But goods imported into any state before uniform duties of customs have been imposed, and thence exported into another state within two years after the imposition of such duties, shall on arrival in the latter state be liable to the duty (if any) chargeable on the importation of such goods into the Commonwealth, less the duty (if any) which was paid in respect of the goods on their importation into the former state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I notice that Mr. Holder is absent. Now, that honorable gentleman made a very valuable suggestion this morning with regard to the wording of this clause. "Goods imported into any state" will mean goods imported after the Commonwealth is formed. Because before the Commonwealth is formed we have no state, and our desire and intention—that is, as far as Mr. Holder and myself are concerned—is that whether goods are imported before or after the formation of the Commonwealth, they should come within the operation of this clause. Therefore, it will be necessary, to carry out Mr. Holder's desire and mine, to add certain words, making the clause read—

Goods imported into any state either before or after the establishment of the Commonwealth.

I do not know whether there can be any objection to an amendment of that kind. I believe, however, that the amendment would carry out the desire of the Finance Committee. I should be very glad if the leader of the Convention could see his way to make such an amendment as I have suggested. With regard to the proviso itself, it provides also that where goods are imported and exported, if the rate of duty is higher in the colony to which they are exported than in the colony from which they have been sent, the extra duty shall be paid. But there is no provision—and I should like to see one—for the case where the rate of duty is higher in the colony from which the goods are imported. In such a case there should be a provision allowing the colony from which the goods are exported to give drawback. We can understand that if goods were imported into New South Wales, where they would have practically no duty at all to pay, and were then exported to Victoria, where the uniform duty was in existence, they should be charged with that uniform duty, or the difference between that duty and what was chargeable in New South Wales; but if the goods were imported into Victoria, where the duty may be higher than the uniform duty, and if those goods were then exported to another colony, there should be liberty to grant drawback if the colony from which they are exported so desires.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales).—I quite see the desire and intention of the Finance Committee in this proviso, but I am absolutely opposed to it on practical grounds. Let us look at the position we have to face. The only obstruction to commerce between the colonies is to be the bookkeeping system, and as that does not involve any cash payment or responsibility of that kind it will, of course, be carried out with the least possible friction. Border Duties are not only vexatious on account of the money payment which they involve, but from the free-trade point of view, on account of the delay of business which they occasion. Now, you ask innumerable Customs officers, many of whom may not be altogether men of an experienced character, to adjudicate on complicated matters, and to determine whether goods coming through are not dutiable under certain conditions referred to in this clause. I say, in the first place, as a practical man of business, that it will be altogether inoperative; and, in the second place, although it is inoperative from the practical point of view, there will continue the strain and stress and obstruction and worry, which are things that we want to get rid of under a system of free intercolonial intercourse. This is more a matter of practical business prescience, if I may use the expression, than of anything else. I do not want to reflect on the honesty of my fellow citizens, but I am confident that many of the most honest of men will not know what goods will come under conditions of this kind. Although a great deal of difficulty may accrue at the start of this new system, and although the revenue of certain of the colonies may suffer, still we have to make the plunge, and we may as well do it without causing the great inconvenience and delay which a provision of this kind will necessitate. If we want to have intercolonial free-trade absolutely and completely upon the imposition of the Uniform Tariff, then, I say, for goodness' sake knock out this proviso, which for two years will continue the irritation, the obstruction, and delay of all kinds in regard to goods coming over the borders.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

What would you substitute?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Nothing at all.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Good heavens!

Mr. ISAACS. -

New South Wales would be an open gateway for all goods which she pleased to allow to come in free. It only wants this to end the matter.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

My honorable friend (Mr. Peacock), for whose opinion—and other qualities—I have more regard than for that of any other member in this Convention—

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Now, you are trying to "get at" me.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We must recollect that this is entirely a new provision which has been sprung upon us, after all the wisdom which was devoted to the elucidation of the problem in Adelaide. I do not want honorable members to think that I misunderstand the object of the provision, or the righteousness of the intention, but I say, as a practical man of business, that it will be inoperative, and will not only be inoperative, but will be obstructing and irritating, and will work against that principle of complete freedom of intercourse which we look upon as one of the blessings of federation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

How can you think of suggesting such an injustice to Victoria, unless New South Wales is prepared to put her Tariff up?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I have always been willing to allow that the absolute free-trade policy of New South Wales—in which I absolutely concur myself—has, to a certain extent, become a very discordant element in regard to bringing these colonies together. I quite allow of that.

Mr. REID. -

Superior merit always is perplexing.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I quite allow that if Mr. Lyne were in the position that Mr. Reid now occupies, or if he should happen to get in the position between now and-

Mr. REID. -
The imposition of the uniform Tariff.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
Put that in the Constitution.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
No; between now and the establishment of federation, a great many of the difficulties which now exist might be cleared away.

Mr. LYNE. -
Hear, hear.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
That is the most hearty "Hear, hear" that we have had since the beginning of the Convention.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
But although the policy of New South Wales has more or less become a difficulty in the adjustment of our affairs, still, what I find fault with is that in attempting to solve the difficulty you introduce what, with all respect, is, I say, an absolutely ridiculous proposal—a proposal which will not have any effect in practical working except the effect of keeping up, for two years, the system of border custom-houses throughout these colonies, making it necessary to insist upon that system of espionage and o

Mr. ISAACS. -
You know that it is a vital thing; you know that it is impossible for us to accept this Bill without it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
If so, I give way. I was not a member of the Finance Committee, and, therefore, I am not imbued with all the feelings which came before that body in the discussion of this matter, nor do I know what strong views may have been taken by representatives of the other colonies. Otherwise, I might not have risen to question the wisdom of this proposal. I am merely giving my opinion as a private member of the Convention; and I do think that this attempt to do justice to Victoria will be altogether inoperative.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
It may seem perplexing when I say it, but still I do say that nothing will be done under this provision, whilst at the same time it will be most effective. Nothing will be done under it, because it will be exceedingly difficult to put in operation the provisions of it; but, at the same time, it will have the effect which it is intended to have, because it will prevent the occurrence of the evils it is intended to prevent. Take the case of Western Australia, where sugar is now admitted free of duty. It would be quite possible for a merchant to ship a quantity of Mauritius sugar into Western Australia free of duty just before the uniform Tariff came into operation, and for that sugar to be subsequently imported into the other colonies, where duties on sugar were formerly imposed. That would have the effect of injuring the revenues of the colonies concerned in fact, their revenues might be ruined if my proposal were not inserted.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
And also the revenue of the Commonwealth.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
How long do you think it is necessary for the provision to remain in force?

Mr. HOLDER. -
Probably one year would suffice, but I do not think any harm will be done by putting in two. The chief effect of the clause will be that the possibility of putting it into operation will prevent merchants from loading up; they will not load up in Sydney or anywhere else when any line is free, they will wait until they see what the uniform Tariff is, and they will pay under that as they ought to. I have a doubt, however, whether the clause gives effect to the intention of the Finance Committee. I understand that in my temporary absence, Sir George Turner mentioned the point. The clause begins-"But goods imported into any state before uniform duties are imposed." I think that would limit the importation to the time when any portion of the Commonwealth became a state; but goods might be imported a few days before the colony became a state-that is, on the establishment of the Commonwealth. I think the clear intention of the Finance Committee was that any goods imported into a state before it became a state should be dutiable under the Federal Tariff if those goods passed to another state.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
How far back would you go?

Mr. HOLDER. -
Practically we would not go back at all; the shadow of this clause will have the necessary effect. If no limit be fixed, but if it be left open, and if the word "state" be made larger, it would prevent the abuse I have referred to. I beg to move-

That after the word "state" the following words be inserted "either before or after the establishment of the Commonwealth."

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
The fact that the uniform Tariff would probably not come into force for eighteen months after the establishment of the Commonwealth will, I think, give a sufficient period of time in conjunction with the two years during which the protection will exist afterwards. I am afraid, and in this respect the leader of the Convention desires me to say he agrees with me, that any attempt to interfere with the state of things before the Commonwealth comes into existence may be regarded as objectionable in the Houses of Parliament through which this Bill must eventually go. We think it would be much safer on the whole to be satisfied with the protection which will undoubtedly exist from the fact that, from the date on which the Commonwealth is established, on which day the colonies will become states, down to the actual operation of a uniform Tariff-and I think that that period must be more than a year, and probably eighteen months-there will be a sufficient protection, coupled with the subsequent period of two years.

Mr. ISAACS. - The alteration suggested could not do any harm.

Mr. REID. - We do not wish to put in anything that may be taken out in the old country. I think a year before the uniform Tariff is established ought to be a sufficient period. I do not think that even the most enterprising speculators will be likely to import goods into any part of the Commonwealth more than a year before a certain event, especially as these importation will be made with the other provisions staring them in the face in connexion with the subsequent two years. That will, I think, paralyze the little tricks of trade.

Mr. ISAACS. - That would not affect them.

Mr. REID. - It would not affect the period my honorable friend aims at, but I think the fact that we will protect our neighbours from the curse of cheapness for about twelve months, at any rate, will be sufficient protection under the circumstances. I certainly object to the amendment and I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). - I shall support the amendment. First of all, it takes away any question that might be raised as to when the goods are imported. Suppose the goods are brought to the border of Victoria from New South Wales, and the Commonwealth officers enter into the consideration of the question as to whether or not this section applies. They will be told that these goods were imported a day before the establishment of the Commonwealth, and therefore this clause does not apply. Therefore, at the very threshold, a very important question arises, and it may give rise to all sorts of controversies, and even litigation. The revenue of the Commonwealth may be in doubt on this question, and certainly the industries of Victoria would be in doubt. As my honorable friend says, there is not the slightest danger of any speculator in New South Wales trying to import goods so as to let them arrive, say, a week before the day of the establishment of the Commonwealth. It can do him no harm whatever.

Mr. Reid. -

If You think it is a serious matter we will certainly pass the whole of it. All our desire is to satisfy you.

Mr. Isaacs. -

I think the amendment will carry out our object if you put in the words "or colony" after the word "state."

Mr. Reid. -

There is an awkwardness in the amendment, because there can be no state before the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Isaacs. -

That is why I suggest the insertion of the words "or colony," but I think it can be left to the Drafting Committee to put it in proper shape, and I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment.

Mr. Glynn (South Australia). -

There is much force in what has been stated by the honorable member (Mr. McMillan). I do not see any necessity for the clause, which may open the way to several evils. I would ask honorable members whether the protection afforded to the states at present would not be sufficient? Supposing that a general election took place in a colony and a policy of protection was affirmed? At present it is considered by the colonies that there is sufficient protection against these importations in the fact that the moment the Tariff is declared the duty is payable at the Tariff rates. Where is the difference between the position of a single state at present under such circumstances, and the position in which the Federal Parliament will find itself? We are assuming that the character of the Tariff will be protectionist. If the protection to the Treasurer, afforded at present in the case of a state is sufficient, I fail to see why it should not be sufficient in the case of a Federation.

An Honorable Member. -

It is not a question of protection; it is a question of financial adjustment.

Mr. Glynn. -
I understand that one object is to save the Treasurer, and the other object is the adjustment of accounts between the importing and the consuming states. I maintain that the Treasurer of the Federation will be protected quite as much as the Treasurer of a colony is at present, when a protectionist Tariff is imposed after a general election.

Mr. FRASER.- Suppose a certain market is flooded with free goods what would you do then?

Mr. GLYNN.- I would not object to this additional protection being given if there were not other probable evils which I will point out. To emphasize the first position I take up, I ask, how are you going to trace the goods? For instance, take leather. It may be imported in bulk and subsequently it may be changed into uppers. On the exportation of the uppers, how are you going to say what quantity of those uppers is taxable? Again, supposing uppers were imported, they might be changed into boots, and in eight months might be exported to another colony; how are you going to say whether or not those boots are liable to duty? They might be exported, not by the manufacturer, but by other persons. Looking at this clause in conjunction with the subsequent clause dealing with goods which are re-exported, you may be paying in some cases too much and in others too little. To show that I am not speaking without book, I will refer honorable members to Table No. 12 in the appendices to the proceedings of the Adelaide Convention. We have figures there dealing with the estimates of customs duties paid on the products of each colony on importation to other colonies. These figures are given on the assumption that the exports were of a certain quantity and value. My argument is this: If it is difficult to trace the quantity and value of exports of colonial products from state to state on the existing data, it will be equally difficult to trace the quantity and value of imports from abroad which become exports to other colonies. What have we in the shape of evidence? We have two departments in different colonies giving a calculation as to the duties actually levied. What I am going to quote is an estimate as to the amount of customs duty paid on the products of each Colony on importation into other colonies. For 1894, the estimate as regards New South Wales, given by Mr. Coghlan, is £113,421; the estimate given by the Victorian Customs department is £148,826; then for 1895, Mr. Coghlan's estimate is £234,942; that of the Victorian Customs department is £135,550. Taking the estimate for Victoria, Mr. Coghlan gives the figures for 1894 as £234,152, while the Victorian Customs department gives the figures as £204,685. In 1895 according to Mr. Coghlan, the figures were £198,695; according to the Victorian Customs department, £257,913.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
That arises from a want of uniformity in keeping the accounts.

Mr. GLYNN. -
That may be the case, but these figures were submitted to the Convention for our guidance.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
There is the innate difficulty in the matter.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I quite agree that that is t not entitled to on the basis of consumption. Now, I refer honorable members to No. 15 of Table 12, which shows the loss of revenue by each colony had Australian products been admitted free of duty. We find that in 1894, according to Mr. Coghlan, the loss of New South Wales would be £407,021, whereas the Victorian Customs department estimates that the loss would be £318,985.

Mr. HOLDER. -
The honorable member is dealing with colonial products and manufactures, whereas we are proposing to deal with foreign goods.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I admit that, but the figures I am giving are the only data available for the purpose of argument. If there is such a discrepancy with regard to colonial exports and imports, it is probable that there will be exactly the same discrepancies with regard to foreign goods.

Mr. FRASER. -
No, it is much easier to deal with foreign goods than with colonial products.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I doubt that, when it comes to re-exportation. We find from this table that in 1895, according to Mr. Coghlan, the loss of New South Wales would be £148,816, whereas, according to the Victorian Customs department, it would be £341,892. Then take Victoria. We find the estimate for 1894 from one authority given as £145,000, and from another as £186,000. For 1895, the figures are £425,000 and £220,000, respectively. Now, when these mistakes are made on the exports from one colony to another of native products, then, by parity of assumption, I say there will be very great mistakes made with regard to goods imported into one colony on their re-exportation to the other colonies. But I would refer honorable members to the figures given by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, a few days ago, as to the position of Western Australia, as regards imports direct from home and through the other colonies. The protection which we are asking for is protection through the other colonies on foreign products. That is what we are asking to protect the revenue in regard to. Now, that is a very diminishing quantity, so that, if there is a slight opening for evil, there is the probability of that evil diminishing gradually. We find, according to the figures given by Sir John Forrest, that the total imports into Western Australia, for 1895, amounted to about £3,750,600. Of that sum the British and foreign imports, through other colonies, amounted to £789,000. But, if you take 1896, the year afterwards, the total is £6,500,000; while the British and foreign goods, imported through other colonies, instead of being doubled are less £722,000. So that I am entitled to say that you are providing for a diminishing chance of evasion. I would not say a word against this clause, if there was not an opening for the corresponding errors which I have pointed out, on the basis of the Victorian figures; but I say that the clause is not necessary—that the state protection already afforded, if applied to the Federal Parliament, will be quite good enough; and, if you pass this and the subsequent clause (91), you will be paying one state far more than it is entitled to on its consumption, and in other cases you will be paying far less. If these errors are open, I ask where is the necessity for this clause, considering that the protection is not required, and that it may lead to all sorts of harassing interference at the border?

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -

I am under the disadvantage of not having heard Mr. McMillan on this subject, as I was busy in connexion with another matter which drew my attention. I presume, however, it will not be considered assumption on the part of some honorable members of this Convention who have been associated with the import trade for a great number of years if they claim to speak with some experience on this subject. I hope that I shall not be at issue with Mr. McMillan, as his experience and my own must be somewhat similar; but I am prepared to dismiss entirely all figures which have been placed before us that profess to give us some idea of the interchange of goods between the various colonies. I do not think that is at all necessary in connexion with this subject, because this is a subject which deals entirely with the transfer from one colony to another of what we may, for convenience, call foreign products, not intercolonial products or intercolonial manufactures. This clause deals with the imports from abroad into Australia in a given year—the year prior to the uniform Tariff—goods which, during the first two years of the existence of the uniform Tariff, shall pass from the state where they were first imported into another state where they are to be entered for home consumption. Now, I will guarantee to produce at the Customs-office of every one of these states men who will be able, very promptly, to certify whether the goods be of foreign export or not. I do not think that there is anyone of the permanent officers in connexion with the Customs who would not be able to say whether goods passing from one state to another were of foreign importation or not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Broken bulk?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Yes. There can be no difficulty whatever where the goods are in the original packages, or even if, as is mostly the case in intercolonial transactions, the packages are composed of a great number of articles, some of which are foreign goods, and some of which are of colonial manufacture. The drawback regulations of Victoria deal amply with such cases, and the drawback officers are satisfied that they get an approximate statement of facts. Even though some of the exporters may gain an advantage in connexion with drawbacks, the Customs officers are satisfied that approximately the amount of exports in connexion with goods which have been imported, and have paid duty, is known. Now, it becomes absolutely necessary to the smaller states-South Australia, Western Australia, and Tasmania-that the goods imported into Victoria and New South Wales-into New South Wales, where they will have paid no duty, and into Victoria, where many of them may have only paid a 5 or 10 per cent. duty—it becomes absolutely necessary for the three other colonies, which are largely supplied from Victoria and New South Wales, that, if they are to secure the advantages of their home consumption, an account shall, at any rate for a period, be kept of what goods come across their borders that have been imported into other states.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I will guarantee that 75 per cent. of the whole thing would be evaded.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The honorable member who gives expression to that opinion has no doubt a very large experience.

Mr. REID. -

Not of that sort of thing, surely.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I mean that he has had a large experience with respect to the importation of goods. If I have had 40 years' experience, he has had, at any rate, twenty years' experience.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The mistake you are making is in thinking that everybody will be as honest as you are yourself.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

It is not a question of honesty or dishonesty.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Oh, yes.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I say, as an expert, that it is not a question of honesty or dishonesty, or if it be necessary to admit that some one may try to evade the law, I am going to point out, presently, that there is no object in trying to evade it. But I say that even in Tasmania, small though it be, we have at Hobart and Launceston men who would immediately detect any fraud of that kind; men who, have been associated with the trade for years, and who, I will guarantee, would, with respect to £1,000 worth of goods thrown before them, immediately brush aside those which were foreign, and leave those which were intercolonial. They would do this almost with their eyes shut.

[Page 1028] starts here

Mr. HENRY. -

Do you mean mixed goods?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

That is another case—where the goods are partly foreign and partly local manufacture. Say, for instance, that Victoria may import a lot of flannels, and that they are manufactured here into men's clothing. Our drawback regulations, if the duty was paid on the flannels, would separate the flannel from the manufactured articles, but any one of our experts would readily pick out the article which was of foreign manufacture, and the article which was of local manufacture. But there is no cause to suppose that there would be fraud, because fraud only arises where there is a monetary motive, and if the exporter from New South Wales or Victoria has no advantage, by reason of an improper entry, as he would not have, what object could he have in attempting fraud, or in making a false entry?

Mr. HENRY. -

He might have the advantage of selling his goods, when he would not otherwise be able to do so.

Mr. LYNE. -

If he got the material without paying duty.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

That does not enter into the question. The question we are dealing with is the export, say, from New South Wales, of a bale of calico, which has paid duty, to Tasmania.
Mr. REID. - Have you a duty on calico in Tasmania?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. - We have; and I shall presume that a similar duty would be in the uniform Tariff. Now, is there likely to be any fraud by an exporter from New South Wales of that particular bale of calico? He has no advantage in making a false entry, and the whole thing rests upon that. So far as the three smaller states are concerned, it is absolutely necessary, for the protection of their revenue, that some such proposal as this shall be inserted. At the present moment I shall assume that Tasmania secures, certainly, 25 per cent. of ad valorem goods through the instrumentality of stocks lying in New South Wales or Victoria. If, therefore, for the two years after the uniform Tariff, Tasmania has to consume the stocks from those two colonies, where will our revenue account be; and what will be the use of our keeping interstate accounts? No use at all. We shall be consuming articles on which no duty had been paid in New South Wales, or articles, on which 10 per cent. had been paid in Victoria. The clause, therefore, is not only necessary for the protection of the smaller states in their revenue accounts, but it is also absolutely necessary, I think, that we should add some further words to it. To goods which have been imported into New South Wales, and have paid no duty, there need be no reference in the clause at all, and, therefore, the first "(if any)," I would suggest, may be omitted, because if there has been no duty paid there need be no trouble. The goods will pay in Tasmania the full Commonwealth or uniform Tariff, and, Tasmania having collected the full uniform Tariff thereon, will get the benefit. But, so far as Victoria is concerned, where it says that the duty shall be collected "(if any) "on the difference between the Victorian Tariff and the Commonwealth Tariff, which may be 10 per cent., Tasmania will only get credit for the 10 per cent. which she collects. While in Victoria the duty will have been reserved to the amount of 10 per cent. on a particular article, and Tasmania will be the consumer of articles which, under the Commonwealth Tariff, are liable to 20 per cent., Tasmania's revenue will only get credit for 10 per cent. Under those circumstances, I think it will be necessary that some few words should be added to the clause as we proceed. In the meantime, however, I would urge the absolute necessity, for the protection of the smaller states, of some such provision as this, because without it, while the Commonwealth Tariff or revenue will be fairly made up, the smaller states will be considerably jeopardized in their revenue by reason of the fact that the duties are collected in other states, while the goods are consumed in the smaller states.
[The chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

We must all recognise that the settlement of the financial question which has been arrived at by the Finance Committee, and which is now before us, has been arrived at only after the most careful and anxious consideration of the question, extending over the seven years following the sittings of the Convention of 1891. During this time every possible effort has been made to solve the problem, but the difficulty has always our colonies.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do not say that. We know that the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) did not approve of everything here.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Perhaps he did not approve of everything, but he stated very properly and frankly that he recognised that he could not have his own way in everything, and that if the compromise which had been arrived at was accepted by the Convention he would accept it. I think that that is the attitude of all the Treasurers. Whenever a compromise takes place no man gets exactly what he wants, but if the representatives of the colonies think this the fairest arrangement that can be made, no doubt the Treasurers will agree to it. I think that the clause should be supported as part of a general scheme which the colonies, other than New South Wales, consider of some importance, and because some provision is necessary in order that the revenue of the Commonwealth shall not suffer by making use of the Tariff of any particular colony. Therefore, without going into any detailed criticism as to whether it will or will not work, or as to the extent to which it may be difficult to find out where goods have been consumed, I am prepared to accept the clause practically as it stands. At first sight, no doubt the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Holder) appears contrary to one's ideas of what legislation should be. There is no doubt that it is retrospective. The Constitution, which is to take effect upon the establishment of the Commonwealth, will by it be made to apply to goods which have been imported into the colonies before the establishment of the Commonwealth. Nevertheless, I think the objection rather apparent than real. In the first place, I doubt whether the amendment will affect very many cases, or any large quantity of goods; but, even if it does, I cannot see that very much injustice will result from it, because it will apply only to goods which commence to move after the imposition of uniform duties. If the clause is really to be effective for the purpose intended, this provision must, I think, be inserted. Therefore, I am willing to take the amendment as part of the general scheme which has been arrived at by way of compromise, and which my honorable friends opposite are anxious to embody in the Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I am willing to agree to the insertion of the words "or colony." It is the principle with which I am concerned. The phrasing of the clause might, I think, be left to the Drafting Committee.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That the proposed new paragraph be amended by the insertion, before the word "state" (line 1), of the words "colony, province, or."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I understand that the Hon. Mr. Holder is going to move the insertion of the other words.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I think the other words are unnecessary, but I leave the whole matter to the Drafting Committee. We have affirmed the principle, and they will be responsible for the form.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am not sure the other words are unnecessary, and I hope that the Drafting Committee will consider the point.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -

The clause speaks of the duty chargeable (if any)" on goods imported into the Commonwealth. I do not think the words (if any)" are necessary. If goods imported into New South Wales do not pay any duty, and they are exported to Tasmania they will then pay the full duty. The words (if any)" are used a second time, and correctly used.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I think the words referred to are necessary, but the honorable member's suggestion will be considered.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Then I desire to call attention to certain words which are not in this clause, but which do appear in new clause K. That clause provides that the duties of excise paid on goods manufactured in a state, and thence exported to another state for consumption therein, shall be taken to have been collected in the state in which such goods have been consumed. These words are an instruction to the Federal Executive to secure to the state in which the goods are consumed a credit for the duty upon those goods.
There is no such instruction in the clause we now have before us. I beg, therefore, to move the addition to the new paragraph of the following words:-

And the full amount of duty chargeable on the importation of such goods under the Commonwealth Tariff shall be taken to have been collected in the state to which such goods have been so exported.

The state might otherwise receive only 5 or 10 per cent. duty, whereas the duty imposed by the Commonwealth might be 20 per cent.

Mr. REID. -

I do not think these words are at all necessary. The new paragraph was very well considered by the Finance Committee.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

That point was not.

Mr. REID. -

The words in the clause cover that point.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I should like the right honorable member to point out in what way it is covered. What I desire is that the state shall get the full benefit of the full Commonwealth Tariff.

Mr. ISAACS. -

This clause is not intended to deal with that matter.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

In my opinion it should deal with it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Is not it provided for in clause 91?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

No; that is the expenditure clause. It is provided for in the clause it is proposed to substitute for clause 92.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I do not think it would be wise to add the words suggested to this clause, as it refers to a different question, but the honorable member has called attention to a matter that has been overlooked. The honorable member could best achieve his purpose by moving the insertion in clause 90 of words similar to those contained in sub-section (1) of clause 92. The same principle which applies after the uniform Tariff comes into operation would then apply to the two years before the uniform Tariff.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I could not agree to that. Until the uniform Tariff comes into operation, we are to go on as we are. After that, we are to have a new system.
Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -

I have no special preference as to where this provision is made, but I think it necessary that it should be made. I will withdraw the amendment for the present, with a view of submitting it again in the manner suggested by Mr. Holder.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The honorable member ought to consider whether the provision be suggests will have any application at all to the period of two years. It ought not to have.

The amendment, was withdrawn.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I drew the attention of the leader of the Convention this morning to the necessity of making some provision with regard to allowing a colony to provide for drawbacks where the duty paid in the colony is higher than the duty chargeable under the uniform Tariff. I am quite satisfied that the Federal Parliament has the power inherently in framing a Customs Tariff, and that might be sufficient. I should be glad if the Drafting Committee would take the matter into consideration. If they cannot meet the difficulty, I will, at a later stage, move the insertion of certain words.

Mr. REID. -

Does the right honorable member mean that the Commonwealth, out of its own funds, is to repay this money?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No; the state, out of its own funds.

Mr. REID. -

That is well worthy of consideration.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

There is no doubt-and the remarks that have been made confirm one in that impression-that the whole of this trouble has arisen in consequence of the present Tariff in New South Wales. It is to get over the difficulty that that Tariff creates at the present time-and it is creating a great deal of difficulty-that this proposal is made.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Not entirely.

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes. If New South Wales had a reasonable protectionist Tariff no such provision would be introduced.

Mr. SYMON. -

You cannot have a reasonable protectionist Tariff.

Mr. LYNE. -

The honorable member's free-trade proclivities are so strong that no protectionist Tariff could in his estimation be reasonable. But I ask the committee whether this proposal would be introduced if it were not for the Tariff of New South Wales? I think it would not, and I say that it is a proposal that is most vicious in its character.

Mr. SYMON. -

Is it a menace to the integrity of New South Wales?

Mr. LYNE. -

It is, and in this sense: That if it is carried, and it seems probable from the expressions of opinion that it will be carried, it will operate altogether against the honest traders. The honest traders will do all they can to keep a record of the goods re-exported from other colonies, but those who wish, and there will be plenty of them, to evade the provision will not keep any record. When the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales was explaining these provisions he said it would be very easy indeed to induce the merchants to keep a record of all the goods exported from one state to another, so that they might be traced right down to their distribution. That is an absolute absurdity, and almost an impossibility. Take the case of broken packages. In those cases it will be almost impossible to ascertain what duty has been or should be paid. In New South Wales and other states imported goods may be used for the purposes of manufacture. The manufactured articles will be exported to other states, and how will it be possible to divide the product exported in the way that will be necessary for the purposes of the record? That is impossible, and it will tell altogether against honest trade between the two states.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That would not affect New South Wales, where there are very few factories.

Mr. LYNE. -

It would affect New South Wales to some extent, at any rate. The factories of New South Wales are not as numerous as I think they should be, and as they would be if we had a different state of things. Still, there are a few factories th

Mr. REID. -

But not in the future.

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes, in the future, too. However, I do not wish to enter into that question at present. We are told that the Customs officers of Hobart, Launceston, and Strahan could easily tell what goods should be allowed to enter Tasmania free of duty, and what goods should be charged duty.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I said that they could easily tell which were English or foreign goods.

Mr. LYNE. -
Well, that is practically the same thing. But how could the honorable member tell the difference in goods crossing an imaginary line between two colonies? Why, take even the River Murray, which is a part of the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales. It may be all very well to tell the difference between goods passing through Albury, Echuca, and other places where there are Customs officers, but hitherto there has been a very great deal of difficulty on the part of the Customs officers to check the goods that have crossed the border. In those cases it is entirely different from the case where the goods are sea-borne and enter a seaport, so that the argument of my honorable friend does not apply.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
Victoria has had to protect herself against New South Wales and the other colonies.

Mr. LYNE. -
I know, and there has been, and still is, a great difficulty in doing that. A staff of Customs officers has had to be kept up from one end of the Murray to the other, and if this proposal is carried through, that staff will have to be kept in existence, so that the states might just as well keep on their Customs Tariffs. Even if you have Customs officers at Echuca, and other of the larger crossing places, there will be nothing to prevent these goods being taken over the Murray at other parts. Therefore, it will entail a very considerable expense to the Federal Customs department to keep up the existing Customs staffs along the various borders of the colonies.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You have to keep up those staffs for the purpose of keeping the accounts.

Mr. LYNE. -
Well, I very much regret that we are adopting this practice of bookkeeping, and I have been opposed to it all through. Some honorable members seem to have gone almost a little off their heads on the question of bookkeeping. They appear to rush at a set of books as if they were something to glorify. But I say that we want to get rid of the system of bookkeeping, to which I am altogether opposed, and the Premier of Victoria was also at one time opposed to it, and very strongly opposed to it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
So I am still.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
What alternative do you propose for the proper distribution of the
That question does not arise under this clause, and I have referred to it previously. There is a very simple method that can be adopted instead of maintaining this clumsy and cumbrous system of bookkeeping for several years, I rose more particularly to enter my protest against this proposal, which will hamper trade to a large extent for the next few years, if we enter into this. Federation, instead of relieving us of all the trouble that we have at the present time. It is the desire of all the colonies to place freedom of trade in the forefront, and to get rid of Border Duties.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is it; not so much to get rid of the bookkeeping as to get rid of the Border Duties.

Mr. LYNE. -

The object is to get rid of restrictions of every kind on our borders. That is one of the main objects of the federation movement; and if an arrangement was made to-day between the various states to have intercolonial free-trade there would be very little crying out for federation of any kind. It proves, therefore, that that is the main and staple thing that is inducing the people of the colonies to ask for federation at the present moment. They desire to have intercolonial free-trade, to have intercolonial commerce free in every way, and if you carry through this proposal, you, will hamper that freedom of trade and commerce very much for the next, four or five years.

Mr. HOWE. -

What is four or five years in the history of a nation?

Mr. LYNE. -

I do not know that four or five years is very much in the history of a nation, after that nation is formed, but if we can reduce these restrictions on trade and commerce between the colonies without injury to the various states, it is our duty to do so. I say that we can do it equitably. All the trouble of this matter is in consequence of the present Tariff of New South Wales.

Mr. HOWE. -

No doubt.

Mr. LYNE. -

If that Tariff was altered, we would have no necessity for any provision in regard to restrictions of this kind, and, even for the sake of federation, I hope it will be only a very short time before we adopt some system which will remove this obstacle out of our way altogether.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I quite agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Lyne) that if New South Wales would put on a reasonable protective Tariff, we would not require this clause, and if the honorable member could give me an undertaking that before these uniform duties of customs come into operation they will follow out what appears to me would be a proper practice in the colony which he represents, I, for one, would feel inclined to support him in striking out this clause.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Perhaps Mr. Reid and Mr. Lyne will put their heads together for that purpose.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am afraid that if the two honorable members consult together, we shall not get anything. If it could be left to Mr. Lyne, I have no doubt he would meet our wishes, and put on such a protective Tariff as would render this clause unnecessary, but for fear that Mr. Lyne will not have an opportunity of carrying out that good work we must provide in this Constitution for some reasonable protection. If we have not a clause of this kind we all know what will happen. As has been pointed out, the merchants in Sydney and other places will simply stock Sydney full of goods, under the present Tariff of New South Wales, and immediately we have intercolonial free-trade those goods will come into the other colonies without paying any duty on the borders. Those colonies will, by that means, lose an immense amount of revenue which they ought to collect, and which will be taken into consideration in calculating the surplus they have a right to expect, and many of the manufacturers of Victoria will be seriously injured. I think that this provision does not go far enough, even as far as New South Wales itself is concerned. Some step ought to be taken to prevent this illegitimate trading and profit-making at the expense of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I really cannot understand how this debate has occupied so long a time. It seems to me that the provisions in the recommendations of the Finance Committee must appeal to every one as being just and fair. I can speak disinterestedly, as coming from a colony where there is a considerable free list—a colony which might, if this clause were not in the Bill, be made the repository of a very large quantity of goods which would come into Western Australia free of duty, and afterwards be sent to the other colonies within the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON. -
This clause is directed to support equality of trade, rather than the mere freedom of trade.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I think I thoroughly understand the meaning of the clause. It means that goods can be imported free into the free-trade colony of New South Wales or into Western Australia, where there is a large free list, and on the introduction of the uniform Tariff, which every one seems to think will be a protective Tariff -

Mr REID. - No fear, it will be a revenue Tariff.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Well, we will say a revenue Tariff - I do not care what you call it - then those goods could be sent to the other colonies without paying the duties that would have been imposed prior to the introduction of the uniform Tariff. Take the case of Western Australia. Merchants would be able to import tea and sugar there in large quantities, and would afterwards be able to supply all the colonies with tea and sugar without paying the duty which other persons in those colonies, importing direct from the tea and sugar producing countries, would have to pay. Take also machinery, and many other articles. This thing applies in only a small degree in Western Australia, it is true, but in a very much larger degree in New South Wales. Now, I ask is it a fair and reasonable thing? Are we going to frame this Constitution in such a way that it will play into the hands of rich capitalists, who will get all the advantage of the profits thus made? It seems to me to be absurd to do so, and, although I can see in it an advantage to Western Australia, I cannot make myself believe that it is right or fair. Therefore, I think that a clause of this sort is absolutely necessary. At the same time, I do not see that we need to take so long to discuss it. It appears to me to be perfectly fair and reasonable that a clause of this sort should be in the Bill. I believe that every member of the Finance Committee agreed that this is a reasonable provision, and why should we spend a whole day in discussing it?

Mr. LYNE. -

Sir George Turner said just now that you were opposed to it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Opposed to this clause?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I have never heard him say so. I hope we will either pass this clause on the voices forthwith or go to a division on it.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -

I hope no one will charge me with coming into the category of those who waste time in this Convention. I do not think that any one can justly do so, but I have a specific purpose in rising now in reference to this clause. I am very much of the view of Mr. McMillan as to the unworkable character of this provision, and as to its in Utility generally, but I am not in accord with the statement of Mr. O'Connor that this provision is in the nature of a compromise. I regard it rather as an expedient to meet a practical difficulty, and it is because we are aware that the Finance Committee recognise there is this difficulty about having free goods dumped down in Western Australia and New South Wales, which would cause a loss of revenue to various other states, that the bookkeeping system is proposed. I take it that a loss of revenue will inevitably result to the states which have free Tariffs. There is no doubt that the merchants of Western Australia and New South Wales, if there is no alteration in the Tariffs of those colonies in the meantime, will unquestionably lay in a stock of free goods, and the result will be a loss of revenue to those colonies, as well as to colonies into which those goods are afterwards imported. The object of the Finance Committee was to minimize that difficulty as much as possible, and prevent injury to the revenue of the various states. I am not going to waste time by going over arguments that have already been used, for I have studiously avoided the repetition of arguments, but I think that this proposed clause should not be operative for more than a one year. I believe that no merchant will import heavily into either Western Australia or New South Wales with the prospect or on the calculation of holding those goods for a period of more than twelve months.

Mr. Howe. -
Make it two years.

Mr. Henry. -
It is two years in the clause now, but I think that one year would be ample to meet the circumstances sufficiently. It would do away with a year's period of irritation, annoyance, and difficulty in keeping records of goods passing between the colonies-that is, in ascertaining the duties payable to the respective colonies under this clause. Therefore, my object is to test the feeling of the committee as to whether this provision should continue in force for a longer period than one year. I beg to move-

That the word "two " be struck out, with a view of substituting the word "one."

Sir George Turner. -
One year is not long enough.

Mr. McMillan (New South Wales). -
I think there is a very great deal to be said in favour of the amendment of Mr. Henry, on the most practical grounds. I can scarcely conceive of any trade operations of the kind going beyond twelve months.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then where is your objection to the two years provision?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I object to it because, as the right honorable gentleman will see, it will involve keeping up the system of border espionage for another year, and prevent free communication between the two colonies. I fail to see any cause why the object of Victoria would not be gained if the restriction in question were only kept in existence for one year.

Mr. WALKER. -

What about jewellery?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That can be smuggled in under any circumstances, but with ordinary goods the whole operation can be got over in twelve months.

Question-That the word "two" proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause-put.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -
Before the clause is finally passed, I desire to call the attention of the Drafting Committee to a necessary alteration in its construction. The alteration I think is a necessary one, and one which I believe the Convention would desire to make. It is very certain that under the clause as it now stands, the duties on goods imported into Victoria, with her 30 to 40 per cent. ad valorem duties, will, under the uniform Tariff, if that be only 20 per cent. ad valorem, cause the state in which the goods are consumed to lose the benefit of the new Tariff.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I have asked the Drafting Committee to provide for an allowance to be made for drawback.

Mr. WISE. -
Will the state pay, back the revenue it has received?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It is this individual state which will give drawback, not the Commonwealth State.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
If that provision be made, then the colony consuming the goods will get the benefit of the full Commonwealth Tariff.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That is only fair.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
I draw attention to the matter, because I think it is desirable that the Convention should have its attention drawn to the necessity of some verbal amendment being made in the clause.

The paragraph was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The next amendment is one suggested by the three colonies of Western Australia, South Australia, and Tasmania, with reference to alcoholic liquors. I shall put only the amendment suggested by Western Australia, as it seems that there is very little difference between the three suggestions by the three colonies I have named.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Western Australia-
At the end of clause add—Nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prevent any state from regulating the importation of opium or alcohol under conditions which are applicable, as nearly as possible, to the laws relating to opium and alcohol within the state.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

This matter is, I think, already provided for in sub-section (1) of clause 52.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I take this opportunity of asking once more whether the provision referred to by Mr. O'Connor is in its proper place? It seems to me that while the provision should certainly remain in the Bill, it would be better expressed if placed apart from sub-section (1) of clause 52, to which it is intended in no sense to refer.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It should be placed in the clause affecting the powers of the states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is a matter for separate consideration.

The amendment was negatived.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 90. - Until uniform duties of customs have been imposed, there shall be shown, in the books of the Treasury of the Commonwealth, in respect of each state—

I. The revenues collected from duties of customs and excise, and from the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth by this Constitution:

II. The expenditure of the Commonwealth in the collection of duties of customs and excise, and in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth by this Constitution:

III. The monthly balance (if any) in favour of the state.

From the balance so found in favour of each state there shall be deducted its share of the expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of the original powers given to it by this Constitution, and this share shall be in the numerical proportion of the people of the state to those of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth. After such deduction the surplus shown to be due to the state shall be paid to the state month by month.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I propose to suggest the insertion of a new clause by leaving in at the commencement the words "Until uniform duties of customs have been imposed," and then inserting the proposals of the Finance Committee, which, I may mention, have been verbally altered from the text which honorable members hold in their hands. The words as I read them, however, are what the Finance Committee desire to have inserted. I beg to move-

That all the words after the word "imposed" (line 2) be struck out, with a view of inserting the following words:--

I. The Commonwealth shall credit each state with the revenues collected from duties of customs and of excise, and in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth under this Constitution.

II. The Commonwealth shall debit each state with-

(a) the expenditures the Commonwealth in the collection of duties of customs and of excise, and in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth under this Constitution.

(b) the proportion of the state, according to the number of its people, in the expenditure of the Commonwealth incurred by reason of the original powers given to it by this Constitution.

But any expenditure of the Commonwealth, originated by the requirements of the Commonwealth, in respect of services or powers transferred, and not incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance in any state of the services as existing at the time of the transfer, shall be taken to be incurred by reason of the original powers given to the Commonwealth by this Constitution.

III. The Commonwealth shall pay to each state, month by month, the balance (if any) in favour of the state.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Before the discussion goes any further I desire to point out that there are two amendments suggested in this clause. One is suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia, and another by the Parliament of Western Australia. But I do not propose to put them, because they have already been practically disposed of. The question before the Chair now is-

That all the words after the word "imposed" (line 2) be struck out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

The report of the Finance Committee suggests that the Commonwealth shall "credit each state with the revenue collected therein from duties from customs and of excise." The committee are dealing now with the period before uniform duties are imposed, and, as I understood Mr. Reid, the amendment is simply that the Commonwealth shall credit the state with the revenues collected from duties of customs and excise. We were careful to put in the word "therein", to make it perfectly clear that each state is to be credited with the duties collected in that state, and I shall be glad to know why that word has been left out?

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales).

Because it is really unnecessary there; it is merely a question of drafting. The clause as it is cannot possibly mean anything else than that the duties collected in a state are the duties to be credited to that state. There is no objection to put in the word "therein."

Mr. REID.

May it be taken with concurrence that the word "therein" is in the proposed amendment?

The CHAIRMAN.

Yes.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).

As this is one of the fundamental changes made by the Finance Committee, I should like to make a suggestion on points open to consideration. Sub-section (2b) provides for a per capita sharing of the expenditure; that will be very beneficial to Western Australia. We have in the subsequent clause made provision that, as a per capita distribution of the surplus would be unfair to Western Australia, a special provision should be made to meet that case. But here we find, when it comes to a question of expenditure, Western Australia is not to receive consideration from the paying point of view. Look at the position with regard to other colonies. We find that Tasmania-with a revenue about one-fourth that of Western Australia, but with a population practically the same-will have to pay the same share of this new expenditure as Western Australia. That seems to me to be unfair. If exceptional provision is made for the payment of the surplus, on the ground that a per capita distribution would be unfair, I cannot see why a special provision ought not to be made for expenditure.

Mr. REID.

If the Western Australians do not ask for it, surely you do not.

Mr. GLYNN.

It affects the whole; there is Tasmania, for instance.

Mr. REID.

They do not ask for it.

Mr. GLYNN.

I would not raise the objection if I were not prepared to offer a solution. I mentioned before that the difficulty of distributing the surplus could be got over by averaging the proportion of females and children to males in all the colonies. I cannot see any objection to that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   It would be expensive.

Mr. GLYNN. -
   There may be some humour in that, but I do not see it.

Mr. REID. -
   It is not meant for humour.

Mr. GLYNN. -
   The statistics show the proportion of males to females and children. You would then take the average proportion for the whole Commonwealth, and you could strike an average on that for each state. All you have to do is to allot the surplus according to the average proportion of males to females and children.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   Would it not be better to equalize matters by the importation of females?

Mr. GLYNN. -
   I see there is a little humour oozing out after all in a matter that lends itself to it, but I shall refrain from taking notice of it, notwithstanding my nationality. If that would be a fair basis for distributing a surplus, it would also be fair in the allotment of the expenditure. The difficulty in Western Australia is that the families are not in Western Australia, but in Victoria, and in other colonies, whilst the bread-winners are in Western Australia. If what I propose be carried out, there would be an additional benefit, because Western Australia would get a larger portion of the surplus in respect of people now living in the other colonies.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
   How could you arrive at the number of bread-winners who are in Western Australia?

Mr. GLYNN. -
   It could be ascertained easily from the statistics or the census. An average could be arrived at for the whole of the five colonies, and on that average the allotment could be made. Honorable members may not see the point of what I am urging, but it ought to be very carefully considered. All that you have to do is to allow the same proportion of females and children to males in Western Australia as actually exists in the other colonies. If you do that, the allotment of the surplus per capita cannot possibly injure Western Australia.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
   If that were the only cause of discrepancy it would be all right, but that is not the case.

Mr. GLYNN. -
That is the chief obstacle to a per capita distribution of the surplus.

Mr. SOLOMON. - Not at all; there is the question of wages, which are 100 percent higher than in the other colonies, and therefore the spending power is greater.

Mr. GLYNN. - That affects production.

Mr. SOLOMON. - It affects the revenue.

Mr. GLYNN. - Decidedly; but it does not matter what the revenue is, it has to be paid whether the population is 160,000 or 260,000, and is not revenue on a per capita basis. I am dealing with the allotment of the surplus and its distribution on a per capita principle. Although the bread-winners reside in Western Australia, many of their families do not, and the discrepancy could be got over in the way I mention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - That would get rid of the bookkeeping difficulty.

Mr. GLYNN. - No, it would not get rid of the difficulty raised by New South Wales.

Mr. WISE. - It would get rid of the housekeeping difficulty.

Mr. GLYNN. - Undoubtedly. I offer this suggestion as a solution of one of the difficulties which face us. It would be premature for me to offer any opinion on the housekeeping difficulties. It would undoubtedly get over the difficulty presented by paragraph (b) of sub-section (2) of clause 90. We are adopting a population basis, which does not represent what ought to be the contribution of Western Australia to the expenditure on account of the original powers vested in the Federal Parliament. I can see no objection to the application of the principle I have pointed out. On another point I would like to call attention to the fact that, by not federalizing to the fullest extent (as regards defence, as suggested by Dr. Quick) on all the lines taken over, as well as Customs and Excise, you are destroying for some years-certainly for two years, and probably for seven years-the benefit of an amalgamation of those lines. Under these circumstances it will be impossible to reduce salaries and promote economy in the departments, because you have to keep each department as it stands when taken over by the Federal Parliament, or the states may object. The bookkeeping is to be kept up, so that you really postpone for seven years the benefit of amalgamation of these lines. Why not do what was done in Germany, which would permit of an amalgamation at once? The German system federalized the Post and Telegraph departments from the start with regard to revenue and expenditure, but they made a provision for the allotment of any surplus on the federal working of those departments in proportion to the profits made in each state between 1861 and 1865. They took the surplus of each state from 1861 to 1865, and they determined upon an average in what proportion the various states should share for a period of eight years in the surplus realized by the federal working of the Posts and Telegraph department. That would be perfectly fair, and it did not, as this bookkeeping does, postpone the operation of the federalization for seven years. Under the system we are about to adopt we cannot, perhaps, interfere with any officer in order to promote economy; we cannot have a uniform rate for postage and telegrams as long as the bookkeeping is kept up. The German system would be the best one to adopt. I think we ought to add at the end of the clause the following proviso:—

Provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the Commonwealth from adopting uniform or other charges in respect of the services or powers transferred to the Commonwealth, or diminishing the cost of maintenance or continuance of any department.

If that is put in, the greater part of the objection I have urged to the amalgamation of these departments on account of the bookkeeping will fall to the ground.

Mr. REID (New South Wales).—

I can assure the honorable member (Mr Glynn) that all these matters were taken into consideration, and at one time we saw a prospect of reconciling the statistics of the colonies in the way he mentions but some honorable members showed so many practical difficulties in the way of following the movements of population, which would be necessary in order to equalize the product, that we found we had to fall back on this system. I am sorry that we could not find it possible to adopt the suggestion of the honorable member.

The amendment that the words after "imposed" be struck out was agreed to, and the words proposed by Mr. Reid were inserted.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 91. - During the first three years after the establishment of the Commonwealth, notwithstanding anything contained in the last section, the total yearly expenditure of the Commonwealth, in the exercise of the original powers given to it by this Constitution, shall not exceed the sum of £300,000; and the total yearly expenditure of the Commonwealth in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the states to the Commonwealth by this Constitution shall not exceed the sum of £1,250,000.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I propose the omission of this clause. The next clause in the draft before honorable members will fit in with the following clause (92) in the Bill.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
I should like to have some explanation.

Mr. WISE. -
It is all right.

Mr. LYNE. -
It is all wrong.

Mr. REID. -
I am with you there.

Mr. LYNE. -
Then why do you not stick to it?

Mr. REID. -
I was overborne.

Mr. LYNE. -

I can see that it is useless to oppose anything the Finance Committee has agreed to, because in that caucus they have agreed to everything, and members of the Convention seem to follow them like sheep. In reference to this matter, I think it is to be regretted that the limit of expenditure is to be struck out. It is one thing which will conduce very much to opposition to the Bill in the various states, because there is a strong and growing feeling that this Federation will be very extravagant indeed. If the limit of expenditure had been allowed to remain, that feeling could have been overcome by those advocating the Bill. In the interests of the acceptance of the Bill in the various states, this proposal

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Oh!

Mr. LYNE. -
The right honorable member (Sir John Forrest), if any one says a word he does not agree with, wants to get on and rush things through, but we cannot do things quite so rapidly as they do in Western Australia. Perhaps Western Australia does not care much how this Bill is dealt with, as she may not intend to take advantage of it; but I am speaking for a colony which does desire to take advantage of it, if possible; and I am quite certain that the excision of this limitation will have a very bad effect in the minds of the public of New South Wales.
Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I do not think that the public of New South Wales are nearly so foolish as the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) would make them out to be. No one believes that the first Federal Ministry is likely to be unduly extravagant; but, if they were, no one believes that they would be restrained by a clause of this sort in the Constitution, because there are a hundred ways in which, if they thought it necessary to spend money, they could spend it without contravening a clause of this kind. The public know that if they constitute a Federal Ministry, they must trust it with the full control of every executive act. A clause of this kind would only mislead those who wished to be misled, while it could not mislead any man of intelligence in any part of the community.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

After the remarks of the honorable member (Mr. Wise), I think it is necessary for me to say a word or two. I think I know the feeling and temper of the people of New South Wales on this matter a little better than the honorable gentleman does, and I say, unhesitating, that every word he has stated is contrary to the true state of feeling in New South Wales.

Mr. DOBSON. -

No.

Mr. LYNE. -

The honorable member (Mr. Dobson) knows nothing about it, nor, I think, about the feeling in Tasmania either.

Mr. HOWE. -

He is a renegade.

Mr. LYNE. -

I do not say anything about him being a renegade, but I know that he is a very strong conservative, at any rate. However, I do not wish to say anything about Tasmania. I was referring to the statement of Mr. Wise that no person with a grain of sense could be misled by this clause if it was kept in the Bill.

Mr. WISE. -

If a war were to break out, and it was necessary to expend money, would any Ministry be confined by this clause?

Mr. LYNE. -

The clause does not refer to the spending of money for defence at all. That is an entirely different matter, as the honorable member knows. The clause was inserted at Adelaide, in order to give some confidence to the public that there would not be that extravagance which, it is believed, will surround the Federal Government.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

The Premier of New South Wales suggested it, I believe.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, and I believe in it now.

Mr. LYNE. -

The right honorable member (Mr. Reid) suggested it, and, I think, very rightly so, too. There is a strong feeling in the minds of the public that there will be unnecessary extravagance, and it will have a very grave effect on obtaining the successful acceptance of the Bill if this is struck out.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I wish to say that, although I gave way on the Finance Committee as to this clause, I certainly am of the opinion expressed by the honorable member (Mr. Lyne). I believe, whatever we in this Convention may think, that the people of Australia will look to the question of expenditure, inasmuch as they, and not we, have to find the money, as one of the serious questions of this Federation; and I must say that the rate payers and taxpayers of Australia will do well to look to those matters, as people in all British communities never fail to do. We are establishing a Commonwealth taxing power, we are leaving intact a state taxing power, we have in most parts of the colonies a municipal taxing power, and, with the establishment of a new taxing power, I think-though I hope not-this question may, in the ordinary nature of things, exercise the people of Australia very seriously. It was in order to re-assure such a feeling, if it did prevail-and I am afraid it will-that I thought it well to put in certain limitations, which would, at any rate, guarantee that the expenditure of the Commonwealth, for the first few years, should be on a strictly economical basis. Of course we understand that if any great emergency, such as war, broke out, that would over-ride every other consideration; as it always has done under all the Constitutions in the world. Moreover, that expenditure would not be a revenue expenditure, which is the only expenditure limited in this clause-it would be a loan expenditure. I am as earnestly of the opinion expressed by Mr. Lyne as he can be, but in the Finance Committee I was overborne by a large majority, and I believe there is a majority of the Convention against me, too. At the same time, I do think that Mr. Lyne is treated with great injustice when his argument is regarded so lightly.

The clause was struck out.

Clause 92. - During the first five years after uniform duties of customs have been imposed, the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the states for any year shall not be less than the aggregate amount returned to them during the year last before the imposition of such duties.
I. Subject to the last paragraph, for a period of five years after the imposition of uniform duties of customs, the total amount of duties of customs and excise collected in each year in any state, or estimated as hereinafter provided, as the case may require, shall be repaid to such state of the Commonwealth, after deducting from the amount, in proportion to the population, the share of the state in the total expenditure of the Commonwealth not provided for by other means of revenue. The repayment shall be made month by month to the several states, in, as nearly as practicable, the proper proportions.

II. For the purpose of ascertaining the proportion of revenue from customs and excise collected in each state, there shall for the first year after the imposition of uniform duties of customs be shown in the books of the Treasury of the Commonwealth the total amount collected in each state for duties of customs and excise.

III. During such first year the duty chargeable under the uniform Tariff upon goods which are imported into any state (whether duty has or has not been actually paid thereon), and during that year exported to any other state for consumption therein, shall be deemed to have been collected in, and shall be credited to, such other state only, and all duties of excise paid in respect of any goods manufactured in any state, and so exported to another state for consumption therein, shall be deemed to have been collected in, and shall be credited to, such other state only:

IV. For the purpose of estimating the amount of the customs and excise arising in each state during each of the four years next after such first year, an average shall be taken by dividing the total customs and excise collected in the whole Commonwealth during such first year by the total population of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth; and the result shall be deemed to be the amount contributed by each person:

V. Where the amount credited to any state during such first year is in excess of the amount of the average so ascertained, there shall in each of the next four years be deducted therefrom one-fifth part of the excess; and where the amount so credited is less than such average, there shall be added to the amount one-fifth part of the sum by which the amount so credited is less than the average; and the sums so ascertained shall be the estimated amounts to be repaid in each of the four years to the states respectively.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Before putting this clause, allow me to state the position. There are a great number of amendments suggested by various colonies on this clause, but, on reading them carefully through, I think they have all been already disposed of, as the committee has already arrived at conclusions which are inconsistent with any of the suggestions made. Therefore, I do not think it is necessary to put any of them.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That all the words after the word "imposed" (line 2) be struck out, with a view to the insertion of the following words: "and thereafter until the Parliament otherwise provides-

I. The duties of customs chargeable on goods imported into a state, and thence exported to another state for consumption therein, and the duties of excise paid on goods manufactured in a state, and thence exported to another state for consumption therein, shall be taken to have been collected in the state in which such goods have been consumed.

II. The Commonwealth shall credit each state with the amount of the duties collected, and so taken to have been collected, in that state, and with the revenues collected in the performance of services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth by this Constitution.

III. The Commonwealth shall debit each state with expenditure ascertained as prescribed by sub-section II. of the preceding section.

IV. The Commonwealth shall pay to each state month by month the balance (if any) in favour of the state.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I have no doubt the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) will temporarily withdraw his amendment, if there is a prior amendment to propose.

Mr. REID. -

Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I simply rose to point out that the whole phase of this question has been more or less altered since the report of the Finance Committee in Adelaide, because we are here really giving everything absolutely to the control of the Federal Parliament, except during these five years. There is no specific guarantee, there is nothing of the character of a complicated question. That being so, and this being more directory than anything else, it is a question well worthy of consideration whether this period should not be reduced to three years.

Mr. LYNE. -

You mean the bookkeeping period?
Mr. McMILLAN. -

Yes; it does not follow that if we reduce the period to three years the bookkeeping system will not go on for a further period if necessary. We are simply erecting, as was said the other day, a temporary bridge; not altogether to give the Parliament a certain period in which it should have data for its own consideration, but so that it should have breathing time to consider the whole question, and, if the Parliament finds that three years is not a sufficient period to get out the necessary data upon which to graft some further considerations in the future, then it would be very easy for it to extend the period of bookkeeping. But it is very questionable whether we ought, in such a rigid way, to make it mandatory on the Parliament that this must go on for a period of five years. We have all agreed that the difficulty of this financial problem arises out of the fact that we are dealing with an unknown quantity, that unknown quantity being the uniform Federal Tariff. It is just possible, owing to certain circumstances and conditions in the character of the Tariff, that many of the difficulties that seem to attend the position now will disappear. At any rate, within a year of the uniform Tariff there will be a flood of light upon the whole question, because this Tariff will be framed on federal principles, and, further, you will have all the machinery of your Federal Government, with all the best abilities of this continent, and with the conditions exactly before them, to consider the whole situation. In order to test the feeling of the committee I will move-

That "five" (line 1) be struck out, with the view of substituting "three."

By this amendment I am not, in any way, attempting to say that it may not take five years' bookkeeping to get out the data; but I wish to make the time as short as possible during which the Federal Parliament will be bound by this mandate to carry on a system which all of us consider is, after all, only the best solution of an evil that we cannot counteract.

Mr. Reid's amendment was temporarily withdrawn.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

I hope the committee will adhere to the period of five years. It seems to me that the first year of the uniform Tariff will not give at all reliable data to go upon. In the course of five years the present abnormal state of Western Australia will, to some extent, be mitigated. Again, Tasmania, in five years, owing to the manner in which her mineral resources are being developed, will have a much better average; and we know that Tasmania, at present, is the colony which is apparently being treated least favorably under the proposed scheme. I think there is no doubt of that, and when the time comes I will give Tasmania my support in asking for some subsidy during the five years.
Mr. REID. -
Subsidy; no, douceur.

Mr. WALKER. -
So far as the colony which I have the honour to represent is concerned, the returns for the first year of the five will be absolutely misleading, because of the enormous importations of goods which will take place immediately prior to the establishment of the uniform Tariff while over a period of three years the statistics will show our average contributions to be less than they really will be in the long run.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
As a matter of personal explanation, I wish to say that the amendment which I have just moved appears on the notice paper under the name of Mr. Henry. Of course, had I known that before, I should not have moved it.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -
I am only too glad that the honorable member takes the same view of this question as I take, and that he has anticipated me in regard to the amendment of which I have given notice. The clause contemplates the continuation of the bookkeeping system for the period of five years, and for any term beyond that which the Parliament may decide upon. Practically this means that we shall in all probability have to wait seven years before we obtain absolute freedom of trade. I believe I am right in saying that a considerable majority of honorable members are opposed to the bookkeeping system, and that it has been accepted as a compromise to meet the existing state of things. That we know is the feeling which exists among a number of prominent representatives from New South Wales and Western Australia. I am not now going to enter into the question of the propriety of adopting this compromise. It is sufficient that we accept the scheme as a compromise. It is quite conceivable that after five years the people of Australia and the Federal Parliament may find the bookkeeping system so costly and so irritating that they will desire to discontinue it, and the amendment would give the Federal Parliament the power to say at the end of three years-"This system has continued long enough, and in the interests of freedom of trade it is time that it came to an end." I desire to secure federation and freedom of trade amongst the colonies above all things, and, although freedom of trade will be considerably restricted by this irritating, annoying, and costly system of bookkeeping, it is a choice of evils, and I reluctantly feel that we must accept it. I hope, however, that honorable members will see the advisability of giving the Federal Parliament the power to discontinue the system at the end of three years if they think fit I should like to say a few words with regard to the remarks of the honorable member (Mr. Walker) and others, who maintain that the experience acquired during the bookkeeping period will be of value to the Federal Parliament in determining the mode in which the surplus should be distributed.

Mr. WALKER. -

We hope that it will.

Mr. HENRY. -

I demur to that. No experience that can be acquired in five years will be helpful in determining the mode of distributing the surplus.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

That is an argument in favour of continuing the bookkeeping system for a longer period.

Mr. HENRY. -

No. Those who aim at perfect equity in the distribution of the surplus must be willing to agree to a perpetual system of bookkeeping. The only experience that you will acquire by the bookkeeping system will be a demonstration of the fact that there must be inequalities in the contributions of the several colonies. It seems to me inevitable that there will be such discrepancies, although I contend that in the main, considering the habits and conditions of the people of Australia, we shall not be very far apart in our relative contributions. I believe, however, that for all time, under a uniform Tariff, some of the colonies will be contributing less per head of the population than others. No man can get a real grasp of the reasons for this disparity in contribution until he has mastered the fact that, with people of the habits of the people of Australia, it is the proportion of males to the whole population that determines the contribution to a Customs revenue. We know that in Australia these conditions are always changing. We have in this part of the world a floating population; many people are continually moving from one colony to another. In one colony there may be a large preponderance of males to-day, while within a short period that preponderance may occur in some other colony. At the present time it is occurring in Western Australia. In that colony the proportion of adult males is 51 per cent., while in South Australia it is only 25 per cent. I am very much interested to note that the figures, which I worked out, based upon the consumption of a certain number of articles, to show the contribution per head in each colony, bear a distinct relation to the adult population of each colony. I say again, emphatically, that while there is a disparity in the male adult population of the colonies there will always be a disparity in the contribution to the Customs revenue. This disparity, however, will be subject to change as the conditions of the colonies change from time to time. It is inconceivable to me that the bookkeeping system, under which alone you would secure perfect equity and justice in the distribution of the surplus, could continue for all time, but I think that you can arrive at some basis of distribution at the end of three years as well as at the end of five years. I admit the force of the remark of the honorable member (Mr. Walker) in regard to the position of New South Wales. There is every probability that in the first year after the establishment of the Commonwealth that colony will contribute, less to the revenue than will be contributed by the other states because of the heavy stocks which will be hold by the merchants and traders there in anticipation of the coming into force of the Constitution.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
In the first year New South Wales will contribute less than her normal contribution.

Mr. HENRY. -
Yes. I hope that honorable members will see the propriety of not tying the hands of the Commonwealth Parliament too rigidly by saying to them "You shall continue the bookkeeping system for five years," and that we shall give them the power, if the people of the country protest against the annoyance of the system, to bring it to an end after three years.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I do not wish to address the Convention unless there is a prospect of the recommendation of the Finance Committee being altered, because I think that the whole of our trouble will be thrown away if the amendment is adopted. We have all felt the greatest reluctance to adopt this system of bookkeeping for five years, but its object is to give confidence to the taxpayers throughout Australia, and to create the belief that before any rough-and-ready method of distributing the surplus is adopted, an effort will be made to obtain a knowledge of the actual facts of the case by experience. The period of three years would be considered upon our side of the border as likely to give no satisfaction at all. I quite understand the inconvenience to the trading community, which has, naturally impressed the honorable member (Mr. McMillan); but we must expose them to this inconvenience in order to satisfy the feelings of the large body of the people. Are we to give way to the requirements of the commercial community, or are we to arrange for such a period of bookkeeping as will convince the people of Australia that at all events approximate justice will be done to them? We have to choose between these two positions.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I am as strongly opposed as any member of the Convention to the bookkeeping system, but I feel that, if we are to have it at all, and if its, results are—to be of any use to the Federal Parliament, it is better to fix the period at five rather than at three years. For the first twelve months, and probably for the first eighteen months, you will hardly get fair results, because we know that the fiscal policy of New South Wales will allow of large importations being made into that colony in the years immediately preceding the establishment of federation. Therefore, while I should be glad to see the bookkeeping system swept out of existence, I think that if we are to have it as a guide to the Federal Parliament we should have it for a period of five years.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I have always been opposed to the bookkeeping system, I do not like it, and I think that there are many arguments to be raised against its adoption. At the same time, when it became inevitable that we should adopt it, I sought to make the period as short as possible. I should have liked to have fixed upon two years, but, having accepted five years as a compromise, I feel bound in conscience to stick to that arrangement. After all, five years is a short time in the life of a nation, and a compromise having been arrived at, I hope that the Convention will accept it as a whole.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There is one strong reason why I think the period of five years instead of three years should be adopted. There is a strong disposition amongst adverse critics to attempt to make the public believe that we are accepting the bookkeeping system in order to shunt all the responsibility in regard to the finances on to the Federal Parliament. It is argued that the Convention could deal with this question instead of remitting it to another body. The whole argument in favour of the position taken up by the Finance Committee, and which I hope will be taken up by the Convention, consists in the difference between dealing with a subject upon mere speculation and dealing with it upon sufficient evidence. Those who say, as persons have said in the press and elsewhere, that we are handing over a difficult problem to another body, with the implication that that body has no better means of dealing with it than we have ourselves, are met at once by the fact that we propose to hand the problem over only on the understanding that that other body will have that sufficient evidence which it is impossible for us to obtain at this stage. Looking at the matter in that way, is it not quite plain that the mutable conditions of trade—the great changes which will occur after the change from five or six diverse Tariffs to a uniform Tariff—will furnish evidence every day that will assist in a reasonable final adjustment? Is it not also plain that while the effect of the more sudden change, and that alone, is manifest, that this is not the time to decide finally upon what should be the distribution of the surplus? What then we have to arrive at, I take it, is some period of time which will put into contrast the mere change that will occur as the first result of the alteration of the Tariffs to a uniform Tariff, and those further settlements of conditions which will supervene upon that sudden change. This affords evidence which will enable the Commonwealth to judge between the period immediately succeeding the change and the period approaching that settlement of conditions which will follow on that. To my mind, it is obvious that three years will not serve this purpose. Much as I respect—and I do respect very highly—the financial sagacity and the strong reasoning power of my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan), I do not think that three years will afford sufficient evidence for giving the foundation upon which alone the Commonwealth ought to rest its final distribution of the surplus. My honorable friend's argument would be a good one if he could show that the Federal Parliament would be as likely to arrive at a just determination upon the experience of three years as upon the experience of five years. I take it the difference would be this: The experience of the first one, two, or three years would probably be the experience of a period during which sudden changes would be making themselves felt. The next period following that year, to say five or six years, would be a period during which the conditions would be assuming a normal aspect, so that the contrast between the change itself and the settlement of conditions would afford evidence to the Federal Parliament on which to determine this distribution for the future. That is briefly the ground on which I feel bound to rest my opposition to any limitation of this period to three years. I confess at once that five years, like three years, would of the conditions of trade and the effects that follow the imposition of a Tariff, that three years would scarcely be sufficient to test the effects of the uniform Tariff. If that is so, a longer period than three years is necessary. Our view of this matter must be affected by our unanimous dislike of bookkeeping transactions between the Commonwealth and the states. We only impose these limits of bookkeeping until a sufficient period elapses to enable the Commonwealth to obtain the necessary evidence. Until that evidence is obtained all that we can do in the way of an attempt at settlement is not only premature but mere guesswork. Having arrived at a period which does afford something like a sufficient test, we should take that period. Three years would be an insufficient test, but by the end of five years there would be a probability either of the conditions becoming normal, or, at any rate, of their tendency being so observed as that the Federal Parliament would know what the result would be which was to follow on the Federal Tariff, under conditions apart from sudden change and of a return to a normal state of things. I believe that the Finance Committee have acted with discretion in fixing five years, and I shall support their view of the subject.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I do not understand the Hon. Mr. McMillan's view to be that three years will be sufficient or insufficient. The view my honorable friend takes, and it is one in which I agree with him, is that the determination on that question ought to be left to the Federal Parliament. You propose to leave the determination to the Federal Parliament of whether five years is sufficient. That is merely the fixing of a minimum period, but if the data then available to the Federal Parliament is not considered enough, it will be open to them, under the clauses as they now stand, to extend the period for another five or even ten years. But there is a feeling amongst a large number of people, and a feeling that might give rise to considerable criticism of these provisions, that this bookkeeping method is undesirable.
We know that the honorable members who have spoken—the Hon. Mr.
Holder and others, who have given great attention to the subject—have expressed their dislike to this bookkeeping method, and there is no doubt there is a great deal of feeling to the same effect outside. If we can minimize that in some way without limiting or hampering the Federal Parliament it is desirable that we should do so. The amendment does not impose any restriction on the Federal Parliament. It merely says that the minimum period shall be three years, and, therefore, it will be something, at any rate, with which to meet adverse criticism outside on the matter of bookkeeping, because we can say that it has been reduced, subject to the control of the Federal Parliament, to the shortest period consistent with that condition of mutability to which the leader of the Convention has referred.
The amendment is not submitted with a view of restricting the Federal Parliament, but of enlarging their discretion, and my own disposition is to support it.

Mr. REID. -

Enlarging the discretion takes away the certainty.

Mr. SYMON. -

The right honorable member has put what is the strongest argument in favour of the provision. I agree that if the Convention are satisfied now that five years is the minimum which ought to be prescribed we should not shorten it. I assent to that emphatically. If the Finance Committee, by whom, of course, we are greatly guided, are of opinion that that is the shortest possible period within which these conditions of change can be got rid of, that is an unanswerable argument. I admit that, but, subject to that, I think there is very great force in the view of my honorable friend.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I suppose we are all agreed that we should like to do away with the bookkeeping system. We have recommendations brought up by the gentlemen in charge of the Governments of every one of the colonies, who all, we may fairly well suppose, understand the public feeling in their own colonies. All agree that five years would be more acceptable to the general public than the shorter period. To me, on a question like that, federation is first and the detail nowhere, and I should not dream of seriously disagreeing with the unanimous opinion of the Premiers and Treasurers of all the colonies. They know their own concerns. They know the feeling of the colonies they represent. They know the difficulties they may have to meet, and they know the way in which they will be best surmounted. It being agreed by all of us that there must be an interim in which this objectionable method will have to be pursued, it would be much simpler to take the recommendation coming from the most authoritative source which can exist in the colonies, and particularly as it is a unanimous recommendation, rather than to endeavour to gratify our own private notions, which may be founded on inferior experience and a less understanding of the general views of the population of Australia. I hope that the clause will be passed as it stands.

Mr. McMillan's amendment was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment now before us is to strike out all the words after "imposed."

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

This clause opens up a very important question, that of how we are to deal with the various states during the period of transition. Honorable members will recollect that during this period the states Treasurers, under this proposal, will have no guarantee whatever as to the amount of money which they will derive from the customs and excise duties of their respective colonies.

Mr. LYNE. -

They will be left high and dry.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are leaving it, under the proposals as they now stand, to the Federal Parliament to impose such duties as it may think proper. We are also giving it power to expend as much of the money it obtains as it thinks proper, and in such a way as it may deem best, and it is to return to the states Treasurers as much as it may choose. That is the position which we have to face, and it does appear to me to be a very serious one indeed. It is serious, not alone looking at existing circumstances, but serious when we come to look at the fact that the states will have to provide that large amount of money for the federal expenditure-an expenditure which has not to be provided for now. I believe that Victoria will have to pay probably a third of the federal expenditure, which will mean something over, if not considerably over, £100,000 a year. Then we know also that the Treasurer will lose the amount now collected from intercolonial duties.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The new Tariff will make that up.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Whether we make it up or not by other means, we shall undoubtedly lose the revenue now derived from the intercolonial duties, which in our colony would probably amount to £200,000 a year. The total amount, if Queensland does come in, would be close upon £1,000,000. If Queensland does not come in, I suppose it will not be more than probably one-half that amount. Then we have also to bear this in mind, that it is said that the money represented by these intercolonial duties will remain in the pockets of the people. To some extent that may be true, but it will not remain in the pockets of the people who now pay the duties. Take the item of sugar alone. We cannot for one moment, I think, say that the labourer who buys his two or three pounds of sugar is going to get it any cheaper after the duties are taken off than he does now.

Mr. FRASER. -

He ought to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The man who buys his two or three bags or his ton of sugar at a time will get a reduction.

We often see notices put up that in consequence of a reduction of duty the price of sugar is reduced.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You may see such notices, and you may possibly see a notice with a large 2s. and a small 113/4d. following it. We cannot suppose that the man who buys his sugar in very small quantities is going to save anything when these intercolonial duties are taken off. While to some extent it may be true that the money will remain in the pockets of the people, as a matter of fact it will not remain in the pockets of the people who have to pay the new duties that will be put on for the purpose of raising the amount the Treasurer will lose by the cessation of these particular duties.

Mr. REID. -

But your argument is not concerned in that at all; your argument is that the Treasury will have so much less—it does not matter where it goes. Your argument is quite good in either case.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, but I was referring to an argument used the other day, that the money will remain in the pockets of the people.

Mr. SYMON. -

Mr. Isaacs proved that absolutely.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Well I have to differ from my legal adviser occasionally, more especially when I believe he is wrong and I am right. I often have to give way to him, but I like to take an opportunity of disagreeing with him when I can get a fair chance. I was pointing out that these other duties would have to be put on, and the result with us will probably be that a large number of articles now on our free list will have to be made dutiable for the purpose of raising the extra amount which will be required. Then we will probably be also faced with the difficulty that if certain of our duties are reduced by the uniform Tariff, an they may be, if they are not reduced sufficiently low to kill our protected industries and largely increase the imports, we will there also lose a large amount of revenue. Then again, look at our Post-office: We have a 2d. letter postage, and a postage on newspapers. If the Federal Parliament says we shall have a 1d. letter postage, and no postage on newspapers, there again, we, as a state, will lose a considerable amount of revenue. Now, we have to face these difficulties. We have to look ahead and see how we are going to raise the very large amount of money which we will probably lose if these alterations of the Tariff be made. Added to them, under another proposal in this Bill, while suffering those heavy losses ourselves, we probably will have to share the losses of Western Australia to a considerable amount. I saw it mentioned the other day that Western Australia would lose some £380,000, and that the other colonies would have to make that up.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is rubbish.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Of course that estimate is not correct. At the start Western Australia may lose, I reckon, £200,000.

Mr. HENRY. -

Even that estimate is quite speculative.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
At any rate, Western Australia will have a heavy loss, although a loan gradually reducing as time goes on.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Have you allowed for the revenue from the new duties?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Yes, allowing for the new duties that would be put on sugar, tea, and other articles, I believe that instead of losing £380,000, which it is said Western Australia will lose, the loss of that colony will probably be reduced to something like £200,000. But of that loss we, as a colony, will have to find our share.

Mr. LYNE. -
So will we.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Yes, but I am speaking of Victoria.

Mr. HOLDER. -
If Western Australia loses £200,000 it will not be £200,000 more than the average loss of the other colonies. You have to take another big slice off that £200,000

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Of course Western Australia will have to bear her proportion of the loss. I am allowing for that in the amount I am deducting £180,000—because her proportion would

Mr. HOLDER. -
You have first to take from off that £200,000 the amount of the average loss all round, and then apportion the rest among the states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Yes; but if we take in the profits of New South Wales, as it is suggested we have to do, then, of course, the amount we will have to pay will be considerably larger. But even if we take the average loss all round off the loss of Western Australia, we will still have to pay a considerable amount. If it be not so, there is no reason why we should put that provision in the Bill. I am confident that unless the amount which Western Australia is going to get is something considerable, her representatives will not have their colony specially mentioned in this Bill as receiving exceptional treatment.

Mr. LYNE. -
They know what they are about.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
They cannot recommend the Bill to their people if we do not insert such a
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am not going to say that I intend to oppose that provision, but I want to see if it be not possible to devise some scheme which will not throw this heavy loss on the colonies at the present time. I believe that these colonies cannot bear it. I believe it will be a matter of utter impossibility if in Victoria we are to lose those various amounts that I have mentioned, and if we have to make up some considerable amount as our share of the special loss of Western Australia. I, as Treasurer, say that I know of no means at present by which this colony can raise that amount of money except one means: We might put on a considerable heavy land tax, which it would be almost impossible to get through our Parliament.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

If you reduce the minimum of incomes liable to the income tax to the same level as in South Australia, you will get all you want.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No, we should not got more than £50,000 extra. I have calculated that. But we could not carry such an amendment of our Income Tax Act.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It would put the burden on the wrong people, too.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Put it on the Legislative Council; that is a fair offer.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

A scheme has been suggested to me with regard to this bookkeeping—I believe it has also been suggested to other members of the Convention—that for the purpose of avoiding this bookkeeping system altogether, we should, if we possibly can, now devise what would be a fair amount to recoup to each colony on the basis of the population, not on the per capita basis. We, in Adelaide, endeavoured to get rid of the difficulty of the inequality in the start of the per capita system by means of a sliding scale, which I still heartily approve of, and which I would have been glad to have seen adopted. But Mr. Harper, who is a financial man amongst us in Victoria, and also a merchant, assures me, from his experience of doing business in all the colonies, that this bookkeeping system will absolutely fail to get anything like a true record of trade transactions between the different colonies, and he has suggested, and I think it is well worthy of the consideration of the Convention, or at all events of the Finance Committee, if it can be called together again, that we should take the experience of a certain number of past years—three, four, or five years—ascertain the whole of the duties that were in force in all the colonies, and what was the return per capita of the Customs revenue, and then endeavour to modify those amounts. He tells me that in Victoria the amount would be about £1 13s., and while we may have to pay more to the Customs revenue by our free list being curtailed, or we may have to pay less by alterations of the duties, he suggests we might take that amount as a fair basis on which to work. Then, ascertaining that in South Australia they pay a certain amount, that we should on that either give them a little more or a little less as in the circumstances may appear to be just, and so deal with all the colonies.

Mr. LYNE. -
That was the first proposal made in the Finance Committee.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I made a proposal somewhat similar to that in the Finance Committee, but this is the proposal which has been suggested to me by Mr. Harper.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
You proposed to pool it all, didn't you?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Well, there have been so many proposals before the Finance Committee, and I have heard and read so many, that I am always in doubt whether I or somebody else proposed it.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
You proposed to pool it all, but you backed out of it afterwards.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
This proposal suggested by Mr. Harper is simply for the purpose of getting rid of the bookkeeping, which we all admit is a nuisance. If it were possible for the Finance Committee to be called together again-I do not think the Convention could go into all the details of the scheme and give it that full investigation which the scheme requires-and if the Convention could see their way to adopt a scheme of this kind, it would do away with our bookkeeping system by now fixing for the five years a certain rate per head, which should be the return to each of the colonies, basing that sum on the actual returns for the past five years, and making allowance for the different colonies assisted, dealing fairly, justly, and equitably with them all.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It would put each colony into a very invidious position, especially those which have to give away something.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Well, I should be glad if an opportunity could be given for the further consideration of that particular scheme. What I want to point out more particularly is, with regard to these losses, that many of the colonies cannot delay the consideration of them. I believe we ought to keep these colonies in a safe, sound, and solvent condition, and endeavour to make provision by means of which the colonies will be able to have repaid to them practically the amounts they are now receiving. I believe that the losses I have referred to should be made up by the Federation itself. It may be said- "How can the Federation make up the losses unless it takes the amount away from the state revenues?" Well, the Federation sooner or later must borrow, and I think we should be perfectly justified in formulating a scheme which would throw the onus on the Federation for the first five years of recouping to the different states the losses they will sustain, and which they will find out by the account keeping system, allowing the Federation to raise that money, as they will have to raise money afterwards, by means of a loan.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is, to borrow money to contribute to the revenue of the various states?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

To borrow money to keep the states in such a condition as will enable them to meet their obligations and pay their way.

Mr. FRASER. -

To borrow money to pay interest-a ruinous process!

Mr. REID. -

I am afraid our securities in the London market will be in a bad condition if we do that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am looking at this matter in the light of my knowledge as Treasurer of one of the colonies for the time being, and I am looking to the position the Treasurer of a colony, situated as we are, will be in when he has to make his Budget statement, and has to say to his Parliament-"I cannot tell you what your revenue is going to be; I do not know how much the Federation is going to raise, nor how much it is going to spend, and therefore I do not know how much is going to be returned to this state." There will be a grave fear in the minds of all our people that there will be a heavy loss to the different colonies in consequence of these various changes which are to be made. That fear will certainly be in the minds of our people outside unless we can show them distinctly that it is a fear which has no foundation; and I shall be glad to be satisfied that it has no foundation so far as I am concerned. But, unless this fear is removed, we shall find that one more difficulty will be added to confront those of us who are most anxious to bring about the accomplishment of federation.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Have you ever borrowed money in your colony to pay your way?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yet you propose that for the Federation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But we have never been in the difficult position in which we shall be placed by means of these chances. I am not wedded to the scheme of borrowing money if any other scheme can be devised, but I say that unless we can satisfy the people that they are not going to have a heavy loss in consequence of the coming, about of federation, and that we shall not be called upon to make up the amount lost by other means, we shall have a difficult task to persuade them to enter into the Federation. I shall be glad if any other scheme can be devised to get over the difficulty, but it is a difficulty that has confronted me for months past, and I have never been able to satisfy my own mind in regard to it. I shall be glad if some of the financial authorities whom we have in this Convention can show me that I am wrong, and that the fears of the people, that they will be called upon to raise such a large amount of money, are unfounded. At present, however, I foresee the grave difficulties that the people and the state Treasurers will be faced with hereafter; and I do say that for the sake of federation, and indeed for the sake of the solvency of the states in time to come, we should apply ourselves to devising some means whereby the various states will be able to get back at least the amount of money they are collecting at the present time, to enable them to carry on their affairs. We put a guarantee in the last Bill which has been omitted now. That guarantee would have forced the Federal Parliament to raise the necessary money either by customs duties of a larger amount than. they otherwise would raise-which would be one means of getting the money-or by some means such as borrowing. I do not like the borrowing plan myself. I confess that it is one that I should be sorry to adopt if any other scheme were open. I have only suggested that it is one way out of the difficulty we are faced with. I think that we should throw the onus upon the Federal Parliament of raising sufficient money by Customs or in some other way to enable the colonies to carry on to the end of the five years, by which time they will have made provision, either by a natural increase of revenue or by not increasing their expenditure, to meet the difficulties facing them. But I fear that unless we make some such provision the state Treasurers will be placed in an extremely difficult position. I bring the matter forward so that we may face it, and so that we may satisfy the people that their fears are not well founded; but in order to satisfy them of that, I am convinced that we must devise some scheme for getting rid of what at present appears to me to be a great difficulty to contend against.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

I recognise, with the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, that we have at last to face this somewhat difficult problem - a problem which has been avoided at each previous meeting of the Convention—that is, how the revenue of the Federal Parliament is to be raised. We have taken it for granted that the whole of the revenue is to be raised by a uniform Tariff. But, as pointed out by the last speaker, there is nothing in this Bill—nothing even in the suggestions of the Finance Committee—to insist upon the revenue which is to be raised in place of the revenue now to be given up by the various states being obtained from the taxpayers of the Commonwealth by means of a Customs Tariff.

Mr. REID. -

And no colony suggests that that should be put in the Bill.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

No colony, perhaps, has suggested it, because it has been taken, to a great extent, for granted. But the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales will, perhaps, call to his memory that, at the first meeting of the Finance Committee in Adelaide, there was an argument upon this very point; and the real reason—because it is no use mincing words at this stage of our proceedings—why a definite instruction was not placed in this Constitution as to the mode of obtaining the revenue was because it was thought that it would be dictating to the people of Australasia what the fiscal policy should be in the future. That reason was, as pointed out most strongly by the Premier of New South Wales, a reason which would materially affect the people of New South Wales as to coming into this Federation. It was admitted all through that the probability was that the Federal Parliament would frame a Tariff which, while not, perhaps, being so protective in its operation as the Tariff of Victoria or the Tariff of South Australia, would be a revenue-earning Tariff, and which would produce nearly as much, in the aggregate to the whole of the colonies as is at present produced by the existing Tariffs of the various colonies. That is to say, that a revenue Tariff could be framed—and I think that on more than one occasion Mr. Reid has mentioned that a revenue Tariff might be framed—embracing only a very few lines, which would return to the Commonwealth a sum of £6,000,000, or about, or even over, that sum, which would be equivalent to the aggregate amount collected in the various colonies now. If we had an assurance that this course would be adopted, that a revenue Tariff would be framed by the Federal Parliament as the means of raising the revenue which the various colonies are to give up, there would be little occasion for the fear which is now expressed by the Premier of Victoria. But it has been pointed out over and over again that, although it has been taken for granted by this Convention that the Customs which the states are giving up entirely, are to be the means of raising the revenue for the Commonwealth, there is a power in this Bill, in clause 52, which gives the Commonwealth the fullest possible power to raise money by any other mode of taxation. It is just as well when we are on this most important branch of our work that we should face the question and declare straight out—even though it may be a difficult thing to recommend to the people of any one particular state—that we expect the means of revenue to be adopted by the Federal Parliament to be precisely the same means of revenue as we give up to them; that is, the Customs and Excise.

Mr. Reid. -
That means heads I win, tails you lose.

Mr. Solomon. -
No; I think the Premier of New South Wales has admitted that he fully expects that the revenue will be raised in that manner.

Mr. Reid. -
I have never admitted anything as to what the future policy or Tariff of the Commonwealth would be. No man can make an admission on such a subject; because he does not know.

Mr. Solomon. -
I did not say that he had prophesied that there would be any special Tariff, but he has said that he was prepared, at least, for the revenue being raised through the Customs, and not through direct taxation.

Mr. Reid. -
I have never admitted anything of the kind; I have never made any statement on the subject.

Sir George Turner. -
The right honorable gentleman said the reverse on one occasion by an interjection.

Mr. Solomon. -
Well, we have a definite statement from him now that he does not desire to be bound in any way; that the colony of New South Wales, which he represents, does not desire to be bound in any way as to the manner in which the Federal Parliament shall raise revenue.

Mr. Reid. -
Or to bind.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

But as against the other four or five colonies, the policy of which is admitted on all sides, because I do not think there is a member of the Convention representing any other colony who will not say that he does not fully expect that the revenue of the Commonwealth will be raised from Customs and Excise.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Not for ever.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

A shorter period will do for me, say ten or fifteen years. If the members who represent South Australia, Tasmania, and Victoria were to go back to their constituents and to say-"Here is a Constitution under which we have no security that the revenue will be raised from Customs; we are giving up all right by our states to raise any revenue from Customs; we are placing ourselves in the hands of the Commonwealth, and it may raise, if necessary, by direct taxation, £6,000,000," will honorable members say that the Constitution would be accepted?

Mr. LYNE. -

That is what you are doing by this Constitution.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

We are not doing anything of the sort, and that is my complaint. The reason why I indorse the fears of the Premier of Victoria is that I can see that under this Bill we have not laid down one straight principle as to the mode of taxation for a given number of years.

Mr. LYNE. -

That is what I say, and you are getting no guarantee that you will receive back the Customs revenue which you are giving up or that you will get any portion of it returned.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

If not, these very carefully-considered clauses as to the mode of distributing the surplus are of little value beyond the paper they are printed upon.

Mr. LYNE. -

That is what I think.

Mr. REID. -

No one denies that under any conceivable fiscal policy a large amount will be received from Customs. Under the New South Wales Tariff on four or five articles we raise £1,500,000 a year.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Precisely; but we know that under the New South Wales Tariff, if applied to the Commonwealth, there would be a deficiency in the revenue of the other states of 40 or 50 per cent. That is really the position, and I think that is the position, although not put in such plain terms, which the Premier of Victoria desired to take up. His argument was very cogent and deserving of the closest attention at this juncture. It was that, whilst we have a series of clauses here given as to how the Customs and Excise revenue is to be collected, and how it is to be distributed in a certain way, we do not place any mandatory clause in this Bill, which will insist upon the Federal Parliament raising any portion whatever of the federal revenue from Customs. On the other hand, there is a sub-section of clause 52 which says the Federal Parliament is to have the right to raise revenue by any other mode of taxation it pleases other than Customs. So we are absolutely giving away the whole sources of our revenue to the Federal Parliament if necessary. Some honorable members may say-"What suggestion do you make in order to give the security which the last speaker asks for?" What security have the states that they will have anything returned by the Commonwealth Parliament which will be nearly equivalent to the amount of revenue that they collect for themselves at present?

Mr. LYNE. -
There is no security at all.

Mr. REID. -
If the limitation clause had been left in you would have had the security, because the Federation then could not spend more than a certain amount per annum.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I quite admit that; but even though that clause has gone by the board, for various reasons, there is still another means of getting over this difficulty, which appears to me to be the greatest we have to contend with. Every member going back to his constituents will be asked two or three pertinent questions with regard to the finances of the colonies. The first will be: What is likely to be our proportion of the expenditure? That may be easily answered, but not so easily answered as it would have been if clause 87 had not been struck out, because the Federal Parliament now has a perfectly free hand. The next question, say in South Australia, will be: Where are we going to derive the £500,000 of revenue which we shall lose by giving up the Customs?

By direct taxation.

Mr. WISE. -
It is purely imaginary that any loss will occur.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I admit it is uncertain, and it will be that uncertainty which will be a bar to our getting a Constitution of this kind accepted by the people of the various colonies.

Mr. WALKER. -
The Federal Parliament will surely protect you.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I am not throwing the slightest doubt on the desire of the Federal Parliament to do justice to each colony, but in the Federal Parliament you will have the same difficulty as we have in the colonial Parliaments. The fiscal policy in the Federal Parliament will be one of the hottest and most hardly-fought questions to be decided. The Premier of New South Wales will probably be a prominent member of the Federal Parliament, with a large number of his supporters who at present hold him in office in New South Wales. They will be rabid free-traders.

Mr. WALKER. -
Staunch free-traders.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I will withdraw the word "rabid."

Mr. LYNE. -
"Rabid" is the best word.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I know "rabid" is only applied to protectionists. The Premier, supported by perhaps a free-trade majority returning a large percentage of free-trade members to the Legislative Assembly, will do his best, unless in the course of events he modifies his opinions, as leading politicians sometimes do, to insist that the Tariff of the Commonwealth shall be something like the present Tariff of New South Wales. The revenue derived from such a Tariff while it might be sufficient for the requirements of New South Wales, will be insufficient for the requirements of the other colonies.

Mr. LYNE. -
It would not be sufficient for the requirements of New South Wales. It is not sufficient for her requirements now.

Mr. REID. -
It would not be sufficient if there were an extravagant Government in power.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Suppose such a Tariff were in operation throughout the Commonwealth, what would the other colonies do? Suppose a majority in the Federal Parliament were inclined to agree to a moderate Tariff, such as that which now obtains in New South Wales, what would be the position of a colony like South Australia? There every possible avenue of revenue has been strained to its utmost limits. We have our land tax, our income tax, our probate duties—all strained to the very last limit that the people will bear. If it were possible for the Federal Parliament to come upon us and ask our people for another £250,000 or £300,000 a year, do you think we should be able to raise that amount? To present a Constitution containing such a possibility to our people would mean its immediate rejection. I have not been led to make these remarks entirely by the suggestion of the Premier of Victoria. This difficulty has been running through my mind for a considerable period, in fact ever since I took part in the meetings of the Finance Committee in South Australia. The only suggestion I have yet heard that is likely to in any way cope with the difficulty is that thrown out by the honorable member (Mr. Holder). He suggested that a clause should be inserted in the Bill providing that the Federal Parliament should return to the various states 95 per cent. of the revenue collected from Customs and Excise.

Mr. HOLDER. - Nineteen-twentieths.

Mr. REID. - That provision would offer the strongest temptation to the Commonwealth Parliament to raise all it could by direct taxation, because it would keep for itself all money raised by direct taxation.

Mr. SOLOMON. - Yes. The provision requires a still further qualification. Supposing, however, that the suggestion were adopted, if the Commonwealth raised the aggregate amount at present obtained from Customs and Excise by the different colonies—£6,000,000 odd—it would be able to expend, roughly, about the sum originally placed in clause 87—£300,000 a year.

Mr. REID. - The Commonwealth could go on levying taxation in other directions.

Mr. SOLOMON. - Exactly. It would be of no more protection to the states to say that the Commonwealth should return 95 per cent. of the amount raised by customs and excise duties than to say that it should return an exact amount, unless a stipulation was introduced as to the way in which its revenue should be obtained.

Mr. REID. - Or as to the total amount of revenue to be obtained.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
We may leave the total amount to be regulated by the amount that we allow the Commonwealth to retain, provided that we do one thing. Undoubtedly, in the sub-section of clause 52 which deals with the right of taxation, we have given the Federal Parliament far too much power. I admit that it must be given the power to raise taxation in any way it thinks fit in cases of emergency—a power to be used only as certain forms of taxation are used in England, in times of war.

Mr. LYNE. -

Hear, hear. That is what was intended.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Yes. I have attended many meetings in South Australia in which it was pointed out by myself and other candidates that this power of taxation was intended to be used only in cases of the direst necessity.

Mr. REID. -

In New South Wales an exactly opposite interpretation was given.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That shows how necessary it will be for us before finishing, our work to make sure that this clause means exactly what nine-tenths of the members of the Convention intend it to mean.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member think that his remarks are relevant to the clause?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Undoubtedly. The clause opens up the whole question of the manner of taxation. We have given to the Federal Parliament the whole of our Customs and Excise revenue, and we have also given them power to raise direct taxation. It appears to me that the only satisfactory way in which we can answer the questions of our constituents as to how they are to be taxed, and how their money is to be spent, is to adopt in the first place the suggestion of the honorable member (Mr. Holder).

Mr. LYNE. -

That will not be sufficient.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

No; but it will give a guarantee that nineteen-twentieths of the Customs and Excise revenue will be paid back to the states, and that only 5 per cent. of it will be expended by the Commonwealth, which means that during a period of years, at any rate, the expenditure of the Commonwealth will not be extravagant. There will be some knowledge of what federation will cost each state—knowledge similar to that contained in clause 87, which we have eliminated.

Mr. REID. -
Five per cent. of £6,000,000 is exactly the amount contained in that clause.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Yes; but I think the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Holder) is the better one to adopt. It is no use saying that we shall have a certain amount returned from Customs, and a certain amount retained for the expenses of the Commonwealth, unless we also limit the Commonwealth Parliament as to their modes of taxation. We have given up our Customs and Excise absolutely. Do we all thoroughly appreciate the fact that under clause 52 we are giving up all other modes of taxation also, if necessary, and that we leave as an open question to be fought out in the Commonwealth Parliament the form of taxation the Commonwealth shall adopt? I do not think the majority of the Convention ever intended that.

Mr. LYNE. -
They have not thought of it at all.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I think they take the sub-section of clause 52 to be an emergency provision. I believe I am right in that conjecture, and that I echo the opinion of a majority of the Convention.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Do you mean that the power of direct taxation is only an emergency provision?

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Yes. Under clause 52 the Federal Parliament is empowered to raise revenue by any other mode of taxation. That goes further than the members of the Convention intended.

Mr. REID. -
They must be little children. Do you think Sir Samuel Griffith was such a child that, if he intended that provision to be restricted to one purpose, he would not have put that purpose in?

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I cannot say what Sir Samuel Griffith's idea was, but I am sure of this that it has never been appreciated by the people of the colonies or by the members of the Convention, that under this clause all the revenues of the Commonwealth might be raised by direct taxation. A free-trade majority might insist upon that.

Mr. REID. -
Surely the majority of the Parliament is to rule.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Most of the colonies do raise a certain proportion of their revenue by direct taxation. We have framed a number of clauses to provide for the method of distribution of the surplus revenue, which we all think is to be obtained by means of customs and excise duties. There is no clause in the Bill which says that the revenue shall be raised in that way.

Mr. LYNE. -

There is nothing in the Bill to say that any portion of the revenue shall be raised by Customs.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

This is a point upon which we do want some definite and clear provision in the Bill.

Mr. SYMON. -

That would be settling the policy of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID. -

What is the use of taking a vote at the polls if you square it all in the Bill?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

My honorable friend (Mr. Symon) says that that would be settling the policy of the Federal Parliament—but to what extent? Does not the honorable member see that with a comparatively free-trade policy the £6,000,000 now raised in the aggregate throughout the colonies could be raised by the Federal Parliament? To say that a revenue equal to our present revenues should be raised through Customs and Excise would not be dictating to the Federal Parliament that they should have a protective policy. It would simply mean that a revenue Tariff of some kind should be imposed that would bring in in the aggregate £6,000,000. it is admitted by most of the Treasurers present that a Tariff not at all approaching the protective Tariff of Victoria could be framed that would bring in far more than £6,000,000 per annum, and that would not cause any great hardship, but that would bear with equal weight on all.

Mr. SYMON. -

I thought you wanted to declare that for all time the revenue should be derived from Customs.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

No, for a period of years. The point was raised by the Premier of Victoria that there was a

Mr. REID. -
Supposing that a majority of the electors of the Commonwealth are in favour of that method of taxation?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

The strain on my imagination to suppose anything of the kind would be far too severe.

Mr. REID. -

Then why are you frightened?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I am frightened of this—that the Constitution does not stipulate in any very clear terms how the revenue of the Commonwealth is to be raised. It leaves it an open question whether after having swept away our local customs and excise duties the revenue will not be raised by direct taxation. That is not a proposal that would be accepted by the people.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Have not the people got control of the whole matter? You are forgetting that the Federal Parliament will be elected by the people.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

No, I am not; but I remember this fact, that the branch of the Federal Parliament which will dictate the fiscal policy, and will have supreme power in regard to money matters, will consist, to a very large extent, of the representatives of the larger colonies. I recognise that the difference between the fiscal policy of Victoria and New South Wales will supply a balancing power; but I say that there should be some declaratory clause in this Bill, setting out that it is the intention of the Convention that a proportion—and for a term of years a considerable proportion—at least of the revenue should be derived from customs and excise duties.

Mr. REID. -

Have we any commission from the people to indicate in this Bill that the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth shall be protectionist or free-trade?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

No; and I do not think that this would convey any such indication. I quite understand the attitude taken up by the right honorable member. I know that the question is a very difficult one for him. I know that if he had to return to New South Wales with an admission that the larger portion of the revenue of the Commonwealth would have to be obtained from the Customs his position would be a very difficult one.

Mr. WALKER. -

Not the larger portion, the whole.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Not the whole necessarily, because a revenue of £6,000,000 could be raised without any protective policy.
Mr. REID. -
The more serious point with me would be this: To go back to the electors of New South Wales, and tell them that I, in this Bill, have assisted in taking out of their hands their prerogative of fixing their own taxation as members of the Commonwealth.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
For what term would you place the obligation on the Federal Parliament of raising the revenue in one way or another?

Mr. SOLOMON. -
For the same t

Mr. SYMON. -
How much from direct taxation, and how much from indirect taxation?

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I do not propose to give the Federal Parliament power to raise revenue by direct taxation, and I do, not think the Convention does.

Mr. SYMON. -
Oh, yes.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
The sub-section in clause 52 has never been put before our people as a mode of taxation for revenue purposes.

Mr. SYMON. -
Oh yes, it has.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I do not know that. It has always been put before the people as a provision which was only to be used in case of difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Does the honorable member think he is in order in discussing clause 52, which we have passed?

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Inasmuch as that clause is intended to be recommitted, and as I myself propose to ask for its recommittal, if no other honorable member does, I think I am in order in referring to it while discussing the question now before the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. -
When clause 52 is recommitted will be the proper time to discuss it.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
With all due deference to you, Mr. Chairman, I think I am absolutely in order, seeing that clause 52 has a bearing on this question, and is within the lines of the present discussion. However, I do not intend to keep the Convention any longer. I recognise that there is a very great difficulty to be overcome—I recognise that the guarantee that each state shall receive a revenue equal, or nearly equal, to the revenue realized now, is necessary to recommend this Constitution to a large section of our people, and recognising that fact, I venture to think that the little time I have occupied in discussing this question has not been misspent.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

As it is now nearly five o'clock, at which hour we usually rise, I think I shall be consulting the wishes of the committee if I move that progress be reported. I therefore beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at eight minutes to five o'clock p.m.
Thursday, 17th February, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-three minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on clause 92 (Payment to each state for five years after uniform Tariffs), on which Mr. Reid had proposed an amendment to omit all the words after "imposed." (See page 1042.)

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I trespass on the time of the Convention with some diffidence, but trust to exhibit my sense of the importance of time by curtailing my remarks. It may be because I survey this financial question in some sense as an outsider that it appears to me to be, in its essence, not a difficult, but a simple problem. The situation with which we are confronted is a proposal for union among several states, each of which is to part with certain of its services. Those services involve a certain outlay on the part of the state, and return in gross, in every colony, a considerable profit over and above that outlay.

Mr. WALKER. -

Except defence.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I am treating them in gross. Taking them in gross, in every colony the cost of the services proposed to be transferred falls considerably short of the revenue derived from them. Consequently, each colony has up to the present time derived a gain or profit from those services which they are now proposing, for the purposes of union, to surrender.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You are including Customs in the profit.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Necessarily. I include Customs, Posts and Telegraphs, and every service which the states are asked to surrender. No one pretends that it is necessary for the purposes of union that they should surrender the profit-the gain-which they have been making from these services. As I understand the position, we all admit that, in federating the services, the states must not be deprived of that gain which they have been deriving from them in the past-upon which their past Budgets have been built, and on which their future Budgets must also be built-unless their whole financial systems are to be dislocated. Consequently, it appears to me that, express it as we may, we do not intend to endow the Federal Government with a large revenue derived at the expense of the states. We propose to endow the Federal Government with the largest powers of raising revenue from the whole people of the whole Commonwealth, but we do that subject to what we admit to be practically a debt from the Commonwealth to the several states-represented by the balance to their credits which they have gained, say, during the period of the last few years from the receipts of the services now proposed to be surrendered. If that be so, is it not something of an ostrich like policy to allow this measure to be placed before the public, relying simply upon what, no doubt, we would be justified in relying upon if we had no other resources—that is, the natural, and indeed, the inevitable working of this Constitution? This Constitution will be intrusted to the elected of the whole of the people of the Commonwealth. The whole of the people of the Commonwealth will have an interest in maintaining the solvency of the several states. A period must pass before the several states adjust themselves to their new circumstances, before they deal with the situation in each state created by a diminished revenue and a diminished service, before they adapt themselves entirely to their new position as subordinate states, instead of being, as they are at present, practically independent states. During that interregnum the Constitution contains already, and must contain to fulfil the merest requirements of good faith, an implied guarantee that the Commonwealth will see that during that period the solvency of the several states shall not be imperilled. Now, if that be the implied guarantee, why is it not possible to make it express and explicit? If that be essential to fair dealing, why should we not adopt the method of plain dealing, and put it on the face of this Bill that for some time which may seem reasonable, the Treasurers of the several states, instead of requiring to frame their Budgets in advance on a merely speculative basis, uncertain as to the absolute return they will receive from the Commonwealth, should be enabled to grapple with the local problems that will surround them? If they are to do this, they must be able to lay before their Parliaments in each financial statement an estimate which shall, at all events, be approximate, of the revenue they expect to receive from the Commonwealth. If the state Treasurers cannot frame their Budgets without this, and the Commonwealth cannot possibly be blind to its obligations in this respect, what reason have we to urge why we should not endeavour in some terms—as general as you please, but sufficiently explicit-to convey our meanings to those who read while they run? Why should we not place in this Constitution some general indication of our foresight of that position? Personally, I should be sorry to see the financial inter-relations between the Commonwealth and the states prolonged for any greater period than is necessary. I know that some honorable members look forward to a permanent financial intercourse between the states and the Commonwealth, and to a periodical re-adjustment of their relations.

Mr. HOLDER. -
The solvency of the states will not become less important.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
The solvency of the states will never become less important, but it will be much less threatened after the first few years. The situation will be greatly cleared, and by various proposals which have been already submitted-those dealing with the national debts, and also, possibly, national railways-it may be possible, and must be found desirable, in the course of time, to frame a financial system which shall practically cut the several states entirely free from the Commonwealth, or, at all events, leave them with only certain fixed financial relations with it. We should, as far as possible, exclude from the consideration of the Commonwealth Parliament the finances of the states as states, and exclude from the states as states any consideration of the financial position of the Commonwealth. That is the position which has been secured in the United States of America. There the state Legislatures concern themselves in no degree with federal finance.

Mr. REID. -
But we know how that position was gained there. They had an enormous surplus, and squandered it instead of returning it to the states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
But if they had not had this surplus, as they need not have had, or if they had expended it judiciously, say upon purely national works, that scandal would not have arisen. There is, at all events, a clear fine of demarcation between state and federal finance in the United States, and I trust that in the Commonwealth of Australia the same line of demarcation shall be clearly drawn as soon as possible.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I think we could discuss this matter much better on some concrete amendment or resolution. That would save time.

Mr. REID. -
It is important enough to be discussed generally.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We had better get each other's views.
Mr. REID. -

Yes; it is one of the most important things to settle.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I largely coincide with the honorable member (Mr. McMillan), but, at the same time, do not think I am the person called upon to frame such an amendment, though quite willing to discuss it if it be submitted by some honorable member more experienced in dealing with matters of finance. To return to the question before us, it appears to me clear that there is in this Constitution an implied obligation on the Commonwealth not to deprive the states of the profit they have been gaining in the past from the transferred services; and if that be so, I fail to see why some agreement should not be arrived at in the Finance Committee as to the particular sum for which the Commonwealth should be liable to each state, at all events, for a fixed period. These states must necessarily grow, and as they grow the Commonwealth revenue necessarily increases; and, as the Commonwealth revenue increases, possibly the state requirements from the Commonwealth may increase also. As increase must arise in the natural course of events, it would not be taking too bold or too hazardous a step to fix the sum of the past profits gained from those services, and hitherto utilized by the several states for other purposes within their own colonies, and to make a return of that sum the minimum return, either for a fixed period, or, if necessary, in perpetuity.

Mr. WISE. -

Why mention any sum at all? Why not leave it to the Parliament?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I would be perfectly willing to leave it to the Parliament, if it were not a problem which, it seems to me, we could solve equitably and exactly here.

Mr. REID. -

On the lines you mention, do you mean to limit them to five years?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I would be willing to do so. The only colony I can conceive as requiring to be dealt with in any different manner from the rest of the group, in forming an estimate as to the amount, to be returned, would be the colony of New South Wales. There the difference is not so great as it seems, because the measure of the sum to be returned is determined by the profit gained, and is not determined by the height of the duties by which, so far as the Customs are concerned, that revenue is gained. In this particular regard, and for this purpose, all Tariffs are dealt with as merely revenue Tariffs, and some of the Tariffs-notably that of Victoria-imposes high duties in certain directions not with a view to gaining revenue, but of curtailing

\[P.1062\] starts here
the revenue derived from imports. There is not, therefore, so great an injustice in using the several Tariffs as a common measure, in determining the profits gained from the state services, as might appear. If New South Wales raised any question on the ground that their Tariff would be measured with the existing protectionist Tariffs, there would be no difficulty in reverting to the time when New South Wales was under a protectionist Tariff. We could then set out exactly in a schedule to this measure the minimum amount to be returned by the Commonwealth to the several states for a period of five years. That would not put the local Treasurers in possession of any extravagant surplus, but would simply enable them to know in advance the sum they must receive from this source.

Mr. DOBSON. -

In order to get the full benefit of your suggestion, ought not the sum to rise every year with the population?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No; for the first five years the one thing needful is to have a minimum to which the Treasurers may look with confidence, and on which they may base their Budget calculations.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Can they do that now? Does not the sum available vary according to circumstances?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Does the honorable member compare the position of the local Treasurers now with their position after four or five of their chief services have vanished, and they are dependent on the decision of another body as to the amount they will obtain from them? There is no comparison. The whole situation is revolutionized. If the honorable member is able to predict what the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth Parliament will be, and what it will yield under these entirely new and novel conditions,

Mr. HOLDER. -

It would be easier to make the forecast for Tasmania than for the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes. I do not take that interjection to be an objection to the course I am urging on the consideration of the Convention. Am I right?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I think it is an objection.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

If the honorable member intends it as an objection, he means that it would be a more difficult task for the Federal Treasurer to so adjust his Tariff as to be able to obtain the sum rendered necessary by specific guarantees than it would be for the several Treasurers of the several colonies, in ignorance of his policy, to forecast their subordinate Budgets.

Mr. HOLDER. -

No; what I say is that it would be quite impossible for us in this Convention to make a forecast of the Commonwealth finances and to put it in the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

There is no necessity to do that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You want us to do it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No. The obligation the Commonwealth assumes is only in respect of the profits earned by the transferred services in the past. These services are practically certain to yield as much in the future, and the probability is that they will yield more; but the loss caused by the abolition of intercolonial duties is a definite one, the measure of which can be approximately gauged. The position of the Treasurer of Tasmania, or the Treasurer of any other colony, although simpler in this respect than the position of the Treasurer of the Commonwealth in the earlier years of the Federation, would not be greatly simpler. If the honorable member follows out his own suggestion, he will see that the amount guaranteed would be very small as compared with the sums with which the Federal Treasurer must deal.

Mr. BARTON. -

Does the honorable member propose to give a general liberty to the Commonwealth to assist the states financially?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I have no objection to that, but am going a little further. I am suggesting a specific determination by the financiers of this Convention of the profit which has been earned by the several services the states are about to transfer. After deducting their cost, there is a certain amount left as profit, and that sum having been determined, if necessary with some special allowance in the case of New South Wales, should be guaranteed to each state by the Commonwealth for a period of, say, five years, to give the local Treasurers a knowledge in advance of the amount they may expect to receive from the Commonwealth during that time of adjustment.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is far better than a general liberty to assist.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I am happy to have the honorable member's approbation to that extent, I do not propose to reply at length to the Hon. Mr. Holder, who has studied this question in all its aspects. If he takes into account the relatively small amounts which are to be guaranteed by the Federal Treasurer, and also the enormous resources at his command, he will admit that the task before him, though liable to be somewhat increased nominally by the existence of a specific guarantee, is not really increased if, as I believe, there is already an implied guarantee that the Federal Treasurer must provide for these wants.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I agree with you there.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Then that fulfils my purpose so far as this argument is concerned. My last argument to the Convention on this matter is that such a provision as I am suggesting does not run counter to the desires of the representatives of New South Wales by coercing the Commonwealth into a particular form of fiscal policy. It is a question of revenue which can as well be met by a revenue as by a protectionist Tariff, and if the implied obligation already exists under the Constitution, and will be recognised by the Commonwealth, those who support a revenue Tariff should not be in any way prejudiced by the adoption of such a proposal.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Can the honorable member say roughly what the profit on the transferred services is?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I had it all worked out in detail in Adelaide, but later returns have been presented to the Convention.

Mr. WISE. -
It can be ascertained from the document that was laid on the table the other day. The total comes to about £850,000.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
We used to reckon it at that, but I thought the amount had been altered. If the payment of such a sum be impliedly guaranteed already this provision would cast no fresh burden on the Commonwealth. The obligation can be met by a revenue or a protectionist Tariff.

Mr. REID. -
Or by other means.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Yes. Although agreeing largely with the views expressed by my honorable friend (Mr. Solomon) yesterday, I disagreed with him absolutely in one particular, and that was in the assumption that direct taxation of any kind is conceivable in the earlier years of the Commonwealth, or in any of the years of the Commonwealth save under pressure of extreme dire national necessity. So far as one can forecast the situation, one need ask for no guarantee on that subject. I feel absolutely certain from past experience of the feeling of the people of the different colonies that, whatever the policy of the Commonwealth may be in fiscal matters, the whole sum required will be raised by means of the Custom-house, whether it be by a revenue or a protectionist Tariff. There is not the least risk of a proposal for direct taxation. At the same time, to be frank, it seems to me to be clear that the Tariff will be protectionist and not revenue. The combination of the two purposes is not difficult, and especially in the earlier years. Duties which would
[P.1064] starts here
become protectionist after a lapse of time might, in the first instance, be largely revenue producing. It appears to me, for these and other reasons, that the Tariff will be protectionist, but, at the same time, the proposal I am now submitting bears no more in favour of a protectionist than of a revenue Tariff. I think I have now said all that is necessary. The suggestion I have made implies no distrust of the Federal Parliament. We can work out this problem now, and we ought to do it. I am content to leave to the Federal Parliament the solution of every problem we cannot fairly deal with here. If it can be shown to me that there is some element in this problem which we cannot possibly master, I shall be quite willing to leave it to the Federal Parliament. I shall leave it to the Federal Parliament with perfect confidence should my proposal be rejected, but if the situation be as I see it, why should we palter with the question? Why should we not set it forth in explicit terms on the face of this Constitution that the states will have this guarantee, and in that way put heart into a great number of people who are at present disposed to adversely criticise what we have done? The Bill, as it now stands, requires for its full interpretation a considerable amount of constitutional knowledge. Although the members of the Convention and others will have every opportunity of expounding it, in the light of their constitutional knowledge, to the public, the measure itself will not, except to a student of our form of government, convey a great deal of what it necessarily means. Not only is the very fact of responsible government not set forth in express terms, but the results, as we know them, of the working of responsible government are scarcely more than indicated, even to the practised eye. So with the financial clauses, the necessary working of our Constitution, given electors whom we know and methods which we know, must produce a certain definite result, that is to say, a frank recognition by the Commonwealth of its obligation towards the several states, especially during the interregnum, and a ready confidence on the part of the states in the justice they will receive. But it would be of advantage, seeing that the measure is to be distributed broadcast over Australia, and that it will be read by many who are not familiar with these processes, if a guarantee were given to the states in express terms. By expressly endorsing this fair and equitable arrangement now we should place the states in a position of assured solvency, and we should remove a cause of public apprehension.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I should have preferred to wait until some actual proposal was submitted to the Convention before I addressed myself to this question. It does seem to me that we are very likely in our desire to get at some certainty on particular points in this Constitution to absolutely forget the principles with which we have to deal. I am quite ready to admit that everything in this Constitution affecting the great principles of federal government ought to be stated as clearly and as completely as possible, so that no interpreter of this law in the future could possibly misapprehend the subject. On the other hand, in some cases, where if you exercise common sense and reason, there is no possible future danger, there has been an attempt, in order to meet a mere shadow of a danger, to introduce into the Constitution matters which are absolutely revolting to the principles of the Constitution itself. Now, let us look at the question just for a moment practically as it will strike those who have to deal with it. One of the first duties of the Federal Parliament will be to frame a Tariff. Is it not an underlying principle of all these financial clauses that the Federal Parliament ought to be absolutely untrammelled in framing that Tariff? Any man who has the honour of being a member of the popular branch of the Legislature will no doubt be a student of our actions and proceedings in this Convention, and be fully seised of the historical facts, of the conditions surrounding the Federation, and of the peculiar conditions of the different states. It is absolutely impossible to suppose that any Tariff will be framed without a full consideration of the financial position of the different states. As I said before, it is not as if our finances were isolated; it is not as if we were giving over to the Federal Parliament one portion of our taxing machinery, or one part of our Customs revenue, say that derived from alcohol. We are giving over the whole of the great machinery of taxation. Having done so, there is, and to my mind there must be for a long time to come until the states become so populous as to be able to support themselves by direct taxation-a strong link between the Federal Government and the state Governments which cannot be ignored under any possible set of circumstances.

Mr. REID. -
They are inseparably bound together from the very nature of the case.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Exactly. If we as sensible men, dealing with a broad Constitution like this, are perfectly certain that these interests cannot be ignored, bearing in mind the fact that the conditions of four of the colonies are more or less identical, and that only one colony, so to speak, seems to be an obstruction, it is against common sense and reason that this position should not be considered. Are we about to give over the management of our affairs to some foreign power? Is it not likely that a large number of the men here present may, if federation is consummated within a reasonable period, be members of the Federal Parliament? Will not every man representing the states in the Federal Legislature be saturated with the wishes and the necessities of the state which he represents? We have, on the one hand, common sense and knowledge of all the conditions. What do honorable members want to substitute for this? They want to insert in the Bill a provision of a kind most offensive to men engaged upon legislation-an absolute mandate to the effect that the framing of the Federal Tariff must be done, not upon the lines and conditions which they may think fit to apply, but upon absolute local conditions. It is proposed to tell them, practically under a threat, that they must do-what? This is the crux of the whole matter. That they must create a certain volume of revenue, which practically fixes the Tariff. I am not going to say that they may not manufacture a Tariff upon purely revenue lines, but from my investigation of the matter I consider that not one of the four colonies to which reference has been made is likely to give up its protectionist ideas for some time to come. Does any one imagine that the Federal Tariff will be framed upon purely revenue lines? I do not, and I am not going to tell the people of the colony I represent that it will. I am perfectly certain that New South Wales must sacrifice more or less of her present fiscal system in the interests of federation; but it seems to me that, if you put us in the position of having to tell the people of New South Wales not merely that there is a general probability that a new fiscal system will be produced, but that we have absolutely placed in the Convention a mandate rendering it necessary for the Federal Parliament to make this change, you strike a very hard blow at the success of federation. I do not say that in any tone of threat. I think it is our duty when we come to these crucial matters to say exactly what are the difficulties with which we believe we shall have to contend when before our own people. I hold, as I have always held, that one of the first principles of honesty requires that we shall let the people know the full extent of the meaning of federation. Therefore, and I say it honestly, if I were a member of the Victorian representation - or of any other than that of New South Wales - I should be perfectly satisfied with the clause as it stands. I believe, taking into consideration the general principles of fairness and honesty which will prevail with the members of the Federal Parliament, not to speak of their mere selfish interests, that the position of the other colonies is assured. What Government could carry through a Tariff at the beginning of the life of the Commonwealth, unless it did that for which everyone was contending? Surely this provision is not upon all-fours with those other parts of the Constitution where it is absolutely necessary that language should clearly define the intentions of the law-makers. For these reasons I must object to any alteration of the recommendations of the Finance Committee. If we do not put in a provision guaranteeing a certain minimum return, we shall be trying to do what is simply impossible. It appears to me that honorable members wish to insert something which shall be between an absolute mandate and a mere direction. What would be the good of a mere direction? If the representatives of Victoria want to be able to say to their people-'There is a provision in the Constitution which will guarantee the solvency of our colony, so that there need be no fear of a deficiency of £300,000 or £400,000 a year, and an increase of local taxation,' will the insertion of the direction in the Bill enable them as honest men to say more than they could say without there being such a direction in the Bill? Of course, it would be different if there were a guarantee. We must either provide for a guarantee, or we must leave the whole matter to the justice and the self-interest of the Federal Parliament. Of course, I am not going to commit myself absolutely until I have a concrete proposal before me; but I do not see how any provision can be of any service unless an absolute guarantee is inserted. Any other provision must only be mischievous in its results.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What distinction do you draw, between a guarantee and a direction?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I consider that a direction is not mandatory, that it is simply an indication-a suggestion-of what we would like to see done; in this case, something to remind the Federal Parliament of what it is impossible that they should forget.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

At any rate, what would be the objection to putting such a direction in the Bill?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is it not proper that we should state what we consider to be their duty in explicit terms, and assume that they will perform that duty?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

After all, that is shaving the matter very fine. If it would be satisfactory to the representatives of Victoria to do that, I should be willing to consider any concrete proposal upon its merits, I simply rise now to say that I think that from every possible view of common sense and experience, and because of the conditions of this federation, there is really no necessity for a provision of this kind. It seems to me that honorable members are trying to provide for specifically what must be the ultimate outcome of the conditions under which we are federating.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I did not like to rise to order when we were listening to the speeches of the two able and influential men who have just sat down; but, sir, I feel sure you will confer infinite advantage upon the Convention if you keep honorable members to the points in connexion with the financial scheme which are still left for discussion. I will draw your attention to the four points which I think remain, and which honorable members will do well to discuss separately. At the present time we are only having a second general debate, and although the arguments which have been delivered are admirable, they would have more force if confined to the exact question before the Chair. In the first place, we have to consider the wisdom of adopting the bookkeeping system, crediting each state with the revenue it raises, debiting it with its share of the federal expenses, and paying over the balance. We cannot dispense with the bookkeeping system, and these provisions in connexion with it are so simple that I think we should deal with them in half an hour. The next point to consider is whether we should deal in an exceptional manner with Western Australia. If so, in what manner should we treat that colony, and should we deal with any other colony in an exceptional manner?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Is this an example of keeping to one point?

Mr. DOBSON. -

The four points follow one another in order. The third point is: Are we to leave this matter to the Federal Parliament? And the fourth point: Shall we provide for a guarantee? Will our discussions not be more intelligible if we deal with these points separately?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I understand that there is a desire to provide for a guarantee in this clause.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I have a few words to say about finance, but I would prefer to postpone them until the proper time.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

As the debate has taken the form of a suggestion to you, Mr. Chairman, I should like, without in any way committing myself to support or to oppose any proposal, to suggest that upon this occasion a little laxity might be permitted. I cannot help feeling that in these financial clauses we are dealing with the most critical portion of the Bill.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

A most critical portion.

Mr. BARTON. -

While I should be against a general direction to the Commonwealth to consider the position of each state, because I think that that would lead to bargaining and corruption, the proposal that the honorable and learned member has made deserves our consideration, and a general discussion of the character that has been entered upon will admirably assist the formulating of the proposal if it is found that it deserves formulating. To formulate it without the advantage of the advice and assistance of financial experts would be a mistake, and this assistance can only be obtained by a general discussion, such as we are now engaged in. I would ask that a similar latitude to that which is taken in a general financial debate may be allowed with regard to this suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I have felt that sometimes the debate has wandered from the clause, and has taken a larger scope than is strictly warrantable, but I have not attempted to stop it unless honorable members have referred to matters already decided under clauses which have been passed. The honorable member (Mr. Dobson) must see that we are not only discussing the proposals of the Finance Committee, but that we are also discussing the clause as it stands. In the clause there are a large number of other matters in addition to those which are mentioned in the proposals of the Finance Committee.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The four points I have mentioned, to my mind, include all.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It will be seen that it is not only the Finance Committee's suggestions that are open to discussion; it is the clause as it stands. The proposal is to strike out part of the clause, and insert other words. It is very difficult to separate one part of a financial policy from another part, and I do not propose to curtail debate in any way, unless honorable members try to re-open matters which have been settled in other parts of the Bill.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I have listened very attentively to the speeches which have been delivered upon the general proposals with reference to the finances of the Commonwealth, and I can quite understand and appreciate the anxiety which some honorable members have displayed with reference to the future finance relations between the Commonwealth and the various states. There is no doubt that the Commonwealth, in taking the Customs revenue, as it must in order to secure to us the main advantages of federation, takes from each of the states its main source of revenue. Under these circumstances, I can quite understand the anxiety of Treasurers to know how their states may possibly stand after the federal union has been accomplished, but I am afraid that there is mixed up in this matter—perhaps unconsciously, but, in the estimation of people outside, very really—another anxiety, and that is to endeavour by some means or other to compel the Commonwealth Parliament to adopt a certain system of fiscal policy; and the great objection in the way of putting any form of guarantee in this Constitution, especially when it refers to revenue raised by Customs, will be that large numbers of persons may suspect, and with some reason, that whilst certain persons who are said to be in a minority—and on the surface, I think with very great reason—are prepared, notwithstanding their position, to trust implicitly their destinies to the wisdom of the Commonwealth, those who are in a majority, and therefore in a position of greater certainty, are not showing an equal readiness to trust the Commonwealth. If there is reason given to the minority to which I refer, and in fact if any reason is given to New South Wales, for a fear or belief that on this burning question the Convention has gone a little out of its way to give a bias to the Constitution in favour of a policy to which we have had for many years the strongest objection, then I say that my position as the leader of the free-trade party in New South Wales, in endeavouring to secure a majority of those with whom I am acting to accept this Constitution, will become unbearable. I am prepared to take the chances of the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth if I have a fair start, if it is left absolutely a sheet of white paper on the Constitution, as to what form of raising revenue the Commonwealth Parliament may adopt. But if the financial necessities of the states are linked in any way with a certain particular form of raising revenue, and the two are connected in the Constitution, then I say a twist, a bias, a sinister aspect will be given to a Constitution which must be absolutely neutral on that vital point to enable those of us of opposite parties to hope for success in the different colonies.
Mr. ISAACS. -

Does the right honorable gentleman mean that the solvency of the states can only be preserved by a protective Tariff?

Mr. REID. -

I am very sorry indeed, more sorry than I can express, that remarks made outside as to the possible solvency of these states are becoming-I will not say warranted, but are becoming serious, owing to the frequency with which similar language is being used in this Convention by responsible persons. I absolutely repudiate any idea of any of the Australian colonies being insolvent. I absolutely repudiate it in every shape and form. When my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) was led-I am sure simply by mere accident in extemporaneous speaking-even into hinting at a proposal that there should be some provision made in this Constitution to finance the states, to render by means of borrowed money assistance to the states, I could not too deeply regret the utterances of a man in his high position with regard to such a pernicious idea. There is nothing whatever in the history or condition of any one of these colonies to suggest that they need ever be carried on by borrowed money, and let us repudiate at once any such expressions. Let us repudiate altogether the views which have been expressed outside with reference to the solvency of this or that colony of Australia. Nothing can be clearer to us, knowing all the facts as we do, than that although the different colonies may occasionally be exposed to vicissitudes-although all of us have for years past been exposed to a terrible strain, owing to the concurrence of droughts and low prices for staple commodities-still, all these troubles put together have served to demonstrate the absolute stability of the Australian people and of their industries. We can all with reason hope that at no distant time the inherent strength of these colonies will propel them into a state of prosperity, reminding us of the days which have passed-a state of prosperity which I hope will not be as fictitious as much of the prosperity of the past proved to be, but a prosperity springing from the legitimate development uld stand. It was with that object that the limitation clause was inserted in the Bill.

Mr. LYNE. -

That is the limitation of expenditure.

Mr. REID. -

Yes; I will not go into details because the clause has been omitted.

Mr. FRASER. -

The new clause 91, in lieu of 92, does not give the states that hopeful guarantee that they should have.
Mr. REID. -

I do not object to my honorable friend making a speech while I am in possession of the Chair. I often do it myself.

Mr. FRASER. -

I apologize.

Mr. REID. -

But I am not at present on that point which is troubling my honorable friend. What I wish to do, without transgressing the rules, is to refer incidentally to the clause as giving precisely that stability which was wanted, and in a form which could be open to no objection on the part of people outside. The great body of the taxpayers in the Commonwealth will not object to iron-bound limits with regard to the expenditure. There is no feeling amongst those who pay the money in favour of unlimited power of expenditure. The disposition of the British taxpayer and the colonial taxpayer is precisely the same, and a limitation clause of the kind which we had in the Bill would have given absolute certainty of finance to every provincial Treasurer, because he would know from month to month, even from day to day if he liked, the Customs revenue received in his state to which he would be entitled. He would simply have to deduct the proportion of expenditure under the clause I have referred to, which his colony would have to pay for the year, and he could form, by a simple sum in arithmetic, not a mere conjecture, but an almost finally correct estimate, as to what the financial position of the state would be with reference to the finances of the Commonwealth. I would impress upon honorable members that objectionable as such a proposal is, if you are drawing up an absolutely symmetrical Constitution—and I quite admit the force of the arguments which led to the omission of the clause—yet we shall see when we come to close quarters on crucial points, that things which perhaps in themselves are not symmetrical or satisfactory, may meet difficulties in such a way as to commend themselves to our acceptance. I would strongly put it to this Convention that that proposal, while comparatively unobjectionable, is an absolutely popular method—popular not according to fiscal creed, but popular throughout the whole Commonwealth equally—knowing as we do the disposition of the taxpayer in British communities. I submit that that method would be universally popular, while, at the same time, it would bring about a very valuable practical result in establishing the Commonwealth. It would enable us to get over this difficulty, not by fettering the policy and the wisdom and the range of federal finance with respect to a policy of raising revenue. Because if any sort of guarantee is to be given which will be of avail it must be a guarantee which will cover the financial circumstances of each state. And that is the great trouble of this financial problem, if you endeavour to settle it by prescribing a certain return of a certain amount of a certain species of revenue. The difficulty of the Commonwealth Treasurer would be this—under a provision of that sort, by which he must be bound, from which there would be no escape, he would be absolutely compelled in trying to define a Tariff on broad national lines for the good of all, to deform that Tariff by a multitude of proposals inapplicable to the position of the people of Australia, because he would be compelled to regard the financial position on certain iron-bound lines, and to consider the position of certain smaller states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

How does that apply, when the requirement in the Constitution is only that a sum of money shall be raised, and that the Treasurer may raise that sum of money by any duty or method he pleases?

Mr. REID. -

I confess that if the matter is put as a matter of revenue raising as apart from Customs, I see that a good deal of the force of what I have been saying is removed. I admit that.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is the light I put it in.

Mr. REID. -

But still, let us take that position. I still object—and it is in the line of objections which have prevailed all through the consideration of this Bill—to any words being put in this Constitution the effect of which will be, and must be to a great extent, to compel the Federal Treasurer to fashion his policy on lines which have been dictated beforehand. That is the objection which has prevailed in connexion with many important matters all through during the consideration of this Bill. I again say that we should put the colonies in a satisfactory position, by means of a clause which would be universally popular with the voters of Australia, if we directed our efforts at certainly to a point which would meet the problem of uncertainty, and satisfy it, and, at the same time, convince the people of Australia that the finances of the Commonwealth will begin on an absolutely moderate and securely defined scale of expenditure.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Mr. Holder's amendment was another effort to obtain the same object in the same way.

Mr. REID. -

Although I have the greatest respect for any proposal which the Treasurer of South Australia may make, or even hint at, I would like to point out an objection to any limitation of the sort he suggests. It would absolutely force the Treasurer of the Commonwealth—well, perhaps I should not say force him, but constitute a very strong temptation to him—to go in for other methods of raising revenue. Personally the argument would not affect me; but I do not think it would be fair that in adjusting or deciding upon what taxation should be raised there should be put in this Bill any provision which would even tempt the Federal Treasurer to pick out any particular form of taxation, not simply because of its own merits, but because it would give him more money for the Commonwealth Treasury than any other form of taxation. And it is on this particular point that we fully realize the way in which we have handed over our finances to this Commonwealth. We cannot avoid it. There is a proposal, I admit, that the Commonwealth should have only the power of retaining a certain class of customs duties, such as the revenue from narcotics and stimulants. But that does not meet the situation, because the revenue from those articles is, I think, vastly more than the Commonwealth could be allowed to spend for Commonwealth purposes. A large portion must go back to the states. I do not at this moment know what the revenue from tobacco and cigars is in all the colonies represented here, but I think it more than probable that that line of revenue would be more than sufficient for the Commonwealth expenditure. But I should be prepared to consider any proposal for handing back to the states all the Customs revenue collected in those states during the five years except the revenue derived, say, from tobacco and cigars.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Suppose that revenue were far short of the Commonwealth wanted, how would you raise the extra money?

Mr. REID. -

I do not think it is possible that the revenue from that source would be insufficient.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But suppose it were?

Mr. REID. -

I do not think it could be so, judging from the revenue we get from those sources in our own colony. I should think the revenue from tobacco and cigars throughout the Commonwealth must come to some £800,000 or £900,000. We are only speaking of the temporary arrangements to be made for five years. But that suggestion would not meet the difficulty of Sir George Turner. Sir George Turner points out that under a certain state of things he would be left to find a certain additional amount of revenue, and that it would perhaps be impossible, or a tremendous hardship, for him to find that amount. I am sorry to have spoken so long, but I come to an important point upon this matter, and which again emphasizes the main contention I have advanced, that we should leave the matter in the hands of the Commonwealth Parliament. People talk of the states and the Commonwealth as if in this matter they were two bodies. But the taxpayers of the state are exactly the same individuals as the taxpayers of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

There are two different Treasuries.

Mr. REID. -

We have the same body of men throughout Australia. Their representatives in the Federal Parliament will represent the same men as are represented in the states Parliaments. The same taxpayers will be represented whether in the states or in the Commonwealth Parliament; and so again the Federal Parliament will legislate for the very same community, for the very same individuals, as are represented in the states Parliament. The point of which is this: It would be impossible for any Treasurer of the Commonwealth having in his keeping the finances, and the interests and well-being bound up in those finances of every man in the Commonwealth, and every state in the Commonwealth, to approach the subject of finance, and to inaugurate a policy of revenue taxation, without the sense of responsibility that from the very nature of the case he had to finance the states as well as the Commonwealth. Now, that will be the position of the Commonwealth Treasurer. He cannot escape from it. A rough-and-ready person, absolutely unfitted for a position of responsibility so great, might come before the Federal Parliament saying that he had not thought out his proposals as they would affect each state, as they would affect-I will not say the solvency-I repudiate the word—but as they would affect the well-being of each state, as well as of the Commonwealth. But can we suppose for a moment that the Federal Parliament would listen to a man who showed by his proposals that he had not been able to reconcile the financial wisdom of the Commonwealth with the financial security of the states? Because the two things are absolutely bound up. The states become the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth becomes the states; and where the people are the same the responsibility is the same, the interests are the same, is it too much to believe that if we launch this great project of federation no Federal Treasurer can be found who will be able, in proposing a fiscal policy for the Commonwealth, to consider every proper financial interest of the states? I rest my position on that ground. If we are not prepared to trust the Commonwealth to that extent, the whole project ought to fall through.

Mr. FRASER. -

That is dragging in money matters to a greater extent than is usual in legislative concerns.

Mr. REID. -

But my honorable friend must see that the powers which are given to this Commonwealth absolutely convey to the Commonwealth powers of taxation of a most unrestricted kind, and that power being given, the mere proposal that a certain amount of money shall be handed back to each state is not the slightest guarantee in the world that the finances will be properly administered, is not the slightest guarantee in the world that the Commonwealth Treasurer will bring down a sound financial policy. It is a rough rule-of-thumb process which might embarrass a wise Treasurer, but cannot possibly help him.

Mr. FRASER. -

It might embarrass the states Treasurers.

