatives. It is obvious that no novice could find his way into the Federal Senate. The men who would get there would need to have given some years of earnest and honest public service in some other walk of life, and have given a guarantee to the people that they possess the necessary ability and integrity. What we lay down is that a young man would not be able to get there, but that no man would be shut out from there. They could prove their fitness for this, the highest of all positions, by working hard and well in some other walks of public life. It will be urged by some, I have no doubt, that a House so constituted would be the fittest House of the two to deal with all important questions. I respectfully submit, however, in this connection, that legislation always is undertaken on behalf of the people, and in the interests of the people, and in these colonies, at any rate, we have gone upon the assumption that the people are the best judges of their own requirements, and that while it may be well to have the most able men, it is possible that, in their opinion, it would be better for the people themselves, ultimately, to be the arbiters of their own destiny. I know Mr. Dobson will probably call this the march of what he describes as the dangerous advance of democracy; but whether it is dangerous or not, it is a rule in these colonies to a very large extent, and it is daily becoming more so. The question of the franchise for both Houses—whether it should be manhood suffrage, or whether it should be adult suffrage, whether it should be a restricted franchise, as to some extent they have in Queensland and Tasmania, or whether it should be plural voting, as I regret to say we have in Victoria—is a question that it seems to me this Convention must deal with. I know there are those who urge that the local Parliaments or the people of the various States may be permitted to decide that subsequently in the Federal Parliament, in the first instance electing the Federal Parliament by their local methods. I respectfully submit there are reasons why that is unwise. First of all I have no hesitation in saying that no franchise except that in operation in South Australia is in accord with the general political sentiment of the people of Australasia. I submit that, and I will submit reasons why I think so. If that be so, we have to remember that whatever Constitution we devise will have no effect unless it commends itself to the electors of Australasia. Thus, while we are bound to draw up a Constitution that in our opinion is as perfect as we can make it, we are bound also at the same time, and together with that thought, to consider whether that Constitution will receive acceptance at the hands of the people. Now, why am I justified in assuming that the Constitution of South Australia is the Constitution that is most in accord with the wishes of the electors of Australasia? One reason is, and a strong one, that two colonies have already adopted it, and that the people of Australasia in all of the colonies have been clamoring for a broader franchise. I remember my native colony of Tasmania, when I was in it many years ago, was said to be ruled by cliques, at any rate it is true that an immense number of the effective males of the colony had no vote.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOON:

They have it now.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Yes; they have it now, but how did they get it. They got it by continually clamoring for a broader franchise, showing they were not satisfied with the restrictive cliqueism that prevailed, and that they wanted each man to have something to say in each election and to do something to impress his footprints upon the history of their colony. In New South Wales they have only recently

I hold that it is extremely important that we shall have an honored and respected check.

That was his language, and it is mine—a check; not something which can impede for all time, but something honored and respected which can check, something which can say:

What you are doing we believe to be dangerous. Take time. Let the people see what you are doing, and it is possible what may be a popular wave of delusion may blow over.

If after this time has expired and discussion has taken place in the two Houses, and in the press and on the platform, there is still an insurmountable difficulty in the two Houses coming together then there must be some means by which the people's will may become law. If we look at it we will see that the two Houses are the agents of the people; they are the hand, I may put it, with which the people give effect to their economic wishes. When the agents fall out the people have the right to demand what any commercial man would demand if the agents he had sent out to do business had fallen out, that they should sit back for a time and let him settle the dispute. Therefore, I favor what is known as the referendum as a means of settling disputes. My honorable friend Mr. Barton interjected the other day that the referendum was a Teutonic fossil, but I differ from him, as in the Constitution of his colony, in Victoria, and in the United Kingdom we have in a cumbersome and awkward form the principle of the referendum as in every Constitution in the British Constitution with which I am acquainted. When a dispute arises either between the two Houses, or between two sections of the Lower House, as to the policy of the Government, we now resort in a clumsy and unsatisfactory manner to the referendum by dissolving the House and asking the people to speak on the issue. Unfortunately we mix up with it a hundred other issues, with the result that in nine cases out of ten we fail to settle the matter. In the House of Commons hon. members know that, although the term of the British Parliament is nominally seven years, it very rarely indeed reaches that term, because for some reason or other the cumbersome English system of referendum is resorted to, and my hon. friend Mr. Reid to-day, in eloquent language and with dramatic gesture, indicated that the British Constitution as represented by the mother Parliament is a whispering gallery, in which the slightest breath of oppression in any part of that Empire upon which the sun never ceases to shine is heard with such force that it secures attention and redress. We need not be afraid of him introducing a principle which we see by experience rarely, if ever, gives entire satisfaction because of the other disadvantages which are involved in it. We have other questions, such as whether we like the candidate. Which one of us, after hearing Mr. Reid to-day, could vote against him, whether we were protectionists or freetraders; and if we could, how great must be our devotion to the political situation, having in view the great qualifications of the man? But if we differed on one point and agreed with him on several others, and the point on which we were asked to vote against him was the one we would lose his support on the other points. While I would not go to Germany for my boots, I would go to the ends of the earth for a better system, and we are bound to ransack the earth to secure all advantages which experience can give us, because there is no light so useful for the guidance of our footsteps in the future as the light of past experience, and we must not reject any lessons taught by any part of the world, whether English or not, because how few institutions there would be in England if there were only those that were English. I earnestly hope, therefore, that the referendum will be attached to this Constitution Bill. However, if the foreign character of the institution is in the minds of some hon. members so great a bar that they cannot accept it on that account there is another suggestion which it seems to me would possibly meet the difficulty—not the one of both Houses sitting together. I am strongly opposed to that, particularly if it is proposed to give equal representation in the Senate to the States without regard to their population, because if we adopted that in such a Constitution the result would be that the minority in the people's House joined with the majority in the States House would carry a Bill against the people. But they might provide that there may be a reasonable delay in the event of a dispute between the two Chambers. The Bill should lie over and again be brought up in the people's House, and if again passed and again rejected it could again lie over until a general election to the people's House had intervened, and if passed again with the full sanction of the people of all the Federation it should become law without regard to the sanction of the States House. This, it seems to me, would be a perfectly safe and sufficiently slow solution of the difficulty between the two Houses.

Mr. O’CONNOR:

That would be three Sessions?

Mr. TRENWITH:

Yes; with a general election intervening.

Mr. WISE:

It is much better than a referendum, at any rate.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It would remove the difficulty, and my object is to remove that, for I am not anxious—if I had the power—to ride roughshod over the convictions of many hon. members.

An HON. MEMBER:

It would be necessary to have three Sessions, but a general election must intervene.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I should be better pleased to have one rejection and a general election intervening.

Mr. WISE:

It would be an advantage to preserve the responsibility of Parliament.
Mr. TRENWITH:

I do not care much for the responsibility of Parliament. I think I may leave this aspect of the case, and go at once to the character of the executive. The difference between a federation and a confederation, of course, is that one body creates machinery for doing its will and the other body only machinery expressing its will. The Executive is absolutely inseparable from a true Federation, and we have in the federations, it is acknowledged, four distinct forms of Executive. We have the American Executive, which, I think, with all deference to them, hon. members are in the wrong in saying is not a responsible Executive. But I feel I am correct in saying that the American people sought to make it a compromise between the responsible government, of which they had some knowledge, and autocratic government. They made their little king—if I may so express it—only capable of exercising certain autocratic powers for a period but they did not leave him absolutely autocratic, because they associated him with the Senate in the performance of certain administrative acts. They endeavored to make the chief administrator responsible, and did make him responsible, to the Senate, and they considered the Senate responsible to the States. In Switzerland they have a sort of responsibility. They saw, as I see, some of the evils of responsible government. Nobody is more willing to own them than I am, although I think we must adopt them in connection with this Federation. I shall be glad myself to see some modification of the Swiss system of Executive adopted in the State to which I belong, but I am showing that irresponsibility does not exist in the Swiss executive. It is responsible directly to the Parliaments for its administration. It is responsible in a different way to that to which we are accustomed. Individual members of the Executive are responsible for their individual administration. It is not responsible—and that is the marked difference between it and the British responsible government—for the measures that it introduces or the legislative matters that it recommends. But while I hold that a modification of the Swiss system with the executive in Parliament instead of out of it, would in my opinion be a better form of Executive than we have, I feel that we must keep in mind that when we are done with this Constitution it has to go to the people. Whatever anyone has to say about it, the people must ultimately accept the result of our labors before it can have effect, and as they must necessarily be largely unacquainted with the intricacies of this intricate question it will be wise to adopt that form of government with which the people are familiar, and of which they have knowledge. I would favour a clause providing for the Executive, a clause very similar to that of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, for the reason that that clause left it open for the Parliament to adopt practically what form of Executive it chose. It did not say in definite or distinct terms how the Executive should be constituted, and if my views are right upon this point what would probably happen if we adopted a similar clause at any rate for the first? Our recognised form of constitutional government would be adopted. And if as time went on some reform in the matter of the Executive took place in the various States that reform could be without any alteration of the Constitution imported into the Central or Federal Government. It seems to me that would be a wise method of proceeding. There is a point I have not heard touched upon yet that, to my mind, is of as great importance as any I have heard. That is the question of the alteration of the Constitution. All experience teaches that rigid Constitutions, too rigid Constitutions, are extremely unwise and irksome to the people who are governed under them. I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion that if the American people had the opportunity of framing their Constitution now it would be a very different Constitution to that which they framed a century ago. I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that the Americans would be glad of the opportunity of framing their Constitution anew, and that the difficulty of altering the American Constitution has often given rise to heart-burnings and to bad feeling and to great difficulty in government already in America. I believe that it will give rise to still greater difficulty, and possibly, and not improbably, to civil war in order to remove its irksome character. Recent experience of the world shows that both in legislation and in every other incident of our daily life the world travels with immensely greater rapidity than it did in times that are past, and that what might be admirably adapted for our requirements to-day would probably altogether inadequately meet the requirements of the people of these colonies fifty years hence, or perhaps in even a shorter time; and therefore, it seems to me, we must provide in the Constitution ready means of altering the Constitution. We have in this connection examples by which we may be guided or warned, and I think we are justified in using the experience of the past as a guide wherever the machinery upon which we are gazing has shown itself to have worked smoothly, and well, and we ought in the interests of those who have sent us here to be warned by the experience of the past, wherever the machinery we are considering has worked with friction or disadvantage to the peoples associated with it. The American Constitution proves conclusively that we must adopt a very much readier means of altering our Constitution than that provided in the American Constitution. Again, it seems to me we can go with advantage to Switzerland. In the Republic of Switzerland they provide that the people, as represented in both Houses of Parliament, can alter the Constitution by a majority, and of course they have a safeguard, as, if anything is done that the people do not desire to have consummated, they can demand a referendum in connection with it; and they have a further provision, which I think we ought to adopt, that when a sufficient number of the people think it desirable that the Constitution should be amended, they can demand a referendum upon that question. The question must be put to the whole people - and if the reply is in the affirmative, both Houses are dissolved - and this seems to me to be a democratic idea that we might well follow, at any rate in connection with the alteration of the Constitution - both Houses are dissolved, and an election takes place on the single issue of Constitutional reform, and then, after a Bill has been drawn up, it does not become law until it is ratified by the people of the States. While I agree that ultimately, in matters of general legislation, the people, the majority of the people, should be the governing power, in connection with matters of the alteration of the Constitution, it seems to me equitable that the States also should have to acquiesce. Now, my reason is this, that when we federate - if we do - we shall federate under a Constitution that we have seen before us, the powers of which we clearly and properly understand, and we go into it as States, as well as individuals, with our eyes open. If it is proposed to alter that Constitution, then the States as well as the individuals must be permitted again to say whether they will submit to that alteration. That seems to me to be a sufficient protection of States rights. The State, in the first instance, agrees to hand over certain governmental functions. Having handed them over they cannot logically claim to hold them in their hand, but in reference to questions that they have not handed over they have the right to be asked, and ought to be asked, if any subsequent steps are taken, just as they will be asked, before they come into this Federation. Those who urge that State rights may be infringed unless we give the States as States the power to veto legislation for all time, seem to overlook the fact that the Constitution is the guardian of the State rights, but what is handed over with the Constitution is all that can be dealt with by the Parliament selected under the Constitution; and if we have a proper Federal Parliament with a proper Federal Supreme Court the Constitution will be the guardian of the State rights, and the High Court of the Federation will be the guardian of the Constitution. That seems to me to be adequate and complete protection as far as it ought to be given to State rights, as far as any person can reasonably ask. If we give more than that we infringe State rights. If we give representation in the Senate upon equal terms, without regard to population, we shall create the possibility of the rights of the large States being infringed by combination with the smaller States. I admit this is a highly improbable contingency, and I do not wish to press any argument an inch further than it can be legitimately pressed, but it is the answer to that very improbable contingency that the large States may combine to oppress the smaller ones. Either of these are unlikely to happen in Australia. I have warrant for this assumption in the surroundings of our local government. We have local States Parliaments representing large and small constituencies, representing wealthy and poor constituencies, but do we ever hear of the large and wealthy constituencies improperly combining to injure the smaller constituencies? So far as my experience goes it is almost all the other way about. The large, populous, and wealthy constituencies are continually taxing themselves to assist the poorer and smaller constituencies. We have a remarkable instance of it to-day in Victoria. We have a very small population upon the Murray called Mildura, immensely removed by distance from most of the rest of the colony, at present extremely poor, in the greatest financial straits, and extremely small numerically. We have the whole of the rest of the colony combining to tax itself to lift these few poor people out of the difficulty into which they have got. Then, in the distribution of our municipal subsidies, we have always gone upon the plan of taxing the whole people to procure revenue, out of which we have subsidised our municipalities, not in the proportion of size or numerical strength, but in proportion to their necessities.

Do you desire an amendment of the Constitution?

Mr. DEAKIN:
And poverty!

Mr. TRENWITH:
If there were advantages, the less they have of combination to help themselves, the more we have given them as municipal subsidies out of the general revenue. In that we are not alone. I think it is characteristic of all our local affairs. In connection with our postal system we charge uniform rates of postage, but in the remote districts, some of our letters cost 3s. or 4s. or 5s. to deliver; but we never grumble. Wherever we can, and continually, we are extending the postal conveniences in the interests of these poor, numerically weak outlying districts. Now, have we any right to assume that, if we create a strong Central Government charged with the duty of legislating on Federal questions within the area prescribed for all the colonies, the people will be less generously treated than they have been in connection with local government within their own State. But if we do assume it, bad as it is that minorities should be subjugated by majorities for base or selfish ends, it is not so bad as that majorities should be subjugated by minorities for base or selfish ends. This possibility is involved in the proposal which has been submitted. I think at this hour, and in view of the fact I have previously urged that my views in the main on all questions perhaps but this question of State representation have been presented to-day twice at any rate in the most eloquent manner it is possible to conceive, I may be excused for bringing my remarks to a close. But I would say in conclusion: we do owe to each other the duty of earnestly determining to go as far as we possibly can in the direction of meeting the aspirations that we know to be in the minds of the people without regard so much to what our own opinions are, in order that this question of Federation may be consummated, trusting to the people of the future to deal as intelligently with their affairs as we in the past have dealt with ours. We have to remember that a great— an awful—trust has been reposed in us. We have in our bands the destinies of a nation, the possibilities of which no man can properly conceive—a young nation without a history, a nation without a flag that has braved a thousand years the battle and the breeze, but a nation that is making a history in a very extraordinary manner; and this baby nation has been placed in our arms. We are entrusted, if I may so express it, with the nursing and development of it, and if we do our duty we shall create here amid these southern seas a national man who shall stand amid the waves—a national giant so deporting himself as to give to the people comfort and happiness in excess of that possessed in any other part of the world—so deporting himself as to create the admiration and excite the envy of the civilised world

The PRESIDENT: The hon. member for South Australia, Dr. Cockburn.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL: Before Dr. Cockburn speaks I would like to ask Mr. Trenwith a question with the leave of the House. He said just now that the Victorian Legislative Council had thrown out the Plural Voting Bill three times.

Mr. TRENWITH: I would like to answer that question. I have so recently concluded my speech that it is hardly a break. My impression is that Mr. Duncan Gillies—

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL: In 1891.

Mr. TRENWITH: Mr. Duncan Gillies introduced a Bill to abolish plural voting, and it was either rejected by the Upper House in Victoria or not dealt with.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL: No. Certain amendments were made in it, and the Government allowed the Bill to lapse in the Legislative Council.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I would respectfully submit that that is synonymous with not dealing with it. At any rate they twice rejected it.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
The hon. member is again wrong.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I feel it to be an honor to which I shall look back with pleasure for the rest of my life to have had an opportunity of hearing the debates to which we have listened during the past week. I had the pleasure and honor of being a member of both of the Conferences that have been held with regard to Federation, and I say without hesitation, bearing in mind the speeches that were then delivered, that neither of those Conventions witnessed the high-water mark reached by this Convention, whether as regards the eloquence, the practical nature of the speeches, or their grasp of the subject. I do not think that time has been wasted by the discussion which has taken place, for public opinion has been forming, condensing, and taking shape within this Chamber during the past week. The only astonishing part of the proceedings is that those who have been most luminous in debate were those who wished to hide their light under a bushel by remaining silent, and I am pleased to know that we did not go straight into Committee, as was at the first suggested.

Mr. REID:
That was not my proposal.

Dr. COCKBURN:
It was the proposal of some, and I am glad it was not acted upon, and that this preliminary debate has taken place. I think that when we go into Committee tomorrow we shall be in a position to get on with the work much more speedily than we could have anticipated a week ago. I will not occupy the time of the Convention any longer with preliminary remarks, but I will go at once into the heart of the subject where all the clash of swords has taken place. It affords me much surprise and some degree of pain to find that on the question of what powers should be ceded to the respective Houses in the Federal Parliament I find myself at variance with hon. members with whom on almost every other political opinion I am in accord. It seems to me that Governments, whether they be unified or federated, are nothing but utilitarian devices framed for the purpose of securing and maintaining the happiness and prosperity of the people. I think our prosperity in the past has been due to one striking feature of our modes of government. We have prospered so far as individual colonies, and the prosperity of the component parts of Australia has been hitherto so great because, up to the present, we have enjoyed the inestimable advantages of managing our own affairs; we have the blessings of autonomy, and I am glad to see that Mr. Barton, in his resolutions, has emphasised this matter, and that our Federal scheme is to enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australia, and that it is not to destroy but to preserve our autonomy and to secure the rights of self-government which we at present enjoy by safeguarding us against all possible aggression. The point is this: how are we best to secure the powers of self-government in a Federation. How are we to guard against these powers being unduly encroached upon by the federal or central authority. Because just in so far as we give up powers out of our own hands to a federal authority just so far we abandon our autonomy and our control over those powers. What we want to guard against is giving up more than is necessary in the first instance, and against any subsequent encroachment by the federal authority upon our State governments; and it is for this purpose only that I am among those who advocate that one House in the Federal Parliament should be specially charged with the duty of safeguarding State rights; which are simply the means to secure State interests, those State interests being nothing more than the rights of self-government which we at present enjoy.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Federate the law.

Dr. COCKBURN:

There is administration as well as law. Above all there is a vortex that continually tends to draw everything to the centre, and to increase the centralizing powers; and what I wish to see is a buttress erected to prevent the drawing to the centre of more than we actually intend. We want to protect local government against centralisation. Here there is real danger. I do not care how carefully we limit the enumeration of the powers we give to the federal authority, in the exercise of those powers there is a danger of encroachment, unless we take care from the outset to guard against it. Mr. Reid has said it is impossible to foresee the State interests of the future. What, then, is the wisest thing we can do? As we cannot foresee the conditions of the future, the State interests of the future, the wisest thing we can do is to erect in the Constitution a sufficient guardian for those interests so as to protect them in the unforeseen conditions of the future. There is danger in Federation of encroachment upon State governments. In this matter we cannot be guided by our own experience, for the simple reason that we have had no experience whatever in the working of federal government; therefore we have to look abroad to see what has occurred in other places, and we must to a certain extent allow ourselves to be guided by authorities who have seen and closely watched the working of Federation in other parts of the world. May I be allowed therefore to quote a few sentences from an authority on federal government, and the working of the powers under federal government, from a book written by Mr. Watson, of Canada, who at the time-I do not know whether he is now-was the librarian of the Ontario Parliament.

Mr. DEAKIN:
A local Parliament.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Yes, that is true; and therefore a man no doubt who understands the principles of local government. As we have no experience ourselves we must be guided by authorities in these matters. This writer says:

It is the solemn duty of each of the British North American provinces keenly to watch and promptly repel any attempt, faint or forcible, which the federal government or a federal court might be disposed to make on the rights and privileges of the members of the confederation. The history of the federal idea on this continent is fraught with important warnings. Its great aim in the United States has been since the infancy of the Constitution to become strong at the expense of the separate sovereignties which were the original sources of federal existence. The words federal authority and centralization have become on the southern side of the frontier almost equivalent expressions. But States rights and provincial rights are the strongest bulwarks against despotism. In a Federation diversity is freedom, uniformity is bondage.

The fear consequently of possible federal encroachment is not a fanciful one; it is a real one.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Hear, hear.

Dr. COCKBURN:
This author is a writer, not only of Canadian experience, but of the whole continent, as he is a neighbor of the great Federation of the United States.

Mr. HIGGINS:
When was that written?

Dr. COCKBURN:
I am not able to say.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If it were shortly after the Canadian Act was passed it would not apply, as that Act was far too sweeping in giving federal powers.
Dr. COCKBURN:
I cannot say when it was written.

Mr. BARTON:
Do those words not express the fears of a man who lives under a system in which there is no substantial power in the Senate?

Dr. COCKBURN:
He had the experience of the United States before him, which has two co-ordinate Houses.

Mr. BARTON:
Singularly enough there is only one Parliament in Ontario.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I do not see that that has anything to do with the question.

Mr. BARTON:
It has a great deal.

Dr. COCKBURN:
What he deals with is the possibility of the powers of the States being swallowed up in the powers of the central vortex. Power tends to beget power, and we have to be careful in giving power to know exactly what we are giving, and to see that those powers do not imply more than we mean. As we cannot foresee what the States interests are likely to be in the years to come, we want a permanent guardian of these States rights, in order that we may preserve the richest prize we have inherited from our forefathers-local self-government. We must have a strong House to guard against any possible federal encroachment on the rights of the States, because local government, self-government, and government by the people are analogous terms.

Mr. ISAACS:
You cannot have local government where the powers are confided to the Federal Government.

Dr. COCKBURN:
States rights, home rule, and government by the people I look upon as synonymous. Centralisation is opposed to all three, and there can be no government by the people if the Government is far distant from the people.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
You are against Federation altogether.

Dr. COCKBURN:
This preservation of local government is the very spirit of Federation as against unification-

Mr. FRASER:
You are against unification.
Dr. COCKBURN:

Yes; and what surprises me is this: that in so many speeches we have heard hon. members who hold similar views to those I hold in general politics, speak in favor of unification and not Federation. I do not think we were ever sent here to consider unification; we were sent here to frame a Federation, and we want a Federation that will preserve the rights of our local governments from start to finish. I learned with a great degree of surprise and no small degree of pain that I am at variance with others with whom I would like to be fighting shoulder to shoulder on the question of government by the people. The question of which are small States and which are large States should not be considered; small and large, rich and poor, in reference to the present condition of these States, are adjectives which should not be used. Our finances are those of the nursery compared with what the future will be, and our largest populations are only, as it were, a handful of people settled on our littoral. I say this question of State rights is a great principle, and I cannot think we are driven apart only by any pettifogging differences in regard to our local politics; but it is only in the nature of things that the representatives of the large colonies should not share the fear of the smaller colonies, because they are to have an overwhelming preponderance of representation in the House of Representatives. We must dispose of the terms "large" and "small," and think of the great principle which is an essential, I think, to Federation—that the two Houses should represent the people truly, and should have co-ordinate powers. They should represent the people in two groups. One should represent the people grouped as a whole, and the other should represent them as grouped in the States. Of course majorities must rule, for there would be no possible good government without majorities ruling, but I do not think the majority in South Australia should be governed by the majority in Victoria, or in New South Wales. In every case the majority should rule, but that does not mean that the majority of one colony is to coerce the majority of another. If we wish to defend and perpetuate the doctrine of the rule of majorities, we must guard against the possibility of this occurring.

Mr. ISAACS:

By your own view three colonies could coerce two.

Dr. COCKBURN:

Now, sir, we find that even in America, where there is a powerful Senate, the States may be gradually encroached upon and be reduced to comparative insignificance. The local Parliaments have been so reduced in importance that the majority of them do not meet more frequently than once in two years.
Mr. DEAKIN:
Their constituents would not allow them. They put it in their Constitution.

Dr. COCKBURN:
It means that they have been degraded. They are now looked down upon as shorn of their prestige.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Owing to federal politics being brought into State politics.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I admit there is something in that. American politics have been generally debased because local Parliaments have been mixed up with federal elections. I must thank the honorable member for reminding me of that. But that is not the whole question. There have been encroachments from time to time by federal authority on local Parliaments. The fact that these encroachments may occur even in America, where the Senate, guarding the State rights, is created with such powers, should be a warning to us to avoid any such possibility, because if anything occurred to sap the prestige and unduly diminish the importance of our local Parliaments we should be irretrievable losers in the future; for I take it that it is to our local Parliaments that we must look if we wish to perpetuate the rule by the majority and by the people. We want to provide against anything threatening the existence of the local Parliaments. Some of the speeches delivered by hon. gentlemen from the other colonies have struck me as being much more towards unification, and towards the abolition of local Parliaments than I cared to have heard. A good many have spoken as though they looked for a United Australia to be consummated by the destruction of the local Parliaments, or at any rate by reducing them so as to be of very little significance. Some of the arguments which were urged against State rights, against co-ordinate Houses, against the power of the Senate being co-equal to that of the House of Representatives, struck me very forcibly as being arguments based altogether on a false principle. The Hon. Mr. Reid made use of a sentence to this effect:

Those from whom the taxation was raised should govern the expenditure.

And the Hon. Mr. Carruthers said:

The proposal seems to me to be indisputable that those who pay the taxes and find the money should have the right to mould the finances of the country.

It seems to me that these two statements are founded upon a fallacy, and amount to nothing less than a heresy in regard to the rights of the people to take part in the government of the country. If you are going to lay down as a general proposition that those who pay taxation should have the right to dictate the expenditure, you are practically abolishing the principle of one man one vote, and you are substituting for it the general proposition that there shall be plurality of votes in proportion to the taxation paid by the individual.

Mr. HIGGINS:
With one vote one man it would be more men more votes.

Dr. COCKBURN:
There are two elements in a Federation - the federal authority and that of the States and the interests of both must be considered.

Mr. REID:
Supposing the State does not contribute a single sixpence.

Dr. COCKBURN:
The people in the States contribute their taxation.

Mr. REID:
Their powers are recognised.

Dr. COCKBURN:
And their local Government should be recognised also. To say that the people who contribute taxation should be those who have the chief voice in the expenditure of money strikes at the very root of that for which we have been contending for many years, and practically amounts to this, that we should abolish the citizens' roll altogether, and substitute for it the ratepayers' roll.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The State has no right apart from the people, but they have rights apart from the State.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I quite agree with that. The State is still the people grouped definitely in that State, although also grouped in the whole of Australia. In the one case the people are grouped as the people of the State; in the other case the people are grouped as the people of the whole of Australia; in each case their privileges are to be respected, seeing that Federation is nothing more nor less than an ingenious device to maintain in equilibrium these two units—the unit of the people of the State and the unit of the whole people. It seems to me that arguments which strike at the very root of our ideas of representation cannot carry much weight.

Mr. BARTON:
Mr. Reid's objection is that the States House had no right to interfere with matters of taxation, for this reason, that as the revenue of the Federation was found by the taxpayer, who pay the federal taxes, they do not pay them over again for special purposes in such a way that the Senate can represent that taxation in the Federal Parliament.

Dr. COCKBURN:

It seems to me that once we consider the question of the origin whence the Government derives the revenue as determining its expenditure we enter on an argument which will land us in a very different position to that we anticipated. In advocating States rights, which are nothing more nor less than a means of safeguarding State interests, we are simply advocating what those who believe in the rule of the people have at all times advocated and stood for. In the whole history of the Continent of America State rights have been associated with democracy, and the opponents of State rights were usually monarchists in disguise.

Mr. DEAKIN:

The States right people wanted slavery in disguise.

Dr. COCKBURN:

Of course they made a fatal mistake in that. It was unfortunate that the advocates of the liberty of the State should claim as a consequence of that liberty the right to enslave their fellow-creatures. Still after a century of national life, and in spite of that error, the States rights party is the predominant party in America; and so I think it should always be in Federation, seeing that federation is not a unification, but simply a provision to ensure local government and to protect autonomy. I would like to say, as the hon. member Mr. Trenwith says, that in Switzerland, there is a slight exception with regard to the representation of the States in the Senate; still only three of the cantons are divided into half-cantons, with one representative, as opposed to twenty-two, which have equal representation, and it is no more the exception there than in America, where, in addition to the various States, there are territories which have not the same amount of representation. I say that in looking to models for guidance—and this is a matter in which we must look to others for guidance, seeing that nowhere in our experience, and nowhere under the British Crown, has the principle of Federation been established—we ought to take the best patterns for imitation, and I take it that the best patterns are the United States and Switzerland. In these co-ordinate Houses and equal representation have been established from the first.

Mr. HIGGINS:

How about Canada and Germany? They have not equal representation.

Dr. COCKBURN:

The hon. member knows Canada is not a true Federation, neither is Germany.
Mr. HIGGINS:
I dispute that.

Mr. WALKER:
Where is there true Federation? The United States approached most nearly.

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is because they have equal representation.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Because the very element of Federation is recognised there, because the bulwark is recognised to be the protection by the Senate of State rights and State interests; and if you do not protect these State rights and State interests you interfere with the spirit and genius of Federation.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Why is Canada not a Federation? Is it because it has not equal representation?

Dr. COCKBURN:
Yes; equal representation is the essence of Federation,

Mr. HIGGINS:
Then you are arguing in a circle. You say no Federation is without equal representation in the Senate; and when I mention Canada, you say Canada is not a Federation because it has not equal representation.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I say that the very resolutions we are considering are framed to enlarge the powers of self-government, but centralisation is opposed to the idea of self-government. A centralised, a distant Government sooner or later is bound to degenerate into a tyranny. It is out of reach of the people; it is out of their sight, out of their hearing, and, consequently, becomes blind and deaf to their requirements.

Mr. ISAACS:
You give the Federal Government power, but you will not let them exercise it.

Dr. COCKBURN:
We should see that the powers we give them in the first instance are exercised in such a manner as we intended; and for that purpose I say we require to erect a barrier against that centralisation, which is the inevitable tendency on the part of large powers. As I have already said, power begets power, and the tendency always is for powers to become greater. Another hon. member, Mr. Deakin, said he did not see how, touching the question of States rights, the question of the Appropriation Bill could affect States rights; now, it seems to me, it is very easy to get an instance of such a case.
In the draft Bill of 1891 it is proposed to hand over ocean beacons and buoys and ocean lighthouses and lightships to the federal authority. It is quite easy to imagine that there might be an Appropriation Bill which would give undue advantage to one port at the expense of another in the way of lighting. Another power proposed to be given over is river navigation for the common purposes of two or more States, and under that power you might have an Appropriation Bill in which the interests and rights of a State might be most seriously infringed by an expenditure of money on some rival port, or on some rival mode of communication.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That might tell either for or against your argument.

Dr. COCKBURN:
It might be the case. The interests of the States might be jeopardised, if not adequately represented. I am taking a case that might occur, and I see there is danger in the appropriation of money that State rights and interests might be infringed. Even in regard to taxation Mr. Deakin said he did not see how taxation could threaten State rights. I simply mention the question of excise as one which might have a most disastrous effect upon the industry of any one colony; or again a protective tariff might be so framed as to infringe the interests of some particular State.

Mr. ISAACS:
How can you prevent it, by your system?

Dr. COCKBURN:
I only say I would do my utmost to prevent it. I do not say it would be prevented. I would do my utmost to prevent it by placing the guardianship of State interests in a body which would be able to protect them, and not in a body merely established for the sake of appearances; because we want a real not a sham States Council. We do not want a House that has the appearance of having equal representation, but we do want a House that will not suffer in comparison with the House of Representatives.

Mr. REID:
Upon the financial basis South Australia seems to lay down do we want the Federation at all?

Mr. GLYNN:
Not South Australia.

Mr. HOWE:
Hear, hear.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Yes, we want a Federation; but not a Federation to absorb our local powers of self-government and our local Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS:
No one wants it.

Dr. COCKBURN:

No; but I am afraid that our wishes may not be carried out. Our rights are in danger if we do not safeguard them for the future

-and there is no doubt that we are not so likely to have the privileges we most highly prize taken away from us if we have a guardian of those privileges especially erected to protect them. Of course, we should be careful not to concede to the central authority any powers which we can efficiently exercise upon our own account. The major premise, the very essence of Federation as opposed to unification, is the protection and the maintenance of local Government. It seems to me that the argument that the machinery should be framed first, and then powers given so as to find the machinery something to do, is bad. I have heard it said by some if we do not give over such and such powers the machinery of the Federal Government will not be fully employed. That seems to be the wrong way of going to work. We should first draw up a Est of our requirements, and then frame the machinery to carry out our intentions. But we seem chiefly to have been considering the machinery, and then trying to find something for the machinery to do; and I must say, upon this point, that I was one of those who were not in favour of taking the Commonwealth Bill altogether as a base of operations. If we are going to successfully build for all time we must go to work from a business point of view, and decide first what we want, and then the way to give effect to our wishes. I will not occupy the time of the Convention any longer with this very much vexed question of State rights. I can only say that I hope now, and at any future time, in considering this question we shall divest ourselves of selfish interests and consider it on a broad principle—a principle in which large and small States are equally interested, if we want to construct a real Federation. To show how temporary and evanescent may be the relative positions of States, one has only to call to mind that when the Constitution of America was being framed New York was one of the small States. Let us remember that just in so far as we are animated by a principle, we are entitled to fight for it, but in so far as we are only trying to make better terms for our own particular colony we are mere pettifoggers. The views I have expressed are from an honest conviction, that the best interests of all lie in guarding the sovereignty of the States which are a party to the Federation; and that it is to preserve, not to destroy, them that the Federation should come into existence. I take it that Australian prosperity is going to be the sum of the welfare of the component parts of Australia. I can not help feeling that Australian patriotism should be founded on the patriotism we we at present... feel towards the States which we serve. I have no sympathy with those who ask us to come here prepared to forget our allegiance to, and in fact the very existence of, the States to whose service we are in honor bound.

An HON. MEMBER:
Who has asked it?
Dr. COCKBURN:
It has been asked over and over again.
Mr. GLYNN:
You might kill yourself with over caution.
Dr. COCKBURN:
When going into unknown territory it is well to be extra cautious.
Mr. HOWE:
What about Switzerland? You are always quoting it.
Dr. COCKBURN:
I am willing to take a lesson from any part of the world, wherever it comes from; and even supposing we got one of those glaciers from the mountains of Switzerland, which were mentioned by Mr. Deakin, and transported it to our arid plains, we would hail it with delight.
Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.
Mr. DEAKIN:
It would help to fill that reservoir of yours.
Dr. COCKBURN:
It is a pity we have to go outside our own experience in this matter. We cannot take a model either from the mother-country or from any of the communities under the British Crown in this respect, for the simple reason that none of them are Federations. Much as we desire to take our model from the Government of Great Britain we cannot do it.
Mr. HOWE:
Take it from Switzerland.
Dr. COCKBURN:
Much as I desire to follow Mr. Reid in his desire to make a model Parliament after the pattern of England, I do not think it can be done, for you cannot make a Federation out of a unification. However much we may admire the Government of England as a pattern, it is altogether foreign to the genius of Federation. It is carried on under a Parliamentary sovereignty, which is absolutely opposed to the whole spirit of Federation. In the very essence of the compact it is impossible.
Mr. REID:
I cannot understand why you were so anxious to get us over here then. We did not come for a picnic, but to do something.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Some are trying to get a Constitution which is in no sense a Federation.

Mr. REID:
The temperature has gone down a good deal, surely.

Mr. BARTON:
You want to make a mill and give us nothing to grind in it.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Mr. Reid is here to frame a Constitution Bill, and he wants to do it after the model of England. You might as well try to make a pear after the model of a peach.

Mr. DEAKIN:
You would make a fine pear.

Dr. COCKBURN:
We should depart no more than is absolutely necessary from our old traditions, though the departure must in many respects be a radical one. I think there has been a good deal of confusion with regard to responsible government under Federation. Now, I think we should draw a distinction between party government and responsible government. The hon. member, Mr. Dobson, declaimed against the evils of party government as inseparably connected with responsible government; but I would ask hon. members to turn to America, where there is no responsible government, and yet party government has there developed in greater evils than are known in England, where responsible government exists. We should not have party government, but at the same time we ought not to do away with responsible government; although, on the other hand, we should have to do away with the Cabinet system, which makes Ministers responsible to the Cabinet instead of to their real masters-Parliament. I do not think it is necessary to abolish responsible government under Federation, but I do not think that the Cabinet system is possible. There is no difficulty whatever with Houses of co-ordinate powers in having Ministers responsible to both Houses. I suggest that we should take a leaf out of the book of Switzerland in this respect.

Mr. GLYNN:
Supposing the Houses differed, would not the Ministry be supreme.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I do not think that follows. I think there is no difficulty in framing an Executive responsible to both Houses. The scheme I advocate is that the two Houses elect an Executive from their members, one from each State, so as to have each State fully represented in the Executive Council.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Would you have a joint sitting?

Dr. COCKBURN:
I would not object to a joint sitting for that purpose. I would not give these Ministers any permanent tenure. I would not, as in Switzerland, have them elected for three years, so that they could hold office subject to no control. I would make it possible for one or more of the Ministers to be removed at any time by an adverse vote. The Ministers, as a rule, would be elected every session, but any of them would be liable to removal in order to keep the Ministry in touch with the Parliament, and to increase their responsibility to the Parliament and the people. This will not in any way abolish responsible government. It will make Ministers more responsible than ever.

Mr. GLYNN:
There would be a State row when a Minister was removed.

Dr. COCKBURN:
It would not be a party row. I would just like to say one word in reference to the remarks of Mr. Dobson—and I think he was posing as a humorist in much of what he said.

Mr. DEAKIN:
He has been one of your stanchest supporters.

Dr. COCKBURN:
I regret that Mr. Deakin has not seen aright on this subject of State rights, although he has been searching for the truth for six years, since last we met in Convention. When Mr. Dobson was making his charge of extravagance against democracy he cited as an example this chamber in which we are meeting. This chamber was not erected by a democracy. It was erected when South Australia was practically under an oligarchic rule. A democracy would not have built it. A democracy, instead of being extravagant, scans very closely every item of expenditure, and is far less likely to incur debts than any other form of government I am aware of. I am surprised that such views with regard to a democracy should obtain. I believe it to be the best form of government possible, and not only the best because it is the safest, but the best because it is the highest and purest. I should like to read on this subject three or four lines from an authority who is recognised as an expert in the matter of Federation which we are considering; they are from a lecture by Professor Freeman before no less an august assemblage than the University of Cambridge. After describing a democracy he says:
Such is pure democracy, the government of the whole people, and not of a part of it only, as carried out in its full perfection in a single city. It is a form of government which works up the faculties of man to a higher pitch than any other; it is the form of government which gives the freest scope to the inborn genius of the whole community, and of every member of it.

That is an ideal form of government, not a form lightly to be spoken of or easily to be destroyed. It is the highest form of Government of which human nature is capable. Now, with regard to one or two matters in the resolutions, I understand you, Mr. President, to rule that these resolutions when carried will not be binding upon the Committee in regard their strict letter. If it were not so, I would feel it incumbent to move some amendment, but under these circumstances, we can be content, if we are not to be bound by the letter, to allow them to go without amendment. I would mention one matter which has not received attention, and it is with regard to the sole power to give bounties being vested in the Federal Parliament. I look at the adjoining colony of Victoria, and I ask what is the industry from which that colony at the present moment derives the most advantage, and which, during the last decade, has developed more than any other? There is no doubt that it is the dairy industry, and its development is solely due to the wisdom of the Victorian legislature in giving a bonus on butter sent out to the markets of the world.

Mr. WISE:
We started the export dairy industry long before Victoria.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Then I am sorry that New South Wales has not been able to make better speed in their good work. The dominating position of Victoria in this connection is solely due to the wisdom of granting that bounty. I do not think it would be wise for the federal compact to prevent the possibility of any of the States adopting a measure of this sort for the development of its resources. We shall have to consider the question when we come into Committee, and see whether some power to do this cannot be left in the hands of the States. If we confine the power to give such bounties to the Federal Parliament, we shall find that it will not be exercised. These measures are all more or less experimental, and it is only the individual States that will undertake them. If you wait for public opinion of the whole of Australia to be educated up to the initiative on such questions you will wait for ever. The Federal Parliament will be exceedingly cautious, and will require before embarking on any course, to be shown that it has been successfully pursued elsewhere.

Mr. GLYNN:
How can you prevent a non-bounty State taking advantage of a bounty State?

Dr. COCKBURN:
That is a matter which can be dealt with in Committee.

Mr. GLYNN:
It is an important objection.

Mr. HOWE:
There can be no intercolonial freetrade if you have anything like that.

Dr. COCKBURN:
It would not apply to Australasia, but to the markets beyond our shores. The question of the railways has been so ably dealt with that I shall say nothing more than that I do not see how they can possibly be handed over to the Federal Parliament. I would deprecate the railways being run on a strictly commercial basis, because it is necessary to develop the country, even if there is a small loss to the railways. And then with regard to finance, the question of the federal contribution, which has been so ably argued by some of my colleagues, I will not say more than that I agree with them. I think a levy affords the only firm footing for the federal revenue; and those who are lost in the weary waste of waters will sooner or later come to dry land and find a firm footing in that mode of meeting the difficulty which, although not free from objections, offers the least. Now, sir, several names have been mentioned with regret as having been present at the 1891 Convention and absent from these deliberations. One name has not yet been mentioned, and it belongs to one of the greatest sons of Greater Britain—that of Sir George Grey—who, when the history of all comes to be written, will stand as one of the greatest men of Australasia; and sir, although his name has not been mentioned, still allusions have been made to an amendment that he moved in the Convention of 1891, with a view that the Governor-General—

Mr. HOWE:
Should be elected.

Dr. COCKBURN:
No. Sir George Grey held that view, but the amendment he moved was that the mode of the appointment should be left to the future. He proposed that the words "appointed by the Queen" be struck out, and the words "There shall be" a Governor-General inserted. I had the honor to vote with him, and I did so, not with the view that the Governor-General should necessarily be elected by the people, but that the question should be left over to the development of the future. I think the machinery of electing the Governor-General direct by the people would be too huge when brought into comparison with the work to be done by the occupant of the office; but I think some means should be contrived of taking Australasian opinion on the question as to who is to occupy this important position. Important it is, although not so important as anyone occupying a presidential position in a Federation, and I think steps should be taken to leave the mode of appointment open. I am sorry Sir George Grey is not here to argue this point with the eloquence with which he used so intensely to interest and convince us.

Mr. Howe (quoting from "Hansard"):

He said in moving the amendment that the Governor-General should be elected.

Dr. Cockburn:

He did not intend that to be in the Constitution. His words did not indicate any such desire. He wished to strike out the words Appointed by the Queen.

Mr. Trenwith:

And leave it open.

Dr. Cockburn:

Why should it not be left open? Much has been said about severing the connection with the mother-country.

Mr. Barton:

If you leave out these words Appointed by the Queen who is to appoint him?

Dr. Cockburn:

He might, I admit, be appointed by the Crown in the same sense as Ministries are appointed by the Governor, it would be well that the appointment should not take place till after the wishes of Australasia had been consulted. Far from this severing the tie with England, it seems to me that the only possibility of friction lies in this question of the appointment of a Governor-General. The appointment of an unsuitable Governor-General without consultation with the Federal Parliament, would be just the very thing to cause ill-feeling where no ill-feeling should be engendered. To talk of this being the only tie binding us to the mother-country when we are bound by a legislative union, and when the Imperial Parliament has the power to pass any Act it chooses which will be binding upon Australia, is to use words without meaning. If we turn to America again we find that while the American colonies were an integral part of the British Empire two at least of those States elected their own Governors, and there were others, where, if they did not practically elect their own Governors, the Governors were not appointed by the Crown. I see no chance whatever of any such amendment being carried, and therefore it would be idle to bring it forward. I only mention it as due to the memory of one who is not here to defend himself, for there is no more loyal son of Great Britain than Sir George Grey, and he certainly would have been the last to make any proposal which would have the effect of severing the tie binding us to the mother-country, to that country which he loves so well and for which he fought so long, and it is a mistake to think that the proposal he made would have the effect which it is stated it would have.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Did anyone attack him?

Dr. COCKBURN:
No; but the matter was ref

Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes.

Dr. COCKBURN:
And, therefore, I look to those in the neighboring colony whose sympathies are in this direction to assist us in extending the franchise to the women of federated Australia. In New South Wales also a resolution was carried embodying the principle, and to that colony also I think we have a right to look for assistance. With regard to the referendum that again is embodied in the very conditions under which we meet. Some hon. members of this Convention have said that the referendum is too intricate a machine for the people to understand. But I would point out that we are met under the condition that our work of framing this Constitution—this most intricate Bill—will be referred to the referendum of the people of Australia, for their confirmation. Therefore, I think, that the question of the widest possible franchise and the question of the referendum are questions which are really admitted by our being assembled in conclave under the respective Acts which called us together. I will not detain the Convention longer. No time has been lost in the debate which has taken place. We are about to erect an edifice which is to endure for all time. We must avoid undue haste. We must give the building time to settle. Each course must be laid duly and in order, and time must be given for the consolidation of the edifice as it is erected. Above all this we must avoid anything of the lath and plaster order of constitution, and we must not allow any considerations with regard to personal convenience to interfere with our devotion to this, the greatest work on which any people could be engaged. In America the Convention sat five months with closed doors framing their Constitution, and if we succeed in our work in three or four weeks we ought to think that we have accomplished a wonder. We are performing a work which only once falls to the lot of a people to accomplish. We are framing a Constitution which will encompass, pervade, and influence every community, every Government, every institution, and every family in this our homeland of Australia, and it behoves us not only on account of the magnitude of the work in which we are engaged, but also because we wish our memories to be held in esteem by those who will come after us, to bend ourselves with all devotion to our task. We shall not escape censure if we do not lay down the foundations broad and strong, and rear the edifice in such a manner that it will protect not only the national life as a whole, but also all its component elements. If we unduly sacrifice any of those powers and privileges we at present enjoy, without getting adequate recompense in return, then posterity will not hold us blameless. But I have no fear whatever of the result of this Convention. We are met here together in the best possible spirit, every speech has been framed in the most conciliatory spirit possible, but at the same time, while we conciliate in matters of detail, we must also stand fast to our principles, and we must remember that the object of federation is twofold. It is to develop a nation and to maintain its component parts, and it is a nice compromise and balance between these two, neither to overlook the rights of the States nor the claims of this nation. A mistake on either hand will result in the defeat of the object we have in view. If, bearing in mind these objects, we patiently address ourselves to our task, then I think not only will our work endure, and our names be handed down with respect to the third and the fourth generations, but millions yet unborn will be taught to revere for all time the names of those who, in this year 1897, were assembled in this National Convention.

Mr. HOWE:
I move:
That the debate be now adjourned.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.
The Convention adjourned at 10.31 p.m.
Wednesday March 31, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

Dr. QUICK:
I have the honor to present a petition, signed by the President and Secretary of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Victoria and Tasmania, representing the members and adherents of the Wesleyan Methodist Church to the number of 130,000. The prayer of the petition is that the preamble of the Constitution of the Australasian Commonwealth shall contain a provision recognising God as the Supreme Ruler of the world; that there be embodied in the Bill a provision that the daily Session of the Upper and Lower House of the Federal Parliament be opened with prayer; and that the Governor-General be empowered to appoint days of national thanksgiving and humiliation. The petition is respectfully worded and concludes with a prayer. I move that it be received.

Mr. HOLDER:
I have seven petitions, one from the Wesleyan Church, signed by 1,115 persons; one from the Baptist Church, signed by 907 persons; one from the Congregational Church, signed by 508 persons; one from the Bible Christian Church, signed by 528 persons; one from the Presbyterian Church, signed by 266 persons; one from the Primitive Methodist Church, signed by 185 persons; and one from the Salvation Army, signed by 623 persons—in all 4,130 signatures. They are respectfully worded and contain the same prayer as the petition presented by Dr. Quick. I simply move that they be received.

Mr. WISE:
I have a petition from 390 residents of Sydney. It is respectfully worded, and concludes with a prayer:
That in the preamble of the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth it be recognised that God is the Supreme Ruler of the world and the ultimate source of all law and authority in nations. That there also be embodied in the said Constitution, or in the Standing Orders of the Federal Parliament, a provision that each daily Session of the Upper and Lower Houses of the Federal Parliament be opened with prayer.
by the President and the Speaker, or by a chaplain; that the Governor-General be empowered to appoint days of national thanksgiving and humiliation.

I move that it be received.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

I have a similar petition from nine members of the Presbyterian Church of Tasmania. It contains a similar prayer. I move that it be received.

Petitions received.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I have a petition from the Independent Order of Rechabites, praying that some provision may be placed in the Constitution enabling any one State to prohibit the introduction of liquor. I move that the petition be received.

Petition received.

SITTINGS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. BARTON:

Under the circumstances it will not be necessary for me to move the following notice of motion standing in my name:

That the Convention shall, at 5.30 p.m. this day, suspend its sitting until 7 p.m., at which hour the Convention shall be resumed, and the transaction of business continued.

FEDERAL CONSTITUTION.

Debate resumed on resolutions by Mr. Barton (vide page 17).

Mr. HOWE:

I take this opportunity of congratulating you, sir, on the high position which this Convention has placed you in. I know from my long acquaintance with you and your ability that the dignity of the position will not suffer in your hands. I also congratulate Mr. Barton on the position to which he has been appointed by this Convention. I hold it to be a great honor for any man to be chosen to lead the Parliament in any of these colonies; but when we find that a Convention such as this is, elected by the people of the whole of Australia, has conferred this honor on Mr. Barton, it is one indeed which can but seldom fall to the lot of any man. Whilst saying this, I am not unmindful of the deep obligation we are under to Mr.
Barton in accepting a position both difficult and onerous. I feel, however, that he combines all the traits necessary to a successful leader—he has tact, ability, patience, and much self-denial, and it is in these traits chiefly that he will so guide our deliberations that the outcome of our work will be a credit to ourselves and an everlasting monument to the capacity of our leader, Mr. Barton. I also—although I do it in all humility—beg to endorse the remarks which have fallen from various speakers of acknowledged ability that the speeches which have been delivered on this occasion excel the speeches of 1891. I have been a student of federal history, but I have gathered more from the speeches delivered within these walls than I have been able to understand in perusing the opinions of representatives at other Conventions. I think in the forefront of the speeches that have been delivered stands out in bold relief that of the leader of the Legislative Assembly in New South Wales, Mr. Reid. I was afraid, from my previous knowledge of Federation and from the knowledge I had by repute of Mr. Reid, that he was not altogether heart and soul with us in the cause of Federation. If I had any such misgivings, however, after listening to the earnest, the able, and the well thought out speech of the leader of the House in New South Wales, they were all dispelled, and I look upon him now as a worthy leader of the Federation movement in Australasia. Now, sir, I am a federationist, and there will be no uncertain sound or misunderstanding concerning my views, while I hope the remarks I make will be brief. From speeches that have been delivered here by the leaders of the people in the various colonies of Australasia I have now come to look upon Federation as a live thing, and not the inanimate matter that we have always viewed it. Federation has come to be regarded as a water-logged hulk which is anxiously waiting for a pilot to take and guide her into the harbor of victory. We have found the pilot in Mr. Reid, Now we want to find the tug. We want those who believe earnestly in the Federation cause to act in the same spirit as Mr. Reid has manifested, and when we get that I am positive that the people of the various colonies will be so enamored of Federation that they will become the tug, and, having already secured the pilot, Federation will be brought into the harbor of repose in the hearts of the people of Australia. I have more hope of Federation becoming an accomplished fact than I had a short time ago; and I am all the more convinced after hearing the views expressed by the leaders in the various colonies in that definite and explicit manner in which they have placed them before this assembly. I therefore predict that Federation will come, and will come sooner than even the most ardent federationist expected a few months ago. Our leader invited those who had not the privilege of being at the previous Conference to speak our minds frankly, and give our opinions freely on different points, to enable the committees which will be appointed to formulate such a measure as will commend itself to the people of Australia. I cannot understand anyone coming here, considering the methods by which we are appointed, and making anti-federal speeches.

Mr. BARTON:

Hear, hear.
Mr. Howe:
I take it that we are appointed under an Enabling Bill for a certain purpose.

Mr. Solomon:
Hear, hear.

Mr. Howe:
The purposes of our meeting are clearly defined, and it is set out in the Enabling Bill that we are to meet in Convention together to formulate a federal measure which we hope will commend itself to the people of Australasia.

Mr. Reid:
Hear, hear.

Mr. Howe:
These are the objects we have to carry out, and the expressed mandate of the people was that we should meet together and do our best to bring into life a federal measure under which the whole of Australasia will become united. I cannot conceive any hon. member, being sent here for this purpose, deliberately getting up in the House and, by his speech and the opinions he advances, endeavoring to throw cold water on a scheme which the majority of us here have so much at heart, and also trying to create barriers and place obstacles in a way that we are not asked by the people to do. Now this leads me to the speech of our Treasurer, Mr. Holder. We all admire his conscientiousness and ability, but when he strikes the note of confederation, I say that he can scarcely understand the mandate of the people. We do not want to create in our midst a danger that means, in time very likely of necessity, destruction not only to the confederated authority, but to the States themselves; and any authority based upon the sufferance of the States is bound to become an object of danger. Besides we have in history examples of confederation. The great leaders of the federal movement in America had established a confederacy, and when that was done they could see very well that unless the Confederate States were brought together, and the confederacy was departed from and a true Federation entered into, the whole thing would fall to pieces. We do not want anything of that sort to happen in Australasia, and consequently I can scarcely excuse any gentleman of such ability as is possessed by the Treasurer when he comes down and advocates a cause which he knows from the test of time cannot be enduring or lasting. Then I was very much struck with a remark that fell from my hon. friend Mr. Gordon. I cannot at all understand the position he took up. He says that the workers have nothing to gain by Federation—that the only immediate prospect they had...
was a cheapening of manufactures and a lowering of wages. Now I say that these are dangerous and injurious propositions to place before the workers of the colonies. We know that the workers in these colonies predominate, and we know that Federation cannot be carried out unless we have the assistance of the workers of Australia.

HON. MEMBERS:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HOWE:

And if our leading politicians are going to perambulate these colonies and preach the doctrine of cheapening manufactures and lowering wages then I say farewell, and for a long time farewell, to Federation. I hope we can prove to the satisfaction of the workers themselves that Federation will give them more continuous labor or work at remunerative prices, and I shall endeavor to do this. We know that union among nations, as among individuals, if on a just basis is the keystone of the arch that leads to peace, prosperity, and happiness, and if that is so in the individual case surely the federation of Australia will also give a greater and a more enduring peace to the mass of the people, a greater amount of progress to Australia, because federated Australasia can undertake works of great magnitude such as would be impossible for any individual State to undertake. Consequently the union of Australasia means the development of our vast resources in a greater degree; and if this is the case will it not give more continued labor to the workmen? Will not our producers also benefit under Federation? And if Federation will lead to the increase of production will not the workers be benefited thereby? Of course they will. Consequently Federation does not mean to the workers inconvenience, the lowering of wages, or less employment. The workers are the first to feel the progress effected by a country, as unfortunately also they are the first to feel the retrogression or decay of a country. As to the Bill of 1891, those who have read it and studied its provisions can come to no other conclusion than that, as far as it goes, it is a Bill that will remain as a monument to the ability and wisdom of those who formulated it; and I also hope that those gentlemen who did so will remember that they owe something considerable to the framers of the American Constitution, for, after all, the Bill of 1891 copies the American Constitution to a very great extent. This does not make it any the less valuable to this Convention, for we have in it the mighty brain-power of the great men of America of those days and now of Australasia; and this Convention gathered together from the various colonies with the experience gained since the formulation of the measure in 1891 up to the present time should be able to submit to the people a Bill that will be adopted by them all. I favor Federation for various reasons. I think we have arrived at that stage in our national life when it is necessary for our own protection to advocate Federation. We must remember that we have a population now in Australasia of nearly 4,000,000 souls—a population greater than America had when she was driven by the idiotic bungling on the part of the King and his Ministers to fight for and gain her independence. We have no such cause—and under the British crown we never shall. At the present moment we have Australasia enjoying greater liberties under our Constitution than the people of the great American Union have under theirs, and not only that, but we are bound by the crimson thread of kinship to one of the greatest nations the world has ever seen. I favor Federation for purposes of defence.