Mr. REID. -

On that point, I am with every one who wishes that the states Treasurers shall not be embarrassed, and I suggest to my honorable friend that both the states and the Commonwealth can be protected from embarrassment, if, during the early days of the Commonwealth, a rigid iron hand is placed upon the spending powers of the Commonwealth. You apply a power, as I say, in a wise and popular direction when you say to the people of Australia-"Our method of solving this state of uncertainty and doubt will be that we will not a

Mr. LYNE. -

How do you guarantee that?

Mr. REID. -

Well, my honorable friend may perhaps see that if you know what the expenditure of the Commonwealth cannot exceed, the first element of uncertainty is disposed of. Why is there an uncertainty even when you have framed the Tariff? Why must there be an uncertainty even after all the proposals are put in the Bill, if they should be put in the Bill? Because the Federal Treasurer might bring down a fiscal proposal which might on one day insure a return to the states of the amount they want, and then in a month or two, by reckless or foolish or loose finance, might take back all he had given, and throw the states into absolutely the same uncertainty as they were in before. Because, if his power to spend is unlimited, the amount which the states will get back must always be uncertain. Therefore I say, let us come to the point of certainty by fixing a point of economy in expenditure. That is the sort of certainty that will recommend itself to the people more than any other. I am very sorry to have taken up the time I have done, but I am very anxious indeed that this matter should be settled on lines which will enable me to go to the large body of electors in New South Wales who believe with me in a certain fiscal policy, and satisfy them that although, in the interests of federation, we are called upon to take risks, and serious risks, this Convention has not given a bias to the Constitution which imposes on us a disability to which our opponents are not also exposed.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I may as well point out, at this juncture, that, having struck out clause 91, we cannot re-insert it at the present stage.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I have listened with great pleasure, as I am sure every member of the Convention present has done, to the very remarkable speech which we have just heard from the Premier of New South Wales. For my own part, I have had a divided feeling while listening to it. I felt entirely with Mr. Reid during the first part of his address, but I felt just as strongly in antagonism to him in later portions of his speech, in which he contradicted what he said at first. Because, he certainly proved to us in a high and statesmanlike way that, in beginning this Federation, the policy of no particular colony must be thrust into the concern. The Commonwealth, he rightly urged, has got to determine its own fiscal policy. Mr. Reid pointed out with great clearness that all the colonies except his own were colonies that advocated protection, and that they would, of a certainty, be in the majority in the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -

I did not say of a certainty. I said a great probability, which is a very great difference. It may fit your argument to make it so.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I beg the right honorable gentleman's pardon for having somewhat misstated his words. I will substitute the statement that "the colonies which advocate protection will very likely be in a majority in the Federal Parliament." "Therefore," Mr. Reid said, "if with my strong views on free-trade, I am still prepared to submit to a Constitution under which there is every probability that a majority will be returned to the Commonwealth Parliament antagonistic to my fiscal views, surely you ought to be satisfied." I agree with every word there, and I think it is quite unnecessary to insert any provision such as was suggested in the very excellent speech that we listened to from Mr. Deakin, because all those provisions operate as handicaps on one colony or another. Such a provision may help this Bill to be carried in one colony, but it will prevent it being carried in another. It will create dissension where there ought to be agreement it indicates distrust when the very essence of our being is trust and confidence. And all this time, this is only an interim arrangement. After a few years all this is to be swept away, and the Commonwealth is to do as it pleases. But for some four or five years that different state of feeling is expected to prevail. The greater trust which you can ultimately place in the Federal Government and the Federal Parliament will not exist at the initiation, or for five years afterwards, as it will subsequently; and so you have to make that provision in order to quiet the minds of the anxious who are antagonistic to the general principles of the Constitution, and you admit, on the face of it, that this is an anomaly. So I say that I have listened to no speech in the Convention with more admiration than the greater part of the speech of the Premier of New South Wales, in which he proved to demonstration that this matter ought to be left to the Commonwealth, without being handicapped by any prejudices or politics of any particular state. But Mr. Reid did not stop there. Having proved his case, I think, to demonstration, he straightway proceeded to demolish it, because he said that the guarantee which is desired for the states would best be given by providing a limitation of Commonwealth expenditure. But how can that be provided? Take the case of defence, how can you say what the expenditure for defence may be ordinarily or in emergency?

Mr. REID. -

The ordinary expenditure you can estimate—the annual expenditure; emergency expenditure you cannot forecast, but that would come out of loan money.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I would say to Mr. Reid that now you can estimate the ordinary expenditure for defence, but you cannot tell what the development of events may need next year, or the year after that, even in your ordinary expenditure for defence, and still less can you tell what it will be in your extraordinary expenditure for defence. No; I venture to submit that your guarantee against extravagant expenditure must be in the power and authority you give to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and not in any way by trying to define any amount. Mention the subjects of the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament, and there you will have a proper limitation of their expenditure.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

On those subjects they might spend large or small sums as they think fit;
you would have no guarantee under that arrangement. Take defence, for instance.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

In defence you cannot control the expenditure of the Government of the Commonwealth anyhow. If you did, what would come of the autocratic gentlemen in this Convention do if they were in power? Why, they would simply set your provision at naught, and say-"Oh, we will spend the money and trust to the Federal Parliament afterwards, and, failing that, we will trust to the Federal High Court."

Mr. WISE. -

Who is going to pull them up, if they go too far?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The Federal High Court. That is the only tribunal that could pull them up.

Mr. WISE. -

The Federal High Court could not pull them up.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Very possibly not. I know that the right honorable despot opposite will sympathize thoroughly with what I am saying because it is exactly on the lines of his own argument. The Premier of New South Wales demonstrated as clear as the day that we could put no set provision in the Bill such as Mr. Deakin suggests, and straightway he proposed to put a provision in, because he said a provision might be put in limiting the extent of the expenditure of the Commonwealth so as to provide for a certain return to the states.

Mr. FRASER. -

That would not give the same satisfaction at all.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No, perhaps not. I do not know which is the more comfortable way of putting the figures. It appears to me that the results would be identical, although certain phraseology might be more comfortable to one colony. Now, my own view is the view that Mr. Reid expressed in the first instance. I think it is quite impossible to make any provision such as Mr. Holder suggests, or as anybody else can suggest, by which there will be a guarantee of the sum to be returned to the states. That depends, of course, on the policy of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

What depends on the policy of the Commonwealth?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The sum to be returned to the states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Surely not; surely that is not a question of its policy.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
As to what amounts arising from the policy of free-trade or protection, for instance.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I do not think that free-trade or protection is involved in this matter.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I think it is, indeed. As far as my opinion is concerned, I take it that the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth will be a protective Tariff extra-colonially, and everybody knows that it must be so.

Mr. FRASER. -
It need not be so at all.

Mr. SYMON. -
Not a protective Tariff - a high Tariff.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I will accept Mr. Symon's suggested amendment. He does not like the word protective, so I will say a high Tariff. I say that somehow or another we know it is absolutely certain that, extra-colonially, there will be a high Tariff. Now, you want to provide that legislatively. That is, in effect, what you want to do. In my opinion, it would be inserting provisions in this Bill that would absolutely prevent it being carried, in some of the colonies at all events; I do not say in South Australia, because I do not know that the insertion of such provisions would absolutely prevent the Bill being carried there, but it certainly would do so in some of the colonies which we very much want to see in this Federation, and without which federation cannot take place.

Mr. FRASER. -
Then, if that be so, they do not want federation.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I submit that it would be unwise to insert provisions of that kind, by which those colonies would be told that not only are they not to come in on even terms with the other colonies, but on the same terms as the other colonies with this thing added, that they are bound to adopt the fiscal policy of the others, with which policy they are in entire disagreement.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But you will not contend that the Commonwealth should not see that the states shall be guaranteed their solvency?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I take it that, as a matter of course, the Commonwealth will see to their solvency.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Then what is the objection to saying so?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I would say, in reply to Mr. Isaacs, that there are a number of things which, I think, it is very unwise to say. For instance, a lot of things have been said in the discussions of this Convention that I think it was very unwise to say—-a lot of things which were understood, and which whilst they remained in understanding and were not put in absolute form, there was no difficulty about, but when they came to be put into too concrete a form they created a shook, and evil results.

- - Then you are going to get the vote of the people because they do not know what they are voting for?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

That is a perfectly legitimate remark for the honorable member to make on the point. If we could see and tell everything, it would be our business to tell it; but we cannot see everything. Our vision is limited, and it is scarcely worth our while to be raising up a number of troubles in view of exactly similar fears having been raised by exactly similar arguments in other countries, where the actual results have contradicted those theories and arguments.

Mr. WALKER. -

They are raising bogies.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Well, they are bogies—a number of terrors which it will take all our work afterwards to dispel.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The terrors are there; we want to quiet them.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

As far as this matter is concerned, it must be admitted that Mr. Reid was right when he said that the substance of this proposal was an attempt to force on a colony with one fiscal policy the fiscal policies of other colonies. He said—"I am prepared to take the risks. Very likely that fiscal policy may be forced on our colony, while you timid ones," he said, "who are in the majority, and who will in all probability have it all your own way, are not prepared to take the risks." I can only say I agree entirely with the first part of the views which Mr. Reid expressed. I think that nothing should be put in further than is already provided, and I also think it would be a most mischievous thing to endeavour to adopt the right honorable gentleman's own suggestion, and put a limitation on the expenditure of the Commonwealth. As a matter of fact, it would be no limitation at all, because if, through circumstances, necessity arose, that provision would be set at defiance.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
In the one case you say nothing in the Constitution, but mean it, and in the other you say it, but don't mean it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Quite so.

Mr. ISAACS. -
A limitation of expenditure could only at most affect a few hundred thousands of pounds, and we are talking of millions.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
But whether the result would be the same or not, I do not wish to detain the committee at greater length. I will simply conclude by saying the present provision is enough.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -
I usually agree with my friend, the Premier from New South Wales, in his very sound view, but in this case I cannot, this morning, follow him in many of his arguments. For the life of me I do not see why clause 92, or the guarantee in clause 92, need be altered at all. I do not see wherein there is any cause for alarm in any colony. If it be proved or shown that £6,000,000, more or less, revenue can be derived only from a high Tariff, I would concede the point. I hold that you could get quite as much money, and perhaps more, by a revenue Tariff than by a high protective Tariff. If a high protective Tariff answers its purpose it stops revenue.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Suppose you have no Tariff, how will you raise money? You will have to raise money by direct taxation.

Mr. FRASER. -
We are now trying to frame a Federation to enable us to do that. I think it is only right that we should give the states Treasurers some satisfaction.
We cannot pass from one page of our existence to a future page without great misgivings. When people are about to change from one page to another they look at the existing page. They are afraid of the future. I therefore think it is only right that we should give the states Treasurers and states Parliaments some satisfaction. It is agreed by all the speakers in favour of the proposal that the new clause is a very simple one indeed. It is simplicity itself; and I, for one, would not be against adopting it.
Representatives and senators in the Commonwealth Parliament will see that the states are not-

Mr. WALKER. -
Slaughtered.

Mr. FRASER. -
Are not ruined. It would be the ruination of the states Parliaments, if sufficient money were not given back to pay interest on loans and such like. They could not, as Sir George Turner rightly observed the other day, raise taxation by direct taxes or in any way that could be devised. That would be impossible. To raise money in that way would create a revulsion of feeling, and, instead of having a harmonious Commonwealth, there would be the reverse. I see no danger in the first part of clause 92 to alarm anybody. The clause reads-

During the first five years after uniform duties of customs have been imposed the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the states-

It does not say the aggregate amount to each individual state, but simply the aggregate amount to be paid to the whole of the states. Can it be contended that the aggregate amount cannot be raised by an ordinary Tariff? I am certain it can. High protective Tariffs do not raise so very much money. In some cases high protective Tariffs cease to raise money at all, and therefore the argument does not apply. Mr. Reid and others have said that the Commonwealth Parliament would be compelled, under clause 92, to put on a high Tariff; otherwise, a protective Tariff. I do not hold with that at all. If we came to a decision in Adelaide and in Sydney, I do not see why we should now try to go back on it. It appears to me that the longer we discuss matters, and the more sessions we have-if we can call these sessions-we are going wider and wider apart.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Do not say that.

Mr. WALKER. -

The honorable member (Mr. Fraser) is mistaken. We did not consider this point at Sydney, but only at Adelaide.

Mr. FRASER. -

I suppose we did not consider it because we were not alarmed at it, and did not feel it necessary to consider it.

Mr. WALKER. -

There was no time.

Mr. FRASER. -

Time! We considered a lot of things, and might have considered this point had it been thought necessary. But it appears that the oftener we meet the more difficult it is for us to come together on simple clauses whereon there need not be any serious difference. I do not agree that any colony need be alarmed at clause 92 as framed in Adelaide. It gives the states a guarantee that the aggregate amount shall be raised throughout the whole;
it does not say that each state shall get back the aggregate amount it is exactly entitled to. It is absurd to say that the amount of money cannot be raised by a fair revenue Tariff. At the same time, when I find men like Mr. Holder, of South Australia, agreeing to the clause, as proposed to be substituted for the old clause, I certainly would not throw obstacles in the way of the Convention in its wisdom deciding to adopt the new clause. I would not say that it might not be adopted; but there is just ground for the Treasurers, not only of Victoria but of other colonies, requiring a guarantee. Victoria is quite as strong as some of the other colonies. If it came to a matter of debating which is the strongest colony, Victoria has an amount of vital financial strength in it, and need not be alarmed at all. Victoria is not put to great straits yet as to making both ends meet—that is, the same straits as older countries are put to. Even now, with all her retrenchment, Victoria could retrench still more if compelled to do so. There are many ways in which Victorian expenditure could be further curtailed; so that this colony, and also the other colonies, are financially strong. Let us hope that the colonies will be still stronger when they unite. If federation is going to do anything, it is going to give us financial prosperity, as it has done elsewhere; and it will also save expenditure as it has done elsewhere, and, in every other way, help to give confidence to the nation. Confidence in this respect means a great deal. There need be no jealousy in regard to the matter. If there is a large section of the population who have no means of livelihood in Victoria, they have only to walk across the Murray or cross the border into South Australia and find employment there. There will be one Commonwealth. The people of Canada do not say—"We are leaving Nova Scotia and are now going to New Brunswick." Names are forgotten in the Canadian Dominion. Boundaries are simply obliterated, and the people residing in Manitoba, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick have forgotten the old names which marked the boundaries, and all are under the same benign rule. So it will be here if we forget the present and look to the future. I would rather see the clause as adopted in Adelaide adopted here, or some amendment in clause 92, as now presented by the Finance Committee. The clause, as I said before, is remarkably simple, and simply means that the Commonwealth Parliament shall refund the moneys that the states Treasurers expect. I was wrong the other day in stating that there would be twelve members for each state in the House of Representatives. New South Wales will be entitled to about 26 representatives, and Victoria to 24, or something like that. It is not to be believed, in my opinion, that the members of the House of Representatives and the senators will neglect the interests of their own states. The senators in the Dominion of Canada are elected for life, and perhaps may not be in the same touch with their constituents as would the senators in the Australian Commonwealth. The Bill provides that half of the senators go to their constituents every three years, and that the members of the other House shall be elected every three years, or probably at shorter intervals. It cannot be conceived that a large body of men who are returned by the electors could neglect the duties devolving on them to see that the state Treasurers are not made insolvent. I am satisfied that this colony and South Australia, probably Tasmania, and also perhaps Western Australia are financially strong. New South Wales appears to be so financially strong as not to mind what course is adopted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That is quite right.

Mr. FRASER. -
We are not jealous of New South Wales.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You are practically a New South Welshman, and you ought to know.

Mr. FRASER. -
I am certainly a New South Welshman, and I am proud of it. At the same time, the financial position of Queensland is not behind that of New South Wales, but is just about as strong, and probably in 100 years will be the strongest of the group.

Mr. WALKER. -
There are great possibilities there.

Mr. FRASER. -
Why should New South Wales object to put one or two words in this clause, just to give confidence? I would not say that the words would make the clause surer, as an honorable member has said, because I think it is sure already, but the words would give confidence and would not do any harm. I therefore would ask that this small concession be made by the Finance Committee.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -
We are now dealing with clause 92, and the important part of that clause—which was fought out, I recollect very well, in the Finance Committee, and insisted on very strongly as giving some assurance to the state Treasurers that the specific amount at all events would be returned to their respective Treasuries—provides that the aggregate amount which the several states have received from Customs in the year prior to the introduction of the uniform Tariff shall be returned in a certain mode. That is the important provision in the clause.

Mr. LYNE. -
That is the clause.

Mr. HENRY. -

That is the clause as it stands. The provision which affords a certain amount of security to the states it is proposed to strike out. I have myself, both in the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania and in this Convention, expressed the opinion that we might with confidence trust to the Federal Parliament, knowing how that Parliament will be constituted, and knowing also the necessities of the various states. In four ou

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It cannot be done. It would be very difficult in a colony, and no man could do it in the Commonwealth.

Mr. HENRY. -

It would be most difficult. If there is a possibility, and there is a strong possibility, that the Treasurer's calculations for the first year may be seriously upset, then in the absence of a provision such as this-I am not arguing for the provision, but in the absence of some provision giving the Federal Parliament power to aid the state Treasurers, or throwing the responsibility on the Federal Parliament-there is the risk of several state Treasuries being very seriously deranged and embarrassed. I am quite in accord with the Premier of New South Wales in repudiating the use of the word "insolvency;" I am merely pointing to the grave contingency that the state Treasuries may be very seriously embarrassed. Then the question arises-in the event of the Federal Treasurer's calculations proving erroneous, and the amounts returned to the respective states being altogether inadequate for the necessities of those states, they are left in this anomalous position: They have given up this instrument of taxation which enables them to raise funds necessary to pay the interest on the public debts. They are left, with the whole liability, and they have to take the entire risk of what the Federal Treasurer's calculations may be, as to whether they will get back a sufficient sum to meet their engagements. In cases where colonies are already overburdened with direct taxation, and have retrenched to the uttermost, what then is left to them? It is obvious, to me at all events, that the responsibility should be distinctly laid on the Federal Parliament or Executive. I agree to the striking out of this clause. I am quite prepared to say to my fellow colonists in Tasmania-"Take the risk and strike out the clause, making no special provision for a specific amount to be returned; trust to the Federal Parliament." But I do desire that it shall be made quite clear that the Federal Parliament shall have the necessary power to come to the aid of the state Treasurers if the circumstances justify it. That is my point. If we do not put some provision in this Constitution making it quite clear that the Federal Parliament has the necessary power in some unforeseen contingencies to step in and aid the state Treasurers we must have some provision such as that in the clause-a provision throwing the responsibility on the Federal Parliament of providing a sufficient sum for the states' necessities.

Mr. FRASER. -

What could be more simple than the words used in the clause?

Mr. HENRY. -

I have given my reasons why I should prefer some general provision giving the Federal Parliament power, under certain conditions to be determined by the Federal Parliament, rather than the provision now in this clause. This provision in clause 92 would be better than nothing, but I would prefer wider terms, which would apply under conditions that we may not foresee. But, while I agree to the striking out of the clause on the understanding I have named, I am not at all in accord with the reasons for doing this which were so eloquently advanced by the Premier of New South Wales. He has told us that his objection to putting anything like a specific amount in this clause-of course, the amount is not named, but it is indicated-is based on the ground that it would indicate what the particular policy of the future Federal Parliament should be in the matter of the Tariff. Now, I fail to see myself in what respect merely naming a definite sum to be returned indicates or becomes a mandate to the Federal Parliament as to what the Tariff shall be; but it is said that if it is compulsory on the Federal Parliament that this large amount shall be raised, it is impossible that a policy of free-trade can be adopted by the Commonwealth. Well, I say, in reply to that, that the financial necessities of the colonies are such that it is imperative that the amount shall be raised, and there is no getting away from the fact; whether you put it in this Constitution Bill or leave it out, the financial necessities of the states are such that the money must be raised. Of course, it is obvious that we cannot state in this Constitution Bill whether this amount shall be raised by Customs or otherwise, and I do not see anything in the clause which indicates that it shall be raised by Customs. The power is left to the Federal Parliament to say how it shall be raised. The Premier of New South Wales laid great emphasis on the argument that if we restricted the expenditure of the Federal Parliament to £300,000 per annum, that would be the best provision by way of security to the states.

Now, I must say, with all due respect to that right honorable gentleman's acknowledged ability, that this argument seemed to me-I do not like to use the language that occurs to me-
Mr. REID. -
Oh, I don't mind; I am accustomed to much harder language.

Mr. HENRY. -
Well, I must say that it seemed to me to be an absurdity. Here we are entrusting the Federal Parliament with power to raise revenue to an unlimited extent, and we all know that the necessities of the states and of the federal authority will require something like £6,000,000 to be raised, and to say that the difference between £300,000 and £500,000 is going to operate in any way in regard to securing to the states the necessary revenue strikes me as absurd.

Mr. REID. -
If you know what the Commonwealth expenditure is to be for the year you can calculate your share of it, and knowing your receipts from Customs, you can know what your income is.

Mr. HENRY. -
The amount of £300,000 has been fixed as a very liberal amount for the expenditure of the Federal Government, and I would ask how, in the name of common sense, the expenditure of an additional £100,000 could seriously affect the position of the states, even if such an increased expenditure were probable? While agreeing to strike out this clause, I trust that the Convention will see its way to insert some provision that will give the Federal Parliament the necessary power to deal with exceptional cases when they arise.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
I, for one, would very much like to see some provision in the Constitution indemnifying the several states against loss from the surrender of revenue from all sources. At the same time, I would not support or assist any proposal which would bear the sinister aspect suggested by the Premier of New South Wales—which would have an embarrassing effect upon the important colony of New South Wales. But it appears to me that it is within the bounds of possibility that the Premier of New South Wales has overstated the difficulty of the case from his point of view. In the first place, I would draw attention to the fact that at Adelaide he gave his support to the scheme embodied in clause 92.

Mr. REID. -
No, I fought that part of it most bitterly in the committee, and was beaten.

Dr. QUICK. -
I understood that the right honorable gentleman gave his adhesion to it generally.

Mr. REID. -
I always fought against the part fixing the aggregate amount.

Mr. LYNE. -

I think the honorable member (Dr. Quick) is mistaken. The Premier of New South Wales did not support that.

Dr. QUICK. -

I may be wrong, but I remember a speech in the Convention at Adelaide in which the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) said he was prepared to give his support generally to the provision.

Mr. REID. -

I said I was prepared to trust the Federal Parliament. That is not trusting the Federal Parliament; it is the very opposite.

Dr. QUICK. -

I accept the right honorable gentleman's assurance that he did not support the proposal with regard to fixing the aggregate. However, I would venture to direct his attention to the fact that the whole of his opposition to this indemnity or security proposal seems to be based on the assumption that the only revenues which are to be surrendered or transferred by the states to the Commonwealth are those to be derived from Customs and Excise. It is quite true that there will be upwards of £6,000,000 per annum surrendered by the states to the Commonwealth in Customs and Excise, but that amount does not represent the whole of the revenues, or the whole of the sources of revenue, which are to be expressly transferred by the states to the Commonwealth. I find by a return which was laid before the Convention the day before yesterday by Mr. Fenton, the Victorian Government Statist, in reply to a motion brought forward by myself, that other annual revenues to be transferred by the states to the Commonwealth reach a total of £1,863,934. So that nearly £2,000,000 in addition to the £6,000,000 will, under this Constitution, be transferred to the Commonwealth, will be under the control of the Commonwealth, and will be capable of legislative modification by the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

There is a considerable outgoing in respect of that.

Mr. SYMON. -

The net amount would be about £1,000,000.

Dr. QUICK. -

Amongst these sources of revenue are the postal, telegraphic, and telephonic services, amounting to £1,675,516; ocean beacons, buoys, light-houses, and light-ships, £76,305; currency and coinage-mint, £36,313; bank-note tax, £53,577; bankruptcy and insolvency, £10,794; copyrights, patents, and trade-marks, £10,776; Agency-General, £653; or a total of £1,863,934. These are sources of revenue-revenue-earning departments-which will be transferred to the Commonwealth, which the Commonwealth will have the control of, and from which the Commonwealth may derive an increased revenue to make up any possible deficiency without necessarily imposing on it the obligation of raising any deficiency from Customs revenue. Now, I would suggest to the Premier of New South Wales to consider this also—whether he would have to say to the people of New South Wales that they are immovably pledged to any particular fiscal policy, merely because some £6,000,000 sterling has to be guaranteed to the states, either in the aggregate or in their several capacities. It seems to be admitted generally that that sum could be raised through the Custom-house, either by protective duties or by revenue duties. In fact, it could probably be raised more easily by revenue duties than by protective duties because the effect of protective duties, if they are successful, is rather to keep goods out of the Commonwealth, and to reduce revenue. Therefore, I do not see how that argument, which seems to overwhelm and embarrass the Premier of New South Wales, ought to induce him to take the strong and determined stand of suggesting that this would jeopardize federation amongst the free-trade party in New South Wales. I am sure that no one wishes to put anything in this Constitution which would embarrass any leading member of the Convention, or any colony. I would, therefore, urge the right honorable gentleman and his colleagues in the representation of New South Wales to consider our position. Take the colonies of Victoria and Western Australia. We stand to lose more than any other colony in point of surrender of revenue, and therefore our position would be more uncertain and precarious than that of any other colony.

Mr. GLYNN. -

You stand to gain more in internal trade.

Dr. QUICK. -

We may gain hereafter. I do not suggest that the indemnity should be a permanent one. It might be confined to a period of five years. That would not pledge the Commonwealth to an indefinite fiscal policy for all time, but it would place the states in a position, in some degree, of certainty. I would ask the chairman of the Finance Committee to consider whether some such addition as this should not be made to the clause which is to take the place of clause 92: The Commonwealth shall during such period

That is the period of five years.

indemnify each state against the net loss, if any, against such debits and credits-

These are the debits and credits specified in the earlier sub-sections.
arising from the transfer of revenue-earning departments and services to the Commonwealth, the revenue-earning value of the same to be determined by the average annual revenue yielded by the same during the five years

That speaks for itself. I throw it out as a suggestion. At the same time, as I said at an earlier stage of this discussion, I do not wish to force my own views in favour of an indemnity, or of some security, on any particular colony, and to have the decision arrived at merely by a division. I would like to see a scheme adopted—either on the lines I have mentioned or on the lines indicated by other honorable members—unanimously, so that the principles embodied in the Bill should not represent the result of a conflict, but the result of conciliation and compromise, which should be the essence of every reasonable proposal in this Constitution, certainly in matters relating to finance. The proposal I have made appears to me to be based on fair and equitable principles. It gives the states credit during the five years' period for all revenue which they receive from all sources. On the other hand, the states will be debited with the expenditure indicated by these sub-sections. Then, if there is any deficiency, as shown in the annual balance sheet—that is, any deficiency as compared with the receipts from all sources during the five years immediately preceding the uniform Tariff—that deficiency will be guaranteed by the Commonwealth, I would point out, also, as showing that such a deficiency need not be made up by an increase of customs duties—that there are various revenue-earning departments capable of earning nearly £2,000,000 per annum which are very elastic, and would probably yield any sum necessary to cover the deficiency without introducing anything like an income tax or a land tax. For instance, there is the bank-note tax which Victoria surrenders, and which yields £19,317 per annum. The colony of New South Wales also surrenders a bank-note tax yielding £26,431 per annum, and South Australia surrenders bank-note tax yielding £7,829 per annum. That shows that any deficiency to make up the indemnity or guarantee need not involve a drastic alteration in the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth. The amount required could be obtained from these other elastic sources of revenue.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). - We have listened to a very long debate upon this question, but so far I have not heard any solution of the difficulty. I cannot say that I am at all in favour of the clause as it stands. It is a very cumbersome clause, and should be struck out. I should like to hear from the Treasurer of Victoria, who started the debate, what proposal he has to submit in substitution for the clause that is to be struck out.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Simply that the commonwealth should by some means guarantee to all the states what is proposed to be guaranteed to one state-Western Australia. Whatever our losses are, the states should not be called on for five years to debit themselves with those losses, but they should be made up by the Commonwealth by some means.

Mr. LYNE. -
Then the right honorable gentleman would make the condition applicable to Western Australia applicable to all the states?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That is the only way I see of dealing with the difficulty.

Mr. LYNE. -
I am not sure whether that is a possible way of doing it. I have read with a good deal of interest the proposal made by my honorable friend (Mr. Holder), and I think that it would meet all that the Treasurer of Victoria desires. Mr. Holder suggests that 95 per cent. of the total amount raised through the Customs should be returned to the states, and that is based on an expenditure by the Federal Parliament of £300,000. The Federal Treasurer would have to raise practically the amount that is obtained now by the states from customs duties to enable him to meet an expenditure of £300,000, and to repay 95 per cent. to the states.

Mr. REID. -
There is nothing in the proposition requiring that the total amount raised shall be £6,000,000. The Commonwealth Treasurer would simply return 95 per cent. of the amount, whatever it was.

Mr. LYNE. -
If he returns 95 per cent. he must raise £6,000,000, or he could not meet an expenditure of £300,000.

Mr. REID. -
This proposal would not compel him to do it. He could raise money by other means.

Mr. LYNE. -
I quite admit that it would not be a direction to the Federal Treasurer that he should raise this sum of money by customs duties. The money could be raised from any source, but it would give the state Treasurers an assurance that they would receive a certain amount of money.

Mr. REID. -
They would not know how much. They would not know what 95 per cent. would come to.
Mr. LYNE. -

The proposal is based on the revenue received from Customs at the present time, and it would require 5 per cent. of the total to provide for an expenditure of £300,000. I do not say that this is the best proposal that can be made, It is well known that I have always been in favour of a guaranteed return to the states for a number of years. It has been suggested that there is a sinister motive in this. I have no sinister motive, but I would ask honorable members to place themselves in the position of a state Treasurer. He would not know without some guarantee what money he would receive from month to month, or from year to year, and yet be would have to forecast his financial position for each succeeding year. It is all very well to say that the Federal Parliament will be framed from the electors of the states as they are now. That is correct in one sense, but only in one sense. It will be made up from the electors of the present states, but under very different conditions. If the Federal Treasurer got into financial difficulties at any time the first thing he would do would be to throw the responsibility on the state Treasurers by refusing to pay them the amount of money that they should receive. He would perhaps be able to carry on, but would do so by placing the states in a very unenviable position. I desire to leave as much as we reasonably can to the Federal Parliament, but we should consider the necessities of the states during the first few years of the Commonwealth. I do not think for one moment that there is any possibility of any of the states repudiating any of their responsibilities or becoming insolvent. Still, some of the states might be placed in very great financial straits if they were left dependent entirely on the Federal Treasurer. It was stated to-day by the Premier of New South Wales that no colony paid its interest out of borrowed money. I would like any Treasurer present to tell me how he pays his interest when his revenue is not equal to his expenditure, and he has a deficiency?

Mr. REID. -

I have had no deficiency, so I cannot say. You had a deficiency, and you are the man to tell us.

Mr. LYNE. -

The right honorable gentleman has borrowed money which practically has been used to pay interest during the time he has been in power.

Mr. REID. -

No.

Mr. LYNE. -

The same thing has been done by every other Treasurer, and I happen to know that the right honorable member has done it.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
You have not permanently paid interest out of the loan money.

Mr. LYNE. -

Money has been borrowed to make up the deficiency, and that deficiency included the payment of interest.

Mr. SYMON. -

Perhaps it was set down for some new railway.

Mr. LYNE. -

No, it appeared as being partly for the payment of interest. It was in the general expenditure of the state. I am not speaking now of New South Wales. I say that any state that has a deficiency pays its interest out of borrowed money, and the financiers in Great Britain know it perfectly well.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

They all do it.

Mr. LYNE. -

I have no doubt that Tasmania has done it as well as others.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

I am doing it now.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am glad the honorable member agrees with me. I cannot agree with the Premier of New South Wales that the mere placing of a limit upon the expenditure of the Federal Parliament will in any way help in assuring to the states a return of this money. I am in favour of placing a limit on the expenditure, as was done in the Bill before, but that simply prevents extravagance. It does not in any way secure to the states a return of any sum of money, such as they are obtaining at the present time. The Federal Treasurer need not raise more than £300,000, and what I want to see in the Bill is some security to the states that they will receive a considerable sum of money during the first few years of the Federation. I said a few moments ago that there was no sinister motive in this. I believe that you are more likely to receive a large sum of money from a revenue Tariff than from a protective Tariff—that is, from a protective Tariff which would have the proper effect. The Premier of New South Wales need not be alarmed if we provide for the insertion in the Bill of a guarantee for a minimum return to the states, because he will be able to tell his supporters that the Tariff of the Commonwealth will be a revenue Tariff, and a revenue Tariff is now in force in that colony. Personally, I admit that I am of the opinion that in a Federation where you have three or four colonies favouring a protective policy, and only one colony against it, the votes of the three or four colonies are likely to override the vote of the one colony, so that in the future there must be, perhaps not a very high, but still a protective Tariff. I hope that when the clause is struck out a solution of the difficulty will be arrived at in the direction suggested by the Prime Minister of Victoria. No doubt the clause is objectionable as it stands, and will have to be struck out, and unless we substitute a proposal such as has been suggested, we shall have all this discussion over again. Some people may argue that everything should be left to the Federal Parliament, but I cannot fall in with that view. I believe that the Federal Parliament will do the best it can to mete out justice to the states, but difficulties may arise which will make that impossible, and the states will then feel the pinch of financial necessity, unless the suggestion is agreed to. I am as willing as any one to trust the Federal Parliament, but I cannot trust it blindly, as one or two seem prepared to do. Therefore, I hope that some security will be given to the states. Though I am not as well acquainted with the feelings of the people of Victoria as the representatives of this colony must be, I venture to think that if you leave out of the Bill a provision of this sort it will prejudice the acceptance of the measure in Victoria. I believe that the same thing may be said of New South Wales, of South Australia, and of Tasmania. I hope, therefore, that, without any long debate, we may come to a solution of this difficulty.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Before we come to clause 93, I might mention that five new clauses have been suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania, of which four appear to me to depend upon the first, which is called 92A, and which is as follows:-

Upon the establishment of the Commonwealth the whole of the public debts of the states, and all interest thereafter payable thereon, shall become chargeable upon and payable out of the funds and revenues of the Commonwealth, but each state shall indemnify the Commonwealth in respect of so much of the public debts of the state and the interest payable thereon as shall exceed that proportion of the same debts which, if calculated upon the basis of the population of the state, would represent a sum per capita equal to the sum per capita represented by the total public debt of the state which shall he indebted in the least amount per capita of its population.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I desire to point out that we are now in the midst of considering the very important question of the distribution of the surplus. We have determined what shall be done with it during five years, and I think that we should finally deal with the whole matter before we turn our attention to the question of public debts. T

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would suggest that, as it is just upon one o'clock, we should leave these clauses to be digested after lunch. I have been asked to say that to-night, and upon other evenings when the Convention is sitting, dinner will be served in the dining-room at six o'clock. I propose to ask honorable members to sit until half-past five this afternoon, and to resume again at half-past seven.

[The Chairman left the chair at five minutes to one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at seven minutes past two p.m.]

Clause 93. - After the expiration of five years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs, each state shall be deemed to contribute to the revenue an equal sum per head of its population, and all surplus revenue over the expenditure of the Commonwealth shall be distributed month by month among the several states in proportion to the numbers of their people as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

The CHAIRMAN. -

There are three amendments suggested, one by South Australia, one by Tasmania, and one by Western Australia, but inasmuch as they are all amendments which have been already decided in other parts of the Bill I will not put them.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There is an amendment proposed by the Finance Committee, and in order to carry it out I beg to move-

That all the words after the first word "After" be omitted, with the view of inserting the following words:-"five years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs all surplus revenue over the expenditure of the Commonwealth shall be distributed month by month among the several states on such basis as shall be fair to the several states, and in a proportion and after a method to be determined by the Parliament."

In moving this, I should like to mention that a suggestion was made by my learned friend (Mr. Symon) the other day, who pointed out that the effect of the words "on such basis as shall be fair to the several states" would leave the question of the fairness of the distribution to the High Court, instead of to the determination of Parliament. Inasmuch as this is a matter entirely of politics and of policy, Mr. Symon suggested that Parliament should be the arbiter with reference to the fairness of the distribution, as well as with regard to the proportion, after a method to be determined by the Parliament. I quite agree with that myself. In fact, before the suggestion was made by the honorable member I had prepared an amendment to serve the purpose. At present I will propose the Finance Committee's amendment as it stands.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I propose after these words are struck out to insert the words "not less than" before the words "five years," so as to make five years the minimum and not the maximum.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

By creating this blank we shall take away what I, for one, consider ought to be the method of distribution after five years. It will take away the per capita distribution. The clause, as we have it before us, provides that after five years the distribution is to be on a per capita basis. The amendment is to leave the distribution absolutely to the Federal Parliament. I have stated several times that I believe, whatever we may provide during the five years, that after that period the distribution should be per capita, even though we should have a modifying clause giving the Federal Parliament some power to vary it if exceptional circumstances arise. The matter has been discussed so often that I shall not discuss it now, but I think it would be wise to take a division on the omission of these words, so as to see whether a majority of the Convention are or are not in favour of the per capita basis. I shall, therefore, vote for the retention of these words, because I believe the basis, after five years, should be per capita.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I shall put the question in this form that the words proposed by Mr. Symon-"not less than"-be inserted before the word "five."

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The object of the amendment is to put the clause in accord with clause 91. I wish to make it clear that both clauses are the same.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I intend to oppose the amendment proposed by Mr. Symon, because it is practically affirming the principle of the whole case. During the debate in committee on this question several objections were taken to allowing Parliament to make a distribution of the surplus as it thought fit. If these objections are to be pushed home, now is the time to do so, because if Mr. Symon's amendment is carried it will affirm the whole principle, and it will provide that after the expiration of five years Parliament can do as it wishes. If Sir George Turner's idea is carried out of preserving the old clause, we shall be forced to per capita distribution on the present principle. I would suggest that it would be more feasible to amend the Finance Committee's amendment. After five years from the date of the imposition of uniform customs duties, which would really mean seven year's experience, because the new Tariff will probably not be imposed for two years, it ought to be possible for the Federal Parliament to recast the method of distributing the surplus for, say, a further period of five years.
That would be twelve years from the foundation of the Commonwealth, and I think the per capita distribution ought then to cease. The position I assume is that, instead of enforcing the per capita distribution at the end of five years, you should give power to the Federal Parliament to say that a further temporary expedient may be adopted for a further period of five years. The effect of the clause as it stands is that the Parliament may really dispose of the surplus in any manner it likes. I object to that. There is a method fixed in the Constitution for five years-the method set forth in the clause we have passed. At the end of that time the Parliament can, on any basis it likes, apportion the surplus among the states. Several honorable members, in speaking on this point, have opposed the vesting of this power of distribution in the Federal Parliament, and if they wish to stick to the position they assumed in speaking, now is the time to agree to the insertion of words to prevent the Federal Parliament being allowed for any longer period to say how the surplus is to be distributed among the states. I suggest this as a via media as between the old system of per capita distribution at the end of five years, and new system of giving omnipotence to the Parliament in regard to the distribution at the end of the five years from uniformity. What I desire is that at the end of the five years from uniformity the Parliament should hit upon another temporary expedient thus hit upon should only hold for five years further, and at the end of that period—which would be ten years from uniformity—there should be a per capita distribution. I suggest that the words proposed to be inserted should be amended in this way: At the end of the second line, after the word
"customs," there should be inserted the words—
and thereafter for a further period of five years.

And then, at the end of the clause, other words should be put in, so that the clause would read—

After the expiration of five years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs, and thereafter for a further period of five years, all surplus revenue for the expenditure of the Commonwealth shall be distributed from month to month among the several states, on such a basis and in a proportion and after a method to be determined by the Parliament;
after the expiration of ten years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs, all surplus revenue over the expenditure of the Commonwealth shall be distributed from month to month among the several states, in proportion to the numbers of their people, as shown from time to time by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -

What is the difference between that proposal and the new clause?

Mr. GLYNN. -

It is this. Under the new clause the Parliament can go on for ever regulating the apportionment of the surplus among the states, which consequently may never get a per capita distribution. The Parliament may perpetuate the system with regard to Western Australia ad infinitum, or it may apply the same system to any other colony, or it may shift the system we are applying to Western Australia to any other colony having a temporary flush of prosperity, such as Western Australia has got now. The difference between the two is that, whereas the clause would allow the Parliament to adopt some other method which would be applicable only for another five years—that would make the term ten years altogether—and at the end of that time the per capita distribution would have to be entered upon.

I make this suggestion because it is extremely probable that there will be at the end of the second five years such an approximation to normal conditions in all the colonies as will justify the resort to the per capita principle then. Thus we should have the positive assurance that at the end of ten years the per capita distribution of the surplus would be entered upon.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Would it not be simpler to scratch out five and insert ten?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not think it would, because there is a fixed period of five years provided for from the very inception of the Constitution. We have fixed the method of distribution for the first five years.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I rise to a point of order. The point is whether the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) is speaking to the amendment under consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment actually before the Chair is that of Mr. Symon to insert the words "not less than" before the word "five;" but we have adopted the procedure of permitting a discussion upon the whole clause.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Exactly so, sir, and it is on that assumption I am speaking; besides which the adoption of Mr. Symon's amendment would practically mean the confirmation of words already inserted. Moreover, I want to point out to Sir George Turner that it would be better for him to adopt the method I suggest as a sort of mean between the two methods which have been discussed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I shall be glad to accept your suggestion if the Convention will adopt it as a compromise.

Mr. GLYNN. -
If the words I have read be inserted they will insure the application of the per capita method of distribution at the end of ten years from the establishment of uniformity.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The question is that the words "not less than" proposed to be inserted be so inserted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I must confess that I do not understand the meaning of this amendment.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I am not quite positive that this amendment will make any difference in the meaning of the clause. Clause 91 says during the first five years and thereafter, until the Parliament otherwise provides, certain things shall be done. The suggestion now is that there shall be a fair basis of distribution in "not less than" five years. It cannot be less than five years according to the Bill as it stands.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I cannot understand the amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -
It is only repeating the effect of the clause as it stands; unless, of course, my honorable friend (Mr. Symon) has some other reason which is not apparent to me.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
The object of the amendment really is to make clause 93 correspond in its effect with clause 91. Of course, if the provision is clear without this amendment, I will not go on with it, but it seems to me that it is not clear without the amendment. In clause 91 the implication is that the five years' term is merely a minimum, and that the Parliament shall at the end of that period deter

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Under your amendment it may be ten years.

Mr. SYMON. -
It may be five, or six, or ten years. So it may under clause 91.

Mr. BARTON. -
But this clause goes on to say-"until the Parliament otherwise provides."
Mr. SYMON. -
That is so, but it is the same here. The Federal Parliament will have the distribution of the surplus.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
That is the intention.

Mr. SYMON. -
No. The intention is that, when we have ended the first five years, the Federal Parliament will determine whether it has sufficient data and material before it to enable it to fix the basis for distribution. If it should not have sufficient data, it may extend the period of bookkeeping for five years more.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Five years?

Mr. SYMON. -
Or ten years or twenty.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Or one year.

Mr. SYMON. -
Or one year. The clause says-"until the Parliament otherwise provides." The only object of my amendment-and of course there is very little substance in it except to make clause 93 clear-is that it does not contemplate the establishment of a rigid rule by the Federal Parliament for the distribution of the surplus immediately upon the expiration of the five years.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
It means that the Parliament must take the matter into consideration at the end of the five years.

Mr. SYMON. -
It means that I want to make the matter perfectly clear. I wish to make clause 93 consistent with clause 91, or to avoid the possibility of clause 93 being construed to be in conflict with clause 91; and I want to compel legislation at the end of five years with regard to the distribution of the surplus, and to make it absolutely clear that it is our intention that it is to be left to the Federal Parliament to say whether the time is ripe for changing the method of distribution from that which prevailed during the five years to a new method of distribution. In clause 91 the intention is that the system of bookkeeping shall continue until the Parliament makes a law to alter it.

Mr. REID. -
Or until the Parliament passes a short Act continuing the existing system for a fixed period.
Mr. SYMON. -

Just so-until the Parliament intervenes. Clause 93 seems, if not inconsistent with clause 91, at any rate calculated to give rise to some little confusion on the point. But I attach so much weight to the view of my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) that I am quite willing to leave the matter to the consideration of the Drafting Committee, in order that if it be possible by the insertion of these words to make the two clauses more consistent and clear, they may do it. It is with that view that I have called the attention of the committee to the matter, and I think that the amendment embodies the intentions of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Do you wish to withdraw your proposed amendment?

Mr. SYMON. -

The reason I have taken the liberty of occupying the attention of the committee about it now is because it is very important that we, in this Convention, should understand that the five years' [P.1089] starts here time is not the limit. Some honorable members are under the impression that at the end of the five years the Federal Parliament are obliged to adopt this system of distributing the surplus.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is what clause 93 means.

Mr. SYMON. -

No, it does not.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Lawyers differ.

Mr. SYMON. -

No, not on that question. It is not a question for lawyers only. The right honorable gentleman is just as competent to form an opinion on that question, because it is a practical question. I am quite willing to leave the matter to the Drafting Committee. I prefer that the words should be stated, but as Mr. Barton has expressed himself in thorough appreciation of what the point is-and it was in order that there may be no misapprehension on this subject that I desired to impress it on the attention of the committee-I am quite willing to leave Mr. Barton to deal with it as he thinks fit.

Mr. Symon's amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to propose-

That after the first word of clause 93 the following words:-"five years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs all surplus revenue over the expenditure of the Commonwealth shall be distributed month by month amongst the several states on the basis which the Parliament deems fair” be inserted.

I may explain the reason of this amendment. I take it, on second thoughts, that the words "proportion" and "method" are unnecessary, because if the surplus is to be distributed month by month among the states in some way, that involves both proportion and method. So I propose to leave those words out. Then, I propose to make this distribution on the basis which the Parliament deems fair, lest the difficulty which Mr. Symon suggests might arise, and any assumed unfairness should be made the subject of appeal to the High Court, thereby making that court the arbiter of a purely political question. I take it that no member of the Convention desires that that should be done.

Question-That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to propose-
That all the remaining words of clause 93 be struck out.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
Before that is done, I desire to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that they seem now to have cut out the possibility of the adoption of the principle of per capita distribution as final at any time.

Mr. REID. -
Nonsense!

Mr. GLYNN. -
Unless the Parliament decides upon it.

Mr. REID. -
Of course, that is exactly what we want.

Mr. GLYNN. -
That is what some honorable members may want, but there are a good many others who do not want that.

Mr. SYMON. -
You can move a proviso.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
In order to test the feeling of the committee on that point, I will move that, instead of striking out all the remaining words of clause 93, we retain them, and change "five" into "ten." Of course, if that is done, the clause will have to be subsequently recast to make its meaning more clear.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I do not think that that can be done, because it would be inconsistent with the decision we have already arrived at.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Mr. Glynn can propose that, after five years, the distribution shall be on the per capita basis.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
Then beg to move-
That the following words be added to Mr. Barton's amendment:-"After the expiration of ten years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs, all surplus revenue over the expenditure of the Commonwealth shall be distributed from month to month among the several states, in proportion to the numbers of their people, as shown from time to time by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth."

I think it would be extremely advisable to bring the per capita system of distribution of the surplus into force at the end of ten years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs, and if we have not then obtained the information necessary to framing a proper basis of distribution, I do not know when we will obtain it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It seems to me the best plan that, after prescribing that the Commonwealth Parliament shall have sufficient experience and data before it—which is the intention of the Finance Committee—our best course is then to leave the matter in the hands of the Parliament. It may be that after they have had five, six, or seven years' experience, they will come to the conclusion that the per capita basis of distribution is a fair one. On the other hand, it may be they will consider that the evidence of a few more years is necessary before determining the plan of distribution. There is no reason why we should tie th

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I think that the alternatives now before us are either to leave the whole matter free in the Constitution, so that the Parliament of the Commonwealth may do what in its wisdom it deems right and fair; in which case, if it be fair, I have no doubt they will accept the per capita method of distribution—

Mr. REID. -

At the earliest possible moment.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Another alternative is that, no matter what is fair and just, even though the per capita system of distribution may be conspicuously unfair, we shall state in this clause, in spite of that, that they shall adopt the per capita system of distribution, and no other. Now, it seems to me that it would be far better to leave those who will come after us, ten or twelve years hence, to decide this question rather than to take it in our hands and decide it today. If we adopt the latter course, it will seem to be equivalent to saying "We are the men, and wisdom will die with us." I hope that the Convention will not say any such foolish thing as that, this Convention over, all wisdom will be gone, because I am sure honorable members will agree with me that the Federal Parliament, ten or twelve years hence, will be quite as willing and anxious to do what is fair then as we are willing and anxious to do what is fair to-day.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I will only add to what the two preceding speakers have said, that the effect of this amendment might be the very opposite of what is intended. It might, in the exigencies of politics, be taken to mean that the present or existing system should go on for ten years.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We will run that risk.

Mr. REID. -

What I wish to point out is that there will be, on all hands, so strong and absolute a desire to bring into force the per capita system of distributing the surplus, the moment it is deemed to be fair, that it would be unwise for us to put this condition in the Bill. If, seven years hence, it be deemed fair to adopt the per capita system immediately, why should it not then be adopted? Why should we insert this restriction? The per capita system is so absolutely fair in itself that it will be inevitably adopted as soon as the Federal Parliament deems it wise to adopt it.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

The per capita system of distribution may be open to objection. Possibly it is, but I do not think it should be left open for the states to battle for better terms.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

If we ran trust the Federal Parliament for five, surely we can trust them for twelve years. Some honorable members seem to think that the Federal Parliament will be perfectly honest, fair, and just during the five years, but that immediately on the expiration of those five years their appetite for unfairness will be so strong that we must fetter them in this Constitution. I certainly hope that the amendment will not be pressed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

There is no question of unfairness or dishonesty on the part of the Federal Parliament, but a large number believe that the per capita distribution should come into operation the moment federation comes into operation. That is what I believe. I believe thoroughly that as soon as we become federated we should have one purse only, and we agree to a period of five years' bookkeeping simply for the benefit of some colonies who urge that a per capita distribution must act unfairly to them. For a year or two it might act somewhat unfairly to them. I do not want anything unfair. I was perfectly willing to accept a five years' bookkeeping, a sliding scale, or anything else, but I believe that at the end of five years we shall go to a per capita distribution. Or, if we cannot get that at the end of five years, I am content to take it at the end of ten years.

Mr. REID. -

I hope we will get it before ten years.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I would suggest to the mover that he alter the proposal he made so as to make the per capita distribution not later than ten years. That would leave it open to have the per capita distribution between five and ten years.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We will accept it at the end of ten years.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I agree with what has fallen from the Right Hon. the Treasurer of Victoria. I should like to see the per capita distribution applied as soon as possible.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You can't get it.

Mr. LYNE. -

I would like it to take place the moment federation is accomplished. I have heard some say that it could not take place until after twelve months, but I hope the Convention will not agree to extending the period to ten years. Five years is a long time—a great deal longer time than a state should be called on to be bound, and go cap in hand to the Federal Treasurer. I do not think the members of the Convention are here to form themselves into a number of state wreckers, although it is approaching that. Every act that has been done is antagonistic to the states, and invests every power in the Federal Parliament. We were not sent here for that purpose, and for my part I shall do all I can to give the states a fair show. I hope the amendment will not be carried.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would like to point out to the honorable member [P.1092] starts here that I believe he is the only person in Australia who does not admit that New South Wales would be exposed to, at any rate, the risk of extreme unfairness by the operation of the per capita method. There may be state wreckers here—I hope not—but there may be also federation wreckers, who I believe are the worse of the two.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I shall be found supporting the suggestion of my friend (Mr. Glynn). The remarks which have been made by preceding speakers, somewhat in opposition to the suggestion, have only served to convince me that I was possibly wrong in not recording my vote in favour of the amendment proposed, I think, by Sir George Turner. The sooner we get to the basis of distribution per capita the better.

Mr. FRASER. -

They commenced it per capita in Canada.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes, and I think it was proposed to introduce it in the Constitution previously framed. In Federal Constitutions hitherto, distribution per capita has been agreed to and has worked well. I trust it will shortly be established in connexion with the Australian Federation, and I shall vote accordingly.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I am sorry my friend (Mr. Kingston) has changed his mind so quickly in regard to this matter. It seems to me that no one in this Convention desires anything more than that we should get what is just and fair, and we are more likely to get that by the Federal Parliament dealing with the matter some years hence than we are by fixing a certain rule now. Take the colony I represent. At the present time we contribute £7 or £8 per head through the Customs, and it is proposed that we should get back £2 or £3 per head.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

How much did you contribute seven years ago?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am not talking of the past or the future, but dealing with the present. No one can say how much we may contribute five or six years hence. I judge of the future by the present, and I say at once that it would not suit the people of Western Australia to give £8 per head and receive back £3 per head. That being so, I cannot agree to a per capita distribution at the present time. Honorable members who will gain, or think they will gain, by a per capita distribution, judging from the present circumstances, are not, I think, acting exactly fairly when they desire to get an advantage. I do not desire an advantage. I only want what is right and just, but it seems to me that some honorable members think they will get an advantage. If that is the case, they should not vote in that direction. I hope that none of us want to gain an advantage in the Convention at the expense of others who will not be similarly benefited.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

We want federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No one, I think, will vote against federation if he is told that it will be left to the Federal Parliament, in which the people of the colonies will be represented, to do what is right and just. The Federal Parliament will not desire to injure any colony, but rather to assist, and those honorable members who think they will get a little advantage by this per capita distribution should not vote for it, seeing that if they get an advantage other colonies must suffer.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

I take it that the vote recorded a little while ago decided the question so far as the majority of the Convention is concerned as between distribution per capita or distribution by the Parliament in such a manner as might be thought fair. I felt bound, when this issue was before the Convention, to vote as I did. But, inasmuch as I have—not very much publicly or in the Convention, but privately-done all I possibly could to preach the gospel of trust in the Federal Parliament, I feel bound, when the issue is placed before us in this way, to record my vote in favour of leaving the matter of the distribution to the Parliament of the future.

There has been manifested all through the debate, in my humble opinion, much too great a disposition to distrust the Federal Parliament. For reasons that have been reiterated over and over again, and which I need not now repeat, we ought to repose more confidence in the sense of justice and fairness of the Federal Parliament, and in the absolute necessity for that Parliament dealing fairly with the various states. I am, therefore, quite prepared to leave the question of the mode of distribution to the Parliament of the future.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

The mode which this Convention has adopted of performing perhaps the most sacred work ever committed to a band of politicians does not, I think, do justice to our common sense. We have devoted the whole of the morning to a general debate on the question of finance, but when the most important question, not only from the financial aspect, from the aspect of the Constitution as a whole, comes before us, we positively and absolutely divide on it without a word. Then, when the division is taken, several honorable members take the floor and seem to apologize for addressing the Convention at all.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I rise to a point of order. Have we appointed a lecturer to the Convention? Have you, Mr. Chairman, heard the honorable member criticising the way in which we speak, when we speak, and saying why we should not speak?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I did not gather any remarks from the honorable member which I can rule out of order.

Mr. REID. -

You did not hear them, Sir Richard.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I was expressing my surprise that when this most important point of the whole of our Constitution was before the committee honorable members should divide without a word, and that they now seem to be speaking on the question in a tone of apology. The whole matter is being decided within a few minutes when I should have thought it deserved a day's debate. We have not been addressing ourselves to this mo

Mr. KINGSTON. -
That has been altered.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I say that I understood my honorable friend to suggest that that should be amended.

Mr. WALKER. -
It has been amended.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I know it has, but the same fault remains in the amendment. Mr. Symon pointed out that, suppose the decision of the Federal Parliament was not fair, or not in a proper proportionate method, it would be against the interest of the state.

Mr. SYMON. -
The division leaves the final decision of that point to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I understood Mr. Symon's suggestion to leave it no more to the Federal Government than before, except to use the words "on a basis which Parliament shall deem fair," and to leave out that question of the proportionate method. I venture to think, with all deference to the much abler lawyers and barristers I see before me, that the word "fair" is about the worst possible word you could use in framing a Constitution. If Mr. Symon had suggested to Strike out the word "fair," and to say "on such basis and after such method as Parliament shall determine," there could be no possible hope of appeal to the Supreme Court as the clause was originally drawn. I still think there is the gravest possible objection to using the word "fair." We know that men when self-interest is concerned will never agree as to what is fair. With all respect to what Mr. Barton may say, I think that the word "fair" is the very last word which should be used. If it has to be left to the Federal Parliament to say on what basis the distribution shall be determined, the word "fair" ought to be left out. What is fairness to one may be gross unfairness to nine-tenths of the electors in two different states. I understood Mr. Barton to speak of our having inaugurated the system of bookkeeping. For what object was that system inaugurated? I consider it was solely because some of the richer colonies thought other colonies would gain an advantage under the per capita distribution. It has therefore been impressed on us, and we are accepting the bookkeeping system for five years in order that we may try and discover where the rich consumers are, where the poor consumers are, which is the colony with the largest revenue per capita, and so forth. Therefore you have engrafted on your Constitution this five years' bookkeeping principle, and you are to wait the result of this five years' bookkeeping before you can say it is fair. You have in the Constitution implied, as plainly as words can speak, that if the five years' bookkeeping bring out the inequalities, or anything like the same inequalities at the end of five years or fifty years, then the per capita distribution is unfair. I say, therefore, that to a very great extent the Constitution does not leave the question of the per capita distribution free and untrammeled to the Federal Parliament. It goes before that Parliament with a bias, and as the opinion of this Convention, which shrank from the per capita distribution at the commencement, which shrank from it at the end of five years, and which will not have it at the end of ten years. The opinion of the Convention impliedly is that they will not have the per capita distribution if the figures show a few irregularities which could be explained away by the errors of statisticians and the want of application on the part of commercial men. Therefore the very thing which the members are aiming after—leaving this important question of the distribution of the surplus to the Federal Parliament—is not gained, because the power is not left in a free and unbiased way. You have the opinion of the Convention which shrank from the per capita distribution, and you have told the Federal Parliament that you have inaugurated a system of bookkeeping. What for? In order that the Federal Parliament may study it and be bound by it, and distribute the surplus for all time on the result of that bookkeeping system? Now, I ask, is that a federal idea? I appeal to my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest), who, at two banquets I had the honour of attending in his company, brought down the house on each occasion by saying we were one people; one in religion, one in destiny, one in interest, one in everything but purse. We are going to keep up the difference between the consuming power of one colony and the consuming power of another; we are going to be one people in name, but not one people in interest. I can imagine no more fruitful subject of party discussion, or heated debate, or unjust tactics and tricks, if you leave this matter for all time to the Federal Parliament without engrafting on the Constitution a time when we shall be one people, not only in name, but in one purse, in one interest, and in one common good. I have not the gift, I am afraid, of putting my views before the Convention as forcibly as I would like, but when I attempted, as Mr. Reid said, to lecture the Convention, my object was simply to ask them and urge them to discuss this matter, at all events for a few moments, and let us see where we are going. If there is nothing in my argument, let the matter drop. But my great argument is that you are not putting this untrammelled before the Parliament, you are influencing them by what you are doing, by the books you are keeping, for if they do not study and be guided by those books they will not be doing what is right. Therefore, I think this is a most important question. Looking at the past, what hope have we of the per capita distribution? Do you imagine that in five years' or in ten years' time there will not be inequalities? As an honorable member pointed out the other day, what is the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest doing? In his colony they have made most wonderful mineral discoveries, gold is to be had by going there, and all the male population, or a great portion of it, is flocking from the other colonies to Western Australia. But I know scores of women and children who cannot follow their husbands to the goldfields of Western Australia, and we therefore are keeping them in the other colonies. The males who are flocking away to the West are, of course, creating a boom there. In five years' time the boom in Tasmania may not have reached its height, but may be going on, and on, and on, and the whole of the West Coast may become a gigantic and vast mineral field, and we in Tasmania may possibly approach to a very large consuming power. But I do not say that the rich colonies should for all time seek to keep exactly what they raise, and that the poor colonies are always to be content with what they raise. That is keeping alive the very principles of self-interest which you wish to knock down. Therefore, I shall support the amendment before the Chair; but I very much regret that, although I have listened to a number of speeches dealing with twenty questions this afternoon, I have not heard one able speech on this most important point in the Constitution.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). - I have been, and am now, very much in accord with the remarks which have fallen from my honorable friend (Mr. Dobson).

Mr. DOBSON. - We do agree then, for once.

Mr. LYNE. - When you are right I agree with you. But I believe the better course now is to fix, as nearly as we can, the method by which the return shall be made to the states, and I know no better method than the per capita distribution. It has been stated that New South Wales would suffer if we adopted, immediately on the federation being consummated, the per capita distribution throughout the whole of Australia. I think there is very grave doubt of that. But even if there was a little loss for the first year, or, at the most, two years, I do not think there would be any loss to New South Wales after that time. In two years, at the very outside, I think the conditions of the same class of people, living in the same manner all through the Australian colonies, will be such that their purchasing power and their consumption will be very much the same, no matter in what part of Australia they may live. The word "fair," which has been used in this amendment, and has been voted for so strongly, is a word that will cause a great deal of trouble and dissension in the future. Look at the figures which have been set before us from the various statisticians of the different colonies; no two of them agree. And when that is so, what basis will the Federal Parliament have to go upon in making this "fair" distribution? If it is to go on the basis of the figures as given by the statisticians of the various colonies it will have a very difficult task to arrive at what will be a fair distribution. A remark fell from the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, just now, that there may be in this Convention federation wreckers. If there is a federation wrecker in this Convention, it is the delegate who wishes to import into the Constitution Bill something that he knows his own people will not accept, and there are many things that have been imported into this Bill which will, I believe, be detrimental, to a very great extent, to the acceptance of the Bill in New South Wales, and, probably in some of the other colonies.

I, at any rate, stand here to support the provisions of a Bill that I hope will be accepted, and I do not hesitate in straightforwardly stating when I have any objection to a provision that I think will not be accepted. It is all very well to talk glibly, and speak round the subject, but I think the time has arrived when we should speak straight out on any subject, and say distinctly whether we think our own people will accept any particular provision or not. I have opposed many parts of this Bill, and I think one great point which will cause its rejection probably in some states is that there is being aimed at a Federal Parliament that will be too extensive, too extravagant, and surrounded by all the glory which I think we should wait a few years for. There is a very strong feeling outside this Convention that we might have a much more inexpensive Federal Parliament than it seems to be proposed that we are going to have, taking into account all the various matters that are proposed by the Convention to be brought within its scope. I would earnestly urge members of the Convention not to allow any matter to be imported into this Bill that is not an absolute necessity; those who import into this Bill such matters will be the wreckers, and not those who speak out when they think there is any danger looming in the

I should not have troubled the Convention at this time, but for certain remarks which have been made by my honorable friend (Mr. Dobson) with reference to those who voted on this side on the last resolution. Mr. Dobson assumes that those who voted in support of the clause are opposed to a per capita distribution of the surplus. For my own part, I have always, as strongly as I could, supported the per capita distribution, but seeing that we have entered on this bookkeeping system, which is practically agreed upon, and seeing further that it is just possible, at the expiry of the five years' period, that some necessitous colony may require aid, and that the Parliament will then, with all the facts before it, be the best judge as to what each colony shall receive, therefore, although I believe firmly that the per capita distribution will be the solution of the question, and that the per capita system must come ultimately, still I think it is prudent at this stage to say that we will leave the matter in the hands of the Federal Parliament, which at the end of the five years' period will be in full possession of all the facts, and will be the best judge how to deal with the question.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is leaving an eternal scramble.

Mr. HENRY. -

I admit the force of the objection to some extent, and had the per capita system been approved by a majority of the Convention at this stage, I should have been found supporting it if other honorable members had been prepared to face the position at once. But having entered on this bookkeeping system, and seeing it is possible that some colony may require assistance at the end of the five years' period, it is wiser to leave it in the hands of the Federal Parliament. I do not anticipate that there will be any eternal scramble, as the Attorney-General for Victoria suggests. The solution of the difficulty lies in a per capita distribution, and I have sufficient confidence in the judgment of the Federal Parliament to believe that they will very soon arrive at that conclusion.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There will be a fight every year as to whether it should be a per capita distribution.

Mr. HENRY. -

No; I anticipate that at the end of the five years, or very soon afterwards, the Parliament will decide on the per capita system.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Anybody may move to alter that.

Mr. HENRY. -
I am aware of that. Circumstances may arise in the history of the colonies that no man can foresee, and I think it would be wise not to tie the hands of the Federal Parliament in a matter of this sort.

Mr. Gordon (South Australia). -

I desire to ask one question, and it is this: What is the object of the bookkeeping system unless it is to supply the Federal Parliament with data on which to make a fair distribution? If we are to bind them at the end of five years, which is a moment in the life of a nation, to a rigid system of distribution, what is the object of the bookkeeping period?

Mr. Fraser (Victoria). -

The sooner the distribution is made per capita the better, and we have only departed from that principle because of the serious difficulties that seem to confront us. In Canada the per capita system of distribution was adopted at the very start, and it has not caused any dissatisfaction. If this matter is left to the Federal Parliament, that may be an inducement to some of the states to be extravagant; they may waste their money, get into financial difficulties, and appeal to the Commonwealth Parliament to rescue them. If the per capita system of distribution is adopted, each state will know what its position is, and the sooner that is done, in my opinion, the better.

Mr. Holder (South Australia). -

In answer to my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon), I desire to say that the object of the bookkeeping is to determine the distribution of the surplus during the five years.

Mr. Solomon. -

Surely that is not the only object.

Mr. Holder. -

The great object of the bookkeeping is to provide for the distribution during the five years. Incidentally, although that is not at all the purpose, it will furnish information that will be of value to the federal authority. I hope that the federal authority will be able very speedily to make the distribution per capita. My only objection to the suggestion now made is that it proposes to stereotype the per capita system in the Constitution. We should then, no matter how inequitable it might prove, be unable to alter it without a referendum. I prefer that it should be determined upon by Act of Parliament, when it could be altered at any time.

Mr. Fraser. -

Do you think it would be inequitable?

Mr. Holder. -

It might be.
Mr. DOBSON. -
Supposing that at the end of five years the bookkeeping shows that the inequalities of consumption are no greater than now?
Mr. HOLDER. -
If they are as great as now, the figures ranging from 25s. up to 39s. a head, or, taking Western Australia, up to £7 a head, I should say that a per capita distribution would not fit in with the facts at all.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
My honorable friend (Mr. Holder) seems to forget that the bookkeeping system will be discontinued at the end of five or seven years. We are not going to assume that the power vested in Parliament, under clause 91, is to be always exercised. But a system of bookkeeping for five years would be of very little use as furnishing data for the distribution of the revenue 50 years hence. Are we going to assume that 50 years hence there is to be a revival of the bookkeeping to enable further data to be obtained? If so, the Commonwealth will never get out of its swaddling clothes. There is no federal state in which the per capita system of distribution has not been found efficacious. It is adopted in Canada, but owing to the Constitution permitting the possibility of subventions, there is a state of affairs which might be repeated here if this amendment is not carried. Fifty years hence members may be returned to the Federal Parliament simply on the promise that they will try to get a different method of distribution adopted. If that is to be possible, we had better not federate. Sir John Forrest pointed out that eight or ten years hence it might be inequitable to distribute the surplus per capita, because the revenue of Western Australia might be £8, and that of the other colonies £2 or £3, per head.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I said now.
Mr. GLYNN. -
We are not going to assume that that will be the state of affairs ten years hence. If the right honorable member has any apprehension, why should he not accept the suggestion I made yesterday, which, although it may seem to be comical, is mathematically correct? That suggestion was that in determining the population of each state the number of females and children should be assumed to be equal to the number determined by the proportion of females and children to males in all the states. If that plan were adopted, there could be no error in the distribution.
Mr. SOLOMON. -
There is another great factor—the earning power of the adults in each state.
Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable member forgets that that does not apply to distribution.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

It applies to the revenue.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes, to the aggregate revenue, but it has nothing to do with the inequalities arising from a per capita distribution. I do not want to argue this point. I say that this would be an equitable way of getting over the difficulty suggested by Sir John Forrest. If we are ever to assume that our conditions will be normal, the sooner we pass a provision of this sort the better. I have listened to many speeches, and I have heard the clause denounced by persons who now propose to vote against it. Surely our discussions are not merely academical. They have some definite end. I call on the gentlemen who rely on the experience of Canada as to local subsidies to support this proposal. The Right Hon. Mr. Reid pointed out that if it was carried it might prevent the adoption of the per capita method of distribution at the end of seven years. The Hon. Mr. Howe suggested that that difficulty could be overcome by a slight alteration in the wording. I do not think that is necessary, because under the clause already passed the Federal Parliament can adopt the per capita method of distribution if they like.

Mr. FRASER. -

Earlier than the five years, even.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes, and that objection falls to the ground.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

There is one point that has not been noticed in this discussion, and that is, that at the end of the five years, when the Federal Parliament have the necessary statistics, they will no doubt adopt some form of sliding scale to prevent the necessity for further bookkeeping. The contributions will then be more equal than they are now. If the members of the Convention who approved of the sliding scale in Adelaide are true to their convictions they will believe that, after the statistics have been obtained, there will be very little difficulty in providing a sliding scale, and after a few years the per capita system of distribution can be adopted. I am sure that every one here wishes to see a per capita distribution carried into effect, but we wish it to be combined with equity and fair play.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

As several allusions have been made to the position of Canada in regard to this matter, I would like to point out that the system of distribution in Canada is not solely per capita. The British North American Act, section 1792 118, provides that-

The following sums shall be paid yearly by Canada to the several provinces for the support of their Government and Legislature.

Then the provinces are mentioned, with a sum set opposite to each, amounting altogether to 260,000 dollars. The section goes on to say:-

And an annual grant in aid of each province shall be made, equal to 80 cents per head of the population, as ascertained by the census of 1861, and in the case of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, by each subsequent decennial census, until the population of each of those two provinces amounts to 400,000 souls, at which rate such grant shall thereafter remain.

This grant is to be in full settlement of all future demands made upon Canada.

But the Government of Canada shall deduct from such grants, as against any province, all sums chargeable as interest on the public debt of that province in excess of the several amounts stipulated in this Act.

So that there is a very considerable exception to the per capita mode of distribution in the case of Canada, although that mode is much more warranted where a country is practically unified in its early stages than under a federal form of union.

Mr. FRASER.- You cannot call Canada unified.

Mr. BARTON.- I do not say that it is, but there are many things which are unified in Canada, and the Dominion approaches unification more than the Union we are about to create. The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) said that the per capita mode of distribution should be carried out within twelve months or two years. I am not accusing my honorable friend of any desire to wreck federation, but I cannot imagine anything more calculated to prevent the acceptance of this Bill in New South Wales than such a proposal. When one looks at the enormous amount of revenue derived through the Customs by New South Wales, notwithstanding the lowness of her Tariff, it will be seen that the people of the colony would shrink from a measure providing for a per capita distribution within a year or two. Such a proposal would be prejudicial to New South Wales, though in less degree than in the case of Western Australia and Queensland.

Mr. REID.- In total amount the loss of the colony would be larger.

Mr. BARTON.- Yes, but it would not be so much per head as in the case of Western Australia. As the conditions of a uniform Tariff operate, the rate of consumption of dutiable products will more nearly approach in each colony, but you will not obtain the assent of the people of New South Wales to a per capita distribution in the early years of the Federation. I think, however, they would agree to the proposal that when the rate of consumption has more nearly approached in the several colonies, and when evidence has been afforded of the process that is going on, it shall be open to the Federal Parliament to determine a reasonable basis of adjustment. Much as the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) may desire to help the federal cause, I feel certain that our financial proposals would be instantly rejected by New South Wales if effect were given to his suggestion, and I do not know how I, with all my desire for federation, could recommend them.

The committee divided on the question that the words of Mr. Glynn's amendment proposed to be inserted be so inserted-

Question so resolved in the negative.
The remaining words of the clause were struck out.
The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
There is a clause, which in its proper order should have come before the one last dealt with; but as clause 93 was called on, I had to move an amendment upon that clause in its proper order in committee. I shall now, on behalf of the Finance Committee, move clause 92. Honorable members will recollect that clause 91 was struck out. This is the clause relating to Western Australia, and I propose to move it as part of the finance clauses, so that it may be before the committee, and I shall ask, afterwards, that it be transposed with the clause last dealt with, in order that it may take its proper place.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -
I desire to ask whether I can now move a new clause of which I have given notice?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
It might simplify matters if the honorable member moved his new clause as an amendment on the clause I am now proposing. I understand the honorable member wishes his new clause to be carried in substitution of the Western Australian proposal.

Mr. HENRY. -
No; I desire to move it before the Western Australian proposal, and not necessarily in substitution of it.

Mr. BARTON. -
In that case, I shall not move the Western Australian proposal at present, so that the honorable member can bring forward his proposal.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -
I beg to move-
That the following stand as a new clause of the Bill:-The Parliament may, upon such terms and conditions and in such manner as it thinks fit, render financial aid to any state.

It is generally recognised that there is a strong necessity for the Federal Parliament to have power in the event of any state being seriously embarrassed financially to step in and give aid to that state. It is very important that we should have an assurance embedded in this Bill that the Parliament shall have power in any such contingency to afford the necessary aid. The question has been raised as to whether the Federal Parliament has inherent power under this Constitution to grant such financial aid. I am not in a position to express any opinion on that question. I leave it entirely to the legal talent of the Convention.

Mr. FRASER. -
Surely Parliament can distribute the money as it likes.

Mr. HENRY. -
I am not clear about that.

Mr. LEWIS. -
They can do so after the five years.

Mr. HENRY. -
Yes; but it is the first five years which will be really the crucial period, in which the states will be passing through a trying financial time. So far as we have gone in these financial proposals, we have tied the hands of the Federal Parliament in a very rigid manner as to the mode of distribution of the surplus. I do not see how the Federal Parliament could possibly employ any portion of the surplus in aid of any particular state since we have tied it down as we have done in this proposal. Honorable members will notice that this amendment is framed in a very wide manner. I am indebted to the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) for aiding me in drawing up this amendment so that it should be as wide as possible. These colonies are entering into a great partnership in this Federation. Seeing that the several states are practically handing over to the federal authority the larger portion of their assets, while they are retaining their entire liabilities, it must necessarily be a somewhat hazardous affair for the several states as to how they will come out under this arrangement. So far as we have gone there is no obligation laid on the Federal Parliament to make good the liabilities of these states with reference to the payment of interest on their debts. As a matter of fact, the entire amount contributed by the several colonies in customs duties for a long period has been absorbed in the payment of interest on their debts. If the several states hand over to the Federal Parliament the entire customs duties, and retain the whole of the interest on their debts and other liabilities, we should have some assurance that the Federal Parliament has at all events the power to aid the states. It has been asked—Should the Federal Parliament devote a portion of the revenues of the other colonies to aid a necessitous colony? I am content to leave that matter entirely to the Federal Parliament, because honorable members will notice that this amendment states expressly "upon such terms and conditions, and in such manner, as the Federal Parliament may decide?" I am in accord with the views of Sir George Turner, however lightly they may have been treated at the time, when he contended that it would be quite a consistent thing on the part of the Federal Government, if there was a serious deficit in the federal finances, which resulted in deficits in the state Treasuries, to borrow the necessary amount in order to make good that loss. Now, it has been stated here that no Government has ever borrowed money for the purpose of paying interest on its public debt. But I am entirely in accord with the views of Mr. Lyne when he said today that the several Governments of these colonies have from time to time had serious deficits, and in order to meet those deficits they necessarily have appropriated a portion of borrowed money to pay their interest. I see no difficulty whatever in the Federal Parliament, in the event of a state being in a necessitous condition, owing to a grave mistake on the part of the Federal Treasurer, having the power, and using it, to borrow a sufficient amount of money to aid the necessitous state. Such a position as that, it seems to me, any state might be placed in. I do not speak exclusively of Tasmania. There might be a serious deficit in the revenue of any other state, except perhaps of New South Wales. It is quite possible that the Federal Treasurer, no matter how great his talent may be, may make a mistake in his estimates of revenue, especially for the first year, when matters will be so seriously deranged as to make it difficult to estimate what the revenue will be; and that may result in a serious deficit for some of the state Treasuries. The state Treasury would then either have to borrow the money to pay the losses of the state (which would no longer have Customs revenue behind it) or the Federal Government would have to do it for the state. Now, seeing that the Federal Government had failed to return sufficient Customs revenue to meet the necessities of the states, it appears to me that it should be laid upon the Federal Government as a duty to make good such losses. Without some such assurance as that the Federal Government may come to the aid of a state in a necessitous condition, where the state has imposed as much direct taxation as it can carry, I fear that some states may be deterred from entering into this Federation. I am not going to deal with the Western Australian provision, which it is just possible may not be approved of by a majority of this Convention. As it stands, I apprehend that there will be some opposition to it, because it has an inherent defect in it, to which the attention of my honorable friends from Western Australia should be drawn. If the provision for dealing with Western Australia be defeated, it will be exceedingly difficult for Western Australia to enter the Federation; but, with such a provision as I propose, it occurs to me that Western Australia might enter the Federation much more safely and with much greater assurance than under the provisions of this Bill. I will not detain the committee any longer, Sir Richard, as I have now expressed my views on this very important matter.
Mr. WISE.-
Do you move the omission of the Western Australia clause?

Mr. HENRY.-

No; I merely suggest that it needs consideration from my friends from Western Australia. I submit my own amendment for the consideration of the Convention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria).-

I hardly like this amendment, because it is altogether too wide. Its provision lasts for all time, and it will to my mind bring about continual pressure.

Mr. HENRY.-

Limit it to five years.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.-

If you limit it to five years it will still have the result of bringing about continual pressure on the states by the Parliament to get better terms and conditions.

Mr. SYMON.-

Don't you think the Commonwealth may be liable to the same pressure after the five years, when they have control over the surplus? They may be pressed to come to the aid of the states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.-

I do not think Mr. Henry's willingness to limit the provision to five years gets rid of my objections. It gets rid of one objection—that with regard to the provision being too wide; but there is still the objection that there will be continual pressure by the states on the Federal Parliament, as there has been in Canada (as our reading tells us), to get what are called better terms. Is it to be assumed that a state is to go cap in hand to the Federal Parliament and say—"We are in such an unfortunate position that we cannot ourselves carry on with the means at our disposal, and we want you to kindly give us some financial aid"? The effect of such an application would be that the condition of that state's stock in the money markets of the world certainly would not be as good as it was before the appeal to the Federation for financial aid.

Mr. DOBSON.-

Would not the state, therefore, strive in every way to avoid asking for aid?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.-

Then this amendment is valueless.

Mr. WISE.-
It is only a guarantee to the public with regard to dangers that are never likely to happen.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then we are going to give a guarantee to the public that we know is worthless?

Mr. WISE. -

The whole of the financial apprehensions are baseless. We know that already.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We do not know it; we may be of opinion here that it is so. But so far as this provision is concerned, either the state must place itself in the position of appealing to the Federal Parliament for aid, and thus advertising its bad financial position, or, as has been suggested, the state will not dare to make the appeal, for the reasons I have mentioned. In the one case it would mean very severe loss to the state that made the application; in the other it means that what we propose to insert is simply some-thing which we know can never be taken advantage of. I believe in dealing with this question with regard to Western Australia as one on which we can well base a scheme which will be beneficial to the colonies, and of which Western Australia may fairly and justly take advantage without injuring her position in the money markets of the world or otherwise. We have provided with regard to Western Australia that wha

Mr. SYMON. -

But that provision is not passed yet.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No; the whole question is open. I do not want to propose anything that will take a single shilling out of the coffers of the Treasurer of New South Wales, or interfere in any way with any moneys that colony may be entitled to receive back from the Federation. There always seems to be a fear in some quarters that whatever is to be given by the other states must be found by New South Wales, and cannot come from any other source. We have already determined that during five years there shall be paid to each colony what it collects, less the expenditure in connexion with its collection, and also less its per capita share of the expenditure of the Federation. I do not want to interfere with that. I believe New South Wales will, by the alteration of the Tariff, receive more than she receives at the present time. Of course, she will find the money, and therefore no one objects to her getting that particular money; but I believe that other states will suffer considerable losses, and I want, if I possibly can, in the interests of the federal movement itself, to guard against those losses occurring during the first five years. I want the state Treasurers to have some interval, this reasonable term of five years, when they will be able to see exactly how the new Tariff is working, and what position the colony will be in at the end of the five years, so that then they will have a reasonable length of time to set their house in order. To do that, I propose to somewhat vary this proposal with regard to Western Australia.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
That proposal is not before the Chair; it is withdrawn.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Well, I am showing, as a reason why I cannot vote for this new clause of Mr. Henry's, that there is another proposal which, in my opinion, is far preferable.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Your contention is that they virtually hang together.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Yes, I think they do, because some honorable members may vote for this as ending the whole matter, and if I wait until after this is disposed of before mentioning my proposal, they may say-"If we had known that there was another proposal to deal with the states individually, we would have considered it and probably have voted for it, but, having voted for Mr. Henry's clause, we cannot vote for it now." I contend that I am entirely in order in submitting, as an objection to my agreeing to this clause of Mr. Henry's, that I have another proposal which will better answer the purpose. Of course, I could put my proposal now, by moving the omission of certain words from Mr. Henry's clause, but I do not wish to adopt that course. I can explain my proposal in very few words. My desire is simply this. We have our existing Tariffs. We will have a uniform Tariff after the Commonwealth is established. Under that uniform Tariff many of the colonies, through the effect of that Tariff and of intercolonial free-trade, will lose a considerable amount of their revenue. I desire that those colonies should not lose their revenue, or, rather, that it should be made up to them by the Federal Parliament. How the Federal Parliament is going to raise that money we must leave that body hereafter to decide. I will briefly state the effect of my proposal. I intend to propose that if any state, in consequence of the operation of the uni-form Tariff and of intercolonial free-trade, has received less than it would have received under the Tariff in existence at the time the uniform Tariff was passed, it shall have that amount made up to it by the Federal Parliament. That is, in substance, the purport of my proposal. I will not trouble to read my proposal, because when we come to deal with it as a substantive proposition we can then consider its wording. That is my sole object, and it is because I consider Mr. Henry's clause is altogether too wide, and is a provision which would never be taken advantage of, that I oppose it, feeling that my suggestion will be a fair way of meeting the difficulty, and a provision which every colony will take advantage of. I therefore suggest that it should have fair consideration while we are dealing with Mr. Henry's proposal.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I am not in accord with my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) in reference to this proposal of Mr. Henry, because it seems to me that this clause is intended to be perpetual, and not to be limited to five years, as I believe the proposal of Sir George Turner will be. Mr. Henry's clause is to be available for all time, and, in my opinion, it is not in any way confused or mixed up with the proposal of Sir George Turner. I was under the impression all along, until the present moment, that the power sought to be given to the Federal Parliament by this proposal belonged to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SYMON. -

There is no doubt of that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I was under the impression that the Federal Parliament would have inherent power to come to the assistance of any state on such terms as it might think fit.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

So it has.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then there can be no harm in adopting Mr. Henry's proposal.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is just where the mischief comes in.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

If the Federal Parliament has not that power, it certainly ought to have it, because we have heard over and over again in this Convention that, should evil times fall on any state, the Federal Parliament would never allow that state to come to disaster. It is all very well to talk like that, but if the Federal Parliament has no power to do that, I do not see what good result will come from such declarations. I think it ought to go without saying that the Federal Parliament which we are erecting should have power to make terms and conditions with any state, in order to save its credit, if unhappily that step should ever be necessary. And, as there may be a doubt about it, I am very much in accord with Mr. Henry's proposal. I can see no harm whatever in it, because we have every one of us said over and over again that the Federal Parliament will always take a great interest in the welfare of the states, and will take care that no disaster ever comes to any of the states. Of course that must be taken reasonably. States must not be allowed to be extravagant, get into difficulty, and then expect the Commonwealth to come to their rescue. But still, as the words "upon such terms as it may think fit" are inserted, the proposal can do no harm, and there should be no opposition to it. Honorable members may say that this power is inherent in the Commonwealth, but let us make it perfectly clear by inserting this short clause.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I have consistently opposed throughout all these discussions the insertion in the Constitution of anything in the nature of what I have termed "placards." That is to say, I have opposed the inclusion, of amendments which only express the powers that are already implied, and which amendments are only intended to assuage fears that have no foundation in fact. Now, I regard this amendment as one of those placards, but, contrary to the course I have taken all through these discussions, I intend to support it. We cannot ignore the fact that, owing to a series of circumstances that need not now be particularized, an idea has got abroad that every state is going to be made bankrupt by means of federation. Every state, according to the enemies of federation, will, if we unite, be made bankrupt.

Mr. FRASER. -

Very few people hold that view.

Mr. WISE. -

We know that it is untrue, and we are each of us able, if time is given to us, and if we have people ready to listen to our arguments, to prove that it is untrue; but we cannot ignore the fact that the enemies of union in every state have got hold of a series of figures, most mischievous figures, issued by persons in authority, which lend more or less colour to that fiction.

Mr. FRASER. -

They ought to be brought to book for it.

Mr. WISE. -

Now, it has been said that figures cannot he. I admit it, but liars can figure; and what we have to do is to put a clause in the Constitution which will prevent the figures put forward by any of those enemies of union who may choose to falsify the returns of statisticians having any effect on the uninstructed voter. Now, I believe that if a clause of this sort is limited to five years it will accomplish that purpose. I would not have it go further than five years, as Sir John Forrest is inclined to do.

Mr. SYMON. -
It will never do to limit it to five years.

Mr. WISE. -

If it goes beyond five years we will then be landed in all the difficulties of the Canadian Constitution, which are a constant struggle between the several provinces for what is called "better terms."

Mr. FRASER. -

They have settled down in Canada long ago.

Mr. WISE. -

I think the honorable member will admit that certainly within the last five years there was an agitation for better terms, and the Federation of Canada has been in existence for over twenty years. If, however, we limit it to five years we get over the transition period.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We do not want this five years.

Mr. WISE. -

We get over the transition period every one is afraid of.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Oh, no.

Mr. WISE. -

After the five years trust to the Federal Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Give the power.

Mr. WISE. -

The power exists.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then make it clear.

Mr. WISE. -

The power exists already.

Mr. SYMON. -

If you limit the power to five years it might take away the general powers.

Mr. WISE. -

I quite see the difficulty but I think it might be modified.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

In what clause do you find the power?

Mr. WISE. -

The power is the necessary implication from the fact of the Union. The power exists from the very circumstance of individual states coming together. The preamble agrees to unite in one indissoluble Federal Commonwealth, and the Federal Parliament, having the power to make laws for the well-being and good order of the whole community, necessarily implies that no portion of the Common-wealth is to suffer. I quite recognise the force of the interjection of Mr. Symon that, if the amendment suggested by Mr. Henry is limited to five years, there might be an objection. I have not the amendment before me, but I think it would be quite easy to so frame it as to show that the intention is to guarantee to the public that the power may be exercised during the five years without limiting the general power.

Mr. FRASER. -

During the five years we are pretty safe. W

Mr. WISE. -

I agree that the limit of five years is not wanted at all. It is a mere concession to popular ignorance that is being encouraged, I am sorry to say, by the Government Statistician of our own colony (New South Wales). I cannot too heartily agree with the censures and criticisms on the figures of Mr. Coghlan, of which Mr. Henry, a representative of Tasmania, gave such an admirable illustration. I believe those figures have done more mischief to the cause of federation throughout Australia than any figures yet published.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Has not Mr. Nash said that federation on the basis of receiving back according to collection would mean ruin to the southern colonies?

Mr. WISE. -

I think Mr. Nash has been rash in accepting Mr. Coghlan's figures.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Mr. Nash said that long before Mr. Coghlan's figures were published.

Mr. WISE. -

It ought to be satisfactory to the people of the whole of Australia that every delegate in this Convention has, while differing on other matters, rejected the figures of Mr. Coghlan. There is not a representative of New South Wales who supports, and not a representative of Victoria, Western Australia or South Australia who gives the slightest credence to those figures.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We think them very good.

Mr. REID (to Mr. Wise). -

Do not say that. Mr. Coghlan's figures are all right.

Mr. WISE. -

No one disputes that the figures are arithmetically right, but they have no relation to the practical facts of the case. These figures ought to make people a little chary of listening to criticisms which are urged by the enemies of Union, and based on the figures of Mr. Coghlan. One cannot take up the daily press in any colony without seeing those figures quoted everywhere by the enemies of union. It cannot be too widely known that there is no one in the Convention who accepts the conclusions of Mr. Coghlan. If that is so, and I say this with some diffidence as a layman in the matter, is there any financial problem at all? As a layman, I was one of those who readily agreed with the proposal to hand the whole matter over to the Finance Committee. We listened to a debate on the proposals of the committee. We are listening to another debate now when the proposals are being dealt with in detail, and I am bound to say that I have asked myself over and over again what has the Finance Committee done for us? There is no proposal brought up, without some member of the committee rising to suggest another proposal of a diametrically opposite kind. Instead of having the guidance of the Finance Committee, we have a certain number of proposals put before us, and every member of the committee has discussed those as if they were fresh matter.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Notwithstanding that, the Convention has adopted the suggestions of the committee so far.

Mr. WISE. -

In a sense the Convention have; but we have not had what we had the right to expect, namely, that the committee would put their proposals forward without proposing alternatives, and suggest that the proposals should be adopted in globo, as I am certain they would have been. Now, is there any financial problem? Who believes, unless we are going to suppose that the first Ministry of the Commonwealth are going to be either knaves or fools, that the Ministry are going to let a state fall into such a condition of insolvency or bankruptcy that the very existence of the Union would be threatened?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Where is the power?

Mr. WISE. -

The power exists from the very fact of the Union.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Well, put it clearly into the Bill.

Mr. WISE. -

I would rather not put it clearly in the Bill, if there is any danger, in attempting to express it, of limiting the power. That the power exists no one has expressed a doubt.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

In what clause?
Mr. WISE. -

No one can believe that those intrusted with the management of the Commonwealth would risk the severance of the Union. The financial problem exists only in the imagination of statisticians, and of those who seize on every argument they can either adopt or invent of preventing the union. As a matter of practical politics, I do not believe any one here has expressed the belief that the problem will ever arise. Whatever temporary inconvenience a state may be put to, that inconvenience will certainly be relieved by good sense and patriotism, or, if we want anything lower, by the self-interest of those who manage the affairs of the Union. Can any one believe a Ministry of the Commonwealth would exist for a single week who, when a state was in difficulties owing to having made larger contributions to the finances than it was in a position to do, refused to make a contribution from the federal revenue necessary to secure the balance of that state's finances? No Ministry which refused that could exist for a week, so that, from the lowest motive of self interest, every colony is secure.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You cannot show us a clause where that power is given.

Mr. WISE. -

I am surprised at my right honorable friend, who has always taken a broad practical sensible view of the question, so expressing himself.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Look at, clause 81.

Mr. WISE. -

I admit the power is not there in expressed words, and, therefore, I say I would support Mr. Henry in moving that the power should be put in. But I see great danger of putting the power in for all time, because it might be considered a direction to the Federal Parliament or Ministry to distribute whatever surplus there may be to the state irrespective of absolute necessities. If you can frame some clause which will limit the power to five years, and avoid the difficulty which has arisen in Canada, I will give it hearty support.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is not for five years we want it; we want it for 500 years.

Mr. WISE. -

Oh no, we don't. In 25 years we shall all have to come and beg Sir John Forrest to lift us out of our difficulties.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Give me the power and I will do so.
Mr. WISE. -

What I insist on is that this discussion has gone what, to a layman, seems rather far, and has raised a whole lot of irrelevant considerations. Free-trader as I am, I most heartily concur in all that fell from Sir George Turner. Free-trader as I am, I am willing to go absolutely into this Commonwealth without exacting a pledge for the preservation of the New South Wales policy. And what does surprise me is to find that there are so many of those who declare that they represent the popular view, that protection is the popular policy, who are unwilling to place the same confidence in Parliament as we are, and who insist that there should be some guarantee given to them that no state shall suffer. I do not hesitate to say that though I count myself a liberal, born and bred in liberalism, steeped in liberalism from my toes to my chin, I would vote with the conservatives to establish protection tomorrow if that was the price of federation. To see all these conservatives insisting on having some provision in the Constitution so as to make protection a necessity, and to see them doing that in the name of union, makes one doubt after all whether the love for union is as strong as they insist, and whether they have not a greater regard for the preservation of their local policy of protection. We are willing to go into this Federation untrammelled, and we ask them to do the same. At the same time, if my honorable friend (Mr. Henry) can see any way of modifying his amendment so as to prevent the evils which have arisen in Canada, and to avoid a continuous scramble for better terms, I shall heartily support it. I do not believe the amendment will express more than is already expressed in the Constitution.

Mr. SYMON. -

Implied.

Mr. WISE. -

Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You cannot show me where it is implied.

Mr. FRASER. -

If it is in the Constitution why duplicate it?

Mr. WISE. -

I am only proposing to do it as a concession to Victoria. I understand that the protectionists are not satisfied. They think they are going to lose. We are willing to make that concession to them, and I hope they will show the same trust that we show in the Federal Parliament, and not ask for the concession.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

Although I have listened very carefully to the reasons given by my honorable friend (Mr. Wise), they lead me to exactly the opposite conclusion with regard to this matter. If there is any truth in the statement that every state is going to be made bankrupt by reason of federation, it shows very plainly either that we ought to have no federation at all, or that our financial proposals are absolutely wrong in their basis. On the other hand, if there is no truth in the suggestion that every state is going to be made bankrupt, why should we put upon the face of this Constitution, which is to last for all time, an assumption that states may be driven to such straits in their dealings with the Commonwealth that they may have to ask pecuniary aid? The words of this amendment are such as plainly imply that the aid which is to be sought is not for the purpose of carrying on the works of the states or the ordinary development of the states. Financial aid must imply some aid given to a state when it is in such pecuniary difficulties that it cannot pay its way.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It does not say so.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, but it clearly means that, and it would be a most disastrous commentary upon the efficiency of these financial proposals if it was necessary at the same time to provide for the insolvency of states which might take place under them.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Embarrassment.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The honorable member may call it embarrassment or any other euphemism, but it means that we may by these proposals reduce a state to such a condition that it will have to go cap in hand to the Commonwealth Parliament and to ask for financial assistance.

Mr. SYMON. -

You do not say that a state would become insolvent for that purpose.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, I do not say that.

Mr. REID. -

It is as nicely expressed as in the 60 per cent. advertisement.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is nicely wrapped up. Any one who reflects upon the conditions which must exist before this provision can be brought into operation will see that it assumes that the states must be reduced to a condition of pauperism before they can take advantage of it.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What would you do if they were?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I will come to that. Mr. Wise seems to be of opinion that there is some power implied in the Constitution to give such aid. Now, from the consideration and study which I have been able to give to the Constitution, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that there is no such power implied. The Constitution is formed for certain definite purposes. There are definite powers of legislation and definite powers of administration, and the clause that the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest called attention to just now-clause 81 expressly provides that the revenues of the Commonwealth shall form one consolidated fund, to be appropriated for the public services of the Commonwealth in the manner and subject to the charges provided in this Constitution.

Mr. WISE. -

The order and good government of the Commonwealth would come under the term "public services of the Commonwealth."

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not agree with the honorable member in his interpretation of the powers of the Commonwealth, especially when dealing with the expenditure of the money of the taxpayers. In such a case there will be a great deal of care taken to keep the nose of the Federal Parliament to the grindstone in the matter of this expenditure. I do not think any expenditure will be constitutional which travels outside these limits. We must remember that in any legislation of the Commonwealth we are dealing with the Constitution. Our own Parliaments do as they think fit almost within any limits. In this case the Constitution will be above Parliament, and Parliament will have to conform to it. If any Act were carried giving monetary assistance to any state it would be unconstitutional, and the object sought would not be attained. That brings me to the question of whether it is desirable that there should be any such power either expressed or implied. I have no hesitation in saying that it would be a disastrous thing for the future of the Commonwealth if there was any such power given.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then what is the good of all this talk about it?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That means that all the talk ought to be one way. The right honorable member must listen to the views advanced on the other side.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The honorable member misunderstands me. I was referring to the many statements that have been made about the Commonwealth taking care of the states.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Then I beg the right honorable member's pardon. I have no doubt there are many ways in which the solvency and the pecuniary position of a state would be considered. It would be considered in arranging the expenditure of the Commonwealth, and in arranging the return of the surplus, and in any matters of that kind. It does appear to me that, of all the expedients which have been suggested for the purpose of reassuring timid states, this is the worst and the most objectionable. I said just now, when Sir John Forrest made an interjection, that I thought this power should not be in the Constitution, either expressed or implied. I say so, first of all, for the reason which has been so strongly put by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, that it would lead to a continuous struggle for better terms. I say also that it would be a very bad thing for the finances of the states themselves to find that a kind of rich uncle was created in the Commonwealth, who would always come to their assistance if they got into any real financial trouble. There is no question that that fact would be traded on by any state whose finances were getting into difficulties. Such a state would always be able to say, no matter what happened-"The Commonwealth will not let us go down; there is a power here to keep up our credit, and we will see that that power is utilized."

Mr. HENRY. -

That is not very complimentary to the public spirit of the states.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Unfortunately, things do happen in states that are not always creditable to the public spirit of the people. We must take human nature as we find it. There is no doubt that a state might be in such straits that it would unconsciously be influenced by the feeling that it had behind it, as a last resort, a power that would save it from public bankruptcy. I have always regarded any dealing between the Commonwealth and the state in matters of money as a thing to be deplored. I should have much preferred some system of finance by which the states and the Commonwealth could have been absolutely independent in matters of account and in matters of money. Unfortunately, that cannot be; but if we must have relations of this kind between the Commonwealth and the states, let them be such that the states will have certain definite rights which they can assert, and the Commonwealth definite rights which it can assert.

Mr. FRASER. -

And duties.
Mr. OCONNOR. -

And duties. Do not let us create a relationship between the states and the Commonwealth in which one state may have the power to exact terms from the Commonwealth, while the Commonwealth may be able to bring pressure to bear upon a state or its representatives. If that is possible under the Constitution, you have at once the germs of corruption and improper influence, which may be used disastrously in the interests of the whole people. If the financial provisions of the Constitution are administered in the spirit in which I hope they will be administered, there can be no danger to any of the states. The representatives of the Commonwealth in the House of Representatives will also be members of the states. The persons who elect them will be members of the states, and will have the same interest in seeing that the state finances are kept in order, that a proper return of the surplus is made, and that no undue strain is put upon the state Treasuries, as they will have in seeing that the financial affairs of the Commonwealth itself are properly conducted. The two things will be so necessarily conjoined that it will be the duty of every representative of the people in the Commonwealth Parliament—a duty for which he will be answerable to the people of the Commonwealth—to see that there is no undue extravagance in the management of the Commonwealth affairs, such as would be likely to bring financial disaster upon the states. These two bodies will work together with, I hope, a mutual regard for each other's interests. The safety and interests of both are involved in the careful conduct of their financial relations. The adoption of an extravagant policy by the Commonwealth will lead to disaster in the states, and disaster in the states must reflect upon the credit of the Commonwealth. Can there be any doubt that when the people of the Commonwealth are brought into union for the management of their common concerns, that management will be conducted in such a spirit on both sides as will prevent the disaster which some timid persons seem to apprehend? I hope that honorable members will reject the proposal, and that the recommendations of the Finance Committee, which seem to me to offer the best solution of our difficulties that has yet been proposed, will be carried practically in their entirety.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I agree with the honorable member who has just spoken, and I hope that the proposal will be rejected. I think that it has been suggested because of a little confusion as to the meaning of the Constitution which we are endeavouring to frame. We are taking out of the present powers of the states certain powers which we propose to give to the federal authorities;
but we leave to the states jurisdiction and absolute control in regard to all matters not specifically transferred to the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth is necessarily given powers of taxation, powers of borrowing, and other financial powers which its very existence requires. It seems to me that we ought not to do more in regard to this matter than to give the Commonwealth these powers for Commonwealth purposes, at the same time securing to the states the rights which we intend shall be conserved to them. I think we have made a mistake—I say so, because I do not wish it to be carried further—in not properly guaranteeing the states against the loss that may accrue from the giving up of Customs revenue. I strenuously hold to the opinion that the states ought to be guaranteed against that loss. But when you go beyond that, and introduce a provision allowing any state to come forward and ask, not for rights, but for favours, I say that such a provision is foreign to the Constitution. If we look at what has been done in America, we shall see the abuses to which a course of this kind may lead. We know that the way in which the federal authority deals with its surplus revenue now is a thing that we should avoid. Every year increasingly large sums are spent in providing pensions. If honorable members will look at Harper's Weekly for 25th December, 1897, they will find there a powerful article in condemnation of this system. In that article it is pointed out that the pension list now amounts to nearly 142,000,000 dollars a year, and that there are more than half as many persons drawing pensions as ever enlisted during the war for three years' service. That is one of the reasons why I think there should be a limit upon the powers of the Commonwealth in the direction of requiring a guarantee for the states. Between the years 1830 and 1840 a great number of the states of the American Union which are now free from debt were seriously embarrassed, and the question of giving aid to them came before Congress. How was it dealt with? On page 312 of the fourth volume of Bryant's History of the United States, I find this account of what took place:

A single fact must be observed, from its conspicuous and yet apparently feeble influence upon the state of affairs. In June, 1836, when the public debt was nearly extinguished, an Act was passed providing that after 1st January, 1837, all surplus revenue exceeding 5,000,000 dollars should be divided among the states as a loan, only to be recalled by direction of Congress.

That was a convenient way of putting it.

This unprecedented problem perplexed the statesmen of the time, but mainly as to the principle of distribution. The ghost that could never be laid stalked again into the balls of Congress. Should the money be divided according to population? If the slaves were counted, that would be to pay an unequal share to their masters; if they were not counted, the slave states would receive only their just proportion according to the number of citizens. Compromise, as usual, healed the difference at the expense of the North. The electoral vote was made the rule of distribution. Thus Pennsylvania, whose electoral vote was 30, received about $3,800,000; yet its population was nearly 200,000 more than the free population of the six slave states-South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Kentucky-whose electoral vote was 53, and their aggregate share of the surplus fund over six million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The distribution, which extended over a year, amounted to twenty-eight million dollars, and none of it was ever recalled. Before the amount was all expended it was evident that there would be a deficit in the Treasury. The states used the surplus variously: some involved themselves in extensive improvements; some divided the amount received among their citizens in petty sums; never was there a more unsatisfactory business operation.

I do not think that was ever repeated, and they have actually found the problem of dividing their surplus so terribly difficult that they find it preferable to resort to the unsatisfactory method they now have of distributing it in pensions. Really, if you take off a few of their departments, the pension list in America is greater than the rest of their public expenditure.

Mr. HENRY. -

Could you not have a pension list under this Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; but what I and others wanted to do was to make it part of the duty of the Commonwealth to provide a certain amount for the states out of the revenue taken away from the states. We know that the amount received from the states will be far more than enough to meet the requirements of the Commonwealth. We should make provision where-by the states would be guaranteed some security that they would receive their rights. I am desirous of doing that, but if we fail to do that, we shall make a mistake equally great, and perhaps much more important, if we put an invitation on the very face of the Constitution to the states to do anything they like in their own state territory as to incurring liabilities, and then to trust to the Commonwealth to get them out of their difficulties. Therefore, I think we shall make a great mistake if we adopt this clause. I do not agree that there is on the face of the Constitution a power existing, or at all events intended to exist, to assist the states out of their local difficulties. I do not agree that that power exists. I think there exists on the face of the Constitution a moral duty not to spend more than is necessary for Commonwealth purposes, and to return the balance in a fair proportion to the states.

Mr. SYMON. -

Do you not think that the Federation could guarantee a state loan?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not think they ought to.

Mr. SYMON. -

Do you think they could?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am not prepared to answer that question, but when we look at clause 52 we find these governing words on the very forefront of that clause-

That Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have full power and authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth.

We see there that the Commonwealth is named as distinguished from the states. We have our Constitution framed in this way with a Senate to guard what? The interests of the states, so that the Commonwealth shall not intrude one inch into what is retained as the executive rights and jurisdiction of the states. Yet while the Commonwealth has not the power to say one word in the government of the states as to their local liabilities, as to the difficulties they may get into, yet we are told that the Commonwealth is to be invited by express words on the face of the Constitution to assist the states and have a sort of moral compulsion put upon it which would be very difficult to resist, and would lead to the difficulties which have already occurred in America. I urge upon my honorable friends to put what they choose into the Constitution to guard the solvency of the states. Nobody ventures to assert that the states are insolvent, but if you take away their revenue, and leave them their liabilities, they stand an extremely good chance of becoming insolvent. That is what we want to guard against. The best way is to secure them a fair return of the surplus revenue on the face of the Constitution, making it part of the duty of the Commonwealth to do so. That is a better course than to put in a clause here which practically asserts that if some of those states go to the wall financially, we make it a sort of moral compulsion on the part of the Commonwealth to come to their assistance.

Mr. LEWIS (Tasmania). -

The two honorable members who have preceded me in discussing this clause have assumed that this financial aid is to be given only, or at any rate mainly, in the case of the practical insolvency of any state. I understand that what is intended by the clause is, that it should go very much further. It includes the power of the Parliament to guarantee a loan to a state, or to lend the money to a state, having raised it on its own security. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) has an amendment on the notice-paper to the effect that a state should not borrow money except from the Commonwealth. It is to empower the Commonwealth to guarantee the loans of a state, or to lend a state the money itself, that this new clause is proposed, quite as much as to enable the Commonwealth to come to the assistance of a state which may happen to be in embarrassed circumstances. Honorable members seem to ignore the fact that under this clause Parliament will have the power to dictate the terms, conditions, and manner in which such financial aid is to be granted. Surely that is ample protection. No state is likely to obtain that financial aid from the Federal Parliament unless its resources are entirely exhausted, and it has no other means of maintaining its credit. I should like to hear it further argued as to whether this power is inherent in the Constitution. I have grave doubts about it myself, and for that reason I desire to see this clause inserted in the Constitution. I know it has not been moved by the honorable member (Mr. Henry) as a concession to popular prejudice, or, as Mr. Wise has called it, a placard. The object is simply to place in the Constitution a statement that the Commonwealth can come to the assistance of a state if it should be required. We have, in the 52nd clause, handed over naval and military defences to the Commonwealth Parliament. It might be fairly argued that having done so the Commonwealth is bound to protect every state from invasion from outside. Yet we have not considered it to be an inherent right of the states to demand protection from invasion, and we have considered it necessary to embody in the Constitution a clause providing that the Commonwealth shall protect every state from invasion. If that is necessary in the case of an invasion of a warlike nature, surely it is necessary to include in the Constitution a clause of a similar nature to protect every state from financial disaster.

Mr. ISAACS. -

A state might create its own liability to financial disaster; but it does not create its liability to invasion by a foreign power.

Mr. LEWIS. -

If the state creates its own difficulty, the Federal Parliament will have it in its power to dictate the terms and conditions upon which alone it will me to the aid of any state.

Mr. ISAACS. -

A state might create its own liability to financial disaster; but it does not create its liability to invasion by a foreign power.

Mr. LEWIS. -

If the state creates its own difficulty, the Federal Parliament will have it in its power to dictate the terms and conditions upon which alone it will me to the aid of any state.

Mr. DOBSON. -

You do not always punish the sinner, even the financial sinner.

Mr. LEWIS. -
Of course, this power is only optional. It is left entirely to the good sense of the Federal Parliament. As has been said over and over again in this Convention, we must trust the Federal Parliament, but at the same time we must give that Parliament the necessary powers to do what we desired it should do, and amongst these powers we should give it a discretion to come to the financial aid of any state, whether that aid is in the form of a guarantee of a loan or a direct loan, or whether it be the financial support of a state which may be in embarrassed circumstances, and which may thereby endanger the credit of the whole Commonwealth.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I expressed the opinion a few days since, in answer to an interjection, that the insertion in the Constitution of any such provision as is now sought to be inserted would be attended by the dangers that, in the first place, it might conduce to reckless financing by the states, and, in the second place, would involve a very heavy obligation upon the federal authority. And, at the same time, I said that I thought the assistance which under such conditions would be required by a state was assistance which in the very nature of the Constitution would have to be rendered by the federal authority. As that position has been challenged, I rise now, not so much to discuss the advisability of adopting the amendment before the Chair, as to ask for a further expression of opinion as to the obligations of the Commonwealth towards the states. I would ask Mr. Henry to withdraw his motion, and to rely upon what, I wish to suggest, is already in the Constitution as a power of assistance which might be rendered by the Federation to a state in need. Turning to clause 98, I see that it is provided there that the Parliament may take over "the whole or a rateable portion of the public debts of the states."

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is, of all the states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The Federal Parliament, will have to treat all the states alike, and cannot pick out one.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I know that; but I want to mention some words, the meaning of which I do not know, but which must, I think, have some meaning, and, if any, will, I believe, meet the case we are discussing. Four lines from the bottom of clause 98 I find it provided that "the amount shall be charged to and paid by the respective states wholly or in part." If those words mean anything at all, it seems to me that they must mean that they give the federal authority the power to require the whole amount due to be paid by the states, or that the federal authority may determine that a part shall be paid.
Mr. REID. -

No; those words are put in to provide for two cases—whether the whole debt is to be taken over or only a part.

Mr. HOLDER. -

It looks on the face of it that any state may meet the whole or any portion of its obligation, as the federal authority may determine.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Higher up in the clause you will see that it says that, whatever is taken over, the state is to "indemnify the Commonwealth."

Mr. HOLDER. -

If the words I have quoted have the meaning which Mr. Reid says they have, it disposes of my first point. My next point is that in clause 52, it is provided that the Federal Parliament shall have the power of "borrowing money on the public credit of the Commonwealth"; and there is no provision anywhere that I know of in this Constitution to limit the expenditure of money so borrowed. There are limits to the expenditure of revenue. It would be quite impossible during the five years to render special aid to, any state under the clause we have agreed to to-day, because the revenue is appropriated. But the provision I have quoted deals with borrowed money, and I know of nothing in this Constitution which would limit or control the expenditure of borrowed money except the Loan Act of the Federal Parliament which authorizes the loan.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You are referring to paragraph (4) of clause 52?

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

But that money could not be spent upon any object the Federal Parliament thought fit.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I want an expression of opinion which shall be authoritative on the point. I see that, according to the provision I have quoted, there is power given to the Federal Parliament to borrow money on the credit of the Commonwealth, and I say again that I do not know of any limitation of the expenditure of that money except the limitation which would be specified in the Loan Act authorizing the borrowing of the money. Of course, these words cover the raising of the money for the building of railways for instance, and in such a case the limitation would be the terms of the Loan Act. But is there anything anywhere to prevent a Loan Act being passed by the Federal Parliament authorizing the raising of a certain sum of money, the proceeds of which loan might be divided according to the terms of the Act among the states according to their needs, or upon some other principle?

Mr. GLYNN. -

The first three lines of clause 52 affect that point.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The money must be expended with regard to "the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth," not of the states.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The passage to which Mr. Glynn refers me is as follows:-

The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have full power and authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth, with respect to all or any of the matters following.

Well, that includes the borrowing of money.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is the Commonwealth as distinguished from the state that is to borrow; the money is only to be borrowed for the purposes of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -

Look at clause 81, where it is clearly set out that-

All revenues raised or received by the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, under the authority of this Constitution, shall form one Consolidated Revenue Fund, to be appropriated for the public service of the Commonwealth in the manner and subject to the charges provided by this Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER. -

With all due respect, I do not think that that clause applies.

Mr. REID. -

Yes; it covers every appropriation issued from the Treasury.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not think so. I think clause 81 deals with revenue.

Mr. REID. -

You receive revenue, and you appropriate money for expenditure.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not suppose it is intended that the term "Consolidated Revenue Fund," used in clause 81, shall include both revenue and loan money. We are surely going to keep these two separate.

Mr. REID. -

There is no provision of that sort.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Then I would suggest that words should be inserted in order to provide that loan money and revenue shall be kept separate. I hope we shall have a Loan Account and a Consolidated Revenue Account, and by no means mix up the two. I take it that clause 81 does not refer to any loan fund at all, but simply to revenue. The term "Consolidated Revenue Fund" defines it clearly. Of course, I am not expressing a legal opinion in a chamber of lawyers such as this is. I should be unwilling to do that. I simply rose with the object of putting forward these points with a view of obtaining a statement of authoritative opinion in regard to them. It appears to me that the clauses I have mentioned imply the possibility of some assistance being rendered to a state in difficulties. It seems to me that, as no assistance could be rendered out of revenue, some assistance might be rendered out of loans, or there might be a guarantee of a loan, or some other way of rendering financial aid to a state that might be devised. But I hope Mr. Henry will withdraw his motion, because to state the matter so broadly as that the Commonwealth shall come to the aid of a state might, I am afraid, lead to very serious reckless financing on the part of some states under some possible conditions.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

My honorable friend (Mr. Holder) has put the matter with his usual clearness, and has very convincingly shown that at any rate there is very considerable doubt as to the question which has been exercising our minds, as to whether it would be an implied power in the Commonwealth to come to the assistance of a state in financial straits. And, therefore, if the existence of the power is involved in doubt, it would be exceedingly desirable that some provision—I do not say the provision moved by my honorable friend, who is not wedded to the particular words of his amendment, or any other—should be inserted, so as to make it clear that that power exists. Now, I was very glad to hear Mr. Isaacs express his desire to eliminate from this discussion, although we may use the word "insolvency," all idea of its being suggested that we contemplate the actual insolvency of any particular state. We cannot discuss a subject like this without using the common words "bankruptcy" and "insolvency," and if we have to speak of state bankruptcy, or state insolvency, we do not mean to impute that any state of the Commonwealth, under any set of circumstances, is likely to repudiate its obligations.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Such a thing is absolutely impossible.

Mr. SYMON. -

Therefore, while we use the terms "bankruptcy" and "insolvency" as applying to a possible state of things which we wish to avert, it is not to be imagined for a moment that we contemplate that such a state of things is going to exist, but we mean that a state may be in such a condition of strait, or the Treasurer of that state maybe in such a condition of administrative embarrassment, that it may be necessary to have re-course to the Commonwealth for assistance in some shape or other. Now, I also desire to say that I do not think it is necessary to determine, and it will be impossible for this Convention to determine, whether or not this implied power exists in the Constitution. There might be, and no doubt would be, a strong difference of opinion upon the subject, and even if we, assembled here, were unanimous on the subject, that fact would not assist the final determination of the question when the exigency arose. But I agree with Mr. O'Connor that undoubtedly in the distribution of the surplus, and in dealing with the financial condition of the states, the Commonwealth would be animated by a desire to see that the states were placed in a position to meet all their engagements. The difficulty which Mr. Henry sees, and to which he directs his amendment, is as to the condition of things during the five years' interval during the bookkeeping period-when there is an express appropriation of the surplus moneys. During that time Mr. Henry fears it is possible, without mentioning any particular colony, that the Treasurer of one of the states might be unable to see his way to meet his public engagements.

Mr. REID. -

He could adopt Mr. Walker's proposal for capitalizing discrepancies.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is one of those delightfully scientific proposals that appeal to the mind of the statistician and the financier more than to the mind of a humble layman, and I am sure that if there is one member of this Convention competent to solve the problem of capitalizing a financial discrepancy it is Mr. Walker. However, I have pointed out what seems to me to be the difficulty to which Mr. Henry has addressed his amendment, and I feel that Mr. O'Connor's argument, powerful as it is in reference to the condition of things after the expiration of the five years, is absolutely without force as applied to the condition of things to which Mr. Henry's amendment is directed. But I go further than that, and I take up the view which was dealt with by Mr. O'Connor on the broad ground-and that is the position to which I wish to direct the attention of members of the Convention-of whether it is politic or right to introduce this amendment into the Constitution. If this power is implied in the Constitution, then the amendment merely asserts and makes absolutely clear a power which the Commonwealth might exercise if the necessity arose. On the other hand, if it is not implied in the Constitution, it seems to me that it is a power that ought to be in the Constitution, so as to enable the Commonwealth to do what I believe it would be the disposition of the Federal Parliament to do, namely, to come to the aid of any state which sought its interference to protect that state from financial disaster or financial strait. I admit all the possibilities on the two grounds put by Mr. Holder—that there is a possibility of this provision leading to reckless financing on the part of the states, and also the other ground that it imposes an obligation on the Commonwealth, and a difficulty with which the Federal Parliament and the Federal Executive may have to deal. But those two things do not seem to me to outweigh the advantage of having this power clearly expressed in the Constitution, to enable the Federal Parliament to give that assistance which might be absolutely essential to the stability and even to the existence of a particular state. Now, I will suppose the case of a state in which such a condition of things has arisen. But again, I say, I do not believe that such a condition of things would ever occur in any of the states of this Commonwealth. Still, suppose a state got into financial embarrassment, and there was a tendency towards, or a talk of, repudiation, why should not the Federal Executive and the Federal Parliament, in the interests of the Commonwealth, come to the assistance and relief of that state? Would it not be infinitely better that the Commonwealth should exercise a power of that kind than that it should allow a blemish to be put on the honour and good faith of the entire Commonwealth, which would result from any one state repudiating its obligations? I admit that there are disadvantages and inconveniences on the one side, but on the other there is the great principle that it is the duty of the Commonwealth to maintain the existence, the integrity, and the solvency of every state. And I do say that that is the function of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. - Then it had better be put in the Bill, and let the people know what they are doing. If they are going to enter into a contract of that sort, the people had better know it.

Mr. BARTON. - If you put that in the Bill, the Bill will be put out.

My honorable friends take a strong view of the matter.

Mr. REID. - Do you really think that if a state gets into any temporary embarrassment it is not strong enough itself to make financial arrangements to relieve itself from its own embarrassment? If there is a state in that condition I say it is a sort of partner that I do not want to have.

Mr. SYMON. -

There is only one answer to the question of the right honorable member, and that is, I do not believe there is any state which has not the resources and which has not the disposition to meet its own engagements but I decline to assent to the proposition that, by putting this into the Constitution, you are declaring that there are such states as are likely to be placed in that position.

Mr. LYNE. -

They might be if they lose all their Customs revenue.

Mr. SYMON. -

If my honorable friend is in power, he will take care, by a strong protectionist policy, to have no Customs revenue at all, because the duties of customs he will impose will be all prohibitive. That is the legitimate outcome, I think, of a strong protectionist policy.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear; there will be no revenue at all.

Mr. SYMON. -

However, I do not want to enter into that question. I know my honorable friend's view of the subject, and I respect it, although I do not approve of it.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is why you respect it, perhaps.

Mr. SYMON. -

I will not adopt that suggestion; it would be unkind. I say again that it would be better to enable the federal authorities to give a guarantee to save a state from being under the obligation of raising a state loan on very adverse terms than that it should be driven into the market as a competitor for money under signal disadvantages. However, the question it seems to me ought to be dealt with upon the broad grounds on which Mr. O'Connor has debated it rather than on any narrow ground, which we cannot settle here, as to whether or not there is an implied power in the Constitution to deal with this subject. It is quite clear that on that point there might be and, I think, undoubtedly would be, strong difference of opinion, and whilst I feel that there are disadvantages both ways, and whilst I pledge myself emphatically to the view that any state of this Commonwealth will have the power and resources to discharge its obligations through all time during the existence of the Commonwealth, still I see no objection to inserting some such power as this in the Constitution.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I desire to suggest that, as we meet to-night, it would be more Convenient to some of us if we adjourned at the usual hour, five o'clock p.m., which has now arrived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

What time is it suggested we should meet to-night?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

We shall re-assemble to-night at half-past seven o'clock. Of course, I wish to meet the desire expressed by the Convention the other morning that we should get on with the work a little faster by sitting a little longer, but if it is the general desire that we should rise now, I am agreeable, so long as we meet again at half-past seven o'clock, and do about three hours' work.

Mr. LYNE. -

Let us finish this debate to-night.

Mr. BARTON. -

We can finish this debate to-night. Under the circumstances, I support Mr. Reid's suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. -

As it is evidently the wish of the committee, I will suspend the sitting until half-past seven o'clock.

[The Chairman left the chair at two minutes past five o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at twenty-five minutes to eight o'clock p.m.]

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

When we were addressing ourselves to this question at Adelaide, it is in my memory that the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales sought to make good any deficiency or relieve a state from any difficulty by an offer of cash to the sum of £20,000, £30,000, or £40,000.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No; he wanted more than that.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Well, he made that offer without letting us know exactly how he would carry his offer into effect; and that offer was, and I think rightly, repudiated by the colony for which he specially designed it—Tasmania. Tasmania did not then, and does not now, require to come into federation on other terms than those on which other colonies come in. Tasmania desires to come in, not as a pauper sister of the more wealthy colonies, but as a sister equal financially,

Western Australia, it is only fair to make some such provision in the Constitution to meet other cases of hardship in other states. It is quite possible to conceive some serious calamity happening to a state, such as a conflagration, extending far more widely than those which have recently occurred in Victoria and Tas-mania, and carrying with it such loss to the community as to very seriously hamper that community, and possibly bring a colony to the verge of insolvency.

Mr. BROWN. -

Embarrassment.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I say to the verge of insolvency-to make it very difficult for a colony, at the time, to meet it obligations; and it would be clearly as much to the injury of the Commonwealth at large as to a particular state, if a state were thrown into a position of that sort, and driven to extremities. Now, at the present time, there is no provision in the Constitution whatever by which difficulties such as that can be met. I cannot but think it would be wise if we made such a provision, which would necessarily be safeguarded by the Parliament of the whole Commonwealth. can see no danger in such a provision, if we are to trust the Federal Parliament, and I do see the necessity of having some such power within the Constitution.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

So much has been said upon this question that I will content myself with simply expressing my earnest hope that these words will not be inserted in the Constitution. As I stated in an interjection, I cannot conceive that any of these colonies will ever be in such a position that it will be unable to provide for its own difficulties, upon the faith and strength of its own credit.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

You offered Tasmania £30,000 or £40,000.

Mr. REID. -

That was a personal offer on my own part.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And now you see what it is worth.

Mr. REID. -

Even if the improbable happened, and if the credit of any member of the Commonwealth in days to come was seriously imperilled, I have so much confidence in the good faith and generosity of the people of Australia, when they are united, that I believe it would not be difficult to amend our Constitution in order to come to the assistance of any state. Then it will be an act of voluntary generosity and brotherhood on the part of those who would be responsible for the liability, and it would be infinitely more honorable to a state than to have to come to a Cabinet for a favour under circumstances of humiliation-for they would be nothing less.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Where would the humiliation be?
Mr. REID. -

It certainly would be humiliation for a state to have to do that. I hope my honorable friend (Mr. Douglas) would think it a humiliation that any colony should be reduced to such a pitch of misfortune. Although he seems a little weak about Tasmania to-night, I will guarantee that, with the marvellous mineral resources of that colony, which I have heard of at banquets—the inexhaustible resources of Tasmania—the only trouble we shall have about Tasmania in six years to come will be that she will be like Western Australia—we shall not be able to strike an average that will be high enough for her. Under these circumstances I do hope that we will not put this, I will say, unworthy clause into the Constitution of Australia.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

It is quite evident that the Convention have had a good dinner; but I do not think that we can very well frame a Constitution on after-dinner speeches. I regret the numerous occasions on which I have had to differ from the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales, but I have now, with the utmost deference, to differ from him again, because I think he has used an extremely good argument why this clause should be engrafted on the Constitution. He tells you to leave it to brotherhood and generosity, and yet he absolutely says—"Supposing the time should come when any state wants financial assistance, we can get the Constitution amended.” On the one hand, generosity, and on the other hand, a state has to wait for a year, or possibly more—during which time it may stop payment—before it can get the Constitution amended. My right honorable friend must see that if the Constitution is to be amended, it is not a question of generosity; it will be a question of law, and, as the right honorable member has absolutely foretold the circumstances under which the Constitution will have to be amended in this respect, I ask him to be consistent and to put this into the Constitution now. It cannot do any harm.

Mr. BARTON. -

Which state do you expect to stop payment?

Mr. DOBSON. -

I do not expect any state to stop payment. I do think it is a mistake when we use these words to illustrate our argument that we should be credited with imagining that any state might do that. But no one can foresee where public opinion is going to drag us or what is going to happen in this changeable world. It is better that we should have a provision of this kind in the Constitution than that in the event of trouble occurring we should have to wait until we could get the people to consent to an amendment of the Constitution. I submit that the last speaker has used the best argument that we have heard yet why this provision should be in the Constitution.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I did not mean to say a word on this subject, but surely we are not going to form a federation of states that are trembling on the verge of bankruptcy. The thing is too preposterous, and this clause is too preposterous. I do not believe that such a clause could ever find acceptance at the hands of a number of men such as are assembled here. There is no fear of the clause being accepted. If it were it would certainly sap the independence of the states by placing the Federal Parliament as a sort of Lord Bountiful over the states, to whom ad misericordiam appeals could be made.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Does it sap your independence to have a banker and an overdraft.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The whole proposal is foreign to the spirit of the Constitution. The Constitution lays it down that the Commonwealth is to deal equally with all the states whether it is in the matter of taxation, of bounties, or of trade, and we may as well strike out the provision that all taxation shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth if we are to contemplate that after the taxation has been raised the proceeds may be handed over to any one colony. The thing will not bear a moment's investigation, and I hope the honorable member will not press his proposal to a division. It is a pity that the amendment has been brought forward. There is no possibility, nor does any one contemplate the possibility, of any of the states being in a worse financial position than they are in at the present time. On the contrary, I believe that their financial position, good as it is now, will be infinitely improved.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

One would imagine, from the way in which this proposal has been handled, that Tasmania has some apprehension in regard to its financial position. It is not with that view that the clause has been submitted, but simply in order that there should be a provision in the Bill which would enable the Commonwealth Parliament, in case of such an accident happening, to give assistance to any state that was in a position of financial difficulty. Are we not now proposing to aid Western Australia? The Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales said just now that he would not go into a partnership with an insolvent partner, but he forgot that, in the preamble to the Bill, it is set out that the colonies are indissolubly united. If a state required

aid the Commonwealth Parliament would have to give it in some way or another, or that state would have to go out of the Federation. It could not go out of the Federation, because the Bill says that they are to be united for ever. If there was power, there is no doubt that a colony in such a position would be kicked out of the Federation and left to fight its own battles. The clause has been referred to as if it was intended for the benefit only of Tasmania. What has Tasmania to do with it? There is no colony, not even Western Australia, that is in as good a Position at the present time as Tasmania. We have a boundary. You have no boundary. We have plenty there to support man. Look at our crops. We do not get your 6 and 7 bushels to the acre. My honorable friend on my right gets 50 bushels of oats to the acre, and 30 bushels of wheat. You cannot get that in Australia. For men, horses, and everything else, Tasmania is the best colony of the lot. It is all very well for the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) to say that he could scarcely see Tasmania, and it is very pleasant for us to hear these little jokes. But this is a matter of business that we are dealing with now. So far as Tasmania is concerned, you can put in a clause providing that Tasmania shall not have the benefit of this provision.

This is merely a matter of benevolence to the other colonies.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Of course, New South Wales has her land revenue; but her representatives need not boast. Tasmania will be all right in the end. The honorable member (Mr. Holder) has made some excellent speeches during the sittings of the Convention, but his last speech was the worst I ever heard. He said: "I do not know what the opinion of the lawyers may be on this subject, but I cannot find any particular reason for this provision. I think there are so many things which will lead to extravagance." How can the insertion of this provision lead to extravagance? Will a state run into debt simply to be relieved of its indebtedness?

Mr. HOWE. -

New South Wales might.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

The only chance is that South Australia might do so. Honorable members are one moment exceedingly anxious that there should be federation, but the next moment they are all at division. We are of opinion that this provision should be inserted in the Bill, because we consider it a necessary one; but, as we are all of the same opinion as the honorable member (Mr. Henry), honorable members unite in saying that we should not have it because it applies to Tasmania.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -

I do not wish to detain honorable members, but I am glad that we have had this debate, because it has brought out the opinion of the honorable and learned members (Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Isaacs) to the effect that there will be no inherent power in the federal authority to aid a state which is in financial difficulties. The colonies therefore can know exactly what they are to expect, and their representatives will have to advise their fellow colonists that in joining the Federation they take this financial risk.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

We all take this risk. Tasmania risks no more than any other colony.

Mr. HENRY. -

Yes; we all take the risk if we enter the Federation, and we shall enter it with our eyes open. It has been so frequently said that, in the event of a state becoming involved in financial difficulties, the federal authority would help it, that it is well we should know that the Federal Parliament will not have power to do so. If we have a division upon this question, I anticipate that the opinion of the Convention will be that no provision shall be introduced to give the Federal Parliament this power.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We are of opinion that there ought to be a guarantee.

Mr. HENRY. -

I have read Sir George Turner's amendment, and I shall be very pleased to support that since we cannot have the security that I desire for all the colonies. I do not know that in my remarks I singled out Tasmania. There is nothing further from my thoughts than that Tasmania should sue as a pauper to the Federal Parliament. My intention is that she should simply come to the Federal Parliament and ask for her rights. In handing over the whole of our Customs revenue to the Federal Parliament we deprive the states of the power to adjust their finances, while they still have all their liabilities to meet. That is a very grave position. I hope that before the Bill is finally dealt with, some clause or provision

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I have listened with a great deal of attention to the speeches made on this subject, but I have not been convinced that we are acting wisely in making no provision whatever for the difficulties which may arise. Of course, everything is plain sailing now. There is no anticipation of any disaster that could actually occur in the future, but to say that we shall frame a Constitution here which gives no power whatever to the Commonwealth to meet the difficulties that may arise does not show a great deal of wisdom. We have heard a great deal during the sittings of this Convention about trusting the Federal Parliament to do a great many things, but it seems that we are unwilling to trust that Parliament in a matter of very great importance.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Or to give them the power.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am sure it was news to most of us to-day to hear that there is no inherent power in this Constitution to meet a difficulty of this kind. We have been told over and over again by some honorable members, who I thought spoke with some authority, that the Federal Parliament will be supreme, and will be able to meet any of those difficulties; but to-day we have been told that there is no power whatever in this Constitution to meet any difficulties with regard to financial troubles in any of the states.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Mr. Wise told us again and again that there was power.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We must remember that all the states are giving up the great power they have at present of obtaining revenue through Customs and Excise. We are handing over that power absolutely to the Federal Parliament, and after five years we say to the Federal Parliament-"We will trust you to do what is right and fair." But it seems that those who ask us to give up all this will not even admit into this Constitution a power, however small, by which the Federal Parliament will be able to Assist the states. There are a great many ways in which it may be necessary for the Federal Parliament to assist the states. There may be great public works which are altogether beyond the means of a state itself, but which are very necessary in the interests of Australasia. But no power whatever is given here for the Commonwealth to deal with such a matter. There may be a necessity or at all events it may be very advisable-for the Commonwealth to borrow money, which it might do at a cheaper rate than the states could borrow at, and which money it might lend to the states under certain conditions. I hope the Bill will be so altered as to give power to the Commonwealth to do so, allowing it to make whatever terms and conditions it likes. There are many honorable members who look forward to the time when there shall be one unified public debt in Australia, and the states will then probably give up borrowing in London altogether on their own account, and borrow from the Commonwealth instead. Is not that to be permissible under this Constitution? If you make it as tight as it is now, however, there will be no power, as far as I can see, to do anything of the kind. We have all heard a good deal about "Trust the Federal Parliament." Well, I am willing to trust the Federal Parliament. But I do not think we shall be acting wisely in excluding from the power of the Parliament the ability to assist a state in any great public work, or in borrowing money cheaply, or in any other way.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The Federal Parliament will find a way if necessary.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes, but I suppose there will have to be several referendums, which, perhaps, is what the honorable member wants—or, at all events, some other honorable members want that. It is not the first five years that I am thinking about so much in regard to this matter. It will be plain sailing at the beginning. But I am thinking of the more distant future—of a time further ahead than we can see now. I do hope that the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Henry), even if it be not adopted in the words he has suggested, will be accepted in spirit, and that some words which may be suggested by the Drafting Committee having the same effect will be inserted in this Constitution.

The proposed clause was negatived.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I now beg to propose the insertion of the following clause to follow clause 93:-

93B. In respect of each of the first five years after uniform duties of customs have been imposed, the Commonwealth shall keep an account showing in the case of the state of Western Australia—

I. The amount of revenue which, under the law of that state immediately before the imposition of uniform duties, would have been collected from duties of customs and excise upon the goods actually imported into and produced and manufactured in that state during that year.

II. The amount of the duties of customs and excise collected and taken to have been collected in that state during that year.

The latter amount shall be deducted from the former amount and the balance (if any) shall be taken to be the net loss of that state for that year by reason of the imposition of uniform duties of customs and excise, and by reason of the operation of free trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth, and the proportion which such net loss bears to the amount so collected and taken to have been collected shall be taken to be the proportionate net loss of that state.

The proportionate net loss (if any) of each of the other states shall be calculated in like manner, and if the proportionate net loss of the state of Western Australia is greater than the average proportionate net losses of all the states the Commonwealth shall pay to the state of Western Australia a sum which will equalize the proportionate net loss of that state with such average.

The amount so paid shall be taken to be an expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of the original powers given to it by this Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I think I made it tolerably clear the other day that I am not in favour of this clause, in the form in which it is suggested by the Finance Committee, for the reason that it makes a special case in favour of Western Australia. My desire all along has been that some general clause should have been framed which would have been applicable, not only to Western Australia, but to every other colony in this Federation. That view, however, did not find favour with the majority of the Finance Committee, and, therefore, this clause, making a special provision for Western Australia, found a place in the committee's report. Before I sit down, I propose to move an amendment to the clause, with the object of making its provisions general rather than making them special in regard to one colony, so that the provisions which apply to Western Australia shall apply to every other colony in the Federation. I think I pointed out the other day, but I may as well repeat it here to-night, that Western Australia stands in a peculiar position in regard to federation—in a position altogether different from that of every other colony in the group. One reason for this is that we are not able to point out, in fact no one, here has attempted for a moment to point out—I hope some one will do so if he can—that Western Australia can in any way gain by federation, at the present time. All the colonies represented here have a great incentive to federation, which is absent in the case of Western Australia. They are all looking forward, every one of them, to the free markets of other colonies. Western Australia is not looking forward in any way at the present time, I regret to say, to the free markets of these colonies. I ventured to say the other day that I believed that the incentive to federation on the part of the other colonies represented here, on account of the free markets which would result therefrom, was stronger and greater than their desire for nationhood. I repeat the statement to-night, that the great thing every one of these colonies is looking forward to is an open market for its manufactures and its products. That being so, you have a strong lever in the direction of federation, which is altogether absent in the case of Western Australia. I hope that will not always continue. We are making efforts in order to be larger producers, and I believe as time goes on this difficulty will not exist, at any rate, not to the same extent. I also pointed out that, besides having that incentive absent from the people of Western Australia, there is another great difficulty in the road. The protection which our farmers have under the revenue Tariff, which gives them an advantage over the products from other colonies, is to be removed by intercolonial free-trade. It is a very difficult task, indeed, which the representatives of Western Australia have in trying to induce the people of that colony to accept federation at the present time. If we are to tell them-"Besides all that, you are going to lose all this money through intercolonial free-trade, and that money will be lost in a way which will take away from you the protection which you now have," I think that our difficulties will be still greater than they are. It has been said by some honorable members-I hope it will not be said again, but if it is said, I do not care-that the representatives of Western Australia are here to try and get something out of the other colonies.

Mr. HOWE. -
Who said that?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It was said in this chamber by some one to-day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
But are you not trying to get all you can?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
All I can say is that we do not want anything from anyone; we are quite content as we are. We are a flourishing community, just beginning to enjoy the blessings of independence. We are not here to ask for a favour from any one. We do not want anything which is not reasonable and fair, and I hope no one will attribute to us any such motives as that. It has been generally admitted that the case of Western Australia is exceptional. This proposal has come from the Finance Committee, based on a proposal I made, which was to be general in its application, so that every colony that happened to be in the same position as Western Australia would benefit to the same extent. Our object in being here is to try and frame a Constitution which all can accept. We are not here to get any advantage; we do not want any advantage over any one else. If honorable members think that anything in these proposals is unfair to them, or is unduly to our advantage, I hope that they will not vote for them. Our only object is to try and make this Bill in some way acceptable to the people of Western Australia. I think I have shown clearly that we are in a different position from any other colony. Of course, it may be said by honorable members-

"You are in a different position, and therefore you can stand out. We are not going to give you any concession. We are not going to try and make a different arrangement for your people. If you do not like to come in on the same terms as the others, you can stand out." That is quite legitimate, and honorable members can express themselves to that effect if they like. The proposal I have to make in place of that of the Finance Committee is nearly in the same terms, except that it is general in its application. It takes into consideration both gains and losses. The wording is almost identical except that we take into our calculation the colonies which will gain, as well as those which will lose. Under the arrangement which honorable members have been good enough to say is altogether to the advantage of Western Australia, we will lose an immense amount. I expect we will lose something like £150,000 a year, even by the arrangement as it is on the paper; that is, so far as I can judge from existing conditions. That is a loss I do not know how I shall be able to dissipate. Probably there may be a proposal by some honorable member which will meet my views even to a greater extent than the proposal I now make. Honorable members will recognise that as this arrangement is only to last for five years, and that then we are to trust to the Federal Government which we hear so much about, no one can say we are desirous of getting an undue advantage. At any rate, if any one dare say I want an advantage I repudiate the statement. I do not want an advantage from any one. All I want is what is right and just. I want to get the Bill into such a shape that I can say something in its favour. I have explained how difficult that is for me at the present time. Our protection to native industries will be gone. You will have our markets, which are worth something. I am sure that to Victoria, South Australia, and New South Wales our markets are worth a great deal.

Mr. LYNE. -

Not much to New South Wales at present.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You will have our markets free, whereas now you are confronted with the duties. Besides that, you will be able to compete to a larger extent and this is an argument against our own people-with our home productions, which, under ordinary circumstances, our own people have a right to.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

What about your market for our fruit?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The market for your fruit? If you will get rid of the codlin moth, there is no reason why your fruit should not be sent to Western Australia now. Western Australia can produce most of the fruits quite as well as Tasmania. Our country is fitted for all kinds of extra-tropical fruits. We can grow nearly all the fruits that can be grown in Tasmania, only they grow better in Western Australia. In a few years Western Australia will be self-contained, unless the population increases to a very large extent. If that is the case, and I hope it will be, the good market we have been able to give for some years, and are giving at the present time, to the producers of the other colonies will continue. I beg to move the following as an amendment on the proposed new clause:-

For each of the first five years after uniform duties of customs have been imposed the Commonwealth shall keep an account showing-

I. The amount which, under the law of each state in force immediately before the imposition of uniform duties, would have been collected from duties of customs and of excise upon the goods actually imported into and the goods produced or manufactured in that state.

II. The amount collected and taken to have been collected in that state from duties of customs and of excise.

The difference shall be taken between the former and the latter amounts, and when the former amount is the greater the balance shall be taken to be the net loss of the state for that year by reason of the imposition of uniform duties of customs and of excise, and by reason of the operation of free trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth, and the proportion which such net loss bears to the amount so collected and taken to have been collected shall be taken to be the proportionate net loss of that state.

The proportionate net loss and the proportionate net gain (as the case may be) of each of the states shall be calculated in like manner, and if the proportionate net loss of any state is greater than the average of the proportionate net losses of all the states combined (after allowing for the proportionate net gain in any one or more of the states) the Commonwealth shall pay to that state a sum which will equalize the proportionate net loss of that state with such average.

The amount so paid shall be taken to be an expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of the original powers given to it by this Constitution.

I think there are copies of the amendment provided, and it is very probable, perhaps, that some amendment may be suggested by honorable members.

Mr. REID. -

I might suggest to the right honorable gentleman that he had better not give this up until he sees himself in a better position. He may find that in giving this up he gives everything up.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Gives what up?

Mr. REID. -

The proposition of the Finance Committee. I advise my honorable friend not to give this up, until he has got something better.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am not here to try and obtain any advantage by any means whatever, except those that are right; and, if there is a division-if this clause stands as it is in the Finance Committee's report-I shall not vote, and I hope every honorable member who represents Western Australia will also abstain from voting. The only difference between this clause and the one suggested by the Finance Committee is that it is general in its application, and applies to every colony instead of only to Western Australia. It also provides that the balance shall be arrived at after taking into consideration the gains and the losses. I have had it worked out, and it seems to me, taking it altogether, to be a more fair basis to go upon. It will press less heavily I think, on most of the states than the proposal made by the Finance Committee.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I will not detain the committee many minutes. I cannot quite follow the effect of this clause, but it appears to me that New South Wales, with its present Customs Tariff, will have to bear all the loss.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Oh, no. Western Australia will lose £60,000.

Mr. LYNE. -

In a calculation I saw the other day, it was shown that New South Wales would have to pay the largest proportion of the amount to be provided for Western Australia, and that Victoria would come next. The principle of this clause is the same, but it extends very much further. New South Wales, with its present Tariff, would have to pay a much larger proportion of the amount payable to any state that lost, owing to the establishment of the uniform Tariff, than any other colony.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

The Federal Treasurer will pay it.

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes, but the larger proportion of it will be paid by New South Wales to the Federal Treasurer. I said that I would not detain the committee many minutes, because I am very anxious to hear this matter debated so that I may thoroughly understand it. I admit that I do not follow it clearly at present. My impression is that if it is carried New South Wales will have to contribute a much larger proportion than any of the other states of any loss incurred by the smaller states.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I must confess that I disclaim any responsibility

[P.1126] starts here
for the appearance in the Finance Committee's report of this particular arrangement in connexion with Western Australia. At the same time, it is a suggestion which carried with it a very large amount of support, and which was no doubt prompted by an admitted difficulty in the case of Western Australia. But much as I appreciate the difficulty of Western Australia, I feel that it will be an even greater difficulty to reconcile the people of the other colonies to the arrangement which is proposed. This view has different aspects, according to the different opinions which we hold on questions connected with the incidence of a Tariff. If we consider that the result of taking off duties is to relieve some unknown personages beyond the boundaries of a country, and not to relieve the people in that country, that is one view of the matter. If, on the other hand, another view is the correct one, that when you take duties off imports you relieve from a burden the people who consume the articles, the matter is capable of being regarded from a different stand-point. I must be understood as speaking from the latter stand-point. My arguments will have very little weight, or ought to have very little weight, with those who take the opposite view. But speaking as I believe, I look upon the fact that the uniform Tariff, while relieving the necessaries of life in Western Australia from heavy taxes, will directly benefit the people of Western Australia. I admit it may have some other effects besides that; but it will be difficult for us in any other colony to convince the people that the effect of taking duties off in a community is so disastrous to that community that other communities ought to make good the loss. It will be a hard argument to carry in, I do not say our colony, but any colony. At the same time, I admit that the difficulty is a serious one. Our friends from Western Australia have not come here with any chimerical difficulty. It is a subject of great interest, and must be so to them, from the circumstance that over one-third of their Customs revenue must go on the establishment of the uniform Tariff. But I look upon that as an unmixed advantage to the people of Western Australia, although still an embarrassment to the Treasury.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We shall have to get the money somewhere else.

Mr. REID. -

Exactly; and that is where the genius of the future Commonwealth Treasurer will come in. He will manage to adjust his Tariff so that Western Australia will not be subject to any greater proportional loss than any of the other colonies. It will be one of the knotty problems which the Commonwealth Treasurer will have to solve; but it is not incapable of an approximate solution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Then there will be no harm in this provision.

Mr. REID. -

But we shall have certain preliminary difficulties to face in our own colonies before federation is accepted, and after the magnificent statements which have been repeated more than once about the revenue, trade, and illimitable prospects of Western Australia, it will be very hard to turn the page over, and appeal to the comparatively indigent populations of the other colonies to consent to a special arrangement on behalf of a colony which we all admit has a broad and grand future. So far as I am personally concerned, I cannot take up that argument. I say that it will be within the power of the Commonwealth Treasurer to so adjust his Tariff that in the case of Western Australia there will be no substantial dislocation of the revenue, although the articles taxed may be materially changed. I do not, however, wish to argue against the proposal too strongly, because I feel that there is a difficulty, and I quite see that the Treasurer of Western Australia was in duty bound to bring the matter very earnestly before the Finance Committee. He satisfied a large majority of the members of the committee that the clause was a proper one to insert, and I merely wish to record my dissent from their opinion. I think, however, that the right honorable gentleman has altered his proposal. I have in my hand a clause which has been hurriedly circulated among honorable members--and which is calculated to give one a cold, it comes so damp from the printers--which appears to differ in its provisions from the recommendation of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

It is entirely different.

Mr. REID. -

What is the effect of it? Is it to apply to all the colonies the cure which it was suggested to apply to Western Australia?

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Yes.

Mr. REID. -

Well, there ought to be perfect unanimity in regard to it. At last we have hit upon a solution of this great difficulty which will give absolute justice all round, but for one slight circumstance. The unfortunate colony which I represent cannot possibly get any advantage from it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

She can pay.

Mr. REID. -
The present Tariff of New South Wales yields about £1,500,000, and any conceivable Tariff such as my honorable friends speak of would probably throw at least £1,000,000 more into the Treasury chest of Sydney, even after deducting our share of the expenses of revenue. If you take the £2,500,000 from the £1,500,000 there will not be much left.

Mr. BARTON. -
You get a minus quantity.

Mr. REID. -
Yes. If the Commonwealth Tariff comes into operation in 1901, we shall have to calculate the facts of trade in that year by the law in force in New South Wales in 1900, under which-if the law now in force remains unchanged-the Customs and Excise revenue of the colony would be about £1,500,000. You must then take the amount collected, and taken to have been collected, under the Federal Tariff during 1901, which will be about £2,500,000; deducting the one amount from the other, you get £1,000,000 as the net loss of New South Wales. All the other colonies will come along with claims, ranging according to these ingenious calculations from £100,000 to £200,000 each; that must come out of our £1,000,000. And why? Because we have been so wicked as not to have taxed their products in the past. Our friends in the other colonies are to have made up to them what they will lose by ly in order to get even with them. I am sure if we did adopt this policy my honorable friends opposite would hail our return to enlightenment and sound political economy. It is rather amusing to me to see how plaintively those who have received the benefit of our free-trade yearn for us to set up the barriers against them as they have done against us. I do not blame them for what they have done; they had a right to do it, and they believed that what they were doing was to the advantage of their communities. But it cannot be a matter of quarrel with us that New South Wales has thrown open her ports to the other colonies before the establishment of federation. If we had a good stiff tax, say 50 per cent. ad valorem, upon everything they send into our markets, I have no doubt we could make a good deal out of the proposed arrangement. There is no doubt it would offer a strong inducement to the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) to put on additional taxation. It would, however, be an unfortunate beginning to federation if, to get a fair adjustment of the accounts, New South Wales were obliged to harry and oppress the trade of the other colonies. I mention these things to show honorable members that it will be a trifle difficult for us to go back to New South Wales and unfold the nature of this proposal to the people there. We have a land revenue, as the honorable member (Mr. Douglas) has pointed out, but we have plenty to do... with it, and I am afraid that we are not in a position to consent to the present arrangement. I do not think that even the leader of the Convention, with his acknowledged influence, could induce the people of New South Wales to accept this solution of the difficulty, so that it seems to me, if anything is to be done for Western Australia, it will have to be done on the lines of the Finance Committee's report. That is the only chance of doing anything. Widening the area only makes the trouble wider and the difficulty greater. I do not think the case of Western Australia, which is a very exceptional one, should be staked on the fortunes of this particular amendment. Although I do not approve of the special treatment of Western Australia, still there are facts connected with that case which will enable us to represent it in New South Wales with a certain amount of force which will get over a difficulty of that sort—for difficulties there must be. But when I come to the other colonies which have been taxing our people and taxing our intercolonial trade so heavily, and when I have to say to them that after they have been taxed so heavily by the other colonies they will have to make up a contribution to those colonies for losing the opportunity of continuing that taxation for a few more years, it is a proposition which I am afraid even the most ardent federationist would wince at. I am afraid we shall have to keep on some other lines. I admit it would be a very good arrangement if New South Wales was taxing at the present time, and had been taxing for a long time, Australasian products. I believe we could then get a mutual agreement, but I do not think that honorable members can be very angry with us because of the fact that we have pursued a federal policy a little too soon. That is the difficulty. I should be very glad if we could get out of it in a way less objectionable than will be afforded by the general proposition submitted to us.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It seems to me that it would rather mutilate the Bill.

Mr. REID. -
It seems to me that we are to be mutilated.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I am glad to see that my right honorable friend is prepared to take his mutilation in such a cheerful way, and that he can speak so lightly of what to most of the colonies is a very serious subject. New South Wales, of course, can afford to treat any loss that might occur in that colony very lightly, because she has her immense land revenue to fall back upon.

Mr. REID. -
This would come out of the Customs.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Even if she made a loss, the Tariff that will probably be passed will give
New South Wales a larger amount of revenue than she is getting at the present time. I may, in passing say that I can hardly see how a Treasurer could complain about having a larger amount of revenue, or how he could think that that was a hardship. But even supposing that that colony did make a loss, as we believe the other colonies will make a loss, it would be a light matter for New South Wales, because she could easily make up the amount out of the immense landed estate she possesses and the revenue she could derive from it.

That is not the case in any of the other colonies, and therefore the position is a very serious one.

Mr. Reid. -

There is no doubt about that.

Sir George Turner. -

The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) and the Right Hon. Mr. Reid appear, to some extent, to think that under this proposal New South Wales would have to bear all the loss; but that is not true.

Mr. Lyne. -

I did not say all, I said the largest portion.

Sir George Turner. -

Only a little more than Victoria. The population of New South Wales is about 10 per cent. more than the population of Victoria, and the loss has to be calculated per capita. If it is a hardship for New South Wales to have to pay this amount, it must be remembered that she will gain a very large amount of extra revenue, and it will be a much greater hardship for Victoria to have to stand her loss, and to have to pay a portion of the loss sustained by Western Australia.

Mr. Reid. -

Do not forget that the reason why we have no loss on the Tariff is because we do not tax you.

Sir George Turner. -

I think that could be easily remedied.

Mr. Reid. -

But we do not follow that line of policy.

Sir George Turner. -

My honorable friend seems to think a great deal of the fact that he does not tax us, but, unfortunately, we are only put in the same position by my honorable friend's Tariff as are Germany, France, and other portions of the world. We have to compete on equal terms with them.

Mr. Reid. -

Good Heavens! What do you want? You have not taken possession of us yet.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We shall have to do that by-and-by.

Mr. REID. -

I think you will, if you are to swim at all.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

My honorable friend insinuated on one occasion that he would buy up Tasmania; then he was going to purchase South Australia; and, I believe, he was then going to annex Victoria. I advise him that he had better with his spare cash invest in British censors, so as to be safe. My honorable friend has told us that the people in Western Australia will save very largely in consequence of having the duties taken off. At present they receive £380,000 or £390,000 from these intercolonial duties. Although the people there may save some small portion of that on account of the duties being taken off, I think the probabilities are that the people will have to pay for most of the goods they import about the same as they do now. I do not see how the people will save any large amount. No doubt some lines may be and will be reduced, but I fancy the people of Western Australia will find, after the duties are taken off, that they will have to pay nearly the same for their goods as they do now. Even if they do save something, it will be very hard for the Government of the colony to persuade the people that they have made such great savings, that they have the money in another pocket, and that they should put their hands into that pocket, and take out some of that money in order to hand it over to the Treasurer. They will then want to know-"What benefits have we gained by federation?" The vast majority will be inclined to say that they have derived no benefit, while they have incurred very serious losses. Mr. Reid tells us that if we have a Federal Treasurer who is a genius be may be able to so frame this uniform Tariff that none of the colonies will suffer any losses.

Mr. REID. -

Substantial losses.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If we manage to discover a genius who could do that, I, as one of the people in these colonies, will be only too glad to see him permanently placed in the Treasury of the Federation. If it be my honorable friend, the present Treasurer of New South Wales, I will be sorry that New South Wales should have lost such an able Treasurer, but I will be glad that the people of Australasia have gained him in order to carry out such a great work; but I doubt whether be will be able to do so.

Mr. REID. -
I have a better man in my eye; it is the man who can capitalize the discrepancy.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is admitted on all hands that if we are to have a good Federation we must be careful not to do anything that will dislocate the local finances. The more carefully I consider the matter, the more I come to the conclusion that unless we carry some provision which will protect the state Treasuries, so that they will not lose a large amount, we shall dislocate the finances to a considerable extent-I do not say to the extent of insolvency or bankruptcy, nobody ever dreams of that-but to the extent that the Treasurer of a particular state would be forced to put on extra taxation; and I think there are very few Treasurers present here who will be able to devise any scheme of taxation in any of the colonies at the present time, or for many years to come, which they would have any chance of carrying, unless indeed they were prepared to give up at the same time revenue of another kind, devised by means which would be looked upon as more objectionable. Therefore I feel, stronger and stronger every day, that if we are to frame a Constitution which will be acceptable to the people of the colonies, we must be prepared, when we bring the measure before them, to say to them that we feel perfectly certain that such provisions have been made as will not throw further burdens upon them. For they will say-"Of course, you may be going to take off some of these taxes, reducing your 30 per cent. duties to 20 per cent., but we shall not get our goods any cheaper on that account, and shall have to make up the extra amount you lose in other ways." I am quite of opinion, so far as Western Australia is concerned, that if we are to induce her to come into the Federation we must do something to assist the representative men in that colony to bring her in with us. We have been told by Sir John Forrest very earnestly, and I have no doubt honestly, that he and his honorable friends will have a very hard task before them to persuade the people of his colony to join us at all. And when we look at the great distance which divides Western Australia from the rest of the colonies, and remember that there are hundreds and thousands of people there who are hoping to develop their own natural industries and their own manufacturing industries, and that through intercolonial free-trade they will be seriously injured in that respect., I can quite understand the difficulty that will arise, and that Sir John Forrest and his colleagues will have a very hard task indeed to induce their colony to join us. I believe that Sir John Forrest and his brother representatives are very anxious to induce her to enter the Federation; and, therefore, while the proposal with regard to Western Australia may not be theoretically correct, I feel that we are bound to do something to assist that great colony. The proposal made by the Finance Committee is one which would have given assistance to some extent, but my right honorable friend the Premier of Western Australia has made suggestions for certain alterations in those proposals. One of those alterations, although it may on the face of it seem to be a very little one, is to my mind very serious. The original proposal is that wherever there are losses among those colonies, an average shall be struck, and if the average loss of Western Australia is higher than the average loss of all the colonies, then the other colonies, including those that may make gains, shall have, \textit{per capita}, to make up the extra loss sustained by Western Australia. But my right honorable friend no are to be set off against the losses in striking the general average. What would that mean? It is stated that in New South Wales there will be a gain of £1,000,000. I do not believe that that colony will gain so much, but perhaps she will gain £500,000 or £600,000. The losses in the other colonies may, with the loss of Western Australia, come to £700,000 or £800,000. Now, if we are to deduct the gains of New South Wales from the losses of all the other colonies, we shall leave a very small sum indeed on which we are to strike the general average, and by that means we shall leave a very large sum indeed to be found by the other colonies to be paid to Western Australia. I think that that would not be at all fair. We probably should have to find very nearly the whole amount of Western Australia's loss, and that, I think, my right honorable friend will see is asking more than any of us would be prepared to concede. But my objection to this proposal-I have urged it before, and must do so again in all seriousness and earnestness-is that we are asking the colonies that are making serious losses themselves, to put their hands in their pockets still further to take money out for the purpose of relieving the losses of what the people of our colonies will probably believe to be the richest colony of the whole group. That is the great difficulty I see in this proposal; and while I, personally feeling that we have to do something, should be glad to assist Western Australia to the extent of the original proposals made in the Finance Committee's report-although I do not think that they are theoretically correct-I could not support the proposal which Sir John Forrest now makes to us. Possibly we may be able to devise some better scheme, which will not specify any particular colony and brand it in our Constitution as being one that will derive advantages from the other colonies to enable it to carry on. I think we should have a general clause, but I do not want for one moment to propose anything which will take away from New South Wales or any other colony any of the money which she may pay in, for the purpose of assisting Western Australia. I know very well that if the representatives of New South Wales have to go back to their colony and point out that their people are going to pay some £500,000 or £600,000 a year extra in Customs, and that a considerable portion of that has to be paid over to the other colonies, they will probably have as difficult a task to induce their people to adopt the Constitution as our friends in Western Australia will have unless some proposal for their assistance is adopted. Now, I have to come back to what I suggested yesterday in the amendment which I have circulated. I will not say that the draft of it is exactly what it should be, because I have endeavoured to modify the Finance Committee's report, but if the principle be affirmed the drafting of the clause can be altered before it is made a part of the Bill itself.

Mr. LYNE. -

What is the effect of your proposal?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is simply this: If a colony, by the alteration made in its Tariff, gains extra revenue, the state Treasury of that colony is in no worse position. The people may be in a worse position by having to pay extra duties, but so far as the state Treasury is concerned it is certainly in no worse position. I do not desire to take from the state Treasury any portion of these extra gains. But I say with regard to the other colonies-and I believe that all but New South Wales will make losses-where losses are occasioned by the action of the Federal Parliament in imposing a uniform Tariff, and in consequence of the cessation of intercolonial duties, those losses ought not to be borne by the colonies themselves, but should be made up by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. LYNE. -

A great portion of those losses will be made up by extra money received from New South Wales.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not want that. I do not want to have the Federal Parliament take anything from New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

You cannot help it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes.

Mr. WALKER. -

You leave New South Wales out then?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No. We have already declared that during five years there is to be a bookkeeping system, and each colony is to get back the amount collected in the state, less certain expenses. Now, so long as we allow that to stand as it is, the Federal Parliament must carry out that provision, and the result must necessarily be that whatever amount New South Wales pays into the Federal Treasury she will get back, after deducting only the expenses in connexion with the collection and the \textit{per capita} cost of the expenditure of the Federation, but without deducting anything on account of the losses of the other colonies.

\textbf{Mr. LYNE. -}

If the other colonies all make losses, and those losses have to be made up in some way, how are they to be made up except by New South Wales?

\textbf{Mr. REID. -}

You cannot make up a net loss out of other net losses.

\textbf{Sir GEORGE TURNER. -}

I am quite aware of that. I do not require my right honorable friend to point out to me that you cannot make up a net loss out of other net losses. But, as the Bill stands now, New South Wales must get back the amount she pays in, less only the expenses incurred in her colony and her proportion \textit{per capita} of the expenses of the Federation; and if those other losses I have referred to are to be made up to the Federation the Federal Parliament will have to devise other means of making them up. If we have a financial genius as state Treasurer, he may be able to devise means of doing so which I cannot see at present.

\textbf{Mr. LYNE. -}

You must make it up from revenue or from borrowed money.

\textbf{Sir GEORGE TURNER. -}

Undoubtedly.

\textbf{Mr. REID. -}

Not if you have this large extra revenue from New South Wales.

\textbf{Sir GEORGE TURNER. -}

My right honorable friend cannot attempt to draw a herring across the trail.

\textbf{Mr. REID. -}

It is more than a herring, I can tell you.

\textbf{Sir GEORGE TURNER. -}

I do not want the revenue of New South Wales to suffer.

\textbf{Mr. REID. -}

You cannot help it, really.

\textbf{Sir GEORGE TURNER. -}

This proposal may not be altogether theoretically correct, but it will rest with the Federal Treasurer to devise some means, and if he cannot devise any other means than borrowing, then, for the purpose of keeping the state
Treasurers in the position we all desire to see them kept in a position that will enable them to carry on properly—the Federal Treasurer would be perfectly justified in borrowing for that purpose.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Or he could put on direct taxation.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I do not want direct taxation to be imposed, because the money would then have to be found by the colonies in other ways. Seeing the difficulties that we are in, we must be prepared to diverge to some extent from the ordinary course, and if we have to leave the Federal Treasurer to devise a means, and he is forced into adopting that particular means, then the Federal Treasurer would be perfectly justified in choosing that mode of raising revenue, if he could not devise any better mode. With regard to paying per capita our share of the interest on the money borrowed—

Mr. SYMON. -
Why not put in your amendment—"Money raised by loan or extra taxation"?
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Because we may have a genius as Federal Treasurer who may be able to devise some other means.
Mr. DOBSON. -
What will the English investor say to the Commonwealth borrowing money to make up state losses?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
If the English investor understands the position as we understand it, he will not think one whit the worse of us for doing that than he thinks of us for many things that we have done in the past.
Mr. REID. -
Capitalizing the promoters' expenses.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
If any honorable member can suggest any better means, I am perfectly willing to adopt his suggestion. It is not the mode I would adopt, if I could see any other, but unfortunately I do not see any other, and I have not heard of any other except that of leaving it to the state Treasurers to make up the losses as best they can. And so sure as we have to go to our people and tell them that there will be losses which they will have to make up out of their pockets, so surely will they vote against all these proposals. Now, is it not better, in order to get this measure carried, that we should take that little departure from the strict lines of finance than run the risk of having this measure rejected? I do not think we need trouble our minds about the English investor. All that the English investor has to see to is that he has good security.

Mr. DOBSON. -

You say the net loss; ought not you also to say the expenses?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The expenses are provided for in another portion of the Bill. I do not want to detain the committee too long, but this creates a very serious position for many of the colonies. If the position taken up by Mr. Reid is correct, then the Federal Treasurer will be able to frame the Tariff so that there will be no losses at all, and all the colonies will practically derive from this new Tariff about as much as they are deriving now under their present Tariffs. If that happy result can be arrived at, the Federal Treasurer will have no trouble in finding this money, but if he knows that he has to provide against the losses we now contemplate it will make him very careful in framing the uniform Tariff. Then the amount, of loss that the Federal Parliament will have to make up will be very small indeed. Under these circumstances, while prepared to stand by the proposal of the Finance Committee for the purpose of assisting the representatives of Western Australia to induce their colony to come into the Federation, I would much prefer that we should have some general scheme, which would not take away from any of the colonies any more money than they themselves will lose by the scheme in addition to that, if it is at all possible for the financial ability of the Convention to frame it on any lines which will enable the colonies not to suffer the loss which I believe they will suffer. The proposal I have placed before honorable members is the best I can suggest, but I shall be very glad to listen to those who have had greater experience in financial matters than I have had, and they may be able to show us a better mode of dealing with the subject. If they do, they will have my hearty support. If they cannot show a better plan, then, in order to test the question as to whether we should deal with it in the mode Sir John Forrest has suggested, or in the mode I have suggested, I will, later on, take an opportunity of moving my proposal as an amendment on his, so that we may be able to decide between the two proposals as to which we should adopt.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I do not propose to discuss at any length the proposals brought up by the Finance Committee respecting Western Australia, because I have already twice debated them in this Convention, and it would be a waste of time for me to go over the same ground again. However, there are two other proposals before us which demand very close attention at our hands, and which, I think, will be very quickly disposed of if we give them close attention. Therefore I have sought, while Sir George Turner was speaking, to work out a few figures which will indicate the practical effect of those two proposals; and when I have given the figures, I fancy the Convention will see at once that it is impossible for us to accept either the one scheme or the other. Now, to test those schemes, the first thing one has to do is to form some estimate of the probable Customs revenue of New South Wales under any conceivable uniform Tariff, and in order that I might get some basis for that estimate, I have been looking up the Customs revenue of the various colonies derived from wine, spirits, and narcotics as compared with the other Customs revenue. The bulk of the Customs revenue of New South Wales is derived from the duties on wines, spirits, and narcotics.

Mr. BARTON. - Do you take into your calculation both Customs and Excise revenue?

Mr. HOLDER. - Yes, both. In these discussions I do not think it is necessary to use both words-"Customs" and "Excise." We take it for granted that when using the one we mean also the other. The present Customs and Excise revenue of New South Wales is a little under £1,500,000. The greater part of that is derived from duties on those particular goods. Taking the duties in all the colonies, the revenue from wines, spirits, and narcotics is 19s. and some odd pence per head, and on other goods, in round numbers, £1 per head.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - You are not including Western Australia, I suppose?

Mr. HOLDER. - I am taking the average for the five colonies which we hope will be included in the Commonwealth, and, according to the figures, the average for all the colonies is £2 per head; the amount for wines, spirits, and narcotics being, as I have just said, 19s. and some odd pence per head; and on other goods, in round numbers, £1 per head.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - It is £3 10s. per head in Western Australia.

Mr. HOLDER. - Yes, but I am taking the average of the five colonies. In South Australia it is much less, but I think it is better to discuss the general average rather than take any particular state. The point I want to get at is this-taking the general returns of the colonies, the total revenue from Customs and Excise under any conceivable uniform Tariff will be probably just about double what it is from wines, spirits, and narcotics alone. If that is so, it is quite clear that the revenue of New South Wales under the uniform Tariff will be very nearly, if not quite, double what it is at present. Making allowance for present revenue not derived from duties on wines, spirits, and tobacco, we are quite safe in assuming that the additional duties levied in New South Wales, should the uniform Tariff be anything like the average of our present Tariffs, will not be less than £1,000,000 per annum. I have looked at it very carefully. I should have liked to have made it less if I could. I have given an outline of the basis on which I have worked out the figures, and I do not think they can be got away from. If that be so, we have to contemplate again these facts: The present revenue of New South Wales is £1,500,000. Her revenue under a uniform Tariff, under the supposition I have suggested, will be £2,500,000, or a net increase of 662/3 per cent. That is a big item to begin with. We then take the other colonies. Victoria has a revenue of £1,800,000, roughly. Under the new Tariff, if she loses 10 per cent. of that revenue, as probably she would, that means a loss of £180,000.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
It is more than £1,800,000, including Excise. It is £2,200,000 odd.

Mr. HOLDER. -
My difficulty has been that I have not been able to get figures up to the latest dates; nor could I get complete figures for all the colonies for one year. In the papers laid before the Convention at Adelaide, the last year for which the figures are given is 1895.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That was a frightfully bad year for us.

[P.1135] starts here

Mr. HOLDER. -
If I am taking all the colonies for the same year except New South Wales, I am quite right.

Mr. REID. -
It was a bad year all round.

Mr. HOLDER. -
In the case of New South Wales, I had to depart from the year 1895, because her free-trade Tariff was not then in operation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The Dibbs Tariff did not bring in anything like the amount you mention.

Mr. LYNE. -
£2,200,000.

Mr. REID. -
More than that in 1892.

Mr. HOLDER. -
The interjection of my honorable friend (Mr. Lyne) supports my view.

Mr. LYNE. -
In the first year it brought in £2,600,000.

Mr. REID. -
A 10 per cent. Tariff only.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am glad to have that corroboration of my estimates. It shows that they were very fair indeed.

Mr. REID. -
The mean of 1893-4-5, for Victoria, I see, on Customs and Excise was £1,945,000.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Really it does not matter so long as I keep the same proportion in view, and do not jump from one year to another in dealing with a given colony. The figures for South Australia are £500,000; Western Australia, £1,000,000; Tasmania, £350,000. The total from the five colonies would be £6,150,000. The losses from inter-colonial free-trade would be probably in Victoria, £180,000; South Australia, £50,000; Western Australia, £200,000; and Tasmania, £35,000. After allowing for an increase, owing to the items taxable under the uniform Tariff which are not taxed to-day, it leaves the total losses in four colonies at £465,000, but a total gain in New South Wales of £1,000,000, or a net gain on the whole five colonies under the new Tariff of £535,000. Now then, I come to an analysis of the two proposals before us. Sir John Forrest wants to depart from the recommendations of the Finance Committee and to substitute in lieu of it a plan which, in the first place, shall take into account the gain in New South Wales, which the Finance Committee has been leaving out of the reckoning. The effect of bringing into the account the gain of 662/3 per cent. is this, to make, roughly, a net gain for all the colonies of 9 per cent.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Your estimate is very much greater than that of others; you have a very high estimate of gain for New South Wales.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I have given the basis of my calculation, and it is fully corroborated by the interjections.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I have a paper worked out by an actuary, which makes it very different for this year.

Mr. REID. -
The amount is right within about £20,000 or £30,000. I know that from actual facts.

Mr. HOLDER. -

However, the result is that if we bring in New South Wales with her large gain we get a net gain for the whole five colonies of 9 per cent., and, instead of deducting the average loss of the four colonies from the loss of Western Australia, with the view to seeing how much is to be paid to her, that is to say, instead of deducting 11 per cent., which is the average loss of the four colonies from the 25 per cent., and having to make good to Western Australia 14 per cent., we have now, which is what the Finance Committee recommend, to make good to Western Australia the amount which shall raise her gain to the average gain of the five colonies-9 per cent. So that we have to make up to Western Australia 25 per cent-her loss- and 9 per cent. more to bring her up to the average gain.

Mr. REID. -

Let us pass it at once.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Our loss would be 40 per cent.

Mr. REID. -

No wonder you would not vote for that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am giving the figures as shortly as I can, and in such a way as, if possible, to enable honorable members to follow me in the calculations as I go on. I think I am giving no calculation which honorable members cannot follow without the aid of pencil and paper. I have shown that the loss of Western Australia may be set down at 25 per cent.; and, if the general position of the five colonies be, not a loss but a gain of 9 per cent., then to bring the loss of 25 per cent. up to a gain of 9 per cent. -

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

How do you make that out?

Mr. HOLDER. -

We practically come to this: We have to make up to Western Australia, first, her loss of 25 per cent., and then raise her to the 9 per cent. average gain.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

40 per cent. is our loss.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That makes it worse still. We have to bring up Western Australia to 34 per cent. Then there is a further point in the proposal of the right honorable member. He wants not only to bring Western Australia up to the average, but all the colonies below the average up to it. Which are the colonies below the average? Victoria is 10 per cent. below the average; South Australia is 10 per cent. below the average; and Tasmania is 10 per cent. below the average. So that, a present of the 10 per cent. has to be made to each of these colonies which they are below the line, and the 9 per cent. which they ought to be above that. We have to give them 19 per cent. each.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

How does South Australia come out?

Mr. BARTON. -

Who pays the piper?

Mr. HOLDER. -

That is the point I was coming to. Where are we to get there amounts? We have to pay a bonus to Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania, and Western Australia. There is only one possible source from which this money can come, and that is the million which is gained by New South Wales.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Do you think it would stand it? Would the million be enough?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not think I need say any more. I do not think any further figures will be necessary to prove that we cannot possibly accept that scheme. Then I come to the other scheme, that of my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner).

Mr. REID. -

You don't put the matter in a federal spirit at all.

Mr. HOLDER. -

This scheme is worse than the other, because, while Sir John Forrest wants to bring us, wherever we are down below the line, up to the line of average loss, Sir George Turner wants to do more than that; he wants to give us, not an average loss, but something else, which we should have received had our old Tariffs been still in force. To do that, we have to pay to the various colonies the £465,000 loss which I mentioned just now. We have to pay, to Victoria £180,000; South Australia, £50,000 Western Australia, £200,000; and Tasmania, £35,000.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You admit that we are going to make a loss of £180,000 according to your own figures?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not want to go over again matters I discussed on Thursday last and on Monday morning, or else I could answer the interjection.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
How do you know what the Tariff will be?
Mr. HOLDER. -
These figures would not be assumptions but facts if I only knew that. If it is impossible for us to expect New South Wales, out of her £1,000,000, to make up the 19 per cent. and the 34 per cent., which will amount to a little over £300,000; it is still more impossible to expect New South Wales to pay, not £300,000 or £400,000 but £465,000, to the other colonies. I do not think, we really need go any further.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I think we need.
Mr. HOLDER. -
This is not a question of free-trade or protection, or of what New South Wales has done for us in the past or may do for us in the future. It is a question of whether we are likely to federate on a basis that will require New South Wales to pay to all the rest of the colonies the whole cost of federation. Whatever the necessary cost of federation may be-and we will keep it as low as we can-South Australia, and I believe the other colonies, are quite prepared to pay their share, and do not want New South Wales to come in and pay their share for them. There is only one alternative to that, and that is the alternative mentioned by Sir George Turner, that there should be federal authority to pay only the interest on those sums which the other colonies were short. That is, in effect, borrowing the money, for the colonies would have to borrow if the Commonwealth did not, to enable them to pay their way. We have not done that in the past. If now and again there has been a special occasion in one or two colonies to tide over a temporary difficulty by Treasury-bills, those bills have only been issued as a temporary expedient, and have been disposed of in the shortest possible time.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Could this not be considered a temporary expedient to be charged against the states in better days?
Mr. HOLDER. -
That is not what the honorable member suggested.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I have no objection to a modification in that way.
Mr. HOLDER. -
I am entirely opposed to the policy of borrowing money to enable us to pay our way from year to year, and I hope we do not contemplate a Federation, the basis and bed-rock of which is a proposal that money should be borrowed to make good the deficiencies of the states for the first five years. I think neither of the schemes will do; and, much as may be said against the committee's proposal, I hope now that the special case of Western Australia, will be provided for in the way the committee suggest. One word more. It has been suggested to me, and I pass on the suggestion to the Convention, that if Western Australia feels some delicacy, as I quite understand she may, in accepting a proposal which names her by name, and puts her for all time in the Constitution as being a state which needed special terms, we could overcome the difficulty by striking out "Western Australia" in this clause proposed by the committee, and inserting in lieu thereof words to the effect-"any state which loses more than 15 per cent.," which would cover the case of Western Australia, but would not touch any other state. Western Australia would get the benefit that I believe she is fully entitled to, and avoid the unpleasantry of being named specially in the Constitution. I throw out the suggestion, and if the Convention could see its way clear to accept it it may meet all parties, and do what I think is fair and just.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

Ordinary members of the Convention must, I think, feel very much bewildered at the stage we have reached. We have had a proposal from the Finance Committee with regard to Western Australia. From the first moment that the proposal was put before us, there has been a general attack on it, more or less, with suggestions by the very gentlemen who framed it, and the destruction of the clause has been attempted by the very gentlemen for whose benefit it was intended. Now, it is very clear to me that if the clause is not carried as the Finance Committee completed it, the whole thing must go by the board. We started a debate on the question of the peculiar position of Western Australia; and where are we drifting? We have had a proposal-which, I put first after that of the Finance Committee-from Sir George Turner, who would practically put the bulk of this loss on one colony. We have then a proposal from Sir John Forrest, which is a sort of Chinese puzzle. I worked out figures very similar to those of my friend (Mr. Holder), and the whole thing is impossible except on the basis from which we started. Then, another element has been introduced in a proposal to make up for the possible losses of some of the colonies in this federal financial arrangement. That proposal is made to help those in their exigencies, and goes back over the whole of this financial debate. So far as I can perceive the opinion of the Convention, there is no chance of that proposal of the Finance Committee being accepted.
Mr. FRASER. -
Oh, I hope so; what better proposal is there?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Well, if it is going to be accepted, it is a very roundabout way of getting at it. The whole original plan, which was intended for the peculiar exigencies of Western Australia, is now being turned into an attempt to meet the losses of all the states at the expense of one.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
That has not been carried yet.

Mr. REID. -
If the other proposals are negatived, the proposal of the Finance Committee will come up then.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I quite understand that; but, at the same time, the tenor of the debate has shown very clearly that the other colonies feel that there is a certain amount of injustice in the same arrangement not being extended to them as has been extended to Western Australia. But, at any rate, as I said when I started, the whole matter has been pretty well thrashed out. It has been proved that the two schemes proposed are absolutely unworkable. There is no doubt that, whether you put this as a charge on the general revenue of the Commonwealth, or whether you make it a per capita distribution, New South Wales will have to pay a large charge of at least £200,000 to assist the other colonies.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We will lose that much ourselves in Western Australia.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
That may be, under one of the proposals, but under almost any proposal New South Wales, putting aside her proper share of the losses of Western Australia, will probably have to pay a sum of, at any rate, £250,000 in order to bring about the suggested arrangement.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You will have our trade and open ports.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
That payment in scarcely likely to be conceded by New South Wales. It seems to me that it would be better as soon as possible to get back to the original proposal, and to debate it on its merits, in view of the peculiar position of Western Australia.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I am sure we were all very glad to hear the lucid statement of Mr. Holder, but I should like to put one phase of the question in order to elicit from him his opinion as to a matter that is troubling my mind. Under the Finance Committee's scheme the proposal is, assuming the uniform duties are not put on for two years, that, commencing with the third year and ending with the seventh year of federation, special treatment shall be given to Western Australia. Assuming also, as I think we may, that in the fourth or fifth year of federation the population of Western Australia will be vastly increased, would it not be possible under this scheme that Western Australia would receive more money under the uniform Customs Tariff than she is getting to-day, and yet be entitled to a considerable amount of money from the other states?

Mr. KINGSTON. - How?

Mr. ISAACS. - She is getting to-day in customs duties £1,100,000. With an increased population she might, under the uniform Tariff, get £1,200,000. If you take the actual goods imported, and calculate the revenue on the basis of the actual state Tariff, that might bring the amount up to a hypothetical £1,500,000. Instead of £100,000 she would then get £300,000.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). - The answer to the honorable member's question is this: That the scheme is so framed as to work automatically. Should the population or the imports increase, then the sum to which Western Australia would be entitled would increase. Should there be a decrease in population and imports, then the sum to which Western Australia would be entitled would decrease proportionately.

Mr. ISAACS. - The position I put is possible.

Mr. HOLDER. - It is possible.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). - The amendment I have submitted does not meet with favour, and I therefore ask leave to withdraw it. The proposal made by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner has more to recommend it than my honorable friend (Mr. Holder) will admit. He assumes that the Federal Tariff will be so framed that losses will be incurred by all the states. We need not assume that. If we get a genius, such as was described by the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, as Treasurer of the Commonwealth, perhaps a Tariff may be adopted that will give to all the states as much, it may be even more, revenue than they receive at the present time. The fear has been expressed all through the discussion, and especially by those who have the conduct of the finances of... the various colonies, that the state Treasuries may be so depleted of revenue that the states may have some difficulty in meeting their obligations. Sir George Turner's proposal is not new. It was proposed before. I think it was in one of the provisions we passed in Adelaide or Sydney. At any rate, it was proposed that the return to the various Treasurers should not be less than a certain amount.

Mr. HOLDER. -

In the aggregate. That made all the difference.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes, but there were many who thought that the word "aggregate" should be left out. The position is not an unreasonable one for the various states to take up. This arrangement is not to continue for all time. It is only to continue for five years after the imposition of the uniform duties, and even if the Commonwealth did make a loss-a contingency which we need not contemplate-it would not be a very serious matter. The Commonwealth could find the small amount required in order to recoup the state Treasuries. It may be asked-where is the money to come from? I dispute the statement that New South Wales would have to find it all. We in Western Australia do not want anything from New South Wales. We can look after ourselves.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If the word "aggregate" were left out, New South Wales would have to pay it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We do not want New South Wales to pay it.

Mr. HOLDER. -

 Somebody must pay it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

There are ways of finding the money without asking New South Wales to provide it. The Commonwealth will have sources of revenue other than the Customs.

Mr. SYMON. -

What are they?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I hope the Commonwealth will have a large area of land surrounding the federal capital, and an immense amount of revenue will be derived-I will not venture to say how much, but certainly more than will ever be required to meet the demands of the states-by the sale of that land.

Mr. WALKER. -

Where is the capital to be?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not know, but I hope a site will be selected outside of any existing city or town, so that we may lay out as the federal capital a city that will be worthy of the great Australian nation of the future. An immense amount of revenue will be derived from that source.

Mr. SYMON. -

You would not ask the Commonwealth to sell its patrimony for any such purpose as that?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then of course the Commonwealth would have power to raise money for the purpose. I notice the horror with which some honorable members view the fact that we borrow money to carry on our local Governments, but I know that that has been done time after time on this continent, and that it is being done how. How are the deficiencies that exist provided for? They have been provided for by borrowed money, whether in the form of Treasury-bills or otherwise, and the same thing can be done again.

Mr. FRASER. -

That is only discounting the future a little bit.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is all we want you to do now. At any rate, I see no great harm in leaving it for the first five years to the Federal Parliament to make good to the state Treasurers this small sum. If it is well arranged, I do not think it will be much. Whether it is small or great, I should throw the responsibility upon the Federal Parliament of providing the money. If the worst came to the worst, they could borrow it, and make the interest a charge upon the Federal Government. I very much prefer the plan suggested by Sir George Turner to any other that has been submitted. It is simple and easily understood, and it will place the state Treasurers in a position in which they will know that they will get as much during the first five years after the uniform Tariff as they would have obtained if they had remained under their own Tariff. That, it seems to me, is a reasonable proposal, and it would give great confidence to the various states. I beg now to ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question before the committee now is the proposal of the Finance Committee.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I shall submit my amendment in order that it may be discussed. I beg to move the omission of all the words after "showing," with a view to the substitution of the following:
I. The amount which, under the law of the state in force immediately before the imposition of uniform duties, would have been collected from duties of customs and of excise upon the goods actually imported into and the goods produced or manufactured in that state.

II. The amount collected and taken to have been collected in that state from duties of customs and of excise.

The latter amount shall be deducted from the former amount, and the balance (if any) shall be taken to be the net loss of the state for that year, by reason of the imposition of uniform duties of customs and of excise, and by reason of the operation of free trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth.

The Commonwealth shall pay to each state the amount of its net loss.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

It seems to me that no one has so far said anything in favour of the proposal of the Finance Committee in this connexion. I think that the remarks of the honorable member (Mr. Holder) have pretty well cleared the ground to give an opportunity for showing that the proposal of Sir George Turner will not be acceptable to the Convention. I now propose to say a few words in favour of the recommendation of the Finance Committee.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Hear, hear; tell us what it is going to cost.

Mr. WALKER. -

I presume that we all agree that, even if we have to pay for it, we must have Western Australia in the Federation.

Mr. SYMON. -

Not if we have to pay for it.

Mr. WALKER. -

I shall not enlarge upon the subject at the present moment except to show that there are certain alternatives which we must face if we do not accept the recommendation of the Finance Committee. In the first place, we might forego intercolonial free-trade for a period of years so far as Western Australia is concerned. That is an alternative which may be more welcome to honorable members than the proposal of the Finance Committee. The second alternative is the imposition of a Federal Tariff large enough to enable Western Australia and Tasmania to receive amounts equal to those which are now received from their present Tariffs. That would mean that the Federal Government would have to impose a Tariff heavy enough to produce something like £8,000,000 of revenue. The third alternative is that Western Australia will not come into the Commonwealth.
Federation. Now, we must look upon the present situation of affairs much as if we were entering into a partnership. We are acquiring a certain goodwill, and we must be, prepared, if need be, to pay something for it in the interests of all. Victoria, South Australia, and, in a less degree, New South Wales, have all had a valuable market in Western Australia, and it would be of great advantage to the people of these colonies to have a practical knowledge of this market.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

What are we going to pay for it?

Mr. WALKER. -

According to the figures which were put before the Finance Committee, Western Australia will lose something like £380,000 a year if her present Customs Tariff is discontinued. We have heard from other sources that these figures, like a great many of the statistics which have recently been prepared for us, are not quite reliable. We have no guarantee that those who prepared the information for the Western Australian Government really knew if the imports from the other colonies were in all cases the products of those colonies, or products of foreign countries re-exported. The honorable member (Mr. Holder) mentioned that on one occasion in South Australia something like £74,000 was paid as drawback upon goods re-exported to Western Australia. I would also point out that, as the Commonwealth Parliament will probably impose duties upon articles not now bearing duties in Western Australia—sugar and tea, for example—the extra revenue thus derived will materially reduce the loss I have mentioned. The probability is—and I think the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) is much of the same opinion as I am in regard to this matter—that probably £200,000 would more nearly represent the loss which Western Australia will suffer if intercolonial free-trade is brought about. As a representative of New South Wales, I do not think that colony would grudge having to pay one-third of that amount—that is, a little over £60,000 a year—for the great advantage of absolute intercolonial free-trade.

Mr. HOLDER. -

But even if Western Australia lost £200,000, that would not be her loss in excess of the general average loss of the colonies.

Mr. WALKER. -

No. That is a point which I have omitted to mention, and I am glad that the honorable member has drawn my attention to it. You must subtract from the amount I have mentioned the average loss of the other colonies, so that the probability is that the amount which will have to be paid to Western Australia will not exceed £150,000. I think that the advantage of free trade with that colony would not be dearly purchased by the expenditure of £150,000 a year for five years. The discussion which we have heard only goes to confirm me in the opinion that after the accomplishment of federation it will not belong before the Commonwealth Government and the various states Governments see the desirability of federating the railways and the public debts of the colonies. When that is done I think the saving which will be effected will more than counterbalance any expense which federation would otherwise entail. It seems to me that we are now dealing with a very important part of the Constitution, and the members of the Finance Committee need not be ashamed, I think, of the manner in which their scheme has been received. I trust that our little work will be crowned by its acceptance by the Convention, and that a large majority of honorable members will agree to our proposal in regard to the colony of Western Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

If the estimate of the honorable member (Mr. Walker) is correct, and the price which the other colonies will have to pay to Western Australia for free trade with her will be £150,000-an estimate which appears to me a very moderate one—it is possible, and, indeed, highly probable, that, while only that sum will be required for the first year, the payments will be much larger during the following years. To my mind, the prospects of Western Australia are in a high degree promising, and I am of opinion that her prosperity is not about to cease. While it is proposed that the loss of the colony shall be calculated at the rates of her present Tariff as applied to her importations from year to year, the fact has been lost sight of that as her population and her prosperity increase the amount of her importations will increase, and there will be this additional inducement for an increase, that the sweeping away of intercolonial duties will also tend to bring about a larger consumption. So that, while the amount of £150,000 may correctly represent her loss upon this calculation for the first year, it will by no means adequately represent the amount which will have to be paid during, say, the fourth and fifth years of the arrangement.

Mr. WALKER. -

Are the other colonies going to stand still all the time?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is immaterial to my argument. I am speaking only of the sum which will have to be paid by the other colonies to Western Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -

The calculation ought to be based upon the present importations of Western Australia.
Mr. DEAKIN.-

I am only discussing the proposal of the Finance Committee and am drawing attention to a matter which has not been referred to. The honorable member (Mr. Walker) spoke of what be termed a first alternative to the proposal of the Finance Committee—that Western Australia should retain for five years her present Tariff, and, though a member of the Federation in other respects, should continue to levy and collect customs duties upon all importations during that time. Naturally there is something in the proposal which is, at first sight, repugnant to those who have seen in the early acceptance of a uniform Tariff one of the greatest advantages offered by federation. We have, however, already commenced to whittle away the advantages of intercolonial free-trade in no inconsiderable degree by the vexatious bookkeeping system, of which the honorable member is so ardent an advocate. If we are, therefore, to refuse ourselves the advantages of complete intercolonial free-trade during a period of five years, is it not a proposition worthy of consideration whether Western Australia should be allowed to retain her power of levying customs, instead of having her possible loss under a uniform Tariff made good by the other colonies? Or, if a uniform Tariff were imposed, it might be possible to allow higher duties to be levied upon certain specified articles, such as narcotics and stimulants, in Western Australia, the extra amount of revenue so raised to be paid to the credit of that state. This question of Western Australia, and of possible Tariff differences, can be more easily considered there than in the case of any other state except Tasmania. Western Australia is separated from us even more than Tasmania is by the sea, on account of the great distance between her nearest settled districts and the settled districts of South Australia, consequently it is not to be feared that any differential duties to be imposed in that colony would lead to the loss of revenue by the surreptitious introduction of goods from other colonies. We are, therefore, able to consider her case exceptionally, with regard to the Tariff. Before we add to the burdens which the states have to carry under this Bill, the possibility of a loss, which Mr. Holder has held out before as this evening, perhaps too definitely; the probability of the states having to contract additional losses by making contributions to a portion of the Commonwealth which does not contribute to our losses—it might be well to consider whether for a period of five years—a long independent Tariff treatment for a period of five years so far as Western Australia is concerned. I believe that is worthy of careful deliberation before we adopt the proposal now before us. The amount to be contributed has been calculated by an honorable member at £150,000.
That, however, will undoubtedly be raised by the calculations of our opponents to more than double.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

What would you do about the transferred services of Western Australia, such as the Post and Telegraph department, in the event of your suggestion being accepted?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I should require to look at the figures before giving a precise answer on that point. I understand that the other services of Western Australia which would be transferred are now carried on at a loss. There might be no objection to taking over those services if it was desired by the colony and was agreed to by the other members of the Commonwealth.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

The services of Western Australia are not carried on at a loss.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

In that case I was under a misapprehension, but the latest figures submitted to the Convention will enable us to deal with that subject. In either case I do not look upon the difficulties as insuperable. However reluctant we may be to allow a differential Tariff over a period of five years, that would be better than to plunge into the unknown with the risk of having any provision inserted, the financial results of which might be consistently misinterpreted without our being afforded an opportunity of giving more than a conjectural reply.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

Would it not be better to postpone the consideration of this clause until we dispose of the other financial clauses?

Mr. FRASER. -

We had better fight it out.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It is a very serious matter for us to carry the proposal now before us. I am ready to do anything in the cause of federation, and in order to save time-I speak with a certain amount of diffidence-it does seem to me that in view of the varied opinions that have been expressed to-night, and the very serious character of the proposal, which has not been championed by the members of the Finance Committee as completely as might have been expected, it would be better to postpone the further consideration of the clause until we have dealt with the other financial clauses. It is possible that there may be some proposal made which will be satisfactory, and, if not, we can go back to the proposal now before us.
An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

There are no other important financial clauses to deal with.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Yes, we have to deal with the debts, which will involve a long debate. It is certain that we are now in the last stage of our labours, and it is not likely that what we do now will be reconsidered. I take it for granted that what we do now with regard to the financial clauses will be final, and I would again urge that this clause be postponed until we deal with the other financial clauses. It must be recollected that we came here to-night with one simple issue before us, but there has been a debate which has taken a very wide range, dealing with all the difficulties connected with the subject. Another thing we must recollect is that this is the first new proposal of a drastic character on the top of the proposals which we had at the previous sittings of the Convention. I believe it would save time, and, at any rate, it will save us from coming to a hasty vote on a matter which may be of vital consideration, if we postpone going to a division on the subject. If Sir George Turner would withdraw his amendment, the consideration of the clause might afterwards be postponed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

If there is any desire to postpone the consideration of the clause, I have no wish to stand in the way, and I shall be willing to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DOBSON. -

We cannot settle the question to-night.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I think the suggestion of the honorable member (Mr. MCMILLAN) is well worthy of acceptance. Mr. Deakin has made a suggestion which I think ought to be taken into consideration. It is impossible to finish this discussion to-night, and I think it was only intended to sit half-an-hour longer than the present hour. I therefore think the best course will be to postpone the discussion.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The next two clauses are not important, and we might deal with them, as they will not take much time.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If they are not important they will not take much time to-morrow. I beg to move, sir, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at ten o'clock p.m.
Friday, 18th February, 1898.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-four minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITION.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia) presented a petition from the Western Australian Christian Endeavour Union, praying that the Convention would introduce into the Federal Constitution a clause recognising Almighty God as the Supreme Ruler of the Universe.

The petition was received and read.

FEDERAL FINANCE.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I desire to lay on the table a return in substitution for the return I laid on the table, and which was ordered to be printed, on the 10th February, 1898. I also beg to move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF AMENDMENTS.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

May I suggest for the consideration of the leader of the Convention that, at the earliest opportunity at which it can possibly be conveniently managed, we might be able to have, before we enter on the reconsideration of clauses, either an entirely or a partially reprinted Bill, seeing that a great many of the clauses have been altered and rearranged?

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

Before the leader of the Convention replies to that question, I would like to suggest that prior to a reprint of the Bill being made—and I think it is very necessary that there should be a reprint—it would be exceedingly advisable to insert the drafting amendments, and also that we might follow the practice pursued in New South Wales of putting the drafting amendments in the Bill in globo, by a suspension of the standing orders.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think that the suggestions that have just been made are worthy of consideration. I think that perhaps it would be an advisable thing that, as soon as the new clauses have been considered, there should be, before the reconsideration or recommittal stage, a formal recommittal of the Bill for the purpose of authorizing the Drafting Committee to insert drafting amendments in the print of the Bill, so that honorable members may see them in print. That will be a desirable thing, for the purpose of enabling honorable members to see in what way it is proposed to deal with the drafting of clauses. That, of course, would not be final; the recommittal stage would come afterwards.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
It would be well to clearly show the alterations by using different type.

Mr. BARTON. -
I would show the matter inserted in black type, and what has been taken out in type crossed by erasure marks. If that is done I think it will be convenient to every honorable member. It would be perfectly understood that there would be no finality at that stage, as before we finally conclude our labours there will be necessity for a short adjournment, to enable the Drafting Committee to recast that part of the work, having regard to amendments made by honorable members. If the suggestions find favour with the Convention, as I think they ought, I will be prepared to adopt them.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I do not know whether the proposals of the leader of the Convention mean that the drafting amendments will be made before we have an opportunity of looking at the amendments. I would suggest that the drafting amendments should be printed in the method described by Mr. Barton, so that every honorable member can see them, and the effect of them, but that they should not be formally moved into the Bill until honorable members have an opportunity, if they see anything that in their opinion requires alteration, of conferring with the Drafting Committee. I think the adoption of that plan might save further alterations. I suggest that the proposed drafting amendments should be distributed in the method described, picked out in different type, and before the Drafting Committee formally move them into the Bill, because it might be that some honorable members would be able to bring some things under the notice of the Drafting Committee before the amendments are passed, so as to save any necessity for further amendments.

Mr. BARTON. -
The drafting amendments will be formally passed on the understanding that there will, be no finality at that stage,

Mr. REID. -
I think they should be first distributed before they are formally passed.

Mr. BARTON. -
That shall be done.

Mr. REID. -
It is our duty to assist the Drafting Committee in the most difficult and responsible task which they have to perform, and when the drafting amendments have been distributed, honorable members might suggest to the Drafting Committee anything they think worthy of consideration. That will enable the Drafting Committee to move their amendments into the Bill with the more confidence.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I shall adopt that suggestion of Mr. Reid also. I shall see that the drafting amendments so far put into shape by the Drafting Committee are handed round before the reprint of the Bill spoken of is issued. There are a great number of those amendments. Honorable members have understood me, from time to time, to appeal to the Convention for any assistance or suggestion in the work of the Drafting Committee, and I have only to repeat now that any such assistance will be welcome.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on Mr. Barton's proposal for the insertion of new clause 93B (see page 1122), and of Sir George Turner's amendment (see page 1140).

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

Before the clause that we were discussing last night is withdrawn or postponed, I should like to crave the indulgence of the committee while I say a few words. I must confess to a certain amount of embarrassment yesterday evening. I did intend to say something in the earlier part of the debate, but we were so bombarded by a perfect tornado of suggestions from the Finance Committee itself, that certainly the whole course of the stream was altered. Now, I only rise particularly to make one or two suggestions which can be taken into consideration afterwards, but I might, for one moment, bring the committee back exactly to the position from which we started. I take it that we are all agreed that this debate implies some special arrangement for Western Australia, in order to do justice to that colony in its peculiar circumstances. I take that as the position which we all agree to, and that we are willing to entertain any reasonable proposal, so long as it will not be fatal to federation, because I think it would be better that Western Australia should be left out of the Federation for the present than that anything should be done that would endanger the scheme as a whole. Now, after all, why is it that we are giving certain consideration to Western Australia? It is because there is a large volume of colonial imports into that colony—exports from the other colonies—the duties on which Western Australia would lose, and because we think that the doing away with all imposts on our borders intercolonially is an enormous advantage to the other colonies. Now, what colonies will gain by that process? Certainly the colonies that export to Western Australia. And before we go into any scheme, it is well to see what is the bed-rock of justice in this matter. I do not mean to say, for one moment, that, in dealing with this Constitution broadly, we have a right to look at everything from the point of view of the absolute sense of justice or scientific proportion, but it is just as well to get at that first, and then reason from it. Now, if in the scheme that was proposed by the Finance Committee they wanted an absolutely just and scientific adjustment, it would have been of this kind—that the loss of Western Australia should be made up exactly in proportion to the exports of the different colonies to Western Australia. That is the bed-rock justice of the thing. On the other hand—and I am only now speaking in the most tentative way, with a view to the Finance Committee and others considering the question—this scientific arrangement might cause a great deal of friction and unpleasantness.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The Finance Committee had that suggestion before them.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I did not know that. If we cannot arrange matters scientifically we may sometimes do it by a rough-and-ready method. What we want in most of these financial arrangements is to get at certainty with regard to the state Treasuries, and really it seems to me—although I do not put the view as one that can be entertained, because I recognise that it is open to grave objections, as almost every view is that it would be better almost to fix upon a sum, say, £150,000 a year if you like, although I know very well that it may be only £5. We have had figures put before us by the Hon. Mr. Holder which are approximately correct. We owe a debt of gratitude to him for the great care he has taken, and the grasp he has shown of all the principal factors in this financial problem all through these debates. I say again that sometimes a rough-and-ready method may be adopted. So far as I am concerned, and I have no right to speak for my own colony excepting personally, I should be quite willing to agree to a specific sum being distributed per capita. That would not be fair, in one sense, but in the case of Tasmania, where the finances are worked on a very close margin, and where, without any disrespect to that colony, it is very difficult to make elastic the sources of revenue, it would fall very lightly on a per capita basis. Then we have the proposal of my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin), which is very well worthy of consideration. I happened to be out of the chamber during the earlier part of his speech, but I understand he proposed that the Federal Parliament should put some extra duties on certain special articles, and that Western Australia should derive the benefit of those extra duties.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Duties in Western Australia.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

There is that proposal; and there is another possible plan, if no other means are open to us, that of keeping on the intercolonial Tariff with Western Australia during the first five years.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I mentioned that as an alternative.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The advantage we would derive from the fixing of a specific sum is this, that we would be able to tell all Australia that every barrier to trade within the colonies was removed. I hope honorable members will not think I wanted to delay the discussion. I have simply stated my views very shortly. Of the imports into Western Australia, New South Wales only contributes a very small proportion. Perhaps the Right Hon. Mr. Reid will tell me what that proportion is?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is rapidly increasing.

Mr. REID. -

It is not much at present, suppose about one-eighth, but it is rapidly increasing.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

With all the enterprise of our people, we are at a disadvantage. There is Tasmania with all As great production, and its facilities for production, and then there is Victoria. It will clearly be seen that in almost any proposal that is not based upon a distribution according to the exports of that colony, New South Wales would have to pay a very large sum for the sake of federation. My reason for asking for an adjournment was that, in the light of this criticism, the whole matter might be considered between this and the completion of the other financial clauses. I do not think there will be any great difficulty over the question of debts, because that is not a matter that affects one colony as against another. If this question can be settled on an equitable basis it will practically close the whole of our financial troubles, and certainly it has in it ingredients of trouble, which, although every other portion of our financial work might be right, might become a source of irritation, and create a difficulty to many of us in placing the Constitution before our respective colonies. I throw out these suggestions for what they are worth, and I trust that some satisfactory solution of this problem will be found.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I rise, not to detain the committee, but to put forward an amendment which would be quite acceptable to myself, although it varies in one important particular the proposal that was submitted in a crude way yesterday evening. I will read it now as a proposition that is worthy of the consideration of the Convention, either in this or in an altered form. It takes the shape of a new clause, and is as follows:-

To compensate the Treasury of the state of Western Australia for any diminution of revenue which might be caused by the imposition of uniform duties of customs, or by the operation of free trade and intercourse among the several states, the Commonwealth may, on the imposition of such uniform duties, and for five years afterwards, impose and collect on the articles, and to the extent agreed on between the Commonwealth and that state, further duties of customs in respect of goods originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth and entering that state.

The proposal I submitted yesterday has been altered by a limitation of the additional duties. As first made it embraced all duties, including the intercolonial.

Mr. SYMON. -

Is it limited to goods imported from abroad?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, that is the important addition—a very valuable addition, of course, from the point of view of the other colonies, but a serious addition from the point of view of Western Australia.

Mr. JAMES. -

It might increase our loss and increase your gain.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Duties are taken off certain goods that you import.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

And our markets would be open to you.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, the duties are taken off goods coming from the other colonies, and put on goods coming from abroad. I put this suggestion before the Convention. Of course the representatives of Western Australia will indicate whether this addition to the proposal as originally made is an obstacle from their point of view, and to what extent it is an obstacle.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
This matter of continuing the intercolonial duties so far as Western Australia is concerned was fully considered by the Finance Committee. We saw that if such an arrangement were made, the same concession would be demanded by other colonies with regard to certain duties which, in their opinion, ought to be continued in the interests of the producers. In order not to give rise to such a claim, we had to abandon further consideration of that proposal. My honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) now makes a proposal which I am afraid cannot be accepted. He says that Western Australia is to allow intercolonial goods to be admitted free. She will, therefore, lose a certain amount of revenue. The uniform Tariff may make up a portion of that loss, but Western Australia is to have an increased Tariff on goods coming from abroad, for the purpose of enabling her to get an extra revenue. Many persons in Western Australia will say to this—"If you are going to subject us to an increased Tariff, and we have to pay the extra duties out of our own pockets, we will not federate." There is also this consideration, that when a duty is raised beyond a certain amount the less money you collect by means of it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

In some cases.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

In many cases. Where they are mere revenue duties, if you sufficiently increase them you also increase the price to the consumers—that is, where, the articles cannot be produced in the colony itself. Supposing that the Federal Parliament put a duty of 3d. a pound on tea, and for the purpose of assisting Western Australia said that in that colony that duty should be 6d. a pound, the consumers would pay the extra 3d.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The consumers would save £389,000 in intercolonial duties.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

To some extent they would.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It is purely a Treasury matter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I believe that the bulk of the people who consume the goods would pay exactly the same price for them. It would be no benefit to them, but it would be a benefit to those who buy in large quantities.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Then, if there were 100 per cent. on an article, and you took it off, it would make no difference.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The honorable member wants to reduce the thing to an absurdity.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Does not the right honorable member see that prices must come down by competition?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is all very well to say they must, but they very often do not.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Our experience is that they do not. I should be glad to adopt this proposal if it were feasible, but there are objections to it which must be considered. If you put on extra duties as revenue duties the people will have to pay them, and when you tell the people that they will have to pay something extra, you may make up your mind that they will have nothing to do with federation. In endeavouring to frame a Constitution we must look at these matters from a practical point of view. It has been our experience in our own colony that when you largely increase certain duties you diminish the revenue obtained from them. The same thing will happen to Western Australia. Instead of this proposal being a benefit to them, it might simply cause a further loss.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I am sure that all my colleagues must feel grateful to my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) for the proposal he has made, and which he, I suppose, considers to be in our interests. I regret to say that I cannot view it with favour. The honorable member, quite innocently of course, protects the producing colonies by providing that our ports shall be free, but he does not make any provision whatever to meet the difficulty that we fear. It reminds me of another suggestion that has been made recently, that, although we will lose a certain amount of revenue, the money will remain in the pockets of our people, and we can make up the loss by some other form of taxation. Mr. Deakin proposes that we should recoup ourselves by increasing the customs duties on goods of foreign manufacture. I may point out that such goods are subject to very high duties at the present time. Intoxicants and narcotics are taxed to as great, if not a greater, extent in Western Australia than in any other colony.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

To a greater extent, so far as liquor is concerned.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

What is the extent?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Sixteen shillings a gallon; and it would be difficult to further tax such commodities. The proposal now made is impracticable, and would be of no use whatever to Western Australia. I would suggest, as a means of getting rid of the difficulty, and also with a view of not treating Western Australia in this Bill exceptionally, that the proposal of Sir George Turner should be adopted with the alteration, that in the event of the uniform Tariff producing to a colony a greater amount than was produced by the Tariff of the colony before the introduction of the uniform Tariff, all contributions shall cease—that the contributions shall only remain in case the uniform Tariff fails to produce as much as the state Tariff did previously. That would be a simple plan. It might result, and I think it probably would, in nothing being contributed at all.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Is not that the proposal of the Finance Committee?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
To a very great extent it is.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
This proposal is general. Every colony would be secured in an amount equal to the amount received when the uniform duties were introduced. We all look forward—at any rate, I do in my own colony—to a large increase of trade and business, and therefore I believe the uniform Tariff will probably yield a larger amount than is produced at the present time in Western Australia. That same remark applies to every other colony. But it would be a great assistance to the passage of this Bill if the Treasurers of the colonies were able to say to their people—"At any rate, under the uniform Tariff, for five years, you would be assured of as much revenue from the Customs as you were receiving when the uniform Tariff was introduced."

If that idea meets with any favour from honorable members, it would be a fair compromise, and a fair way of dealing with the matter. In fact, I do not think it looks well at all to introduce into a great State document, such as we are trying to produce, a clause giving different treatment to one part of the Commonwealth as distinguished from another part. No one can say that my proposal is unreasonable. It would only go so far as to provide that Western Australia should be assured that for five years she would have as much revenue from the Customs as she had when the uniform Tariff was introduced.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
This is a matter which so greatly concerns Western Australia that I had no hesitation in feeling we were all desirous of hearing the views of Sir John Forrest on the proposal now before the committee. We must all feel that Mr. Deakin's amendment has gone. It is impossible, as Sir George Turner pointed out, that the people of Western Australia would be likely to accept a Constitution under which they were likely to be taxed double, it might be, the amount which people of the other colonies are taxed on their tea, sugar, or imported machinery—that in Western Australia increased taxation should be imposed, from which the other colonies are free. Then, it would have the effect of creating, in Western Australia, a discriminating Tariff, not only against foreign nations, as ordinarily understood, but against England. We do not know on what articles these additional duties might be imposed, and the result would be that we should have very great difficulty, from a financial and economic point of view, staring us in the face. In addition to all this, further complications and difficulties would be occasioned by the possibility of goods on which taxation was levied being imported into other colonies, and thence, under the free intercolonial system, into Western Australia. To prevent that, there would be required a system of bookkeeping and an espionage which would create difficulty and irritation. I think, however, as Sir George Turner and Sir John Forrest have dealt with this amendment effectually, it is unnecessary to say more on the subject, except that we are all indebted to Mr. Deakin, I am sure, for having evolved a suggestion which, if not open to the objections I have mentioned, would have afforded a way out of a very serious difficulty.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Mr. Walker made a similar suggestion last night.

Mr. SYMON. -

I did not hear Mr. Walker make the suggestion. As to Sir George Turner's amendment, the fatal objection to my mind appears to be that there is no proper legitimate source from which this money would come to compensate the various colonies sustaining loss. It has been pointed out that if the Customs revenue were to be the source, the money would, of course, primarily come from New South Wales. The figures dealt with so ably and lucidly by Mr. Holder have satisfactorily and once for all established that fact. Sir George Turner says-"I don't want this money to come out of New South Wales." But all the colonies except New South Wales will be losing colonies, and, without so providing in the Constitution, Sir George Turner suggests that the money must come either from borrowed money or out of extra taxation, or, as Sir John Forrest says, out of the proceeds of Commonwealth lands within the federal territory.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Or the Federal Tariff being so framed as not to make a loss to any of the colonies.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend shrinks from putting any one of these suggestions into the amendment; and I invite him to do so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You want to trust the Federal Parliament. Always do that when you are in a hole.

Mr. SYMON. -
I say trust the Federal Parliament altogether, all in all or not at all, in the matter. My honorable friend says on the one hand we should trust the Federal Parliament, and the next moment he expresses mistrust. The suggestion now before the committee means that we are placing on the face of the Constitution a declaration with which Mr. Reid is to go to New South Wales, to the effect that there is to be a very high Tariff indeed. If Mr. Reid is willing to do that I do not think any of us, free-traders or protectionists, need complain. But I apprehend that Mr. Reid is not willing to do that. As to the suggestion about borrowing money in order to make good the contributions of the states, I do not think any man in the Convention would tolerate that for a moment. Whatever the exigencies of local finance may be, and whatever the peculiarities of administration under necessity may be, still we do not flaunt-I say "we," but I do not think the Treasurer of South Australia has ever flaunted in the eyes of the people, or in the eyes of the British community, that our colony was using borrowed money to pay ordinary expenditure.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The states would have to borrow to make up their deficits, so it is as bad one way as the other.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
They have always done it.

Mr. SYMON. -
I believe those difficulties are greatly exaggerated. My own belief is that, with the impetus that will be given to the business prospects after federation, and with the adjustment of a wise uniform Tariff, we shall find little financial difficulty indeed. It would be really a mere bagatelle. We are magnifying mole-hills into mountains.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
There will be the increase of population.

Mr. SYMON. -
And there will be the increase of population. As has been said, if you have a very high Tariff you reduce your revenue; but if you have a high, but an adequate, fair, and just revenue Tariff—which we all admit must come—the losses to the states will be very considerably minimized from what we believe they might otherwise be. The fatal objection to the amendment before the committee is that there is no source from which this money can legitimately come, except out of the pocket of the people of New South Wales. I thoroughly agree with what Mr. Holder has said, and I hope the amendment, if a division is taken, will be rejected.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -
I rise to support the proposal of Mr. McMillan that the further consideration of this subject should be delayed. I think we might yet find some way out of the difficulty if the Finance Committee were again to meet with our friends from Western Australia. It is a wise suggestion that, instead of subjecting ourselves to a great deal more discussion at the table here—which, I think, is not likely to lead to the result we all wish—we might, perhaps, in committee again consider a proposal, or one or more proposals, which have not had serious consideration given to them by the committee, and which, under the special circumstances that have now arisen, might be found acceptable.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
What is the use of the committee doing that, and turning round and reversing their proposals next day?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
It must not be forgotten that the committee were cornered on an important proposal of the kind. The members of the committee agreed to the proposal, because they saw no other way out for Western Australia.

Mr. SOLOMON. - Precisely.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
And the extreme solicitude of the Finance Committee, joined to the extreme solicitude of the Convention, to draw our friends from Western Australia into the Federation, leads us to desire to meet them in every possible way.

Mr. JAMES. -
Why not give us the customs duties for ten years?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
I will address myself to that presently. I presume the Convention desires to do everything which is fair to every state. It is admitted that Western Australia occupies a very exceptional position. The bare fact of her collecting over 35 per cent. of her present customs duties on intercolonial products, and the fact that she cannot afford to lose this revenue of £380,000 immediately, point to the necessity for something being done. If we have arrived at a conclusion which is shown to be detrimental to New South Wales—in which view I do not concur—and if that conclusion is not acceptable to that colony, then, as New South Wales, as usual, dominates the Convention to a certain extent financially, we must think of some other plan. The suggestion, or amendment, of Mr. Deakin is one which that gentleman will surely see is hardly likely to be accepted by Western Australia. I concur most fully in the conclusion arrived at by Sir George Turner, that the higher the rates of duty, the less would be the revenue collected. We should not, by giving to Western Australia the opportunity of collecting a higher rate of duty than the uniform Tariff would give on the various foreign products, relieve that colony from the financial difficulty in which she finds herself.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Well, the amendment can be further adapted.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I am going to suggest another alternative. The suggestion made that Western Australia would have the option of collecting higher duties on foreign imports, is not likely to give them the revenue they need. But it has been suggested-and I regret there almost seems to be, in some minds, treason in the suggestion-that Western Australia should, at any rate for five years to come, in connexion with the collection of her customs duties, have a decreasing or sliding scale on intercolonial products. I know it has been regarded as almost treason against the Constitution that we should within the compact for a uniform Tariff think of one colony which does not give thorough intercolonial free-trade.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Would you extend the same privilege to Victoria?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

We have not the absolute necessity in the case of Victoria that we have in the case of Western Australia. But if we give this right to Western Australia-Question: Shall we injure any other colony?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I should think so.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

I think not. I hold in my hand a return of the various products imported into Western Australia in the years 1894, 1895, and 1896. I find from the figures here given that those imports grew in value in those years from £251,342 in 1894, to £445,864 in 1895, and to £783,372 in 1896. Let us look at what the component parts of those figures are for the year 1896, remembering that all these are colonial products. Flour amounted to £152,135; grain, £160,800; hay and chaff, £73,245; potatoes and onions, £44,221; green fruits, £13,402. Now, take dairy and domestic produce. The imports of butter were £148,971; bacon, hams, &c., £79,625; cheese, £30,118; preserved milk, £47,446; eggs, £33,389

Mr. SOLomon. -

Preserved milk is not domestic produce.

Sir PHILIP Fysh. -

It is colonial preserved milk which is referred to. Undoubtedly, preserved milk produced in the other colonies has been going to Western Australia in enormous quantities. We are sending concentrated milk—that is to say preserved milk—constantly. The figures I have quoted amount to a grand total of produce going from the whole of these colonies of £783,372 in 1896. This trade would not be injured by the retention by Western Australia of one of these duties for the next five years on a sliding scale. On the assumption that Western Australia may see her way clear to retain these duties, wiping them off at the rate of 20 per cent. per year for the five years, this gives her a right to be in a different position to the other colonies so far as intercolonial trade is concerned during that period. She would retain the whole of her receipts from customs duties in the first year, reducing the amount to 60 per cent. in the second year, to 40 per cent. in the third year, and so on until she got rid of the whole duty. I cannot find among these items one on which there would be an injury to the producers of the other colonies by the continued imposition of the Tariff in Western Australia. Let me assume that Tasmania provides the whole of the potatoes, £44,000. Who buy those potatoes? The Western Australians themselves. It is not blocking the market, so far as [Tasmania is concerned, if Western Australia retains her duties to some extent on potatoes. It will, however, I recognise, give her producers a better chance of producing for their own market. She is a new colony which people have entered upon before dairying and, agricultural production have been levelled up to the condition of production in our other colonies. Victoria, at any rate, has been living on her bonus system, and her producers have become solidified by acquiring capital and attaining a good position. In Western Australia, however, where production is in a younger stage, the farmers have not yet attained a position which will enable them to compete with the producers in the other colonies, and during the next five years it maybe presumed that they will endeavour to secure that position for themselves. Certainly, I think they will be able to secure it by means of the continuation of the duties to which I have referred. With respect to the other colonies, by the continuation of the Western Australian ditties for five years, on a sliding scale, to enable that colony to become a producer, they would not be in any way injured. If it could be shown that]

South Australia, or Victoria, or Tasmania would lose any portion of their present trade by reason of the continuation of such intercolonial duties, I could understand that that would be fatal to any such agreement, but I do not think that any one of experience will arrive at any such conclusion. We have the trade already, and until Western Australia becomes producing and self-reliant we shall continue to have it. Whether it be in regard to potatoes, grain, or flour, Australia will be in the position of retaining that trade, unless, indeed, some extraordinary crisis should rule again in America or elsewhere in regard to wheat. The other colonies must command a market like that of Western Australia because she is at our very doors, and we are able to put the stuff in at a lower rate than any other country could do. I am satisfied, Sir Richard Baker, that by such a system Western Australia will secure the two objects she has in view: The one the continuation of her Customs revenue-losing it only 20 per cent. at a time—and the other the rendering of assistance to her farmers for the next five years. I am sorry to make use of any argument which might indicate that I would be a party to the retention of protective duties. I consider myself as thorough a free-trader as any one; but considering the peculiar circumstances in which we are situated—that we do not propose to build up some new system, but merely desire to stand by while Western Australia works out her own future—which she can only work out in some such way as has been suggested—it must be patent to us all that it would be desirable to adopt some such plan. I do not desire to speak for the Western Australian representatives. They are capable of speaking for themselves. We must admit, as reasonable men, however, that they are in an extraordinary position, and, therefore, some extraordinary means must be devised to meet their case.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

I very much regret that the proposals of the Finance Committee have been somewhat complicated by the host of amendments which have been placed before this Convention since the report of the committee was laid upon the table.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Many of them by members of the committee itself.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Quite so. We are somewhat hampered by members of the Finance Committee, who have sprung entirely new theories upon the other members of the committee since we have met the Convention with our proposals. I may at once, perhaps, refer for instance to the attitude taken up by the Premier of Victoria (Sir George Turner) on this matter. I am not divulging anything which I think should be kept as a Star Chamber secret, when I say that in the Finance Committee the whole debate upon this question was as to the means to be devised to deal with the special and peculiar circumstances prevailing in Western Australia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I asked the Finance Committee to devise a scheme that would apply to all the colonies, but New South Wales objected.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
But that was never debated. It was objected to at once by all the members as utterly impracticable. We were determined to consider specially the conditions of Western Australia, and Western Australia alone. But at the same time, Sir Richard Baker, now that we have considered to some extent the condition of Western Australia, and since the publication of the proposals of the Finance Committee, there has been a little feeling that if there is going to be a grab at the Commonwealth purse—whether it is to have anything in it or is simply to be filled with loan money—Victoria is going to have a "finger in the pie" as well as Western Australia.

Mr. HOWE. -
Oh, yes! Trust Victoria!

Mr. SOLOMON. -
No doubt about that! The Premier of Victoria points out that his colony is likely to lose from £100,000 to £150,000 by intercolonial free-trade, but he forgets to point out that Victoria, by having the whole of the markets of Australia open to her spoon-fed industries, which have been protected for the last twenty years, is likely to gain far more by the establishment of intercolonial free-trade than the whole of the other colonies put together.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I am not so sure of that; I wish I were.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
It is pretty well patent to any one having a knowledge of the commerce of the different colonies that it is so, and I hope that honorable members of this Convention will cast aside altogether from their consideration any such idea of general grab on the Commonwealth purse, about which we do not know how it is to be filled, or how it is to be replenished. It is all very well to suggest (but I am surprised at Sir George Turner's suggesting it) that at the start of this Federation we should make up every little loss that may occur from joining together, by floating loans upon the London market, and dealing out from the Commonwealth purse the result of these loans to the different colonies. Surely we must recognise that every one of the states coming in to this Federation must be prepared to lose something in return for the great gains which we shall obtain, and the great improvements which will be effected. We shall have the great gain of intercolonial free-trade, we shall have open markets, and the great advantage resulting from better work being done by one central administration in regard to a number of departments instead of a host of administrations. But all these gains require that some sacrifice should be made on the part of the colonies to enable us to come into the Federation at all. This, I think, was the spirit in which the Finance Committee dealt with this particular question. But they recognise that while Victoria will lose something (it may be from £100,000 to £150,000 a year) by intercolonial free-trade so far as direct monetary loss is concerned, South Australia perhaps losing £50,000, and Tasmanina perhaps £30,000; yet that these losses are to be looked upon simply as the price which all of us are called upon to pay for federation. Perhaps New South Wales would be called upon to consent to a greatly different fiscal policy to that approved of by the majority of her people, but that also is a price to be paid for federation. But in regard to Western Australia we have a case which is not a question of the loss of a twentieth or a fortieth of the Customs revenue, or of a loss of £100,000 out of a revenue of £2,000,000, but a loss of nearly a third of the total of the Customs revenue of the colony.

Mr. REID. -

More than a third.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Yes, more than a third; between £350,000 and £380,000 out of a revenue of from £1,000,000 to £1,100,000. But every one recognises, and has recognised from the inception of this Convention, that in dealing with these commercial questions and with the finances of the colonies, it is absolutely necessary to make a special exception in regard to Western Australia. The question as to how this exception was to be met, as to the practical lines upon which it would be better to devise a scheme to suit Western Australia, was left to the Finance Committee. They have endeavoured from the start to thrash the question out. It was left to them to suggest some means by which the difficulty could be surmounted; and even though the Finance Committee are blamed for not showing any brilliant flashes of financial genius in discovering some new patent way, by a fairy wand or otherwise, of disposing of the difficulty that faces us, the thing was looked at from its practical aspect, and each Treasurer on the committee, and every member of the committee, tried to imagine himself in the position that Sir John Forrest and his colleagues are placed in, and to ask himself how, if so situated, he could possibly go to his colony with a proposal that meant a loss of a third of its revenue, and advise it to come into the Federation on those conditions. The members of the Finance Committee recognised that, under these circumstances, it was necessary to give the people of Western Australia special treatment in order to induce them to join the Union. Every honorable member recognises that if there is one colony of the group which the older colonies specially desire to see in the Federation—perhaps, because of their selfish wish to extend the markets of their own producers—it is Western Australia. Western Australia, with its growing population, and its immense demand for colonial produce, is the market we all desire to open up for our general trade, and it is for the Convention to determine whether we shall treat Western Australia, not with liberality, because that is a word which need not be used in this connexion, but with a degree of fairness, and a recognition of the fact that she must be assisted in bearing the loss which federation will entail upon her, or whether we shall make up our minds to leave her out of the Union.

The conclusion of the Finance Committee was that it was necessary to give special terms to Western Australia; that in asking this desirable partner to join us we should say that, as she was sacrificing more than the rest of us, we should give her special terms in the adjustment of the finances. There is nothing in a bargain of that kind to bring contempt upon Western Australia. The proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin), which is the last before us, seems to me to miss the main point. All the other suggestions in the same direction, asking for a differential Tariff, such as those made by the honorable member (Mr. Walker) and others, seem to me utterly impracticable. If we are to have federation at all, the main principle that is to be laid down, irrespective of the financial position of any colony, must be absolutely free commercial intercourse between all the colonies. Intercolonial free-trade—the removal of border barriers—is what we desire above all other things in connexion with federation, so that each colony may be given an opportunity to develop the resources best suited to her climate and her soil. All this has been recognised from the start, and to say now that one colony of the group shall have the right to impose a Tariff upon a sliding scale, or a Tariff with differential rates against foreign countries, while there is intercolonial free-trade amongst the other colonies, is to strike a blow at the rock upon which federation is to be built. I have already said that, in my opinion, the proposal of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) would mean a general grab by all the colonies—by the colonies who otherwise would be willing to sacrifice something of their revenue to obtain federal union. I do not wish to go over the ground traversed by the honorable member (Mr. Holder) yesterday, but it seems to me that the right honorable member’s proposal would perhaps make it necessary for the Federal Parliament to raise a loan of something like £500,000, in the very first year after the establishment of the uniform Tariff, in order to recoup the various colonies their losses by intercolonial free-trade. I admit at once that there is nothing brilliantly original about the recommendations of the Finance Committee. Originality had to be cast aside, and all efforts of financial genius had also to be cast aside. We had to face the question from the practical stand-point of men who had colonial experience, of men who had some knowledge of the commerce of the colonies, and of the particular requirements of Western Australia. It was pointed out by the Treasurer of Western Australia that that colony would lose a little more than one-third of her revenue—something more than £350,000 a year—by the establishment of intercolonial free-trade. This came as a surprise to the members of the Finance Committee, but from a careful examination of the figures put forward by the right honorable gentleman and by his colleague (the Hon. Sir James Lee Steere) it was apparent that, although there might be some slight discrepancies in regard to the manufactured products imported into the colony, Western Australia would absolutely lose, in round figures, from £300,000 to £350,000 by the establishment of intercolonial free-trade. It was only necessary to look at the documents quoted a few minutes ago by the honorable member (Sir Philip Fysh) to see how that loss would accrue. This document—and I recommend its perusal to every honorable member—shows that the bulk of this £350,000 is obtained from duties upon fodder and dairy produce, which will probably be produced in Western Australia in the very near future. Can we imagine that during the seven years that would be occupied by the framing of the Commonwealth Tariff and the subsequent introduction of the bookkeeping system, the position of Western Australia in regard to the production of food and dairy products will remain what it is now? Can we imagine that Western Australia will still have to import great numbers of cattle and sheep, and great quantities of butter and eggs, and so forth? It will be necessary for me to read only a few of the items from which £200,000 was obtained in 1896, to show honorable members that we are really making a great deal too much of this proposed concession to Western Australia, and that we are exaggerating the possibilities. In round figures, Western Australia, in 1896, collected through her Customs £20,000 on cattle, sheep, and pigs; £20,000 upon bacon and hams; £10,000 on bran; £27,000 upon butter; £19,000 upon chaff; £11,000 upon cheese; £16,000 upon oats; £6,000 upon eggs; £22,000 upon flour; £12,000 upon preserved meats; £7,000 upon jam, and £8,000 upon potatoes.

Mr. ISAACS. -
What is the honorable gentleman quoting from?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

The annual report of the Western Australian Collector of Customs and Registrar of Shipping, for 1896. On these and similar products Western Australia collected £213,000. In the ordinary course of events, however, the colony will within the next two or three years be producing a great part of these supplies for herself, and we must take this probability into account in calculating the amount which will have to be made up to the colony after the establishment of a uniform Tariff. Surely the very liberal land policy which has been promulgated by the Forrest Government, and which is gradually settling the fertile and suitable agricultural lands in the southern portion of the colony, must in the natural course of events lead to the production of the great bulk of these products by the people of the colony with in a very few years. Preserved meats is the only item that need be taken out of the category. This, of course, would considerably reduce the liability of the other states. We are told that Western Australia would have a deficit of £350,000 if intercolonial free-trade were established. Of this amount, perhaps £100,000 is obtained from duties upon articles manufactured in the other colonies, and it may be pointed out that, as a large part of the raw material would pay duty-I am alluding to the raw material of clothing, boots and shoes, and so forth-that would still further reduce the loss of Western Australia. Then we must remember that, upon the free list of Western Australia, there are items which I believe are not in the free list of any other British colony-such items as tea, sugar, machinery, and a host of other lines which in other places contribute largely to the revenue. It was pointed out by the honorable memb

Mr. HENRY. -

You might not get much revenue from tea and sugar during the first two years in Western Australia.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I think, as a rule, that mining communities are larger consumers proportionately of tea and sugar, and, I admit, of other beverages as well, than working men in other communities; they are more wasteful consumers of tea and sugar than the ordinary class of working men.

Mr. HENRY. -

Seeing that these articles are duty free now, they might be imported before the Tariff is altered.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Precisely; I thank the honorable member for the interjection. Still, the fact must not be lost sight of that during the first two years after the establishment of this Federation, it is extremely probable that the Premier of Western Australia, with that foresight which has characterized him hitherto, will see the necessity of removing two or three of those lines from the free list, especially lines of the kind mentioned. There can hardly be any doubt that the Government of Western Australia will not endeavour to increase the difficulties of federation, but will rather strive during those two years of interregnum to meet the difficulties by increasing their revenues from a few of those lines which can be easily taxed without being a great burden to anybody. These figures will reduce the Tariff liability to Western Australia by something like £200,000.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The Premier has just admitted that he may get more revenue under the uniform Tariff than £380,000.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Precisely; and that is the point I am now coming to. That has been carefully considered in the suggestions of the Finance Committee. Those suggestions are not that Western Australia should be recompensed for the whole of this loss of duty through the establishment of intercolonial free-trade, but practically the gains by uniform Tariff over the loss shall be considered in proportion to the loss sustained by the other colonies, and, whatever the difference may be, it should then be made up to Western Australia. I think the figures quoted by Mr. Holder are fairly correct—much more correct than the statistics and figures we have had hitherto—and we will suppose that the increased duty upon tea, sugar, and the excise duty upon beer will provide a little over £100,000 to meet the deficiency of £300,000. Then consider for a moment the probable increase in production on those numerous lines, for instance, dairy products. We will say that the loss sustained by Western Australia will be £200,000 or £250,000 by the establishment of intercolonial free-trade; that is, supposing that there is not a uniform Tariff, and that her present Tariff, which is a very partial one, will be continued. But under a uniform Tariff it is extremely probable that the revenue of Western Australia will be very much larger than it is at present, on some lines especially, so that instead of having to deal with a deficiency of £250,000, we may safely assume that at least £100,000 difference will be made up by an increase of the duty on other lines which are not taxed now. That would leave us—what? £150,000 a year to deal with for five years; that also is supposing that during the whole of the period of two years which will form an interregnum before the imposition of a uniform Tariff the farming communities of Western Australia will continue as now unable to produce even sufficient eggs and butter, flour, chaff, wheat, and oats to supply their own little community of 150,000 or 160,000 people. We can safely assume that during the next seven years the men who are taking up land in the southern portions of Western Australia which are suitable for agriculture will be able to keep a few hens and produce eggs sufficient to supply the community, without having to pay £7,000 a year for them as at present, and that they will be able to produce sufficient butter instead of having to pay £20,000 a year for it as at present. We see that production of that kind is increasing now; the farmers are gradually endeavouring to keep up with the demands of the gold-fields population, because that is the principal population that they have to look to. Now, as to the present special conditions of Western Australia. We have not only the question that I have just dealt with to consider, because that is considering the position of Western Australia as it is to-day, and the taxpaying portion of the people of Western Australia as they exist to-day. I say without hesitation that to deal with the problem from that stand-point only is to give it a most exaggerated appearance. At present they have a population in Western Australia of 150,000 or 160,000, and the bulk of that population does not consist, as it does in the other colonies, of a large number of women and children; at least 70 per cent. of the population consists of adult males.

Mr. HENRY. -

51 per cent.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I am somewhat inclined to doubt those figures.

Mr. HENRY. -

They are the figures of a reliable statistician.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

A census has not been taken recently, and I know from knowledge gained by visiting the various mining centres that in Coolgardie and Kalgoorlie, where there is a population of 10,000, it would be difficult to find 1,000 women.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The males are 51 per cent. more than the females.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is different; that is not the point I was going on. The estimate that I was giving, and I think it is a very moderate one, is that at least 70 per cent. of the population right through consists of adult males. We all know that in most of our calculations here we reckon a family to consist of a man, his wife, and three children. That is the general average throughout the colonies for the purposes of rough calculation, and we estimate in our return of revenue at an average rate per head in the southern colonies, including every man, woman, and child in the community. It must be patent to every member of the Convention that a man contributes a great deal more to the revenue than a woman and three children altogether. However, when we are calculating the population of Western Australia, we may fairly assume, to start with, that the adult males there contribute four times as much per head to the revenue as every adult male in each of the other colonies. The figures will bear me out in that.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Not quite so much as that.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

The argument is further strengthened by this fact, which must not be lost sight of, that the revenue derivable from population depends to a very great extent upon the earning ability of that population; that is almost an axiom. What is the earning ability of adult males of Western Australia compared with the earning ability of adult males in the rest of the colonies? It is nearly twice the amount. In Western Australia, every adult male who can work fairly gets as much as £3 to £3 10s. per week.

AD HONORABLE MEMBER. - On the gold-fields.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I dare say that in the cities, where the men who are not fit for gold-fields work are employed, they probably do not get anything like that amount of wages; but, on the gold-fields, you cannot get a man to work for less than £3 10s. a week, and if he is working in wet ground, or where there is any difficulty, £4 per week is the current rate of wages. Any attempt by the leading mining companies to lower the wages has been met by a strong combination of the Amalgamated Miners' Association.

Mr. HOWE. -

Very properly so, too.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is a question I do not intend to argue just now. Where your adult male unit is separated from his wife and family, where he is living in a rough country, and earning nearly twice as much as he can in the southern colonies, his spending power with regard to the leading revenue-producing items in the Tariff list is twice as great as the spending power of a man in the other colonies. A man earning £4 a week in Western Australia can afford to spend a few shillings a week in beer, wines, and spirits, and the bulk of them do so religiously. Here we have at once the solution of the immense difference in the revenue-producing power of the population of Western Australia as compared with the population of the other colonies. I will not apologize for somewhat lengthily explaining this matter, because it has a most important bearing on the question before us. We cannot expect that the population of Western Australia will continue to be mainly a population of adult males, or that they will spend £80,000 or £100,000 a month as they do now in post-office orders to send to their wives and families. As the permanency of these mines in Western Australia has been established, so has been the permanency of the billets of those men who until recently could not rely upon regular employment. The men are, therefore, adopting precisely the same system as is adopted in other mining districts in the more settled portions of Australia, and they are getting their wives to join them, as they recognise the expensiveness of keeping up two homes and the increased cost of living. They are, therefore, altering all the conditions under which we are now considering this financial problem. As each man gets his family to Western Australia, so his relative amount of contribution to the revenue of the colony will become more like the amount contributed by the population in the other colonies. Here is a factor that will operate very largely in removing this great bogy which we are now facing. As to the policy adopted by the Finance Committee in their recommendations, I should like to point out that they have carefully recognised all those circumstances; they have all been brought before the committee and considered; and the committee saw at once that even though it might appear on the face of it that the colonies were becoming liable from a general fund for what might seem to be a large amount per annum for a given number of years, still the circumstances were such that this apparently large amount will, in all probability, be reduced year by year, so that perhaps in two or three years it would be hardly worth considering. I do not for a moment admit that it is a matter for very grave consideration at the present moment. I cannot see for the life of me why, in entering into this great Federation, where we are pooling the whole of our revenues, amounting to £6,000,000 or £7,000,000, we should make such a tremendous mountain out of this molehill of having to compensate one of the colonies of the group—one of the parties to this partnership—to the small extent of perhaps £100,000 or £150,000 a year, and that perhaps only for a few years—not necessarily for the whole five years. I am strongly of opinion that perhaps for the first year or the first two years we may have to pay amongst us £100,000 or £150,000 a year to assist the revenue of Western Australia. That is a matter which Western Australia need not be for one single moment ashamed of. This is a question of a partnership into which we are all going, not to take advantage of one another but on equal terms, to do justice to one another; we want to present a Constitution to our people in each state which they will recognise as a fair and just one. I cannot understand, for an instant, the sentimental dislike expressed by the Premier of Western Australia to that colony being named in this Constitution. The circumstances are admitted on all sides to be extraordinary; the necessity is admitted on all sides to be a grave one. Wherefore, then, this desire to hide what we are really doing by putting in, as suggested by my honorable friend (Mr. Holder), that any colony having less than a certain percentage should be recouped? We have said in plain English to this Convention-the Finance Committee have said—that the circumstances of Western Australia demand special treatment. We have not hesitated to place before you what we think the best means of dealing fairly and justly with Western Australia in this matter; but I, as one of that committee, say that here the consideration must end, here the special circumstances and conditions must end, and any demand on the part of the Premier of Victoria, or any other member of this Convention, to still further extend this special difficulty by proposing that each colony shall be recouped for any particular loss she may make in regard to intercolonial free-trade, is beyond reasonable consideration at the hands of this Convention. I am sorry if I have taken up too much of the time of the committee, but I consider that this matter, although a very important one, is one that has been grossly exaggerated. It is one that we have exaggerated from a mere mole-hill into a mountain, and it is one which, by that very exaggeration, may prove very dangerous to the cause of federation. Therefore, I have sought to show honorable members that this big difficulty, as it appears at present, is a gradually decreasing quantity - that it must, in all probability, gradually decrease during a few years until we shall hear nothing more of it. The circumstances are such that if we desire the co-operation of Western Australia, which is the best market open at present in the whole of the Australasian group for the products of the southern colonies, if we desire to have her trade open to the rest of us, it is necessary that for a few years her circumstances should be considered, and met fairly and in a proper and federal spirit. Under these circumstances, I hope that the amendment proposed by the Premier of Victoria will be rejected as utterly impracticable, as meaning borrowing money to make up the necessities of the whole of the colonies; and that the amendment of Mr. Deakin, which means no inter-colonial free-trade, which means still keeping up certain barriers, still having vexatious differential Tariffs, will also be rejected with very little hesitation.
Mr. FRASER. -

That is only for a time.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

It may be only for a time, but I have pointed out that the very basis of this proposal for federation—the main point which has recommended it to the people of Australia—is the prospect of having our markets free and removing Tariff barriers, and the amendment of

Mr. Deakin would prevent that. It is all very well to say that it would only prevent it in one colony, but that one colony is a colony to which many of us look for a great deal of our trade. One may as well be candid on these questions. As a representative of South Australia, I say that South Australia looks to Western Australia for a very lucrative and mutually advantageous trade. The figures also show that Victoria, although seeking now, if there is going to be a loss, to have her loss recouped, has been the largest gainer in the past by the trade of Western Australia—far the largest gainer. The figures quoted by Sir George Turner show that; and the figures quoted by Sir John Forrest show it. In conclusion, I may say that if it is a matter of a mere probable expenditure of perhaps £100,000 or £150,000 a year, for a few years, between the different colonies, we may well consider that that is a fair and reasonable price to pay for a federation complete and full, embracing, as it should do, the rising and prosperous colony of Western Australia.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I am inclined to think that the debate upon the clause now before the Chair has practically come to an end; because, if I understood the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest a few minutes ago, be stated that he thought his colony might, or would, possibly, receive from the uniform Tariff as large an amount, or a greater amount, than the loss of £350,000, which he believes Western Australia will sustain by intercolonial free-trade. If that belief is entertained by the Premier and Treasurer of Western Australia, it appears to me that the Finance Committee and the Convention have been rather, as the last speaker said, making a mole-hill into a mountain. But while we are all anxious to do every justice to our friends in Western Australia, and to consider their position exceptionally, I think we have been rather considering the less of the two losses or evils which the representatives of that colony have a right to point out. I understand that the losses are of two kinds. First, there is the direct loss which they think they may suffer, although Sir John Forrest has practically knocked that suggestion away.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You are driving that point to death. I did not say that altogether.

Mr. DOBSON. -

There is the loss by intercolonial free-trade, and I understand that behind that there is the loss— I begin to think, though I may be wrong, the greater loss—that Western Australia will not have the advantage which other colonies have had for a quarter of a century, of putting her settlers on the land and rearing her industries under a protective policy.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We have no exports either, remember that.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Under these circumstances, I am inclined to think that the suggestion made by my honorable friend (Sir Philip Fysh) is well worthy of discussion by the Convention—that we should not treat Western Australia exceptionally on the lines now before the Chair, but that we should allow her to continue her duties upon intercolonial produce for a period of five years, one-fifth going off each year. I am quite aware that, as Mr. Symon has pointed out, this would be to some extent a blot on the great advantage which federation is to bring. But we shall all have a free market, with the exception that we shall not be able to ship our colonial produce to Western Australia for five years, and if every year the duties go off by a sliding scale, we shall each year be coming nearer to the goal of intercolonial free-trade and an unfettered market. That appears to me to be a very good solution of the difficulty, but for some cause or other honorable members seem to have lost the interest which I thought this debate would have assumed, and probably the sooner we get to a division the better. I am disposed to think now that the matter of not having protection like all the other colonies is a greater injury to the producers of Western Australia than the supposed loss by intercolonial free-trade, which, I think, in the words of Mr. Solomon, must be to a great extent minimized, considering that the present free list of Western Australia includes tea, sugar, beer, iron, and machinery of all descriptions, as well as other articles.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I have been endeavouring to discover from the debate the views of the Finance Committee. That committee was appointed for the purpose of making recommendations. It was composed of the most excellent financiers the Convention could produce, and the result of their deliberations was the recommendation, which the Drafting Committee put into form, now before the Convention. At the present stage, it appears to me that the only agreement between members of the Finance Committee is a thorough disagreement with the proposals which they recommend to us.

Mr. HOLDER. -

No, the majority of the committee stand by them.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am delighted to hear it. That is entirely different from the impression I should have formed from the speeches which I have heard from time to time. I thought that except my honorable friend (the Treasurer of South Australia), and, I think, the Right Hon. Mr. Reid-

Mr. WALKER. -

I also supported it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

There were also Mr. Walker and Mr. Solomon, whose speech just now was like a breeze from the sea—it was so delightful to find that one of the committee, at all events, adhered unhesitatingly to that which they had thoughtfully considered and deliberately recommended. I confess that I have felt somewhat lost, and have been wondering whether it would be possible, by having another meeting of this Finance Committee, which was so strangely consistent in its recommendation and so strangely divergent in the explanation of what it recommended, to reconcile their explanations with their recommendation whether it might not be well for them to meet again with a view, not only to arrive at a private agreement, but also at the public exposition of that agreement. Now, we have really four proposals before us. There is the recommendation of the Finance Committee, which I understand from Mr. Holder they still adhere to, however variously they have expressed themselves. Then, there is the amendment of my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin); next, there is the suggestion of my honorable friend (Sir Philip Fysh); then, there is the proposal of Sir George Turner, which is indorsed by Sir John Forrest—a member of the Finance Committee, by the way.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Both are members of the Finance Committee.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

And, finally, there is the alternative to do nothing, to leave this out altogether, and not to treat Western Australia exceptionally at all. Now, the views of Sir John Forrest do bother me a little. As a member of the Finance Committee, I suppose he agreed to this report?

Mr. ISAACS. -

This portion of it, at all events.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am asking for information, because I was not on the committee. I am inviting contradiction if he did not.
Mr. WALKER. -
    He did not enter a protest, at any rate.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    As a member of the Finance Committee he agreed to its report, but, on consideration, he does not like Western Australia having special consideration directed to it.

Mr. HENRY. -
    He always objected to that on the Finance Committee.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
    He only objected to the name being used, not to receiving the results.

Mr. BARTON. -
    He wanted the donation to be anonymous.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    As things go on, I become more and more puzzled. How was the majority of the Finance Committee arrived at? I suppose that Sir John Forrest, at all events, agreed to the report and the recommendations of the Finance Committee, whatever internal dissension there may have been, and whatever doubts he may have had in arriving at that end, and I want to know whether he adheres to it still? I am sorry he is not here just now.

Mr. ISAACS. -
    Oh, yes, he is; he is behind you.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    I understand, from the sense of fair play which I have always found in him, that he thinks the other colonies ought to have consideration as well as Western Australia; that it is a little infra dig. for Western Australia to accept special consideration; that he thinks so highly of his colony that he considers it is casting a reflection on that colony to say that Western Australia shall have benefits which the other colonies do not receive. All that I sympathize with, but what I would like to ask him is this: Supposing we cannot agree to the methods which he and Sir George Turner suggest, of treating all the colonies alike, does he wish the recommendation of the Finance Committee to be adopted?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
    It would be better than nothing.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    Very well then, as both Sir George Turner and Sir John Forrest have suggested alternative methods which are absolutely impracticable, as was clearly shown by the speech of the Treasurer of South Australia last night-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Sir George Turner's proposal is not impracticable.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I think so, indeed.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

And I think so, too. Therefore, I think Sir John Forrest will have to go back to the views he agreed to in the Finance Committee, and submit to the indignity of our living special consideration to Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I expressed the same views in the Finance Committee as I have expressed in the Convention. There is not much in the proposal either.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

If Sir John Forrest is sure that there is nothing in the proposal there is no necessity for putting it in the Bill. If he does not want it, I am sure nobody wishes to force it upon him. It was put in by the Finance Committee, I suppose, as a means of getting Western Australia into the Federation, and in consequence, I suppose, of arguments that no doubt Sir John Forrest addressed to the committee to show that Western Australia had to have some special consideration. Now, take the argument that Sir John Forrest addresses to its to-day. His elucidation of the difficulty is a guarantee to every state of its present revenue for five years.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes, that is it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

That will mean a continuation, first of all, of the highest Tariff in any of the colonies. It will mean, secondly, further taxation to make up the loss from intercolonial free-trade; and, thirdly, further taxation again to make up the expenses of the Federation.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

And the estimate of Western Australia's revenue to-day is based on an assumption of the continuance of an absolutely abnormal condition of things for five years, which is another point.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I say that it will have to be a curious kind of Tariff that will carry all this out. You cannot adopt the Tariff of any one colony you will have to adopt a Tariff which will be as high as that of any colony, and which will, in addition, cover other goods which are higher in the colonies in which the duties are highest on those particular goods. And then you will have to add to it still farther, or raise money by direct taxation, by providing additional duties enough to make up for the loss on intercolonial free-trade, and for the cost of the Federation. Now, does Sir John Forrest think that this is practicable for a single moment?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I think so.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I certainly do not think that Sir John Forrest really does think it is practicable. On reconsideration, I am sure he will not think so. I think, that, in those figures which the Treasurer of South Australia gave us last night, we were shown the utter impracticability of adopting any such course as that suggested. Mr. Holder showed that in a few words—and better than in mere language, because he worked it out in figures which nobody has contradicted. Now, what have we left? Of course the whole difficulty with all the colonies is to have the cake and eat it too. The Attorney-General of Victoria said this course is impossible, he said that Western Australia had no special claim, and he said that, to the extent to which the Government of Western Australia would be poorer, its people would be richer.

Mr. ISAACS. -
As far as its revenue duties are concerned.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
And my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) says—"The extent to which my colony will be richer, my Government will be richer, and my people will be poorer." And so we wrangle on. We always talk about the loss a country sustains, forgetting that the loss of one is the gain of another. Whoever dreams, when a Treasurer brings in a new Tariff which takes duties off some goods and puts duties on other goods, or which takes the duties off all the goods, that the country sustains loss? The Government may sustain inconvenience, but that the colony sustains any loss nobody will seriously contend. But when we come to discuss federation that is the whole line of argument, for honorable members talk about what is really a matter of adjustment and never of loss as being not a matter of adjustment, but of absolute loss.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But we have separate Treasuries.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Now, Mr. Isaacs in a very careful and elaborate speech sought to demonstrate the general principle that what the Government lost the people gained, and he further endeavoured to show that there was no reason to make an exception in the case of Western Australia.

Mr. ISAACS. -
In regard to revenue duties.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Always so. The honorable member also tried to show that in the case of Western Australia, although the Government revenue might be lessened to a larger extent than the revenue of other colonies, yet the people were so much the better off, and therefore they sustained no loss. Then came his right honorable leader, who took precisely the opposite view, not endeavouring in any way to answer the arguments which I am sure convinced Mr. Isaacs, and that Mr. Isaacs still entertains, and Sir George Turner stated that, not only was Mr. Isaacs wrong in the exception, but also that he was wrong in the rule. Well, sir, I want to know where we are at the present time? We have had a long discussion, and yet we are not very much more forward than we were at the beginning. Shall we leave Western Australia out? That is to say, shall we make no provision for that colony? If so, Sir John Forrest, who wants everybody to treat his colony fairly, will tell us that in all probability their loss will be so great that Western Australia cannot join the Federation. Shall we treat Western Australia in the way Mr. Deakin proposes, which would meet the views, I should think, of Mr. Isaacs?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Does it not? I should have thought it would.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Shall we adopt Mr. Deakin's proposal to remove the restriction from Western Australia by the imposition of duties to such an extent as may be necessary to prevent the uniform duties of customs disarranging the finances of that colony? I really thought that that was a logical sequence.

Mr. FRASER. -
There is no great risk about that. There is no risk in doing that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
But it is objected to by many, and we get the usual arguments from the free-trader on the one side and the protectionist on the other. The free-trader tells us that the higher you make the duties of customs, the less you get from them, which, carried out to its legitimate conclusion, would land you in the reductio ad absurdum that if you had no duties at all, and, of course, got nothing from them, and you imposed duties, you would get less than nothing. That is what the whole thing comes to. I have heard this argument times out of number, and it is really not necessary to repeat it. There must, of course, be an extent when a duty becomes prohibitive, and you will get nothing out of it; but what reason have we to suppose that any duty imposed in any of the states will really reach that stage? The amendment of Mr. Deakin is merely what is fair and right, whether the Convention accepts it or not. It says to Western Australia-"Your position is exceptional, and you do not want to be deprived of the right of imposing duties to prevent the disarrangement of your finances." Mr. Deakin's amendment says-"Let Western Australia take the right to do that to the extent to which it is necessary, but not so as to interfere with the cardinal principle of this Bill, which is, between the colonies, absolute freedom of trade."

Mr. ISAACS.-

The proposal is that if the Commonwealth chooses to do it, and the state chooses to agree to it, then they can do it with respect to foreign produce only.

Sir JOHN DOWNER.-

I am not quibbling about the words of the amendment; but if that method is adopted, while the burden will be on Western Australia, they will get the benefit of it. If they have to impose extra duties on the foreign goods imported, those burdens will fall on their people; but the benefits arising from the reduction of duties under the uniform Tariff will also be for the benefit of their people. The amendment, I think, is a right, just, and proper proposal. But we have to consider also the question of what is expedient. The circumstances of Western Australia, as has been pointed out, are exceptional. The Federation will not be complete without that colony. The money that we are asked to expend, at the most, is a mere trifle in comparison with the importance of obtaining the assistance of Western Australia in this great cause, and I do believe, as Sir John Forrest says, that there will not be any money to pay to her at all. I believe it will, in the result, be what a Minister who has had some experience, and who recognises the manner in which the policy of the Federal Government will probably be formulated, has told us it would be. I could very well understand, without going too much into detail, that in the result there will be very little or nothing to pay to Western Australia; but if, in the meantime, this guarantee creates confidence in the minds of the people of that colony, so as to bring Western Australia into the Federation, I am willing to take all the risks about it, and to accept the recommendations which the Finance Committee deliberately adopted, but which they have inconsiderately, in many instances, abandoned-I am willing to stand by their recommendations as they were sent to us, and endeavour to make them law. As far as I am concerned at present, I sympathize very much with Sir John Forrest in his feeling that he does not like to appeal in any way for his colony, which now occupies so great a position, to the sympatheies of anybody. But, at the same time, whilst he says that, he does ask for special consideration, and when he says that much the same consideration should be shown to all the rest of the colonies, be asks for that which is impracticable and impossible. And so, sir, I simply conclude by saying that I hope the Finance Committee will become a little better consolidated in their original suggestions, and will stand by their own recommendations. If they do so, I will support them.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

If the proposal of my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) is to be put to the Convention, I desire to move the addition to it of the following:--

That no payment shall be made to any state in which the revenue received from Customs and Excise, after the imposition of uniform duties, exceeds the amount received by the state the year before such imposition.

This would have the effect of enabling all the state Treasurers to know exactly what their position would be during the five years immediately after the imposition of uniform duties. If the Convention does not agree to this proposal, if it is influenced by the views of those who think that it would be a great drain upon the resources of the Commonwealth, I cannot help it. In the argument my honorable friend (Mr. Dobson) used yesterday: That because I said there was a possibility of the revenues of the various states being as great after the imposition of the uniform duties as before such imposition, there was no necessity to do anything, too free a use is made of my words. My object in desiring that the state Treasurers should be assured of their position during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties is, that it would provide a very strong argument in favour of the various colonies entering into the Federation. We cannot foresee what is going to take place, but we may have our views about it. The view I express may or may not be an accurate one. I hope it will prove to be accurate, and that there will be no necessity for any contribution from any of the states. If the results of federation are to be as great as foreshadowed by some honorable members, and notably my honorable friend (Mr. Symon), there is no doubt that our revenue will be materially increased, but we have to take care now to assure the future as far as we can, at any rate for the first five years after the imposition of the uniform duties. With this view, I think that the proposal of Sir George Turner, with the addition of this proviso, which overcomes some of the objections that have been raised, is a reasonable one, and that it would not be likely to cast any heavy burden on the Commonwealth. The only objection to this proposal-and it may be considered to be a very strong one—is that the Commonwealth might be called upon to pay a very large sum of money, and that it might not have the necessary funds available. But those who make that statement do not take the view held by Mr. Symon and others, that an era of great prosperity is to come upon this continent as soon as we federate. If we take this more sanguine view the chances are—of course it is not a certainty—that the revenues of the various states will be greater than they are now. In that case no harm will be done. We are trying to frame this Bill in such a way that it will be acceptable to the people. If we can assure the people of the various colonies that the revenue from Customs during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties will not be less than in the year before, we shall have provided for those who have to advocate this Constitution a good argument with which to induce the people to enter the Federation. Of course if this proposal does not meet with favour we shall have to fall back upon the recommendation of the Finance Committee. As I said before, I shall take no part in the division upon the Finance Committee's proposal. My chief objection to it is that it names Western Australia for special treatment. I should like a plan to be adopted which would be general in its application, such as that submitted by Sir George Turner, with the addition of my proviso. It may be said that the amount to be paid by the Commonwealth will be very large, and we may hear from the representatives of New South Wales that that colony will have to find the money. Those who use the

Would it not suit you better to take off the intercolonial duties by degrees during the five years?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No, even without any inducement of that sort it is probable that the duties that exist now in Western Australia will not remain always. There is a disposition in that colony to reduce the duties on many of the articles of food which are imported, and I have no doubt that that will be done.

Mr. REID. -

You gave a promise to that effect.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I promised to deal with the question during the next few months. My object is to have this Bill passed in such a form that we can confidently recommend it to the people of the various colonies. If we can assure them that the Customs revenue for the first five years after the imposition of the uniform duties will not be less than in the preceding year, we shall do much to assist those who have to advocate the cause of federation before the people. I beg to move now that Sir George Turner's amendment be amended by the addition of the words which I have read.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

The effect of this proviso is simply to throw a little doubt upon the conclusive figures given to us by the Hon. Mr. Holder, and to make it perfectly sure that New South Wales will not come into this Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You are afraid of the future.

Mr. REID. -

I said I was not in favour of the Finance Committee's proposal, but I must frankly admit that it is the best we have had submitted to us yet. I see grave objections to it, but I see graver objections to all the other propositions that have been made. It seems to me that we shall have to go back to the Finance Committee's recommendation. Although I do not favour it myself, it is one which I could far more cheerfully justify anywhere than any of the other proposals that have been put before us. Of course it is essential that any proposal we adopt should command the approval of the representatives of Western Australia, otherwise all our labour would be in vain. Our main object is to get a solution of this problem which will commend itself to the representatives of Western Australia as being satisfactory. Sir John Forrest was satisfied with the Finance Committee's recommendation. I have not heard a word from that time down to the present by which the right honorable gentleman has shown any desire to go back on what was done with his full concurrence in the Finance Committee.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I do not like the special treatment of Western Australia.

Mr. REID. -

I quite see that, but if the right honorable gentleman sees that the making of the thing general will cause difficulty to the other colonies, I am sure that he will not insist on a merely sentimental objection.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Would not the proviso meet your case?

Mr. REID. -

The proviso does not alter the complexion of the proposal made by the Premier of Victoria, I believe that it would be mere idle words, except with reference to one colony, New South Wales, whose case has been already referred to. Most of these proposals were considered by the Finance Committee, and the whole of this discussion strengthens the fact that the Finance Committee, having thought the matter out, has made a suggestion which, under all the circumstances, is the best that we can adopt. Although I do not approve of it personally, still I recognise that Western Australia will have to give up one-third of its revenue on colonial produce, and that it is in a peculiar position amongst the other colonies, because whilst the other colonies will have an increasingly valuable market for their exports opened to them, Western Australia, for years to come, will receive no corresponding benefits from us, because her main product, gold, goes through every country in the world free. We are only too glad to get it. Western Australia is in a peculiar position all round. It does not come into this projected Federal Union with any strong necessity from the facts of trade, impelling it to make sacrifices to join us in order to get the run of our markets. It has no pressure of that sort, and that is one of the difficulties of my right honorable friend. If the exports of Western Australia were of a character fitted for the other Australian markets, then my right honorable friend could go to the electors of Western Australia and say:"Look what we are doing. We are opening to the producers of Western Australia a grand market in the adjoining colonies." But my friend from Western Australia has not that argument to use. It is very likely that in years to come this union will prove of inestimable advantage to Western Australia, and that she will then have a magnificent intercolonial trade. But that is in the future, and does not apply to the electors of to-day. I therefore, from every point of view, feel that the case is so special that, although personally I could not approve of the recommendation of the Finance Committee, I would be in a position, having heard the whole of the discussion of this proposal, to say to those who object to it that, after the most severe scrutiny, it contained absolutely the least unsatisfactory method.

Mr. ISAACS. -
For New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -
Looking into the figures, I do not apprehend any serious question for any colony. As I said last night, the Commonwealth Treasurer will have immense power and opportunity in the moulding and framing of a Tariff. I would remind Mr. Isaacs that although New South Wales would bear one-third, at any rate, and probably more, of the loss, that colony is not interested in the Western Australian trade to anything like the extent Victoria is. We are many hundreds of thousands of pounds a year below the trade of Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You hope soon to come up to it, though.

Mr. REID. -
Of course we hope to come up to everything in the world soon. But that will take a little time, considering our enterprising friends in Victoria who are a few hundred miles nearer the gold than we are. I really do feel that the Commonwealth Treasurer would be able, having the difficulty staring him in the face, to make large adjustments, and, even at the worst, the amount would be greatly reduced by the losses of other states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is very little satisfaction to know the amount is reduced by their own losses. It is good satisfaction to you, of course.

Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend must recollect that the revenue really has been got out of brother Australians all the time, and that the evils of getting this revenue out of fellow Australians are felt to be so grave that they constitute the chief reason for federal union. That aspect must be regarded. If my honorable friend could have the consolation that these duties were coming out of foreign nations—the hated importer of other lands—that would be another matter. But he must admit, on his own theory, although I think myself the duties come from the gentlemen behind the barrier, that they are a loss to fellow Australians and not to foreign. That aspect of the matter, I say, must not be forgotten. It would be easy, as I pointed out last night, for a colony to make its loss greater by putting its tariff upon articles of Australian production indefinitely. But I do not think that that would be a gain in any sense to the colony that did it. It might put more money into the Treasury, but it would not be a gain to the people in whose interests the Treasury is administered. These matters must be considered. It is a loss really of opportunity of taxing fellow Australians, which opportunity and the use of it are the strongest possible reasons for destroying Border Duties and the distinctions between one part of Australia and another. It is a loss in one sense, but in another sense it is one of the glorious gains of federation. The more time we take up now, the more we will be driven to the proposal of the Finance Committee, which has the cardinal merit of being acceptable to those whose interests have to be studied in the matter.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Have not our interests to be studied, too?

Mr. REID. -

I am of opinion that our interests are less prejudiced by the committee's proposal than by any other proposal that has been submitted. I confess that I was rather taken at first with the suggestion that there should be a power in Western Australia of retaining these duties on intercolonial produce for five years, with 20 per cent. off each year. But I am confronted with the difficulty of another colony, where the argument might be pushed with as much force—"Well, if you do that in Western Australia, why not do it for the farmers of Victoria?"

Mr. ISAACS. -
If that were so as to intercolonial produce, you might have the outward Tariff less. How would that work?

Mr. REID. -
How do you mean by the outward Tariff.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Suppose the Tariff against the world were less than the gradually-reducing intercolonial Tariff, how would that operate?

Mr. REID. -
On the same articles?

Mr. ISAACS. -
On the same articles.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
They are not the same articles.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Some are the same.

Mr. REID. -
Well, that could easily be adjusted. But I discarded that rather attractive proposition because of the difficulty in Victoria—a difficulty I quite appreciate. On the whole, therefore, I feel that the committee's proposal is the more broad and satisfactory adjustment, which has the great merit of satisfying the Western Australian representatives—a cardinal point in any arrangement we make.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -
I have no desire to lengthen this discussion, but, as I have not yet spoken on the subject, I feel bound to make some comment on the present proposal. There is a just, and, I may say, a strong feeling as to the necessity of making some provision in the Bill that will induce our Western Australian friends to join the Federation and enable them to justify their action in their own colony. I am quite in accord with the view put forward by Mr. Reid on the practical aspect of the question. I also recognise that if the Western Australian delegation say that any proposal is impracticable, that proposal could not be recommended to our fellow colonists. A proposal deemed by the Western Australian representatives to be impracticable must be changed, or some other proposal made which could be justified. I recognise that position. I also think, however, that there is something due to the interests of the other colonies, and I naturally ask myself the question as to how the proposal will affect the colony which I share in representing in the Convention. As I have already said in the general debate, I regard the principle in the proposal submitted by the committee as inherently bad. It was very clearly demonstrated to my mind, by the Attorney-General of Victoria, that the radical defect in this proposal is that it will compel the taxpayers of one colony to contribute to the relief of the taxpayers in Western Australia. In fact, it is doubling the burdens of taxation to the extent of the loss, or the amount paid to Western Australia. This must be obvious at once to any one who reflects on the question. It is generally admitted that in Tasmania the purchasing power of the people and the ability to contribute through the Customs is relatively less than in the rich colony of Western Australia. Yet out of our poverty we would be compelled to contribute to the wealth of Western Australia. In principle the thing is radically wrong and I cannot see, how it can be defended. But we come round to the question of expediency, which I admit we have also to consider. Before leaving the question of loss, I must say there seems to me a great deal of confusion very often in people's minds in distinguishing between the losses to the Treasurer and the loss to the taxpayer. That distinction should be kept clearly in view. As regards the taxpayer, the Premier of Victoria has contended that in imposing customs duties the loss would not fall on the consumer. Sir George Turner's argument was tantamount to that. I am aware, as a practical man, that there is always sufficient competition amongst the traders of a colony to secure to the consumer either the relief afforded by a remission of duties or a burden caused by an increase. The result seems to me inevitable. Take a simple illustration. Assuming that in Western Australia a duty were imposed on tea and sugar, which duty is not imposed now, can it be contended that the consumer would not have to pay that duty? Such a duty might amount to something like 40 per cent., and we know that competition in trade is such that at the present time, in all probability, there would be no margin for a 40 per cent. difference. It follows inevitably that the burden would fall on the consumer. There is a fallacy with which many of us are familiar, but I really fail to see how the consumer can escape the burden. That was very clearly and admirably illustrated by the Attorney-General of Victoria the other day. Now I come to the practical question as to whether, recognising the great difficulties we have in dealing with this question, we should adopt some plan that would justify our friends in Western Australia in saying to their fellow colonists - "Yes, You may enter the Federation." I am as anxious as any man present to see Western Australia join the Federation. I am also desirous that we should, at as early a stage as possible, enjoy the benefits of a free interchange of commodities, and have an open market in Western Australia. But I am faced with the practical question, from a Tasmanian point of view: Would the people of Tasmania be justified in taking from their admittedly insufficient surplus a considerable sum of money, merely for the sake of having the right to trade with Western Australia? That, is the practical way in which the question addresses itself to my mind. I confess I have great difficulty in being able to say to the people of Tasmania "Yes, I consider you are justified in risking the payment of what is, to Tasmania, a considerable sum of money to relieve the taxpayers of Western Australia, merely for the privilege of trade with them." I confess to a very great difficulty in being able to justify my action in supporting a proposition which is inherently bad, and which may possibly call on the Tasmanian taxpayers to contribute a certain amount of money for the privilege of trading with Western Australia. With regard to the figures supplied by Mr. Holder-whose great ability in grasping these questions I join most cordially in admiring-they are necessarily speculative. They deal with what are the possible losses Western Australia may sustain under a uniform Tariff, and, therefore, with the amount that the several colonies may be called on to contribute. If tea and sugar, which are two important articles as revenue yielders, are admitted free to Western Australia at the time we have a uniform Tariff, it is almost a certainty that merchants and speculators in such articles, which are certain of consumption and will not depreciate by keeping will largely import them into Western Australia. The result would be a rather serious diminution of the revenue of Western Australia for the first year, and, consequently, in proportion to that particular year, would be the amount to be contributed by the several colonies. There would be a loss of anticipated revenue. The revenue that Western Australia would contribute under the uniform Tariff would, in consequence of the heavy importation of articles now free, be considerably diminished; and in proportion as the revenue for the first year of the uniform Tariff is diminished, so is the loss or losses of the several colonies increased. No one can pronounce with any degree of certainty as to what the losses may be. These losses may be considerable. I am very sorry I cannot see daylight through this; but my own mind leads me to support Mr. Deakin's proposal as equitable and just. But we are faced with the difficulty of meeting Western Australia, and until the representatives of that colony agree to something, it is very difficult to say what course should be taken.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I understand that no postponement of this clause is to be granted. I think that it is well that we should understand from the leader of the Convention what is to be done, because it seems to me that a postponement might lead to the debate being terminated for the present, whereas if the discussion is to be continued we shall know exactly what we are doing.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - Don't postpone it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Then it seems to me that the only question that will ultimately come before us for voting upon will be that of the Finance Committee. I feel myself in a very awkward position. The representatives of Western Australia are to be absent from this chamber when the division takes place. That is right in itself, but we shall find ourselves voting for a proposal on behalf of a colony which absolutely does not want it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - I do not say that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - If language means anything, the right honorable gentleman told us that he dissented from this method of treatment, and preferred a proposal of his own.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - I said I preferred another clause to this.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - That is what I say; the right honorable gentleman dissented from this.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - No, I object to Western Australia being specially mentioned.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Unquestionably the right honorable gentleman objects to a proposal which will apply to Western Australia without applying all round, and he has given very cogent reasons against the whole scheme in view of the very proper feeling of Western Australia against any special privileges being granted to her. Of course, if we are to understand now, after this debate, that the right honorable gentleman, on behalf of his colony, accepts this as a fair settlement should we agree to it, then, of course, that lets us know exactly where we are.

Mr. DEAKIN. - He accepts Sir George Turner's proposal as amended by himself.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Yes; but that is not the point. As far as I can see, if there is any possibility of gauging the opinion of this committee, it is clear that the proposal that will obtain a majority will be the original proposal of the Finance Committee.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We shall see about that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Very well. But I think, whatever process we adopt, before we come to vote specifically on that proposal we ought to have some assurance from the Western Australian delegation that it is satisfactory to them, and that they take it as a solution of the difficulty, so that if we vote for it there will not still be unpleasantness left behind, and an unsatisfactory solution. The point is: If this proposal is adopted, will the members of the delegation of Western Australia be willing to go back to their colony and tell their people that they are now in accord with this as the best solution of the difficulty, and that they warmly propose the Bill for the acceptance of their people? We shall be in a very peculiar attitude if, after passing this proposal, which is intended entirely to consult the position and meet the exigencies of Western Australia, we find that the delegation from that colony, in the first instance, retire from the Convention while the vote is taken which I have no fault to find with them for doing—and then, when the proposal is agreed upon, apparently at their own request, they go back to Western Australia and say that they were really never in favour of it. I still say that it would be far better to have a postponement of the question.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You do not say what you will do when you go back to your colony on any particular question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But this is a special matter affecting only Western Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Does not the attitude of Western Australia depend upon a variety of things?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It may. But I am justified in looking on this matter from the point of view of the speeches made, and there is such an amount of incongruity in the position that it does not seem to me that any decision will be satisfactory. The members of the Finance Committee themselves have brought forward so many amendments on their own proposals, that it seems to me that as we have other work to do in regard to the financial clauses—in reference to the debts, for instance, which is a question that will take up a considerable amount of time—it will be better to postpone this subject for the further consideration of the Finance Committee. If, after what has been said in the course of this debate, they still consider that their proposals are worth anything at all—
Mr. HOLDER. -
We cannot do better than we have done.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Very well. If the committee come back and say: "We have reconsidered the proposals made, and still adhere to them," the whole thing will be passed; but at the present moment with so many proposals before the committee, many of which have been sprung upon the committee by the members of the Finance Committee themselves, the best way would be for the Finance Committee to reconsider their recommendations. I think that that is a very fair suggestion to make. I made it last night, and I thought that it would have ended the discussion this morning. I still think that it would be a good thing if the proposal before the committee were withdrawn, with a view of the Finance Committee reconsidering the financial clauses.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I hope that the advice of the honorable member who has just spoken will not be followed. I confess that I am becoming sick of the subject of Western Australia in regard to this matter. It seems to me that we are just as near to a settlement as we ever were, or ever will be. I hope there will be no time lost in taking a division. I favour the clause of Sir George Turner as amended by myself. If, however, that does not meet with the favour of the committee-and I see no reason why it should not, as it seems to me to be the most feasible and the simplest plan-then the opinion of the committee can be taken upon the suggestions of the Finance Committee. I do not see any reason for delaying the matter. As I have said, Western Australia will not take part in the second division if it takes place, and it will be for this committee to say whether they approve of the suggestions of the Finance Committee or not. In regard to the representatives of Western Australia pledging themselves one way or the other, I reply that I do not feel much inclined to make any pledges to this Convention, nor do I see that any other member has made any pledges with regard to his colony. I have heard some members say that they will be unable to recommend sometimes this question, sometimes the other, with the object, I think, of influencing honorable members. But, for my own part, I make no pledge whatever. When I see the Bill complete it will be time for me to consider whether it is such a Bill as I can recommend to the people of Western Australia. I make no pledge on this question or any other; nor do I find that those honorable members of this Convention holding official positions in the other colonies are willing to pledge themselves as to the attitude they will assume when the Bill is completed. It is asking too much.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I didn't ask you to pledge yourself.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The honorable member asked me to pledge myself in regard to the financial proposals, but I say that the whole subject will require consideration when I see the Bill completed. I have never expressed myself as adverse to the recommendations of the Finance Committee, because I recognise that in a sense I was a party to the committee's report but I never fully approved of these recommendations, because I thought that some provision which would have been general in its application, and would not single out any one colony for special treatment, should have been adopted. I prefer the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner as amended by myself to the recommendations of the Finance Committee, but if we cannot obtain the approval of honorable members for that amendment, it will be for us to consider whether the recommendations of the Finance Committee, although they are objectionable to the extent that they single out Western Australia for special treatment, should find a place in the Bill,

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I shall support the suggestion of the honorable member (Mr. McM

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would point out to the right honorable member that in the Canadian Constitution there are a number of sections which give special treatment to various states. It has been suggested that the further consideration of this matter should be postponed, but I am inclined to think that we have not yet arrived at a stage at which there should be a postponement. At any rate, I think that the sense of the committee should be taken upon the amendment of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner), because, whatever may be said of the other proposals, it, at least, has been fully debated. If, afterwards, we reach a stage when there may be a proposal before the committee which seems to require deliberation upon the part of the Finance Committee or upon the part of the Convention, let us have a postponement then. At the present stage, however, there is no solid ground for a postponement. I consider that the speech made by the honorable member (Mr. Holder) last night effectually disposes of any argument in favour of the amendment of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner). The figures produced by the honorable member showed the inequity of the proposal, and tended to prove that New South Wales, to use a common term, will have to pay the piper.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is the old cry.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, and so long as proposals of this kind are brought forward, I, at any rate, will take care that it is heard.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The Honorable member's argument cannot be considered proved by figures like those produced.