Mr. GORDON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HOWE:

I am glad to hear that cheer, and I took objection to the position taken up by Mr. Gordon last evening. He considers that all we have to do is to look after the commerce of Australia, and as the commerce of Australia belongs chiefly, he said, to England, England is quite capable of looking after that. I think a nation of 4,000,000 people should be in a position to look after her own commerce to a great extent, and not depend entirely upon the mother country. We must remember the position of the mother country at the present time. It is a critical one. Students of history, and those who watch passing events tell us that a world's war is not a remote contingency. We are numerous enough and wealthy enough to have an efficient defence force of our own, but I recognise that those States, as they are disunited and disconnected, cannot have an adequate defence force efficient enough to repel any attack upon Australia. Therefore I consider Federation for defence is to be commended, and that is the reason I approve of it for this particular purpose. What position is the mother country in at present? She may have to withdraw at any moment her forces from Australian waters. A world's war may break out at any time, and she may be involved in a death struggle for her very existence, and it is not right that we should say:

Let England protect her commerce; so long as her flag floats supreme over every sea no danger will arise.

I do not hold with that view. Let us show that we are worthy of her protection. Let us show her we are willing to do all we can to protect ourselves, and let us prove to her that we are worthy sons of worthy sires. It is not right that England, who has done so much for us, and is still willing to protect us to the last breath, should have to say when such a contingency arose, that she would be unable to give that protection we have no right to depend upon. The great outcome of Federation will be intercolonial freetrade, and it is the greatest boon we have to get. There is no way of bringing it about without Federation, and if we could, perhaps I would not be such an ardent federationist as I am. That is, perhaps, another answer to the hon. member's remarks. Intercolonial freetrade-I am sorry to have to put it from a provincial aspect-from the geographical aspect will increase our commerce by leaps and bounds. And the workmen of South Australia will participate in the benefits that will accrue to the country. I have no fear, as Mr. Gordon has, of our trade and commerce going to the other colonies if this is brought about. We have it in evidence before a Commission of which the Treasurer of this colony was chairman. We took evidence from all kinds of people engaged in manufactures in this country, and the result was very gratifying to those who advocate moderate protection, for we brought into being industries that are likely to be permanent; and we can only come to the conclusion, by reading the evidence of that Commission and the recommendations of that Commission, that the industries now established in South Australia, that the owners of those industries, and that the workmen themselves are quite able to compete at any time with similar industries in the other colonies whenever intercolonial freetrade is brought about. I think I have stated the case correctly. What have we to fear from intercolonial freetrade? What have the workmen, the artisans to fear? Their homes will not be lessened in value, they will not have to seek in other lands for employment, wages will not be lowered, neither will the cost of manufacturing be such as to induce the manufacturers to reduce the wages of the workmen. I emphasise this point, because I consider that without the assistance of the worker, the mechanic, and the artisan-all men who earn their livelihood by the sweat of their brow-we cannot have freetrade; because if it gets abroad, and they get it into their heads, that they will be losers by Federation, they will be against it. Men will be set against men, brothers against brothers, and Federation will be retarded, and very likely much to the regret of the hon. members who appeal to the sympathy of those people to whom I have alluded. Now, Sir George Turner said that when he was approaching the South Australian border he was afraid that he was going to be molested by the Defence Force of South Australia, and that he was almost terrified at the very name of Protector. Well, if the hon. member had known much about the ideal Government that has existed in this colony for some years past, he would have had no such fear, because we have been economising, and we have economised the Defence Force of South Australia out of existence. True we have the Protector, and Sir George must know that in the history of England that word was once a word of terror to evildoers. I have no doubt that Sir George had in his mind that he was holding territory that did not quite belong to him.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We have had it for fifty years.

Mr. HOWE:

The very name of the Protector would be a terror to all these land acquisitioners who know they hold land they are not legally or morally entitled to. Now, I favor Federation as, a means for the settlement of territorial disputes. I am sure Sir George will have no objection to submit this question of the disputed boundary to the Federal Parliament, by whom, I believe, equity and justice would be done. It is these little questions of riparian rights and boundary disputes that lead to enmity between the colonies and to unfriendliness between the administrators of the various Governments, and I can see that Federation will enable us to settle these disputes. A question for Federation, and one which is likely to endanger our commerce in a great degree, is the question of riparian rights. We have endeavored to get the New South Wales and Victorian Governments to meet us on various occasions. We have appointed Commissions to meet Commissions they have appointed; but somehow or other we have never been able to bring these Commissions together. The New South Wales Government takes the position that the waters that form in their colony belong to them, and that they can divert and use them as they think proper.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

No harm has arisen.

Mr. HOWE:

No; but if you carry out the works you contemplate it will, and I think you have been in the forefront of the agitation in this respect. I understand it is the policy of New South Wales to irrigate millions of acres of land. Well, then, I say that, from all I have been able to gather in studying this question, if you do this you will endanger the navigation of the River Murray, but you do not mind that; you say:

The waters are ours, they belong to us, we hold possession of the bed of the river.

The Imperial Parliament may have given you that, but it does not say you are entitled to the waters thereof; and I question whether you can legally divert the water from its proper channel so as to endanger the navigation of the river. Experts have told us that if New South Wales carries out the irrigation works she has in contemplation—and we know that the New South Wales people when they contemplate anything, will generally accomplish it—will endanger the navigation of the river.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Only Victoria has up to the present diverted any of the water.

Mr. HOWE:

Poor Victoria. We are not so concerned about the waters of Victoria as we are about the waters of New South Wales; and I am only saying this question cannot be settled—we never will get a settlement of it until Federation obtains; then I expect we will get a settlement. I therefore favor Federation for this purpose. There are a great many reasons for which I favor it, and there is one in particular whereby the workers of these colonies would gain. I know that Federation is impossible unless we are assisted by the workers of these colonies. There is one question, I think, that can only be settled by federated Australia. I believe every Statesman in these colonies has given deep thought to what is known as old-age pensions. It is a question that is coming, and would have come in Australia before, if we had been united. Among the workers all over the world there is a fear that in their old age they will be dependent upon the cold charity of the State in which they live, or be a drag upon their kindred, who can little afford to keep them in the declining years of their lives. It is lamentable that people who have given their best labors to a country in the declining years of their lives should have nowhere on earth to lay their heads unless it is provided by the charity of the State, or they are a drag upon their kindred, who cannot afford to maintain them.

Mr. HIGGINS:

That is a matter for the State Parliament and not the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HOWE:

No; the States cannot undertake it, the population is too migratory. I am using this as an argument that we should go into Federation, so that we could give a guarantee to all the workers in these colonies that, in their declining years they will not want, but will have sufficient to maintain them, to enable them to hold their heads up as independent men, and so that they will not need the charity of the State or be a drag upon the relations who can ill afford to maintain them. When I say workers, I embrace all classes of people in receipt of salaries and who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, and this is a line I hope that the members will point out to the workers that will reconcile them to the fact that instead of having anything to lose they will have something to gain in Federation. I have given some reasons, but many more could be advanced why the Federation will benefit the great mass of people of Australia. Now, we must have some machinery to carry out the proposed Federation in a proper manner, and, in the first place, it is proposed to federate under the Crown. I think we are all agreed as to that, and it scarcely requires any argument upon my part. I think the consensus of opinion of the Convention is that we cannot and will not listen to any advance that may be made to cut the painter from the mother-country. Now as to the appointment of a Governor General. I am very glad that some of those who attended the Convention of 1891 have seen fit to alter the position they then took up, and to find that they are now in favor of the Governor-General being appointed by the Queen instead of being elected by the people. You, sir, I think, held the opinion in 1891, that it would be better to leave the appointment to the people. I am very glad, and I compliment you that you see your way clear to depart from the position you then took up, and that you are now an advocate for the position being in the gift of the Queen.

The PRESIDENT-I do not wish to interrupt the hon. representative, but I may just as well say, since he has appealed to me, that the views I expressed in 1891 are the same as I hold now.

Mr. HOWE-Well, I am very sorry I have misrepresented you or your ideas in any form, but it is scarcely my fault, and I will read to you an extract from your speech

HON. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. HOWE:
Well, I apologise for my mistake. I am in favor of the appointment being in the hands of the Queen; and I hope that those who took a certain position in the 1891 Convention will see the advisability of the appointment being in the hands of the Queen. An elective Governor-General would occupy a position superior, perhaps, to that of the Premier of Australia. One thing, however, I cannot concede, is that he would be more of a despot if elected by the people than he would be if appointed by the Queen. His duties will be written within the four corners of the Act, and in this respect it matters not, therefore, whether he is appointed by the Queen or elected by the people. I come now to the two Houses, the Senate and the House of Representatives; and this is where the full partnership of the States comes in. If it were not for the Senate, and the methods by which it is proposed to be formed, I would not be the ardent advocate of Federation that I am. When we look to the House of Representatives and see how the smaller States will be dominated there it is only right and just that we should have equal representation in the Senate. The full partnership comes in here, but it is just proposed to make it a little one-sided, inasmuch as they will not give its co-equal powers with the House of Representatives. I consider that it would be a mistake for the small colonies to accept anything less than the suggestions thrown out here, namely, to give the Senate the power to amend Money Bills. If we do not give them the power to amend all Bills - the same power as will obtain in the House of Representatives - we will run the chance of being simply appanages of larger colonies. It will not be a full partnership. This is a point I lay great stress upon, and one that I am not ready to give way upon. Unless we have equal powers in the Senate with the House of Representatives, to amend all Bills that may be submitted to them, I should not pledge myself to go thoroughly in for Federation. Why, Mr. Reid stated yesterday that if they had the right of veto that would be sufficient. If a measure were sent to the Upper House, and they did not like it, they would veto it. What would be the consequence? The whole machinery of Government would be thrown out of gear, which would lead to much strife, and be the means of almost capsizing Federation. I think the safety-valve, which has been alluded to so often, is to give senators the power of amendment, because under this there is no other road open to them, and no other way out of the difficulty.

Mr. TRENWITH:

There is no other way for them to dominate legislation.

Mr. HOWE:

Is it likely they would seek to do anything unbecoming? The domination of the Lower House is so great and complete, that unless you give co-equal powers to the Senate, there is a danger that Federation will not come for some time yet. There is no question that giving this right of amendment to the Senate is the safety-valve whereby Federation can be accomplished and endured. The position is this: The Lower House assents to a certain Bill, but the Upper House, having the extreme power of veto, can throw it out. Supposing the Senate wants a certain clause in the Bill to be amended, it is done, and then forwarded to the Lower House. It may be sent back to the Senate again in its original form, and

Rather than veto this Bill we should give in to the Lower House; rather than take the risk of throwing the machinery out of order, we should pass the Bill without amendment.

The only course open to them, if this is not done, is the right of veto. We can fairly give this right to the Senate, and trust to the intelligence of that Chamber. The House of Representatives can listen, at all events, and give due weight to any amendment made in the Bill. If they do not agree with it they can return it to the Senate again, and if the Upper Chamber persists in the amendment a conference can be held, as is done in this colony, between the two Houses. Here by giving a little and taking a little we have been able to settle difficulties that at the first blush looked overwhelming. This is the safety-valve that will give long life to Federation. If you take this right away from the Senators, I am positive that rather than submit to any injustice, they will have no hesitation in vetoing a Bill which they otherwise would have passed. I maintain that the right of amendment is conducive to the best interests of the larger States; and it is all very well for some members to say, as they have said, that if the larger States agree to join the Federation, the smaller States will be compelled to join also. I do not hold with this at all. I take it that however wealthy they are, and however populous these larger States may be, they would be weak if even one State stood out of the federal movement. It is only by the whole being united that they can become strong. Take only one niche of the continent out, and its Federation cannot be so strong and enduring as we would like to see it. Consequently, I hope those who represent the larger States will consider the question, and not say, because they are wealthy and powerful, that they can federate without the smaller States. That very weakness would be the means, very likely, of leading to their severance altogether.

Now, as to the mode of election, I believe in both Houses being elected by its people under the franchise obtaining in the various colonies. I believe the Senate and House of Representatives should be elected by the people who vote for the more numerous Houses in the various colonies. I think this is a fair basis, and on it the Federation would be established according to the will of a free people. So far as the franchise is concerned I do not think that we have any right—although we consider we are in the van of progress—to dictate to the other colonies as to how they shall send their representatives to the Federal Parliament. So long as each colony adopts its own methods, its own franchise which obtains now, and sends its, representatives to the Federal Parliament that is all we can expect. How would we like to be told by members representing the larger and more populous colonies,

You will have to, if you wish to come into the Federation, abandon your adult suffrage.

Our reply would be at once that we would stand out of Federation for all time rather than abandon that which we possess, and we have no right either to dictate to them as to how they shall return their representatives. I remember Mr. Deakin, a gentleman who is considered a Radical member for a certain district in Victoria, saying distinctly that, although they had plural voting in Victoria, in so far as he himself was concerned and the knowledge which he had of the people and the representatives of Victoria, that if that were abandoned to-morrow be did not think it would make any difference to the personnel of the House. By that I am not advocating plural voting, but I think it shows us that we have no right to dictate to the colonies as to how they shall send their representatives to the Federal Parliament. I believe in a uniform franchise for the Federal Parliament, and I am quite willing to do as was suggested at the Bathurst Convention: I am willing to agree that the Federal Parliament shall be allowed to formulate a franchise of its own, so that the people of the whole of Australia shall be under one franchise as far as the Federal Parliament is concerned. I hope when it is adopted that the Hare-Spence system of voting will be approved by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. DEAKIN: First catch your hare.

Mr. HOWE: And then everyone, whether they are in the majority or the minority, will know they are fairly represented in the great Federal Parliament. I think I have given my reasons as briefly as I can why I advocate Federation, but there is just one item I cannot allow to pass without alluding to, and that is our railway system. I recognise that it is necessary that the Federal Government should have control of the railways for federal purposes, but I do dread to give the central authority the control of our State railways. If we do so we place ourselves at the mercy of the Federal Parliament, and in a country like this, sparsely populated and undeveloped, and in which a great mineral development may take place, we do not know when we may be called upon to make a railway to a certain point. If we place the power of development by this means under the Federal Government we must be subservient to the federal authority as far as developmental construction is concerned. It would not be in the power of any State to construct a mile of railway unless we got a Bill passed through the Federal Parliament. When we know the difficulty that exists even in our own little House, where the people are conversant with the country, of impressing them with the desirability of any great work, how much more difficult will it be to impress a greater number of delegates who know little or nothing of our country? This is the danger I foresee, and I think it would act as a bar to progress. I started by saying that I am a Federationist. These are my views, I may be wrong, but I am willing to modify them if I am proved to be so. I want Federation, but I do not want it at any cost. Although South Australia wants Federation it will not submit to injustice. I am, of course, speaking my own individual opinion; and, should South Australia say that she is... willing to part with the railways to the Federation, I would bow to that decision. I would have no objection to a clause being inserted in the Bill providing that the Central Government should be permitted to take over the railways with the consent of the State, but not otherwise. I think I have made myself clear on the attitude I shall assume on the powers of the Senate, on the railways, and on the other points to which I have alluded. I do not think that any Convention has met under more favorable auspices.
We have gentlemen of position, of great eloquence, and learning, possessed of vocabularies and the flowers of the English language in abundance, and when we find these men coming forward and advocating Federation in the earnest manner in which they have, I say the outlook is brighter than I have ever known it before, and I am here to assist those gentlemen in bringing it to a successful issue. Although I have expressed, perhaps too definitely, some of my views, I am willing to listen to all the arguments, and I am willing to give and take. Some people say that the time has not arrived yet for Federation, and ask what we are to gain by Federation, and assert that there is no danger from outside foes, but those are not the voices of federationists. Those are the voices of the sluggard, of the mercenary, and of the foolhardy. I say we will not listen to those voices. We are sent here for a specific object, and that is to the best of our ability-and we have able men here—to draft a Bill that will meet with the acceptance of the whole people of Australia. We are capable of doing this work. But I say further than this. If the leading politicians of these colonies, after having evolved this Bill, will take the

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I shall not attempt, after the many able and exhaustive speeches made by members, who have addressed themselves to particular subjects, to repeat arguments which have been better expressed by others, but there are features which have not been dealt with with sufficient explicitness, and which, from the action of certain members of the South Australian delegation, require comment. In making this explanation I shall endeavor to be as brief as possible. I allude to one fact of which some members probably may not be aware, viz., that on October 6th next a period of thirty years will have elapsed since the first Dominion Parliament was opened in Canada by Viscount Monk. I trust that we will be able to so push forward our work so that thirty years after the inauguration of the Federal Government in Canada, the Federal Government of Australia will be an accomplished fact. Considering also that it will be the sexagenary of our beloved Queen, it will be a great compliment to Her Majesty to make these two dates uniform. With reference to the remarks of certain of the South Australian delegates, I was pained to hear the pessimistic tones in which those gentlemen expressed themselves. I feel sure those expressions are not indorsed by you, Mr. President. I think those members should have taken a larger view of the question, and not have supposed that the two colonies of New South Wales and Victoria would enter into a conspiracy to deprive them of their rights. I point out to these gentlemen that there are many advantages which South Australia, and South Australia alone, will possess from the Federation. Does not she possess within her borders for hundreds of miles both banks of that noble river the Murray, the mouth of which is also on her shores? If the South Australian Parliament shows that enterprise that has always characterised it, does it not lie within its power to develop the territory from Wentworth to the Murray mouth on both sides of that wonderful river? It is idle for those South Australian delegates who have animadverted upon New South Wales to say that she has no rights and privileges over the Murray where it flows through Riverina, to say that she shall not, if acting justly, do what she likes with her own. The New South Wales Government cannot take this water from this river otherwise than by spreading it over the earth's surface, and the water by the law of gravitation must return to the Murray, and must in the natural course of things pass by way of Wentworth into the sea. Always conceding that New South Wales acts in a neighborly way, South Australia has nothing to lose by Federation, and much to gain, in connection with the utilisation of the waters of the Murray. The South Australian delegates further propose that the Federal Government should take over the responsibility of all items of expenditure, but they would not give the Federal Government any revenue to meet that expenditure.

Mr. SOLOMON:
No.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That is practically the outcome of what they say. They also propose that the Federal Government shall only have the control of defence, lighthouses, quarantine regulations, and ports and harbors bordering on the seacoast.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Not the majority of the delegates.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I am speaking of a certain portion of them. Surely the South Australian delegates must know that Victoria has less seaboard than any of his good sense to say whether some compromise cannot be effected in the way I have suggested. I am sure that, knowing the desire the members have for pressing on the business, and for conveniencing the Premiers who desire to visit the mother-country, we cannot do better than make our proceedings as brief as possible, and emulate those business people who would not spend days dealing with matters which could be settled in a shorter space of time.

Mr. BARTON:
I think the hon. member will find that the proceeding which is proposed to be taken is the most expeditious when it is explained.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I am very pleased to hear that. I would now like to deal with the railway question, and I say that although I am strongly in favor of handing over the State railways to federal control I do not intend to press that matter on the notice of the Convention except in an ordinary way. I impress upon the Convention the desirability of the federal body at some future time obtaining the control of these railways if the necessities of the Federal Government demand it. If we give that power it is as much as at present we should require to do, though I am convinced that if evidence is taken from such men as Mr. Eddy, the South Australian Commissioner, and the Railway Commissioner of Victoria, their evidence will, I believe, warrant us in supporting the handing over of the railways. I come now to the question of the Commonwealth Bill; and I say that, with some exception as to the manner in which the Senate is elected, the remuneration of the delegates, and certain minor matters, I accept the Commonwealth Bill as a whole. The question of the constitution of the Senate is one that interests me exceedingly from the position which I have the honor to hold in Victoria. I was sorry to hear the remarks of Sir George Turner, which were all made in good part, and which I take in the same spirit, reflecting upon what he was pleased to consider the obstruction to legislation offered in the Legislative Council of Victoria. There is no greater mistake possible than for him to make such an assertion. Mr. Trenwith quoted the instance of the Council throwing out the plural voting bill upon three occasions. He is altogether mistaken.
Mr. TRENWITH:
   Perhaps, technically, I am wrong, but in effect I was right.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
   The Council did what they considered was right.

Mr. TRENWITH:
   Three times the measure passed the Assembly, and it is not law yet.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
   If the Legislative Assembly, in introducing measures to the Legislative Council, attaches conditions to Bills that the Council cannot accept the Council says: If you attach objectionable conditions we will not pass your Bills, we will not have an obnoxious measure forced upon the country merely for the sake of giving effect to the fads of certain sections of the Legislative Assembly.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   What is a fad?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
   It is unnecessary to go into the designation of a fad; but, from my point of view, many arguments and positions which Mr. Higgins takes up partake very much of that designation.

Mr. HIGGINS:
   I might say the same to you.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
   Yes; and we are both entitled to our opinions. No statement that cannot be borne out in fact should be made against a legislative body that has practically co ordinate powers with the other branch of the Legislature. The Council does not ask anything but what is fair and right, and upon the other hand they demand the same privileges from the Assembly which the Council concedes to them. The Legislative Council voices the opinion of 180,000 odd of the best of the citizens of Victoria, men whose names are of the best, men who have borne the burden and heat of the day, in contrast to those who have no stake in the colony, and who could leave it and the burden of contributing to the State funds by the ratepayers.

Mr. TRENWITH:
   May we say our criticisms have not been of the members, but of the Constitution?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
   We are aware of it, and there is no one more aware than I am of the manly and straightforward way Mr. Trenwith has dealt with the Legislative Council; and I am proud to say that Mr. Trenwith, who represents a certain section of the community, is a firmer friend of the Legislative Council than many of those who advocate measures of no advantage to the community. Mr. Higgins says that the Victorian Legislative Council by throwing out the Land and Income Tax Bill affords a glaring example of the iniquity that marks the doings of that body.

Mr. HIGGINS:
No; I referred to it as an example of the power of veto. I did not say one word about iniquity.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
He implied that it was an iniquitous thing for the Council to exercise its own powers, and he led us to believe the Council had done something very wrong. The fact is that at the present time every man in Victoria owning an estate above 640 acres has to pay as taxes to the State 3d. per acre for fourth-class land, 6d. for third-class land, 9d. for second-class land, and 1s. for first-class land, from which he gets an exemption of 640 acres. In other words, if a man owns 20,000 acres in Victoria he pays £1,000 a year in land tax, less £32 exemption. That being so, when the Legislative Assembly sent up a Land Tax Bill which raised certain novel and unheard-of conditions, the Legislative Council said:

 Much as we are averse to another land tax, and much as we are averse to class legislation, if these two measures are dissevered, and a Bill is sent up initiating and providing for an income tax, the Council will pass it.

The Council did pass it, and the income tax of 1s. 4d. in the £1 shows that the Legislative Council was prepared to meet the emergencies of the State in a fair and liberal spirit. I also point out that there is no place in the world other than Victoria—where the income tax reaches 1s. 4d. in the £1.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Very nearly time they came into a Federation.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Yes, I think so. Mr. Isaacs instanced the Insolvency Bill.

Mr. ISAACS:
I did not say a word about it. I never mentioned it.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
The hon. member animadverted on the Legislative Council on account of their treatment of the Insolvency Bill. What the Council did in the case of the Insolvency Bill was-

Mr. ISAACS:
I did not mention it.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Perhaps he should have said it. It does not matter whether he did or not.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
The Insolvency Bill contained a provision that all estates passing through the Insolvency Court should be liable to a tax of 5 per cent. on the assets. The Legislative Council said that this was a most unfair impost, but they agreed that if the Government would modify the impost to 2 1/2 per cent. they would pass the Bill. They sent the Bill back, and, instead of the hon. member accepting it in that spirit, he allowed the Bill to lapse.

Mr. ISAACS:
That is all wrong.

Mr. TRENWITH:
It shows that our two Houses get into conflict.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
During the time that the Legislative Council of Victoria has been in existence—since 1881—it has only thrown out twenty-five Bills out of 725. If that shows anything at all it shows that the Council is doing in a moderate measure what the electors created it to do.

Mr. TRENWITH:
How many Bills have they permitted to lapse?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
The Legislative Council has nothing to do with Bills lapsing. That is entirely within the control of the Government, as the hon. member well knows.

Mr. ISAACS:
How many have they emasculated?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
If the hon. member means that the Council has allowed equal justice to be dealt out to all people, I concede his criticism. But if he adopts conditions that cannot be accepted without imposing an injustice on certain classes, then I say that the Council has very properly emasculated his Bill. I only say this by the way; for years past there have been deliberate attacks made on this legislative body, deliberate misrepresentations, based mainly on fiction, with just a little truth thrown in, and I feel it to be my duty to expose these misrepresentations. With reference to the powers and the provisions of the Senate, I do not go so far as many hon. members in saying that the Senate should have coordinate powers with the House of Representatives. I accept the proposition that the People's House, as it has been called, should have a greater control in money matters. Bills are initiated in the popular Chamber, and naturally members of the Government are more cognisant and better empowered to speak of what is required by the Government than members in the Senate can possibly be. But it would be a perfectly fair and just position to take up, a perfectly fair power to concede to the Senate, that they should have the power of suggestion in certain items, because as Government is carried on there should be no factious spirit shown between the two branches of the Legislature. In the case of the majority of measures, I say that the Senate should exercise co-ordinate powers with the House of Representatives.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
Including Bills imposing taxation?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I would modify that to a great extent; because I am sure that none of the members of the body to which I belong wish to embarrass the Government; but where Bills are sent to the Upper House indirectly affecting taxation, but which purposes are not solely for revenue, there is no reason why Houses constituted as Legislative Councils are, should not have power to deal with these matters. I speak from forty years' experience in Victoria, and I can testify to the fact that plural voting is practically a myth. With the exception of the city and suburbs, it cannot be resorted to. A man may have property in the country, but no man will go perambulating about the country merely to record his vote. Plural voting is practically confined to Melbourne. If I take an office in the city surely I am entitled, owing to the payment of rent and taxes, to the same consideration as I am when renting a house in the city and suburbs. That has been the law in Victoria, and it has worked well, and it is also a recognised spirit of municipal government. I do not know whether others share the same advantages as Victoria does under municipal government, for there votes are given to the ratepayers according to the value of their property.

Mr. ISAACS:
No one objects to it so long as it is confined to municipal governme

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Yes; but the best proof of the value of plural voting is the success of municipal government in this respect. Men who have to pay ways and means for the carrying on of the Government should get some consideration, for it is not the men who are here to-day and gone tomorrow who are held responsible. Take the case of a man to-day, in South Australia, who has nothing. and consequently no responsibility, supposing he goes to Melbourne the next day, is he to receive the same consideration as the unfortunate man who has property in a place upon which he has to pay taxes, and must therefore remain in that place? I cannot understand any one seeing it from any other point of view; it is really wresting a power from one class and giving it to another, without any shadow of reason to support the claim.
Mr. HIGGINS:
That is an old argument which was exploded sixty years ago.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
I do not know whether that is a fact. I believe I have honestly stated the case, and I think my hon. friend must see the matter in the same light. Whether he does so or not I will not try to convince him or Mr. Issacs, because I know they have very pronounced views on this subject. With the exception of these remarks, I am at one with the framers of the Constitution Bill, which I will do my best to support in Committee, believing as I do that it will be of advantage to the future of Australia. With respect to the mother colony of New South Wales, I am very pleased to find the generous and statesmanlike way in which they have promoted their claims in this Convention. It seems to me they have not unduly taken up a position which the mother colony is justly entitled to arrogate to herself. Anyone who knows as I do that great colony, with its enormous natural resources, must be convinced that it contains within itself the elements of future greatness which do not appertain to other colonies; and when we find that colony coming here and placing her future and present welfare before us as she has, we are bound to sink all petty and parochial differences in order to try to come to a mutual understanding that will benefit not only the colonies as a whole, but also the colonies individually.

Mr. BRUNKER:
I feel it would prove a vain effort on my part, Mr. President, if I attempted to find words sufficiently expressive to convey to you and the members of your Government my deep sense of gratitude for the singular kindness which the representatives of New South Wales have received at your hands and at the hands of your Government since they arrived in South Australia for the purpose of attending to their duties in connection with this Convention. I feel that I am expressing the wishes of my fellow colleagues in thus conveying to you this our united thanks. At this late stage of the debate I shall not attempt to force upon this Convention any arguments in detail for the purpose of laboring or prolonging the discussion. I feel that I shall have an opportunity in Committee of dealing with details upon the construction of the Bill, which I am sure will be presented to us in a form that will have embodied in it the principles of equity and justice, and such, I hope, as may be presentable to the people who have conceded to us the right and the honor of representing them in this great assembly, brought together for the purpose of debating a question of greater importance than any hitherto submitted to any assembly in the Southern Hemisphere. I am one of those who have had the advantage of experience, and who have watched the rise and progress not only of New South Wales, but of the whole of the various colonies in this Southern Hemisphere, and, although I have not had the personal advantage that some members have had, I have carefully watched by study what their progress has been, and I feel convinced the time has arrived when we are prepared to federate, in short, to establish a system of Federation that will break down for ever the great barriers which have for so long obstructed our progress, and have encouraged the rivalries and jealousies which have prevailed to the disadvantage of the people of these great colonies. I said I had had some advantages in watching the rise and progress of the colonies, and I can say, to the honor of New South Wales, that, notwithstanding the eloquence and ability and practical knowledge which has been displayed in this debate during the last ten days, I remember when New South Wales in nation building stood in the forefront in 1853, and that such men as the Hon. Wm. C. Wentworth, Sir James Martin, and other great giants of those days, placed not only New South Wales, but the sister colonies, in the proud position they have since occupied by establishing one of the most free and liberal Constitutions that exist in any part of the world. The Constitution which was then implanted on the Statute Book was framed by men of ability; and I feel proud, as an Australian, to stand here to-day and with all sincerity to express the wish that these principles of equality, justice, and freedom which have prevailed under that Constitution may prevail under the Constitution which I hope may emanate from our hands before we disperse. I would wish to offer a few words of advice without being considered presumptuous to many of those whom I have heard use arguments throughout the discussion with regard to the positions of the larger and the smaller colonies. I am one of those who remember when the city of Sydney, one of the greatest commercial cities in the Southern Hemisphere, had obtained nothing like the dimensions of the city in which we are now assembled. I remember various parts of New South Wales and of the other colonies which had scarcely been trodden by the foot of man, but which have since grown into such importance that they are peopled by a sturdy yeomanry, who have broken down the forests and rendered the land the most productive in any portion of the British dominion. I am one of those who believe more strongly in the vast resources of these great colonies than most people. I believe that their resources are unequalled in any part of the world and all that we require for the purpose of increasing our wealth is their development, and that development can only be obtained by a thrifty and enterprising population. I say, if we strengthen the position of the various colonies by the system of government which we are now endeavoring to introduce, we will do that which will tend to more largely help the development of these colonies than any other object we can attain. I feel thoroughly assured that, notwithstanding the many differences of opinion which exist just now with regard to the position of the smaller as compared with the larger colonies, we, as representatives, and I am sure that I speak for the Convention generally, will have no desire to enter into conflict in framing a Constitution. The smaller colonies may at any rate expect to receive from the representatives of New South Wales that fair consideration which we believe they are justly entitled to; we will assuredly treat them as brothers, and act as one body for the good of Australia as a whole. There is no reason why a people of one origin, a people who speak the same language, who have the same love of freedom and liberty, and the same hatred of oppression, should stand against one another, maintaining rivalries and jealousies which should never exist I am speaking in generalities, as I do not wish to enter into details with regard to the great, important, and delicate question with which we have to deal. I shall refrain from that course in consideration of the members of the Convention. Many of us are doubtless conservators of time, and if there is one to whom that attribute may be conceded in our own Assembly more than another it is myself, and I think I can appeal to Sir Joseph Abbot to say that I have not given him much trouble by my presence in the Assembly. I might elaborate very much upon the condition of the colonies generally, and the doubts which are likely to accrué from Federation, but I shall not do that now; I shall have a full opportunity in committee. But I should like to say that, with a favorable climate, a good soil, and fortunate commercial locality, these colonies in the future should be the home of the most enlightened, free, and intelligent people of the world. I might detain this Convention at considerable length in referring to the inexhaustible wealth of our pastoral and agricultural resources, to the enormous wealth of our mineral resources, gold, silver, copper, iron, coal, and other things which conduce so fully to a country's greatness. With this taken into consideration, the results of the future are, I am sure, still more difficult to estimate. Now I do not refer to this in an egotistical spirit, but only desire to impress upon the members of this Convention the vast responsibility which we as representatives owe to the Commonwealth. We each have a duty to perform, and it is impossible to over-estimate the influence which every representative of this Convention may have upon the future of this great country. It matters not what position we occupy, where we are located, or what is our nationality, if as true colonists we do our duty well, the future is full of promise, not only to the present generation but to those who are to come after us; and, unless as time advances and the circumstances and conditions of the colonies change most materially, our future is assured beyond all peradventure; and this fair land, dedicated by our ancestors to liberty and freedom, will become so firmly affixed to the soil that it shall live for all time, and continue to shine as a beacon-light to the whole world, showing that an intelligent people are capable of self-government.

The PRESIDENT:
If no other representative desires to speak, I will now call upon the representative of New South Wales, Mr. Barton, to reply.

Mr. BARTON:
If I had doubts or tremors - as indeed I had at the outset of these proceedings-in facing the dignity bestowed upon me of leading this Convention, they have been much increased by the splendid debate to which I have listened. The debate has been one which-is worthy of this Convention, and worthy of the intellect of the country from which this Convention springs. I was a member of the Convention of 1891, and heard the debates of that body, and able indeed were those debates, because, while there were a few speeches which aimed at oratory, nearly every speech delivered, I think I may say every one, was an instruction and an education to those of experience, to those even well educated in public life, who formed that great gathering. Yet I may well compare the debate now closing with the prime debates of that aggregation of statesmen. I do not think, whatever other results might have taken place in the election that has just been decided by the electors of Australia, that there could have been obtained by any alteration in results, a debate that would much more have helped the desires of those - if I may say so as one of them
- who most insisted upon the present method of procedure, or have been more instructive than have been the speeches which I have heard delivered here. It is not for me to particularise, but I think we may claim with pride that we had a noble speech yesterday from the Premier of New South Wales, and an equally noble speech, if I may say so, from the hon. member Mr. Deakin. For in these speeches, the closeness of their reasoning was an enlightenment; the ardour of their aspiration was something to warm the heart of every hon. member who listened to them; and the dignity of their language was something to uplift us to the level of the task that we have to perform. Hearing such speeches, and such excellent speeches as were delivered by other hon. members, whom I think I may well be relieved from particularising, I think I may be pardoned for again expressing the difficulty and tremor which I feel in having had laid upon me the task of leading such a splendid assembly in the deliberations which are to ensue. However, that task has been accepted and must be performed. And first, I would like, before proceeding to reply generally to the debate, to say that I do not wish in that reply to be thought too controversial; and, like my hon. friend Mr. Reid, I do not desire that my words should be taken as expressing too deep-seated conviction, too much of that condition which has been called cock-sureness; because I realise, with every member of this Convention, that we are now upon the threshold of that stage in our deliberations in which the principle of mutual concession must prevail; and upon the application of that principle the success of our whole deliberations will depend. I must first, be fore replying to the arguments which have been advanced, discharge myself of a duty. The hon. and learned member, Mr. Symon, was kind enough to compliment me upon certain words which are to be found in the beginning of these resolutions—these words: In order to enlarge the powers of self-government of the people of Australasia.

[P.366] starts here

I may say at once that these words are the suggestion of another hon. member of this Convention—a gentleman who has also laid us under a debt of thanks by the masterly speech which be delivered-Mr. Wise. I do agree very fully with Mr. Symon, now that I have been able to confess that those words are not my own, and I wish to express the feeling that they are an immense improvement upon the form the resolutions would have presented without them, because they do express the object, the very object, for which we are here. They may dispel the very doubts and fears which, notwithstanding the occurrence of these words, have been so frequently expressed by some of the delegates during these debates; doubts and fears which I think the course of events since 1891 should have dispelled, and which I hope will be dispelled before we have concluded our deliberations, which clearly have for their object the enlargement of the power of self-government of our people. This was clearly the intention of the people of Australia when they took steps to confer upon the people a dual citizenship, and it would have been a mistake if the views of those who elected us were not inserted in these resolutions. I would like to say a few words upon a subject so much pressed upon us by several delegates: the necessity for economy in the Federal Government. I wish to ask delegates to look at this question, not from the standpoint upon which we are now placed, but to endeavor to realise the accomplishment of Federation, and then to ask themselves whether we should take such particular pains to impose limitations of economy upon a people who will be constituted as ourselves, who will indeed be ourselves, and will therefore - it cannot be denied - have as much claim to be considered their own masters as to how their proceedings shall be conducted, when we are indeed forming a nation whose life is bound up in their Constitution. We may claim that it is their money; that it will be by taxes on the federated people that the Federal Government's revenue will be raised. It will be by the Federal Parliament that that money will be expended, and as there is no question between any two members of this Convention that both chambers of that legislature are to be elected, why should we impose a limit of economy upon the nation when the next steps we take show that this nation, in our judgment, will be better fitted to deal with it than we, before the Constitution is made, will be able to do. It is for us to give them adequate revenue and endeavor to provide for their necessities upon a scale adequate in some degree to the work which we foresee they will have to undertake; and having done that, the question of economy in future proceedings must be the sole charge of a free people, though that free people will, in one sense, be ourselves. At any rate, in the true sense, it will be the federation of the people of Australia. Leave the question of economy to them, so long as you take care that in the machine you are creating you are not wasting more money than is necessary to make it perfect. I have heard arguments in one or two quarters that seem to indicate an endeavour to make the people more sure that the federated people of Australia shall be more economical when they are constituted a nation. It seems to me this is a question that must be left to the federated people of Australia. Give them a Parliament which is large enough for the purpose of carrying out their object - and upon that point we may well discuss the question of the representation. Give them a source of revenue which is adequate, and all questions which may arise for the determination of that Parliament, and the questions which relate to the distribution of the revenue which is given to them, are questions for them, subject to any legal check which the Constitution imposes upon them. I would like again, before I leave this part of the subject, in order that it may not be supposed I am aiming in the wrong direction, to say I quite agree with Mr. Reid that the Parliament ought not to be too large for its work. Mr. Reid suggested that there should be a representative for every 60,000 inhabitants. That would give a National Assembly of sixty members. That is half the basis of representation proposed by the Commonwealth Bill. In that Bill the National Assembly or House of Representative - we have not yet named it would consist of 120 members. Looking at the authority and the power that will really be conferred-and as to this there does not seem to be any general disposition to extend the powers conferred under the Commonwealth Bill - I can agree that some larger number than 30,000 should be the number forming the basis for the election of the representatives. Looking at the ambit of the powers to be conferred, it might be thought that the number of sixty members would give us a House of Representatives which, compared with the extreme numbers of the House of Representatives or Assembly of some constituent State, would be rather dwarfed by comparison in numbers.

Mr. SOLOMON:

They will reduce them.

Mr. BARTON:

I was about to allude to that. There may be an alteration in that way, but we who have occupied seats in these popular Chambers know the extreme reluctance they have to cut down the numbers. We, in New South Wales, know of the difficulty we had in trying to reduce the number from 141 down to 125. It was reduced by sixteen, and it was no small difficulty to do it. If I had been able I should have included a provision for reducing the number to 100, but the great fear was that in my endeavour so to reduce the number I should risk a measure for which the people were crying at that time. Now let us apply that to the conditions which will surround us when we federate. We shall have these same Parliaments of our States, and we have seen from this debate how jealously they watch, how vigilant they are, lest any shred of authority, lest any particle of individuality be taken from them even for the most necessary purposes. It will be seen therefore that it would be with the utmost difficulty that we should be able to reduce the number of any of these Houses, and yet if we must limit, as has been suggested, the number of representatives in the National Assembly we should have a probable outcry that that House is belittled by the comparison. One State in the United States has, if I remember rightly, a representation in what is called its Lower Chamber—I do not like the term—of something over 275 representatives. And that is 100 years after that Federation, which was supposed, not indeed to take away the individuality of the States, but to render it at any rate possible for States which had surrendered part of their work to the Commonwealth in order that it might be done more efficiently with their own help, to cut down representation in their own Legislatures with a view to economy. Therefore we must take care that the basis of representation in our National Assembly should be wide enough to prevent its lines being extravagant, and yet that it should be ample enough to secure the carrying out of all those measures of national concern which are certainly of greater ambit and purview.

Mr. REID:

May not the greater importance of the federal electorates tend to redress that want of balance?

Mr. BARTON:

I do not quite see that. I do not know yet whether we are going to provide for single electorates for our National Assembly. I know if we make electorates large enough to return three or four members we shall have a great outcry about the expense of conducting elections. If we reduce it to single electorates-with all that has been said in their favor-they frequently result in the Parliament being bereft of half its best intellects in order that certain local interests may be represented. Without expressing too positive opinions on the subject—because I wish to guard against that—I would like to express the opinion that we must not seek in any way to belittle the Parliament which we are about to make by rendering its importance and its attributes, even apparently, less distinguished than those of the States which compose the Federation. Before proceeding to some of the more important questions which have been discussed—and I say important only in relation to the time and elaboration of the discussion that has been bestowed upon them—I should like to make a short reference to one argument that has been used with regard to the federal judiciary. It has been suggested that the federal judicature should consist of the Chief Justices of the various colonies. I beg to say that, so far as I am advised, I entirely dissent from that proposal. I think that that would be a provision which would make totally against the value of the federal judiciary for the work which it has to perform. One of the smallest objections is that in these colonies—if there are any where it is not a provision of law—the strong feeling prevails that no judge should sit on appeal from his own decision, and it is a very plain provision in New South Wales.

Mr. PEACOCK:

And in Victoria.

Mr. BARTON:

I am glad to hear that, because I had a strong suspicion that it was so. Whether or not it is in all the colonies a provision of law that no judge shall sit on appeal from his own decision, it ought very speedily under the powers given by the Constitution to be a provision of law for the Commonwealth, and if it once becomes so I should like to know what capacity, what adequacy, for this work will be left amongst the half-dozen Chief Justices who will at their sittings have to decide on appeals from half a dozen States. And, when we bear in mind that in every appeal from a colony the Chief Justice of that particular State must not take part in the hearing, there would be still less chance of forming a court that would be acceptable or satisfactory as a Federal Court of Final Appeal. There is another strong objection. If this is to be a Federal Court it must not spring from any provincial origin. If the object of the court is federal, and if it is to be made an arbiter between State and State and between State and Commonwealth, if it is right that it should be a federal instrument-and clearly it must be so, because it is one of the essentials of a Federal Constitution-well, then it must be equally clear that it must not owe its origin to provincial appointments. What I am going to say now I do not utter disrespectfully, but we have seen cases, and we cannot deny it, of judges, appointed with the very highest encomiums and expectations from Bar and public, who have turned out to be, in the performance of their duty, not so strong as was supposed, perhaps not even so impartial as was anticipated, or in other respects not quite so well up to their work. If such a provision were carried into effect the Federal Executive would not have a chance of deliberating upon the question, but must take the judge provided, even though the results attending his appointment were not such as were expected. How can all that be right, or how can it give us a Court of Appeal which will encourage the people to select this tribunal as their Court of Appeal in preference to the Privy Council? If there is to be, as is suggested by my friends Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Deakin, a right of choice for the appellants whether they will go to the Australasian Court of Appeal or to the Privy Council, then, inasmuch as we find that the components of the Privy Council have lately year by year been stronger Judges, how is it likely that appellants will, even with the inducement of less expenses, use the Federal Court of Appeal in preference to the Privy Council if they find it is constituted in such a way as allows of no intervention in regard to its composition on the part of the Federal Government? Is it likely that that which we desire-that a respondent in an appeal should not have to go practically 12,000 miles away when there is no necessity for it-will be fulfilled, if we give this choice or option, and at the same time allow our Federal Court of Appeal to be a body which the Federal Government have no hand in forming, and a body that cannot be improved, whatever mistake may have been made in the original selection? I will not waste time in farther argument on that subject, because commonsense and reason combine in declaring that the Federal Executive must be free in the choice of its court, which is to be a safety-valve in the Federal Constitution. I pass on to the question of finance, but I am not about to trouble the Convention with any views of mine upon the question of collecting revenue, or the distribution of a surplus, because I recognise fully the fact that I have only once in my life participated in a financial debate. I hope therefore to leave a question of this kind to persons who have shown aptitude for the discussion. I am sure that I shall not be a member of the Committee of Finance, Trade, and Taxation, and it is to gentlemen like Sir George Turner, Sir Philip Fysh, Mr. McMillan, and others who could be named, that we must leave, I think, a great deal of the discussion of these questions. But I should like to say a few words upon a matter which is inextricably associated with the question of finance, and that is the question of the railways. I may say that to me it was a pleasure to find so large a preponderance of members of this Convention agreeing to the proposition that the railways should remain the properties of the States that constructed them. In that respect I speak with much greater certainty, and, a much greater feeling of conviction than upon many matters which I shall presently address myself to. It is conceded that the lands are the property of the province, and it is conceded that they are not to pass to the Federation, because it is alike granted that, while the Federation is a body which has most to do with our external outlook, the provinces will have most to do with the regulation and management of provincial affairs. Amongst such, it is necessary that we class the landed territory of each province. If the land is the possession of the province let us consider what railways were created for. Were they not created for the development of the land, and are they not as much an instrument for the development of the land as the roads and bridges, and do we hear any suggestion that the roads and bridges should pass to the Federation? It would be absurd to assert it; yet if the railways are to pass the two are pari ratione.

Mr. SYMON:
They are not pari ratione.

Mr. BARTON:
Well, Sir, they exist for the same purpose as the roads and bridges, namely, for the development of the land which we, the people of the individual colonies, mean to retain. There is something which inherently makes them a provincial and not a federal property.

Mr. GLYNN:
You cannot work the roads and bridges by amalgamation.

Mr. BARTON:
You might, but with a considerable lack of that local knowledge which is so necessary for the satisfactory working of roads and bridges. Let us take care before we hand over the railways that we do not hand over something which requires a great deal of local knowledge to manage. If ever these railways are banded over it will have to be when the people of the various colonies have become accustomed to look on them from the standpoint that they can be made more useful by the Federal Parliament, and it may be that in the growth of the federal spirit the people will begin to say for themselves that the railways are so much a matter of common concern and interest that they may be with advantage taken over by the Federation; but that is easily provided for. In the Bill of 1891 in clause 52 there is a subsection which seems to be particularly applicable to this purpose. Among other subjects of legislation which are in that Bill

Matters referred to the Parliament of the Commonwealth by the Parliament or Parliaments of any State or States, but so that the law shall extend only to the State or States by whose Parliament or Parliaments the matter was referred and to such other States as may afterwards adopt the law.

This clause with verbal amendments would meet the whole case of these railways if at any time a majority of the House of Representatives and a majority of the Council of the States should choose to say that they should be taken over, having first obtained permission from the local Parliament. Let us wait until that time, and not undertake to do anything specific in that direction now, which would interfere with the powers and privileges of any States. Territories which include the landed properties of the States have been conceded to be theirs for ever, and the railways have been constructed by these States themselves for the development and improvement of their territories. The hon. member, Sir William Zeal, has said something about preferential rates.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Differential.

Mr. BARTON:
Well, differential. There is a distinction drawn by several members between differential and preferential rates. I think that the difference is admirably expressed in a book which has been written upon "The Public Regulation of Railways." It was written by Mr. W. R. Dabney, formerly chairman of the Committee on Railways and Internal Navigation, in the Legislature of Virginia, and was published in 1889. It contains an analysis of the Inter-States Commerce Act, and is in every respect particularly valuable. I am about to quote a short passage, which, to my mind, emphasises the distinction between differential and preferential rates, and it is a differential rate which is aimed at in this passage which occurs in a decision given by the Inter-State Commerce Commission:

It is a very familiar rule in the transportation of freights by railroads, and has become axiomatic, that while the aggregate charge is continually increasing the further the freight is carried, yet the rate per ton per mile is constantly growing less all the time. In consequence of the existence of this rule the aggregate charge continues to be loss in proportion every hundred miles after the first, arising out of the character and nature of the service performed and the cost of the service, and thus it is that staple commodities and merchandise are enabled to bear the charges of transportation from and to the most distant portions of our country. Examples showing the universality of this rule may be seen in the tariffs of the railroad companies generally in the United States, where their length is sufficient to admit of its application. . . . . The Act to regulate commerce, so far from throwing hampering restrictions or obstacles in the way of the operation of this salutary rule, gives it all the benefit and aid of its sanction and safeguards by providing that the carrier shall be entitled to recover a reasonable compensation for the services performed upon open published rates, against which no competitor can take advantage by allowing shippers secret rebates and drawbacks in order to get the business.

That is a fair definition of a differential rate, as opposed to a preferential rate. A preferential rate is a rate which prefers one port against another port, or a citizen against another citizen; a rate which is imposed for the purpose of attracting trade from one port and giving it to another. A rate which does this in such a manner as to make preferential charges quite apart from that salutary rule which is the essence of the Inter-States Commerce Act, is a preferential rate-a rate by which a citizen outside the bounds of a colony or State is treated preferentially as against the citizen who is within its bounds. Allow me to give an instance. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that there is a place called Echuca on the River Murray, and two important ports called Sydney and Melbourne. Of course members will recognise that in all I say I am speaking, whatever my tone may be assumed to be, with the utmost desire to promote conciliation. Suppose, further, that there is a railway running from Sydney to the country to the south-west, and a railway running in the direction of Echuca from Melbourne in order to tap the Murray. Suppose such a rate as this is established, that the New South Wales producer living 250 miles from Echuca can have his wool carted to that interesting place and thence carried by rail from end to end of Victoria to Melbourne at a charge of 2s. 9d. per bale. Suppose also that there is a quiet drawback, or bonus, or whatever you may like to call it, to the carrier of 6d. per bale. Then suppose that the unfortunate producer of Victoria, having raised his wool in that patriotic colony, wishes to have it carried over the same distance to the same port and finds that he is charged 6s. 1d. per bale. That is what I would mean by a preferential rate. And that would be an instance of the very thing which the Inter-States Commerce Act not only condemned but abolished, that is the attempt to give preference to one part of the Commonwealth over any other part.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

Does not that show the necessity for federal control?

Mr. BARTON:

It shows the necessity for a clause in the Constitution to deal with such matters. There is a useful clause in the Commonwealth Bill which I do not think we should be above adopting. It is the power given at the beginning of Section 52 for the regulation of trade and commerce with other countries and among the several States, and if we were to add to the words "trade and commerce" the word "traffic" we should have something distinctly federal in its operation. There is a clause in the Constitution of the United States in almost the identical words that are in the Draft Bill of 1891.

Mr. GLYNN:

The Act is not effective.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not think that if the hon. member looked at the book from which I have been reading he would have said the Act has not been effective. In these colonies there are only half a dozen proprietaries instead of say a hundred private proprietaries, as in the United States, and the scope of such an Act need not be so wide and its administration one-tenth so difficult here.

Mr. GLYNN:

I quoted from a book five years later.

Mr. BARTON:

The Act might not have been so entirely effective as the framers intended it to be; but in that case we shall have to pass a better one. In the meantime what shall we do? As I shall not be a member of the Committee on Railways I would suggest that we should have a clause or two drawn up ready to deal with a difficulty of this kind. I have a clause prepared in rough draft which deals with this subject, and I do not see why I should not read it now.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I understand that these preferential rates have been held void as against the Constitution of the States?

Mr. BARTON:

They have been held void as against the provisions of the Inter-States Commerce Act.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Before that.
Mr. BARTON:
They may well have been held to be against the provisions of the Constitution. I will read a clause in the Commonwealth Bill. It is the first clause under the heading "Equality of Trade."

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
What you are quoting are the results from competition of private companies.

Mr. BARTON:
I am aware of that.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Are not our railways State railways?

Mr. BARTON:
That does not cure the mischief. I will read the clause which exists in the Commonwealth Bill, clause 11, chapter iv.:

Preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one part of the Commonwealth over those of another part of the Commonwealth.

I would suggest that there should be a clause something like the following, but more condensed:—

No law or regulation of trade, commerce, revenue, or traffic shall be made by the Commonwealth or any State, or by any authority or corporation constituted by the Commonwealth, or any State, or by any individual purporting to act under the authority of the Commonwealth or any State, which shall have the effect of giving preference to any port or ports of one part of the Commonwealth over the port or ports of any other part of the Commonwealth, or which shall have the effect of giving any undue or unreasonable advantage to the inhabitants of one part of the Commonwealth over the inhabitants of any other part of the Commonwealth, or which shall have the effect of unfairly diverting trade, commerce, or traffic from one part of the Commonwealth to another, and the Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws for carrying out the provisions of this section, and for annulling any law or regulation of trade, commerce, revenue, or traffic contrary thereto, or having the effect of derogating in any way from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth.

That clause in a somewhat shorter form would meet the difficulty, except as to one matter that has been pointed out by my friend Mr. Symon, the difficulty that the prerogative of the Crown may intervene. That difficulty can be overcome by another very short clause, and the reason I have not read out the draft of a clause on that subject is that it will require some little time to consider it properly, especially as to whether the scope of it may not be further increased.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
In order that the Constitution may bind the Crown?

Mr. BARTON:
Yes.

Mr. REID:
A general clause to that effect might be provided.

Mr. BARTON:
I have provided there a provision which may be imperfect, but it is difficult to provide in any concise clause for the overcoming of this difficulty of preferential rates.

An HON. MEMBER:
What is the difference between preferential and differential rates?

Mr. BARTON:
I shall endeavor again to show the difference between preferential and differential rates. Mr. Dabney says in effect that a preferential rate is a competitive rate between railway and railway, whether they belong to the State or not, so framed as to give an unfair preference to place over place, or to citizen over citizen. A differential rate is a rate which provides that as you increase the distance of haulage you may diminish the rate paid for haulage, provided that in the aggregate you do not charge less for haulage to the more distant part than you do to the less distant part.

Mr. ISAACS:
It would, I understand, rest with the decision of the court as to whether any minimum should be declared void.

Mr. BARTON:
It would rest with the tribunals of the Commonwealth to declare any particular regulation of traffic void. If any suit arose between party and party it would be regulated at once by any person appealing against a rate exacted by a State railway and suing for a refund. So far in regard to this question of preferential rates, and if we provide in some such manner as here outlined for the abolition of preferential rates and charges there is no further need for the Convention to take into consideration precisely the question of amalgamating the railways. The feeling against amalgamating the railways is so strong in every one of the colonies that the people would not consent to its being placed in the Constitution.

Mr. WISE:
I do not think anyone is prepared to do more than give the Commonwealth power to take the railways over.

Mr. BARTON:
I have said we might well agree to a clause giving that power, but not without the consent of the owners of the railway.

Mr. WISE:
That is the point.

Mr. BARTON:
Then I shall submit that, inasmuch as these railways are not in essence a subject of federal property, it would not be fair to give the Commonwealth power of resumption over the railways, even if they paid a fair price, because the railways, being so inherently connected with the development of the States, it should be for the local Parliaments to say whether they would hand them over or not.

Mr. WISE:
Would you admit federal railways?

Mr. BARTON:
I grant that in time it may be necessary to provide for the construction of a federal railway for strategic purposes. If the hon. member wants to make any proposition of that kind it will be respectfully listened to, but as we are situated at presents for all strategic purposes, so far as the military commandants have enlightened us, the present railways are sufficient for carriage to any likely point of attack. If other necessities arise they may be dealt with as they arise. Of course the Commonwealth must have power, and, indeed it would have power without express provision to take possession of and to control any means of carriage that exist for the purpose of the transport of men, munitions of war, and the commissariat in times of war. That is as it ought to be, and to this extent, therefore, I suggest that, for greater clearness, power should be given to use the lines of railways, and if further necessities arise they may be dealt with. Then, so far as we know, we shall have provided for any emergencies we can foresee. I grant that trouble may arise over the break of gauge, but even if no legislation is passed to deal with the railways in the direction of enforcing the constitutional provisions I have outlined, there may still be a board appointed with the added functions of an advisory body, whose suggestions would be accepted in the same way as the suggestions of the Board of Trade are now accepted by railway authorities in England, and so from day to day the extinction of the break of gauge would draw nearer. Upon this railway question I do not profess to be able to speak with any great knowledge or experience, but I suppose the conclusion which the Convention has come to is that intercolonial trade must be free, or Federation is a mockery; and resting upon that principle are the rights of the Commonwealth to insist that preferential rates must be entirely abolished. At that point the right of the Commonwealth to interfere with the railways should cease, and its rights having ceased, it should go no further. It is said we have too large a revenue if the railways are not taken over. I admit the distribution of the surplus seems to present a great difficulty to the best financiers of this Convention; and in this connection I should like to say a word about the evils of a system which involves too much book-keeping between the States and the Commonwealth. One does not require to be a financial expert to know that matters of book-keeping and financial interchange between the States and the Commonwealth are among the most dangerous that can obtain: We know from the experience of Canada that the provisions which exist in its law, for certain doles or grants per capita to be made to the States, have been productive of a great deal of whatever political corruption there has been in that Dominion. We know that however stiffly we may provide by our local Acts that there shall be no relation between the Central Government and the local and municipal bodies, there is always the endeavor by the latter to get the better of them.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There is always something too national for the shire council.

Mr. BARTON:
Yes; there are always national works. We do not want that kind of thing between the State and the Commonwealth, and we must avoid it. We must avoid monthly or quarterly accounts and debits between States and the Commonwealth. It has been suggested that this difficulty would be reduced by taking over the debts of the various colonies. Here again it is impossible for me to speak with any degree of knowledge, but I listened with attention to the speech of Sir Philip Fysh, who threw a great deal of light upon the subject, and his speech went a long way towards reconciling one's mind to the question of what to do with any surplus unnecessarily in the hands of the Federation. Some tell us that the credit of the Commonwealth will not be a better credit than the credit of the States. That is founded upon the falsest assumption. It is founded upon the assumption that the credit of a community depends upon its assets. That is not the security for the payment of the public debts. No one could point this out more clearly than it was pointed out by Sir George Turner. It is the existence of a strong and stable Government, such as you will have under Federation, and the existence of a people under it whose constitution is a guarantee that their efforts at the attainment of prosperity will be unhampered—it is that which makes the credit of a nation. The very fact of several States joining in a Commonwealth which has such a strong and stable Government will also help to improve the credit of those States. So that the result of Federation in the first place would be an improvement in the provincial credit; and if you carried out a scheme such as has been suggested for the consolidation and conversion of the public debts of the colonies, by that process you would not only keep the credit of the States unimpaired, but, you would improve it, and you would hand over the public debts to a central power, whose credit would be higher still. Otherwise, what appears inevitable, namely the existence of a surplus in the hands of the Commonwealth—though I did not hold that opinion when I entered this Convention, and that again shows the benefit of this discussion—would seem to present very great difficulties, and deserves the serious attention of the Committee upon finance and trade.

The existence of anything in the shape of an absolutely inevitable and unnecessary surplus is a thing much to be deprecated, and one likely to give rise to that state of things that has been termed in Canada "agitation for better terms," one which will lead not to union but to disunion, and will be a provocative of friction as well as an incentive to plunder. I hold that opinion very strongly. However, if there must be a surplus there must be some basis of distribution. I leave the discussion of the whole question to the Committee of Finance, Trade, and Taxation, but I think that the Convention itself should endeavor to show that it has some consensus of opinion on this subject, and, while it does not wish to interfere with the Commonwealth in the full exercise of its powers or prevent it from raising Customs taxation and from voting the appropriations which are necessary for the purpose of giving life to the powers with which we invest it, it is necessary to prevent anything in the shape of an unnecessary surplus. We should try and avoid such a mistake as to confer upon the Commonwealth a surplus as to which there would be necessarily some method of distribution involving haggling amongst the States, and which if not distributed might lead to incentives to extravagance and perhaps to corruption in a body which it is the desire of all to keep as pure as we trust it will be efficient. Other proposals might be made on that head, but it is clear now from what I have heard in the debate on this question that we should, at any rate in our Finance, Trade, and Taxation Committee, as well as in committee of the whole House, endeavor to prevent any action of ours bringing about of necessity a surplus to be distributed under conditions of such great danger as might ensue. We have had a proposal from Mr. Holder, to solve that difficulty by allowing the States to collect the revenue and then hand over periodical doles to the Federation. The first objection to that is that a union constituted on such principles is not a Federation. Any body which lives upon doles, or annual, half-yearly, quarterly, or whatever they may be, payments of the States to that body, is not a Federation at all. It depends for its lifeblood upon the States and not upon the individual citizen, and so far as it depends upon that, so far as that principle of the individuality of the citizen in his power of control, and in his capacity as a source of revenue is departed from, to that very extent you abandon Federation and set up some other form of Government. All that is a matter of principle which cannot possibly be abandoned. We have had other gentlemen making proposals. There was another gentleman representing South Australia who made similar proposals, and I take theme proposals, if I may venture to say so without any disrespect to these gentlemen, as being wholly anti-federal and not in accordance with the charge which we stand here to perform. We are sent here charged with the duty of framing a Federal Constitution, and those who come here to substitute for Federation something which has not its attributes and powers, come here to give us something which the citizens have told us to avoid. Efforts like these are not in accordance with the statutory obligation and task which has been laid before us; they are not in obedience to the command with which we have been sent here, and if they are carried into effect they will be an actual fraud upon the duty we stand here committed to discharge. It needs only that that should be stated—provided the principle is accepted that doles from the States are not a medium of Federation—to show that it is not in our scope to accept such proposals, and that they must be abandoned entirely as being anti-federal. We are here to frame a Federal Constitution. The seventh section of the Enabling Act makes our duty clear, and we cannot accept these proposals to which I have referred and still keep to our statutory duty. The same gentlemen have made other proposals by which they wish to cut down the attributes of the Commonwealth in such a way that there would be practically nothing left for the Commonwealth to perform. What is the use of erecting this complicated piece of machinery if the States are to continue to do everything for themselves? Our labors here rest upon the position that there are functions which none of the States can perform effectively for the whole, and also that there are numerous things which can only be performed effectively for the States as a whole by the passing of a uniform law which would govern the whole of the States as one. The States have sent us here charged with the duty of arriving at a Federal Constitution, and we are charged, further, with the duty of giving a Constitution embodying such powers as will make it strong and effective, and giving it such power that even if, with a certain degree of efficiency, certain things could be performed locally, they could be still better performed by a central control over the whole. I admit that I consider the control of the post offices and telegraphs has the elements of this principle. It is all very well to urge that there is an efficient system in operation in South Australia, and that it pays. I do not wonder it pays when one has to put a twopenny stamp on a town letter, and that one cannot communicate with a friend in New South Wales, by telegraph, without paying two shillings. The charges are so high as to amount to a public inconvenience.

Mr. HOLDER:
We do not charge higher than the other colonies.

Mr. BARTON:
We charge only a penny for a letter in New South Wales, and a shilling for a telegram to Victoria.

Mr. HOLDER:
We charge the same from Adelaide to Sydney as they charge from Sydney to Adelaide.

Mr. BARTON:
We at any rate have always been ready to accept low charges reciprocally with the other colonies, and if the result of our liberal policy has been that the departments do not make a profit, it is not a reason for not federating the posts and telegraphs, but rather for coming to such an arrangement between all the colonies.

Mr. HOLDER:
They are purely local matters.

Mr. BARTON:
I say that they are not purely local matters, as they include the subsidising of mail lines, the arrangement of transcontinental telegraphs, and the arrangement of oceanic cables. It is not in the interests of Oodnadatta but in the interests of Australia that we should place all these matters under one common control. Mr. Holder does not represent Oodnadatta—we heard a great deal about Oodnadatta last night—but I do say that the suggestions to leave the control of such matters as the post and telegraphs to the local Governments comes from a mind not accustomed to the consideration of the largeness of the project.

Mr. HOLDER:
That is distinctly unfair.

Mr. BARTON:
I believe I am not unfair; but if the hon. member thinks I am, I regret it, and if it turns out that I am so the hon. member will find me most ready to apologize. If we are to have the control of such matters as mail subsidies, transcontinental telegraphs, and oceanic cables in the hands of the Federal Government, it would be an unwise and injudicious policy to take away from that body the control of the reticulation, on which these other matters are based.

Dr. COCKBURN:

They are separate from federal matters.

Mr. BARTON:

It would be a division which would hamper the Federal Government by the inconvenience of the arrangement which would follow on their division. If we are to confine the Commonwealth to a body which is to simply frame a Customs tariff, and to take charge of such matters as quarantine, ocean lighthouses, and some little interference with buoys and beacons, it is a pity that the States have gone to the expense-in one instance I believe of between £30,000 and £40,000-of holding the election in order to be represented here. Let me not be unfair, because this very question brings me to the question of the protection of the States. There is no one who holds more strongly than I do that it is necessary to provide for the maintenance of the proper individuality of the States. Those who took part in the Convention of 1891 can bear witness in that respect. I recognise the great difficulties there are in the way of maintaining the full individuality of the States, and at the same time adhering to our well known form of responsible government; but I believe that they can be surmounted, and that it would be a shame on us if we, in the first instance, charged with the framing of our Constitution, did not make an effort to surmount them. Recognising these difficulties, I believe that the States which happen to be the less populous, should be dealt with liberally and generously. The State interests must be conserved, not only by safeguarding their full right to exercise all functions reserved to them, but by making the powers to be exercised by them so certain that there can be no doubt, even if the matter is referred to the Supreme Court, about the clearness of the definition.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

There is the danger of the powers overlapping.

Mr. BARTON:

I am coming to that in a minute. We have not only to attempt to safeguard State rights by placing provisions for that purpose in the Constitution, but we must also take great care to make the machinery as fully applicable to the preservation of those interests which are erroneously called State rights as if they also were set down in the bond. There have been cases of overlapping, as we find in the records of the United States, and the reports of the Privy Council in the case of Canada. We know that there is constant liability to overlapping; that when the federal body exercises its powers of legislation which are definitely given to it, if the utmost care and the utmost precision are not exercised to confine the legislative operations within the circle of the power given in the Constitution, there will be these cases of overlapping in the federal law, which would constitute an encroachment upon the competency and individuality of the States. These cases must arise, and they form one of the strongest arguments for a second Chamber in the Federation, and for arming that Chamber with competent powers to prevent that overlapping. When such cases occur, you have to call in the machinery of the Federal Court, and may be afterwards the machinery of the Privy Council; but is it not better that there should be in the Constitution an element in the shape of a second Chamber, which will do its utmost to try and keep these powers, which will keep legislation within Constitutional limits, and prevent resort to authorities external to Parliament? That is one of the strongest necessities it seems to me for a second Chamber. If the principle is not conceded that federal laws require the assent of the people and the assent of the States, why is it that the most democratic amongst us concede two Houses? I suppose there are some among us who will say that in a separate form of government, a government not united or federated, they would get along very well with one Chamber instead of two. But the most democratic—even if they are not representatives of this hospitable State in which we are now sitting, South Australia, there are those of Tasmania, and others—who would urge this, that even if they might not be reconciled to a second Chamber in their own colony as a separate State, they would not be reconciled to a Federation without a second Chamber. Why is this, unless it be a recognition of the fact that the laws require the assent of the people and also of the States? With a National Assembly as the sole Chamber the clear tendency must be to engulf State interests. If you have the States Assembly alone with equal representation, there would, I think, be a clear tendency to that kind of loose confederation in which the Union would be dependent upon the States. If that were the principle of the Federation we should have something very little better than the principle of even the Federal Council at Hobart or the abolished Articles of Confederation of the United States. It is recognised that neither of these things will do; that you must have two Chambers, one Chamber for the representation of national interests and the other Chamber for the representation of State interests. If you depart from that principle you must be giving too great power to the national interests or too great power to the State interests and the golden mean is reached by granting these two Chambers. This is, of course, an elementary proposition; and the reason I refer to it I will make clear enough. The reason is that if you have your body constituted in either of the ways I have spoken of, neither of the conditions would make a Federation; and as we come here charged to make a Federal Constitution, we cannot make a piece of legislative machinery of that kind. We must not make our legislative machinery so that we shall have either unification on the one hand, or a confederacy on the other. Clearly, then, the intention of two Houses is to make the principle a rule of daily governance. Though it might happen that such necessity might not arise in more than a fractional part of the proceedings of the Commonwealth, still the principle must be inserted as a rule of daily governance, because there will be no day on which the necessity for the exercise of that principle might not arise. Then the mere concession of the principle of two Houses is enough to show that one must rest on the basis of proportional population, the other on State entities. This is the gist of the matter, that there are two different entities to be preserved. They are both necessary to constitute a Federation. One unit is the individual citizen, and the other unit is the State entity. We are bound to confess that both the individual citizen as represented in the National Assembly and the individual State as represented in the States Council must have their powers, and you must provide so that in each case the majority of the units shall prevail. I do say that you must so protect your Constitution that you will not have a majority of citizens dominating the State interests, or the State interests dominating the national life; but it must be so constituted that the interests they each represent are firmly embedded in the Constitution, and you must leave the future to the evolution of those two legislative bodies, which command the respect of both entities of the Federation, namely, the majority of the citizens, and the majority of the States. At the same time attacks have been made in the course of debate by the representatives of both extremes. We have almost been told, on the one band, that the mere principle of numbers should control all the operations of the Federated Commonwealth, and on the other hand, that the principle of State entity should be so strong that in all circumstances, and no matter in what emergency, the greatest functions of a Commonwealth are not to obtain. I hold that neither one nor the other, but the middle course, is the just one. Then if these interests must be preserved in general legislation are they to be defenceless in the financial legislation? That is the question which next forces itself upon us. If it is conceded as a matter of reason - and I think it is by the majority of the Convention—that these interests are existent and therefore deserve preservation in ordinary legislation, how is it that these claims are not to be regarded in legislation relating to money? We know there are a number of propositions of legislation containing money proposals that commonly come under the name of Money Bills. They are, however, erroneously so called. There are many Bills which have for their object the making of a tax or appropriation, and they are Money Bills pure and simple. There are others which are for carrying out general projects of legislation, and which contain money provisions which will be charges on the people—provisions which are incidental to the carrying out of a higher legislative object. They are not Money Bills, though they are so called, but they are precisely the class of Bills in regard to which, without any infringement of the principle of constitutional government, a free hand to amend or veto in detail must be conceded to the States Assembly representing the different States. But I concede this at the outset: that if the principle is adopted which I suggested in opening this debate, and the suffrage of the electorate of the Senate is left in the hands of each individual State, we may get a House of the States a little weaker by the operation, because you may not secure that the House of the States will be representative by the direct action of the voters in the States - you may have some of them elected, for instance, by the State Parliament, some of them in various other ways, and there may be direct and indirect representation. But if you concede that the House of the States is to be chosen by the direct action of the electors, for the whole of the colony without the restrictions of electoral districts, then you have the principle of popular representation absolutely faithfully preserved in the Senate. Therefore there is very much more reason why we should concede the principle that they should have the same hand in moulding the financial legislation of the Commonwealth. Just as the National Assembly rests upon the individual citizenship of the people, the States House, although it rests upon the action of the States as entities, if it is elected on a popular vote upon the widest possible footing, cannot be distinguished from the House of Representatives in the attribute of popular representation. Can the States Assembly be less representative when elected on that basis than the House of Representatives? If this is so, then we have to face the dilemma raised by Sir John Downer, who put it that supposing it were conceded that under a bi-cameral Constitution the predominance must be given to that Chamber which represents the citizenship of the people, meaning the National Assembly; yet if we had a Second Chamber, in which the citizens of the States were equally represented, how were you to say it was a compliance with the idea of popular representation that the money power was to be wholly in the hands of one? I admit the difficulty, and I am not prepared with so ready an answer as some, because although it might be urged that the citizen does not pay twice over when he pays the Commonwealth tax which originated in the popular assembly, still, he cannot forget that although a citizen of the State he has to pay that tax.

Mr. ISAACS:

Is not the true principle of federation this: that you first select such matters as are all admittedly collective interests, distinct from purely local interests, and then in the legislation in regard to these matters you endeavor as far as possible to obliterate what are, after all, merely arbitrary lines.

Mr. BARTON:

I think my friend has stated the principle with correctness. But the position remains the same. It is inevitable that almost every project of law will have the appearance of benefiting or injuring some individual State, and, if that proposition be, accompanied by proposals involving expenditure or the raising of money, there should be some representation of State interests in the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS:

Put it there for protection.

Mr. BARTON:

You put it there for protection, and if it is to be a protection it must be one that can be effectively exercised, and effectively exercised in all the turmoil of legislative action.

Mr. ISAACS:

Not necessarily.

Mr. BARTON:

It is not necessary that it arises on every occasion, but there are very few occasions on which, when you deal with a question which affects as a whole the Commonwealth, there will not be some interests of a State involved demanding protection - perhaps not seriously assailed, perhaps seriously assailed-but it is after all for those who represent the people in the State to judge of that and accord it the protection which they deem necessary. That is all I claim. I am not now contending against the principle of responsible government. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I believe that all that is necessary can be done, and yet with the doing of it all we can preserve the principle of responsible government. Sir John Forrest put the matter in a very practical light when he said:

If you have a National Assembly elected by the individual citizens, by districts and in proportion to population, and if you have the entire population of each State on a similar suffrage electing its equal quota to the Senate, which will be the people's House?

Some say the National Assembly under such circumstances would be the people's House; others say that both would be the people's Houses. There are some, however, who will be of opinion that the people will stand better on two legs than one.

Mr. REID:

It would not do to fight one another, then, would it?

Mr. BARTON:

I think the man who owns both legs will take care. I think the gentleman concerned who is both a citizen of the Commonwealth and the citizen of a State, may very well be left to take care of his pair of legs and see that one does not inflict damage on the other. But you must take care not to make him lopsided, though some of your propositions go that way.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

He will have to put his best leg foremost.

Mr. BARTON:

Yes; but what I would suggest is that you had better let him find that out for himself. If you elect your quota to the Senate on your widest suffrage and without division of your electorates, does that representation rest on citizenship or does it not? If it does, it must be allotted the power which accompanies Citizenship. If it does not, why and how does it live? I have urged before that we must rely on responsible Government. In 1891, as well as now, I have conceded that the ultimate responsibility may have to be in one House only; but I believe we must choose between responsible Government and the Swiss or the United States system; and I believe we can make provision here which may result in the operation of responsible government. Sir John Downer appears to think we can do that, and yet make the Executive of the day responsible to both Chambers. I do not at present see how that could be worked out, and we must, therefore, face the problem of constituting for ourselves that responsible government under which we have been accustomed to live, and of endeavoring to make it a principle of the federal system, or adopt Sir Richard Baker's suggestion, and take in an adaptation of the Swiss principle, which is founded on the American, or an adaptation of the American principle itself. Now it has been well, and thoroughly well pointed out, that the American form of constitution was an attempt to photograph the English Constitution, under which men who had broken away from the empire were then living. The ideals of responsible government had not then been reached. If that constitution had been made much later, there would be a much nearer approach to the responsible form of government than in that constitution.
As for the Swiss Constitution, I do not believe that they had reached in the latest development of their constitution a proper conception of the safeguards of liberty embodied in the English Constitution. They made some sort of copy of the United States Constitution, but are we to resort to that any more than they did? It is too much of a far cry for us, and we have advanced too far in political development and political thought to go back to the United States system for our Executive. As to the idea of doing away with party government by adopting the Swiss form, let us look at the facts. I will give an illustration and imagine the application of that Constitution to ourselves. Suppose the leading questions of the day were protection and free trade. You want a Parliament of 100, out of which you get your Ministry. We must suppose there is a majority for one or the other of those principles. Let us suppose that a majority of sixty is in favor of protection, and the minority of forty in favor of free trade. Will anyone tell me—will any of you who have been accustomed to the British Constitution to give effect to your party ideas and votes tell me—that when you come to the election of your Ministry under the Swiss form of government you will not vote by ticket for a set of Ministers to reproduce that power of partisan government, without which you have been unable to live hitherto?

Mr. ISAACS:

Unless as in Switzerland they are mere heads of departments.

Mr. BARTON:

They occupy a much more restricted place, and this in itself is a total subversion of our ideas of responsible government, which the people of this country would not look at. I think it was Mr. Symon who in his able speech laid down that you cannot do away with that ideal and that form of political life which centuries of development have given to those who live under the British Constitution, a development which was moulded by their fathers; and if you import anything like the Swiss or the United States Constitution into ours you would not be able to do away with party government, because the conditions under which you live would assert themselves.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

The Federal Constitution is not the British Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not say it is, but it is our bounden duty to work out our salvation by a form we know best in preference to that about which we know little. If we are to place the ultimate responsibility in one House, and we have a form we know and can wield, we are bound to try and work out our salvation by that; and, although it may be an experiment as regards Federation, it is better to take as an experiment the application to the Federal system of the well-known form of responsible government than to make the double experiment of adapting to one new system—that of Federation—a second system borrowed from Switzerland or America and foreign to the habits and unsuited to the genius of our people.

An HON. MEMBER:

You subordinate Federation to responsible government.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not think I do, because I have not expressed myself fully on it. We must choose between that form of responsible government and the Swiss and United States systems, and I cannot believe that our people, while adopting the federal system, which I believe can be made a cohesive and lasting form of government, can at the same time adapt itself to the Swiss or United States form of internal government.

Mr. DOBSON:

Would it not adapt itself to the fact that it has to get the consent of both Houses?

Mr. BARTON:

I am urging that you ought to give a larger power to the States Council than to the Upper House.

Mr. DOBSON:

The French Senate have turned out a Ministry.

Mr. BARTON:

They may have done so, but if you only look to the operation of the French system you will see that under it there are a few more changes of Ministry than changes of season, and we do not want that. We do not want anything that will operate to substitute the unstable for the stable. We do not want, either, a system under which, when the Government may be corrupt or blind to the convenience and interests of the people, the people are deprived of the sacred privilege of turning it out. The people of these colonies are too well accustomed to their freedom to submit to any kind of rule under which it could be said:

You have to take this man as your president, and you have to take these men as your Ministry, and they will have to sit there for four years in defiance of your wishes.

We as a people would never submit to it, and we would never submit to any form of government which deprived us of our freedom in case of the Ministry being proved unfit for their work. I was going to say this, that if we adhere to our ideal of responsible government, and if we adhere to the Cabinet system, there is nothing to prevent the States Assembly having much larger power in money matters than we would give to a local Upper House. Why should we not secure to a certain extent veto in detail to the States Assembly without violating responsible government? I am convinced that there is a way to do it, and if there were no other I have only to look to the Bill of 1891 to find a way. It has been called a compromise. In chapter I., clauses 54 and 55, these conditions are contained, and I think it is well to read them before we go into Committee, because it is advisable that we should all know what was done in 1891. Clause 54 says:

Laws appropriating any part of the public revenue, or imposing any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Representatives.

Clause 55 says:

The Senate shall have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of all proposed laws, except laws imposing taxation and laws appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the Government:

This does not propose that Tax Bills or the Annual Appropriation Bill should be amended. It goes on to say: which the Senate may affirm or reject but may not amend. But the Senate may not amend any proposed law in such a manner as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people.

I think the Senate would generally be found, in such a Constitution as will be evolved, from what I have heard of this debate, rather prone to prevent unnecessary taxation and unnecessary expenditure. The second part of the clause says:

Laws imposing taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only.

The third:

Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of Customs on imports, shall deal with one subject of taxation only.

The Customs Bill may be considered as dealing with one subject, although there may be many items in it. The fourth part of the clause says:-

The expenditure for services other than the ordinary annual services of the Government shall not be authorised by the same law as that which appropriates the supplies for such ordinary annual services, but shall be authorised by a separate law or laws.

That is to say that the ordinary annual Appropriation Bill shall contain only the ordinary appropriation for the services of the year and if there are other appropriations they must be sent up in separate Bills.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That is difficult to define.

Mr. BARTON:
It is no doubt difficult, but I do not think it is very difficult.

Mr. ISAACS:
If the question were to arise before the court regarding the inclusion of other appropriations it might render the Act null and void.

Mr. BARTON:
This Act if passed will be agreed to by the Imperial Parliament—the sovereign Parliament of Great Britain.

Mr. ISAACS:
If the hon. member will permit me I will make myself clear. A Bill passed by the Federal Parliament may contain something which the court may hold renders it null and void.

Mr. BARTON:
It is possible, but if that is his only objection I think the hon. member will find that the Committee will seek to make this clause more strict and binding. It lays down a principle, however, which I approve, and surely there is enough skill in constitutional law and draughtsmanship amongst us to make what is meant in this clause so definite that the court would have no doubt about its construction.

Mr. O’CONNOR:
The difficulty may be between the two Houses.

Mr. ISAACS:
The Bill may pass and someone take exception to it, with the result that the Supreme Court may set it aside.

Mr. BARTON:
There is enough ability in this Convention to define that matter in such a way that we may have still the advantage of such a provision. Then comes in another sub-section to which much exception has been taken in this Convention. It reads:

In the case of a proposed Law which the Senate may not amend, the Senate may at any stage return it to the House of Representatives with a message requesting the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein. And the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make such omissions or amendments, or any of them, with or without modifications.

The objection my friends, Sir George Turner and Mr. McMillan, have taken to this clause is that if the suggestions are rejected the States House would be belittled. I do not follow that at all. I do not see how if one House rejects the proposition of the other, as must continually be the case in matters where their powers are co-ordinate, the other House is belittled.

Mr. SYMON:

Make it "amendment" straight out.

Mr. BARTON:

You must look at it in this way, that you would then give power to amend Taxation Bills and the Appropriation Bill, but I do not think a majority of members will agree to that. We have to make our machine workable whatever we do, and I for one think that if the Bill contains only the annual expenditure for ordinary services of the year, it would be not only a very serious thing, but an extremely culpable thing, for any House to reject the ordinary annual services for the year. If you come to a Bill for the ordinary annual services under provisions like these, which put "tacking" out of the question, there can be no excuse except resentment or revenge for rejecting it. If, therefore, you take this power of suggestion as applying merely to a Taxation Act and the ordinary annual Appropriation Act - for those are the only cases in which amendments under this proposition of 1891 are not allowed-surely it is power enough to give when you remember that a veto or rejection would be a thing which would throw the whole country into confusion, and would only be proposed on account of resentment or revenge. The government of the country must be carried on, and with the government its public and annual services, and if those Bills which involve the salaries of the public service and ordinary appropriations were to be rejected, why-Senate or no Senate-the whole country of Australia, with a voice as strong in the smaller States as in the larger States, would condemn such a course. It is only in respect to these two matters this power of suggestion has been proposed. I find in the "Practice of the Legislative Council of South Australia," written by the very learned Clerk of this Convention, Mr. Blackmore, the nature of the compact which has actually been between the two Houses from 1857. It is not a Statute, but it exists in such a way that it can be understood. Hon. members will find it on pages 182 and 183 of that book. I will refer hon. members to another book, the "Practice of the House of Assembly," in which Mr. Blackmore, on pages beginning at 333 and going on for some dozen pages or more, has defined the whole process of the negotiations which took place, and has given in full the resolutions and messages of both Chambers. I am informed-and I think there are gentlemen in this Chamber who can say whether I am right or wrong-that this plan has worked with considerable success in South Australia. Mr. Playford, now Agent-General for the colony in London, but then Premier of South Australia, made strong reference in the debates in 1891 to the question, and I am further informed that while there have been occasional differences in the carrying out of this work of legislation, and making suggestions—the House to whom the suggestion is made either adopting or rejecting them—the average result has been an improvement in the relations of the two Houses, and a considerable improvement in many cases of the legislation sent from one House to the other. I really cannot see why the adoption of the process of suggestion should belittle either House. In those cases in which suggestion was provided in the 1891 Bill I would not concede the power of amendment, but the power of suggestion there sought to be given to the Senate is one that we might well import into the Constitution as a means of settling differences, to prevent such a calamity as a deadlock or the rejection of the ordinary Appropriation Bill.

Mr. Reid:
It is just possible that the power of suggesting these amendments might provoke that calamity.

Mr. Barton:
We must not be so conservative as all that; and I do not think my friend is generally so conservative. I do not think if we see a proposition made which has worked well in the light of experience—

Mr. Reid:
We do not get it here.

Mr. Barton:
Well, we have very good authorities. We have such authorities here as Sir Richard Baker.

Mr. Reid:
Hear, hear.

Mr. Barton:
And Mr. Playford. Mr. Reid: Hear, hear, and Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. Barton:
Mr. Playford is a politician of long experience, and has held high positions here. I say why should we hesitate to adopt such a plan when it is a proposal which, on the face of it, is consistent with, and has a tendency to, courtesy and good feeling between the two branches of the Legislature? Surely we will adopt that proposal, instead of running away from any difficulties which we cannot very well state, but only imagine, while we have before us the fact that it has promoted courtesy and good faith in legislation.

Sir John Downer:
That is only compromise.

Mr. Barton:
I dare say it is compromise. I am not so uncompromising as my hon.
friend Sir John Downer, or some other gentlemen who sit near him; but I may say that I honour gentlemen who, having once arrived at opinions, are reluctant to give them up readily. I think, however, that we are here to compromise, and, that we shall have to compromise to obtain the assent of those who sent us here to do what we are doing. It is said that to concede the powers of which I have spoken, would impair responsible government. I cannot say, nor can any man, that that would be the effect. If the object is to have responsibility to one House alone, I say the responsibility is not taken away from that House. We should not withhold the power to amend in the case of Bills which are not strictly Money Bills. The additional power is in the cases of certain classes of Money Bills, to have them sent up separately as to the objects which each defines with the power of rejection or veto as to each Bill separately sent up, instead of having them sent up in such a state that the Second Chamber would only have the intolerable and unfair alternative of either rejecting the Bill—which, though it might contain a legislative proposal which would be distasteful, might also contain a quite separable proposal with which it would agree—or else accepting a taxation they believed to be injurious to the community in order to pass the proposal to which they did not object. We should at all hazards avoid this. Why should there be such a difficulty about there being a veto allowed in matters of detail. Veto is no such uncommon thing. I believe it exists in the Imperial Parliament. May, under the head of "Rejection by the House of Lords of Provisions Creating a Charge," says:

The right of the Lords to reject a Money Bill has been held to include a right to admit provisions creating charges upon the people when such provisions form a separate subject in a Bill which the Lords are otherwise entitled to amend. The claim of privilege cannot therefore be raised by the Commons regarding amendments of such Bills, whereby a whole clause, or series of clauses, has been omitted by the Lords; which, though relating to a charge and not admitting of amendment, yet concerned a subject separable from the general objects of the Bill.

So it is here, if two legislative proposals for expenditure outside the annual services of the year, or two propositions for taxation are submitted. If they are embodied in one Bill, I take it, it is an unfair provision, because it does not enable the Senate to exercise its power of veto on one proposal, though it may not be in favor of both.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
One might depend entirely on the other.

Mr. BARTON:
That would not be a case of two separable propositions.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Take the Land and Income Tax Bill.

Mr. BARTON:
They are proposals which should never be in one Bill together. If there are two propositions more dissimilar in their incidence than a land and an income tax they are hard to suggest. One of them—the income tax—comes from the earnings or profits of the people, or of that portion of the people who, I was almost guilty of saying, are to "hump the swag"—at any rate they are to bear the burden. But the other—if a tax on the unimproved value of land—has no relation to the earnings or the thrift or the solvency of the person owning the land, and taxes that land on its unimproved value whether the owner makes a profit out of it or not. I am not attacking these forms of taxation, but I do say this: that it is impossible to imagine two taxes more diverse their very root, and I think Sir George Turner could not have selected a better example of two taxes which ought not to be included in one Bill. I venture to say this is undoubtedly cutting down the right of the Senate to protect the State, and preventing them from voting upon matters that should be put separately. I believe most of these matters have been well, and fairly dealt with in the Bill of 1891. I know some members are ready to accept the proposal providing that a referendum is also prescribed. I will go into that directly. have heard it said that if there are two Chambers in the Federation, and a proposal is carried in one by a majority, and in the other Chamber, representing the States, the majority of the representatives, who do not represent the larger population, negative the proposal, that House takes control. We have heard it said that if there are two Chambers in the Federation, and a proposal is carried in one by a majority, and in the other Chamber, representing the States, the majority of the representatives, who do not represent the larger population, negative the proposal, that House takes control. We have heard it said that veto means control; I think we have heard it argued here, and I ask those who think the right of veto means the right of control to consider this question: Will they in their own colony allow the second Chamber to have the sole right of initiation and amendment of Money Bills, and agree that they keep control of the Government by giving only the veto to the Lower House?

Mr. HIGGINS:
That is not the argument at all.

Mr. BARTON:
That is very often "not the argument," which cuts too near home. It may not be argued here in so many words, but it is asserted out of doors over and over again that where you have the majority in the one House affirming proposals, and representatives in the other House—of course these will be representatives—which re-

[P.386] starts here

resents the vote of the majority of the States, but not necessarily of the people rejecting them, then that House takes away the control from the Lower House in matters of taxation and expenditure. No more absurd proposal could be laid down, and if it were true then the very converse shows what would be the effect.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Suppose the Victorian Assembly resolved upon the adoption of free trade and the Council persistently rejected it, does not the Council control the people of Victoria, and compel them to continue in a direction against their wish?

Mr. BARTON:

Yes, in a sense; but not in the sense in which it is proposed. Put it the other way: if there is a reluctance in one Chamber to initiate a proposal that is in accord with the public wish, and which the other Chamber would pass, that is controlling the people as much against its will as it is possible to imagine.

Mr. ISAACS:

The answer to that is that the popular House is supposed, so long as it lives, to represent the popular will.

Mr. BARTON:

If you have two Houses, both elected upon a popular vote, which are you going to say is the popular House?

Mr. ISAACS:

Are you not forgetting the rights of representation?

Mr. BARTON:

It does not apply in this case, because in one you represent entities and in the other population; because one represents individual citizens and the other represents the States by the vote of the majority of their citizens. If you put the House that represents State entities upon a popular basis you cannot say it does not represent the population.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It represents individuals in the ratio of ten to one.

Mr. BARTON:

It is a contradiction in terms. Talking about ten to one does not change the matter a bit. We might just as well be in a bookmaker's ring to hear that. Both represent the people, and among them both represent the whole people.

Mr. SYMON:

It would not make a wrong horse win.

Mr. BARTON:

I am not trying to discount the principle that the Government must be responsible to one House, but within the operation of that principle we can grant much greater liberty to a Chamber which is one of the essentials of the Federation than we could give to a Chamber which is not one of the elements of any Federation. We are told of the difficulty of persuading electors to adopt a measure founded on compromise. I admit that upon this matter, if we are to be successful, we must compromise. My hon. friend Mr. Carruthers was right when he said there is always a difficulty in persuading the electors to accept a measure founded on compromise. But we must face that difficulty, because we cannot make a Federal Constitution without compromise. We must be ready—as we start from this point at the termination of this debate—to submit our views to compromise, provided we do not give up a principle which is so dear to ourselves, and so much an essence of our political action that it cannot be foregone at any price. But if there is a difficulty to get the electors of one State to agree on a measure founded on compromise, I ask is not every great measure founded in that way? But if our measure is not fa [P.387] starts here cause the sword is in the hand of the other party.

Mr. ISAACS:

The other party may not have a sword.

Mr. BARTON:

Then the shield would not be asked for. True, the shieldless party might wake up from a nightmare when the gas is out, and, having seen a sword in its sleep, it might reach out for a shield. But is that the way the hon. member wishes us to take him?

Mr. ISAACS:

We offer them a shield.

Mr. BARTON:

Yes, on the condition that you have the sword. I would like to carry my friend a little further. Of what use is the shield if the sword is persistently wielded? If the shield is in the hand of one party and the sword in the hand of the other, I know which is likely to die.

Mr. REID:

It is of some use, you know, if the fellow who has the shield does not die for six years anyhow.

Mr. BARTON:

I think he is very likely to die if he only has a shield whilst the other fellow has a sword. Even my hon. friend would be capable of the active exercise which would give him victory in such a case.

Mr. REID:

I would have to go on killing him for six years, and then he would not die.

Mr. BARTON:
The sword is not drawn yet, and Mr. Isaacs may talk about a shield, which Mr. Solomon suspected was made of cardboard. But I would like the hon. gentleman to analyse this expression; because if it is true that there are States amongst us who want a shield, that can only be because there is a sword in some one else's hand. I do not think my hon. friend has put the situation exactly in that case. If there is to be a battle, it is right that both parties should wield swords, and that both should have a shield; otherwise they would not be equal contracting parties to the fight. Is it fair to ourselves, however, that we should consider a matter from that standpoint? I think not. On the other hand, we are going into these subsequent discussions, which I hope will result in some concessions being made on all sides, so that, as a result of our deliberations, we may find that none of us want shields or desire to carry swords. We ought to enter into these negotiations with such ideas obliterated—negotiations which can only be successful if all elements of that kind be swept away—and I should like them to come like peaceful citizens to the banquet, and not say before they sit down, "Wait for a moment until I go and fetch my bludgeon."

Mr. ISAACS:
The sword illustration is an imaginary one all round.

Mr. BARTON:
I am sure my hon. friend does not mean it in any other sense. It is said that under the system which is proposed there will be deadlocks, one expression used during the debate being that We must provide for them or the machinery will go to pieces.

There was a quotation from a speech by Mr. Gladstone partly used by my hon. friend Mr. Clark, the representative of Tasmania, yesterday, and which was also used by Sir Henry Parkes at the Convention in 1891, and it is a very useful one when we consider the stage at which we have arrived. I will only quote the latter part of it. It is as follows:—

The undoubted competency of each reaches even to the paralysis or destruction of the rest. The House of Commons is entitled to refuse every shilling of the supplies. That House and also the House of Lords is entitled to refuse its assent to every Bill presented to it. The Crown is entitled to make a thousand Peers to-day and as many tomorrow; it may dissolve all and every Parliament before it proceeds to business; may pardon the most atrocious crimes; may declare war against all the world; may conclude treaties involving unlimited responsibilities, and even vast expenditure without the consent, nay, without the knowledge, of the Parliament, but in reversal of policy already known and sanctioned by the nation. But the assumption is that the depositories of power will all respect one another; will evince a consciousness that they are working in a common interest for a common end; and they will be possessed, together with not less than an average intelli-geance, of not less than an average sense of equity and of the public interest of right. When these reasonable expectations fail, then, it must be admitted, the British Constitution will be in danger.

Mr. TRENWITH:
That assumption has sometimes been falsified.

Mr. BARTON:
Every assumption is more or less falsified in politics. There is only one way out of the difficulties of Legislatures, and that is to make them the depositories of common sense when they know who their master is, when they know under what principles they are there, and when they know the limit to which reasonable objection can extend. While there have been instances of conflict having been carried beyond reasonable grounds, the clause I have read from the Bill of 1891 provided against the possibility of the recurrence of cases of that kind, or almost the possibility, and, for the rest, if we must provide for deadlocks—and it seems to be a large portion of the intention of this Convention to provide for deadlocks—we are referred to the Teutons. I have the book, "The Growth of the British Constitution," which my learned friend Mr. Isaacs referred, and I should like to read one passage which shows the circumstances under which we get something from the Teutons. On page 8 the author, Mr. Freeman, says:—

In the institutions of Uri and Appenzell, and in other of the Swiss Cantons, which have never departed from the primeval model, we may see the institutions of our own forefathers, the institutions which were once common to the whole Teutonic race, institutions whose outward form has necessarily passed away from greater States, but which contain the germs out of which every free Constitution in the world has grown. Let us look back to the earliest picture which history can give us of the political and social being of our own forefathers. In the Germany of Tacitus we have the picture of our institutions of the Teutonic race before our branch of that race sailed from the mouths of the Elbe and the Weser to seek new homes by the Humber and the Thames. There, in the picture of our forefathers and brethren, seventeen hundred years back, the full Teutonic assembly, the armed assembly of the whole of the people, is set before us well-nigh the same in every essential point as it may still be seen in, Uri, Unterwalden, Glarus, and Appenzell. One point, however, must be borne in mind. In the assemblies of those small Cantons it is only the most democratic side of the old Teutonic Constitution which comes prominently into eight. The Commonwealth of Uri, by the peculiar circumstances of its history, grew into an independent and sovereign State. But in its origin it was not a nation; it was not even a tribe. The Landesgemeiden of which I have been speaking are the assemblies, not of a nation, but of a district; they answer in our own land, not to the assemblies of the whole kingdom, but to the lesser assemblies of the shire or the hundred. But they are not, on that account, any the less worthy of our notice; they do not, on that account, throw any less light on the common political heritage which belongs alike to Swabia and to England. In every Teutonic land which still keeps any footsteps of its ancient institutions the local divisions are not simply administrative districts traced out for convenience on the map. In fact, they are not divisions at all; they are not divisions of the kingdom, but the earlier elements out of whose union the kingdom grew. Yorkshire by that name is younger than England, but Yorkshire by its elder name of Deira is older than England; and Yorkshire or Deira itself is younger than the smaller districts of which it is made up, Craven, Cleveland, Holderness, and others. The Landesgemeinde of Uri answers, not to an assembly of all England, not to an assembly of all Deiri, but to an assembly of Holderness or Cleveland. But in the old Teutonic system the greater aggregate was simply organised after the model of the lesser elements, out of whose union it was formed. In fact, for the political unit, for the atom which joined with its fellow atoms to form the political whole, we must go to areas yet smaller than those of Holderness and Uri. That unit, that atom, the true kernel of all our political life, must be looked for in Switzerland in the Gemeinde or Commune; in England-smile not while I say it-in the parish vestry.

Mr. ISAACS:

But he says, notwithstanding that, it forms the basis of the whole political Constitution, and he says more, that we are coming back to it.

Mr. BARTON:

We go to the Teutons for the referendum. These are the circumstances under which the referendum arose, and why should we be told to go to the Teutons to seek for such expedients? It was said by one hon. member [644] that our modern dissolution arises out of the referendum. It may arise out of it, but the germ of the modern dissolution is not in the referendum. I think it was Mr. Trenwith who attempted to show that the referendum was applied through the power of dissolution.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I said it was an application of the principle, but in a clumsy manner.

Mr. BARTON:
He proceeded to argue that the germ of it was to be found in the referendum.

Mr. ISAACS:
I do not think you are doing Mr. Trenwith justice.

Mr. BARTON:
I think I am. I had a note which I made at the time, and on which I am making this statement.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I did not use the word "germ" at all.

Mr. BARTON:
Mr. Trenwith is such a fair debater that I must be more than abundantly fair to him. If I have misquoted him, I apologise; but my argument is not affected. We have been asked to go to the Teutons, but I suppose there were others before the Tuetons who decided matters in the same way.

Dr. COCKBURN:
Greece and Rome.

Mr. BARTON:
And others before them. Wherever you found a tribe congregated together the affairs of that tribe were settled by their little referendum, and we may go back to the cave-dwellers, who were quite as familiar with their referendum as with their megatherium. How does that recommend the referendum to us? We are told that we have gone back 100 years to the time when men were imprisoned for sedition by advocating short Parliaments and manhood suffrage, but if it is a sin to go back 100 years, which I claim we have not done, what term must be applied to that sort of political research which with a political spade and mattock goes to dig up the referendum from amongst the bones of the megatherium.

Mr. ISAACS:
My hon. friend misunderstood me. My advocacy of the referendum rests on its utility and its application to our Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:
It would be an unwieldy thing for our higher civilisation, and would only be the means of promoting trouble and inconvenience. The principle of the referendum is found embodied not in our Constitution, but in our very Parliament itself. The referendum was the casual meeting together of the nomadic nations for the purpose of settling emergent questions, but when population increased, it was no longer possible to gather the tribe together under a tree or to learn the will of these small democracies by calling them together, it was found necessary to appoint representatives to settle matters. That principle we have in our form of referendum by parliamentary elections. As much as we want of the referendum we have in our Parliament, but some members wish us to go back to the rude implement of the nomad tribes, which is altogether too unwieldy and unsuitable for our more highly civilized form of Constitution.

We have found it necessary for Federation.

Mr. BARTON:

Is it not a fact that a pertinent question has been put to every gentleman who has spoken which he has found it almost impossible to answer.

Suppose your referendum or your other expedient to be tried, and still there is no agreement, what would you propose?" has been the question, and he says:

I do not know;
or else he says:
Resign or dissolve.

We do not want the referendum if we want responsible government, and I cannot reconcile in my mind, if I may say so with every respect, the attitude of those who so earnestly insist upon the preservation of responsible government in our Constitution, and yet want to give the referendum a greater influence in it even than at present.

Mr. ISAACS:

Responsible government means responsibility to the people.

Mr. BARTON:

Who has denied it? Why does the hon. member trouble me by telling me that responsible government means responsibility to the people? My learned friend has misunderstood my remarks from the start, as all through I have admitted that the ultimate responsibility must be to the National Assembly, and I do not need the instruction from my friend that responsible government means responsibility to the people.

Mr. TRENWITH:

And when your legislative machinery cannot agree in its various parts how are you to get the will of the people without reference to them?

Mr. BARTON:

When our legislative machinery does not agree in its various parts, I believe in the expediency of a dissolution far more than in the expediency of the referendum. I am perfectly agreeable to the referendum as a means of deciding the national will in certain events. When it comes to a question whether a new Constitution shall be created, or when the citizens are asked whether the Constitution shall be changed, then I admit that you may as well take the vote, because of the unique character of the decision, and because in such cases it does not whittle away the principle of responsible government; but when it comes to an everyday matter I do not see the
Mr. REID:
It does not follow from that that it is not a good modern implement.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not think my learned friend need to have told me that, because I do not admit the advantage of the application of the referendum in a general way; for the referendum for an ordinary question is unwieldy and too expensive.

Mr. WISE:
If you have enough referendum you can dispense with, Parliament altogether.

Mr. TRENWITH:
It would cost less than a dissolution at any time.

Mr. BARTON:
If it costs as much as a general election in New South Wales it will cost about £40,000, and I suppose it will cost £20,000 or £30,000 in Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It will cost less than that in Victoria.

Mr. BARTON:
I do not want to continue this speech at very great length. I want to finish within a reasonable time, and would point out to my friends opposite, as I have already pointed out, that the referendum may be resorted to when the matter is one like that of the making of a new Constitution, or when it is such a matter as the acceptance of a new Constitution or the amendment of the Constitution in a vital particular; but for daily use, it is certainly an inconvenient, an unwieldy, and an unnecessarily expensive implement. And I also contend, that with regard to the amendment of the Constitution or the acceptance of a new Constitution it is not in conflict with the principle of ministerial responsibility, and when you find any such conflict, then you should give up one or the other. Let us see what becomes of the referendum when applied in its fullest sense. Let us take the referendum as a court of appeal between the two Parliaments as a substitute for ministerial, dissolution, or facing the people, what is the result then?

Mr. FRASER:
Or the reduction of a number of members in the colony of Victoria.

Mr. BARTON:
That is the longest stretch of inference I have heard in the debate. What is the result of it upon the principle of responsible government? Our general conclusion is that if a Ministry cannot carry on without the confidence of the country it ought to resign. When a Ministry finds it is in conflict with the popular branch of the Legislature, and not with the other, and that the difference cannot be solved, in ordinary circumstances it could resign, and make way for those who can carry on the Government, or it would dissolve and ask for a renewal of the confidence of the people; but if the referendum is made an ordinary means of evading an appeal to the people, the Ministry may have its vital measures rejected; but on the Swiss plan that Ministry may stay in office as long as it likes, though it may be defeated on the referendum over and over again. Will anyone tell me that that is compatible with the principle of responsible government. Does it not undermine that very principle? Does it not sap it? If a Ministry can stay in office by a continuation of those processes -and at enormous expense, mark you-after having its measures rejected, and can say, "We shall wait until the expiry of our Parliament, when the people will support us.
Certainly we have lost our Land Bill, our Railway Bill, and our Customs Bill, but the people will support us." Cannot hon. members see that so long as that process goes on that Ministry which should have accepted its responsibility and faced the people can stay in office and flout that very principle which those who want this concession say still should be implanted in our Constitution as an essential of British political Government? Let me go a little further. What a convenient institution, it has been suggested to me, that is to save an hon. member from making up his mind. We have our real referendum in our system of Parliament which has led to the outgrowth of responsible Government, but to hold up this other expedient to save shivering Ministries and the very souls of trembling legislators, is not the principle we want embodied in our Constitution. We do not want to go back 1,700 years, after the magnificent political development which has occurred. When we want to plant responsible Government in our Constitution we do not want to dig up from some depth or other a poison which is to destroy that noble tree. I should like to say a little more about this referendum. I should like to apply another allusion of Freeman's to it. In his description of this tendency of growth, Freeman says:

Everywhere we find the king, the senate and the assembly of the people, and the distribution of power is not essentially changed when the highest personal authority is transferred from the hands of a king chosen for life to the hands of consuls chosen for a year. The likeness between the earliest political institution of the Greek, the Italian, and the Teutonic, is so close, so striking in every detail, that we can hardly fail to see it in possession handed on from the earliest times, a possession which Greek, Italian, and Teuton already had in the days before the separation, in those unrecorded but still authentic times when Greek, Italian, and Teuton were still a single people, speaking a single tongue.

Here we have the King, here we have the Senate, here we have the Assembly of the people; but because of our greater number and because of our civilisation, the Assembly of the people is an elected body, and not a mere gathering of warriors clashing their spears. Freeman goes on:

I have referred more than once to the picture of our race in its earliest recorded times, as set before us by the greatest Roman historians in the Germany of Tacitus. Let me now set before you some special points of his description in his own words, as well as I am able to clothe them in an English dress.

Here is Freeman's translation of the passage from Tacitus:

They chose their kings on account of their nobility, their leaders on account of their valour. Nor have the kings an unbounded or arbitrary power, and the leaders rule rather by their example than by the right of command; if they are ready, if they are forward, if they are foremost in leading the van, they hold the first place in honor.

That is not to be gained by giving them irresponsibility. Then Freeman goes on:

On smaller matters the chiefs debate, on greater matters all men; but so that those things whose final decision rests with the whole people are first handled by the chiefs. . . . The multitude sits armed in such order as it thinks good; silence is proclaimed by the priests, who have also the right of enforcing it. Presently the king, or chief, according to the age of each, according to his birth, according to his glory in war or his eloquence, is listened to, speaking rather by the influence of persuasion than by the power of commanding.

And listen to this:

If their opinions give offence they are thrust aside with a shout; if they are approved the hearers clash their spears. It is held to be the most honorable kind of applause to use their weapons to signify approval.

Now we know why the shield is wanted and the sword is wielded.

Mr. ISAACS:

It is very clever, but very unfair.

Mr. BARTON:

It is not unfair; I have not twisted any argument, but my friend is astonished to find his arguments lead to certain conclusions.

Mr. ISAACS:

Will the hon. member hear me for a moment?

Mr. BARTON:

When I have finished my speech; I think he has interrupted me quite enough. I have said enough to explain certain affections for the referendum by those who say they have an affection for responsible government. Give us responsible government, but, in heaven's name, give it to us entirely intact, and not coupled with those conditions which make for its early undoing. Let us crawl into office as we may, and shelve every question by the referendum so that we and the cowards who support us may hold perpetual office. When the vital question has been asked, "Well, if your referendum shows that you have not both a majority of the people and a majority of the States, what then?" is not the answer, to use a familiar school and college phrase, "I am stumped." Well, then, if you must have some way out of a deadlock, if the common sense which Mr. Gladstone was satisfied to trust is not to be imputed to our federated people, if you must have some little patent fastened on the boiler, let us select the easiest and cheapest way. The real way out of the difficulty is conciliation, conference, and common sense; but if you want a manufactured way, let us have the easiest and cheapest way out of the difficulty; and I would rather have the system proposed by Mr. O'Connor. I do not say I advocate that. I cannot see any satisfactory solution in the referendum, because if the House of Representatives represents the people, and the Senate represents the States, we shall have the same answer from the referendum as from the Legislature; and the right thing to do when you get the answer of the Legislature is to dissolve, and face the people.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Dissolve both Houses?

Mr. BARTON:
I have not come to that conclusion yet.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
The man who commences the assault should be locked up first.

Mr. BARTON:
If it becomes necessary as we consider the matter in Committee, I may not hold my hand. I believe with Mr. Higgins the time for compromises has not come yet. Now I come to say a last few words, for I will not go into other questions that were debated, because I wish not to press unduly on the time of this House. There was something said by Dr. Quick as to the suffrage to which I wish to give my answer, but I think we can discuss it in Committee, and I should like to appeal to the members upon this question. There is a necessity for many compromises, but it has been well and truly said by Mr. Higgins that the time for compromises was not during the debate. It was a time for uttering our opinions, and these resolutions were framed for that purpose, not, as some suppose, for the purpose of restricting debate, but so that we might touch the essential points, and everything which springs from them. We have had full and free discussion, and I think we have each treated each other with extreme courtesy. Mr. Higgins said the time for compromises has not come yet, but that is not because we may not afterwards agree in one direction or another. The time for compromise, then, has not come, and therefore the time for fully committing ourselves has not arrived, because our final determination of questions not generally admitted must in nearly every case be a compromise. Why does one say: "Good-bye to Federation if I cannot secure adult suffrage." What necessity for an expression of that kind? Why does another say: "Good-bye to Federation if I cannot secure co-ordinate powers to the two Houses." If we can frame a Constitution which approaches to a true and just Federation, while retaining that principle as to which the majority of us may come to a conclusion that it is vital, why should one say: "I will not have a Federation because I cannot get this"; and another: "I will not have a Federation because I cannot get that." It is the things that are vital that concern us. If anyone will tell us it is vital to the binding together of the various colonies in eternal bonds that adult suffrage should prevail and that every woman should have a vote, even in the colonies where they have not asked for it, I will tell that gentleman that he is misconceiving the purposes for which we have met. We can only arrive at Federation by the securing of principles which are just as essentials, and as regards those matters which are not essentials we should be traitors to our cause if we said we would not take Federation without them. Now, in the true spirit of compromise let us enter upon that stage which is assigned to us if we carry these resolutions, trusting each in his fellows' honesty and patriotism. I would ask the Convention what it is that is at their doors? The state of Europe at the present time is one which borders on a bloody and disastrous war. There are those who have said, and said it so often that the saying of it amounts to a mere fatuity: "Oh, Federation will come some day, and it will only come under the influence of some impelling danger." That phrase has been repeated so often by these people that they cannot see when an impelling danger is in their view. The Marquis di Rudini, the Premier of Italy, has told the Italian people in a manifesto that. "Nothing but the maintenance of the concert of the Great Powers can save Europe from a disastrous war." Are there any of us so utterly bereft of reason that we can not see this: If the nation to which we belong—even England herself - was ever in such a position that her navy was not equal to more than keeping in check the navies of other powers, then would that be the time for us to federate? Seeing such a combination against her, is there any one of us who would care to sit down and say, the British navy is to be our final protection? Was it so our fathers won what they have? Is it so they have kept it? What ought we to do, then? Are we to fold our hands, and with these smouldering fires, which at any time may burst into ravenous conflagration, full in our view, to say that the danger is not now and near? If any such contingency as that at which I have pointed arises, what will be our duty? What is good enough to have is good enough to keep. If we can enter upon a Federation which will give us those powers of defence—for they will never be aggressive—by which we can repel invasion we can grave for ourselves letters upon the record of the world's history which will tell, till that record is no more, that we are not unfaithful to our trust to the Empire, and not unworthy of the mother who bore us. But if we are to sit down in this languid way and say, "I will not take Federation because I cannot get this pet theory or fad of mine"—of course the man never calls it a fad, I am only translating him—then we shall never gain Federation. If we act in that spirit, or go on refusing the benefits of union which are offered us, then when the fire leaves smouldering and rushes forth in flame we shall be sore grieved that we listened to the idle tongue that spoke such words. This is the time of our danger; every day is the time of our danger. If we were not in a time of danger how idle it is for us to think that it is only with the enemy at our doors that we are to federate, and then only in a crude, ignorant, ill-assorted, and ill-formed alliance, which must only invoke disaster. But when, alert and ready, we have arrived at a fair settlement and have formed a just Constitution, it will be our shield and our pride when the day of attack shall dawn. Let us enter into these committees not with the base thought of wresting this or that from one neighbour or another, but with the pure resolve to accept any reasonable Constitution which will secure for us the justice embodied in the mandate of those who sent us here.

Mr. ISAACS:

On a question of personal explanation I would like to say—

The PRESIDENT:

I think, as the hon. representative of New South Wales has replied, that closes the debate.

Mr. ISAACS:

I do not wish to go against your wish.

Mr. BARTON:

May I support the request of my learned friend. It is my wish that he should have the right of explanation.

The PRESIDENT:
The representative of Victoria can only explain with regard to any material part of his speech.

Mr. ISAACS:

I am sure no one would allow any personal feeling to enter into this debate; it is too noble and too high a matter, and I should be the last one to dream of such a thing. The question that was referred to may be misunderstood, and if I occupy a minute or two I shall not be losing the time or wasting the attention of this Convention.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

On a point of order I object to this. Any personal explanation no doubt will be allowed, but if we are to be governed by the standing orders I submit that the hon. gentleman cannot give a speech. If the hon. gentleman is misrepresented in any shape or form he can explain it simply.

The PRESIDENT:

The representative of Victoria will only be in order in explaining himself in regard to some material part of his speech; and I ask him to confine any remarks he desires to make to such explanation.