Mr. BARTON. -
They come from as safe a source as we have in the Convention—a gentleman whose name has only to be mentioned to secure respect for the moderation of his arguments and the clearness of his statements. They are the best and most practical indications of the probable effect of this proposal that we have yet had.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
They give New South Wales a million more revenue than Victoria.

Mr. BARTON. -
I see no joke in what has been said about giving £1,000,000 to New South Wales and then taking it away from her to divide it among the other states. The arrangement may seem a joke to those who profit by it, but, notwithstanding the mild sarcasms of the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) last night, we who represent the colony do not see the humour of the situation. I do not wish to express myself at any length in regard to this matter, because I think that, so far as the inequality of proposals of this kind can be demonstrated by figures, the speech of the honorable member (Mr. Holder) was such a demonstration. It may be said that his statements were merely surmises. That may be so, but if you have the best surmises yet drawn with respect to the operation of a clause, you must take them before anything else. That is the position in which I find myself with regard to the speech of the honorable member (Mr. Holder). Reasons were given by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) against the proposal in the Bill, and, so far as they extended, I am rather inclined to think that they also operate against the proposal of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner).

Mr. SYMON. -
And against the proposal to make special provision for Western Australia.

Mr. BARTON. -
They were directed against the proposal to make special provision for Western Australia, but if that special provision is to be extended all round, even if actual loss takes the place of proportionate net loss, it seems to me that the argument of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) will have four applications instead of one. So far as the arguments against the Western Australian proposal have gone, I do not see that they are not exceeded by the arguments against the proposal of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner). I would rather take the proposal of the Finance Committee than that of my right honorable friend. At any rate, we have debated his proposal at considerable length, and I do not see why we should not deal with it now. I do not see why we should not deal with the whole clause at this stage. If the need for a postponement should arise it might be asked for, but I would suggest that we should deal with this matter as soon as possible. For myself, I feel some inclination towards the suggestion of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin), and I may be pardoned if I give one or two reasons in favour of its acceptance. It is, of course, very well to say that we cannot persist in a proposal which the Premier of Western Australia has declared against, but we have to take the reasons for and against in all theme matters, in the full confidence that the best reasons will, in the long run, probably prevail upon all sides. What is the position of Western Australia? It was rightly pointed out by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) the other day—I have seen a criticism of his position with which I do not agree—that while the Treasurer of Western Australia might not be a gainer, and might indeed be a loser, by the operation of intercolonial free-trade and a uniform Tariff against the outside world, he would be in a worse position only by way of figures, because the taxable capacity of the population of Western Australia would be increased to the extent of the duties foregone. If, by the operation of a uniform Tariff, the Customs revenue of Western Australia was £200,000 or £300,000 less than it is now, the money would be saved to the state, and would be still available to the Treasurer for taxation. That is the position which has been criticised, but I do not think that the criticism should have any effect. It has been pointed out that the honorable and learned member and other protectionists were in a false position when they urged that the consumer paid the duty. I am not aware of any protectionist having urged that where the production is not substantial the consumer does not pay the duty. When production increases, and it becomes necessary to reduce the price of the imported article in order to enable it to compete with the local article, the importer, by reducing the price, pays the duty, and it is saved to the consumer. That, however, does not apply in the present case. It is not urged that where there is no material production the consumer does not pay all or nearly all the duty. That being so, the amount which has been mentioned as being lost to Western Australia would really be saved to the taxpayers of that colony, and could be obtained from them by the Treasurer.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Surely there is some production in Western Australia.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am not saying that there is not; but between the intercolonial products which flow into Western Australia and the amount of its local production there is a considerable difference. I am not urging that there is not a very promising production in Western Australia, but it has not reached a point at which it can affect the argument of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs). There being this amount of taxation saved to the people of Western Australia, it can be raised in other ways. I quite sympathize with the position of the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) if he says that the time has not yet come for direct taxation in that country, and that perhaps he could not carry such a policy there. What does that imply? It does not get rid of the fact that there is a taxable capacity. If the money cannot be obtained by direct taxation, it still remains available by means of Customs taxation. If it is available by means of Customs taxation alone, some provision should be made for the application of Customs taxation to this taxable capacity. The burden laid upon the taxpayers will be the same as that which they have to bear now. If, therefore, some arrangement can be made by which the loss of Western Australia can be compensated by increased taxation, the colony will avoid the stigma which some honorable members have argued would attach to her if she received special treatment. The only way in which this could be done is that suggested by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin). It seems reasonable that if Western Australia is not anxious to accept the favour from the other colonies, and the representatives of the other colonies think that their taxpayers would have some objection to compensating the taxpayers of Western Australia for having made a loss, an alternative proposal should be considered.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is the only solution.

Mr. BARTON. -

So far, it seems the only reasonable solution. That is to say, that while a uniform Tariff is imposed, an agreement should be made between Western Australia and the Commonwealth allowing that colony to increase the duties upon certain articles for a term of five years, in order that the additional revenue thus obtained by her might compensate her for the loss she would otherwise sustain.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We do not want that.

My right honorable friend owes the same duty as we all owe to the Convention. He owes it to his position to give full consideration to the proposal which has the most reason in its favour, and takes the money from the source from which it comes at the present time. I therefore think this proposal should be fairly considered. One can sympathize with the right honorable gentleman if he is of opinion that this is not a time to impose direct taxation in Western Australia. That is a strong argument for raising this money by indirect taxation. But it does not follow in the course of that argument that means adopted to solve the difficulty should be destructive of the intercolonial free-trade which all the other colonies desire to follow upon the imposition of a uniform Tariff. If that destruction can be avoided by any such expedient as Mr. Deakin has suggested, it is perhaps the most reasonable, and perhaps the only one which has any logic to support it. I do not say that under some circumstances I will not vote for the proposal of the Finance Committee, still I must join in thinking that that proposal is not defensible on purely logical grounds. As the taxpayers of Western Australia will save a certain amount of money by being freed from a certain amount of taxation on the removal of the duties on intercolonial trade, it does not seem to be supported by reason or innate justice that this colony—which, after all, consists only of its people, like all the rest of us—and those people having been saved a certain amount of money, they should be again paid that amount of money, because that is really the state of the case. That is the difficulty. It might be possible that the transaction could be supported on the ground that the Treasury does suffer loss, and that there is a difficulty in recouping that loss; but if there is an easy way of recouping that loss, that argument would also disappear. We seem to be brought to this position—that there is a way out of the difficulty which has not been seriously considered, and, as far as that proposal is concerned, it ought not to be lost sight of by the committee; it ought not to be hastily swept away. The fact that there is an objection from Western Australia is entitled to very great attention, as coming from a colony whose affairs are in question; but it is of equal concern to the Constitution that some proposal should be adopted with reference to which we could say to the electors of our colonies, who are the taxpayers, that the burden is being laid on the right shoulders; that intercolonial free-trade is not being denied, and that there is a way of doing this which does not impose an undue and unnecessary burden upon the electors with whom we have also to deal. I would urge, therefore, that some consideration which has not yet been afforded should be given to Mr. Deakin's proposal. It is certainly more in the line of the argument of Mr. Isaacs yesterday than any other proposal which has been made, and I strongly think that there was force in his argument. We may support the Western Australian proposal, if it is carried, by urging this, that it really may not amount to very much; that, under this Tariff, it may not give very much back to Western Australia; but we do not want to go back to our electors with such an argument when it is possible to point out a way by which the position of Western Australia might be actually restored, and without a penny's loss to the pockets of its own taxpayers. On the whole, that seems to be the legitimate result of the proposal made by Mr. Deakin.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

The question before us seems to me to be a perfect paradox. The Premier of Western Australia put before us a most extraordinary and peculiar proposition. He said practically - "We are to be relieved of taxation, and the rest of the colonies are to make up that difference." But at the same time he went on to say - "I do not like to be branded with that species of robbery, and, therefore, I want you who are all more or less interested in the subject to be branded with the same brand as ourselves." Inasmuch as I do not want Tasmania to have any such brand upon it, I would either stand out or go in. I have no doubt we shall go in, although I think we shall suffer if such a proposition is carried out. What does the honorable member say in order, as it were, to gain votes? "We will spread it all over the community, and you will all suffer in this respect; you will all be defaulters, and therefore you will all have to be paid out of the difference." That seems to me to be a very peculiar argument. What is the position of Western Australia at present? There are a number of articles admitted free of duty into that colony which are taxed in the other colonies. If that colony is to come into the Federation, why should it not be taxed in the same way and in the same proportion as the other colonies? There are tea, sugar, tobacco, spirits, and a variety of other articles which in that colony are free.

Mr. SYMON. -

Spirits are not free.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

I think wines are free.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

According to the list, sparkling wines are subject to a duty, but not wines in general.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes, they are.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

That appears to be the case from the return. Sir John Forrest was a member of the Finance Committee. I am happy to say I was not a member of that committee, and therefore I can speak with freedom. The members who form that committee must feel themselves bound more or less by its decision.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

No.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

If a committee brings up a report it seems to me that the members are bound by that report. I was on a committee on one occasion and they rejected the motion which I proposed, yet I had to sign the report, and I was bound by it, although I tried to get out of it. Sir John Forrest was a member of the Finance Committee, and that committee brought up a report which stated that Western Australia should be treated in a certain manner; now, in the Convention Sir John Forrest objects to that report. He says- "No, do not imagine that Western Australia is going to do this," and Western Australia is not going to receive the plunder. They do not like it. Why should not they receive the reward which they claim to be entitled to? There is another extraordinary thing. There are five colonies represented here, every one of which, with the exception of Tasmania, has threatened to retire. The fact of the matter is that the only union will be that of Tasmania by-and-by, and that will be the only result of this Convention.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

You will then have the capital all to yourself.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

What are we going to do? Are we not bound, more or less, to yield one to the other? How can Western Australia complain of its position at this moment? At present is it not the richest colony of the group? When we met in 1891 the population of Western Australia was only 45,000; the population now is verging on 200,000, and, no doubt, before the end of the year it will be 200,000, yet it comes here and makes a complaint of poverty.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Then what do you complain of? You say you cannot pay your debts.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I have never said so we can pay them twice over.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Very well then, what are you doing? Just what Victoria and the others did when they had a lot of money. You are getting into debt, and then you say the other colonies should pay your deficiency. That is the sum and substance of your argument. I would point out to Western Australia that it has a splendid career before it; that it is in a splendid position, and Sir John Forrest, who has known that colony ever since he has been in this hemisphere, knows very well the progress it is making, and yet he tries to depreciate that colony.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Then what are you trying to do? Is it to rob your neighbour to make up your deficiency? Take my advice, I am an older man than you, make up your mind to take part in this Union, and you will have great results. All knowledge goes from the east to the west, and generally the west keeps everything. The west gains everything, and it is trying to gain a great advantage over us. The great western country is attempting to take possession not only of Tasmania but also of New South Wales, but it will not gain possession, that is very evident. However, you are not going to have it all your own way. Sir John Forrest may have great influence on the Finance Committee, but he is now in the Convention itself. But do not think that you are going to have your own way here; be satisfied with your position, and form part of the Union, and there is no doubt that Western Australia must progress in wonderful degree. You have now over 100,000 inhabitants more than you had in 1891, and those men will be your rulers in the future. There is no doubt about that. You will have a very different population henceforth to what you have had hitherto. You have had it all your own way, but you will not have it very much longer. There is a new element springing up.

Mr. SYMON. -
These are home truths.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Instead of having a small population, as you had when I first saw Western Australia, you will have one of the largest populations of any one of the colonies. Why cannot you be satisfied? It seems to me that Western Australia has nothing to complain of, and it had better join the Union on straightforward and equitable principles, and give up this idea that it is to be paid for a deficiency which cannot arise, and which, according to the arguments of Sir John Forrest himself, he places before us in a most extraordinary way. First of all, he says—"We must lose; but you need not pay, because we will make it up out of the other pocket. We shall lose out of one pocket but we shall gain in the other." I know Sir John Forrest is a very obstinate man, but on this occasion he should yield to good sense and sound advice. My advice to him is that he should withdraw his opposition.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I want to say only a few words, chiefly with reference to the amendment of the Hon. Mr. Deakin. I should be very pleased indeed if it could be proved that his scheme would help us out of the very serious difficulty in which we are placed. I am afraid there are objections to it which are fatal, so far as I have been able to see. I think we may assume, for practical purposes, that a uniform Tariff will be a protectionist Tariff as against the outside world; if it be not, it will at least be a high revenue Tariff upon foreign goods. Given a high revenue Tariff on foreign goods, any additional impost on those goods, and on the small proportion of foreign goods coming into Western Australia, must be very considerable to make it of any effect. It must have one of two results; it must either so diminish consumption as to destroy itself, or it must diminish importation apart from consumption, by making importation unprofitable to such a degree that it will destroy itself. We have all in the past seen, again and again, that the imposition of increased duties has resulted in smaller revenue. If we take the average Tariff, as I have done before, simply for argument sake, as the basis of the Federal Tariff—say, 10, 15, or 20 per cent—to meet the special needs of Western Australia, we shall arrive at a point which will so tend to discourage importation, both through the diminution of consumption and the unprofitableness of importation, as to make the proposal absolutely unworkable in the direction which we seek. I am not at all surprised, having these difficulties in my mind, that the Premier of Western Australia does not see his way clear to accept the proposition. It does seem fair that it should be Western Australia that should make up Western Australia's loss, and that the other colonies should not be asked to make up that loss. On the other hand, I think it is not a scheme that can be carried out unless some one can answer the objections I have raised, which appear to me to be fatal, attractive as the scheme may appear at first sight. I do not think any one would desire that a committee constituted as the Finance Committee is should bind all its members to agree to any majority report which it might bring up. It would be a distinct loss to the Convention if any man who happened to be a member of any committee was prevented from placing his opinions before the Convention, simply because he chanced to have been outvoted in the committee. Therefore, I do not complain at all that the minority of the Finance Committee have seen fit on various occasions since the committee's recommendations have been placed before the Convention to represent their strongly divergent views. I think they have helped the Convention in doing so. At the same time, the majority of the committee do, I believe, adhere to the committee's recommendations, and I expect to see, that in this respect, as it has done in all others, the Convention will accept the recommendations of the Finance Committee and embody them in the Bill. I have already stated the reasons why I think, if that result follows in this particular case, we shall have reason to be content with it.

Mr. LEAKE (Western Australia). -

My inclination has been, and still is, to support the recommendations of the Finance Committee; nor have my opinions been changed by the arguments which have been advanced in favour of the various amendments that have been proposed. In fact, they appear to me to make confusion worse confounded. In the consideration of this very difficult problem, I must confess that I am influenced very largely by the result of the mature deliberations of the selected men who have affirmed those conclusions, and I am prepared to accept these recommendations as the best that can be devised. They appear to me to have been conceived in generosity, and should, therefore, be accepted with gratitude. The objections which I have heard advanced against them appear to me rather sentimental and, so far as I can understand the arguments of my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest), those objections can be met by a mere change of phraseology.
The accidental mention of the colony of Western Australia in these proposals can be altered, and some general words can be used which will give effect to the recommendations as conclusively as the words proposed.
It has been freely admitted in the Convention—and I gratefully acknowledge the fact—that the position of Western Australia is exceptional, and that she is entitled to ask for exceptional treatment. Certain advantages were offered to her, her exceptional position being recognised, but as soon as those advantages were offered, it was conceived by representatives of other colonies that their position also was exceptional, and that those exceptional advantages should be shared by others, thereby doing away with the exceptional colony which joins the Federation must lose something. It is therefore a question merely of proportion, and this Convention says:"If the loss to Western Australia is out of proportion to that of the other colonies we step forward and generously offer to repay you something." But for us to expect, as delegates from Western Australia, that we shall become compensated for our full loss is, I think, expecting more than we are entitled to. Moreover, it must be remembered that Western Australia's gain must be another colony's loss. I am not convinced that our loss will be so very great as is at the present moment anticipated. Our conditions are abnormal, but I am one of those who hope that those abnormal conditions will not obtain for very long. Again, as has been pointed out by more than one speaker, the tendency in Western Australia-and in this particular I am in agreement with the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest-is towards a reduction of our customs duties. In fact, we have been promised a reduction in our Tariff. The right honorable gentleman himself has told this Convention, as he has told our local Parliament, that it is his intention, at a very early date, to abolish some duties and to reduce others. One of the results of our somewhat high customs duties has, fortunately, been huge increases in our revenue, and I am happy to say that Western Australia is, I firmly believe, in a better position to join the Federation, or, at any rate, in as good a position t

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Hear, hear; she has a very large surplus.

Mr. LEAKE. -

We are possessed, in proportion, of a greater surplus revenue than the other colonies. I do not mention that in any vaunting spirit, but merely as an actual fact, and with the idea of advancing the interests of federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What about the effects of this Tariff?

Mr. LEAKE. -

If I differ from the right honorable gentleman in what I say, I wish to avoid considering our relative positions, or any possible reference to controversial local politics.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You are talking about the surplus revenue.

Mr. LEAKE. -

I think we may say that there has been a surplus revenue, and if members of the Convention will refer to the return which has been laid on the table, it will be seen that the colony of Western Australia has enjoyed credit balances for the last eight years, varying from £30,000 up to £500,000. I am right, I think, in saying that that surplus has for the last three or four years averaged upwards of half-a-million. Therefore, we are in a position, I say, to anticipate and to meet the possible loss that will ensue by the adoption on our part of the Federation Bill. We should, if we lose anything, probably lose but little, and the little that we do lose I think we can fairly afford. My arguments, perhaps, would seem to go to the extent that we ought to ask for no concession at all from the Federation, and in that connexion I would remind honorable members that there has been no persistent endeavour from this bench to place too prominently before the Convention the peculiar and exceptional position of our colony. But I accept, as I said before, with all gratitude the generous offer which has been made, prompted no doubt by the strict federal spirit, and by that true spirit of compromise which we all anticipated would influence honorable members in the consideration of this question. I accept these proposals the more readily, because I am convinced that if the Bill is adopted as suggested by the Finance Committee, it will enable those delegates from Western Australia who are truly imbued with the idea that federation is a political necessity of our existence, to go back to our constituency and point out to our fellow colonists that we may fairly and justly join in a Federation with neighbours who are prompted by such generosity and such fair principles; and this would assist, I think, the passage of this measure in the colony of Western Australia. The matter is important in this regard, because if we do discuss it in our colony, we must be prepared to show to our colonists that neither are our finances crippled, nor is the possible development of our internal resources delayed by federation; and I do not think that the immediate financial loss which would accrue to our colony would be so great as not to be fully compensated by the advantages of federation, and the acceptance of the principles of intercolonial free-trade. In this particular I know that I do not express the views of my colleagues in our delegation, because the majority of them are protectionists, and perhaps, with one or two exceptions, there is very little tendency towards free-trade among them. But, as we all have to give and take, I appeal to them, and I will listen to any appeal they may make to me to modify my views in this particular direction. Although it has been said that we have no sources of revenue in Western Australia—that we do not export—I cannot be unmindful of one source of production which we possess, and which, I think, we may fairly claim will benefit under federation—that is our timber industry. If we have federation, although our ports will be open to intercolonial goods, it must be remembered that the ports of our neighbours will be open to our timber. I do not feel disposed to support any of the amendments which have been proposed, and my chief objection to the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) is this—that we are asked to accept federation on distinctly anti-federal lines. If we accept the proposed which he has made we must pile up duties upon duties, and possibly the second edition of duties, in order to be of any use to us for revenue purposes, will practically amount to prohibitive duties, and, therefore, I am not inclined to accept his amendment. Rather than that, I would see these Western Australian proposals wiped out altogether, and leave the question for the first five years entirely and solely to the Federal Parliament. But as there is no possibility of that line being followed, I have made up my mind, as at present advised, at any rate, to adopt the suggestion of the Finance Committee. As to the question of the Western Australian representatives voting upon these particular proposals, I must confess that I feel myself somewhat in a difficulty. At the first blush I was prepared to agree with my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest), that the Western Australian delegation should not vote upon the proposal of the Finance Committee; but I should only refrain from voting if I thought that honorable members in this Convention would consider that our delegates were prompted in this matter by any policy of greed. If our votes might be considered to be cast as the result simply of true deliberation, then I should have no hesitation in voting; but if such a thing were possible as that any slur or taint should be cast upon us through our voting, I myself should certainly refrain from recording my vote.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
No one has suggested anything of the kind.

Mr. LEAKE. -
I do not think for a moment that there is any such suggestion. It is, perhaps, only my exceeding diffidence and modesty which prompts me to this expression of opinion. I certainly feel strongly on this question. I accept with pleasure, I accept with thanks and with gratitude, as I said before, the offer of the Finance Committee, and, unless some strong expression of opinion which I have not yet heard induces me to act otherwise, I shall certainly vote for their proposal. In the course of the debate, I was very pleased to note that some honorable members had referred to the exceptional position of Western Australia. And if Western Australia is in a position where she can make sacrifices, and does not want to make money out of her neighbours, the certainly does not require to go cap in hand to them to ask for financial assistance. If she is in that high financial position, then she may congratulate herself on the fact that so far above her neighbours does she stand that they must lean on her for assistance.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think that the non-adjournment of this debate has been productive of very great gain, because we have now had an additional flood of light thrown on the position of Western Australia—light which, I fancy, will lead us still more strongly to the conclusion that Western Australia really has no claim whatever to exceptional treatment on the ground of any special loss.

As the last speaker has very clearly shown, it really amounts to this, that whatever we do give will be thankfully received, but it is a case of "To him that hath shall be given, and from them that have not"—like some of us in the eastern colonies—"shall be taken away, even that which they have." I feel that we have been dealing with this question upon an altogether mistaken basis, and I deeply regret that Sir John Forrest should have declared his intention of supporting the amendment proposed by Sir George Turner, as that amendment intensifies ten times over—at least four times over, according to the number of colonies—the objections which many of us entertain to the recommendations of the Finance Committee. I can quite appreciate the view which my honorable friend has put, and the considerations that have influenced him in taking up that attitude. He says it is from considerations of delicacy. He wishes to avoid the brand, as Mr. Douglas said, of putting Western Australia in the Constitution as a colony receiving some special favour from the other colonies. Now, I ask Sir John Forrest this—If he feels a delicacy in supporting the proposals of the Finance Committee, ought he not to have fourfold delicacy in supporting the proposal of Sir George Turner, which is to give a sum—a douceur, if I may so express it—to Western Australia, but to unite in the receipt of the gift three other colonies?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I deny that absolutely.

Mr. SYMON. -

Does not Sir George Turner's proposal give that to Western Australia?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No, it only gives Western Australia security; that is all.

Mr. SYMON. -

The right honorable member is not addressing himself to the point I am putting. Does it not give exactly the same benefit to Western Australia as she would derive from the adoption of the Finance Committee's clause?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Certainly not.

Mr. SYMON. -

In what way.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I will tell you.

Mr. SYMON. -

Presently. I would like to hear Sir John Forrest presently explain how that is. As Mr. Henry says, it will give Western Australia a great deal more. Instead of being an average contribution, it will be, to put it roughly, a contribution as to an actual, not a relative, shortage.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

But only in the event of their being short.

Mr. SYMON. -

When Sir John Forrest gets up, I want him to explain in what respect does the loss to the people of Western Australia, which this Convention is ready to provide that the other states should make up-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I have asked particular questions a good many times, but you never answered them.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Mr. Symon will charge you very heavily for answering them.

Mr. SYMON. -

Because my answers are of value when they are given that way.

But I want Sir John Forrest to explain where this loss to Western Australia comes in. We have listened to Mr. Barton; we have had as exhaustive and careful an exposition of the subject from Mr. Isaacs as any one could wish to have. It is clear to demonstration that, if not all, at any rate a large proportion, of this so-called loss of Western Australia will remain in the pockets of the taxpayers of that colony. If that is the case, as undoubtedly it is, the whole point is that there will be some little trouble to the Western Australian Treasury. There will be a loss of revenue, a Treasury loss, to be made up, but the whole point is that the Treasurer of the colony of Western Australia will have perhaps a little more trouble and difficulty in arranging his financial position than he would have if he were able to look to the Federal Parliament for a contribution in cash to provide for his difficulties. The whole thing is that by this uniform Tariff you are providing for the compulsory remission of Customs taxation from Western Australia, and you want the other colonies to make it up. Now, just look at the absurdity of the position—you are remitting taxation in four of the colonies, and you are increasing taxation in the fifth colony. New South Wales is to have her taxation increased, while taxation in the other colonies is to be remitted; and, because you remit taxation in those other colonies, you are to charge it against the colony that will be over-taxed. To me, it seems to be the very wildest injustice that such a state of things should prevail, and I do not wonder at Sir John Forrest trying to avoid—and in that respect I quite sympathize with him—the appearance of the name of Western Australia for all time in this Constitution as associated with a transaction of that kind. I appeal to him, as representing a colony of great strength and boundless resources, to say that he does not want this assistance at all, that he is perfectly willing to rest on his own estimate of the future of Western Australia, and that he believes that this suggested loss will never result. It has been said that, if there are likely to be no difficulties on the part of the state Treasury of Western Australia, no harm can accrue from putting this proposal in the Bill, because there will be no deficiency to make up. But the argument is all the other way. If there will be no deficiency to make up, we do not want any provision of the kind, and, therefore, why put it in the Constitution? If there is some trifling, some small deficiency in regard to the resources of the colony, I am quite sure that no one has greater confidence in the elasticity of his own resources and revenue-producing country than Sir John Forrest himself, and I feel sure that when we come to deal with this matter of the special provision of the Finance Committee, Sir John Forrest will rather prefer not to have this sort of contribution made at all, but that he will rest content with the benefit his people will derive from the enforced remission of taxation, and that he will be quite prepared, when the time comes, to make up any deficiency by other ways and means in Western Australia. Now, sir, the position with regard to the surplus is a matter that I do not enter into, but if the facts are as stated, then the only effect of any possible remission of taxation under the uniform Tariff will be that the surplus will be to that extent diminished. There will be no difficulty in the Treasury then. The whole thing is a Treasury difficulty. It is not a difficulty to the people; it is not a loss to the people. It is nothing that comes out of their pockets which ought to be recouped, and, therefore, so far as it is merely a Treasury and financial difficulty, the surplus on the one side and the remission of taxation on the other will partially, or perhaps wholly, balance each other. I am sure that my right honorable friend, as he has had surpluses in the past, expects to have them in the future, and that, with the abounding prosperity of his colony, he has no fear as to what the result will be. I can also understand, with regard to my honorable friend's (Mr. Deakin's) amendment, that there is another objections and that is: That if it is made compulsory—and I do not remember what the exact words of it are—it enforces upon the Treasurer of Western Australia a particular mode of making up the losses caused by the remission of customs duties. If it is permissive it amounts to nothing, because it merely indicates a way by which, with the consent of the Commonwealth, this remission of taxation may be made up. I can quite understand that my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) would not be desirous either of having a compulsory method inserted in the Constitution, or of having a sort of direction given to him, as if he did not know his own business, with regard to the way in which he should find the money. I appeal to my right honorable friend to withdraw his support from the amendment of Sir George Turner. It does not get rid of the delicacy of feeling to which he has referred. Let us dispose of that, and treat this suggested scheme of the Finance Committee on its merits. I regard it, to use a word that has been employed before, as being indefensible. I feel most strongly that we shall be making up no loss, and that if this money is handed over it will simply mean presenting a gratuity to Western Australia. Still, if the honorable members from Western Australia desire it, I will vote for it being placed in the Bill.

I rise once more, most reluctantly, in consequence of the direct appeal made by the Hon. Mr. Holder, to whose opinion we all pay so much respect, and the criticism which he has offered upon a proposal that is not yet before the committee, but which has, during the course of this debate, received so luminous an exposition at the hands of the leader of the Convention. In reply to Mr. Holder, let me say that the whole of the weight of his argument, as against the amendment now before the committee in an indirect manner, lies in the fact that he assumes that the uniform Tariff to be brought into existence will necessarily be a Tariff of high duties. His argument implies a Tariff of high duties upon revenue-producing articles. I think he will admit on further consideration that, whatever may be the nature of the uniform Tariff, which none of us can exactly foresee, the implication that it will practically exhaust the sources of revenue in the colonies, by imposing as high duties as are possible without impairing the revenue on all commodities, is not one that is supported by his own reading of the necessities of the Commonwealth, his estimate of the amount of the Tariff likely to be levied, or by the forecast he has given us of the probable policy then to be pursued by the Treasurer of the Commonwealth. It is an extreme assumption that, be the Federal Tariff as protectionist as you please, it would not only be of such a nature as to satisfy the advocates of local production, but would actually exhaust in one act-to use a common phrase-the revenue-producing capacity of the Commonwealth. That, to me, is an assumption so extreme that it would need very powerful evidence indeed before I could accept it. The honorable member, as he usually does, has laid his finger on the weak point of the amendment as originally proposed, and the criticisms offered by the representatives of Western Australia, whom we all desire to meet as far as possible, have emphasized the same weakness, that is, in the power given to Western Australia, with the consent of the Commonwealth, to increase duties only upon goods which are not the produce of the other colonies. That is a desirable end to attain, and it is an end that we all hope to attain at the earliest possible moment. But the amendment might be acceptable to the representatives of Western Australia if a further addition were made to it, enabling Western Australia to retain her present duties on intercolonial produce, subject to a reduction in each year by one-fifth of the amount of the duties, so that at the termination of the five years, which we trust will see the end of the vexatious system of bookkeeping, we shall also see the end of the Western Australian Tariff, so far as it affects goods the produce of the other colonies. By these means Western Australia would still retain, with the reduction of one-fifth each year, the large revenue she now derives, and the certainly larger revenue she would derive during the course of the five years. The reduction to her would be very gradual; the dislocation of her finances would be prevented, and yet we would secure by steps that complete intercolonial free-trade without which federation could never be a reality.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No extra staff would be required.

Mr. BARTON. -
The Commonwealth officers would make the collections.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Yes, and the duties would be paid to Western Australia. I do not desire to discuss the amendment at length, because it is not before the committee, and feel that it would be unfair to interpose it in the discussion on Sir George Turner's amendment. If that proposal should fail, it will be my duty to submit the amendment altered so as to embrace a continuance of the duty on intercolonial products in Western Australia, reduced by a sliding scale until completely abolished at the end of the five years.

Mr. SYMON. -
You make that as all alternative to the extra-colonial duties?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
In addition to the power of imposing extra duties on goods which are the produce of countries beyond Australia, there should be a power to retain the duties on intercolonial products for five years, reducing them by one-fifth in each year, so that at the end of five fears they would entirely disappear.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I should be inclined to vote for the proviso that it is proposed should be added to Sir George Turner's amendment. I am, however, against the scheme to which it is sought to attach the proviso. But, assuming, as we must for the purpose of this particular vote, that the scheme may or may not be accepted eventually, I believe that the proviso will be an improvement to it, and for this reason: As the scheme at present stands, it is open to the same objection as those submitted by the Finance Committee and by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, namely, that the measure of net loss is altogether wrong. It is an artificial loss that is created; it is a balance obtained in a certain way that is deemed to be a net loss.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is a paper net loss.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, and that paper net loss may, under conceivable circumstances, as was admitted yesterday evening by my honorable friend (Mr. Holder), be, in effect, a net gain. And, therefore, inasmuch as what may, in fact, be a net gain, is to be deemed a net loss, it seems to me to be a wrong proposition and a wrong measure altogether. This provision comes in to say that whenever this artificial net loss shall, in fact, be a net gain over the amount actually received by the particular state in the year preceding the imposition of uniform customs duties, no money whatever shall be paid to the particular state. That, so far as it goes, seems to me rather an improvement of the schemes and for that reason I shall feel bound to vote for the proviso. The proviso, however, is couched in negative terms, and may seriously conflict with the preceding clause, because it says-"No payment shall be made to any state in which the revenue received from Customs and Excise after the imposition of uniform duties exceeds the amount received by that state before such imposition." if this particular form of words be retained it may seriously affect the operation of the preceding clause as to the surplus. While I shall vote for the proviso, I shall be prepared to vote against the new clause. On any ground the measure of the net loss proposed to be laid down-the standard proposed to be adopted-is wrong. As I understand, the states are not asking, and certainly I do not think they ought to ask, to be guaranteed their possible profits and possible gain. And that is what all the schemes do. The schemes say in effect-"During these five years we shall take two constant factors. We shall take the Tariff that the state had previously to the imposition of the uniform duties, and we shall take the uniform Tariff; and the variable quantity-namely, the goods-imported in each of these separate five years..."
shall be calculated as on each of these bases. And we shall take one from the other, and, if in a particular case it is found that the amount of money actually received under the uniform Tariff is less than would hypothetically have been received if the state Tariff were still in force, the state shall regard that as a not loss." Now, this is not a net loss. It is not a loss in the sense in which the states are asking for a guarantee or security against a diminution of their present revenue. The basis, I think, is wrong altogether, and this observation applies to all these proposals. Then we come to the proposal of Mr. Deakin. But before we consider that or any proposal, I think that all we ought to do—the position is difficult enough—is to see that each state does obtain some sort of guarantee on the face of the Constitution that it will not suffer any diminution of its revenue from what it received immediately before the imposition of the customs duties.

Mr. FRASER. -

We tried that and lost it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not lost altogether.

Mr. FRASER. -

Well, try it again.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We did not carry it in one clause, but, as pointed out by Mr. Dobson, it may well be made the subject of a subsequent clause. The position then is this: Does the proposal of Mr. Deakin—which is certainly deserving of the very best consideration, because it goes a long way, I admit, in the endeavour to solve the question—does the proposal effectually meet the case? In the first place, I point out that the proposal is to give Western Australia what is really a guarantee against loss in that state.

Mr. FRASER. -

She pays the money herself.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If we are going to give Western Australia a guarantee against the whole of her loss—not the extra loss remember—but against the whole of her loss, is there any reason why we should not give a similar guarantee to every state?

Mr. SYMON. -

No reason whatever.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We are going to give Western Australia by this scheme a complete guarantee against the whole of her loss—not the extra loss—that she sustains above other states. Now, I think every state could fairly ask for the same.

Mr. SYMON. -

You might just as well put in the Constitution a guarantee as to what the Tariff shall be.

Mr. FRASER. -

This is lawyers' splitting. There is no common sense in that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The next position to consider is that if this guarantee is given to Western Australia, not only is it unfair to the other states, but it amounts to an absolute determination not to give any guarantee whatever to any other state. Again, it will influence the other states adversely in other directions. First of all, it considerably vitiates the bookkeeping system. The object of the bookkeeping, or one great object, is to try and get data for the Federal Parliament, on which it can act after the expiration of the five years. How can you tell what the imports of Western Australia will be under a uniform Tariff if she has no uniform Tariff during that period? To that extent, therefore, the bookkeeping will be vitiated.

Mr. FRASER. -

It is only 21/2 per cent., 5 per cent., or 10 per cent. on the other Tariffs, and it is easily reckoned.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I have no doubt my honorable friend sees the applicability. He will pardon me if I do not. The next objection to the proposal is that it seriously affects the Tariff from the outset, because Western Australia, knowing that it has the right to come and bargain with the Commonwealth as to certain articles on which it will seek an extra Tariff, will have a very strong voice in determining what the nature of the articles will be on which the Commonwealth Tariff is to be laid. There will, therefore, be an inducement to urge arguments in respect of the formation of the common Tariff in the first place, not with a view so much to the general welfare, as with a view to get protection under this particular clause. And then, I point out, that it will vitiate the whole Commonwealth returns and imports in another way. It will be extremely difficult, especially if the clause with regard to the rateable reduction be added, in many cases, such as those in connexion with boots, clothes, hats, and so on, to distinguish with any degree of accuracy between colonial imports and foreign manufactures. We shall have a large amount of difficulty as to the rate at which goods shall be taxed. I would also like to point out that if you are going to have the present Tariff of Western Australia diminishing by 20 per cent. each year, as regards intercolonial products, you must necessarily make your Tariff as against the world higher than those rates otherwise you would have a low Tariff as against Queensland, if she does not come into the Commonwealth, and a high Tariff against a state which was a member of the Commonwealth. That would be unfair, and would be really offering a premium to Queensland or any other state to stand out of the Federation. For these reasons it seems to be very difficult indeed to adopt the system proposed. I do not pretend to have exhausted the objections, but these I have mentioned seem to be on the surface. They may be answered; and it may be shown that they have no real validity. To me they appear to be real practical difficulties which stare us in the face. I admit this scheme is not open to some of the objections to which the other schemes are open.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You can't have ideal justice. This is the nearest thing we can get.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I was going to point out how I think we might approach the matter; the object being, as I conceive it, to say to each state-"We will ask you to come into the Federation, and in order to secure your state Treasurers, we will guarantee to each one of you that you will not receive less during the first few years of the uniform customs duties than you were receiving previously to the imposition of those duties." Therefore, it seems to me that, without attempting, as Mr. Higgins says, the impossibility of attaining to ideal justice, what we can do is this-We can say that during each of the first five years of the uniform Tariff the Treasurer of the Commonwealth shall keep an account of all of the actual duties collected, or taken to be collected, in each year in respect of each state; put that amount down, and calculate what is a fair annual average receipt, or what really represents the average annual receipt, from such duties by the states, for a period which may be considered fair-it may be three, or four or five years-previous to the imposition of uniform duties; and that it shall then be stated that the average annual amount is the amount up to which the states shall be guaranteed, so that, if the actual receipts for any of those five years shall be found to be less than the average annual amount previously, the difference shall be made up to that state by the Commonwealth.

Mr. LYNE. -
That was the first proposal.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It has not been made during this session.

Mr. LYNE. -
It was made in Adelaide.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I have no doubt that the scheme might be made to meet the case of all the states.
Mr. HENRY. -

The same difficulty applies to this as applied to Sir George Turner's proposal.
Mr. ISAACS. -

No, because under Sir George Turner's proposal you have to guarantee prospective gains as well as prospective losses. We either must accept some scheme of this sort or else say that we are not going to guarantee the states at all. Is it contemplated that the states shall not have the loss made up to them! I think it was insisted upon and put pointedly by Mr. Holder that the necessities of the states would compel the Federal Parliament to make up the amount of their losses. If that is to be the case, it seems to me that that should be put in so many words on the face of the Constitution, and the proposal I have made would, it seems to me, put it in a fair and proper way on the face of the Constitution. We might, for instance, take the case of Western Australia for three or four years, and constitute the average upon that period. It might be that upon that average Western Australia would have received a million pounds a year from her Customs, and that she would have to be guaranteed a million pounds a year by the Federal Parliament for each of the five years. Then we should know exactly where we were standing, and there would be no temptation to doctor the Tariff to meet the particular case of Western Australia. We should have intercolonial free-trade from the start, and each colony would feel safe in going into the Federation. I feel, of course, that New South Wales may say that there is a difficulty in her case. But the difficulty in regard to Western Australia is one that exists, and we must face it. We must either say that the amount lost is not to be guaranteed to the states, or that the amount is to be paid by the Commonwealth Treasurer. We may be sure that the Commonwealth Treasurer and the Commonwealth Parliament will be able to adjust this matter in some way; and because we cannot say absolutely what they may do, I do not think we should shrink from guaranteeing to the states this possible loss, which guarantee I am sure will be of considerable effect in commending the Commonwealth Bill to the favorable consideration of the people of the Commonwealth. I have drafted a clause which I think would meet the case, and will read it to the committee. I do not say that I am satisfied with the wording of the draft, but I put it in this form because other proposals before the committee are similarly drafted, and I want to make my clause easily possible of comparison with the others. It is as follows:-

For each of the first five years after uniform duties of customs have been imposed the Commonwealth shall keep an account showing-
I. The amount collected and taken to have been collected in that state from duties of customs and of excise.

II. The net average annual amount collected in each state from duties of customs and of excise during the three years immediately before the imposition of uniform duties.

The former amount, if less than the latter amount, shall be deducted therefrom, and the balance shall be taken to be the net loss of the state for that year by reason of the imposition of uniform duties of customs and of excise, and by reason of the operation of free trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth.

The Commonwealth shall pay to each state the amount of its net loss.

I only wish to say, with regard to the period "three years," that that is only put in as a tentative proposal, and as a basis for discussion.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

I have hesitated to address the committee on the fiscal question, because I know I am one of those who hold opinions which do not command the support of anything but a hopeless minority of this Convention. I have never from the outset believed that the financial difficulty has been in any way solved by any proposal submitted to the Convention. I feel that the views which I advocate are not likely to receive the support of the majority of the Convention, but the discussion which has gone on for the past week has proved to me that the difficulties are so great as to force a considerable section to look around them, and even to come nearer to the views which I hold.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would point out to the honorable member that we are only discussing the question of special treatment to Western Australia.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I am well aware of that, Sir Richard; I have had a long parliamentary experience, and I know pretty well how to keep to the subject. My remarks will be quite pertinent to the matter, as it has been spoken to by those who have addressed the committee. In listening to the speeches, I have found that there has been a great deal of reiteration in them.

Mr. FRASER. -

Any amount.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

We hear the same points urged time after time, over and over again, and yet we seem to come no nearer to a solution of the difficulty. The speech of Mr. Isaacs just now is but a replica of other speeches made during this debate, but it seems to me that it does not show a way out of the difficulty which confronts us. We are all willing to give guarantees to the states if we can only see where honestly the money is to come from to pay the money guaranteed. I have not yet heard any honorable member favouring the guarantee proposal who has made any practical suggestion except Sir John Forrest. He is the only one who has honestly proposed or suggested any fund from which the amount guaranteed may be met but I do not think that that right honorable gentleman, on an examination of his own proposal, will believe that it is one which could be worked out. His proposal is that a fund should be raised by setting apart the territory upon which the federal capital is to be situated, and selling the land or leasing it, and from the fund so realized paying the amount of the guarantees to the states. But the right honorable gentleman will see for himself that a proposal of that character is one that will not stand investigation. Other proposals have been hinted at in the nature of borrowing the money, but I do not think that the Convention would agree to have embodied in the Constitution any proposal of the character that money should be borrowed from the very outset of the Federation for the purpose of meeting an obligation of this character. So that now we come back to the real point, which is that one section of the taxpayers must find the money to recoup another section of taxpayers. We must be prepared to accept either the proposal of the Premier of Victoria or the proposal which the Premier of Western Australia has agreed to; if there is a deficiency to be met in regard to one colony we must look for some means of meeting that deficiency, and it must come from the surplus of any colony having a surplus. How is the revenue to be raised? By taxation. If there is a deficiency it will be because one section in the Commonwealth is under-taxed, and if there is a surplus in any particular colony it will be because another section is over-taxed. Did any man ever hear of such a proposal as that the people who are over-taxed are to bear the burdens of the people who are under-taxed? Because the Western Australians under the new Tariff will not raise as much revenue as they now raise by their Customs Tariff, their people will not be paying the same amount of taxation as they are paying now. Therefore, under the new Tariff the Western Australians will be under-taxed as compared with the people of New South Wales. And it is proposed, because the people of Western Australia will be under-taxed, that the people in New South Wales—or, for the matter of that, the people in any of the other colonies who are over-taxed—are to subsidize those Western Australians, who keep in their pockets the money which would otherwise go in paying legitimate taxation. Surely the Western Australians

will be all the richer by not having this amount of taxation taken out of their pockets.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Better not have any; then we shall be rich.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I think that, as a matter of political economy, the right honorable member will admit that if he remits £300,000 worth of customs duties his people may fairly expect to have other taxation to that amount substituted. If, upon the establishment of federation, the people of Western Australia have to pay £300,000 less in customs duties than the amount now raised, surely they cannot complain if they have to submit to some other method of taxation. The proposal which presents itself to my mind as the best for dealing with this difficulty is that which emanated from, I think, Sir Samuel Griffith, who suggested that any colony which was likely to have a deficit should be allowed to impose excess duties upon seaborne goods. I would have no objection to the insertion of a provision to that effect with regard to Western Australia. I would be willing to allow that colony to impose excess duties for a certain period—say, five years—until the equilibrium of the finances was obtained. I have, however, never agreed with the financial schemes which have been submitted to the Convention, because I am of opinion that unless there is some fund which can be e

Question so resolved in the negative.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
After the division which has just been taken I see that it is hopeless to proceed with my amendment, and I therefore ask leave to withdraw it.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
I now propose to move the amendment already foreshadowed. I will not endeavour to attach the words which I propose to move to the words of this clause which we have already passed. But, in the event of my proposition being accepted, will ask permission to recast the words so as to make it harmonize with the rest of the clause. It is practically a substantive proposal. I beg to move-

To compensate the Treasury of the state of Western Australia for any diminution of revenue which might be caused by the imposition of uniform duties of customs, or by the operation of free trade and intercourse among the several states, the Commonwealth may, on the imposition of such uniform duties, and for five years afterwards, impose and collect on the articles, and to the extent agreed on between the Commonwealth and that state, further duties of customs in respect of goods originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth, and entering that state either directly or from another state.

To put it simply, that paragraph, which may be put either with what follows or singly, as the Convention prefers, gives to Western Australia, with the consent of the Commonwealth, power to impose additional duties on articles, which are the subject of duties in the Commonwealth, but any extra duty which is imposed on those articles will be paid to the state of Western Australia as compensation for any losses which it might incur by entering the Federation. The remainder of the clause deals with intercolonial duties, and is as follows:-

And notwithstanding the provisions as to free trade and intercourse between the states, the customs duties in the said state as existing at the time of the imposition of uniform duties upon goods not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth shall be collected five years with a deduction of 20 per cent. per annum.; (that is to say), with a deduction of 20 per cent, for the second year, 40 per cent, for the third year, 60 per cent, for the fourth year, 80 per cent. for the fifth year, and at the end of the fifth year customs duties on all such goods shall cease and determine.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Do you mean that that shall apply to foreign goods?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, intercolonial goods. On foreign goods the proposition is that if Western Australia desires to impose additional duties on foreign goods over and above those imposed by the Commonwealth, such duties may be imposed, and if so they will be solely for the benefit of Western Australia.
With regard to intercolonial duties, the proposition is that the existing duty shall remain, but shall be decreased 20 per cent. per annum. after the first year, so that in five years they will disappear altogether.

An HONORABLE MEMBER-Is that an alternative?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, it is supplementary. This offers a means by which Western Australia can assure itself, with the consent of the Commonwealth, that her finances will not suffer by a uniform Tariff.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

But it will kill intercolonial free-trade.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It will not. The honorable member might as well say that the bookkeeping system, of which some honorable members are ardent advocates, will kill free-trade for five years. The bookkeeping system will doubtless seriously hamper intercolonial free-trade. For five years, during the transition period of the Commonwealth, this scheme will in some degree interfere with intercolonial free-trade, but those who would refuse what they desire because they cannot obtain it at a blow—because it is offered in five stages—are not looking to the life of the nation, and to all that must accrue during its slow national growth.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Do you propose that Western Australia shall make up the loss partly by duties on intercolonial goods and partly by duties on foreign goods?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I propose that, if Western Australia so desires, with the consent of the Commonwealth, she can do that; but in no case shall she levy higher duties on intercolonial goods than exist at the time of the establishment of the uniform Tariff, and they are to be diminished by one-fifth each year.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The first part is optional.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, but the second part is absolute. If Western Australia does not desire to accept the first part of the proposal she has to decline it. But the second part of the clause as regards intercolonial goods would be absolute. The first proposal, as Mr. Symon put it, may be said to be permissive; it is subject to the desire of Western Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is optional.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes; the second part is not optional, because Western Australia, without further authority, will have the right to continue to levy duties on intercolonial goods.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is optional for Western Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, if Western Australia chooses to refuse it, it will be optional.

Mr. SYMON. -

It only operates as a gentle hint to the Treasurer of Western Australia as to what he ought to do.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, as to what be may do, and doubtless he will do it. I do not wish to detain the Convention, as this proposal has been discussed by the leader and one or two honorable members, and trust that it will meet with general acceptance. The alternative is that unless we accept this scheme, we are proposing to make a levy on states which are likely to incur a loss in the commencement of the Federation, for the purpose of handing the money over to another state which, according to the testimony of its own representatives, enjoys a large surplus. We continue to them the large surplus they at present enjoy by increasing our own deficit.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would like to make a suggestion, and that is that, as the amendment of Mr. Deakin consists of two paragraphs, they be put seriatim. That course of procedure would not deprive any honorable member of his rights. There are some of us who may vote for the first portion of the amendment—I think several honorable members think of voting for the first portion, but they have not considered the second portion of it sufficiently to have made up their minds on it, and it is not yet in print. I, for one, have not. As at present advised, unless convinced by some other argument, I shall vote for the first paragraph, but I should not like to be deprived of voting for the second paragraph afterwards, if, on full consideration of the matter, I deem it my duty to do so, but I should like an opportunity of considering the second paragraph, and if any amendment is proposed to leave out one part of this suggestion, it will have a more limiting effect on honorable members in their action than if the paragraphs are put seriatim. Supposing, for instance, the first paragraph is carried, and the second is rejected, some honorable members would not like the amendment in that shape to be put in the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We do not want the first paragraph without the second.

Mr. BARTON. -

But put it the other way. Some honorable members think that another addition might be made to this amendment, which might then be acceptable all round. There would be a better opportunity of doing that if you took the paragraphs seriatim. I always find that honorable members are freer when matters which involve substantive proposals are put seriatim.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

Supposing, Mr. Chairman, you put the amendment in paragraphs, and the first paragraph is carried, and the second rejected, have we no opportunity of voting again on the question that the first paragraph be added to

The CHAIRMAN. -

Oh, yes. I will point out that the present question is that the words which Mr. Deakin has proposed be inserted in the clause. If an amendment is moved on this amendment, and is rejected or accepted, then I shall put the question that what is left be inserted in the clause, so that any honorable member will have an opportunity of voting for Mr. Deakin's amendment as a whole or for part of it, if part is carried.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, if you put it in the way suggested, namely, if you put the amendment as a whole, leaving any honorable member to move the omission of any part of the proposal that he thinks fit, but if you put it paragraph by paragraph, and we agree, say to the first paragraph, that stands part of the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No; there is another stage, when I put the question that the whole amendment, or whatever is left, in case it is amended, stand part of the
Mr. BARTON. -

You, Mr. Chairman, will put each paragraph separately, and the question will be whether that paragraph stand part of the amendment, and whatever is kept, the question will then be whether that part be inserted in the Bill?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I am sure that I feel very much obliged to Mr. Deakin-and in saying so I echo the views of my colleagues from Western Australia-for the desire he has to give some consideration to the colony we represent, but I may say at once that the views expressed in the amendment do not command themselves to me. I see no advantage in giving the proposed power to tax foreign goods when it will be impossible to exercise that power. I have not the slightest doubt that the Commonwealth will tax foreign goods sufficiently high and that putting a provision in this Bill that Western Australia can tax them still higher is giving us a concession that we will never be able to exercise.

Mr. HOWE. -

That is common sense.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The Commonwealth will be, after all, the arbiters of the matter, for they will have the power, not the state. At the request of the state the Commonwealth may do this thing, but is it likely that the Commonwealth will do such a thing, or that the people of our colony will desire to be taxed on foreign goods only to a larger extent than any other part of Australia? To my mind, the whole thing is unworkable. That would be the result. Now, I should like to dispel an idea which seems to have got abroad, and is grasped at by some honorable members, that Western Australia enjoys an immense surplus of revenue. All I can say, after many years' experience as Treasurer of that colony, is that although our revenue has expanded in a marvellous way, still the demands for expenditure have expanded in a yet larger way, and there is more difficulty now, with a revenue of nearly £3,000,000 a year, in meeting the demands of the people, than there was seven years ago when the revenue was only £500,000. So that I hope no one will run away with the idea that we have more money in Western Australia than we know what to do with. Although our revenue is great, our demands are even greater still. I do not much appreciate the latter portion of this amendment either, providing a sliding scale.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That helps you a good deal.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I think it would be a cumbrous method, and not likely to find acceptance in our own colony. The only plan—the simple plan suggested by Sir George Turner—has been rejected, and this sort of half-and-half thing, which means nothing, it is desired we should put in its place. It has been asserted by many honorable members who will, no doubt, vote for this amendment, that Western Australia has no claim—that she has not made out any case for special consideration.

Now, why don't they stick to their colours? We do not, as beggars, ask for any concession, we only ask for what is right. I want honorable members to take that point of view. If they think Western Australia is entitled to nothing, why not vote to leave Western Australia in the same position as any other colony? For my own part—I have not consulted my colleagues on the matter—I do not give any adherence whatever to the proposal which has been so kindly made by my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin).

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

It is in the interests of your colony.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I beg to move—

That the word "shall" in the latter part of the amendment be omitted, with a view to the insertion of the word "may."

I do not see why Western Australia should be compelled to adopt a sliding scale system if she has no desire to do so.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

It seems to me that it is idle to discuss a proposition which does not commend itself to the colony whose special case we are considering.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I should not have spoken but that Mr. Deakin, who has had to leave the chamber, has put the amendment in my charge. I sincerely hope that the committee will not dispose of it in any summary way. I can quite understand the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, after being defeated on proposals which he preferred, feeling disinclined at present to accept any other suggestion but I think we may appeal to him, as so much turns on his veto in this matter, to consider whether the main idea of this suggested clause will not answer his purpose. If, as has been put by the Premier of New South Wales, it all depends on what Sir John Forrest will take or will not take, we may as well throw aside all idea of coming to any agreement which will be acceptable unless we go back to the scheme that has been rejected.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Or leave the matter to Sir John Forrest.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do, however, think that it is owing to the natural fatigue caused by a number of amendments being sprung upon him that the right honorable gentleman is unable to accept what appears to a good many onlookers to be really the only solution of this problem. After all, what is the problem? We have used the word "loss," and that has misled us. There is no loss. It is simply a dislocation of the finances for the time being which causes an inconvenience to the Treasurer of Western Australia. How does that dislocation of the finances arise? It arises simply from the fact that one-third or more of his revenue comes from duties levied on the products of the other colonies. Surely, if that is the reason of the dislocation, the proper thing to do is to mitigate that dislocation by a gradual sliding scale of reductions. What more common-sense proposal could be made than that? I feel strongly in favour of the second part of Mr. Deakin's proposal. Sir John Forrest has shown the weakness of the first part of it, with regard to the goods which are the produce of countries outside the Commonwealth, and I admit that it gives very little relief. But this proposal is divided into two parts. One part has been prepared by the Drafting Committee and not by Mr. Deakin, and is to the effect that, so far as regards goods originally produced outside the Commonwealth, Western Australia may, with the consent of the Commonwealth, put on extra duties. Sir John Forrest has pointed out that it is very unlikely, having regard to the feeling in favour of a reduction of duties in Western Australia, that more could be got by that means. The main dislocation would be caused by Western Australia not being able to get a revenue from oats, wheat, potatoes, and other produce imported from the other colonies. That is the main dislocation, and to avoid it or to make it gradual is the essence of this amendment. We do not want to have a violent dislocation of the finances of Western Australia, and there would be a violent dislocation by introducing intercolonial free-trade suddenly. Let us do that gradually, so far as Western Australia is concerned. This would only be a matter of five years, and not one new officer would be required for the staff.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

There would be a change of, Tariff every year. That is nothing, I suppose.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

With all respect to the right honorable gentleman, I think he misunderstands the position. It is not a question of a change of Tariff. He will have his Tariff when the uniform duties come into force in the Commonwealth. In the first year he would, under this proposal, get the revenue derived from the old duties, minus 20 per cent. In the second year he would get the revenue derived from the old duties, minus 40 per cent., and so on, until the end of the fifth year, when he would have to come on to a level with the other colonies. This is all the amendment means, and it is a reasonable proposal. It has been suggested that injustice may be done to those colonies outside the Commonwealth if the Federal parliament should impose lower duties than are now imposed in Western Australia. I take it the Federal parliament will be careful that it does not protect outside countries, as against any state of the Commonwealth. We may, in that respect, trust the Federal Parliament. Victoria, of all the colonies, is the most interested in the question of intercolonial free-trade with Western Australia, and I think I leave the concurrence of the Premier of Western Australia when I say that we are willing to trust the Federal Parliament far as regards the alleged danger of it Tariff being adopted that would protect outside countries as against any of the states of the Commonwealth. I think it will be an irreparable mistake, a profound pity, if at this stage of the discussion after we have considered so many schemes that were known to be absolutely unworkable, if we should reject a proposal which, at all events at first sight, has the elements of what is reasonable about it. I do hope that we shall not rest upon the statement of Sir John Forrest, made, I think, in haste. I say, with all respect, that I think the right honorable gentleman has expressed himself with a little haste. We are anxious to have Western Australia in this Federation. We want to have that grand country, with its endless resources, within the bounds of the Commonwealth at once, but we may, by having intercolonial free-trade right off be saddling ourselves with too big a task. It is quite possible to hasten more quickly by not insisting on free-trade in the first instance. I was struck by a speech made by the Hon. Mr. Walker yesterday evening. It is due to him to say that from him came the first suggestion that this is one of the solutions of the difficulty. I am glad that he has impressed the Convention so far that they have come to see that a gradual reduction of these duties, which is necessary for the purpose of preventing a dislocation of the finances, is the true solution of the difficulty.

Mr. CROWDER (Western Australia). -

I would like to point out how impossible it seems to me that Western Australia can in any way accept a sliding scale as proposed. If such a scale were accepted, the merchants of Western Australia would have to empty their warehouses at the end of every twelve months, otherwise the man importing goods in January would be able to undersell the man importing goods in December.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -

I would like to add my solicitation to that of Mr. Higgins, and invite Sir John Forrest and his colleagues to consider the proposal submitted by Mr. Deakin. I would like to call honorable members' attention to a phase of the question as naturally affecting Western Australia. As I understand it, those particular duties were introduced for the purpose of stimulating production in Western Australia. That was one of the objects in view in imposing duties on articles such as butter, bacon, bran, pollard, chaff, and similar produce. These duties, in connexion with the liberal land system, have no doubt attracted a great many producers to Western Australia. Under the proposal of the Finance Committee, intercolonial free-trade is entered on immediately, while under the proposal of Mr. Deakin intercolonial free-trade is gradually introduced under a sliding scale; and surely it will suit the producing interests and also the financial arrangements of Western Australia very much better to adopt the sliding scale. I doubt myself as to whether the proposal of the committee would be as effective as the proposal of Mr. Deakin in protecting the revenue, because, as a matter of fact, it was the large amount of loss to Western Australia, in consequence of the remission of the duties on intercolonial products, that led to the introduction of some special means of dealing with that colony. Now, the very best means which, in my judgment, could be adopted are those proposed by Mr. Deakin; and I do hope the suggestion of Mr. Higgins will be seriously considered by Sir John Forrest and his colleagues. I hope those gentlemen will take time to consider what effect the proposal

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I will only delay the committee one or two minutes, perhaps not so long. If this resolution is carried it will simply mean affording protection to a number of Victorian exporters of colonial produce to the extent of the difference between the external duty and the internal duty.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Are you speaking of the first part of the proposal, or the second?

Mr. GLYNN. -

They are both in a similar situation. Last year there were importations to the value of £6,500,000 into Western Australia. Of those importations, about £2,500,000 were of colonial produce.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

How much gold does that include?
Mr. GLYNN. -

I am speaking of other Australian produce. Gold is in a separate list, and therefore does not affect my argument. The amount of gold that would be imported to Western Australia from Victoria must be exceedingly small. As I have said, there was colonial produce to the value of £2,500,000 imported into Western Australia last year.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That included gold.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

There was £1,000,000 of gold in that.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That may, if correct, which I doubt, diminish the effect of my argument, but it does not destroy it. To, the amount of the difference between the external and the internal Tariff you are protecting the exporters from the other colonies as against the English exporters. There must, in many of the lines of goods, be competition at the present time. If a difference be made in the duties, the competition will be to a large extent in favour of the colonial exporters into Western Australia. South Australia might be benefited by this, but it would be an unfederal position to take up. Then you would practically take the money out of the pockets of the Western Australia taxpayer, because it would not go into the Treasury of that colony, but into the pockets of the manufacturers of the other colonies. It would be transferred from the Treasury into the pockets of the exporters.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You are not speaking of the sliding scale.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not care what scale Mr. Higgins is referring to. One proposition is a certain uniform Tariff, and the other proposition is to abolish the intercolonial duties by diminution over a series of years. But the moment you reduce the 20 per cent. duty against the external world to a duty of 17 per cent. in favour of colonial products, the difference of 3 per cent. undoubtedly is against the importers from abroad. To that extent the proposal is purely and simply protection; and that is a principle this committee cannot affirm.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would point out to the honorable member that the proposal only applies to goods which have not been imported from abroad.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I understood the proposal was to impose a heavier rate of duty for a time on goods imported from outside the colony.
The CHAIRMAN. -

That is the first proposition; the second proposition only deals with colonial products.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Unfortunately, I did not see the proposal in print, and my remarks must chiefly apply to the first part, in regard to which my argument holds true. Nevertheless, colonial products may in either case compete under more favorable conditions. It is no more than protection to the extent of the difference between the two duties, and the committee cannot support the principle. It has been said once or twice that Western Australia has no grievances, but that on the abolition of the intercolonial duties, the people will retain in their pockets money which previously they paid to the Treasurer. Put is that true? A proportion of the payment must, under the uniform Tariff, go to the Federal Treasurer, and a proportion will go to exporters in the other colonies. By the abolition of the Border Tariff you are giving protection to the exporters of the four other colonies. The money is not really kept in the pockets of the taxpayers, but a portion of it goes to the Federal Treasurer, and a considerable portion to the manufacturers, who take advantage of the abolishment of the Border Duties.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I think that by the process of exhaustion we shall shortly be forced to the conclusion that the best proposals are those laid before us by the Finance Committee. Certainly no honorable member has yet been able to satisfy a majority of this Convention that he can suggest anything better.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No one has been able to satisfy a majority of the Convention that the proposals of the Finance Committee are better than the other proposals.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I think we will be forced to accept the proposals of the Finance Committee, or, at least, that there will be no difficulty in regard to the particular proposal before us. Two reasons have been given against that proposal. One put out by Mr. Reid is that it is not acceptable to the very colony which it is intended to protect. The proposal is not submitted as a matter of right, but as a matter of expediency, for the purpose of securing the advocacy of this Constitution by the gentlemen who will be charged with the presentation of it for the consideration of the Western Australian public. When we are told by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest that the proposal is not acceptable to him, I think the best thing we can do is to take him at his word and reject it. I would like to go further and say that, so far as South Australia is concerned, the proposal is not at all acceptable from our point of view. It is all very well for my friend from Tasmania (Mr.
Henry), whose colony does a magnificent trade with Western Australia of something like £4,000 a year, to say it does not matter whether or not Western Australia imposes duties on intercolonial produce.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
He does not say that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I could well understand it if he did, and he would be perfectly justified in saying it as a representative of Tasmania. But I, in endeavouring to represent the views of South Australia, which does a much larger trade (second only to the trade of Victoria) with Western Australia, do not hesitate to assure this Convention that we look with satisfaction to the certainty that in connexion with the adoption of federation there will be intercolonial free-trade with the colonies, and particularly with Western Australia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
But if you cannot get it all at once had you not better take it gradually?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I think we can get it all at once, and we are prepared to accept the suggestion of the Finance Committee to pay the loss of Western Australia proportionately with the other colonies. We are willing to pay our share; but if we are to go back to our people, who have been looking forward to the throwing down of the barriers to free intercourse with our great and thriving neighbour in the West, and to tell them that while we are compelled from the time of the adoption of the uniform Tariff to throw open our markets, they are not to have an opportunity of obtaining access to the markets of Western Australia, they will, to say the least of it, be very much disappointed. I ask honorable members not to force us into that position, but rather to accept the statement of the Premier of Western Australia that the proposal is not acceptable to him.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No proposal is acceptable to him but his own.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I think, from what we heard as to the report of the proceedings of the Finance Committee, that we shall not have much difficulty in satisfying Sir John Forrest that ultimately he will do well to accept the recommendations of that committee. I do not hesitate to give the members of this Convention the assurance that a proposal of this sort now under discussion would materially increase any difficulties we may experience in securing the adoption of this Constitution by South Australia; and I trust that the scheme will be rejected.
Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

I assume that there is no intention to come to a division upon this subject before the adjournment. I hope that there is not, because I do most earnestly trust that the present position taken up by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest will, after reflection, be departed from by him. At all events, the right honorable gentleman may be assured of this: That, try as he may, try as any of us may, it will be absolutely impossible to act a scheme which would be acceptable to each individual in this Convention. We have been endeavouring all through to arrive at satisfactory results by compromise, and it does appear to me that the proposal now before us affords an opportunity of dealing with the special circumstances of Western Australia in a way which is much more likely to be satisfactory to the majority of this Convention, and to those who will have to deal with the matter hereafter, than any other proposal which has been submitted. I would urge Sir John Forrest to consider the position from the point of view of the other colonies. As far as Tasmania is concerned, I cannot speak positively, but I think that our people will take the view that if the alternative to this proposal is to be the arrangement suggested by the Finance Committee, they will unhesitatingly give their support to this proposal for the very simple reason that, in the one case, the difficulties of Western Australia are left to be dealt with within her own borders, and, in the other case, thousands of pounds may be drawn from Tasmania to make up the Western Australian loss. That is the position we have to face, and I ask the right honorable gentleman to consider whether it is fair, for the sake of obtaining a very problematical benefit, to force us into that position. The gradual adoption of intercolonial free-trade is, of course, not what we should desire. No one has been a more ardent advocate of free intercourse between the states of the Commonwealth than I have, as honorable members know; but it seeing to me that owing to exceptional circumstances we cannot obtain that very great boon all at once. Why, then, should we not do the next best thing, and obtain it gradually? I cannot understand the very strong opposition shown by honorable members from Western Australia, and I entertain the very earnest hope that after the interval for reflection between the adjournment this evening and our next meeting, and after having seen the amendment in print—because none of us have seen it in print yet—the Western Australian representatives will be prepared to accept the proposal as giving them very reasonable terms.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

After a sleep of twenty years Rip Van Winkle awoke, and not unnaturally wondered where he was. After listening for about twenty minutes to this debate I find myself in precisely the same position. I have been longing and hoping-hoping against hope-that I should get some assistance from the members of the Finance Committee which would help us to understand the position a little better. We have heard a lot of talk about the lawyers and the time they waste, and that sort of thing; but at least when they come to a conclusion it is clear and definite, and we know what it means. But my experience of the Finance Committee in Adelaide, in Sydney, and here is that you never know exactly what they mean, and they are never quite clear about it themselves. Of course, I know how hard it is for a man to make up his mind even when he really knows what he wants. No one is more aware of that than I am.
Mr. REID. -
   It is a good thing you make that admission or you would have got "a scorcher."
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   I am not a bit afraid of that. I suppose my right honorable friend (Mr.
   Reid) would have administered the "scorcher"?
Mr. REID. -
   No, I would have set Mr. Douglas on to you.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   It seems to me that we ought to get a little help from the Finance Committee which has worked so laboriously and has produced so satisfactory a report-
Mr. REID. -
   There is no doubt that the honorable member has been asleep. We have carried all our substantial proposals.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   No one in the Convention has a more perfect sympathy with the right honorable member than I have, so that if I have imitated him in going to sleep he will forgive me.
Mr. REID. -
   Of course accuracy is nothing to an essayist, but you must know that all the substantial propositions of the Finance Committee so far have been adopted.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   My right honorable friend will admit that I have been loyal to the Finance Committee. I have treated them as gentlemen eminently competent to come to conclusions, whatever doubt they may have about these conclusions after they have arrived at them. I thought that, in this particular, they had arrived at a determination by which they meant to abide. But have they?
Mr. REID. -
There is one man who is abiding by them, and he is myself.

Mr. HENRY. -
Are not the members of the Finance Committee who formed the minority to be allowed to express their opinions in the Convention?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I assume that the report of the Finance Committee does not express the views of every member of that committee, and, of course, every member of the committee has a right to express his views here. The painful thing is, however, that we hear only the views of the minority, so that we do not really know what the views of the majority are with regard to the proposal. The chairman of the committee seemed to think that he had done his duty when he told us that the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) objected to the proposal now before us.

Mr. REID. -
Since this proposal is intended to conciliate the colony of Western Australia, surely that is so. Who knows more about the requirements of Western Australia than the right honorable member?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
If I proposed to give a man £10,000, and someone else said that £5,000 was enough, and then the man said that he would not accept £5,000, I think that it would not be easy to determine exactly what should be given to him. To my mind, this matter is worthy of more consideration. I should very much like the right honorable member (Mr. Reid), who has proved himself to be so highly competent to assist us, to say something in regard to this matter. I do not pretend to be a financier I belong to that troublesome class of people who arrive at fixed conclusions by very bad processes. What I should like the right honorable member to say is whether he agrees to this proposal for assisting Western Australia, quite apart from the attitude taken by the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest)? After all, though we recognise that the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) is a great authority, and all-powerful in his own colony, we must admit that there may, some day, be a change of public opinion there, and we cannot be entirely dominated by the opinion entertained by the right honorable gentleman at the present moment. We all want Western Australia to join the Federation. I have hitherto stood loyally by the report of the Finance Committee, and I ask the members of the committee to stand by it.

Mr. WALKER. -
We are doing so.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Some of the members of the committee are doing so, but very few. We never know who is standing by it, and the public do not know. The Finance Committee bring down a report, and, without having considered it, we follow them loyally, but our loyalty is but ill regarded. I understand that the Premier of New South Wales stands by this report? I wish him to correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. REID. -

I am no longer the chairman of the committee.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Very well. Then the report is dead.

Mr. REID. -

No, the committee is dead, but the report lives.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

And the chairman, I suppose, lives for the purpose of supporting the report.

Mr. REID. -

The honorable member had better have a day with Sir John Forrest; he would make better use of his time by talking the matter over with him.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am maintaining the same attitude as I have maintained before. I agree entirely with the first part of the amendment proposed by the honorable member (Mr. Deakin), though I do not like the sliding scale. I am also willing to accept the report of the Finance Committee, not because I agree that it contains the best solution of the difficulty, but because I think that it provides a means for bringing about federation without substantial loss. There may be a slight loss, but it will not be much. Whatever conclusion we come to, I think that we might fairly ask those honorable gentleman whom we have trusted to such a large extent in this matter of finance to give us the best assistance they can, and either support their recommendations in a manner quite the reverse from lukewarm or abandon them altogether.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

So far as I have arrived at a determination in regard to this matter, it is my intention to support the first portion of the amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is the part we do not want.

Mr. BARTON. -

I know that, but the Convention has a duty to perform to itself. Because my right honorable friend says that he will not take this, and that he will not take that, we are not shut up to accept exactly that which he says he will take. We have to do the best we can, and I am sure he will agree with me when I say that all of us have to consider the interests and the opinions of our own electors as well as those of the people of the other colonies.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The honorable and learned member would not force this against the unanimous wish of all the representatives?

Mr. BARTON. -

I will state my own opinions, though I generally have to get my right honorable friend's permission to do so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The right honorable member thinks that he is in Western Australia.

Mr. BARTON. -

Even though the objection is expressed unanimously by the representatives of Western Australia, that does not prevent us from proposing what we consider to be a fair concession. It will be for the representatives of Western Australia to consider whether they will accept what we propose. We should be in a very peculiar predicament if, after having specially provided something for Western Australia, and included her name in the Constitution, her people were to turn round and say-'This does not suit us.' We should appear rather foolish if the Constitution were rejected in Western Australia because it did not give that colony enough, and rejected in the other colonies because it was thought by them that it gave Western Australia too much. That is the position which has arisen, and it is one to be reflected upon. I do not think a vote should be taken upon the matter to-night. In my own opinion, it would be against the wishes of the Convention to go any further at the present time. I might be prepared to vote against the proposal of the Finance Committee; if I did so it would be because I know that there can be no absolute finality at this stage, and because I hope that something better may be devised. So far as I call see, the first paragraph of the amendment is better than anything that has yet been suggested. I am doubtful whether I will vote for the second paragraph.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is a further protection to the eastern colonies.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, it is an attempt on the part of the eastern colonies to consider how far they can make this Constitution acceptable to their own electors as well as to those of Western Australia. If we put something in the Constitution which my right honorable friend may think right for his colony, but which we may know is not right for ours, and try to explain it to our electors-as the young lady tried to explain a certain occurrence by saying that it was only a very little one—we might find ourselves in difficulties in our own colonies, while at the same time we might not satisfy the aspirations of my right honorable friend's constituents. That would be a very pretty termination to our labours. For this reason I think that no vote should be taken to-night. Whether all honorable member is a senior representative of a colony, or whatever position he occupies, he should think twice before coming to a final determination upon this matter. In my opinion we are now at a state in our discussions when we should avoid anything that may seem quite conclusive. We have to determine what is the best course to decide upon. I am not saying that the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) is the best that can be adopted, but it strikes me as the best that has yet been suggested. I should like, however, to wait for even a better proposal. Under these circumstances, and without committing myself to any definite expression of opinion, I think I shall best discharge my duty to the Convention, and to myself, by moving that you, sir, do now leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales).—

I must dissent from the opinion of the honorable and learned member who has just sat down. This is not an ordinary question affecting all the colonies. What we are now discussing, is a proposal which has been made purely and simply to satisfy the people of Western Australia, and I hold that it is futile to discuss a question of this sort until we are fairly advised that the representatives of Western Australia will give the proposition advanced reasonable consideration. That was my reason for asking for an adjournment before. I must confess that now I think, on the whole, to-day's debate has done good; it may not have been time wasted; but I have not addressed myself to the proposals of Mr. Deakin at all, because at once Sir John Forrest practically disclaimed them. I imagine that between this and Monday it ought to be considered by Sir John Forrest whether there is any proposal at all that he could accept for his colony, and fairly and generously consider it as a solution of the difficulty. Otherwise it seems to me that it is perfectly useless to discuss it. The leader of the Convention says that we should discuss these proposals in the general interests of the Commonwealth, but the fact is that if there is no scheme that will apply to Western Australia, we have the simple reasonable solution of doing nothing.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at eight minutes to five o'clock p.m., until Monday, 21st February.
Monday, 21st, February, 1898.

Appeals to the Privy Council—Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at twenty-five minutes to eleven o'clock a.m.

APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

Some days ago, when discussing the question of Privy Council appeals, I referred to certain particulars which had been taken out with regard to a number of cases as indicating the time occupied in determining appeals from the various colonies to the Privy Council. I have been asked to lay these particulars on the table, which I have very great pleasure in doing. In all probability they will assist in enabling a speedy compliance to be made with the motion of which the Hon. Sir Joseph Abbott has given notice for a return on the subject.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Do these particulars relate to South Australia alone?

Mr. SYMON. -

No, to South Australia, Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland, Tasmania, and Western Australia.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

How many years do they cover?

Mr. SYMON. -

The last 30 years.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

If that is so they will give all the information I propose to ask for.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend's curiosity extends further than these particulars go. I have not gone into the interesting subject of cost. The particulars can be amplified in any way desired. I think they will be of great assistance, and they may dispense with the cost and delay of furnishing a more complete return. I lay this paper on the table, and I beg to move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from Friday, 18th February) was resumed on Mr. Barton's proposal for the insertion of new clause 93B (see page 1122), and on Mr. Deakin's amendment thereto (see page 1191).
Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I hope that we shall be able at an early hour this morning to bring this very protracted debate to a conclusion and to get ourselves out of the entanglement into which we seem to have fallen in respect to this particular clause. I think we all admit that, owing to the peculiar circumstances of Western Australia, it is desirable, if it can be done without injury or unfairness to any other colony, that Western Australia should have consideration shown to it. There are a large number of honorable members who agree that if this is to be done by way of compensation, New South Wales should not be made the only contributor and the only sufferer. There are honorable members representing other colonies who also feel that it would be unfair to them if they were made to bear, in addition to the loss of Customs revenue, a further loss by way of contribution to Western Australia. No member of the Convention admits more readily than my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) the injustice of making Tasmania contribute to any payment made to Western Australia in addition to making up her own loss on Customs. He has made no secret of that. He has said to me, in his usual frank and outspoken manner, that the representatives of Tasmania cannot possibly vote for the new clause upon which the Hon. Mr. Deakin has moved his amendment. The amendment does offer to Western Australia a means by which she can within her own boundaries and by an adjustment of the customs duties avoid any loss at all. It is fully admitted by the representatives of Western Australia, which is one of the richest colonies in the group at the present time, that it is highly improbable that there will be any loss. My honorable friend (Mr. Douglas) has pointed out one good reason why the loss, if any, should not be a heavy one, and that is the rapidly-increasing population in Western Australia. In addition to that she has such an abundant revenue and such prospects of increasing that revenue that she may very well be content to accept such compensation for any loss as she can get within her own boundaries. And it is quite clear that by adjusting the balance of her customs duties she could still get a sufficient revenue from her own people. At the same time, she would not be taking more money from them than she is doing at the present time. Mr. Deakin's amendment seems to me to point a way out of this difficulty, and I hope that it will be adopted. There is an objection to the latter part of the amendment on the ground that it delays that perfect inter-communication of trade that we all desire to see established. But it is not absolutely necessary that that method should be adopted. It is highly probable that that method will not be required. And even if it were required, my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) must admit that it would not be an unpalatable method to the colony be represents, inasmuch as Western Australia has had a predilection for taxing Australian commodities.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

She is not worse than you; not so bad.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Worse than Tasmania for this reason: That Western Australia has differentiated in favour of the foreigner against the other Australian colonies.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Where? We charge them all 20 per cent. alike.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Not a bit of it. Western Australia places foreign goods in a preferential position as compared with Australian goods. She charges lower duties on foreign goods than on Australian products.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

To stimulate our own industries.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

That is what it is called, but even with that virtuous intention there is no sufficient justification for Western Australia differentiating in favour of the foreigner against her own sister colonies.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I suppose you call Great Britain a foreigner?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I hope Western Australia will reform, whatever else may happen in regard to this matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Is Great Britain a foreign country?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Foreign compared with the colonies of Australasia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Not a bit of it.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I have carefully considered since we last met the various proposals that have been made, and it seems to me that the only basis for some satisfactory solution is in the latter part of the proposal of Mr. Deakin. I do not think it is worth while recapitulating the very grave objections to this preferential rate of duty on goods beyond the sea; nor do I think it is possible for a moment to consider the proposal incidentally made by Sir John Forrest that Western Australia should retain her own Tariff for the first five years. There would be one very grave objection to that, it seems to me.

Sir JOHN FORREST.
- When did I propose that?

Mr. MCMILLAN.
- I understood that the right honorable gentleman made such a proposal.

Sir JOHN FORREST.
- I never knew of it.

Mr. KINGSTON.
- The proposal is in the amendment before the Chair.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON.
- It is in the latter part of Mr. Deakin's amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN.
- That refers only to intercolonial duties. There is a similar objection to the way in which this latter part of Mr. Deakin's amendment is put. Although we shall have intercolonial free-trade ourselves, I take it that New Zealand and other parts will be dealt with exactly the same as foreign countries, and that under the Tariff that will be framed, if it is to be a protective Tariff, practically every article which is produced in these colonies will come under it; that is to say, it will be protective against wheat, potatoes, and all produce outside Tasmania and Australia. Now, it seems to me that it will be far better to have the uniform Tariff applying all round, Western Australia taking the risk under it, than to continue two Tariffs alongside of each other. I should, therefore, propose, if it would be likely to meet with acceptance, that the Tariff of the Commonwealth should be applied all round, with a sliding scale with regard to the intercolonial duties, and that if there is no duty on a particular article Western Australia should take the risk. I do see a very grave objection to carrying on, even for the purpose of getting over this difficulty, the old Tariff of a state. Of course, I know that this proposal opens up the difficulty that we do not know what products will be made dutiable from beyond the sea; but at the same time I think it would be a much better basis than the one we have before us. Therefore, I have risen simply to suggest that we should approve of the latter part of Mr. Deakin's proposal as an adjustment of the difficulty, but that, in my opinion, it will be better to take the new uniform Federal Tariff instead of the old state Tariff.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia).
- I think that the latter part of Mr. Deakin's proposed amendment is even more objectionable than the first part. What does it mean? It means treating our western sister as a foreign element in the Federation for five years; in other words, it is destroying that union to which we are looking forward. I think the second part of the amendment is decidedly the worse part, but even to the first, looking at it carefully, is an impossible proposal. It will puzzle the world at large as to what the Tariff of Australia is. The world at large, with which we hope to do better business when we are federated, will be more puzzled than ever. It will say-"It was possible to understand things before federation, but now it is impossible to make out the difference between the treatment of goods going to the Commonwealth and goods going to Western Australia, a part of the Commonwealth." The proposal of the Finance Committee is much better than any proposal made since, and it is infinitely preferable to the scheme now proposed.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is damning the Finance Committee's proposal with faint praise.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Well, no one thinks it a perfect scheme, it makes one feel bad; but this proposal makes one feel sick. It will be better to settle the claim of Western Australia at once, and go in for Australian union forthwith in a way that the world at large will be able to understand, than to adopt what would be looked upon as simply a complicated puzzle.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I quite agree that this proposal of Mr. Deakin's is vicious in every part. It is bad root and branch. I do not intend to go over the ground traversed the other day, but I would point out again that this proposal means simply handing over to Western Australia a sort of banner which she may - I do not say she will - flaunt in the face of our people, proclaiming that our goods are liable to be doubly taxed as compared with all foreign imports. Secondly, it will be placing something on the face of the Constitution utterly destructive of the cardinal principle of free interchange between all the colonies which we are endeavouring to build up. It may be said that the system proposed is only to last for five years. But we shall be told in five years, very likely, that the inter-colonial trade with Western Australia has fled altogether. You are covering a period of five years in regard to that trade, and at the end of that time the necessity for any special provision may have disappeared altogether. Even if Mr. Deakin's proposal were adopted there are one or two amendments which my honorable friend will find it necessary to make in it. There is one point in particular, and it is this: Instead of dealing with what is the average net loss, you are taking into consideration the whole of the revenue of all the different colonies in the Federation in order to make up every shilling of the actual diminution.
of revenue to which Western Australia may be subject. That, I say, is a very grave defect. It is simply blotting out Western Australia from the Federation just as much as though she did not go in at all on the establishment of the Union. It would be far better and be more consistent-deplorable as such a state of things would be—that Western Australia should stand aside for five years, than that we should have such a lop-sided provision from the trade point of view as this would be. The provision may be regarded as standing on two legs, both of which are equally bad, the two being as to extra-colonial and intercolonial duties. Then I would point out that the imperative part of the latter provision of the proposal should be permissive like the first part, so as not to impose it upon Western Australia as a condition to maintain these intercolonial duties. For these and other reasons which I have dealt with before I intend to vote against both provisions of this amendment, and against the amendment as a whole. I would rather see a general provision inserted if it is desired that Western Australia should come in on such terms, leaving her free to frame any Tariff she pleases, or to collect her revenue in any way she pleases, during the five years. That would be less objectionable on the face of this Constitution than holding up a declaration that free-trade between the colonies is to be a myth. I would ask honorable members, in dealing with the Finance Committee's proposals, to consider whether it would not be preferable as regards Mr. Deakin's amendment that we should obliterate all special reference to Western Australia in the Constitution. Of course, the proposal of the Finance Committee arises from a consideration of the special position of Western Australia, but the principle is that it is desired to make up to the state having the largest proportionate net loss above the average net loss of all the states, that excess proportion of net loss. There is no necessity whatever for inserting the name of Western Australia. Therefore I would suggest the following amendment, as one which I shall be prepared to move at the proper time, so as to provide instead of mentioning Western Australia-because in two or three years Western Australia might not be the particular colony with the largest amount of proportionate not loss—that the particular colony with the largest excess of average net loss should be the colony to be treated specially by the Federal Parliament. That colony at present is Western Australia, but it might be in two or three years' time Tasmania, or South Australia, or Victoria.

Mr. WALKER. -
Not New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON. -
She is such a wealthy colony that we can never predicate her sustaining any such loss of her revenue.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
She might if she puts a Tariff on before she comes into the Union.

Mr. SYMON. -
My right honorable friend surely does not consider that to be a very hopeful contingency. My amendment would be to strike out the reference to Western Australia in the suggestion of the Finance Committee, and then at the end of the second paragraph, and in lieu of the third paragraph, to insert the following words:-

The Parliament shall have power in such manner as it thinks fit to make good in each year to the state, if any, whose proportionate net diminution of revenue for such year is most above the average net diminution of all the states, the excess of the proportionate net diminution of that state above such average; provided that such excess for the first of such five years shall be the maximum to be made up for each of such five years to any state.

The latter part is inserted because, otherwise, if the population of Western Australia increased of course her average net loss would immensely increase. There is no doubt about that. The increase would go on arithmetically progressing. We must guard against such a contingency as that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
You still guarantee the gains.

Mr. SYMON. -
No, I think not. The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) asks where is the money to come from, but we have already debated that question at great length. The advantage of my suggestion is that it empowers the Parliament to deal with the manner in which this excess diminution must be made up.

Mr. LYNE. -
The Parliament will have to find the money.

Mr. SYMON. -
Yes, but not necessarily out of the coffers of New South Wales. The remission of taxation to one colony in order to get the money from another colony upon which heavier taxes are imposed does not commend itself to one's sense of justice, but if we are to arrive at a solution of the difficulty we must either adopt something in the nature of the suggestion of the honorable member (Mr. Deakin), Something which goes a little further, or the recommendation of the Finance Committee. I should like to see the recommendation of the Finance Committee carried into effect. The principle of that recommendation is that the colony making the largest average diminution of revenue should be specially considered.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It is only a hypothetical loss, which may be an actual gain.

Mr. SYMON. -

If it is an actual gain you do not make it good.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Under the recommendation of the Finance Committee you would have to do so, because it would be a hypothetical loss.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is not the way the financiers have been treating the matter in the Convention. By my proposal you get rid of the difficulty which the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) feels, in that you are not pillorying Western Australia in the Constitution.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We are saying what we mean.

Mr. SYMON. -

No; what we mean is that the colony which suffers shall be recompensed. It may not be Western Australia which will need this consideration.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We would not put any provision of this sort into the Bill if we had not the case of Western Australia under consideration.

Mr. SYMON. -

I admit that the reason for this provision is the position of Western Australia, but the representatives of that colony say-"We do not want to see the name of the colony in the Constitution in this connexion." Therefore, let us be content with embodying the principle of the Finance Committee's suggestion without the name of the colony of Western Australia. The principle of this recommendation is, I think, contained in the amendment which I have just suggested, and which I shall be prepared to move at the proper time.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -

I have heard all the propositions which have been submitted to us on this clause. They have been many, and have shown great ingenuity upon the part of their propounders, but I think that the only one which can recommend itself to our sense of equity and justice is that of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin). It may at the first glance appear, to borrow the phrase of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon), to pillory Western Australia, but I think it does so only to a limited extent. It will enable the people of Western Australia to recoup themselves for any loss of Customs revenue without inconvenience to themselves and without doing injustice to any industry. Looking at the matter in an equitable spirit,
I feel that none of the other proposals which have been submitted to us can be considered fair and just to the the other colonies. Although the proposal might place the Treasurer and Parliament of Western Australia in some little difficulty at first, I do not think that that difficulty, when fully considered, will be found of vital importance. The extreme sum that it is anticipated will have to be made up to Western Australia is £378,000 per annum, the amount now collected from customs duties there exceeding £1,000,000. This being so, it is not probable that state would have any practical difficulty in recovering through the medium of the Customs a sufficient amount to make up any loss, and it would stand in an absolutely just and fair position before the federal community. It would have asked for no concession from the Federation, and any loss would be made up entirely by its own resources. It is provided that the collection of special duties by that state shall be subject to the consent of the Federal Parliament; but I do not know why we should put that provision into the Bill. It seems to me that we might give the colony of Western Australia absolute liberty to deal as it likes with the Customs, in order to obtain the sum required without reference to the Federal Parliament. In every other respect, however, I shall support the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) as being fair and just, and the only practical solution of the difficulty which has been vexing us for so many days.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

The proposal made by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) does not, as I said on Friday last, meet with my support - at any rate, the first portion of it does not. I do not think we should be able to avail ourselves of it, and it might have the effect of doing us injury rather than good, because it gives us power to put up an extra barrier against foreign producers, and if we did that we should only be giving a greater amount of protection to the products of the other colonies. As I feel sure that we should be unable to avail ourselves of any provision of this sort, I think it would be unwise to cumber the Bill with it, and therefore I intend to move the emission of the whole of the first part of the amendment. I also propose to move several amendments in the second portion, in order to leave it optional with Western Australia to collect the same amount of revenue as is collected before the establishment of the uniform Tariff. The amendment as it stands makes it compulsory to do this.

Mr. SYMON. -

My suggested amendment would meet the right honorable member's objection. It substitutes "may" for "shall."
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We are sometimes told that "may" and "shall" are identical terms. However, I intend to make the amendment quite clear. I propose to make it read in this way:-

Notwithstanding the provisions as to free trade and intercourse between the states, the customs duties in the state of Western Australia as existing at the time of the imposition of uniform customs upon goods not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth may, if that state thinks fit, continue to be collected for five years with the deduction of 20 per centum per annum; that is to say, with a deduction of 20 per centum for the second year, 40 per centum for the third year, 60 per centum for the fourth year, 80 per centum for the fifth year. At the end of the fifth year customs duties on all such goods shall cease and determine.

I should have preferred a longer term than five years, and to have had no sliding scale, but I realize that if we cannot get all we desire, we should try to meet honorable members and get what we can. I have already pointed out the difficulties of Western Australia, and I am glad that they have been generally appreciated. The Premier of New South Wales has expressed himself to the effect that the case of Western Australia is surrounded by much difficulty, inasmuch as she has no great incentive to join the Federation, seeing that at the present time she has not much to export except timber. Although the amendment does not go as far as we should like, it is one which I think we may fairly accept. It will give us power, if we so desire, to continue the duties upon produce and other manufactures imported from the other colonies, these duties being reduced gradually, until at the end of five years they will disappear altogether. It does not follow that we shall use this power, but still, if it is found necessary so to use it, it can be used in the interests of the colony. I hope that if there is a considerable majority in favour of the amendment, it will be passed without much delay, so that we may then go on with some other part of the Bill. I do not think any one can object to the provisions in the amendment, because there is very little likelihood of the duties coming out of the pockets of others than the consumers of Western Australia. Of course it is contended that duties are not always paid by the consumers, but in this case they will be paid chiefly by those who consume the goods that are imported. I take some exception to the attitude which has been assumed by several of the representatives of Tasmania in regard to this matter. It would, of course, be very hard for Tasmania to have to contribute towards the loss of Western Australia. If there is to be any contribution, it would no doubt be fairer that Western Australia should contribute to Tasmania.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
We have not asked for that yet.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

When the honorable member told us that the policy of Western Australia has been to relieve the foreigner and to tax the people of Australia, he was a long way wide of the mark. I do not look upon the mother country as foreign. If we owe an obligation to any one it is not to Tasmania, but to the great mother country, which protects us, and to which we owe our national existence and our liberties.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

What about the tea and sugar producing countries?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Our aim has been to help the local producers, and articles of food in general use which we cannot produce in our own colony we have admitted free. For this reason tea and sugar have been placed upon the free list. I think that those who are protectionists to the extent of desiring to foster local industries will not quarrel with me when I argue that articles of food which cannot be produced in the colony should come in free of duty. Of course I prefer the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs). I think that is a reasonable proposal, which will probably cost nobody anything. At the same time, it will be a great lever in our hands in advocating the acceptance of this measure, because we can see that if the worst comes to the worst, at any rate, we shall be guaranteed a certain amount during the next five years. I do not think that is unreasonable, considering we are handing over the great source of our revenue, the Customs, which is nearly all profit. It is not unreasonable to say that during the first five years of the working of this new machinery, the Commonwealth will take care that no difficulty or disaster will come upon us by reason of our giving up this great, engine of revenue. I intend to move that the first nine lines of Mr. Deakin's amendment be struck out.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

It appears to me that something will be accomplished by striking out these words which will be undesirable, and which I should say the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest does not want. He says he does not see any prospect of giving effect to the first part of the amendment, because the effect would be to protect the local producer as against the producers outside the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I did not say that.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I understood the honorable member to say something to that effect. At any rate, if it is struck out the effect will probably be to protect the outside producers against producers inside the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No. The second part of the paragraph will really be the minimum possible Tariff.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It seems to me, reading the amendment as it is, that the Commonwealth Parliament may permit the Western Australian Tariff to remain as it is with reference to intercolonial products, while the uniform Tariff of the Commonwealth might be very much lower than the Western Australian Tariff.

Mr. LYNE. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It seems to me that that is possible. If so, what would happen would be that the producer outside the Commonwealth would have protection against the producer inside the Commonwealth, because it will be cheaper to import some products from outside the Commonwealth than it would be to import from the neighbouring colonies, because the duty would be higher between the states than between the whole Commonwealth and producers outside.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You could not force us to put on the duties.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

No; but the Commonwealth might permit the duties to remain in order to reduce the loss which would be entailed in Western Australia by the change in the Tariff. However, I think that is highly improbable. I do not think that the Commonwealth would create such an anomaly, still the power to do so appears to be given; whereas, if the clause were carried as it now stands it would give the Commonwealth Parliament power to equalize the duties by empowering Western Australia to collect higher duties from abroad than from the other sections of the Commonwealth. I do not propose to occupy any more time, but it seems to me that this anomaly does exist. I shall vote against striking out the first portion of the amendment.

Mr. HENRY (Tasmania). -

I am sure every honorable member must have been highly gratified at the attitude taken up by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest. It is only another evidence of the reasonableness which has distinguished him in the consideration of this financial question, The object we have in view, as practical men, is to satisfy Western Australia; to enable her delegates to go back to their colony and say-"We have such terms in this Bill, from a financial point of view, as will justify us in recommending it for acceptance by the people." I do not propose to enter into the question at any length, and, seeing the stage we have arrived at, it is not desirable to reply to arguments which have been used, although I attempted to do so. Seeing, however, that the parties most ultimately concerned are satisfied, and seeing that our one object has been to introduce a reasonable provision into this Bill which will satisfy Western Australia and will not operate unjustly on any other colony, I think we have reached a stage when we need not enter into any further argument. The great recommendation of this proposal as compared with the proposal of the Finance Committee is that under the last half of Mr. Deakin's proposal Western Australia will bear her own burden of taxation. Under the proposal of the Finance Committee she would have called upon other colonies to bear a share of the taxation which she would escape. I urge upon Mr. Deakin that he should withdraw the first portion of his amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There will be no objection to that.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I have no objection whatever to withdraw the first part.

Mr. HENRY. -

I think that will be the better course, seeing that Western Australia is satisfied, and we shall then be able to get on with other important business.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I am quite prepared to accept Mr. Deakin's proposal if it is distinctly understood that this is not intended as a proposal upon which something else is to be built afterwards. If this is simply paving the way for subsequent proposals to extend all round these terms which we are now, as a special measure, giving to Western Australia the case will be quite different. As I said a few days ago, I believe Mr. Deakin's proposal in the case of Western Australia is the better one, because it certainly has the great advantage of leaving it to the people themselves to find the money to make up the difference; but if this is intended as the foundation stone for subsequent proposals, so as to make this a bargain all round against intercolonial free trade, I should strongly object to it.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

No, no.

Mr. REID. -
On that understanding I will support it.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I hope there will be no such understanding as has been suggested by the Right Hon. Mr. Reid. I trust that if we are going to concede to Western Australia the privilege of maintaining her customs barriers against her sister colonies that the same privilege will be extended to the other colonies.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

No.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I claim it undoubtedly on behalf of South Australia. I do not hesitate to assure honorable members that there will be a profound feeling of disappointment if anything of the sort suggested is given effect to.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

It is only for five years.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Only five years in the case of the richest colony of the group, for the purpose of, as has been suggested by my right honorable friend, protecting her own industries at the expense of those who are desirous of extending their commercial relations with her.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But if she does not come in you will be just in the same position.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I have no doubt that Western Australia in due course will come in, and she is just as well prepared to come in as any other colony. I hope the Premier of Western Australia will withdraw from his present attitude. What is proposed by the Finance Committee is this: That we, even the poorer colonies of the group, are prepared to pay our share in order to secure, in the earliest stages, all the advantage of federation—that is, intercolonial free-trade—throughout the whole of the Commonwealth. If we are to return to the colony from which we come and inform them that they who looked so long for the benefits of intercolonial free-trade, which is really the greatest advantage to be secured by federation, are to be still further put off before it is accomplished, I venture to say that we will return with a scheme which will not augur so brightly for the future of federation as we could desire. I claim that all the colonies should be treated alike. If there are matters with regard to which Western Australia requires special treatment, some of us at least representing South Australia are prepared to support the proposal s of the Finance Committee; but we regard the sort of combination which at this moment seems likely to be effected between the representatives of Western Australia and the representatives of Tasmania, who do little or no trade with the great colony of the West, as an alliance which may be fraught with the worst results to those who are more fortunately situated at present, and who do a large and important trade, which they think ought to be benefited by the adoption of federation, which we are here to accomplish.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I only wish to say one word in reply to my right honorable friend—that South Australia has done her trade with Western Australia even under the existing Tariff.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes, under difficulties.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And surely with a steadily reducing intercolonial Tariff South Australia may reasonably hope to do even a larger trade. In reference to what was said by the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, I do not desire to be placed in any ambiguous position. A proposal has been already submitted by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, and indirectly voted upon, which would have the effect of providing similar treatment to all the colonies which might suffer loss, and I voted for that proposal. If such a motion is proposed again I shall be compelled to vote for it. But, as far as intention is concerned, this motion was not proposed by me with any such ulterior purpose. It was simply submitted as a solution of the difficulty which confronted us. The manner in w

Mr. SOLOMON. -

The magnanimity which you refer to consists in consenting to be allowed to do exactly what they please.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, Under the iron limit of five years, with an absolute reduction of 20 per cent. in the duties each year.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

No; he has put in the word "may."

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is, as to taking advantage of it. I noticed that one of the members from Western Australia (Mr. Crowder) made a point as to the commercial difficulties that might arise. If so, this introduction of an optional provision will leave it open to Western Australia, if she thinks it might be to her advantage not to employ the provision—not to put it in force. It has not the effect that the honorable member (Mr. Solomon) has indicated.
Mr. REID. -
And under your proposal the extra revenue they may require will come out of Western Australian pockets,

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It will come out of the Customs, at all events. Under these circumstances, I ask leave to withdraw my amendment with a view to moving it in another form.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I now beg to move-

Notwithstanding the provisions as to free trade and intercourse between the states, the customs duties in the said state as existing at the time of the imposition of uniform duties upon goods not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth may be collected for five years with a deduction of 20 per cent. per annum; (that is to say), with a deduction of 20 per cent. for the second year, 40 per cent. for the third year, 60 per cent. for the fourth year, 80 per cent. for the fifth year, and at the end of the fifth year customs duties on all such goods shall cease and determine.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
As the amendment comes up from the Finance Committee there need not of necessity be a single penny to pay Western Australia. Western Australia was only to be paid if the imposition of the uniform duties created any loss.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Or any alteration in trade.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
And it did not follow at all that any loss, would be created or that one penny would have to be paid to Western Australia. On the contrary, we have the assurance of the Premier of Western Australia himself, who is the man best able to judge, that there would be no sum to pay at all-that really no difference would be made. So we have before us a recommendation which, however anomalous it may appear in form, still, in substance, recommends itself to Western Australia as allaying those fears, and which, I thought, the majority of us were prepared to accept. Now we have got something which the Premier of Western Australia is congratulated on, but for the life of me I cannot see where the congratulation comes in. Under the proposal now before the committee Western Australia gets all the uniform duties and all benefits which Sir John Forrest says would, in his opinion, be enough to pay him.
Mr. SYMON. -

For losses which may never occur.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

For losses which may never occur. First of all, we give the Premier of Western Australia what he says he is satisfied will compensate him for any possible loss, and, having done that, we give him the right to levy additional duties on his own account, and then congratulate him on his generosity, because, forsooth, he brings the duties to nothing in five years, having got the full amount in the first year, 80 per cent. in the second year, and so on. I recognise that Sir John Forrest is a reasonable and fair man, and I appeal to him not to try and force this amendment. I can understand the amendment is satisfactory to my friends in Tasmania, because they have nothing to do with it.

Mr. HENRY. -

They have nothing to do with it!

Mr. REID. -

Tasmania exports £4,000 worth of goods to Western Australia.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Tasmania has practically no business with Western Australia.

Mr. HENRY. -

There is very considerable business.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Tasmania, whose interests are not concerned at all one way or another, accepts this amendment, because it quietens the fear of having to subscribe to a continent loss—a very contingent loss—which Western Australia might sustain. The colony most materially interested is South Australia. Not only is Western Australia, as I have said, to get the benefits of this Constitution, which Sir John Forrest thinks will prevent his colony sustaining loss at all, but she is to have the right to impose duties for five years, with a result that will be exceedingly disastrous to the colony I represent. I sincerely hope we will either adopt the report of the Finance Committee, or adopt nothing at all. From the first, I have thought that it was either a case of doing something in the direction the committee recommend, or of saying to Western Australia—"You have no right to any consideration at all."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Supposing we don't come in at all.

Mr. SYMON. -

You would be very sorry for that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

After all, there would be a time when you would have to say you were very sorry.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
This amendment is better than not coming in at all.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I don't know; it is better for Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Better for you.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I don't see that at all; but, however, I do not know. What I say is, that when the Finance Committee give us a recommendation which, whether logical or not, we can easily understand-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Very difficult to understand.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
It was straightforward.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
It was quite straightforward, and it recognised the special claims which Western Australia set up, and it ministered unto them. Now it is proposed to minister unto their other claims.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The money would be taken out of the pockets of the other states; that is our difficulty.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
The Premier of Victoria suggested that money should be borrowed for the purpose of starting the Commonwealth as a new working concern. Even that would have been better than the proposal now before the committee. In fact, I do not know anything that would not be better than the anomalous position of intercolonial free-trade in all the other colonies, leaving out the colony which is considered the most rising one of the whole.

Mr. WALKER. -
It is an anomalous position we have to deal with.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I still hope that, in spite of the opinions that have been expressed, the committee will not adopt the amendment.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
In the form in which the honorable member's (Mr. Deakin's) amendment is now presented I am prepared to support it, and I should like to explain particularly why. I do not understand its being put forward as a substitute for a general guarantee. Nor do I understand that it would stand as a guarantee, even for Western Australia, such as that state and the other states deserve, and, I think, must have, in this Constitution. I would like to point out why I welcome this, or any proposal, which will effect a desirable and necessary object. When this proposal by Mr. Deakin has been disposed of, I shall move the amendment which stands in my name. That amendment provides a guarantee, and an effectual guarantee, against loss, but not a guarantee against prospective gains. The guarantee-which I referred to the other day, but which I shall not debate at length now, because I shall have an opportunity presently-would be a guarantee to the states that during each of the five years immediately succeeding the imposition of uniform duties, they would not get less than they had for, say, an average period preceding the imposition of those duties. I will point out, when I come to deal with the matter, how there need be no injustice at all, even in New South Wales, but that there is only an apparent difficulty in the way. My proposal, however, even if adopted, leave, one difficulty which I think Mr. Deakin's amendment gets over. The difficulty is that in imposing a Tariff, or any taxation which will afford a guarantee and afford the Commonwealth the means of paying the states the amount of that guarantee, it will be difficult not to give to any one particular state just the right amount without leaving other states with either too much or too little. In the case of all the states except that of Western Australia the position can be pretty accurately gauged. In the case of Western Australia there must be left a gap of some sort. The proposal of Mr. Deakin just fills up the gap and enables the general guarantee to stand for all the states, including Western Australia, for what we call the proportionate net loss, and yet enables Western Australia to make that loss up out of its own pocket, so to speak, without calling on any of the other states to contribute to extra or excess loss which may be sustained. On that ground, therefore, I am prepared now to support the amendment in this particular form. The honorable member (Mr. Reid) has said he is no party to any bargain, implied or otherwise, in regard to any other proposal. I desire to say that it must not be construed that we are any party to a ny bargain the other way. We hold ourselves free, while voting for this amendment, to vote for any other proposal, or against it, whether that proposal be of a like or any other nature.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

As a member of the Finance Committee, it is right to say we adopted this suggestion in regard to Western Australia because it was approved by Sir John Forrest on behalf of that colony; and I intended to vote against Mr. Deakin's amendment unless it was approved by Sir John Forrest. It is most important we should have a proposition acceptable to Western Australia, and, as Mr. Deakin has withdrawn the first part of his amendment, I intend recording my vote for that amendment as now submitted. At the same time, I want it distinctly understood that I do not think the Finance Committee made a bad proposal. The proposal the committee made was, as they believed, in the interest of federation. I also desire to say that on the Finance Committee I advocated special consideration for Tasmania. To my mind, the amendment now before the committee has the additional attraction of removing, at all events from our Tasmanian friends, the feeling that possibly the people of that colony may have to subscribe indirectly to losses sustained by much wealthier colonies than themselves. I welcome the amendment as the happy solution of the difficulty.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I do not quite agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Walker), in his statement as a member of the Finance Committee, that the proposal of the committee is a good one. The proposal, in my opinion, is about as bad as it could be. If I vote for the proposal as now submitted, it is only because it is not quite so bad as that of the Finance Committee. I do not like the present proposal. It is very objectionable, but it may perhaps be better than the proposal of the Finance Committee, because it recognises the chances that New South Wales would have to make up nearly all the deficiency of Western Australia. In that case, I do not think it matters much to New South Wales whether the proposal is accepted or not. It certainly does not matter so much to New South Wales as it does to Victoria. If Victoria is satisfied to accept the proposal in conjunction with Western Australia, it will hit Victoria harder than it hits any of the other colonies. The trade between Victoria and Western Australia is much larger than that between any of the other colonies and the western province.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It will not hit us any harder than if Western Australia stands out altogether.

Mr. REID. -

Not so hard.

Mr. LYNE. -

Possibly not; but it would be very much better for Victoria if there was intercolonial free-trade between the other colonies and Western Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Hear, hear. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LYNE. -

In that respect, this matter is therefore more for the consideration of Victoria than for that of New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS. -
We would retain that trade.

Mr. LYNE. -

And more than that, I recognise that, perhaps, the taxpayers of Western Australia must pay a large proportion of the deficiency, though those who exported from Victoria would also pay a portion, along with those who exported from South Australia.

Mr. WALKER. -

Does the consumer not pay the whole of the duty?

Mr. LYNE. -

No. The consumer does not pay the whole of the duty. In some colonies the consumer pays but little of the duty. In Western Australia the consumer would pay a portion, because the people of that colony have not had an opportunity of producing the articles which they are importing.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Practically the consumer pays the whole of it.

Mr. LYNE. -

Not the whole, but a larger proportion than he would pay if in Western Australia there could be produced sufficient, or anything nearly sufficient, to meet the importations. The case of Western Australia is, therefore, not a parallel to many other cases which I could quote, in which the consumer does not pay. Now, I will take the colony of Victoria, where, I know perfectly well, the consumer, in many instances, does not pay; and I could compare, in many cases, prices in Victoria with prices in New South Wales, where there is no duty at all. However, I rose to point out that this is more particularly a matter for the consideration of Victoria and South Australia, as the colonies which are doing the larger trade with Western Australia up to the present time. The trade that is done between New South Wales and Western Australia so far, I regret to say, is insignificant compared with what it should be, while the trade between Tasmania and Western Australia is very small, and I do not think it is likely to be very large for a considerable time to come, at any rate during the five years to which this amendment will apply. If I vote for this proposal it is not that I approve of it altogether, because I should like to see absolute intercolonial free-trade between all the colonies from the onset, and a great deal is detracted from the federation of the colonies for the first few years if we do not have absolute intercolonial free-trade. I venture to say that this is one of the principal objects that people in all the colonies have in view in trying to bring about federation, and if intercolonial free-trade existed to-day there would be very few advocates for federation, except for defence and one or two other things. I agree with those speakers who have stated that they are not surprised that Sir John Forrest should accept this proposal. I certainly think that in his interest it is perhaps the best proposal that has been made, because under it Western Australia is placed under this advantageous position, that she is not called upon to come into the Federation unless she chooses to arrange among her own people to accept this step-by-step reduction of duties for the first five years of the Commonwealth. If she does not desire to accept this arrangement she can stand out, and then the other colonies will be simply placed in the same position in relation to Western Australia as they are at the present moment. I hope that this discussion, which has lasted so long, will not be continued very much longer, because nearly everything that can possibly be said in regard to it has been said. I did hope that this difficulty would be overcome in a manner more advantageous than the one now proposed, and I am sorry that there has not been any reference to the letter from Mr. Harper, which appeared in the Argus of Saturday, and which, I think, contains the germ of the solution of the whole of this difficulty between the states—a principle which I have advocated for some time past.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I think that this proposal is really worse even than the one we rejected, and which came from the Adelaide Convention, because in the case of the Adelaide proposal there was no assumption that there would be a loss at all, if there was one, it was covered. Under this proposal we are allowing Western Australia, for the next two Years, to raise her Tariff beyond its existing limits I do not think it is likely that that will be done, but we are allowing it to be done, if Western Australia thinks fit to do it and as we are taking precautions against other things in this Constitution, it is just as well we should take precautions in regard to that matter also. In all communities there are men who can fight exceedingly hard for their own interests, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that there are men in Western Australia who will use their best endeavour's to induce the Government of that colony to do what is to their advantage under the Commonwealth Constitution. Besides, there is the further objection to this proposal that you will have two Tariffs in force. Mr. McMillan pointed out that it would be far better to have an intercolonial Tariff, subject to certain reductions, but so as to be, in character, like the uniform Tariff.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I propose, after this provision is dealt with, to add something to make it optional for Western Australia to adopt the uniform Tariff on the intercolonial articles.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

That makes the honorable member's suggestion better still. It is the only consistent method of getting over the difficulty. Under this amendment there will be two different Tariffs, and two different methods of treating imports, and, as Mr. Trenwith pointed out, it is quite possible for the uniform Tariff against foreign goods to be lower than the Western Australian Tariff on colonial products sent to Western Australia, so that we may have a differentiation under this scheme against colonial products. Now, how are we who represent South Australia going to recommend this proposal in our colony? One of the chief trials on which we are asking them to accept federation is that it will give us a start on intercolonial free-trade with the colony with whom we do the largest amount of trade. It was interjected on Friday last, when I was speaking, that about £1,000,000 of the total importations of colonial produce from, Victoria into Western Australia represented gold; but I find, on looking up the figures, that the value of the gold imported last year into Western Australia from Victoria was only £45,000, so that my argument on that occasion was quite correct. Now, how can we ask the people of South Australia to accept with enthusiasm a Commonwealth Constitution under which intercolonial free-trade is partly postponed for five years? In about three years' time we are to get an instalment of about one-fifth of the whole reductions of customs duties on colonial produce in Western Australia, but by a rise in her Tariff within the first two years that very one-fifth may be annihilated so that in this way the introduction of intercolonial free-trade may be postponed for four years. Therefore, we cannot heartily recommend this proposal to our people. I can understand New South Wales falling in with it, because her imports to Western Australia are not half of our own. Victoria and South Australia are also the greatest shippers of outside products to Western Australia, so that we would surrender, not only a portion of our trade in intercolonial products, but also, it may be, our trade with Western Australia in goods imported from abroad; and what Victoria and South Australia now send to that colony amounts to almost the total of the goods imported via other colonies from abroad. We cannot with good prospects of success recommend the people of South Australia to accept this Constitution if intercolonial free-trade is to be played with like this for five years. The fact, that under this proposal Western Australia can discriminate between colonial and foreign products imported into that colony ought to damn it. I would much prefer that the proposal of the Finance Committee should be adopted. How can we in this Convention, on the mere hurried suggestion of Sir John Forrest—because this amendment of Mr. Deakin's proposal is a very vital one—adopt a mode of dealing with the difficulty different from that recommended by the Finance Committee? This proposal will allow Western Australia to establish a Tariff that will yield a better revenue than she gets from her present Tariff. Although Western Australia may suffer no loss at all, it may have an intercolonial Tariff for the purpose of getting a greater gain. How can the Convention accept this suggestion which has never been considered by the Finance Committee? It will stultify our common sense if, on a mere suggestion, we accept this proposal of Mr. Deakin's, as now altered by Sir John Forrest. I hope the matter will receive more consideration. I would not have spoken but for the fact that representatives from all the colonies, except South Australia, seem to be ready to bolt this proposal.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

I do not wish to go over the whole of the ground that was taken up last week in discussing these various proposals, but I must say that I am surprised at the Premier of Western Australia going back, if I may term it so, upon the proposals which were adopted by the Finance Committee at his special instigation, and with the entire approval of both himself and the other member representing Western Australia (Sir James Lee Steere). It seems to me that when the Finance Committee admitted the necessity for some consideration to be shown to Western Australia in regard to her Customs Tariff, and selected the mode which is embodied in the proposals they put before the Convention, they did all that was absolutely practicable, and all that it was possible to do for Western Australia, while at the same time properly protecting intercolonial free-trade. It is no use for us to bandy words about what the result of adopting this amendment will mean. It certainly means killing intercolonial free-trade for the first five years. It means that Western Australia will have the privilege not only of collecting a much greater revenue under the uniform Tariff that may be adopted, but of collecting just whatever duties she may choose to impose during the first two years - the interregnum - as against the other colonies. Now, I ask, do the other colonies want Western Australia to come into the Federation on those terms? I say, without hesitation, representing as I believe I do, a large portion of South Australia, that we do not want Western Australia to come into the Federation on terms which will render utterly nugatory all our attempts to establish intercolonial free-trade. The objects of these colonies in seeking to establish federation are - first, intercolonial free-trade; next, in regard to defence; and then in regard to some of our more important services. And if we have to go back to our people and say that the Convention has accepted a Constitution which permits one colony of the group, and that probably the largest consumer of our products, to act in the way I have described, how can we attempt to recommend such a Constitution to our producers? It is impossible, if we permit Western Australia to stand out and impose whatever Tariff she pleases for five years.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Not any Tariff we please, but the one which may be in existence when the uniform Tariff is established.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Yes. But the right honorable member knows himself that the Tariff of Western Australia will probably be altered within the next two years.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Do you say that Sir John Forrest knows that himself?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I do not think there is a probability of a change of Ministry or of fiscal policy in Western Australia, but that the rapid changes with regard to her population may render it necessary for the Government in power to entirely alter her Tariff within the next two years. And what is the position under the amendment submitted by Mr. Deakin? Not that the Tariff now existing in Western Australia shall be the basis, although affording the only facts on which we can base any conclusion now, but that the Tariff which may be in existence two years hence, when the uniform Tariff is adopted, shall be the basis of this arrangement, and Western Australia is still to be permitted to impose duties under that Tariff throughout the five years following. It is all very well to say that there is an implied trust in the Government of Western Australia that they will adhere to the present Tariff, but there is nothing to guarantee that the duties on chaff, flour, and other products imported from these colonies into Western Australia will not be increased to twice their present amount during the next few years if the exigencies of Western Australia happen to require that that shall be done.

Who can say that the present Government may not be replaced by another Government, or that the present policy in regard to the raising of revenue from intercolonial products may not be entirely altered, so that when the uniform Tariff comes into existence, the Tariff of to-day may have ceased to be, and instead of 10 per cent. duties the duties imposed may be 15 per cent.?

Mr. FRASER. -

Or nothing.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Or nothing. If we could believe that, of course it would be so much the better, but I do emphatically press on the members of the Convention that it would be advisable, at this stage, even after all the time we have devoted to this question, to postpone the consideration of these clauses for a week, until some other proposals have been considered, with the view of bringing the different delegations into caucus, and considering whether some better means cannot be suggested, if the recommendations of the Finance Committee are not satisfactory. I do not think I need touch upon the proposals in print to be submitted by the Attorney-General of Victoria (Mr.
Isaacs) at present. They will come up for discussion later on, but I do think it would be the greatest mistake we could possibly make to accept this proposal of Mr. Deakin's and place it in the Constitution now. It would be far better to give a little further time to the consideration of this important matter.

Mr. FRASER. -
But how much time do we want to consider it?

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I may point out that we are not considering the original proposal, but each day when we come into the Convention we are faced with some new proposal. We are not going over the old ground again and again. We are not debating the proposals of the Finance Committee, which we were pretty fairly agreed to, but a new proposal of importance, which was only put in our hands in print when we came here at half-past ten o'clock this morning, and which has since been amended; and if we hurriedly come to a conclusion on such a point as is involved in the present proposal I think we shall make a very great mistake. The proposal now before the Chair is one which, I am sure, will not recommend itself to the people of South Australia; it may, perhaps, recommend itself to the people of Tasmania, who have very little to lose in regard to their intercolonial trade; but to the people of South Australia, and, I believe, even to the people of Victoria, the proposal would prove very unacceptable indeed. When the producers of Victoria-those producers whom the Premier of Victoria is so anxious about-come to know that they are going to lose one of their very best markets, leaving the people of Western Australia a perfectly free hand to tax them for five years, I doubt whether the producers of Victoria will accept this proposal with any more satisfaction than the producers of South Australia. Of course I may be told that the representatives of Victoria are perfectly able to protect their own people, but I also know from my reading that, if there is any section of the Victorian community from which opposition is expected-opposition of a grave nature-it is the section employed in agricultural pursuits. The producers of Victoria are the people who are showing most opposition to federation, as it is proposed at present, because they believe that they will at least reap a less benefit, probably a far less benefit, from it than the mercantile community. If, on top of all the objections we have already had - objections on account of the stock tax and other matters - we also have the position still further complicated, made still more annoying to the producers of this colony, by the fact that Western Australia, where they have been sending a large quantity of produce every year, is to be treated in this way, what support can be expected from them? I forget the exact figures of the Victorian exports to Western Australia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

£1,250,000; and yours are £800,000.

And those are chiefly produce. Last year, as has been already stated, there was only some £50,000 of gold exported to that colony from Victoria. Will the Victorian producers, with an export of £1,250,000 to Western Australia now, and with the probability of that increasing, and perhaps being doubled in the near future, with a perfectly open market, approve of the Victorian delegates consenting to a Constitution giving Western Australia for five years after the uniform Tariff the full right and power to tax the producers of Victoria and all the other colonies to the same extent as she can tax them now, or even to a greater extent if she chooses to alter her fiscal policy within the next two years? I certainly doubt whether such a Constitution will be any more acceptable to the Victorian producers than it will to the South Australian producers. However, I would suggest to the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) that perhaps it would be advisable for him, at this stage, to withdraw his proposal. It is a new proposal, which has been sprung upon us somewhat suddenly, and the honorable member would perhaps best meet the wishes of the Convention, and also prevent a lot of unnecessary debate, by withdrawing his proposal at the present time. And then I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that this particular clause dealing with Western Australia, and all the amendments thereon, should be postponed for a few days. We have plenty of other work to go on with, and there might possibly be another meeting of the Finance Committee held, or meetings of each of the delegations of the different colonies, so that some more acceptable means of meeting the difficulty might be submitted. I think it would be the greatest mistake for the Convention as at present constituted, a great many of our members being away, to take a vote on such a crucial question, because not more than two-thirds of the Convention could be represented in the division. I would suggest, therefore, to the honorable member (Mr. Deakin), not at all with the view of endeavouring to block his proposal by any unfair tactics, but with a view of affording time for proper consideration, that his proposal might be withdrawn, at all events, for the present. We are really now at an absolute deadlock on this question. On the one hand, we have a certain section of the Convention prepared to accept the suggestions of the Finance Committee, recognising, as they do, that, although those suggestions may involve an expenditure of £100,000 or £150,000 per annum, we know, at all events, the full extent which those suggestions do involve, and, moreover, we do not bar intercolonial free-trade. Moreover, this £100,000 or £150,000—and that is the outside amount—would be a mere nothing to the Commonwealth purse.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

To the Commonwealth purse? It won't come out of that; it will come out of the states according to population, and with one-third of our population you do nearly as much trade as we do.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

The Premier of Victoria seems rather to change his ground occasionally. A day or two ago he proposed that the Commonwealth should float a loan for half-a-million to recoup the whole of the colonies.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But you would not have that.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I prefer to consider the Commonwealth purse as the purse of the Parliament which we are about to establish—a purse which is to be replenished by contributions per capita. It is specially laid down in all these amendments, I think, that the Commonwealth shall be responsible for the loss, whether it is a loss to one state or to the whole of the states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is to be charged against the states per capita.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

It is to be deemed one of the original charges. Now, how do we provide for the original charges? By a per capita contribution of the whole of the states. That is the only purse which can be termed the Commonwealth purse; the purse which is contributed to by every man, woman, and child in an equal ratio seems to me to be the Commonwealth purse. But, as I was asking when the right honorable member's interjection turned me aside, where is the enormity of this contribution towards Western Australia? It is admitted, even by members from Western Australia, that there is a probability that there will not be any call at all upon the general community for any recompense for their loss—that there will probably be no loss, but that when intercolonial free-trade is established, and the uniform Tariff is in operation, it will yield nearly as much as will recompense Western Australia for her loss on intercolonial goods. We have also been told that the advance in the agricultural prospects of that colony will, to a great extent, do away with all this difficulty, or a great deal of it, and yet we are making here a tremendous mountain over a matter which, after all, is only, at the utmost, a matter of £100,000 or £150,000 a year, to be contributed by the whole of the states. What does this amount to? Suppose we have to contribute £100,000 or £150,000 for intercolonial free-trade, and the full measure of federation, that would only represent a per capita contribution of less than 6d. per annum for every man, woman, and child in the colonies represented. What a tremendous lion in the path of federation to make all this fuss about! And that is putting it at the very largest estimate at which it can possibly be placed, and is assuming that agricultural pursuits in Western Australia do not advance at all during the next few years. And this 6d. per head of the people of the whole of these colonies is the price we have to pay for federation with the richest colony of the group—with the colony whose trade is most to be desired by the older and more producing colonies. I hope that at the present stage this difficult problem will not be finally settled, as I think it would be most unfair that a vote should be taken unless we have the very fullest representation of the whole of the colonies present.

Mr. CROWDER (Western Australia). -

I regret that I cannot support the motion of the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) or the amendment moved by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, because under those proposals I cannot conceive that any man in Western Australia would be mad enough to vote for federation. What is the position which those proposals would place Western Australia in? On the one hand, the people would be taxed by the Federal Parliament, and they would also have to be taxed again under this clause. It is all very well for members of the Convention, including delegates from Western Australia, to argue that Western Australia may not require to be taxed, but I may point out that once she joins the Federation, and intercolonial free-trade takes place, the income which she derives at the present moment, or the greatest part of it—the part derived from wine, beer, and spirits—will diminish; because under intercolonial free-trade Victoria and New South Wales will swamp her markets immediately with Wine, spirits, and beer sent from those colonies, and the excise duties on that wine, spirits, and beer will be collected in the colony where those articles are manufactured.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Western Australia will receive credit for her consumption.

Mr. CROWDER. -

Again, under the sliding scale, is it possible to conceive for a moment that any Western Australian merchant will vote for a clause which simply means that every merchant must empty his warehouse on the 31st of December, or else make a loss of 20 per cent. on all the goods be bought during that year?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

20 per cent. of the duty.

Mr. CROWDER. -

20 per cent. of the duty is the difference between a dead loss and gain. It is all very well to argue that merchants can keep their stocks down and arrange their shipments so that they will arrive in the beginning of January, but if that were done it would mean starvation, as the consumers would be blocked and could not get the articles they required. I do not wish to detain the committee except to say that I am a believer in federation, and I feel deeply that the representatives of the different colonies have a difficult task before them in trying to induce their people to make some concession to Western Australia. I feel that, and I would say that if they can see that any of these different proposals which have been made will jeopardize federation in their colonies, then let them strike out all these proposals, and leave it to Western Australia to come into the Federation when she thinks fit. I am a believer in federation, but I am not a believer in federation with starvation. What I desire is that Western Australia shall be treated justly. But if treating her justly will jeopardize federation in any of the other colonies, then I say strike out the proposals and federate; we shall come in sooner or later.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

It seems to me that this proposal is calculated to defeat the very object for which we are assembled here. What is the chief object we have in attempting to federate the Australian colonies? Undoubtedly, intercolonial free-trade is the chief object which we have at heart in this movement.

Mr. LEWIS. -

This is setting it after five years.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The postponement of the Australian hopes for five years is a very serious matter. In forming this Federation we all have to surrender many things which we hold very dear, and we look for our recompense in the removal of intercolonial barriers. But if, while having to surrender everything we get nothing in return, and our hopes are postponed for five years, what will the people whom we represent say?

Mr. JAMES. -

It is a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The removal of intercolonial barriers means a little more than the mere price we have to pay for the tolls between the colonies; it is the removal of the restrictions which hamper, curtail, and annoy the people of the different colonies in their intercourse and interchange with one another. To secure the removal of these restrictions is the chief object for which we are assembled here. By postponing the realization of the hopes of the people of the several colonies for five years, we shall deal a very severe initial blow at our federation proposals. Undoubtedly, offences will come. Many will bear no love to the federal authority on account of the privileges which will have to be surrendered to it, and if this surrender has to be made without an equivalent satisfaction being obtained, much will be done to make federation unpopular at the very moment of its birth.

Mr. HENRY. -

What will happen if you shut out Western Australia?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Western Australia is not going to be shut out. The people of Western Australia are animated by the same federal spirit as ourselves, and for the same reason, that they desire to have intercolonial free-trade. Any postponement of intercolonial free-trade will, I believe, cause dissatisfaction to the people of Western Australia just as much as to the people of the other colonies. By agreeing to this proposal, we shall be putting a brake on federation just at its start, and when difficulties will arise, to secure the removal of which we ought to endeavour to obtain the good-will of everybody. An immense barrier will be raised to the successful launching of our federal scheme. We shall place in the hands of the enemies of federation a most formidable weapon, and I do hope that the Convention will pause before they agree to any proposal of this kind.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOON. -

It has been pausing.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It has been pausing, and now it is going down a declivity with fatal speed. When the amendment was first submitted I did not think there was much probability of it being carried, but now there seems to be a considerable fear that it will be carried. It has been made all the more objectionable by the alteration made in it. When first submitted it presented two anomalies—interference with outside trade, and interference with and postponement of intercolonial free-trade. The former part of the amendment has been excised, but it now provides that the whole force of the interference shall fall upon intercolonial free-trade—the most vital principle in the scheme of federation. I trust that the Convention will either defeat the proposal or postpone the further consideration of it so that honorable members may have an opportunity of reflecting on the inimical results that will follow from its adoption. It will take away the strongest argument for federation, and will deal a most fatal blow to this high enterprise.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
I rise with great regret, but the statement made by the Hon. Mr. Crowder is so serious, and indicates so grave a misapprehension of the scope of the financial clauses, that I think the Convention will agree that, taking into account the strong language in which it was couched, it certainly merits a reply. I would ask the honorable member to refer to sub-section (1) of new clause 91, in which he will see that the danger he fears has already been provided for. That sub-section is as follows:

The duties of excise paid on goods manufactured in a state and thence exported to another state for consumption therein, shall be taken to have been collected in the state in which such goods have been consumed.

The danger which the honorable member foresees of intercolonial goods paying excise in one of the eastern colonies, and then being imported to swamp the markets of Western Australia, depriving that colony of its revenue on imports from abroad, has, therefore, no foundation.

Mr. CROWDER. -
What is the difference between the outside duty and the excise duty?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Even in the protectionist Tariffs the difference is very small. In our own colony it has been reduced, and it is not impossible that it may be further reduced, if not entirely abolished, in the future. This, however, is a matter that the Federal Government will have to deal with. When it imposes import duties it will see that the excise duties represent a fair proportion.
The honorable member is alarmed without sufficient cause. We should not forget that it is to a member of the Western Australian delegation—the Hon.
Mr. James—that we owe the first suggestion, made in Sydney, of this method of meeting the peculiar position of Western Australia. The scheme cannot, therefore, be said to have been sprung on the Western Australian representatives as a surprise.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
It is proposed to insert this provision with a view of enabling Western Australia to collect these duties, although there may be no diminution whatever of her revenue. That is monstrous. There should be some limit to it. My right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) does not expect, does not ask, that we should hand over to him the power to continue these duties, even upon a sliding scale, for five years, although there may be no necessity for it. This is out-Heroding Herod. We began some days ago to discuss the financial position of Western Australia, because it was likely to suffer from a deficiency of revenue. We considered several methods by which that deficiency might be made up. Now, even if there is no deficiency, we are going to allow the whole of the free-trade system of the continent to be dislocated. There ought to be some words inserted in the amendment to provide that these duties should only be imposed to make up a diminution of revenue. We have discussed this matter from the point of view of the exporters to Western Australia, and the arguments advanced seemed to me, rightly or wrongly, to be irresistible. We have discussed the question whether Western Australia, owing to her exceptional position, should have made good to her any deficiency which may result from the new Tariff. If there is to be no deficiency, why should we hand over to Western Australia for five years this engine of what some of us may think to be oppression upon the part of the consumers of that colony, and of interference with trade on the part of others?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Could we not provide that if, after the first two or three years, there was no deficiency, these arrangements should cease?

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not care how it is done, but I do say that honorable members do not understand the effect of the amendment if they are going to vote for it without some qualification of that kind. It is perfectly preposterous. We are asked to pass an amendment which will have the effect of declaring that, whether there is a deficiency in the revenue of Western Australia from this cause or not, the Western Australian Government may retain these intercolonial duties. I hope that no honorable member will vote for any such proposal. It is simply a partial repeal of the provision we have already introduced in the Constitution, that there shall be free-trade in all the colonies. Honorable members, in supporting this amendment, do not consider what the broad aspect of it is, apart altogether from the interests of this or that particular colony. We are intrusting to Western Australia the power to retain these customs duties, in spite of our declaration in favour of free interchange, whether she wants them or she does not.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
The honorable member who has just resumed his seat has told us that he is not speaking in the interests of this or of that colony, but it is an extraordinary thing, and I am sure we all rejoice at it, that in regard to this matter the South Australian representatives should be so unanimous, I cannot see what South Australia has to fear. It will not be placed in a worse position than any of the other colonies, and our action is not in any way especially adverse to its interests. The retention of our duties will not affect South Australia more than any other colony. Honorable members seem to be very anxious to maintain the trade with Western Australia untrammelled. I have repeatedly pointed out to honorable members that unless we have some inducement to offer to the people of Western Australia it will not be easy to induce them to come into this Federation. The other colonies will obtain the advantage of free intercourse, but Western Australia is not in the same position. It has no export trade with the other colonies. I have asked Mr. Symon time after time to point out what great benefit Western Australia will derive from federation, but the honorable member has always avoided that question,

Mr. SYMON. -

I will tell you.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I don't know how the honorable member would proceed if he were in our places, and had to tell the people that in the first few years, at any rate, of federation there would be no possibility of any gain, but there would be every probability, in fact almost a certainty, of considerable loss. If there are any honorable members from whom we have a right to expect generous treatment, it is the representatives of South Australia and of Victoria, who have a trade with Western Australia that runs into millions of pounds annually. If this proposal will give any little advantage to Western Australia-and it is admitted that its position is exceptional-those are the honorable members to whom we might look for assistance. The position is just the reverse, so far as the representatives of South Australia are concerned. For some years past South Australia has had a trade of about £750,000 per annum with Western Australia, and now it wants more, whilst it is unwilling to give us anything in return. Honorable members do not appear to realize the difficulty we shall have in advocating the cause of federation before our people. We have really no inducements to offer them, but that is nothing to the representatives of South Australia. Their only anxiety appears to be to get our trade free and untrammelled. That is not the treatment I expected from them. This proposal may give us a small advantage, It may prove to be no advantage at all, and I do not like to see such unanimity on the part of the representatives of one colony. If my honorable friend (Mr. Solomon) will find it to be difficult to induce his people to accept federation when he has to tell them that there is to be a sliding scale, so far as Western Australia is concerned, and that for the first few years there will not be complete freedom of trade, how much greater must our difficulty be when we have to tell our people that there will be a loss and not a gain?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

What stronger argument do you want than that supplied by the Finance Committee's recommendation, which provides that you shall be recompensed?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I never did like the Finance Committee's recommendation. I cannot believe that it would be right for us to take anything from Tasmania, however much we might take from South Australia, which has a large trade with us. Tasmania does a very small trade with Western Australia, amounting only to about £4,000 a year, and no one could advocate her making a contribution towards the loss of Western Australia. In fact, I should hesitate to take it if it were agreed to by this Convention. There is a great objection to the Finance Committee's proposals-although I have advocated them, and have indeed suggested their adoption to some extent-and that is, that I can

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

You told us about yourselves, and we believed it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Of course I believe that all that has been said in praise of Western Australia is quite true. I know, at all events, that we are the greatest gold-producing colony in Australia at the present time. But even though what is proposed does result in some advantage to Western Australia-and of course it will result in some advantage to us-I do not think that the other colonies should grudge us that little advantage.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I have risen to ask my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) whether he would not desire to amend the clause in order to make it a little more elastic? It appears to me that, as the clause is worded now, the whole of the duties enforced at the time of the coming into operation of the uniform Tariff must be kept on. Western Australia will not be able to take off some duties and leave the others. The clause says "existing duties." If some existing duties are considered too high, and the people of Western Australia desire that they shall be reduced, it does not appear to me that, according to the wording of this clause at present, the Parliament will be able to make any reduction. The provision should be made more permissive and elastic, so as to allow Western Australia to take advantage of it in the way of reducing duties if she thinks proper.

Mr. SYMON. -

We should add the words "or to reduce."