Mr. ISAACS:

I have no desire to transgress the Standing Orders, but I think that in an assembly of this kind a little more latitude should be given in debate than in the technical proceedings of Houses of Parliament. I do not wish to be misunderstood as to the way I based my remarks on the referendum. Not for an instant did I base my advocacy of it upon its ancient origin. I dwelt to a large extent upon its utility and adaptability to our Constitution, and its most recent adoption in America by millions of people since 1890. It is successfully used there. The only reference I made to Mr. Freeman's work was when Mr. Barton said he did not wish to go to a foreign country for his Constitution. It was only a passing remark of mine that, although we based our adherence to that great principle of the referendum, upon its advantages, its inherent advantages and capability of adaptation to our circumstances, it would even then lie open to reproach that it was a foreign Constitution, because Freeman, in whose company I am free to bear any jibes that may be cast, says:

It is deeply embedded in the earliest traditions of the early Teutonic races.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

I rise to a point of order. I should like to make another speech, and I dare say other representatives would like to make another speech, but they would be entirely out of order in so doing, and I object to any one delegate being allowed to make a speech after the mover of the motion has replied. I submit that, according to the Standing Orders, the only point upon which the hon. member can address the Convention is to show the manner in which he has been misrepresented.

Mr. ISAACS:
If there is any objection to my explaining I waive my right.

The PRESIDENT:
There is no doubt as to the position, and I must ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to an explanation.

Mr. ISAACS:
Rather than be the means of other objections being raised I will waive my right.

The PRESIDENT:
The motion before the Convention is:
That, in order to enlarge the power of self-government of the people of Australasia, it is desirable to create a Federal Government which shall exercise authority throughout the Federated Colonies, subject to the following principal conditions:—

I. That the powers, privileges, and territories of the several existing colonies shall remain intact, except in respect of such surrenders as may be agreed upon to secure uniformity of law and administration in matters of common concern.

II. That, after the establishment of the Federal Government, there shall be no alteration of the territorial possessions or boundaries of any colony without the consent of the colony or colonies concerned.

III. That the exclusive power to impose and collect duties of Customs and Excise, and to give bounties, shall be vested in the Federal Parliament.

IV. That the exclusive control of the Military and Naval Defences of the Federated Colonies shall be vested in the Federal Parliament.

V. That the trade and intercourse between the Federated Colonies, whether by land or sea, shall become and remain absolutely free.

Subject to the carrying out of these, and such other conditions as may be hereafter deemed necessary, this Convention approves of the framing of a Federal Constitution. which shall establish—

(a) A Parliament to consist of two Houses, namely, a States Assembly or Senate, and a National Assembly or House of Representatives: the States Assembly to consist of representatives of each colony, to hold office for such periods and be chosen in such manner as will best secure to that Chamber a perpetual existence, combined with definite responsibility to the people of the State which shall have chosen them: the National Assembly to be elected by districts formed on a population basis, and to possess the sole power of originating all Bills, appropriating revenue, or imposing taxation.

(b) An Executive, consisting of a Governor-General, to be appointed by the Queen, and of such persons as from time to time may be appointed as his advisers.

(c) A Supreme Federal Court, which shall also be the High Court of Appeal for each Colony in the Federation.

I do not know whether the Convention is still desirous that I should put the paragraphs seriatim or en bloc.

HON. MEMBERS:

En bloc.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BARTON:

I ask leave to amend my contingent notice of motion by adding the following paragraph:

That the chairman of each committee have leave to give publicity to its resolutions as arrived at from day to day; and that the proceedings, as recorded by the Clerk, of each committee be made public so soon as Committee No. I shall have submitted a Bill to this Convention.

Leave granted.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

I. That the resolutions on the conditions under which and the powers with which it is desirable to create a Federal Government be referred to three committees, with power to send for persons and papers Committee No. 1 to be for the consideration of constitutional machinery and the distribution of functions and powers; Committee No. 2 to be for the considera-of provisions relating to finance, taxation, railways, and trade regulation; and Committee No. 3 to be for the consideration of provisions relating to the establishment of a federal judiciary.

II. That such Committees do consist of four, three, and two members resex officio a member of each Committee.

III. That Committee No. 2 be instructed to specially consider sub-resolutions III. and V. of Resolution 1, with the view to their being carried into effect on lines just to the several colonies.

IV. That it be an instruction to Committee Nos. 2 and 3 to report their respective conclusions to Committee No. 1.

V. That, upon the result of the deliberations of the several committees, Committee No. 1 do prepare and submit to this Convention a Bill for the establishment of a Federal Constitution, such Bill to be prepared with as much expedition as is consistent with careful consideration.

VI. That in each committee a majority do constitute a quorum.

VII. That such committees have leave to sit at any time.

With the addition of the paragraph which the Convention has just allowed me to add.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

There is on the notice paper an amendment in my name, but I do not propose to proceed with it. I should like to say that my object in giving notice of the amendment was to obtain greater expedition in the work in which we are engaged, but after having had the benefit of conferring with Mr. Barton, and having been assured that the procedure which he now proposes will result in greater expedition, I may say I have been largely guided by his advice in this matter, and I am sure many others have also been largely guided by his opinion—and as I desire to assist and work with him in every way in the responsible position he occupies, I do not propose to move the amendment.

The question was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON:

I think some consideration has been given by the various delegations to the question of which of them will represent them on the various Committees. If you will leave the chair, Mr. President, for a few minutes it will give them the opportunity of handing me the names.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Say till half-past 4.

The PRESIDENT:

So long as that?

Mr. BARTON:

There has been some consideration, but there may be some alterations.

At 3.58 p.m. the Convention adjourned until 4.30 p.m.

On resuming.

Mr. BARTON:

Mr. President, since you left the chair for a few minutes the various delegations have arrived at a conclusion as to those of their members who, in their opinion, should sit on the committees, and as they have courteously given the names to me I shall hand the list to the Clerk and ask that the names may be read to the Convention.

The PRESIDENT:

Let them be read.
The CLERK:
The Committees will consist of-
CONSTITUTIONAL COMMITTEE.
FOR NEW SOUTH WALES.
Honorable Sir J. P. Abbott.
Mr. Barton.
Honorable J. H. Carruthers.
Honorable R. E. O'Connor.
FOR SOUTH AUSTRALIA.
Honorable Sir R. C. Baker.
Honorable J. A. Cockburn.
Honorable Sir J. W. Downer.
Honorable J. H. Gordon.
FOR TASMANIA.
Honorable N. J. Brown.
Honorable A. Douglas.
Honorable N. E. Lewis.
Honorable W. Moore.
FOR VICTORIA.
Honorable A. Deakin.
Honorable I. A. Isaacs.
Dr. Quick.
Mr. Trenwith.
FOR WESTERN AUSTRALIA.
Honorable J. W. Hackett.
Mr. Hassell.
Honorable Sir J. G. Lee-Steere.
Mr. Sholl.
FINANCE COMMITTEE.
FOR NEW SOUTH WALES:
Honorable J. N. Brunker.
Mr. Lyne.
Mr. McMillan.

[Page 397] starts here
FINANCE COMMITTEE-continued.
FOR SOUTH AUSTRALIA:
Honorable F. W. Holder.
Honorable J. H. Howe.
Mr. Solomon.
FOR TASMANIA:
Sir P. O. Fysh.
Honorable C. H. Grant.
Honorable J. Henry.
FOR VICTORIA:
Sir G. Berry.
Honorable S. Fraser.
Sir W. Zeal.
FOR WESTERN AUSTRALIA:
Mr. Loton.
Honorable F. H. Piesse.
Honorable J. H. Taylor.
THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE
FOR NEW SOUTH WALES:
Mr. Walker.
Mr. Wise.
FOR SOUTH AUSTRALIA:
Mr. Glynn.
Mr. Symon.
FOR TASMANIA:
Mr. Clarke.
Honorable H. Dobson.
FOR VICTORIA
Mr. Higgins.
Honorable A. J. Peacock.
FOR WESTERN AUSTRALIA:
Mr. James.
Mr. Leake.
And the Prime Minister of each colony represented at the Convention is ex officio a member of each Committee.

Mr. BARTON:
I would suggest before the adjournment is moved that the gentlemen on the various Committees would kindly meet together to elect their chairmen, so that they may get to work at once tomorrow. I would suggest that instead of any lengthened adjournment being taken-inasmuch as the work of the Committees may not be so long as some think it may be-you should take the chair, Mr. President, at 10.30 every day as usual. That would give an opportunity for notices of motion and for obtaining returns and such other matters as may be necessary for the committees, and by that means when the Constitutional Committee brings up its report the Convention would then be able to go into Committee to consider the Bill without any delay.
Sir RICHARD BAKER:
Before the question is put I should like to say that the Legislative Council Chamber will be at the disposal of the Constitutional Committee, that being by far the largest Committee in number.

The PRESIDENT:
Of course if no resolution is moved fixing any other time of meeting, on the adjournment, this Convention will meet every day except Saturday at half-past 10 o'clock.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I would like to suggest that these Committees be appointed by the House. They have not been appointed yet. We do not know who they are.

The PRESIDENT:
I take it that effect has been given, as intended by the resolutions, to the mode of appointment provided with reference to the selection of the Committees, and that selection has been communicated to this Convention.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
How can the Clerk of the House record them?

Mr. TRENWITH:
In order to avoid any objection hereafter a formal resolution should be passed to clothe the Committees with authority.

Mr. BARTON:
I will move, if it is necessary to remove objections:
That the names as recorded by the Clerk at the table be the names of the several Committees appointed under the resolutions.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I second that motion.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.
Convention adjourned at 4.58 p.m.
Thursday April 1, 1897.

Petitions - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. LYNE:
I beg to present a petition from twenty citizens of New South Wales, members and adherents of the Congregational Church of Australia and Tasmania, praying for the recognition of God in the preamble of the Constitution of the Federation, and that the proceedings of the Federal Parliament be opened with prayer. The petition is respectfully worded. I move that it be received.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I have a similar petition to present from 1,969 members of the Church of England in South Australia. It is respectfully worded, and contains a prayer. I move that it be received.

Petitions received.

ADJOURNMENT.
The Convention adjourned at 10.32 a.m.
Friday April 2, 1897.

Petition - Suspension of Standing Orders - Sittings of Select Committees - Personal Explanation - Papers - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITION.

Mr. BRUNKER:
I have the honor to present a petition from the members and adherents of the Church of England in Australia and Tasmania. It is respectfully worded, and contains the usual prayer, and I move that it be received.

Petition received.

SITTINGS OF SELECT COMMITTEES.

Mr. WISE:
I desire to move, with the concurrence of the Convention, the suspension of the Standing Orders, to enable me to move a motion without notice. The motion I desire to move, if the Standing Orders are suspended, is one which will allow, if it is carried, any member of the Convention, by permission of the Chairman, to be present at the proceedings of any of the Committees of the Convention now sitting. I therefore move:

That the Standing Orders be suspended, to allow me to move a motion without notice.

Dr. QUICK:
I rise to second that motion, and in doing so I think it will probably be advisable to add to the proposition that the press be enabled to be present, as well as members of Convention, at the meetings of the Select Committees, because I find in to-day's papers, in Adelaide, there is not a correct statement of the proceedings of the Constitutional Committee; in fact there are very serious mistakes indeed, to which I intended to have drawn attention, apart from the motion of the hon. member. I find it is stated-

The PRESIDENT:
I would suggest that the better plan would be to suspend the Standing Orders first, and then discuss the matter on the motion to be submitted by Mr. Wise.

Dr. QUICK:
I wish to support any proposition which will enable proper publicity to be given to the proceedings of these committees. I do not feel justified in stating what the mistake is, under the circumstances, because it might involve a question of privilege, but it would certainly remove a great deal of misapprehension which may hereafter arise as to the proceedings of these committees if proper publicity were given to them, and I appeal to Mr. Barton to support me in that view of the question.

Mr. BARTON:

There has been a gross breach of privilege, because there has been a breach of the secrecy of the committees already committed.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. WISE:

I move—

That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable any representative, by permission of the Chairman, to be present at the proceedings in Committee of the Convention.

I limit my motion as originally proposed - of course, it will be competent for any member to move an amendment-but my motion is designed merely to allow of any members of the Convention, after they have done their work, or who may not be at the time engaged on any committee work, to be present at the deliberations of any other committee. I understand that the Standing Orders of South Australia, under which we are working - and probably other members, like myself, were ignorant of it - prevent any member being present at the deliberations of the committees - though they entitle them to be present when the committees are taking evidence. With us, select committees are almost always open to the public. When the committees were appointed, I was not aware that members of the Convention would be excluded.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Would you open these committees to all the public?

Mr. WISE:

My motion is confined simply to members of the Convention. I put the words "by permission of the Chairman," in the motion, so that if it is desired, for any reason at all, that the deliberations should be confined to the members of the Committee, the Chairman would have it in his power to ask any member of the Convention not on the Committee to retire.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:

I rise to second that proposal; because I recognise in it an opportunity to obtain the presence at some of our committees of gentlemen who have given special attention to some of the special work of the committees. The exigencies of the position during the last day or two have unfortunately excluded from our committees experts who have special knowledge, and who may be useful in aiding the deliberations of these committees. It is no secret that the Finance Committee would be very glad to have the presence of gentlemen who have made a special study of the financial questions during the past few months, and we regret that they are not present. If they come as visitors, and the Chairman gives them an opportunity of taking part in our deliberations other than voting -

An HON. MEMBER:
They cannot do that.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Other than voting. I am quite sure that the Committee will be glad to see them. I hail in this proposal a good opportunity of making such an improvement. I reserve entirely the objection against the suggestion which has been hinted at, that the committees should be open to the press. We intend to get our work done as promptly as possible, but we cannot do that with the intricacies which are associated with the work of these committees if we are to be invited to address ourselves again to the public, as we have been doing during the past fortnight.

Mr. BARTON:
If that motion is to be carried, I should like to have this amendment added:
Under the same limitation as to publicity as is imposed on members of the Committee visited.

I should like to mention to you what I conceive to have already been a grave mistake committed. I have only seen one of this morning's papers, and I find that there must have been information somehow obtained by the press, which is outside the limits of the leave confided to me as Chairman of the Constitutional Committee. You will remember, air, that the resolution passed was that the Chairman have leave to give publicity to the resolutions of the Committee. I have strictly adhered to that. I have gone no further than that, and have given the press the resolutions that were passed;
so strictly, as I feel in duty bound to do, have I interpreted the leave given to me, that when a debate has taken place, and a proposition has been negatived, I considered that to be, no part

Mr. BARTON:
Of that I am not Sure, because I have not had the time to look into it. In the leave given in these resolutions appointing committees, the record of the proceedings to be kept by the Clerk is not supposed to be divulged in any way except under these terms: When No. 1 committee reports; that is to say, when it has prepared and submitted its Bill, this record, kept by the Clerk, may be given publicity to. That stage has been entirely anticipated, and matters of record, such as divisions and matters not of record, such as questions of debate, have been obtained by some means or other quite contrary to the leave given to the Committee, which was confined to the resolutions come to from day to day. Now I need not assure you, Mr.
President, that I have not been a participant in that. By some means or other, whether by most astute cross-examination resulting in admissions-but I take it that no member of a committee would allow himself to be cross-examined for such a purpose-or by other means, the members of the press have obtained information—by no means correct, I am told—but at the same time information which ought not to have been communicated to the press, even in a mistaken form, when we consider the obligation of honor that is imposed upon us by that resolution. I think it is right to mention this matter to you, sir, in order that the leave given in the resolution may be strictly interpreted and adhered to with loyalty.

Mr. WISE:
I am willing to accept that, but I may say that I never understood that the proceedings of the Committee were to be so secret.

Mr. LYNE:
This, I think, only shows the objection there is to these committees sitting in secrecy. For my part I do not think there is anything secret in connection with the work of the committee. So far as the Finance Committee is concerned, I do not think much information has leaked out in connection with that.

Mr. WISE:
Perhaps there was nothing to communicate.

Mr. LYNE:
I do not want Mr. Wise to cross-examine me now, as representatives of the press have done some members, and are apt to do. It is a most difficult thing not to allow them to get some information through their cross-examination. I think if the members of the press are excluded from the committees, and we are bound to secrecy, that when we get the Bill in the House or in Committee we will have a great many more speeches than we would if the deliberations of the committees were open to the public.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE:
I think it would do away altogether with the accusations that the committees are sitting in secrecy if we allowed members to be present, and it would shorten the time in the end, because we would have fewer speeches when the Bill comes before the House. I suggest—I do not wish to move any motion—but I suggest that it is advisable and wise to allow the representatives of the press to be present at these committee meetings.

Mr. BARTON:
We shall have an enormous amount of talking to the gallery if we do.

Sir JAMES LEE STEERE:
I support the suggestion of Mr. Wise. I think it is done in other colonies, and I know that in our colony members are allowed to be present when a committee is deliberating. I am glad this subject has been brought forward, because I intended to allude to it in the Constitutional Committee this morning, as the accounts published in some portions of the press are very misleading. It says in the account published in the Register—

I should not have mentioned it unless it had been made public in the press, as I considered we were bound to secrecy, but as the matter has been published in the press, that secrecy has not been observed—

Mr. PEACOCK:
Are you going to give us the correct statement?

Sir JAMES LEE STEERE:
It says in the Register that the Constitutional Committee agreed to adhere to the title, "The Commonwealth of Australia," and from that anyone would think it was unanimously agreed to—

Mr. PEACOCK:
And was it not?

The PRESIDENT:
I think it has been well stated that the proceedings of the Select Committees should be regarded as confidential and should not be divulged; and I do not think that rule has been in any way relaxed by the fact that the press has in some way obtained some information on the subject. I suggest therefore to the representative of Western Australia that it would be more in accordance with the Standing Orders as they exist that no reference should be made to what was done or what was not done by the committees.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I do not think it is necessary that we should impose the duty on the Chairman of a Committee of deciding whether or not any member of the Convention should be admitted to its proceedings. I think the members of the Convention should be free to attend the proceedings of any committee.
I agree altogether that our proceedings at this stage will be shortened by their being treated as confidential, and that it will be quite impossible to draft a Bill if the public are looking on all the time. When we appointed these committees, I understood that we practically absorbed all the members of the Convention, and assuming that they would all be engaged during the whole of the time, we did not think it necessary to make provision for the members of one Committee being able to attend the deliberations of another. I think, however, that it would be expedient that members should be able to attend any of the committees, and that it will shorten debates hereafter if they had the opportunity of hearing the deliberations of committees. Of course they should not vote-

Mr. BARTON:

Or hold communication with the members of the committee.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Precisely. I would suggest to Mr. Wise that he should amend the motion by striking out the words:

With the consent of the Chairman.

Mr. ISAACS:

I think there can be no doubt that every member of the Convention should have access to the committees. I think it is a difficult position that a member of the Finance Committee, for instance, when some difference arises which he either did or did not anticipate, should feel himself under an obligation not to inform his co-delegates what has been done, and to ask their advice and guidance. It would be absurd that a man should be placed in that position, and I therefore think, as far as members of the Convention are concerned, there should be no limit to their communication with each other. With regard to the admission of the press there is more in the suggestion than would warrant us in dismissing it without a moment's consideration. There is one important matter which we should not lose sight of, and that is that the Constitution we frame must meet its fate at the hands of the people hereafter. I am afraid it is impossible to preserve absolute secrecy in regard to our deliberations; and while it is difficult to say that any member has violated the obligation of honor that rests on him, as well as the resolution that binds him, still we will find that the gentlemen of the press—always enterprising in discharging their duty to the public—will publish statements which they believe to be correct, but which may have the effect of misleading the public and creating a bad impression. Consequently, it is worthy of our best consideration whether we should not face the disadvantage of open committees, rather than the certain disadvantage of incorrect information being distributed, which may lead to the public prejudging the work of the Convention to its injury.

Mr. BARTON:

If you are going to allow members of the press to attend the proceedings of the committee, the talking will be so much to the gallery that the committees will last a month.

Mr. ISAACS:

I think that we are all anxious to get through as quickly as possible, and that on the whole it is preferable that we should have publicity, and have correct information from the outset, so that the public may watch these proceedings which really concern them most vitally throughout, and we shall have the undoubted advantage, through every stage, of public criticism on our determinations, so that we may be better enabled to see how far we should adhere to the conclusions as we go along.

Mr. BARTON:

I should be extremely sorry indeed to preside over the deliberations of a committee conducted in that way.

Mr. ISAACS:

Yet your course is a matter for general determination. Personally I am absolutely opposed to the principle of secrecy. So far as we can have publicity, we should have it. There are disadvantages undoubtedly, but it seems to me that the advantages of publicity on the whole outweigh the disadvantages.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

If the determinations of these committees were in any way final then I would certainly say admit the press. When the Bill is before the Convention with the committees' reports, the press and public will know exactly what alterations have been made, and they will see what the conclusions by these committees are; but these conclusions do not bind the Convention in the slightest degree. Every clause will be open to debate and amendment by the Convention itself, then publicity can be given. But if publicity is given to our proceedings at this stage these proceedings will be interminable. I do not of course desire to divulge anything that has been done, but the meetings of the Committee at the present time are more of a conversational character than otherwise. If we have the press present then we will have the debates over and over again.

Mr. BARTON:

And magnificent orations!

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

And much the same character of debate here when the Convention is considering the Bill in Committee of the whole.

Mr. TRENWITH:
I think that the press ought not to be admitted, for the special reason that our business in committee is business undertaken for the purpose, if possible, of getting as near as we can together in our conclusions. Our whole attitude during this Convention is to be that of compromise. We may arrive at decisions personally in committee and subsequently may have to depart from them in the interest of compromise, and we should not be subjected to the danger of being pilloried, and referred to as having voted one way on one occasion and another way on another occasion. That seems to me to be a very important consideration.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
There is no record of the debates.

Mr. TRENWITH:
However, I deprecate very strongly the language used by Mr. Barton about talking to the galleries. I think I may use to him the same remark that he applied to Mr. Carruthers when Mr. Carruthers used the word "subterfuge." I would say to Mr. Barton that the Convention is composed of men as incapable as he is of talking to the galleries."

Mr. REID:
I have had very considerable experience of the powers of the press in obtaining information. I have been on secret conferences in another colony, every member of which loyally observed their pledges to keep secrecy, and yet something like a two-column report of our proceedings appeared in the daily press.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Supposed proceedings!

Mr. REID:
Three-fourths of which were by some mental powers known to journalists evolved without any foundation in fact. When we were engaged in a very friendly conference of a very important character, dealing with such a matter as the Land and Income Tax Bill of New South Wales, and my speeches were of a most moderate character, next morning I was depicted as trailing the head of Charles I. over the Committee Chamber, and indulging in most fearful threats against some very innocent old gentlemen in another place. Do what you will, if you shut your doors you will have more mischief through secrecy than through publicity. But I am not now going back on the decision of this Convention. We must have some sort of order and regularity in these proceedings. I ventured to express my views on these matters at an earlier stage, but I am to adhere loyally to the procedure which has guided us. I have been represented in the press as logrolling and intriguing to prevent this Convention arriving at any result whatever. Every member here knows these statements are absolutely without foundation.

Mr. BARTON:

Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:

Still I suffer and say nothing. We have resolved upon a certain course of procedure, and we must continue to make the best of it, and I am sure any information which got out—if any got out-did not get out through any gentleman on this Constitutional Committee. I know the members of the press; probably one of them was hanging on to an open skylight. (Laughter.)

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:

I would like to submit that we are at present in these Select Committees engaged in the work of drafting a Bill, and we should be no more subject to the close scrutiny and criticism of the press in that respect than should the meetings of Cabinet Ministers of any colony who are engaged in discussing any particular measure they are drafting.

Mr. BARTON:

Might I have the indulgence of the House to make a suggestion before the debate closes. I do not mind submitting myself to the cross-examination of the press, because it generally results in my cross-examining them.

Mr. REID:

You think so.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not think they have ever got anything out of me which I did not want to give them. I suggest that the proper plan when any members of any Committee is interrogated by members of the press or anyone else would, to save himself from all responsibility, be to refer his questioner to the Chairman of the Committee.

Dr. QUICK:

My hon. friend Mr. Barton seemed to suggest that the information which was published in the press appeared through a violation on the part of some members of the condition of secrecy. I would only point out to him that on the face of it the information is so inaccurate that it could not have proceeded from any member of the committee. The numbers are wrong; the motions are wrong. At any rate, the information was of so inaccurate a character as to be calculated to mislead, and I suggest that the Chairman should take the earliest opportunity of correcting that information. I think it is only right and proper that the information published should be correct.

Mr. BARTON:
I have said already, from my place here, that the information is garbled and inaccurate.

Dr. QUICK:

I think it is a mistake that the statement should go forth that members and committees have committed a breach of their obligations by imparting information to the press.

Mr. WISE:

I have nothing to add in reply except to say that I accept the amendment of Mr. Barton.

The PRESIDENT:

I would like to say with regard to the suggestion by Sir Philip Fysh that if the motion is carried in the form proposed, though it will permit the attendance of members, it will in no way authorise their participation in the proceedings.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WISE:

Before the Convention adjourns I would like to say by way of personal explanation that for my part, as for the committee with which I am connected, the Judiciary Committee, I did not know it was secret, and for my part I have spoken quite freely of the work done; but I have in no way stated anything incorrect or given false information.

They are not Secret Committees, but Select Committees governed by the Standing Orders.

Mr. WISE:

I understand that. If anything has appeared about the Judiciary Committee I do not think it has—or anything to which any member of the committee might object, I freely take the blame upon myself, but I erred through ignorance.

PAPERS.

The CLERK laid upon the table of the House, to the order of the Convention, March 24th:

Copies of papers—Break of gauge, existence of preferential and differential rates, New South Wales; extract of Railways Commissioners' annual report, South Australia; break of gauge, existence of preferential and differential rates, amalgamation of railways, South Australia.

Mr. HOLDER:

I suppose the proper course will be to move that the reports be printed, but I would have liked to have seen them first. If the Convention is agreeable I move:
That the reports be printed.

Mr. WALKER:
I second that.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.
The Convention adjourned at 11.2 a.m.
Monday April 5, 1897.

Petitions-Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WALKER:
I have the honor to present a petition from 402 members of the Presbyterian Church of Australia and Tasmania, resident in New South Wales. Its object is that the preamble of the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth shall recognise the Supreme Ruler of the world. I beg to move that the petition, which is respectfully worded, be received.

Mr. HOLDER:
I have six petitions to present,-one from 103 Congregationalists, sixty-six Bible Christians, forty-six Presbyterians, twenty-nine Wesleyans, and thirty-eight members of the Salvation Army, residents of South Australia. They are similar to the petition just presented.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I have a similar petition, signed by 2,447 residents of the diocese of Sydney.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I have a similar petition from members of the Church of England in Australia and Tasmania.

Mr. GLYNN:
I have a similar petition, signed by the Right Rev. John O'Reilly (Archbishop of Adelaide), James Maher (Bishop of Port Augusta), and Anthony Strele (Administrator of Palmerston and Victoria in the Northern Territory portion of South Australia), on behalf of the Catholic community resident in South Australia.

Mr. BARTON:
I have a petition to present from the Committee of the Sydney Rescue Work Society, under the signature of the director, praying that provision be made in the Federal Constitution to preserve to each State the right to prevent the importation of intoxicating liquors and also the importation of opium.

Petitions received.

ADJOURNMENT.

The Convention adjourned at 10.33 a.m.
Tuesday April 6, 1897.

Petitions-Notice of Motion-Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. SOLOMON:
I have a petition to present from 1,201 electors, praying that neither the Federal Government nor Parliament shall make any law respecting religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof. I move that it be received and read.
Carried.
The petition was as follows:
We, the undersigned, adult residents of Melbourne, Victoria, believing that religion and the State should be kept entirely separate, that religious legislation is subversive of good government, contrary to the principles of sound religion, and can result only in religious persecution, hereby humbly, but most earnestly, petition your honorable body not to insert any religious clause or measure in the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth which might be taken as a basis for such legislation; but that a declaration be made in the Constitution stating that neither the Federal Government nor any State Parliament shall make any law respecting religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, Signed by 544 adult residents of Victoria, 321 of South Australia, 276 of Tasmania, and 60 of New South Wales. Total, 1,201.

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
I have a petition from 119 members of certain churches in Tasmania, praying for the recognition of God as the Supreme Ruler of the world in the preamble of the Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth.

Dr. QUICK:
I have a petition to present from certain adherents of the Wesleyan Church, Golden-square, Bendigo, praying that provision be made in the Constitution Bill for the recognition of a Supreme Ruler, and that the daily Sessions of the Upper and Lower Houses of Parliament be opened with prayer.

Mr. REID:
I have to present a petition from 1,007 members of the Salvation Army praying that in the preamble of the Commonwealth Bill there should be a recognition of the Supreme Ruler of the world.
Petitions received.
NOTICE OF MOTION.
Mr. GRANT:
I beg to give notice that to-morrow I will move:
Inasmuch as there are now in Adelaide chief representatives of the railway systems of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and West Australia, this Convention considers the present time a favorable opportunity for these representatives conferring together as to the possibility of agreement upon a uniform gauge for the railways of Australia, and requests that they would forthwith take this matter into their consideration.

ADJOURNMENT.
The Convention adjourned at 10.35 a.m.
Wednesday April 7, 1897.

Petitions - Notices of Motion - Uniform Railway Gauge - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. BARTON:
I have to present a petition from citizens of the colony of Victoria, being members of the Church of England in Australia and Tasmania, similar to the petitions already presented, asking that in the preamble for the Constitution it be recognised that God is the Supreme Ruler of the world, and that the meetings of the Federal Parliament be opened with prayer. It is in due form and concludes with the usual prayer.

Mr. SOLOMON:
I have a petition, signed by 1,663 electors of Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia. It is in due form and concludes with the prayer:
That neither the Federal Government nor the State Parliament shall make any law respecting religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.
It, is similar to that presented yesterday.
Petitions received.

NOTICES OF MOTION.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I beg to give notice for Thursday, the 8th of April, that I will move:
That five days' leave of absence be granted to the Hon. Mr. Hackett on account of urgent private affairs.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I beg also to give notice that:
Contingent on the House going into Committee of the whole to consider the proposed Commonwealth Bill, it be an instruction to the Committee to deal with the powers of the "States Assembly" in regard to money Bills, clauses 54, 65, and 56, before dealing with any other portion of the Bill.

Mr. LYNE:
Does that mean you want us to deal with that first?

Mr. PEACOCK:
Of course.

OVERCOMING THE BREAK OF GAUGE.

Mr. GRANT rose to move:
That inasmuch as there are now in Adelaide chief representatives of the railway systems of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and West Australia, this Convention consider the present time a favorable opportunity for these representatives conferring together as to the possibility of agreeing upon an uniform gauge for the railways of Australia, and request that they would forthwith take this matter into their consideration.

He said: In rising to move this I am under some difficulty, because I believe the Governments of the various colonies have already taken the matter into consideration, and this motion may interfere with the result of their deliberations. I can have no possible wish to do that, because it is an object which will commend itself to every member of this Convention, that the representatives of the railway systems in the colonies being here present should take into consideration the establishment of an uniform gauge at some early period. I do not propose that it should be done at once, but I think we should look forward to an uniform gauge for the whole of Australia. There is no need for me to delay the House with any arguments in favor of this course, because the matter has been so fully debated for so many years past that every member of this Convention must be convinced of the desirability of it. I would like, however, to amplify my motion with the permission of this Convention, so that effect might be given to such a resolution. I am aware it is somewhat outside the scope of this Convention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Hear, hear.

Mr. GRANT:

I am aware that the Convention has no power to dictate to the representatives of the railway systems of the colonies that they should take into consideration the question of uniformity of gauge. Still the present seems a most opportune moment for the consideration of the subject, because they are assembled together and have not much to do, as I understand that the Finance Committee, before whom they were summoned to give evidence, are not quite ready to take their evidence, and no possible harm can result from their deliberations on this subject. Therefore, without further preface, I will submit the motion and ask the permission of the Convention to add the words:

And at as early a date as possible report as to the necessary procedure to facilitate this object.

Leave granted to amend.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

With regard to the notice of motion as printed, I would not object to it, although it is clearly outside our authority to deal with a matter of that sort at all. We are here for the purpose of framing a Constitution, and not for the purpose of making any inquiry into the gauges of the Australian railways; but I would not raise any objection to our passing a resolution as representative men that these officers should confer on the matter. I, however, strongly object to passing any resolution requesting the Railway Commissioners to furnish this report, which in our position would practically amount to a direction to them to report to the Convention. If we have a report, it seems to me that we must do something with it; but as we cannot, it is unreasonable to direct these men to bring up a report as quickly as possible. I do not object to the motion as printed, although I do not know that any good can come of it; but if the amendment is insisted on I must vote against it.

Mr. REID:
I hope that Mr. Grant will withdraw this motion. I fully recognise the importance of the matter that it contains, but I think it extremely probable that the various Governments will be able to set on foot an inquiry into all the phases of this very important matter, which will come perhaps not in time for this Convention, but for general information throughout the colonies, and will afford means of looking at this matter. I happen to know that the wildest statements have been made as to the cost of carrying out a uniform gauge, sums of from £10,000,000 to £20,000,000 having been mentioned; but I also happen to know on perhaps as good an authority as it is possible to get, speaking on a subject about which there is no certainty, that the cost will be under £2,000,000.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
That is a great mistake.

Mr. REID:
There is always a certain amount of convenience in allowing one to finish a sentence. I am speaking of carrying the line from the Queensland border through New South Wales, through Victoria, into South Australia as far as the, 5ft. 3in. gauge.

Mr. LYNE:
Is that the main trunk line?

Mr. REID:
Yes; and the interest charged upon that would be about £60,000 a year, divided between the three colonies in such proportion as might be just. I think the Governments are agreed that the whole matter is one upon which the public, as well as the Governments, are entitled to information; and if the hon. member would withdraw this motion I think he will find that in a very few days-certainly I am prepared to agree to it, and I think my hon.
friend the Premier of Victoria, and my hon. friend the Premier of South Australia also are—that the Railway Commissioners of the various colonies will be invited to meet and discuss this matter—to go into it fully and prepare a report for general information. That will no doubt suit my honorable friend from Tasmania

Mr. Grant:

I am well aware that the matter would be far better dealt with in the way suggested by Mr. Reid, and therefore I am quite willing to withdraw the motion; but I understand that this subject has been under consideration for twenty years and upwards—that is, as regards a conference between the parties. I want, if possible, to force their hand or facilitate the movement in having this conference. But, having the assurance of the Premier of New South Wales that the matter will forthwith be taken into consideration, and that the public will have the necessary information, I will, with the consent of my seconder and the permission of the Convention, ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Trenwith:

On a question of order, Mr. President, I should like to say as regards permission being given to withdraw the motion, that there is a danger in accepting such resolutions, which are clearly outside the province of this Convention, and if such abstract resolutions are permitted we may, at a later stage of our proceedings, have other abstract resolutions also outside our province. I want you, Sir, to rule whether this is a motion that can be accepted by this Convention.

The President:

On that I think that, although we are here for the purpose of framing a Constitution for federated Australia, the acquisition of information which might be of use in the framing of that Constitution is within our province, and that the resolution does not go further than suggest a ready means for obtaining such information.

Motion withdrawn.

Adjournment.

The Convention adjourned at 10.44 a.m.
Thursday April 8, 1897.

Petitions - Notice of Motion - Leave of Absence to a Member - Return, Queensland Railways - Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.
PETITIONS.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I have a petition to present, dealing with the question of the importation of intoxicating liquors. It contains three signatures.
Mr. HOLDER:
I have a similar petition to present, signed by forty-two Wesleyans, twenty-four Bible Christians, and 555 members of the Salvation Army.
Petitions received.
Mr. HOLDER:
I have a petition to present from the Women's Christian Temperance Union of South Australia, in reference to the prohibition of the importation of intoxicants and opium. I move that it be received and read.
Question resolved in the affirmative.
The petition was as follows:
The humble petition of the Women's Christian Temperance Union of South Australia. showeth: That a State or States may hereafter desire to enact prohibition, and prayeth that provision be made in the Federal Constitution to preserve to each State the right to prevent the importation of intoxicating liquors. The petition further humbly showeth that the want of such a provision in the Constitution of the United States of America has led to many and serious abuses, which have interfered in an important way with the enforce-of prohibitory laws The petition further prayeth that the same liberty may be accorded in each State as to the importation of opium. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.
E. W. NICHOLLS, President.
MAY KELLY, Hon. Treasurer.
MARY F. GEORGE, Hon. Secretary.
NOTICE OF MOTION.
Mr. BARTON:
I give notice that to-morrow I will move:
That this Convention at its rising adjourn till 11.15 a.m. on Monday, the 12th inst.
That is in connection with the visit I understand several members are about to pay to Broken Hill.
LEAVE OF ABSENCE TO MR. HACKETT.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I move:
That five days' leave of absence be granted to the Honorable J. W. Hackett, on account of urgent private affairs.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I second the motion.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

RETURN-QUEENSLAND RAILWAYS.

The CLERK laid on the table, to order of the Convention of March 24th, a letter from the secretary of the Queensland Railways Commissioners in reference to differential rates; also a copy of an Act of the Queensland Legislature to aid in securing Queensland traffic to Queensland railways.

Mr. HOLDER:
I move:
That the return be printed.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.

The Convention adjourned at 10.35 a.m.
Friday April 9, 1897.

Petitions - "Hansard" Reports - Suspension of Standing Orders - Money Clauses in the Constitution Bill - Notice of Motion - Hour of Meeting Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WALKER:

I have the honor to present a petition from the Central Queensland Territorial Separation League. It is respectfully worded and ends with a prayer. I move that it be received and read.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

The petition was as follows:

To the Honorable the Representatives of the Colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania, respectively, in Federal Convention assembled.

The Memorial of the Executive Committee of the Central Queensland Territorial Separation League

Respectfully sheweth:

That your memorialists have noted with regret the failure of the Government and Parliament of Queensland to provide for the election of representatives of the colony at the Federal Convention.

That your memorialists desire to draw the attention of the Convention to the following facts:—

(1) That, by Acts passed by the Parliament of Queensland, that colony has for certain administrative purposes been divided into three parts, described as the Southern Division, the Central Division, and the Northern Division, respectively, with the several boundaries described in the first schedule to this memorial.

(2) That in every one of the Government Financial Separation Bills introduced unsuccessfully into the Queensland Parliament from time to time since 1871, the colony was proposed to be divided into three parts—South, Centre, and North.

(3) That in the Session of 1890 the proposals of Sir Samuel Griffith, then Chief Secretary, included a federative division of the colony into three provinces with separate Governments and Legislatures, and, whenever an Australian Federal Commonwealth was formed, the merging of the three provinces into the Federation as three separate States.

(4) That, in 1891, similar proposals were submitted by Sir S. Griffith, and in 1892 he introduced the Queensland Constitution Bill for the same purpose, and in doing so stated that the conditions and requirements of the different parts of Queensland were different, and that the large area of the Central Division justified its erection into a separate province.

(5) That the Queensland Federal Enabling Bill, introduced last year, provided for the three divisions being constituted as separate electorates.

The Premier, Sir Hugh Nelson, when moving the second reading of this Bill, said:—"Take the Northern and Central Districts. We all know that they have a perfectly legitimate aspiration, that they are looking forward to the day when they will be formed into separate States. Why should they not? I propose that they shall of necessity be represented at this Convention by dividing the colony into three electorates-Northern, Central, and Southern, each sending its own representatives. This is a burning question with the electors of the Northern and Central districts."

(6) That the said Central Division of the colony of Queensland embraces a self-contained territory of about 210,000 square miles, having its principal outlets at the ports of Gladstone, St. Lawrence, and Rockhampton, respectively, and extending westward to the eastern boundary of South Australia.

(7) That the eastern watershed of the above-mentioned division is served by the Dawson, Nogoa, and Isaacs river systems debouching as the Fitzroy river into Koppel Bay, while the western watershed of the division is secured by the Barcoo, Thomson, and Diamantina river systems.

(8) That the eastern watershed of the Central Division contains a considerable agricultural area in the vicinity of Rockhampton, one important sugar plantation, with well-equipped mill, producing over 1,500 tons of sugar per annum; and a large extent of good pastoral country, giving employment to three large meat export works. That this rich area also includes the Crocodile Goldfield, in which the celebrated Mount Morgan mine and township are situated.

(9) That the division comprises also the famous Peak Downs and other rich plains country immediately to the eastward of Drummond Range, in which wheat is now being planted on a considerable scale, and which is destined, in the opinion of agricultural experts, to become the principal wheat-growing district of the colony.

That in addition to great deposits of copper and coal the Peak Downs Goldfield has been worked for over thirty years, and still furnishes remunerative occupation to an increasing number of miners.

(10) That the western area of the Central Division comprises an immense extent of wool-growing country unsurpassed in Australia. That although its development has until lately been retarded by want of surface water, it has now been found to be liberally endowed with artesian springs of great volume, some hundreds of which have already been tapped by bores varying from 500ft. to 4,300ft. in depth. That boring is still being vigorously carried on in the district, and that as the leases of runs expire they are being rapidly made available as grazing farms, varying from 2,500 to 20,000 acres in extent.

That, in consequence of this development, the wool shipped from the Central Division ports already exceeds one moiety of the entire wool produce of Queensland, while Rockhampton has attained the position of an outlet for exports of a greater annual value than any other Australian port north of Sydney.

That, according to the official returns, the live stock assets of the Central Division include 2,000,000 cattle and 10,000,000 sheep.

(11) That the Central Division of Queensland possesses in addition to three branch railways a great trunk line running a distance of 425 miles westerly from Rockhampton, approximately along the tropical line to Longreach, on the Thomson river, and is about to be extended from Rockhampton some twenty-eight miles to deep water at Broadmount, close to the mouth of the Fitzroy river, where it is intended that the railway trucks shall discharge exports into and receive imports from the large ocean-going steamships which now carry the oversea trade between Australia and the mother-country.

(12) That the population of the Central Division, according to last returns, is estimated to be 54,764, or more than double the population of the whole colony of Queensland at the time it was separated from New South Wales.

(13) That the revenue of the Central Division for the past year, as shown by the official returns was £729,858, or £13 6s. 6d. per capita, not including Customs duties paid on goods re-exported from South Queensland, and imported into Central Queensland. That, in other respects, the sum stated does not truly represent the amount of revenue raised by the Central Division, the actual amount being considerably in excess of that stated.

(14) That the inhabitants of the Central Division have for many years desired the privilege of self government, and to that end have repeatedly and almost unanimously claimed the boon from the Parliament of Queensland, as well as by petition from the Imperial Government. They rely not only upon the provision made in past Imperial legislation for the protection and benefit of communities placed in the position of the petitioners, but also upon the implied promise of the Duke of Newcastle in his despatch of the 18th August, 1858, addressed to Sir William Denison, the Governor of New South Wales, in which he stated that "it will be desirable that the Crown should possess the power of dividing further the territory now created into the colony of Queensland by detaching from it such northern portions as may hereafter be found fit to be erected into separate colonies"; and also upon his despatch to the Governor of Queensland, Sir George Bowen, dated September 14th, 1861, in which he said, "I am not prepared to abandon on behalf of Her Majesty's Government the power to deal with districts not yet settled as the wishes and conveniences of the future settlers may require."

(15) That while such claim was formally acknowledged by the Queensland Government proposals of 1890 and 1891, and by the Constitution Bill introduced by the Government into the Queensland Parliament in 1892, and while such claim has also been practically admitted by more than one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State for the Colonies, your memorialists' wishes have not yet been acceded to.

(16) That Mr. Chamberlain, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies, in his despatch of the 15th January last, expressed the opinion "that the people of Central Queensland will no doubt find the Federal Parliament when constituted ready to listen to any reasonable scheme which may be submitted to it with the object of giving them that independent control of their local affairs which they now seek."

(17) That a clause of the Commonwealth Bill of 1891 contains the provision that subsequent to the passing of the Act of Union no State shall be subdivided except with the sanction of the Parliament of that State; and your memorialists have reason to apprehend, that the same provision will be contained in the Constitution Bill of the Convention.

(18) That the enacting of such a provision would be calamitous to the Central and Northern Divisions of Queensland, and leave them perpetually at the mercy of the more numerous but less productive populations of the Southern Division.

That, as an act of simple justice, your memorialists, therefore, pray that provision may be made in the Constitution Bill of the Convention for the admission of the present colony of Queensland into the Federation as three separate autonomous provinces or States.

And your memorialists will ever pray, &c., &c.

(Signed) G. S. CURTIS, M.L.A., Chairman.

For and on behalf of Executive Committee of the Central, Queensland Territorial Separation League.

Rockhampton, March 31st, 1897.
Mr. MCMILLAN:
I have to present a petition from the New South Wales Christian Endeavor Union with regard to the prohibition of liquor coming into a particular State. It is respectfully worded and contains a prayer.
Petition received.
"HANSARD" REPORTS.
Dr. QUICK:
I would like to ask a question with reference to the "Hansard," seeing that the Treasurer of South Australia is in his place. I would like to know what arrangements have been made for the sale of "Hansard" reports to the general public, to whom application has to be made in order to become subscribers, and how much will be charged for them.
Mr. HOLDER:
I imagine that the absolute settlement of this question will be a matter for the Convention or a committee of it, subject to the approval of the Convention. Copies of the daily "Hansard" can be obtained from the Government Printer on application. I think the price fixed is 4d. Perhaps that amount was decided upon on the basis of the large "Hansard" published during the first week, but I cannot speak positively on that point.
Mr. WALKER:
I made application to the Government Printer for copies of the revised "Hansard," and it seems there are no corrected proofs available. Unless we have these "Hansard," as it stands, is so inaccurate that it is practically useless.
Mr. HOLDER:
I believe the corrected copies are being printed off.
SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS.
Sir JOHN FORREST:
I desire to move that the Standing Orders be suspended to enable me to move a motion. I wish to move:
That it be an instruction to any Committee of the whole, to whom the proposed draft Bill shall be referred, that all conditions relating to Money Bills and the relative powers of the two Houses be first considered.
My reason for asking that the Standing Orders be suspended is only to save time; in fact, the principal object, I wish to inform hon. members, is that myself and colleagues may have an opportunity of dealing with the most important matter which is the subject of controversy in the draft Bill. As I have already informed the House, we have to leave for Western Australia on Wednesday, and we have it from our friend Mr. Barton that on Monday morning he hopes to be able to place the draft Bill on the table for the information of hon. members. Now, if on Monday morning this matter, which I now bring before the House, is to be discussed, besides other matters which are to be dealt with, the whole of Monday will have passed before we can consider any portion of the draft Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You are blocking the Finance Committee from getting on with its important work this morning. You are causing just as much delay.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I rise to a point of order. I will take your ruling, Sir, as to whether it is competent for an hon. member to move this motion, of which he has given no notice. He has already given notice of a motion similar to the one tabled now, and he asks this House to suspend the Standing Orders.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
You can vote against it if you do not like it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Will the hon. member be good enough to allow me to go on. I am raising a point of order that it is not competent for the hon. member to anticipate a motion which he himself had previously given notice of. The Convention is not responsible for the fact that he placed on the business paper that notice of motion to be discussed at a certain time, and while that notice of motion is on the business paper it is incompetent for him to anticipate it. If the Convention were to suspend the Standing Orders for the purpose of allowing him to submit his motion he will be anticipating the motion which he has already placed on the notice paper. Standing Order 426, page 120, says:

In cases of urgent necessity any Standing Order or Orders of the House may be suspended on motion duly made and seconded without notice, provided that such motion has the concurrence of an absolute majority of the whole members of the House of Assembly.

Mr. BARTON:
Where is the urgent necessity of this?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
The hon. member has given notice of this motion, and therefore he himself has said it is not a matter of urgent necessity.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I said nothing of the kind.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
By giving notice of motion the hon. member has said it.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
That was by inadvertence.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I wish the hon. member would try to control himself. He has a big leadership, and he ought to be able to.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

YOU must not misrepresent me.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

The hon. member has misrepresented himself, because he has given notice of this motion. and therefore could not have regarded it as a matter of urgent public importance. He has properly given notice of a motion to deal with the matter at the right time, and that is when the House proposes to go into Committee on the Bill. The hon. member has not withdrawn the contingent notice of motion, and while that contingent notice is on the business paper I submit, with all respect, that he cannot anticipate it by asking the Convention to do now something which he has given notice of. I hold in my hand that excellent compilation by the Clerk of this Convention of the decisions of Speakers of the House of Commons. On page 119 you will see this:

When a Bill is before the House it is not competent by a motion on the same subject to anticipate discussion.

By parity of reasoning when a motion is before the House it is not competent to anticipate the same subject.

Mr. BARTON:

That has been ruled hundreds of times.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

The practice is so well known that I can hardly understand anyone professing to doubt what it is. In this particular case referred to in the decisions:

Mr. Newdegate gave notice that he intended on the order being read for the second reading of the Bill to move that the order be discharged; and further gave notice that he proposed to move on a subsequent day a motion that it was expedient that Her Majesty's Government should introduce a Bill on the subject. Mr. Speaker said: "I may state that the practice of this House is this: If the House should order a Bill relating to a certain subject to be read a second time on a given day, it will not anticipate the discussion on the matter which it has so ordered by a motion on the same subject; and therefore if the hon. member postpones the second reading of a Bill to a later day than the resolutions of which he has given notice that resolution could not be proceeded with."

Now, I submit that while the hon. member has got that notice of motion on the business paper it is not within his power, according to parliamentary practice, to move any motion which may anticipate discussion in reference to it. What the hon. member proposes to do now is to ask this House immediately, without any notice to members who may be absent, to depart from what is the reasonable practice, and a fair practice, in all bodies similar to this; that is, to inform every member of the Convention what the business is that is to be disposed of.

Mr. BARTON:
We were expecting this motion on Monday, and it is brought on to-day.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Unless he can satisfy the Convention that this is a matter of such urgent importance as to justify the suspension of the Standing Orders, he cannot move the motion.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
You would not give me the opportunity to do so.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
The hon. member is master of his own business, and has given notice of a contingent motion to be moved at the proper time, and my contention is that while that notice of motion is on the business paper of the Convention, it is not competent for the hon. representative to do what he now proposes.

The PRESIDENT:
On the point of order that the Standing Orders prohibit the moving of a resolution without notice, and also prohibit the anticipation of debate-

Mr. BARTON:
If you are about to rule, Mr. President, may I say something on this point of order? This is a motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders to enable notice to be dispensed with, and no portion of the Standing Orders is affected except the ordinary requirement of notice, which will be dispensed with if this notice is carried. I would say, in support of the view which Sir Joseph Abbott has taken, that if the hon. member's motion is carried he will be able to bring on a motion which will anticipate debate on a motion of which he has given notice for Monday next. He cannot do that. It is an argument against the suspension of the Standing Orders that, if he gives notice of motion for a future date, he confesses that it is not a matter of instant necessity, and consequently he finds himself in a contradictory position. He confesses by giving notice that it is not a matter of moment, and now he asks the Convention to declare that it is a matter of urgency.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I did not know that I could do it. I deny that I did not regard it as a matter of urgency.

Mr. BARTON:
We are all supposed to know what is the ordinary Parliamentary procedure, and if the hon. member did not, the consequences must fall on his own head. I will not anticipate discussion on the motion of which he has given notice, but, as Sir John Forrest stated that the money clauses are the most important in the draft Bill, I wish to point out-

The PRESIDENT:

I would ask the hon. representative to confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. BARTON:

I would not have referred to the point except that the hon. member touched on it.

The PRESIDENT:

The hon. representative from Western Australia had not concluded his speech when he was interrupted by the point of order.

Mr. BARTON:

The position is as strong as it can be against the hon. member, and I say so without any desire to block him in any way, as I intend to meet his contingent motion dealing with the money clauses, when it comes on, simply on the merits. I, however, submit that the matter must be left at its present stage, and that is to deal with it on the contingent notice of motion on the motion to go into Committee. He is asking us to suspend the Standing Orders in order to enable him to move a motion which will compel us to deal with one portion of a Bill which is not yet before the Convention, and he can give us no reason for making one portion of the Bill more important than another until that Bill is laid before the Convention.

The PRESIDENT:

There is no doubt that the Standing Orders prevent the moving of a motion without notice, or one which anticipates debate, and if the Standing Orders are suspended then two rules must be abrogated, as the hon. representative will then have the right to move a motion without notice, and one which also anticipates debate. It has been put that all that the hon. representative seeks to do is to suspend the Standing Orders to enable him to move a motion without notice. That is not so. He has asked the Convention to suspend the Standing Orders for the purpose of allowing him to submit a motion which he sets out without notice, and which would also anticipate debate on a resolution of which notice has been given; and so, if the Convention now assents to the suspension of the Standing Orders, as asked by the hon. representative, it assents to two things—the moving of a motion without notice, and the moving of a motion which anticipates debate. Therefore, if the leave is given, the hon. representative will be perfectly in order in doing that which he desires. The point has been further put that by the action of the representative in giving contingent notice of this motion, he has admitted that it is not a matter of urgent necessity; but, in reply to that, I take it that the representative, in moving the suspension of the Standing Orders, gives the Convention his assurance that it is a matter of urgent necessity; and, further, I also take it that which may form the subject of a notice of motion, and which may not be a matter of urgent necessity on one day, by lapse of time may well become a matter of necessity afterwards. And in all these circumstances I rule that the representative is in order in moving the motion which he had submitted to the Convention. At the same time I would point out that the Standing Orders provide a remedy for any abuse of this power, because they require an absolute majority of the House to the carrying of the necessary motion, and should that not be obtained the permission to move a motion without notice and which anticipates debate will not be given.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

I was beginning to explain for the information of hon. members, when the point of order was raised, that my reason for moving the suspension of the Standing Orders was that if we did not proceed with this matter to-day the whole of Monday would probably be taken up in discussing this and other matters; and as the representatives of Western Australia, who are one-fifth in number of this Convention, have to leave for Western Australia on Wednesday, by dealing with this subject at the present time it would give us an opportunity of discussing and I hope of voting upon a matter which we consider to be of the very gravest importance to our colony. It has been said—I do not know that it has been said in this Convention, but it has been said—that Western Australia is indifferent to Federation, and I believe that some have gone so far as to say that we have no right to be here through being in that position. I would like to point out for the information of hon. members that there are no ten delegates in this assembly who have come here at greater inconvenience, and at a more inconvenient time, than we have. I think that that fact alone should show that we do take some interest in this matter, and that we wish to take part in a subject of such vital importance to us, not only at the present time, but in the future. Hon. members are aware that at present there is a general election going on in Western Australia, and that almost every member here is a candidate for that election; and it is well known to honorable members that I am the leader of a political party in Western Australia, and therefore my presence has been required there all the while I have been here, and under all these circumstances perhaps I am not going too far in asking some little consideration from hon. members. I may say that we came here... at very great inconvenience, and at a very inconvenient time, and we also came here with the assurance that it would take but a very short time to deal with this matter. I am certain of this, that if we had known that it was to take so long to deal with this great subject, and that we would have to return before having an opportunity of voting upon any vital part of the Bill, we would not have been here. It would have been impossible for us to come here on those conditions. I was assured by one leader of a Government that it would take ten days, and by a leader in another colony [7] starts here that the utmost it would take would be three weeks; yet we have been nearly three weeks already, and we have not yet got into Committee of the whole on the Bill. This, then, is another reason why I ask for consideration, that the time which has been occupied is much greater than the Premiers anticipated. I should be sorry, and I am sure every hon. member would be sorry, if the Western Australian delegates had to go away without having an opportunity of voting on what we consider the most important part of the Bill on which there is a great divergence of opinion, and the most controversial between the colonies. It was said before we came here by the press, by responsible persons, and the heads of Governments, that they were most anxious that Western Australia should be represented. It was urged upon me by all of them time after time that I should do all I could to have Western Australia represented, and I promised on my return to do all that was possible. I did what was possible. I had to summon our legislature in order to amend our Enabling Bill. That meant some trouble, and was most unusual. Then I had to hurry away here three days after I had made my political speech to the electors of the colony, to come away for a month in the middle of a political struggle more acute than any other that has taken place in Western Australia. I may be told, "If you cannot stay, we will have to do without you. We can show you no special consideration at all."

Mr. PEACOCK:
Who says that?

Sir JOHN FORREST:
It may be said. If that is not the feeling I hope members will vote for this motion.

The PRESIDENT:
The hon. member must confine his remarks to the motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I must say that if hon. members desire that the Western Australian delegates shall take part in any discussion for two days-on Monday and Tuesday—on the Bill Mr. Barton hopes to place before us, they must approve of the only means that are available to give us that opportunity.

Mr. SOLOMON:
I second the motion.

Mr. BARTON:
I find myself bound to oppose the motion of the hon. member for the suspension of the Standing Orders for the purpose which he has indicated, and I suppose as he has canvassed that purpose, I may with equal justice be allowed to canvass it in my reply. The hon. member has pointed out that he and his colleagues have come here at great inconvenience. That may be true, but it is equally true of nearly every member who has come.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not know about "equally true."

Mr. BARTON:
Some have come a great distance, some at political inconvenience, some at great personal inconvenience, and some have suffered monetary loss—perhaps disastrous monetary loss in certain cases—by coming here. We all suffer some loss, and it is not to be urged against the whole of the remaining members of the Convention that because one body of gentlemen have come here at some inconvenience they are to override the proper deliberations of members, all of whom, excepting perhaps the South Australians, come here at serious loss or inconvenience themselves. We must look at the matter all round in order to be just, and looking at it all round, while we admit that every consideration should be extended to the hon. members from Western Australia, that consideration must not be extended with the result of dislocating and putting into disorder the business of this Convention. The hon. member says the purpose of the suspension of the Standing Orders is to allow him to move a motion which will enable him to take certain clauses of the Bill out of their order. Now, I would have no objection to a motion that we should take the principal clauses of the Bill upon each important subject treated in the Bill, and discuss these in proper order; but when we consider that the object which the hon. member has in view involves this: that he wishes to discuss the money clauses of the Bill before this Convention has had the opportunity of dealing with the constitution of the two Houses proposed to be created, and whose duties will include what will be set out in the money clauses, it seems to me that the object for which he states he wishes the Standing Orders to be suspended is totally unreasonable. We have a Bill which must, if it is framed upon anything like the groundwork of the Bill of 1891, deal first, among other things, with the constitution of the Senate, its qualifications, and the nature of its electorate, if it is to be elected; again, with the constitution of the House of Representatives, its qualifications, and the nature of its electoral representation; and then with the question whether members of this House, or either of the Houses, should receive remuneration for their services.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
That is very important.

Mr. BARTON:
Then with the question, if we take things in the order of the Bill of 1891-which has been so much approved by this Convention that it is most likely that any Bill prepared will take things in similar order-of the powers of the Parliament. Before you consider the money clauses of the Bill, and the relative powers of the two Houses in regard to money, it is essential to consider what powers of legislation you will give to the Parliament. Then there are the questions of the nature of the Executive Government, of finance and trade, and of the amendment of the Constitution. If the purpose is to suspend the Standing Orders so as to carry a motion to allow of this discussion of the relations of the Houses to Money Bills, is it to be contended for a moment that it is a right thing that this Convention should deal with these proposed powers of the two Houses inter se before we have before us that part of the Bill treating of finance and trade? Why plunge into a discussion beforehand of the powers inter se of the two Houses when we have not considered those important questions, the discussion of which is probably at the bottom of the powers which we will give to the two Houses? I am perfectly willing to meet the hon. member; I am willing to eliminate and to postpone all clauses which are merely machinery clauses, and do not relate to vital principles; but, for the reasons stated, I must object to a motion having for its object the taking out of its order the consideration of the clauses relating to Money Bills and the postponement of the discussion of matters which are in their nature anterior to the subject of money clauses. Then there is the constitution of the two Houses. Before dealing with the money clauses we should surely know how the Houses are to be elected, and the powers which we will give to them; if, for instance, it is intended to allow each Chamber-

The PRESIDENT:
I wish to make a suggestion-

Mr. BARTON:
I was only putting an illustration.

The PRESIDENT:
I would suggest to the representative that probably he may consider these remarks are more pertinent to the motion which is intended to be dealt with than to the motion now before the House. It is merely for the suspension of the Standing Orders.

Mr. BARTON:

I am not going one whit further than traversing the reasons given by my hon. friend for the suspension of the Standing Orders-

Mr. SYMON:

I rise to a point of order. The whole question, as you put it, Sir, is whether these Standing Orders are to be suspended to enable this discussion in which we are about to be launched to take place. Now, if we are to be launched into a discussion without the suspension of the Standing Orders, we may be debating the subject the whole day, and the Finance Committee or any other Committee that has work to do will be delayed in doing it. I do ask you to rule that we should be confined to the particular motion of whether the Standing Orders are to be suspended or not.

Mr. BARTON:

There is no necessity for any ruling, as I shall abstain from discussing anything that is indicated in the hon. member's point of order.

The PRESIDENT:

The assurance of the hon. member will obviate any necessity for a ruling.

Mr. BARTON:

The hon. member Sir John Forrest stated in his speech that these clauses—and, I suppose, I may deal with matters which the hon. member was allowed to deal with—

The PRESIDENT:

I did not understand the representative of Western Australia to discuss the clauses at all. His arguments were chiefly confined to the question of urgency, that he might have an opportunity of moving a certain resolution to which effect might be given next Monday.

Mr. BARTON:

I am not going to infringe the spirit of your ruling, Sir, but when the representative of Western Australia states that portion of an expected Bill is the most important portion of that Bill, and it is for that reason he wishes to have the Standing Orders suspended, I only wish to meet that statement by representing this: that there must in any Constitution Bill be other matters which are quite as important as the powers of the Houses between themselves—so their relationship to each other in respect of Money Bills—and it would not be right to suspend the Standing Orders for the purpose of the whole machinery of that Bill in Committee being dislocated.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I hope the Convention will give Sir John Forrest the opportunity he desires of securing the suspension of the Standing Orders with a view to enabling him and the other Western Australian representatives to be present during the discussion of the more important features of the Constitution Bill. I think it would be not only a matter of courtesy on the part of hon. members of the Convention to do this, but a matter of policy also. I trust no one will be able to say at any time that, for any object whatever, the representatives of any colony at this Convention were shut out from a discussion by an accident which they could not foresee or counteract.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I admit it would be extremely undesirable to suspend the Standing Orders for the purpose indicated, namely, to arrange now in what order we will take the discussion of a Bill which we have not seen. Supposing the Standing Orders are suspended, how can we know what is the best way to deal with the Bill when we do not know what the Bill is itself? We would be practically discussing the question in the dark. That seems a sufficient reason for refusing the suspension of the Standing Orders. If the question were a matter of urgency, and we had the necessary information upon which to proceed when the Standing Orders were suspended, there might be some reason for it; but when the Standing Orders are suspended - supposing they are - we shall then be in absolute ignorance of the provisions of the Bill, and consequently unable to arrive at a conclusion, in the language of the proposed motion, as to which are the more important portions of the Bill. This, it seems to me, is a sufficient reason for voting against the suspension of the Standing Orders.

The motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders was then put.

The PRESIDENT:

As the House is not unanimous there must be a division.

A division was taken and resulted as follows:—

Ayes, 26; noes, 14; majority, 12.

Ayes.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT:
There are twenty-six ayes and fourteen noes, a majority of twelve for the ayes. As there is a majority of the whole House, the Standing Orders are suspended as desired.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not intend to say many words; in fact, I think I have said all that I desired to say in moving the suspension of the Standing Orders. I am very sorry indeed to have to urge this matter upon hon. members, and to act contrary to the wishes of an important section of the House; but I am compelled to do it in the interests of the colony I represent. Whatever may have been my private feelings, I cannot help trying my best to have a means provided by which the representatives from Western Australia will be enabled to take part in the discussion, and I hope vote upon, a matter which we consider of most vital interest in the Bill. As to the argument of Mr. Barton that the Bill is not before us, and that we do not therefore know its provisions, I am of opinion that we know very well what will be its provisions. We have seen in the daily press the conclusions that have been arrived at, and many of us have been on the Constitutional Committee; and, therefore, to argue that the Bill is not before us is really -if I may say so, respectfully-splitting straws. We know very well what the Bill will be when it comes before us, because we have taken part, many of us, in the discussions, and those who have not taken part have seen the conclusions arrived at in the committees. Therefore, I can see none of the inconvenience which my friend Mr. Barton seems to find in discussing one portion of the Bill before the other portions. In fact, I think, when we get the Bill into our hands on Monday, we will be astonished at the very few alterations on the Bill of 1891.

Mr. BARTON:
   Some radical ones.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
   And the radical ones, which are very easily understood, are not many. For instance, there is the mode of election to the Senate.

Mr. HOWE:
   Do not give it away.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
   Oh, that is only trifling.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
   And the power of the Senate has been altered in some respects, not very materially, but in the direction which the colony I represent desires.

Dr. QUICK:
   Why, then, are you so anxious to have it discussed?

Sir JOHN FORREST:
   Because we wish the decisions arrived at by the Constitutional Committee to be upheld in the Convention, and if we are not here when they come forward they may not be. Surely that is good enough reason for what we desire. I cannot agree that the question of the mode adopted in connection with the constitution of the two Houses has anything whatever to do with the question I want decided, that is, the relative powers of the two Houses. Whatever may be its constitution I desire that the Senate should have the powers which a good majority in Committee have agreed that it ought to possess. The constitution of the two Houses does not affect the point at issue, for I desire that the House which represents the States shall have the power of amending all Bills, taxation, Customs, and all others, with the exception of the Appropriation Bill, which we are willing should not be amended, but may be rejected by the States House. This is the decision arrived at in committee, and, on behalf of the colony which I represent, I wish to take part in upholding that decision in the Committee of the whole. It is not a question whether we should have the Senate elected by a whole colony or by divisions of a colony, or even by members of the Parliament; but I want for the Senate co-ordinate powers to amend all Bills, with the exception of the Appropriation Bill. I think members should have some consideration for the West Australian representatives, and should assist us to take part in the discussion on this important matter; but if, on the other hand, they will not give us this opportunity, and should the decision of the Constitutional Committee be reversed, it cannot be said that the decision, without our votes, is the deliberate judgment of this Convention, because ten members will be absent, and those ten members would have voted for the views I advocate.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Argument or no argument?

Hon. MEMBERS:
Hear, hear. Nominees.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I notice that when a division takes place on any important matter affecting the interests of their States, the representatives of the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria vote together on a motion.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
No.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Look at the last division list.

Mr. BARTON:
May I remind the hon. representative that he carried his motion just now by the vote of a member for New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS:
And member for Victoria too.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
That was due to the spirit of fair play. I thank those hon. members for giving us the consideration that I think we are fairly entitled to. When it comes, however, to a matter of pounds Shillings and pence, you will find that the representatives will look after the interests of the colony they represent. We found it so in 1891, and we find it so now. I have not conferred with my co-delegates, but I know that their view is that the smaller colonies should be protected. While we are willing that the larger colonies should have the preponderating power in the House of Representatives on the basis of population-and that we should have very few members there-we say that we ought to have equal powers in the Senate. I will say no more, but submit the motion to the judgment and consideration of members.

Sir JAMES LEE STEERE:
I second the motion, which I think is one which must commend itself to the favorable consideration of members, because it is not only our colony which will be affected by the absence of its representatives when the discussion takes place, but there are representatives of other colonies who will be. I wish to take particular notice of the observation that the representatives of Western Australia were the nominees of the Government. I wish to say distinctly that the Government took no part in influencing the elections.

Dr. QUICK:
You are not elected by the people, at any rate.

Sir JAMES LEE STEERE:
We were elected by the representatives of the people, which is far better.

Dr. QUICK:
In your own opinion.

Sir JAMES LEE STEERE:
Now, with reference to these particular clauses which it is proposed to deal with first, if the motion of my honourable colleague is assented to by this Convention, I cannot see that they will be governed by any other clauses so far as to prejudice discussion. We have a very strong feeling in our colony—and I believe it is the same in all the smaller colonies—that, in order to safeguard our interests, it is necessary that the States Assembly should have equal power with the House of Representatives in amending Money Bills; and I really cannot see that the discussion will be affected by any previous clauses in the Bill. For that reason I hope that the motion of my honorable colleague will be agreed to by this Convention.

Hon. MEMBERS:
Divide, divide!

Mr. HIGGINS:
As I apprehend that this motion will go to a division, I wish to say a few words to explain my vote. I am quite sure that every member of this Convention is equally desirous with the hon. member Sir John Forrest of having Western Australia in this Federation, and of having the Western Australian representatives in our deliberations. But to pass from that, I cannot help recalling the words used by Sir John Forrest in his speech in the opening debate. The hon. gentleman then said:

While I am prepared to assist in passing this Bill, and while I believe in a Central Government, I am at a loss—and I honestly confess it—to satisfy myself—

Mr. SOLOMON:
On a point of order, Mr. President, is the hon. member in order in quoting from "Hansard"?

The PRESIDENT:
It is not entirely regular, but in view of the fact that there are representatives here who are not well acquainted with the Standing Orders, I do not think that the hon. member will insist upon the point of order.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I am speaking from memory with the assistance of a certain document. Sir John Forrest said:
"I am at a loss - and I honestly confess it-to satisfy myself where the gain comes in for the colony I have the honor to represent. Still, though we may have to sacrifice something in the first instance, it will be for the eventual good and happiness of the whole, so I am prepared to throw in my lot with the other colonies of Australia."

The position is this: that this Federation, which the other colonies regard as vital to the growth and prosperity of Australia, is regarded as a matter of comparative convenience by the hon. the Premier of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
My words were justified.

Mr. HIGGINS:
We have come to this Convention to make compromises in order to achieve Federation, and to vote on this matter-and properly so-but to have voting gentlemen who have come to this Convention with the idea: Well, unless we get exactly what we want, we will not have Federation at all, those are uneven terms, Sir. While I feel the value of having the representatives of Western Australia here, I do think that it is rather hard to expect that we should allow upon this one particular subject the representatives of Western Australia through their Premier, Sir John Forrest, like Brennus, to throw his weighty sword into the scale and say vae victis. Much as we would like to do it, we cannot forget that all the representatives of the other colonies were elected by the people. I do not wish to say it in any spirit of rudeness or churlishness, but there is no doubt that, rightly or wrongly, the representatives of Western Australia have not been elected by the people. The people of Western Australia have not spoken yet, they have not given expression to their views.

Mr. HOWE:
That is not a federal spirit!

Mr. HIGGINS:
I conceive that it is a perfectly federal spirit to say that the people should speak.

Mr. HOWE:
They have no business to be here according to your argument.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I hope the first division in this Convention, which has taken place here to-day, will be an object lesson to those throughout the colonies who think there ought to be equal representation of all the colonies in all respects.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I look at this matter, so far as I can see it, from an entirely practical standpoint. If this motion had come on at the ordinary time, I might have voted for it; but we have a distinct course of business before us, and I understand some members have left for a few days thinking that that course of business would be carried out.

Mr. BARTON:

That is so.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I think it would be fatal to our meeting here, and fatal to the first step in Committee, if a vote were taken with certain prominent members absent. I should be willing to take a vote if I was sure there was a full meeting of the Convention. I do not approve of the argument of the hon. member who has just sat down, because we have nothing to do with the mode of election of members of the Convention. Our object simply is to have fifty members representing five colonies in the Convention. If Sir John Forrest would adjourn this debate until Monday, we would have this result, that-as it is not likely that the division he is anxious to bring about would be taken until Tuesday afternoon-by then all the representatives who have left for the other colonies would be in their places.

Mr. SOLOMON:

We could arrange pairs.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

I am sure Sir John Forrest does not want to snatch a vote of the Convention hastily. On the question of pairs, I may say we have certain strength and talent away, and you cannot compensate for its absence by arranging pairs, I shall be obliged to vote against the motion, though, so far as my views are concerned now, I should vote for it if the opportunity were convenient, and I suggest that the discussion having been started should be adjourned, so that it can be resumed immediately upon the Bill coming before the Convention.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

How would it do to pass this, and postpone the division until all the members are here?

Mr. MCMILLAN:

There are two objects to be gained if this, debate is closed at once. We want to get on with our Committees, and this delay is very awkward. If we adjourn until Monday, and the money part of the Bill is brought up first, we would not decide until Tuesday afternoon or evening, and that would meet Sir John Forrest's purpose.

Mr. LEAKE:

In the opening debates of this Convention a good deal was said about the spirit of compromise and conciliation which should actuate hon. members, and I appeal to hon. members who are opposed to this motion to take advantage of the opportunity as the first practical one of applying that principle. Western Australia does not in this instance ask any great or peculiar privilege. All we urge is that we should be heard upon what appears to me to be not only an important but a vital principle in the proposed Bill. The principle which the resolution involves includes not only a constitutional, but also a financial question in the Federation Bill. The arguments of Mr. Barton are perhaps too narrow to appeal to hon. members with any considerable force. Where can the objection be to the representatives of Western Australia taking part in so important a deliberation? I sincerely trust hon. members will give us some opportunity of expressing the views which we hold. It is admitted that we must retire from this Convention on Wednesday next, but we not only want to express our views, but, as Sir John Forrest states, we desire also to record our votes. I take it it is not the idea of any hon. member to snatch a division—

Mr. BARTON:

That is what is being done.

Mr. LEAKE:

And thus probably raise trouble at the second meeting of the Convention. Again I appeal to the sense of fairness of hon. members to allow this course to be adopted. It may be unusual, and possibly the same object might be attained if Sir John Forrest, when the Bill comes into Committee, moves to postpone certain clauses until after the consideration of subsequent ones. I understand from the arguments of Mr. Barton that he would have assented to such a proposal; and, after all, it seems to me that there is very little variance between the parties on this question. Considering the advantages which we may possibly gain, I would ask in that spirit of compromise and conciliation which we hope does prevail, that hon. members will meet us upon this point. I would like to make one observation with regard to what fell from Mr. Higgins as to the position our delegates occupy in this Convention. We are referred to as "nominees" and not as representatives of the people.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I have not used the word nominee."
Mr. LEAKE:

In reply to it, I say we are the elect of the elect, and we can claim as great privileges as any member who sits in this Convention. I may also remind hon. members that even though the term "nominee" should apply to us, they cannot apply it in derogation of our position, because in doing so they would derogate from the ability of the exalted Convention which sat in 1891, every member of which was the nominee of a separate Parliament.

Mr. TRENWITH:

And which could not secure the confidence of the people.

Mr. HOWE:

I do not wish to go into the subtle arguments of the gentlemen who preceded me, but from a practical point I wish to express my views. Sir John Forrest has placed his case before the House in such a common-sense manner, that it appeals to my understanding. He has stated that, at great inconvenience, he has attended this Convention. In the first place, he assured us it was not the intention of Western Australia to join at all in this Convention, but that, by the frequent appeals made by the Premiers of the various colonies, he was induced to agree to be present. He agreed to come at a very critical time in the history of a new country like Western Australia, which is just upon the eve of a general election, and he had no time when he agreed to come to appeal to the people. He tells us that he scarcely had time to get the Bill through the House, and allow the conventionists to be elected by the Houses of Parliament met together for that purpose. Consequently I think that, in putting his case before us, he has placed us under a deep obligation to himself. What are our inconveniences in comparison with his? When we entered into the compact we knew that we would have to go to one colony or another, and we were prepared to do this. But his case is different. He declined at first to come into the Convention. He has told us that his time is limited, and that unless the most crucial part of the Bill is brought forward now, he will have to depart, and will thus be deprived of even expressing his views upon it or of voting thereon. So far as I am concerned, I shall be no party to placing Sir John Forrest and the Western Australian contingent in such an unsatisfactory position. Is it our desire that Federation should be an accomplished fact? If so, in treating the Western Australian people in this way we should be throwing a barrier in its way which may take years to remove. Mr. Higgins's remarks, I think, were very severe, and quite uncalled for. He twisted the representatives of Western Australia with not being properly elected, and with not being here on the same footing as ourselves, notwithstanding Sir John Forrest's explanation that it was the only means by which they could be represented here, and that that course was adopted by the invitation of the Premiers. Those who block the reasonable request of Western Australia are not showing that federal spirit which should be exhibited.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I would like to take your ruling again on another point of order. The point I would submit is that the form of the proposed resolution is not in accordance with the practice adopted in this and every other House. We are told the objection to the instruction must be urged when the instructions are under discussion. Now, your rules were adopted as the rules of this Convention. Your rules are the same as the rules of most Australian Colonies, which provide that, where not otherwise provided, resort shall be had to the usages and practice of the House of Commons. Therefore, for the purpose of informing hon. members as to what the usage and the practice of the House of Commons is, the whole of Australia is deeply indebted to Mr. E. G. Blackmore for his admirable compilation of the decisions of various Speakers.

Mr. ISAACS:

Hear, hear.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Those decisions are the rules and practice of the House of Commons as the Speaker's ruling is the practice of the House until it is dissented from. This instruction is out of order for two reasons—first of all, it is mandatory; secondly, it is directing the Committee to do something which the Committee itself has power to do. The House has no power to direct the Committee to do that which the Committee itself has power to do. The House can only instruct the Committee that they have power to do certain things; that is, the House can give them power to do certain things which otherwise they would not have power to do. It may be said that these things are technical. I can see no necessity for the waste of time we have had, because Sir John Forrest could just as well have moved in Committee the postponement of all the clauses until he came to the clauses he wished to discuss.

Mr. BARTON:

He is only blocking the Drafting Committee.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I will not impute motives.

Mr. BARTON:

I do not mean on purpose.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I do not sympathise with those who say that Sir John Forrest does not represent anybody. I think he does represent his own colony, and he has represented it for a long time.

Mr. HIGGINS: Nobody has said that he did not.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT: First of all the motion says:
That it be an instruction to the Committee, &c.
After all, has not the Committee control of the whole Bill once it is sent in to them?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON: Would it not be as well to read the whole of the instruction?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT: Would it not be as well to let me put my case, and for the hon. member to reply to it? However erroneously I might state my case the hon. member has got the right of reply, and to point out in what respect I am wrong. If the hon. member desires it, I will read the whole of the instruction, which states:
That it be an instruction to the Committee to deal with the powers of the States Assembly in regard to Money Bills before dealing with any other portion of the Bill.

As a Committee, it has got that power. Will any one say that the Committee has not got the absolute control of the Bill committed to it by this Convention, and that it cannot postpone every clause in it until the clauses which Sir John Forrest wishes particularly to discuss are reached. If the procedure of the House of Commons is to be our guide in this matter, then there is no doubt as to what the law is. In Mr. Blackmore's "Decisions of Speakers Dennison and Brand," page 189, it is stated:

No instruction can be given to a Committee to do that which they have already the power to do.

That is quite independent of the Standing Orders. The quotation then goes on:

Nor can an instruction be given to a Committee to deal with a question beyond the limits of the Bill. Nor may an instruction be mandatory in form, the intentions of an instruction being to give a Committee power to do a certain thing if they think proper, not to command them to do it.

Mr. DOUGLAS: You misunderstand the meaning of it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT: A thing which has struck me in this Convention is the wonderfully disorderly conduct of the rulers of the other Legislatures (laughter) - with friend, Sir Graham Berry, who is a pattern for every one of us. With regard to the form of this resolution, I submit, first, that it is giving the Committee an instruction to do something which of itself it has the power to do, and for that reason it is out of order; and, secondly, it is out of order because it is mandatory, and the Committee being invested with the proposed power it has no right to get this instruction. The case to which I have referred is well known. In page 190 of the book I have quoted from, it is stated:

An instruction given to the Committee to confer on it that power which, without the instruction, it would not have.

Will anyone tell me that the Convention has not got the power to do exactly what it likes when it gets into Committee? The suspension of the Standing Orders in no way cures that. I hope the language of the authority I have just quoted is plain enough even for the hon. member who presides over the Legislative Council of Tasmania. There is another passage in Mr. Blackmore's book which I would like to quote. It is as under:

The Speaker-"The right hon. gentleman considers the instruction unnecessary, because the Poor Law Board have now the power of altering the boundary of unions. But the question is not as to whether the Poor Law Board has the power, but whether the Committee on this Bill would have power, without the instruction, to do so; and in my opinion the Committee would not have that power, because the subject matter would not be relevant to the subject matter of the Bill. Therefore the right hon. gentleman is in order, and rightly has precedence with his motion, because an instruction is not of the nature of an amendment, but a substantial motion."

There he ruled that, because the Committee had not the power to insert a new clause, the instruction was in order. The heading of the case I have quoted is that an instruction is given to the Committee to confer a power on it. I have pointed these things out because I do not see why, when we have seriously adopted a set of Standing Orders, we should depart from them. In Legislatures there is nothing more dangerous than the sudden suspension of Standing Orders. The majority can always protect themselves, but the Standing Orders, as Mr. Speaker Onslow once said, are for the protection of the minority.

Mr. SYMON:

May I ask if the member for Western Australia, Sir John Forrest, withdraws this motion now, will it be competent for him to proceed with the notice of motion on the paper, of which he has given notice contingently, in its present terms?
Mr. DEAKIN:
A point of order has been raised.

The PRESIDENT:
On the point of order raised by Sir Joseph Abbott there is no doubt that the course pursued in this matter is not the usual course, but the position is this: that the Standing Orders that regulate the usual course of procedure in Parliament and this House have been deliberately suspended by an absolute majority for the purpose of enabling a specific motion to be moved. That motion is now before the Convention, and I propose to rule that it is in order.

Dr. QUICK:
Then everything is in order.

Mr. SYMON:
If Sir John Forrest withdraws this motion now, will it not be competent for him to proceed with the other one on the paper?

The PRESIDENT:
I should not rule that the withdrawal of this motion would prevent Sir John Forrest, when there is a resolution before the House that the House should resolve itself into Committee, from moving the motion on the paper.

Mr. BARTON:
The hon. member can withdraw this one, and still go on on Monday.

Mr. PEACOCK:
That is pretty rich, after wasting all this time.

Mr. SYMON:
Then I will join with Mr. McMillan, in urging Sir John Forrest either to consent to this debate being adjourned until the draft Bill is before us, or to withdraw the motion now with a view of moving it on the occasion indicated by the notice on the paper. I, for one, am in the position of desiring more light. We are really beating the air. We have no Bill before us, and it is difficult to understand how we can give instructions to a Committee to deal with a Bill which is non-existent, and the terms of which we do not know.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
We know them well enough.

Mr. BARTON:
As a Convention we cannot know them until the Committee reports.

Mr. SYMON:
We have not all had the opportunity of being on the Constitutional Committee, and, technically at any rate, we do not know whether there are money clauses in this particular Bill or not. It will be better for us to pursue the course indicated by the motion, of dealing with it contingently on the motion being moved to carry the Bill into Committee of the whole House. We should then know what the terms of the whole Bill were, and the business would be forwarded just as effectually. The object Sir John Forrest had in view has been to some extent assisted, because, in that spirit of conciliation and compromise which pervades the assembly, he has had an indication of a large amount of goodwill. The majority have concurred with him in suspending the Standing Orders to permit of this discussion, and he has been able to see who are with him and who are against him; he has separated, I will not say the sheep from the goats, but the sympathetic from the unsympathetic members of the Convention. I am entirely with him. I do not think we ought to look at it from the point of view put by a member for Victoria, that we who are elected by the people are of finer clay than those chosen by the Legislature of Western Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS:

I never said that, nor anything like it.

Mr. SYMON:

We speak with no more authority than they. There are ten representatives here representing that colony, and they take a very strong interest in securing a strong Senate. They say whether the Senate is elected by the people directly, or chosen by the Legislature, makes no difference to us—we want a strong Senate. And one of the elements which the representatives of the smaller colonies think is necessary for a strong Senate is that the largest possible power should be given to it in dealing with Money Bills. Undoubtedly that is the crucial point in connection with the Senate. I do not believe that to the representatives of the less populous colonies there is any other point on which they entertain so strong an opinion. Whilst we are in sympathy with Sir John Forrest, in the view which he has put forward, we feel that he has gained this much: he has the assurance of Mr. McMillan, that if the motion had come forward in the ordinary way, he would have voted for it. I do not think that he should be afraid, when we come to debate this matter at length, that he will be met by any unreasonable antagonism on the part of the representatives of the more populous colonies. At any rate he can depend upon the views which he puts forward being fairly and justly considered. I am quite sure that the grounds for special consideration which he has put forward will have special weight, and that under the special conditions in which certain members of the Convention find themselves, members will give them every consideration in bringing to a final decision that particular point which they think is of the highest consequence before they enter upon any scheme of Federation. At the same time, I appeal to Sir John to withdraw the motion, because, before voting on it, I want to see the whole Bill, and I feel that there is an element of fairness in the contention that there are those absent who would exercise considerable influence on the Convention in regard to this matter. Sir John knows that there is a sentiment of goodwill in the Convention towards him and the colony he represents, and, therefore, I would suggest that he should either withdraw the motion, or consent to an adjournment of the debate until the draft Bill is before us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Personally, I am very anxious that the representatives of Western Australia should be present when we are dealing with this question relating to the powers of the Houses with regard to Money Bills, as I think that it is probable that such arguments may be brought forward as will induce them to change their strong views, or that we may bring forward sufficient arguments to convince them that, unless they are prepared to change or modify their views, they may jeopardise the whole work of the Convention.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear. It is just as well that the public should know it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Therefore, I will be pleased if they should be present, in order that their views may be set forth, and the public may have the opportunity of hearing them. I submit, however, that the course which Sir John Forrest has taken to-day is the very course which will prevent full discussion before the Western Australian delegates leave. Although the Finance Committee have been sitting for several days they have very important and very difficult matters yet to decide. There is still one matter which should be thoroughly threshed out, and will have to be threshed out, that will take many hours before we can come to a decision upon; and, unless we can come to a decision to-day, it will be impossible for the Drafting Committee to put the resolutions into proper shape in order that the Bill may be proceeded with on Monday. With that object in view, I would strongly urge upon my honorable friend, the Premier of Western Australia, not to insist upon his motion, but to allow this matter to cease now in order that we may get to our work. I would point out that if there is any desire to block discussion in Committee, so that Western Australia may not be represented, there would be no difficulty in doing that if hon. members really wished to do it. But I feel sure that no one wishes to do that, because, if we wanted to do so, we could discuss the Bill on the second reading, and at such length as to make it impossible for them to have an opportunity to deal with the matter. We are perfectly willing that they should have an opportunity of expressing their views. I myself would be very glad indeed if a vote could be taken when the Western

Sir JOHN FORREST:

By permission of the Convention I should like to say that I am only too pleased to fall in with the views of hon. members. The only object I had was to save time on Monday. I am very much obliged to hon. members for the way in which they have dealt with the matter, and I will ask one of my colleagues to move that the debate be adjourned. Perhaps that would be the better course.

HON. MEMBERS:

Withdraw.

Mr. BARTON:

I will save him the trouble by moving that the debate be adjourned.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

Would that be the best way?

Mr. BARTON:

You can withdraw and take the contingent motion.

HON. MEMBERS:

Withdraw.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

I would suggest to my honorable friend that he should withdraw this motion. I voted for the suspension of the Standing Orders in a spirit of generosity, so that the hon. members from Western Australia would be allowed to state their views on this important question. I agree with Sir Joseph Abbott, that the proceeding is irregular, but I say that the irregularity is justified by the exigencies of the case, because hon. members from Western Australia wished to make a statement.

Mr. SYMON:

The President has ruled that Sir John Forrest may proceed with the contingent motion on the paper.

Mr. HOLDER:

I would suggest that Sir John Forrest should withdraw the motion; and if he will do that, then the contingent notice of motion he has on the paper will have the full effect, and his rights will in every way be protected.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

You will not come to it till Tuesday, though.
Mr. HOLDER:

But I take it that the hon. member may secure his end by another method. The division we took just now indicated the desire to have fair play. One of the members from one of of the large colonies voted with him, and so did another from another large colony. A member from one of the larger colonies (Mr. McMillan) urged the undesirability of taking snatch votes. I do not think any of us want snatch votes. I do not think any of us desire what is unfair. I think the whole of the members ought to be prepared to give pairs right through next week, and, if required, until the Convention has finished its work; and if hon. members would only undertake to give pairs when required, and of course when properly authenticated, they would be meeting the very special claims of Western Australia.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Pairs will never do! Oh, dear! That would be a nice way to deal with this business. I never heard of such a proposal. VICTORIAN DELEGATES:

Let the South Australians give the pairs! (Laughter.)

Mr. HOLDER:

Those who want to get a snatch vote will refuse to give pairs.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Nothing of the kind.

Mr. TRENWITH:

If we decide to give pairs, we might as well take all the votes now.

Mr. HOLDER:

I am surprised to hear any refuse to give pairs. It almost makes me withdraw my advice to Sir John Forrest. I believe a large majority of members will be prepared to give pairs rather than have a catch vote. I believe the South Australian representatives would readily do so.

Mr. LYNE:

How can you give pairs when you do not know what the proposal's will be?

Mr. HOLDER:

We know the Bill will be before us before the Western Australian delegates withdraw.

Mr. BARTON:

Let them arrange pairs with the hon. members for South Australia.

Mr. HOLDER:

I am willing to pair with Mr. Lyne if he has to go away.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You pair with Sir John Forrest.

Mr. HOLDER:

I will willingly pair with any hon. member from Western Australia with whose views I differ.

Mr. GLYNN:
Without listening to discussion?

Mr. TRENWITH:
What is the use of discussion if you have decided how you are going to vote?

Mr. MCMILLAN:
If you put the question to Mr. Barton asking him, if this motion is withdrawn, whether he can bring in the Bill on Monday, so far as he knows now, Sir John Forrest will know the position he will be in.

Mr. HOLDER:
I am asking the hon. member to withdraw his motion; but I am asking under the special circumstances of the case that when the Western Australians have to withdraw, those who differ from them should give them pairs.

Mr. BARTON:
Perhaps, after what has been said, I may claim the indulgence of the House, without this being regarded as a speech, to make a statement. I wish to say that Sir John Forrest knows how sedulously I have endeavored to push forward the business of the Convention. I would like, too, to give force to what has been said about the time which has been taken up to say that, supposing the Bill is brought up on Monday, the proceedings of this Convention will have taken twenty days from the outset, while up to the same stage in 1891 they took twenty-nine days, or nine days more. There is, I may say, a chance of the Bill being ready on Monday morning. There was more chance of that at 10.30 this morning than there is now. If there is any serious prolongation of this debate, this chance will disappear. I am willing to work hard, and other members are also ready to work hard with me. I point out to the hon. member that if, a little while ago, I was prepared to break the Sabbath on his behalf, I hope he will not take any action now that will cause me to be religious on Sunday. I am speaking jocosely when I say that; but I do want hon. members to understand that it is only by anxious and unremitting care that this Bill can be ready on Monday.

HON. MEMBERS: Withdraw!

Dr. COCKBURN:
As between withdrawal and adjournment I would submit that the hon. member Sir John Forrest has secured the suspension of the Standing Orders, and cannot be prevented from going on by the technical point raised by Sir Joseph Abbott.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I will raise no more. I will take no steps to prevent the hon. member from going on with this motion when the Bill is before the House.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I, too, would suggest that Sir John Forrest should withdraw the motion.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I am quite willing to meet the views of the House, and withdraw the motion.

Leave granted; motion withdrawn.

NOTICE OF MOTION.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I give notice that on Monday next I will move:
That, in the opinion of this Convention, the interval for the consideration of the Draft Bill by the local Legislatures should be extended to not less than 120 days and not more than 180 days.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. BARTON:
I beg to move:
That this Convention, at its rising, do adjourn until 11.15 a.m. on Monday, 12th instant.

I have put this motion upon the paper at the request of a number of delegates who wish to go to Broken Hill. The question is entirely in the hands of the House. The Constitutional Committee will meet at 10.30 o'clock on Monday, by which time it is hoped, at any rate, the Bill may be ready, and this motion is merely for the convenience of members going to Broken Hill.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I second the motion.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.
The Convention adjourned at 12.18 p.m.
Monday April 12, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 11.15 a.m.
BUSINESS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. BARTON:

Before you call on the ordinary business of the day, Sir, I think it will be satisfactory to hon. members if I say a few words about the state of business, and the time that we may hope to begin to discuss the new Bill. Committees Nos. 2 and 3 have reported to Committee No. 1, and the report of Committee No. 1 will, including the Bill, I think, be ready at close on one o'clock. Of course the Drafting Committee appointed have had to take into consideration the labors of the other two committees, and have had to frame the necessary clauses upon the results of their deliberations. They have been assisted in the case of the Judiciary Committee by their work having been thrown into legal form beforehand. The Bill, if I may break the confidence of the Committees so far as to say so, is practically prepared. But it has to go back to the Printer for a few alterations -one or two of consequence, and others not-before being fit to present to this House, and it will not be in a form in which it could be conscientiously laid before this House before one o'clock. The course I suggest is that, after the ordinary morning business is taken, the Convention shall rise till after lunch. So soon as the Bill is returned to the Constitutional Committee with all corrections made, that committee will be ready to meet and adopt its report, which is the Bill, and then, as soon as this is done-notwithstanding that I may be incurring as Chairman of the Drafting and Constitutional Committees some charge of breaking the Standing Orders or Parliamentary law, I think I will take upon myself, unless forbidden by this Convention, to distribute to members during the suspension of the sitting, copies of the Bill-

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:

Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:

So that by two o'clock or half-past two members may have had some opportunity of looking at the Bill. They will then be assisted by short explanations from me of the principal provisions of the Bill, and the manner in which they differ from those of the Bill of 1891, and when this is done I shall have the honor of moving that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the clauses of the Bill.

PETITION.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I have a petition, signed by 2,606 residents of Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, and Tasmania, praying that neither the Federal Government nor any State Parliament shall make any law respecting religion, or prohibiting free exercise thereof.

Petition received.

LOCAL LEGISLATURES AND THE DRAFT BILL.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I move:
That, in the opinion of this Convention, the interval for consideration of the Draft Bill by the local Legislatures should be extended to not less than 120 days nor more than 180 days.

I propose to say a few words in regard to this matter, but I should not object in any way if hon. members think it would be better to postpone its consideration till to-morrow morning, as otherwise it might interfere with the work of the Drafting Committee and the progress of the Bill.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Postpone it till this afternoon.

Mr. BARTON:
You might want to get on with the Bill then.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Postpone it till this afternoon.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
My object in moving this motion is to meet a difficulty which has arisen, especially in Western Australia, in regard to the reassembling of the Convention after 120 days. It would have been easy to meet within 120 days if it had not been for the celebration in connection with Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee, which will very much interfere, I think I may say, with the Parliamentary business of Western Australia, and I think has been found inconvenient by every Premier in Australia. As everyone knows, it is the intention of the various Premiers of the colonies to visit England, and they will not return to Australia until towards the end of August. Now, it might have been very easy for the Government of Western Australia to have met Parliament during the absence of the Premier, under ordinary circumstances; but the circumstances are not ordinary, because a general election will have taken place, and a new Parliament will have to be met. I myself hesitate to advise the Government to meet Parliament during the absence of the Premier, and I think that that feeling would be the same with every other Premier who is here if he had to meet a new Parliament. It is very easy of course to meet a Parliament which has very nearly run to the end of its term, but under ordinary circumstances the head of the Government likes to be in his place when Parliament is sitting, and especially so when a new Parliament is assembling. As I have just said, we will not be back till the end of August, and, when we do return, there will be the ordinary business of the country to be attended to in Parliament. I believe, in the case of Victoria, the Premier intends to make his financial statement as soon as he returns, and immediately afterwards he will have to go away to the Convention which may be sitting perhaps in Melbourne or Sydney, or some other place. In his case, of course, it is the last Session of the present Parliament, and a general election will take place shortly afterwards, and therefore there is not much probability of any difficulty arising. Another reason why 120 days is rather short is that we all hope to see Queensland represented at this Convention, and there may be some difficulties in the way of Queensland being represented as early as 120 days from the date of the adjournment of this Convention. Altogether, I think the reassembling of this Convention is not a matter that anyone should desire to hurry. If the feeling of the people of Australia is such that a little delay will damp their enthusiasm or their desire for Federation, I think that would be a good argument for not going forward with this Bill hurriedly. Unless the people of Australia are in real earnest in regard to this matter, and are desirous for a real union-unless that desire is deep-seated, it seems to me that we, the politicians of Australia, should not desire to hurry them on in the fear that their enthusiasm or their desire might grow less. For these reasons I urge hon. members to agree to this motion. Of course I am aware that in each of the colonies there is a law providing that we should meet not later than 120 days after the adjournment; but, of course, that can be obviated easily enough by passing a small Bill through our Legislatures-and I do not anticipate for a moment there would be any trouble in doing that-extending the time to sixty days longer. I always thought from the beginning that 120 days was too short a time to deal with this matter, and that it would be much better to give a longer time. My motion does not say that we shall adjourn for 180 days, but that it shall not be longer than that period, and, according to the terms of the motion, it will be competent for arrangements to be made for assembling at an earlier time if the state of public business allows of it. It would be convenient to many people and others besides myself and even other Parliaments besides the Western Australian Legislature, if this motion is agreed to. All I can say is that, if it is not agreed to, I cannot see how in our case we are to get over the difficulty, unless we meet Parliament earlier than we anticipate at the present time. The Legislature of Western Australia has agreed that we should not meet till the end of August, and they have granted the necessary supplies for July and August with a view to the colony being represented at the great ceremonial in connection with Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee. That being the case, there is no necessity whatever for the Government to meet Parliament until the end of August. If this motion is not agreed to, and if we have to meet again before 120 days time—about the end of August—I cannot see how it is possible for Western Australia to be represented on that occasion. I think everyone will agree that it is undesirable in this great movement that any colony should be absent. We all deplore the absence of Queensland on the present occasion, and we hope to have that great colony present with us when we meet again. This is more likely to come about, I think, if my motion is agreed with. Every assistance should be given to those colonies which are in any difficulty in order that when we meet again we may meet as representatives of all parts of Australia.

Sir JAMES LEE STEERE:

I beg to second the motion.

Mr. BARTON:

It is not my intention to address myself to the merits of this question, and I ask the Convention to take advantage of the kindly offer made by my hon. friend Sir John Forrest, for the adjournment of the discussion. We are now at a point at which the Constitutional Committee are doing all they can to get the Bill before the Convention, and it is desirable that their labours should be completed as soon as possible. In addition to that I would like to ask hon. members to remember that the wishes and views of the Government of New South Wales in a matter of this kind are of some importance. As I have not had any conference with the hon. the Premier of New South Wales in regard to this proposal, and as he will be here to-morrow morning, I submit that it would be convenient to adjourn this discussion till then. Bearing in mind that view, if I am in order, I will move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. LYNE:

How can it be got on with to-morrow morning?

Mr. BARTON:

There need be no difficulty over that. Though there may not be any opposition on the part of the Government of New South Wales I should like to be sure of that first, and I think that the Premier of one of the larger colonies is entitled to be heard upon a subject of this kind. I am not going to address myself to the question. If I did so, I would only point out that a matter of this kind would require amendments to be made in the Federal Enabling Act by five or six Parliaments, and I do not think it is very strong argument in favor of this proposal that we ought not to take any account of the state of public feeling in the other colonies.

Mr. DEAKIN:

Leave it till to-morrow.

Mr. BARTON:

If the hon. member thinks that the people of Western Australia are of opinion that there is nothing to be gained by Federation, there may be some force in the argument; but, if there are colonies which feel that there is much to be gained by it, then I think the electors of those provinces would be inclined to think they were being further deceived and befooled were the proposal lightly accepted.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

Ask for leave to continue your remarks to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:

I move-

That the debate be now adjourned till to-morrow morning.

Debate adjourned.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING.

The PRESIDENT:

I take it that the House desires a suspension of the sitting. Under the circumstances the Convention will resume its sittings at 2 o'clock.

Mr. BARTON:

Make it a little later-2.15.

The PRESIDENT:

The Convention will resume its sitting at 2.15 this afternoon.

The sitting was then suspended.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

Upon the Convention resuming its sitting at 2.15 p.m.

Mr. BARTON said:

I have to bring up the report of the Committee appointed March 31st, 1897, for the consideration of Constitutional Machinery and the Distribution of Functions and Powers, and to prepare and submit to this Convention a Bill for the establishment of a Federal Constitution, and I move that it be received and read.

Question resolved in the affirmative.
The CLERK then read the report, as follows:

1897.-Australasian Federal Convention.-Constitutional Committee.

Report of the Committee appointed March 31st, 1897, for the consideration of Constitutional Machinery and the Distribution of Functions and Powers, and to prepare and submit to this Convention a Bill for the Establishment of a Federal Constitution.

Your Committee (No. 1), appointed March 31st ultimo, for the consideration of Constitutional Machinery and the Distribution of Functions and Powers, and to receive Reports from Committees Nos. 2 and 3, appointed respectively for the consideration of provisions relating to Finance, Taxation, Railways, and Trade Regulation: and for the consideration of provisions relating to the establishment of a Federal Judiciary, and upon the result of the deliberations of the several Committees to prepare and submit to this Convention a Bill for the establishment of a Federal Constitution, have to report as follows, that is to say:—

Your Committee have held several meetings for the consideration of the matters committed to them by the Order of Reference, and have received from Committees Nos. 2 and 3 the reports of the conclusions arrived at by these Committees respectively.

Your Committee have further to report that they appointed a Committee of three members, viz.:—Mr. E. Barton, Q.C., the Hon. Sir J. W. Downer, K.C.M.G., Q.C., M.P., and the Hon. R. E. O'Connor, Q.C., M.L.C., to draft a Bill in terms of the Order of the Convention of March 31st ultimo.

The Sub-Committee have, in the preparation of the Bill, used every expedition consistent with the careful consideration which a matter of such gravity demands.

Your Committee submit to this Convention the Draft Bill as prepared by the Drafting Committee.

Your Committee further present to the Convention the reports made to them by Committees Nos. 2 and 3.

EDMUND BARTON,
Chairman Constitutional Committee.
Legislative Council Chamber, Parliament House, Adelaide, South Australia, April 11th, 1897,

Mr. BARTON:
I desire to move:
That the reports and Bill be printed.
Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON:
I have now to move:
That Mr. President do leave the chair, and that the Convention resolves itself into a Committee of the whole for the consideration of the Bill in detail.

In making that motion, inasmuch as the Bill only reached the hands of hon. members a few minutes ago, it would be expected of me that I should make some statement as to the shape which the Bill assumes, and as to the main points of difference between it and that instrument of Federation to which we have all been so long accustomed, and which we have so often read and re-read, the draft Bill of 1891. In making this statement I hope to be as brief as possible. The labors of the Drafting Committee, added to those undertaken in the general committees, have been rather arduous, and I must say that if my remarks extend to any length that will not be from any desire on my part, but simply in the performance of the duty I owe to this Convention. I would like to say at the outset that, as far as the Drafting Committee have been concerned, they have endeavored to carry out the decisions of the three committees appointed by the Convention as nearly as is possible in the preparation of an instrument of this kind. Of course a good deal is sometimes left to inference. A committee comes to a resolution, and, as in the case of the Finance Committee, it leaves a good deal to those who have to put its conclusions in the shape of law; and inferences have to be drawn as to whether they have been correctly interpreted by the draughtsmen who prepared the Bill. I think, however, that in all cases we have fairly and correctly interpreted the wishes of the committees. The conclusions of the Judiciary Committee left us little to do, as their conclusions were well drawn up in the form of the clauses in the Bill as we received them. Those of the Finance Committee consisted of resolutions, the bulk of which were in affirmation of the clauses which were contained in the Bill of 1891. There were, however, sundry matters in which the clauses of the Bill of 1891 were radically departed from, and in some particulars it became necessary for the Drafting Committee to frame provisions relating to the revenue and expenditure of the Commonwealth and the distribution of the surplus upon very different principles from those which were accepted in 1891. Again, the provision as to the taking over of and the consolidation of the public debts was of a considerably different character, and in the report of that committee they also recommended the appointment of an Inter-State Commission to deal with railway and river traffic, and I shall have occasion presently to explain what their recommendation was and how it was carried into effect by the Drafting Committee. So much for the reports of Committees 2 and 3. In the Constitutional Committee there were a certain number of amendments carried on the Bill of 1891. The bulk of its provisions were practically left untouched, although there were of course numerous minor amendments, but there were strong amendments with reference to some clauses, and in the statement which I am about to make I would ask hon. members not to consider me as giving particular effect to my own opinions but as endeavoring to record what has been done by the committees. With respect to the money clauses of the Bill of 1891 there have been departures which by some may be considered small, but by others as entirely radical. These I will come to directly in the course of the exposition I hope to make. In other portions of the Bill of 1891 the Constitutional Committee decided to alter the constitution of the Senate. They decided that the Senate should be a body chosen by the people of each State as one electorate, and in so doing they decided also that the qualification of the electors should be the same as that of the electors for the House of Representatives, and also that the qualification for the States Assembly, as the body formerly known as the Senate is now called, should be practically the right to vote at elections for the House of Representatives. Having made these few remarks with regard to the decisions of the committee—though I must not omit to say that there were other important decisions of the Constitutional Committee, which I have not yet mentioned—I should like to explain this Bill in a way which hon. members can more readily follow by taking the Bill in their hands and weighing my successive explanations as they are given. I shall endeavor to keep as nearly as possible to the form of the Bill as it stands, because in construction and groundwork this Bill is very similar to the Bill of 1891, whatever departures there may have been in substance and form in the various clauses. Of course it is necessary in a Bill of this kind that it must be passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, and we have endeavored, as was done in 1891, to put the Constitution of the Federation in the form of a document by itself, and we hope complete in itself. The Bill, therefore, now before hon. members is framed as a Bill to be introduced into the Parliament of the United Kingdom constituting the Commonwealth and declaring the Constitution of the Commonwealth. The Constitution itself stands as a separate part of the Bill. Hon. members will remember that in some of the Constitutions of the various colonies the Constitution Bill stands as a schedule of the Imperial enactment. The Constitution of Australia in this Bill has been placed by itself under the heading of the eighth clause, covering the portion of the Bill which has to be passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Of course everything has to be passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, but, as before, there will be a certain number of covering clauses to be passed by that Parliament—I think seven in number -and then there will be the eighth clause, part of which will be the whole Constitution as intended to be carried into effect if this Bill is passed by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. In that respect we have proceeded upon the lines laid down at the Sydney Convention of 1891. We have thought that the name, as before, of the new Federation should be the Commonwealth of Australia. I need not refer to the many discussions which have taken place upon the name appropriate for the Federation of the Australian Colonies, but on the whole we have been of opinion—at any rate the Constitutional Committee have come to the decision—that as we are now about to constitute a nation, which by its attributes will be a great Commonwealth, it should receive that name and, for myself, I venture the assertion that I know of none better and none statelier. I need not, therefore, further refer to the clauses which form the covering clauses of the Bill which the Parliament of the United Kingdom will give to this Constitution, but I will refer to the frame of the Constitution itself. It is divided into eight chapters. The first deals with the Parliament, and this is divided into five parts, that is, General, the States Assembly, the House of Representatives, Provisions relating to both Houses, and the Powers of the Parliament. The second chapter deals with the Executive Government; the third deals with the Federal Judiciary; the fourth with Finance and Trade; the fifth, the States; the sixth, New States; the seventh, Miscellaneous Provisions; and the eighth chapter with the question of the amendment of the Constitution. As before, it is provided that the legislative powers of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Federal Parliament consisting of Her Majesty the Queen, a States Assembly, and a House of Representatives. There has, however, been a change of name—and without recording, as it will be unnecessary to record, the decisions of the committees—I may say that the title of States Assembly was, upon full discussion, considered to be the best expression of the origin and objects of the body which has hitherto been spoken of as the Senate. The title of House of Representatives has been left untouched. With reference to the earlier provisions of the Bill, I will ask the special attention of hon. members to the provision that, wherever they find "The Parliament" or "the Parliament of the Commonwealth" as they read the Bill, they will understand that that indicates the Federal Parliament. There are many clauses in the Bill where the Parliament of the Commonwealth has to be mentioned in juxtaposition with the States or the Parliaments of the States. In those places where there has been any possibility of confusion the title "The Parliament of the Commonwealth" has been adopted, but where confusion seemed to be unlikely or impossible the shorter title of "The Parliament" has been adopted to express the Federal Parliament. Of course provision has been made for the appointment of a Governor-General, and the first considerable amendment on the Bill of 1891 has been made in relation to the salary of that officer. It will be remembered that in 1891 it was provided that the salary should stand at such sum as should be fixed by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, but in any case it was not to be less than £10,000. It has now been expressly provided that the salary shall be neither more nor less than £10,000; that is to say, that that amount is not fixed as a minimum, as in the former Bill, but is a fixed sum. The result of that is that if a clause in regard to the amendment of the Constitution is passed in the form I shall presently explain it will require a referendum of the whole people of Australasia to increase or diminish that sum. The States Assembly has in principle been altered. When I say "States Assembly" hon. members will remember that I am now referring to the so-called Senate of the Bill of 1891. The numbers of the States Assembly instead of being eight for each State are now placed at six. As before, there will be retirements every three years of half the members of the States Assembly, but instead of the members of this States Assembly being elected, as was provided in 1891, by the Houses of Parliament of the several States, the intention now, if the clause is adopted by this Convention, is that each of those States shall elect its contribution to the States Assembly by direct popular election, the whole State voting as one electorate. The qualification of the electors for the States Assembly is to be identical with that which will exist for members of the House of Representatives. The qualifications of a member of the States Assembly will, in like manner, be those of a member of the House of Representatives, it having been apparently the opinion of the Committee that, inasmuch as the States Assembly was to be a body elected by popular vote, there should be no more restriction upon the capacity of an elector or the capacity of a candidate than would in like manner be imposed upon an elector or a candidate for the House of Representatives. Until Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Do you propose to refer to clause 13 at present?

Mr. BARTON:

I shall come back to that later on. I now refer to clause 23. It is there provided in the first paragraph, in accordance with the instruction of the Constitutional Committee, that as nearly as possible there shall be two members of the House of Representatives to one of the States Assembly; that is, that the proportion of two to one shall from time to time be as nearly observed as possible. Then it is provided that subject to any alteration by law of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, which alteration, however, will have to be according to certain principles, and will have to preserve the rights of the States Assembly as to the equal number of members and so on until other provision is made each State shall have one member to what is called each quota of its people. The words used are these:

The quota shall, whenever necessary, be ascertained by dividing the population of the Commonwealth as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by twice the number of the members of the States Assembly, and the number of members to which each State is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the State as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by the quota.

That provision, which seems at first a little complicated, is one that is very easily understood if hon. members submit it to the process of illustration. The quota, for instance, is to be ascertained first by dividing the population of the Commonwealth by twice the number of the members of the States Assembly. Suppose there are six States represented in the States Assembly; then, as there are to be six members for each State, the number of these members would be thirty-six. As it is provided that there shall be as nearly as possible two members of the House of Representatives for one member of the States Assembly, in such a case the number of members of the House of Representatives would be seventy-two. Take the population of Australia as it exists at present at 3,600,000, including Queensland and Tasmania, and apply that process. The population is 3,600,000.

The quota is to be ascertained by dividing the population by twice the number of the members of the States Assembly or Senate. That will be a divisor of twice thirty-six, or seventy-two, which happens to be the number originally intended in the Bill, as the number of members in the House of Representatives, according to the proportion of two to one. Dividing 3,600,000 by seventy-two you get the quota originally intended in the deliberations of the Committee, namely 50,000. The clause goes on to provide:

The number of members to which each State is entitled shall be determined by dividing the population of the State as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth by the quota.

Divide by that quota of 50,000 so ascertained, and you get the numbers of the total. The number of members to which each State is entitled will be ascertained by this process, that there shall be not less than six members-

Mr. PEACOCK:

Five.

Mr. BARTON:

I mean members of the States Assembly. Therefore in the Bill we propose to lay down clearly the number of members for the House of Representatives in the first Parliament. That will be seventy-two. Turn to clause 26, and we find provision that, notwithstanding anything in clause 23, the number of members to be chosen by each State at the first election shall be as follows; that is, to be determined according to latest statistical returns at the date of the passing of the Act, and in relation to the quota referred to in previous sections. So long as the number of members of the Senate remains at thirty-six the number of members of the House of Representatives must be seventy-two, and, applying the quota clause in the way I have endeavored to explain, the quota you get amounts to 50,000 at the time this Act comes into law, but nevertheless it will be such a number as will give, as against thirty-six members of the States Assembly, seventy-two members of the House of Representatives, and distributed according to the number of population of each State.

Mr. TRENWITH:

Will not the first Parliament number more than seventy-two by the provision that the small States are to have five without regard to their population?

Mr. BARTON:

That is the House of Representatives.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I am talking of the House of Representatives. Will not its number be slightly more than seventy-two?

Mr. BARTON:

Yes; it may be that there will be two or three more. The provision is that it should be as nearly as practicable two to one. Of course there may be cases in which there will be a slight preponderance in favor of the House of Representatives, but cases of that kind cannot be avoided. However, I think hon. members will find on applying the machinery clause adopted by the Drafting Committee—which was prepared by Mr. O'Connor—by way of practical illustration some means by which from time to time, without the necessity for constant recurrence to legislation, the quota of members can be ascertained and the number of representatives determined. There are further provisions, however, with reference to this question, as, for instance, that:

Subject to the provisions of the Constitution the number of the House of Representatives may from time to time be increased or diminished by the Parliament.