Mr. DOBSON. -

Quite so. It seems to me that the words at present go too far. Now I come to deal with two objections that seem to me to be well worthy of consideration. The first is that of Mr. Glynn. He says that, although Sir John Forrest might not be ungenerous enough to take advantage of it, there is no reason at all why, between this and the coming into operation of the uniform Tariff, the Parliament of Western Australia should not raise the duties of that colony, or lower them, for the express object, of getting the best possible terms out of this arrangement which we are proposing to make. I am certain from my knowledge of Sir John Forrest that he would not take advantage of any provision in that way; but at the same time we should take care that no Parliament of the group shall be able to twist an advantage which this Convention gives to it in order to get a greater advantage than is intended.

Mr. JAMES. -

If you have nothing to fear from Sir John Forrest—and you may feel equally secure that you have nothing to fear from Mr. Leake—what fear have you at all?

Mr. DOBSON. -

I did not say that there is anything to fear, but I do say that we should make the provision so that it will be impossible for any colony to take undue advantage of it. The second objection is that of Mr. Symon, and it seems to me to be a still more forcible one. Our sole desire is to make up to Western Australia any fancied or real loss she may sustain in proportion to the real losses sustained by the other colonies; and unless this provision is amended in some way, so that it operation shall only extend to make up the loss actually made by Western Australia it will not be in accord with the view of the majority of this Convention. These two points which I have gathered in the course of the discussion appear to me to show the advisability of referring in important clause of this class to our Finance Committee. I can hardly go with Mr. Solomon when he says that the amendment has been sprung upon us, because we all knew about it before it was proposed; but I must confess that some important points have been raised during the discussion this morning, and as the Finance Committee is composed of the Treasurers of the various colonies and of financial experts, who have had this problem before them for a considerable period, I am inclined to think that we should refer the provision to them, so that they may fully consider such objections as these of Mr. Symon and Mr Glynn. Now, I ask myself, what is a fair thing to do with regard to Western Australia, to whom we all desire to be fair, if only in return for the very generous spirit which Sir John Forrest and his colleagues have manifested to us throughout this Convention? I do not know at this moment how I shall vote when the matter comes to a division, because I am perplexed about it, and my perplexity arises because my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) himself says that he does not approve, and never did approve, of the proposals of the Finance Committee.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I did not say I disapproved of them; I said I did not like them.

Mr. DOBSON. -

But the right honorable gentleman went so far as to say that if the clauses were passed, he would not be fully prepared to accept from us a contribution in money. But what is he now supporting? Is not the proposal one for making to Western Australia a contribution from the producers of Victoria first, from those of South Australia secondly, those of New South Wales thirdly, and to some extent from those of Tasmania?

Mr. FRASER. -

It is a contribution from the consumers.

Mr. DOBSON. -

We know that the consumers may be in it in a way, but the... colonies, and the other half is expenditure upon public works and upon building railways. If that is the position of Western Australia, I am inclined to think, with great deference, that the true course for me to urge is that my right honorable friend and his colleagues should say-"We are so rich and prosperous and so well off, and, at the same time, so desirous of federation, that we will not ask the other colonies for anything at all." I believe that if we were to have these matters thoroughly beaten out by men of judicial minds, having no interest in the matter at all, and who had all the figures and data given them to examine, they would say that Western Australia was not in a position to ask for any concession whatever, on account of her extraordinary position of prosperity and wealth at the present time. Let us take one example. I find from the figures that have been furnished to us that Western Australia has constructed railways to the extent of 970 miles at a total cost of £3,236,493; whereas we in Tasmania, with our rocky and mountainous country, have constructed only 428 miles, against Western Australia's 970, at a cost of £3,600,000.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have constructed about 1,500 miles of railways altogether.

Mr. DOBSON. -
The railways of Western Australia bring in £1,066,708, whereas our Tasmanian railway receipts are only £170,000. The railways of Western Australia pay 31 per cent. interest, which is the full interest on the money lent by the debenture-holders, and our railways, on the expenditure we have laid out upon them, pay only 1 per cent. Therefore, it seems to me to be questionable, as a matter of absolute justice, whether we should make the producers of the other colonial contribute anything whatever to a colony with the magnificent position of Western Australia.

Mr. JAMES. -
Because we are rich you want to pick our pockets.

Mr. DOBSON. -
No, nothing of the kind. I say to Western Australia - "Federate with us, and do not assume that you are going to make a loss." We say that we are going to make a great gain by federation, and it is because we think we are all going to gain in the end that we are here. If Sir John Forrest wants to see what the advantages of federation are, let me refer him to the magnificent peroration in the speech which Mr. Glynn delivered to us on Friday week, and be may add to that a few very practical things which Mr. Glynn did not mention. The right honorable gentleman himself must know what the great advantages of federation will be to his colony, or he would not be here at all. In looking over the Customs revenue of Western Australia, what do we find? There is a total value of imports amounting to £6,493,557, and of that total goods to the value of £1,664,437 are subject to specific duties. Then we find that £2,400,990 of imports represent goods which are absolutely free. We also find that £691,394 of imports pay duty at the rate of 5 per cent.; 10 per cent. is paid on goods to the value of £648,074; 15 per cent. on goods to the value of £836,441; and 20 per cent. on goods to the value of £252,221. Therefore, there is room for modification if we can get any modification. We could strike out the 20 per cent. duties and the 15 per cent. duties, and leave, say, the 5 per cent. and the 10 per cent. duties. But all these things are worth looking into before we come to a conclusion upon this matter. Therefore, I hold the opinion that in a matter of this sort, which is so complicated and so important, we should ask for the views of the Finance Committee. I do not think we shall be doing ourselves justice, or paying the committee the deference which they are entitled to, unless we refer a matter of this sort to them, and let them bring up a report.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I am very sorry that the Right Hon. the Premier of Western Australia should have referred to South Australia and some of the eastern colonies in the way he has thought fit to do, after the speech he has delivered this morning.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You are so unanimous.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes; when we do agree our unanimity is truly wonderful. It is only on rare occasions that the representatives of South Australia do thoroughly agree, and then they do so because there is urgent need for it. As to what the right honorable gentleman has said with reference to the people of the eastern colonies, he seems to me to have put it as though all the advantages are on the side of those colonies. I am sorry to be compelled to make anything in the way of a contrast, but I cannot help saving that Western Australia is greatly indebted to us. We have peopled her wildernesses, we have discovered her resources, we have discovered her gold mines, we have fed her people, and in return for that it seems to me that we have had to bear heavy burdens in the shape of taxation. The position is that we are told that Western Australia cannot come into the Federation unless special terms are conceded to her. We desire to see her come in. We are prepared accordingly, in the sacred cause of federation, to give our consent to any scheme of benevolence which is necessary for the purpose of securing the entry of Western Australia into the Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We do not want benevolence.

Sir JAMES LEE STEERE. -
Do not talk about benevolence.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Well, I will not use the word "benevolence," I will say a scheme of fair and equitable compromise. The only reason why I was tempted to use the other term was because my right honorable friend intimated that he was not prepared to consent to the scheme suggested by the Finance Committee, because he did not like Western Australia to be specialty named in connexion with it, and I thought he rather regarded it as an act of benevolence, against which term, however, his manly and independent soul revolts. That was the reason why we employed a term which I shall be happy to see withdrawn in favour of one more acceptable to the people of Western Australia. Whilst the proposal of the Finance Committee was to make good a loss, the proposal which it is suggested should be substituted for it, and to which my right honorable friend gives his assent, goes a great deal further. The proposal now is to secure to Western Australia, loss or no loss, a power to raise revenue which

Mr. HENRY. -
A power to raise revenue from her own people.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Extra customs duties would fall both upon the producers in other colonies and upon the consumers in Western Australia. There can be no doubt that these duties would seriously embarrass our trade by facilitating the competition of local producers. What is the position of South Australia? Our chief trade is with Western Australia. So far as the New South Wales markets are concerned, we have them already. The Victorian markets are overstocked, so that it is difficult for any one to compete with her manufacturers and producers. The Tasmanian markets are not so extensive as we could wish. Western Australia is the great market for the consumption of our goods. But if effect is given to the scheme now proposed we shall have to return to our people and say-"Whilst you are going to throw open your ports to the producers of New South Wales, Victoria, Tasmania, and Western Australia"-at the present time the timber exportation of Western Australia is of considerable importance-"you are not to have free access to the colony to which your commercial attention is chiefly directed." An arrangement of this kind would be a huge blot upon our Constitution. We are told that, at the present time, Western Australia receives something like £380,000 per annum from duties upon intercolonial produce, which amount she will lose if she is compelled to adopt intercolonial free-trade. But if the proposed scheme is adopted, she will not only be able to make up this loss, but she will be able to put into the Treasury chest between £900,000 and £1,000,000, which she will obtain from the other colonies.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

How can that be?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

£380,000 for five years would amount to £1,900,000. I take away one-half to allow for the gradual reduction, and that gives between £900,000 and £1,000,000.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Irrespective of the revenue derived from the uniform Tariff.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes. I put it to the right honorable member, does he want that? I do not think he does. I know that his financial soul is very often vexed by these questions of pounds, shillings, and pence. Even with a booming revenue it is possible to find the expenditure increasing proportionately; but I have at times heard the right honorable gentleman dilate upon the advantages of federation apart from mercenary and sordid considerations. I therefore ask him to give us some practical proof of his enthusiastic love for federation by saying that he does not want to give to Western Australia the power to take £1,000,000 from the other colonies.

Mr. FRASER. -

The people of Western Australia will have to pay these duties.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

The honorable member's interjection almost forces one to the conclusion that intercolonial free-trade is not what we are chiefly aiming at. His remark would apply to the people of Victoria, and of the other colonies, as well as to the people of Western Australia. Are we to be told, when we try to emphasize the propriety of establishing intercolonial free-trade at the earliest moment, that it is of no concern, because the people of the various colonies pay these duties themselves? If the right honorable member must have special terms beyond the advantages which federation will give to all the colonies, he should recognise that the terms which he now seeks are too favorable. It is proposed that instead of Western Australia being recouped her actual loss, she should be empowered to levy immense sums by imposing additional duties upon produce from the other colonies.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The Western Australians will not tax themselves to a larger extent than they can help.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Well then, why not rely upon the same principle in regard to the other colonies? But the power to tax goods imported from each other will be taken away from the federated colonies. I would suggest that Western Australia, the richest colony of the group, should not extort extreme terms at the expense of her poorer neighbours. If she is to suffer loss, let her consent to an arrangement which will recoup her the amount of that loss, but no more.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

I am sorry that we are taking up so much time over this matter. As Western Australia is willing to accept this proposal, I do not see that we should cavil so much at it. I do not think that any one can deny that the Western Australians will have to pay the bulk of any extra Customs taxation, and if they do not want to pay more taxation, they will not consent to its imposition. Then, too, this arrangement is to last only for five years, and five years will be over in a twinkling of the eye, as compared with the duration of the Union. If we do not make concessions like this one to another, and especially to Western Australia, the colony which appears to require so much to make up her loss of revenue, how can we expect to get over the difficulties which we have to face? I do not wish to say an unkind word to South Australia, but I am afraid that there is a Murray River running between Western Australia and South Australia somewhere.

Mr. SYMON. -

Not a Murray River—a golden river.

Mr. FRASER. -

Yes, a golden river; that is better. This trouble will only last, at the most, for five years, and will be lessened each year by the sliding scale.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would you allow the other colonies the same privilege

Mr. FRASER. -

No. Not that I would have any personal objection to such an arrangement, but I think that it would really stop federation altogether.

Mr. SYMON. -

If we give this concession to Western Australia, what answer shall we make to Victoria if she asks for a similar concession?

Mr. FRASER. -

Though I am a Victorian representative I would not vote to give Victoria such a concession, because it would create immense difficulties. Western Australia, so far as her trade is concerned, is a colony apart. The whole of her trade with the other colonies is water borne. The colony is a new one, and has sprung into life within a very few years, and it cannot be dealt with upon quite the same lines as colonies which have been in existence for half-a-century or more. I do not see any better proposal than that now before us. To my mind, it is preferable to the proposal of the Finance Committee. I do not see that any complications can arise under it. No doubt it may put a stop to a little of the trade between South Australia and Western Australia and between the other colonies and Western Australia. That is to be regretted, but the trouble will be of short duration. I would say, let the Western Australians have this power and be done with it, so that we may settle the financial provisions of the Constitution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

When I was speaking upon this matter before I pointed out that Western Australia was asking for the power to collect, of course from her own people, a greater amount of Customs revenue than was necessary to make up any possible loss under federation. I ask the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) if he wants to collect Customs revenues in excess of this possible loss? Suppose the uniform Tariff brings him in as much Customs revenue as he has now, does he want anything more?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We do not know what our population may be in the future.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

But you do not want more Customs revenue than you are getting now.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Why not? We may want twice as much.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I understood that we all agreed that where the circumstances of Western Australia were not different from those of the other colonies no exception should be made in favour of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is quite different when we make up this loss ourselves.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

My right honorable friend appears to want to get from the uniform Tariff as much Customs revenue as he gets now, and to obtain as much more as he can get from extra duties.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Does the honorable member think that the Western Australians will easily be got to agree to these extra duties?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not know as to that. I would suggest the insertion, after the words "from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth" in the latter part of the amendment, of the words "to the extent necessary to equalize the proportion of net loss of such state with such average." Afterwards, I would reinsert the remainder of the Finance Committee's recommendation, except so far as the alteration in the mode of payment is concerned.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I would not agree to that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Even if the amendment is agreed to, I shall vote against the clause as amended. I shall move the amendment to minimize the evil of what I think a mischievous clause.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

Does the honorable member think that any one will support it upon those terms?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think that there is still some reasonableness left in the Convention in spite of the length of this discussion, and I have a sure and certain hope that a good many honorable members will vote for the amendment. I think that, after the luncheon adjournment, the Premier of Tasmania will see that Western Australia should have the right to impose extra Customs taxation only to the extent necessary to recoup her for any diminution in revenue resulting from the operation of this Constitution.

Mr. LYNE. -

But the honorable member does not propose to let Western Australia have an advantage over the other colonies.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Certainly not.

Mr. LYNE. -

That was what the Premier of Western Australia seemed to want.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Yes, I am afraid so.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The Convention resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I intend to move my amendment, because it is the logical sequence of the arguments by which the representatives of Western Australia support their position. I am not doing it in any flippant spirit, but in all seriousness. Western Australia says-"Our position is exceptional, we are importers, not exporters; you are both. You derive benefits which we do not participate in; our position is abnormal at present. We believe we will develop industries which will make us exporters after a little while, and we want you to give us five years in which we are to get the benefit not only of your intercolonial duties, but also of any other duties we choose to impose on a sliding scale. By that means you will enable us to protect our own industries, to develop them, and we sincerely hope that at the end of the five years we shall not be in need of any of you." That is practically the position that Sir John Forrest has taken up.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What is your objection to that?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
There is no objection whatever if you are allowed to do it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Give us some inducement or we cannot come in.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
The inducement is to be the same inducement which operates upon everybody.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What is your inducement?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
It is of a mixed kind. I aware my right honorable friend it is not all made up of pounds, shillings, and pence.

Mr. SYMON. -
It must be a material inducement to Western Australia to give her people untaxed food.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
That is the case. Sir John Forrest asks why I want South Australia to come in. I hope it is from a feeling much higher than any feeling which concerns business operations, or such considerations as we have before us at the present time. I will do my right honorable friend the justice to say that he has the higher feeling, only if he can combine the noblest with the most ignoble motives, he does not mind, while he can make things right all round. My right honorable friend simply asks to be placed in a fair position, not an exceptional position. When it was proposed to extend a benefit to his colony, which, he thought, reflected upon its dignity, he protested, with all that pride of colony which becomes him so well against any such proposition. He said: though he would take it if we forced it upon him, he would take it complainingly. As far as I am concerned, I was willing, and am still willing to adopt the report of the Finance Committee, which, by the way, at the present moment is not supported by a single member of that committee, as far as I know, except Mr. Holder.
An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Mr. Solomon also supports it.

Mr. WALKER. -
It is an excellent scheme.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Does the honorable member think so?

Mr. WALKER. -
Yes, but I support this scheme because Sir John Forrest approves of it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
At present the only members of the Finance Committee who support the recommendations are the members from South Australia who were on that committee.

Mr. ISAACS. -
They did not defend it on grounds of justice.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I would ask Mr. Isaacs if he can defend this scheme on grounds of justice? Not a bit of it. He says "I am going to support it, because directly it is carried I am going to propose another logical sequence of this proposal."

Mr. ISAACS. -
No; I think it is an admirable supplement to the scheme I want to propose.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Exactly, but this will come first, then Mr. Isaacs will come in as a supplement. His clause is to be an addendum. I do not think my honorable friend will get in his clause. I do not think he has the smallest chance, and I think it would work a monstrous injustice.

Mr. ISAACS. -
We shall get something like that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
While I quite agree that the position of Western Australia is exceptional, and that she should get exceptional treatment, I say-"Don't be too lavish in your treatment of Western Australia." Let us combine that consideration with a reasonable degree of economy in our generosity. If Sir John Forrest is earnest in what he says that all he requires is to be placed on an even condition with the other colonies, he should propose something in the nature of the amendment I am now proposing. He should have said-"I do not want to keep the duties which I believe will recoup me for all my losses, and in addition to that be able to levy those duties which go to the very root of federation, interfere with its cardinal principle, and create anomalies, which have to exist for five years. I only want the duty on the Commonwealth or the right in me to levy the customs duties which are now imposed to such an extent as circumstances may prove to be necessary to recoup me the losses I have sustained in excess of the losses sustained by other portions of the Commonwealth."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That was when it came out of the pockets of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
That is the position my right honorable friend has taken up. But when there is a disposition to accept that he asks for something more. The Tasmanian representatives, relieved from their anxiety lest they should be called upon to assist this rich colony, are willing to accept anything which somebody else has to pay for.

Mr. BARTON. -
Who says so?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
That is what I am saying. New South Wales does not care very much. The Finance Committee say, like my friend (Mr. Walker)-"Well, really, all we have to consider are the views of Sir John Forrest, and, having ascertained what his final view is, to accept it, although I adhere loyally in sentiment-only in sentiment, not in truth or in fact-to the report of the Finance Committee." I am going to propose an amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What for?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I am going to tell the honorable gentleman what for? I am going to propose the amendment just to see whether my honorable friend has the accurate sense of proportion in his wishes for right which I have always suspected him of.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Will you vote for it?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
No, I will vote against it. I would like the majority of the members to see exactly what I mean. My own fear is that this will be carried.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Oh, no, there is no fear of that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
My own fear is that the amendment of Mr. Deakin will be carried.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Oh, yes.
My wish is, if Mr. Deakin's amendment be carried, to minimize the effect of that amendment, or, at all events, to put it on lines right and just to everybody. If I fail-if the amendment on the amendment is carried, and the motion as amended is carried, so that that which I think is a bad thing becomes a portion of the Constitution-then I will have to persuade myself that I can still loyally support the cause which I have been interested in for so many years, and which is so dear to the hearts, I believe, of most of us.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That would not upset you, would it?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
My honorable friend knows very well, as the representatives of Tasmania and the representatives of New South Wales know, that when some particular local interest comes in they get very much upset. Victoria gets very much upset at times.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
No, no.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
In fact, I think there is rather a normal condition of mental anxiety on the part of Victoria. New South Wales is in a condition of defiance.

Mr. WISE. -
Suppression, not defiance.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
At times, I think South Australians want to do what is proper and right.

Mr. ISAACS. -
For them.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
For them and for all, because the interest of one should be the interest of everybody. Although objecting to the proposal, I am going to move, in order to test the feeling of the committee-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is rather hard.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Why?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It will make it worse.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I am trying to make it better, and trying to bring about a state of things which, at the worst, I shall not have to repudiate.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
And you will vote against both.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I am sure my honorable friend would not respect me if I did not vote according to my judgment. I am going to minimize the amendment—if I could I would oppose it—because to minimize a bad thing is no evil.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
This is a moral ideal!

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I have seen the need of it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
For export only.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I now move—
That, after the word "states" (line 2), the following words be inserted:—
"The Commonwealth shall re-impose and collect the customs duties in the state of Western Australia existing at the time of the imposition of uniform duties upon goods not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth to the extent necessary to equalize the proportionate net loss of that state with such average. Such duties shall be re-imposed and collected for five years with a deduction of 20 per centum per annum (that is to say), with a deduction of 20 per centum for the second year, 40 per centum for the third year, 60 per centum for the fourth year, and 80 per centum for the fifth year, and at the end of the fifth year customs duties on all such goods shall cease and determine."

I move this amendment hoping, in the cause of federation, the committee will seriously consider whether it is expedient to make a provision in respect of Western Australia, however desirable it may be that that colony should be in the Federation, which, on the face of it, in the most unfederal spirit, would work harm to one of the states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Do you say what the particular net loss means?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I take the report of the Finance Committee. I take clause 92, as recommended by the Finance Committee.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
You accept the definition there?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Yes, I take that and then go on. I take all the premises by which you arrive at the net loss, and then I provide how the net loss is to be made up.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
And you allow the people of Western Australia to make up their own net loss?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Oh, yes, they are entitled to do that, I think.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

How about the first year? You have no calculation.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

You have to make your calculation as soon as you can. That will be a matter for the Parliament of the Commonwealth. My intention is that the Commonwealth shall make that calculation. The Parliament of the Commonwealth will, in respect to Western Australia, continue such of the duties at the rates which are at present imposed and which may be necessary for the purpose of recouping to Western Australia any loss.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

What data will they have?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I would like to know my honorable friend's data for the extraordinary proposition, which is rule of thumb at the best, and which he does not agree with, but thinks it will not affect New South Wales?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You had better withdraw.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I certainly will not withdraw. We have discussed the matter sufficiently, so far as the general question is concerned, and by this time we ought to know pretty well what we are about. We have had a report, which I am willing to adopt, and of which Sir John Forrest approved, but afterwards repudiated. We have another recommendation with which I distinctly disagree, and which, if it cannot be improved, I hope will be rejected altogether.

Sir John Downer's amendment was negatived without a division.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I shall not detain the committee more than two or three minutes, but I think there was something in the contention raised by Mr. Symon, when he pointed out that there was a possibility under Mr. Deakin's proposal that Western Australia would obtain a larger revenue than she obtains at the present time.

[P.1234] starts here

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The last decision was on that.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

No, the last decision was on Sir John Downer's amendment.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Well, that was it.

Mr. LYNE. -

But, it had other matters in it as well. The insertion of one or two words in Mr. Deakin's proposal would prevent Western Australia obtaining a larger revenue than she now obtains, and I understand Mr. Deakin's proposal to be that Western Australia shall be guaranteed against any loss, and nothing more. If the proposal may possibly give her more revenue than she obtains at present, I certainly do not think that that is the intention of the committee. I stated at the outset that if I voted for this proposal it would be because it was the better of the two proposals before the Chair. The proposal of the Finance Committee is not so good as this one, but I am not at all anxious to see this amendment passed, nor do I think it is entirely a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. Moreover, if there is any possibility of Western Australia obtaining a larger revenue than she now obtains, this proposal will not meet with the approval with which it would be received if it was simply to allow Western Australia to reduce her duties 20 per cent. each year, instead of immediately on the imposition of the uniform Tariff, and thus prevent her suffering any loss of Customs revenue through federation. I would like to say a word with reference to the speech of Mr. Dobson, who suggested that the colony of Western Australia should be allowed to take the duties off any of her importations regardless of the wishes of the other colonies. I think that that might act very unfairly. We will take, for instance, the case of flour. If Western Australia kept the full rate of duty on flour, that would be injurious to the exportations from the other colonies, but if she reduced her Tariff by 20 per cent. all round, it would be only a proportionate reduction.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I said that she should have liberty to reduce duties, and then let 20 per cent. go off the reduced rates.

Mr. LYNE. -

I understood the honorable member to say that Western Australia should be able to select out of her Tariff any particular items she chose, and reduce the duties on them.

Mr. DOBSON. -

No; I said she should be able to select any of the articles on which duties are now imposed.

Mr. LYNE. -

I did not understand the honorable member to say that she should reduce the duties on all articles 20 per cent., but that she should be allowed to select any particular ones for reduction.
Mr. DOBSON. -

No; let me give you an illustration. Supposing she had a duty of £1 per ton on chaff, she could reduce it to 10s., and then take 20 per cent. off the 10s.

Mr. LYNE. -

Then I did not understand the honorable member properly. I thought the honorable member suggested that the 20 per cent. should come off generally, whatever rate she fixed on as the basis, and I feel that we should not do anything which would give a probable increase of revenue to Western Australia instead of simply enabling her to protect herself against any loss that might arise during the five years.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

To give effect to the suggestion I made, and also to secure the determination of this provision when the necessity for it ceases, I beg to move the addition to Mr. Deakin's amendment of the following:—

Provided that this provision shall cease to have effect if and whenever there shall be no diminution of revenue to Western Australia owing to the imposition of uniform duties of customs or by the operation of free trade and interchange among the several states.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I wish to know whether that provision is intended to operate in such a case as this: If there be a year in which the state of Western Australia is not under any loss, is the whole operation of Mr. Deakin's amendment then to cease, notwithstanding that there may be other years during the five years in which there will be a loss? I should like to know whether the amendment is to operate to that extent, or is it to be made clear that its operation in the case I have pointed out is to be prevented?

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I intend that the moment any diminution of revenue ceases the operation of Mr. Deakin's amendment shall cease.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

How are you to know the moment?

Mr. SYMON. -

In the same way as you ascertain whether there is a diminution.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

A relative diminution.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes. The whole object is to secure Western Australia against loss to her Treasury. If there is no loss, that can be ascertained in the ordinary way. I intend, by my proposal, that the moment there is no loss this special provision shall cease.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What do you mean by loss?

Mr. SYMON. -

Personally, I do not call it loss, I call it simply a dislocation of the Western Australian Treasury. The right honorable gentleman will be able to find out whether there is a loss, and, if so, what that loss is. The whole of the provisions embodied in the Finance Committee's scheme have been directed to ascertain what is there called the loss, the proportionate net loss, or the diminution in the receipts of the Treasury of Western Australia through the Custom-house, and what I propose to do is to apply this method, if the Convention agrees to it, to provide that the moment there is no diminution this special provision shall cease.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Your proposal applies to a whole year's loss.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Then why not say so.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is not necessary to say so, because you can only ascertain annually whether there is a loss, and, if so, what that loss is.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Some honorable members do not understand it in that way.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is what the words of my amendment would cover. There must be one year's transactions completed before the loss, if any, can be ascertained.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

It appears to me that none of these expedients for bringing this provision into operation, with regard to the loss of revenue, can have any application at all. In dealing with the matter on the basis of paying a certain sum of money the amount could be ascertained, because the payment would not be made till the end of the year, when the loss could be absolutely ascertained, and, therefore, if it was only just a money payment that was to be made by all the colonies, it should be on the ascertained loss. But that expedient has proved itself unsatisfactory to most of the colonies for many reasons. At one time I was prepared to support that proposal in the absence of anything better, but it appears to me that Mr. Deakin's amendment relieves us of a great deal of difficulty, and will put the matter on the fairest possible basis.
But, having arranged to give this benefit to Western Australia, I will be no party to fritter it away, so that it will be of no value. We must look at the thing fairly and squarely. We cannot give Western Australia a money compensation. Then what are we going to do? We are going to grant a compensation which will give a certain advantage to Western Australia. There is no question that it will give an advantage to Western Australia, and it seems to me that we must be prepared to pay that price for the benefit of having Western Australia in this Union. That appears to me to be the least objectionable way of making a special concession to Western Australia. Let me point out to Mr. Symon how impossible it is that the provision he suggests can be brought into operation. I presume that you could not ascertain, till the end of a financial year, whether Mr. Symon's provision was to operate or not. Well, if at the end of some financial year you find that there is no diminution of revenue in Western Australia, as compared with the year prior to the introduction of the uniform Tariff, Mr. Deakin's proposal can no longer apply; but until that fact is ascertained all your traders are in a state of absolute uncertainty as to what the duties of customs imposed in the following year will be. That is the condition they will be placed in every year.

Mr. SYMON. -

No; once the diminution of revenue ceased, Mr. Deakin's proposal would never be revived.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If that is so, yours is unjust, because it is certainly not intended to compensate Western Australia for the loss of one year only. If another year's loss occurs it must be compensated for. If

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Traders could provide against any loss, owing to the decrease of customs duties, if they knew the decrease was coming.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That, of course, would be an answer to another objection to the sliding scale. I do not like the sliding scale, but it might be made not very objectionable if it had a certain tenure for four or five years, but if there is to be no certainty about its continuance, it will be an embarrassing, mischievous, and disturbing influence on trade. The reason that I support Mr. Deakin's proposal altogether is that I think it must be taken as a whole. I do not think it is scientific—it is objectionable in many ways, but it is the best thing we have been able to evolve after a discussion which has lasted a considerable time, and after the application of a great deal of ingenuity to the solution of this problem. It appears to me that Mr. Deakin's proposal will operate justly in this sense: That the payment will come from the colony which is chiefly concerned, and that the other colonies will lose no money, although they will certainly lose, for a time, the full advantages of free-trade with Western Australia. Well, that is what we must be prepared to pay to induce her to join the Federation. I quite admit the force of Mr. Kingston's statement that that loss will fall on the colonies in a varying degree. Perhaps South Australia would gain more from absolute free-trade than New South Wales, but, on the other hand, while Victoria will lose considerably from this arrangement, New South Wales will lose a certain amount, and Tasmania will lose a certain, although a smaller, amount. As practical men, however, we must make up our minds to that loss, and I hope that, with the advantage of her proximity to Western Australia, and of her production of the particular things that the people of that colony require-advantages which have already given great benefit to South Australia-she will still retain and improve upon her present trade with the West, because she will then be in a better position to trade with Western Australia than she is under the existing Tariff. South Australia has already a large trade with Western Australia, with prospects of that trade increasing and under this sliding scale arrangement for the reduction of the customs duties of Western Australia I hope that her trade with that colony will be still greater in years to come. But I rose to point out the objections to Mr. Symon's amendment. It appears to me, not only should that amendment be rejected, but that Mr. Deakin's proposal, with some few amendments, will meet the difficulties of the case. I will point out some ways in which I think the provision should be amended, not necessarily now, but if Mr. Deakin is willing to accept the amendments in substance they may be put into drafting form afterwards. I think there ought to be power to take any one or more of the duties of Western Australia and deal with them, and that Western Australia should not be bound to deal with the whole of her Tariff.

2007

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I quite agree with that.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I think also that there ought to be some power to enable the Commonwealth and Western Australia, by agreement, to modify the duties from time to time, otherwise you bind Western Australia for the whole five years to the duties which happen to be imposed on particular products at the time the uniform duties of customs come into existence.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I agree with that, too.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Mr. O'Connor means to give the state power to decrease, but not to increase, duties of customs within the five years.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, the Commonwealth and Western Australia. And, of course, that must be done. If those two provisions are made there will be sufficient elasticity about the arrangement to enable it to be worked, and I hope that Western Australia, possibly in the interests of her own people, may not only see fit to relax the terms of this provision in such a way as will be an advantage to her, but that long before the five years are up she will be able to throw her ports open to the products of the other colonies.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Ought she to have to wait until she gets the consent of the Federal Parliament to do that?

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I shall accept the amendments Mr. O'Connor has suggested. I did not endeavour to cast my amendment into proper form to fit it into the Bill, but simply to express plainly what was meant. I shall be quite prepared to accept any other necessary drafting amendments.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I would like to ask Mr. O'Connor, supposing in the third year the uniform Tariff makes up to Western Australia all her loss, will it be possible for this provision to apply in the fourth and fifth years?

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

The answer to that question is, that we cannot tell what the result of the fourth and fifth years will be until they have gone by.

Mr. DOBSON. -

But you are discarding Mr. Symon's amendment.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

Mr. Dobson desires to make the matter perfectly clear. We have drifted away altogether from the original position on which we debated this subject, and now it is simply a question of whether we are to allow Western Australia to continue her policy of protection on a sliding scale for five years. What is the good of talking about a loss to the Treasury and that sort of thing? Sir John Forrest wants to keep up the policy of protection for the sake of the butter-makers, the hay and wheat growers, and those sort of people in Western Australia, to the detriment of the producers of similar things in other parts of the Commonwealth. Now, I say that it will be a violation of the principles we have implanted in this Constitution if such a state of things is allowed to prevail; and when Sir John Forrest talks about his difficulty in ascertaining the advantages of federation to his colony, let me remark that it is surely of the greatest possible advantage that he should be able, immediately on the establishment of federation, to give to his people untaxed food. Why should we seek to impose upon them the injustice of taxed food for a period of five years?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is their business.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is my business - the business of every member of this Convention-just as much as it is my honorable friend's business. There are far greater numbers of people in Western Australia who are interested in having these duties immediately remitted than are interested in having them continued.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is for themselves to consider.

Mr. SYMON. -

No doubt it is for themselves, but we are now considering the interests of the whole of Australia, and considering a Constitution to be founded on the principle of free interchange, free-trade between the different states.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is not all on food.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend (Mr. Solomon) the other day estimated that the amount of duty on food-food for man and beast-was £213,000 per annum.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

But the amount is £378,000 altogether.

Mr. SYMON. -

The great bulk of these intercolonial duties are duties on food, and we are face to face with the plain question of having to maintain for Western Australia a system of protection for five years against their fellow citizens in the other colonies, under the guise of preventing a dislocation of the Treasurer's accounts. Now, surely that is not the position in which my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) would wish to place us?

Mr. FRASER. -

Otherwise, we shall not get Western Australia in at all.

Mr. SYMON. -

We will get them in right enough; they will come in. They have much larger considerations to move them into this Federation than the mere question of pounds, shillings, and pence, It is not the mere sordid element-at any rate, not as reckoned in that particular way-but it is for a far larger gain that my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) himself and his colony will be brought into more intimate relations of citizenship with the whole of the rest of Australia, commercially, personally, and in every other way. He sees quite well that in addition to all his gold boom he will have prosperity opening out to him that will repay him infinitely more than this paltry re-arrangement of these protectionist duties.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then what are you arguing for?

Mr. SYMON. -

I am appealing to my right honorable friend to withdraw his support from this amendment, to put his trust in his own people and his own colony, and to tell us he won't have this special consideration at all.

Mr. Symon's amendment was negatived.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The question now is that all the remaining words after "showing" proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
There is a suggestion I was going to make. The question is whether this clause gives power for the Western Australian Government to adopt the uniform Tariff of the Commonwealth? There is no doubt that one of the weak spots of this proposal is that you may have a difference in the rates of duty between the uniform Tariff and the old Tariff of Western Australia. I do not know whether this point can be met by the Drafting Committee, but it would be a good thing if the clause was sufficiently elastic to allow the Treasurer of Western Australia to agree, as the basis of this arrangement, to the uniform Tariff wherever it could apply to the same articles. I will read a proviso which has been drafted for me on this subject, and I will then leave the matter in the hands of the committee:-

Provided that in the case of goods made dutiable by the uniform Tariff, the colony of Western Australia may elect, in respect of similar goods, that duty shall be collected at the rate fixed by the uniform Tariff.

I think if the uniform Tariff could be applied-

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It might give them more.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Of course, but on the other hand, by the sliding scale, the duty will be decreasing every year. Under this provision you would never have a duty higher in the Western Australian Tariff than you would have in the uniform Tariff.

Mr. BARTON. -
Would your amendment secure that?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I only bring forward the suggestion to be considered. Perhaps the Drafting Committee will suggest something that will make the clause sufficiently elastic to allow this kind of negotiation between the Treasurer of the state and the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I am afraid that this is not a matter of drafting at all. I take it the intention is to make some proposal under which Western Australia will have the option of applying the external duties of the uniform Tariff intercoloniaally to the products of other colonies. Judging from Mr. McMillan's remarks, my impression is that he intends that to apply by way of amelioration to the other colonies, to enable Western Australia to apply the duties of the uniform Tariff in place of her own, on the assumption that she will apply them in place of any higher duties she may be exacting. Now, the proposal which my honorable friend has outlined does not carry out the view which he seems to entertain. It would render it optional for the Treasurer of Western Australia to take either the duties in existence in his own state at the time of the imposition of the uniform Tariff, or to take in their place those prescribed by the uniform Tariff, and apply those intercoloniaally.

Mr. FRASER. -

To intercolonial produce and manufactures?

Mr. BARTON. -

To goods "not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth," which is the phrase used in Mr. Deakin's amendment. That means goods produced or manufactured in the states. Now, if Mr. McMillan wishes to make it so that if the Commonwealth Tariff is the lower one of the two in respect of goods produced intercoloniaally that Tariff should be applied, his amendment should go so far as to specify that, and say that in such a case those duties shall be charged. If honorable members will consider the matter they will see that this is not a question of drafting at all, it is altogether a matter of policy, and a very important matter of policy. It might or might not suit Western Australia to agree to this, and it might or might not suit the Convention to place a provision on these lines in the Constitution. It is quite clear, however, that the Drafting Committee cannot help the Convention in this matter unless something in the nature of an instruction is given to the Drafting Committee. In the absence of that they cannot frame clauses conjecturally. Matters of policy are no concern of the Drafting Committee, and therefore I would like the Convention not to leave this matter in a nebulous state, but to let us understand perfectly whether there is to be an option, first, to take the Federal Tariff instead of the existing Tariff of Western Australia, so far as it applies to goods not originally imported into the Commonwealth, and if that is so, whether that is to be a mere matter of discretion, or whether there is to be an understanding that the Federal Tariff, if the lower one, is to be adopted in preference to the other.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -
I hope that we shall not hamper the decision we have arrived at by making any further amendment. Five years will pass very quickly, and it is not worth while to worry our brains in adding any more provisions.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I take it the intention is this—I do not know that it is expressed, but I have no objection to it—that the Tariff in existence in Western Australia when uniform customs duties come into force shall still be applicable to intercolonial imports. At the same time, I do not wish to make that a hard-and-fast rule for the whole of the five years. The Legislature of Western Australia might desire during that period to reduce the intercolonial duties, and no one should object to their having the power to do so. That is a matter the Drafting Committee might deal with. The uniform Tariff might be higher than our own Tariff. Even if it were a little lower, the Legislature of Western Australia might desire to go lower still, and unless the power was given to them they would not be able to do so. We should give the Legislature of Western Australia a free hand not to increase, but to reduce duties, if they think fit to do so, during the five years.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I voted for the last amendment with great misgivings, and I should like now to ask the leader of the Convention whether he does not think that, as a matter of Constitution building, we should try to frame a provision to meet the objection taken by Mr. Symon? It ought to be set out that whenever it is shown that the uniform Tariff is giving to Western Australia an equivalent of the loss caused by intercolonial free-trade, the operation of this provision should cease. The Drafting Committee devoted great attention to this point. They gave hours to it, and the clause they submitted was framed on that understanding. We are now departing from it. I think it would alter my voting if I saw that Western Australia was to get the benefit of this blot on the Constitution even when they were incurring no loss under the uniform Tariff, but making a gain.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have not given a vote with more reluctance during the whole of the proceedings of the Convention than the vote I last gave. In answer to the honorable member, it seems to me that the question we have to ask ourselves now is whether this is a provision for the purpose of maintaining the revenue of Western Australia, or for the purpose of maintaining intercolonial protection in Western Australia. I voted for it under its revenue aspect. If I had considered it only from the point of view of its effect in keeping up intercolonial protection in Western Australia, I should have had to say to myself that the maintenance of intercolonial protection after the adoption of the uniform Tariff was alien to the principles of federation. If the matter is to be treated from its revenue aspect, I am clear in my own mind that, as soon as it is shown that Western Australia suffers no loss by the operation of intercolonial free-trade, these duties should cease.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Her own people will see to that.

Mr. BARTON. -
They may or they may not. But in Constitution building I take it that, if you provide for one part of a case, and there is an alternative, you should provide for that also. Some provision might be placed in the Constitution that would have the effect of making it plain that this provision was to be regarded from its revenue aspect, and that Western Australia was not to enjoy any benefit by way of intercolonial protection that was not given to the other colonies, excepting in so far as that was necessary for the purposes of revenue. That is the view I hold, and it is a view that is consistent with my expressed intention to support the first part of Mr. Deakin's amendment. As I had to choose between this and what I considered to be a worse proposal made by the Finance Committee, I voted for it. But I trust that it will be regulated so that it may be restricted to its revenue aspect. Protectionists and free-traders alike avow their conviction that one of the first benefits and one of the eternal benefits of federation—one of those things without which it cannot be—is inter-state free-trade. Holding that opinion, I am able to answer the Hon. Mr. Dobson's question in this way. I do think the clause should be limited so as to provide that, the moment the requirements of Western Australia are met, she should not keep up these duties for the purposes of intercolonial protection, which it is one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution to deny to every state in the Federation. My honorable friend asks if the Drafting Committee cannot do something to meet that difficulty. The Drafting Committee cannot interfere with matters of policy. If the Convention think that a restriction should be imposed the necessary provision should be inserted either now or on the reconsideration of the clause.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I desire to move the addition of a proviso to the clause, to enable the Federal Parliament, at any time from one year after the adoption of uniform duties, to repeal the clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I think you had better not make any more amendments.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes, I will move this amendment, and ask the leader of the Convention whether, in view of what has been done, he will reconsider the effect of the other financial clauses? One object of the bookkeeping was to give information to the Federal Parliament, which would be a guide at the end of five years as to what new method of apportioning the revenue should be adopted. We have now introduced a most complicated factor into the calculation. The Federal Parliament, instead of having evidence as to the effect of the uniform duties in the Commonwealth, will have evidence as to the effect of uniform duties in four states, and of two different Tariffs in another state. The introduction of this complicated factor will render all the calculations useless. So that I would ask, considering that the work we have done by the insertion of the two previous clauses has been practically cancelled by the adoption of Mr. Deakin's amendment, whether the leader of the Convention will not consent to re-open the consideration of those two clauses?

Mr. BARTON. -

What effect do you estimate that the amendment has had on the two clauses so as to justify us in reconsidering them?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I say that the apology made for the adoption of the bookkeeping system was that, at the end of five years, it would be possible to tell from the bookkeeping of the uniform Tariff what should be the method of apportioning the surplus at the end of five years. You cannot possibly apply a barrier Tariff against four colonies working under a lower uniform Tariff without disturbing the operation in the colony with the barrier Tariff of the uniform Tariff. How can you apply the work of apportioning the surplus on such complicated data as that? I say that if the Parliament find the operation of this clause is not what we think it will be, they should have power to cancel this clause or to make some other provision in lieu of it, so as to enable the Parliament to do what is right under the circumstances. I therefore beg to move that there be added the following proviso:-

Provided that the Parliament may, at any time after the expiration of one year from the adoption of uniform duties, repeal this clause and make other provision in lieu thereof.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You die very hard, I must say that.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I was very pleased to hear the remarks of our leader in connexion with this clause, and I am sorry the clause was not presented for consideration in its initial shape. I would suggest to Mr. Glynn not to press his amendment to a division at the present moment, but I will ask the consideration of the Convention, and of the Drafting Committee in particular, as to

Mr. BARTON. -
To compensate the Treasury of Western Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Yes. I would suggest to Mr. Barton that we might add to the clause a provision setting forth that-

This section is intended solely to compensate the Treasury of the state of Western Australia for any diminution of its receipts in consequence of the adoption of uniform duties of customs or by the operation of free trade and intercourse with the several states, and its operation may be accordingly repealed or reduced at any time by the Federal Parliament.

I am not attempting to tie myself to any particular phraseology, but what I understand is that, though many voted for this provision, a majority so voted only because they recognised the necessity of compensating Western Australia in the event of loss. We also know that the leader of the Convention favours that view, but if we pass the clause as we have it now, Western Australia, for the purpose of protecting her industries and producers, may retain the provision. This ought not to be. I therefore ask that the Drafting Committee may consider the matter further, and advise the Convention as to whether a provision such as I have suggested, defining the purpose of the clause, should not be inserted, placing in the hands of the Federal Parliament the power of modifying it if they think proper to do so. I recognise perfectly well the difficulty of framing a provision of this sort, and I would infinitely prefer that an amendment such as I suggest should be framed in the least objectionable shape possible, and should emanate from the Drafting Committee.

Mr. BARTON. -
My difficulty would be as to whether my view of the matter is shared by the majority of the Convention.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I should ask our leader to test the feeling of the committee on that point. I think the suggestion I have made simply gives just effect to the honest desire to meet the difficulties of the position.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
The objections that have been raised by our leader and also by Mr. O'Connor apply equally to this proposal. Traders would be in a state of uncertainty always from not knowing what the Federal Parliament was going to do. It seems to me that this proposal would not only be unnecessary, but mischievous. It has generally been conceded by every one who has given attention to the matter that the case of Western Australia is exceptional. My honorable friend the Prime Minister of New South Wales and others who have been on the Finance Committee have admitted that the position is exceptional in regard to this matter, but now our friends from South Australia seem to think that there is no exception whatever, and that it is unnecessary to do anything for Western Australia. I accept the Finance Committee's proposal, which, as honorable members know very well, did not meet with favour from me at first. I was not going to vote for that: It seems to me that our case is exceptional, and unless we can get some argument to use in favour of joining the Federation we shall be placed in a very difficult position. Some honorable members appear to look on the trade of Western Australia as absolutely their own, as though we in Western Australia have nothing whatever to say to it. They have it, and they mean to hold it. But they forget altogether that if they prevent the people of Western Australia from joining the Federation, the Parliament of Western Australia will be absolutely free to deal with its Tariff and everything else exactly as it likes. They seem to think that under any circumstances Western Australia will join the Federation, whether it is to its advantage to do so or not. I think I know perhaps as much about the colony as the representatives of South Australia, and I can say that, even with the clause we have adopted in the Bill, it will be a difficult task to induce Western Australia to join the Federation. That being so, honorable members are grasping at a shadow, and grasping very hard at it, whilst they will be very likely to lose the substance. I believe they are open to this advice: That in their own interests they should leave the matter where it is. In striving to obtain something which may be to their advantage they will probably lose something a great deal better worth having. I should be very sorry, indeed, to place myself in opposition to the people of South Australia. That colony is our nearest neighbour, and we have always lived on the happiest terms and have worked together; but they must not think of themselves only, they must also think of us.

Mr. HOWE. -

We have developed your country.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Although the Honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) made an eloquent address in favour of the consumers of Western Australia, I would point out that they are able to look after their own interests without the people of Australia. In reply to the interjection of the honorable member (Mr. Howe). I believe that a good many people have come from South Australia to Western Australia. and I see evidences of their success when I go through the streets of Adelaide. It is of no use for the people of one colony to say that they have done a good deal for another colony. We are all working as well as we can for our own interests. I do not think that I am doing anything unreasonable in supporting the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin), but I am very sorry to see what I was going to call a grasping spirit-I will withdraw that term, and call it a self-interested spirit-pervading the mind of the Premier of South Australia. I hope that in the future he will give a little of his great mind to the consideration of the interests of Western Australia, and not concentrate all his attention upon his own colony.

Mr. Glynn's amendment was negatived.

[P.1244] starts here

The CHAIRMAN. -

The clause which we have just put into the Bill ought to come before the clause immediately preceding it.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. I will ask that the two be transposed.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will see that that is done.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I rise for the purpose of proposing the amendment standing in my name, and which has been circulated for the information of honorable members. It deals with a question which, to my mind, is not only important but essentially important to every one of the states. We cannot remember too well that the clauses which we have already passed take from the states the bulk of their revenue. Victoria is giving up over £2,000,000 a year, but we are not getting rid of the correlative of that revenue, namely, our liabilities. Therefore it is essential to us, and to each of the other states, that we should receive a guarantee that a portion of the revenue we are surrendering to the Commonwealth sufficient to enable us to meet our liabilities shall be returned to us. It is only because it is absolutely necessary to secure uniformity of trade and commerce that we are obliged to give up the control of our Customs and Excise to the Commonwealth, and, having done that, we have a right to say that we must have a guarantee that we shall not be left in a position in which, while we still have our liabilities to meet, we are deprived of the means for meeting them. I would have been very glad if some other honorable member, preferably a member of the Finance Committee, had come forward to enunciate this in express terms. I should like to point out that, while we are putting on the face of the Constitution the actual surrender of our revenues, so we ought to put on the face of the Constitution in like manner the security that each state will have, that the liabilities which it necessarily retains shall be met. If there was a proposal before us that the Commonwealth should indemnify each state against the interest portion of its liabilities to an amount equal to the revenue it surrendered, that would be one way of solving the difficulty. It would be only putting in one particular concrete shape a method that might or might not be adopted by the Commonwealth. Other methods might suggest themselves to the Federal Parliament and Treasurer which might be equally efficacious, and perhaps more palatable for the time being. Therefore I do not desire to lay down a hard-and-fast rule as to the way this essential end might be attained. But I wish to put on the face of the Constitution that the state shall be absolutely guaranteed in the direction I have indicated. The fault I have to find with the proposal of the Finance Committee and certain other proposals subsequently made was this: That there was no proper measure of guarantee offered to us. It was suggested to keep an account in the Federation first of the revenue actually received for each of the five years succeeding the uniform Tariff, but against that was placed, not a proper measure which would enable us to calculate our loss, but this utterly false measure was placed, viz., that we should calculate as against the import of goods and the production and manufacture of goods for each of these five years—that is, possibly seven years ahead of the present time—that we should calculate as one factor the state Tariff as existing at the time of the imposition of uniform customs duties. That would be utterly wrong. It would not by any means measure the actual loss to the state. Therefore I have reiterated time after time that it would be rather a guarantee of possible and prospective gains than a measure of actual loss. What we want is this, to be able to say to each state—"You can come into this Federation with the assurance that, when the uniform customs duties are established, your whole financial machinery will not be thrown out of gear, because you will be guaranteed by the Commonwealth that you will during each of those five years receive as much as before." It would not do to say "as much as you were receiving in the year immediately preceding the imposition of the uniform customs duties," because that would not only leave it to each state to fix its Tariff with a view to that matter, but it would also afford a very bad standard in any case, because the year or the previous two years immediately preceding the imposition of the uniform duties would be years of dislocation of

What about New South Wales?

Mr. ISAACS. -

A difficulty might arise in New South Wales, but I do not conceive that it is a difficulty that must necessarily lead to injustice, because, as the Right Hon. Mr. Reid has pointed out, no doubt with an internal vision of the identity of the person he was speaking of, the Federal Treasurer will be a man of genius and he will be able to rectify any difficulty in that direction.
Mr. REID. -

I am afraid that under this clause it would be a sort of genius which would entitle a man to get into close confinement.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Let us see what it amounts to. Does my right honorable friend, or any one else, venture to suggest openly that the states are not to receive back as much as they are surrendering in the first five years? Would any one venture to say openly to the people of his state that the Treasury of that state is not to receive back sufficient to meet its liabilities? There is not a member of this Convention who would dare to take up such a position. If this is the case, are we not under a bounden duty to those who sent us here to show them that the position that I have advocated, viz., that the states are to get back a sufficient amount, is clearly indicated on the face of the Constitution? Of course, if we are going to attempt to bind the people-if we are going to say-"Oh, trust the Federal Parliament, you may or may not get it;" and then, if we are told that it is very unfair to New South Wales that they should get it, it is time that we looked after our own states, and insisted upon this essential to going into the Federation: That each state should find a guarantee in this Constitution such as I am asking for. I do not care in what shape the guarantee is given; I do not care whether it is that a sufficient amount of liabilities are taken over; I do not care if it be in the form, if possible, of a Tariff; we should have in some shape, and in some words sufficiently clear, the absolute promise on the part of the Commonwealth that it will return to the states a sum which shall not leave them losers by the operation. If any honorable member can suggest a better form, I am not wedded to this form. I would have preferred if somebody with more knowledge of finance and figures had come forward and indicated it. I would have been happy to support him. But as far as Victoria is concerned, and I think the same may be said of Tasmania, South Australia, and Western Australia, we should have this guarantee in the Bill. What have we done for Western Australia? One of my honorable friends asked me that question. We have given Western Australia a guarantee to a certain extent, and, as I indicated earlier in the day, I was prepared to vote for that, not by way of giving Western Australia specially and solely a guarantee in this direction, because Western Australia requires it less than other colonies, but I was prepared to do that, so as to form a proper supplement and an addition to any general guarantee that is given to all the states alike. I can see that New South Wales, under some circumstances, might be called upon to pay an improper share, but I can see also that a Tariff can be framed so that that should not be done. I can see that various expedients could be resorted to, perfectly legitimate and proper ones, by which that unjust result could be averted; but I know also that it would be impossible to so frame a Tariff as to give Tasmania, Victoria, and South Australia just as much as they ought to have under normal conditions, as they are living now, and not leave Western Australia with a gap to fill up. I, therefore, think we were right in supporting the last clause, because that will afford Western Australia a means of filling up the gap, without resorting to the pockets of the colonies.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Don't you see where your admission lands you?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Where it ought to, I hope.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You can only get the money either from loan or from New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not care if direct taxation be called on to help. But where does the opposite position land you? If my friends mean what they say—and say it openly—it means they are going to take such steps as will prevent the other colonies from getting back a sufficient amount of their revenue. If that is what we are asked to do, I should say the other colonies would not hesitate in refusing to do it.

Mr. REID. -

You are not asked to do anything at present. We all agree to leave it to the federal electors and the Federal Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I want to leave it to the federal electors, but to leave it in a way that they cannot misunderstand it, and in such a way as to make it safe and right for the other colonies. I want to say to the colonies—"You are perfectly secure in this respect: You will not be left with your liabilities around your neck, and revenue out of your reach." That is, shortly, the position. I hope that when Mr. Reid comes to deal with the question, as I hope he will, he will say definitely and distinctly which position he takes up. I hope he will say whether he is content to admit that Victoria and the other colonies are to get back a sufficient amount of their revenue. If he admits that, I would ask what objection he has to this proposal? If Mr. Reid says that the proposal would mean an injustice to New South Wales, it seems to me that we cannot meet each other at all, and that we are beyond hand-shaking distance. If we are to say it would be unfair to New South Wales, and that there is no conceivable way out of the difficulty, it means that the colonies are to give up their revenue and hand it over to the Federal Parliament—that we are practically not to expect to get it back. Under those circumstances, I press the proposal with all the earnestness I can. This is not a right to be bartered away, but one absolutely essential to our existence as states. Without it we cannot continue to live, and if the proposal is rejected, what are we to say to the people? Are we to say-"Oh, trust the Federal Parliament"? If we did that, the people would say-"No. We were told by New South Wales it would be unjust to do so that there are no possible means of getting the money back without injustice to New South Wales, and, therefore, we cannot get it at all." If that be the case, the people would hesitate before giving an affirmative vote for the Bill. On the other hand, it seems going a long way to assert that you could not say to the states "We will not secure you in your solvency."

It comes to that, and if the revenue be taken away the states are insolvent. If the states are given what is necessary to maintain solvency, then less cannot be given than what the states are asking. The position should be known clearly and distinctly. It should not be covered up with buttered words, or the declaration "We will trust the Federal Parliament." Are we to be sure that we can go to the people and tell them that they will get back revenue sufficient to guarantee their liability, or, what would be equivalent, that such a proportion of the states' liabilities would be taken over by the Commonwealth? Or have we to tell them to take a leap in the dark-that we have got the vote of the Convention, supported by New South Wales, that to get back what is absolutely essential to the existence of the states would be an injustice and an impossibility? We have now come to understand each other thoroughly. We must take our stand that it is essential to our very existence as states that we should have this security. I beg to move the following new clause to follow clause 93:

For each of the first five years after uniform duties of customs have been imposed the Commonwealth shall keep an account showing-

I. The amount collected and taken to have been collected in each state from duties of customs and of excise.

II. The average annual amount collected in that state from duties of customs and of excise during the three years immediately before the imposition of uniform duties.

The former amount, if less than the latter amounts shall be deducted therefrom, and the balance shall be taken to be the net loss of the state for that year by reason of the imposition of uniform duties of customs and of excise, and by reason of the operation of free trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth.

The Commonwealth shall pay to each state the amount of its net loss.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I really wonder whether my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) was here on Thursday evening. Does he not remember that his respected chief made absolutely the same proposal?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No, no; it was totally different.

Mr. REID. -
I have looked at it with great care, and in all essential features the proposal is absolutely the same.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I may say that I have looked at the present proposition very carefully to see whether it is the same or not, and I have come to the conclusion that it is entirely different.

Mr. REID. -
When the Chairman says it is entirely different I only wish he would go on and tell us in what respect it is different.

The CHAIRMAN. -
In the first place, there are three years named instead of one. In the next place, the actual revenue collected in the state is the measure, instead of, as in the other case, the revenue which would have to be collected after the imposition of the uniform duties. These are two different things altogether.

Mr. ISAACS. -
One includes gains as well as losses.

Mr. REID. -
That may be so, but the aim is exactly the same.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The object is the same.

Mr. REID. -
The aim is the same, although the play on words may be slightly different. For greater caution I will just point out the respect in which I think the propositions are the same. The Convention is asked to put in the Constitution a direction to keep an account for each of the first five years after the imposition of the uniform ditties of customs, and that that account shall, in the first place, show the amount actually collected and taken to have been collected in each state. That is to say, the amount actually collected under the uniform Tariff for each of the five years. Then the next entry that is to be made is the average annual amount collected from duties of customs and excise during three years immediately before the imposition of the uniform duties. That is where the deviation occurs. I would like to show from the dates on which this operation must take place that I am absolutely correct in saying that the proposition now made is the same as the original proposition. That is so, certainly, so far as one colony is concerned, namely, the colony that would have to find the money. That is the only colony which will not have a net loss on the operation of intercolonial free-trade, because it is the only colony that does not tax its fellow Australian colonists. The uniform Tariff call only come into operation for the year 1901. That is allowing two years, a certain time for the assent in the colonies to the Constitution, and for the proclamation, with six months' interval, and then the work of framing a Tariff.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If that is the objection of my honorable friend, I have no objection to take the Dibbs Tariff.

Mr. REID. -

In saying that the propositions are substantially the same I am not stating the only objection. During the three years prior to 1901 see what position the honorable member puts New South Wales, and indeed every other colony, in. There is a direct temptation to engage, for the two or three years before federal intercourse, in rival measures to put up Tariffs against the existing state of things-to put up Tariffs against Australians - with the sure and certain hope that the higher Tariff put on the subjects of the coming intercolonial trade the greater will be the credit of the states in the accounts of the Commonwealth. Supposing that New South Wales continues in her present policy, the figures in the year before the imposition of the uniform Tariff would be exactly the same as the figures for the three years before the uniform Tariff. The basis would be as nearly as possible precisely the same. The present policy of New South Wales is not a casual passing state of things. The present state of things has characterized the fiscal policy of that colony for I do not know how many years. With a slight interval, the present policy has been that of New South Wales since the foundation of the colony. It is too much to ask the oldest colony of the group, at the very time of federation, to depart from a policy which, it might be said, has been inherent in its very existence since it became a colony. And now to ask it to depart - in what direction? To suddenly put on a number of duties to tax its neighbours (just as its neighbours tax the colonists of New South Wales), in order to get even with the other colonies in the calculation of the taxes of the Commonwealth. Because, unless we do that, this will be our position.

Mr. ISAACS. -

At the very worst, it is anticipating the Federal tariff for two years.

Mr. REID. -

It is inconceivable that the Federal Tariff will leave us with a net loss in comparison with the previous Tariff. That is admitted all round. When these two amounts are taken, we will be left with a large amount more than we ever collected ourselves. Consequently, there is no equality in this proposal. Why is Western Australia dealt with specially? Why have we spent two or three days in dealing with the special case of Western Australia on the lines on which we have dealt with it if this was the thing that was seriously contended for? Why could not we have saved Western Australia the comparative, if not the positive, humiliation of being dealt with as a special case, when this is infinitely more satisfactory to Western Australia than anything we have given them? What is the use, after five days' discussion, of giving to Western Australia the concession to tax herself in order to make up her deficiency, when the moment we have arrived at that decision we immediately turn round and do for the other colonies something infinitely more beneficial to them than what we have done for Western Australia, the moment they lose by the adoption of intercolonial free-trade? Because, the other colonies under this proposal are to get something, not by taxing their own people, not by increasing duties which are not increased in other parts of the Commonwealth, as in Western Australia-no, but by the much simpler plan of putting their hand in the Commonwealth purse, and taking out an amount which shall represent the exactions of those colonies on their fellow Australians. And the more they have taxed and harassed their fellow Australians the larger the cheque they will get out of the Commonwealth purse. And out of whose pocket is the money to come? Why, Sir, 48 per cent. of the total amount taken out of the Commonwealth purse to replace the Border Duties in the state exchequers will be taken from the one colony that has not put any duties on her neighbours. Well, this is the refinement of the federal spirit, and it seems to me that we have been wasting a great deal of time if this is to be the solution of the difficulty. Why not have given this concession to Western Australia, in common with the other colonies, as it is much better than what we have just given to that colony after much grudging and a comparative amount of heat?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I suggested it days ago.

Mr. REID. -
Surely you do not think that this assembly, which, at any rate, is an intelligent assembly, would have wasted five days on all the intricacies of the Western Australian difficulty, and solved that, and, in the next breath, have arrived at a settlement which will make that settlement of the Western Australian difficulty not only unnecessary, but absolutely unfair to the very colony in whose interests we are supposed to be giving something up?

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is quite necessary.

Mr. REID. -

If this is necessary to Victoria, it is doubly necessary to Western Australia, but we are not giving this concession to Western Australia, to make up out of the Commonwealth Exchequer a single penny of the loss which Western Australia will suffer from intercolonial free-trade. Western Australia has not asked us to do that. She has simply obtained power to get the money out of her own people to make up the gap in her finances, whatever it may be. On the top of that proposal comes the Attorney-General of Victoria, with another proposal which is in no sort of harmony with it, and which makes absolutely a disagreement with a part of it, if this is to be carried out. I thought Mr. Holder crushingly showed the absurdity of this proposal the other

Mr. ISAACS. -

He did not deal with it then; it was not before us then.

Mr. REID. -

The same thing, in principle, was before us then.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

If the honorable member does not admit that substantially the same proposal was before us on that occasion, I will not look to him for an admission again, because it is notorious that, although the basis of the period of time has shifted, the principle of compensation is absolutely the same. Surely the honorable member will not deny that. I do not think Victoria is quite so hard up that its Attorney-General should take up a position of that sort. However, I will not waste any time on this matter. It has now been before the Convention for several days, and we know all the bearings of these proposals. I am not going to say anything more than the observations I have made. It will simply make the Convention ridiculous, after the time we have taken on the special case of Western Australia, if we now adopt this general proposition; because, if we do adopt this proposal, we must immediately proceed to withdraw the other which we have passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

This will practically negative the other.

Mr. REID. -

Certainly the other will have to be struck out, if we pass this. I should be very sorry to see us getting at such cross purposes in this Convention. I simply decline to discuss the matter any further, it is so abominably unfair. Mr. Isaacs' proposed new clause was negatived.

Clause 94 was agreed to.

Equality of Trade.

Clause 95-Preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over the ports of another state, and any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth, or by any state, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth, shall be null and void.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think that the heading "Equality of Trade" is unnecessary, especially as the public debts clause comes under it and can have no application to it. I see no necessity for that heading, and it may as well come out. I therefore beg to move-

That the heading "Equality of Trade" be omitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Honorable members will see that this clause begins by prohibiting any preference being given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over the ports of another state—not merely to a state or part of a state, but to the ports of a state. And then it goes on to say that any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth, or by any state, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth shall be null and void. It seems to me that the whole of the legitimate effect of this clause can be gained by a very much shorter provision, which would simply nullify any law or regulation of commerce or revenue giving any preference to one state or port of that state over another state or port of that state. I beg to move-

That clause 95 be struck out with a view to the substitution of the following:-

Any law or regulation of commerce or revenue made by the Commonwealth or by any state, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, giving any preference to one state or any part thereof over another state or, any part thereof shall be null and void.

This clause is not intended to interfere with the internal regulation of trade in any state. It is simply intended to prevent any state from giving trade preferences, whether by itself or by any authority under its control, to itself or to any state over another state.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It will prevent us from continuing our Riverina rates, but it would allow you to carry our goods from the border to Sydney at any price you liked.

Mr. BARTON. -

It would not have the latter effect, certainly.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Why?

Mr. BARTON. -

For this reason. If we prohibit any law or regulation of commerce or revenue giving preferences to any state, we cannot make preferential rates. That I take to be certain. At both Adelaide and Sydney I pointed out that I did not in any way defend preferential rates. I drew a distinction between local rates and preferential rates, and that is a distinction that is daily drawn by the Inter-State Commission in America. It is a distinction which generally dictates the answer to the question-"Is the rate fair or not?" If the honorable member will look at any of the books published in the United States on the subject, he will find that the cases are frequent in which the Inter-State Commission has to decide whether a rate is fair within the meaning of the inter-state legislation or not.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Can they hold that a rate is bad because it is too low?

Mr. BARTON. -

Not if it is a rate dealing with the development of internal traffic alone.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The last report I saw showed that the Inter-State Commission could not declare a rate bad on the ground that it was too low.

Mr. BARTON. -

No. If they find that a rate is deliberately fixed low, not for the mere purpose of internal development, on the ordinary principle of diminishing the rate in proportion to the length of traction, but of wrongfully preventing inter-state commerce from taking its ordinary course, the allowance of that rate is a matter which they can consider. A decision which says that they cannot interfere with a rate because it is low is not a decision which abnegates their constant duty to prevent preferences between the states. I do not think any decision can be found which will negative that view. Under the clause as it stands, the prohibition of preferences extends only from the ports of one state to the ports of another state. If it is wrong to give a preference to the ports of one state over the ports of another state, it is equally wrong to give a preference to a part of a state over a part of another state. I have endeavoured to correct that anomaly. On the other hand, the second part of the clause, making void any law or regulation made by the Commonwealth or by any state, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth, may mean more than the Convention intends. At the instance of the Hon. Mr. Isaacs we amended clause 89 to make it read that on the imposition of uniform duties trade and commerce, whether by intercolonial carriage or ocean navigation, between the states should be absolutely free. The words used before were "throughout the Commonwealth." What we desire to protect is inter-state trade, and we recognise that the internal regulation of trade must be left in the hands of the individual states. That is a principle on which we are agreed. It exists in the American Constitution, and the more I reflect upon it the more important I think it is that it should be preserved here. If we had adhered to the wide words used in clause 89, as to the amendment of which I agreed wi

Let the new clause be printed.

Mr. BARTON. -
No, I don't see why that request should be made to me when it is not made to other honorable members. I am getting rather tired of being asked to have every small amendment I submit printed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I have endeavoured to follow the statement of our honorable leader with regard to this question, which he himself will admit is a very important one. He appears to be desirous of radically altering clause 95. I do not understand what would be the full effect of this proposal, and, under the circumstances, I think I may fairly ask that the further consideration of the matter be postponed until we see the new clause in print, and have an opportunity of studying it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I am very loath to accede to the suggestion of my right honorable friends and I will tell you why. The most important propositions are brought forward by way of amendment by members of the Convention without being printed. He has himself submitted some of the most drastic, the most important, and the most radical amendments.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
They have always been printed.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, because the right honorable member has had an opportunity of getting them printed. I do not see why I should have this clause separately printed, because it forms part of a schedule of amendments which has been printed, and which is about to be distributed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It has not been circulated.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, but the most radical propositions have been dealt with without their being printed. It is hard on me, holding the position I do, that I should be handicapped by having to get every proposal I bring forward printed. Honorable members are all old parliamentarians, who understand what they are about, and they do not want two or three days to consider a proposal the meaning of which is plain on the face of it. At any rate, the proposal has been circulated; but I wish to protest against the idea that whenever I bring forward a proposal it must be printed, whereas the same condition does not apply to any one else.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

The observations of the leader of the Convention in one respect, at all events, have emphasized the distinction which, though possibly latent in the clause as he has amended it, is not explicitly set forth there. The honorable member has admitted that a particular line of demarcation is to be drawn between traffic rates within a state. Whatever be their end-even though it be a reduction of an enormous amount as compared with other charges made by the state-such arrangements are not to be open to question if they only affect the development of the state's own resources, or the encouragement of its own traffic. But if, at the same time, such a reduction, although it may have the effect of developing the local resources of a particular part of the territory of a state, has also the further and additional effect of interfering with the railway traffic or the railway rates of some portion of another state, then the reduction may be held to be repugnant to this particular provision. I do not think that any one disputes the wisdom of that distinction. No honorable member here desires to limit the power of a state to make any regulation or alteration of its charges it pleases to make, so long as they are perfectly local in operation. If they cease to be local, and involve a question of interstate commerce, they are to come within the scope of authority of this commission. But even so-and it is a most important and vital point—I venture to say that it is too important a distinction to be allowed to be concealed in the wide words which the leader of the Convention has employed in the clause. With the principle these words convey we are all in hearty concurrence, and I only trust that they may be given their full effect. But with regard to the question whether the decisions given in the United States can be held sufficient security for the important distinction to which the leader of the Convention has drawn attention, is another point, upon which I should not like to express a judgment without an opportunity for further consideration. At all events, it is surely a matter in regard to which we should not rely on words which are not to be found—speaking from memory—in the United States Constitution, even though on the face of decisions given in the United States courts, under their Constitution, such words would convey, by necessary implication all we desire. We cannot be sure that they would, if introduced into our Constitution, have precisely the same significance as different words in the United States Constitution have been held to possess. That is a very important point which, owing to shortness of notice, I have not had an opportunity of examining, and therefore do not desire to detain the Convention by its discussion. But, at all events, it is a very reasonable request that we should be allowed an opportunity of examining the general proposal now submitted to us, together with the decisions of the United States, in order to determine whether this language, if introduced into our Constitution, would, so far as we can tell, be interpreted by our courts so as to have the same effect as other words have had in the United States. Let me press upon the honorable and learned leader that, having enunciated a principle that meets with acceptance all round, he should not ask us to take the further step of trusting to the interpretation of the courts of such wide words, in the belief that the distinction he indicates will be held to be implied in these words by the future courts of the Commonwealth. If the honorable and learned gentleman will place plainly in this clause a definition of the functions of the Inter-State Commission, which shall give it authority over all matters affecting intercolonial interest, and will at the same time either by that definition or by more express words retain to the states the liberty to deal with all rates and charges that are purely and strictly local in operation, he will have met, at all events, the first obstacle to the adoption of this clause. He will place in explicit terms in the Constitution the principle which seems to be essential to the proper interpretation of this clause, and which he himself has alluded to as being the proper interpretation to be placed upon it. If that be done, although I should desire to examine the United States decisions—and, no doubt, another opportunity for their consideration will be given—I shall be satisfied but unless that distinction were put in the clause, I should view with apprehension the addition of words as wide as these are, which might prejudicially interfere with the profitable working of the railways of the states, and might seriously affect their earnings.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -
I should like to add to what Mr. Deakin has just said, that too much reliance ought not properly to be placed on the American position, because our situation in regard to railways is different to the position in the United States. The railways in Australia are owned by the states, and what qualification that fact might have as governing the relations between the state and the railways we do not know. The distinction pointed out by Mr. Deakin should be clearly stated, I think, in this clause, because it is vital to the whole working of the Constitution. Preferential railway rates are not to be allowed, and I think that this provision should be covered not by any general words, but by clearly-expressed words. A great deal hangs also on whether the Convention is going to allow in the next clause the word "may" to be altered into "shall." If there is to be an alteration we should perhaps be content with a vague principle which otherwise we should not put up with. So far as South Australia is concerned, there is a strong feeling that the matter should be made clear, both as regards preferential rates and as to the erection of the body which shall so adjust the interests of the various colonies that no injury shall be done to either of them.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I quite feel that there is a large measure of truth in what the honorable and learned leader of the Convention says, that he should not be subjected to any further delay than any other honorable member is subjected to in regard to amendments which he wishes to propose. But this clause is fraught with enormous consequences, and goes much further than the American Constitution or the American decisions.

Mr. BARTON. -
The clause as it is in the Bill goes a tremendous distance.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But this clause will go further. The clause in the Bill deals with freedom of trade. This deals with the matter on a totally different line.

Mr. GLYNN. -
This is a better one.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is a question of opinion. At all events, this is a totally new proposal. In America the provision that preference is not to be given to one port of one state over any port of another state is a provision which is altogether different in character to this. I have alluded previously to the effect of that provision in the United States Constitution, as defined in the case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling, where it was stated distinctly that the provision related only to the United States and not to individual states. That provision was introduced by reason of the fear that the Federal Government might probably prefer the ports of one state over the ports of another.

Mr. REID. -

It was a restriction on the powers of the United States, and not particular states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Quite so; not on individual states. Now we are proposing to take up a totally new line in that respect, and also in another respect. What has been guarded against in America is the institution of barriers against freedom of commerce, and it has been held both by the courts and by the Legislature that there is to be no barrier introduced between the states as to commerce. But this proposal does not intend to do that. These words do not make our commerce free. This clause says that although you may want to invite commerce to enter your ports, although you may want to offer attractions to commerce, you are not to do it, because the mere doing of it, irrespective of your motive, will give a preference to your own state. Where will a provision of that kind land us? The clause says that, whatever regulation of commerce or of revenue is made by the Commonwealth, or by a state, or by any authority constituted by either of them, if, in the opinion of the Supreme Court—for that is what it comes to—its effect is to give a preference over any state, or part of a state, it is to be null and void. How are we to carry on under such a provision? I think that this is too important a matter to be dealt with off-hand. It would at once do away with our railway rates affecting the Riverina traffic.

Mr. BARTON. -

Does the honorable and learned member mean that the deference between this and the existing clause would do away with those rates?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, because the existing clause deals only with derogations from the freedom of trade. This clause goes much further.

Mr. BARTON. -

You have this provision in the first part of the existing clause as applying to ports.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In the existing clause the application to ports is only an application of Commonwealth laws. Preference is not to be given to the ports of one state over the ports of another. We are now applying this provision to state laws.

Mr. BARTON. -

We applied it to state laws in the second part of clause 95 originally.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That was only in regard to freedom of latest Inter-State Commission report that I have been able to lay my hands upon. He will find it at page 20, volume 2, of the House of Representatives-Miscellaneous Documents, 1894-5. The passage is headed "The Southern Freight War." This freight war is very like the freight war that now exists between Victoria and New South Wales. Of course, I must not be understood to be defending this freight war.

Mr. REID. -

At any rate, it does not injure the producer.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It does not. As the passage is a very long one, I think I should be unduly taking up time by reading it. As I understand, the commission report that the situation calls for a statutory remedy, because under no circumstances are they enabled by the American law to deal with the sweeping reductions which are the result of this freight war. The contest for traffic is not between states, but between lines of railway. By the secret and the open cutting of rates, damage is done to one locality as against another, and the commission find themselves unable to deal with this evil. In America, they have not reached the position which is sought to be reached by this proposal, which is quite a new departure, and would have the most serious consequences for Victoria. If honorable members doubt the reason of our insistence upon full time for consideration, I invite them to read the Railways Commissioner’s report upon this very question. He deals with it most fully upon page 315 of the Victorian Blue-book. He points out that it would affect Victoria to the extent of £160,000 it affects us not only with regard to our railway returns, but also in our position as a commercial and distributing centre. Although the change of words is not, upon the face of it, very great, the effect is enormous, and revolutionizes the clause altogether. I do not know how the amendment affects New South Wales, but it is difficult to see how we can accept, without full consideration, a provision which allows the Supreme Court of the Federation to take up any enactment and say whether, in its opinion, apart from its object or motive, it gives a preference to another state or part of a state. If it has that effect it is, independently of any other consideration, to be null and void.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Those words are not in the amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the effect of it. I do not see how else the honorable and learned member can read the amendment. It provides that any enactment which has the effect of giving a preference is to be null and void.
If it has the effect of derogating from freedom of trade and commerce.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Those words are not in the provision read by Mr Barton.

Mr. BARTON. -
I simply prevent the giving of a preference.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes. The question appears to me a very difficult one, and I think my honorable and learned friend will see that, in consideration of its difficulty and of the consequences which flow from it, we should have a little further time to deal with it.

Mr. BARTON. -
I will not press the matter to a division to-night, but I think we might discuss it a little longer.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
In thinking over this matter while honorable members have been speaking, it would seem to me that the clause will have this effect: We at the present time have reduced rates for wool coming from Riverina to Victoria; these rates will have to go. On the other hand, New South Wales has increased rates upon goods coming to our borders from the interior of her colony. Those rates will remain, because they do not give a preference to one part of New South Wales over any part of Victoria. It seems to me, as I have had to remark on several occasions with regard to this particular question of railway rates, that we are always faced by one position—the hands of Victoria are to be tied, while the hands of New South Wales are to be left absolutely free.

Mr. REID. -
I say, leave them both free. The producer is not injured by these rates. The lower the rates, the better for the people who use the railways.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I should be prepared to leave them to fight it out if both sides were free, but I would rather see no fight at all.

Mr. BARTON. -
Would the right honorable member rather have the additional clause 95 taken out of the Bill?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Now, you are springing another difficulty upon me.

Mr. BARTON. -
I am not springing another difficulty upon the right honorable member. I only want to know what he wants.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I want to stop any unfairness.

Mr. REID. -

He wants to put that little thing right that affects him, and he does not think about anything else.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not think the honorable member is fair in making such a statement.

Mr. REID. -

I apologize; the honorable member has been the good boy of the Convention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

In future I intend to be the bad boy. The difficulty about these words giving a preference is that it would mean we were giving a preference to a portion of New South Wales over Victoria, but if we attempted to challenge the New South Wales rates the answer would be at once that they were not giving a preference to any portion of New South Wales over Victoria. That is the cleft stick in which we are going to be placed. We shall not be able to carry on the war, whereas, quite unintentionally under this clause New South Wales will be left perfectly free to carry on that war.

Mr. REID. -

We do not want any inequality

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We do not want any inequality, and that is why I desire to have an opportunity of looking at the wording so as to see if we could not meet the views of our New South Wales friends, and at the same time be fair to Victoria.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I wish to draw attention to the fact that according to clause 95, as it is in the Bill, there are two prohibitions: First, it prohibits preference; that probably would be directed against Victoria adopting any rule or regulation giving a preference to the Riverina trade. So far it might be desirable that such a clause should be kept in the Bill, but the second part of the clause contains this important prohibition. It prohibits any law or regulation having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth. I wish to draw attention to the fact that the amendment of Mr. Barton proposes to give effect to the prohibition against preference, which might have a very serious and important effect upon Victoria; but at the same time he omits from his new clause that prohibition against any law having the effect of derogating from the freedom of trade and commerce.

Mr. BARTON. -

You could not speak of any such preference which would not be a derogation from the freedom of trade and commerce.

Dr. QUICK. -

I would point out that the omission of that prohibition might give New South Wales a free hand to impose any regulation of trade or commerce which, although not directly intended as a preference, might indirectly have the effect of a preference. For instance, New South Wales might go on reducing its railway rates until they assumed such an attenuated shape that they would have the effect of a preference by attracting trade which would naturally go to Victoria to some port of New South Wales. I think we might be able to accept the proposed amended clause if Mr. Barton would insert, in addition to the words which he proposed-"No law or regulation giving a preference, &c., or having the effect of derogating from the freedom of trade and commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth."

Mr. BARTON. -

It is the same thing really.

Dr. QUICK. -

Then I want to know why these words, "having the effect of derogating from the freedom of trade and commerce in the different parts of the Commonwealth," have been omitted?

Mr. BARTON. -

The reason is because I do not believe in idle repetitions. I think the two things mean the same. As a draftsman, I thought it better to leave out these words.

Dr. QUICK. -

These words have stood the test of time for some years.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, they were altered in Adelaide.

Dr. QUICK. -

I know that in New South Wales objections were taken to these very words, "derogating from the freedom of trade and commerce." I know that there were a number of critics of the words in New South Wales who were of opinion that this would prevent them from attracting trade and commerce to Sydney, so there must be some difference.

Mr. BARTON. -

I hope the honorable member will take my assurance. I am not in the habit of telling lies.

Dr. QUICK. -

I accept the honorable member's statement, but we know that a certain amount of literature has clustered around these words, so that the omission of them cannot be regarded by the representatives of Victoria as altogether without significance. At any rate, there is a sufficient amount of reasonable doubt on the subject to give weight to the suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner that the clause should be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not intend to ask for a division to-night.

Dr. QUICK. -

It strikes me that the omission of these words might have a very prejudicial affect with regard to the action of Victoria. It would appear that the prohibition of preference is deliberately intended to take away from Victoria the power of giving preferential rates in order to attract the Riverina trade. Yet it reserves to New South Wales the power to impose what Mr. Barton calls development rates; yet these differential rates might become so narrowed down as to be absolutely preferential in their effect. I would ask is it intended to reserve such a power to the railway authorities of New South Wales? With regard to freedom and equality of trade, I may remark, by the way, that equality of trade has been struck out, I do not know why. The heading seemed to suggest the meaning of the clause, that was, that there was to be equality of trade, and none of this cutthroat business, such as New South Wales putting on rates between Albury and Wagga to prevent trade drifting towards Melbourne. Are those rates to be preserved? I say we ought to put something in this Bill to prohibit such a thing.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Between what places does the honorable member say these rates might be imposed?

Dr. QUICK. -

Between Wagga Wagga and Albury.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Those will be done away with.

Dr. QUICK. -

But what is to prevent their being imposed under this emasculated clause? The railway authorities will be able to impose any rates they like within their own territory. In my opinion, those words with regard to preventing anything which would derogate from the freedom of trade or commerce are most significant and important. If they are eliminated, the clause will be emasculated and shorn of a large amount of the power which would secure freedom and equality of trade.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Will the honorable member explain what is the meaning of the words
"derogating from freedom of trade and commerce"?
Dr. QUICK. -
It would prevent the placing of any obstruction in the way of river navigation or railway carriage. It would prevent anything in the nature of a rate which would derogate from the freedom of trade between two colonies—which would take away from the freedom of trade. Therefore, I would suggest that if this clause is to be pushed forward tonight, it should be amended by inserting the words which are contained in the original clause.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
There are certain things which we allow. If there is a high rate from Wagga to Albury we would certainly allow that that was a preferential rate. We cannot fix the rate so as to take away the trade.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
But it would not be a preference under this clause.

Dr. QUICK. -
It is evidently intended to prevent preferential rates being imposed at Echuca or Swan hill in order to draw traffic from across the border. That is quite clear. It will cripple our action, but at the same time it reserves more freedom indirectly to the railway authorities of New South Wales. I agree with my colleagues that, if there is to be freedom and equality of trade, which we all profess to desire, it ought to be implanted firmly in this Constitution. The representatives of New South Wales ought not to be allowed under the pretended exercise of a power to develop their own resources, so as to interfere with the free flow of trade and commerce to the nearest port.

Mr. GORDON. -
No matter from which state?

Dr. QUICK. -
No matter from which state.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -
That is the point. I was surprised to hear Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs rather fighting against the great principle without which federation would be a bastard federation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
What principle?

Mr. GORDON. -
The principle which would prevent anything in the way of preferential rates.

Mr. ISAACS. -
You have not heard me say one word against that principle.
Mr. GORDON. -
I understood the honorable member to fight against the principle in the interests of the little bit of trade from Riverina.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Anything I said on the subject was rather the other way.

Mr. GORDON. -
Then I must have misunderstood the honorable member. But Sir George Turner rather argued in favour of the little bit of trade from Riverina.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
No, I did not. What I said was that it would be unfair to take that trade away and tie our hands, unless the same thing were done to the other colonies. We are quite willing to go on an equal footing.

Mr. GORDON. -
I agree with the honorable member, and I am glad I misunderstood him. Without some provision to prevent preferential railway rates free-trade would be a farce. The benefits of free-trade could be done away with by erecting a barrier of railway rates.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Do you mean to say that giving lower rates to the foreigner is a barrier?

Mr. GORDON. -
As between states, if it be worked in that way.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Nonsense!

Mr. REID. -
It is not a barrier; it is a premium.

Mr. GORDON. -
It is an obvious barrier. The wealthiest colony would, in that case, carry off the palm. I hope no suggestion will be made to obviate what Dr. Quick so clearly described just now as the flow of trade and commerce to its natural geographical outlet.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
I suppose it is inevitable that this controversy, which was really thrashed out on a previous occasion, must again come before the Convention. The whole question is really where "differential" becomes "preferential." That seems to be the whole point. But it seems to be forgotten that in New South Wales we have an enormous territory, which we are absolutely bound to open out. It is not our fault that our territory is bigger than that of Victoria. In some cases in which it was never intended in any way to give what might be called a preferential rate, but to give purely a differential rate to afford the people in the far interior an opportunity of having a reasonable chance with those nearer the port, that rate as it got nearer the border might be construed by some as a preferential rate. But supposing it was made a regulation of the railways throughout New South Wales that those differential rates should be exactly on the same scale throughout the colony. I do not mean to say we would be committed to that; but I take it as an example. In such a case I do not see how, in view of the interests of our own people, it would be possible for us to say that the attenuated rates, at the far end of one of those systems nearing the border, should be absolutely altered, in the same manner as if we joined the service of Victoria, and made a through rate. The best thing in these matters is to be perfectly candid. We have discussed this matter before. My honorable friends are aiming at a state of affairs that would, no doubt, exist if the whole of the railways were absolutely federalized and vested in the Commonwealth. Under these circumstances let us, for instance, take Cootamundra as a central point between Sydney and Melbourne. What has been contended is that, if the railways were federalized, there should be a through rate from Cootamundra to Melbourne, on the same principle as from Cootamundra to Sydney. We are quite willing at this stage of our affairs, before the railways are absolutely federalized, to let things remain as they are.

Mr. HIGGINS. - And allow us preference rates?

Mr. REID. - Yes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Exactly. The Victorian position is simple. It is very easy to decide that there is an absolutely preferential rate if greater facilities are given to people in another colony than are given to the people of the colony by which the facilities are granted.

Mr. GORDON. - Or people are placed at a greater disadvantage by a higher rate.

Mr. ISAACS. - That is provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Yes, exactly. There are two positions; one very simple, and the other very complicated. It is very simple to understand that if you reduce your rates from Riverina below the point at which you charge your own people for a similar carriage inside your colony, that is a derogation of trade and commerce to some extent.

Mr. ISAACS. - Not a derogation of freedom.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Well, perhaps not. On the other hand, we have a much more complicated thing to consider. The New South Wales representatives are asked to say that a large amount of their railway tariff, which has been fixed on differential rates, would, when we federalize, become fixed on preferential rates. That is the whole point.

Mr. GORDON. -

Let the Inter-State Commission settle that as a jury.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

No, no. What we want to do first, before we decide on an Inter-State Commission or anything else, is to understand in this Convention what we mean. There is no use in saving that here is a very difficult hazy question, surrounded by all kinds of complications, which must be left to a tribunal of the Federal Parliament. You may possibly do that, but before that is attempted you would want to understand the whole question from beginning to end. And the whole question is, I think, as I have stated it—that you want us to make through rates from our railways from the different parts of our colony into Victoria before the railway system is absolutely federalized. I say it would be me possible for us to justify that procedure.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is not the proposal.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The Convention must recollect that, although we are going to federalize, the states will still have their autonomous Governments, and have to keep up the police, public buildings, and all the ramifications of civil life throughout the colonies. The parts of the country into which we have sent our railways are kept up at an enormous expense. People have settled there, and are connected with the Government through the land and by other means. Those people, in many instances, wish to trade with New South Wales and through our ports. Are we going to increase the rates to our own producers in order to give the people of Victoria a through rate? The result would be that, with our railway system, which is now under such magnificent management that we can afford to reduce rates from the far interior of the colony, we would actually have to say to our producers—"While we federate, and while we will let you go to the nearest port, you will have to pay a higher rate."

Mr. ISAACS. -

What proposal has Victoria ever made to the effect you are stating?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I have asked the delegates a very simple question. Is not the whole purport of their argument that they should get through rates from certain places in our colony on the same principle as if the railways were federalized?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I never heard that asked for.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
We would like that, but, at the same time, we are not asking for it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Then there is no-thing in the argument at all. Dr. Quick and others have said-"You have so attenuated your rate at the far end of the railway system as to practically give preference to the port of Sydney." Well, is not that exactly the point I am trying to deal with? We do not give that preference necessarily because the lines approach the border, but as part of the policy of our railway system, and for the benefit of those in the far interior. It seems to me that, if we cannot get at some arrangement that is absolutely understood in the Convention, we had better give up all the clauses connected with the Inter-State Commission, or anything that hampers the question.

Mr. BARTON. -
The Commonwealth would still be able to legislate for trade and commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The broad principle of equality of trade would still remain in the Constitution, with the High Court as guardian of our rights in this respect. Let the Federal Parliament deal with the whole question under the powers that are in the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
Before I move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, I would just like to say one word more. I am not going to re-open this question. Honorable members who entertain any fear with regard to the omission of the second portion of the old clause 95 may perhaps find their fears very much modified if they look at the form in which clause 89 now stands. It has been amended to apply to inter-state free-trade only, and it enacts that from the imposition of uniform duties of customs trade and intercourse between the states shall be absolutely free. In this clause there is a prohibition of derogation from freedom of trade, but I take it that a law passed in derogation of freedom of trade would be void under clause 89. Therefore, there is nothing to fear about leaving out the second portion of this clause. The first part is simply a prohibition of preference to the ports of one state over the ports of another state.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If you keep the latter part of the clause in, would it not operate as from the beginning of the Commonwealth?

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, that would be the only difference, and the question is whether it is worth while to make it operate in that way, because it may be taken that there is in the Constitution, without the latter part of clause 95, an implication that any law or regulation of commerce or revenue having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the states shall be null and void.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would it be right to make it operate from the beginning of the Commonwealth?

Mr. BARTON. -

It might not be, and it might be better to leave it to the operation of clause 89. I think it would be better to get rid of the implication I have spoken of, in order that, until the uniform Tariff is imposed, proposals of law that would have the effect of conflicting with the state of things that would subsist for two years after the inception of the Commonwealth might not arise. So I ask honorable members, in looking over the matter between now and to-morrow morning, to see whether the present form of clause 89 does not provide for all we want, and whether the expansion of the first part of this clause by the words I have suggested is not a desirable thing—that is to say to extend the forbidding of preference to port over port to a forbidding of preference between state and state. The second part of the clause may be read as sufficiently provided for by clause 89, and at the right time. I now beg to move, sir, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at six minutes to five o'clock p.m.
Tuesday, 22nd February, 1898.

 Appeals to the Privy Council-Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-four minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That a return be laid before this Convention showing-

1. The number of appeals from the Supreme Court of each of the colonies of New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia to Her Majesty's Privy Council.
2. The parties to the suit.
3. The date of the order of the court granting leave to appeal.
4. The date when the transcript was forwarded to England.
5. The date of judgment of the Privy Council.
6. The amount in dispute.
7. The result of such appeal.
8. The amount of the taxed costs of each appeal.
9. Such return to be for the last 30 years, and to show the average time from the date of the order giving leave to appeal to the date of judgment by the Privy Council; and also the average time for the last seventeen years; also the average time in the last seventeen years from the posting of the transcript to the date of judgment of the Privy Council; also the average amount of the costs in which the amount of the taxed costs is known; also the average amount of the taxed costs of an appeal to the Privy Council in the last seventeen years.

I understand, Mr. President, that this information can be obtained with very little trouble and at very small expense, and I am quite sure that when it is produced it will be of great service to honorable members, at all events, to those who are not connected with the law.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I have great pleasure indeed in supporting this motion, and I am also very glad to hear the mover say that there will be no difficulty and no delay in supplying the necessary information. I am quite sure that when it is obtained it will cast a flood of light, not exactly in the direction my honorable friend supposes, but a flood of light upon some of the minor details of this great question.

The motion was agreed to.
COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on clause 95 (see page 1250), and on Mr. Barton's proposal that the clause be omitted with the view to substituting the following:-

Any law or regulation of commerce or revenue made by the Commonwealth, or by any state, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, giving any preference to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof shall be null and void.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I tabled an amendment on clause 95, some days ago, and it appears in the printed amendments. It has come on before I expected it to come on, but I think this is the place at which I should press my amendment. The words which I propose should be added will apply to the proposed new clause which has been submitted by our honorable leader, as well as to the clause which at present stands in the Bill. The proposed new clause simply makes invalid any preferential rate. It in no way affects unfair differential rates. I need not, of course, speaking to members of the Convention, remind them of the difference between the two kinds of rates-preferential and differential rates-but I think it has been generally admitted that if you interfere with preferential rates, you ought also at the same time to interfere with such differential rates as operate in the same direction, and operate unfairly. Now, sir, in dealing with this matter, my proposal is to insert in the last line of clause 95, after "Commonwealth," the words "or with the view of attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another."

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Attracting?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, "attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another."

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Why should not a state do that?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Well, the position is one in which at present only three colonies-New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia-are concerned, but, in the course of a few years, I leave no doubt that Western Australia will be very intimately concerned in this, and I also think that, although you cannot have a railway to Tasmania, still there will very likely be an important advantage gained by Tasmania, if there is a just rule laid down in the Constitution. The position, so far as I am concerned, is this-I am one of those who, I suppose wrongly, have advocated the taking over of the railways by the Commonwealth. We have been beaten on that, and I accept the beating. I take the position that we cannot, at this stage, expect to get more in that direction than we already have, but the next course I should like best would be that there should be some inter-state body, some Commonwealth body, an impartial body, which should regulate the railway rates throughout Australia in the interests of Australia as a whole. That, I am told, also, it is impossible to get, because each colony wants to develop its own area-its own land-in its own way. Then what is the minimum which any one with an idea of what federation means for Australia thinks we ought to ask for? The minimum we ought to ask for is that there shall be no more unjust preferences by charging different rates from the same place to the same place, and that there shall be no more devices used for the purpose of attracting trade in one direction, or to one port as against another port. What does the Bill do at present? All the Bill does at present is to take away any rate which interferes with freedom of trade. That, of course, has not anything at all to do with the matter of preferential and differential rates. Freedom of trade is obstructed if you keep goods out, but here is a case in which you try to draw goods to you. The next point in which the Constitution acts is that it interferes with preference rates, and if you look at Mr. Barton's amendment you will see he is very careful to restrict that amended clause to the case of preferential rates.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

What amendment?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Mr. Barton's amendment reads:--

Any law or regulation of commerce or revenue made by the Commonwealth, or by any state, or by any authority constituted under the Commonwealth or under any state, giving any preference to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof shall be null and void.

Mr. BARTON. -

An honorable member has asked which amendment. The amendment circulated this morning is the same as the clause circulated yesterday, with the exception of the word "under" for the word "by."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The word "preference" governs the whole of the clause. The idea is, for instance, that Victoria shall be prohibited from charging one rate from Echuca to Melbourne to Victorian producers, and for the same goods charging another rate from Echuca to Melbourne to New South Wales producers. That is distinctly giving a preference. A preference is given to the New South Wales producer over the Victorian producer in order to attract the trade of the Riverina along the Victorian lines to Melbourne. Although I represent Victoria, I think such rates are anti-federal and ought to cease. They are not only anti-federal, but they lead to the greatest loss to our revenue, and to the extra taxation of the people for the purpose of making up the yawning deficit. Those rates should cease all through the Continent. Assuming the committee is in favour of those rates ceasing, ought they not, in the same breath, to remove the power to impose such differential rates in any colony as are meant to attract the trade in one direction in place of attracting it in another direction? I may remind honorable members that there is practically the same rate from Cootamundra to Sydney on the railways for wool as from Hay to Sydney, although Cootamundra is 200 miles nearer the New South Wales capital. Mr. Mathieson, giving evidence before the finance committee, says-

Just now the distance to Cootamundra, the station which rules the high rate, is 254 miles. They charge for greasy wool 3d. per ton per mile to Cootamundra, and for 200 miles further, viz., to Hay, they charge practically the same rate, but it works out 1.70d. per ton per mile.

In fact, wool is carried from Hay to Cootamundra, 200 miles—for nothing. Mr. Mathieson goes on—

I simply want to illustrate the position that Victoria would be placed in if Mr. Eddy is to be at liberty to quote whatever rate he thought fit to stations within New South Wales. Why, it would simply mean that for me to maintain the position in Victoria, I would have to square the whole of my rates along the Murray River so as to enable me to take that traffic to the port to which it has been going for a long term of years.

I understand that by squaring the rates it is meant to have the same rates for all goods of the same class from the same station, Mr. Mathieson continues:-

Mr. Eddy has mentioned that on the northern boundary from Wallangarra he carries wool 192 miles for the same rate as he does from Tamworth, 282 miles. From Bourke, which is 504 miles from Sydney, he carries wool for something less than 2d. per ton per mile. But then he has three rates, one for Bourke proper, 1.90; one for the other side of the river, 1.60; and another that takes him 100 miles into Queensland territory, 1.29. While Mr. Eddy may abolish all these differential rates, he is still enabled to draw Queensland traffic to Bourke in the same way as he will prevent the flow of traffic from the Murrumbidgee on to the Victorian lines. Mr. Eddy suggests that so long as we quote a rate into New South Wales that is not less than the rate to our own terminal station he raises no objection. But he forces us into this position: That a province which has been an integral part of Victoria, all but in name, for many years, is now to be taken from us-

Mr. REID. -

Not in name; you have not been able to tax it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Mr. Mathieson goes on:-

simply because there is a want of true federal feeling, and to confine the trade to the New South Wales territory. All that I ask is, that due consideration should be given to this important question and, if there is to be a commission appointed to deal with intercolonial rates, that commission should have the right to determine what is a fair and reasonable rate in the district that might be governing the flow of traffic to and from the various colonies.

I want to carry out that idea. I understand that the Victorian commissioners have no objection to the taking away of preferential rates of the nature I have indicated-charging New South Wales wool about one-third the price from Echuca to Melbourne that Victorian wool is charged. But Mr. Mathieson also says that if that preferential rate be taken away, New South Wales, or any other colony, ought also be prevented from charging differential rates and from forcing the trade from its natural channels. That is what Mr. Mathieson wants. It may be said that this is a very difficult question, because lower rates mus

Do it without taking away the right of another country.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is not interfering with another country. It is interfering with one part of the country for the benefit of Australia as a whole. But the answer is that we are not taking over the railways, and are not assuming any power to fix rates. The Federal Government, however, is, as I understand, to appoint an Inter-State Commission. I propose that that commission shall have power not only to stop all rates which are preferential, in the sense of charging more for Victorian wool than is charged for New South Wales wool from Echuca, but it shall also have power to forbid any rate, no matter where it is imposed, no matter by what authority it is imposed, which is made with a view simply of attracting trade to the ports of one state in the place of the ports of another state.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Does not the American Inter-State Commission carry out your view?
Mr. HIGGINS. -

It does not. I have here a recent article in the North American Review, of November, 1897, which is evidently written by a great railway expert, and is a most thoughtful paper. He shows the state of chaos to which the American railway systems have been reduced by the want of such a power of interference.

Mr. HENRY. -

How are you to distinguish between rates for the development of a country and rates for bringing traffic to a particular quarter?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Railway experts—and I have consulted them—can tell you in 99 cases out of 100 when that is the case. They know that certain rates, having regard to the scale of charges and proximity to a certain border, must be so fixed not for the mere purpose of development or easing the producer, but for the purpose of forcing trade into an unnatural channel. It is quite certain that any state can, if it chooses to incur the expense, force all its trade to its own port. You can pump water to any height, but it is a question of expense. The question is whether in framing this Federal Constitution we are going to prevent a colony from continuing preferential rates, so as to secure the trade for its own ports, and at the same time not going to prevent the other colonies from continuing the differential rates which are obviously meant for the purpose of attracting trade to those ports. I think, therefore, that it is a pure question of intention. My idea is that the Inter-State Commission, an impartial body to be appointed by the Federal Parliament, shall go into the question of rates, and, like a jury, come to a conclusion whether the differential rates are reasonable or unreasonable. If you will remark that the burden of proof is upon all those who object to the rates, prima facie, every colony is to be entitled to have its own rates to develop its own country in its own way. But supposing it is proved that a certain rate, like the rate between Cootamundra and Hay, is obviously intended for the purpose of preventing trade coming to Melbourne which would naturally come here, the Inter-State Commission can interfere.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Would that question be settled by the commission, and not by the High Court?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, I think it is desirable that the High Court should be kept to the decision of law points, while the Inter-State Commission should be confined to the decision of expert questions with regard to railway management. The function of a legal court is to deal with law; it has not to deal with questions of policy or of railway management.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Suppose we provided in the Bill that the states were not to impose these improper rates, could not the High Court decide that question as well as the Inter-State Commission?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is quite true assuming that after the Inter-State Commission decided as experts that these rates were unfair differential rates, and then the state still imposed those rates, of course, there would be the ordinary legal process. That would come before the ordinary Federal Courts. There is no doubt that if the law or the rule laid down by the Inter-State Commission were not adhered to the only appeal would be to a law court.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Supposing the Constitution said that there were to be no preferential rates, and the Inter-State Commission decided in another way, would there be no appeal to the High Court?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No, I take it that the Inter-State Commission will be the jury to settle whether a rate is unfairly differential, and that will be final. But supposing that, notwithstanding the Inter-State Commission had laid down the principle, the rates were still imposed, the only process would be to go to law. But I apprehend that in every such case it would be like the story of the coon and the colonel-the state, instead of waiting to be shot, would say, like the coon-"Don't fire, colonel, I'll come down"-and on being told by the Inter-State Commission that a rate was unlawful and unfair, the state would cease to impose that rate.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The decision of the Inter-State Commission would be final.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think so. We are all sinners in this respect. I find, from the Border Duties Act of Queensland, that New South Wales has been doing to Queensland just what we have clone to her. The preamble to that Act says-

And whereas it has been ascertained that differential rates on the railway lines of the neighbouring colonies have been promulgated and otherwise arranged for, which have had and are continuing to have the effect of diverting the traffic which ought legitimately to be conveyed over the railway lines of this colony, thereby entailing a considerable loss in railway revenue; and whereas it is considered desirable to prevent, as far as practicable, this diversion of traffic-

Then they impose a certain duty on all goods exported over the border to
New South Wales. There is no doubt we do to South Australia exactly what New South Wales does to us. We have these tapering rates, which are meant to protect West Victorian trade from going to Adelaide, or in that direction. I admit it is most anti-federal.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And the only federal feature about it is that we all do it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I hope we shall stop all these practices. We had a discussion a few days ago with regard to bounties, and the Premier of New South Wales stated, in words which struck me at the time, the true principle that ought to guide this committee in dealing with this system of railway rates. He said-

The keen point, as my honorable friend will admit, of federalists throughout all Australia is absolutely this: The rising of the Commonwealth is to be the death of these local struggles to get an advantage for one colony over the others.

Are we to carry that out? What is an unfair differential railway rate but a bounty to the warehouseman in Sydney? Does it not simply mean that, in order to get business to Sydney or any other city, you are imposing rates so as to draw trade to it, and unduly low rates in order to draw business into Sydney? It means, practically, that out of the railway revenue you are making a present to the people of the port. If it is improper and inconsistent with the federal spirit for us to give bounties, are we not to stop this system of giving bounties to the ports, which arises from the system of giving unfair differential rates? I appeal to the right honorable gentleman, who always uses most guarded words in this matter, to carry out the noble principle which he laid down in his own words only last week—"The rising of the Commonwealth is to be the death of these local struggles to get an advantage for one colony over the others."

Mr. REID. -

It did not convince you at the time; you voted the other way.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It convinced me that my right honorable friend understood the true federal principle. I was altogether in favour of interfering with that system which allows, by means of bounties, one state to get the better of another. I only supported bounties so far as the bounties did not interfere with the system of freedom of trade. I think honorable members will hear me out that that was so. Speaking to the general principle, the Premier of New South Wales has laid down a maxim by which we ought to be guided.

Mr. REID. -

By which we are to be guided, but not you.
Mr. HIGGINS. -

I might also indicate that the late Mr. Eddy, an authority second to none on this question of railways, speaking in the interests of New South Wales, has used these words in a report:-

The advisability, and even necessity, for federal control appears to be fully recognised. For this reason, in some countries Governments are steadily buying up railways originally constructed by private enterprise. The welfare of the whole continent is largely dependent upon the economical and effective working of the railways.

It seems to me that, as time goes on, we shall see more and more how much Australia is dependent upon the effective working of these railway systems. Mr. Eddy also says-

The greater the efficiency and economy of the administration, the greater the ability to reduce rates. Waterways being practically nonexistent, the railways of Australia become to a greater extent than elsewhere the main arteries of communication.

Take the idea of an artery. The system which is at present at work has a tendency to tamper with the organism of Australia, and to make separate arterial systems, in place of working, as it were, from one heart. I knew of nothing more ridiculous than looking at a map of the eastern part of Australia, showing its railway systems. You find a number of railways in New South Wales all carefully avoiding the Victorian border, and you also find railways in Victoria going up as far as the Murray and eager to draw as much life-blood as they can from New South Wales.

Mr. WALKER. -

Why not federalize the railways?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I cannot get that, therefore I am going for the next best thing. We must not have separate arterial systems; I am only using Mr. Eddy's metaphor.

He continues:-

If the federation of the Australian colonies be realized it may become absolutely necessary to have some kind of federal railway control. The principal objects in view are to insure uniformity of policy, efficiency of management, and the affording of greater public convenience; to minimize to as great an extent as possible the friction and unfair competition now existing in the border districts for the trade of adjoining states, and to bring about as speedily as possible at a minimum cost a uniform gauge on those sections of state railways where desirable.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
What are you quoting from?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
From a report by the late Mr. Eddy.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
What is the source of the quotation?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It is a report made prior to the Convention in Adelaide-dated the 16th March of last year-and was addressed to the Premier of New South Wales.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I think Mr. Eddy said afterwards that that could

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I have read Mr. Eddy's evidence, but I do not know whether he goes definitely as far as that. But, at any rate, that does not affect my point, which is this: As the committee has decided against federalizing the railways in the full sense, are we to interfere with unfair rates so far as they affect Victoria and South Australia, and not interfere with unfair rates so far as they affect New South Wales? I think the question bears upon its face its own answer. I have no doubt whatever that the representatives of New South Wales are as anxious as we are to stop this ruinous war of competition which is going on between the colonies, and I have no reason to think their federal sentiment is not as strong as our own. But I hope we shall rise to the occasion, and treat all the colonies fairly. It is a matter which at present only perhaps affects three colonies, but it will soon affect Western Australia as well. She will, in the course of time, find herself prevented from the possibility of having preferential rates. Suppose a railway were constructed from Port Augusta towards Coolgardie. At the same time South Australia might impose any differential rates she liked, no matter how unfair, to the injury of Western Australia. I said, a little time ago, in reply to an interjection by Mr. McMillan, that I had a passage from the North American Review. It is an article by Mr. H.T. Newcomb, entitled "The present Railway Situation," and the passage I quote is to be found on page 591 of the North American Review, for November, 1897. The writer says-

The present railway situation may be briefly summarized. From the stand-point of the investor in railway enterprises, the salient facts are: That rates and charges for transportation services are demoralized; that the law has imposed upon railway managers the unnatural burden of maintaining a costly, wasteful, and worse than useless competitive system; that the carrying corporations are allowed to combine neither for the establishment and maintenance of just rates, nor for the prevention of unjust discriminations; that nearly 40,000 miles of railway are in the hands of receivers; that railway securities having a par value of nearly four and one-half millions of dollars receive no return of interest or dividends; and that solvent lines are practically at the mercy of those of their competitors whose bankruptcy has relieved them from the necessity of attempting to earn a return upon at least their bonded indebtedness.

Then he asks what is the remedy, and he says (on page 593)-

What is to be considered an equitable adjustment of the burdens of transportation? It will be far easier to enumerate some of the things that cannot coexist with such an adjustment than to give it a positive definition. Relatively just charges will not make arbitrary or unjust discriminations among railway patrons, whether considered individually, as constituting communities, or as producers or consumers of particular commodities. They will not favour a particular individual on account of his political, social, or commercial standing, the character of the business in which he is engaged, the extent or number of his commercial transactions, or, what is almost the same thing, the quantity of transportation that he purchases, nor unduly on account of the place of his residence, or location of his farm, factory, warehouse, or store. Such rates will not place a locality at commercial disadvantage on account of the number of the inhabitants, the degree of their geographical concentration, or their political affiliations, nor on account of its economic organization, the character of its productive resources, nor the number, extent, or financial condition of the railway lines by which it is served.

The point is (Mr. Newcomb says), that you must have your over-riding rule, so as to avoid many other things making differences between people. Because of their political affiliations you are not to alter your railway rates for the benefit of one state and the injury of another, but are to try as far as you can to make your rates work for the benefit of the community as a whole, without regard to whether a man is living on one side of a border or another.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Would not the application of the zone system overcome that?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It would largely help, but I do not expect to get as much as that. If there could be a zone system by which there could be a through rate given irrespective of political boundaries, I quite admit that that would be one solution of this problem, so far as I can see.

Mr. GRANT. -

Uniform rates would be the same.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Yes, but I have not proposed their imposition. All I say is that, if you had uniform through rates, they would answer the same purpose. At the same time, we cannot expect so much as that at the present stage. All we can expect is that if an Inter-State Commission is created it will be able, as a jury, to decide whether any particular rates have been designed for a purpose which is not a federal purpose, and to attract trade from one state to another state. I feel that I have taken up enough time in speaking upon this matter, and, in submitting the amendment, I appeal to honorable members to deal with it in the interests of Australia as a whole forgetting the fact that there are other interests, and trying so far as we can to insure the working of the railways for the benefit of the producers of the whole continent. We should work for the development of Australia as a whole, and not allow one state to put a wall round its territory, and say-"I have nothing to do with you on the other side." It will be quite enough for my purpose if the railway systems of the colonies are, so far as possible, treated as one Australian system.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The honorable member must have graduated in a free-trade school.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not understand the honorable gentleman, but, as he is regarded as one of the free-trade leaders in New South Wales, I ask him what will be the use of talking about free-trade between the states, and diminishing the friction upon the borders, if we do not provide against a war of railway rates? The President was very expressive when, in Adelaide, he asked-"What is the good of transferring your war from the Custom-houses to the railway stations" A railway rates war could be made much more detrimental to the freedom of commerce than intercolonial customs duties, and, in achieving the glorious result of absolute freedom of commerce between the colonies, I hope that, as a corollary, we shall provide that there shall be no competition between the rival railway systems to bring about the loss of railway revenue and to injure the development of Australia.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -

I take the liberty of rising at this early stage in the discussion in order, if possible, to shorten it. The debate in Adelaide, which was a very lengthy one, was really upon sentimental considerations, and not upon the hard business lines upon which a matter of this kind should be treated. There have been endless explanations as to what are preferential and what are differential rates. New South Wales claimed that her differential rates were not preferential, while Victoria claimed the right to impose such preferential rates as she pleased. In my opinion, if the contending parties would only come together and discuss the matter in a businesslike manner, it could be settled at once. I think that everything that can be said about it here has been said. It has been dealt with by experts, it has been most ably thrashed out by the legal talent of the Convention, and if we were to sit here for three months, I do not think any more light could be thrown upon it, or that the Convention could make preferential rates into differential rates or differential rates into preferential rates. The trouble lies in the geographical position of Victoria. Victoria has only short distances to carry her produce, and cannot therefore carry it at the low but profitable rates imposed in New South Wales. There can be no doubt, the contention of New South Wales that she should be allowed to develop her territory by what are called differential rates for long distances is reasonable and just. Indeed, Victoria has to a very large extent adopted differential rates. Goods can be carried to and through Melbourne at an almost nominal rate where distances are great. Victoria has thoroughly indorsed the principle of differential rates, and should have no reason for complaining against New South Wales for doing the same thing. I shall not take up time by going into this matter generally, or by showing the position of South Australia as compared with that of either Victoria or New South Wales. I will confine myself entirely to the dispute between these two colonies. We have had elaborate reports by the Railways Commissioner of Victoria, showing that Victoria is entitled to certain traffic, and, on the other hand, we have had equally elaborate statements from the Railways Commissioners of New South Wales, showing that their colony is entitled to this traffic. When two business parties disagree, what is the proper course to pursue? The course generally pursued is to go to arbitration. I think that arbitration in connexion with this matter would lead to far better results than an Inter-State Commission. An Inter-State Commission must, to a great extent, fail in its object, unless those who control the railways are the members of that commission. Of course, if those who control the railways are appointed to act as an Inter-State Commission, they will be able to settle the question of differential and preferential rates between themselves, and their technical knowledge would enable them to detect any errors or any endeavours to take advantage of each other, and, perhaps, in some way fairness and justice would be done between the colonies. But I do not know why the Convention should be the battle-ground of the contending parties. I think that it should not. The railways are purely commercial undertakings, and they should be managed on commercial lines. Differences of this kind continually arise in England. There has been a war of rates between the various companies there, but they are supposed to act honorably, and to conduct their business in a strictly fair manner to each other. Agreements have been made between them at times as to the way traffic shall be dealt with, but I have never known such to last without some evasion for more than twelve months. Although the principals have not interfered with or endeavoured to evade these agreements, they have so many agents, and there are so many varying interests at work, that the agreements have broken down almost immediately. In America the Inter-State Commission has found it impossible to control these matters. I again contend that we are not called upon to constitute such a commission here, and that the parties should be allowed, where possible, to settle their differences between themselves. One general system of operating on the railway systems throughout the world when any difficulty of this kind arises is to pool the receipts from the principal freight. Nothing would have been easier if the parties had come together and dealt with the matter apart from political considerations than to pool special receipts. In that way a fair return could be got from the traffic, and justice would be done to all the parties concerned. The Commissioners of Railways in their reports make recommendations that are simple in their character, and are such as would commend themselves to our judgment. But even they are overweighted by political considerations. We have had to listen to enormously long speeches from the sentimental aspects of the question, whereas we should consider it from a commercial point of view. The railways are money-making machines, and we should deal with them on that principle. It would be futile for us to attempt to lay down any rule by which to determine what are differential and what are preferential rates, and it is just as well to acknowledge that at once. I hope, therefore, that we shall not be treated to any more long discursive speeches on the subject. Experts will have no difficulty in deciding what are differential and what are preferential rates, but the views of honorable members are coloured by political considerations. I have made these few remarks in the hope that they will have some influence in shortening the discussion, and that the succeeding speakers will deal with the question from its business aspect alone.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The first amendment I shall put is that suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia. It is as follows:-

That the following words be added to the clause:"or having the effect of inducing trade or commerce in any particular direction within the Commonwealth unfairly, and in particular by one part of the Commonwealth offering greater inducement than other parts, wherever the inducement offered returns no direct profit as regards the particular trade or commerce induced to that part of the Commonwealth offering the inducement."

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

That is an amendment which I moved at the sittings of the Convention in Adelaide, and which I afterwards submitted and succeeded in carrying in the Legislative Council of South Australia. After considering the amendment that has been proposed by the Hon. Mr. Higgins, and supported with so much ability, I prefer it very much, and I shall vote for it. It appears to me that that amendment goes right to the heart of the subject. Let the colonies have as many differential rates as the development of the country and the interests of the producers require, but directly any of them put on a rate with the intention of attracting trade from a port in another state to a port of their own, let it be treated distinctly as an antifeder

Mr. ISAACS. -

A rate having the effect of diverting trade.

Mr. GORDON. -

That removes the question into the ambit of ambiguity.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not agree with that, but that is what it means.

Mr. GORDON. -

The test, after all, is the intention, and what is the intention can only be gathered from the evidence surrounding the case, and can only be determined by a jury of experts. The Inter-State Commission will be such a jury. They will consider the whole of the circumstances. They will consider whether the circumstances of a particular railway require differential rates in the interests of the producers, and whether or not particular rates are imposed with a view simply of encouraging the producers. They will decide all these questions, and from the surrounding facts they will get at the intention. If the intention is what I may call federally dishonest, the jury will disallow the rates. My honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) asked me yesterday how a low rate could be disadvantageous to the producers. A war of low rates may be disadvantageous to the producers, who, like the rest of the community, have to bear the burden of the debt. If the result of lowering the rates is to make the railways non-paying, the producer has to pay out of one pocket what he gains in the other, and the country generally suffers. A war of railway rates, even when the rates are lowered, would, therefore, injure the producers to an extent for which the lowering of the rates would not compensate them. I think Mr. Higgins' amendment touches the matter right at the heart. It applies the real test as to what is a federally dishonest rate, and I shall support that amendment rather than the amendment of the Legislative Council of South Australia, because it is simpler, more direct, and would be much more workable.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I understand that the leader of the Convention proposes that we should strike the clause out altogether.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The Hon. Mr. Higgins' amendment is submitted as an amendment on the leader of the Convention's proposal. If there is any amendment prior to that suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia it should be moved now.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

It is perfectly legitimate to say that the Commonwealth shall not make any law giving a preference to a port of one state over a port of another state. I think we all agree that that is correct. We should not consent to strike out the clause until we have something else before us.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

If the amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia was negatived, we would still be in a position to discuss the Hon. Mr. Higgins' amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Certainly.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

Would it be possible to submit the Hon. Mr. Higgins' amendment before we strike out the clause? I agree with the Hon. Mr. Isaacs, that we should be sure we have something else before we consent to let the clause go.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The Hon. Mr. Higgins has moved his amendment as an amendment on the Hon. Mr. Barton's new clause.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I would ask Mr. Higgins to submit his amendment as an amendment on the clause as it stands.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

Before I knew that the Hon. Mr. Barton was going to submit a new clause, my intention was that my amendment should attach to the clause as it stands, and should come after the word "Commonwealth." When I saw Mr. Barton's new clause I found that my amendment would equally well attach to it. I have now much pleasure in moving-
That, after the word "Commonwealth" in the last line of clause 95, the following words be inserted - "Or with the view of attracting trade to ports of one state against ports of another."

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

It is impossible for any one who feels as strong a desire as I do to see all the barriers separating the people of the different provinces broken down not to sympathize with the object of my honorable friend in moving this amendment. Like himself, I have contended from the first for the taking over of the railways by the Federal Commonwealth, and, like himself, I accept my defeat on this question and recognise the impossibility of re-opening it. I gather that my honorable friend's intention is by this amendment to bring about a state of things in the management of the railway systems of the several colonies as nearly as possible the same as would exist if they were under one control, and as I intend, for reasons that I shall offer, to oppose the amendment, I would like to make it quite clear that I understand the object of it, so that there may be no misapprehension either in my mind or in the minds of those who are listening to me. The view of my honorable friend is, I apprehend, that, inasmuch as there are certain rates which, although in one sense development rates-differential rates-are in fact preferential, and, inasmuch as any railway expert is able to tell at once what portion of the rate is purely a development rate, and what portion is competitive or preferential, there should be power to the Inter-State Commission so far to control the management of the railways of each state as to prevent those rates being imposed which would not be imposed if the railways were under one control. Now, while I greatly sympathize with that object, I doubt very much whether it would be achieved by this amendment, and for two reasons. In the first place, reflection since the sitting of the Convention at Adelaide has satisfied me of the truth of that which Mr. Grant, who speaks on this matter with the authority of an expert, has just announced to the committee, namely, that an Inter-State Commission will be utterly ineffective, and therefore I, for one, shall record my vote against the insertion in this Constitution of the clause relating to the constitution of the Inter-State Commission. I believe it would be ineffective for this reason: Without tiring the committee with extracts from reports of the Inter-State Commission in the United States, which most honorable members interested in the subject will have already read, I entirely agree with Mr. Grant that that commission has proved a failure.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It almost admits it itself.
Mr. WISE. -

Yes, in its last report it almost admits that itself. It is not correct, I think, as Mr. Higgins rather indicated than said, that the cause of that failure is to be sought in the inability of the commission to deal with the differential rates. I believe that the cause of the failure of the commission is far more deep-seated—that it has failed through the inherent circumstances of its constitution. It has failed to exercise authority which it has no real power to enforce; and if there has been that failure in the United States, where there is the enormous prestige of the Federal Government behind the commission, where the bodies with which it has to deal are private companies, how unlikely it is that there should be any success here, where the bodies to be dealt with are not private companies amenable to the law, but practically independent commissions. I object to putting any possibility of conflict into a Constitution unless one sees clearly how that conflict is going to be resolved. And one can easily foresee—it would be merely tedious of me to suggest to the committee occasions that I have in my mind—when there might be many decisions come to by the Inter-State Commission which would excite popular feeling to a very high degree, which might affect the material interests of large sections of the community in either state, and which, if it was attempted to put them in force, would create so much friction, so much difficulty, that there would be a real risk to the existence of the Union itself. I regard the Inter-State Commission, although devised with the best intentions, as an element of disintegration; and for that reason I cannot assent to an amendment which would put it in the power of a body too weak to enforce its decrees—a body which exercises authority quite novel to us in Australia—to deal with matters affecting the vital interests of each state. But there is another objection. I doubt very much whether, even assuming—and I will assume for this part of my argument that the decrees of the commission will be effective—I doubt very much whether the object of the amendment moved by the honorable member can be carried out with fairness to New South Wales. My doubt arises from this consideration: That the amount of dead capital invested in our competing railways is so great that the injury inflicted upon us by the prohibition of the differential rates, which are in fact preferential, would be so much greater than the injury inflicted on the neighbouring colonies of Victoria, Queensland, or South Australia. And there is no provision in the Constitution for making up the loss that would ensue upon the working of these competitive railways which we have built under the present system of separation—no provision to make up that loss, and no means to provide for insuring that the loss shall not take place therefore, both because I believe the proposal will be ineffective, and because if it were effective it would work with unfairness to my own colony, I find myself reluctantly compelled to oppose the amendment. I do not intend following Mr. Grant's suggestion to enter into any discussion at all about the details of differential and preferential rates. The value of the discussion at Adelaide was to clear up that question thoroughly in the mind of every member of the Convention. I am not going to make any general observations as to the propriety of differential rates. I am simply going to consider the facts as they are, and I would like in this connexion to make a confession of having been guilty unintentionally of considerable exaggeration in talking of this railway question both at Adelaide and elsewhere. I do not believe now that it is correct to say that a war of rates is as bad as a war of Tariffs. Mr. Higgins repeated that observation—an observation which many of us who feel very strongly on this railway question have allowed ourselves to make, but on reflection it is obviously unsound, and for this reason. There is a point below which the reduction in rates cannot go. There is a point at which competition becomes so obviously unprofitable that it ceases of itself. And there is this other consideration—that the producers do benefit by the reduction of rates. No doubt they benefit at the expense of the general body of the community, and those persons are generally persons residing in the towns and using the suburban railways, to whom higher rates are charged for the benefit of the producers in remote districts.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The merchants in the ports also get the chief advantage.

Mr. WISE. -

They get some advantage, but I would not say the chief advantage. Now, some of us have unintentionally contributed to mislead public opinion—and I plead guilty to this myself—by attaching too much importance to this question of the war of rates. We can have great advantages from federation, great advantages from interstate commerce provisions, and yet the war of rates may continue. The advantage, of course, would be infinitely greater if we could remove the war of rates, too.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But there is a great difference between the two things.

Mr. WISE. -

There is an enormous difference between continuing the war of rates with the prohibition to each state to erect barriers by means of port charges or any other device to hinder trade, and continuing the war of rates under the conditions which prevail to-day. I very reluctantly come to the conclusion—I have by no means given consideration to it now for the first time; the matter interested me when I stood for election in New South Wales and when it was brought forward in Adelaide—that there is no middle course between keeping things as they are, and taking the railways over.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I am afraid that is so.

Mr. WISE. -
It is a humiliating confession, because it is an admission that the federal systems themselves have not yet sufficient community of development or organization. Those of us who take the view I am endeavoring to express are in this position. The general commerce clauses, as they stand today, put New South Wales in a position of enormous advantage. I will be perfectly fair to my friends from Victoria. I, for one, will be no party to asking for a Bill so framed as will make the preferential rates of Victoria illegal and allow us to keep our differential rates on the plea that they are development rates. I shall be no party to depriving Victoria of her weapon, while giving us complete liberty to use ours with undiminished brightness. I recognise further that the general clause in the Constitution dealing with trade and commerce would place Victoria and New South Wales in that relative position; that is to say, that the clause which prohibits an interference with trade and commerce, if the decisions of the United States are followed, would hold all the rates by which Victoria gets the Riverina trade—to which I do not think she is entitled, but by which she does in fact to-day get that trade illegal, whereas it would allow us to put any rates we please between Albury and Cootamundra, which would have the practical effect of shutting out Victorian produce.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not know what clause would do that.

Mr. WISE. -
The commerce clause, and this clause as it stands.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The commerce clause will enable you to stop the preferential rates.

Mr. WISE. -
That is my opinion. If the Victorians are satisfied I am quite satisfied. If they leave it as it is I am satisfied.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Preferential rates are no barrier to trade.

Mr. WISE. -
If my honorable friends can satisfy their minds that there is no necessity to put anything in the Bill, I am quite content.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is another question.

Mr. WISE. -

I do not want to move an amendment unnecessarily; I rather want to throw the matter out for discussion if there is any doubt, as I believe there is, in the power of the Parliament under this Constitution to make laws prohibiting preferential rates, while there is equally no doubt that they have no power to interfere with the internal management of the railways to prevent one state from imposing differential rates, even though they may have the effect of being preferential. If that is the position, and my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) thinks it is-

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Are you in favour of leaving the old system of fighting and competition between railway systems?

Mr. WISE. -

I am not in favour of it, but I can see nothing else which is better. I do not see that any proposal which has been made for getting rid of it will not give rise to difficulties, in themselves far greater, and likely to menace the very existence of the Union, and, therefore, I would propose the insertion of this new clause, to come after the clause moved by my learned friend (Mr. Barton):

But nothing in this Act shall be taken to limit the powers of the several states in respect of the control and management of the Government railways of the states respectively.

I wish to make it perfectly clear that the trade and commerce clause gives Parliament no power to interfere with the internal management of the state railways by the states themselves. I hope that my position will not be misunderstood. I am not in favour of that state of things.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is to keep the flame alive.

Mr. WISE. -

Exactly.

Mr. GORDON. -

Yet you say you do not like the present war of rates.

Mr. WISE. -

I am afraid that it must be my fault if my honorable friend does not understand me. I am only attempting to provide that there shall be no power in this Constitution to get rid of one class of rates while preserving others.

We have in the Constitution a clause that allows each state's railways to be taken over with the consent of the state; without they are so taken over they will not be Government railways of that state. My chief reason for insisting on this is that I believe that in five years' time, when the sentiment of union is further developed, the practical necessities of the case will force the railways to be taken over. I believe, therefore, we run no risk from guarding against any implied powers in this Constitution to interfere with the railway rates of any particular colony. I believe, further, that the very fact that there are these competing rates going on between the states that are comprised in one Federal Union will in the course of very few months seem so absurd, and at the same time be attended with so many practical inconveniences, that Parliament will exercise the powers conferred on it by the Constitution with the consent of each state, and take the railways over and work them as one system. Therefore, I believe, paradoxical as it appears to provide that things should be left as they are, it is the quickest way of getting the railways taken over. If you attempt to establish some sort of Inter-State Commission which misleads the people into the idea that the problems are settled, when, in fact, they are never really touched, you check and delay what is, I believe, a great sentiment, resting not only on an enlarged view of patriotism, but also on the direct practical motives of self-interest, in favour of working the railways as one system. In taking that course I trust again that in no way shall I be misrepresented as advocating the continuance of this state of border warfare. The practical question is: How are we best going to bring about that which we are all aiming at? If we are agreed, and I think we are, that the Inter-State Commission has been a failure in the United States, what guarantee have we for putting forward to the people a similar proposal here, where the difficulties will be much greater? But if the Inter-State Commission is out, my honorable friend must admit that the whole basis of his amendment goes. There is no power to distinguish between those two classes of rates.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No, I would not permit that. I think it would then come to be a question of fact to be decided by the court, which I want to avoid.

Mr. WISE. -

I should think so. I cannot imagine a question less adapted to coming before the court than that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I agree with that.

Mr. WISE. -

Does it not practically come to this, that if the Inter-State Commission goes my learned friend's amendment goes?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No.
Mr. GORDON. -

The Inter-State Commission will not go.

Mr. WISE. -

I am not sure, but I hope that it will go. I believe there is a majority of this committee against it. Certainly much stronger arguments for keeping it in will have to be given than those adduced at Adelaide, in view of the later knowledge we have on the subject. I do not propose to move my amendment now, but I should like it to be printed, and the view I have expressed to be considered by the Convention. I have not expressed it without considerable reflection, and have been very slow indeed to come to a conclusion which, at the first blush, appears to be so anti-federal, but which I believe in the long run will best advance the interests of federation.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

The particular amendment before the Chair is that of my learned friend (Mr. Higgins). Well, I should like to point out with regard to that amendment that, together with my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Wise), I think we are at one in the desire to prevent any unfair dealing, but I am afraid that such words as those proposed by Mr. Higgins might carry us further than we intended to go in one direction, and not as far as we desire to go in another direction. Would they not be futile, to start with, in preventing unfair attractions in the ports of one state as against the ports of another state? Mr. Higgins' amendment would make the clause provide that any law or regulation of commerce or revenue made by the Commonwealth or by any state, or by any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, with the view of attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another state, shall be null and void. Now, what does that mean? Suppose that Victoria were to offer inducements in the shape of better port regulations and lower charges, as we will assume she would do, to attract foreign ships, and ships from various parts of the Commonwealth, to Melbourne, rather than that they should go to Sydney. Would they be null and void? If they would, I do not know where this provision is going to stop. Assuming that they were null and void—that the Supreme Court or the Inter-State Commission declared that our lower charges were null and void, what would be the result of it? That decision would not mean that Victoria was to charge a higher rate, but that she was to charge nothing.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You are begging the question. You skip over the point. You may improve your port without necessarily improving it with a view to attract ships to your ports as against the ports of another state.
Mr. ISAACS. -

I am assuming a strong case, I am aware, namely, that we in Victoria will make lower charges for goods and various regulations with a view to attract trade to Melbourne against Sydney.

Mr. HOWE. -

That would merge into a preferential rate.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, I am putting it that in Melbourne we will charge lower rates all round with the view of bringing trade here, by making the port of Melbourne more attractive than the port of Sydney. What would be the result of declaring our Melbourne charges null and void? Why, that we could not make a charge at all.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

That will cure itself, then.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I doubt it, because the greatest barrier we could erect would be to make no charges at all in our port—to do services for nothing. If offering special opportunities to foreign trade and arrangements for attracting trade to Melbourne as against Sydney, for example, constitute a barrier to freedom of trade, then, of course, the greatest barrier we could erect is to do things for nothing.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is a reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I want to meet the argument that has been put before the Convention—that the insertion in this Bill of a clause providing that any law of the Commonwealth, or of a state, with a view of attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another state shall be null and void will carry out the object honorable members have in view.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

We all admit that it will.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; we do not. I, for one, believe that it will not enable us to stop the system of making one port attractive as against another. I am answering Mr. Wise's argument.

Mr. WISE. -

I assumed that Mr. Barton's new clause will be combined with Mr. Higgins' amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am assuming that, too. But it is only a prohibition against laws derogating from freedom of trade, and I submit that such a provision will not give any opportunity of preventing the operation of laws and regulations which increase trade. I am afraid we are getting into a knot about it.

Mr. WALKER. -

It seems to me that we are.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It appears to me that we are assuming that a prohibition against a law derogating from freedom of trade includes a prohibition against a law giving preferential rates, but it does not do anything of the kind. If we in Victoria preferred our own people, and made higher charges against outsiders, I agree that it would be a breach against the law of freedom of trade. Anything that will raise a barrier like a customs duty, or any provision offering an obstacle to outside trade coming in, would undoubtedly be a barrier to freedom of trade, but when you reverse the process, and say you will do certain services for nothing, that is not a barrier freedom of trade.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You are assuming that you are keeping within your own geographical area; but supposing you went beyond your borders, into the geographical area of another colony?

Mr. ISAACS. -

How can we go beyond our geographical area? We have no jurisdiction to carry our railways beyond our territory. If we were to say we will carry produce for people in New South Wales at a less rate than we will carry produce for people in Victoria—mind you, I am not defending the practice—I mean to say that that is not a barrier to trade.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That practice is not a barrier to trade; it is not a derogation from freedom of trade.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear; at least I am not quite so sure of that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is offering an inducement that may operate very unfairly, not to the trade, but to the railway system of the other colony.

Mr. REID. -

That is right.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not a block to trade, but it unduly cuts down the revenue and disarranges the finances of the other colony, and, on that ground, I am anxious to counteract it, but I venture to submit that we shall not accomplish that purpose by putting into the Bill a clause which merely declares that any provision made by the Commonwealth, or by any state, with the view of attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another state shall be null and void. In certain circumstances such a provision would be nugatory, and I am not prepared at the present moment to go to the extent of saying that all regulations with the view of attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another state are to be prohibited.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The point is, you can attract trade within Victoria to one port as against another port, but you must not deliberately legislate for attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another state.

Mr. WISE. -

Would not Mr. Barton's amended clause meet the case?

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; I pointed out yesterday why it would not. Take the case of Melbourne and Sydney, for instance. I am not going to say that Victoria is to be prohibited from attracting trade to Melbourne against Sydney. Why should she not do it, and why should not Sydney do the same thing?

Mr. FRASER. -

Because it would not be fair.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In America the Commonwealth, which is the nursing mother of all the states in this respect, has not to make any difference between the ports of the different states; that is to say, that the Commonwealth has not to prefer the port of one state over the port of another state, but there is no provision that each state cannot do what it pleases in attempting to make its own ports the great ports of all the states, provided it does not set up any barriers and obstacles to the admission of trade. That is the only prohibition, and I cannot see why we in Victoria should not be at liberty to make our ports as attractive as possible to trade. That is a matter for our own consideration.

Mr. HOWE. -

What is the good of abolishing custom-houses if you are going to transfer the trouble to the railways?

Mr. ISAACS. -

A custom-house is a barrier which repels trade, which says-"Trade shall not enter unless it pays certain duties"; but we are talking about preventing ourselves from attracting trade to our respective ports from the ports of any other state. I cannot see why we should not be at perfect liberty to do that, provided we do not set up any barriers.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Does "equality of trade" not cover that?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I would like to hear a definition of "equality of trade." There is no such expression in the whole of the Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Your argument is parallel to that used in relation to bounties the other day.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Bounties are not to attract trade to one's self. What we were then talking about was the production of goods, and we were willing to consent to the Federal Parliament annulling those bounties if they interfered with the common trade of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Free wharfage would have the effect of a bounty.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Is the honorable member going to propose that there shall be a common rate of harbor dues, port dues, pilot charges, and common regulations all over the colonies?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am not going to say that, but I want you to consider it in connexion with your argument.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Its consideration leaps to one's mind in a moment. We are here to take away the barriers between states.

Mr. WISE. -
Do you consider that, if Mr. Barton's amendment is carried, the Victorian preferential rates, as against South Australia and New South Wales, will still continue?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I think that under Mr. Barton's amendment they could be interfered with.

Mr. WISE. -
That is my view also.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I think that, under Mr. Barton's provision, the Victorian rate would be interfered with, but that the New South Wales rates would not.

2073
Exactly; I agree with that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then I think we are one about that.

Mr. WISE. -

It was to prevent that made my suggestion, as I thought the proposal unfair to you.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We must keep clearly in view the distinction between freedom of trade and equality of trade. A prohibition against freedom of trade would not include a prohibition against preferential rates. So long as we keep that in view, the Convention will be able to make up its mind. We ought not to be too prone to put in large words, which can only make null and void all our desires and attempts to attract trade to one port as against another. There can be honest rivalry and honest and legitimate endeavour to make our ports more attractive for trade than the ports of other states. We should not be prevented from doing that. To make the bare statement, as in Mr. Barton's proposal, that a provision giving preference to a state, or part of a state, over another state, or part of that state, is to be null and void-or, as Mr. Higgins proposes, that such provision must not be made with a view of attracting trade to the ports of one state over the ports of another state-is going further than necessity requires.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Would not the trade and commerce clause cover that?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think not. The trade and commerce clause in America enables Congress to legislate so that no barrier shall be set up by any state or state authority. Up to the present, no one has ever suggested that the Commonwealth should legislate so as to prevent additional attractions being given by a state.

Mr. WISE. -

We want to prevent differential tonnage or wharfage dues.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the difference is against foreign trade?

Mr. WISE. -

Or against other states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But not as against their own state?

Mr. WISE. -

Oh, no.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Very well, that is the point. We must bear clearly in mind whether the effect is in regard to commerce and trade, or in regard to the finances of a particular state. We are losing sight of the distinction between obstacles to trade and equality of trade. Unless we are prepared to go the length of saying the Commonwealth shall determine how much shall be charged, I do not see how we can fairly say one state shall not attract trade to its ports over the ports of another state.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

There is no doubt this is one of the most difficult matters we have to deal with in connexion with the chapter on finance and trade. We will probably waste a great deal of time in discussion unless we get to some general understanding as to what we desire to do. It would be impossible, I think, to frame words which will secure freedom to a railway system to impose preferential rates for developmental purposes, but not differential rates to attract the trade of another colony. In the nature of things, it would be impossible to distinguish between the two. A legitimate rate for the development of a district must incidentally have the effect to which I have referred. Preferential rates must always be in the nature of a reduction of the ordinary rates, and this must incidentally enable the railway system which makes the reduction to stand in a better position than before in regard to competing districts. My learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) has cleared away by his speech a great deal of confusion which otherwise might have fallen on this debate. Some people jump at the conclusion that one of the objects of federation is to paralyze business competition. The object is nothing of the sort.

Mr. FRASER. -

The object is to encourage business.

Mr. REID. -

As my honorable friend (Mr. Fraser) says, one of the main objects of federation is to encourage business competition throughout the mercantile communities of Australia.

Mr. GORDON. -

This is a question of state business; not private business.

Mr. REID. -

My friend may be sure I will not stop at generalities, but will address myself presently to the matter under review. I begin with the general observation that throwing down the barriers is not to restrict the utmost keenness of business competition, but on the contrary, to give it freer play than before. Now we come to the crucial question about railways. Unless the railways are federalized, they remain a business concern which the states have to run on business lines. You may federalize your railways, and then you may go to the extreme length of abolishing rates which seem to invite traffic. In that case, having taken over the financial responsibilities of running the lines and paying the cost of their construction, you are perfectly free to lose as much money as you like on a particular line.

Mr. MC MILLAN. -

Having the monopoly.

Mr. REID. -

But one of the incidents of the monopoly, if those differential rates are abolished, may be to render a large stretch of railway lines unproductive.
So long as the railways are federalized, the burden falls on the right shoulders; and the man who owns the property is quite at liberty to lose as much as he likes on it. But so long as the railways are left-as I understand we have left them, and as I believe we must leave them-to the separate ownership of the colonies; and so long as to the separate colonies it is left to manage them so as to pay working expenses and interest, I submit that following from that state of things you cannot hamper the administration of those railways, except in a very slight degree. I may say at once I am quite prepared that there shall be some words in the Constitution which would prevent rates being run up unduly.

Mr. LYNE. -

Don't you mean run down?

Mr. REID. -

I am quite prepared for protection in this direction to those interested in commerce. It is natural for my friend (Mr. Lyne) to make the observation he did. The whole tenor of his policy is to prevent people getting things cheap. I consider that, so long as the railways and the financial burdens connected with them are left in the hands of the states, the states must be left free to develop their traffic and revenue by every sort of business contrivance they think fit for that purpose.

Mr. GORDON. -

Cut-throat and otherwise.

Mr. REID. -

Whose throat is cut-the man who has nothing to do with the railways?
But no throat is cut. The producers of Australia are not injured. Take the case we all know a great deal about, the intense competition between Victoria and New South Wales for the Riverina trade. Is there a single man in Riverina engaged in the work of production whose interests have not been vastly benefited by the war of railway tariffs?

Mr. PEACOCK. -

It does not benefit all the people of the state.
Mr. REID. -

But do you not see that the people of the state have their remedy? If the people of Victoria differ from the policy of the Government of Victoria in carrying on the railways, it is very easy to bring about a change of policy or a change of Government.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But if you have non-paying rates in those parts of Riverina, you must put on extra rates on the parts nearer Sydney.

Mr. REID. -

Is not that for the people of the state to consider? The honorable member should not confuse the argument.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am not aware that I am doing so.

Mr. REID. -

The honorable member is when he raises questions of justice or equity between one section of the people of New South Wales and another section.

Mr. GORDON. -

Does not the honorable member see-

Mr. REID. -

I know this is a rabid question with my honorable friend, but if he will be good enough to wait until I have finished, and he favours me by mentioning any question that I have not dealt with, I shall be much obliged to him. What I wish to say is this: Taking as an illustration the competition between Victoria and New South Wales for the trade of Riverina, the producers and settlers of Riverina have not been injured by that competition; they have been greatly benefited. But do not let it be supposed for a moment that the Government of Victoria were simply studying the benefit of the people of Riverina. Nothing of the kind. Being the managers of a business railway concern, they saw their way to benefit our people by running their lines to the advantage of the people of Victoria. It would be indeed a confession to make that this arrangement for the purpose of attracting Riverina traffic does not also benefit the country which reduces the rates. Of course it does. The plain fact about all the difficulties between the Governments of New South Wales and Victoria in arriving at a peaceful solution of this matter is that, when the railway experts have arrived at such a solution from a railway point of view, there are powers behind the throne interested in the commercial condition of the respective colonies which step in and say--"That might be a very good railway arrangement, looking at the matter from a railway point of view, but we have larger interests behind this matter than the mere administration of the railways; we have our commerce to protect, and if we adopt your railway agreement we will undoubtedly inflict a great injury upon our general commerce." That is the secret of the failure of our attempts to agree. Let us suppose that these competitive lines on our side, and on the Victorian side, were owned by two large companies. They would have agreed long ago. They would have reconciled their interests, so as not to have cut so immensely the rates. But the secret is that behind this railway competition there is the competition for trade and that is one of the difficulties of the position. It only points the force of what I am saying, that, if you leave this business concern in the hands of the states, with the liability in the states to make both ends meet, you must leave with those states all the incidences which follow from financial responsibility and actual management.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But these are losing rates.

Mr. REID. -

Again I say that my honorable friend had better address himself to the Government of Victoria on that subject. It is a matter which may be very interesting between himself and his Government, but it is of no sort of interest to me.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I was speaking of your rates in New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

Again I say that so long as the railways of New South Wales are not managed by my honorable friend, or by any one over whom he has influence-

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is hardly an answer to my question, and is not courteous.

Mr. REID. -

Unfortunately, my honorable friend's interjections come with such a sharp point that one is apt to return the sharpness. My honorable friend's interjections are not, as a rule, dictated by a thirst for information, but very often they are in the way of throwing down a sleeper on the rails of one's argument. We do not look upon interjections of that kind in a very friendly spirit. As I said to Mr. Gordon-If I leave untouched anything upon which the honorable member thinks it worth while to ask me a question, I shall be happy to answer him when I have finished. It is impossible to deal with this matter in a systematic way if the different trains of thought in different minds are projected upon the line on which one is reasoning. I say again, we are brought face to face with the general connexion between federal management and state management, Federal management must mean federalizing the railways, and the more we attempt, whilst leaving the railways in the hands of the states, to control or interfere with the management of those railways, the more we set the business forces in motion which can never bring about any harmony, and which can never bring about the slightest solution of all these troubles. Even in the United States, where there is no state relation, no state considerations at all, where it is a mere matter of competition between private individuals or companies, what is the history of this Inter-State Commission? You have only to look at the reports to see that it has overwhelmed railway management with a thousand difficulties, and heavy expenditure in the way of litigation; that instead of the Inter-State Commission being a final and authoritative tribunal, which settles matters with some show of expedition, and without any great expense, nearly every ruling of this commission goes into the courts of the United States, and an enormous amount of litigation follows upon the decisions of the commission. I shrink from throwing this question of railway communication into the state in which it would be if we left the financial responsibilities with the states, and yet the Commonwealth takes the power of interfering with their management. The extent to which I would go is this: I am quite prepared, although I am afraid it is going a little too far, that there should be a power in this Constitution to prohibit the impositions of certain rates which are decided against, I would not state by the Inter-State Commission, but I would say directly by the Federal Court, because it means eventually the same thing. If the ease is of any importance, it goes from the Inter-State Commission to the Federal Court. I would remark parenthetically that if we can avoid multiplying these high expensive offices in connexion with the Commonwealth, we should do so. If we can avoid the necessity of appointing three very highly-paid railway experts, knowing what the experience of America teaches us, namely, that, in spite of all their skill, every important question will come to the courts at last for determination, we will do well to provide that any disputes which may arise in this Constitution connected with railways should be determined at once by the Federal High Court.

Mr. FRASER. -

How far would you go with the rates?

Mr. REID. -

I will tell my honorable friend that, while I admit it is rather a deviation from the general principles I have endeavoured to lay down, still I am quite prepared to deviate from these general principles to this extent. If it is thought desirable—I do not myself press for it, but I am willing to see it done and to vote for it—that there shall be a jurisdiction in the Commonwealth to prevent the imposition of exorbitant rates, to prevent any railway from being used in such a way as to impose an exaction from any persons who happen to be situated in certain parts of the Commonwealth—

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is, from being a bar to trade.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, that certainly comes within the prohibition with which we are willing to surround this Constitution. But, remembering that, so long as state railways are in state hands, it is in the power of the people of the states to control the policy of the Government in any direction, I am quite agreeable that a superior power shall control even the Government to such an extent as to prevent any of our state Governments from throwing any obstacle in the way of trade.

Mr. HOLDER. -

They have never done that. They have done the opposite.

Mr. REID. -

Then all I can say is that the grievance becomes mysterious.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It has been done, because you have put on rates to prevent us getting trade from your country.

Mr. REID. -

The less we go into these conflicts the better, because they simply illustrate the tactics business firms will always adopt when they go into competition. I have never complained of what has been done in Victoria

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

As the Bill is now it will restrict your rates and not ours.

Mr. REID. -

I do not care how it is put, so long as it is put equally.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It will not be put equally as it is in the Bill now.

Mr. REID. -

I am willing to leave each colony to run its own railways on its own lines, and to allow that on the part of New South Wales implies a similar freedom on the part of Victoria or any of the other colonies owning railways. But I am quite willing to give the Commonwealth power, in the interests of what we will call freedom of commerce—and in that sense equality of commerce—to redress a grievance which is based upon an exaction, an unfair and unequal exaction, from any class of persons using the railways of any State. I am quite agreeable to come up to that point, but I must admit that, so far as I can review the effect of sub-section (1) of clause 52, and any such clause as that we are discussing it will be necessary to put in this Constitution, and probably at the end of any clause we agree to here, express words to that effect. I am quite agreeable that there shall be such express words used. I think it would be to the advantage of this debate if we came to some conclusion upon the discussion, and the point that my mind has come to is this (I will not move this amendment, Sir Richard Baker, but will simply read it as expressing what I am willing to agree to upon this matter): To add at the end of the clause the following words:-

Provided always that state railways shall not be subject to the provisions of sub-section (1) of section 52, or of this section, upon any ground that traffic rates are unduly low.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is almost the same as the amendment of Mr. Wise.

Mr. REID. -

It is almost the same. My honorable friend (Mr. Wise) and I had a conversation this morning before the commencement of the proceedings of the Convention and we found that our ideas were almost precisely the same. We came to the conclusion that that was the position upon which the matter might fairly be put. The result of such a provision, it seems to me, would be this: Those financially responsible, and actually vested with the control of the railways, would be left free to control them as business concerns, but they would have to work them upon such lines of fairness and equity that if they endeavoured to raise rates unfairly against any person using the railways the power of the Commonwealth might be invoked to annul any such rate. I admit that this is a very difficult matter, but I do not think we can get away from the position that you cannot federalize the management of the railways unless you also federalize the acceptance of the financial responsibility for, those railways. You cannot have the responsibility of finding me money to run the railways in one set of hands, and the power to practically manage the railways vested in a tribunal which bears no sort of financial responsibility for the operation of those lines. Now, we must have some regard to the existing state of things. If federation had come about twenty years ago there would be very little difficulty today in regard to this matter of railways. But I know that our people in Riverina, made the most urgent appeals to us year after year to carry our railways system down to their part of the colony, and, indeed, promised all sorts of things if we would do so. Well there being no immediate prospect of the accomplishment of federation, and being anxious to develop the resources of that very rich part of New South Wales, the Government acceded to the application. And there comes the whole difficulty. The responsibility of developing the resources of the lands of each colony is left quite as fully as before to each individual state. Again, the railways being owned by the state, and the state owning an enormous quantity of land, it, as the representative of the whole community, has a strong reason, even an imperative reason, for railway construction which has nothing to do with railways from the strict business point of view. There are other considerations which arise, and a railway that might, as a matter of fact, for a course of years show a heavy loss on the national page headed "Railways," might have conferred untold advantages on the whole community in many other directions. And all these elements have to be taken into account by a state which runs railways, and which is at the same time responsible for the good government of its country and the development of its territory.

Mr. HOWE. -

So that present cut-throat rates are to be maintained?

Mr. REID. -

Again I wonder at the violence of this expression. Does it come from a human being who has been injured by the lowering of rates? Has any one ever heard of a man living alongside a railway line indulging in violent complaints because rates have been reduced? Why this exclamation from a certain quarter of this Convention? Does it not add force to what I have stated?

Mr. HOWE. -

The right honorable member's statement does not point to inter-colonial free-trade.

Mr. REID. -

If my honorable friend and the people of the colony which he represents are prepared to indemnify us against loss in connexion with the management of our railways, we shall be prepared to give them a very large share in that management. But the sort of person who uses violent language about the liberal way in which we adjust our rates is a person I do not pay the slightest regard to, because, having no sort of financial responsibility in connexion with the matter, he must have some interest at heart which is really no concern of the people of New South Wales.

Mr. HOWE. -

The whole of the people are a guarantee for the debt.
Mr. REID. -
Not the people of South Australia.

Mr. HOWE. -
I am not so narrow as to confine my interjection to the people of South Australia.

Mr. REID. -
Does not my honorable friend see that those who use violent language about low rates show that these rates are doing them an injury because they happen to be competing against them? When business men use violent language about others who are competing with them no one regards them. Any one who attempts to destroy competition of any kind makes a big mistake, and will never succeed. What keener competition can you have than that for the trade of Riverina, and what part of that competition is keener than the competition between the great business firms of Melbourne? If the people of South Australia want to have a voice in the management of our railways, they must take some financial responsibility in regard to them. There are any number of men in the street who will give you all sorts of wise advice about the way in which to manage your business, and they are in this singularly happy condition, that if you carry out their advice, and are ruined by it, it does not matter a pin's point to them. That is the position of those who are advising us as to the management of our railways. We thank them for their advice, we reflect upon it, and, if we think it good, we adopt it. But we always feel that the responsibility must be with us, and that we cannot shift it by saying that other people advised us to do this and we followed their advice. So far as the people of South Australia are concerned, I think I can dismiss from their minds the idea that we contemplate doing them an injury.

Mr. HOWE. -
I have no such apprehension.

Mr. REID. -
No. So far as we are concerned, the difficulty is chiefly connected with the railway system of Victoria.

Mr. HOWE. -
And the river trade.

Mr. REID. -
Well, that is a separate matter. I do not wish to bring the river, which was given to us by nature, into the same category as the railways.

Mr. HOWE. -
The river is a feeder to the railways.

Mr. REID. -
Yes; but, so far as we are concerned, it really injures our railway traffic to some extent. The Bourke Railway, for instance. However, the river is a natural advantage to some of our settlers, and the more advantages they have the better we are pleased. I do not apply the statements I am now making to the rivers; I am speaking only of the railways, which have cost us a large amount of money to construct, and our indebtedness for which constitutes a heavy burden upon the people. I have no sympathy with anything unbusinesslike in connexion with the management of these railways; but, viewing the interests of the people as a whole, I do not look with alarm upon the reduction of rates of carriage to the lowest possible point, because I reflect that this policy can at any time be altered if it is against the will of the people, or if it is seen to act against the benefit of the state. In any case, the state should be allowed to carry out its own policy in regard to matters in regard to which it is financially responsible.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I am beginning to think that we shall have nothing of federal principle left in the Constitution by the time the sittings of the Convention are finished. First of all, we have agreed to the irritating system of bookkeeping, which is nearly half as bad as that which erects customs barriers upon our borders.

Mr. FRASER. -

It will be in force only for a time.

Mr. GORDON. -

Then we have left Western Australia out of the Federation altogether for five years; we have chipped off a very large integral portion of Australia from the Federation for that time. Now we are going right back upon every sentiment previously expressed in the Convention with regard to the management of intercolonial railways. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise) in a speech, which was charming but which meant very little, put two propositions to the Convention. The first was that we should not establish an Inter-State Commission because it was novel.

Mr. WISE. -

Because it has been proved a failure.

Mr. GORDON. -

The honorable and learned member's first proposition was that it was novel. But the whole of this Constitution is novel. We are creating entirely new political machinery.

Mr. FRASER. -

Surely not.

Mr. GORDON. -

It is new so far as we are concerned, and in some of its aspects it is new so far as the political history of the world is concerned. Then the honorable and learned member said that an Inter-State Commission—a jury of experts—would be a disintegrating factor in the Federation. How can it be said that a body of men competent and educated to deal with the frictional differences which are now admitted to exist between the colonies would be a disintegrating factor? Such a body must be a peace making and mollifying institution. For these two reasons the honorable and learned member says with the utmost calmness and frankness that we must continue to be competitive. If we are to continue to be competitive, why do we want federation?

Mr. FRASER. -
We are not taking over the railways.

Mr. GORDON. -
If the Convention is going to think that way, I am a convert to the taking over of the railways.

Mr. REID. -
I should think the honorable and learned member would be. He would take over anything.

Mr. GORDON. -
Rather let us

Mr. FRASER. -
Would the honorable and learned member take over the railways of Tasmania and Western Australia?

Mr. GORDON. -
Let us consider any proposition rather than leave in our midst such a cause of friction and damage to the Federation as this would be. After consultation with the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, it has been decided by the representatives of New South Wales that we are to remain competitive. I thought that federation was to reduce competition.

Mr. REID. -
I never dreamt of such a thing.

Mr. GORDON. -
The honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise) used the words "We must remain competitive." I thought that the abolition of protective duties was to do away with competition.

Mr. REID. -
Indeed it will not. It will do away with unequal competition.

Mr. GORDON. -
Is not unequal competition still competition?

Mr. REID. -
The abolition of protective duties will not do away with competition; it will increase other kinds of competition.

Mr. GORDON. -

The intention of federating is to allow the people residing in the Federation to enjoy fully, freely, and without anti-federal competition the natural advantages which the continent offers. It appears that each colony is to keep within its own hands a weapon which will destroy half the benefits of federation. That is what this proposition narrows itself down to.

Mr. REID. -

What is the thing which any colony can do that will destroy the benefits of federation? Is it putting the rates too high?

Mr. GORDON. -

They may put the rates up too high.

Mr. REID. -

I shall be willing to go with you to prevent that.

Mr. GORDON. -

I shall be pleased to answer any question the right honorable member may put to me after I have finished my remarks. These interjections do tend to throw one off the track of his argument, but I will answer the right honorable member at once. He says-"Might this barrier be raised by way of higher rates or lower rates?" My reply is, by either. I will take him on his strongest ground, and on my weakest. A barrier may be raised by charging low rates with a view of tempting trade from one state to another. But then the right honorable member says-"How can this hurt anybody? The producers gain." So do the carrion gain after the battle. So do the contractors gain in a war between two countries. Of course somebody will gather in spoils. But does the right honorable member contend that a war of railway rates in which less than actual cost is charged for the carriage of goods can do good to any colony.

Mr. WISE. -

After union, this will end itself.

Mr. GORDON. -

The honorable member gives away his whole position. Are we to leave this cancer to remain festering until it is so bad that the patient must either die or it must be cut out, or are we to take immediate steps to effect a cure?

Mr. WISE. -

Unfortunately, there are no steps that will effect a cure.

Mr. GORDON. -

If the honorable member had a mote in his eye he would no wait until it destroyed the eye before he took it out.
Mr. WISE. -
I am not going to take remedy that will put the eye out.

Mr. GORDON. -
Are we going to leave this difficulty here to create friction and trouble? We should then be in very much the same position commercially as before. I cannot understand the argument of Mr. Reid in advocating a cut-throat policy of low rates on the ground that it benefits the producers. Have not the experts of this and the other colonies met and absolutely denounced such rates?

Mr. LYNE. -
What?

Mr. GORDON. -
They lamented that they should exist.

Mr. LYNE. -
They only denounced the preferential rates, and not the differential rates.

Mr. GORDON. -
I am attacking the preferential rates. The Hon. Mr. Higgins' amendment only attacks preferential rates and rates imposed with a view of unfairly attracting trade.

Mr. LYNE. -
It attacks differential rates also.

Mr. GORDON. -
It is not meant to have that effect. The Inter-State Commission sitting as a jury would see that no unfair rates were imposed with a special view of attracting trade improperly from one state to another. The railway experts have lamented the existence of such rates, but it remained for Mr. Reid to get up and solemnly in this Convention defend a thing which all those who know anything about it have condemned.

Mr. REID. -
No, not to defend it. I say it is a question of independent management, and that as long as management is independent you cannot control it.

Mr. GORDON. -
Let me quote another authority to the right honorable member, and it is an authority which I am sure he will respect—that of his own colleague (the Hon. Mr. Carruthers).

Mr. REID. -
He is in favour of federalizing the railways.

Mr. GORDON. -
Either of federalizing the railways, or of providing some piece of machinery which would remove the friction. He prefers federation of the railways, but he says, if we cannot get federation, let us have something which will remove the friction.

Mr. Wise. -

Reflection proves that we cannot find that something.

Mr. Gordon. -

We think we can, but let me quote the honorable member. He says-

We also have been trying to get the trade of Riverina, which geographically belongs to Victoria. If something be not done wisely in reference to the railways, the anti-federal spirit will continue to be exhibited. The same spirit of antipathy engendered and fostered by the Custom-houses will be engendered and fostered by the Railway department.

Is Mr. Carruthers right, or is his revered chief?

Mr. Reid. -

We are both right, from different points of view.

Mr. Gordon. -

One point of view must be wrong, and I am afraid it is that of my right honorable friend. Mr. Carruthers goes on to say-

Any policy which allows New South Wales to rob Victoria of the earnings of her railways tends to impose additional taxation upon the people of Victoria, and anything which allows Victoria to rob the people of New South Wales of the earnings of her railways tends to impose additional taxation upon the people of New South Wales.

What becomes of the catch-penny argument of Mr. Reid that low rates benefit the producers in the particular locality in which they are imposed? The question is-taking the larger view put by Mr. Carruthers-whether it is a good thing for any colony?

Mr. Fraser. -

It may create new traffic.

Mr. Gordon. -

My honorable friend has a bee in his bonnet on this subject. He is a large carrier of wool, I know. Mr. Carruthers also states-

I urge, therefore, that the Federal Constitution Bill should either provide to take over the railways or provide some machinery by which thorough inquiry might be made, and ultimately federal control—or such control as the Federal Parliament may approve-assumed over railways.

That is what we want—such control as will prevent this unfair competition. The Hon. Mr. Wise said that too much had been made of this question, and that it had been spoken of as if it were as bad to have railway competitive rates as to have inter-colonial customs barriers. To some extent that is a figure of speech. Nobody contends that one is as bad as the other at present. But one may be made almost as bad as the other if once a spirit of antagonism is aroused between the colonies. What would be the consequences then to the weaker colonies? At present they can protect themselves by inter-colonial customs duties; but if it becomes a question of fighting wealthy colonies like New South Wales and Victoria in the matter of railway rates, the smaller colonies must go to the wall. We must have an independent body protect us against possible injustice. We are not making laws which we of this Convention are going to administer. We are making laws for all time. We do not know what causes of friction may arise, or what troubles may come under the new Constitution. We must provide for possibilities, and there is a serious possibility here of injury being done to some of the colonies and to the whole fabric of the Constitution. Surely we can devise some scheme under which an independent body can see that fair play is done in this respect. It is a comparatively narrow issue. It is not a question affecting the whole management of the railways of the Commonwealth, as Mr. Reid would have the Convention suppose. Outside the area of competition between the states the management will be left to the colonies themselves. It is only in matters affecting intercolonial interests that this body will come in.

Mr. FRASER. -

Would not the Federal Court deal with these matters?

Mr. GORDON. -

I doubt it very much unless it is provided for. Moreover, we do not want this constant litigation. The arguments which have been used against the Inter-State Commission by comparing it with the Inter-State Commission of the United States are not of much value, because the United States Commission is a commission which is dealing with private concerns, with railways which, in their inception, were cut-throat railways, lines which were designed to kill each other. Here the Inter-State Commission would deal with the interests of those who appointed it. We would appoint a body to deal with our own interests, not with outside interests, and there is no comparison between the duties of those two bodies or their area of jurisdiction, nor is there any comparison between those bodies as regards the spirit in which their decisions would be received. It is impossible to conceive that any of these sovereign colonies would dispute a decision arrived at by the Inter-State Commission, and it is impossible to conceive that so high and expert a body would do anything unfair to any colony. I must confess that there was some force in the criticism of Mr. Isaacs as to the wording of Mr. Higgins' amendment. It is possible that it is a little too wide; it might be made to embrace the prohibition of such attractions as one colony might fairly surround its ports with, and we do not want that. It would be better to confine the proposition to rivers and railways, or, if desired, to railways only. Do not let us run the danger of making it too wide. But either to leave the thing untouched, or, worse still, to go right back on the whole federal position, and to crystallize in the Constitution a selfish policy of managing the railways would be, in my opinion, absolutely destructive of the federal spirit. That is the limitation which the Right Hon. Mr. Reid and Mr. Wise seek to embody in this Constitution - to encourage competition, to throw right into the Constitution a casus belli between the colonies, and to say-"Although you are federating in name, you have each still a powerful weapon with which to injure one another, and here is the warrant for your using it." That is a direct invitation to the colonies to derogate from the federal spirit, and one which I hope the Convention will not encourage.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

I indorse almost every word that fell from the Right Hon. Mr. Reid in this matter, for I do not see how it is possible to control the railway rates unless you federalize the railways. The one thing is impossible without the other. It is impossible to give a body the control and fixing of rates and other matters unless you federalize the railways altogether, and there is not much use in wasting time over the question of federalizing the railways, because I believe there is an overwhelming majority in the Convention against that proposal. For very good reasons it is regarded as quite impossible and impracticable. As to differential and preferential rates, I do not see how you can very well draw a distinction between the two. For instance, the rate from Sydney to Cootamundra is 3d. per ton per mile, while the freight to Hay, which is 250 miles further, is only the same. Now, that is a preferential rate which is intended to draw traffic. I deny that the present railway warfare-or cut-throat policy, as it is called-has the injurious effect attributed to it. The rates from here to Echuca, of course, are lower for the producers across the Murray than they are for the producers on this side of the Murray; but the producers on this side of the Murray, who use our railways, would have to pay higher rates if the railways did not get the traffic across the border. If the lines running to the borders of the different colonies did not get the traffic from portions of adjoining colonies which geographically belong to them, and if the traffic was so curtailed that it would be very slight indeed, of course the people living in the colony would have to pay a higher rate in order to make the railways pay. Let honorable members make no mistake about the matter-it is really not known at how low rates railways can be run if they have an enormous traffic. What fixes the paying rate is not so much the distance as the amount of traffic and the gradient. For instance, between Sydney and some parts of New South Wales there are very steep gradients, and of course a locomotive cannot draw perhaps more than from four to eight trucks on such lines. On the other hand, on the line to Echuca, except on the gradient near Woodend, a locomotive can draw from 40 to 60 trucks. The geographical advantages, and the advantages of level lines, are things you cannot get rid of. Victoria has a perfect right to draw traffic from Riverina. No clause that we can devise or put into this Constitution will get over that, because Riverina geographically belongs to this colony. So does the Richmond district belong to Queensland, and I could name many other parts in the different colonies which belong, geographically, to adjoining colonies. It is almost impossible to drive trade hundreds of miles from its natural outport, and it should not be done. That is not intended, I hope. But I would repeat that we should not run away with the idea that the people who use the railway to Echuca, for example, on this side of the border, would not have to pay higher rates if the traffic on the other side of the border was shut out. If you run trains with only one truck loaded, when you should have 20 or 30 trucks, the train cost is almost the same as if there were a full train. There is a very slight difference in the coal consumed, but there is no difference in the pay of the engine-drivers or guards. The wear and tear is almost the same, so that, practically, the only saving is the small decrease in the amount of coal consumed. It is utter nonsense, therefore, to say that the so-called cut-throat policy has been as ruinous as it is said to have been. £1 per ton will pay to run goods to Echuca with sufficient traffic, while the lowest rate charged is much more than that. If you have plenty of traffic the rate has not yet been named or used in these colonies which is not sufficient to pay; such rates are paying everywhere else where there is a large traffic, and this will be admitted by the railway people themselves. Of course, I do not object to the cut-throat policy, as it is called, being stopped in a reasonable way; but I say that it does not injure the railways to the extent supposed, and they have all adopted that policy in the various colonies. When federation takes place there will be much less friction in this regard than there is at present. Of course, with one Federation there will be a sort of Commonwealth sentiment running through the various railway departments, and the result will be that there will be less of cut-throat railway rates. While I do not know that the clauses in the old Bill need be objected to—I do not think we need be alarmed at clause 95 or clause 96; I think they are right enough—still, I agree that it is just as well to leave the Inter-State Commission out, as it is more embarrassing than otherwise, and I do not see that it can do very much good. At any rate, what possibility, I ask, is there of taking over the railways of Tasmania or of Western Australia? It would require an immense department to manage the railways of all the colonies included in the proposed Commonwealth, and, the wider the scope, the more difficult of management the railways would be. If one department had to manage the railways in Western Australia, in Tasmania, in New South Wales, in Victoria, and in South Australia, it would have to be a very huge department indeed, and those railways would be much better managed as they are; especially as the responsibility of making them pay would be with the states. Another matter which ought not to be forgotten is that the river rates control the railway rates in many cases. If the railway rates in many parts were raised, the rivers would be much more used than they are at present. The river rates control the railway rates, especially when there is navigation, and the Darling, the Murrumbidgee, the Edwards, and other rivers are navigable for a part of the year. So that the cut-throat policy is brought about, not go much by the competition with the railway rates as by the river rates.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). - I cannot allow the question to be put without saying a few words. It appears to me that the words proposed to be inserted by my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) are of a character which might be misinterpreted, because I do not think, according to his speech, that he intended that they should go so far as they appear to go. However that may be, there are very many difficulties in the way of dealing with this question. I think the best course to take to ascertain really what is aimed at is to find out if possible what is underlying this proposal. I take it that the desire of the colony of Victoria to appoint an Inter-State Commission is, in the main, to hold the trade she has in Southern Riverina. It must be admitted, I think, on all sides that during the last ten or twelve years the extension of the railway system of New South Wales and the re-arrangement of rates has, to a large extent, drawn towards New South Wales much of the trade which formerly went into Victoria. And how you are going to appoint a commission of any kind to take out of the hands of the state, so long as she controls her railways, the power of regulating, the rates thereon, I cannot conceive. If you wish to get over the whole difficulty there is only one way of doing it, and that is by federalizing the railways and the debts of the colonies. I do not see any other way of getting over a difficulty such as presents itself at the present time. South Australia, of course, in a degree, but not to the same extent as Victoria, is desirous of holding the trade she has with Broken Hill, and, probably, taking a part of the trade which she hopes to obtain from the western portion of New South Wales, further towards the Darling. I can, therefore, understand both Victoria and South Australia being very anxious indeed for the appointment of a commission which must, if it is to have any effect at all, take the power of regulating rates on the lines of those colonies that have spent their money in building railways. I do not think, unless under the conditions of taking over the railways and the debts, it is likely that any state will agree to permit an Inter-State Commission or a body of any kind to dictate what the rates shall be. If I read aright the result of the Inter-State Commission in the United States, it is not to prevent a state from obtaining all the trade it can within its own borders, but to prevent a railway that runs through one state from adopting such a tariff as will take the trade from another state. If any one is to blame for attempting to take trade from another state it is the colony of Victoria.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
How is that?
Mr. LYNE. -
And she has been to blame for a very considerable time.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
We had made railways to the border before you had made any railways down there at all.
Mr. LYNE. -
New South Wales does not desire to put a rate on her railways to take from Victoria any trade which is not her own.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
She has done it.
Mr. LYNE. -
For many years past, I think from about 1882, Victoria has, according to the evidence of her commissioner (Mr. Mathieson), considered the whole of the trade in Southern Riverina, to belong to her, although it is in the territory of New South Wales.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
They are all Victorian settlers.
Mr. LYNE. -
That may be so, but they are under the rule of New South Wales. And they are also contributing to the cost,
New South Wales. The object of the Inter-State Commission and its duty, I take it, would be at once to prevent the rates that are now imposed by the Victorian Railways Commissioner, which have the effect of drawing the production from New South Wales. As Sir William Zeal knows, when you get a certain distance above the Murray, the Victorian Railways Commissioner gives, in some cases, a discount on the rates charged over the railway lines in Victoria of 61 per cent., and in other cases, discounts of from 40 to 45 per cent.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Well, you do practically the same thing on your side.

Mr. LYNE. -

We are compelled to do it in consequence of the action of Victoria, but we do not desire to do it. In referring to those particular cases, I refer to them as preferential and not differential rates. I say, therefore, that Victoria, was the first sinner in this regard, and that it was only in self-defence that New South Wales was compelled to put on rates in our own colony to prevent the destruction of the railway revenue of New South Wales.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

But you had none of that revenue until you made those railways.

Mr. LYNE. -

No, we had none of that railway revenue, and we had also none of the capital cost; but we have gone to the capital cost; of constructing those railways, and we desire, if we are allowed by our neighbours, to levy rates on the traffic of those railways that will bring in revenue enough to pay interest on the money expended. You are not proposing to take away from New South Wales that capital cost, but you are proposing to take away from us the power of producing sufficient revenue from those railways to pay the cost of their construction. New South Wales is only doing that at present for the purpose of protecting herself against the inroads of those who started this competition.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

It is the other way about; we were there first.

Mr. LYNE. -

No, I beg the honorable member's pardon; you were there first, but you were the encroachers.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

We settled the country for you.

Mr. LYNE. -

You came to take some part of our country, and in that respect you were the first sinners. But New South Wales met those differential rates of 40 to 60 per cent. discount by, first of all, placing as low a preferential rate as she could on her long lines of railway, and, in the second place, by putting on a high rate when the goods were going towards the Victorian border.

Mr. HOWE. -

That is what New South Wales pleads for now, according to the statement of your Premier.

Mr. LYNE. -

I do not think so. I listened to what the Premier of New South Wales said, and I do not think he advocated a high rate on goods going from a certain point; take, for illustration's sake, from Hay to the Victorian border. What our Premier contended was that New South Wales should not be prevented from putting on the ordinary differential rate for the first 50 miles from Sydney, another rate for the next 50 miles, and so on, each 50 or 100 miles, the rate shading off and becoming lower and lower. I always thought, until I heard Mr. Eddy's evidence in Adelaide, that if you took a mile of railway near Hay, where the goods were carried at the low rate, that that mile did not pay; but Mr. Eddy distinctly said in his evidence at Adelaide that he did not run an engine or carry a ton of goods over a mile of railway anywhere in the colony that did not pay. And that seemed to indicate that, although the rates are low when you get to the extreme limits, still they are not at such a low level as to involve a loss to the colony.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Mr. Eddy did not say that the lowest rate paid; he admitted that the lowest rate did not pay, but he stated that, in conjunction with the whole of the lines, the traffic paid.

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes; I was just going to say that if he did not get to carry that ton of goods, not only over that mile of line, but also over other miles of the railways of the colony, probably there would be some loss, but having to carry it the whole distance, he was enabled to say that every ton of goods paid the Railway department of New South Wales. Now, I understand the Premier of New South Wales to say that he is not in favour of, nor did he desire to keep on, that preferential high rate, going towards the border of Victoria, and towards the border of South Australia, or, still later, when we extend our railways, towards the border of Queensland. That is certainly a cut-throat policy. There is no question of that; and I can scarcely think that any of the delegates from New South Wales would strongly advocate the retention of the system on that account. But it can only be done away with if the Victorian Railway department do away with their discount system, the object of which is to draw railway traffic from the very centre and almost from the other side of New South Wales into Victoria. Because, if Victoria is allowed to continue its extreme preferential rates, New South Wales must, in some way or other, meet those tactics. Victoria has started this, and we must defend ourselves; but the object at the present time is to prevent Victoria continuing that extreme preferential rate, and if that object is accomplished we shall be no longer under the necessity of defending ourselves from such competition. But the Inter-State Commission in the United States of America was created, I think, for the purpose of preventing any company from establishing cut-throat rates upon its railways with a view to draw the trade from another state into the state from which its lines were run. And if a rate was imposed on the New South Wales railways which drew the trade from Victorian territory to Sydney, it should not be allowed. That idea, I think, must be accepted by all those who wish to see the railways of these colonies run on fair and equitable lines. But to say that we in New South Wales shall not be allowed to put on a differential rate at the 50-mile limit, the 100-mile limit, and so on, would be to tie our hands, and prevent us getting sufficient revenue to pay interest on the capital we have expended in the construction of our railways. And unless we allow those limit rates to be extended from Melbourne to Cootamundra, which is about half-way between Melbourne and Sydney, no doubt Victoria will also lose some trade. I do not see how we could agree to a differential rate, starting with Melbourne as a base, being charged on goods carried right through the Victorian territory, where the Railway department would have a higher rate paid to its treasury, and that when the traffic got into New South Wales it should pay any lessened rate there, or over all our lines, which is what, it seems to me, both Victoria and South Australia desire. I have not the slightest doubt that South Australia is looking, more particularly, to the trade of Broken Hill.
Mr. HOWE. -
Oh no, that is secure; you cannot take that away.
Mr. LYNE. -
Very likely; but supposing New South Wales extended her railway system, as she must at some time or other, to Broken Hill, I do not think the honorable member would then say that the trade of Broken Hill was secured to South Australia.
Mr. HOWE. -
Oh, yes.
Mr. LYNE. -
I happen to have gone into the matter in every detail, and I am satisfied that your trade will not be secure. You will get a portion of the trade.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
If you are prepared to carry the trade five miles for their one mile, you will secure it, and not else.

Mr LYNE. - There are many things I need not go into now. If the railways were extended from Cobar, or Lachlan, to Broken Hill, a large portion of the trade that is now done through Adelaide would be done through Sydney. South Australia, to-day, is afraid of such extension.
Mr HOWE. - Not at all.

Mr. LYNE. - We should not be prevented from extending our railways, and obtaining a portion of the trade which we cannot obtain by water carriage.
Mr HOWE. - Your producers are under an everlasting obligation to South Australia—gave facilities which you denied them.

Mr. LYNE. -
It is not my fault that those facilities have been denied in connexion with Sydney. I have, on all occasions, advocated the extension of our railways, right to the extreme limits of the colony, wherever an opportunity presented itself. I will take the arguments on the other side. At the present time we have a preferential rate on Queensland produce in order to attract that produce to Sydney. I do not think New South Wales desires that that should be so, and I am prepared to admit that the whole of the trade belonging to Queensland, if that colony come into the Federation, should to its natural ports, and not be drawn by cheap rates to Sydney as at present. But this is too small a matter to consider in this question. We should not be prevented putting on such rates as our commissioners or the Government consider are just and equitable to give facilities to persons 500 or 600 miles from the metropolis. If we cannot do that we cut off the chance of trade with our own metropolis. How are we going to solve the difficulty? So long as we do not take any produce that is raised in Victoria, and draw it from Victoria, or so long as we do not take that course in regard to South Australia and Queensland, we should be allowed to work and develop our country in our own way. That is all I contend for, but other representatives are contending for a great deal more. New South Wales should not be a kind of chopping block for all the states. We do not ask that New South Wales should take any trade to which she is not entitled.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
What about Queensland trade?
Mr. LYNE. -
We do not want it.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
You do, you know.

Mr. LYNE. -
I referred to that a few minutes ago, and I think I am speaking for all the representatives of New South Wales when I say they do not want to continue to impose those rates to withdraw trade from Queensland.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
Why should they put an export duty on wool?

Mr. LYNE. -
There are certain preferential taxes put on in consequence of the rates on the Queensland border. But that at present may be put on one side. We are prepared to give those taxes up. We do not want to draw from South Australia, Victoria, or Queensland; but there is a desire on all sides to draw from New South Wales. That is what is aimed at; and what we want, if possible, is to induce the Convention not to agree to it. We must lay down in as clear terms as possible in the Bill that the preferential rate system, which is mostly carried on by Victoria at the present time, shall not be continued. It may draw the trade to Victoria, and, I understand, it really does draw a great deal of wool from as far as Wilcannia and near Bourke.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
All we want is that trade shall be allowed to go to its natural ports.

Mr. LYNE. -
You want a great deal more trade to come to Melbourne.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You want to take the trade away and force it to Sydney, and we are not likely to agree to that.

Mr. LYNE. -
All we want to do is to keep the trade for our own port and our own state, and until such time as the public debts and the railways are confederated I do not see how we can have a system other than that of differential rates. So far as I understand Mr. Wise, he supports the view I am putting now. He may, however, be supporting that view from motives altogether different to mine. Mr. Wise has been a strong advocate for federalizing the railways, and also the debts. His proposal, as it strikes me, is an attempt to show the impossibility of dealing with special rates unless the railways and debts are both federalized, and he is, therefore, supporting the idea I am now presenting for the purpose of showing that in no other way can this difficulty be overcome. My expression of the view is not for that purpose at all. My object is to allow New South Wales to keep her railways for the purpose of developing the colony. In the development of each state we may, with some degree of certainty, judge the future from the history of the past. Would Victoria, if she had not separated from New South Wales at the time she did, have attained her present development?
Would New South Wales have projected the Victorian railways as Victoria herself has done all over the colony, and have developed the resources of Victoria to any greater extent? I think not. Would South Australia, had she been attached to a larger Federation, have developed so rapidly as large a railway system as she has up to the present? I think not. The development of each state will progress much more rapidly and more naturally if it is left in the hands of the state, instead of being transferred to the Federal Parliament, for at any rate many years to come. If it were desired to make a branch line to any particular part where, at present, there would not be sufficient traffic to pay interest on the cost, the Federal Parliament would not for a moment think of carrying out the work if it were left entirely to them. But the interests of the state would be more directly concerned. The necessity for the development of territory comes home to the state more quickly than it would to the Federal Parliament. A state develops and extends its railways, not because it sees a return at once, but because the development of the country in the near future will bring a return. In that way the whole of New South Wales has had to be developed by the railway system; and, in my opinion, we are simply on the fringe of our railway construction in that colony. Victoria has more railway mileage than New South Wales, but the territory of the latter colony is three times as large, and is not developed to anything like the extent of that of Victoria. It is much better, therefore, to leave this matter of local development in the hands of the states. The question of federalizing the railways may be left for further consideration, until the Federal Parliament has been in existence some years, when the people will have more confidence as to what that Parliament may do, and as to how it will extend the railway system. To attempt now to carry through an Inter-State Commission or any body to take the work out of the hands of Parliament, still leaving the responsibility of the debts on the shoulders of the state Parliaments, cannot meet with the consideration or with the approval of New South Wales, or, I believe, of any of the other states.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -
I intend to support any proposal which will give federal control over the railways, so as to prevent that competition in future which has been going on in the past. I am strongly of opinion that, although the great object of federation may be to have freedom of trade throughout the federated colonies, still we must not lose sight of the fact that the reason for desiring that change is in order that there may be some harmony amongst the endeavour to cure, surely we ought not in doing away with our custom-houses leave in their place something which may provoke just as keen a conflict and strife in the future as our custom-houses have ever done. It appears to me that if by the state ownership of railways we are to have the conflict increased and intensified, as it must be, of which we have seen a little in the past, then the federation we shall accomplish will only be a federation in name, and we shall still leave in it the germs of division and strife for the future, when we might have seized the opportunity which now presents itself of destroying, once and for all, those germs. My honorable friend (Mr. Wise), who is one of the minority with myself who is in favour of taking over the railways, advocates that if we leave things as they are - that is, if we have no control over the railway competition - we shall be adopting the surest and most effectual means hereafter of forcing the Federation to take over the railways. I altogether dissent from my honorable friend's views in that respect. I believe that if we leave the railways as they are now, without any controlling influence, the effect will be to largely prevent the consummation of federation at all, because the electors cannot be so blind as not to see for themselves that the continuance of the existing state of affairs, intensified, as it must be, by the removal of the Border Duties, will to to inflict disaster and loss on the various colonies concerned. I maintain that, so far as New South Wales and South Australia are concerned, the people are not prepared to have their public finances further demoralized by the continuance of this railway contest, by this war of tariffs, with the pecuniary loss which follows in its wake. Arguments were used by my chief to the effect that these competitive rates were a benefit to the producers; that they have really helped the flow of trade rather than retarded it, and that it was really the business of those who owned the railways whether they managed them best at low rates or high rates, and that it was the business of those who ran the railways as to what rates they would fix; that no loss accrued, but rather a gain to the producers who used the railways. I take leave to gainsay that argument. There may be a gain to the producers who have the choice of the use of the two lines of railways; it may be a gain to the producers on the border of Riverina, or near to South Australia, who can take advantage of either one or other of those competitive rates, and who, if they choose, can ship goods to Adelaide or Melbourne, and to Sydney or Melbourne. But whilst those producers have that gain, some one else pays the price for it, and the price is paid by the producers and users of the railways in other portions of the colony, where there is no choice whatever between two lines. There being a state monopoly of railways throughout Australia, the producer cannot turn from the state to a private railway. In nine cases out of ten he is forced to use one line, and he must pay the price fixed on that line. Where the choice presents itself to the producer to use two lines, and he gets the benefit of competition, that benefit is enjoyed at the loss of the general railway revenue. We know very well that in all the colonies now the railways are placed under managements which are bound by Acts of Parliament to run the railways on commercial lines. There is no Railway Act in force in any of the colonies which provides that railways are to be run on development lines. I have been astonished to hear the arguments used on that subject. If you search the Railway Acts of New South Wales, South Australia, or Victoria, you will not find one Act which provides that the commissioners are to run the railways on development lines; they are bound to run them on sound commercial principles.

Mr. REID. -

It is a sound commercial principle to develop traffic along the railway lines.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I should like my honorable chief to point out where the Railways Commissioners of New South Wales have ever offered to carry goods at a nominal rate simply to enable settler to take up land and promote settlement in New South Wales. They have always laid down this dictum: That they must fix a rate which will pay for the cost of carriage and leave some margin of profit. I can understand that where the railways are owned by the states only, and there is no controlling Act of Parliament, that it might pay the states to carry goods at a loss, and to make up that loss by imposing a charge upon the land; but the Railways Commissioners are bound in all the colonies to manage the railways on commercial lines. They may pay heed to the development of the territory, but that is not within the four corners of the Acts under which they work. I am sure that the competition going on between Victoria and New South Wales for the carriage of wool from the border and the return traffic in goods is a competition which takes away from the railways of both colonies their proper earnings; it diminishes the net returns of the railways of all the colonies, and the commissioners are thereby losing a large amount of legitimate revenue, and it really amounts to this, that the Government give with one hand to some of their producers, while they take away with the other hand from other producers. If, instead of carrying on this competition, we were able to develop the fertile territory of our colony by giving lower railway rates all over it, we should be conferring a benefit on all our producers. As I have said before, to give to Victoria and New South Wales the right of competing on their railways, to take traffic away from another colony, or to force that colony to retain its traffic by lowering its railway rates beyond commercial limits, is to deplete the revenue of one colony by the action of another, and to force the colony whose revenues are depleted to look around or some other source of income, either by increased railway rates elsewhere or by increased taxation. If this is occurring in the early infancy of Australian railway management, when we have comparatively few miles of railway constructed in proportion to our territory, what will it be 50 years hence, when we have so much more produce to carry and so many more miles of railway, with the competition growing keener day by day? We know there is a limit to customs duties, because they are burdensome to all who have to pay them, and there is a general complaint against them. But, as has been pointed out by Mr. Reid, so far as low rates are concerned, there is always a large section of the community who will benefit by them, and there will never be a universal outcry against them, because there is such a large section of the community who will benefit by their lowness. But, at the same time, the state will have to suffer a loss. We know in these colonies how easy it is for losses to be entailed because the Government has to hear them, the people forgetting that the Government only represents themselves, and that the losses have, in the end, to be made up out of their own pockets. It is hard to make the people remember this, but it is a fact, and one that will be made more and more patent as years go on. Now, I maintain that the difficulty is one that should not be argued as one that merely affects Victoria and New South Wales, because we have the same conflict going on already between Victoria and South Australia. We have it beginning between New South Wales and Queensland, and there can be no doubt that in a few years' time it will be going on also between Western Australia and South Australia. It is a conflict in which lower and lower rates will be charged, the public revenue being depleted in consequence, and there will be strife engendered between the various states concerned. I have made a great point I through this Convention in favour of the taking over of the railways by the Federation, but I recognise that it is impossible to carry a proposal of that kind at this juncture. I do not believe in going to that extreme, but if things are left as they are they will breed such discontent that the Federation will ultimately be forced to take over the railways. It will be better to minimize the evils that will result from not taking them over at present, and to insure that the railways will not be used as weapons of hostility on the part of one state towards another. The conflict will be intensified because of the removal of Border Duties. Any one who knows anything of the conditions prevailing in New South Wales is aware that nearly the whole of the trade of Riverina will be practically at the mercy of Victoria when Border Duties are removed. Geographically, Victoria is entitled to the greater portion of the Riverina trade. There will, under federation, be no barrier of custom-houses to prevent the flow of that trade to Victoria, and is it likely that Victoria will stand idly by and see New South Wales annexing that trade without some attempt on her part to retain it? If there has been a conflict in the past, it will be intensified when the custom-house barriers are removed, and then Victoria will have to strive to retain the Riverina trade wholly by reducing rates on Victorian lines. There will have to be a very, large reduction of rates by New South Wales if there is to be any retention by her of any portion of the Riverina trade. It will mean that the traffic of Riverina will have to be carried on by New South Wales at a dead loss, if she is to retain her share of it, or otherwise we shall have to hand over the whole of the Riverina, trade to Victoria, and that will mean that we shall have some hundreds of miles of our railways rendered absolutely useless and a valuable public asset destroyed. I am thoroughly in favour of allowing trade to flow in its natural channels, and believe that the natural channel of a large portion of the Riverina trade is to Victoria. But I am not in favour of any Constitution which will provide that we should ruthlessly destroy the public asset of any colony without paying compensation; and the only fair means of giving compensation to New South Wales or any other colony a portion of whose railways are practically destroyed in any given district by reason of opening trade to its natural channels will be for the Federal Government to take over these lines and manage them as a whole on sound commercial principles, free from the competitive influences which are all the keener on the part of states than of individuals, because states like to gain prestige and supremacy, and are willing to pay for it so long as their people will agree to bear the burden. The only means of allowing trade to flow freely in its natural channels, as far as railways are concerned, will be for the Government to take over those lines. There will be a loss, perhaps, on one line, but that will be compensated for by the increased flow of trade on another line, and the consequent increased profit. If we had these lines federalized, we should find that unproductive lines in Victoria would become remunerative and would, instead of paying 1 per cent., pay 3 per cent., or 4 per cent., or 5 per cent. Some lines in New South Wales might pay less than they paid previously, but the increased profits would more than counter-balance the losses sustained. I am surprised at any ardent federationist in this Convention wanting to federate in a half-hearted manner. When the United States Constitution was framed there were no such things as railways, and consequently there was no state ownership of railways. But I would undertake to say that, if there had been railways in existence, the wisdom of the framers of that Constitution would have provided that these great arteries of traffic should be made matters of federal concern. If there had been state railways in Canada, I feel sure that there would have been a provision in the Canadian Constitution which would have prevented any conflict by means of the federalization of the railways. We have an opportunity of overcoming this difficulty by means of an expedient which I am positive the people of Australia are prepared to adopt. But the difficulty we have to confront at present is that we allow the state to own railways, but want the Federal Government to have a hand in their management. Of course the difficulty is serious to contemplate, and hard to remove. I am not prepared to go to the extent of my honorable friend (Mr. Wise), and to say that there is no middle course. If we refuse to interfere with the management of the railways we shall jeopardize the passage of this Constitution, and it is only on the ground of expediency—that there should be some safeguard to satisfy those who see great losses staring us in the face without the adoption of some provision of this sort—it is only to satisfy the minds of those who think the loss will be too great for the various colonies to bear that I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the leader of the Convention. And, in giving my vote in that direction, I wish to intimate that I should infinitely prefer, even at this late stage of our proceedings, for the Convention to spend some time in retracing its steps, so as to undertake to federalize that which is almost as important in its effect as the Federal Government itself, namely, this great gigantic monopoly of railways. In Australia our railways are almost as great, if not quite as great, in their importance as our Crown lands. We consider that it is one of our most sacred obligations to develop our territory; but here we have an asset, increasing in value day by day, equal in value now to the whole of our public debts, equal almost in its value in many of the colonies to the whole of the Crown lands left in the hands of the state, and yet we are prepared to leave this great matter of Australian concern to state management. Freedom of trade does not consist merely in the removal of customs barriers. Duties do not constitute the sole impediments to free intercourse. You may have competition increased to such an extent by the diminution of railway rates as to create a barrier to the flow of trade in its natural course. These barriers can be created, not only by raising rates, but by reducing them. Have we not known goods to be carried by the wealthy railway companies of America practically for nothing, in order to destroy the natural flow of trade to other lines owned by men who could not afford to stand against this competition? I am not one of those who look at this question wholly from the merchants' standpoint. I do not believe that trade ought to go only to the man who has the longest pocket. I believe that it should flow along the lines which nature has provided for it. Anything that prevents it from flowing along those lines is an obstacle to it, and, as an obstacle, injures some one. Whilst the injury may fall upon that great milch cow, the State, and may not at first be very greatly felt, in the long run it must mean increased taxation and increased burdens upon the community, and the engendering for all time of a strife which will be as bitter and as keen as that which has been created by the customs barriers on our borders. Do we not know that the fiscal policy of Victoria has promoted strife between the colonies, though that policy is not nearly so much resented as the policy which creates warring railway rates? Complaints about these rates are heard from the far north right down to the south, and in Victoria as well as in New South Wales. Producers who do not happen to live near the border are taxed, in order that men living close to the border may be induced to send their produce along artificial lines. Whilst the proposal before the Convention will, to some extent injure Victoria, but because I think no loss should be entailed upon a state without compensation, and no compensation is proposed for the loss which New South Wales must suffer if some safeguard is not provided. I should, however, prefer to see a policy adopted which will not inflict loss upon any one. Let the whole of the paying and non-paying railways of all the colonies, together with the public debt, be taken over by the federal authority, and they will prove instrumental in building up the prosperity of the people. But they must be under the control of one power. If they are under six or seven authorities, instead of being instrumental in creating prosperity, they will be weapons for destroying the best influences upon national life in the future.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

As one who advocated the federalizing of the railways when speaking at public meetings in New South Wales before the elections, I shall be consistent in supporting the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton), and the proposal to establish an Inter-State Commission. It seemed to me that the last speech was admirable in its tone, and the best federal speech we have had to-day. There has been such a tone of provincialism prevailing the speeches of honorable members of late that I began to wonder whether we were an anti-federal meeting, or a Federal Convention. I had the honour to consult the late Mr. Eddy upon the subject of the federalizing of the railways, and he assured me that he considered that federal man without the federalizing of the railways was not worth having, and that to abolish intercolonial custom-houses, while still keeping up differential railway rates, was to take away with one hand what you gave with the other. My honorable an learned friend (Mr. Wise) is perhaps the ablest exponent in New South Wales of the advantages of federalizing the railway. I give him credit for being an ardent federationist, but he appears to wish to gain ends by a peculiar process. It appears to be his desire to make things so intolerable that they must be rectified, and he then hopes to see his views carried into effect. The position reminds one very much of the case of a man suffering from incipient blindness by reason of cataract, who has to wait until his sight is totally gone before an operation for its restoration can take place. I hope, however, that that is not the process which honorable members want us to put into practice now, and that, on the contrary, we shall grapple with the difficulty at once. It is somewhat discouraging to find that an expert like the honorable member (Mr. Grant) takes the other view, but I know that at heart he also wishes that the railways may in time be taken over by the Commonwealth.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

They will be taken over in time.

Mr. WALKER. -

Yes. Speaking from our experience in New South Wales, there are two kinds of federationists. There are those who wish to put as little as possible under the federal control. These gentlemen call themselves "prudent" federationists, but some of us think that they are anti-federationists. There is another section, and to it I am pleased to belong, the members of which desire to strengthen the Federation, so long as there is no derogation from state powers, in matters affecting land legislation, education, trade, licensing, local government, European immigration, and so on. I shall support what I believe to be genuine federal principles. I regret that one of the speakers saw fit to impute motives to an honorable member who differed from him. I do not think we ought to do anything like that. Being conscious of our own motives a honorable and thorough federationists, we should give credit to those who differ from us for similar honesty of purpose.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I had hoped to have heard something more from our friends from Victoria in regard to this matter.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

They are not supporting the honorable member (Mr. Higgins).

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; but the debate is taking a general character, and it will be useful to have the views of some of our honorable friends opposite, so that we may know what they require, and what their opinions are upon these matters. Although I am loath to continue the line of New South Wales speakers, I think it just as well that I should state what I have to say at this stage. I hope honorable members will follow the very wise advice given by the honorable member (Mr. Grant) in the early part of the debate. The point that is now left for decision is really a comparatively small one, and I think it of very little advantage to go into the question whether New South Wales or Victoria is to blame for the existing state of things, and whether it is desirable or undesirable in the abstract to do away with differential rates. Since our meetings in Adelaide I have altered my views-and I think other representatives have done the same-upon the general bearing of this question. I should have been very glad if some method could have been devised by which the necessity for imposing differential rates could have been obviated, and I should have been quite willing now to fall in with the views which suggest some provision such as that implied in the clause now under discussion, but I see an insuperable difficulty in the way of any enactment of that kind. It would, it is true, stop the working of the preferential rate in Victoria, and it would stop the working, also, of the preferential rate strictly so called in New South Wales, but it would leave New South Wales in this position—that by reason of the paring off of the differential rates of New South Wales, the whole effect of a preferential rate might be given to the working of her railways. I can see, therefore, the justice of what has been pointed out by our honorable friends from Victoria, that by passing a clause which prohibits preferential rates only you would put Victoria in the position of losing all the advantages of the present condition of things, and, at the same time, leave New South Wales practically in the possession of those same advantages. Although, theoretically, I should like to see some such provision as I have indicated carried, I recognise the justice of the protest made by the representatives of Victoria. I could not expect them to fall in with our views. Now, the other alternative is the one which has been proposed by my honorable friend in his amendment. That involves, according to the honorable member's reading of the amendment, the handing over to the Inter-State Commission of the power of saying, with regard to any rate on a New South Wales railway, that it is not a differential rate or a development rate merely, but that it is a preferential rate. Unless you lay down some definite clear principle in the Constitution, which would be a guide to the Inter-State Commission in deciding a question of that kind, I do not see how you can hand over to them the power of determining such questions without giving them a very dangerous jurisdiction, and one in respect of which it would be impossible to say in what direction it would be exercised.

Mr. GORDON. -

The amendment contains the principle.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, that does not help us in any way. The difficulty is this-if you constitute an Inter-State Commission, and say that that commission shall carry out the provisions of the Constitution on the railways of the Commonwealth, without giving them any further guide than that furnished by the clause now under discussion, you leave it practically open to them to say in any case how the operations of trade are being affected by a rate. If the operations of trade are being affected in such a way that business, even from New South Wales, is being drawn to Sydney rather than being allowed to go to Melbourne, they would have the power to say that the rate should be prohibited.

Mr. GORDON. -

Not unless the rate is made with a view to attracting traffic.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The mere intention with which a rate is imposed is a matter that the Inter-State Commission could not and would not consider. If the rate had the effect of drawing away any portion of the trade of New South Wales to Sydney that would otherwise have gone to Melbourne, the Inter-State Commission would come to the conclusion that, whatever the expressed intention was, the intention must be gathered from the effect of the rate. If it does not mean that it means nothing. I should be very sorry to see any provision put into this Constitution which my honorable friends from Victoria would construe one way in their favour, and which we would construe another way in our favour. I would very much rather see the meaning of the thing settled definitely here, so that we would know what we are about. Mr. Higgins' amendment does not lay down any definite line upon which it would be safe to leave it to the Inter-State Commission to form a judgment with regard to the rates on the New South Wales railways. The words used by my honorable friend are-"Rates having the effect of derogating from freedom of trade and commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth, or with the view of attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another state." If that is to be construed having regard to the effect of the rate, then I say that it is an interference which we could not possibly submit to under present circumstances.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The first part only relates to Commonwealth legislation.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes; but I am not dealing with that just now. I say that if the meaning of it is that the intention is to be judged by the effect, then that is an interference which, under all the circumstances, we could not possibly submit to. If, on the other hand, the intention simply is to be considered, then it is useless for my honorable friend's purpose. If we make a development rate for the purpose of aiding the settlers upon our own lands, and we make a development rate which we can well afford to charge with reference to a particular kind of produce, that rate may be a competing rate of a most efficacious character against Victoria. If it was not imposed with a view of attracting our own trade from the ports of Victoria, it would not come under the prohibition. That is not what the honorable member intends. He desires to give a power to the Inter-State Commission to say with regard to any of the rates on the New South Wales railways-"These are rates which we cannot allow, because they interfere with the free course of trade by attracting trade to one port of the Commonwealth as against another." I do not want to repeat what has been so well said by my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) and by my honorable friends (Mr. Lyne and Mr. Wise) before me. There is no halfway house in this matter. Mr. Higgins wants to get all the advantages of federal ownership of the railways without the disadvantages and the responsibility of the cost of their working. We cannot allow that to be.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We cannot either.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No. And it appears to me when we come to look at this matter in the plain business-like way in which it is our duty to regard it, we must come to the conclusion that in leaving the railways as they are at the present time, in the hands of the states, we cannot without mischief and loss both to Victoria and New South Wales make any provision which will give any authority a right to interfere with the making of these rates. It is no doubt an unpleasant conclusion to come to, but it is a conclusion which, under all the circumstances, is I think inevitable. What else is left? It is proposed by Mr. Wise that things should be left as they are, and I am now inclined to take the view that that is really the only way out of the difficulty at the present time—to leave each railway system exactly the same power as it has at present, subject to the general control over trade and commerce which is given in the first sub-section of clause 52 of this Constitution. To what extent that may go I will point out in a moment, but it does appear to me that the only way out of this difficulty is to abstain from putting in the Constitution any directions as to rates—to abstain from putting in the Constitution any directions which will in any way affect the fixing of rates or the competition between these railway systems, and to confine ourselves to the simplest function of a Federal Government in regard to the course of trade. Now, what is that? The one thing which is necessary for the free intercourse of trade between the states is that there should be no obstruction to trade between states, not that trade should be made easier between states, whoever has to pay for that result, but that there should be no obstruction to trade between states. Let me give an illustration of what I mean, and, of course, I am putting the illustration only as an extreme case. Do not let it be assumed for a moment that I think it will be carried out. Victoria has a stock tax the Victorian railways are under Government control; the stock tax is abolished but it would be quite easy to put on a system of rates against New South Wales stock which would have exactly the same effect, in so far as stock are carried by rail, as the stock tax had.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We do not for a moment desire anything of the kind.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I only put that as an illustration, and I guarded myself by saying that I did not suppose that such a thing would ever be done. I am showing the length to which I think the interference of the Commonwealth should go, and the limits of that interference. There must be some power in the Commonwealth to prevent anything of that kind from being done. Exactly in the same way there ought to be some power in the Commonwealth to prevent New South Wales from putting a rate on her railways against produce of any kind coming from Victoria. Anything of the kind which would operate against the free passage of trade from one part of the Commonwealth to the other, there ought to be a power in the Commonwealth to stop and regulate. But, short of that, it appears to me that any interference with the course of trade, with the competition between these railway systems, would be, at the present time, not only mischievous, but might lead to consequences which we cannot even anticipate with any clearness. That power, I say, is contained in the Constitution as it is at present; it is amply provided for in sub-section (I) of clause 52, because if the power to regulate trade and commerce means anything, surely it means this: That, inasmuch as one of the principal advantages, and the great business basis which binds the colonies together and is a reason for their union, is that trade and intercourse of every kind shall be absolutely free, you do not interfere with that freedom by cutting down rates. That is simply a matter for the authority which runs the railway, and the people who have to pay for it to consider.

Mr. ISAACS. -

To facilitate the freedom of trade.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Of course you might facilitate it; as a matter of fact, business is facilitated to those who live within the competitive area. But when you get beyond that, when you get to the question how any prohibition is to be insisted on, then, I contend, you must leave that to the general powers which are exercisable under the trade and commerce clauses. We are not without authority on this question. In the United States the sole foundation of the Inter-State Commerce Act is the trade and commerce clauses of the Constitution. They are not founded on any such provision as that which we are discussing here, but are founded simply on a right which is inherent—the right to regulate trade and commerce—in the Constitution. I hope the committee will excuse me if I read a statement which shows how that right flows from the principle of the control and regulation of commerce, and which is put in very much better language than I can command. From Dos Passos' book on the Inter-State Commerce Act, I am going to quote the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Wabash, St. Louis, and Pacific Railway Company against The State of Illinois. Mr. Justice Miller says—

It cannot be too strongly insisted upon that the right of continuous transportation from one end of the country to the other is essential in modern times to that freedom of commerce from the restraints which the state might choose to impose upon it that the commerce clause was intended to secure. This clause, giving to Congress the power to regulate commerce among the states and with foreign nations, as this court has said before, was among the most important of the subjects which prompted the formation of the Constitution. And it would be a very feeble and almost useless provision, but poorly adapted to secure the entire freedom of commerce among the states, which was deemed essential to a more perfect union by the framers of the Constitution, if at every stage of the transportation of goods and chattels through the country the state within whose limits a part of this transportation must be done could impose regulations concerning the price, compensation, or taxation, or any other restrictive regulation interfering with and seriously embarrassing this commerce. . . . As restricted to a transportation which begins and ends within the limits of the state, it (the law of Illinois) may be very just and equitable, and it certainly is the province of the state Legislature to determine that question. But when it is attempted to apply to transportation through an entire series of states a principle of this kind, and each one of the states shall attempt to establish its own rates of transportation, its own methods to prevent discrimination in rates or to permit it, the deleterious influence upon the freedom of commerce among the states upon the transit of goods through those states cannot be over-estimated.

Now, that is the principle, and it appears to me to be one which flows directly and immediately from the basic principle of this Constitution itself. Now, I have said that there is abundant power in the inter-state commerce clause to control commerce.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Without this clause at all?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Without this clause at all, and I was coming to that presently.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are agreed with you so far.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Without the latter part of it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Without the latter part of the clause; but before I come to deal with the clause, I would like to refer to something which my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) said in his very acute analysis of clause 95. The honorable member very truly said that the object of this clause is not to interfere with methods to make the trade easier, or to make opportunity of trade better in one state than another, so long as that is not done in such a way as to be a deliberate obstruction to trade. I quite agree with the honorable member that if Victoria, in the management of her wharfage system, saw that she could impose charges and rates of such a character as to make her port attractive, there is no reason why she should not do it. In the same way, if New South Wales found herself able to impose light shipping dues and wharfage rates, I do not see any reason why she should not do so. But there should be a power somewhere in the Commonwealth to prevent Victoria or New South Wales from imposing special kinds of charges or rates on any one kind of produce coming from any one colony, and any charge of that kind which would have an obstructive effect on the trade of any portion of the Commonwealth should be prevented, and would be prevented under these inter-state commerce clauses. That is the reason why it seems to me that these clauses, interpreted as they would be in the broadest way, and the way most beneficial to freedom of commerce through the states, should be preserved exactly as they are. I come now to the question of this clause; not the clause as it is proposed to be amended by my learned friend (Mr. Barton), but the clause as it is. As it is, it contains two parts.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - Which are separate sections in the American Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. - And in the 1891 Bill.

Mr. BARTON. - They were put into this Bill in Adelaide.

Mr. OCONNOR. - They were separate in the 1891 Bill, and, as my learned friend reminds me, they were put into this Bill in Adelaide. The first part of the clause simply provides that a-Preference shall not be given by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over the ports of another state.

Mr. ISAACS. - It was originally introduced in America to guard state rights.

Mr. OCONNOR. - Exactly. I think it is a very good thing that some such provision should be inserted here. Because there are a number of powers in the Constitution which will be administered by the Commonwealth, and which might possibly be administered to the detriment of one state, or to the advantage of one state over another. For instance, regarding the postal and telegraphic services, regarding navigation and shipping, regarding ocean beacons, buoys, and light-houses, and so on, it would be in the power of the Commonwealth to regulate all these things, and to put charges upon shipping in regard to all these things.

Mr. BARTON. - With the sub-sections in.

Mr. OCONNOR. - Yes, under the sub-sections it would certainly be in their power to do that, and, without any intention, the outcome of the operation of this power might be to favour one port over another in the making of these regulations. I think it quite right that there should be in the Constitution a power to declare null and void any such regulation. Therefore, it appears to me that the first portion of the clause might very well stand.
Mr. BARTON. -

But why do you want to limit the first portion of the clause to the ports?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Well, the first portion of clause 95 is limited to the ports in the amendment, but there is really no reason why the ports should be considered solely, because you may have advantage given to one place in a state over another place in another state, neither of those places being ports. That might be done by regulations of trade, or by dealing with the telegraph or postal systems, or in a variety of ways. However, that is a matter which no doubt my learned friend will deal with. Coming to the second portion of the clause, it simply declares that there shall be no derogation from freedom of trade or commerce. Now, what does that mean? I must confess that it is one of those dangerous generalities which we ought to be very much afraid of putting into this Constitution. We ought not to have anything in the Constitution without its reason, and, unless there is some special reason for putting ill these general words, I do not think they ought to be in the Constitution. But, if they refer simply to the prohibition against the imposition of customs duties or charges of any kind that will interfere with the freedom of trade, that is already provided for in clause 89, and if they mean anything else, that something else ought to be stated more definitely. It appears to me therefore, so far as the latter portion of the clause is concerned, that, inasmuch as it is simply an attempt to carry out what most of us think is impossible—that is, to deal with this question of differential rates and yet leave the railways in the hands of their present ownership—there is no reason for the insertion of this provision, and it might as well disappear from the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -

You are speaking of differential rates.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Of course I am speaking of differential rates. With regard to the Inter-State Commission, my mind has fluctuated very much on that question, but I feel disposed to adhere to the view which I put forward in Sydney when this matter was being discussed, and it is this: That all the power which we require to be exercised by the Inter-State Commission can be exercised by an Inter-State Commission appointed under the power of regulating trade and commerce—that under the power to regulate trade and commerce there is ample power to appoint a tribunal or body for the purpose of carrying that into effect. And it appears to me that the danger of putting a clause of this kind as the Constitution, although it is only a permissive provision, is this, that once you establish the notion that you may create this official body there will probably be a clamour to have it appointed, and if you once appoint a body of that kind you may rest well assured that it will be a very live body; that it will be always looking out for something to do, and that, unless you have its sphere of interference and its duties confined within narrow and definite lines, it may possibly be a body that may do more harm than good. On the other hand, if you leave it to the Parliament of the Commonwealth to appoint this Inter-State Commission, it will appoint the commission as part of a species of general legislation dealing with the whole question of inter-state connexion, and, dealing with the question in that comprehensive way, it will, at the same time, probably lay down the duties and principles on which that body is to act.

Mr. REID. -

They need not appoint the commission until a real necessity arises.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Quite so; and I have very little doubt but that the operation of these conflicting railway systems, when once we are federated, will be to show more clearly than ever the advisability of handing over, perhaps, first the trunk lines, or first some portions of those railway lines, and then other portions of the lines, but gradually approaching the handing over to some kind of federal control these main lines of railway. Now, there is, in the provision of a permissive clause-clause 52-abundant power to do that, and I think it is very likely that, when the Commonwealth is brought face to face with the difficulties of managing these different systems of railways, in the intercourse of trade and commerce between the states, it will very likely be found that the solution of the difficulty may be in the direction of handing over some portions of these railway systems, very shortly after the Federation is established, rather than in the appointing of an Inter-State Commission with the functions and the large powers it must have if it is to be of any use at all, and which, if it is once established, may possibly be an obstruction rather than an aid to anything like the handing over of the railways to the general federal control. I have been against the handing over of the railways to the general federal control, simply because I see the impossibility of its being carried out at the present time, and because of the impossibility of forecasting, in any way, how these railways are going to work under the altered conditions under which we are to live when federation is established; but when those altered conditions, by our experience under the Commonwealth, have become fixed, when we know how the operation of trade and commerce and trade facts will bear on the new state of things, then we will be in a position to deal much more comprehensively and much more satisfactorily with this problem of railway management than we can possibly do now. Therefore, my suggestion would be to retain so much of clause 95, whether in the amended form suggested by Mr. Barton or in its present form, as deals only with the imposition of regulations relating to trade, commerce, and revenue by the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Make it clear that the clause refers only to that.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, and leave the creation of the Inter-State Commission to the general powers of the Commonwealth. In that way we shall solve the question in what appears to me the simplest way in which, in the light of the facts now before us, it can be solved.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Do I understand the honorable member to move any amendment?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, I have not moved any amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would it not be well for Mr. O'Connor to move an amendment in the first line, in order to make sure that it is the Commonwealth?

Mr. BARTON. -

If Mr. O'Connor's idea is carried out it is not necessary to make it sure that it is the Commonwealth, because, as it reads, it means the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think so, but others have doubts.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

This question is a very important one. At the same time, the sense of its importance seems somewhat to have been lost since we first faced it in Adelaide. It was Mr. O'Connor, I think, who suggested the appointment of an Inter-State Commission to deal with the railway question. It was then felt, and expressed by very many members of the Convention, that it would be of little use to remove the border customs duties if we still allowed preferential rates on the railways to accomplish, practically, the same purpose that those duties had in the past accomplished. Today we seem to have become, somehow, reconciled to those railway preferential rates. We seem to have accepted the position that they are inevitable, and that we must put up with them for an indefinite time. That means we are gradually frittering away the benefits of the Federal Constitution. Presently we shall have a Constitution, federal in name, but which will give us nothing but the husks, because the wheat will all be gone. I am not prepared to follow the lead of Mr. Wise and accept as our remedy this condition, which, to my mind, is most unsatisfactory in connexion with our railway system. That honorable members may have their memories revived, and may see just what the position is, I desire to quote a few figures from the proceedings of the Convention held in Sydney. Papers were there laid on the table containing the evidence given before the Finance Committee in Adelaide by the Railways Commissioners. I will first quote Mr. Eddy. On page 2, that gentleman gives evidence as to the price of carrying truck loads of wheat over certain distances. He says there-

The rate for 200 miles, at per ton, in 6-ton truck loads, is 11s. 4d.; for 300 miles the rate is 12s. 4d.; for 400 miles the rate is 13s. 4d.; and for 500 miles, 14s.

It will be seen from this that 6 tons of goods are carried for 8d. per ton over the last 100 miles of the 500, and I ask honorable members who know anything about the matter, whether it is not absolutely clear that those goods are carried over that last 100 miles at a loss?

Mr. FRASER. -

Not if the country is level.

Mr. HOLDER. -

It may be down hill all the way, and still the goods are carried at a loss.

Mr. FRASER. -

Goods are carried on a private railway across the Murray at a less rate than that.

Mr. WISE. -

At a loss to whom?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I will come to that in a moment. If Mr. Fraser will make a simple calculation, he will find it is impossible to carry 6 tons of goods 100 miles for 8d. per ton.

Mr. FRASER. -

I thought you said 8s.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am quite certain it could not be done. It might be done for 8s., we are told, and that shows the extent of the loss. It is now done for 8d.

Mr. FRASER. -

I would like that confirmed.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Here it is in Mr. Eddy's evidence. Details are given, and also the mode by which his calculations were arrived at. The figures must be absolutely accurate.
Mr. REID. -

Mr. Eddy said he never carried a ton at a loss.

Mr. HOLDER. -

He never said that.

Mr. REID. -

I understand he said so.

Mr. HOLDER. -

No, he did not. What be said was that he did no business at a loss. He said that if the last 100 miles did not pay, the whole 500 miles did.

Mr. REID. -

That is the way to look at it. You must not take the tail end, but take it as a whole.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That interjection will not divert me from my point, because it will rather help me than otherwise. Mr. Wise asks me to whom it is a loss. I reply that it is a loss to the revenue of Australia. If 11s. 4d. be, as I suppose it is, a fair rate for the first 200 miles, and if the rate for the next hundred miles is unfairly low, then the railway is entitled for the work it does to a much larger revenue than 14s. for a 6 ton load over 500 miles. I begin by making it clear that there are railways in Australia which are carrying goods at a much lower rate than is a fair one, and a lower rate than the railways ought to be able to charge. The reason why this unfairly low rate is tolerated in New South Wales is because in Victoria and South Australia there are rates which are also too low. New South Wales is compelled to carry goods at a rate which will not pay simply because, unless she does that, she cannot get trade for which the other two, colonies are strongly competing. There is ample justification for the interjection by the Hon. Mr. Howe that those rates are cut-throat rates—that we are cutting each others throats. South Australia is making New South Wales and Victoria lose money, and Victoria and New South Wales are making South Australia lose money. Each colony is making the others lose money which might fairly be obtained for services rendered. Mr. Eddy was an expert of the highest worth. If he were here to-day, he would give us the benefit of his knowledge, and assist us very materially in deciding this important matter. I, therefore, make no apology for quoting at some little length some remarks of Mr. Eddy on the same page. Mr. McMillan, who was the chairman of the committee on that occasion, asked—

Would you be willing to leave the question as to what extent it is a preferential or a differential rate between the different states to a commission to be appointed?
Mr. EDDY. - You will find it will be absolutely necessary to do that. It would be impossible for a body like this, engaged in the drafting of a Constitution, to go into so much detail as to be able to indicate, even in a small degree, the lines on which the commission that they would create to carry out certain functions for them should go.

The CHAIRMAN. - Personally, as the chief railway administrator of New South Wales, that is your view?

Mr. EDDY. - Yes; with certain safeguards, viz., the absolute prohibition of preferential rates between the traffic of adjoining colonies, the creation of a strong commission, free from influence, to see that the spirit of the Constitution is carried out, the commission to be of such a nature that it would carry the confidence of all the states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That would let each colony do what it liked within its own borders. That is what he wanted.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I know what Mr. Eddy wanted.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is in reference to traffic which begins and ends in the state.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Mr. Eddy took a different position from the other two Railways Commissioners - very much the same position that Mr. Reid took the other morning - that every state should be free, in its own borders, to do just what it liked. At the same time, I will quote Mr. Eddy to show that even he, who did not quite believe in that kind of thing, wished to limit that liberty, which he first claimed the state should have. Mr. Eddy said-

I think that the commission would have to deal with the question somewhat in this spirit; that the main principle to animate the policy of rate-fixing to be that all traffic originating in adjoining states should be carried over the railways of other states at rates entirely in harmony with the rates applicable to all traffic of a like character for like distances in such states - that is to say, that any traffic originating at any place in an adjoining colony must pay, when passing over the lines of another state, exactly the same rates as are paid by the people of that state. There ought to be no difference. Whether the traffic has come from A, B, C, or D, it must always pay the same uniform rate in passing over the railway line.

I entirely agree with that sentiment, and I am about to point out that entire agreement with such a sentiment would require a limitation of a very different character from that contemplated by one or two of the interjections made just now. At page 91, Mr. Mathieson says -

He has three rates - one for Bourke proper, 1.90; one for the other side of the river, 1.60; and another that takes him 100 miles into Queensland territory, 1.29.

It will thus be seen that goods landed at Bourke, and placed upon the rails there, are charged three different rates, according to where they come from. They are charged the highest rate when they come from the east side of the river. Then, when they come from districts where they might be conveyed on barges, they are charged another rate, and, on the other hand, if they come from 100 miles across the Queensland border, the lowest rate is charged, so that the principle Mr. Eddy contended for was not enforced in New South Wales.

Mr. FRASER. -

Nor on the other railways of Australia.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I will come to that. I would point out to those honorable members who cheered the remark, that no matter where the goods came from, a uniform rate should be charged, that here is one step we should take to secure that principle. We ought to prohibit the charging of preferential rates-rates which induce certain persons to send their trade to Sydney when they live across the river, when the same rates are not conceded to persons living close to Bourke, but who live on the eastern side of the River Darling, so that there is a weak place even in actual experience, which equity demands we should make strong, and which justice demands we should right. It was pointed out this morning with some emphasis by the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) that there was no barrier to traffic in any of these arrangements; but I point out that there is clearly a barrier here. The natural flow of that traffic for 100 miles on the other side of the Queensland border would be, politically, to Brisbane or to some other port of Queensland, but these preferential rates of New South Wales act as a barrier to the natural political flow of that traffic, and divert it to New South Wales. The natural flow of the traffic on the western side of the Darling would be to South Australia, but the preferential rates of New South Wales form a barrier to the natural flow of that traffic, and force it to Sydney. It is these barriers to the natural flow of traffic which, in my mind, are the great reasons for the adoption of some such provision as we are now debating. I could give another quotation from the evidence, only I do not like to weary honorable members, which refers to goods sent from Cootamundra to Albury. The natural flow of traffic would be from Cootamundra southwards to Melbourne. In all probability, for most classes of goods, if there were no barriers, the natural flow of trade would be from Cootamundra, via Albury to Melbourne, but a very high rate is charged to Albury from Cootamundra. If the goods are going to Sydney, a much lower rate is charged than if the goods are carried over the same rails in the same trucks and over the same line, and they are not going to Sydney but to Melbourne. Where is the justice of that? The extraordinary difference in the rates charged must be for the same reason, that they divert the traffic from the course which it would naturally follow, in order to benefit Sydney. I ask now, in this connexion, what is the good of saying-"We must insure absolute freedom of trade and intercourse between all parts of the Commonwealth so that there shall be no custom-house barriers to this freedom of trade, that it shall flow freely in every direction, and so that every man shall do his business just as he pleases-what is the good of saving this concerning all other things if we leave the railways, the most important factor in dealing with all matters of trade, to be so managed and to have their tariffs so arranged that this freedom of trade is absolutely destroyed?"

Mr. FRASER. -

The only way is to pool the railways.

Mr. HOLDER. -

My answer to that is that I have been driven more closely to the federalization of the railways by the debate to-day than I have ever been before.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is the solution of the question.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLDER. -

In the past, I have not been able to see the absolute necessity for it. I have always thought before that it must be possible for a body of men, such as we are, to frame a clause under which a fair regulation of the railway rates might be secured. But if it be impossible, certainly the way out of the difficulty is to federalize the railways, which I have hitherto opposed, on the ground that there are financial difficulties of a somewhat serious character. But we may overcome these by calculations and apportionment of cost.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
If that were done we could not carry federation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There are worse difficulties than these. The development of the country is our great difficulty.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I have two interjections to deal with; one says we cannot carry federation if we pool the railways. Possibly that is the case. Then Sir George Turner says that you cannot separate the railways from the development of our territory, and I believe it is because you cannot readily make that separation that we might not get federation accepted by the people if we federalize the railways.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I would go with you if you could get over that difficulty.

Mr. HOLDER. -

There are railways that might be put under the control of the Federation. We might do that with railways where they are carrying through traffic, and all railways which run from capital to capital, or branches of those railways. At any rate, if it be admittedly impossible to frame regulations and to lay down principles for the fair adjustment of this railway traffic, we shall, all of us, I think, be driven to support the federalization of the railways; but I am not going there at present. I refuse to believe that the Convention is unable to draft words which will cover what we wish to cover, and which will at the same time exclude undue limitations of the rights of the states. The right of ownership is very powerful, and it is a right which no one would wish to diminish in the slightest degree. While the states own the railways they must have authority with reference to the earning power and the methods by which that power is maintained. But I say to Mr. Reid, who made a strong point of this in the morning, that this provision against these cut-throat railway rates is one of the best means of increasing the value of the railways to the states themselves. In this connexion, I come to some other papers laid before this Convention. In January, 1895-I think that was the month, but I am not sure; at all events, in the beginning of 1895-the railway experts of New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia (and, I think, also Queensland), met in Melbourne, and discussed the whole matter of railway freights and charges, and they saw that great loss had resulted to the Railway departments of the different colonies through these cut-throat rates. I had marked a number of passages to read to the Convention from the evidence given before that meeting of experts, which passages would have enabled us to measure the loss to the railways sustained in consequence of these rates, but I know how wearying it is for honorable members to listen to figures. In some cases the evidence shows that discounts amounting to 61 per cent., and even to 66 per cent., are given, and the commissioners there represented came to the conclusion that if a fair agreement were arrived at these tremendous discounts would be at once discontinued. I will quote a passage from the report of the South Australian Railways Commissioner to the South Australian Government, dated 10th October, 1894. The words are valuable, as being by a railway expert whose knowledge and reputation fully justify me in quoting his remarks.

Mr. REID. -
Is that with regard to the 1895 agreement?

Mr. HOLDER. -
The report is dated 10th October, 1894, at the time when the negotiations for the meeting of commissioners were going on. Mr. Pendleton says-

During the past year attention has been directed to the attempts which have been made from time to time, and in various districts, to divert traffic from its legitimate channels to other routes through the adoption of special rates. We have been extremely loath to enter upon what has been described as a "war of tariffs;" but at the same time we have felt it to be our duty to take such measures, and put in force such a scale of rates, as would secure to this colony its proper traffic which would otherwise have been diverted to competing routes. Such a condition of affairs is, however, as undesirable in the interests of the freighter as it is of the different railway administrations involved. Competition must sooner or later end in combination, an we hold to the opinion that the proper course to adopt is for the respective authorities to enter into an agreement, in the first place as to the rates from competing districts, which should be upon a fair and equitable basis, both as regards the freight and the railways, and, in the second place, as to the division of the receipts, no matter by what route the traffic may be conveyed.

In other countries where competition is keener than in Australia, and where the position of the competing railways is much more complicated, such a course was, after a protracted struggle, found to be absolutely necessary, and the only solution of the difficulty if ruin were to be averted.

Those are strong words, and they are as applicable to-day as they were in 1894. I echo the last of those words-"if ruin is to be averted." I am not speaking for one railway system alone. I am speaking for all. "If ruin is to be averted," and the earning powers of the railway systems are not to be seriously diminished if not destroyed, some agreement is urgently necessary. What are we trying to do to-day? We are trying to put into the four corners of this Constitution the basis on which some agreement can be arrived at, and surely, I say again, we have the ability in this body, which includes within its ranks 26 lawyers, to frame some suitable words-

Mr. HOWE. -

We have 29 lawyers here.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Still more then is it reasonable to hope that we shall be able to frame a form of words which will prevent this ruinous competition, and enable the railways to earn what they are entitled to earn in the shape of revenue, at the same time doing justice to the freighter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And to the commercial community as well, because it is well known that that is the trouble. The railway authorities would be able to come to an agreement at once if it were not for the commercial influence behind which prevents them doing so.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I admit that, but I would point out that, given certain conditions, we should abolish those discount amounting to 61 per cent. and 66 per cent., and arrive at some basis of understanding whereby the ports of Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, and Adelaide would be relatively in the same condition as to advantage of trade as they are in today.

Mr. FRASER. -

Then the rivers will get the traffic. We should not get the traffic if we abolish the discounts.

Mr. ISAACS. -

This is what Mr. Holder is after.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I admit that I should not be sorry to see that, nor, of course did I lose sight of that point of view.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is the trouble. The cataract in another man's eye blinds the honorable member to the river in his own.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That argument has no force at all with me, because, while it is important for South Australia that the river trade should come to her, it is still more important that her railways, in which she has invested £12,000,000 sterling, should make a good profit. We have a railway revenue of over £1,000,000 a year, and it is of much more direct importance to the South Australian Treasurer that the South Australian railways should be managed at a profit than that the trade should come down the river. I again, therefore, urge the absolute necessity for some arrangement being made between these states so as to secure a fair return on the traffic over the railways, even in competition with the river itself. But what is going on now? A low charge is necessitated by river competition, necessitated by unfair-together unfair-intercolonial railway competition; and while I am not willing to leave out of the account the river competition, I do say that it should be possible for the parties concerned to agree to discontinue these undue discounts and other concessions on our railways so as to be able to get what our railways fairly earn; and if we did that there would probably be no loss either to the railways or to the freighters concerned nor would any undue advantage be given to them. Freighters would probably have to pay a little more than they do now and to send more to their own ports than they do now.

Mr. FRASER. -

Some wool at present comes from Bourke to Echuca.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I know.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Have you any figures showing the loss by each colony by these cut-throat rates?

Mr. HOLDER. -

No, and I think it would be impossible to work out such figures.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

They have been given.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I have marked some passages on the subject, but I do not like to detain the committee so long. Honorable members will find some very startling figures in the evidence given by Mr. Mathieson in Adelaide. What has been done in America and other parts of the world should be done in these colonies. In 1895, as I have said before, the commissioners of the various colonies met. They were men with a complete knowledge of local conditions and of railway management, men interested in making these systems earn as much as they possibly can, and eager to see that their own railway systems did not suffer in any arrangement arrived at with regard to other railway systems. They agreed upon a scheme of combination by which these ruinous cut-throat rates would be abolished.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The agreement was admittedly satisfactory only from a railway point of view.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am coming to that. I would now say a few words as to what Mr. Reid said this morning. What we all want is that the railways shall be managed as if they were large commercial undertakings, but at the same time we do not want our railways to be managed as political engines for the benefit of some state as against others.

Mr. REID. -

I quite agree with you there.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Very well. Now then I come to the point on which the right honorable gentleman says he agrees with me. He agrees that our railway systems should be managed as if they were large commercial enterprises. What are the facts? If they are to be so managed, the railway experts who met in Melbourne, and who, as the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) says, viewed the matter purely from a railway standpoint, made recommendations which ought to be accepted. From a purely railway standpoint-excluding the political standpoint-their agreement was the right one to arrive at, and I do not hesitate to say to-day that the right thing to do is to leave the political aspect out of consideration, and to deal with the railways as if they were purely commercial enterprises. Under these circumstances, it would not take the Railways Commissioners three weeks to thrash out the matter and to bring up a satisfactory agreement under which losses would be prevented in the future.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does the honorable member treat the railways as a commercial enterprise, entirely separate from all the other enterprises of the state?

Mr. HOLDER. -

There is only one point in respect to which the railways must be regarded upon political considerations, that is, so far as they affect the development of territory. A state to develop her territory might be justified in constructing a railway long before there was sufficient traffic to make it pay; but the traffic ultimately created would be to the great benefit of that state.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is a commercial principle.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes; because the enterprise might in the long run return a very good profit. But I do not believe in using the railways to promote the good of one state at the expense of another. I have heard the federal idea expressed more eloquently than I can express it by every Premier in Australasia in after-dinner speeches, and surely it is this, that the gain of one state is the gain of all. We ought not, after federation comes about, to seek the good of one state at the expense of all the rest, or of any of the rest.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If you wipe out all the divisional lines I am with you, but that is what you will not do.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not think the right honorable gentleman and his colony have in the past gained by these preferential rates. While Victoria has fought bravely and undauntedly, she has lost as much as any other state.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The Railways Commissioner says that it would be a terrible loss to Victoria if we abandoned the system now.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If the alteration were made upon fair lines I do not think that the agreement arrived at in 1895 would show any serious loss to Victoria. I think that the largely increased revenue which will be caused by the abolition of these tremendous discounts would more than make up for any slight diversion of trade. That is how I have been advised by the railway experts in South Australia when I have consulted them upon these and similar matters. I now practically come back to where I began, that is, to the assertion that we are discussing a matter which is far too important to be left unsettled. If it is far too important to be left unsettled; it is also far too important to be left in a state of great uncertainty. It is a settlement, and not hints and surmises, that we want. I listened with great attention and interest to the speech of the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connar). He threw light upon the subject, as he always does, but he asked me to go further than I am prepared to go. If he will go just a step further than he indicated, and consent to the insertion in clause 52 of a line giving the Federal Parliament power to legislate in regard to intercolonial railway rates, or to inter-state competing railway tariffs, I shall be content to trust the Federal Parliament. But I am not going to trust the Parliament to exercise a power which I do not know that it has. If we are not sure that we have given it this power we cannot trust the Parliament. It is simply a question as to whether the Convention has or has not done its duty. If it has done its duty, and has given the Federal Parliament power to deal with this question, no one will be better satisfied than I. Otherwise much of our work will be done in vain.

Mr. FRASER. -

That is taking away state rights.
Mr. HOLDER. -

No. I should be the last to advocate that. I think that my record shows that I am not forgetful of state rights, and this particular state right, which I have already recognised under the title of the ownership which the states have in their railways, has been guarded by what I have said. I am not taking away state rights; I am conferring upon the various states which enter the Federation the power to manage their railways without being subject to unfair competition. That is not a derogation from state rights, but an increase of them. I am quite prepared to accept any form of words with which the leader of the Convention or the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) may be content, in regard to clause 95, if a provision is inserted in clause 52 clearly empowering the Federal Parliament to deal with this matter. If we do not insert such a provision it may be that, after years have passed, we shall have been found to have fatally failed in our duty.

Mr. BARTON. -

For what reason do you doubt that the trade and commerce sub-section in clause 52 will give the Federal Parliament power to make regulations in regard to railway matters?

Mr. HOLDER. -

If it gives the Federal parliament that power, why not make it clear? So many limitations have been suggested. We have had two this morning. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise) has moved an amendment which expressly takes away from the powers of the Parliament, and which would, if we passed it, altogether destroy the value of the provision referred to by the honorable member (Mr. Barton). Then we had the speech of the Premier of New South Wales, who would seek judging by his concluding sentence, to limit the operation of this provision. As these efforts have been made to limit it, I think we had better say what we mean in as plain English as we can command; so that it may not happen in the future that this question which is so vital to the financial well-being of the states and to the full accomplishment of the federal scheme we have in hand, will be over-looked, or its settlement rendered impossible.

Mr. REID. -

I do not wish to be understood as opposed to the broad lines you have laid down.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am very glad to hear that interjection, and I am not surprised at it, because until the right honorable member spoke this morning I should have counted him as an absolute supporter of the principles I have enunciated. I hope that even now we shall find him standing shoulder to shoulder with us, not in resisting differential rates, which are necessary to the working of the railways, but in resisting preferential rates.

Mr. REID. -

Rates designed to draw trade out of its own state. I am prepared to follow you in that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

This morning the right honorable member simply deprecated unduly high rates. But I think the figures I have given show that it is as important to prevent the imposition of unduly low rates as it is to prevent the imposition of unduly high rates. We must attend to both extremes, and do what we can to prevent both.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not rise to speak at any length at the present stage, but to suggest that, as we have spent to-day and a part of yesterday upon this question, it is a fair time now at which to come to a division upon the amendment submitted by my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins). I shall not vote for that amendment, because I have been considerably impressed with some of the arguments used to-day, and I think that the purposes we have in view will really be met by a modification of my amendment, confining it to a prohibition against the Commonwealth misusing the trade and commerce clause in such a way as would give an improper preference.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And leave the states free.
stands, inserting a prohibition against the Commonwealth giving a preference to a state or any part thereof over any state or any part thereof. I shall be able to show then, following up the line taken by my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor), that with the power given to the Commonwealth to regulate trade and commerce by law in sub-section (1) of section 52, and with the prohibition which exists in clause 89, there will be sufficient to carry out what we have in view, which is the prevention of anything being so done by a state in the regulation of its internal commerce as to go outside its border limits as laid down in the Wabash case, attempt to regulate what must be the commerce between state and state, which is really the subject of legislation by the Commonwealth itself. I do not wish to expand my views at this stage, but simply to suggest that every argument which is applicable to the amendment has been heard, and that we may as well take a vote upon it so as to mark another step in advance. We are now in our fifth week of sitting, and there are honorable members who are content to wait until the end of our proceedings, but who hope that they will not be unduly prolonged.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). - We have seen such a remarkable development in the course of the discussion on this question that it will not be a matter of surprise to us if the public outside require a little development as well. When this discussion began, it was distinctly founded on the basis of preserving to each state the right to deal with its own railways, and to impose what Tariff it pleased, no matter what pernicious result might follow, so far as free-trade was concerned. That position was distinctly taken up, as was pointed out by my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon), in the face of the declaration that we were to have intercolonial free-trade. We were really going to preserve a state of things that might destroy the very foundations of the Constitution. As the discussion has gone on, we have found out that the gentlemen who made utterances that were capable of that construction did not mean what they said. We have had each one interpreted more broadly by somebody else, till, in the speech of my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor), we had a demonstration, I think, that if we followed the cases decided in America, the power given to Parliament to regulate trade and commerce, coupled with the fundamental provision for freedom of trade, would be quite sufficient to give all the authority that is required.

Mr. REID. - You must not forget that in the Inter-State Commerce Act there is an express provision which is not in this Constitution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - Yes; but the Inter-State Commerce Act is not contained in the American Constitution. It was passed by the American Congress under the general power which they had of regulating trade and commerce.

Mr. REID. -

We all know that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

My right honorable friend will excuse me for mentioning it for the information of others who may have forgotten it. What I feel so strongly is that, although the power to regulate trade and commerce has in the evolution of the American Republic been coupled with an exceedingly wise Judiciary extending its provisions to the utmost limit, and always studying the principles which underlie the Constitution, there is no reason why we, in framing a Constitution a hundred years afterwards, should leave everything to judicial decisions. Why should we leave the greater part of the Constitution to be framed by Judges, who might be influenced by utterly different principles, and discard the experiences of the past, which ought to have told us what we are to provide for, simply assuming that the judgments given in the future will be similar to those that have been given in the past, in a country with which we have no relations at all? For my own part, I have felt for a long while that this trade and commerce clause would do an immense deal that we are legislating for. Supposing that any state, by means of a railway tariff, endeavoured to interfere with the cardinal principle of the Constitution—freedom of trade between the states—you have an authority that could prevent it, the Supreme Court. It is beyond all doubt that, if a tariff such as that which Mr. Holder has described were in existence, the Supreme Court could interfere and say that it could not be permitted. There may be another case—and it has been put several times during the discussion—that of increasing the freedom of trade by lowering the tariff, even to a point at which it will be unprofitable, not with a view of developing the resources of the state, which would be legitimate, but with a view practically of giving bounties that would have the effect of defeating the cardinal principle of the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Bounties to whom?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

To persons within your own territory.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is the other way.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

It might be bounties to your own people or excessive charges on people outside. It would be a bounty in the one case and protection in the other.
Mr. BARTON. -
   It might be a bounty to people outside.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   Yes.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
   Do you say that that it prohibited?
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   No, I do not think it is prohibited, but it would be exceedingly unfair between the states. It would create all sorts of ill-feeling, but there it would end. It would not be an interference with freedom of trade.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
   Is that quite certain?
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   I think it is quite certain that what made trade more free could not be said to be an interference with the freedom of trade. In my opinion, then, as far as the Constitution stands at the present time, without these provisions at all, the general cardinal provision that-trade should be free would give the Supreme Court power to prevent any tariffs being made in derogation of that principles But that would not apply to a reduction which might operate, not unfairly in the way of trade, but unfairly as between States.
   How is that to be got over? I agree again with Mr. O'Connor. I think the Parliament will have jurisdiction under the general provision relating to trade and commerce, as they have in America, and can deal with that; but when we have said all that, we have one thing to recollect-that we want this Constitution to be passed, and that we want to put it in a form in which we do not require conflicting opinions, but which he who runs may read, so that there may be no possible mistake as to what it does mean. The trade and commerce clause is good, and may be all-sufficient, but this is not a Bill merely drawn to satisfy a lawyer's notions of precise and accurate drafting. It is a Bill that has to be drawn in a form to recommend it to the public and which the public will understand, and from that point of view we must not make the American Constitution do too much work for us. We must do a little for ourselves.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
   Say what we mean.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
   So far as this matter is concerned, the suggestion of my honorable friend
   (Mr. Holder) ought to be absolutely unobjectionable. I think it is unobjectionable to the honorable member (Mr. Reid), and I think it should be absolutely unobjectionable to everybody, because if everybody says that that is at least what it means, then what possible objection can there be to saying so? While I entirely agree with Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor in their view that these provisions in the Constitution are quite sufficient, still, with the view to prevent differences of opinion, above all to recommend this Bill to the general public, whom we wish to understand it, and without whom we can do nothing, I think we should be a little more explicit, and the insertion of a few words which, some of us agree, are included in the general power, and others think not, might fairly be agreed to, so as to prevent any possible misunderstanding, and to recommend the Bill to the persons who have to adopt it.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

As I was responsible for the moving of the amendment, I want to say a few words as to certain criticisms which have been levelled against it. In the first place, a very weighty criticism came from the right honorable member (Mr. Reid), in which he said:"You cannot interfere in this way unless you take over the whole railway system; but, as the state and the state Government are responsible for the finances, you cannot interfere with part of the finances in this way." I have given due weight to that in thinking the thing out; but I would ask the right honorable member whether he thinks that there will be a serious dislocation for the worse of the finances of New South Wales, or of any other colony, if rates, which every one seems to think are losing rates, should be stopped? I cannot see where an inconvenience can happen to the finances, if they are losing rates.

Mr. REID. -

If they were losing rates, I would quite agree with the honorable member, but I happen to know that they are not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I understand that the late Mr. Eddy, whose authority none will dispute, would not admit that they were losing rates; but he would not say that they were gaining rates; he would not say that they were profitable rates.

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes, he did.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

He simply said that they were able to pay their way, taking the good with the bad.

Mr. REID. -

They leave a small margin of profit.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I admit the honorable member's contention to the full extent, that we have no right to interfere with the financial position of any state in any serious degree, however we must in some way interfere. Certainly as regards the great colony of New South Wales, and her grand resources, I cannot think that the honorable member is serious in saying that by giving up certain rates, which are reduced to the lowest point of payment, we will be interfering with her finances.

Mr. REID. -
To some extent.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The right honorable member says, "all developmental rates must incidentally attract trade." I quite admit that, but then these rates will not be void under this clause. If a rate is honestly meant for the development of the back country, so as to relieve the local producers, then it is not void under this clause, even if it should have the incidental effect of attracting trade. The only case in which the rate will be void and dealt with by the Inter-State Commission is the case in which the real object of making the rate so low is to attract trade from the ports of other states.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
That will be the effect of it, I should think.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Of course the effect of the rate will be one of the evidences to show its intention, but it is not conclusive evidence, and the mere fact of its incidentally attracting trade is not a ground for having the rate declared void.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
How would you prove with what intention a rate was framed except by considering its operation?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
In 99 cases out of every 100 you can very soon tell the object of a tapering rate. If it is to be left to a body of railway experts, you will find that no railway expert will have the least difficulty, in 99 cases out of every 100 in telling the object of every rate. If no charge is made for produce coming from Finlay to Berrigan, and no charge is made for the same produce from Berrigan northwards up to Cootamundra, I do not think it would be very hard to say that that was not a developmental rate. That is practically what is done on the railways there sometimes. You will find that the same charge is made for wool from Cootamundra to Sydney as is made for wool from Hay to Sydney, 200 miles further.

Mr. REID. -
And yet that very state of things has caused a development of the district.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
My right honorable friend, with his usual tact, appeals to the desire of producers, of whom we have representatives in this chamber, I believe, to have the rates as much competitive as possible between the different railway systems.

Mr. REID. -

I was only speaking of the difficulty of discovering what sort of rate it is.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The producer, the right honorable member says, will benefit; but it is not for the producer's benefit that he is doing it, because, if it were, he would have the rates as low on this side towards Melbourne. It is done for the benefit of Sydney warehousemen, and it is a mere bounty given to the people of Sydney. There was an important criticism levelled against this amendment by my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs). I think honorable members will recognise that, important as it is, it is more a verbal criticism than a substantial one. He says-"If these words are put in they will go too far; they will have the effect of practically interfering with the improvement of a harbor with the view to attract more trade to the port." I venture to say, with the utmost confidence, that my amendment will not have any such effect.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I go much further than that. I say any regulation of commerce

Mr. FRASER. -

Then deepening a channel would be an infraction of the law.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Exactly; in the way in which the honorable member puts it my amendment would prevent a state deepening a channel.

Mr. FRASER. -

And that is absurd.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Of course, the amendment would not prevent the deepening of a channel. The deepening of a channel is not a matter of law or regulation. What is prohibited is a law or regulation made by the Commonwealth. I cannot find that my honorable friends have pointed to, one single concrete instance in which this, limitation of the powers of states with regard to railway rates can be used with any damaging effect. It is evident, from the idea that Mr. Fraser has, that some honorable members have been led to think that my amendment will interfere with the deepening of a channel, but I think I have clearly shown that it will not do anything of the sort. It is against a rule or regulation that this provision is levelled, not the deepening of a channel. But supposing the words of this provision were its wide as Mr. Isaacs has said, that is merely a question for the verbal amendment of my proposal by the Drafting Committee. I do not profess to be the draftsman of the Bill, and I ask the Convention to allow a division to be taken on the merits of this question, the substantial question being as to whether we shall be so far federal as to insist that unfair differential rates-unreasonable differential rates-rates which are not merely developmental" shall be prohibited by this Bill, or, rather, that it shall be left to the Inter-State Commission to say whether those rates come within the unfair category or not. I appeal to honorable members to vote on the substantial question, because we shall be able, in the event of my amendment being passed, to trust to the skill and farsightedness of the Drafting Committee, so that if Mr. Isaacs' fears about the extent to which this provision can be applied are substantial they can be dealt with.

[P.1318] starts here

Mr. ISAACS. -

Supposing you lowered the charges for pilotage and wharfage in connexion with the port of Melbourne, that would be void under your proposal.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No; here you are speaking of any law or regulation of commerce or revenue made by the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Or by any state.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

My honorable friend does not suggest any improvement. If his idea is adopted we shall be simply left as we are, with an arrangement under which the Victorian system of preferential rates is prohibited, and the New South Wales system of differential rates is not prohibited.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Oh, that is not so; we can protect ourselves, or else federalize the railways.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

My honorable friend has made no better suggestion. No suggestion has been made which would at least go so near to meet the crux of the difficulty as this; and I shall be only too happy if the Drafting Committee will propose any words which will obviate any necessity for the fears of the Attorney-General of Victoria. I might indicate one direction in which the thing may be limited, if we succeed in the impending division, namely, that my amendment should apply to rates on railways or rivers-that they are not to be made so as to attract trade to the ports of one state as against the ports of another. The more you consider the words, the more you will see that they are carefully guarded. It will be competent for Victoria to do all it can to develop the Gippsland Lakes as against Western Port and Port Phillip, because that will not be attracting trade from the ports of one state to the ports of another, and so New South Wales can develop the Hawkesbury against Port Jackson, because that also will not be developing the ports of one state as against the ports of another. I take it that we have come to the nearest possible solution of this difficulty; but, having regard to the serious effect of this clause on Victoria, South Australia, and ultimately Western Australia, perhaps also Tasmania, and I think New South Wales, it will be one of the most serious blows to the prospects of federation if there is not a limitation imposed in this respect.

Question so resolved in the negative.

The amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia (see page 1270) was then put and negatived.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I propose to modify the amendment which I previously suggested. I now move-

That clause 95 be struck out, with a view of substituting another clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I would like to hear what you propose to substitute.

Mr. BARTON. -

I propose to substitute the following clause:-

The Commonwealth shall not give preference by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof.

The amendment as I circulated it to-day read:-

"Any law or regulation of commerce or revenue made by the Commonwealth or by any state, or by any authority constituted wider the Commonwealth or under any state, giving any preference to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof shall be null and void."

As to the use of the words "null and void," I do not think there is any necessity for putting a prohibition on any state or the Commonwealth in that form, for the plain reason that the prohibition itself is so effective that any law made in contravention of it would be null and void. The form I now propose seems to be more dignified as applied to the Commonwealth or a state, and more respectful to the authority dealt with. I have left out, in the present proposal, the words "affecting the law or regulation of a state," and I think the reason for doing that is easily explained. The provision in reference to preference given to ports is in the American Constitution; and the cases show that that is a prohibition on Congress, or on a similar body to the Parliament of the Federation. In passenger case, T. Howard, 283, it is laid down, according to Baker's Annotated Constitution, that-

This clause is a limitation upon the powers of Congress in the regulation of commerce, and intended to prevent what otherwise might have resulted in discrimination in favour of one state against others.

I ask honorable members to mark the words "in favour of one state against others." Although it was inserted in the Constitution as a prohibition against preference between the ports of the different states, it was interpreted as a provision in furtherance of prohibiting the right of Congress to make preference between one state and another state. It is in that way, I think, the amendment should be modified, and I am quite with those who say it is unnecessary to include a provision prohibiting preferential regulations made by a state, or by any authority constituted by a state, because I am, on reflection, as convinced as I was with reference to the question of the control of the rivers, that the trade and commerce subsection provides the Commonwealth with sufficient legislative power to deal with any such preference. More than that, any such preference may be dealt with by the Congress even before legislation, if it amounts to an infraction of the Constitution in other respects. There is not any power to regulate trade and commerce, but there is a further provision in clause 89 that, after the imposition of the uniform duties, trade and commerce as between the states, or among the states, shall, whether as regards internal carriage—which includes railways and rivers—or as regards ocean navigation be absolutely free. We have in those two provisions taken sufficient protection, and it was well pointed out in the debate by Mr. Isaacs, yesterday, that the absolute freedom clause (the 89th) was one that operated only on the imposition of uniform customs duties. Looking again at the trade and commerce clause, it is, without doubt, that in the United States the decisions have gone as far as to include all we have been arguing for in this debate. They go so far, as my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) has pointed out, in the case of the Wabash Company, as while allowing a state to make its own law or regulation in regard to traffic which begins and ends in that state, they nevertheless declare any law of a state Constitution void, if professing to deal with that traffic, it does actually deal with inter-state traffic in a way to infringe on the powers of the Congress in regard to trade and commerce. Of course, a fortiori, if the law of the state expressly attempts to fix what amounts to interstate commerce, then it is under the same prohibition. It cannot stand against the powers given to the Commonwealth or Congress. There is one passage in the American decision which so supports my view that, notwithstanding it has been read already, I would like to call the attention of honorable members to it. Dealing with the law of Illinois on this question, we read in Dos Passos' The Inter-State Commerce Act that the Wabash Railway Company had violated a statute of Illinois, enacting that if any railroad company shall, within that state, charge or receive for transporting passengers or freight of the same class the same or a greater sum for any distance than it does for a longer distance, it shall be liable to a penalty for unjust discrimination. The court said of that law:
As restricted to a transportation which begin and ends within the limits of the state, it (the law of Illinois) may be very just and equitable and it certainly is the province of the state Legislature to determine that question.
But when it is attempted to apply to transportation through an entire series of states a principle of this kind, and each one of the states shall attempt to establish its own rates of transportation, its own methods to prevent discrimination in rates, or to permit it, the deleterious influence upon the freedom commerce among the states, upon the transit goods through those states, cannot be over-estimated. That this species of regulation is one which must be, if established at all, of a general and national character, and cannot be safely and wisely remitted to local rules and local regulations, we think is clear, from what has already been said. And if it be a regulation of commerce, as we think we have demonstrated it is, and as the Illinois Court concedes it to be, it must be of that national character, and the regulation can only appropriately exist by general rules and principles, which demand that it should be done by the Congress of the of the United States under the commerce clause of the Constitution.

From that case it seems perfectly clear that when either professedly, or by its operation, the law of a state goes to affect interstate commerce to such an extent as to usurp the power of Congress in America to regulate that branch of trade or commerce, it is to that extent, at any rate, void.
When we had a discussion in Adelaide I referred to a large number of cases decided in the United States upholding the view of the entire power of a state to deal by its own regulation with traffic beginning and ending in that state. That power has been upheld in a long series of cases, but it is only fair to point out this: That in a case decided before the Wabash Company's case, Peik v. The North-Western Railroad, U.S. Reports, 164, it was decided that-

A statute which fixes the maximum rates for fare and freight on a railroad which extends from one state to another is not repugnant to this clause of the Constitution, although incidentally such regulation may reach beyond the limits of the state-Peik v. North-Western Railroad, 94 U.S., 164.

NOTE. - The last clause in this syllabus has been over-ruled by a

So it would appear that where the regulation incidentally reaches beyond the limits of a state, so as to affect inter-state commerce, it is to that extent void, although the effect is only incidental. The question we really have to deal with is: Are we to overload the Constitution with a number of provisions which may themselves affect the full vital power of the trade and commerce clause, and which may-for we know not how they will work until they are actually applied-produce effects upon trade and commerce in every colony which we cannot contemplate or foresee; or is it not better to rely upon a provision which has already been settled by judicial interpretation in cases so clear as that of the Wabash Railway Company? I take it that it is far better to place reliance on the trade and commerce clause. I would point out that the question of the railways stands in rather an analogous position to that of irrigation or the control of rivers. With regard to the control of rivers we decided so far, at any rate, to rely on the trade and commerce clause, very much fortified as it is by the 89th clause. Our railways are used for the development of our land; we claim the right to use our rivers for the development of our land; we say we will not hand over our rivers, so far as their application to the development of our land is concerned—although we are prepared to hand them over for the federal purposes implied in the regulation of trade and commerce. I think we ought to say the same with regard to the railways; that is to say, that we will not hand over our railways into a common pool. I would like to draw this distinction, that when honorable members speak of pooling and federalizing the railways as synonymous terms, they are speaking under mistake. Pooling the railways means the unification of the railways, whereas the may be federalized without being unified.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

We could pool special receipts.

You may do that if you like, but all I wish to point out at present is that if you pool the railways you will unify and not federalize them. Here we have a means of developing our territory, which I take it is as precious an advantage to us in all our colonies as is, in respect of any one colony, the waters of our rivers. We have decided that the use of the rivers which develop our land is a provincial and not a federal matter, while we are ready to submit by all manner of means to the full power of the Commonwealth Parliament to legislate for trade and commerce, so as to maintain that freedom of trade between the states which is one of the prime purposes of the Constitution. The same argument applies to the proposal with regard to the railways. We are entitled to retain the railways in our own hands, but we also say that the regulation of trade and commerce, so far as it affects the railways, is a federal power, and in the same way as it applies to navigation it applies to railway traction, but to this extent only: Just as the use of the waters in your rivers within your states is your own property, just as you are entitled to use it for the development of your land, so for the internal development of your province you are entitled to use your railways without restriction, and you only go outside the limits of provincial concern, and hand yourself over to the federal power, when, in the exercise of your power to regulate internal traffic, you trespass into the federal domain by attempting to regulate traffic between the states. Still it is an analogous case between the control of rivers and the control of railways. Preferences by states, if the Wabash case is any authority, will be dealt with by the courts. Even without the passing of any special legislation such preferences are dealt with in the courts of the United States, that is, so far as they affected interstate traffic. Is there anything conceivable in the application of these authorities which should lead us to doubt that an authority of that kind is applicable to our own case? So I submit that if we adopt the full value of the trade and commerce clause, we are in this position—that every one of us, as a whole, will retain control over all traffic which begins and ends in his state, subject to the one limitation that we are not entitled, because we have internal control, to assume also control which implies the government of traffic which is not wholly internal. That is the principle laid down in the Wabash Company's case. I am satisfied that is sufficient for the purpose we are dealing with. If that is a sufficient principle for my friends from Victoria I am prepared, for my part, to accept it as sufficient for New South Wales.

Mr. GLYNN. - Will the honorable member refer to clauses 96 and 97?

Mr. BARTON. - I will come to those in a minute, and I was about to speak with regard to them. In the same line as the case of Peik v. The North-Western Railway, which has been partly, but not entirely, over-ruled, there is a further case which does not appear at all to be over-ruled, that is Railroad v. Iowa, 94, U.S., 155. It is said—

The statute is not void that fixes a minimum of fares and rates, nor is a statute void which fixes the minimum rates of fare and freight on railroads for passage or shipment wholly within the state.

What I would ask is this—Will our friends from Victoria and South Australia be satisfied to leave the Constitution in a position which imports the full value of this decision?

Mr. HOLDER. - Will you state plainly in clause 52 that the Federal Parliament has power to deal with these matters?
Mr. BARTON. -

My answer to that is, just as I asserted and argued with reference to the trade and commerce clause, that it imported what was desired with regard to the navigation of the rivers—that it imported full and fair power, but no more than that, and I believe that argument was on the whole accepted. My argument here is the same, that without any tag to it—and all tags of this kind are dangerous—the trade and commerce clause is sufficient for this purpose.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Why not say plainly what you mean?

Mr. BARTON. -

For this reason, that you do not need to say twice over what you mean if once will do. By asserting that the trade and commerce clause will be sufficient you have the benefit of decisions in courts which have been dealing with a very similar Constitution, and the reasoning with respect to those cases is so entirely consecutive that I do not believe there is a legal gentleman in this Convention who will throw the slightest doubt on that reasoning.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We cannot put Baker's Annotated Constitution into our Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

But that is no reason for asking to have the same thing repeated over and over again.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

And the danger is that you may say more than you mean.

Mr. BARTON. -

What I am afraid of is that we may go on putting tag after tag on to this trade and commerce clause, which I regard as absolutely the most valuable provision in the Constitution; we may put this and that explanation on to it, and not only end in limiting it in the specific ways in which we profess to do so, but we will lead up to judicial constructions which will apply limitations in a way we never intended. It is far better to stand in the paths we know, and take the meaning of decided cases as legal gentlemen here approve. There can be no conflict of opinion with regard to the Wabash Company's case. Having that before us, we should abstain from overloading the Constitution with provisions which are always loaded, and which sometimes go off at the very time we do not want them to. Now, my honorable friend has asked me about the Inter-State Commission. I return the same answer as to that. I do not want to unnecessarily overload this Constitution with safeguards. If the better judgment of the Convention chooses to leave the provision for the establishment of an Inter-State Commission in the Constitution, the provision will not have the injurious effect which a tag to the trade and commerce clause would have, because such a tag would, I think, have the effect of limiting the trade and commerce clause, whereas the provisions for the establishment of the Inter-State Commission would certainly have no limitative effect whatever. They do not affect the power of the Commonwealth to legislate in regard to trade and commerce, and, therefore, I do not consider them to be objectionable in reality. I feel sure that they would not establish any injury. But I am sure that the more you limit the trade and commerce provision in sub-section (1) of clause 52 by putting explanatory tags at the end of it, the more you weaken its effect. That is what I am afraid of. I can assure my honorable friend (Mr. Holder) that I am speaking quite frankly now, when I say that my opinion is that to append any limitation to the trade and commerce clause whatever might seriously limit its effect, whereas the provisions with regard to the Inter-State Commission would leave the effect of the trade and commerce provision as it stands in clause 52, without undue limitation. There has already been one limitation inserted with regard to that clause, which, though I do not object to the provision in itself, is, I think, in its wrong place as it stands as a proviso to sub-section (1) of clause 52. I refer to the provision with regard to intoxicating liquors, and I am so impressed with the necessity of having no proviso to that subsection that when the time comes I shall ask the Convention to put the proviso in another place in the Bill, in order that there may be no limitation to the trade and commerce provision whatever.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Hear, hear.

Mr. BARTON. -
The argument, however, does not apply to the reasons for the establishment of the Inter-State Commission. I have always been somewhat inclined towards the establishment of such a body, because I think it is a right thing to do, although I recognise that whether this establishment should be provided for in the Constitution, or whether we should leave the matter to the Commonwealth Parliament, is another question. It may be that it would be better to leave for legislation by the Commonwealth Parliament the matter of the Inter-State Commission, but, at all events, my view has been all along that the clauses for the establishment of that body are innocuous in the Constitution, and do not affect the construction of the trade and commerce sub-section. To that extent, as I wish to be rather zealous in the guardianship of this sub-section, I have no objection to a provision affecting the trade and commerce clause, whereas the provisions for the establishment of the Inter-State Commission would certainly have no limitative effect whatever.
commerce sub-section. I feel that there should be an Inter-State Commission, and I am prepared to trust the Federal Parliament to create one. But I know there are a great many people out-of-door who would feel more secure if there were some such provision, not defining altogether the limits within which the commission is to act, but making it sure that there will be a commission of the sort. But about that I am not so very urgent, because I have always been one of those who are rather opposed to putting placards in the Constitution. I think we must rely on the abilities of those who are making this Constitution to explain it to the people, and we should abstain from defacing it or deforming it in any way by declarations which are generally inadvisable, and only act as electioneering placards. We should be strong enough, I think, to explain this Constitution to our people without such placards in it. Therefore, I am prepared to forego the clauses providing for the Inter-State Commission, although if I am alive when the Federal Constitution is adopted I shall be one of the first to urge that such a commission shall be appointed.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Is not the appointment of the commission rather inconsistent with the principle you have been suggesting that we should adopt?

Mr. BARTON. -

I am saying that the provision for the establishment of an Inter-State Commission in this Constitution is rather a placard, and to that extent is somewhat inconsistent with what I am urging. But I think it may be a guarantee. And I have always had an attachment to the idea of an Inter-State Commission. All of us have our pet ideas, and this has been one of my pet ideas; but I am willing to leave such matters to legislation by the Federal Parliament, and am quite content to forego my pet placard if honorable members will do the same with theirs.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Then could we not, on the same ground, strike out the trade and commerce provision, and allow the Federal Parliament to settle that matter?

Mr. BARTON. -

No, that would be a grave mistake, because it would give the Federal Parliament power to frame a Tariff which was not uniform, and to make a distinction between different states; it would give the Parliament power to create a Tariff which might be unjust and unequal in its incidence as between one state and another. To that extent we are bound to guard our interests, and it is for that reason that we have provided that customs duties shall be uniform. And if honorable member will look at the American Constitution, they will see that that instrument gives power to levy and collect taxes, &c., but there is attached to it this provision—that the taxes shall be uniform throughout the United-States.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Is there any necessity for clause 95?

Mr. BARTON. -

I am saying now that I do not think there is any necessity for clause 95 in its present form. What I am saying however, is that it should be made certain that in the same way as you provide that the Tariff or any taxation imposed shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth, so it should be provided with reference to trade and commerce that it shall be uniform and equal, so that the Commonwealth shall not give preference to any state or part of a state. Inasmuch as we provide that all taxation, whether it be customs or excise duties, or direct taxation, must be uniform, and inasmuch as we follow the United States Constitution in that particular—in the very same way I argue that we should protect the trade and commerce subsection by not doing anything which will limit its effect. That is the real logical position. I do not think we need go further than that, because the provisions of the Bill are ample to sufficiently guarantee the rights of the states. Every state will have full control over its traffic, except to the extent that it will not be able to usurp the powers of the Commonwealth in respect to trade and commerce. And are we going to allow those powers to be usurped? That question, I am sure, would meet with a direct negative all round. But if we go further and put in a limitation or proviso, we are simply increasing the power of a state to usurp that power of regulating trade and commerce, which should be confined to the Parliament of the Commonwealth. For it is only by that authority that trade and commerce can be kept free and equal. I suggest, therefore, that the amendment which I have outlined may be placed in this Bill. Sir John Downer agrees with me that the trade and commerce clause is quite sufficient for the purpose, but he would insert a few words to inform the public. I meet that argument again by asking whether it is not a danger to insert such words when they may alter the entire legal construction of the Constitution? I suggest simply inserting such a provision as I have suggested to prevent the Commonwealth from dealing by way of preference with any state or part of a state, and that we should leave the Constitution in that respect in the same way as we have left it by saying that taxation shall be uniform and equal throughout the Commonwealth.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I think the best argument we could have for inserting in the Bill what my honorable and learned friend calls a placard is supplied by the long and legal speech which he has just delivered to show us that it is not necessary.

Mr. BARTON. -
My speech was not so long as that of the honorable and learned member.
Mr. GORDON. -
Then I will call it a little more laboured.
Mr. BARTON. -
Everything is easy to my honorable friend.
Mr. GORDON. -
I think that the honorable and learned member has shut his eyes to the fact that the circumstances of these colonies, so far as the railways are concerned, are different from the circumstances of the American colonies when they federated.
Mr. BARTON. -
Perhaps my honorable and learned friend would prefer to answer me after the tea adjournment.

[The Chairman left the chair at twelve minutes past five o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at thirty-five minutes past seven o'clock p.m.]
Mr. GORDON. -
Before the adjournment I had started to show that the lengthy argument which Mr. Barton addressed to the Convention was one which by its very length and subtlety proved, I think, to many of us that the question which he considered as settled by his proposition is one which at the best is highly debatable. His argument that it is unnecessary to provide against the anti-federal use of the railways was founded upon two propositions. The first was that our circumstances are similar to those of America at the time they formed their Constitution, and that as they did not see fit to provide against such an anti-federal use of the railways we need not provide against it. I am not going to trouble the committee now with any definition of the difference between preferential and differential rates; I prefer to use the term "anti-federal use of the railways." The honorable member's argument, as I have said, was that, because the Americans saw no reason for providing against that in the Constitution, neither should we. My answer to that is this: Our circumstances are by no means analogous to, but, on the contrary, are entirely different from, the circumstances of the American states at the time when they formed their Union. They had no state railways. They were not interested at all in railways, whereas the federating colonies of Australia have invested £150,000,000 or £160,000,000 in railways. If the American states at the time of the establishment of their Constitution had had £150,000,000 invested in those great state utilities, which might possibly, indeed even probably, be used in the future in an anti-federal way, is it not almost a certainty that they would have provided against such an anti-federal use of the railways in their Constitution? It seems to me almost a certainty that some such provision would have been made, because they provided for their debts and other financial considerations. The very fact that they did find it necessary afterwards to appoint an Inter-State Commission seems to me to be a conclusive argument why we should provide for this now. Why should we not, as Mr. Holder suggested, take advantage of their experience? They found it necessary afterwards to go to the trouble of formulating legislative machinery to appoint a commission. Why should we not do this now, seeing that state interests are so vital and so huge in this matter, and that these railways may be used very dangerously by one state against another? Then the honorable member's second proposition is that the Americans have found the trade and commerce clause in the Constitution sufficient to control the anti-federal use of the railways. Even if that is so, it had to be ascertained to be so by the courts. The courts of America had to search the Constitution and find this out. Why should we throw on our courts the onus of doing the same thing when we can make it clear at the outset? Why have uncertainty when we can so simply and easily have certitude at once? I can quote no better authority on this point than my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor). And what does he say?—

If there is one thing more than another that we should endeavour to avoid it is the admission of doubtful language into this Constitution.

And any language is doubtful which requires a court to interpret it. It is doubtful in the negative sense clearly.

Mr. BARTON. -

Is language any longer doubtful when a court interprets it according to the principles of plain reason?

Mr. GORDON. -

I think the honorable member has rather mistaken his authority, at any rate, the bearing of that authority, on the present state of things in America. I am now quoting from as high an authority as any Judge in America—that of Mr. R.E. O'Connor. He says—

If we are going to make up our minds that there is to be some provision that the railway intercourse should be free of its present restrictions we should say so in language which would be unmistakable and be free from ambiguity.

I think that the majority of honorable members will take that view. Then
Mr. O'Connor also says-

I can see no reason why in the first place we should not place in our Constitution a distinct prohibition against anything like the imposition of differential rates for the purpose of advancing one colony over another, or one locality over another. We should make provision to prevent preference being given to the ports of one colony over the ports of another colony, and we should make it plain that in the running of our railways there is to be no disadvantage accruing from residence in a particular locality or a particular colony.

Whatever my honorable friend's legal mind may lead him to infer, there is no lay member who will say that the requirements of Mr. O'Connor's proposition are satisfied by our being made to rest on the probable decisions of a court of law founded on a decision given in America more than twenty years ago, and which was then only a majority decision. I could not possibly use language stronger or clearer than that used in the quotation I have given by an eminent member of the Convention and a member of the Drafting Committee. Mr. O'Connor is also a gentleman whose judgment is sound, and I know that the leader of the Convention relies to a very large extent on his judgment, and his sound law and common sense.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is no conflict between us whatever.

Mr. GORDON. -

I submit that there is. My honorable friend wishes this prohibition against the anti-federal use of the railways to be a deduction to be drawn by the courts of law. Mr. O'Connor says that if we mean it, we ought to say so in language clear and unmistakable. There is as much difference between these two propositions as there is between light and darkness. They both have the same object, but seek to attain it by very different means. With much respect to our leader, I dispute that the authority he quoted applies to the present state of things in America at all.

Mr. BARTON. -

There has been legislation since then.

Mr. GORDON. -

I know that. I am going to show, on the authority he himself quoted, that legislation might qualify the Wabash judgment if it had to be given now. The Wabash decision was only a majority decision, and we all know what that means. It certainly indicates that the proposition was not a clear one, but that it was one upon which even great lawyers differed. It was only by a majority that the deduction which the honorable member wants us to believe is as clear as noonday was arrived at. Can any honorable member say that that is language clear and unmistakable? Of course, it is not so. In addition to that, this judgment was given long before the appointment of the Inter-State Commission. Neither my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) nor the leader of the Convention were quite frank in quoting the authority of Mr. Dos Passos, to the effect that the trade and commerce clause did make it clear that the Federal Government had power to prevent the anti-federal use of the railways. This gentleman quotes the Wabash decision, but he guards it by a very important qualification. I have always understood that when an authority is quoted, if the authority guards his proposition by a qualification, it is only fair to the court that that warning should be given to it. But my learned friend forgot, if he ever knew, that Mr. Dos Passos introduces a very important qualification into his comment on this case. He states the case, and then goes on to say-

But it must be remarked that the language of Mr. Justice Miller, which is quoted above-

That is the passage which my learned friend quoted.

so far as the Inter-State Commerce Act is concerned, the provisions of which were not before the court, should be regarded as obiter dictum, and used only in the most general sense.

In other words, it was a wide generalization, not the clear and unmistakable language which Mr. O'Connor demanded should be placed in this Constitution. Yet my learned friend, in one of those lapses which even the most brilliant minds sometimes have, asks the committee to say that the judgment is equal to clear and unmistakable language in the Constitution. Mr. Dos Passos goes on to say-

When the Act, therefore, creating the Inter-State Commission comes before the Supreme Court for interpretation, it will be treated and regarded as a new and original question to be determined upon general principles, and without a precedent to guide the Judges in their decision.

Mr. BARTON. -

Is not the author then speaking of a state of things which had arisen since the Act was passed?

Mr. GORDON. -

Clearly; and that will be our position, as a majority of the Convention are for an Inter-State Commission. My learned friend himself says he will support it. But he sought to apply his reasoning and his argument to a state of things which exists in America now whereas his own author says the judgment only applied to the law before the appointment of the Inter-State Commission.
My learned friend is utterly and entirely mistaken. I never attempted to apply the language of that case to the state of things existing in America since the Inter-State Commerce Act was passed. I was careful to point out that the state of things which is described there was the state of things antecedent to the Act being passed—that under the trade and commerce clause the Inter-State Commerce Act had been passed. I did not point out, because every member must know it, that since that Act was passed matters have to be determined according to its provisions. I was applying the state of things existing in America before that Act was passed to the state of things which must prevail in the Commonwealth till the Federal Parliament passes a similar Act.

Mr. GORDON. -

I do not think that explanation removes the misconception which, at any rate, my learned friend's remarks engendered in my mind. We are practically agreed, in fact it is provided in the Bill, that we shall have an Inter-State Commission. My learned friend says he will support an Inter-State Commission.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is only a provision giving a power, which power is contained already in the trade and commerce clause. I was applying the language of the case I cited, and which Mr. O'Connor cited before I did, to the state of things which existed before the passage of the Inter-State Commerce Act. Nobody can say what the state of things will be afterwards; but I said I would support the passage of such an Act, as I trust my learned friend will also do if he has an opportunity, though perhaps neither of us will have an opportunity. What I did say was that I hoped that these matters would be regulated by an Inter-State Commerce Act as in America, but that, until that Act was passed, this authority was strong to show that even before the United States legislated on the subject, an interference by a state with interstate commerce could be prevented by the court. That is what I wanted to point out, and nothing more.