That may be done because of a great increase in population, and if it is done it will be subject to this accompaniment: Supposing that twelve members required to be added to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, it will then be necessary that half that number, as nearly as may be, shall be added to the Senate, so that the proportion of two to one may be observed. Therefore the machinery clause prepared by Mr. O'Connor really provides a simple means of ascertaining the required representation upon the occurrence of the necessity for its increase, whether it is impelled by the increase of population so that the House of Representatives is the reason of the increase, or whether it results from the admission of new States, in which case the addition to the States Assembly will be the cause of the increase. It provides an automatic way of ascertaining the proportion of the two Assemblies to each other. I do not know that I need say much more on that point. A little study of the Bill will convince hon. members that that provision is one which will work extremely well, and will cause any increase which takes place in the States Assembly and the House of Representatives to proceed by equal steps. Of course it will not be necessary at any time-absolutely necessary-unless Parliament chooses, to increase the members of the Houses except when new States are admitted. If Queensland, for instance, were divided into three States, there would immediately be a necessity for an increase, because she would be entitled to come in on the same terms as ourselves who, I hope, are about to join; and in such a case therefore-provided Queensland came in-there would be the thirty-six members I have spoken of instead of thirty, as would be the case if only five States federated. On the other hand, if Queensland were divided into two or more States, the provision I shall refer to presently as to new States places it in the hands of the Federal Commonwealth to determine the quantity of representation to which such new States would be entitled. For instance, the new State or States might be entitled in the first instance to only three members each, in which case if that number of members were added to the Senate a number would have to be added to the House of Representatives, which would enable the proportion between the two Houses to be maintained; in other words, the House of Representatives would be entitled to an increase of twice as many. I hope I have given a sufficient explanation of that, and will now pass on to some of the other clauses in the Bill. I should mention while on this portion of the Bill that in the election for the House of Representatives no elector is to cast more than one vote. The clause dealing with the qualification of electors is numbered 29 in this new Bill, and it provides that:

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each State that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification for electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State. But in the choosing of such members each elector shall only have one vote.

That is a provision which necessarily has given the committee some trouble in arriving at a decision, and I dare say it will cause a good deal of discussion in this Convention.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
Does the same provision apply to the States Assembly?

Mr. BARTON:
The same provision will apply to the States Assembly by reason of a clause which I shall mention presently. The franchise is to be exactly the same in either House.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The franchise may be the same, but the voting may be different.

Mr. ISAACS:
There seems to be no provision for one man one vote as regards the Senate.

Mr. BARTON:
Yes, in clause 9 it is provided that:

The qualification of electors of members of the States Assembly shall be in each State that which is prescribed by this Constitution or by The Parliament as the qualification for electors of members of the House of Representatives.

That makes one qualification hinge upon the other. If there is an alteration in the qualification of electors for the House of Representatives the same alteration will occur in the qualification for members of the States Assembly. If the Parliament of the Commonwealth passes a law for a uniform franchise, the effect of it will be that under the Constitution the franchise for electors of the States Assembly must be altered exactly to the same extent. In regard to the election of members of the House of Representatives clause 29 sets out that:

In the choosing of such members each elector shall have only one vote.

Respecting the Senate, we have provided that:

The qualification of electors of members of the States Assembly shall be in each State that which is prescribed by this Constitution or by The Parliament as the qualification for electors of members of the House of Representatives.

Without arguing the matter now, I think that is sufficient provision for equality of qualification, and in that sense I mean to include the right to vote, and that only once. With regard to the mode of election of senators, clause 10 states:

The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing a uniform manner of choosing the members of the States Assembly. Subject to such laws, if any, the Parliament of each State may determine the time, place, and manner of choosing the members for that State.

If it is considered that single voting is not sufficiently provided for by the Bill as it stands, an amendment in that direction would be comparatively easy. I would like to say that it is provided, as in the previous Bill, that the people of any race not entitled to vote are not to count in reckoning the number of members of a State for electoral purposes. Clause 24 says:

In ascertaining the number of the people of any State, so as to determine the number of members to which the State is entitled, there shall be deducted from the whole number of the people of the State the number of the people of any race not entitled to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Before you pass on, will you look at the last words in clause 10-"Houses of Representatives." Should not that be

Mr. BARTON:
That is a slip which was made at the last moment, and it should read "States Assembly." I will propose in Committee that that should be altered. Now, I will pass over such formal matters as the election of the President and the Speaker of either House, the disqualification clauses, and so on, and come to a matter which may be as important as to some it will be interesting, of course, in this Chamber. That is a provision relating to both Houses, which is that, until the Parliament otherwise provides, each member of either House of the Federal Parliament shall receive an allowance for his services of £400 a year, to be reckoned from the day on which he takes his seat. This is a matter which does not require much discussion at my hands. There will be here, as elsewhere, two opinions upon the question of payment of members. While I myself may have seen some events which have caused me not to be so fond of the operation of that principle as I once was-thinking that that which is apparently logical in reason will always work out with success in legislation-still, I think there are circumstances which will be taken into consideration by hon. members which make this a different question from the question of payment of members in the provincial Parliaments. There are difficulties which have to be considered. There is the difficulty of there being only the one Parliament and seat of Government to govern the whole of the three million square miles of territory, and the difficulty of attending that Parliament will be infinitely greater than that involved in members attending the Parliaments of their own colonies. Inasmuch as the members of the Federal Parliament will, without intermission, have to be in attendance for three or four months each Session, I think the question whether they should be entitled to receive some allowance becomes a much more serious question than it is in regard to the provincial Legislatures. Many of those who are not much enamoured of the subject in regard to the provincial Parliaments may have a very different opinion in regard to the Federal Parliament. As for me, I may say I am prepared to accept the principle as it applies to the Federal Parliament. One of the most important clauses of the Bill, as it is one of the longest, will be found on page 11. It is clause 50, and it relates to the powers of the Parliament. Hon. members will have a fairly good recollection of what was in the Bill of 1891 under this heading. The legislative powers of the Parliament—all these sub-sections must be read as being powers not to be exercised by the Parliament at once unless in some other part of the Bill power for their immediate exercise is given—are only to be exercised by the passage of federal laws. The alterations made in that clause are not very numerous, but still they ought to be stated. They are these: After the sub-section dealing with ocean beacons and buoys, it is proposed that the Federal Parliament should have power to legislate, and, of course, by that legislation take control of, astronomical and meteorological observations. There has been an addition to what was formerly the sub-section relating to fisheries. It read in the Bill of 1891:

Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits.

And these words have been added:

And in rivers which flow through or in two or more States.

After the sub-section giving power to the Federal Parliament to legislate with regard to banking, the incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money, power is proposed to be given to it to legislate upon insurance, including State insurance extending beyond the limits of the State concerned. Where a State adopts a system of State insurance, for instance, on lives, and where that State takes proposals, not only from citizens within its own bounds, but accepts those emanating from citizens of the Commonwealth beyond its bounds, then it is proposed that that insurance shall be subject to the general provisions of the Commonwealth law on the subject, but where the business is confined within the limits of the State carrying it on it is not proposed to interfere with it. The sub-section following that dealing with naturalisation and aliens originally read:

The status in the Commonwealth of foreign corporations and of corporations formed in any State or part of the Commonwealth.

It has so far been altered as to read:

Foreign corporations and trading corporations formed in any State or part of the Commonwealth.

So that the Commonwealth may have the power to legislate, not merely with regard to the legal status of corporations acting within the Commonwealth, but it may have power as far as it can legislate upon the general subject of these corporations, over the general subject of foreign corporations, formed in any part of a State of the Commonwealth, for the purpose of uniform legislation.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Does that give power to exclude them from trading in the Commonwealth?

Mr. BARTON:

Not, I think, to exclude them, but to regulate the mode in which they conduct their operations. It is for the purpose of uniformity. After the old subsection, which gave the Commonwealth power to deal with the subjects of marriage and divorce, have been added these words:

Parental rights and the custody and guardianship of infants.

The committee seemed to feel that if the social questions of marriage and divorce may be handed over, it would be well if these social relations, so intimately connected with marriage and divorce, should also be added. In place of that sub-section which dealt with river navigation, a very important change has been made. The original sub-section 28, now 31, read:

River navigation with respect to the common purposes of two or more States, or parts of the Commonwealth:

That has been struck out and the following substituted:

The control and regulation of navigable streams and their tributaries within the Commonwealth, and the use of the waters thereof:

So that, not only is there power to legislate as to river navigation with respect to the common purposes of two States, but there is an entire control and regulation given of navigable streams and their tributaries within the Commonwealth, and also over the use of their waters, apart from the question of navigation.
Mr. DOBSON:
Will vested rights be taken away?

Mr. BARTON:
That is a matter which we will discuss at a later stage. It would depend upon the power given the Federal Parliament to legislate generally with regard to vested rights. When I mention a sub-section of this kind, I am brought to the consideration of something which, of course, I ought to mention to this Convention. I am not putting forward the provisions of this Bill with the desire to have it inferred that I agree with all of them. As far as I have had a hand in its preparation— and I have of course a large hand in that—it is a Bill to carry out the different conclusions of the three committees. But it is not to be expected, and could never be expected in relation to a momentous matter of legislation of this kind, that the members of those committees should be unanimous. There are cases where the committees have in a friendly way disagreed. I can say that, at any rate with regard to the Constitutional Machinery Committee, I use the words "in a, friendly way," because I find that, without a vestige of truth, it has been stated in the public prints that there have been scenes in that committee, and unless everything that a man views with his own eyes is to be called a scene in the language of the press, one cannot understand the motive or idea that could have prompted such a statement. There have been no scenes. I know nothing of the proceedings of the other committees, because I have not been at their meetings, other than that I have been given to understand and have every reason to believe that they have been perfectly harmonious; but with regard to the Constitutional Committee no such thing as a scene and nothing more than the honest difference of opinion, and the honest warmth of expression which occur when opinions differ, has ever occurred within the room of that committee, and there has not been one solitary occasion upon which the friendly relations existing between any two members have for a moment been broken. I am impelled to say this at this stage, because I thought I might forget a reference which I intended to make, so that the public of the colonies might know how totally wrong, unjust, and totally incorrect is the idea that the decisions were come to with unwarrantable heat, and after improper wrangling and confusion; and I take this opportunity to contradict the highly improper and unfounded statement, and of telling this Convention, and through the proceedings of this Convention the people of the colonies, that that statement has not one iota of fact to support it. (Cheers.) Proceeding with the legislative powers of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, the subsection relating to control of railways has been amended by the insertion of one word. It reads now:
The control of railways with respect to transport for the military purposes of the Commonwealth.

I think the subsection was very well understood before as referring only to matters of transport, that is, the transport of forces and munitions of war which are necessary for military purposes; but inasmuch as there has been some discussion in the various colonies on the subject, and inasmuch as we have heard it said, especially as regards New South Wales, that it was intended surreptitiously to give the Commonwealth the right of taking control of the whole of the Australian railways, the insertion is made simply for the purpose of explanation. The only remaining alteration in the matter of legislative powers contained in the limits of this section is in the sub-section formerly numbered 31 and now numbered 34. That has been shortened by the omission of the words:

With respect to the affairs of the territory of the Commonwealth, or any part of it.

That limitation was considered by the Drafting Committee-and the Drafting Committee has taken the responsibility for it-to be unnecessary, because the clause must be read to come within the ambit of the powers generally conferred by this section, and it certainly cannot be read for the purpose of the usurpation of any power, except so far as that power might be held by those who read the Constitution as lawyers do, to be transferred. The belief of the Drafting Committee was that the words as they stood originally raised some doubts and some ambiguity; and that the words as they now stand are tolerably free from doubt and ambiguity, looking at the way such an instrument as this must be read. The next clause, 51, relates to certain exclusive powers given to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and the most important of these is the first, which says:

The affairs of the people of any race with respect to whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws not applicable to the general community.

I remember well how strongly Sir Samuel Griffith in 1891 spoke in favor of this subclause, which has, I think, been adopted without any alteration whatever. It is obviously important to say that in addition to the powers of restricting immigration and emigration, given in clause 50, the Commonwealth shall have the power to make laws specially applicable to any alien race living within the Commonwealth. Looking at the fact that at the time of Federation there may be a considerable number of these aliens residing within the Commonwealth, and as the conditions under which they live may be of interest to every citizen of the Commonwealth, and as the spread of such races may vitally affect the future of the Commonwealth, it must be conceded that the Commonwealth should have the exclusive to make regulations with the view of preventing any danger arising to the Commonwealth.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

Does that clause give power to make conditions with regard to the entry of aliens?

Mr. BARTON:

I think that power is given by the clause dealing with the immigration of aliens; this sub-clause specially deals with the regulation of the conditions under which aliens shall carry on within the Commonwealth. The remainder of the clause, though important, is not so important as the portion which I have read. It deals with the government of any territory which may be surrendered to the Commonwealth for the purpose of the seat of Federal Government. If such a surrender is made it will be important and absolutely essential that the Commonwealth, should have sole control of it. Then there are matters relating to the departments of the Public Service, of which control is made over to the Commonwealth and any other matters in which the Commonwealth may have exclusive powers. That if not exactly the same as in 1891 will be found a necessary clause, because if members in the passage of the Bill make amendments that have the effect of conferring exclusive power on the Commonwealth they must be read with this clause to make that power entirely exclusive.

Now I come to the question which my hon. friend the Premier of Western Australia considers the most important in the Bill, and if government is finance and finance is government these clauses must be considered at any rate amongst the most important in the Bill. The clauses as originally drawn represent what acquired the name of "The compromise of 1891." In 1891 the compromise amounted to this: that where the law appropriated any public revenue or imposed a tax or impost it must originate in the House of Representatives, but that the States Assembly should have equal powers with the House of Representatives in respect of all other Bills except Taxation Bills and the annual Appropriation Bill; that is, it proposed that the States Assembly might reject these, but might not amend them. It was also in that Bill proposed that the Senate might not amend any proposed law in such a manner as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people. It is in the part of the Bill so far as I have read that the amendments projected by the Constitutional Committee apply. The first of these sections, now reading as section 52, is to this effect:

Proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or the imposition of any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Representatives.

So that in the case of proposed money laws, whose chief objector policy is not either the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or the imposition of any tax or impost, such laws may originate in the States Assembly as well as in the House of Representatives. The next and only other important alteration is in the clause now reading as 53 in the Bill. The original provision, after equal power was given in respect of all proposed laws, made an exception of laws imposing taxation as well as of laws appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary services of the year. The amendment made by the Constitutional Committee is that the words:

Laws imposing taxation and have been struck out, and the result is that the further power is conferred upon the States Assembly of amending laws imposing taxation.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

How did Loan Bills stand in the 1891 Act?

Mr. BARTON:

In the Constitution of 1891 I take it that Loan Bills might have originated in the States Assembly or the Senate, because the words in the first portion of the clause were:

Laws appropriating any part of the public revenue.

And inasmuch as the money mainly appropriated by Loan Bills is not revenue, but borrowed money, so even under that Bill it is probable that such a Bill could have originated in the States Assembly.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Does not a Loan Bill appropriate revenue to pay interest?

Mr. BARTON:

Its main object is the appropriation of money to be lent. But it may be that even in that case it would have been necessary for such a Bill to originate in the House of Representatives.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

It has always been considered a doubtful point.

Mr. BARTON:

I know there has always been strong argument on both sides. It is now made clear that a Loan Bill can originate in the States Assembly, inasmuch as the main object of a Loan Bill is not the appropriation of part of the public revenue, but the appropriation of the proceeds of the loan. The effect of the amendment of striking out the words:

Laws imposing taxation and in clause 53, is that instead of laws imposing taxation being not subject to amendment by the States Assembly, but only open to suggestions from them, as in the fourth and fifth portions of the clause, this alteration is so radical—i am not now discussing its propriety, that is a matter for afterwards—that the States Assembly will, if this is adopted, be able to amend every portion of a Taxation Bill. I have now explained the chief alterations in the money clauses. In the last of them, which now reads as clause 54, it is made necessary—of course, in accordance with other alterations made—that where there is to be an appropriation, which necessitated formerly only a message to the House of Representatives, there shall now be a message to such House as the appropriation has to occur in. So that we shall have, if the provision is adopted, messages from the Governor-General alike to the House of Representatives and States Assembly. Hon. members will recollect I am not criticising at the present moment, but simply explaining. I do not think that, as the object is simply to make clear, I should say any more about this clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
You still keep in the right of suggesting alterations?

Mr. BARTON:
But it will only apply to Appropriation Bills now.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Now they have a double-barrelled shot, then?

Mr. BARTON:
It applies only to the cases of those Bills which the States Assembly may not amend, but as they are now reduced to the ordinary services of the year, so, too, the power of suggestion is limited to these, and on all others they have the power of amendment and the power of origination. If the hon. member will look at a copy of the memorandum I prepared for the Constitutional Committee headed "The 1891 Compromise," he will find these matters clearly explained. There has been one amendment which I think I ought to call attention to, and that is with reference to the disallowance by Order in Council of any law assented to by the Governor-General. The period within which such disallowance might be exercised was, under the former Bill, two years, as it is in most of the Constitutions of the colonies; but the committee were of opinion, in view of the improved and rapid means of transit, that one year was a sufficient period to allow for such purposes, and therefore they have amended it to operate within a year, or not at all. I take next the provisions relating to the Executive Government. These in the main remain as they were in the Bill of 1891. The executive authority of the Commonwealth, which, of course, is vested in Her Majesty the Queen, is to be exercised by the Governor-General as her representative. There is to be a Federal Executive Council holding office as Executive Councillors, and during the pleasure of the Governor-General; and the Governor-General, in the mode in which we know he is in the habit of exercising his powers, may appoint officers to administer departments of State, who are to be called Ministers of State, and whose number is not to exceed seven. I take it myself that there is nothing in these clauses to prevent the appointment of additional members of the Executive Council, but that such additional members beyond the seven cannot be Ministers of State.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It says "shall hold office." Does that mean hold office as Executive Councillors or hold office as Ministers?

Mr. BARTON:

That is as officers administering these departments of State.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Assuming this is accepted, how is the first Ministry to be formed?

Mr. BARTON:

I will not suppose the hon. member is ambitious of the honor of being sent for, but if he is, let me put this as an illustration. These clauses I take it can only operate by what is known as the Cabinet system of government. If the hon. member were sent for to form a Ministry it would be his object to do so by calling together such other Ministers of State to whom he might assign portfolios as he might think fit, and their continuance in office must be subject to the vote of Parliament. And in order that it may be subject to the vote of Parliament—and I thank the hon. member for asking the question—there has been an amendment Made by the Constitutional Committee, which will be found in the last paragraph of clause 61, which reads:

After the first general election no Minister of State shall hold office for a longer period than three calendar months unless he shall be or become a member of one of the Houses of the Parliament.

A similar provision to that exists in this colony, and it was thought wise by the committee, in order to ensure that the Ministers of State should be subject to parliamentary control, to adopt a modification of that provision, or rather the same provision in somewhat different words, for the purpose of ensuring that control. If the hon. member is in doubt that the system of government under which the machinery of this Bill will operate will be responsible government as we understand it, that doubt will be altogether removed by the requirement of the presence of Ministers in Parliament. The extent to which the responsibilities of Ministers will be to one House alone must of course be largely gauged by the relative powers of the two Houses; and if the ultimate control is clearly vested in one House or the other there can be no doubt in the end as to the result of conflicts in general between them. That is to say, that the necessary conciliation and conference on the part of one of those Houses is likely to prevail, and that the responsibility of Ministers in effect will be to that House. Whether that will be to the Senate or to the House of Representatives will be the subject of a great deal of discussion. Much as I might express myself on the question of the powers of the Senate concerning Money Bills, were I to debate that matter, I should still say by way of explanation that I cannot see that the ultimate, the long-run, result will be to give the Senate the ultimate power of government and to invest it with the determination of the responsibility of Ministers, because I think the final result will be to invest the House of Representatives with that responsibility. But the question to consider is how far under the altered system is the machine workable, and how long will it take to bring about the desired results? With regard to the question of the Executive Government and Ministers, there is no provision in this Bill, nor was there any in the Bill of 1891, that Ministers accepting office should have to offer themselves for re-election. The reasons for the absence of such a provision will be obvious. Looking at the extent of the territory of the Commonwealth, and the distance which the constituencies of Ministers will be from the seat of government in many cases, and the immense difficulties under which Ministers will labor in having to present themselves for re-election, and looking at the fact that the reasons which existed for Ministers offering themselves for re-election in the days when an English Statute was passed upon the subject have now become obsolete or have fallen into desuetude, the Committee, I think, exercised a wise discretion in omitting such a provision from the Constitution Bill. The provision dealing with the re-election of Ministers by their constituencies prevails in the colony to which I belong, but happily it does not obtain in South Australia; and, seeing that in our habits and customs the reasons for it no longer exists, the Constitutional Committee acted wisely in not insisting upon the insertion of it. The result of this executive provision may be what Sir Samuel Griffith said in 1891:

We provide for a Government responsible in name and form to the head of the States, but in substance to the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

In what way it will be responsible to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and the division and extent of this responsibility between the two Houses, will be a matter for this House hereafter to determine. There is a clause in this Bill which is practically the same as was in the Bill of 1891. It reads thus:
67. On the establishment of the Commonwealth the control of the following departments of the Public Service shall be assumed and taken over by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth shall assume the obligations of any State or States with respect to such matters, that is to say:

- Customs and excise:
- Posts and telegraphs:
- Military and naval defence:
- Ocean beacons and buoys, and ocean lighthouses and lightships:
- Quarantine.

It was considered necessary in the Bill of 1891 that immediate control should be taken of these, while of course the control of other departments upon which the Commonwealth has power to legislate will be taken over from time to time as the occasion arises. It may be necessary to call attention to this clause because it is absolutely necessary to have a clause of the kind, and the question with hon. members will be whether it goes far enough.

Mr. HIGGINS: Will the debt for military purposes be taken over as an obligation?

Mr. BARTON: Whether any such obligation as to military clause, which relates to the taking over of lands, buildings, and works. I may have a remark to make about that later on, under clause 84. I think the obligations referred to in clause 64 may be only such as arise from time to time in the States administering the different departments, and that would not mean the loan expenditure incurred.

Mr. SYMON: Obligation there means duty-not debt.

Mr. BARTON: I take it to read that way. Coming to the chapter relating to the judicature, I may say that, while the clauses referring to the judicature have been redrafted by the Judicature Committee, in the main or to a large extent they correspond with the provisions in that behalf contained in the Bill of 1891. Hon. members were familiar with these provisions, and I do not propose to spend any great time in explaining them. It is provided that instead of, as before, the Parliament having power to constitute a judiciary, there shall be a Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, as a part of the Constitution-that I believe to be an improvement-and other courts which the Parliament may from time to time create or invest with federal jurisdiction. That means that the Federal Parliament may make other federal courts or give jurisdiction to deal with federal matters to some of the courts of the provinces if in its wisdom it thinks fit. There are to be a Chief Justice and not less than four other judges who will hold office on the usual tenure, that is, during good behavior. They are to be appointed by the Governor-General, with the consent and advice of the Executive Council, and may be removed by the same advice, but only upon an address from both Houses of the Parliament praying for their removal. The Drafting Committee have taken the liberty to amend the clause by adding the words:

In that same Session.

because they consider that is necessary in order to prevent possible manoeuvering. It is provided that the judicial power shall extend to matters which arise under the Constitution or involving its interpretation; that it shall extend to laws made by the Parliament or matters which arise under any treaty; to admiralty and maritime matters; to questions affecting the public Ministers, consuls, or other representatives of other countries; to matters in which the Commonwealth or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth is a party; to questions in which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth; to matters between States; and to questions relating to the same subject. matter claimed under the laws of the different States. These are the functions of the High Court of Judicature, apart from its functions with reference to cases of appeal from the courts of the States. They are the functions of the Court, more particularly as a federal tribunal, and apart from its functions as a Court of Appeal. This matter will receive much attention later on, and I need not go into details now. Then there is an appellate jurisdiction conferred on the High Court in the following cases:

To hear appeals, both as to law and fact, from all judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences of any other federal court, or court exercising federal jurisdiction, or of the Supreme Court of any State, whether any such court is a court of appeal or of original jurisdiction; and the judgment of the High Court in all such cases shall be final and conclusive.

And then there is this proviso:

Provided that no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in the High Court than according to the rules of the common law.

Then it is further provided that:

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the conditions and restrictions on appeals to the Queen in Council from the Supreme Courts of the several States shall be applicable to appeals from them to the High Court.

The next clause provides that:

No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any State or from the High Court or any other Federal Court,

With three exceptions, and these are that:

The Queen may, in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any State, or any other part of her dominions are concerned, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.

The Judiciary Committee, as was done in 1891, confined the appeal to those classes of cases in respect to which public interests may arise; and they may arise not only in controversies between a State and the Federal Government, or a person and a State or the Federal Government, but in many controversies between party and party; and the fact that a controversy is between party and party is not intended to take away the applicability of this section, so that even in cases between party and party where such interests are affected there will still be the power for Her Majesty to grant leave to appeal. There are several other provisions with regard to the jurisdiction of the High Court of Judicature, but I do not propose to describe them at any length, as they are matters for after consideration. There is this further provision:

Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to authorise any suit in law or equity against the Commonwealth, or any person sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, or against a State, or any person sued on behalf of a State, by any individual person or corporation, except by the consent of the Commonwealth, or of the State, as the case may be.

That is a provision, I understand, which was placed in the Bill by the committee, as it was placed in the Bill of 1891, not for the purpose of preventing action being taken against the Commonwealth or State, but for the purpose of placing within the hands of the Commonwealth or the State concerned the power of determining the mode in which these suits shall be brought against the Commonwealth or State. Then it is provided that trial by jury shall be held in the State where the offence has been committed. Thai is to prevent a person being taken away from the State where the alleged offence was committed into another, and there tried by another jury 1,000 or 1,500 miles distant, perhaps. In other words, the power to change the venue of the trial is restricted to the limitations of the State in which the offence has occurred; so that, if it has occurred in New South Wales, South Australia, or Tasmania, a person could not be taken away to be tried by the jury of another colony, but only by his peers in his own State. Now I come to the provisions dealing with finance and trade. Members will have the benefit of hearing the views of Mr. Symon, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee; and in the same way they will have the benefit of the explanations of Mr. McMillan, the chairman of the Finance Committee, on matters of finance. Changes will be found to have been made by the decisions of the Finance Committee as to dealing with the surplus in clauses 87, 89, and 90, as to the question of expenditure by the Commonwealth in clause 88, and as to taking over the public debts of the States in clause 96. Then there is an alteration in clause 93, making more clear than ever the invalidity of any derogation from absolute free trade between States, and there are provisions for the appointment of an Inter-State Commission. I shall deal with these as shortly as I can. Except with reference to the clauses I shall mention, the Finance Committee have, by their resolutions, re-repeated the provisions of the old Bill, so I do not intend to take hon. members over that ground. First of all, as to the question of dealing with the application of the revenue of the Commonwealth. I am speaking now of a period which cannot last longer than two years, which may elapse before the Commonwealth Parliament imposes its first tariff. In a portion of the Bill to which I have not called attention, there has been an amendment made at the request of the Finance Committee to the effect that the imposition of a uniform tariff shall take place not later than two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth. Until uniform duties are imposed the following provisions are proposed: there are certain things to be shown in the books of the Commonwealth with respect to each State individually; the Treasury books must give the particulars which are required, and it is provided first that these books shall show as to each State:

The revenues collected from duties of Customs and excise, and from the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the State to the Commonwealth by this Constitution.

That does not relate to any power which is created as a new one or which may be described as an original power, but to the powers formerly exercised, by the States, and now transferred to the Commonwealth; that is to say, the books are to show the revenues which are collected from Customs and excise, and collected in continuance of the existing tariffs except so far as they may be amended, and revenues arising from the departments to be transferred from the State to the Commonwealth. Then these books are to show as to each State:

The expenditure of the Commonwealth in the collection of duties of Customs and excise, the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the State to the Commonwealth by this Constitution.
By the deduction of the second from the first of these will be ascertained primarily the balance in favor of each State, that is to say, the balance which the Commonwealth collects which exceeds each State's proportion of expenditure. The next part of the clause is precisely this: that when the balance, if any, has been so found by deduction, as I have pointed out, it shall be taken in hand, and the share of each State of the expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of the original powers given to it shall be ascertained, and that share of the expenditure is to be ascertained per capita in other words, in the proportion of the number of the people of the States to those of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest Commonwealth statistics. Therefore there is first a balance found by the deduction of the expenditure on Customs and excise, and the performance of the transferred services and powers, from the revenues to be derived from these sources. Then, after that, the balance is to be taken in hand; and the expenditure of the Commonwealth, in the exercise of its newly originated powers, calculated in proportion to the numbers of each State, is to be deducted from the balance so found; and then the surplus shown after deduction is to be paid to the Government of each State month by month.

Mr. HIGGINS:

Is the first expenditure the expenditure in that State?

Mr. BARTON:

That will be so, because the governing words are:

In respect of each State.

So it practically comes to this, that if not a separate set of books for each State, a separate set of accounts will be necessary. There is a further provision with regard to expenditure, which is the subject of a separate clause, and which is to operate for four years after the establishment of the Commonwealth. The term "four years" is inserted for this purpose: The Constitutional Committee have decided that the proper duration of the life of each House of Representatives is to be four years, and not three years as in the parliaments of the various States. That is a matter which, however, I will not discuss at present. In this case, then, four years has been fixed because it appears to have been thought by the Finance Committee that the period which constitutes the ordinary life of a Parliament should be fixed for the operation of the clause I am going to describe. That clause relates solely to expenditure. Hon. members will see that in it there are two blanks. These remain to be filled in by the Convention, I suppose on the motion of the chairman or some other member of the Finance Committee. The figures were not supplied to the Drafting Committee, as I assume it was not necessary. The provision is:

During the first four years after the establishment of the Commonwealth, notwithstanding anything contained in the last section, the total yearly expenditure of the Commonwealth, in the exercise of the original powers given to it by this Constitution, shall not exceed the sum of Pounds; and the total yearly expenditure of the Commonwealth in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the States to the Commonwealth by this Constitution shall not exceed the sum of Pounds.

Mr. GLYNN: Does that put a maximum on military expenditure?

Mr. PEACOCK: A maximum on all expenditure!

Mr. BARTON: It seems to me to put a maximum on all expenditure, because the whole of the expenditure cannot exceed the total yearly expenditure in the performance of the services and powers given by the Constitution, and any powers subsequently transferred from the States to the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON: Does that prevent any increase in case of war?

Yes. It must be understood that I neither commend nor condemn this clause; the proper people to more fully explain it are the members of the Finance Committee. The next important provision is a very important one. It relates to the first five years after the imposition of uniform Customs duties. If it takes as long as two years to arrive at the imposition of uniform duties, then the operation of the clause will extend to a time seven years after the establishment of the Commonwealth. During the five years after uniform duties have been imposed, it is provided that the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the States for any year shall not be less than the aggregate amount returned to them during the last year before the imposition of such duties. That means that during those two years - if there are two - during which the uniform duties are not imposed, but the Commonwealth revenue from Customs is the revenue from the various States, the provisions of clause 87 are to be observed; but after those two years have passed, the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the States is not to be less than it was in the last of those two years.

Mr. PEACOCK: You mean annually?

Mr. BARTON: I mean the aggregate amount for any one year. Of course it can be more. There is no limitation as to that. But it is not to be less during those five years.

Mr. GLYNN:
You may have to resort to direct taxation to raise it.

Mr. BARTON:
That I have nothing to do with. It is provided in clause 89 that in the books of the Treasury of the Commonwealth there shall continue to be shown the particulars required by section 87, and during this period of five years, even though there shall be a cessation of intercolonial duties, an account shall be taken of all imported dutiable goods passing from one State into another State for consumption therein.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
I do not think that formed part of the report of the Finance Committee.

Mr. BARTON:
That is how we understood it after consultation with the chairman of the Finance Committee.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Exactly.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
It is quite new matter.

Mr. BARTON:
I can read it to you in the report of the Finance Committee. We, as a Drafting Committee, are only concerned in throwing into legal shape the decisions of the Finance and other committees, and the chairman of the Finance Committee assures me that the view we have taken is right. After intercolonial freetrade has arrived, the amount of duty chargeable on such goods will be still ascertained by officers on the borders, or if they come from State to State by sea, then at the ports, in the same way as if they were still subject to duty, for the purpose of taking the account. It will, in the books of the Treasury, be accounted as revenue collected in the State into which the goods pass, and not in the State in which the port of entry is situated, so that the proportion may be ascertained in which each State shall receive its share of the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the States. That calculation has to be made and imported into the process executed by section 87, and by the combination of both, I take it, is to be ascertained the proportion which each State shall receive as its share of the whole or aggregate amount.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
Perfectly clear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Are you going to read that paragraph of the report on which it is founded?

Mr. BARTON:
If I may have the report. It is farther provided that the aggregate amount shall be distributed month by month. I am told that the report of the Finance Committee has gone to the printers, so that each member may have a copy of it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is not as I understand it.

Mr. BARTON:
I am told by the chairman that the clause perfectly expresses the intention of the committee. But inasmuch as I am challenged, I may say I do not believe any three draughtsmen ever lived who could have understood or interpreted correctly those resolutions as originally presented by the Finance Committee.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I quite agree with you.

Mr. BARTON:
And I do not wonder that my hon. friends, who are both members of that Committee—or three of them—differ about the question of whether this clause correctly expresses the determination of the Committee, because the Drafting Committee were obliged to hold more than one conference with the chairman of the Finance Committee before it was found out to what extent the Finance Committee had succeeded or failed in expressing themselves in their resolutions. But, I must say, we did feel under some disadvantage, and we did think that even if members of the Finance Committee did not agree upon all points—as I suppose they did not—they might have taken a little more trouble in making their meaning a little more clear. There is only one more question in connection with this portion of the Bill that I need refer to, and that is the distribution of the surplus. First of all there is a period of two years before the uniform Customs duties are imposed. Then there is a period of five years after the imposition of these uniform Customs duties during which no State is to receive less than it did for the year immediately preceding the imposition of such duties. Then it is provided that:

After the expiration of five years from the imposition of uniform duties all surplus revenue over the expenditure of the Commonwealth shall be distributed month by month among the several States in proportion to the numbers of their people as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
All surplus revenue?

Mr. BARTON:
I really do wish that hon. members of the Finance Committee would give some little consideration to their own report.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

All surplus revenue will include revenue from every source?

Mr. BARTON:

These are the instructions we got:

Shall be distributed month by month among the several States in proportion to the numbers of their people as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

That period may be seven years after the establishment of the Commonwealth, but may be as little as six years, for I am taking it that perhaps the uniform tariff will be imposed within the first year after the establishment of the Commonwealth, which is perhaps rather sanguine. Then, in that case the period of distribution according to population of the surplus revenue will be postponed for that six years, but if it takes two years to reach the imposition of uniform Customs duties, then the distribution of surplus revenue according to the population of the colonies will not take place till the seventh year. With reference to equality of trade, section 92 is a combination of the two sections which existed upon that subject in the Bill of 1891. But it is made a little more explicit and a little more pointed, and I will read it in order that the attention of hon. members may be drawn to it.

Preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one part of the Commonwealth over the ports of another part of the Commonwealth, and any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth, or by any State, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth, or by any State, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth shall be null and void.

That annulment of laws is substituted for the power of Parliament to annul these laws, because it is thought, if these laws do derogate from freedom of trade or commerce, it might just as well be expressly stated that they are not worth the paper they are written on. Then occurs the provision that the Parliament may make laws constituting an Inter-State Commission. The members of this Commission are for the purpose of executing and maintaining the Constitution in respect of its provisions relating to trade and commerce upon railways within the Commonwealth, and upon rivers flowing in or between two or more States. It is provided that the members of the Commission shall have a fairly secure tenure of office, in order that they may be non-political, and not subject to dictation. They are to hold office during good behaviour, they can only be removed by a vote of both Houses of Parliament during the same session, and they are to hold their appointments from the Governor-General and Executive. Their remuneration is to be determined by Parliament, and, as in the case of a judge, their salaries are not to be subjected to decrease during their continuance of office.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Is there still to be the power to make railways in favor of one port over another?

Mr. BARTON:
Well, it will scarcely pay. If you make a railway and it gives that preference to which I have referred, the preference will be made void under section 92. If you like to make a railway to a certain port, and you choose to establish a tariff which will give a preference to your neighbour, this Constitution steps in and says, "Hands off." Then it is provided that the Commission shall have power of adjudication and administration. As Mr. Higgins asked me a question upon this point, he will be, perhaps, interested to know that the Commission is to have no powers in regard to the regulation of any railway in the State, except in the case of rates which are preferential in effect, and which are also made and used for the purpose of drawing traffic to a railway from a neighboring State.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:
None of these clauses were in that report.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
This is the first I have heard of it.

Mr. BARTON:
Hon. members will admit that if we had stuck at the point at which the Finance Committee left off we should not have a Bill entitled to be called a Constitution Bill. The Finance Committee resolved:
That, subject to the consent of the State or States interested, the Federal Parliament shall have the power to take over the control and responsibility of the railway system of any State or States on such terms as shall be arrived at by mutual agreement.
That is already embodied in clause 50.

Mr. WISE: Whereabouts?

Mr. BARTON:
Will the hon. member look at clause 50, and he will see that the Parliament has the power to legislate with reference to:
Matters referred to the Parliament of the Commonwealth by the Parliament or Parliaments of any State or States, but so that the law shall extend only to the State or States by whose Parliament or Parliaments the matter was referred, and to such other States as may afterwards adopt the law.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Surely that would not enable the Federal Parliament to take over the railways.

Mr. BARTON:

Both the Constitutional Committee and the Drafting Committee seem to think that this gave sufficient power in respect to this subject. Where it is necessary to embody the powers given by an instrument of this sort to the full extent intended by those who created them, the greater the sacrifice of brevity of definition and of generality to particularity, the more limited are the powers, instead of being more extended. Another resolution of the Finance Committee was:

That in order to deal effectually with all railway matters arising between the States, and to enforce the principles of equality of trade laid down in the Constitution, there shall be established by the Federal Parliament an Inter-State Commerce Commission.

If we are to be tied down to the resolutions of the Finance Committee there is absolutely no word there to say that the Inter-State Commission has any power to deal with the railways at all, except that they are to enforce the provisions laid down in the Constitution.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Yes, but you have put in the very thing we refused to put in our report.

Mr. BARTON:

Whether you refused to put it in your report or not I do not know, but I know the Drafting Committee took the resolutions of the hon. members' committee, and which were broad enough to enforce certain principles, and inserted in the Bill clauses to enforce those principles. I am not concerned now as to whether hon. members were unwilling to do this or not. They placed resolutions in the body of their report which told us that certain principles were to be enforced, and we have inserted in this Bill clauses which are to enforce those principles. Now we are told there was no intention to enforce these principles. If that is so, why did the Finance Committee say that certain principles were to be enforced?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You have taken upon yourself to construe equality of trade.

Mr. BARTON:

I thought my hon. friend had more sense of order in debate-I say that jocosely. I welcome, as an ordinary rule, interjections because in the warmth of debate they help me along, but when interjections are made while I am explaining provisions of a measure I cannot get along as I like.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

If I do not interject now it will go forth that I assented to this.

Mr. BARTON:

No; it will not.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

Yes, because it will go to the public to-morrow.

Mr. BARTON:

Will the hon. member allow latitude to the Drafting Committee to explain their position? We were told to make provision for the Inter-State Commission to enforce principles laid down in the Constitution, and we have endeavored to express the intention embodied in the resolutions. If we have gone further than the resolutions intended that is because they expressed themselves perhaps with a little more generality than was intended. If the resolution intended that there should be some restriction upon the equality of trade the proper thing is for the committee to explain itself to the Convention.

Sir GRAHAM BERRY:

You have put one restriction in the clause, the one we discussed and rejected.

Mr. BARTON:

How am I to know these things? Hon. members have sent on to me, as Chairman of the Constitutional Committee, a set of resolutions, and under the resolution by which the Drafting Committee were appointed we had to take these resolutions and put them into form in the Bill. When we made the restriction that the Inter-State Commission was to have no power over rates and regulations which are not preferential and not made for the purpose of drawing traffic to one railway from another, we took the matter in this sense, that the object was to maintain those principles of equality of trade laid down in the rest of the Constitution, and at the same time maintain the federal principle that so long as the principle of equality of trade was maintained there should be no restriction on a State and its dealings. It was with this view, and with the view that the decisions of the committee should be expounded in the broadest sense, that we have framed these clauses. Members must recollect that there can be no finality about the work of the Drafting Committee.

Mr. PEACOCK:

It would be a bad thing for Victoria if it were so.

Mr. BARTON:
The committee wish to manifest no stupid jealousy about their work, but they hope that all amendments which may be made will be made with as much care as the Drafting Committee consider they have shown in preparing the Bill. How can it be supposed for a moment that the committee in preparing this Bill are dealing with the matter finally? They were endeavoring to faithfully carry out the resolutions of the committees as far as people of ordinary intelligence, as they believe themselves to be, could, after taking an extraordinary amount of time, have determined. How could we do otherwise? If a member of the Finance Committee had given us certain other restrictions beyond these we have imposed we would have been only too glad to have inserted them. We had to provide for an Inter-State Commission, and therefore we set out that:

The Parliament may make laws constituting an Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce upon railways within the Commonwealth, and upon rivers flowing through, in, or between two or more States.

I do not wish to detain members much longer, as I think I have pretty well dealt with the recommendations of the Finance Committee. There is, as Sir Graham Berry has pointed out, a restriction in clause 95, that the Inter-State Commission shall have no power except in cases of preferential rates used for the purpose of drawing traffic from the railway of a neighboring State. I think that is the real meaning of preferential rates, and that their abolition is indispensable in maintaining an equality of trade. The Commission cannot interfere unless the rate is not only preferential, but is made for the express purpose of taking away the trade from the railway of another colony. If the clause forbade the imposition of a rate which merely had the effect of attracting traffic from the railway of another State there might be something to complain about, as it would be carrying the principle of equality of trade to the extent of derogating from the interests of the State imposing the rate, but in this case the regulation must not only operate as a preferential rate, but it must have been imposed with the intention of securing trade which belongs to the railway of another State. I submit that the Drafting Committee have taken a very limited view of their instructions, and have acted in good faith. There is very little more to say with regard to the Bill, as I do not think that the time has come for controversy between members while I am expounding the clauses of the Bill, inasmuch as I have not expressed any particular views of my own, but have endeavored to make a mirror of the Bill for the use of hon. members, and I think, therefore, that we have not reached the stage of acute argument. The first of the remaining chapters of the Bill relates to the States. I should first explain clause 96, which relates to taking over the public debts of the States, and that is another clause drafted by the committee in conference with the chairman of that committee. The committee resolved:

That the Federal Parliament may assume the full control and responsibility of all existing and future debts of the States, and thereafter shall pay the interest thereon, appropriating for this purpose the surplus revenue, debiting or crediting each State with any balance accruing in the operation; that all net savings made in interest upon any conversion of or renewal of any loan shall from time to time be utilised in reducing the debt of the colony interested.

Not finding there, as we find in the 1891 Bill, that these operations could not be conducted without the consent of the States, we inserted an expression which probably embodied the meaning of the committee as they intended it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No.

Mr. BARTON:

If that does not express the intention of the committee as they intended it to operate, I would like to know why the Drafting Committee were not told of it. Why are we told when the Bill is in print that we have not carried out fully the intentions of the committee when the fact staring at one in the face of the resolution is that it did not provide for the consent of the States to be obtained before the consolidation of the debts, as was provided in the 1891 Bill? The resolution says:

The Federal Parliament may assume full control and responsibility of all existing and future debts of the States.

If we are obliged to read the resolutions of the Finance Committee literally the Drafting Committee would be forced to the conclusion that there was a permission given to pass an Act of Parliament for the Federal Parliament to take over, not only the existing debts of the States, but whatever thereafter might accrue. We can only read the instruction in that way. That was the English of it. We must endeavor, in translating it into the phrases of law, to come to the conclusion that a common sense provision was intended.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

Read it as it originally stood.

Mr. BARTON:

The clause as it originally stood might have read in that way. But this is not a provision according to the clause as it originally stood. It was resolved by the Finance Committee that these debts might be taken over without requiring the consent of the States.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That was what we desired.

Mr. BARTON:
That is not the meaning of the provision in the 1891 Act.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The Drafting Committee ought to have carried out our instructions and tried to amend it afterwards in the Convention.

Mr. BARTON:
But I am told by members of the Finance Committee, or some of them, that it was intended that this should be done only with the consent of the Parliament of the State or States affected. Am I correct in saying that some of the hon. members of that committee seem by their interjections to say that it was intended that the Parliaments of the States should be consulted?

Sir PHILIP FYSH:
Not consulted.

Mr. BARTON:
That is where the whole mistake has occurred; because we were under the impression that we should not construe these literally, but that inasmuch as there had been a striking provision in the Bill of 1891, if it was intended to leave out a provision of that kind there would have been something to account for its omission. However, there is not the least trouble about the amendment of the clause in that particular, because if hon. members of the Finance Committee think that the real intention was that the consent of the State or States should be unnecessary if the Federal Parliament chose to deal with the debts, then in clause 96 there are nine words which may be taken out to fulfil the whole intention of the committee, and these are simply one phrase:

With the consent of the Parliament of any State.

Mr. LYNE:
I must say when I gave my vote I believed that the State had to be consulted.

Mr. BARTON:
Here we have another instance of the difficulty of construing the views of the Finance Committee. One gentleman says he did not think it was necessary that the consent of the States should be obtained, another says he understood that that consent had to be obtained. However, a clause has been inserted endeavoring as far as possible to carry out the intention which seemed to be expressed by the Finance Committee, except that we thought the Finance Committee had not taken a step which perhaps some members may consider a strong one, and others not, of giving liberty to the Parliament of the Commonwealth to take over the debts of a State without consulting that State. I have explained some of the differences which arise between the two Bills. In the chapter relating to the States the alterations are not serious, and the powers of the States which exist on the establishment of the Commonwealth are still saved to them as under the Bill of 1891. The most serious alteration, if there is a serious one, in this part of the Bill, is the omission of that section which required the reference of communications which were to be made by the Governor of a State to the Imperial authorities to be made through the Governor-General of the Commonwealth. The Committee for Constitutional Machinery omitted that clause, and the

The seat of Government of the Commonwealth shall be determined by the Parliament.

Until such determination is made, the Parliament shall be summoned to meet at such place within the Commonwealth as a majority of the Governors of the States, or, in the event of an equal division of opinion amongst the Governors, as the Governor-General shall direct.

The Constitutional Committee of 1897 have held the same opinion which the like Committee of 1891 and the Convention of 1891 held, that the final determination of the seat of Government of the Commonwealth is a matter which belongs to the Commonwealth itself as a free people to determine, and that in the meantime only interim provisions should be made. An important alteration has been made in the provision relating to amendments of the Constitution. That is in clause 121. The original section provided that when an amendment had been approved in a Bill by an absolute majority of both Houses of the Commonwealth, then, before it received the Royal assent, it might be submitted to conventions popularly elected by the several States, and these conventions should determine whether the alteration was to be adopted; and if in the conventions the amendment was found to be the will of a majority of the people and a majority of the States, then the alteration should be presented to the Governor-General for the Royal assent. The respect in which that important clause has been amended is this—that if an absolute majority of the States Assembly and House of Representatives has decided in favor of a proposed law for the amendment of the Constitution, that law shall be submitted, not to conventions elected by the States, but directly to the electors of the several States who are qualified to vote for the House of Representatives; and that shall be done in not less than two, nor more than three calendar months after the passage through both Houses of the proposed law. It was considered by the Constitutional Committee that there ought to be, after the passage of the Bill through both Houses and before its final adoption by the people, a period of not less than sixty days during which the people would be familiarised by the press and public men with its provisions, and at the end of which they would be in a position which would enable them to deliberately accept or reject it. The Drafting Committee determined, lest such an amendment should be hung up for a long time by any Government or any authority having it in charge, to add the words:

Nor more than three calendar months,

So that there may be some definite period within which an amendment must be submitted to the people for them to decide upon.

Mr. LYNE:
That only applies to amendments of the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON:
Quite so.

Mr. LYNE:
Is there any provision in the law to prevent deadlocks between the two Houses?

Mr. BARTON:
An hon. member asks me whether there is any provision to prevent deadlocks. All I can say is that the Constitutional Committee have not found themselves in a position to accept any proposal made to them for the prevention of deadlocks.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON:
It may be felt that it is necessary to expressly legislate for the prevention of deadlocks' or it may not. I know there are different opinions in this Convention. All that we could do in the Drafting Committee was to act on the decision of the Constitutional Committee. It may be the opinion of the Convention that a direct provision for the solution of deadlocks should be made, or that this or that mode of settling the difficulty should be adopted, but when the Constitutional Committee came to their decision it was obvious that we could not supply any provision in the Bill for the purpose of settling deadlocks. I should like to make a still further explanation. Hon. members will find in various sections the words, "until the Parliament otherwise provides," or "unless other provision is made." Those are with reference to matters in respect of which it has been thought, that the Parliament should have power from time to time to legislate without the form of a referendum being gone through. Parliament, for instance, might determine a franchise, and might afterwards come to a conclusion to alter it, so as to make it more liberal. If it came to that conclusion, under this Bill, Parliament would have power to legislate with regard to that franchise without asking for an amendment of the Constitution. So that wherever the Constitutional Committee have decided that such words as:

Until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, should be used, it will not be necessary before making any alteration in the law to ask for an amendment in the Constitution and the referendum. In other words, where such words as those described are used, the power by implication-by irresistible implication-is given to the Parliament to legislate from time to time without it being necessary to ask for an amendment of the Constitution by way of referendum. Of course it will be quite clear to many hon. members that this was the inevitable thing. There are many cases in which it would be going through an entire farce to prescribe that the Constitution cannot be amended without the expense of the referendum, costing perhaps a hundred thousand pounds. There are minor matters with respect to which indeed the Constitutional Committee thought a clause might be drafted specifying the cases in question, and saying that in reference to these it should not be necessary to amend the Constitution. But we take the words:

Until the Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, to mean that the Parliament may make provision on the subject, and that until such provision is made certain things may be done. We interpret them in that way, and think it unnecessary to make a separate interpretation clause giving an explanation of that which is sufficiently clear already. Having occupied the time of the Convention for some while, I should like, notwithstanding the very friendly interchanges which have taken place between hon. members and myself-

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

What about clause 13?

Mr. BARTON:

To express my thanks for the kindness and patience with which they have listened to me. But before proceeding any further I would like to refer to two clauses to which Sir George Turner has directed my attention. Hon. members will remember that in the clauses referring to the Senate it has been provided that the members for each State to be sent to the Senate shall be elected by that State as one electorate. But a difficulty arose in providing for the occurrence of vacancies after any such election. Hon.
members will recollect that if the provision here is adopted, like the provision in the Bill of 1891, half the Senate or States Assembly will go out every three years, and then there will have to be an election. Now clauses 13 and 14, as they originally stood, applied more immediately to the method of election prescribed by the Bill of 1891, which was election by both Houses of Parliament, but inasmuch as the Constitutional Machinery Committee had to alter that method of election, and passed a resolution that the States Assembly should in future be an assembly elected by each State acting as one electorate for its own quota of members, it became necessary that other provision should be made for the purpose of filling up vacancies. In these original clauses 13 and 14 it was provided:

If the place of a senator becomes vacant during the recess of the Parliament of the State which he represents, the Governor of the State, by and with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint a senator to fill such vacancy until the next Session of the Parliament of the State, when the Houses of Parliament shall choose a senator to fill the vacancy.

If the place of a senator becomes vacant before the expiration of the term of service for which he was chosen, the senator chosen to fill his place shall hold the same only during the unexpired portion of the term for which the previous senator was chosen.

These clauses were referred to the Drafting Committee, and the committee themselves came to no determination upon them, but it was pointed out that as the mode of election to the Senate had been altered it would be advisable that substituted provisions should be made for those clauses, so that the principle of that mode of election should be carried out, or in other words, that some such provision should be made as is done in section 9 of the Federal Convention Enabling Act of this colony and section 10 of the Act passed in New South Wales. That provision was that when the seat of a member of this Convention became vacant it should be filled by the appointment of the person who, not having been elected, was the highest on the poll. The suggestion made to the Drafting Committee was that they should endeavor to provide some method for filling vacancies in the seats of members in the States Assembly in that way. Now we are confronted with a difficulty which I should mention. A member of the States Assembly is elected for six years. There are outgoings every three years. While the election of members for the Senate is for six years there is a difference in the case of this Convention, which was only elected for a few months. This present sitting will not last a month, or five weeks at the most, I hope, and before the lapse of four months it will be competent to call us together again. The final sitting will not last more than a month, making up about six months. The difficulty in the case of a senator is that he is elected for six years. When we found these things confronting us, and it was suggested to us to provide that the person next on the poll to those elected should be the person to take the place of a retiring or dead senator or one who lost his seat—when we saw that that might operate over three years, or rather six years at the most, we thought it would be futile to endeavor to enact that the person who is next on the poll should be placed in the States Assembly in such a case. The reasons for this will occur to hon. members. It might be almost impossible at the end of several years to find the happy man who would be the successor. He might be dead himself. Those who are elected might be the only candidates, and then there would be no seventh man. Let us imagine indeed, we must imagine—that elections for the States Assembly will be conducted on party lines, and supposing each party ran a ticket, it would be clear that we would not be fulfilling the mandate of electors by putting in a man who had views opposite to the man whose place he was taking. Seeing this difficulty we preferred to make the provision set out in this Bill. We preferred to risk the departure, which is the only one in substance we have made in the Bill. We provided in clause 13 that:

If the place of a member of the States Assembly becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service the Houses of Parliament of the State he represented shall, sitting and voting together, choose a successor, who shall hold office only during the unexpired portion of the term.

The difficulty that arises is this: if you are to endeavor to make a direct provision for filling a vacancy when a member of the States Assembly loses his seat, dies, or resigns, the normal way will be to make provision for the electors of the whole of the State selecting a man, but the futility of that occurred to the members of the Constitutional Committee, and the suggestion was that we should make some alternative provision, something like that provided in the measure which led to the holding of this Convention. I have given reasons why we found it impossible to carry any suggestion of that kind into working effect, and what we have done is to provide the next best thing. If Parliament is in recess the Governor of the State can appoint a member to fill the vacancy until the Parliament meets, and immediately Parliament meets it will elect a representative for the unexpired portion of the term. It strikes us that this is the only resort we can have to avoid absurdity on the one hand and difficulties on the other. At the same time we have drafted a clause, which will be ready to morrow, in which an endeavor will be made to carry into certain limited effect the suggestion which has been made, but so that there will be no such lapse of time as might destroy the significance of a party vote in reference to the States Assembly. After a lapse of time we know public opinion

Mr. ISAACS:
There was another suggestion, that there should be a temporary appointment until the next election takes place.

Mr. BARTON:
That would be the next general election.

Mr. ISAACS:
The next ordinary election.

Mr. BARTON:
We found when considering this, that the difficulty would be that it would destroy the whole of the probably effective working of the enactment, which provides that half of the senators are to retire every three years. It may be that it is not so. I may say this with reference to any determination as to what appeared to me to be the best way, that if any member can suggest a mode of improving the drafting of the Bill or the machinery, I shall be pleased to act in a federal spirit in the matter and express my concurrence, if it appears to be better than my own view.

Mr. ISAACS:
Will you consider the suggestion with regard to the temporary election?

Mr. BARTON:
I shall consider it. Of course the provisions themselves are really only suggestions. Another difficulty would arise in the case referred to by Mr. Isaacs. If the election were to take place at the time of the next general election of the State the difficulty would be that there would be a mixing up of federal with provincial matters.

Mr. ISAACS:
It is not a State general election.

Mr. BARTON:
If it is not a State general election it must be an election for the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The next States Assembly election.

Mr. BARTON:
If I understand the hon. member correctly he has been saying that the suggestion is that there should be an appointment made by some method until the next general election.

Mr. ISAACS:
Until the next election, which would enable the people to select their own candidate without incurring extra expense.

Mr. BARTON:
That is to say, they would be elected at the next general elections for the States Assembly?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Yes.

Mr. BARTON:
I think that is fairly well secured in the interim suggestion. It must be for the period which must elapse before the next general elections.

Mr. HOLDER:
You may pass over a period of five years and eleven months.

Mr. BARTON:
The committee have endeavored to do their best with what is a very difficult subject, and I think their scheme will perhaps be found to work as well as any other.

Mr. ISAACS:
It may be five years.

Mr. BARTON:
It may be five years and eleven months, or it may be only a month, but we have to look at what is a fair provision considering what are the ordinary chances of human life and circumstance. The members may find when these measures are discussed that the proposal we have suggested will fairly meet with their approval, and that it is rather a matter of detail than of any great principle. I think I have explained the Bill as it differs from that framed in 1891. Let me, from the point at which I replied to Sir George Turner on clause 13, finish returning my thanks for the patience with which the Convention has listened to my exposition, in which I have not attempted for one moment to deviate into party lines or into strong expressions of opinion. I have attempted to make it as clear as my limited ability will allow, and, I hope that I have given a fair description of the general objects of the Bill. I would like to add that the Drafting Committee, finding that they had before them in the Bill of 1891 a number of provisions dealing with a Federal Constitution which had in effect received acceptance at the hands of the committees, and remembering that the Bill had obtained the greatest approval throughout the colonies with respect to its draughtsmanship, thought they should endeavor not to lay wanton hands on that measure in respect to the matters in which it has not been amended. The committee followed its phraseology as far as possible, but where they have not done so it has been, in their humble view, in the direction, which actuated its draughtsmen, of combining brevity with clearness. One way sacrifice clearness to brevity, but where the committee have made alterations it has been because they were endeavoring to combine the two. There are more clauses in this Bill than in the one of 1891, and the reason is that the provisions relating to trade and finance are much more numerous than they were in the other measure. In respect to the other clauses of the Bill members will find that they are fewer than in the other Bill; and in regard to the clauses relating to trade and finance, with the fresh light which has been thrown on these matters during the last six years, it would be strange, indeed, if the committee had not made more numerous suggestions than were embodied in the Bill of 1891. It is in this respect that the present Bill is longer than its predecessor. I should like to say on behalf of the Drafting Committee that, though they have added to the Bill in this respect, they have endeavored to treat the 1891 measure as reverently as possible, since they recollected that a gentleman, who may be described as the supreme draftsman of Australia, Sir Samuel Griffith, was the main author of it, not only in its passage through the Committee, but in the work of drafting it. Our own work has been laborious; and whatever may be the conclusions at which members may arrive with regard to the Bill, I think they will find it is absolutely clear to read, and is subject to very little, if any, ambiguity. That has been one of the main parts of our work. We have spared neither time nor labor on our duties, and we do hope that we have produced a Bill which, when considered, will be found acceptable in all its main provisions to the Convention.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I second the motion.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
The notice of motion standing in my name I do not propose to move at the present time, as I have been informed by those who are competent to give an opinion that the better plan will be for me to move what I desire when we get into Committee on the Bill. I am impelled to take this course, too, by the general concurrence, or, at any rate, the general desire expressed by hon. members who wish to meet the views that I wish to have approved.

Question-That the Convention do now resolve itself into a Committee of the whole to consider the draft Bill.
Resolved in the affirmative.
In Committee.
Sir RICHARD BAKER took the chair amidst cheers.
Preamble postponed.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I wish to move the postponement of clauses up to 52, so that we may consider the money clauses. In making this request my desire is that the representatives from Western Australia should have an opportunity to deal with this very important portion of the Bill. Unfortunately for us—very unfortunately, and I say it with great regret—we have to leave Adelaide on the 14th, and we cannot expect, if we take the clauses seriatim, that we shall have an opportunity to deal with this portion of the Bill. To the States, with the smaller populations, and Western Australia is one of them I regret to say, though I hope as time goes on we shall be able to vie with the other portions of Australia in regard to population—it is of very vital importance that the powers of the States Assembly should be as full and complete as is consistent with the form of government that we desire should be introduced. Of course it may be said that we are asking for more than what the larger populations of Australia consider reasonable, but if any hon. member looks at the matter from a reasonable point of view he must come to the conclusion that we are not asking anything very unreasonable in desiring that the States Assembly shall have the power of amendment over all classes of Bills, except the Appropriation Bill.

The CHAIRMAN:
I think that the hon. member is not in order in discussing the provisions of the Bill. He must only give his reasons for wishing for a postponement.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I do not wish in any way to infringe the rules of debate. My only object in asking for this somewhat extraordinary course to be pursued it in order that the members for Western Australia may have an opportunity of expressing their views on this portion of the Bill. I do not wish the House to go on with this debate at the present time unless it is convenient to hon. members to do so. I shall be glad to consult their wishes in that respect.

Mr. BARTON:
Do I understand that the hon. member does not wish to go on any further to-day?

Sir JOHN FORREST:
If it is the wish of the House.

Mr. BARTON:
I am certainly pretty well exhausted.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I will move:
That clauses 1 to 51 be postponed until after consideration of clauses 52, 53, and 54.
Sir GEORGE TURNER:
    Report progress now, and move that to-morrow.

Mr. BARTON:
    If the hon. member is willing that progress should be reported now I think that will be a convenient course, and will meet the views of the majority of hon. members. I do not wish to claim any special consideration, but I do know that I and two others are more tired than most men.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
    Let us carry this motion now.

Mr. ISAACS:
    Mr. Reid ought to be heard on it.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
    I understand many members desire to take a vote now.

Mr. BARTON:
    I should like to say a word or two on the motion.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
    It seems to me that it would defeat what I desire if pro-progress is reported. I think there is a general desire amongst members, that a vote should now be taken. If that is the case, why not vote for it without discussion?

Mr. BARTON:
    If the hon. member wishes to take a division to-night I shall address myself to the question, but not at great length. I must only reiterate my protest against any such course as he wishes to adopt. I feel very strongly that this Bill should be taken in the proper order of its clauses, not necessarily that every small machinery clause should be taken in its order; but I think it is not logical, or according to the reason of the Bill, to take out two or three clauses which may suit the convenience—and I say that in no offensive sense at all—of hon. members, dissociate

Sir JOHN FORREST:
    YOU cannot do that; you have not time.

Mr. BARTON:
    If we are to have a different procedure imposed upon us let us understand what we are doing. If we are to decide what relations there are to be between the two Houses in respect to Money Bills, or what the powers of each House are to be in dealing with those Bills, before we decide how the Houses are to be constituted, or how elected, who are to be the electors to them, or who are to be eligible for election, and are to rush to those provisions without for a moment deciding what powers of legislation those Houses conjointly are to have, we would be taking into consideration their powers in regard to Money Bills before knowing what sort of Houses they are to be or what sort of functions they are to have. A procedure of this kind must, with every respect to the proposer of it, meet my firm protest as the member in charge of this Bill; and I hope members will not consent to it. If they do it will mean the destruction of the proper order of this Bill; it will not conduce to effective working in Committee, and will occasion a good deal of surprise throughout Australia.

Mr. GLYNN:

I quite agree with what Mr. Barton has said in reference to the inexpediency of postponing every portion of the Bill until the question of money clauses has been discussed. I wish to explain that I intend to vote on this occasion against what will apparently be the decision of many of the South Australian representatives. On the last occasion, when the proposal was mooted that the Standing Orders should be suspended to enable this matter to be dealt with as one of urgency. I voted for the majority which secured the suspension of the Standing Orders, because I thought that as a matter of courtesy we should give the hon. member an opportunity of testing whether the question should be brought on at once or not, as he said that expedition was necessary owing to the fact that the delegates from Western Australia intended shortly to leave for their colony. But at the same time had the motion itself been put I intended to vote against its passage. Sir John Forrest seems to forget the fact that those who were sent to this Convention were not necessarily chosen from the ranks of members of Parliament, and those candidates who were members of Parliament must have known that they were subject certainly to political disadvantages. Knowing their duties as private members and members of Parliament they were bound to subordinate all personal or local parliamentary exigencies to the interests of Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

Very good in theory.

Mr. GLYNN:

It may be in theory; it is also in fact. The Convention is elected not necessarily from candidates of parliamentary qualifications. As a matter of fact there was a pretty wide-spread opinion throughout the colonies that it might have been better to have had the Convention selected altogether of non-parliamentary men. I do not agree with that view, because I think that the pick of the political intellects of the colonies capable of dealing with Convention matters might be selected from the Parliaments. At the same time there was that feeling, and we must respect it. What Mr. Barton has said is perfectly true. We cannot deal with this Bill piecemeal. The question of the effect of money clauses must be to a large extent determined by the consideration of the relative powers of the two Houses and the franchise basis for election to the States Assembly. We are not going to take the report of the Constitutional Committee on the constitution of the two Houses. Those clauses which are an explanation of the views of the Constitutional Committee may not be adopted by this Convention. Does Sir John Forrest say that the whole effect of Federation is to be determined by the vote upon the question of Money Bills?

Mr. DEAKIN:

Hear, hear.

Mr. GLYNN:

Does Sir John say that West Australia will determine whether to come into the federation or not, simply by his vote being given on this matter?

Sir JOHN FORREST:

We are generally agreed upon the others. WESTERN AUSTRALIAN DELEGATES:

Hear, hear.

Mr. GLYNN:

I venture to think that there is a very strong improbability that the members are all agreed on the other questions. I think there are considerable differences of opinion on other parts of the Bill. I put it to hon. members, is it not a fact that there are many points on which divisions may arise, and to settle which the votes of departing members would be useful?

Sir JOHN FORREST:

It is a very serious matter, I tell you.

Mr. GLYNN:

In my opinion, the question of Money Bills is not a serious matter. I think we are really raising an empty issue—an issue which, though empty in appearance—is really pregnant with the most dangerous considerations in the public mind. You are raising a question which is not vital to the exigencies of Federation, and putting it before the public as if it really were. We ought not to encourage the setting up of the question of whether Money Bills are to be settled according to the prejudices of some hon. members as determining the fate of the federal movement. For that reason I shall oppose the motion of the hon. member. When I was elected to this Convention I knew that in my case, as in that of others, it might be at considerable sacrifice of my personal leisure. The representatives of New South Wales and Victoria have come here at considerable sacrifice of their personal interests.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
You are at home.

Mr. GLYNN:

I am not talking chiefly of inconveniences from my point of view. I say that the members of Victoria and New South Wales are subjected to quite as great pecuniary sacrifice, and sacrifice their own personal interests quite as much as the representatives from Western Australia. I know there is an election coming on in Western Australia, but I say that matters of local politics are ephemeral and transient, and you might sweep away a whole local Legislature and still not do very much damage, as others would be found to take the places of those who were gone. But if we strangle the possibilities of Federation before they are really born we may have to wait for another generation before the cementing of the union of these colonies can be brought about. For these reasons I shall oppose the motion.

Mr. DEAKIN:

May I be permitted to endorse, without repeating, the extremely well chosen and powerful arguments already placed before the Convention by the two bon. members who have preceded me. I rise to add another argument in the same direction, and to offer a suggestion for consideration of a means which might be found of meeting the wishes of Sir John Forrest, without that entire breach of the ordinary, regular, and reasonable method of procedure which he invites us to take. The one additional argument I wish to offer in the first instance in opposition to the proposal of Sir John Forrest is that this carries with it the further assumption that we can discuss clauses 52, 53, and 54, with all the problems that they involve, and the possible amendments on them that may be suggested, during the course of a single sitting to-morrow. If this part of the measure is of the transcendent importance which he declares, it is one which will necessarily provoke some remark from a considerable number of members of the Convention. It will also probably lead to the submission of some variations or amendments on these proposals, or on any proposal which he may make in substitution for them. And to suppose that the whole of these clauses-

Sir JOHN FORREST:

Only three.

Mr. PEACOCK:

The crux of the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN:

If they are of the transcendent importance which the hon. member for Western Australia, Sir John Forrest, suggests, does he say they are to be disposed of-and finally disposed of in such a way that no matter how this Convention may hereafter alter other parts of this measure-no matter what changes-we may think fit to make in the Constitution of the two Houses and in their powers -we are to have settled this part of the Bill in a single sitting?

Sir JOHN FORREST:

I want a majority to decide, not a minority.

Mr. DEAKIN:

I will show the hon. member presently that there is great force in that argument. We have now to face two assumptions, which the hon. member makes. The first is that these clauses can be disposed of in a single sitting, and the other is that, though they are thus disposed of in anticipation of the discussion on all parts of the Bill, they are to remain untouched and unaltered, no matter what conclusions we may hereafter arrive at. I would suggest to the hon. member whether it would not be possible to meet his wishes and those of his hon. colleagues by allowing them to take up the discussion of these particular clauses to-morrow, and to occupy the whole of the time of this Convention. I think that courtesy might fairly be extended to them. (Laughter.) Let the hon. members not only give us the benefit of their opinions on this part of the Bill, but on each one of these three clauses, and if necessary on each of the contested points in the clauses. For the purpose of bringing out all the contested points it might be advisable for the hon. member in charge of this Bill, Mr. Barton, and for one or two others to direct their attention to any question they might omit. Let us obtain from them a full and frank discussion on these points, and give us an indication how they will record their votes. That would be of greater value than the vote which Sir John Forrest proposes to take, and which he admits is not to be final. The vote to-morrow can only bind those who are compelled to withdraw from this Convention, thereby giving the result of their best judgment on the matter at this stage of the proceedings. The only conclusive votes that will be cast to-morrow will be the votes of the hon. members for Western Australia. If they are allowed to put on record by this motion-which is an extraordinary departure from all parliamentary procedure-their views, and also record their votes, the public will see, and it will at once appear, when the division hereafter will be taken, whether, if their votes had been cast at the later stage this measure would have been altered.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK:

Can we count these votes, then?

Mr. DEAKIN:

You cannot in the ordinary way of counting a division, but you can reckon them in determining the present will of the Convention. You cannot forecast its ultimate decision. We all know this meeting is not final. I would be inclined to sacrifice everything and go with Sir John Forrest if he had no opportunity of reversing the vote.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
We have a large majority,

Mr. PEACOCK:
That is a nice way to talk!

Mr. DEAKIN:
I do not know that it affects the matter one way or the other.

Mr. BARTON:
I think it affects the matter very greatly, because it gives us an idea of how it will be done.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Will members allow me to finish? I say if this were the last, the final vote, and if for all time Sir John Forrest and his colleagues were to be deprived of the privilege of casting their votes, upon this particular issue and if this were the final meeting of the Convention, I should be inclined to sacrifice everything; but Sir John Forrest must remember that the Convention has to meet again, and that he and his colleagues will be able to attend then and have their votes recorded upon the division lists.

We have a majority.

Mr. DEAKIN:
If they are then in the majority they will carry their case, but if they do succeed now, the vote they give is liable not only to be reversed by this Convention at its present sitting, but it is equally liable to be reversed again when the Convention meets in sixty or 120 days. Consequently the hon. member, who appears to be clinging to this vote, as if he never would have another, is not being deprived of the opportunity of voting.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
You are clinging to it.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I am clinging to it because it is the course, not only of parliamentary procedure, but the course which reason, justice, and judgment dictates to us. He is asking us to consent as a favor to him, and I am most anxious to do so; but it will be an injustice to all the other representatives and all the colonies represented. Still I am most anxious, even at the risk of that, to oblige him. I am simply pointing out a method by which he and his colleagues can place their views before the public, and have their speeches and votes recorded. If Sir John Forrest goes further he is endeavouring to snatch a mere victory of votes.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
We have a majority.

Mr. DEAKIN:
It is only a majority that can snatch a victory.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
It is the minority who are trying to snatch a victory, and not US.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
We are only here to hear argument.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
You have heard that for a week.

Mr. DEAKIN:
I only say that Sir John Forrest is open to the imputation that he is endeavoring to snatch a vote before the Convention has had proper time, means, or opportunity, of determining such an important question after considering it in all possible aspects. While I am anxious to meet him in every possible way, I wish to point out that even though he attain all he desires now, the ultimate decision of the question will be retained by those who remain here to the close of the proceedings, and afterwards at the next meeting three months hence. The supplementary meeting of this Convention has yet to come, and then Sir John Forrest and his colleagues will have another hearing and as many opportunities of voting as they can desire.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think this is a very difficult position which we have got to face, and at the same time I think we must take into consideration all of the circumstances surrounding the case. I quite agree with Mr. Barton as to the inadvisability under ordinary circumstances of altering the ordinary procedure, but at the same time I have not heard any argument which will lead me to believe that there is anything attached to the discussion on the money clauses on which the decision with regard to the previous clauses depends, and if anything should crop up in the course of our proceedings which will show that the discussion on the early part of the Bill had some relative effect, after we had debated the money clauses, it would be quite within our right to re-commit those clauses. I take it that the gentlemen who have come here at great inconvenience, and whose time is limited, and who acquiesced in the general desire to close the earlier debate, have not had the opportunity of giving their views on what they consider the most salient part of the Bill. I take it also that they are fairly satisfied with the other provisions of the Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
We are satisfied with the form in which they are now in the Bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN:
I think it would show a thoroughly federal spirit if we agree to this proposal. I do not think the scheme proposed by Mr. Deakin is practicable, and and I might suggest to him that the real part which the Premiers will have to play will be before their own Parliaments between this and the next sitting of the Convention, and the favor or disfavor with which our labors are met will depend upon the reports given to our respective Parliaments. Although it seems to me that there will be scarcely time to complete this discussion before the West Australian representatives leave, still unless there is some insuperable objection, or unless it is absolutely impossible to debate these clauses until the debate on the others has taken place, I would suggest that we should come to a vote as early as possible. It cannot be settled on principle, and it is a great stretch of procedure, but the motion is only moved under the peculiar circumstances surrounding the case.

Mr. LEAKE:

I do not follow the arguments of Mr. Barton and Mr. Deakin that we should be adopting an unwise course, because I submit that it is undoubtedly one of the rules of parliamentary practice in committee to postpone clauses until after the consideration of others. Nor is Mr. Barton altogether exact when he says that the Constitution of the Federation is not settled. It is practically settled, if we may judge from the tenor of the debate on the opening resolutions. At any rate, we have this fact before us that the basis of responsible government is to guide us in the construction of the Constitution. If we do not exactly know on what lines our Constitution will be dealt with, we can, at all events, arrive at a very fair conclusion. We are not going to any extent off the beaten track by adopting the motion of Sir John Forrest. If the first element of good government is good finance, why should we not first of all consider the financial clauses of this proposed Constitution?

Mr. HIGGINS:

What about responsible government?

Mr. LEAKE:

We propose to base our Constitution upon the principles of responsible government, but we cannot adopt all the practices of responsible government. I take this opportunity—as I may not have it again, judging from the feeling of the House—of expressing my view, which is this, that as at present advised it is my intention to vote for clauses 52, 53, and 54 as they stand. We are asking, it is true, a favor of this Convention, but I cannot accept a favor of this kind unless it is graciously conceded. Although hon. members may be debarred from the extreme privilege of listening to our views upon this question, I claim that I for one expect to derive great benefit from the discussion which will arise between hon. members hailing from other colonies; and it is because of the instruction I desire to get that I support the resolutions of my honorable friend, Sir John Forrest. I again appeal to hon. members in this Convention to allow us from Western Australia to have the full benefit of this discussion, and allow us to appreciate, and, if necessary, be guided, and, perhaps, have our views altered by the arguments which will be adduced by hon. gentlemen who are opposed to this resolution.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

I move: That the Committee do now divide.

Progress reported.
ADJOURNMENT.
The Convention adjourned at 5.29 p.m.
Tuesday April 13, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 10.30 a.m.

RETURNS.

Mr. HOLDER:
I beg to lay on the table returns to order of the Convention, March 23rd, 24th, and 26th, relating to Customs and excise and taxation of the Australasian colonies; population, South Australia; railways, South Australia; cost of defences and public debt, South Australia. I move that they be printed.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

BUSINESS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. BARTON:
I should like to take the sense of the members of the Convention now as to whether it is their desire to sit late. If there is a consensus of opinion to that effect I would, be prepared with, a regular motion for the purpose. As there seems to be no objection to sitting to-night, I move without notice-

That the Standing Orders be suspended to enable a motion to be made with regard to the course of business.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON:
I move now-

That the Convention shall at 5.30, this day, suspend its sitting till 7 p.m., at which hour the Convention shall be resumed, and the transaction of business continued.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I desire to second the proposal. I think we ought to go a step further.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It is necessary that many delegates shall have an opportunity of returning to their respective colonies during the Easter Holidays, and we ought to settle now whether we propose to sit at all during those holidays, or will adjourn over them. I suggest that in addition to sitting to-night, we might also now decide whether we will sit tomorrow night as well; and then on Thursday, instead of adjourning at 1 o'clock, we should sit on till 2 o'clock. That would give those who desire to go away time to get the necessary refreshment and have ample time to catch trains. But if we adjourn at 1 o'clock on Thursday and meet again at 2, those desirous of going away will be fidgety and anxious, and will not be able to settle down to the business.

Mr. BARTON:
Is there any objection to sitting till 5.30 on Thursday?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Yes; because many of the representatives are anxious to take advantage of the holidays to get back to their various colonies, and as the train leaves at 4.30 very few would like to leave the Convention if, business was going on till 5.30.

Mr. BARTON:
Would 3.30 do?

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
That would cut it rather fine. It amounts to this-I propose that we sit straight on till 2 o'clock; that gives an extra hour. The hon. member suggests sitting from 2 o'clock till 3.30 -or an extra hour-and-a-half-half-an-hour more than I propose.

Mr. BARTON:
Not much difference.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
I wish to suggest that Mr. Barton should amend his motion by including the words until otherwise ordered." That will obviate the necessity of making motions, every day; because it seems to me, and I think the majority of the delegates will agree with me, that we should finish our work as speedily as, possible.

Mr. REID:
Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD BAKER:
To do so we should sit every night as a rule, but exception can be made by special motion. If Mr. Barton amends his motion in the manner I have indicated that result will follow. We should sit every night unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. REID:
The suggestion raised by Sir George Turner is one which, will require very serious consideration, because I fancy we are all anxious, if possible, to finish this work. I was hoping we would be able to go on on Saturday and Monday, at any rate, because I know how I am placed individually in reference to the meeting of Parliament in Sydney on April 27th, and if we adjourn for four days it will leave those who come from distant colonies simply here doing nothing. The delegates from Now South Wales will have only time to go to Sydney and start back again on the same day—a matter of four days travelling—so that the project is impracticable for us, and I put it to our brother delegates for very serious consideration whether we should not go straight on, except with the intervention of Good Friday, sitting on Saturday and Sitting on Monday.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Personally I have not the slightest objection.

Mr. REID:
Of course I am only putting it for the consideration of delegates; but I put it most earnestly to the delegates that this work has to be finished, and we ought to stick to it till it is finished, and to do that we must throw aside these matters about holidays.

Mr. LYNE:
Nearly all of us have been settled here continuously in various capacities since the Convention met, and, although I do not want any special consideration for myself, I have to leave here for Sydney on Thursday night, and I wish to return in order to be present here again on Tuesday or Wednesday if I possibly can. I certainly think it would be unwise to sit during Easter, as I am sure other members of the Convention will desire to got to their homes for two or three days. I presume it will not be expected that we should sit on Good Friday and on Saturday. Unless we break through the order of thing we will only sit in the morning. Easter Monday is a general holiday, and I do not think we can very well sit on that day.

Several HON. MEMBERS:
Yes, yes.

Mr. LYNE:
It is all very well for hon. members who do not desire to go home, but we do want a little rest occasionally. I think that the motion is a reasonable one, and, although I do not desire any consideration for myself, I have to go on business to Sydney. I hope that Sir George Turner's proposal will be agreed to.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
I hope this adjournment will not be agreed to because we representatives of Tasmania, however much we might desire to go home, could not possibly get home. We could not even get home, turn round, and come back straight, as the delegates could from New South Wales. Having in view the desirability of pushing on with the Work, I hope we shall go on on Saturday, and again on Monday, so that the work may be urged forward.

Mr. TRENWITH:

I would point out that we can only save one day if we refrain from adjourning.

Mr. REID:

Two-Saturday and Monday.

Mr. TRENWITH:

We cannot save Saturday, because we have already agreed not to sit on Saturday out of consideration for the religious opinions of some of our members. If the religious opinions of some hon. members were sufficient to induce us not to sit before, they ought to be sufficient now.

Mr. REID:

It is a matter of urgency.

Mr. TRENWITH:

We thought it desirable to sit on Saturday, but a very proper objection was raised that we could not do so without violating the consciences of some of our members, so that all we should gain is Monday. Having in view the very great convenience it will be to a considerable number of delegates, I think the proposal of Sir George Turner is the wise course to adopt. Of course, it is to be regretted that the delegates from Tasmania cannot get home—if they could, no doubt they would be very glad of our convenient break of this character. The representatives of Victoria can get home.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

No one else can.

Mr. TRENWITH:

It happens so, but I am pointing out that we cannot save much.

Mr. REID:

Two solid days-Saturday and Monday.

Mr. TRENWITH:

We are proposing to discuss out of its proper order some portions of this Bill to meet the convenience of some hon. members, which I think is a desirable arrangement. I am simply urging now to meet the convenience of a considerable number of hon. members that as we can make so slight a saving it would be as well to make this adjournment. I think it is highly probable that, if we sit on Monday, in view of the fact that it is a recognised holiday, and that in Adelaide one of the most important events of the year takes place, some hon. members will be unsettled as to where they will go, and they are not likely to give that undivided attention to their work which they otherwise would. I strongly urge this adjournment. The saving is small if we refrain from granting it, while the inconvenience to some hon. members will be very great indeed.

Mr. BRUNKER:

I rise to say at once that I am opposed to the proposal for an adjournment, and perhaps I have stronger personal reasons to seek a few days' holiday in order to reach my home than any other member of this Convention. I recognise very fully that we are here to perform a certain duty, and we should not cease to perform this duty until we have completed the important work we have in hand. I am in favor of sitting on Saturday and Monday, to enable us to carry out the duties entrusted to us. I should indeed be glad of the opportunity to reach my home, if it were only for an hour or two. I feel that it is impossible for me to do this, and the only convenience that will be served by an adjournment will be in the case of the Victorian delegates, who can easily get to their homes in the interim. I hope hon. members will adhere to the proposal made by the hon. the Premier of New South Wales.

Mr. SOLOMON:

I recognise that there is a great deal of weight in the interjection made just now by the hon. the Premier of New South Wales. If it is proposed to sit both on Saturday and Monday, although I personally would not be able to attend, I should not like to raise my protest against that being done. I have no doubt that upon important points concerning which the South Australian delegates are deeply interested some members of the Convention on the other side will be prepared to pair with me.

The PRESIDENT:

I would like to point out that no amendment has been made.

Mr. BARTON:

I would like to make a suggestion to hon. members about this matter, and that is that the motion should be amended by adding the words This day and to-morrow to the motion. We can sit to-night and to-morrow. Then it would seem desirable according to the opinions expressed all round that we should adjourn on Thursday and meet again on Monday.

Mr. REID:

Why not sit on Saturday?

Mr. BARTON:

I am quite in the hands of the Convention in this matter.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Why not sit on Friday?

Mr. BARTON:

I think it is desirable not to shock the consciences of a great many people, and I think a sitting on the day you mention would be highly unpopular, and would provoke a great deal of criticism on our deliberations. We should endeavor to avoid giving even the semblance of ground for such criticism. After what Mr. Solomon has said, if the urgencies of business demands it, I would have no hesitation in sitting on Saturday. I propose we sit this evening and to-morrow, adjourn on the afternoon of Thursday and then meet again on Monday, and also in the evening. We can also sit every evening till we finish our business.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Why not sit on Thursday night?

Mr. BARTON:
Because that would interfere with members who want to leave the city to spend the Friday in the country.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Oh, surely we could sit on Thursday night to get on with our work.

Mr. REID:
That's right. Stick to the work.

Mr. BARTON:
If that is the general sense of the Convention let us by all means adopt it. It matters nothing to me, and I thought I was making a proposal that would commend itself to the majority of the members of the Convention. I would ask, first, that this motion be amended:

By inserting after the word "That" the words "until otherwise ordered," and leaving out the words "this day."

Mr. ISAACS:
How will it read?

Mr. BARTON:
That, until otherwise ordered, the Convention shall, at 5.30 p.m., suspend its sittings until 7 p.m., at which hour the Convention shall be resumed, and the transaction of business continued.

Leave given to amend the motion.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

LOCAL LEGISLATURES AND THE DRAFT BILL.

Adjourned consideration of the motion.

That, in the opinion of this Convention, the interval for consideration of the Draft Bill by the local Legislatures should be extended to not less than 120 days nor more than 180 days.

Mr. REID:
As my name has been mentioned-

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Postpone it till to-morrow.
Mr. BARTON:
Further adjourn it until to-morrow?

Mr. LYNE:
I suggest that it be withdrawn.

Mr. REID:
I must say a word or two.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Then I shall have to say something also.

Mr. REID:
I do not wish to say anything that would provoke discussion, and rather than risk that now I will postpone my remarks till to-morrow.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I move:
That the debate be farther adjourned till tomorrow.

Question for adjournment resolved in the affirmative.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

In Committee.

Clause 52-Proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or the imposition of any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
The Committee, in dealing with this clause, has not followed out the Commonwealth Bill of 1891. That Bill provided:

Laws appropriating any part of the public revenue, or imposing any tax or impost shall originate in the House of Representatives.

What might at first glance appear a somewhat unimportant alteration, but which is in reality a most important alteration, has been made in the reading of this particular clause, and it now stands:

Proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation.

Now, it will be very difficult indeed for anyone to construe the meaning of these words:

Having for their main object.

It seems to me we are here initiating a system which must necessarily be a reason for a large number of complaints and disputes between the two Houses. We know that the Senate or the States Assembly, as it is called, will be anxious to initiate Bills, and in many cases they will bring forward measures which will contain appropriations. They will argue at once that the Bill is brought in for a certain purpose—take for instance, the building of baths—and they will say:

The main object of the Bill is to provide bathing accommodation for the people, and it is true that it is necessary to spend money, but the main object of the Bill is not for spending consolidated revenue and we had a perfect right to initiate it; and that might mean a heavy expenditure. Now, if that were done, we must all admit that the House of Representatives would immediately say that their rights were being infringed, and that such an appropriation did not come within the power of the States-Assembly. You may take scores, I venture to say hundreds, of cases where the question would be fairly and legitimately raised as to whether the States Assembly were justified in initiating Bills. Whenever there is an appropriation of revenue, it should be made in one House only, and that House should be the House of Representatives. I can see no great advantage in having such Bills introduced into the two Houses. It should be sufficient that the House of Representatives, which represents the people as a people, should initiate them. At the same time, I think there is a means by which, Bills which in reality deal with large questions of public policy, and which incidentally appropriate small portions of the revenue, may be fairly dealt with. It would be competent for both Houses to frame a Joint Standing Order by which such Bills may be introduced into the States Assembly, but that the clauses relating to the appropriation should be printed in italics, and should not be dealt with by that Chamber, but by the House of Representatives when the Bill reaches it. That is the course we have adopted in Victoria.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

You have not always done that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

You will not deny that it has been done.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:

It has been done.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

There is no reason why they should not follow this course. I am perfectly certain that if we were to follow the course suggested in the Bill we would have more disputes over this particular question than over all others. I see no necessity for initiating these Bills in the States Assembly, and therefore I move:

To strike out the words "having for their main object the appropriation of" with the view of inserting the word "appropriating."

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I should like to point out that this power, which on the face, of it enlarge the rights of the States Assembly, does not practically do so; because, if you look at section 54, it is evident that the initiation of any expenditure can only be by a Minister, as initiation cannot take place unless by message, and of course according to the ordinary course a message will, only be granted to a responsible Minister, and therefore the new power will simply enable the Minister who represents the Ministry in the State Assembly to initiate such Bills. What advantage is there in that? The majority by which the Ministry is controlled must be in the House of Representatives, and the Government will only act according to the majority in that Chamber.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It is very ambiguous.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Apart from that there may be difficulty in the suggestion of Sir George Turner. When I was speaking on the resolutions in the opening debate I suggested that there had been some difficulties in the way of dealing with different classes of Money Bills. There are Money Bills which deal incidentally only with the expenditure of money which might with advantage be amended in any direction by the States Assembly, but when one comes to try and put into language that difference it is really impossible to do it. It is impossible to lay down any rule which will distinguish between those matters in which amendment is incidental and those matters of principle in which the House of Representatives should undoubtedly have the initiation in dealing with Money Bills. But although the distinction does exist, it is one of those distinctions which are too fine to be drawn in a Constitution of this kind. We cannot have a Constitution which will scientifically draw a line between the different rights which should be appropriated by the two Houses. All that we can do is to make a workable arrangement, and that workable arrangement can be found out by some method arranged between the two Houses, such as that suggested by the hon. member Sir George Turner. But I would like to suggest to Sir George Turner that it would be desirable to have his amendment altered. I understand the hon. gentleman proposes to leave in the words "proposed law"?

Mr. ISAACS:

That will not do. That means something passed by the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I think the word used should be Bills.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I would make a suggestion to the honorable gentleman. There is a distinction in the part dealing with Money Bills between proposed laws and laws. That is a very strong reason why we should have "laws" in this part of the Bill, as that would indicate that the law must comply with certain conditions, and if it does not comply with those certain conditions it is unconstitutional, and must be set aside; but a proposed law is a question between the two Houses, and merely a question of order. In the powers between the two Houses dealing with Money Bills it is most essential that those should be made matters of constitutional objection, and not matters of order. I would suggest to Sir George Turner that he should alter his amendment by striking out all the words down to "any" in the second line, and inserting the words:

Laws appropriating.

Mr. ISAACS:

Laws for appropriating.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

That would raise a difficulty, too. I would suggest that the words up to "any" should be struck out, and that the words:

Laws appropriating

should be put in, thus bringing back the section to what it was in the old Bill. In dealing with these money clauses there is a very great advantage indeed in bringing back the wording of the Bill as far as possible to the Bill of 1891, which represented a compromise. That compromise which deals with the conflicting claims of the two Houses, and represents the differences of opinion prevailing throughout the colonies as to the rights of the two Houses, is known as the settlement of the question arrived at in the 1891 Bill, and it appears very desirable that we should not alter those terms in any way. Though this is not the time to go into the question as to what colonies are to be affected, I think, as far as my view of New South Wales is concerned, that although what was agreed to in 1891 would be accepted, no extension of those powers with regard to the States Assembly can be accepted. Therefore it becomes important that, as far as possible, the words of this compromise should be adhered to, so that we may in this Committee perhaps come to some conclusion, after the question has been threshed out, that after all we cannot do better than stand by that compromise. I would like to say a word with regard to Mr. Isaacs' interjection about "proposed law." I see no advantage in altering that. "Proposed law" describes exactly what the thing is. There is no misunderstanding its meaning, and I take it that for a mere change in the form of expression which can have no substantial difference in it, we should not alter the phraseology of this Bill. It is not only the phraseology adopted by the last draughtsmen, but it was the phraseology adopted by the draughtsmen of the former Bill. If Sir George Turner accepts my suggestion, I will say no more now. Otherwise I will have something to say at a later period.
The CHAIRMAN:
I would point out to Mr. O'Connor that if the amendment is not amended and is carried, it will then be too late for him to move his proposed amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I would rather that Sir George Turner fell in with my proposal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I am perfectly prepared to accept the word "Bill," but I do not like "proposed laws."

Mr. ISAACS:
I think if you accept the word "Bill" you remove the inconsistency between clauses 52 and 53.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
That question about "Bill" does not arise here. It should be "law appropriating."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
It cannot be a law until it is passed by both Houses and agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I ask the hon. member to withdraw his amendment to enable me to propose a prior amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I ask for leave to temporarily withdraw my amendment.
Leave given.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
Then I will move:
That the word "proposed" be struck out.

Mr. ISAACS:
I would like to draw the hon. member's attention to this. I agree that we should not have trouble about mere words, but one or two considerations will convince him that the word "Bill" as proposed by Sir George Turner will be very much better. If you put in "laws" there, as it was in the Bill of 1891, there will be the very difficulty pointed out by my hon. friend, Mr. O'Connor; the law would be unconstitutional, absolutely void, and I think that is a position none of us should stand in, because after Parliament has passed a law, there should be no doubt-as far as the doubt can be removed-of its validity. It would be a terrible calamity if, after any law were passed and the Federal Parliament had risen and the Treasurer had thought, "Well, here is an Appropriation Bill that is in proper order," and it was disputed afterwards, for the courts to have to declare it unconstitutional and void.
Mr. O'CONNOR:
That might happen in many cases.

Mr. ISAACS:
We may endeavor to avoid it by using the word "Bill." It might never be anything more than a temporary contest, at most, between the Houses. But if you put the word "laws" you do not obviate the conflict between the two Houses, but you beyond doubt add another terror-a possible invalidity-after the Houses have agreed. We should seek sedulously to avoid that. I should like to point out the reason why the Committee of 1891 appear to have used the word "laws" in clause 54 of their Bill, which is now clause 52 in ours, and the words "proposed laws" in other clauses. Throughout the other clauses the words "proposed laws" clearly mean Bills that have been passed by the House of Representatives and have been sent up to the Senate. That is the distinction.

Mr. BARTON:
Among these three clauses.

Mr. ISAACS:
Throughout clause 55 of the Bill of 1891 it is provided that the Senate is to have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of all "proposed laws;" except laws imposing taxation and laws appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the Government. That is much more restrictive than the Appropriation Bills in the preceding clause. It would bring those two clauses into collision if the same term "proposed laws" be retained in both of them with their present wording. And when we look further on we find the Senate cannot amend any proposed law in such a manner as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people, i.e., proposed by the other House.

Mr. BARTON:
The distinction was kept alive between the state of order of a Bill, and the question of its constitutionality?

Mr. ISAACS:
That distinction ought to be preserved; but by putting in "proposed laws," in clause 52, you will obliterate that distinction. and indistinctness and confusion will arise. It will render that clause and the succeeding clause inconsistent, because it is clear that the Senate has not equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of proposed laws. Under clause 55, subsection 5, of the Bill of 1891, in the case of a proposed law, which the Senate may not amend, the Senate may return it. The distinction is kept up throughout.

Mr. BARTON:
These clauses are consistent with themselves as they stand.
Mr. ISAACS:

But if we keep the words "proposed laws" in clause 52 I am afraid the distinction sought to be created and preserved in the Bill of 1891 will be done away with.

Mr. BARTON:

If it would not be interrupting the hon. member-

Mr. ISAACS:

Certainly not; go on.

Mr. BARTON:

Our intention in leaving "proposed laws" as it stood in clause 52 was to keep up this distinction. The question whether a Bill should be originated in the House of Representatives or amended in the States Assembly was one not intended to come before the courts afterwards, but to be settled by the Houses themselves; but the question as to keeping up one system of taxation in the Bill was one which could well come before the courts as one of constitutionality.

Mr. ISAACS:

I think the word "Bill" ought to be used, because if we use the words "proposed law," in both clauses as at present framed, while we avoid the difficulty which is referred to, we get into others; we do not distinguish between a Bill which originates in the Senate and one which does not originate in the Senate. Do I convey my meaning to the hon. member?

Mr. BARTON:

I am not quite clear on the matter.

Mr. ISAACS:

If we use the word "law" we get into the difficulty of having it invalid afterwards. We want to avoid that. We then have the choice of two expressions-"proposed law" and "Bill." If we use the term "proposed law" in clause 52 we give the ordinary meaning to that expression, namely, a proposal which emanates either from the House of Representatives or from the Senate. And if we there attach that meaning to the expression "proposed law" we keep up the meaning in the succeeding clause. Now, in the succeeding clause, that expression clearly refers to a proposal originated in the House of Representatives and coming afterwards to the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

It would be a Bill in either House. A proposed law represents the same thing.

Mr. ISAACS:

I am afraid our minds are not at one about it.
Mr. BARTON:
I cannot see why the words "proposed law" will not do in clause 52.

Mr. ISAACS:
Because in that clause it means a Bill which originates in either the House of Representatives or the Senate. But in the succeeding clause it does not mean that—it means a Bill which originates in the House of Representatives, and cannot mean a Bill which originates in the Senate, because, it provides that the Senate is to have equal power in respect of proposed laws with a certain exception, which exception is not consistent with the preceding section. In other words, there are two sections in immediate juxtaposition; one says that the Senate is not to have power to originate a Bill for appropriating revenue, whether for the ordinary annual services or not-

Mr. WISE:
Would not you get over that difficulty by saying in the next clause "except in the last preceding section"?

Mr. ISAACS:
You get over it by inserting the word "Bills" instead of "proposed laws."

Mr. WISE:
That involves the redrafting of the clause.

Mr. ISAACS:
No; it does not. You have as it at present stands a distinct inconsistency. Let me put it to the hon. member. Suppose a court were constructing these two sections, and it said:

In clause 52 the Senate is to have the power to originate an Appropriation Bill, provided its main object is not appropriating the public revenue, no matter whether it is for the ordinary annual services or not.

Coming to clause 53, the court would say:

The Senate has equal powers except with regard to a particular class of appropriation, namely, appropriation for the ordinary annual services.

How do the two things stand together? They do not stand together.

Mr. BARTON:
Then the best thing—if that did not really affect the reading of the Bill—would be to put in at the begining of clause 53 the words "Notwithstanding anything in the last section contained."

Mr. ISAACS:
That would certainly make the meaning of the clauses worse

Mr. BARTON:
Yes, so it might.
Mr. ISAACS:
The difficulty, however, might easily be met by inserting "Bills" instead of "proposed laws." The word "laws," as used, is open to objection, and it is recognised that it may be left to the declaration of a court to say that an Act is invalid. If you use the word "Bills" you carry out the intentions of the framers of the 1891 measure.

Mr. BARTON:
You now raise a discussion as to what is a Bill and what is a proposed law.

Mr. PEACOCK:
When you lawyers differ, what are we laymen to do?

Mr. ISAACS:
I should support an amendment to substitute "Bills" for "proposed laws."

Mr. BARTON:
How would this do-put before the first word in clause 53 the words:
Save as in the last clause stated.

Mr. ISAACS:
I should like time to consider that, because every word of this clause ought to be closely scrutinised.

Mr. BARTON:
I agree with you that every word deserves to be scrutinised.

Mr. SYMON:
I confess I have followed with great interest the lucid statement made by the hon. member for Victoria, Mr. Isaacs, but I am unable to assent to the view he takes as to the construction of this clause. We are limited in this amendment to a mere question of words, and we are not now dealing with the desirability of omitting the words "main object." I feel there is great force in the view put forward by Sir George Turner. It does seem to me that this section 52 as it stands intends, in the Constitution, to create a condition as to the validity of laws of that character, although as the hon. member, Mr. Isaacs, has pointed out, the result would be, If the conditions imposed by that clause are not fulfilled, that the law might be invalid, or be liable to be declared such by the High Court of the Commonwealth. The point at which I diverge from my hon. friend is as to whether the same result would not flow from the amendment of the clause by introducing the word "Bill." It seems to me if you use the word "law," and the conditions necessary to the validity of that law are not performed, the law goes. In the same way if the condition necessary to the validity of the Bill is adhered to the law equally goes.

Mr. ISAACS:
That might be so.
Mr. SYMON:
In that case we advance no further by substituting the word "Bill for "proposed law."
Mr. ISAACS:
I want to draw a distinction between that clause and the one immediately succeeding.
Mr. SYMON:
Starting from the beginning of the clause, it seems to me, at any rate, that the word "proposed" ought to be struck out. We want to go a little further, and we want to see what is to be substituted for it. If we strike out "proposed," we go back to the 1891 Bill. These words:
Appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or the imposition of any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Representatives, seem to me the best under the circumstances. The word "laws" in the clause is used in a different sense from the use made of it in the succeeding clause. I wish to point out to my hon. friend that clause 53 is right, and it is immaterial whether you substitute "Bills" for "proposed laws." "Bills" is the more familiar word used in parliamentary phraseology. 'Clause 53 necessarily requires the use of the words "proposed laws" or "Bills," because you are dealing there, not with the validity of the, law, but with the power of amendment, and you cannot amend a law once it is passed and assented to, and you can only speak of the power of the Senate being co-ordinate with the power of the Lower House as applicable to "proposed laws" or "Bills." If you used the word "laws" there it would be inapplicable. That is shown by the use of the word in sub-paragraphs 2 and 3. You could not use the word "Bill" there, and you could not use the words "proposed laws." Therefore we must use the expression which is most applicable to the things we are dealing with. It comes back to a question of words. My honorable friend opposite agrees with me. Whether you take "Bill" or "laws"-whichever is best, so far as the expression goes-it comes back to the same thing. I think we shall arrive at a clearer expression if we adopt Mr. O'Connor's suggestion. I submit that the words as they appear in the Commonwealth Bill of 1891, to the extent that we are dealing with the matter, are most suitable and appropriate under the circumstances. They involve no more difficulty in the matter of interpretation than the substitution of the word "Bill," and the substitution of the word "Bill" would lead to no difficulty between the two Houses.
Mr. BARTON:
I quite see the point which Mr. Isaacs has raised, and, although it is a fine point, I believe there is something in it. I do not agree with the suggestion that we should insert "Bills" there, because if we did that we would give rise to a fresh bone of contention as to the difference between Bills and proposed laws. "Laws" was chosen by Sir Samuel Griffith to denote Acts of Parliaments as being a word preferable to any other, and instead of drawing the distinction between Acts and Bills he drew it between "laws" and "proposed laws." If we insert the word "Bill" here we should not only have a conflict as to the difference between "Bill" and "proposed law", but the question would arise as to whether in all clauses in which the words "proposed law" occurred we should not have to make that amendment again, and that would involve perhaps fifty or sixty questions in Committee. That, I think, would be a waste of time. I think the expression "proposed laws" is a sufficient one, and I think Mr. Isaacs' point can be met and his desires attained in the way I have indicated. It is more than arguable, it is clear, if proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation of revenue or the imposition of taxation are to initiate in the House of Representatives, and you indicate in the next clause that the Senate is to have equal powers with the other House, with certain exceptions, that although you have to read these things together, and although probably the courts would construe them as the Bill is drawn, the point may be raised and may be made a subject for litigation. It is an arguable point, and I suggest to Mr. O'Connor that it would be better to withdraw the word "proposed." I suggest also that the view of Mr. Isaacs might be met by a short amendment at the beginning of clause 53, that is to say:

Save as in the last clause stated.

If that were done the whole difficulty would be obviated, and it would save the necessity for making the fifty or sixty amendments which I have spoken of. I think that the words "proposed laws" are a proper and sufficiently dignified way of stating what is intended, and if you take the word "laws" instead of "Acts" you have no alternative but to accept them. I suggest that that phraseology should be adopted, and think that the insertion of the words I have mentioned should meet Mr. Isaacs' objection.

Mr. ISAAC S:

I do not care how it is done so long as this inconsistency is avoided.

Mr. KINGSTON:

I am disposed to think that Mr. O'Connor is right in his suggestion, which will have the effect of restoring the Bill to the shape in which it was passed by the Convention of 1891, and will in effect re-enact the Commonwealth Bill, for which I have naturally some affection. I would point out that clauses 54 and 55 are perfectly clear.

Clause 54 will declare in what Chamber the laws shall originate or be first proposed. It will fix a limitation on the place of origin, and there is nothing inconsistent in clause 55, which provides what shall be the rights of the Senate in reference to laws which have been proposed or originated in connection with section 54. If we place it in the form in which we find it in the Commonwealth Bill we will simply declare that Money Bills, in their ordinary sense, shall be first proposed in the House of Representatives, and then we may go on without any contradiction to declare that the Senate shall have equal rights after they have been proposed, except in specified cases. I think we have good grounds for adhering to the Bill of 1891.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I am sorry that so early in the debate we should be wrangling about words, but I think there are great consequences attached to the words in this instance, and therefore I wish to say something. I think that the object of Mr. Isaacs is to prevent a law, when it is once on the Statute-book, being impeached as to its validity on the grounds that it has not been carried by the two Houses in the way prescribed, and I think any word we can use to prevent that lamentable consequence should be used. On this point we cannot be too explicit. The British North American Act says:

Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue or for imposing any tax or impost shall originate in the House of Commons.

Mr. ISAACS:
Those are the words of the Act framed by Lord Thring.

Mr. HIGGINS:
He is the draughtsman for the House of Lords. What objection can there be to the word "Bill?" We know that it is the word used for an instrument before it has passed the two Houses, and I think we should keep to the ordinary vernacular to which we have become accustomed in Australia. I would ask Mr. Barton why the word "Bill" should not be used?

Mr. BARTON:
You would have to make the alteration in every other section where it occurs, and that would mean fifty or sixty amendments.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If we settle the matter once I do not think there can be any difficulty in having the amendments formally made.

Mr. BARTON:
That would mean that you would have to put the question in each case. I would not give up this in favor of the other suggestion because I do not think it is any better.

Mr. HIGGINS:
There is a great deal in the suggestion of the Hon. Attorney-General for Victoria that the words "proposed laws" might mean that a person might say that he was not bound by a law not passed in the manner prescribed. If you look at section 53 what objection is there to inserting "Bills" in the clause:

The States Assembly shall have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect to all proposed laws except laws appropriating the necessary supplies.

And so on. There is no objection whatever; that is to say, if a Bill is sent up to the States Assembly it has to have the same power with regard to it, with the exception of laws appropriating supplies; and what objection is there in subsection 2 of section 53, to inserting: "Bills" imposing taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only? Then the effect of using the word "Bill" will be that it will be a mere question between the two Houses.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Make a special clause to have a general application.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I do not like special clauses. I admit you can do it by a special clause. But why cannot we use the vernacular we have been used to in connection with our Parliament? The term "Bills" has a clear definite meaning.

Mr. WISE:
The provision was adopted at the 1891 Convention, after full discussion.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I do not think we can do better than follow the precedent of Canada, which has worked well for thirty years. There has been no attempt to impeach a law there on the ground that it was not put through the two Houses in the manner prescribed. After having read the debates of 1891 I can only say I can see no ground for departing from the British North American Act.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
This discussion began on a matter of substance, as was apparent from the way in which it was introduced by the Premier of Victoria. The form, I admit, is more difficult of comprehension even to the legal mind, but everybody appeared to me to be agreed on the matter. I do not understand the distinction which the Attorney-General of Victoria makes. It may be my misfortune, but I confess I do not quite understand it. Everybody appears to agree that "proposed law" and "Bill" mean the same thing.

Mr. ISAACCS:
No.

Mr. BARTON:
What is the difference?
Mr. ISAACS:

Because "proposed law" as used in subsequent sections has a different meaning.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

But a proposed law and a Bill must be the same thing whether hon. members agree with it or not. Everybody, in my opinion, was substantially agreed upon that. I like the words as they stand. I am not now going into the question of whether Bills or laws is the better term. I confess I have a certain amount of sympathy with Mr. Higgins. I like old words with a well-known meaning. The modern fashion of using new words to express the same thing does not, from constitutional prejudice perhaps, recommend itself very much to my mind. Yet I think the words here are good enough, and they are the words which, after much discussion too, we resolved to use in 1891. There are three suggestions. One to leave the clause as it is, another to put "Bill" instead of "proposed laws," and the third to strike out "proposed." I think there is no doubt that until a Bill is assented to it is a "proposed law," and I shall vote for leaving the words as they are, although it is not a very important matter.

Mr. REID:

I think it most discouraging to find we have spent three-quarters of an hour over a matter of absolutely no importance. The term "proposed law" is equivalent to "Bill." With reference to clauses 52 and 53, the clauses as they stand are distinctly logical, and do not admit of any difficulty. Clause 52 applies to the origin of a Bill, and clause 53 applies to a Bill that does originate and become a proposed law.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I think there is a great deal in the suggestion as to the necessity for "proposed laws." I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. ISAACS:

I think it would be much better to adhere to the Bill of 1891. There are two objections to the present course. I entirely agree with Mr. Kingston that the Bill of 1891 preserves one great distinction, the difference between "law" and "proposed law." A technical meaning is given to "proposed law" in clause 53, making it apply only to certain classes of Bills-Bills that have passed the House of Representatives.

Leave given to Mr. O'Connor to withdraw his amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I move:

To strike out "Having for their main object the appropriation of," with the view of inserting in lieu thereof "Appropriating."

Mr. GLYNN:
I would like to point out what I consider to be a distinction which has been completely overlooked between "Proposed laws" and "Bills." A "Bill" proposes many sections, but a "proposed law" may be simply one clause in a Bill.

Mr. REID:
So may a Bill.

Mr. GLYNN:
A Bill may have only one clause, but you cannot expand a single clause into twenty. These are not convertible terms. As a matter of fact, if the words "having for their main object" be struck out, then the consequence is that a section in a Bill appropriating revenue cannot be introduced except in the House of Representatives, and thus affect the fate of other sections in the same Bill dealing with general matters. If hon. members look at the matter they will see a vast distinction. It is emphasised by the fact that, in old Acts, you will find each section commences with the words, "Be it Enacted"; each thus standing separate from the others. The lawyers in the Convention will agree on what is a significant fact, that it has been decided that the marginal note of each section of an Act is a preamble explanatory of that particular section.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
I propose my amendment again.

Mr. REID:
I strongly support the amendment, because these words will open the door to needless disputes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Hear, hear.

Mr. REID:
And we all want to avoid those whatever our views are. We want them put in plain English—in black and white. I am cordially in sympathy with those gentlemen who wish to abolish those annoying distinctions which raise difficulties over trivial matters. For instance, in the case of a Bill which merely incidentally raises the question perhaps of a fee, or the salary of an officer, I am entirely with those, who wish to remove such Bills from the category of Money Bills. My objection is to the words used to do that; they do not meet the objection in view, and they raise a number of difficulties which must be obvious without my mentioning them. They simply leave an opening for disputes, perhaps quite as large and more vexatious than the other.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We have now got to a matter of substance by the amendment. I appreciate the pacific spirit in which the Premier of New South Wales referred to it just now. This is not a matter of form, but of substance. It is just as well to deal with questions of substance on which we are not quite agreed at as early a stage as possible. We have here the question as to the extent the powers of the two Houses are to be co-ordinate. I admit you cannot make the unequal equal by any kind of legislation. I will not attempt to argue it, because the conventions of the Constitution, which, after all, are merely the strength of the stronger party asserting itself, will in the end rule, but meanwhile I feel we should begin on a good understanding with one another, and not say one thing when we mean another.

Mr. REID:

Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:

That is the point of view from which I am addressing myself to this question. The feeling of the majority of the Constitutional Committee has shown, sufficiently or insufficiently in this clause, that although, for the purpose of convenience it might be well that the Appropriation Bill should be solely with the House of Representatives, and taxation Bills solely originate with them, yet beyond this question of convenience of the arrangement of business between the two Houses, their powers should be substantially the same. And it was from that point of view that you, Sir, moved the amendment embodied in the Bill before us. It was agreed and stated specifically that Bills, whose sole object or whose substance was the appropriation of revenue, or whose sole object was taxation, must originate in one place and that that one place should be the House of Representatives, without any conceding as of necessity any constitutional superiority to the House of Representatives, but treating it as a matter necessary for managing the ordinary affairs of the Commonwealth. But to go beyond that and say that there should be no Bill introduced into the States House which deals incidentally with any money question -the main object not being the money question, and the money question being only an incident-was an initial admission of inferiority on the part of the States Assembly which a majority of members of the Finance Committee were not prepared to agree to.

Mr. REID:

With the permission of hon. members I would like to put this case to test how far my hon. friend wishes to go. Suppose a Bill contains a scheme of defence for the whole of the Australian colonies. Of course the defence would probably be constructed out of a loan vote, but it would involve an interest charged on the debt. Would my hon. friend consider such a Bill as a Bill whose main object was a system of defence or a Bill whose main object was the appropriation of public money?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I think I should reply in the way I am wanted to reply, that the main object was a scheme of defence.

Mr. REID:
Exactly.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
But I would go further than that, and say it would not be at all an improper function for the Houses which represent all the colonies to be able to initiate-

Mr. ISAACS:
You would give them absolutely co-ordinate powers?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Except in regard to the ordinary appropriations of the year, in regard to that machinery without which a calamity would arise, and the ordinary operations of the Government could not be carried on.

Mr. HIGGINS:
What do you mean by ordinary appropriations?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
The ordinary services of the year. In this, as in many other things, I do not think there would be much difficulty in construing the words. The fewer words we put in, and the more we leave the parties to construe, the better. The great object is to put in as few words as possible and the thing will work out itself. We do not want a thing drawn up over which there can be constant temptations for quarrelling and dispute. As far as this particular clause is concerned I intend to support it as establishing a principle. I think there is perfect consistency between the whole of the clause, which express exactly what a majority of the Constitutional Committee decided.

Question-That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause-put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT: I will call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that Sir John Downer crossed from this side of the House to the other after the question was put, and after the tellers were named by you. Do I understand that you have a Standing Order which allows him to do that? If you have not, resort must be had to the practice of the House of Commons, and according to that he could not do what he has done.

The CHAIRMAN: We have had a uniform practice in both Houses of Parliament ever since we have received representative government, and it is this: Until the tellers have actually completed their work any member can cross from one side of the House to the other. If a member is told on both sides, he is called to the table by the Chairman of Committees and asked which way he intended to vote.

Mr. DOUGLAS: That is the rule in the House of Commons.

Mr. BARTON: I take it we have not reached the word "revenue" yet, and there is a very great point, a matter of much importance, attached to this word in regard to Loan Bills. I take it whatever the opinions of hon. members may be on other points, there will be a general consensus of opinion that if Bills for the appropriation of revenue are to originate in the House of Representatives, then Loan Bills which are Bills for the appropriation not only of revenue, but also of borrowed money, should also originate in the House of Representatives. I think I shall have the concurrence of Sir John Forrest in the proposition that it should not be left to the States Assembly to originate a proposal which involves an expenditure of perhaps five or twenty millions of money. With that view I propose one of two things, either to turn "revenue" into "public moneys" or to add "or moneys," which, I think, would serve the same object, and would show that it applied to both. I propose:

After "revenue" to insert "or moneys."
Amendment agreed to.
Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 53. (1) The States Assembly shall have equal power with the House of Representatives in respect of all proposed laws, except laws appropriating the necessary supplies for the ordinary annual services of the Government, which the States Assembly may affirm or reject, but may not amend. But the States Assembly may not amend any proposed law in such a manner as to increase any proposed charge or burden on the people.