Mr. GORDON. -

I should be sorry indeed to misrepresent the honorable member. I think he misconceives the effect which his remarks had on the Convention. If he was arguing on the assumption that we are not to have an Inter-State Commission, then I say that the deduction which was made by the Judges in the Wabash case was only a majority decision, proving to everybody that it was a highly debatable proposition. We all know how Judges differ. The most eminent Judges in England, only the other day, differed in every court in the land, right up to the highest, as to the interpretation of the statutes relating to betting. So that when you get only a majority decision you have a debatable proposition. If my learned friend was arguing on the assumption that we are to have no Inter-State Commission, I think I have shown clearly that his deduction is debatable. If he was arguing on the assumption that we were going to have an Inter-State Commission he has no authority at all, if he rests on Dos Passos' dictum, for that author says-"It would be fruitless to endeavour to attempt to predict what the result may be when this Act (the Inter-State Commission Act) comes before the Federal Court for interpretation." So that I have the honorable gentleman on the horns of a dilemma.

Mr. ISAACS. -
What is the date of that work?

Mr. GORDON. -
The date of the work of Dos Passos, from which I have quoted, is 1887.

Mr. BARTON. -
It was written in the year that the Act was passed.

Mr. GORDON. -
If the honorable member's proposition is that the judgment proves there is a prohibition in the trade and commerce clause without express words against the anti-federal use of railways, I say it is a debatable proposition; and if the honorable member, even as the law then stood, argues that the judgment held good after the Inter-State Commission was appointed, he is contradicted by his own authority, because Dos Passos says-"It will be fruitless to endeavour to predict what the result may be when this Act comes before the Federal Court for interpretation." The honorable gentleman states that the trade and commerce clause, in clear and unmistakable language, provides against the anti-federal use of railways, but I think it is clear that this is doubtful The real course for us to take is that advocated by Mr. O'Connor. We should put, in clear and unmistakable language, in the Constitution, a direct prohibition against the anti-federal use of railways. I think I have shown that our honorable and learned leader's argument, which is a lawyer's argument, is founded on decisions which have now no solid ground to rest on. No one can say that we should establish this Constitution upon a deduction to be gathered from a doubtful decision, or upon the assumption that Australian judgments will be given on the lines of old American decisions, after the appointment of an Inter-State Commission, when even this leading American authority says he cannot "predict what the result may be when this Act comes before the Federal Court for interpretation."

Mr. BARTON. -
If the honorable member would refer to Dobney's book, which I quoted in Adelaide, he will find that it is written by a writer who has had experience of the Inter-State Commission Act, and of how the Inter-State Commission defined what is and what is not anti-federal. Perhaps it would be fairer if the honorable member dealt with the authorities I cited in Adelaide, which included Dobney's work.

Mr. GORDON. -
I cannot carry in my mind all the authorities that the leader of the Convention quoted in Adelaide, and I am only dealing with the authority he has quoted on the present occasion.

Mr. BARTON. -
I thought the honorable member carried everything in his mind, when he quoted Mr. O'Connor as citing an authority he was not dealing with.

Mr. GORDON. -
No, I would rather rely on Mr. O'Connor-

Mr. OCONNOR. -
When it suits you.

Mr. GORDON. -
I would rather rely on Mr. O'Connor than on some American authority, of whom I know nothing.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Do you follow my view of the question?

Mr. GORDON. - I have faith in the things I see, and not in the things I know nothing about. I have faith in Mr. O'Connor, and I believe his words were unmistakable wisdom when he said:"Place this prohibition against the anti-federal use of the railways in the Constitution in unmistakable words," whereas his honorable colleague says:"Leave it to the courts and the refinements of law." I say that it would not be fair to Australia to leave so great an interest on so slender a foundation.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I should like to clear up one or two doubts-which may possibly have been raised in the minds of honorable members by Mr. Gordon's ingenious argument, which was certainly more ingenious than direct. I cannot give him as much credit for its directness as I can for its ingenuity. The words that were quoted from Mr. O'Connor's speech in detail were quoted from a debate on the words which, if the amendment be carried, will disappear from the 95th clause.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
The debate was on the resolutions.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, it was a general debate on the federal resolutions, and I think my friend was arguing then for an Inter-State Commission. That debate was based on the Bill of 1891. That Bill contained something very similar to the present 95th clause, but the proposal then consisted of two clauses, and the second part was a prohibition without the further statement that further legislation should be null and void.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It gave the Parliament power to annul it.

Mr. BARTON. -

Arguing on that, Mr. O'Connor said it was necessary, that the provision should be made more clear-that, inasmuch as the language of the clause was doubtful, we should do without that which was doubtful, or add to it something which took away its doubtfulness. My proposition has been to remove the entire doubt by striking out the clause, and substituting a provision which does not admit of any doubt in regard to the action of the Commonwealth, leaving the remainder of the dealings of the states in regard to the traffic to be regulated by the trade and commerce clause, which does not admit of any doubt. The question really is-Is the subsection relating to trade and commerce doubtful? Putting aside judicial determinations for a moment, what are the words of the clause-'The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries and with the several states.' Will my honorable friend say that the word "regulation" is doubtful, or that "trade and commerce" is doubtful? Will he deny that the power to regulate carries with it the power to legislate?

Mr. GORDON. -

Why then go to the American courts to decide what it means?

Mr. BARTON. -

If my honorable friend hears me he will have his answer presently. The power to regulate gives the power to legislate, coming, as it does, under the heading-'Parliament shall have the power to make laws in all cases following,' one being the regulation of trade and commerce. The power to make laws, is clearly a power to legislate, so there is no doubt as to the meaning of that word. And is there any doubt that "trade and commerce" includes all exchanges and traffic among the several states, as well as with other countries? If my honorable friend has no doubt about the meaning of those words, then there is, clearly, the power to legislate for the regulation of traffic by way of commerce, whether by land carriage, river, or sea; among the several states, and with foreign countries. Let us take the matter apart from all legal determinations. If the regulation includes navigation, does it include railway, as well as river and sea, traffic? If the answer to both is in the affirmative, where is the doubt, apart from judicial decisions?

Mr. GORDON. -

It requires judicial decisions in America.

Mr. BARTON. -

The decisions are all of one tenor, and against my honorable friend's contention. And, while he is arguing that we should take away any doubt, because the matter has to be solved by a court of justice, is it not clear that a consistent course of decisions is the only way we can safely arrive at a det

Mr. GORDON. -

A long series of decisions of the courts of justice are usually embodied in the law.

Mr. BARTON. -

A long series of decisions of the courts of justice are usually not embodied in the law.

Mr. GORDON. -

They are, where they apply to the business of the state.

Mr. BARTON. -

If that were so, we should have a code of laws to explain the whole common law of England. My friend, as a lawyer, has rather twitted me with some want of knowledge on the subject, of which I am, perhaps, an unworthy exponent, and says that the decision required to be embodied in a statute should be made clear. If that be so, we must come to the conclusion that the ordinary operation of the common law of England requires, as I have said, a statute to explain it. But that is not the case. A succession of plain words, defined over and over again by judicial determination, requires no explanatory statute. If it did, we, overburdened with legislation as we are, would never be done making laws. But where is the authority to show that the United States Constitution allows the anti-federal use of railways? There has not been the slightest attempt to cut down the authority of the Wabash case, whether that was decided by a majority or not. On the Wabash case followed the passing of the Inter-State Commission Act, which was an endeavour to embody the principle laid down in the decision in that case. Since that statute has been passed, there have been a large number of decisions under it. I do not want to weary the committee by citing cases; but under these decisions it is abundantly clear that a distinction is drawn between what is federal and what is anti-federal. Under these numerous decisions, which there is no authority on the part of the United States to impugn, it is clear that when a rate deals with traffic entirely within a state, that must be regulated by the power of the state to deal with its own traffic, while not engaged in commerce with another state. But where that rate has the effect, of interfering with the inter-state traffic, it is held that it would be usurping the power of the Commonwealth with regard to traffic. There the Inter-State Commission does step in, and prohibits that rate, and that is only carrying out the broad principle at the root of the Wabash decision. So when the honorable member says that I am in a dilemma, he convicts me of putting before the Convention the state of the law in the United States before the Congress legislated for the appointment of an Inter-State Commission. That is precisely our position, because even if we retained the Inter-State Commission clauses, they are only clauses giving authority to Parliament to appoint an Inter-State Commission. There is, under these clauses, no Inter-State Commission, but only authority to appoint one. Until a commission is appointed, and until its powers of administration and adjudication are defined by a statute, the state of things under this Constitution must remain precisely as it was under the United States Constitution before the Inter-State Commission was appointed. So whatever value the Wabash decision has—and it has all the authority of an untouched decision of the United States Court given twelve years ago—its authority is applicable to any state of things which will exist in the Commonwealth until the Inter-State Commission is not only appointed, but invested by statute with power. Until such a commission is invested with the same powers as the commission in the United States, I am confident that the mere verbal carrying into effect of these principles of the Constitution (because Congress cannot legislate outside the Constitution) which were laid down in the Wabash case must prevail here without statute, and when such a law is carried it will be more effectually carrying into effect the principles of the Constitution itself.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I do not attempt to reconcile the views of Mr. Barton and Mr. Gordon, both of which views have been expressed with a great deal of force and earnestness. But I think those views have made it very clear indeed that after all there are some occasions when it is desirable to have what has been described as a placard in a Constitution. Of course, I am not a believer in having placards, in the least agreeable sense of the word, scattered broadcast throughout the Constitution, but there are occasions and places in which it is desirable to have something which is intended to be what Mr. Barton calls a placard inserted in the Bill. After listening to what has been said, I think this is one of those occasions, because Mr. Gordon has pointed out circumstances that, at any rate, indicate the possibility of some doubt as to the length to which the decisions of the United States go on this very important point. But, after all, we must remember this: That this is not like an Act of Parliament which we are passing. It is not in the position which Mr. Barton has described, of choosing or setting up a code of laws to interpret the common law of England. This Constitution we are framing is not yet passed. It has to be handed over not to a Convention similar to this, not to a small select body of legislators, but to the whole body of the people for their acceptance or rejection. It is the whole body of the people whose understanding you have to bring to bear upon it, and it is the whole body of the people, the more or less instructed body of the people, who have to understand clearly everything in the Constitution, which affects them for weal or woe during the whole time of the existence of this Commonwealth. We cannot have on the platform, when this Constitution is commended to the people, lawyers on both sides, drawing subtle distinctions, which may or may not be appreciated by the people.

Mr. Howe. -

If you had lawyers on the platform in that way you would never get the Bill forward at all.

Mr. Symon. -

Whether that be so or not, where we have the varying opinions of lawyers on a matter of such particular consequence as the trade of a country, those varying opinions are not proper matters to bring before the whole body of the people as matters upon which they should give their vote. Therefore, this is one of the things on which we may discard the objection which I, for one, would otherwise take to the insertion of what are called placards in the Constitution. But I think that Mr. Gordon is quite justified in the anxiety he feels as to every material advantage seeming to be slipping away from under the feet of South Australia. That is the position we are in. Yesterday the hope we all cherished that unrestricted freedom of trade between these colonies would be maintained was taken away, and the one avenue in regard to freedom of trade between these colonies which, at this particular moment, is of value to us as South Australians was closed.

Mr. Henry. -

Temporarily.

Mr. Symon. -

But I will ask my honorable friend how he would feel if he had federal union was being postponed for seven long years, during which time all the possible benefits that might accrue to them might altogether disappear?

Mr. BROWN. -
Some of them.

Mr. SYMON. -
They may have altogether disappeared. We cannot say; none of us can tell. But at any rate the victory that Sir John Forrest achieved yesterday has had the effect of closing against us the only channel of benefit in respect of the free interchange of commodities that is of any considerable moment to us. My right honorable friend achieved a very great victory for his own colony no doubt, and when he goes back to Western Australia his people will perhaps canonize him for it. There is no other honour great enough for what he has done.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
He would be a very fat saint.

Mr. SYMON. -
We will call him the modern St. John.

Mr. WALKER. -
You are posing as a martyr.

Mr. SYMON. -
At any rate, the great advantage to Western Australia is a correspondingly great disadvantage to us. We have been left with the River Murray, in regard to which it has been said that the water is to be under the control of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
I rise to a point of order. I wish to ask whether the honorable member is speaking to the Question?

The CHAIRMAN. -
Strictly speaking, I do not think that the honorable member is in order in discussing these matters, though he may mention them so as to make the point that a particular clause ought not to remain in the Bill, seeing that so much has been struck out of it which he thinks ought not to be struck out. But I do not think the honorable member is in order in discussing the Bill in general.

Mr. SYMON. -
The honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott) did not give me a chance to discuss it. He jumped up before the words were out of my mouth. I can understand the uneasy feeling—I will not say uneasy consciences—of my honorable friends from New South Wales in regard to this subject. I am not going to reproach them about it. The thing is past and gone. But, having been deprived of all the possible gains that we looked for, specific gains which we thought we could point to when we returned to our constituents, it is a matter for very grave anxiety how far the revenue which depends upon our internal trade is to be taken from us. The fact is that the specific advantage gained by South Australia is like the Cheshire cat in Alice in Wonderland—it has faded until nothing is left but the smile.

Mr. WALKER. - What is the smile?

Mr. SYMON. - The smile is the advantage we shall have in joining a Federal Union out of which we admit that great prosperity to all the colonies will spring. The right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) said that he wished to have something specific to put before his people, but what have we left? You have taken away the gains that we hoped for, and you are now engaged in whittling down the arrangement made in Adelaide. If you succeed in putting an end to it, there will be nothing upon the face of the Bill which can be called a placard or anything else to indicate to our people that there will be any particular-or specific gains from the union into which we contemplate entering. The point which has been elaborated is as to the effect of clause 95. If the leader of the Convention is willing to support the clauses providing for the establishment of an Inter-State Commission, I see no objection to the amendment he proposes in clause 95, and I will state in a word why I think so, and why I also think that the Inter-State Commission provision should be retained. Clause 95 is in two parts. The first part is that which prohibits the Commonwealth from, by any law or regulation, giving a preference to one part of the Commonwealth or to any state or part of a state. That, I think, is as far as the legislation in regard to the Commonwealth can well go. All that it is necessary to provide in the Constitution is that the Commonwealth Parliament shall not be able to pass any law which would give a preference of this kind. Having done this, the clause goes on to provide that "any law or regulation which shall have the effect of derogating from the freedom of trade shall, be null and void." It seems to me that the view expressed by the honorable and learned member on that point is unassailable. That portion of the clause is simply, an elaboration of the provision in clause 52, which deals with trade and commerce. At the same time, we should either have in clause 52, as was suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Holder), an express provision enabling the Federal Parliament to legislate in relation to the railways and the railway traffic—that would be far and away the best method of dealing with the subject—or we should retain the provisions enabling the Parliament to establish an Inter-State Commission. It seems to me that either the one or the other is essential. If no such provision is placed in the Bill we shall be in an exceedingly difficult position, and it will be impossible to satisfy the commercial population in our colony that their rights in regard to free interchange with neighbouring states are likely to be preserved. Therefore, while I shall support my honorable friend's amendment, because I think it is absolutely necessary to provide for-the prohibition of these preferences in the Constitution, I think that we require something further, either in the nature of an Inter-State Commission or in the nature of a provision enabling the Federal Parliament to legislate. If the latter provisions are retained, the power to legislate will be sufficiently exercised by dealing with the Inter-State Commission. It will be, competent for the Parliament, upon establishing a commission, to prescribe the rules by which it shall be guided, to provide for everything enabling it to give effect to its decrees, and to secure that it shall be in a position to do that.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I agree with the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) that if a reference to the appointment of the Inter-State Commission is retained, in the Bill in clauses 96 and 97, we may very well accept the suggestion of the leader of the Convention, and leave the creation of the commission and the power to regulate intercolonial trade to the judicial decision, under clause 52, sub-section (1). I should like, in order to sustain the position taken up by the leader of the Convention, to remind the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) that the decision in 1886, in the case of The Wabash Railway Company v. The State of Illinois, is not the first in which the question of the power to regulate inter-state commerce turned up. In a book published in 1863, this statement, was made as to the extent of the power of Congress over commerce. Referring to a provision of the United States Constitution, it is stated-

This clause grants to Congress the full power of regulating foreign and domestic commerce, navigation, and intercourse. The power does not extend to internal traffic between individuals in different parts of the same state, but to the trade which may be carried on between the United States and foreign States, and among the several states, and from one state to places within the territory of another state.

So that before the decision of 1886 this power was very clearly defined; nor again was the decision of 1886 the reason of the creation of the Inter-State Commerce Commission. That commission was created owing to the extraordinary complications which arose through the pushing on of railways in the southern states as the result of the war. From 1865 to 1875 there was an extraordinary expansion in the southern states, and it is pointed out by a writer in the Forum of last September that-

After a while the struggle for southern traffic between rival lines east, west, and south lost every semblance of order, and culminated in a disastrous "rate war," destructive to the interests of transportation, and utterly demoralizing to trade.

So that really the decision of 1886 was not the precipitating cause of the appointment of the Inter-State Commerce Commission, but the general failure to regulate those evils which were becoming intensified and more numerous, owing to the pushing on of the southern railways after the cessation of the war in 1865. Again, Mr. Barton has said that we are not to rest solely on the decision of 1886, because from that time down to May, 1897, the Inter-State Commerce Act under which the Inter-State Commerce Commission was appointed, has often come before the Judiciary of the United States. There is the one point of doubt as to whether under sub-section (1) of clause 52 a commission could be appointed. If the appointment of the commission and the power to regulate rates in accordance with the decisions in the Wabash case was to rest on sub-section (1) of clause 52, and if the appointment of the commission was held to be ultra vires in the United States courts, these points must have been thrashed out in the various cases that up to May, 1897, came before the Judiciary. Some of these cases may have turned on other points, but still if you could have upset the very Act which was the justification of the commission interfering at all, of course, the particular interference complained of on the part the commission would have fallen to the ground. You could, by striking at the foundation of their authority, strike at the Act which was challenged in that particular case, and which flowed from that authority. But what has been the result? The Act has never been declared to be ultra vires. In May, 1897, one of the last cases was decided, and that was on the attempt made by the Inter-State Commerce Commission to extend its powers beyond the decision of 1886 by practically interfering with the internal commerce, and also to arrogate the rights of the states. The decision was described by a writer in the Forum as being one of the most momentous ever given in the United States courts, and it was that the power of the commission stopped at the attempt to make rates. It might declare whether a rate was or was not fair, but it could not make a rate. Mr. Barton was justified in stating that, under the operation of this clause, the principle affirmed in 1886 would operate here. But there is a doubt as to whether the Federal Parliament will have power to create a commission if we do not retain in the Constitution clauses 96 and 97. The reason is this, that it was declared that there was a special class of commerce and a special class of rates that the states could not touch. Congress sought for a means of carrying out the spirit of that decision, and it found precedents in existence in the case of the states. The Inter-State Commerce Commission was only the last of several commissions appointed. Just as the Board of Trade in England has power to regulate railway rates, so in the United States there were commissions appointed to do, in regard to the internal traffic of the states, what the Inter-State Commerce Commission had to do with regard to inter-state traffic. I say, therefore, that following the ordinary state method of regulating traffic, and maintaining equality of trade within the states, the United States Congress were justified in appointing an Inter-State Commission, because they found precedents and analogies in the case of the states themselves. The power of, by this means, regulating interstate commerce could scarcely be challenged by states that had done the very same thing with regard to that portion of railway management that lay within the field of their jurisdiction. In Australia the analogy fails. There they were private railways. Here they are state railways. There they had state commissions, and here we have none. The British precedent of the Board of Trade does not hold here either, and, unless you make provision in the Constitution for the appointment of an Inter-State Commission, the power of the Federal Parliament to appoint such a commission as a means of carrying out the spirit of sub-section (1) of clause 52 may be challenged. Mr. Barton declares that this cannot interfere with the operation of clause 52. He says that we can do no harm by putting it in, and as its omission may affect the powers of the Parliament, we ought to act on the principle that modest doubt is the beacon of the wise, and make assurance doubly sure by inserting it in the Constitution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I should prefer, instead of "The Commonwealth shall not give preference," the words "Preference shall not be given." That is a more striking way of phrasing the clause, and I think also that it might remove the fears of some honorable members that this may refer to the Commonwealth and not to the states. I recognise the force of what the leader of the Convention says, that the provision already in the Bill that trade and commerce between the states shall be absolutely free might make the clause unnecessary. But if the clause is necessary at all, I certainly do not think it expedient that it should be confined to the Commonwealth, because it might seem to be almost a limitation rather than an authority. If trade and commerce between the states is to be absolutely free, then neither Commonwealth nor state should be able to make any law interfering with it. To give a preference would certainly be to interfere with the freedom of trade and commerce. What do we mean by freedom? Do we not mean that there should not be any preferences?

_Sir GEORGE TURNER._ -

Would you say that making a low rate would necessarily be an interference with the freedom of trade?

_Sir JOHN DOWNER._ -

No, but it would be a preference, and so I shall submit for the consideration of the committee whether, instead of the words "The Commonwealth shall not give preference," we should not put it abstractly by saying "Preference shall not be given."

_Mr. ISAACS._ -

In America they have put it abstractly, and it only relates to the Commonwealth.

_Sir JOHN DOWNER._ -

We have heard too much of the American decisions. I should prefer saying what we mean, and supposing that we might have our meaning interpreted in accordance with our intentions, and not in accordance with the, American decisions. We should not slavishly follow a Judge-made law, or a precedent in which the Judiciary supplied the defects of legislation. I should prefer to risk putting in plain words what we mean, and testing the Judiciary to interpret it according to our undoubted intentions. It is not necessary to suppose that, because we use the same words as are used in the American Constitution, we intend them to be interpreted in precisely the same way. If some case of the kind occurred in Russia we should not consider that we were bound by the decision given, and I do not see why we should be bound by the American decisions when we use words which ought not to be difficult of interpretation. For these reasons I think it better to put the matter abstractly. I beg, therefore, to move-

That the words "The Commonwealth shall not give preference" be struck out, with a view to the substitution of the words "Preference shall not be given."

That will have this effect. If the other words are broad enough to prevent any state legislation on the subject, these words will not do any harm. If they are not broad enough they may do some good. At all events, they contain a general enunciation of what we desire to provide—that preferences shall not be given by any law, whether it is made by the Commonwealth or by any state. I cannot see that there can be any objection to using these words. As you have already provided for the states, there is no harm done by putting in these words. If the other words are not broad enough, then these words supply the defect.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That re-opens the whole difficulty we have been dealing with all day.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I do not think so.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
My learned friend (Sir John Downer) says that we have had too much of American decisions. The difficulty in our way is that where you have a Constitution such as this is, which reserves to the states all rights that are not taken away, expressly or by necessary inference, a provision of this kind cannot be read to have any reference to the states. I believe it is from that principle that a provision almost in these words in the United States Constitution has been held to be a prohibition on the Congress alone, and not on the states. The Constitution, as ours proposes to do, keeps to the states all powers not taken away expressly or by the necessary interpretation of powers given to the Federation. That being so, I take it that what my learned friend now proposes would necessarily be read by any court, whether in the United States or anywhere else, in the same way as applying only to the Commonwealth, because the states will retain all powers which are not taken away from them, either by the mere operation of the Commonwealth powers or by the necessary incidence of the Commonwealth powers. It was in deference to honorable members that I made this clause begin with the words-"The Commonwealth shall not give preference." Although we thought that the legal interpretation of it was perfectly clear, it was suggested to me that I should use the words "The Commonwealth shall not give preference," instead of saving "Preference shall not be given," in order that honorable members might have no doubt as to what the meaning of the American decision was. I do not believe that the amendment of my learned friend, if it is carried, will affect the meaning of this suggested clause at all. If the committee thinks it better to have the words in this way I have no objection, because I have not the slightest doubt that they both mean the same thing.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
They would not have the same meaning in the eyes of the public outside.

Mr. BARTON. -
That may or may not be. If the committee prefers the way in which my learned friend wants it to be put to my way, believing that they mean the same thing, I am willing to leave the matter entirely in their hands without the slightest feeling about it. I really do believe that the words as they are put are, on the whole, likely to be better understood. The reason why the states are interdicted from making laws or regulations which conflict with the freedom of trade and intercourse in the Commonwealth is because clause 89 says that after the imposition of uniform customs trade and commerce amongst the states shall be absolutely free. That is, the reason why the states themselves would be interdicted from doing anything which conflicts with the federal power to regulate trade and commerce. I conceived that the states were sufficiently dealt with by clause 89, and that the only remaining thing was to deal with the Commonwealth itself, which I thought I was doing by proposing this clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Clause 89 also prohibits the Commonwealth

Mr. BARTON. -
It prohibits the Commonwealth too,

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
I do not object to the words "by the Commonwealth or by any state" being kept in, as I think that is an improvement, but it appears to me that the whole of the arguments of my learned friend in reference to the effect of clause 89 apply with equal force to this clause, and go to show that it is unnecessary. I notice that an honorable member interjected that this was reopening the whole question. I do not see it in the slightest degree. It is all a question of phraseology. It is a question of altering the Bill in the form in which we passed it in Adelaide, and the form in which it was passed in 1891. It is simply a question of whether we will say that no preference shall be given by the Commonwealth. Surely there is no interference with any principle if we say that no preference shall be given by anybody, the Commonwealth, or any one else? I think, sir, I must very respectfully insist on my amendment being put.

Clause 95 was struck out.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I move -
That the following stand clause 95 of the Bill:-The Commonwealth shall not give preference by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to one state, or any part thereof, over another state or any part thereof.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
I beg to move as an amendment-
That the words "or any state" be inserted, after the word
"Commonwealth," in the proposed new clause.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
I should like to know what the meaning of this amendment is?

Mr. REID. -
There must be something in it, or there would not be such a fight over it.

Mr. LYNE. -
I wish, to know what the effect of the amendment is? The words of the amendment are very few, but they may have a very considerable meaning. I think we should know, what we are going to vote on.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We know what it is.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I know what its effect will be.

Mr. LYNE. -
If the learned member knows what the effect of the amendment is, he might tell me what it is.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I will.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
As the clause is drawn, it says the Commonwealth may not impose preferential rates. The leader of the Convention says that they have already provided that states may not do so. Therefore, all you have to protect yourself against is the Commonwealth. If the leader of the Convention is right we need not put anything in. It would be superfluous, and might operate as a contradiction of the other clause.

Mr. LYNE. -
I am quite satisfied.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
We put this in so as to make no possible mistake.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
From a Victorian standpoint, it means that we are to lose the Riverina trade absolutely. It means that no state is to give a preference to any one state over any other state, that is to say, that we are not to give any differential rates or preferential rates with regard to goods that come from the Riverina over our own goods; we must charge the same.

Mr. LYNE. -
You don't want to impose these differential rates, do you?

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is what it means to Victoria. We would be perfectly willing if some fair scheme of federalizing the railways could be adopted, or, in the alternative, to be allowed to work out our own salvation; but we distinctly object to have this taken out of our hands; without any compensating return. Our revenue has been taken, our bounties have been taken, our rivers, have been taken, and this is another proposal to take our railways, too.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I think it is quite enough for me to say that although, for the first time, our friend Sir John Downer will not follow his chief, I will.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

Well, even that does not affect me very much.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

You complained about the members of the Finance Committee not sticking together; the members of the Drafting Committee ought to stick together.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The Drafting Committee agree to matters of form.

Mr. REID. -

Is not this a matter of form?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No, it is a matter of substance.

Mr. REID. -

I thought you believed so, or you would not have spoken three times.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am glad to hear my right honorable friend say that. I now ask for leave to withdraw my amendment, in order that I may move another in lieu thereof.

Sir John Downer's amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I now beg to move that the words- "The Commonwealth shall not give preference," be struck out, with a view of inserting "Preference shall not be given."

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is exactly the same thing.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I prefer to move the amendment in that form.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

The amendment in the form in which Sir John Downer has just proposed it means this-that if we carry it, we undo all the work we have done to-day.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

Mr. O'Connor says that the amendment, if carried in its present form, will undo all we have done today, whereas the leader of the Convention told us that he does not care which way it is put, because it means identically the same, so that we have the melancholy spectacle of every member of the Drafting Committee disagreeing with the other members of that committee.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Is this what you call federation?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
This is only putting, in an abstract way-

Mr. DEAKIN. -
What we have put concretely?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Yes, what is put too concretely.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
It seems to me that if Sir John Downer's amendment will have the effect that he contemplates, it will be extremely undesirable to carry it. The honorable gentleman contemplates, I assume, that it will prohibit states from giving a preference, under any circumstances, to their own citizens over the citizens of another state.

Mr. WALKER. -
And vice versa.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If it will leave New South Wales to do as she likes, but it will not leave Victoria to do as she likes.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
If it will leave one state to do as it likes, it should surely leave another state to do as it likes? But it might prevent states doing anything for the benefit of their citizens in a manner which would not be prejudicial to the rest of the Commonwealth. The presence of these words might have the effect which Sir John Downer thinks they would have. I think that would be extremely baneful and pernicious, and therefore they should not be carried. I have in mind a question which we were discussing the other day-the question of old-age pensions. It might happen that a state would think fit to give old-age pensions to its own citizens, and also provide that citizens of another state should not participate in those old-age pensions, even though they came to reside in that state, until they had lived there a certain length of time, and the presence of these words in the clause might prevent a policy of that kind being carried out by a state.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I want to state the position in which I find myself. Just now I heard the leader of the Convention say that this amendment was not at all necessary, and that all that it would secure was in the Bill already, so that it was simply a placard. Now we are told by Mr.
O'Connor that these words will not do at all, because, he says, if we put them in we will undo all that we have done to-day. Now, are we to follow the leader of the Convention or are we to suppose that these words include some new principle? I was prepared to vote with the leader; I am now prepared to vote with Sir John Downer, because it is now evident to me that these words mean something that is not already in the Bill, and that without them the Bill would be, to a large extent, a farce.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -
I do not see how any honorable member who is not very well versed in these railway rates can possibly give a vote until this confusion is cleared up. We have had two members of the Drafting Committee differing before, and now we have all the three pulling in different ways. I ask Sir George Turner to indorse or explain away the statement made by the Attorney-General of Victoria, to the effect that if Sir John Downer's amendment is carried it will practically deprive Victoria of all the Riverina trade, and will do an injustice to Victorians in that way.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Cannot you test the principle of it by your own experience and knowledge?

Mr. DOBSON. -
I thought that the whole debate, to-day and yesterday, was straining in the direction of having some fair uniform rates in reference to our geographical boundaries, and that one state was not to deprive another of the trade or traffic which nature gave it. If Sir John Downer's amendment will be unjust to Victoria in reference to traffic that is 200 miles nearer Melbourne than Sydney, I shall be inclined to vote against that amendment.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -
I may point out to Mr. Dobson that Sir John Downer's amendment cuts both ways. Although it would prevent Victoria making a railway tariff which, at present, would be somewhat unjust, as compared with the New South Wales railway tariff, it also prevents New South Wales from making a tariff which would be somewhat unjust as compared with the Victorian tariff.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No, they cater for the Riverina trade, which will be in their own territory, and, therefore, they do not interfere with the trade between different states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
There seems to be some misapprehension with regard to this particular clause. As it stands now, we, who represent Victoria, see no objection to it.
It is protect

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

You are quite right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The Attorney-General of Victoria merely said that that was something which we could not accept, for this reason, that while you tie the hands of Victoria you leave the hands of New South Wales absolutely free. We all know very well that we have a limited area in Victoria, and that the trade we get from Riverina,-we say properly get, geographically-comes from a portion of New South Wales into Victoria. If we are not to be at liberty to give preferential rates to get that trade we shall be deprived of that trade altogether, but New South Wales can make any arrangements she pleases to get that trade.

Mr. LYNE. -

I think you have shown your hand a bit too clearly.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I have, from the very start.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

It is a pity that more members of the Convention have not done as Sir George Turner has done all through.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I have no doubt that I have shown my hand too clearly from the start, but I tell you now plainly that if it is the desire of New South Wales to take away from Victoria the trade that she has had for so many years, without allowing us to be on fair grounds to compete with New South Wales-for that trade, then they are asking for something which I shall be obliged to tell the people of Victoria, as the Premier of this colony for the time being, not to grant.

Mr. REID. -

But we do not want any thing of the kind.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I believe that you do not want anything of the kind; but I am pointing out that the effect of these alterations will undoubtedly be to give to New South Wales the right to make any rates she thinks proper regarding all the trade within her own borders, which would mean the right to make such low rates as would take this Riverina trade to Sydney, if need be, practically for nothing, whereas Victoria would not be able to make such rates, as would insure that trade continuing to come in the course in which it now comes. That is the plain simple question, and is what, we have been fighting all along. I am perfectly prepared to allow that the two colonies should be put on level ground to fight this matter out afterwards, as we have been fighting it in the past. We are perfectly prepared to fight, because in the past we have succeeded well. But we do not want to fight.

Mr. REID. -

Let us come to the agreement of 1895 and settle everything comfortably.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That agreement was no doubt very profitable to the railways, but it meant ruin to many merchants in Melbourne.

Mr. REID. -

I am glad you are looking after the merchants at last.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I look after every class; but my friend (Mr. Reid) has told us that he only looks after the squatters, because he can get a lot out of them. We are prepared to let the clause go as it stands. But we cannot agree to an alteration which would prohibit states making rates as matters now stand. Then it is sought to make another alteration, simply saying that preference shall not be given. That throws us back into the realm of doubt and difficulty, out of which we have all been trying to get. What does the alteration mean? My honorable friend surely believes it means, that preference should not be given by the Commonwealth or the state; otherwise he would not propose it. If all that is meant is that preference shall not be given by the Commonwealth there is no need for the alteration. If the idea is that preference should not be given by the state, let my honorable friend say so; in so many words, and not use language which people might believe meant that by the American decisions the Commonwealth was referred to when the states are intended.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

I am very glad indeed that the honorable member who has just resumed his seat has spoken in the manner he has. I have been contending against the majority of the New South Wales representatives in favour of embodying some such proposal in the Bill as will be carried if this amendment, proposed by Sir John Downer, be carried. I have contended that for the reason that I see the passage of the Bill without such a proposal means to hand over the whole trade of the Riverina to Victoria, leaving to New South Wales nothing but her assets in the shape of her railways. I said before that geographically the Riverina trade belongs to Victoria, but if Victoria is to get that trade it should not get it at the price of the ruin of the large and valuable assets belonging to New South Wales in that district.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We were there long before you were there to make the assets.

Mr. LYNE. -

That does not constitute any proprietary.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

At the present time no one ought to know better than Sir George Turner that the bulk of this trade now flows into the port of Sydney, and flows there owing to the fact that Victoria itself has put up barriers to the trade coming to Melbourne. But let these barriers in the shape of high prohibitive duties be removed and the trade will flow to Melbourne. Sir George Turner is doing the right thing for his colony in advocating a course which will allow that trade to come to Melbourne, and to be a profit to his colony. As a free-trader, I have no objection to the flow of trade to its natural channel, but I do object to an injury being done to a vested interest, and a national interest, of New South Wales without some compensation. I have always claimed that, as federation will wreck and ruin interests here and there, to the right and to the left, in regard to commerce and traffic, compensation should be provided in the taking over of the arteries of traffic, and making the profits pay for the losses. I always took the consistent position that, so long as this Federation is built on lines which refuse to take over the great national artery of Australia, then every care should be taken to safeguard the assets which we left to the various states in a ruined and crippled condition. I hope my colleagues will see that as clearly as I do. I have travelled this district from end to end, and know the condition of the colony there. If you give Victoria a free hand to make preferences for New South Wales trade over its own trade, you will hand over the traffic to the sister colony of Victoria. Why should Sir George Turner be ready to give New South Welshmen, with their wool and stock, rates on his railways which he refuses to give to his own colonists of Victoria? I have no objection to low or differential rates on the Victorian railways, but I have every objection to rates which favour the people of Albury, and which Victoria will not give to the people of Wodonga. That is not federation at all. We shall have to wait for another century until the federal spirit is stronger in the hearts of the people than is shown at the present time. If you are going to leave what will breed up bitterer feelings than the Tariff-if you are going to allow Victoria to make war on the revenue and territory of New South Wales by means of railway rates-then the federation that does come will be a sham and a farce, and the people will not be slow to see it. I give all credit to the Premier and the Attorney-General of Victoria for having in plain language said what is the meaning of the amendment. I take my present attitude on the amendment, not from any selfish motive for protecting New South Wales, but in order that we who are building this Constitution may say there is something more to federate than the mere freedom of trade and the Tariffs. You may federate, but you will be leaving weapons which will be used with as keen effect in the future as in the past. I look to the amendments moved by the various colonies to clause 95, but I look in vain for the amendment suggested by Victoria. Sir George Turner tells us that if this amendment is carried he will advise the people not to accept the Bill. And yet, forsooth, neither House of the Victorian Legislature has proposed the slightest amendment on the clause. The clause as drafted at Adelaide has been before the Legislative Assembly and the Legislative Council of Victoria, and neither House has suggested that one line or one word be amended in the slightest degree. Then we are told it is against the instincts of the people of Victoria to accept the clause. The federal instinct is truer in Victoria, perhaps, than has been voiced this evening.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We do not object to the clause.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
I would not have spoken now but for the reason that I believe the foundation of a true Federation will be built on lines which will do away with all those differences between men of the various colonies, and will do away with that feeling and those laws which give a better place to a New South Welshman because he comes from that colony, and to a Victorian because he comes from Victoria. I believe in having equality of rates for people in regard to trade and commerce, not merely through the ports and customs, but in everything which governs trade. I should go with Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs if they would press the matter to its logical issue, and propose to remove the difficulties which we had to face in the financial proposals, and which we have to face now, and if they will join hand in hand with those who believe that federation should be built on lines which will remove all those things containing within them the germs of conflict. I invite my friends, therefore, at some stage, to propose that the railways be federalized.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
And also the River Darling?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Well, I should not object to let the Darling be federalized, as I said in my speech on the question; but to allow that river to be used to compete with the state railways is one of my great arguments against it. But I said then, as now, that you will remove difficulties of a varying character and on various points by at this late stage adopting some clause which will federalize the railways. I intend to vote for this amendment, simply because I believe it does mean that it will restrict the right of Victoria or any other colony to attempt unduly, and improperly, and unfairly to attract trade from a sister colony, leaving it perhaps with a ruined asset.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). - My colleague has expressed himself with very great earnestness, and we all know that he has a very strong feeling in favour of federalizing the railways. He has taken advantage of the turn which the debate has assumed to repeat, in still stronger and more emphatic language, his views on that subject. But when he says that the settlement which this Convention is apparently about to arrive at will expose the New South Wales railways in the Riverina district to ruin, I beg leave, with much superior knowledge of the subject, and as Minister for Railways, to assure my colleague that he is absolutely mistaken. Not only have I to assure him that he is absolutely mistaken, but I have to go further and tell him that, unless this settlement which I am supporting is carried out, his statement would have a much greater significance, because, taking the railways of Riverina as they exist today, it is absolutely the case that, unless we are allowed to apply different rates to those railways from the other railways in New South Wales, they will be absolutely crippled. I am speaking now, not only on my own authority, but on the authority of the responsible officers of the Government, whom I have had with me in long and serious consultation. My honorable friend is absolutely wrong.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. - Does that apply to preferential or differential rates?

Mr. REID. - It applies to the Riverina railways. I can assure my honorable friend that unless we are allowed the liberty to establish rates there as we please, in the interests of our own railways, the value of those railways will be seriously impaired. I am supporting this proposal in common with my honorable friends from Victoria, for perhaps the for that is, as my honorable friend says (and there he is perfectly logical), the federalization of the railways absolutely, or a friendly agreement between the colonies concerned. I deeply regret that that friendly agreement has not been arrived at, but that is no fault of ours. Our commissioners, the commissioner of Victoria, and the commissioner of South Australia did arrive at a friendly agreement, but the powers above the Victorian Commissioner cancelled that agreement. My honorable friend spoke of a conflict between New South Wales and Victoria on this matter. I can assure him that I look forward to any such conflict with absolute confidence. I feel that, as this Bill is going through, I shall be quite prepared to meet my friends in Victoria in that friendly dispute which exists between us in connexion with the Riverina trade. If they are satisfied with it I am sure I can be.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I only rise to ask Sir John Downer not to press his amendment. As Mr. Barton's amendment stands, it is quite clear that it is the Commonwealth that is not to give any preference. Sir John Downer's amendment, which, as a form of words, I infinitely prefer, does evidently leave it in doubt whether that language may not be interpreted so as to give a prohibition not merely as regards the Commonwealth, but as regards the states. On the principle according to which I sought to act in the few remarks I made earlier in the day, I think it is undesirable, if we can have clear language, that we should have ambiguous language. On that ground I ask my honorable friend either to withdraw his amendment, or to put it more clearly.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I feel some difficulty in withdrawing the amendment after listening to the speech of the Premier of Victoria, because that showed such a complete misapprehension of everything we are doing that it shook to the foundation my ideas of the agreement we were coming to. I understand the right honorable gentleman thinks that, in spite of all the provisions about states treating each other fairly and everything else, it would be still quite open for any one to make a preferential railway tariff as against another state for the purpose of getting the full benefit of what that state considers are the natural advantages that ought to belong to it. I understand that is exactly what the Convention intends to prevent—that is, to prevent natural advantages being created by preferential tariffs. If the natural advantages exist you have to get the benefit of them on their own merits, and not by reason of any preferential rates which you make, and which give people in another state, not in your own state—because you can do what you like in your own state—a preference which it is the very object of the Convention to prevent. It is very agreeable to me to find the enforced accord of the two Premiers, and it is sweet to know that they agree.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Agree to have opposing armies on each side of every border.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

That is what they say, but although their promise is most gratifying to the ear, it is, I am afraid, rather blighting to the hope, because the view of the Premier of Victoria is that they should be left alone to fight out their own battles. And the very object of the Convention is to leave no battles to be fought out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You want to leave us with nothing to fight with, while you leave the other people everything to fight with.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am sure the right honorable member will agree that I do not wish to have anything of that kind.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That will be the effect.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not think it will be the effect. If my right honorable friend thinks that the words which he wishes to preserve in this clause will give him what he wants, he will find that, in the result, he is grievously mistaken, because I am perfectly certain that the other clause which the leader of the Convention has referred to is quite good enough to prevent Sir George Turner from entering into the contest which he seems to very agreeably contemplate.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We do not.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Then we had better understand each other.

Mr. REID. -

Do not make mischief between two friends.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I admit that it is a nasty job, especially so late in the evening.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I shall be glad if my honorable friend will show me that I am wrong; he has a better knowledge of constitutional matters than I have.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think the right honorable gentleman is wrong.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I shall be glad if my honorable friend can show me that I am wrong.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The view I take is that, according to clause 89, as the leader of the Convention has stated, it is quite clear that as soon as uniform duties have been imposed there shall be absolute free-trade between the colonies.

Mr. GORDON. -

That would not be so for five years.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Then there is an addendum proposed. The view which Mr. Barton took about the matter was that this makes it impossible for any state to impose a railway tariff which might operate as a limitation on trade and commerce.

Mr. ISAACS. -

How do you say that these two things are identical?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Well, that is my opinion. As a matter of law, in my opinion, these words are broad enough to give the High Court jurisdiction to stop any Victorian Tariff or any New South Wales Tariff which would have the effect of interfering with perfect freedom of trade; and if it should appear on the hearing of a case that New South Wales or Victoria had imposed a Tariff for the purpose, or which had the effect, of interfering with that provision for intercolonial free-trade, the provision, I think, would be held to be void.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is to say, a state can put on a Tariff to keep trade within its own borders, but not to draw trade from another state.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

A state can impose any Tariff within its own borders just as it pleases so long as that Tariff does not interfere, or has not the effect of interfering-I use both terms-with perfect freedom of commerce between the different colonies.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then I shall have to object to that clause as well as to the other.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Very likely, but it is just as well at this stage that we should understand one another.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not believe in thinking to one's self-"It is all right; they think it means that." Federation should be founded on a perfect understanding at the beginning, so that we can put trust in each other in the future. I thought it was to a large extent a matter of form when I moved this amendment, but I see now that it is a matter of substance. I thought it was a matter of form until the Premier of Victoria was invoked and gave vent to the utterance in which he showed, I think, a slight misunderstanding those federal principles that should be kept in view, and seemed to think that whatever may be done with regard to the other colonies, at all events, New South Wales and Victoria should on one particular question be left to fight it out between themselves. That is not the intention all.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Hear, hear; and it ought not to be.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
There is no fighting it out between the colonies to be permitted. The whole question is to be put in the domain of law under the authority of the new Parliament you are creating, and when you provide this law, if the right honorable gentleman says that he understands that after that Victoria or New South Wales can impose preferential rates in respect of certain classes of trade, I say unhesitatingly that that is exactly what this Bill is intended to prevent. I am sure that my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) will agree with me in that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I agree with you, too, only my difficulty is in the way you are wording it, and leaving New South Wales to do exactly what she likes, and shutting Victoria absolutely out.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
If my right honorable friend can show me that that is so I shall be with him. What we have said is that no state shall impose preferential rates.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That is, within the colony?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Yes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That makes all the difference. We have a little bit of a colony, and New South Wales has a very big territory, and if she imposes differential rates they will, so far as we are concerned, have the effect of preferential rates.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
My right honorable friend can impose whatever differential rates he likes, but not against another state.

Mr. ISAACS. -
They are not against another state.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
That is how I read it. Under all the circumstances, I think I must decline to withdraw my amendment.

Mr TRENWITH (Victoria). - I would respectfully point out to Sir John Downer that what he contemplates, and what is in the mind of Sir George Turner, is such an application of authority to railway rates within the colony as will have the effect of preventing the contravention of absolute freedom of intercourse between the colonies, as it is properly understood; that is to say, as will prevent trade from flowing in its natural channels. I do not mean by creating a barrier in the shape of anything like customs duties, or by what would be called preferential rates, but by creating what may be called a magnet to attract trade to a certain point to such an extent as to constitute a barrier to that trade flowing to its natural outlet. Taking the illustration we have in our mind, Riverina is about 200 miles distant from Melbourne, and about 400 miles from Sydney, and if there are no preferential or differential railway rates, the trade of Riverina will naturally flow to Melbourne. If there were complete freedom of inter-course between the colonies, most of the Riverina trade would take its natural course. But if any attraction is created to draw it to another point, that is to all intents and purposes a barrier to prevent the trade flowing to where it would flow were it not for that artificial attraction. That is exactly what Sir George Turner fears, and exactly what Mr. Reid has indicated, will take place. An attraction will be created in New South Wales in order to draw the trade of Riverina, not to where it would naturally flow in pursuance of the spirit of freedom of trade throughout the Commonwealth, but, in consequence of the attraction set up, to Sydney; and this attraction will operate as a barrier to the trade coming to Melbourne.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That is the kind of thing that the Victorian representatives have been fighting for all day.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Well, we are present fighting as independent states. That is to say, we are doing our best for our respective states—for the states we have the responsibility of managing. We are not at present united. But we are actuated by the federal spirit, and claim that immense advantages will come from the adoption of free and unfettered intercourse between the various states of the Commonwealth. Can any one say that we have unfettered intercourse when you allow all the resources of a powerful state to be devoted to attracting some of the trade within the Commonwealth from some particular point to which that trade would otherwise go? If we are to have it, we must be permitted to have it on fair and equal terms. We must not be expected to be content to juggle with the terms "differential" and "preferential." We will not be content to see the interference with trade by one system of rates permitted simply because those rates are called differential, and do not apply specially to traffic coming from beyond the boundary of a colony, and a similar kind of interference prohibited because it is brought about by rates termed "preferential." We have been fighting for the Riverina trade, and the Premier of Victoria says that we are prepared to continue to fight for it, and the probability is that, with the natural advantages so greatly in our favour, we shall fight for it successfully. But, if we are not to fight, the matter must be referred to some competent and fair tribunal, which will have the power to deal, not only with rates affecting the carriage between states, but also with rates which do not apply outside the colony in which they are levied, though they are designed to influence traffic in another state. I respectfully submit to the honorable member (Sir John Downer) that freedom of intercourse between the states should mean that the natural flow of trade in the Commonwealth should not be interfered with. If the honorable member carries his amendment he will, as has been pointed out by the Premier and by the Attorney-General of Victoria, tie the hands of this colony in its struggle for a trade which the Secretary for Lands of New South Wales has said naturally and properly belongs to it.

Mr. SYMON. -

The amendment of the honorable member (Sir John Downer) means really the same thing as the amendment of the leader of the Convention.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I think it does not, and I will endeavour to show why. Under this provision New South Wales could carry goods from Riverina to Sydney practically for nothing; not to make her railways pay, but to divert trade to Sydney.

Mr. SYMON. -

The Inter-State Commission would come into operation if this were unfair.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

We have not yet established the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. SYMON. -

But we are going to establish it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

If we establish an Inter-State Commission the amendment will be absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. REID. -

Even if the Inter-State Commission is not established you will have the protection of the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth, which will surely be as good.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The Federal Supreme Court will have to interpret the law as we make it, and if we agree to this amendment the court will say that New South Wales is acting within its rights in creating a strong attraction to draw trade to Sydney, because it does not by any export duty or tax prevent trade from coming to Victoria. If we leave that clause as it stands, it is doubtful whether we shall have the power to fight upon the best terms we can make for this trade that naturally and geographically belongs to us. This trade was created and has been developed by Victorian money.

Mr. REID. -
I should think that the people who settled in Riverina created it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
It has been created by Victorians, and with Victorian money.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Out of New South Wales land.

Mr. BARTON. -
Was the money a gift?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
No; it was spent to obtain a profit.

Mr. LYNE. -
Are you sure that you did not create Sydney?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
If we took the honorable member's estimate of himself, we should think there was very little he did not create. I am sure that Sydney money and Sydney people did not develop the Riverina trade, and that it was developed by Victorian money spent by Victorians living in Riverina—of course, to make more money. I am not saying that we have done anything to be proud of, or to be thankful for; I am only showing that this is our trade, and that, if no barriers are created, it will flow to Melbourne.

Mr. REID. -
Since our squatters settled Victoria, we might say that we created this colony.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
No doubt, to some extent you have done some good for Victoria, but there can also be no doubt that you have done harm. However, that is not the matter we are discussing now.

Mr. LYNE. -
The honorable member wants Riverina.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Yes. But I would see no objection to your having it if there is a fair fight, and our hands are not tied.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
The honorable member proposes to fight. That is a nice way to federate.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
If we are to declare that above all things, and at all times, there shall be absolute freedom of inter-course between the colonies, we must tie the hands of New South Wales, and prevent that colony from doing what we are not to be permitted to do.
Mr. LYNE. -

From getting its own trade from its own territory?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

That is where my honorable friend lacks the federal spirit.

Mr. REID. -

The honorable gentleman shows the Victorian spirit.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) cannot get beyond the boundaries of his colony. While he is clamouring for the abolition of the barriers we have created, he wants to raise up barriers himself. I admit that Victoria has probably done more than any other colony to establish barriers upon the borders, but we are now talking about knocking down these barriers. If we knock them down, let us make it impossible for any one else to create similar barriers. If the amendment of the honorable member (Sir John Downer) be carried, the hands of Victoria will be tied, while the hands of New South Wales will be left unbound, and New South Wales will be able to do, by means of differential rates, what we cannot do by means of preferential rates. Therefore, I strongly urge honorable members to leave the clause as it is. I consider that there must be an Inter-State Commission, which must have control of railways which go from state to state, and be able to interfere where railways are so managed as to influence the natural flow of trade between colonies. This commission must have the power to prevent one colony from imposing rates which will unfairly attract trade to its own territory. There can be no absolute freedom of intercourse between the colonies unless the power to create barriers of any kind at all is taken away.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

It seems to me that either the clause must be passed as the leader of the Convention has drawn it, or, what may be better still, it must not be passed at all. A great deal of the debate has gone far beyond the position which we at present occupy. I have very great sympathy with the Premier of Victoria. Any specific clause which would prevent the people of Victoria from imposing preferential rates, while the people of New South Wales were allowed to carry on the struggle for trade by imposing differential rates, would be unfair to Victoria. But the question, of course, arises under other clauses of this Bill—for example under sub-section (1) of clause 52—could these preferential rates be continued? It is questionable whether they could or not. I do not think this Convention has absolutely settled whether that clause would do it or not. It would be a matter of opinion, more or less, among honorable members. Now, a great deal of argument has been used, first, as if we had gone as far as the Inter-State Commission, which we have not yet reached; and, secondly, by my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers) and others, entirely on the basis of the necessity to federalize the railways. Now, the railways cannot be federalized at the present time.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

It is just as easy as to federate the colonies if you only tackle it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If we take the absolute opinion of honorable members of this Convention as to what they would like to see, probably there might be a majority in favour of federalizing the railways. Others would say that they hoped to see them federalized a little later on, but I think most will say that, as a matter of pure policy at the present time, we are not ripe for any such operation, and that any attempt to do that would practically jeopardize the whole of this scheme before the people. Now, we have only reached this stage, as far as I can understand it, in our Bill—that these preferential rates may be nullified by certain general clauses in the Bill, and it does seem to me that for us to put into this measure at this particular time anything that would strike a direct blow at Victoria until some other provisions have been made would be a very unfederal and unfair act. I myself believe that several other clauses which have been introduced of a declaratory character—of course, I only speak as a layman—are more or less surplusage, and I doubt—I say this, of course, with a great deal of diffidence whether this clause is necessary at all. It certainly seems to me—and I only just rose for the purpose of saying this—that it lies in all fairness between the clause as drafted by Mr. Barton and knocking out the clause altogether.

Sir John Downer's amendment was negatived.

On the question that the proposed new clause be inserted in the Bill, Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria) said -

I may state that several who voted with me this afternoon upon my new clause have indicated that they wish me to submit my proposal in a slightly altered form, and I propose to move it by way of an addition to the clause which the leader of the Convention is submitting. I propose to add to the new clause the following:-

Neither the Commonwealth, nor any state, nor any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, shall make any law or regulation relating to railway rates with the view of attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another.

The position is this: That in deference to the remarks which were made during the course of the debate today, I am going to restrict the proposal which I made to a prohibition of unfair differential adjustments with regard to railway rates. My proposal this morning was criticised upon the ground that it was too wide. It has been said that as a sequel to the leader of the Convention's proposal, it would come in well if restricted to the case of railway rates. I have fully explained the position I take up, and I shall not do so again, but I may say that the object of this amendment is that we shall not have preferential rates, and that we shall not have unfair differential rates. I want to prevent both. I am convinced that if the clause were passed as the leader of the Convention has submitted it, preferential rates could be stopped, but unfair differential rates could not.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The ports of one state might be nearer than the ports of another.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There would be no occasion then for any attempt to attract trade from one port to another. It is the suggestion I made this morning, modified to meet the criticisms of certain honorable members who said that my proposal was too wide. The effect of this would be that with one stroke we would stop both preferential and unfair differential rates. The proposal now is to be restricted to regulations or laws which relate to railway rates.

Mr. REID. -

You are simply giving us the same discussion over again.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales is right, and he is wrong. He is wrong in stating it is the same thing. I have just indicated that it is different in one respect.

Mr. REID. -

I said that it raises the same discussion.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I hope that there will be no discussion. I am simply indicating what the amendment is, and surely a member of the committee, on a grave matter of this sort, is at least entitled to do that. I am not going into any long discussion about the Wabash case. We have had enough of American decisions, and this is a most unfit place in which to discuss decisions. I know what I want, and I desire to put it in plain language which we can all understand.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I have been listening all day, without taking much part in the debate, to the arguments of our able constitutional lawyers with regard to the meaning of certain words and of certain clauses, and with reference to the effect of certain amendments. I confess that I am absolutely confused as to the meaning of the clause, and as to the effect of the amendments. That being so, how can we expect the laymen in this Convention, and the people outside, to understand what we mean when we have framed this Constitution? We ought to have this matter settled once and for all in what seems to me to be a federal manner. It may be thought that I want to keep on this war of rates. I have no desire whatever to do that. I want it to cease at the earliest possible moment; but my one fear is—and I cannot get rid of that fear, although I may be absolutely wrong—that if I consent to these amendments, and to the clause in the Bill as proposed, I may be tying the hands of the colony of Victoria and leaving the colony of New South Wales absolutely free. That I cannot do, because when we once pass the Constitution we cannot alter it.

Mr. REID. -

You have a very able Attorney-General to advise you.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I have an able Attorney-General, whose opinion I value, and whose opinion I generally find to be correct. I have other able colleagues who hold legal positions, and I find them differing absolutely as to the meaning of the clauses.

Mr. REID. -

It is these night sittings that are doing it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I want to deal with this matter in an absolutely federal spirit, and I say now that the length to which I am prepared to go is this: That if our Drafting Committee will put the clause in such a form as that it will leave to the Federal Parliament full and ample powers to decide all these questions with regard to warring rates, I will not only be prepared to support it, but I will be prepared myself to move it.

Mr. BARTON. -

I may say at once that I will not ask the Drafting Committee to take in hand any question of policy unless the Convention first expresses its view as to the policy.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then I will have to draft something myself which will carry out that idea, leaving it to the Drafting Committee afterwards to put it into proper shape. I always hold that those who have the drafting of a measure, who have every clause in their minds, should make any necessary amendments. Many of the serious defects in our laws are caused by amendments being proposed which in their particular wording do not work in with the wording used by the draftsman of the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -
The Drafting Committee will be quite willing to render any assistance they can after the resolutions have been carried.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is all I can expect from the Drafting Committee.

I am not prepared to move that amendment to-night unless I put it into the baldest possible form. I voted against the Hon. Mr. Higgins' amendments because I believed they would have an effect contrary to what he intended. He is very strong in the opinion that they would carry out what he desires and what I desire. I have very grave doubts whether that is so. I think the proper course for us to pursue is not to attempt here to decide these matters. We are prepared, in regard to many more important questions, to place our absolute trust and confidence in the Federal Parliament to do what is right and just to all the colonies, and I say now, as one of the representatives of Victoria, that I am prepared to advocate that course with regard to this question, and I am prepared to press upon the people of Victoria that it is the proper course to take in the interests of federation.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I wish to congratulate the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) on the speech he has made. I have been wishing all day, and a good many other members have been wishing too, that we could have the assistance of Victoria, as we had in Adelaide, towards a pacific policy, towards the ending of this railway strife; and welcome indeed the return of Victoria to the pacific fold.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I offered this in Sydney.

Mr. REID. -

Wait a moment; don't be too soon, they may leave you again.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I offer my right honorable friend my congratulations right away, and if he will bring forward such a clause as he suggested, he will have a strong support from the colony I represent, and I will do my best to secure the passing of the clause.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I wish to say a few words about the amendment of my learned friend (Mr. Higgins). It strikes me that he has made a very ingenious attempt to get this question before the Convention again, it having been practically settled this afternoon.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I have been asked by several honorable members who misunderstood the question to bring it forward again.
Mr. BARTON. -

This amendment differs slightly in form from the other. It is in order, I think. If it had been in precisely the same terms as the other, it would not have been in order. The former amendment applied to all laws or regulations with the view to attract trade to the ports of one state as against the ports of another. The present amendment applies only to railway rates, but every honorable member knows that the amendment which was negatived was aimed at railway rates, and at nothing else.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But several honorable members voted against my proposal because it was so wide.

Mr. BARTON. -

My belief of the matter is that the majority of the committee opposed that amendment because they thought that it was specially aimed at railway rates. We were discussing railway rates from the time we began this discussion, about three or four o'clock yesterday afternoon, till the time my learned friend moved his amendment, and I do not think anything else but the competition of railway rates has been the subject of discussion ever since that was moved. I think that nearly every honorable member who voted must have known what the drift of the amendment was. Inasmuch as my learned friend has restricted his present amendment to railway rates, instead of laws or regulations to attract trade from the ports of one state to the ports of another, it cannot be objected to on the score of order. But there is a more serious objection to this amendment. The former one was implanted in a clause, since struck out, which dealt with derogations from freedom of trade and commerce, and the effect of the amendment was to limit a certain class of laws or regulations as they affected freedom of trade and commerce. The whole of that clause has been struck out, and this amendment is proposed as an addendum to a clause which deals only with a prohibition against the Commonwealth to give a preference between states, so that it occupies a totally different position from the other one. Either it is meant to raise the same point as the other one did, or, if it is not, it assumes such a totally different aspect that really this clause would almost be a prohibition to any state to make any railway rates. Let us look at the amendment:-

Neither the Commonwealth, nor any state, nor any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, shall make any law or regulation relating to railway rates with the view of attracting trade to the ports of one state as against the ports of another.

There is scarcely a rate that could be made on a railway which would not fall within the prohibition of this amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Do you say that all rates are made with the view of attracting trade to ports?

Mr. BARTON. -
Every rate which is made on a railway which communicates directly with a port is made with a view to attract goods to that port, and two ports which are connected by a railway attract trade each to each, by that line. What is there in this clause which saves almost any rate from being made the subject of an inhibition? What I am saying now is said in order that my honorable friend may have an opportunity to forward his view. We have been sitting some time, and shortly it will be a proper thing to report progress. I am only making these few remarks now in order to put my views before the honorable member, because he may see fit to give this clause some form which might deprive it of the objections I have to it. To repeat myself, lest I should be misunderstood, let me say that either this is the same thing in substance which we negatived this morning, in which case it is rather too much to ask the Convention to deal with it now again, or else it is a totally different thing; and, instead of being a clause about derogating from freedom of trade and commerce, it is a clause which might have the effect of causing the inhibition of almost any rates we could devise. I submit we shall have to negative the amendment in this form, but I have spoken in order to enable the honorable member to bring forward his views tomorrow in a form which will be acceptable to the Convention.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You are against the fundamental idea of stopping differential rates?

Mr. BARTON. -
I am totally against stopping developmental rates. I am totally in favour of preventing any rate which wears the false mask of a developmental rate from being used for the purpose of improperly interfering with inter-state traffic.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You limit it to that. That is the point of fundamental difference.

Mr. BARTON. -
I see no fundamental difference unless it consists in this; and the remarks of Mr. Trenwith and Mr. Higgins' interjection lead me to make these observations. Mr. Trenwith's speech rang with the idea that you should not take trade from its natural channels. Now, I want to know what is meant by the natural channels of trade? If you give advantages to people outside your borders which amount to bonuses as against your own producers, and if, in addition to that, in your freight rates you handicap your own producers in their competition with outside producers, and if you do that for the purpose of taking traffic from another colony, will anybody tell me that the channel that that traffic takes is its proper natural channel?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Yes, if that is done in answer to other rates as low.

Mr. BARTON. -
There may be something in that, but we understand that it was by this bonus system which was adopted by Victoria that Victoria got, and means to hold, this trade, and, if so, is it not plain that the undertaking of that system called forth these counter rates? It is by these temptations that this trade has been got and developed, and it is by the continuance of the system that this trade is hoped to be retained.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You started the cutting rates.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not wish to act in any spirit other than conciliatory towards honorable members, but the remarks I have just made were prompted by what Mr. Trenwith said, and by the interjection of Mr. Higgins. I do not think that traffic is going in its natural channels when it is attracted into those channels by giving premiums to outsiders, and handicapping your own producers. I am not in favour of all differential rates. I am in favour of the principle of less rates for long haulage. You cannot work railways without that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
We are all in favour of that.

Mr. BARTON. -
I am in favour of applying that principle to the traffic of a railway which is within a state's own borders-which begins and ends in that state. But I express this qualification-that, where that kind of rate is designed and used for the purpose of infringing the proper province of the Commonwealth to regulate trade and intercourse among the states themselves-inter-state trade and traffic-it then becomes an unconstitutional proceeding. I have expressed that view several times, and I hold that, under that view, this amendment would be totally unnecessary. If it is intended to introduce any view more extensive than that-

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It is.

Mr. BARTON. -
Then it is intended to introduce a view which deprives the state of the internal regulation of its own trade, and in that respect I will have to oppose it, root and branch.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I very much regret that it should be found necessary to discuss this matter at such length, but, of course, I must make allowance for diversity of interest causing diversity of opinion. We have had experience of that during this Convention in regard to the rivers. That was a pitched battle between the South Australian and the New South Wales representatives. Now we have a sort of pitched battle between the representatives of three of the colonies—South Australia, New South Wales, and Victoria.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

A triangular duel.

Mr. REID. -

They have been living on one colony for a long time.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

In my opinion, under existing conditions, where each state is practically, for all purposes, a sovereign state, and has entire management of its own affairs, each state has a right to its own trade. I think no one will deny that each state, under existing conditions, has an absolute right to its own trade, and there is no power that I know of, except the power of the House of Commons at home, which can interfere with its management of that trade. But I agree that under the Federation which we are trying to bring into existence each state is prepared to give way to some extent, in order to have the blessings of free intercourse between the states, which it is believed will be to the advantage of the people of the whole of Australia generally. Now, it seems to me that this discussion might be very much shortened if all honorable members agreed to fall in with the view expressed by Sir George Turner, that a clause should be inserted in this Bill giving absolute power to the Commonwealth to step in in any case in which one state desired to monopolize its own trade to the disadvantage of another state.

Mr. REID. -

Its own trade? I thought you said it had a right to develop its own trade.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I said it has, under existing conditions; but at the same time, what is desired by all the states, except the one I represent, is to get a bit of the trade of another state.

Mr. REID. -

We have never gone for it, and precious little we have got of it.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Victoria desires to have the Riverina, trade.
Mr. REID. -
They are nibbling all round us, but we do not seek to get the trade of other colonies.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Our good friends from South Australia want to take in every part of Australia, whether it is far away up the Darling to Bourke, over to Broken Hill, to Coolgardie in the West, or down in Tasmania. Those enterprising people seem to desire to have a share of all the trade. Well, we all admire their enterprise, and we all owe them deep debts of thanks for trying to serve their own interests in pushing their trade all over Australia, doing good for themselves and doing good to others.
Mr. GORDON. -
Especially the latter.
Mr. SYMON. -
You will not allow us to do good to you.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
My sense of fair play revolts at the idea that, after we erect this Commonwealth, any state should be allowed to charge less on its railways to the people of a neighbouring state than it charges to its own people. In fact, that seems to me, even without federation, to be very unfair.
Mr. BARTON. -
And that is the cause of all the trouble.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That position certainly cannot be supported by any good argument, from the point of view of fairness, unless we regard ourselves as states having no interest in one another, and only concerned each in the development of our own interests. I hope that, under federation, that state of affairs will not prevail. In fact, I could not bring myself to vote for any proposal by which, for example, the people of Victoria could charge the people of New South Wales less for traffic over the Victorian Railways than they charge to Victorians, or vice versà. That seems to me a proposal for which, under any circumstances, even if we were to wreck federation over it, I really could not vote.
Mr. LYNE. -
Victoria is doing that now to the extent of 61 per cent.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Under federation she will have to give it up.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
New South Wales is doing a jolly sight worse, as I will tell you presently.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Under federation, each colony will have to submit to the rules of the Commonwealth. I understand that Sir George Turner is willing to leave this matter entirely in the hands of the Commonwealth, and we may rest assured that the Commonwealth will not tolerate anything of that sort. My principal object in rising was to suggest to the leader of the Convention that if that is considered a reasonable proposal—that the Commonwealth should have power to deal with any state which was acting unfairly, in the opinion of the Commonwealth, to another state—I think we might all be satisfied.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have explained that that is really a power given under the trade and commerce clause.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But you differ as to what, is unfair.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am not so sure myself about it. My own opinion is that where a state has certain rights to manage its own business in its own way, unless you take those rights away from it in express terms, there will be difficulty. I hope that by tomorrow we will be able to come to a conclusion on this question, and not spend another day over it, very interesting and very important though it is. The time is approaching when we will have to turn our faces homewards in a very few days, and I think that if those honorable members who are interested in this matter will come together and frame a clause, general in its terms, which can be applied as the circumstances arise, it might be better than any express provision for meeting the difficulty at the present time.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I hope honorable members, in thinking this matter over, will so bear this in mind—that while it is absolutely right that the Commonwealth should have power to see that, as regards the commerce between the states, there is no unfair attempt to draw trade from one state into another; that so long as the state has its sovereignty and possesses its own railways, it must be left absolutely free as to the trade of its own colony within its own boundaries, and that no other settlement of that matter will be a federal settlement.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does the right honorable gentleman refer to the trade that will naturally flow into another colony?
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Trade cannot flow naturally into any place, unless there are the men in existence there to supply the trade. Trade simply follows the direction that humanity gives it. In order that there may be a little thought over the state of things that has arisen, I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

THE HON. J.N. BRUNKER.

Mr. BRUNKER (New South Wales). -

Mr. President, I should like to relieve myself of a deep debt of gratitude which I feel I owe to the members of this Convention, for the kindness conceded to me under the uncontrollable circumstances which prevented my attending the sittings before today. I feel I cannot find words sufficient to express to members of this Convention my deep sense of gratitude for their kindness towards me.

EVENING SITTINGS.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

Before we adjourn, I understand there is some question as to whether we shall be sitting at night next week. If the leader would give us an indication now, it might be of assistance to honorable members. I am anxious to know when the Drafting Committee are likely to have the three days' adjournment which has been spoken of, because there is a desire to have a conference of the Premiers during those days?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The position is this: After we have gone through the clauses, the preamble, and the new clauses, I shall, before the reconsideration of the clauses comes on, ask that a print be made of the Bill as amended, with the Drafting Committee's amendments as so far made, so as to enable honorable members to see the work done. But that must be done concurrently with the sittings. There will be no further evening sittings this week except on Thursday, but I think there will have to be evening sittings next week. On the reconsideration of some of the clauses there will be debate, particularly in reference to the clauses relating to disagreements between the Houses. On these latter clauses there is sure to be a debate of, at least, a couple of days. Taking all these things into consideration, I do not think that the adjournment to which Sir George Turner has referred can, under any circumstances, be obtained before the middle of next week. I should think it much more likely to be the end of the week before there can be an adjournment. But I shall go on asking for evening sittings, at any rate, on Thursday and Tuesday nights next; and, if special reason arises, I will ask for an evening sitting on Wednesday.

The Convention adjourned at nine minutes past ten o'clock p.m

[P.1355] starts here
Wednesday, 23rd February, 1898.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITION.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I have the honour to present a petition from various banking institutions in the colony of Victoria, praying that the Convention will not deprive them of the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I beg to move-
That the petition be received and read.

The motion was agreed to.

The CLERK read the petition, as follows:-

To the Right Honorable the President and the Members of the Australian Federal Convention, in session assembled.

The Petition of the undersigned Banking Companies, trading in Victoria, humbly sheweth-

1. That your petitioners have had under consideration that clause in the Bill now before your honorable Convention dealing with appeals from decisions of the local courts, and are of opinion that the existing right of appeal to the highest court in the empire should be preserved.

2. That, having regard to the extensive and increasing business relations between Australia and the other parts of the empire, as well as the necessity for maintaining confidence in Australian investments, it is of the utmost importance that the final Court of Appeal should be the Privy Council, so as to insure certainty and uniformity in the decision of all mercantile and other questions depending on principles of law common to the empire.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that your honorable Convention will not deprive them of this right of appeal to Her Majesty.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -
I beg to move-
That the standing orders be suspended, in order to enable a motion to be moved without notice.

The motion I wish to move is for leave of absence to be granted to the Hon. William Moore, who is too ill to be able to make his appearance in the Convention. He may not be able to attend for several days owing to his illness, but he may come back to-day or to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I beg to move-

That seven days' leave of absence be granted to the Hon. William Moore on account of illness.

The motion was agreed to.

STATE OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should like to draw the attention of the Convention to the state of business. I am quite sure that all honorable members are with me in desiring that the business of this Convention shall be expedited, so far as that can be done without sacrificing the due discussion of all matters coming before us; and it occurs to me that perhaps I am not asking too much if I suggest that we might all engage in a self-denying ordinance in one respect by undertaking, where arguments have been previously used by ourselves, not to repeat them. My right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) shakes his head, but I do not know that that is an effective answer to what I am saying. I would also suggest that we might say to ourselves that where another honorable member has put an argument which we may have a desire to put, and has put it sufficiently well, we should not repeat it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

It may not satisfy the gallery.

Mr. BARTON. -

But I think it will satisfy the public at large if we prevent any undue prolongation of our discussions, so long as we discuss fully and fairly the matters that come before us. There is a certain notice on the paper which I may indicate by way of illustration, that will revive the whole discussion upon railways, and I do think that so much has been said on both sides of that subject that we might very well so manage the matter as to be able to decide any question of that sort today. I am not making special reference to that matter, because we have yet to deal with new clauses and with the reconsideration of the Bill. All I say is that it is not a good thing for the Convention that we should have too many night sittings. I did hope that we should get through the business of the Convention without any night sittings at all, but we have had to begin them. I ask that we may so manage our business as not to require an unnecessary number of night sittings; and I think that, even so, we may still get through our business during the next fortnight. I think with a little selfdenial all round we shall be able to do that. I certainly shall not ask from any honorable member what I am not willing to do myself.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on Mr. Barton's proposed clause 95A (in substitution for clause 95), which was as follows:-

The Commonwealth shall not give preference, by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue, to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof;

and on Mr. Higgins' proposed addition thereto, as follows:-

Neither the Commonwealth, nor any state, nor any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, shall make any law or regulation relating to railway rates with the view of attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I have an amendment to propose as an addition to Mr. Barton's proposed clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The position now is that nothing has been inserted in the Bill in place of clause 95; all we have done is to amend the proposed new clause, and the question before the committee is that the proposed new clause as amended be inserted in the Bill. Upon that motion I understand that an amendment is to be moved by Mr. Reid.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Although I voted-

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I believe that, as a matter of courtesy, I am allowed to write out an amendment. I am really in possession of the Chair.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You propose to make an addition to the clause; I wish to amend it.

Mr. REID. -

Then, in that case, I will give way to you.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No amendment can be made in the words that have been agreed to.

Mr. REID. -

I beg to move that the following words be added to the clause as amended:-

But nothing in this Constitution shall be taken to interfere with the power of any state or authority constituted by a state to arrange rates upon lines of railway so as to secure payment of working expenses and interest on the cost of construction.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is quite necessary now.

Mr. REID. -

We will get a straight vote on this, and see what honorable members mean.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

In a few words I desire to state what I intend to do. I shall vote against the whole clause, with a view of supporting the proposal of which the Right Hon. Sir George Turner has given notice, and which appears to me to meet the whole case better than any of the propositions before the Convention.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

It is a great pity that we have added Mr. Higgins' amendment to the clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Honorable members cannot go back upon or comment upon former decisions.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am only giving a reason for the course I intend to take. The first part of the amended clause inserts in the Constitution a prohibition which seems to be absolutely necessary. I quite appreciate what my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) has said, but we cannot vote against the whole clause. We

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

He was fighting against the same thing all day.

Mr. SYMON. -

He may have been. I do not care whether a man has been fighting against a thing all day or all the week if at the finish he submits something that is worthy of consideration, it is our duty to consider it. It would have been better if the matter had been postponed yesterday evening, with a view to Sir George Turner, with the assistance of his Attorney-General, preparing some amendment that would solve this problem or cut this Gordian knot. We should have been more likely to produce satisfaction by dealing with the question in that way than by making the addition that has been made to the clause. I should have been glad to consider the Hon. Mr. Higgins' amendment from a different point of view, but for the reasons I have given. I do not see how I can vote against the whole clause, and I hope that some means will be adopted to enable us to consider Sir George Turner's suggestion, with a view of arriving at a reasonable and complete solution.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I address myself to this question, for the first time, and with the greatest reluctance, partly because I have entertained an opinion different from that of some other representatives of Victoria, for whose judgment on these matters I have a great regard, and partly because I have failed to see that the Convention had come to any such specific issue as demanded any contribution. I have striven throughout the whole of our sittings not to speak, save under necessity, and now rise only to state, in a very few words, what appears to be the position. In the first place, I gave the vote just recorded deliberately, a similar vote yesterday, and will give it again on every opportunity afforded to me. One need not refer to the difference of opinion as to how far the words which Mr. Higgins has used are capable of one or other of the interpretations given to them, because yesterday we had a statement from him of what is intended to be implied by the amendment. He expressed his willingness to leave himself, beyond the assertion of the principle, entirely in the hands of the Drafting Committee as to the form of expression which should be given to it after the Convention had approved it. What Mr. Higgins said yesterday evening was this:

I do not profess to be the draftsman of the Bill, and I ask the Convention to allow a division to be taken on the merits of this question, the substantial question being as to whether we shall be so far federal as to insist that unfair differential rates-unreasonable differential rates-rates which are not merely developmental, shall be prohibited by this Bill, or, rather, that it shall be left to the Inter-State Commission to say whether those rates come within the unfair category or not. I appeal to honorable members to vote on the substantial question, because we shall be able, in the event of my amendment being passed, to trust to the skill and far-sightedness of the Drafting Committee.

That is a clear intimation of what the honorable member's intention was.

Mr. BARTON. - How can the Drafting Committee alter the policy of this amendment?

Mr. DEAKIN. - They are not asked to do so.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). - I rise to order, I was called to order for referring incidentally to Mr. Higgins' amendment, and the honorable member is apparently discussing the whole merits of that proposal.

The CHAIRMAN. - I have given a ruling, and I think that, in the interests of finality, it ought to be obeyed—that is, that we ought not to re-open questions that have been decided. No doubt the honorable member is quite in order in alluding to former debates and decisions to illustrate the arguments he is adducing, but he must not rediscuss the question.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). - It is not my intention to do so. I have simply sought to state the position, and now propose to discuss the further amendment submitted by Mr. Reid. We have said in addition to the declaration that "The Commonwealth shall not give preference, by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue, to one state or any part thereof over another state or part thereof," that "Neither the Commonwealth, nor any state, nor any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, shall make any law or regulation relating to railway rates with a view of attracting trade to ports of one state as against ports of another." The intention of that is, while leaving all developmental rates directly under the control of the state in which they are imposed, to prevent under cover of such rates a war of rates really designed to be preferential.

Mr. BARTON. - I hope the honorable member does not think it is within the province of the Drafting Committee so to read the debates as to carry out the intentions of an honorable member without regard to the words of his motion.

Mr. DEAKIN. - I will not reply to that interjection, desiring to conclude. The position we now find ourselves in is this: We have said that the Commonwealth shall not give preferences, that neither the states nor the Commonwealth shall impose what are practically preferential rates, that is, rates that are competitive and not merely developmental, and now we are asked to add another proviso, to the effect that this shall not be taken to prohibit any state from making such charges upon its railway system as may be required to pay working expenses and interest upon the cost of construction. The object of that, apparently, is to negative the provisions we have already made, but I have my doubts as to whether the amendment would have that effect. I have my doubts, after listening to it as read, whether it would interfere at all with what we have carried. In any case this appears to be an unsuitable and improper place in which to introduce any such amendment. It is not intended to complete the clause or the sense of the clause in any way. The proposal just accepted by the Convention does not imply anything necessarily antagonistic to this amendment, for all that is aimed at is to prevent unfair rates-rates which under cover of being developmental have a distinctly anti-federal purpose, and that is a reasonable thing for the Convention to do. I, as one who has consistently advocated since the Convention first met the federalization of the whole of the railways, feel bound to adopt this as the furthest point to which it is possible to go now without interfering with the management by each state of its own railways. The clause, as it stands, need not, and will not, involve any interference with the management by each state of its own railways so far as its capacity to render them payable is concerned, unless under that pretence rates are imposed the object of which is to deprive some other state of traffic that would otherwise be attracted to it. I have the misfortune not to agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) in regard to the position of Victoria. I believe the Bill, as it stands, contains provisions of the most serious import to this colony, and regard this amendment as a means that is offered to us of mitigating a threatened injury.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am very much inclined, if the clause remains as amended, to vote against it. I am disposed to vote for the Right Hon. Mr. Reid's amendment, but even if that addition is made to the clause I do not think it will satisfy me. The reason why I am inclined to vote against the clause as amended is this: The first part of the clause, the part which I drew, is a prohibition upon the Commonwealth against giving preference by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof. The addition is this. There is a prohibition not only upon the Commonwealth but upon the states, and upon authorities constituted by the Commonwealth or by the states, preventing them from making rates with a view to attracting trade to the ports of one state from the ports of another. I cannot understand how the passage quoted from the speech of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) can be reconciled with the words of his amendment. The purport of this provision is not to prohibit fair developmental rates. If words mean anything its purport is that there shall be carried out by the Commonwealth and by every state some sort of arrangement by which points of equidistance between rival railway lines shall be established, and the rates shall be fixed in such a way that no particle of traffic can pass those points in its passage to a port. I do not care what my honorable friend meant by his speech; that is the meaning of the amendment. Supposing this matter, as has been suggested, were left to the Drafting Committee, all it could do would be to loyally give effect to the sense of the amendment. The committee could not alter it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am afraid that several honorable members differ from you as to the meaning of the amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am prepared for that, but I am expressing my own views about the matter. To me the meaning of the amendment seems perfectly clear. It is a prohibition against the framing of rates with a view to attracting trade to the ports of one state from the ports of another, and to my mind that prohibition can be reasonably satisfied only by fixing equidistant points. If an arrangement is to be made in any other way, in what way is it to be made? In what way does the amendment indicate that developmental rates are to be allowed, and preferential rates prevented? It was clear enough, under the clause relating to trade and commerce, that preferential rates were to be prevented, and developmental rates allowed. Now we have this qualification placed upon the clause as I moved it. The difference which it makes, in addition to what I have already pointed out, will be a very serious one. The first part of the clause says that "The Commonwealth shall not give preference," and so on. Honorable members will find there a clearly expressed prohibition of any preference being given.

Then there is the addition preventing the Commonwealth from making any law or regulation with regard to railway rates to attract trade from the ports of one state to the ports of another. That means that preferences being already prohibited in the earlier part of the clause, something else is to be prohibited which is not a preference.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Something which is not upon the surface a preference.

Mr. BARTON. -
Something which is not a preference at all. If we are not to be ensnared in some bewilderment of words, it must be agreed that there is a clear prohibition of a preference so far as the Commonwealth is concerned in the first part of the clause, and that the second part of the clause prohibits something which is not a preference. I challenge any lawyer or any honorable member who pays respect to the English language to deny that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Before the honorable and learned member goes further, I would ask him if, independently of that, there is any power elsewhere in the Constitution allowing the Commonwealth to make laws with regard to railway rates?

Mr. BARTON. -
There is no power to make railway rates; but in the clause giving the power to regulate trade and commerce there is the power to prohibit what is bad. It is quite possible that this provision may give an implied power to make rates, but that would be still further from the intention of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins).

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The honorable and learned member has forgotten that the Federal Parliament has power to take over the railways with the consent of the states.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes; but my honorable friend cannot call that to his aid, because he cannot call this general provision to the aid of a merely permissive one.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That is no answer at all.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, it is. The honorable member is aiming at something beyond the permissive power given in clause 52. The addition of my honorable friend being limited to a prohibition of railway rates which may attract trade to the ports of one state from the ports of another, the necessary implication is that similar rates are permitted in regard to river carriage and every species clause, for a state to frame non-preferential rates with any certainly that the Commonwealth would allow them. This interference which is sanctioned by the clause as amended would go to this extent, that any state in attempting to frame a railway tariff would be constantly hampered by the knowledge that, even though it might not be seeking a preference, its rates might be over-ruled by the Commonwealth. That would be intolerable to every state in the Union. I think the clause should be guarded by some provision which will make it clear that it is not intended to deprive the states of the opportunity to earn the expenses of railway management and the interest upon railway construction.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The states would never be safe from applications for injunctions.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The states would never be safe from applications for injunctions.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, and even with the addition of the amendment of the Premier of New South Wales, the clause will be prolific of lawsuits. There will be dozens of applications to the Federal High Court.

Mr. SYMON. -

Instead of one High Court, we shall want two or three.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. We should have to go back upon our work, and arrange for the appointment of twelve Judges and a Chief Justice, instead of three and a Chief Justice. A clause of this kind as it stands is eminently open to misunderstanding, and entirely misleading. I am sure that the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) does not want to be the author of a misleading provision, and I hope that something will be done to prevent any provision from getting into the Constitution which will be such a fruitful cause of uncertainty and confusion, of financial injury and litigation.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would point out to the committee that the question now before us is the addition of the words proposed by the Premier of New South Wales.
Perhaps we had better get rid of this amendment before we discuss the whole clause.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I was going to say, with reference to my amendment, that I only justify it because of the words which have already been inserted in the clause. I feel it absolutely necessary that, if the words which have been added to the clause are to remain in it, my amendment should be carried, and for obvious reasons. I do not think any honorable member can wish that the lines of railway which have been developed in the separate existence of the states should be so interfered with as to practically throw them upon the hands of the states. Of course I am only warranted, in one sense, in representing the interests of New South Wales in this matter, but the provision is of general application to all the states upon the mainland which have lines of railway, though the case of New South Wales is a particularly hard one. Although it has been stated over and over again by my honorable friends opposite that Melbourne is the natural port for the Riverina trade, we must not forget that heavy duties were put upon the live stock of Riverina to prevent it from being sent to its natural port, and that heavy duties were put upon agricultural produce to prevent the farmers of Riverina from sending their wheat to their natural port. Since Victoria shut her doors in this way upon the producers of Riverina, and prevented them from getting to their natural market, it was only common justice to the settlers in this rich tract of country that the New South Wales Government should come to their rescue, and make railways to enable them to get their produce to Sydney. This was a necessity that was thrust upon us. We did not create obstacles to prevent the wheat and live stock of Riverina, from going to its natural market, and it is almost too much now to hear people like the honorable member (Mr. Trenwith) talking so glibly about Melbourne being the natural port of Riverina. The development of the rich agricultural areas of Riverina was blasted by the policy adopted by Victoria in shutting her doors against their produce.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Not blasted; they could not blast it, although they tried do so.

Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend is quite right. I want to point out that, in common fairness, the New South Wales Government had to come to the rescue of these settlers and make railways into Riverina, in order to give the people there a market. We, having been forced into that position, I ask the Convention if, in common honesty, any provision should be put into the Constitution to prevent us from imposing such rates as will pay for the grease upon the axles of the railway trucks?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What about freedom of trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth?

Mr. REID. -

Surely the Convention is not going to throw railways like these upon our hands without giving us the power to run them in such a way as will pay working expenses and interest upon the cost of construction.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

But this is a magnificent country.

Mr. REID. -

That is why the railways went there. My right honorable friend has a magnificent country, but he had to ask for special terms for it a day or two ago. Now I want special terms for the railways of Riverina.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We will give you five years.

Mr. REID. -

That seems to be a favorite period with the members of the Convention, but five years would not mean much in the history of a line of railway. I am absolutely in favour of extending freedom of trade as far as possible. More than that, I point to what I have done already as an earnest that I am sincere in this respect. But when I have to deal with the existing state of things, with the property belonging to the state, I have to some extent to see that that property does not go to wreck and ruin. I am bound to do that, and I do not care whether the railways are in Victoria, New South Wales, or South Australia. The Riverina Railway, when it was constructed, was also in this position. In 1887 a duty on wheat was imposed by South Australia, and even although the rivers were snagged to enable South Australian enterprise to use those rivers, to carry on our trade, our farmers found that, when they sent their wheat down to South Australia, the door was shut in their faces.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Shame!

Mr. REID. -

I do not say it is a shame, but those railways were absolutely necessary under such circumstances in order to find a market for our settlers. I am no opponent of the freest commercial enterprise, so long as the Commonwealth—and then it would not be the Commonwealth, but New South Wales, because we should have to provide 40 per cent. of the money—but so long as the Commonwealth would come in and make up the loss which would be inflicted under this provision of Mr. Higgins', I am quite willing to have trade and intercourse on our railways as free as possible. But unless the Commonwealth takes the railways over it is impossible to do justice to our railways unless we are allowed freedom of management, at any rate, up to the point at which we can pay the interest and working expenses. Unless we can do that, the honorable member, by his amendment, is practically taking the property of the state, and making it worthless. I am afraid I cannot be a party to that, although I am quite in favour of the freest play of trade throughout the Commonwealth.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I would like to point out that I am one of those who believe the drift of trade ought to be towards its natural outlet. In the votes I have hitherto given on this Bill with regard to the rivers, and now with regard to the railways, I have always had the object of allowing that state of things to exist. By the clause proposed by Mr. Barton dealing with preferential rates the Commonwealth would not have the power to interfere with these railway rates, but the states would be allowed to do so. Under these circumstances, although we have built this railway into Riverina, if Victoria were content to allow the trade which belongs to her to flow from Riverina by her railways, I would not object to any concession she might give to our people in that part of the country as against her own people. But she is not content with that. By her railway system she has endeavoured to annex nearly the whole of our territory in the western and central divisions of New South Wales. The map which was laid on the table in Adelaide shows that over an area extending from a line about 30 or 40 miles north of the Murray, south of the Murrumbidgee River, right away up to the Queensland border, and up to the head of navigation at Walgett, 1,250 miles from the Murray River, the Victorian Government are prepared to give concessions generally of 40 per cent., and on large clips 61 per cent., as against her own people. If we pass the clause submitted by Mr. Barton, and nothing else, the Commonwealth could not allow that state of things to exist, but the states themselves could. I will object to give any such power to the states. All that Mr. Reid has said with regard to the construction of railways into Riverina, is absolutely true. We were forced to construct those railways for the reasons he has stated, but Mr. Reid seems to forget that if we are to federate the condition of things will be entirely changed, and there will not be those barriers which forced us in the past to incur this expenditure.

Mr. REID. -

But we shall be left with an unprofitable railway.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Exactly; I am coming to that. We cannot federate without giving and taking, without some of the colonies making losses and some making gains. Our loss will probably be the worthlessness of these railways; but even then it is not a loss to the settlers in our community, because they will have the advantage of getting to their best and readiest markets.

Mr. REID. -
But if you take the trade you ought to give us something to make up for the loss on the railways.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I admit that, and I agree with what Mr. Carruthers said last night. With him I should like to give any vote which would force the federalization of the railways upon the Commonwealth; but what I do object to is withholding from the Commonwealth a power which it would be more likely to use with reason and justice, that is, the determination of these railway rates, while at the same time we give to the states power to make those rates. Could anything be more iniquitous, even under the existing state of things? But how much worse it would be if we were to have in a Federated Australia Victoria claiming to capture our traffic away up to Walgett, nearly 1,200 miles from their own railway stations! As we go right through New South Wales the same thing is done. Away up the Lachlan reductions of 66 per cent. are given. Fault is now found with regard to the terms and character of the amendment proposed by Mr. Higgins. This is not the time to discuss that amendment; it was allowed to go on the voices, and I think the committee were somewhat led away in allowing that amendment to go by the remarks of Mr. Barton with reference to curtailing debate. While I entirely agree with much that he said, I do not think that it has done any good in this case. The debate should not have been curtailed, and the imperfections of this amendment should have been pointed out before the question was put.

Mr. BARTON. -

I did not for a moment suggest that there should be no debate. What I suggested was that there should be no repetition of arguments.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

It is too late now to find fault. If those imperfections existed they should have been pointed out before the question was put.

Mr. BARTON. -

I pointed out some of the imperfections last night.

?. - Admitting the imperfections, for the reasons I have already stated, and because I do not believe power should be given to a state which is not given to the Commonwealth to interfere with the trade of a neighbouring state, I shall continue to vote in every possible way to give effect to my views on this matter. On every occasion when the question arises, when I can give a vote to allow the trade of the country to drift to its natural outlets, whatever the consequences may be, I shall give that vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I also regret with Sir Joseph Abbott that the vote this morning was taken in such a thin House. I do not wish to infringe upon your ruling, sir, but I should have liked to have spoken on Mr. Higgins' amendment, because in the part in which he refers to the ports, it seems to me you have a conundrum which it is almost impossible to solve. I wish specially to point out that what Mr. Reid has proposed, no doubt very hurriedly, will not give us what we want. He proposes that we should have the power inviolate to so run our railway line or lines as to pay working expenses and interest. That does not interfere for a moment with the Federal Parliament in dictating the whole question of the tariff. Suppose you have run a railway line with such attenuated charges towards one end as to give what my right honorable friend would call an unfair preference, and suppose we say that we must make certain charges in order that the railways shall pay, what the Federal Parliament would do would be this. They would say:"You will have to pay heavier charges near your own port." I do not want a clause like this to be passed, under the guise of giving us the management of our railways, when it practically takes it away again.

Mr. REID. -

The amendment was drawn up hurriedly, but I think the honorable member will find it absolutely prevents any interference with the rates fixed by a state.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

On looking over the amendment, I have only to reiterate what I have already said. Supposing these attenuated rates are made in such a way that, from Sir George Turner's point of view, action might be taken before the Supreme Court, or through the Federal Parliament, to say that an unfair preference was given by those rates, and supposing the answer of New South Wales was that we had to make our railways pay, they would simply point to the rates on other parts of our lines, and they would say:"You must simply re-adjust your tariff in order to make your railways pay."

Mr. REID. -

They could not do that without going into the facts connected with that particular line-the conditions under which the trade was carried on, and the competition to which it was exposed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

There might be a number of questions, but it seems to me distinctly to infringe upon the one principle which is at the bottom of the whole of this discussion. We are asked to have the responsibility of our own lines with regard to the payment of interest and everything else, and another outside power which will interfere with the management.

Mr. REID. -
I am wholly opposed to that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not want the matter to be dealt with in this hurried way. I believe the whole clause ought to be rejected now absolutely.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear. This gives us the chance of doing that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We are getting now near the end of our labours, and there will be a disinclination to re-open any question, except accompanied by very strong proof; and anything we do now may be beyond repair. I am, therefore, very anxious that nothing should be done which would in any way imply a power of management over our traffic. It seems to me that, while the intention is right, the proposal will not give the desired effect.

Mr. REID. -

That is a matter of drafting; the intention is clear, and the Drafting Committee can carry it out.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

There is a little more in it than drafting. It is a question that will come up in the future. There is left open a very large question, in which, from my point of view, if I were adjudicating on the matter, I could not say to New South Wales-"You have plenty of power on the railways, by the alteration of rates, to pay your own expenses and interest, and at the same time carry out your policy."

Mr. REID. -

That would not be the test. The only test would be as to the management of the line for the purpose of getting the desired end. If the management was in good faith it could not be interfered with, but if it was not in good faith it could.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But it does open up the question of absolute interference with differential rates for developmental purposes, and those rates, which, from our point of view, are for developmental purposes, might, in the opinion of the court or of Parliament, be considered preferential. I know the hurried position in which the right honorable gentleman was placed, but it seems to me clearly proved that either the first or second amendment will scarcely be anything but a blow to the Constitution.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

One of the chief inducements to South Australia to enter the Federation is the hope of the abolition of those cut-throat railway tariffs. It has been well pointed out by Mr. Carruthers, with a courage and consistency which we must all admire, that it is idle to provide for the abolition of war at the Custom-house if that war be transferred to the railway station. An amendment has been carried at the instigation of Mr. Higgins which has the effect, at least, of securing recognition of the principle that something should be done for the purpose of dealing with those conflicting railway tariffs. Under those circumstances I voted for the amendment, and under those circumstances I will adhere to it; and I will resist as far as possible any attempt to make it nugatory in the way suggested by the Premier of New South Wales. At the same time, it has occurred to me, in view of what took place last night, and in view of the amendment which has been tabled in pursuance of that discussion by the Premier of Victoria, that it is possible we may secure, by dealing with his amendment, something which those who desire to put an end to this railway traffic war would even prefer to that which has yet to be carried by Mr. Higgins. Under the circumstances, I suggest to the leader of the Convention that it might be possible, by a suspension of the standing orders, in the same manner which was adopted in the matter of the rivers question, to enable us to discuss Sir George Turner's amendment before deciding finally what we will do with reference to the clause now under discussion. I do sincerely trust that a course such as I now suggest may be adopted. I am sure it will relieve many who desire some satisfactory provision, and who do not wish to be forced to vote on the amendment now before the Chair in a way which may prevent the giving of what is now proposed, whilst, at the same time, there is no security that the amendment of Sir George Turner, or any modification of it, will be passed. Under the circumstances, I ask the leader of the Convention that we may be afforded the same opportunity in connexion with this question as was afforded in connexion with the riparian question, with, I trust, similar results.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I felt constrained yesterday, and I feel constrained to-day, to vote against the proposal of my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins), because I believe it would not carry out what we all desire to see carried out. From the numerous expressions of opinion which have been given by honorable members, it is clear there are at least six or eight different readings of this particular clause. Now, we are asked to embody it in our Constitution in such a way that we cannot alter it except by the referendum. I fear to do that, because I confess I do not understand—and I believe there are very few members who could say—what the result of any test case in regard to the amendment might be. I therefore felt bound to vote against the whole proceeding, hoping we might possibly come to a decision which would leave to the Federal Parliament to do what we all desire, and what I believe
Mr. Higgins desires by the amendment. But that must be done in such a way that, if afterwards it was found that the legislation by the Federal Parliament did not carry out what we desired, the Parliament would always have it in its own hands to make necessary alterations, and ultimately pass such a law as would be reasonably fair to all the colonies. So far as Mr. Reid's proposal is concerned, it does to some extent mitigate the difficulties. It leaves the states in such a position that they know they will be able to carry on their railways in such a way as to pay working expenses and interest. I therefore do not exactly like voting for this amendment, but still, I cannot see how I can vote against it. In voting against it, I would be affirming that the amendment already dealt with should stand, while I believe it should not. I am rapidly being forced to the conclusion that, sooner or later, this, or some other body dealing with federation, will have to deal with it in an entirely different way, in regard to the debts and the railways, than we have attempted up to the present. I have always been against handing over the railways of the states to the Federation. But, day by day, I am coming to the conclusion that my previous decision is wrong, and that, sooner or later, we shall have to be prepared to hand over our debts and our railways to the sole management of the Federation, if we are to deal with the matter in a way that would be satisfactory to the whole Commonwealth. But one difficulty staring us in the face in regard to both proposals is as to how we can provide for the development of the country in the meantime. I do not know whether it would be any use the Finance Committee tackling this problem. If so, I would like to see the Convention adjourn for a few days, and the Finance Committee meet together and devise a scheme to hand over the whole of the railways and the whole of the debts, at the same time making the best provision they can for the development of the country in the future.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You have to consider how such a proposal would be regarded by the colonies.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I believe that if we could provide some means by which the states would not be restricted from developing their various countries the people would be perfectly satisfied to hand over the railways and the debts.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I am perfectly sure they would not. If Sir George Turner is honest in what he says, let him submit a motion dealing with the railways and debts. It is no use a member of the Convention talking of being gradually drawn to the conclusion that the railways should be amalgamated and handed over. Let the Convention, with its eyes open, tackle the question if it so wish. I feel satisfied that the people of New South Wales, at any rate, and, I think, of the other colonies, would not submit to anything of the kind at the present moment. There is no use beating about the bush. There is no use in this Convention saying it is afraid to deal with the subject. If a majority of the representatives desires that the debts and the railways should be handed over, let them so decide, and then let the people give a vote one way or the other. Those who desire federation at an early date had better leave the matter alone. There are one or two newspapers which circulate those ideas, and, it may be, influence members' minds. For my part, I think it ridiculous to talk of anything of the kind. The questions submitted to the Convention at present are large and numerous, and we should have federation much quicker if those questions were not so numerous.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I must ask the honorable member to confine his attention to the clause as far as he can.

Mr. LYNE. -

I was replying to the remarks of Sir George Turner.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I am afraid honorable members take too much latitude generally.

Mr. LYNE. -

The railway rates and the debts cannot be separated. It is acknowledged already, by half-a-dozen speakers, that the difficulties would be overcome if the railways were taken over. What is the question of railway rates? It is the question of the interest, and that leads us at once to the debts.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member think that bears on this particular clause?&

Mr. LYNE. -

I must say I do. I think it is bearing very strongly on the clause. I do not now wish to open a discussion on the debts and the railways, but was merely replying to Sir George Turner. I regret very much that anything should have taken place before I arrived this morning to curtail the debate which was going on last night.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not think the honorable member is in order in referring to a former decision of the committee.

Mr. LYNE. -

I have not yet referred to any decision of the committee.
The CHAIRMAN. -
The honorable member was expressing his sorrow at what has taken place.
Mr. LYNE. -
I do not know exactly what did take place.
The CHAIRMAN. -
The honorable member is out of order.
Mr. LYNE. -
Surely I have the privilege of stating I regret I was not here in time to know exactly what did take place.
The CHAIRMAN. -
Oh, yes.
Mr. LYNE. -
And that I have been informed the debate last night was curtailed very suddenly.
Mr. REID. -
Very cleverly.
Mr. LYNE. -
The debate was curtailed suddenly, and I had not an opportunity of voting on the matter submitted. I now have an opportunity of referring to the matter on the amendment proposed by Mr. Reid. That amendment I must say is, in its inception, submitted for the purpose of improving, if possible, the clause as it is amended at the present time.
Mr. REID. -
That is all.
Mr. LYNE. -
But I do not think the amendment would have the desired effect. I gave expression to my views yesterday regarding what I conceived should be the course to be taken with reference to the railways between the various states. The amendment now submitted is one which will only give power to the various states to impose, without restriction, any tariff that will meet the interest on the debt and the losses on working expenses—I think I am correct in saying that—without interference from the Commonwealth or any of the other states. Now, my feeling is that no state should impose railway rates that would draw the trade from another state to that first state, but, under the conditions we are likely to have, each state should have full power to deal, in a legitimate way, with the railway rates of its own state, so long as they were not framed with the view to draw trade from another state. That is all I and my colleagues of the New South Wales delegation ask at present. Now, if this clause is left as it stands, very serious injury will be done to the cause of federation in New South Wales, because this is one of those object-lessons that the people take hold of very quickly, and that they can understand very thoroughly. About one-half of the members of this Convention are legal gentlemen, and when we find one-half of them interpreting this clause in one way, and the other half arguing that it should be interpreted in another way, how can we expect that the lay mind outside will grasp the meaning of this clause? They will readily grasp the principle of putting on long-distance railway rates with a view to develop distant parts of their respective colonies. That will come home to them very readily. Unless this clause is amended in some way so that it will not unduly interfere with the state management of our railways, I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that it had better be struck out altogether. For my own part, I would rather see the [Page 1368] clause dealing with trade and commerce left by itself than have a clause of this kind inserted in the Bill, whatever its effect may be, and I do not suppose that any honorable member can positively say what its effect would be. I would rather see the trade and commerce clause left in the Constitution, subject to the interpretation that may be put on it by the High Court, than a system which will interfere with our railway rates, and enable other states to obtain traffic to the disadvantage of our own railways. It is all very well to say that the southern part of New South Wales belongs geographically to Victoria. We all give full credit to Victorians, and to Victorian capital, for developing that part of our colony, but the Victorians did not develop it in the interests of New South Wales, but in their own interests. We were compelled, for the reason given by Mr. Reid, to extend our railways to the southern borders of our colony, so as to enable our producers to get their produce to market. The only other ways by which they could send their produce to market were in bond by river through South Australia, or in bond by rail through Victoria.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
You utterly neglected Riverina.

Mr. LYNE. -
No, it was simply that we had a larger territory than Victoria to deal with, and it took us longer to extend our railway system to that distant part of our colony. Now, this question seems to me to be resolving itself into a similar position to that in connexion with the rivers. Similar influences are at work. It is a question of who is going to get the most trade from New South Wales, and before this question is settled, if the clause is not amended or struck out, I hope that there will be a full vote of the Convention taken on the principle at issue, and then we must be satisfied with the result of that division. That ought to be demanded by all members of the Convention.
We are entitled to ask for a full vote on a serious matter of this kind. If we do not get a full vote of the Convention now, I hope that when we receive the revised print of the Bill we may have an opportunity of dealing with this question in a full House, and not merely while 33 members are present, as was the case when the last division was taken and Mr. Higgins' amendment was carried in a snapshot sort of way a few minutes ago.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I hope honorable members will bear with me for a few moments. At this juncture I think it is well that I should state what the producers of our colony whom I represent think they have a right to, and what they expect at the hands of the Convention. The producers of South Australia expect this Convention to give them free-trade throughout the length and breadth of Federated Australia. Now, it seems to me that, while we have for the last day or two, given free-trade through the abolition of custom-houses and inter-colonial imposts, we are now seeking to hamper the producers of Australia by transferring this power to the Railway departments of the various colonies. Cut-throat rates on railways are quite as great an obstacle to freedom of commerce as custom-houses on our borders.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Hear, hear; fair commerce.

Mr. HOWE. -

Mr. Reid's amendment simply allows things to remain as they are, each colony to carry on its railways in its own way, at its own sweet will and pleasure, although it maybe to the injury of other colonies. Now, I say that a state has a perfect right to conduct its railways in its own way (so long as it does not interfere with the federal spirit that ought to exist in a true federation of these colonies, and so long as it does not hamper trade and commerce), and to devise means to make its railways pay. I was very much struck with a remark of the Premier of New South Wales, who said-"While we seek to control our own state railways, and while we advocate and must of necessity maintain a differential rate upon those lines of railway, we do not seek to make the tapering end the expansive end." In other words, the Premier of New South Wales would not impose a high traffic rate on those lines of railway in his colony for the purpose of prohibiting the free flow of traffic from his colony to another colony. Did I understand the right honorable gentleman correctly?

Mr. REID. -

I never used those expressions about the tapering end and the expansive end.
Mr. HOWE. -

I understood the right honorable gentleman to say that while there might be an infinitesimal rate for the carriage of goods towards the end of a line in this colony, he would not discourage produce going from New South Wales to another colony, so long as the Railway department received an adequate rate of revenue. Is not that so?

Mr. REID. -

No, I did not make use of any of those expressions; I did not refer to that part of the question.

Mr. HOWE. -

I am very sorry that I misunderstood the honorable member. However, I must say that I cannot return to my colony and recommend this Constitution to the people of South Australia unless something is done to put an end to these cut-throat tariffs that have obtained so long, and that have been so injurious to every colony that has adopted the system. In self-protection we must fight to the last, but who benefits by such competition? Scarcely any one. A few producers may benefit, but their number is infinitesimal compared with the rest of the people who will undoubtedly have to bear the burden. Therefore, I cannot return to my colony unless something is done to remove the system which at present obtains. I may tell the Convention that, so far as Mr. Barton's amendment is concerned, or the clause which he proposed in lieu of the one that was struck out, I was in favour of it, so long as that ran side by side with the Inter-State Commission, but after looking over the amendments now before us this morning, I very much prefer, as between the two proposals that have been carried and the one that is now under discussion, the amendment suggested by Sir George Turner. If we can negative the two proposals already carried, and also this proposal of the Premier of New South Wales, I shall be delighted indeed to vote for the proposal of the Premier of Victoria, because if we carry that I can really go back to South Australia and say to those who sent me here that I believe, under that provision, the producers, whom I endeavour to represent, will receive ample justice.

Question-That the words proposed to be added to the clause be so added-put.

The committee divided-
Ayes .... ... 20
Noes .... ... 22
Majority against Mr. Reid's amendment .... ... 2
AYES.
Barton, E. Lyne, W.J.
Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I would ask the leader of the Convention whether he cannot see his way to give us an opportunity to consider the amendment of Sir George Turner before we finally come to a conclusion as regards this question? I would point out to the honorable member that there is almost a consensus of opinion in favour of the first part of the clause proposed, but to it has been added the amendment of Mr. Higgins, to which some honorable members object. I would point out to my learned friend that he might take the power in the mode I suggest.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have no objection to the course which the right honorable member has suggested; in fact, but for the division coming on rather suddenly, I should have expressed my concurrence with it before. It will be necessary, if the suggestion is adopted, for me to propose that the Chairman do leave the chair, and report progress, with the view to obtaining an instruction to the committee, and then in the Convention to move to suspend the standing orders, and to propose some motion like the following:-

That it be an instruction to the committee of the whole that they have leave to postpone, if they so desire, the consideration of the proposed new clause in substitution of clause 95 struck out, which has been amended, until after the consideration of another clause to be proposed in substitution of clause 95; also that they have leave to reconsider the first-mentioned new clause which has been so amended.

Of course it will be necessary to take leave to reconsider if we wish to dispose of the whole matter at once. That will be a course in accordance with what was done in regard to the rivers.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is that with the view of seeing whether we will reverse what we have done this morning?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is with the view of enabling us to consider Sir George Turner's new clause, and take such course upon that as we think proper, and to deal afterwards, or at any stage before we proceed to fresh business, with clause 95 in its present position, so that the hands of the committee will not be tied in any way. I beg to move-

That the Chairman do now leave the chair, and report progress, with the view to obtaining an instruction to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT having taken the chair, progress was reported.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg to move-

That the standing orders be suspended to enable Mr. Barton to move a motion of instruction to the committee on the Commonwealth Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg to move-

That it be an instruction to the committee of the whole that they have leave to postpone, if they so desire, the consideration of the proposed new clause (in substitution for clause 95 which has been struck out), which has been amended, until after the consideration of another clause to be proposed in substitution for clause 95; also that they have leave to reconsider the first-mentioned proposed new clause which has been so amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention again resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the further consideration of the proposed new clause 95A as amended be postponed until after the consideration of a new clause to be proposed in substitution for clause 95.

I take it, sir, that the way is now clear to my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) if he wishes to propose his new clause.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would suggest that, if there is still a majority in favour of Mr. Higgins' amendment as against Sir George Turner's proposal, it is infinitely better to know it at once, because, if there is a majority in favour of the former, all the debate on the latter would be a waste of time. I therefore propose that we first ascertain whether the committee prefers to retain Mr. Higgins' amendment, or to dispose of his amendment, and then deal with Sir George Turner's amendment on its merits. It would save a great deal of time if we did, because, if after giving leave to Sir George Turner to move his amendment, and having a long discussion thereon, we found that the committee was still of its original opinion, all that time would have been wasted.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Why did we take all these steps then?

Mr. REID. -

Otherwise, we may have this ridiculous state of things—that Mr. Higgins' amendment remains in, and Sir George Turner's amendment, too.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

It may be so. Let us know how we stand. I beg to move—That the committee reconsider clause 95 as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the right honorable member move that as an amendment on the motion of Mr. Barton?

Mr. REID. -

Yes, because it will enable us to know at once whether I he committee is prepared to take up Sir George Turner's amendment. If it is it will rescind Mr. Higgins' amendment. I do not suppose Sir George Turner intends his amendment to be side by side in the Bill with the other.

Mr. BARTON. -

It will be impossible.

Mr. REID. -
I do not suppose that Sir George Turner, in moving his amendment, is agreeable that his amendment and Mr. Higgins' amendment should be in the Bill side by side.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
No, but you see you are putting honorable members in a false position. Some honorable members desire to vote for my clause, and get it if they can; but, failing that, they desire to retain Mr. Higgins' amendment, and therefore you are putting those members in a false position.

Mr. REID. -
I do not wish to do that; therefore, I beg leave to withdraw my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I have not put the proposition to the committee.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
As one of those who voted for the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins), I hope that the proposal of the Premier of New South Wales will not be carried.

Mr. REID. -
I have withdrawn it.

The CHAIRMAN. -
It has not been proposed from the Chair.

Dr. QUICK. -
I trust that we will carry out what was intended when this instruction was given to the committee, namely, that we should have an opportunity to have a straight vote on Sir George Turner's clause. I supported Mr. Higgins' amendment, because it gave expression to what I thought a fair principle, although, perhaps, its wording was open to objection and was capable of improvement. But my position is this: If Sir George Turner's proposal is now carried I shall feel justified, if a division is taken, in voting against Mr. Higgins' amendment, but if Sir George Turner's proposal is negatived I shall feel at liberty to support that amendment.

The motion of Mr. Barton was agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I do not propose to detain the committee at any length with regard to this matter, because I think it is a proposal which ought to command a majority of honorable members by its own wording. We are all striving to get to one point, so that no state may be able to improperly and unjustly deal with another state. I think that is the simple point we have to decide. We have been two days endeavouring to devise some means by which to do it. I think up to the present we have not dealt with the question satisfactorily. There is only one way, to my mind, in which we can deal with the question in a way which will be fair and just to all the states. I pointed out before that, if we put anything in the Constitution, and it turns out afterwards, by a decision of the Supreme Court, to have a meaning different from what we desired to put in the Constitution, we shall find it almost impossible to alter the provision. Whereas, if we leave it to the Federal Parliament, and they devise means which will not work well, or afterwards turn out to be unfair, we must trust to the justice of the Parliament to make the necessary alterations when they find that an injustice has been done by any of their acts. We want, if we possibly can, to stop all this cut-throat competition in all the colonies. We are all agreed upon that, but, unfortunately, we cannot find words to do so in such a way as will satisfy all of us. I beg to move-

That the following stand as clause 95B, to follow clause 94, viz:-

The Parliament may make laws to provide for the execution and maintenance upon railways within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce, and particularly to forbid such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable, or to be unjust to any state.

I do not know that the second part of the clause will be necessary, except that we want a particular instruction. From time to time, under this provision, I take it the Federal Parliament will have full power to legislate with regard to these matters, and they will know that they have a direction, in the Constitution itself, that in so legislating they must see that the provisions are not undue or unreasonable, and that they are not doing an injustice to any state. If they find that they have done an injustice to any state it will be in their power, and it will be their duty, to remove that injustice as soon as possible. Of course, the wording of my new clause may be questioned.

Mr. GORDON. -

It is not quite the same as the printed clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No. With regard to the clause which we hurriedly prepared last night, A doubt was raised as to whether it would give power to the Federal Parliament to deal with the rates if they were too low. We want to give power to the Federal Parliament to deal with the rates whether they be too high or whether they be too low. If it will act in any way unreasonably or unjustly, then we are prepared, so far as I and my colleagues are concerned, to trust implicitly the Federal Parliament to do what is right and proper to all the states.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It would be an excellent proposal if we were federalizing the railways.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, if the railways were federalized; but as it is it practically puts them under federal authority, without the protection of the Federal Court, which we should have if the railways were federalized.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No, only under the control of the Federal Parliament for the purpose of carrying out the principles of the trade and commerce sub-section.

Mr. REID. -

If it stopped there, there would not be a word of objection to it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But, in addition to that, the Parliament must see that no injustice is being done by any one state towards another. Unless some power of that kind is given to the Federal Parliament, we must fall back upon the federalization of the railways. But if the railways are federalized, we shall, no doubt, have to hand over all our lines to the Federal Parliament; whereas, under this proposal, we only want to give the Parliament power to say that one state, in dealing with its railways, shall not act unfairly and unjustly to any other state. I shall be quite prepared to hear any objection that may be raised to this proposal, and, no doubt, we shall be able to satisfy those who are objecting to it that this is the best thing we can do.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If the people will not agree to the federalization of the railways, what is the good of making regulations that practically give the Federal Parliament as much authority as if the railways were federalized?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not know that we are doing that. I do not desire that. But I and all of us desire that no state shall do anything which is unfair and unjust towards another state so far as the management of its railways are concerned. We are not proposing to take any power to make any regulations at all. All we are taking power to do is to say that if the Federal Parliament finds that a state Parliament in one state or another has made regulations the effect of which is to give undue preference or discrimination so as to act unreasonably or unjustly to any other state, then the Federal Parliament may have power to step in and prohibit these regulations. I think this is the least power we can place in the hands of the Federal Parliament if its power is to be effective.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There is only one word in the first part of this proposal which is anything more than padding, and that is the word "railways." The real proposal is in the words beginning after the words "and particularly." The rest we can disregard. For this reason: The first part of the proposal is utterly useless, inasmuch as, without any such leave being given as is given by the first part of this amendment, the Federal Parliament will have power to make laws to provide for the execution and maintenance upon railways within the Commonwealth of the provisions of the Constitution with regard to roads and rivers, and all essential laws relating to trade and commerce.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But if you left the first part of the amendment out there might be an implication the wrong way in regard to the latter part.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think there will be an implication the wrong way even if we leave the first part in. Now, my objection to this proposal is that it is a total departure from the proper guardianship of the Constitution. While the Parliament may properly in relation to trade and commerce make laws for the execution and maintenance of roads and rivers, and pass any other laws for the carrying out of the trade and commerce subsection of clause 52, when they have done that much they have done all they should be allowed to do. They should be kept within the meaning of the trade and commerce provisions. Their legislation, if it stopped at that point, would be subject to the High Court of the Commonwealth, which is the proper tribunal. To take the adjudication of matters of this sort out of the control of the High Court, and to vest it in the Federal Parliament, is a proposal which I have a rooted objection to; and I shall be found, as I have been found from the beginning of the proceedings of this Convention, objecting to every provision which seeks to take away from the High Court of the Commonwealth, which we have appointed the arbiter of the Constitution, the consideration of matters which should be matters of adjudication by the court, and the placing of them within the jurisdiction of the Parliament, by that means keeping down and restricting the authority of the High Court as the protector of the Constitution.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

But the High Court will only interpret the laws passed by the Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, but if you give, outside the ordinary meaning of the trade and commerce clause, the discretion to the Parliament which is given to it by the latter part of Sir George Turner's amendment, you do more than you ought to do. By the second part of this amendment you take away from the High Court, and vest in the Federal Parliament, the determination of what is a preference or discrimination, which is an infringement of the trade and commerce provisions.
Mr. SOLOMON. -

Will not they be subject to review by the High Court?

Mr. BARTON. -

That cannot be if you give the Federal Parliament the sole discrimination. And I draw attention to these words-"such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable or to be unjust to any state." Those words put in the hands of the Federal Parliament, instead of the High Court, the entire determination of what is an undue and unjust preference or discrimination.

Mr. GORDON. -

What is the best tribunal?

Mr. BARTON. -

I am much obliged to my honorable friend for his interjection. The best tribunal is a just one.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You might as well give the ownership of the railways to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. GORDON. -

But which is at once likely to be the most competent and the most just?

Mr. BARTON. -

The one which is likely to be most competent is the one that best understands the Constitution and can best interpret the meaning of it.

Mr. GORDON. -

The Parliament makes the law.

Mr. BARTON. -

And under this proposal the reasonable law which the Parliament may have made might be twisted at the discretion of the Parliament to the utter damnifying and humiliating of the High Court.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

If you strike out the words "as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable," would your objection be met?

Mr. BARTON. -

It would to a certain extent, but the proposal would still be open to this objection-that the insertion of these words constitutes an absolute denudation of the Supreme Court of its proper power under this Constitution. My next point is this-and it was the subject of an interjection by Mr. McMillan-that this is an attempt to deal with the railways of the various states as if they were already federalized property. Now, we must either federalize the railways or not.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
Are you prepared to federalize them?

Mr. BARTON. -

We have hitherto determined not to federalize the railways. I objected to the use of that term yesterday; I should prefer to say we have decided not to pool them. What we have determined to do in the case of the rivers—and, so far, the same applies to the railways—is this: To leave the Federal Parliament with authority to exercise federal control for the purpose of maintaining navigation. And so, in the case of the railways, we should prevent interstate commerce being interfered with. That, we, as New South Wales representatives, are perfectly prepared to abide by, but beyond that we are not willing to go. This is an attempt to treat the railways as if the Commonwealth had assumed their ownership, and in that respect the proposal is radically wrong. Because we have stopped short at taking over the railways—and I venture to say rightly so—but having so stopped short we are now asked to give to the Parliament of the Commonwealth a power which is only consistent with the complete ownership of the railways. How else can this clause be defended, except that you are going to give jurisdiction to the Federal Parliament to manage the railways? There is not a railway rate or tariff that would not be subject to a power of this kind. If the Parliament is to have the power of saying what is a just or an unjust preference or discrimination, we are practically allowing the Parliament to assume the ownership of these railways, because it may do everything it likes, short of absolutely taking them over.

Mr. REID. -

And short of paying the expense of running them.

Mr. BARTON. -

And short of paying the expense of running them, as my right honorable friend says. So that you give to, the authority which is not charged with the expense of maintaining these railways, or with the responsibility of managing them, and whose citizens do not have to sustain the obligation of them, such an authority as to impose an interdiction upon the management in such a way as would seriously jeopardize the finances of the state that owned them. It is a most radical amendment, and I do not think I shall go too far in denouncing it as the most unjust proposal that could possibly be put forward here. Now, with reference to preference or discrimination, we have under the trade and commerce subsection and under clause 89 made such provision as will enable the Parliament in the first place to make laws to maintain the proper freedom from interruption of navigation and commerce in regard to the carriage of goods between the states. We had that provision sufficiently in the trade and commerce sub-section, and we have added to its effect by clause 89. I do not think that my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) understood that, when he spoke with regard to that clause this morning, because, as an interdict not only to the Commonwealth, but to the states themselves, in connexion with any action they desired to take in regard to trade and commerce between the states, those provisions cannot be usurped. Those provisions are sufficient to maintain freedom of trade and commerce between the states, but they allow the states themselves to take care of the trade and commerce which is within their own limits. And that is the proper division of federal and state power. I have been surprised to find in the course of this debate that the proper limits of the state and the Commonwealth in regard to this subject have been so much mixed up, even by honorable members who have spoken freely and strongly before as to the necessity for the separation of these two powers being provided for in the trade and commerce sub-section and clause 89. The sub-section and the clause referred to retain the authority of the state and of the Commonwealth within their proper provinces, and enable the High Court to interdict any traffic regulation made by a state which usurps the interstate authority of the Commonwealth—that is to say, which applies regulations that, upon their face, affect interstate traffic in such a way that it could not be continued without obstruction. But we are now asked, instead of leaving the provinces of the Commonwealth and of the states distinct, to go further and to give power not only of legislation, but of interference, to the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

For one of the purposes of the Commonwealth—freedom of interchange.

Mr. BARTON. -

My honorable friend is quite in error there, because all that has already been done in the trade and commerce subsection and in clause 89. But he now proposes to go further. The amendment which he has proposed only reads sensibly if you read it as an additional power. The first part of the amendment is a mere repetition, but the second part is an additional power. If, therefore, you have already provided in such a way that trade and commerce come within the proper sphere of the High Court as arbiter between the states and the Commonwealth, it follows, if you mean what the amendment says, that you mean to go further and let the Parliament, dictated by factions and by parties, be the arbiter with regard to traffic and the state railways. I submit that that is radically wrong. It is an interference with the whole course of the Constitution which we have been making. Apart from all preferential considerations, if I were not one of the representatives of New South Wales, I should oppose this proposal, because it is an attempt (quite apart from all consideration of the ownership of railways in the colonies) to take away from this body which we have set up the authority which should belong to it, and to force the states into confusion. I object to it because it takes away a power from the body that should be the arbiter, and leaves to faction the dictation of this important matter. I object to it because if this amendment is carried we shall be doing what is unjust as between the states. That cannot be. And this would be a maleficent provision to put into our Constitution.

Let any proposal be made which I consider to be fair and just and reasonable and I will not be one to unnecessarily object to it. But I do object to a proposal which seeks to hand over these cases which should be determined by an authority of permanently just and even decisions to an authority the voice of which today may be negatives by its own voice tomorrow. There cannot be justice or consistency in a proposal of that kind, and the transfer of this authority to the wrong place, if done, will be the most evil thing for the success of this Constitution which ever has been done. Passing from that constitutional view of the matter to the other view of it, what right is there that we should, at the dictation of one colony, place in the hands of the Parliament the determination of the way in which all the state railways shall be managed, for it amounts to that? It has been our intention, up to this point, to leave to each state the management of its own railways; and the two cannot stand together. This proposal is not in furtherance of the federal power for the regulation of trade and commerce, but it is an attempt to give the federal power an authority over railways which we have said we are going to keep to the states. If the Convention is going to pass a law of that kind, they will really in one breath be saying that the states shall manage their own railways, and in the other breath that this Federal Parliament shall manage the railways for the states. These two things cannot live together, and I do say that you could not have a proposal submitted that would be more likely to do damage to the Constitution than that to which I now object.

Mr. Isaacs (Victoria). -

I am sorry I cannot agree with the honorable member who has just resumed his seat. So far from thinking this a maleficent or wrong proposal, it should, in my opinion, have the support of every honorable member in the Convention who desires to see the Constitution come into operation with little friction as possible. Nothing has been said during the debate which has convinced me that the freight wars are injurious to the freedom of trade of the states as they stand, and, as I gather from the arguments of my learned friend and of those who have spoken with him, the position will be this: That under the trade and commerce clause, and under clause 89 of the Bill, Victoria and South Australia may be prevented from doing anything which would give either of those states an opportunity of drawing custom to their own railways, whilst New South Wales would have the fullest opportunity, unrestricted by the Commonwealth, of doing everything she could to prevent any of her trade leaving her own political borders. In other words, the political lines are to govern and not the natural or geographical position. That must be cleared away. It must be made perfectly plain in the Constitution that Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia are to be left with exactly the same rates as they have now in regard to railways, or that the matter must pass into the hands of some impartial and superior body, which will have power to control us all and keep us all within fair and equitable limits. We are told that New South Wales cannot consent to that. I personally hold the view that under the trade and commerce clause, as I said yesterday, the freedom of trade and commerce is what is looked to. I do not know of any case or any decision that has ever been given which goes to show that the giving of lower rates to an outsider is an interference with the freedom of commerce, and indeed a very late case decided in 1895 strengthens the views that I hold. Strong opinions have been given on the other side, and we ought not to leave this matter to the ultimate decision of a court in such a way that if the decision should be adverse to what most of us desire, the position could not be altered except by a referendum succeeding on a joint vote of the two Houses of Parliament. I think that would be a calamity. If it were to turn out as we fear it might, it would be a calamity. The object of the proposal put forward by the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria is to do away with that. When the Hon. Mr. Barton said that it appeared on the surface of it to be a fair and equitable proposal he did it scant justice. The first part of it was in the Bill of 1891 and in the Adelaide Bill, with the exception that rivers were included.

Mr. WISE. -

You will admit that the words in the first part are not necessary?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think they are necessary if you are going to say any more than that, because the absence of these words, if you are going to particularize, might raise an awkward implication. The objection is to the concluding words, which are these-"and particularly to forbid such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue, unreasonable, or unjust to any state." The first objection taken is that the wrong tribunal is to decide the matter. I would seriously ask honorable members whether such a question can be left to the Supreme Court as advantageously as to the Parliament? Is it a mere question of dry law? Is it a mere question of the construction of an Act of Parliament or of a regulation? If it were, I should say, undoubtedly, leave it to the Supreme Court. But what is the position? You will have to inquire into the political and commercial position of a country, and into the competitive claims made on the various lines, and you will have to look into a thousand and one considerations wholly foreign to the province and ordinary jurisdiction of a court of law. The Judges should not be asked to decide matters which extend far into the political arena, and which might land them in very awkward entanglements, and make the Supreme Court a centre of terrible political conflicts and controversies that might go to the very existence of the states.

Mr. OCONNOR. - Would not that apply to almost any question arising under the Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS. - No, because an ordinary constitutional question would be determined by a consideration of the document before the court. This is a totally different thing. The considerations which relate to what is a just railway rate between different states should be determined by independent men in Parliament, and not on questions of dry law. In a state, the state Parliament or an authority created by them determines the rates. Then we say that we will transfer any disputes that arise in regard to these matters to a superior body. And what body would be so calculated to determine them equitably as the Federal Parliament? If we want precedent for this we have got it in England. We have been talking about the American Inter-State Commerce Act, but the English Railways Act is the foundation of that measure. It is the English Act that the Americans follow. We have been looking to America for the provisions of the Inter-State Commerce Act with regard to railways, but the English law is the foundation of them. In deciding the latest cases in the American courts the Judges have been forced to go to English law in order to determine what is right in respect to these railway rates. In America have they left the question of what is fair and reasonable in railway rates to the Supreme Court? Not a bit of it. They have actually left it to Congress. The contention of my honorable friends opposite that Parliament has a right under the trade and commerce clause to regulate these matters shows that in America it is the Parliament that determines them. They have the fullest control. Under the Inter-State Commerce Act they constituted the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Is not there a difference between a Parliament in a state and a Parliament that exercises its powers over several states?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am referring now to the United States. The United States Congress has not any property in the railways, and although Congress does not attempt to manage these railways-and it could not, because they are private property-yet, by virtue of the powers it possesses, it did pass an Inter-State Commerce Act, in order that it might see that the states were fairly and properly dealt with.

Mr. REID. -

Are you willing that the principles of interference recognised under that Act should be recognised in this Constitution?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, and I would go further. There is a case, The Texas and Pacific Railway Company against The Inter-State Commission, which was decided in October, 1895, and is reported in volume 162 of the United States Reports, page 197. In this case the Supreme Court

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

What about the Wabash case?

Mr. ISAACS. -

The decision given in the Wabash case has been very severely commented on in a dissenting judgment recently, so that it is useless to rely upon it absolutely.

Mr. REID. -

There is the Act itself, the first section of it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will the honorable member allow me to answer one thing at a time? The case to which I was referring dealt with the position of the Inter-State Commission. It is a very instructive case, and I will read the final conclusions of the Supreme Court. They will be found on page 233 of volume 162. The court stated:

The conclusions that we draw from the history and language of the Act, and from the decisions of our own and the English courts, are mainly these: That the purpose of the Act is to promote and facilitate commerce by the adoption of regulations, to make charges for transportation just and reasonable, and to forbid undue and unreasonable preferences or discriminations: That in passing judgment upon questions arising under the Act the tribunal appointed to enforce its provisions, whether the commission or the courts, is empowered to fully consider all the circumstances and conditions that reasonably apply to the situation, and that, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, the tribunal may and should consider the legitimate interests as well of the carrying companies as of the traders and shippers, and in considering whether any particular locality is subjected to an undue preference or disadvantage the welfare of the communities occupying the localities where the goods are delivered is to be considered as well as that of the communities which are in the locality of the place of shipment. That among the circumstances and conditions to be considered, as well in the case of traffic originating within the limits of the United States, competition that affects rates should be considered, and in deciding whether rates and charges made at a low rate to secure foreign freights, which would otherwise go by other competitive routes, are or are not undue and unjust, the fair interests of the carrier companies and the welfare of the community which is to receive and consume the commodities are to be considered. That if the commission, instead of confining its action to redressing, on complaint made by some particular person, firm, corporation, or locality, some specific disregard by common carriers of provisions of the Act, proposes to promulgate general orders, which thereby become rules of action to the carrying companies, the spirit and letter of the Act require that such orders should have in view the purpose of promoting and facilitating commerce, and the welfare of all to be affected, as well the carriers as the traders and consumers of the country.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is the commission that has to consider all these things, not the Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The commission will be created by the Parliament, and the Parliament can pass any enactment it likes for the guidance of the commission. It may refuse to establish the commission if it likes. But I urge it upon the consideration of my honorable friend, if the Supreme Court is not a body ill calculated to deal with these matters. If it did deal with them, it would be entering into political contests, which would degrade it, and it would render itself subject to animadversion upon the part of those who were dissatisfied with its decisions, which would seriously detract from its dignity. Suppose, however, that the Supreme Court endeavoured to deal with these matters, I ask how would it proceed? It would call experts-

[P.1379] starts here

merchants, railway men, and others-from all parts of the states concerned. Would it also have to call for a jury of the inhabitants of these states, or would the Judges be supposed to be competent to give a decision upon the facts set before them? I think that all the considerations surrounding the ease should determine us that the Supreme Court is not a body suitable for the performance of this work.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Does not the Inter-State Commission declare what is unjust, while the Supreme Court acts accordingly?

Mr. ISAACS. -

In this case, Parliament will determine what shall be done, and who shall do it. I can quite understand that Parliament may say - "We are too large a body, too complex a tribunal, to ourselves determine these matters, just as we are unable to directly control the management of the various departments of Government; but we can lay down principles, and we can create a tribunal which we can alter if it does not satisfy us, and we can thus see that justice is done between the various states as nearly as possible." That is what Parliament does in America, and what Parliament does in England. In England they have created a commission, and have laid down provisions similar to those I have been referring to. We must not think that America affords all the precedents in regard to matters of this kind. In America they refer to the English decisions, and acknowledge that it is the English law and legislation which forms the foundation of their interstate commercial provisions. In England the state does not possess or control the railways, but care is taken that in regard to these gigantic concerns which merchants and producers require to be able to meet each other and to effect a distribution of products, both manufactured and unmanufactured, the rights of the public are considered. The public are not legally compelled to use these instruments of commerce, but they are practically compelled to do so. Therefore, the state steps in and says that there shall be no undue preferences or discriminations. In this connexion the English case of Phipps v. The London and North-Western Railway Company, 1892, 2 Q.B., 289, is very instructive. I merely refer to the case to show honorable members that these matters have had consideration in the English courts of law.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Every English railway company works under a charter which is limited by certain conditions, these conditions dealing with the question of discriminating rates and other matters.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There are railway companies in existence in England who got their charters long before the present Act was passed, and it cannot be said that they took them with the knowledge that this Act would be passed. The Act was brought in because it was found that the public welfare demanded it—just as, I think, the public welfare will demand some provision of the kind I am advocating.

Mr. GLYNN. -

There were Acts passed before 1888. There were Acts passed in 1844.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes. The amending Act was passed in 1887-8, and the English Act preceded it. The question was considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1896 in the action—The United States v. the Trans-Missouri Freight Association. It is a remarkable thing that in nearly all these cases we have a division of opinion amongst the Judges. The decisions are generally come to by a majority of five Judges to four.

Mr. GORDON. -

That shows how dangerous it is to leave these matters to the Judges.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Undoubtedly. The position in America is very curious. There appears to be no provision enabling the Inter-State Commission to stop what is called "the war of freights," that is, undercutting. Honorable members will recollect that I read the other day part of the report of the Inter-State Commission for 18945, in which, after deploring

[P.1380] starts here

the terrible war of freights in the south, the commissioners expressed themselves as unable to deal with it, because the legislation of the Commonwealth has not yet given them power to do so, the implication being that Congress could give them this power. In 1890 Congress passed a law providing that "every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce," was thereafter to be illegal. Under that Act a very strange case arose, and it indicates the necessity for a provision such as we now desire to introduce into this Constitution. The Trans-Missouri Freight Association consisted of a certain number of railway companies which had been undercutting each other, and which combined to fix rates from which none of them should depart. The legality of the combination was questioned, but before the court could give a decision the association was broken up, in order that the court might not decide the matter. But the Judges said that they could still deal with it, and that they could grant an injunction against the repetition of what had occurred. They decided that the provisions of the Act to which I have referred—

Apply to and cover common carriers by railroad; and a contract between them in restraint of such trade or commerce is prohibited, even though the contract is entered into between competing railroads only for the purpose of thereby affecting traffic rates for the transportation of persons and property.