(2) Laws imposing taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only.

(3) Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of Customs on imports, shall deal with one subject of taxation only.

(4) The expenditure for services other than the ordinary annual services of the Government shall not be authorised by the same law as that which appropriates the supplies for the ordinary annual services, but shall be authorised by a separate law or laws.

(5) In the case of a proposed law which the States Assembly may not amend, the States Assembly may at any stage return it to the House of Representatives with a message requesting the omission or amendment of any items or provisions therein And the House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make such omissions or amendments, or any of them, with or without modifications.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
Will you put it in paragraphs, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN:
Certainly. The question is that Part I. stand.

Mr. BARTON:
Would it not be better to start the clause with the words: "After the origination of any proposed law."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

No.

Mr. ISAACS:

It would leave it open to doubt. I think there may be an inconsistency, and a half hour spent now in saving that would be time well spent.

Mr. BARTON:

Have you any suggestion to make? I have been thinking of the words I suggested, but it would be clumsy, as it will be putting an exception at the beginning of the clause when there are several exceptions later on.

Mr. ISAACS:

You can put them in now, and reconsider them later.

Mr. BARTON:

At line 2 it may be advisable to insert the words "Except proposed laws which must originate in the House of Representatives."

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

That will meet the difficulty.

Mr. ISAACS:

Embody the principle, and it will be easy to frame the words.

Mr. BARTON:

Then I move:
To insert after "except" in the second line of the clause, "proposed laws which must originate in the House of Representatives and"

Mr. WALKER:

I have a prior amendment. In place of States Assembly I propose that we should call it Senate. It is much simpler, and we all know what it means.

Mr. REID:

Put it without debate.

Mr. ISAACS:

Wait until we have disposed of the money clauses.

Mr. REID:

He has the right to move the amendment, and he is going to insist on his right.

Mr. ISAACS:

Then I have nothing further to say, although I thought we should carry out Sir John Forrest's motion first.

Mr. WALKER:

I move:
That the words "States Assembly" be struck out, and that the word "Senate" be inserted in lieu thereof.
Mr. BARTON:
I hope that the Convention will do nothing of the sort. The name has been deliberately chosen.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
By your Committee and no one else.

Mr. BARTON:
It has been deliberately chosen by the Committee, and it expresses the origin and intention of that assembly far better than the word "Senate." I do not wish to protract the debate, as I think we should settle it in a few minutes. It is proposed to call it the States Assembly for the reason that it is the House which has to represent the States as distinct entities, and therefore the conjunction of these words will express its origin as being the House representing the States, and also express its function as being the House which, in case of need, has the custody of the States interests. Now we are told that there is an objection to it because a member of the States Assembly would have to be called M.S.A., but as a member of the House of Representatives would have to be styled an M.H.R., I do not think there is much in the objection. Hon. gentlemen who have been for a large proportion of their lives revelling in the luxury of adding M.L.C. and M.L.A. to their names will not object very much.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL:
Why not call them M.P.'s.

Mr. BARTON:
There is no great objection to that that I know of, because it will be a Parliament and not a Legislature, and each House will be a popular House, every member of which will be entitled to call himself an M.P. I would suggest that this clause should be left as it is, because it contemplates the origin and functions of the body proposed to be created.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I would suggest that it would be a great deal more convenient to discuss the names of the two Houses in connection with the first clause. I understood we took the discussion on these clauses for the purpose of fixing the relative rights of the two Chambers, and I would suggest to the hon. member, Mr. Walker, that it would be better to discuss this other matter on clause 1.

Mr. WALKER:
I would be very happy to accept the hon. members suggestion, but we have the advantage to-day of the presence of representatives of Western Australia, and I am glad to say that several of them are going to vote for it.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Is that part of the agreement?
Hon. MEMBERS:
    Question! Question!
Mr. REID:
    I think I might say half a dozen words in an opposite sense to the the utterances of my hon. friend Mr. Barton. In every way I think the word "Senate" is a better title, a title which commends itself to an English community far more than this Frenchified title. As to the constitution and powers of the Houses, they will be, all right if they are in the Bill, quite irrespective of the names of the Houses. The term "Senate" is far more venerable to Englishmen than this expression of States Assembly. I would like to point out that the Senate will be truly a National House, and that, whilst preserving all just State rights, it will be looked upon by the people, not so much as an assembly representing the provincialism of Australia as an assembly representing the whole nation.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    I hope that the name in the Bill will be retained. It is well that the name should tell its own story. It is, in fact, a States Assembly.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    It is, in fact, a Council of the States. That is what it is called in Switzerland.
Mr. DEAKIN:
    That is a better name.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    The word "Senate," according to the Premier of New South Wales, is a term with which the people of England are familiar. Not at all. The people of America are.
Mr. REID:
    It is a term much older than America.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    I think that the people of England know very little about it, only what they have learnt. In starting this new Federation, we may fairly well be expected to use, and indeed are justified in using, a term which will be applicable to what we are doing. We have one House to be called the House of Representatives, and another House representing the States, and which represents the States through the direct vote of every adult in the States, and we might not unreasonably, but very properly, I should think, be expected to use a term which would tell us what the body really is. "States Assembly" does it better than any other word that could be used. "Senate" tells us nothing. & Except that they are old men.
Sir JOHN DOWNER:
That is all, and which we have distinctly provided under the guidance of Mr. Reid that they shall not be.

Mr. REID:
Is the Drafting Committee always going to give us a second barrel?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
When I was on the Constitutional Committee I voted for "States Assembly." I do not call it a matter of life and death anyhow. I think, however, the term "States Assembly" would better bring to the minds of the people what the object of the Assembly is.

Mr. HIGGINS:
This is a question simply of name, and it shows the awkwardness of the procedure we have adopted, that we should have to vote on the question of "States Assembly" before we know what will be the name of the other House.

Mr. REID:
We will have to do so, and it is no use wasting time regretting it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
It will affect my vote if we call the other House the National Assembly or not. I see no objection to the term "States Assembly," which does represent truly the objects of the Chamber. It is an Assembly of States, based, so far as I can see, on the whole population principle. It is an Assembly of the States, and is not one of the people.

I should like to ask that it be an instruction to the Chairman to make the consequential amendments rendered necessary by this amendment.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Right through?

Mr. BARTON:
To put into the Bill the words "Senate" or "senator" where the words "States Assembly" or "member of the States Assembly" at present stand.

The CHAIRMAN:
If it is the wish of the Committee that I should do so, I conceive it is within my powers to make them as consequential amendments.

Mr. BARTON:

Mr. BARTON:
I now propose to put in, after the word "except," the following words-

Mr. HIGGINS:
Before you do that I-

Mr. BARTON:
Have you a prior amendment?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Yes.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Mr. Barton might simply state his amendment first, so that we may know what it is.

Mr. BARTON:

I move:

To insert after the word "except" the words "Proposed laws which must originate in the House of Representatives and"

Mr. HIGGINS:

I wish to move:

To alter the words "House of Representatives into "National Assembly."

I will not go into reasons. Having the words "States Assembly," it follows by parity of reasoning that we might alter the name of the House of Representatives to National Assembly.

Mr. BARTON:

There is no need to do that now after we have done away with the term "States Assembly," and substituted the term "Senate." We might as well keep now altogether to the forms of the old Bill.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Nothing to do with the National Ass.!

Mr. HIGGINS:

I ask leave to withdraw.

Leave given.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I would like to ask Mr. Barton to further consider this, and I would suggest it would be better not to attempt to make any alteration now, but to take time to consider it. It seems to me that if we make this alteration-

Mr. BARTON:

It would necessitate a further alteration, I admit.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

It will be provided that the States Assembly should have equal powers with the House of Representatives, except in regard to such Money Bills as are initiated in the House of Representatives, which Bills the Senate may reject, but not amend. While I hold that view strongly myself, I would not like to secure by a side wind what we ought to attempt to gain straightforwardly.

Mr. SYMON:

I would point out to Mr. Barton that the only object of this portion of the clause is a limitation of the power of amendment. It is not intended that all laws which originate in the House of Representatives under clause 52 are to be excluded from the powers of amendment.

Mr. BARTON:

No.

Mr. SYMON:
But that will be the affect of my hon. friend's amendment.

Mr. Barton:
If I do not move something else afterwards.

Mr. Symon:
Would it not be better to leave the clause as it is? It is very clear, and does not introduce a possible extension one way or another in relation to the powers of amendment which we might find inconvenient.

Mr. Kingston:
I am inclined to think the clause goes somewhat further than limiting the powers of amendment. It declares that the Senate shall have equal power with the House of Representatives except in respect of certain cases, and I would suggest:
To add after the word "except" the words "as mentioned in the preceding section, and except."

Mr. Barton:
That would leave, perhaps, less difficulty. I do not know, however, that it will not be better to adopt Sir George Turner's suggestion. There may be no difficulty about the reconsideration of this clause for the purpose of settling any question of that kind. That being so, I would suggest that we should leave the amendment of the present clause alone at this stage, until after the main features of the Bill have been dealt with. This amendment was proposed with the intention of proposing a subsequent amendment; not for the purpose of limiting the power of amendment given by this section. But for the purpose of preventing the question of law raised by Mr. Isaacs from becoming a serious question. But now that a suggestion has been made by Sir George Turner that it is better not to persist in this point on the present occasion, I think that gives time for further consideration; and, if Mr. Kingston will concur with me, I will ask leave to withdraw,

Sir John Forrest:
Your proposed amendment will prevent the Senate from amending the tariff or a Taxation Bill.

Mr. Barton:
That was not my intention. I have said if this amendment were carried I should then have moved a further amendment.

Leave given.

Mr. Reid:
I wish to raise a very important point here, and again I do not wish the Convention to engage in any lengthy discussion upon it, though it is of very great importance. I move:
After the word "except," in line 2, to insert the words, "Laws imposing taxation and"

I am proposing the amendment here because I am following the lines of the clause in the draft Bill, and I think those words in that measure were very wisely put in the foreground, because the question at issue is simply this: if that amendment is not inserted, there will be such a state of things between the two Houses as will give the Senate power equally with the House of Representatives over Taxation Bills. I am not going to repeat the arguments which I addressed to the Convention before. I think we should all avoid doing that, for most of us have pretty well made up our minds as to how we should treat these matters. I wish to say at once that I am perfectly prepared to give equal power over Money Bills of all kinds without any distinction, if the basis of taxation is the State basis. That is to say, if each State contributes equally as States, as they are represented here, it is nothing but fair and just that each State should have absolutely equal right over money so contributed, but any attempt while the contributions are according to population, to give equal powers over money matters, must result in failure. I do not wish to talk about the failure of Federation, because it would be quite possi

Mr. MCMILLAN:

You propose to restore the law of 1891.

Mr. REID:

I feel that that law is open to serious objection, for it goes too far. I do not wish to raise any point except the exact one at which we have arrived now.

Mr. MCMILLAN:

And make suggestions take the place of amendments.

Mr. REID:

If I had to express an opinion on that I should give a strung one adverse to anything of the kind being done, because I believe that will lead to endless quarrels between the two Houses. We must be perfectly plain in this matter, and I quite admit that the power of suggestion, from my point of view, is very much the same as the power of amendment. There is a radical difference between the system obtaining in the two Houses regarding money matters as we understand government in Great Britain and as we understand it in these colonies, and the question is: are we going to preserve in the main the principle of government as we understand it, by which one House is to be the master of finance, or are we going to endeavor by various means to have two Houses masters in finance? Any system of finance based upon two Houses is fraught with disaster. It will not work; it will lead to endless differences, because, fix this clause as you like, there will be a resolute attempt on the part of the House of Representatives to assert the principles which I have mentioned. On the other hand, with the power of suggestion, the Senate will consider it really is entitled to a voice in the financial adjustment of the Commonwealth, or else why the power? I part with my friends there. I say under a system of responsible government there must be only one financial House. Any other system is fraught with disaster, but at the same time, I am willing that the Senate should have—not as an antiquated power never to be used, but as a real living power—the right of rejection. We know that in the old country it has ceased to be a right by disuse; but I quite agree that in this compact the Senate should have not an abstract right, but an absolute right, and be perfectly entitled to use it, to throw out a Bill when it is stamped with such a serious wrong or injustice as to cause the Senate to feel itself justified in so throwing it out. This is the only interference with the finances that I should allow to the Senate, namely, the right of preventing a gross wrong or injustice, and any attempt to allow it to play a more active part in the finances of the Commonwealth than I have mentioned will in my opinion, be a serious mistake. I do not wish to take up the time. I went into this matter fully in the Convention, and I ask members if they wish to know my views to refer to what I then expressed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

I desire to follow Mr. Reid, because he has unquestionably raised the most important matter we have to talk over in this Convention. It may fairly be considered the crux of the situation. Many of us believe that in theory the smaller States ought not to have equal representation in the Senate, but we came to the conclusion, from the speeches which had been made, that it would be practically impossible to have Federation at all unless we were to view with as much kindness to the smaller States as we possibly could the fact that they were smaller States. Therefore we agreed, some of us against our inclinations, to the proposition that they should be entitled to have equal representation with the more populous States. When we agreed to that we felt we were going a very long way. I believe now that we have made a mistake. As a matter of tactics it would be better if we were not prepared to admit that the smaller States should have equal representation in the Senate, because then there would be an opportunity for compromise. These less populous States say, "We have got that concession, and it is not a matter of compromise now. You have given it to us, and we are going to get as much more as we can." We saw the difficulties which members would have to contend against in the colonies they represent, because, if they had to go back and tell their constituents... that they could not obtain equal representation, they would probably fail in trying to induce the people to join in the Federation. We saw this difficulty, and we have met them in a spirit which, I think, is fair and equitable, so that they may honestly and fairly ask the people of their States to join in the Federation. They have now to treat us in the same way. If the Premier of Victoria or of New South Wales attempted to go back to the people of his colony with this proposition in the Bill he would have his ideas scouted. I have no hesitation in saying that, even if I felt inclined to do so, if I went back and asked the people of Victoria to agree to the proposition submitted; I should have it rejected at once. I say honestly and fairly—and I have no desire to say anything which might be taken to be threatening, but I desire to put this forward for earnest and careful consideration—that I for one feel that I dare not go back to my colony and submit any such proposal to the people there. Seeing that we have endeavored to meet the representatives of the smaller States in the difficulties with which they have had to contend, I earnestly ask them to put us in an equally good position. We are prepared to meet them by going back a long way on our own ideas as to what power the Senate should have with regard to Money Bills, and if they earnestly desire Federation they must be prepared to assist us as we have assisted them. I believe with the Premier of New South Wales that the proper course would be to leave to the Senate the living power of rejection. In the opening debate I stated as my own view that we should not adopt this power of suggestion, but if the other colonies are prepared to accept it I am prepared to go with them and agree to it. As far as I am concerned—and I think I am speaking for the whole of my colleagues—if the other colonies are not prepared to accept what has been fairly regarded as the 1891 compromise, then we are placed in such a position that we have no hesitation in saying that Federation will be impossible.

Mr. PEACOCK:

Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

We are in a difficult position, and I wish to follow the good example which has been set in being as brief as possible; but I earnestly entreat the representatives of other States to look at this matter from our point of view, and they must then come to the conclusion that if we attempt to go back to Victoria with a measure which provides for two co-ordinate Houses, and for the Senate to amend all Money Bills, we take with us something that the people of Victoria will not accept.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We are only asking all the colonies to agree to terms which have been conditions of every legitimate Federation which has ever been formed.

Mr. SOLOMON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. PEACOCK:
No.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
We sympathise with the difficulties of the two honorable and respected gentlemen who have just addressed us. It may be, that Sir George Turner may have a difficulty in persuading the people he represents, that what is suggested is fair and right; but our duty after all, is to our own colony as well as to the colony he represents, and we have to say honestly what we think to be fair and right. Put the cause of Federation first of all as being the great national cause, still we cannot make sacrifices unjust to the people we represent.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
I wish to make no speech on this subject, because I agree with Mr. Reid, that we have expressed ourselves already, and our views are well understood both outside and by each other; but at whatever risk, as far as the consequences are concerned, I will not be a party to go further than we have, as we have already gone a very long way.

Mr. PEACOCK:
How far have you gone?

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Much further than they have gone in the United States and Switzerland. We have limited the power of amendment of the Senate, which is unlimited in America. In our desire to bring about a union of the people of these colonies we have done all we could to allow views which we thought to be right and fair not to stand in the way of agreement, because we thought compromise was necessary. Speaking for myself, further I am not prepared to go. If what the Premier of New South Wales says is true, that the power of suggestion is really the same as the power of amendment, and I am not sure that he is not right

Mr. REID:
I did not say so. I think they are both objectionable.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
Both the power of amendment and the power of suggestion

will practically depend upon the strength of the body which has the authority to exercise it, and that has to be worked out like this question of responsible government, which it is mistakably alleged cannot be applicable to both Chambers. For my own part I can conceive that there need be no difficulty over the question of responsibility to the Senate. We see it in our own community growing more and more, and we will see it in other communities of Australia coming more and more every day. I cannot see any necessary conflict between the two Houses. Whether they agree or disagree will depend largely upon the respect they have for each other, and when each House feels that the other House is equally powerful, then the time will have come for compromise.

Mr. Reid:

The power of rejection is a very good power.

Sir John Downer:

But you do not mean it to be used. The living power of rejection, which the Premier of Victoria spoke, he meant to be a dead power, and not a living power. Without using any further words on the subject, I shall adhere to the clause.

Mr. Wise:

I have not had the advantage of listening to those bitter controversial discussions in the Constitutional Committee, which seem to have left lively recollections in the minds of some of the hon. members who have spoken, and, consequently, I still remain in exactly the same position as I was when we were engaged in discussing the resolutions.

Mr. Reid:

I was not there, but there were no bitter controversies, I assure you.

Mr. Wise:

I agree with every word that has fallen from Sir John Downer on one point, that the danger of conflicts over Money Bills is yearly growing less. Whether or not it were admitted, which I do not admit for a moment, that senators and members of the House of Representatives would be chosen from different sections of society, it is true that more serious controversies are likely to arise over social and other matters than about Money Bills. At the same time, I cannot ignore the utterances of the Prime Minister of Victoria, and, so far as a stranger can follow the trend of thought in another colony, I should say, if I might do so without being considered to be presumptuous in speaking on matters of which I know little, that he is right in his estimate as regards the popular feeling in Victoria. It is a root fact to be taken into account by the Convention that there is such an ingrained popular feeling of prejudice in Victoria against a second Chamber amending a Money Bill, that, call the Senate what you may, constitute it as you please, and make it as different as you like from the Legislative Councils of olden times, still it remains a second Chamber. There is such prejudice against allowing that second Chamber to interfere in any way with Money Bills that any proposal of that sort will be rejected, because it will be reviving ancient divisions between parties, and will give rise to differences and conflict which will imperil the whole scheme. I believe that is the state of feeling in Victoria, whether we regret it, whether we can explain it, or whether we approve of it. I cannot help noticing that that is the state of feeling not only amongst those who represent the extreme view in favor of the power of the House of Representatives, but it is fostered also by those who urge that the Senate should have larger powers; and just as I am unable to understand how there can be anything democratic in limiting the power of the Senate to prevent oppression of the smaller States, the smaller States have the protection provided in clause 21, which says:

The presence of at least one-third of the whole number of members of the Senate as provided by this Constitution shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers.

So there is absolute safety for the smaller States against any act of oppression, and it does seem to me that the alarms expressed on every side are utterly unfounded. I cannot ignore what I believe to be the fact-explain it or regret it as we may—that the non-acceptance of this amendment will imperil Federation in Victoria.

Mr. BARTON:
And in New South Wales too.

Mr. WISE:
I say nothing about New South Wales.

Mr. REID:
It will.

Mr. WISE:
I put it to my friends of the smaller colonies whether it is necessary to run a great risk to gain after all very little. If the power of rejection is retained, and the power of making suggestions is also given, then the desire of the smaller States to be given opportunities of making their views known is granted. I would go further, and move an express clause allowing the Senate to make amendments in Loan Bills, so as to prevent the improper expenditure of loan money for the advantage of a special State.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Would you give the power of increasing the amount?

Mr. WISE:
No: only of striking out any part.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I think if my friend Mr. Wise further considers the clause to which, he has drawn attention, he will come to the conclusion that it supplies very little protection indeed to the smaller States.

Mr. HOWE:
None at all.

Mr. KINGSTON:
He puts it that two-thirds of the members by walking out can prevent the transaction of business. I put it to him that if two thirds would do that they would have the power, and it would be better for them to stay and exercise it in a logical way by voting on the question.

Mr. WISE:
The Victorians object to give them the power to vote on it.

Mr. KINGSTON:
They can vote as regards the rejection of a measure. As regards the more important matter of the suggested amendment to this clause, moved by the Premier of New South Wales (Mr. Reid), I shall be found recording my vote in its favor. I do not hesitate to give expression to my views, which may perhaps be considered personal to myself, believing as I do that in this respect I stand alone and separated from my colleagues of South Australia.

Mr. PEACOCK:
They will come round all right.

Mr. KINGSTON:
Still I hold these opinions very strongly. It is with great diffidence that I have come to that conclusion to so separate myself from my colleagues, but having done so I intend to adhere to it.

Mr. HIGGINS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. KINGSTON:
We will do well to keep as closely as we can to the compromise effected in 1891.

Mr. BARTON:
Hear, hear.

Mr. KINGSTON:
At that Convention all the colonies here represented were represented-

Mr. PEACOCK:
And Queensland too.

Mr. KINGSTON:
And were assisted by the sage counsel and able deliberations of the representatives of Queensland, and above all favored with the wise advice of the then Premier of that colony, Sir Samuel Griffith. I find that, after considerable trouble, a compromise was effected which is found embodied in the clauses on which these clauses are based, and for which I think nearly all the Premiers of the different colonies voted.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Not mine, though.

Mr. KINGSTON:
I should be loth to depart from that compromise—the more particularly that I am inclined to attach some importance to the words of warning which have fallen from the lips of the representatives of the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria—the two largest colonies in the group—which words of warning were not spoken without due deliberation and appreciation of their effect. It seems to me that if we depart from the arrangement then come to we deliberately approach the possibility of delaying the advent of Federation for years to come—for a time indeed which it is impossible to overestimate. Are we willing to do that? What is the matter in dispute? Some of the representatives say it is a pure matter of form. I am inclined to think that, perhaps, too much importance is attributed to it either on one side or the other; but on a question of form are we going to wreck Federation? Surely not. I trust we shall all pause before we do anything to cause that. My friend Sir John Downer put it himself that there might be too much importance attached to it. In this respect it seems to me it is simply a question whether or not the Senate should have power to amend Tax Bills, or have the power only of making suggestions for their amendment. On that matter are we going to separate without our work done, or with our work so badly done that we know we imperil the chances of Federation in the immediate future?

Mr. HIGGINS:
Hear, hear.

Mr. PEACOCK:
That is the point.

Mr. KINGSTON:
This compromise of 1891 comes to us with the weight which ought to be attached to the deliberate conclusions of men who had equally at heart with ourselves the sacred cause of Federation. They did all they could to come to a conclusion. I shall be found wherever I can, giving my vote and voice in favor of giving effect to that compromise, and I trust it will be given effect to, because there is not a representative here who does not know full well that if any other conclusion is come to the result will be that either the two larger colonies will be excluded from the Federation we wish to establish, and if there is to be a Federation at all it will be a Federation simply amongst the smaller colonies. Do we want that? Ought we not, I venture to put it, in a matter of this sort, when the views of almost 3,000,000 of people in New South Wales and Victoria are voiced here by their representatives, to endeavor to meet them so far as we can, and above all to meet them as regards a matter of form which it was thought might well be waived by the representatives who formed the Convention of 1891? I am not very much afraid of all this clashing of State interests on national questions that is talked about so much. I do not believe there is very much in it. I am inclined to think, with some other speakers, that to a great extent it is a matter of form. But I do object to the possibility of a clashing of State interests on national questions being made an excuse for the creation of a Chamber in which, though it is said it will in no way resemble an Upper House in the ordinary sense of the term, will at least resemble it in this respect: that there we will find the possibility-and, from our experience of the last few weeks, I should say the probability-of a small and comparatively unimportant section of the community, numbering say, 600,000 people, banding themselves together to prevent perpetually expression being given to the wishes of a much greater number - say two and a half or three millions of people. I think there are many others who, on further consideration, will be disposed to agree with me in this respect. If it is a matter of form, let us give way upon it. If it is a matter of substance, let us try to arrange for a compromise. What is the compromise? At least we find before us a compromise arrived at by gentlemen in whom we have the greatest confidence, and therefore I say: do not let us, for the gratification of our own personal and provincial will, separate without having done our best to accomplish that which we have been sent here to accomplish-the great cause of Australian Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

We have heard a good deal during this discussion about the compromise of 1891, and hon. members have been asked, not once but several times, to remember that, and to act accordingly. As far as I can remember, what is regarded as the compromise of 1891 was a defeat, and not a compromise. I and many others who were at that Convention fought this question as strenuously, if not more so, than we are doing at the present time, both in committee and in Committee of the Whole. The division that was taken on the point resulted as follows: - Twenty-two for the clause as it appears in the 1891 Bill, and sixteen against it, or a majority of six. It will be quite open to anyone in discussing this Bill to take any decision that may be arrived at this time as a compromise, in the same way as the decisions arrived at in 1891 were compromises. I am surprised to hear the hon. member Mr. Kingston refer so often to the compromise of 1891, because he must know that there was no compromise about it-on the part of a great many members at any rate. We advocated then, as we do now, that the Senate should have equal powers in all matters. We have conceded on the present occasion many things which we were not prepared to concede in 1891. Amongst other things we have conceded is that the Appropriation Bill should not be amended by the Senate, the reason being that we desired that the government of the country should be carried on without continual contests between the Houses. We have also in many ways during the present occasion made concessions to those who desire-I may fairly say so-that there should be one House of Parliament and not two. They do not go so far as to say so straight out, but by their actions and their votes they indicate their adherence to that principle. They advocate the formation of a House which shall be subservient to the House of Representatives, which they delight in calling the People's House.

Mr. DEAKIN:
Perfect nonsense.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Perhaps when the hon. member rises to speak he will not like to be interrupted in the same way that he is doing to me, and he had better withhold his observations till that time arrives. We have also conceded that the whole colony shall be constituted one electorate for choosing the Senate, and that the franchise shall be on the most liberal basis, while we are quite willing that the initiation of all Money Bills Shall be vested in the House of Representatives. We have also conceded that the Appropriation Bill shall not be amended, and can only be rejected All we claim is that all other Bills-Tariff, Excise, and Taxation Bills-shall be subject to amendment by the Senate, and it seems to me that that is a reasonable demand. These colonies with the smaller populations will have very little representation in the Lower House, and if they are not to have representation in the Upper House we may as well hand ourselves over, body and soul, to those colonies with the larger populations.

Mr. HOWE:
That is what they want-slavery.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
All I can say in reply to Mr. Reid and Sir George Turner is that if those they mentioned are the only terms upon which they want Federation, they must federate for themselves, and leave the other colonies to stand out of the compact. They tell us it will be impossible for them to go back to their people in the smaller colonies and tell them the terms upon which Federation is wanted by the larger colonies. We shall have to go and tell them we are to have very few representatives in the Lower House, and that the Upper House will be a body really with no power over taxation and money expenditure, and when we tell them that they will have none of it, just in the same way as the representatives of Victoria and New South Wales say they will have none of it if this reasonable provision is inserted in the Bill. Besides the powers I have referred to as being confined to the Lower House, we must not forget that no Bill containing a money clause can be introduced except by a message from the Governor, and, therefore, the whole power of initiation of every Bill which is of the most trifling money character must originate in the House of Representatives.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
I desire to draw attention to the state of affairs in the House. We have neither the Leader of the Convention nor the leader of the New South Wales Government in the House.

The CHAIRMAN:
That has nothing to do with the question. Every delegate to this Convention has an equal power with every other delegate.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Like Sir George Turner and Mr. Reid, I will say as few words as possible. I wish to state as plainly as I can that it is useless for me to go back to the people of Western Australia and ask them to join this Federation unless I can show that after Federation is established they will have some voice in the management of those matters over which they now have supreme control. On the terms proposed it is altogether impossible, and I am sure I can speak for everyone of the people, to accept a Federation which would really be no Federation at all, and it is impossible for Western Australia to take up any position in regard to this matter other than that which was taken up in 1891, which we have taken up on the present occasion in Select Committee, and which I again urge upon this Committee at the present time.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I feel this matter is so critical that I should not allow the opportunity to pass without some utterance before voting. It is no doubt the cardinal point upon which this Federation scheme will turn, but I shall be very guarded not to say anything which would at all embitter debate, or prevent us coming eventually to that compromise which will meet the purposes of the various colonies. Sir John Forrest has just said that he would not dare to go back to his people with a scheme which did not give the Senate power to amend Money Bills, but it hardly fits in his mouth, as he is not elected by the people.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
I have not come here to represent the Age newspaper.

Mr. HIGGINS:
The hon. member knows very well that I speak as independently as any man can speak, and the remark of Sir John Forrest is simply one of those utterances which embitter debate, and which prevent us effecting a compromise.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
You should not have commenced.

Mr. HIGGINS:
I think everyone who knows me will admit that I speak and act independently.

Sir JOHN FORREST:
Cannot I do the same?

Mr. HIGGINS:
I have not said one word about his independence, and I call witness to it. I am anxious to say nothing to embitter debate, but if there was one utterance calculated to do so more than another it was that of Sir John Forrest. The position is a very dangerous one. We, who represent the more populous colonies, as they at present stand, are twenty in number, and those who represent the less populous States as they at present stand are thirty in number, and if the latter are willing to put forth their full strength they can do what they like. If they can only bind themselves together and vote as one the whole thing is done; but it is quite a different thing to say that they will get Federation by that means. Unless the extreme power which the representatives of the less populous States have is exercised with foresight, wisdom, and moderation Federation is impossible. The position is that you have 650,000 people, more or less, in the three less populous States, represented here by thirty members, and 2,500,000 people in Victoria and New South Wales represented by twenty members.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Not quite so many as that.

Mr. HIGGINS:
If the Premier of Tasmania wants a reduction of 50,000 I am quite willing to give it him; but it is hardly worth while taking notice of such a trivial interjection. Substantially the position is as I have stated, and if these thirty members vote together as one unbroken phalanx they can do as they like with a federal scheme which is to bind the 2,500,000 people. Unless the tremendous power which they possess is wisely exercised, or if it is used with an iron rule, they will prevent the States from coming to a compromise. In dealing with this matter I must assume that there is equal representation in the Senate. I have expressed myself before, and I think it was only due to singular weakness on the part of some of the speakers who occupy responsible positions that equal representation was conceded, because once granted, certain corollaries follow which it is hard to reconcile. But then, sir, I must also assume that the senators shall have six years tenure without power to have the House dissolved. Now, I ask anyone who is experienced in parliamentary practice here to say in which House the ultimate power will lodge if there is power in the Senate to deal with Taxation Bills or Money Bills by way of amendment? The extraordinary thing is that the utterance which you made, sir, at the opening of the debate so clearly and thoroughly, has been ignored by those who have taken the extreme States rights position. You put it clearly that you cannot have responsible government with responsibility to two Houses, but apparently those who are acting in the extreme view on States rights have forgotten that, or else, like Sir John Downer, they say, though not in express terms, that your argument is based on a wrong idea. I ask anyone if that statement of yours, Sir, can be impugned. No man can serve two masters. You cannot have responsible government that is responsible to two Houses, and-to go one step further-you cannot have responsible government unless to that House which has the power of the purse.

Mr. DOBSON:

Sir Samuel Griffith does not quite say that.

Mr. HIGGINS:

If you read his speech you will find it is expressed with the utmost caution, but there is no doubt that, whatever Sir Samuel Griffith says, he will find it very hard to get behind the conclusion which the Chairman of this Committee came to in the opening debate. I think the honorable member has been a Premier of Tasmania, and he knows how to work Bills through Parliament, and he will be able to do so hereafter. It is to be assumed he will do so in future, and appealing to him in the light of what is to come, I ask him if he has to work his Taxation Bill through two Houses, whether he will find it very easy to do it? In the United States there is power to amend Taxation Bills, but the position there is this: Ministers are elected and chosen not by the Parliament, but by the people. In the United States they have no responsible government in our sense, and, as has been pointed out by writer after writer, that system of giving equal control over Money Bills could never have lasted except under a Constitution where Ministers are elected by the people.

Dr. COCKBURN:
    How are they elected by the people?

Mr. HIGGINS:
    I am quite sure Dr. Cockburn has not asked that for information. We all know they are not chosen by Parliament.

Dr. COCKBURN:
    They are subject to the approval of the Senate.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    I do not think that has anything to do with it, with all respect to the hon. member. The President and the Ministers are dependent upon election by the people.

A MEMBER:
    No.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    The difference is that under responsible government the Ministers are practically chosen by the Parliament. They must have the confidence of the Parliament. The hon. member, Mr. Wise, has charged the members for Victoria, here with favoring some antiquated idea in regard to the power over Money Bills being in the Upper House. He says the danger of conflicts as to Money Bills is getting less and less. It is quite true it is less, but why? Because we have learned to recognise gradually, but clearly, that the power as to Money Bills must rest with one House.

Sir JOHN DOWNER:
    Just the opposite.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    It is simply this, because the practice as to the rights of the two Houses has become so settled, so stereotyped, that there have been less conflicts about Money Bills than formerly. But although my friend, Mr. Wise, says the main questions which divide the people to-day are social questions-although that is quite true-still you cannot dissever the Money Bills from the policy upon which the money is spent. You cannot dissever Taxation Bills from Appropriation Bills.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
    Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:
    The whole power of appropriation is based upon taxation, and you cannot draw the line between them in that arbitrary way.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:

Hear, hear.

Mr. HIGGINS:

You may take it in any way you like. Suppose there is a certain scale of payment to the federal servants. Suppose the Appropriation Bill says you must pay a servant of the Federation so much, and the Treasurer finds that he must get so much money to meet those payments, he brings in a Taxation Bill for this purpose, the Senate says "We cannot amend an Appropriation Bill, but we can amend a Taxation Bill," and they knock off this and that item, and thereby stop the appropriation in an equally efficient manner. I feel this is not the time for a long debate. Holding strongly, as I do, my views on the subject, I am very anxious that there shall not be the semblance of stone-walling to prevent Sir John Forrest obtaining a vote upon the clauses. I am determined he shall have his vote as far as I am concerned, and let the public see that it is by means of that vote that Federation will be wrecked, if it is wrecked. I cannot go to the full extent of my feelings in this matter, but I would appeal to hon. members, before it is too late, to say that they will follow out that compromise, at the very least, which was suggested in the Convention of 1891.

Mr. DOUGLAS:

I presume that anybody in this Convention has a right to address the members whether he comes from a small colony or whether he comes from a big colony. I should like to know if we had been summoned here upon the principles advocated by the Premier of New South Wales and the Premier of Victoria whether the smaller colonies would be here at all, because the representation would have been of this character Western Australia, one representative Tasmania, one representative; South Australia would have had four or five representatives; and the big colonies would have had about fifteen or sixteen. Now we have come here as advocates of our own colonies, the large colonies want to deny that we should meet upon an equality. We are representing the colonies here on an equality, and we are not to have our wings cut, in order to have justice done to us as administered by Victoria and the [P.494] starts here

"ample powers" ready to be given by New South Wales, which, in fact, amount to nothing so far as the small colonies are concerned. The only difference between the smaller colonies and others is this: the smaller colonies speak out the truth, the others would avoid the facts if possible and hide and disguise them by going in a different direction.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT; What are you here for?
Mr. DOUGLAS:
You want the voting power, and you cannot get it. If the colonies of Victoria and New South Wales were to federate how would they carry out their objects? In no way except by the assistance of the smaller colonies. The smaller colonies hold the balance to enable them to agree, but they have not agreed yet, and are not likely to. We hear what they are going to do. Truth and justice are claimed by the large colonies, and the small ones are all rogues and vaga-bonds. That is the description which those hon. members will give us when they get back to their country. One would have supposed from hearing the speech of one of the representatives of Victoria that he knew the feeling of all the people in Victoria, because he happened, and those who are with him, to have been elected upon one ticket, and that therefore they are the pure merinos of Victoria. It is nothing of the sort; they do not represent the pure merinos of Victoria at all. But what right have we here at all? None whatever. We ought not to be here because we represent a small colony, yet as regards the individuals connected with that colony we represent just the same as they do.

Mr. LYNE:
Surely there are pure merinos in Tasmania, too! (Laughter.)

Mr. DOUGLAS:
We do not want any renegades here. We from Tasmania are one true blue-none of those extraneous individuals who come from one colony and inhabit another. That is the position of the hon. member here who would carry matters far beyond where those persons who really belong to New South Wales and Victoria are attempting to carry them. He would not allow us to be represented here to the extent that we wish.

Mr. LYNE:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
What do you ask us to come here for, then? What does this hon. member say-that we ought not to be here on equal terms? We find that the two big colonies are joining together to crush us out of it-that there is a sort of conspiracy to try to carry out certain objects. But we came here to construct a Federation in which we should have equal powers with regard to certain matters with those of the other colonies. If we do not get that we will not join.

Mr. LYNE:
Hear, hear.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
What are we to gain by it? Tasmania is independent. Victoria has tried to crush us, and could not do it.
Mr. REID:
A hostile fleet could not find you out. (Laughter.)

Mr. DOUGLAS:
The colony is in a better state than Victoria.

Mr. REID:
Thanks to us.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
She can pay her debts better than Victoria can, and can meet all the demands made upon her. But what is the position of that other colony? Are we not here on equal terms? Are we to be told that we are a small colony and the other is a big colony? We will not be treated on those terms. We say we have just as much right to represent the people of our colony as you have. What are the statistics of your colony? Victoria at the present moment is diminishing in population. Looking at the statistics as placed before us, we find that in 1941 New South Wales would have a population of over eight million, Victoria four million, and Queensland is to go far ahead of Victoria, which will take a minor place altogether.

Mr. BARTON:
Tasmania will have 420,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS:
Tasmania will have a free community. We are of the right sort. We are not mere saplings. We are the gumtrees of the community. If the smaller colonies do not receive fair consideration as regards Money Bills they will naturally do what Victoria threatens to do, though Victoria requires Federation. Victoria cannot live without Federation, and it is absurd for them to say they will go on without Federation. Victoria is a protectionist colony, entirely different from New South Wales. How you are going to make a fair compromise between the tariffs of the two will be for the Premiers of the two colonies to say. I say that Tasmania does not want this Federation unless we have just and equitable provisions regarding the laws and jurisdiction of the country.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I can well understand the hon. gentleman, occupying the position he does in Tasmania of President of the Legislative Council, who thinks it his duty to come out of his chair to defeat Bills, both of financial and other characters sent up by the Lower House, coming here and telling us how inferior we are to this great island of Tasmania. We must all recognise the fact that the primary objects of Federation must be for defence purposes, and, having regard to that fact, it is of little consequence to Tasmania, because a fleet would pass it by without knowing it was there. I was in the Convention of 1891, and I am perfectly satisfied that that Convention framed a Bill which we would have great difficulty in getting the people of New South Wales and Victoria to accept. Having regard to the conditions that were then made by the representatives of these two colonies, I have no hesitation in saying that the people there are not likely to come in on the proposed terms; and it is utterly useless for these smaller States to say they will have the right to dominate the finances of the people of Australia and the States interests. If we give them those powers we practically ignore the people, who are the taxpayers of the colonies, for the acres of those broad but small States. Because, after all, when we come to facts, we must recognise that it is the people that are taxed, and not the acres of the countries represented in the States. I unhesitatingly state that the concessions made in 1891 were of a most liberal character. I cannot understand why the smaller States are not prepared to accept what was then conceded. With regard to Bills which they had no power to amend, they had power to make suggestions. An amendment in a Bill is practically only a suggestion to the other body to consider that amendment. The other body may reject that suggestion, and ultimately the power will be with the House that made that amendment to say whether they will accept the Bill or not. The Convention of 1891 conceded to the Senate the power to make suggestions, but not the power to make amendments. I believe that the two things are identically the same, but we have to persuade our people in the larger States that they are not identically the same. That is where the trouble and difficulty will be. With the power of the Senate to do as I have indicated, and with the provision which is in this Bill and was also in the Bill of 1891, that no two systems of taxation should be imposed by the same Bill, where is the danger to the smaller States?

Mr. WISE:
And no tacking.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Yes, and with no tacking. What have these smaller States to be alarmed about? If they are earnest for Federation, if Federation is to be of any advantage to them, surely they can trust the honesty of those members in the Senate who will have the power to reject these Bills altogether, irrespective of proposed amendments. But what is conceded to them? All that we say is that you shall not have the power of passing an amendment in the Bill, but you have power to make suggestions to the House of Representatives. Where is the humiliation in that?

Mr. WALKER:
Hear, hear.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Are we children, to talk about humiliation?

Mr. WALKER:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
Are we not business men trying to protect the interests of our respective countries with the greatest advantage not only to them but to the whole of Australia? Are we children to be told, as I heard it said to-day, that it is humiliating to the States that they should suggest amendments to the House of Representatives, who do not represent acres but people as against States? It appears to me that it is the smaller States who are acting the part of children in saying, "We want everything, and if you do not give us everything we will not take anything."

Mr. PEACOCK:
"We won't play with you any more."

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
New South Wales has far more to give away to the Australian colonies than any other to come into Federation.

Mr. LYNE:
Hear, hear.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT:
I am as earnest as any of those who wish to bring about Federation. I want to see a United Australia, but not a United Australia dominated by acres and not by people. I want to see Australia dominated and ruled by the people. If we are to have the States represented, why not at once say these States shall be represented in proportion to their area, and not in proportion to their people? I do hope that the common sense of members of the smaller States will enable them—if they are in earnest about Federation—to accept this principle of suggestion. Practically it is absolutely the same as the principle of amendment. There is this difference, that the people have been so educated with regard to the turmoils and the disputes with the Legislative Councils —and I am not going to condemn the Legislative Councils, for, I believe, they have done a vast amount of good in the colonies, in that they have prevented hasty legislation—and the States will have the same power under this Bill—but the people have got an idea that the Senate will be a type of our Legislative Councils. The Senate will be nothing of the kind. I look upon it that the Senate will be filled with the best men in Australia, and we can trust the States to act from a common sense point of view, and not from interested motives; and they will be interested, not with regard to their small population, but in promoting the welfare of the whole of Australia. That is the view we must take, if we desire to have Federation at all.

Mr. HOLDER:
I think it will be apparent from the debate that has taken place that we are approaching a crisis in this matter. We are assured by the Premiers of New South Wales and Victoria that unless the amendment now moved be carried there is great danger that those two great colonies will stand out of any Federation sought to be established. We are assured, on the other hand, by Mr. Douglas, from Tasmania, that unless the amendment is rejected Tasmania will stand out. Without making any threats—and I do not take these other statements which have been made as threats—I want to say that my own personal conviction is that unless the clause be passed as it stands there is every chance of South Australia standing out.

Mr. HIGGINS:
What about your Premier?

Mr. HOLDER:
The Premier represents his view, and just as he is perfectly free to represent his view so am I free to represent mine. And I do not hesitate to say again, though I am expressing mine only—

Mr. HOWE:
It is not your own only.

Mr. HOLDER:
Well, probably others hold the same views, but I express my view when I say that I believe if this clause is materially altered there is great danger that South Australia will refuse to be a party to any Federation sought to be established on that basis. There is too much being made of the objection of the electors on the part of the larger colonies to what is proposed by the electors of the smaller colonies. I know the electors of this province pretty well, I know the electors of some others somewhat, and I think that the electors throughout are far too wise to object to a Second Chamber as such. They object to a Second Chamber such as they have known in the past for certain specific reasons, chiefly because the Second Chambers they have known represent not the people, but a section of the people. If it were proposed here to-day in this Constitution to confer the powers we are seeking to confer on the Senate upon a body which represented not the people, but a mere section of the people, no one would be found more strongly opposing the proposition than I would.

Mr. HIGGINS:
But the Senate will represent a class of the people.

Mr. HOLDER:
The members, too, who will vote on the same side as myself would be found fighting against it with all their strength. But, when we see a Senate proposed to be constituted on the basis of manhood, if not of adult suffrage, we see a body to whom we are not afraid to give these powers. I would ask Sir Joseph Abbott why he fears to trust this body with these larger powers? We surely can trust them. I want to remind hon. members of a decision we arrived at this morning. This is the time for compromise. It has been suggested that the smaller colonies are not willing to make compromises, but did not this morning's vote, taken ultimately without division, decide in favor of largely extending the exclusive powers of the House of Representatives? As the Bill stood when it came to us from the Drafting Committee the special powers of the House of Representatives had no application to Loan Bills. This Convention by a vote, and without a division, this morning extended the rights of the House of Representatives in relation to Loan Bills. That was a large concession, and I ask now in return for that which was freely made this morning that those representing the larger colonies should make some concession to meet our views.

Mr. HIGGINS:

It was no concession; it was a matter of giving what was involved and meant.

Mr. HOLDER:

I do not think so at all. Are we asking anything unreasonable? If it can be shown to be unreasonable I am quite willing to give way. What are we asking? That in one House—the House of Representatives—we should have representation on the basis of population irrespective altogether of State boundaries and divisions. Surely that is protection enough, guarantee enough, to the largest colony of the group, which can feel free to come in where such a principle is acknowledged. There has been no proposal from the smaller States for anything different to this. We freely grant to this House the supreme power; we say that the Cabinet should be solely responsible to this House, and, as I said before, we are content that there should be representation on the basis of population irrespective of State boundaries and divisions. What is the predominance of the larger States over the smaller? Under the Bill before us New South Wales will be entitled to twenty-six members, Victoria to twenty-three, South Australia to seven, and Tasmania and Western Australia to five each.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:

How many people?

Mr. HOLDER:

I will come to that in a moment. The three last-named colonies will have seventeen representatives, as against Victoria's twenty-three and New South Wales's twenty-six, or seventeen against forty-nine. We who represent the smaller colonies do not complain of that.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Do you not? (Laughter.)

Mr. HOLDER:
I do not know where the laugh comes in, and if I were sitting down instead of being on my feet, what would make me laugh would be this, that while we give way on this important matter the other colonies object to the small concession we are asking of them as to the power of the Senate. I ask them to be generous to us in this matter, and to recognise the justice of our claim by making us some small concession in return for our large generosity to them. Sir George Turner has interjected that the number of population must be taken into account. We were told by the hon. the Premier of New South Wales this morning that if the States would contribute equally towards taxation, they might have a right to what they are asking. There is equality of sacrifice right through this proposed Federation, and the people in the larger colonies will give no more per head in taxation than the people in the smaller States. I want to ask the larger colonies to put themselves in this position. We are discussing matters to-day from the point of view of the larger and smaller colonies as we to-day represent them. I want to put myself, however, outside of that point of view, for I want to consider what is quite a possibility in the future. I want to consider the possible change that may be wrought in the future, when what are now the smaller colonies may develop into the larger ones and if I could divest myself of the remembrance of the fact that I was representing South Australia, I should want to look at this as a matter of fairness, that if the House of Representatives has in it representation according to population the other House should have in it representation according to the number of States. In the one case we look at the personal entity, the person is the basis of the existence of the House. In the other case we look at the State entity, and the State is the basis of representation. If it be said that this matter between suggestion and amendment is so small a matter, I ask why those who attach so much importance to it are willing to wreck Federation for the sake of a matter so small? I say, however, that it is not small. It is very important. The other side say it is a matter of form. Sir Joseph Abbott, a man of long experience, has told us that there is practically no difference between the two, and why, I ask, do they stand out? Why not give to the smaller colonies that which they believe to be the safeguard of their rights, and without which they cannot see their way clear to come into the Federation? I do not wish to take up the time, but I do wish to ask the representatives of the larger colonies to be somewhat generous to us, and to make a concession to us that will be somewhat parallel to that which we have given to them this morning in reference to Loan Bills. If they will only give some evidence of their willingness to create a Senate strong enough to protect our rights, they will not find us unwilling to meet them, but the proposal before us amounts to this:— "We may have a Senate where the representation varies according to the population, and if we take such a Senate it may be strong, or we may have equal representation in a weak Senate"; but if we take a Senate where the representation is not equal, or which is weak, we might as well tie our guardian's hands behind its back. This is one of those clauses which proposes to tie the hands of the Senate behind its back, and I say we might as well give up the Senate as accept it on these terms. For these reasons we cannot give way. We can easily see that the people behind us, those whom we represent here, will never come into the Federation unless the matter be conceded for which we ask. I wish the representatives of the larger colonies would point out to those whose views they represent that the Senate is in no way parallel to an Upper House as we have it amongst us, and have sometimes suffered under, but that it is to be a body standing on equal representation with the House of Representatives and with an equal franchise, and therefore to be trusted with equal, or nearly equal, powers in connection with the financial administration of the Federation.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

I quite recognise the spirit in which Mr. Holder has addressed his remarks to the Committee, and I wish in the few words I have to say to answer him in the same spirit. It appears to me the principal defect in his argument is that he forgets that we are here not to decide this question by our votes, but that we are here to decide whether we can come to an agreement as to the wishes of the people of Australia who desire to enter this Federation. We do not represent territories here. We represent people, and the larger States, who take the view which I am about to support, are a people to the extent of two and a quarter millions.

An HON. MEMBER:

Two and a half.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

Perhaps more than two and a quarter now, but I am taking the population from the latest statistics. Those who take the opposite view are a people representing about three-quarters of a million.

Mr. ISAACS:
Mr. O'CONNOR:

Perhaps less. The decision which we may arrive at here is nothing, looking at it in one sense. Of what matter is it that the representatives of the three-quarters of a million can carry a vote in this Convention, if two and a quarter millions of people who have to enter this Federation will not have it? Then it seems to me that we are leaving out of consideration one very important element. Mr. Holder challenges those who take the view I am expressing, to say why we fear to trust the Senate on this financial question. I will tell him why in as few words as possible. It is only with regard to financial matters that the least restriction is put on the Senate-in all other matters they have an equality of power. The reason that we provided this limitation was that, inasmuch as the bulk of the money will come out of the pockets of the two million and a quarter, they do not want the policy with regard to its expenditure frustrated by the three-quarters of a million.

Sir JOHN FORREST:

It is the same per head.

Mr. O'CONNOR:

That interjection is no doubt the echo of something which fell from Mr. Holder concerning the equality of sacrifice which has nothing to do with the question. The question is simply that if you have people existing in these two proportions, how is their money to be expended? Their money can only be expended by the Government which is responsible to one House-the House which directly represents the taxpayers—and our reason for objecting to equal power being given to the other House is that if you were to establish a Constitution which gave power to the Senate which represents a minority of the population to amend or modify the financial policy you would have in the Constitution seeds of self-destruction. No body of people outnumbering the population of the smaller States as they do would put up with their dictation on such a matter as the expenditure of their money. Under the system of responsible Government which has been adopted in all these colonies the majority must rule, and the majority would not rule if this provision which is now sought to be carried is implanted in the Bill. I said in my observation in the general debate in the Convention that I was quite willing to give the utmost possible equality of representation and of power to the representatives of the smaller States, consistently with the carrying on of responsible government. I say now, that I am willing to adopt the same course, and it is only because I feel that it is utterly impossible to carry on responsible government with responsibility to two Houses, that I support this amendment. Let me state more in detail the position. It will be admitted, and it has been by you, Mr. Chairman, in the speech referred to by Mr. Higgins, that in responsible government there must be responsibility to one House and one House only, and that is the House in which the executive government sits, and if you give the power of amendment to the Senate, in what position do you place the executive sitting in that Chamber? As long as the executive government has a majority in both Chambers the question does not arise.

Mr. ISAACS:
Would they be sitting in the other Chamber if that power was given?

Mr. O'CONNOR:
They would have to sit in both Chambers, no doubt, and I assume there will be a substantial representation of the Executive Government in the Senate. I do not think any Government would think it possible to carry on its business without having a fair representation in the Senate; but the Government which is responsible for carrying out the expenditure of the country sits in the Assembly and is responsible to that Chamber. You come to a position of affairs—and it is only in this that any difficulty arises—in which the Government which has a majority in the Assembly is in the minority in the other House with regard to its financial affairs. What is the position then? If you place the power in the Senate of throwing out a measure or of amending it, and therefore moulding it, you cannot say the moulding of the measure is in the hands of one House. It is in the hands of that House which can show itself strongest, and in what way—

A MEMBER:
The best staying power.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
First of all by having the best waiting power, and then, as the hon. member remarked, by having the best staying power. When you put that in the hands of a House not subject to dissolution, which has a fixed existence, I say you are putting in the hands of the Second Chamber the power of dislocating the government of the country, and of absolutely stopping the machinery of responsible government. It is for that reason you cannot give coequal powers to these two Houses. Let me take an illustration of finance which will be familiar to every hon. member. I take it that you wish to establish your first tariff—and the majority in the House of Representatives supports a tariff with certain high duties—and that is the one on which the expenditure is planned out. That goes to the other Chamber. There is a majority there opposed to it. They cut it here and they cut it there; they make it to suit their own views; they reduce the revenue by 25 or 50 per cent. and completely alter the incidence of taxation.

Mr. HOLDER:
They cannot be in sympathy with the other House. They do not represent the people.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
It does represent the people in one sense, but not in an equal sense. It is a Chamber in which the smaller States have ten times the representation of the larger States, and you hand over to that House the power of defeating the expression of the will of the majority in the other Chamber. That you constitute a condition, and on that account you render absolutely impossible the ordinary work of government and the carrying out of any financial policy. I am asked why is it you cannot trust this power to the Senate? Because the Senate cannot exercise it without the help of the other House. The Senate under those circumstances is put in this position: it may amend, and amend, and amend, without taking the responsibility of rejection, and under these circumstances it throws the responsibility for the rejection of a whole policy upon the House which by a large majority has formed that policy. That is to say, unless you can be brought to such a state of things that the Assembly will say- "This is our will. But we find we are placed in this position: either we come to a deadlock, in which government cannot be carried on at all, or we take upon ourselves the responsibility of submitting to the dictation of the Chamber in which the people are not equally represented." In these circumstances we shall be brought to a condition of things which will never satisfactorily work with the populations of Australia. This is why I say that the House which has such a power, which has the power to dictate, will have the moulding of the financial policy in whatever form it is introduced. I think this matter ought to be argued out as far as it can be. Every man, whether from a small or large State, is equally anxious that we should not separate without at least carrying this movement as far forward as it was by the men of 1891.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON:
Farther than that.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
I hope so, but if we separate without this amendment being carried I have no hesitation in saying that so far from this movement going forward this Convention will result in a retrograde step.

Mr. PEACOCK:
Twenty-five years put back.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
We have familiarised the people of the different colonies with the proposal of 1891, and although there have been many objections made to it by representatives, on the whole it was a reasonable compromise, and a compromise which the people of the larger colonies were willing to accept.

Mr. LYNE:
I do not think so.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
My hon. friend does not agree with me. There may be differences of opinion, and his opinion may be that of the minority of the New South Wales representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER:
They could be induced to give way.

Mr. O'CONNOR:
They may, as the principle has been adopted by the majority, be induced to give way. If any message is taken from this Convention that we are to ask the large colonies to make a still further concession, what chance is there of carrying Federation in the larger colonies? Now, let me ask the attention of the Committee for a moment to what the real meaning of this clause was according to the compromise of 1891 to which I have referred. I cannot cite a better authority than Sir Samuel Griffith, and what he says upon this very clause, and why we proposed it, is put perfectly plainly. He says:

As to all laws, except two classes, the rights of the two Houses are completely coordinate. As to the ordinary annual Appropriation Bill, the Senators have to express their wishes in a manner different from that in which they express them in regard to other Bills. The same with regard to Taxation Bills. And with these exceptions the powers of the two Houses are co-ordinate. I think it is a very reasonable compromise, and that all those in this Convention who really desire to see a Federation of Australia brought about might fairly accept it, or something like it. Because, remembering the old maxim -I do not know who first used the words-that those who want the end must want the means," it is of no use for hon. members to profess to want Federation while they refuse to accept the means necessary to obtain it. I am quite certain that unless a compromise something like that proposed be accepted, Federation cannot be brought about.

Then Mr. Munro made the observation:
It will be utterly impossible!
and Dr. Cockburn added:
That is to say, that those who want unification will not abandon their aim.
Sir Samuel Griffith went on to say:

I do not want unification. I strongly object to it. I am perfectly satisfied that under this constitution there will be no unification, because State rights will be perfectly preserved. That is my opinion, at any rate. I do not propose to make any further observations. I will merely repeat that if members of this Convention really desire a Federation they will not vote against the only possible means of obtaining it.