On page 330 the court made some observations which, I think, should guide us in this matter:

To the question why competition should necessarily be conducted to such an extent as to result in this relentless and continued war, to eventuate only in the financial ruin of one or all of the companies indulging in it, the answer is made that if competing railroad companies be left subject to the sway of free and unrestricted competition the results above foreshadowed necessarily happen from the nature of the case; that, competition being the rule, each company will seek business to the extent of its power, and will under-bid its rival in order to get the business, and such underbidding will act and react upon each company until the prices are so reduced as to make it impossible to prosper or live under them; that it is too much to ask of human nature for one company to insist upon charges sufficiently high to afford a reasonable compensation, and while doing so to see its patrons leave for rival roads who are obtaining its business by offering less rates for doing it than can be afforded and a fair profit obtained there from. Sooner than experience ruin from mere inanition, efforts will be made in the direction of meeting the under-bidding of its rival until both shall end in ruin. The only refuge, it is said, from this wretched end lies in the power of competing roads agreeing among themselves to keep up prices for transportation to such sums as shall be reasonable in themselves, so that companies may be allowed to save themselves from themselves, and to agree not to attack each other, but to keep up reasonable and living rates for the services performed. It is said that, as railroads have a right to charge reasonable rates, it must follow that a contract among themselves to keep up their charges to that extent is valid. Viewed in the light of all these facts, it is broadly and confidently asserted that it is impossible to believe that Congress or any other intelligent and honest legislative body could ever have intended to include all contracts or combinations in restraint of trade, and as a consequence thereof to prohibit competing railways from agreeing among themselves to keep up prices for transportation to such a rate as should be fair and reasonable.

The court says that, as Congress has determined that there shall be no combinations of this kind, it cannot go into the question of whether rates are or are not reasonable. The court has only to look at the bare words of the Act, and decide whether there has been any combination. But is that the state of things that we wish to see existing here? If the Supreme Court has to take into consideration the various circumstances to which I have referred, will it not be disturbed in it proper functions and required to decide questions it was never intended to decide? But if we leave matters where they are, we shall have injustice, according to the contention of my honorable friends. New South Wales would, from the nature of her situation, be absolutely free to make such charges as she liked, be they great or small, so long as they were confined to the traffic originating within her own borders, although that traffic might politically and geographically belong to another state, and should naturally flow to some other part of the Commonwealth. When we are entering into a Federation these considerations must appeal to us with unanswerable force. Therefore, I say that the amendment of the Premier of Victoria is supported by the very latest decisions on these matters, and is defensible and unanswerable when attacked from the aspect of the nature of the tribunal which it is sought to impose. It is also necessary in order to give what I think a fair and reasonable solution of the difficulties which have been engaging our attention for the last few days.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I should like, in a very few words, to say something in reply to the argument which the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton) addressed to the Convention with regard to the impropriety of submitting the matter of the justice or injustice of railway rates to the Parliament. I think the honorable member rather makes a fetish of the High Court. I think we ought to remember that, after all, the High Court, important as its functions are, is the creature of the Constitution, and that the Constitution is not to be the creature of the High Court. Why are the services of the High Courts so often called into requisition in America? Simply because of the uncertainties of the Constitution. And if, by stating plainly what we intend, we can avoid the necessity of calling into use the services of the High Court here, why should we not do so? I should prefer to we as much left to parliamentary sovereignty as possible, consistent with the proper adjustment of the Constitution, rather than that we should delegate the duties of Parliament to the High Court, as, owing to the uncertainties of the American Constitution, has too often been the case there. It is a common saying that the Constitution of America is not to be found in the Federal Constitution Act itself, but in the decisions of the Supreme Court, and if we can avoid a similar state of things here, I think we ought to do so. I entirely agree with the Attorney-General of Victoria that Parliament is the best tribunal to decide this matter. When Mr. Barton asks us why should we remit this question to the voices of the faction which at the time it was to be decided might be in power, I ask him in return why remit any of these matters to the voices of the faction which might be in power? We are giving the Federal Parliament power to take the shirts off our backs by giving them absolute powers of taxation. They have a right to restrict our liberties, and to make us military servants and slaves of the Commonwealth for the whole of our lives if they choose, theoretically speaking; and surely we can leave to the Federal Parliament the right to say whether an injustice is or is not being perpetrated in the Commonwealth in a matter of this kind. That is all we are asking—that Parliament shall have the right to see that no injustice is committed in the matter of railway rates. In matters of immensely more importance we are leaving the arbitrament to the Federal Parliament, and why should we not do so in this case? I object, as I said before, to a fetish being made of the Supreme Court, which is only the creature of the Constitution. If we can make, in our Constitution, things so plain that he who runs can read, by so doing we shall lessen the necessity of going to the Supreme Court for explanations.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

One word in support of my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon). I would say, do not let matters of detail obscure the great issues of principle which are before us.

Do not let the mere question whether it is the Federal Parliament, the Interstate Commission, or the Judiciary which should interfere in this matter obscure the great issue that some federal authority should have this power. I do not want to see a false vote taken on this occasion, as has been done on some former occasions in which members voted against a great principle because the power did not appear to them to be put in the hands exactly of that authority in which they thought it ought to rest. Let us decide, on the grounds of principle, whether or not we want to give some federal authority an oversight of these matters. The mere putting in of the words "Federal Parliament" does not necessarily imply that the Federal Parliament itself will always be the arbiter. The Federal Parliament can make what laws it likes to constitute any other body to be the arbiter.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Those are the words of the amendment—make laws.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Yes; and yet the whole of the declamation against this proposal has been based on the ground that every question will have to be debated on the floor of the Parliament. The Parliament will certainly erect some authority to deal with this matter.
Yes; the Parliament will use an instrument.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Of course it will. It will not bring into the political arena every question of this kind. The Parliament will be composed of sensible men, like this Convention, and will delegate its authority to some efficient instrument.

Mr. GORDON. -

Just as they appoint the Supreme Court Judges.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

When we have a clear issue before us, do not let that issue be obscured by a mere question of detail as to whether this, that, or the other instrument should be employed. The real question is whether there should be a federal authority or not in this matter.

Mr. WISE. -

That is not the question at all

Dr. COCKBURN. -

That is the whole point.

Mr. WISE. -

It may be what is intended, but it is not expressed.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

If the honorable and learned member sees what is clearly meant, then, to use the language of his own profession, let the issues be joined, and a vote be taken on the merits of the case.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I quite agree with my honorable friend (Dr. Cockburn) that we should direct our attention first, at any rate, to the particular principles which are involved in this proposal, and in the whole discussion. Mr. Isaacs referred at some length to cases in England and America, but I would respectfully point out that remarks based on such references are completely wide of the mark. In the first place, just contrast the difference between questions arising between railway companies A, B, and C, heard before some board in England, and questions arising affecting the trade of colonies whose representatives are to be constituted a tribunal to decide all questions arising which affect such trade. It is a very queer kind of a jury—a jury personally interested probably in every question that comes up. If we can learn any wisdom at all from our proceedings, we can learn this lesson, that the moment trade comes up in any shape or form—whether in regard to the hold that one colony wants to have over the rivers of New South Wales, or with regard to the hold the two colonies want to have over the trade of New South Wales—we find immediately that the pure federal atmosphere becomes obscured, and there is a contest, almost by delegations, upon these points of self-interest. Who can calmly see the slightest chance of any questions which might arise being settled in a just and impartial manner by such a tribunal? Who can look forward with any satisfaction to the tribunal established under the proposition of the Premier of Victoria—a tribunal in which almost every individual sitting in judgment and making laws will represent the direct interests of his own state in conflict with the direct interests of another state?

Mr. GORDON. -

The creation of an interstate tribunal is conceded.

Mr. REID. -

The honorable member must see, first of all, that that is not so.

Mr. GORDON. -

The Inter-State Commission is in the Bill.

Mr. REID. -

It by no means follows that it will remain in the Bill.

Mr. GORDON. -

We all assume that it will.

Mr. REID. -

We have not assumed anything about any clause we have not yet considered. It is entirely open for consideration and perhaps for omission. That is the view we have taken in the past with reference to every other clause, and I presume no understanding has been arrived at in reference to this one. The Convention is absolutely free to leave it in or take it out. But even if that were to be left in, this amendment is fatally at variance with the jurisdiction and usefulness of such a body making laws—to do what?"—to forbid such preferences or discriminations as it," not the Inter-State Commission, "may deem to be undue and unreasonable or to be unjust to any state." Just dwell for a moment upon these words. The Federal Parliament is called upon to make laws to forbid these things. Now, any one who has the slightest knowledge of railway management and the multitude of rates that may come within the scope of this proposal will see the sort of task that is being laid on the Federal Parliament. It must spend probably all its time dealing with particular rates on particular competitive railways, trying to checkmate the ingenuity of the Railways Commissioners as each attempt after attempt is being made to impose a rate which is doing what, perhaps, the Federal Parliament will think to be a wrong thing, but which cannot be declared a wrong thing until Parliament has passed a law declaring it to be a wrong thing, and forbidding it to be done. First of all, it would leave all such matters to the Government. No private member would ever attempt to bring in a Bill to forbid the schemings of Railways Commissioners to carry on their railways so as to evade this provision, so that naturally the Government would deal with such matters, and the Government would thus spend nearly all its time in order to carry out the spirit, meaning, or intention of this clause. That is a proposition which has only to be looked in the face to stand self-condemned. If the words were to establish a tribunal to forbid preferences or discriminations which that tribunal might deem to be undue and unreasonable-

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do you suggest that? If that is the only objection we can cure it.

Mr. REID. -

How can the honorable member suppose, when I have just begun to address myself to the proposition, that that is the only objection? I deal first with the structure of the proposal, to show what it means. The first thing we all attempt is to come to an understanding what a proposition means. It then comes to us for our judgment whether we approve of it or not. I point out that the meaning of this proposition is that the Parliament, not by any resolution of one House or of the two Houses, but through all the clumsy stages of passing a law, must grapple with all the ingenuity of Railways Commissioners in passing rate after rate or 100 different rates upon different lines which may be in contravention of the principle of this proposition. Who would lay upon Parliament such a task? No reasonable man would set Parliament to check Railways Commissioners by means of Acts of Parliament; they would never overtake the commissioners. What Parliament in the world is there that could pass Bills through two Houses to forbid railway rates, to overtake the ingenuity and industry of Railways Commissioners who can frame rates every day, and who could alter them the next day by a stroke of the pen? The Parliament would be hopelessly, lagging behind in the race to attempt by such clumsy methods to grapple with the quickness of action of the Railways Commissioners. So that method in itself breaks down. But there is a more important point behind it. Do we want our Commonwealth to be put in such a position that its political forces in the party arena are to be put in the odious position of pretending to do justice when their own self-interests are involved? What set of Judges in the world have ever been allowed to adjudicate in a matter affecting any human being when they have a direct personal interest in the matter to be decided? What sort of new tribunal is this which the wisdom of this illustrious Convention is creating? Are not the bare bitter strong opposing forces of self-interest sufficiently apparent in this Convention when the trade, whether of a river or a turnpike or a railway, is involved? Have we not seen enough to the peculiar kind of judicial treatment which such questions receive in this Convention without carrying the miserable fight of provincial self-interest into the Federal Parliament, in the name of an impartial judicial tribunal? The whole project breaks down, and it can only be thought of owing to some desperate emotion of self-interest; or to meet some desperate necessity of some colony or colonies. I confess that my honorable and learned friend, the Attorney-General of Victoria, does not often perform such an extraordinary change of front as he has done in connexion with this question. I will read from today's newspaper the well-considered decision, or the ill-considered decision, of Mr. Isaacs, taking this report as correct. Mr. Isaacs said-

That, although sympathizing with Mr. Higgins' objection, he was afraid the words of his amendment would carry them too far in one direction, and not far enough in another. Suppose Victoria formed regulations and a set of charges, with a view of making Melbourne the greatest port in the Commonwealth, would those regulations and charges be rendered null and void by the amendment? If so, the amendment went too far; for each of the states, so long as they raised up no barriers to trade, should have the most perfect liberty, by offering low railway rates, to make their ports the best in the Commonwealth.

That is a plain and intelligible proposition, and I won't oppose it. I am prepared to give Victoria exactly the same liberty as ourselves in connexion with such matters. I am prepared, if the words leave the matter in doubt, and I frankly admit that they do -

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is just our difficulty.

Mr. REID. -

I wonder you are so long in seeing it; I saw it yesterday, and I think my friend must see it too. But, whilst I am prepared, contrary to the principles of the Constitution, to help Victoria out of her difficulty, I must say that if my friend thinks this is helping him, he is making a great mistake. There is no colony against which these words could be used more strongly than against the colony of Victoria. But I am not concerned specially with Victoria. I am looking at the matter, first of all, as it affects the working of the Commonwealth, and, secondly, as it affects the working of the states. Mr. Isaacs knows that in the United States Commerce Act, in its very first section, it is expressly provided that there shall be no interference with the traffic which is entirely within a state. The first section of the Act puts such traffic absolutely beyond the interference of that commission, and that is the very basis of the Constitution—the very words of the United States Constitution, and the very words of this Constitution. In section 53 or 52, subsection (1), the Commonwealth is given power to make laws to regulate commerce among the states. In section 89, it is provided that the commerce among the states, using the same words, shall be absolutely free.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Between States.

Mr. REID. -

Yes. These are the words of our Constitution, and they are the words of the United States Constitution; and the provision in the Inter-State Commerce Act absolutely exempting traffic entirely within a state followed the legal decisions upon the words in the United States Constitution. We must be taken to know what we are doing. The words "among the states" can only mean one thing. They cannot mean between one part of one state and another part of another state. They mean the commerce between the states, as expressed. That has been the scope of the United States Constitution, and the scope of the Inter-State Commerce Act. That is the scope of this Bill up to this moment, and I submit it is a sound scope. I submit that where the sovereignty of a state is preserved it should be left with its sovereignty or else it should be plainly told it has no sovereignty. One of the greatest evils of the task we are engaged on would be brought about if we are not always clear and explicit on the point as to whether the states are really to be sovereign on matters vested in themselves, or are to be creatures of the Commonwealth. It becomes all the more important if the law of the Commonwealth, passed on a subject within the scope of the Commonwealth, is absolutely supreme over any state law passed in the course of its sovereign power-over a power expressly kept within the state. That is the position. If the Commonwealth law on subject A, which is within the power of the Commonwealth, incidentally conflicts with a state law on subject B, with which the Commonwealth has nothing to do, the state cannot even be heard in the Federal Supreme Court to say one word against the Commonwealth law. Why? Because it is provided under the 7th section, and under, I think, the 100th section, that where the law of the state is inconsistent with the law of the Commonwealth-it does not say on the same subject-the law of the Commonwealth shall prevail. We are in a sufficient position of danger. Though the Commonwealth laws may interfere with the state's law, in which the states are supposed to be sovereign, still we have sufficient danger, without further mixing up these two important questions. If it were a dispute between A., B., and C., as private individuals, the proposition to make the Parliament judge of a particular railway rate or regulation would still be ridiculous, because it would not work; it would break down. The Federal Parliament, after three months of procedure, might decide a certain rate to be wrong, and annul it, and another rate would take its place. We would then have another run of three months before the Commonwealth could undertake to say the second rate was wrong. That is the sort of procedure the amendment establishes. It does not suggest another tribunal to decide whether a particular rate is unfair and unreasonable, but it takes on itself, as a Parliament, to decide it by an Act of Parliament. That seems to me, in the plainest possible view of the facts, to be a ridiculous proposition. If an Inter-State Commission is intended to decide such matters, the general words of the Constitution regulating trade and commerce would enable the Commonwealth Parliament to establish such tribunal. So far as any useful purpose is concerned, the proposition in reference to an independent tribunal is unnecessary. Any question affecting a railway rate in this Commonwealth is a state question. It is a question affecting a state and not an individual.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
And states.
Mr. REID. -
If there were 50 states the argument would be the same. What have we done in reference to disputes which affect the Commonwealth and the states? We have deliberately put in the bedrock of the Constitution, that such disputes shall be decided by an independent tribunal, sworn to do justice, sitting as Judges. That is the protection which we have put in the Constitution for the states. If the Commonwealth and a state come into collision at any time on an item, the state will seek the protection of the Federal Supreme Court, however strong the Commonwealth is, and appeal for justice. That is the structure and design of this Constitution. Why should a state's interests in its railways be remitted to any other tribunal? I will tell you why. There are a lot of people with a great deal of interest in the trade of New South Wales; and they want to have special words, to make sure they will get that trade. That is the plain English of the matter. We cannot be blind to the position of New South Wales. We have colonies all round our borders. These colonies have been straining every nerve, not for one year, or for ten or twenty years, but always, to practically annex New South Wales as far as they could. We have their emissaries, day after day, going through the length and breadth of New South Wales on such an errand. We have Victorian agents going up, not merely through Riverina, but as far as Bourke-through the back country of our colony-offering extreme inducements to take trade from us.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. - Did not your Commissioners of Railways send out certain circulars?

Mr. REID. - I am afraid we have had to. When we see these gentlemen from Victoria going up to near Bourke, I think it is about time we did something in the defence of our own interests. But I only mention that to show that a Federal Parliament which will be composed of representatives of colonies that act in that way is not quite the tribunal which we ought to select. We want, at any rate, to choose a tribunal whose Judges have not been beset by that sort of thing. What a strange thing to propose that gentlemen who have been members of Governments that have indulged in these cut-throat rates should sit in the Federal Parliament as Judges over such a matter. Such a tribunal is tainted with self-interest, and, under the guise of doing justice, it will bring into play all the political passions that can possibly be invoked-political passions which are never so keen as on questions of trade, as we have seen in this Convention. So that whatever we do, if this Convention is determined that the Commonwealth, whilst paying nothing for the construction and management of the railways, shall practically run them—if we are prepared to put the people of the colonies in the position of saying yes or no to such a proposal as that, at any rate, let us try to induce them to shut their eyes to the sort of thing they are asked to do, by giving them some guarantee that they will get justice, or that the tribunal which is to determine the matter will be a just one.

Mr. ISAACS. - Why should that tribunal be more unjust in a case of this kind than in the case of the Tariff?

Mr. REID. - I will tell my honorable friend the difference between those two things. We are not handing over the railways to the Federation. If the Federation had the financial responsibility of running the railways, much that I say would lose its point, because the Federation would have to pay for its mistakes in railway management, and other people would not have to pay to have the privilege of doing their own business in the way that somebody else directed it ought to be done.

Mr. ISAACS. - That is no distinction.

Mr REID. - That is a sufficiently strong distinction.

Mr. ISAACS. - Nobody proposes that the Federal Parliament shall make such regulations.

Mr. REID. -
This proposal is infinitely less sensible than a proposal of that kind would be. I could more easily understand the Federal Parliament being asked to make regulations, although that would expose them to the taint I have already referred to—the taint of self-interest.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That would not be done.

Mr. REID. -

Still, I think it infinitely more absurd to compel Parliament to express its opinion on the fluctuating rates of railways in a solemn Act of Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

And an opinion would not be asked until a dispute had arisen.

Mr. REID. -

How could it? That brings me to another feature of the injustice of this proposal. It must be remembered that the Parliament has, before it can legislate, to arrive at a personal judgment—the personal judgment that it deems a certain railway rate to be undue or unreasonable, or to be unjust to any state.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

Then we had better go to school again.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Some of us.

Mr. REID. -

What do these words mean? The Parliament may make laws—I leave out the intervening words—particularly to forbid such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue. How can any authority deem a thing to be undue or unjust until it knows what that thing is?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It can provide for it beforehand.

Mr. REID. -

That is exactly the admission that I wished some one to make. It only points more keenly than I can to the clumsiness of this proposal. Each of these railways is in a widely different set of circumstances than the other railways—certainly that is so it our colony—and how, in the name of common sense, can any Parliament deal with the varying circumstances, of different lines of railways in different districts, and with rates of which they have no knowledge?
The Federal Parliament can lay down general principles.

Mr. REID. -

If there are any particular general principles which honorable members wish us to oblige them with, let them propose to put those general principles in the Constitution; let them put those general principles before us in black and white now, and let us know before we sign this deed what you are driving at. It is a queer way of putting general principles in, to propose to give a certain tainted tribunal, in a matter of this sort, an absolute power to do what it likes.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I do not admit that the Federal Parliament is going to be a tainted tribunal.

Mr. REID. -

When I say tainted, I mean tainted in the point of self-interest. In the case of our friend, that taint is patriotic. The representatives of South Australia are unanimous, except the Treasurer of South Australia, who shines amongst us all for the absolute conscientiousness of his attitude in this Convention. I will not say the same about ourselves. I do not want to put myself on the same plane as the Treasurer of South Australia in this matter. I say that there is nothing more natural than for the representatives of New South Wales to look more particularly after the interests of their own colony rather than after the interests of other colonies. They are human beings. And I am merely saying the same of my honorable friends, only that they are rather more so. It is no reflection on a Parliament to say that it consists of human beings. It is no reflection on a Judge, if he happens to be a shareholder in a bank whose case comes before his tribunal, to say that he should not sit in that case. No Judge would think of doing so under such circumstances. And in these matters of trade, when the rival interests of the colonies crop up in the Federal Parliament, each man who comes from his own colony will, in the course of human nature, naturally look more after the interests of his own colony than after the interests of other colonies who have got other persons there to represent them.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then, whatever tribunal you have to get, you would get its members from persons who were not citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -

A Judge is a citizen of the Commonwealth, and yet be cannot sit in a case in which he is interested.
And yet you say you would not have him sit in a case of this kind.

Mr. REID. -

Not at all. A few minutes ago I expressly pointed to a tribunal that we have put in the Constitution, which is the kind of tribunal I have referred to.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But won't the members of that tribunal necessarily be citizens of the Commonwealth, and tainted, as you say?

Mr. REID. -

No. But I was not referring to the Inter-State Commission. I was referring to the Federal Supreme Court.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Are not the members of that court citizens of the Commonwealth?

Mr. REID. -

If I cannot point out the difference between the functions of Judges on the bench and the functions of political representatives dealing with the interests of the various states in the Federal Parliament, I really cannot meet the intelligence of the honorable member. Fancy Mr. Solomon trying anything affecting the mercantile interests of South Australia. He is a clear-headed able man, it is true, but I should want another clear-headed able man, who was a New South Welshman, along-side him when such issues were being tried.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

A man after the Reid pattern.

Mr. REID. -

No, I am not up to the honorable member in business matters. My honorable friend is a much cleverer man than I am in business matters.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Will you answer me one question—would your objection be overcome by putting in, after "Federal Parliament," "may appoint an interstate tribunal independent of Parliament, which may make laws dealing with this question"? Will you agree with that?

Mr. REID. -

One would think that my honorable friend was knocking me down at auction. I would like to state to my honorable friend, without turning my back on the Chair, that I infinitely prefer the High Court or an Inter-State Commission to the tribunal of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Still you do not say whether you will accept the alteration.

Mr. REID. -

No, because I have other objections, and very serious ones, which I have mentioned. The words in the Bill give the Federal Parliament at present full power to appoint, as a tribunal, a body of men to deal with questions affecting commerce and navigation. The power is in the Bill, and there is no necessity for this provision.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Not quite so full as this.

Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend knows, just as well as I do, that this is not a drive for an Inter-State Commission but is a drive for prejudging how they are going to decide. That is the sort of thing that is wanted. My honorable friends are constantly willing to accept tribunals so long as they lay down a principle on which they must act. You cannot lay down a general principle in reference to the varying

Mr. BARTON. -

It would not be fair play.

Mr. REID. -

Any words which could be pointed to by a critic of this Bill in any colony as designed to prejudice that colony and its substantial interests, in the event of an independent tribunal having to decide, are words I do not want to see in this Constitution. If the interests of a great colony like New South Wales are to be left absolutely to any tribunal, the interests of the smaller colonies must be left in the same way.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the proposal.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is not the proposal.

Mr. REID. -

That proposal does not fit this proposal. This proposal is one to do a thing which is impossible in the nature of the case. It is impossible justly to lay down any rule in any form of words that would enable justice to be done under all the varying and fluctuating conditions to which I have referred. No human brain could conceive a form of words which would, in administration, be absolutely fair as regarded every possible case of railway rates and railway administration which would come up, and the attempt to do such a thing is idle. We might just as well attempt-and it would be a very valuable thing if we could do it-to lay down general principles of law and justice, which the Federal Court should administer. We do not attempt to do that.

Mr. BARTON. -

We might as well make a code of laws for them.

Mr. REID. -
We leave the destinies of every man in the Commonwealth and of every state to the judicial discretion of the High Court. If we do that in reference to matters of the greatest concern

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Subject to lines we have laid down.

Mr. REID. -
If my honorable friend were more familiar with these matters he would know that the Federal High Court will begin with a wonderfully free hand.

Mr. BARTON. -
It amounts to saying this: Do justice, provided that you slate the other fellow.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
It means, do justice, provided that you do it on that pattern. That suits some, because the pattern suits them. Any attempt to lay down any criterion of fairness in the varying complexities of the administration of different lilies in different parts of the country must break down, because the circumstances vary so indefinitely; and only those who have an ulterior purpose to serve, and see that the words will at any rate do them good, will attempt to put them in. I can understand men of business putting all sorts of words in to suit them, however ridiculous they may seem in the structure of the document. But we are here, I presume, to act fairly by one another. We are here to constrict a document to which the critic cannot point as containing a blemish of that sort. I frankly put to my honorable friends here a difficulty, which is not a new one to me; for the strongest observations I made in 1891—and I made, I am afraid, rather too strong observations—were about this very provision in the old Bill, which amounted to an interference with the management of the state railways, while leaving the state with the financial responsibility of working them. I have always put this matter as a very strong and important one in connexion with our railways. I cannot change my view on the matter, because it appears to me inherently just that those who have the financial responsibility of a mere trading concern, remember, because these railways are simply a trading concern

Mr. DEAKIN. -
More than that.

Mr. REID. -
Let me put this test. If the railways in Riverina, were owned by private individuals whose money had been embarked in them, there would be a great deal more slowness in interfering with the vested interests of those shareholders than there is in interfering with the interests of New South Wales. A large number of questions would come up. We would hear about the rights of property. We would hear all sorts of very solemn things said about the rights of possibly some few influential individuals who owned those lines. The railways in Riverina were established as a business concern, also as a state concern; they were established under circumstances of peculiar hardship to our settlers, when those who now speak of Melbourne as the natural port of Riverina, refused to our producers the right to sell a shilling's worth of their produce in a Victorian market. It must not be forgotten that we built these railways because of that hardship.

Mr. BARTON. -
Because there was only the one market for them.

Mr. REID. -
Because, deprived of their natural market, they came to the Government in Sydney, and said:"We cannot sell our goods in this natural market of Melbourne, in Victoria, you must do something for us, and let us come to Sydney, where we shall have a chance to sell our goods." The Riverina railways were constructed under these circumstances, and, built as they were under such circumstances, I cannot consent to words being put in this Bill which would make those railways worthless—which would make it impossible for us to keep them open. It is not a matter of interfering with trade that oppresses me here; it is the fact that these large assets must be preserved and must be protected.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Do you mean that by charging reasonable rates Riverina would be destroyed? Riverina is the most prosperous part of New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -
Yes; but if the mere mileage distance were preserved, 200 miles would always prevail as against 500 miles. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
You want to derogate from freedom of trade by taking it away.

Mr. REID. -
No; my honorable friends in Victoria having put up a fence across the boundary of the 200 miles to keep our stock and our wheat and our general produce from going to their natural market, we were compelled to build these lines to give our producers an opening.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
That is going to be done away with.

Mr. REID. -
Then just send along a cheque to the value of our railways!

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
We want to get rid of all that.
Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend does not owe anything upon these lines. If he owed a few hundred thousand pounds upon them he would take a very different view. The airy wave of the hand that does not owe anything is very pretty, but I, unfortunately, cannot wave my hand in that airy fashion, because the colony I represent does owe a large sum of money upon these lines. Of course, there is no trouble of this sort in a country that only measures about five by two. These difficulties have arisen because our producers were shut out from their natural market, and I say that, having built these railways, so long as we have to run them I will not allow our liberty of action in running them to be interfered with. Now, that is plain language. It is not only plain, but it is absolutely in accordance with the principles of the United States Constitution, because, as I have already pointed out, under the words of that Constitution, and under the Inter-State Commerce Act, it is recognised clearly that, so far as a State's own internal trade is concerned, the state's sovereignty is preserved. I only ask for that which every state in the United States has. If these were private railways, and only private capital were concerned, and if our claim would be recognised in regard to private ownership, that claim becomes all the stronger, inasmuch as our railways are owned by the state, and represent a large amount of money belonging to the people of the whole country; and inasmuch as they were constructed, not to secure some sordid gain, but on sound principles and with good objects. But I can see the position of Victoria under the Bill as it stands. She would be treated unfairly. My reason for saying that is this: That goods going from New South Wales to Victoria, to the nearest port—we will drop calling it the natural port—would interstate commerce, and the Commonwealth would have power to step in there, whilst it would not have the power to step in in case of goods going from Hay to Sydney. We must look at facts they are, and make allowance for them. If we asked our people to shut their eyes to facts in accepting this Constitution, we should make a great mistake. And just as I could not expect my friends in Victoria to go with this Bill as it stands to their people, so I could not go to my people with the Bill as it would stand if this proposal of Sir George Turner were put into it. But I am prepared, in spite of the interests of my own colony—which would be against such a proposal—in fairness and justice to Victoria, to vote to allow her to have the same terms as we have ourselves. I am prepared to give Victoria exactly the mine freedom as we have in regard to our internal commerce. And I do this, I admit, on no broad principle of federation. I have no doubt that it would be far more satisfactory if we could cast all these considerations to the wind and allow the matter to go by. It would be more in harmony with the federal spirit to do so. But when we go to our people who have these large assets in their hands, which would be rendered valueless under conditions such as we are asked to accept, we place federation in an unfortunate position. We do not wish to see that. We wish to do justice to Victoria. The present condition of affairs has grown up—and I recognise that it is more a matter between Victoria and New South Wales than as affecting any other colony. Because our friends in South Australia, with the protection they will have secured in regard to the rivers as the Bill stands, and with the enormous distance of our back country from Sydney, need not have much anxiety in connexion with the matter. I admit that they may have on the border some trouble with Victoria with which I am not familiar, but even in South Australia, where everything I am told—since there is no temptation the contrary—is perfect, I understand that there are port charges imposed, when wool gets near to Adelaide, which have the effect of sending it down to Adelaide. So that these things are really done all round in the interests of railways, and generally by business men for business reasons. The sooner we recognise these railways as business concerns and leave them alone to be managed by gentlemen who know their own business, the better I think it will be. Now, there is a suggested amendment which has been placed in my hands, and which I will read, although really I think it only states the position of affairs as the Bill stands already.

Mr. BARTON. -

But the Victorian representatives want the position to be made plain.

Mr. REID. -

Then here is the suggested amendment—

The Parliament may make laws for the execution and maintenance with respect to trade and intercourse among the states of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Even the Chairman cannot listen to that proposal without laughing.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is just what we have contended would leave Victoria in an unfair position.

Mr. REID. -

I admit that this proposal leaves matters exactly as they are. But it is a nice little form of words. They read far nicer than Sir George's words do.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

What does the amendment mean?
Mr. REID. -

It means exactly what we have done. It just emphasizes what I have been saying, that, with these general words, there is really an attempt to do a thing which would not stand investigation if it were put in plain English, that is to say, to assume an internal control over internal railways in respect of internal traffic. That proposal is absolutely foreign to the Constitution of the United States, and it is absolutely foreign to the proposed Constitution of the Australian Commonwealth. I will resist it to the utmost. But, at the same time, I say again that, in the case of Victoria, the particular provision which I have referred to would leave her in a very unfair position as she stands, and if any form of words can be suggested to meet the case of Victoria, and leave her open to come into our colony and compete for the trade of our producers, I am quite willing to put them in the Bill. But Sir George Turner, I think, would not find that this would be satisfactory to his own colony. That is my impression.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The worst the Parliament can do under this would be to allow the state of affairs that you are willing to allow.

Mr. REID. -

I do not know that it would. It would depend on which way the whip went, or upon which way the Government of the day chose to go. I take my right honorable friend's case as showing how it might work more injuriously to him than to us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am willing to risk that.

Mr. REID. -

Then, if my honorable friend is willing to risk it, he must feel very confident of his tribunal. When I find a cautious able lawyer like my right honorable friend prepared to take the risk of the verdict that will be given, I think he knows how the verdict is going. I am not prepared to risk it. I cannot go before my electors and talk in such a free and easy manner.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You risk a far bigger issue.

Mr. REID. -

No business man would be talked to in that way.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You have risked your fiscal policy, so that I suppose you must be pretty certain of what the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth is going to be.

Mr. REID. -
I again point out how that comes about. In the same way I have agreed to equality of representation, which I absolutely disapprove of. I think in the future it will work in the most unfair and ridiculous way. Why did I vote for it? Simply because it is impossible to have federation without it. In the same way I am prepared to risk all my fiscal principles in the name of federation, because it is impossible to have federation without it. Do not believe I would do it if I could help it? But that is not the supreme consideration which applies to this question. This is not a question of that broad and vital character. It is a question of rival interests in trade, which, boiled down, come to rival commercial interests which have grown up, and of which the railways have been made the vehicle during past years. If any method can be adopted to lessen the evils of this competition, while preserving to each state some sort of control over the railways left on its hands, I should be prepared to adopt it. But this proposition I have sufficiently shown to be one I could not possibly accept.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

The question under consideration is whether or not this clause purposes fulfilling a federal object. The Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales says there appears to be perfect willingness to adopt any tribunal so long as the persons who agree to it can prescribe the pattern. With all submission, I would point out that we have in this Constitution prescribed a pattern for trade and commerce. We have declared that after the imposition of a uniform Tariff, trade and commerce between the states shall be absolutely free. Now, we have discovered in our experience two expedients that have been used for the purpose of derogating from absolute freedom of trade. One of them is customs duties. We have decided that that derogation from freedom of trade shall be abolished, and we have declared that after the abolition of Border Duties there shall be absolute freedom of commerce between the colonies. Really, then, we must remove the other influence that derogates from absolute freedom of trade.

Mr. BARTON. -

These clauses do it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

With all deference to the honorable member's great ability, his knowledge of constitutional law, and of constitutional history, I venture to differ from him on that point. The declaration itself is absolutely useless. A Constitution that was only a declaration could serve no practical purpose. If you make a declaration of a principle, you must provide machinery clauses, and I submit that what we are endeavouring to do here is to provide a machinery clause for giving effect in one particular to that absolute freedom of intercourse between the colonies.

Mr. REID. -

Do not forget that there is a special subsection in clause 52 giving the Federal Parliament power to do everything that is necessary.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

That is to appeal to the Federal High Court.

Mr. REID. -

No as a matter of legislation.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

There appears to be a very considerable doubt as to whether there is power to prevent differential rates that act as preferential rates and derogate from freedom of intercourse between the colonies. This clause only aims at making it clear that if there are such rates the Commonwealth shall have power to over-ride them. Those who are advocating free-trade between the colonies; those who declaim, as Mr. Reid does, against the inequity perpetrated by Victoria in raising barriers against the natural markets of the people whose trade we are now considering, should recognise that the advantages of freedom of trade to the whole Commonwealth would be sufficient to compensate for any trifling pecuniary disadvantages that might accrue in connexion with some of their assets. My right honorable friend says that the tribunal to which this is to be referred is tainted. It is impossible to conceive of a less tainted tribunal if he means that it is tainted with unfairness. It is proposed to submit it to a tribunal on which each of the parties interested would be represented in proportion to their interests, as calculated upon the basis of population. All the elements considered fair in arbitration cases are to be provided. Not only are the parties interested to be represented in proportion to their interests, but there are to be fair-minded and impartial persons to hold the balance fairly between them. Mr. Reid, in reply to an interjection from Mr. Solomon, said-"If you were representing one side I should require to have a keen clear-headed business man representing me on the other." That is exactly what this clause provides—that where a conflict arises as to the question of whether a rate that is proposed within the boundaries of a state is designed to act as a barrier to freedom of intercourse, both parties shall be represented by the keenest and clearest-headed men they can get. After the question has been thrashed out it will have to be decided by the vote of a tribunal in which they are represented, and in which there are a number of other persons who have no personal interests whatever. The vote of the whole, not of the interested parties merely, is to decide whether or not the proposed rate is in derogation of freedom of intercourse. Mr. Reid laid considerable stress upon the point that this matter was not to be referred to an Inter-State Commission or to any tribunal but Parliament itself, that Parliament upon every occasion must make the law, that Parliament must go struggling along in the rear of nimble and active Commissioners of Railways, and that it would necessarily always be at least three months in arrear. If I understand the powers of Parliament, Parliament may make a law providing that a certain tribunal shall decide in case of a dispute. That law may empower a commission or any other body to be the arbiter from time to time. I recognise that in regard to these technical questions a layman is at a great disadvantage, but it seems to me that, under the provisions of this clause, Parliament may make a law decreeing that an Inter-State Commission shall be the arbiter when a dispute arises. If I am correct in that assumption, the Inter-State Commission will be in exactly the same position with respect to its ability to act quickly as the Railways Commissioners of the various states. It will not have to manage the railways; it will not have to say what rates shall be adopted; it will only have the power to say that certain rates shall not be adopted. The objection raised by the leader of the Convention was that this was a proposal to give the Commonwealth the management of the railways without attaching to that management any responsibilities in connexion with them. But I respectfully submit that control in no way means management.

Mr. REID. -
It is much easier.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
It is not proposed that the commission should be able to say how the railways should be managed, it is only to say how they should not be managed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
If you could control the rate of interest charged by a bank it would not matter much who managed the bank.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
That is not a parallel case. If I had power to say in every instance what ventures the bank should enter upon, I might very materially influence its welfare and prosperity; but if I were only empowered to say that the bank might enter upon any venture which might seem desirable, except some particular venture indicated upon the face of the document giving me this power, I do not think that I could very materially influence the welfare of the bank. At any rate, what we are now aiming at is the establishment of intercolonial relations such as have never previously existed. There are several barriers to this which it will be necessary to remove in order to achieve our desires, and I am now urging that the Commonwealth Parliament, in which all interests will be adequately represented, shall have the power to say that one particular incident of railway management cannot be tolerated. Certain rates are not to be imposed, not because it is urged that their imposition is necessary to make the railways a profitable asset, but because they derogate from the principle of absolute freedom of intercourse between the colonies, which we say is essential to federation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If you were starting a new business under specific conditions that would be all right, but you are now dealing with a business already in existence.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

That is true; and if the provision is agreed to it will be for the states to consider whether the advantages to be achieved from the knocking down of all barriers, and from amalgamating, for certain purposes services which cannot be performed by the various states separately as well as they can be performed by these states unitedly, will compensate for the business loss involved.

Mr. REID. -

Does not the honorable member see how unequal that would be? The other colonies will get the advantages he speaks of without this sacrifice.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The right honorable member makes the statement that this is unequal, but he does not prove it.

Mr. LYNE. -

It is true, nevertheless.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

In the effort to draw the trade of Riverina to Sydney at whatever cost-

Mr. REID. -

You refused to have it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The right honorable member has already made that statement, but I am opposed to entering into a fiscal controversy here. It would, however, be very easy to show that nothing we have done in the slightest degree necessitated the construction of railways from Sydney to Riverina, because, in spite of all the barriers that we have erected, if ordinary and fair rates were charged upon the New South Wales railways, it would be possible to take produce from Riverina to Melbourne, and thence by sea to Sydney, more cheaply than it can now be taken direct by rail.

Mr. REID. -

Thank you for nothing.
Mr. TRENWITH. -

The right honorable member has been adopting the line of argument in which he is so eminently successful. He has been raising up a man of straw in order to knock him over again.

Mr. REID. -

Two and eleven pence a cental is not straw; 30s. a bullock is not straw.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Whether the duty is 50s. or 5s. a bullock that is in no degree pertinent to the argument I am conducting. The question at issue is: Is it possible to have internal railway rates which will not be in derogation of freedom of trade, and, if so, is it desirable to make laws to prevent the establishment of such rates? I submit that we cannot carve this Commonwealth according to the pattern we desire, unless we accept some such provision as that which has been proposed by the Premier of Victoria. In reply to the argument that no such provision is contained in the Constitution of the United States, I respectfully submit that it would be a strange thing if this Constitution, which is being made in 1898, were not in many particulars better than the Constitution made over a century ago. It is no fatal objection to say that 100 years ago some extremely wise and marvellously able men framed a Constitution in which this provision does not appear.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There were no railways then.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

In making our Constitution we should be guided by the mistakes of other people, and not tempted to follow those mistakes. Our experience has taught us that it would be extremely wise to provide that the Federal Parliament, which will have the Commonwealth interests at heart and the pattern of this Constitution in its mind, should have this power, so that it may be able to create machinery which will bring about results such as we require. I recognise the generosity of the Premier of New South Wales in saying that he would be glad to support any proposal which would place New South Wales and Victoria upon an equal footing, not only in regard to the trade of Victoria, but also in regard to the trade of that part of New South Wales which is geographically attached to Victoria. I agree with him that if we can come to no equitable arrangement, to restrain the states from making undesirable railway rates, which will be acceptable to all, the next best thing will be to give a free hand to all the parties engaged in this fighting for traffic. But clearly, fighting, if it can be avoided, is not desirable in connexion with states that are proposing to unite in a partnership of friendship and brotherhood; and fighting, if it continues, must derogate from that feeling. It is impossible to conceive New South Wales and Victoria living on terms of amity and good fellowship, such as ought to exist, while each of their Governments are from time to time engaged in framing legislation or regulations intended to circumvent the other. It is because I am anxious to see the fighting removed—because I am anxious to see between the colonies a condition of absolute free-trade that I am supporting this proposal. Although I am a protectionist of the protectionists, I admit, and always have admitted, that the slight advantages of intercolonial duties would be immensely outweighed by the greater advantages of absolute freedom of intercourse between the colonies, with reasonable protection on the coast.

Mr. REID. -

It is a good thing to be able to support one's principles and one's interests at the same time.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I can say, without pretending to understand the subtlety of my honorable friend's interjection, that as far as I am concerned, and I believe most members of the Victorian delegation, we are considering, not the mere interests of Victoria or any other spot of the Commonwealth, but the desirability of embodying in this Constitution provisions that will act equitably, and in accordance with the principles that we have laid down.

Mr. REID. -

Then you will give us compensation for our loss?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Personally, I should see no great objection to, if possible, adding to this proposal some other to the effect that if, in controlling the action of states in connexion with their railways in the interests of Commonwealth purposes, loss were entailed, that loss should be recouped to the state which suffered it from the Commonwealth funds, if the loss could be proved. That seems equitable and fair, and, personally, I should have no objection to it. But I would urge on honorable members that, if we are going to have free-trade between the colonies, let us have it. If we are going to have federation, we cannot have it on the lines that ought to exist without wiping away absolutely a thing in the nature of fighting or struggling between the colonies. If we can abolish such fighting we certainly ought to do so, and we cannot have federation on the basis it should prevail unless we do.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I cannot help thinking that the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales made an unanswerable point at the opening of his speech and also at the end of it, when he said that this proposal of the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria, if carried, would operate much more to the prejudice Victoria than to that of any other of the colonies. But that being his view, what amazed me was that he should spend so much energy, and he has plenty of energy, so much ability, and he has plenty of ability, as we all know from sad experience, in combating a proposal which will tie the hands of Victoria and leave the hands of New South Wales absolutely free in the matter of rates. Sir, I understood that the Premier of Victoria was in favour of putting a stop to all preferential rates and to all unjust differential rates. By unjust differential rates I mean those differential rates which are not merely development rates—which are not merely meant to relieve producers in the back country, but which are designed for the purpose of drawing trade from the nearest port or the natural port, as you may choose to call it. I understood that was the right honorable gentleman's intention, and I looked this morning to find his proposed amendment. But to my amazement I found that, after all the deliberation we have had, we have now before us a proposal which I think I shall be able to convince honorable members is simply a proposal to stop preferential rates, and has nothing whatever to do with unjust differential rates. Let us look at the proposal as it stands. It states that—

The Parliament may make laws to provide for the execution and maintenance upon railways within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce,—

So far there is no harm in that, and the Premier of New South Wales says he is willing to have that portion of the proposal, because there is no provision as to trade and commerce which will stop differential rates of any sort in New South Wales. But see what follows:

and particularly to forbid such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable, or to be unjust to any state.

Now, the vital words there are "preferences or discriminations." They are the cardinal words upon which the whole thing turns, and no chain is stronger than its weakest link. I would ask what preference, what discrimination, is there in the case of the kind of rate to which I referred—charging nothing for wool from Hay to Cootamundra? Where is the preference there? There is neither preference nor discrimination as to person or goods. There is no preference or discrimination. It is not meant by this that you may not charge from one station a different price from what you charge from another, otherwise we must have one uniform railway tariff from every New South Wales station to Sydney. The phrase is "preferences or discriminations," which must be either as to persons or goods. Now, in the rate from Berrigan to Sydney, or from Hay to Sydney, or from Cootamundra to Sydney, I take it that you charge every person the same price wherever he comes from; there is no preference of persons, and no preference of locality. Where, then, I ask, is there any power under this proposal of the Premier of Victoria to interfere with what he says he is in favour of interfering with unjust differential rates? I would be the last person in the world to accuse my right honorable friend—who is candour itself, as we have found in the Victorian Parliament—of keeping the word of promise to the ear and breaking it to the hope. But I will say this—that if we want the people of Victoria to think that, while they are giving up their system of preferential rates, we are getting the right to interfere with New South Wales' unjust differential rates, we could not devise a better form of words for that purpose; but if the clause be examined, the whole thing turns, as I have said, upon those words, "preferences or discriminations." Where have these words been taken from? The Attorney-General, in his speech, has very well and conclusively shown that it will be better to leave these questions to some expert body, and not to the Federal Court. I thoroughly agree with him there but in his speech he referred to a judgment in which there were certain words which caught my ear. I find he has got these words, "preferences or discriminations," from page 233 of the volume he read, with regard to a case in 1895, Texas Railway v. Inter-State Commission. It says, in the words of the Judge:

To forbid undue and unreasonable preferences or discriminations.

These words look very well until we see how they are applied. What I find is that the Inter-State Commerce Act, which was the subject of discussion in that case, makes it unlawful for any common carrier to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatever.

Mr. LYNE. -

I think that is in our Railways Act.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is in the Inter-State Commerce Act, but I do not know about the Railways Act. That is the clause the Judges had in their mind when speaking of preferences and discriminations. That relates only to interstate commerce, and how can these regulations, affecting only interstate commerce, affect commerce within the boundaries of New South Wales? It is perfectly correct, as the Premier of New South Wales puts it, that there is no power to interfere with commerce within the limits of New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

The first clause of the Inter-State Commerce Act recognises that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Therefore, when these words are looked at they must be looked at with reference to the only power which Congress has in the United States. The reason why the Constitution of the United States is not given the power to interfere with commerce within the limits of the states is because they had no railways in 1788, and a change in the Constitution was almost impossible to obtain. But I showed, the other day, how very unfairly and injuriously the railway system works in America because they have not power to interfere with any rates except interstate rates. We want to avoid the evil in this case which they have fallen into in America. In the very head-note of that particular case it will be seen that they have expressly excepted any case within the limits of a state. It says -

In enacting the Inter-State Commerce Acts, Congress had in view, and intended to make provision for, commerce between states and territories, commerce going to and coming from foreign countries, and the whole field of commerce except that wholly within a state.

That is the point. But the honorable member has extracted from the judgment [P.1398] starts here the words "preferences or discriminations," which mean preferences or discriminations as between states. Clause 52 in this Bill deals with the regulation of trade and commerce with foreign countries or between the states. It has nothing to do with trade and commerce within a state. Now that I have made that point clear, I might state that although my amendment holds the field at present. I tell honorable members honestly that if there be any form of words which will achieve the same purpose, I shall vote for it and support it, because it is too critical and important a matter for any one to be wedded to his own particular verbiage or amendment. Whether honorable members believe me or not, I must say that when it comes to a question of opposing what has been put forward by the responsible leader of the Government in Victoria, I feel very chary about voting against it in a matter so vital. But I say this with confidence, that no matter what the consequences are, I shall vote against this proposal, because it does not carry out the purposes for which the Premier has proposed it.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

My right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) has raised certain objections to this proposal. I intend to deal very shortly with them. First, he raised the objection that it will be practically inoperative, because Parliament could not be expected to pass a law annulling a regulation which it thought was unjust. In the first place, Parliament will have complete control of the matter. If it chooses it may pass a law, as Dr. Cockburn said, laying down certain principles, and subsequently it may, upon the advice of the Inter-State Commission, if it chooses to create such a body, act upon any report of that body which may take evidence that will be practically inaccessible to the Parliament. Parliament may act upon that report, or such advice as it chooses to get, just as Parliaments today pass judgment on much more intricate questions.

But I would like to ask, if you are not going to allow Parliament to control this matter, either by itself or by any body such as an Inter-State Commission that it may choose to create for the purpose, what are you going to have? All the objections which are urged against Parliament acting in the matter apply with tenfold force to the Supreme Court. The Right Hon. Mr. Reid says that Parliament will be a tainted tribunal. I wonder how far he is going to carry that argument. If it is tainted in this respect it must be in every respect, because Parliament will be composed of representatives from each of the states, and will be no more interested in dealing with this question than with, say, the surplus.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

What becomes of the cry-"Trust the Federal Parliament"?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Of course that is gone, because it is not convenient to remember it for the present. But When we come to deal with millions of money, to be dealt on lines right and fair to the states, we are then told that Parliament is not tainted-that it is a perfectly just tribunal-and when we ask that it may interpose its over-powering authority on a question of this kind we are told that it is tainted. My right honorable friend said that it is a different thing from asking the Commonwealth to take over the railways. I pointed out, and it has been pointed out again by Mr. Trenwith, that that has nothing whatever to do with it. It would be a valid argument if we were proposing that Parliament should pass affirmative and positive regulations which would control the railways. What are we asking? Nothing of that kind. Not that the Commonwealth Parliament should control the railways in any state but that the Parliament should see that one state by means of its railway regulations does not practically control the railways of another state, that it shall merely hold an impartial and sufficiently strong hand to see that one state does not compel another state to go against its better judgment-and clear interests in the management of the second state's railways. Then, my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) says that this would operate against Victoria. And why? First, Mr. Higgins says this does not refer to differential rates. In that I am utterly unable to follow Mr. Higgins. I do not know the distinction between a differential rate and a discrimination. A differential rate is a rate that is not even along the whole distance, but one in which a difference is made on account of locality, length of haulage, class of goods, or for personal reasons.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Or because of competition by water carriage.

Mr. ISAACS. -
In other words, a discrimination is made.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You want to say that it would stop one fare from Ballarat and another from Stawell.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I think it would if the discrimination were unjust to a state. Parliament would have a power to act if they thought such a discrimination or difference was unjust to any other state. But in any circumstances, I cannot conceive such a rate would be unjust to any, other state. If, however, such a rate in the opinion of the Federal Parliament was wrong, then, of course, the power would apply. If we take the words of the clause, we read-"The Parliament may make laws to provide for the execution and maintenance upon railways within the Commonwealth"-that is our railways-"of the provisions of this Constitution relating to commerce." That would relate to interstate matters; but the succeeding words are without limitation as to interstate commerce. The words are "and particularly to forbid such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable, or to be unjust to any state." These words are without limitation, and apply to state commerce-internal commerce-just as to interstate commerce. It is therefore intended to go, and the words do clearly go, far beyond mere state commerce. We all know that the judgment in the American case must relate to interstate commerce, because the Constitution does not permit Congress to dabble in anything else. When we look at that judgment we always read it in reference to a particular fact. We know it relates to interstate commerce only, because Congress cannot go beyond that. But, when we give express power to go beyond, these preferences or discriminations must be those relating both to internal commerce and interstate commerce. Mr. Reid thought I was not consistent in what I said today and yesterday, and he referred to a newspaper report of my speech. The newspaper reports of what we say are wonderfully good, and, with the space at the command of the reporters, it is marvellous what accurate views they give of our speeches. But in this particular case, my honorable friend (Mr. Reid), having Hansard within his reach, chooses to take a compressed report, the general accuracy of which I do not deny. I shall, however, read a few words from Hansard to show I am perfectly consistent, because the newspaper report does not exactly convey what I said. My honorable friend quoted my remarks in order to show that I said all differential rates were perfectly right, and that it should be left to each colony to do what it pleased. What I said, according to page 1277 of Hansard, was-

We have no jurisdiction to carry our railways beyond our territory. If we were to say we will carry produce for people in New South Wales at a less rate than we will carry produce for people in Victoria—mind you, I am not defending the practical mean to say that that is not a barrier to trade.

Mr. REID.-

Hear, hear; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. ISAACS.-

That practice is not a barrier to trade; it is not a derogation from freedom of trade.

Mr. REID.-

Hear, hear; at least, I am not quite so sure of that.

Mr. ISAACS.-

It is offering an inducement that may operate very unfairly, not to the trade, but to the railway system of the other colony.

Mr. REID.-

That is right.

Mr. ISAACS.-

It is not a block to trade, but it unduly cuts down the revenue and disarranges the finances of the other colony, and, on that ground, I am anxious to counteract it. That is exactly what I say today. I have said that all along, and I have only been anxious that Victoria should not be in a worse position than New South Wales. It has been put forward by a very learned representative of New South Wales that the trade and commerce clause would enable the Federal Parliament to stop Victoria charging preferential rates, but would leave New South Wales free. We in Victoria think that is unfair. I quite recognise the justice of Mr. Reid in condemning that distinctly. The proposal we have made will, I think, meet the views of those who desire to see what is right and proper. If there is anything whatever in the objection that the Federal Parliament has to wait to see whether a particular rate is unjust—I do not think that that is meant—but if there is anything in the objection, it would be met by inserting, after the word "forbid," the words "or prevent." This will allow us to make laws to prevent undue discrimination. The word "forbid" means that you must see the thing first before you annul it. But the word "annul" is not in the proposal. If the case be as I have stated, it would be well to put in the word "prevent." There is no doubt whatever a law could be passed to prevent unjust discrimination. That could be done by a law which may operate in circumstances to arise in the future. The objections that have been raised would be fully answered, and Victoria and every state would be perfectly protected. We should then have provided a remedy for what I understand to be a very great evil, and a remedy that is not open to the various objections that my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) pointed out, it seems to me unanswerably, to the amendment this morning.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Would you consent to put at the beginning "Without limiting the general effect of clause 52"?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not see what effect that would have.

Mr. GLYNN. -

It would have a very, vital effect.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales.) -

I think, with all due deference, that nearly everything that can be said has been said on the subject. We are really debating and re-debating the same thing over and over again which we discussed when dealing with the rivers. I am not in a position to give a judgment on the opinion of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins) with regard to this proposal. I take the proposal to have the meaning which appears on the surface.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What is that?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The meaning on the surface was the meaning that Mr. Barton considered it had, when he exhausted the whole question in a very able and concise speech. I take the meaning to be that you give to Parliament the complete control of our railway system; and that is the way I will deal with it. After all those arguments we have had, almost ad nauseam, we come back to the position from which we started. We conceive that our railways are very much like our lands. I do not take the extreme view that many do, that there is an absolutely strict analogy between the question of railway warfare and that of customs duties. I have never done so. I know there is some analogy. But in all those differences of opinion New South Wales has said-"We will be ready to stand-or fall in the future Federation on the broad interpretation of the first subsection of clause 52." But we further say, that if any ingenious gentleman in this Convention can draw any clause which will give that a clear interpretation, but will not, at the same time, practically do away with our management of our railways, we are quite willing to adhere to such a clause.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is not a question of interpretation. Is there not a fundamental difference in that you are not willing to allow any interference with the state rate.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Yes, the honorable member is perfectly right. I have been absolutely candid in the matter.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, you have.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I say there is no medium course between our own absolute and untrammelled control, and the absolute vesting of the railways in the Federation. I think the case is clear. After all, we have the responsibility of the profit and loss on our railway lines. As one very learned gentleman has said in this Convention, when once a power is handed over to this Federal Parliament, the High Court, by implication, will probably uphold, and may even strengthen it. And we simply say that we cannot allow these great railways, which are intended as much for the policy of development as anything else, to be controlled by any body. We say-"We stand or fall by the commercial clause, but we would rather that Victoria had an absolutely free hand, with power to impose preferential rates, which are no doubt anti-federal in the strictest sense, than that there should be an arrangement made by which an Inter-State Commission, or any other body, should have absolute control of our railways."

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Why don't you apply the same principle to the carrying of passengers?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not quite understand the honorable member.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

You have a uniform rate for the carriage of passengers, but preferential and differential rates for the carriage of goods.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That does not touch the question. We might not have that arrangement tomorrow. My point simply is that we must have the absolute control of our great railway system in New South Wales, because we must make it pay.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
You are not making your goods traffic pay now, any way.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I will be perfectly candid in this matter. I do not take the same view that many honorable members, or even railway experts, do, in dealing with these lines. I believe that these lines would probably pay, even upon the broadest federal principles. I believe that even if you were to arrange through rates, say, from Cootamundra to Melbourne, on a commonsense basis, the lines would still pay. But that does not touch the question. We are not experts in this Convention. The whole question is the matter of our control of our own railways, and you may draw any refined cobwebs of language and tell us that the Federal Parliament will act justly, but that does not alter the fact that we have to go back to the people of our country and tell them that we have given the Federal Parliament a power which is practically a power of control over our railways. And they can reasonably say to us-"If you were giving that power, why did not you get rid of the whole affair; why did not you get rid of the debts of our railways, and hand them over absolutely to the Federal Parliament?" Well, while I shall hope to see, in the future, the power of control over our railways given to the Commonwealth-and this has practically the same effect-I believe, from my point of view, it would be absolutely fatal to the acceptance of this Constitution in New South Wales.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Oh, don't say that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Honorable members, will not consider that as anything of a threat. I am only giving an opinion which I gave in my speeches previously. As an honorable member who has felt the pulse of the people in his own country, I do not hesitate to say that we would simply be playing into the hands of the anti-federalists of our colony, if we gave over that great asset-our railways-which is so intimately connected with the development of our country.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Why should it be worse for you than for Victoria?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
What?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
This clause.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Or the federalization of the railways.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not say that the particular clause we are dealing with is worse for New South Wales than it is for Victoria, but Victoria is willing to take the risk, and we are not. That is the point. It is all well enough for Victoria, but we have to go to the people of our colony and tell them what this Constitution means. There is no use our saying that this Constitution means the opinions of certain honorable members here; we must tell them what we believe it means.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Well, we have to do the same thing.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Yes, but we are not actually sponsors for you. You must act according to your view. You may say to your people that there are so many countervailing advantages to be gained by federation, that they may well accept this article of the Constitution, but our people would not be satisfied with any statement of that kind. If I were a Victorian tomorrow, I would say to my fellow colonists-"The advantages of our going back to our proper geographical area would almost certainly outweigh any disadvantages we may suffer under this Constitution." Our position is that New South Wales has an enormous territory, of which everybody around us is trying to get a slice geographically. I do not object to that. I believe in everybody getting his goods to the nearest port, and I believe in the federal principle right through, but if we do not give over our railways, on the principle that everything left is sovereign power in the state, just as every thing given over to the Commonwealth is a sovereign power there, so you have no right to leave a certain power or asset in the state, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, introduce a controlling clause in the Constitution which will absolutely annihilate that state right. I do not see how you can get away from that. It is not a matter of refined logical reasoning, but simply a practical distinct position taken up by New South Wales. We say, sir, to broad-minded federationists, that we are willing to come in under the first sub-section of clause 52, and we are ready to trust to the Federal Parliament in that respect, and to the sense of justice of the Federal Court, in order to get our rights respected, but beyond that we will not go. Of course, if this is carried it will be in the Constitution, but we will fight to the last moment against any provision being introduced in this Bill which will practically put in rigid lines in this Constitution that, for all purposes of control, we have handed over our railways to the Federation.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I shall repeat to honorable members of this Convention the prayer of Mr. McMillan that they will not talk on this matter any further, because the thing has been discussed ad nauseam, and I shall not be as long as Mr. McMillan in saying what I have to say on the point. If we carry out the suggestion made by the honorable leader of the Convention at the opening of our sitting today, namely, that we should not repeat over and over again what has been said before, and if also we do not transgress your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and talk of anything outside the question, I do not see how we can say much more about this matter. I intend to obey both those injunctions. I will only say one thing, and that is that a very apt illustration of this question comes from my honorable friend and colleague (Mr. Grant), one of the representatives of Tasmania, who tells me how, when the Tasmanian Main Line Railway Company desired to have some dispute with the Government settled, an appeal was made to the then Chief Justice about it, and the Chief Justice said-"Well, do you want law, because if you do, we can give it to you; but if you want justice you had perhaps better go somewhere else." I think, therefore, we might very well leave the matter to the Federal Parliament, which we are able to trust as a body more likely to arrange for the better adjudication of any dispute that may arise than the Supreme Court.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

Before the division on this question is taken, I should like, in the absence of the leader of the Convention, to ask Mr. O'Connor a question as to the amendment of Sir George Turner. Mr. Barton has told us, and I am sure we must all say rightly, that the first part of this clause, down to the word "commerce," is surplusage, and the question I wish to ask Mr. O'Connor is this-Is not the second part also nothing but surplusage? And, in the words of Mr. Higgins, is not the clause practically worthless I ask Mr. O'Connor whether the second part of the clause is not surplusage for this reason: The only two clauses we have relating to the matter are the general clause 52, sub-section (1), which gives the Commonwealth power to regulate trade and commerce? Not another line except those words. Then, in clause 89, we are told that after the imposition of uniform duties trade by means of internal carriage shall be absolutely free. I want to ask my learned friend if the last part of the proposed new clause is not absolutely bound and limited by the powers of the Commonwealth as expressed in sub-section (1) of clause 52 and in clause 89? Without this clause at all, or without the words-"such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable, or to be unjust to any state," has not the Federal Parliament, under the general clause, as Mr. Barton has all along been pointing out, the power to prevent this injustice from being done? I understand that my honorable friends from Victoria want to have a clause which goes some way beyond that. And in that I am inclined to agree with them, but I think that the clause as framed by the Premier of Victoria shows most distinctly that, however unjust or differential a rate may be, unless it derogates from the powers of the Commonwealth as expressed in the two clauses I cited, it is absolutely null and void. That is the question I should like to be answered with no uncertain sound before I make up my mind as to how to vote. At present I am inclined to vote against Sir George Turner's amendment, partly for that reason, and partly because I do not believe in leaving a question of principle to be decided by the Federal Parliament. I think that we are to some extent shirking our duty, and that after discussing this very intricate question for three or four days we are absolutely getting no fruit from our debate. You are not engraving in the Constitution the principles you want to guide you. Put the terms of your partnership, or when you cannot have a term in pounds, shillings, and pence, put the principles of the bargain into your Constitution, and let the High Court and not the Federal Parliament apply those principles in that just and equitable way which only trained Judges can do. I am at difference with a great many of my honorable friends, who say-"Take a matter of this sort and leave it to the Federal Parliament." As my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) was speaking, there came into my mind a question of disagreements and a referendum. Here is a question about the Riverina traffic, in which two colonies are most closely interested. Suppose this matter is referred to the Federal Parliament, then comes in at once the question of counting heads.
The colony of New South Wales has a majority of two or three in the House of Representatives, and according to our friends from Victoria the colony of New South Wales ought to have a majority of one or half a senator in the Upper House. When you come to refer a question of this sort, where it is nothing but self-interest from beginning to end, all policy will be sunk.

"Can we, Victoria, maintain the trade of Riverina?" or "Can we, New South Wales, take it away from the Victorians?" will be the question, and it will go by a count of heads to a very great extent. I am not denying for a moment that there will be able men and men of enlightened patriotism in the Federal Parliament. But are we not rather indulging in cant when we imagine that self-interest, localism, and other motives of that sort, will not be there? The other day I read a very nice little story with reference to our friend Carlyle, and his opinion of the House of Commons. I think the story arose in reference to a discussion he was always having with his friend Emerson about the personality of the devil. Carlyle, who did not believe in many things, did, apparently, believe in the personality of his Satanic Majesty, but his friend Emerson did not. When Emerson came to visit the Sage of Chelsea, they had a very long argument on this vexed question, and of course Carlyle did not succeed in converting him. At last Emerson said "Let us go to the House of Commons, and spend an hour or two there." "All right," said Carlyle, and he took his friend into the Strangers' Gallery of the House of Commons. After listening to a debate, lasting some three hours, Emerson wanted to go, and Carlyle gave his friend a poke in the ribs, and said "Don't ye believe in the Devil, noo? " I take it, sir, that the devil of provincialism, the devil of self-interest, and the devil which our democratic friends may send there, will be present in the Federal Parliament-the man who thinks the word "democrat" is meant only for himself, who goes there bound hand and foot, and in some instances signs the platform of this league or of that society, who goes there to carry out their views, and not to take part in the government of the Commonwealth by the discussion of what is fair and right. I do not trust implicitly the Federal Parliament, and I do not believe that any member of this Convention does, to decide questions solely of self-interest. I wish to get rid of, or to minimize, the questions of self-interest which have to go before the Federal Parliament. Do let us fight out the question now, and engraft the principles in our Constitution, and then your High Court, not your Federal Parliament, is the right tribunal to adjudicate on the matter, or to say whether any state or states are infringing the principles of the Constitution or derogating from that freedom of trade-that freedom of intercourse-which we all desire to see. The Premier of New South Wales uttered a very good illustration in favour of the argument I am using when he said that he does not trust the Federal Parliament. He said that this amendment, emanating from our absolutely fair and generous friend (Sir George Turner), was the outcome of a desperate emotion of self-interest. I did not know that my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) was emotional; I thought that he was intensely practical. I did not know that he could be guilty of any desperate emotion of self-interest or desperate effort to gain undue advantage from, this Convention. But if the Premier of New South Wales thinks that members of the Convention can be influenced by a desperate emotion in favour of the self-interest of themselves and of their state as against the interest of the Commonwealth, how much more will that desperate emotion of self-interest be present in the Federal Parliament! I am unable to vote for this clause, first, because I do not think it is necessary-I do not think it carries the thing one whit further than Mr.
Barton's proposed new clause does-and, secondly, because I do not think that we ought to leave the Federal Parliament to settle a question of policy which, after four days' debate, we are shrinking from settling, and which we appear to be unable to settle.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I have no difficulty in answering the question put by my learned friend (Mr. Dobson). I am glad to have the opportunity of answering the question, because in my answer is disclosed one of the strongest objections which there are to this amendment. The honorable member is quite right, in my opinion, in assuming that the power to make laws regarding preferences and discriminations must refer to the trade which is spoken of in clause 52-that is, to the trade and commerce amongst the several states. Therefore it applies, not to traffic which is entirely confined to a state, the beginning and end of the transit being within the state, but only to traffic which passes from one state to another. But in saying that I only point to this conclusion, that the whole question of controversy between us is the traffic between one state and another. There has been no attempt, and I take it that there will be no attempt, to interfere with the local traffic of either Victoria or New South Wales or any other colony. It is only in dealing with the traffic as it passes from one colony to another, particularly from Riverina, in New South Wales, into Victoria, or from Victoria back into New South Wales, that we are concerned here. It is very unfortunate that a condition of things involving very important interests on both sides of the border have grown up. It is a very unfortunate thing that we cannot decide this question without considering those vested interests. But, I say, notwithstanding all the windy generalities used here with regard to the federal way of looking at this thing-and no man is more anxious than I am to regard everything we possibly can so regard from the federal stand-point-we must remember, in dealing with the question of the vested interests of those who are represented here, that we are not dealing with property and rights of our own, but with the property and rights of those who have sent us here. And if the basis of our union necessitates the surrender to a certain extent of rights that we now possess, we must take care that that surrender is just, and is properly safeguarded in all its terms. It is only because I feel, in common with the other representatives of New South Wales who have taken the same view as I hold, that to consent to the clause as it is proposed now would be to hand over absolutely to the determination of the Federal Parliament property which is not federal property, but our property, that I oppose this amendment. It is quite true, as Mr. Dobson has said, and as Mr. Higgins has contended, that we have only to deal here with rights as to traffic between the colonies. But in what position is the Parliament to be in regard to those rights? It is true that the limitation apparently here is that they are to forbid or prevent such preferences or discriminations as the Federal Parliament may at any time deem to be undue or unreasonable or unjust to any state. But the question of what the unreasonableness or the injustice is it is proposed to leave entirely to the Federal Parliament to determine. That is the groundwork of the objection of my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) and my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid), and all those other representatives of New South Wales who have addressed the Convention. I do not wish to elaborate the objection, but I would merely say this about it: No matter how absolutely contrary to fact, no matter how absolutely contrary to existing rights and to real justice, the decisions of the Federal Parliament may be, there would be no possible appeal from its decision and control over it. It is because the power which is handed over to the Federal Parliament in this way may be exercised, and could be exercised, and in certain circumstances would be exercised, to the extent of interfering with the ordinary differential development rates of the railways of New South Wales, that we protest against this clause in its present form. I would only appeal to the experience of honorable members in this Convention. I doubt if, in our fondest anticipations of the constitution of the first Parliament, we look forward to getting together a body of men who will have less self-interest, or who will be animated by a higher ideal of what the duty of the Parliament should be, than the members who compose this Convention. And yet, what do we find in this Convention? We find that this very question of the manner in which the trade of Riverina is to be dealt with is looked upon, not from the point of view of the rights of the parties interested, but from the point of view of the advantage of the countries which are concerned here. And when you have a Parliament constituted, not as this Convention is, but representing particular localities, striving to advocate the interests of particular localities in particular states, can there be any question that that tribunal will be infinitely more animated by the interests of their several states than this Convention or any member of it could possibly be? And I say I object to handing over the consideration of what the rights of New South Wales should be on her own railways to any such body. I do not wish to allude to arguments that have been so well used already upon this same side of the question, but I wish now to suggest something which I think will find a way out of our difficulty and enable us to find out accurately what position our friends from Victoria are taking up in this matter. Let me call the attention of the committee now to what has been taking place within the last two days. After a great deal of discussion, the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) was defeated by a substantial majority, and in the majority which defeated that amendment were included a number of my honorable friends from Victoria, who are supporting Sir George Turner's amendment now. On what ground did the vote in the majority?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is what I want to know.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I will tell the honorable member why. I am not speaking from inferences, but from statements made. They voted that way because they considered that it was in the interests of both New South Wales and Victoria, which were the colonies directly interested, that the status quo should be preserved in regard to the use of preferential rates. They saw the importance of arriving at a common solution of the difficulty of preferential rates which would enable them to be abolished, and at the same time would not give New South Wales an advantage over Victoria. It was because of that position which was taken up by Victoria that I and others who thought with me abandoned the idea of trying to provide for the ceasing of these preferential rates, and gave way to our friends, in order that the status quo might be preserved. And they voted for us on that occasion.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Who did?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I refer now to Mr. Isaacs, for one. He did not expressly state the ground on which he voted, but he concurred in the view put forward by Mr. Barton and myself.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is right in this respect: I concurred in your view of the legal inferences to be drawn. If it were to be left in the position in which it now is we should be satisfied.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

But the honorable member voted against the amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But I said clearly that I should have preferred something better.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I am coming to that. I am glad to hear what the honorable member has just stated, because it confirms my view that it was on that ground that the honorable member and his colleagues voted against this amendment, which was rejected by a substantial majority. But it appears now that the honorable member and some of those who supported him, think that there may be a danger in the preservation of the existing state of things in the powers expressly given by the trade and commerce provision. The honorable member thinks, and no doubt properly, that under the trade and commerce provisions it will be competent for the Commonwealth Parliament to legislate in such a way as might prohibit the existing state of things in Victoria while leaving the hands of New South Wales free. Now, I am willing to meet that objection. I am willing to do anything in reason as far as I am concerned, and I think I represent in that respect the feeling of all my colleagues from New South Wales, which will fairly meet the views of our friends from Victoria. I am willing to do this: If the only objection which our friends have to leaving the matter to the operation of the trade and commerce provisions is that they might possibly interfere with the existing state of things, I am willing to propose an amendment which will make it perfectly clear that the trade and commerce provisions can have no such operation.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Declare the continuance of war.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Can you call that federation?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I am sorry that such a provision has to be made, but we have done many things here which are departures from the first principle on which we entered upon our deliberations. We have been obliged to depart from those principles because we were brought face to face with facts, and we must recognise that facts make it impossible to pursue those principles to their logical conclusion. And all legislation with us, as in our several colonies, must proceed upon a recognition of facts as they are. That is why, although I agree that a provision of this kind is not what one would expect or wish to find in the Constitution, I think that, if it is the only way out of the difficulty, we should not, on any merely theoretical grounds, object to it.

New South Wales cannot accept the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, but I think it might accept the proposal I am about to make. It is really the proposal that was suggested by my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) yesterday as an amendment to one of the clauses, but it is put in slightly different language. It is that Sir George Turner's amendment be negatived, and that the following take its place:-

Nothing in this Constitution shall be taken to render unlawful any rate of a railway the property of a state on the ground that the rate is unduly low.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That will allow you to give rebates and discounts.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Does not it give exactly the same right to Victoria.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable member will see that it will allow the Federal Parliament to interfere with regard to rebates and discounts in the one case, and not in the other.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Not unless they were an obstruction or a prohibition to, trade. It is very difficult to meet my honorable friends. We were told yesterday that the only objection which existed to the adoption of the commerce clauses was the possibility that they might interfere with the existing state of things. The existing state of things is that these railway systems are fighting each other by cutting rates. That is what you have to provide for; but if your cutting rates do not come under the prohibition, surely we have met that objection. But now my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) raises another objection, that you can interfere with discounts and private arrangements of that kind. If interference can take place upon the one side it can take place upon the other. We cannot provide for all these minor details in the working of a railway system. My amendment recognises that the railway systems are rival businesses, that they are competing for trade within a certain area, and that they are to be allowed to go on competing as at present until some other way is found of getting over the difficulty.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If they are rival businesses, they would do better by making an arrangement.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Is not it for those who own the businesses to consider the arrangement?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

We are considering it now

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes; and you propose that this vexed question, which we cannot settle because we cannot get a recognition of the rights which we insist upon, shall be handed over to, and finally settled perhaps in a way which may cause interference with our business, by the Federal Parliament. We are not willing to consent to that. We are willing to make many surrenders, and have done so.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

What are they?
Mr. OCONNOR. -

It would take me too long to inform the honorable member. This being a surrender which we cannot make, we cannot accept Sir George Turner's clause, but we are willing that that clause should be set aside, and the clause I have suggested substituted for it. I appeal now, not to the members of the Convention who may be

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I only want to make one alteration in my new clause. It has been suggested to me, and I think rightly, that the use of the word "particularly" may cut down the meaning of the first part of the clause. I have no desire to do that. When inserted the word, it was more with the object of bringing into prominence the latter part of the clause. I therefore desire, with the permission of the committee, to amend the clause by omitting the word "particularly."

The proposed new clause was, by leave amended accordingly.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That clause 95A, as amended, be reconsidered.

I may explain, Mr. Chairman, that this is my proposed new clause, with the addition which was made at the instance of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins). I take it that honorable members, in view of the decision just arrived at by the committee, will now be of opinion that the amendment carried at the instance of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) is unnecessary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
The amendment of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) having been carried-and the rules of the Convention preventing me from referring to that matter-I do not think that the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins), which was agreed to this morning, will now meet with the approbation of the committee. The whole clause, as amended, would read in this way, and I think honorable members will agree that it would be as pretty an example of higgledy-piggledy as ever was given.

Mr. HOWE. -
It is understood that Mr. Higgins' amendment is now unnecessary.

Mr. BARTON. -
At any rate, this is how the clause stands. I dare say some honorable members do not wish me to read it, but I intend to do so:-

The Commonwealth shall not give preference, by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue, to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof. Neither the Commonwealth, nor any state, nor any authority constituted by the Commonwealth or by any state, shall make any law or regulation relating to railway rates with the view of attracting trade to ports of one state against ports of another.

I believe that we are engaged in the making of a Constitution, not in writing a comic paper. Therefore, I beg to move-
That the amendment of Mr. Higgins be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I would point out that the first part of the clause has not yet been inserted in the Bill.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -
In the few words I had the honour to address to the committee this morning, I guarded myself against this contingency. I distinctly stated that if the amendment of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) was carried, I should, upon the recommittal of this clause, vote against the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins), and I think that other honorable members will take the same position in regard to it.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I can understand the position of the honorable member (Mr. Howe) and other honorable members, but, from my point of view, the amendment of the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) will not give the advantages that the honorable member (Mr. Howe) hopes for.

Mr. HOWE. -
At any rate, I am satisfied with it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I understand that the honorable member is willing to hope that the amendment of the Premier of Victoria will enable the Federal Parliament to interfere with differential rates so far as they are unjust.

Mr. HOWE. -
When they become preferential.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I understand that that is the honorable member's view. I differ wholly from him, however, and I think that other honorable members differ from him. If there is a division I shall vote against the striking out of my amendment.

Question-That the words proposed to be struck out (Mr. Higgins' amendment) stand part of the clause-put.

Mr. BARTON. -
I beg to move-
That the following be substituted for clause 95:-
"The Commonwealth shall not give preference, by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue, to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof."

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That the proposed new clause be amended by adding the following proviso:-
"Provided that nothing in this Constitution shall be taken to render unlawful any rate of a railway the property of a state upon the ground that the rate is unduly low."

As a matter of drafting, the exact wording may be left to be dealt with afterwards.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I rise to a point of order, as to whether our mode of procedure will allow this to be done. We have already decided that certain words shall stand part of this clause. Certain words were added by Mr. Higgins, but they have since been struck out, and I take it we are now dealing with certain words that I have proposed. Can anything be dealt with until the words I have proposed have either been added to the Bill or rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Matters stand as follows: This clause was originally proposed by Mr. Barton, and an addition at the end of it was carried on the motion of Mr. Higgins. A further addition was proposed by Sir George Turner and negatived. Now the standing orders are being suspended to enable this clause to be reconsidered, and the amendment of Mr. Higgins has been struck out. There is nothing whatever to prevent other words being added to it now. The clause carried on the motion of Sir George Turner is a separate clause, which we have inserted in the Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I apologize. I did not know my clause had been inserted in the Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It was for that reason that I was obliged to move my amendment as an amendment on this clause. I should have preferred to move it as an amendment on Sir George Turner's clause. The reason why I proposed the amendment I have in part already stated. I would like to say this in addition, that the intention of it is to preserve, as far as possible, the methods under which these railways are being run both in New South Wales and Victoria at the present time. It will be quite impossible to disregard altogether, in considering a question of this kind, one of the first uses of a railway system, and that is the development of your own territory; and considering that the amendment which has been now carried will give the right to the Commonwealth Parliament to make any law it likes regarding what it may consider to be preferences or discriminations, it is necessary to place some safeguard upon the exercise of that power which will insure to any state that it has the right to put on such rates as will operate for the proper development of its territory. The power given under the amendment of Sir George Turner would entitle the Commonwealth Parliament to interfere with, say, some rate which was put upon the railways in Riverina for the purpose of aiding a particular class of traffic—for instance, for aiding the producers of wheat or any other class of produce that ought be interfered with by a law of the Federal Parliament. There is no one to interfere with their decision. They may decide anything in any way they may think fit, and if it should appear just and reasonable to the Commonwealth Parliament they might enact that no rate below a certain amount should be charged upon the railways in Riverina, although they ran within the borders of our own state. Of course it may be or may not be absolutely contrary to the facts and justice of the case; but if we are handing over to a body which will necessarily be self-interested, and will have its own interest to look after, the decision of a question as to whether a rate is a discriminating or a preference rate, we must take care when that power may be exercised in regard to our own railways that some limitation is put upon it. No doubt one of the uses of railways is to make profits to a railway business, but another more important use of railways is to assist in the development and settlement of the country. If any railway system is making profits, and the state thinks fit to distribute those profits, not by paying them into the Treasury, but by reducing the rates in such a way as to extend settlement, and benefit farmers, and enable them to get their produce to the sea, it will be interfering with the first principles on which we are dealing with this matter if such interference could be allowed. The first principle of our dealing with those railways-not handed over-which are part of the property of the state and are inseparably connected in their management with the public lands-not handed over-is that the fullest possible power should exist to use those railways in the development of the lands, in any way the state owning the railways shall think fit. For those reasons, in addition to the reasons I have already given in speaking to the amendment which I suggested, I propose that at the end of this clause the words which I have read be added.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

My honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor), when he first suggested those words, did so as a substitution for the clause which I had proposed. In doing that he was quite right. If those words had been carried there would be no necessity for the clause. My honorable friend will see that we have now intrusted the Federal Parliament with full power to deal with those matters, and to say whether rates are unreasonable or unjust. But he desires to go on and say that they shall not declare rates to be unreasonable or unjust because they are unduly low. Well, I venture to say that in nine cases out of ten the cause of the injustice would be that the rates were unduly low. If that provision is to be carried out it certainly neutralizes all the effect of the clause we have passed.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That means your intention in carrying the amendment was to give power to interfere with the imposition of our rates.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Not necessarily so.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That is quite clear.

Mr. REID. -

We are not children; we know what you are driving at.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No doubt my friend judges everybody by himself.

Mr. REID. -

You are no fool, I can tell you.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I must ask the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) not to interrupt.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Rightly or wrongly, we have determined that we will leave the decision of this question as to the injustice of any rate to the Federal Parliament. I repeat that in nine cases out of ten an injustice would be caused by the rate being unduly low. If this amendment is to be inserted, it will enable New South Wales to do what we have been openly fighting against all along. There has been no concealment about the matter. We say that if New South Wales is to be at liberty to reduce those rates down to nothing, then that is unfair and improper competition with the other colonies. There would be the same result if Victoria were allowed a similar liberty. That is a point we desire to leave to some tribunal, and that tribunal we have decided shall be the Federal Parliament. Under the circumstances, while this amendment would have been a fair matter for discussion as an alternative, the Convention ought not to be asked to insert the words unless honorable members are prepared to stultify what they have done in the past. There is nothing in the remarks about the liberty to open up the country.

Mr. REID. -

No doubt you will do that for us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are not to assume for a moment that the Federal Parliament, which we all have so much trust in, is going to declare a rate to be unjust if that Parliament is satisfied that the object in imposing the rate is for the development of the country, and not to do an injustice to another state.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I am not going to adopt the language used by the Premier of Victoria last night, when he said he could not take the Bill to the people of Victoria in the state in which it stood in regard to this matter. That declaration on the part of my honorable friend has evidently been highly satisfactory to him in that which has just happened; but I must, in all frankness, say, that this spectacle of cutting up everything that belongs to New South Wales to the satisfaction of our neighbours, is going on in a somewhat monotonous fashion. Unless some change comes over the spirit of this particular dream, it is a mere waste of time for any one who represents New South Wales to sit here; except that a statutory duty compels a member to stay to the last, and do his best to bring this Constitution into a shape in which it will have some chance of acceptance. I think my honorable friend, the leader of this Convention, went altogether too far on a previous occasion; but, still, in the interests of federation, I can appreciate the attitude he took with reference to a similar question of the particular instruction in connexion with the general power of controlling commerce and navigation. I would like to know from Mr. Barton whether what has occurred this afternoon will justify him in persisting in such an attitude? Are we always to give way? Is every general principle of the Constitution to be invaded with particular stipulations, all aimed at one particular colony? I confess, in all earnestness, as responsible for the railways of New South Wales at the present time, I feel that position of responsibility in a way which other members of the Convention cannot perhaps appreciate. The amendment precisely defines the attitude I mentioned to the Convention yesterday morning. I read out similar words as showing the final position that New South Wales could arrive at in reference to this matter. What I read was almost word for word with the amendment now proposed. I tell honorable members frankly, as the Minister responsible to the people of New South Wales for the millions invested in her railways, that I cannot ask those people to throw those millions into the gutter to satisfy the appetite of our friends for our trade. It is, of course, a matter of indifference to the representatives of Tasmania, Victoria, South Australia, and Western Australia whether New South Wales is in the Federation or not. Her absence would not make the slightest difference to the happiness of the union which will be consummated between Tasmania and Victoria.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

The honorable member knows better.

Mr. REID. -

But I assure honorable members solemnly, as the mouthpiece of the people of New South Wales, charged with the responsibility of the railways of that colony, that in giving everything Victoria has wanted in such a form as to cripple us, the Convention has made a fatal mistake. We now have an opportunity of doing for New South Wales what has been done for Victoria, and so showing the absolute impartiality of honorable members. As to the geographical distance of our railways in the Riverina from Victoria, it can be shown to absolute demonstration that, owing to the distance being so much greater, our railways must be practically closed if we are not allowed to make our rates low enough to keep them alive.

Mr. BARTON. -

For our own trade?

Mr. REID. -

For our own traffic and for our own people. That is the strong point. If we were seeking to get an ounce of traffic out of another state, this Convention would have a right to spurn anything I say. But the singular thing is that the Convention has departed from sound principle in order to protect another colony in taking our trade from our own people and out of our own boundaries, and will not do as much for New South Wales in respect of its own trade and its own railways. My honorable friend (Mr. Douglas) will see there is a great responsibility attaching to me in virtue of the office which I hold. It is no secret that I have had the Chief Commissioner of the railway system of New South Wales down from Sydney with the express purpose of finding out how far I could go in the way of meeting the wishes of the Convention. I am not speaking lightly. I am speaking after a number of consultations with the man who absolutely knows how we stand. And I tell the Convention—and I leave the responsibility with the Convention, although perhaps the matter is one of no importance to it—that if, having safeguarded the grasp which Victoria has over the trade of New South Wales, the latter colony is not safeguarded in an endeavour to make her railways in the Riverina pay for the expenses of maintaining them, a very heavy handicap has been put on us in the way of accepting this bargain. The general principles—and this is the most serious thing of all—have been departed from in order to obtain definitions which, without any doubt, are intended in the interests of one particular colony, if not two. Well, now, however attractive the prospect is of taking bodily possession of a fair estate belonging to other people, do not forget that those other people have an opportunity of considering their position before they enter this alliance. And I tell this Convention, as I told them once before, that these are object lessons to the people of New South Wales of the sort of treatment they get from the representatives of the other Australian colonies. I ask our friends, who are impatient to annex large tracts of New South Wales, in the interests of their own desire to look after our business for us, to be a little more moderate, and not place too great a strain upon the people of New South Wales. Because it will undoubtedly place a very great strain upon the people of New South Wales if their railways in Riverina are made useless, while Victoria, with the one hand, shuts her markets against our producers and offers 66 per cent. premiums for our own trade. Whilst that is ground for the triumph of Victoria, those whose markets are open, those who are forced to find railways, to find markets, for the other colonies are left exposed to the chances of this clause as it stands.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Our railways were there twenty years before you constructed yours.

Mr. WISE. -

Why not let both colonies be treated in the same way?

Mr. REID. -

That is what I have said. If I had tried to prevent Victoria getting fair play I would not feel so strongly on this matter, but I have already offered that Victoria shall be put in an absolutely fair position as against New South Wales, recognising her vested interests and rights in our trade. And I am prepared to say that all those rights which have existed, which have been used to create inequalities against our own people, in order to increase the

for a moment, and doubly so when the representatives of one's own colony vote against him; but while that is true, now that the temporary irritation may be said to have gone, I make the same appeal to this Convention as the representatives of Victoria made last night, and I shall wait to see whether it will receive equal respect and attention.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am about to move, in a couple of minutes, as it is now past five o'clock, that progress be reported, because I think we should be all the better, after what has passed, for a little cool reflection. I am not going to indulge in any warm words to the Convention. I do not think that that conduces to the success of our efforts in framing a Constitution. My right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) has rather thrown out a challenge to me, but I am happy to inform this Convention that that challenge may have been suggested to his mind by what I said to him this morning while this debate was going on. For I pointed out to him that I had taken a stand, on behalf of the general interests of federation, with reference to the question of rivers, which maintained this trade and commerce clause in its integrity, even although, under certain circumstances, rights of irrigation might have, in emergencies, to give way to rights of navigation for a time. I maintained that attitude with reference to what has been taking place on the question of railways, thinking it a consistent one, and expecting that the Convention, which had adopted that attitude in connexion with rivers, would adopt a similar attitude in connexion with the question of railways. I maintained that, on the part of New South Wales, it was something of a sacrifice, and I thought that the Convention might well adopt the same attitude when there was another attempt to cause sacrifices to be made by New South Wales again. Some amendment of this kind ought to be adopted, not that I think an amendment of this kind will put matters right. Mr. Reid has spoken of his responsibility, and it is a great one. I, also, have a great responsibility.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

We all have our responsibilities.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, we all have our responsibilities; but I suppose that there is laid on me, in respect of this question, a greater responsibility than on any man in Australia, and I hope to maintain that responsibility fairly and equitably, at any rate, in such a way as to conduce to the success of our labours; but it is a very great trial to me to find that there should be any objection at all to an amendment of this kind, when one considers that, throughout this Convention, the interests that have been under serious debate, as to the manner in which they shall be adjusted for the general benefit, have been the particular interests of New South Wales. All these attempts, when they are successful, result in New South Wales paying the score.

Several HONORABLE MEMBERS. - No.

When they are successful, I say, they must result in New South Wales paying the score, and an attempt such as this which has been made, unless it is nullified by such an amendment as has been proposed, will again result in New South Wales paying the score. I said a few days ago that I had nothing to complain of in the attitude of this Convention towards New South Wales. Up to that time I had not, and I limited my statement up to that time. Up to then New South Wales had been fairly dealt with, and, reciprocally, New South Wales had taken a stand in reference to the rivers question which was abundantly fair and even generous to the other states. But, when she seeks to apply that same rule, which resulted so happily for the other states on the rivers question, to matters—which ought to go with the regulation of trade and commerce, in the same way as the rivers go with it—when the question becomes railways and not rivers—then a stand is taken which... railways, then I much fear me that there is becoming a forgetfulness of the right line of justice which we ought to observe. I am not saying these words in any heat, I am saying them with great deliberation.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Why say them at all? As leader you ought not to make these remarks. It is unworthy of you.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am afraid that my honorable friend is a little more irritable than I am, and perhaps he will be sorry he said that I am taking a course unworthy of me as leader of the Convention. I take it to be my duty as leader to endeavour to point out, at all times, where I think the Convention is going too far in any one direction, and if I have not that authority as leader, exercising it as fairly as I can, then I suppose I was not put here for anything at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You represent New South Wales.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am representing New South Wales too, but my right honorable friend will do me this credit, that from the very beginning of this Convention I have represented New South Wales in a spirit of the utmost fairness and generosity to the other colonies.

Mr. REID. -

You have been too generous, and you have your reward now. I knew the people I was dealing with.

Mr. BARTON. -

But, sir, if I have adopted that attitude-and I believe it is said that I have-is it to be said that I am acting in a way unworthy of my position when I point out that things inconsistent with the attitude I have been endeavouring to maintain are now being done?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

That is only your opinion.

Mr. REID. -

Is not that all he is expressing?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Why should he lecture a majority of the Convention?

Mr. BARTON. -

Let my right honorable friend understand me. I make the utmost concession to every member in the exercise of his opinion. I recognise the right we all have to express our opinions freely and fully. But my right honorable friend, perhaps, will recollect that when I have resumed my seat he will be able to lecture me. What I wish to point out-and it is consistent, I take it, with that protest which I have always made against curbing discussion in the Convention, with that liberty of speech which I have endeavoured to safeguard here—is that I should be allowed to proceed without undue interruption. I am merely expressing my own opinion, and I am bound to express my opinion in this Convention, irrespective of my representation of New South Wales, when I consider that there are dangers ahead of the Convention, and it is in respect to dangers ahead that I am now addressing honorable members.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What is before the House, I wonder.

Mr. BARTON. -

What is before the committee at present is Mr. O'Connor's motion, and on that I intend to move to report progress. I thought I had explained all that. I am astonished to be told that I am lecturing this Convention when I am simply taking that stand which I consider that a member appointed to my position should always take—that is to say, to point out to the Convention where he thinks the proceedings are going too far. I do ask that this matter should be considered. I do ask that we should not put the whole question of federation in a serious danger. I am not delivering a lecture, but I am making an appeal to this Convention and to its sense of justice. Let the course which the Convention adopted at my instance with regard to the rivers be pursued with reference to this question of railways, and I am abundantly content.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You ought to have gone as far with the rivers as you did today with the railways.

Mr. BARTON. -

Whether they have gone by river or by rail to their destination, the end of that proceeding would have been that they would have gone to Jericho.

Mr. REID. -

You have got the muddy end of the river, and that is all you are entitled to.

There appears in some quarters to be a forgetfulness that we are all engaged in the common work of endeavouring to secure such a Constitution as the people of the colonies at large may accept, and that is all I am addressing my self to in speaking to this amendment. I think we ought not at any point to stray from that one matter, which is the beacon light in front of us. We are charged by law to make a Constitution, and our statutory instruction ends there. But, inasmuch as that Constitution has to be accepted by the people of the federating colonies, it is implicitly right to say that we should make a Constitution which they will accept. Now, one section of these people will not take that Constitution if they are under a well grounded suspicion that the movements that take place in this Convention, even when they are defeated, are merely victories of defence to New South Wales, and when they are successful are victories of aggression against her. I wish these words to be well regarded. I do not speak as a representative of New South Wales now, I speak as the leader of this Convention. I think that if my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) were to give matters a little more consideration, he would sometimes think before be laughs.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You have been lecturing the Convention all the way.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am speaking here very seriously; I am not speaking with any desire to, in any way, lecture the Convention, but I wish to protect the interests of the state I represent. I have not been one of the men who have made threats. I have not been in the habit, at any time since the beginning of the Convention, of laying down impossible conditions as to those matters which would secure my support. I have endeavoured often to stand between conflicting parties, and to lead the Convention to a decision which is just between those parties, and that is my attitude now. I wish a decision to be come to which is just between the conflicting parties, and if I am of the honest opinion that a decision which has been come to without some further proceeding is not just, surely my right honorable friend ought not to laugh at me when I hold that opinion and put it forward in the duty I owe to this body. I do hope that this amendment of Mr. O'Connor will either be adopted or that we shall have some means to retrace the step we have taken, so as to render such an amendment unnecessary. We are told that because of some trade that Victoria has acquired in the southern regions of New South Wales a step has to be taken, which, as far as we know, will result in an enormous diminution of our own trade on our own railways. That is the position, and we are told then that New South Wales has long-distance lines upon which she can charge development rates, that Victoria has not those long distance lines and cannot charge development rates, and that therefore her only resort is to charge preferential rates and give discounts and drawbacks.

Mr. FRASER. -

No. She could taper off her rates.

Mr. BARTON. -

Well, let Victoria taper off her rates, and let us understand this business properly. We are two contiguous states. We are each entitled to our traffic confined within our own state. We are ready to accept that position. We are willing that New South Wales should confine herself to making any development rate as regards her internal traffic, and that Victoria should make any development rate as regards her internal traffic. Then we are prepared to go further. We are prepared to make some concession which will, to a certain extent, recognise the expenditure which Victoria has gone to in order to secure trade in our south western districts. We do not wish to go beyond that, but we do resent a position which takes matters right beyond that, and converts a position of mutual defence into a position of aggression on one side. That is the position as it presents itself to us. Surely it is not our fault if the lines in Victoria are so abortive, owing to the length and breadth of her territory, that the policy of development rates cannot be carried out with some force, and so as to yield a good return to her railways, unless she goes into another colony and takes some trade from that colony. That is not our fault; and as we are normally entitled to make rates for our trade within our boundaries, the same as every other colony is entitled to do, why should there be set up a position which will virtually and effectually take away that title from us and transfer it to another state? That is the position which has been set up. I do not wish to add another word to what I have said. I hope that every honorable member will understand me as speaking not in heat—not in anger. I speak not in anger. I am accustomed to speak with warmth, but I am not speaking in heat or in anger. I am speaking in the best interests of this Convention and of the cause which I believe others have at heart as warmly as I have. But I do trust that the difficulty of this position will be recognised. I do trust, without any word of threat, because words of threat am not desirable here; without any attempt to menace members, because I think the position of menace is one unworthy of a member-

Mr. REID. - They were used last night, and very usefully, too.

Mr. BARTON. - I do trust that the opening out of the actual position, as it may be regarded in the colony from which I come, will be taken as an indication to the Convention that there should be some further consideration of this matter, which will eventually lead to its being settled on lines of justice. I beg to move-

That the Chairman do now leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again tomorrow.

The CHAIRMAN. -
According to our practice and standing orders, the motion that I report progress and ask leave to sit again cannot be debated, and no honorable member can move that motion after he has made a speech.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

The Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales has made allusion to the vote which was given by myself and his colleague (Mr. Carruthers) with regard to this matter. I cannot see that there is any necessity for the remarks he has made. We have given our votes according to the best of our judgment. I do not know that we have come to the point when every member of every delegation is bound to vote according to the views of the majority of that delegation. I am still under the impression that the clause as it stands will give enormous advantages to New South Wales, by preventing Victoria from making aggressions upon the trade of that colony.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether, under the standing orders, this discussion can go on after the motion for reporting progress has been moved by the leader of the Convention?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I have not put the motion to report progress. I refused to put it on the ground that the honorable member who moved it had spoken.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

It is clear to me that it is not in Mr. Barton's power, having made a speech with reference to the matter, to move that you, sir, report progress. What I was saying before I was interrupted, was that, as the clause now stands, in my opinion, New South Wales gets enormous advantages.

Mr. REID. -

I wish the Railways Commissioner would tell me that. I should then be satisfied. But be tells me the opposite.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Then perhaps my intelligence has misled me. I have at any rate given my vote according to my opinion, believing that it was not against the interests of New South Wales. I belong to that colony, and have never lived out of New South Wales during the whole course of my life. It is my native colony, and I certainly would be the last in this Convention to do anything to injure it.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear; I am sure of it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

If I could be convinced that the vote which I have given was given under a misunderstanding, and would have the effect of injuring New South Wales, I should be most anxious to retrace my steps if it were possible to do so; but I listened to the speech of Mr. Carruthers last evening, and that speech impressed me immensely. I do not think Mr. Reid took great exception to it at the time.

Mr. REID. -
    I did, though.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
    My right honorable friend disagreed with Mr. Carruthers, perhaps.

Mr. REID. -
    I strongly objected to what he stated, and if he knew as much as I do about railway opinion in New South Wales he would have followed me. I am acting under advice.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
    I hope, at all events, that nothing will be said that will cause ill feeling. After we have slept upon the matter, we shall be able to come to a conclusion which will, while doing full justice to Victoria, do no injustice to New South Wales. And if it can be shown to me that the vote I have given will have the effect of doing injustice to New South Wales, I shall be willing and anxious to retrace my steps.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
    Or any injustice to any other colony.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
    No; it is only now a question of New South Wales' interests, and not of the other colonies. It seems to me, however, that New South Wales is getting enormous advantages by preventing Victoria from capturing New South Wales' trade from Walgett.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
    May I be allowed to assure my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) that I have not for a moment thought that he and my colleague (Mr. Carruthers) gave their votes in any way except, as they considered, absolutely in the interests of New South Wales? My observation was made simply because I happen to have official information which makes me feel more strongly than I should feel if I were acting upon my own individual opinion as a member of this Convention.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
    I should like to say a word or two with regard to this question. Nothing would give me greater pain than to see my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) martyred; but I do not see, in spite of all that he has said, that he has had to suffer martyrdom at all. On the contrary, I think he has had his way all along the line. I remember that when first we met in Adelaide, some of us had strong views as to the question of the powers of the Senate. We had a majority with us, but the right honorable gentleman was then opposed to us.

Mr. FRASER. -

Why go into personal matters now?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I do not want the impression to go abroad that in any case has my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) been martyred. I say with regard to the powers of the Senate that we had at first a majority with us in Adelaide. But the division was postponed day after day until Mr. Reid got a majority with him; and then he had his own way. I might allude again to the rivers question. We had a majority with us upon that matter also, but Mr. Reid made an eloquent appeal to us not to make a martyr of him and his colleagues, and he succeeded in delaying the division until he got a majority with him; so that once again he beat us.

Mr. REID. -

Let me do the same again!

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I believe that, in spite of us, the right honorable gentleman will get his way again after all. But I wish to say that it seems to me that, by inserting this amendment, we are inserting in our treaty of peace a provision for a continuance of war.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I should like to say one word, sir. I should be very sorry, indeed, if my honorable friend the leader of the Convention should think that anything that I have said in any way reflected upon him. I recognise most fully that he has a very difficult position to occupy. He is one of the foremost representatives and advocates of his colony. I do not think I am going too far when I say that he has never lost an opportunity of urging its claims whenever he could. At the same time, he is the leader of this Convention. That is a very difficult position to fulfil, and I regret that my right honorable friend (the Premier of New South Wales), whom I think I may say I respect very deeply, and our leader did not like to lose the division in which they were so much interested. Well, no one does. No one likes to be beaten; but I think when we are beaten we should accept the defeat. And I may also say that it is not a very good thing, after you have had a defeat or a victory, that one side or the other should have anything to say about it till the next day; then, perhaps, an opportunity can be afforded of endeavouring to change the minds of those who have inflicted the defeat. I have tried to judge this question as fairly as I could, and I can assure my honorable friends opposite that I gave my vote conscientiously, and I think every one else did the same. And what more could we do? We could only take the cases placed before us and judge as to which was the sounder; and whether we were right or wrong in the conclusions we came to, I do not think it is a good thing to discuss a division after it has taken place. I assure the leader of the Convention that there is no one in this House who has a greater respect for him than I have. But I do not think it is a good thing, after we have come to a decision, to lecture us with regard to our votes.

Mr. BARTON. -

I was not lecturing; I was only holding up the danger signal.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

If there is anything which I have said that our leader takes exception to, I shall be most happy to absolutely and unreservedly withdraw it; and I am sure that the respect in which he is held by me is shared by every member of this Convention.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at half-past five o'clock.
Thursday, 24th February, 1898.

Return: Appeals to the Privy Council - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at twenty-seven minutes to eleven o'clock.

APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.
Mr. HOLDER (South Australia) laid on the table, pursuant to an order of the Convention (dated 22nd February), a return relating to appeals from South Australia to the Privy Council, and moved that it be printed.
The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on proposed new clause 95A, which was as follows:-
The Commonwealth shall not give preference, by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue, to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof; and on Mr. O'Connor's amendment to add the following proviso:-
Provided that nothing in this Constitution shall be taken to render unlawful any rate of a railway the property of a state upon the ground that the rate is unduly low.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
In order to put more clearly before the Convention the object aimed at, I have prepared another amendment, which carries out my intention more fully, and I desire to ask leave now to withdraw the amendment I submitted yesterday. The new amendment puts the matter on the ground we wish to discuss.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Will it let in the High Court?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Under certain circumstances I think it will, but I do not wish to discuss it now.
The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I beg now to move-That the following words be added to new clause
"Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, a rate upon a railway the property of a state shall not be prohibited or taken to be unlawful on the ground that the rate is unduly low, if such rate is imposed for the development of traffic between places within the limits of the state."

The amendment as it was put yesterday did not sufficiently indicate that what was required was protection of rates which were merely for the development of traffic within the territory of a state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The development of the country.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is precisely the same thing.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Oh, no.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If honorable members can show me any substantial distinction I shall be prepared to follow it. I propose to explain, as shortly as I can, the reasons for this further amendment. I would ask the attention of the committee, because we have undoubtedly arrived at a very serious point in our deliberations. I wish to discuss, without any undue heat or exaggeration of expression, the question of what the position really is as far as it affects New South Wales. I should very much have preferred to treat the railways in exactly the same way as the rivers. I should very much have preferred to leave the solution of this question to the general principles which are embedded in the Constitution under the commerce clause. I should very much have preferred to leave to the High Court the interpretation of any Act that is passed dealing with trade and commerce and affecting these matters. Unfortunately, it has been decided by the passing of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment that that course is not to be followed, and the position as it stands to-day may very readily be gathered from that amendment. My right honorable friend struck out the word "particularly," and did so for the purpose of making more clear what his intention was. The criticism of Mr. Higgins, which was, I think, quite justified as a matter of legal construction, showed that there might be a doubt as to whether the power given to Parliament under Sir George Turner's amendment would enable the Parliament to interfere with the rates of a state regarding its own traffic only. And, in order to make that matter perfectly clear, Sir George Turner struck out the word "particularly," and carried the amendment in the condition in which it now stands. Well, we did not object to that being done, because we thought it was better that the committee should understand at once the real meaning of the amendment. We thought it was better that the injustice of the proposal should stand out in a clear defined way, so that there could be no mistaking the effect of it. And its effect now is that not only has the Parliament the right to lay down a rule as to what shall be preferences or discriminations in interstate traffic, but also as to what shall be discriminations and preferences in any traffic on the railways of a state.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Any traffic which affects intercolonial trade.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Not only upon any traffic which affects intercolonial trade, but upon any railway of a state, whether carrying interstate traffic or not. The honorable member may shake his head, but I can assure him that he has not considered the legal effect of Sir George Turner's amendment, and therefore he is not in a position to give any opinion on the question.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The legal effect of the amendment is that they can do so, but the commonsense effect of it is that they won't.

Mr. BARTON. -

Well, are we making a law or not?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If a legal power is given by the amendment, I want to see what that power is, and I decline to accept the honorable member's assurance that the operation of the provision which Sir George Turner carried yesterday will be protected by common sense. I say, that we are giving a right here which will be exercised to its fullest extent, and I will explain presently why I think it will. But, first of all, I want to make clear to the committee what the meaning of Sir George Turner's amendment is. I do not think there can be any question that what I have just stated is the real meaning of it. Now, how does that affect the position in which New South Wales stands? Mr. Trenwith interjected just now that, whatever the law may say, common sense would dictate something else. But I would like to point out to the honorable member that we are making a law here, and making a law of, perhaps—indeed, certainly—of more momentous import than any law yet passed in Australia—a law the interpretation of which will involve the rights of millions of persons in the future, and a law which, above all things, should be exact and definite in its terms.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That applies to everything in the Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Undoubtedly that applies to everything in this Constitution. Therefore, it is of little value to tell me that the meaning of a clause or an amendment may be one thing in a legal sense, but that it is something else in a common sense. We have to consider this as a matter of law, and to consider the rules of construction that will be applied to the interpretation of this Constitution in the future. The honorable member's interjection brings me to another point. The strongest objection which we have to handing over this power to the Federal Parliament is that we are handing it over to a body which, however honest it may be in intentions, is interested in the deepest possible degree in the determination of the question. And it is interested in exactly the same way as the members of this Convention are interested, but it will be a body which, however much we may hope as to its personnel and as to its character, cannot possibly fail to be more affected by special and personal interests than the members of this Convention. Now, in any question dealing with the trade which will be affected by this amendment there will at the least, leaving out Queensland for a moment, be interested in the matter the colonies of Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia. Any one who knows anything about the fixing of the rates in the competitive area which carries the Riverina trade will know this: That the rates upon that area are not fixed only by the requirements or the competition of trade between New South Wales and Victoria, but are also affected very largely by the cost of carriage on the river, in which South Australia is so deeply interested.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

What is the object of federation?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The honorable member knows as well as I do what the object of federation is, and it is in order to secure and retain the principles of federation that I am moving this amendment. Now, I say that, on any question affecting this trade, you have had up to the present time and there will always be a triangular duel; not only a contest between New South Wales and Victoria, but also a contest between New South Wales and Victoria by land, and the interests of South Australia on the river. No system of competitive rates can be devised to deal with this matter which would leave the position of the river traffic out of consideration, and the reason why these rates upon the railways of Victoria and New South Wales are compelled to be fixed so low is because they must be brought down to a level which will enable them to compete with the river traffic. Now, in any question that can arise in the future regarding this traffic, you must have exactly the same elements of competition, exactly the same interests at work, and it is because we feel that, in any question of discrimination or preference with regard to the rates of our own railways, we are submitting that question to be decided by a body in which, of the three parties to the contract, two may be interested in one way, and one in the other, that we say that it is not the kind of tribunal to which we would submit the interests of New South Wales, and the fixing of the rates on her railways.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I do not wish to interrupt the honorable member's line of argument, but at some part of his speech, perhaps, he will be good enough to say how far he thinks the amendment carried yesterday by Sir George Turner does give the Commonwealth control of the railway traffic wholly within any one state?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I pointed that out very shortly a few minutes ago, when the honorable member was evidently not in the chamber, but I have no objection to answer the honorable member's question now. If the honorable member has Sir George Turner's amendment before him-

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I have what you said last night before me.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

But I am now dealing with Sir George Turner's amendment, which has been considerably altered by the striking out of one word. The amendment as it stood was, as I pointed out before, open to the criticism of Mr. Higgins-and I think it was very fairly arguable, if the matter was to be decided by the court, that, with the word "particularly" inserted, the power "to particularly forbid such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable, or to be unjust to any state"-that those words were merely an illustration of the general power conferred. But the honorable member will see that by striking out the word "p

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Does that take the power out of the implied limitation of the trade and commerce clause?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Undoubtedly it does. If this matter was to be decided by the court, there would be some reason in the suggestion. But it is not to be decided by the court, but by the Parliament, and it is left to the latter to determine what is a rate or preference which comes within the power of Parliament. If Parliament determine that, what power is there to prevent it?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Surely the court could try the validity of an Act passed by Parliament to see whether it is wide enough.

Mr. WISE. -
Parliament is made the whole test of what is reasonable or unreasonable.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It seems to be forgotten that Parliament may forbid such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue or unreasonable, or unjust to any state. The court has no power. The absolute power is given to the Parliament.

Mr. REID. -
The only question for the court would be as to whether Parliament had so deemed it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Exactly. As my honorable friend reminds me, the only power left to the court is to determine whether Parliament has deemed a particular rate, preference, or discrimination to be undue, unreasonable, or unjust to any state. I have no hesitation in saying that the meaning of the amendment is not only such as I have indicated, but that it is proposed deliberately and purposely in order to carry out the meaning of my right honorable friend.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Hear, hear.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I am glad to hear that cheer from Mr. Deakin, because this brings us to the true position.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
My only object is to make it clear.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
This brings us to the position which ought to be put in no mistaken language before the Convention. We are not without light on this matter from the experience of the past. We know that, in dealing with the question of whether a rate is discriminating or whether a preference is unjust, the area of the conflict will be, at least, what it is at the present time. We find according to the valuable report laid before the Convention by Mr. Eddy on the differential rates controversy—which has been so long going on—that the competing area, over which Victoria allows a reduction of as much as from 61 to 66 per cent., extends into New South Wales territory up the Darling to where the Darling becomes the Barwon. It extends across the Bourke line and the Lachlan River down to the Murrumbidgee. It includes all the area served by the Jerilderie to Hay line, and all the branch lines to Jerilderie, to Berrigan, and all the Albury lines to the border, and branches of them—in other words, the area in which the New South Wales rates, drawing New South Wales traffic, would be considered an area the rates in which should be submitted for the consideration of Parliament under this amendment of Sir George Turner. That is to say, the whole of the railways of New South Wales, in so far as they deal with the richest part of the products of New South Wales, would be submitted to the judgment of the Parliament of the Commonwealth as to whether the rates were discriminating, or whether preference should be made.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
A Parliament in which New South Wales is represented.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
A Parliament in which New South Wales is represented, and in which Victoria and South Australia are represented, and in which a combination of Victoria and South Australia could overcome the majority of the members for New South Wales. There is no use in talking in this way, and I do not want to say anything more about it. Exactly the same interests operating here would be in force in the Federal Parliament. We are warned by what has been going on here as to the danger of submitting the consideration of the rates on our railways, in regard to our own traffic, to a tribunal, in which, necessarily, there would be much self-interest. It must be remembered that if Queensland becomes a member of this Commonwealth, as I ardently hope she may, there will be exactly the same class of problem to meet. There is a competitive area between the New South Wales terminus at Bourke on the Darling and the termini of the Queensland railways. Within that area, both in Queensland and New South Wales, there is competition for trade. If the rule suggested applies, there would be, as has been pointed out, a new party and a new element in the Commonwealth Parliament—an element which would, also, have an interest in fixing the rates of the railways of New South Wales for the carriage of our own traffic and fixing them in a way to suit somebody else. And not only that, but we come to a point at which our northern railway touches Queensland in another way—from New England to Wallangarra. Exactly the same consideration arises there. Queensland would have a right to say—"After you, in South Australia and Victoria, have attended to the little matter of the rates for Riverina, we have a word to say in regard to the rates to Bourke—to the railway at Moree, which comes within 60 miles of the Queensland border.

Mr. BRUNKER. -
And the line is being extended to Collarendabri.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Yes, it is being extended to Collarendabri. There is no question that one of the first results of the development of the railways in the north-west must be in that direction. The interest of New South Wales is not only in the competitive area in Riverina, but is touched at every border of the territory. It touches us where we deal with South Australia, and also where we deal with Queensland, on the north-west and northern border. Remembering the admissions that have been made by my honorable friends from Victoria, as to what they mean by this amendment, and remembering what they desire and require in regard to the rates of the New South Wales railways-

Mr. REID. -

They may find it a rod for their own backs.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Remembering these things, how can we possibly take back to the people of New South Wales, with any feeling of confidence, a measure which hands over to a Parliament, the members of which would, as I have pointed out, be deeply interested in determining the rates on our own railways for the carrying of our own produce? I appeal to honorable members who may take strong but not extreme views in regard to this matter, and I appeal particularly to those who represent colonies which are not specially and directly interested in the trade of the districts which these proposals will affect. I ask whether, as a matter of common ordinary justice, we should be expected to submit to an interference in our railway management of the kind proposed? These railways have been built by us at enormous expense to serve the interests of our producers, and they must be conducted with a regard to the interest of those producers.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And, if you wish, you would argue, to ruin the Victorian railways.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No. I have before pointed out in this Convention that I recognise the difficulties of dealing with the question in any symmetrical way, or upon the ideal lines which we should like to see embodied in the Constitution. We must face the facts, and we are quite willing to face them in such a way as will leave things where they are. We are willing to leave to Victoria her power to impose rates, and to leave to New South Wales the same power, trusting to the development which must take place after we have become united for some more reasonable arrangement. Until such an arrangement is come to, we are willing to leave things as they are. Under the guise of a provision which would do that, the amendment of the Premier of Victoria was carried; but that amendment, instead of leaving things as they are, gives to a body interested in the way I have described the control, not only of intercolonial railway rates, but of all the rates charged.
upon the railways of New South Wales. I quite admit that the majority which carried that amendment may refuse to accept the amendment I now have to propose. But I would remind honorable gentlemen that, although they may carry an amendment, or a clause, or a Constitution here it means very little if an element of injustice is contained therein-and I am not using too strong a word if I say an element of spoliation-because that will make its acceptance impossible in New South Wales.

Mr. Reid. -

We do not mind the same old game; but we do not want a new game upon the top of it.

Mr. O'Connor. -

I would ask honorable members to consider the object of our meeting. We should not be tempted to use too far an advantage which a chance majority may give us. I am willing to consent to any amendment which will put this matter upon a reasonable footing. I have taken up some little time in explaining the manner in which this question affects New South Wales, because I think there are many honorable members here who may not have studied the map, and who may not have seen exactly what the proposal means. I think that to those who understand the position, and who have listened to the arguments we have been putting forward, the justice of our case will be apparent. I do not care to be bound down by any particular form of words. I am quite content to move my amendment in any form which will carry into effect the principle mentioned by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) just a while ago that is, the principle of leaving things as they are. By carrying the amendment of the Premier of Victoria we have not left things as they are, but we have given away a power which I think was beyond the wildest dreams of my honorable friends opposite when the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) was being considered. In order to surround this power with a limitation which will preserve the right of New South Wales to develop her own territory and to look after the interests of her own producers, I beg to move-

That the following words be added to the proposed new clause:-

"Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, a rate upon a railway the property of a, state, shall not be prohibited or taken to be unlawful on the ground that the rate is unduly low, if such rate is imposed for the development of traffic between places within the limits of the state."

It does not matter very much where that provision is inserted, and I leave it to the Drafting Committee to part it in its proper place. It will enable New South Wales to consider the interests of her farmers in Riverina. It will enable her to deal with, say, the wheat traffic from places like Berrigan in such a way as will permit the farmers there to send their grain to the seaboard, upon such terms as will make exportation possible. We all know that if Australia is to have any large dealings with the outside world the cost of delivering produce at the seaboard must be made very much lower than it is now, and it is one of the uses which New South Wales proposes to make of the gains of her railways to benefit her producers by reducing the rates of carriage to the sea. That is the principle which is being adopted with us, and which must be adopted in all the colonies if Australia is to become a producing country worthy of the name.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
And to compete with the outside world.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
We ask you to allow us to reduce our rates where the interests of our producers require that they should be reduced. I do not like to see a provision of this kind introduced into the Constitution at all. I look upon a provision such as the amendment of the Premier of Victoria as a blot upon the work we are doing, but, if that provision is to remain in th

[P.1426] starts here

Mr. BARTON. -
This shows how much damage you can do by trying to explain what is already clear.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
If the words are clear, why should the honorable gentleman object to having them made clearer?

Mr. BARTON. -
It is not possible to make the construction of such words clearer.

Mr. REID. -
Your 60 per cent. rates are quite clear.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Order. I must remind the Right Hon. Mr. Reid that Mr. O'Connor is in possession of the chair.

Mr. REID. -
I really forgot that that is the fact, owing to what is taking place.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
My right honorable friend's interjections are always useful. I do not wish to detain the Convention at any greater length except to urge upon honorable members that they should consider at this crisis at which we have arrived that the question is not to be settled by majorities, but by what is fair, right, and reasonable. Looking at the matter in that way, I hope that no honorable member will feel himself tied or bound down by any view which he may have previously expressed in the absence of full knowledge of the subject. I hope the matter will be looked at fairly from every point of view, and that the necessity will be recognised, if Sir George Turner's amendment is to stand, for some such limitation as I have proposed. I would rather have none of these limitations; I am quite willing to leave the matter as it was left, and for the reasons explained by Mr. Barton on many occasions, to the general power of dealing with the regulation of trade and commerce, which is the underlying principle of this Constitution. I say that that power administered by the Government, and interpreted in the last resort by the court, is at once the most elastic and the safest provision which can be made in dealing with this difficult question.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I quite agree with my honorable friend that we should do what is fair, just, and reasonable, but I consider that, in carrying the amendment, we did yesterday undoubtedly what was fair, just, and reasonable to all the states. My honorable friend seems to forget that there is any other state than New South Wales, when he talks about what is fair, just, and reasonable. The keynote of my honorable friend's remarks for the last three-quarters of an hour has been "We are not to trust the Federal Parliament to do what is right." That is the sole basis on which he has objected to my amendment. The effect of that amendment is simply to leave to the Federal Parliament the controlling power, not to regulate rates and charges with regard to that traffic, but to prevent any one state doing what is wrong to another state. All through we have been told that our friends in New South Wales are perfectly satisfied that they should be placed in that position, but it has been admitted lately that what we contended for hour after hour, and day after day, was quite correct; that is, if you left us to the operation only of the trade and commerce clause, you tied up Victoria and left New South Wales free.

Mr. WISE. -

I was the first to point that out to you in Adelaide.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That was pointed out by the honorable gentleman, but it was argued all along, and it is argued by Mr. O'Connor now, that we should rely on the trade and commerce clause. That has been pointed out, and so we have attempted to argue and tried to get out of that difficulty, which simply meant to give everything to New South Wales, and leave Victoria at her mercy.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I said I would be quite willing to vote for any amendment which would leave matters as they are.
Mr. REID. -

We all say that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I would ask my honorable friends to listen to what I have to say. My honorable friend will give me credit for not wanting anything that is not fair to any colony. In fact, that is what we are all here for. I would suggest that the amendment should read in this way:--

Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, a rate upon a railway the property of a state shall not be prohibited or taken to be unlawful on the ground that the rate is unduly low, if such rate is not unjust to another state.

Let it stop there.

Mr. WISE. -

That will not meet it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Very well; I throw out that suggestion to show our bona fides - to show that all we want is to prevent Victoria or New South Wales from using the railways in such a manner as to be unjust to one or other of the states in the Federation. I do not want to take my honorable friends on the hop, and I am willing that they should have time to think over the matter. Let us see the words of the amendment, and the effect of it. What we did yesterday was, to my mind, simply to leave to the Federal Parliament the whole question of dealing with all the states in such a way as to prevent one treating another unfairly or improperly. Here we are asked to say that, notwithstanding anything we may have done, a rate is not to be unlawful on the ground that it is unduly low, if such rate is imposed for the development of traffic between places within the limits of the state. My honorable friend says we must put in words which are definite. These words are definite and distinct enough to tell the people of Victoria "this is aimed directly at you, and for the benefit of New South Wales." This power is not wanted by New South Wales for the development of the country; it is not wanted for the benefit of the producers or for opening up these remote districts; but it is wanted to conserve the traffic of New South Wales in New South Wales, to take the Riverina trade to Sydney, and to prevent it from coming to Melbourne, and we are invited to say that a rate is not to be unlawful if imposed for the development of the traffic between places within the state. That is stating, in as clear, definite, and distinct language as possible, to Victoria-"You must not make your charges low in order to get the Riverina trade to Melbourne, while in New South Wales we can carry goods for nothing for the express purpose of taking trade away from Melbourne, where it now flows, and to lead it to Sydney." Is it to be thought for a moment that we, as representatives of Victoria, could consent to such a proposal, or is it to be thought that the people of Victoria would agree to a Constitution having that provision staring them in the face? Mr. Barton characterized our action as malevolent.

Mr. BARTON. -
No, maleficent—the opposite of beneficent.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The honorable member used a lot of hard terms, but I would find it difficult indeed to characterize the effect of Mr. O'Conor's amendment on the prosperity and progress of Victoria.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
They must think that you are green.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We are just getting back to the one question which we have been strenuously fighting for the last few days; that is, that leaving the matter to the trade and commerce clause simply meant that we were tied, and that New South Wales was free. Surely any honorable member who reads this will see that its effect, whatever the intention is, will be to make it absolutely clear that that is to be the position hereafter. Therefore, those who are prepared to deal fairly, justly, and equitably with all the colonies will never dream for a moment of voting for an amendment of this description.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
What does the honorable member mean by saying that the trade and commerce clause makes us free, and binds Victoria?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That was admitted by Mr. Wise and Mr. Reid yesterday.

Mr. WISE. -
I have always thought so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I contend that the effect of the trade and commerce clause is what I have described.

Mr. SYMON. -
Many others do not agree with that.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
How can we settle it when the lawyers differ?

Mr. WISE. -
Put in a clause to make it clear.
An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

It would only make it obscure.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not want to have any misunderstanding, and we need not have any sneers about the matter. If it is to be a question of fighting, Victoria is just as able to fight, and is quite as prepared to fight, with regard to these railway rates as is New South Wales.

Mr. LYNE. -

We are quite as well able to fight as Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We have fought so far and succeeded, and we are perfectly willing to continue the fight.

Mr. LYNE. -

We do not want to make a fight, but if you make an onslaught on us we will defend ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would ask honorable members to allow the right honorable gentleman to address the Chair.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are perfectly prepared to fight, and we have fought as separate states. We will fight so long as we are separate states, but when we are bound together in a Federation, we want to stop that fighting on the border, and let everything be fair, just, and reasonable.

Mr. REID. -

Especially reasonable.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Well, now, Mr. O'Connor has based his argument on the ground that the Parliament will be too deeply interested in this important subject to do what is fair. Are we going to enter into our Federation with any such thought in our minds? If we are, I say that we shall do better to end our conference at once, and save the great expense going on day by day to our different countries, When we were dealing with the question of bonuses, and the question of the distribution of the surplus, my right, honorable friend said:"Surely you are quite prepared to trust the Federal Parliament to do what is fair, just, and equitable." But when it comes to a question of preventing injustice being done by one country to another-

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Dealing with our property, that is the thing.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And you will be dealing with our revenue.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Surely the surplus is just as much our property as these railways or the rivers can be said to be the property of New South Wales. We have had to agree to leave the surplus absolutely to the Federal Parliament, to do as they please with it, and to divide it among the states as they choose.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

There it is a case of putting the property of all the states into a pool, but here the property is ours only.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No. New South Wales cannot suffer any loss in regard to the distribution of the surplus, but when we pointed out that we were bound to suffer a loss which might mean ruin to us, we were told, of course, to trust the Federal Parliament. And I suppose we shall have to trust them. But are we to believe for a moment that if we trust the Federal Parliament in regard to these railway rates, there will be any combination to injure New South Wales? South Australia is fighting Victoria just as much as Victoria is fighting New South Wales. It is a triangular duel.

Mr. REID. -

It is Mr. Midshipman Easy's triangular duel, and New South Wales is Mr. Midshipman Easy.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then it is said that we are fighting New South Wales for the purpose of securing her traffic, to her injury, and that South Australia and Victoria are going to combine with that object in view. I say again, as to that, that if my honorable friends opposite have any such thing in their minds, we had better break up our conference at once and end the matter. Surely we are not going to imagine that the representatives of these colonies—and I think that New South Wales would have pretty nearly as many representatives as South Australia and Victoria together—are going to combine for the purpose of injuring New South Wales? Is it imagined for a moment that the representatives of Western Australia and Tasmania would not prevent any such corruption taking place? If it were suggested that these two colonies were combining together with that object in view, would not the sympathies and determination of the representatives of Tasmania and Western Australia lead them to prevent any such combination? Are we to assume that those representatives were acting dishonestly yesterday because they voted as they did?

Mr. REID. -

I do not say there has been any dishonesty. Victoria has been trying to get our trade for the last twenty years, and what we say is that you have had your hands in our pockets too long. That is all. We do not say that it is dishonest. It is honest enough—but inconvenient to us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And it is just as inconvenient to us to lose what we have got. If the representatives of New South Wales cannot see their way to their country coming into the Federation unless they are to take away from Victoria what she has now, Victoria may just as well say that she is not prepared to come into it without taking away from New South Wales what she has. We have two positions offered: Either we must leave ourselves to fight as we have been fighting in the past, and no one wants that; or-

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We have come here to make peace.

Mr. REID. -

Peace with honour, not peace with surrender.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If we are not to surrender anything at all-

Mr. REID. -

Oh, you are all right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We have had to surrender many things. We have had to surrender our bonuses, which I, for one, look upon as more important to this colony than even the trade we are fighting about.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But you did not talk of upsetting the Convention with regard to the bonuses.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am not talking of upsetting it. But if my honorable friends opposite mean, and if my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) agrees with them, that we are going to combine with the representatives of South Australia corruptly to injure New South Wales, then I say—"Better break up the Convention." But if we are not, we may trust the representatives to do what is honest, though it may be to their loss to do so.

Mr. REID. -

And that is what you are going to do, I am sure of that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And we did it yesterday.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Would the right honorable gentleman be content if we say that existing rights are to remain as they are?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am afraid that New South Wales would not consent if we did say that.

Mr. WISE. -
Oh, how do you know?

Mr. REID. -
"Existing rights" it is, you know.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It is the right to do as you please.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
"Existing" rights are something like "existing" rights in the waters falling from the heavens. They happen to fall in my right honorable friend's (Mr. Reid's) territory, and he thinks he has a right to keep them against any one else. But if it were suggested that we should retain what we have now, and New South Wales what she has now, I should not see much objection to that.

Mr. REID. -
That would be infinitely better for us than the present proposal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I do not think it would. But to come back to the point: The position is that if we leave it to the Federal Parliament to do what is right and proper we are running just the same risk as New South Wales is. It may be to the interests of South Australia and

New South Wales to see that our existing rights are altered, and if it is supposed that there would be a combination between South Australia and Victoria to injure New South Wales, we have just as much reason to fear a combination against us. But we are prepared to trust the Federal Parliament, because we believe that in a matter of this kind it would do what is absolutely right.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Does the right honorable gentleman think it fair to leave to the Federal Parliament what Mr. O'Connor says is the most important part of the bargain we are now making? The matter will be a bone of contention thrown before them as soon as they begin their business, without having any basis to work upon.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
My honorable friend must see that we have left many other matters to be fixed by the Federal Parliament without giving them any basis to work upon.

Mr. DOBSON. -
It will be a question of bargaining between the two states, and we should settle it in some way.

Mr. REID. -
Hear, hear.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I do not see how we can settle it.
Mr. DOBSON. -
Then how can the Federal Parliament settle it?
Mr. REID. -
Hear, hear. A very good point.
Mr. DOBSON. -
There will be ten times the difficulty we have now.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I am perfectly prepared to settle it by doing what we are supposed to do in a Federation-wipe out our political boundaries altogether. That is a way that would settle it. If we are to federate, let us do what a Federation surely means in all matters of this kind-leave the people who are living in Riverina to use the railways to Melbourne or to Sydney as they think fit.
Mr. REID. -
Leaving to one state the responsibility of paying the piper!
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Well, we have heard that so often that it is becoming nauseous. We have heard about leaving New South Wales all the responsibility, and we have been told before that it was the prohibitive duties imposed by Victoria that forced New South Wales to build these lines. My right honorable friend said that, and repeated it yesterday, but it was so self-evidently incorrect that I did not think it worth while to take up the time of the Convention by answering it, because every one knows that such statements contain a good deal of "hifalutin" and exaggeration.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
We have had to pay half the cost of constructing bridges over the Murray.
Mr. REID. -
Really! It is wonderful that you have done something.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
And we have offered to build a bridge over the Murray at our own cost. But I have been led off the track too many times by these friendly interjections from my fellow representatives. I must say I think Mr. O'Connor has been very hard-pushed for any argument to support his amendment when he has had to reiterate time after time that the groundwork of it undoubtedly is the fact that this Parliament which we are proposing to bring into existence is going to do something that is unfair and unjust to New South Wales. I think we may dispense with that argument altogether, and be perfectly prepared to leave the whole question, as we have done, to the Parliament. I have no objection, however, if the representatives of New South Wales would frame any words which will show that New South Wales is to be prevented from doing with regard to this railway traffic what is unfair and unjust to Victoria, while Victoria, on the other hand, will be prevented from doing what is unfair and unjust to New South Wales. I am willing to accept any words which will show that unfairness and injustice will be prohibited to both, but I am not prepared to accept any proposal which will leave what we consider to be an injustice to one side, and take away from us that strong force we have at the present time to counteract that injustice and prevent it from operating against our colony.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Your amendment is the difficulty in the way now. If you wipe that out we might arrange the matter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Surely the honorable member is not serious in asking us to insert these words. He cannot be serious.

Mr. REID. -

He does not do the joking. I do it. He never made a joke in his life.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am afraid that he has been rubbing shoulders with my right honorable friend too much. I do not know whether the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) will deny the correctness of my reading of this proposal—that the effect of it is to allow New South Wales to develop the traffic within New South Wales, and to allow Victoria to develop the traffic within Victoria.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Hear, hear.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Well, that is useless to us. The effect of it is undoubtedly to take away everything that we have been fighting for during the last few days, and the honorable member cannot be serious in asking us to agree to that.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is the principle of interstate commerce in America—that each state shall have the control of traffic within its own boundaries. That is the principle which is laid down in the amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But have they competing states where, say, there is a port in one

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Nothing of the sort.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is the effect of the amendment. I do not think the honorable member desires it, but the effect of his proposal certainly is to say that all the traffic of New South Wales must go to Sydney, and that Victoria can keep her own traffic. That does not suit us.

Mr. REID. -

Take the last words of the amendment-"traffic between places within the limits of the state." Could it not be said that your low rates from Wodonga to Melbourne are to develop traffic between those two places, although they extend in effect to New South Wales?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not think so. The bargain is made by the carrier. He makes a bargain with the Victorian railways, and a bargain with the squatters. He does the work for one complete bargain, and any rates we might make, I think, would undoubtedly be held to be rates to attract the traffic from New South Wales into Victoria. There is no question, I think, that it would be so. I would commend to my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) the suggestion I have made. We are willing to meet him as far as we can, and to say that a rate is not to be declared to be unlawful on the ground that it is unduly low-"if such rate is not unjust to another state." We must have these low rates in our own colony to develop our country. We want to develop the mallee, to develop the Gippsland district; but in framing those rates we will be framing rates which will not be intended to attract any of the trade from New South Wales.

Mr. FRASER. -

The present rates are unjust to every one of the colonies, one against the other. How do you get over that?

Mr. HOWE. -

That is what we will have to get over.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I will not trouble the committee any longer. As this amendment is framed, it renders absolutely nugatory what we did by a very large majority, and after full consideration, yesterday, because it simply gives to New South Wales the sole weapon, and takes it away from Victoria. Our friends from New South Wales cannot expect us to agree to any such proposal, nor do I think they really desire us to do so. If they want anything that will be an alteration of what was done yesterday, they must be prepared to submit something which, on the face of it, is far fairer to Victoria before they can ask the representatives of other colonies at the Convention to agree to it. They must be prepared to do something which is fair to Victoria, and also fair to our friends in South Australia. What they are doing now is... undoubtedly unfair to Victoria and unfair to South Australia, and it will leave Victoria to do something which is unjust to South Australia, because we could work our traffic in such a way as to take away from South Australia traffic which, geographically, ought to go there. We do not want that power, and I do not think New South Wales wants the power which this amendment will undoubtedly give to it. Therefore, as the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) appealed to the Convention to do what was fair, just, and equitable to New South Wales, I would appeal to the Convention to do what is fair, just, and equitable to all the Australian colonies.

Mr. Wise (New South Wales). -

I think it is very much to be regretted that there were not longer intervals for reflection between the suggestion and the determination of the various proposals which the Convention has been considering during the last two days; because it is impossible not to observe that the Convention has got into one of those moods which deliberative assemblies do somehow get into occasionally, when an element of discord seems to come upon them and to confuse the minds of honorable members, so that matters cannot be looked at with that clearness and tranquillity which ought to characterize our deliberations. As there has been heat introduced into the discussion, and as I am going to oppose as strenuously as I can the proposal of Sir George Turner, I would like at once to preface my remarks by saying that I have the most complete conviction of the honesty of purpose with which he moved his amendment, and of his sincere desire to arrive at a settlement of this matter which will be beneficial, not only to Victoria, but to every part of the Commonwealth. I have been struck, and other honorable members must have been struck too, with the fact that all through these discussions there has been an evident sincerity of purpose on the part of members, and of delegations in this Convention, and in spite of some heated remarks from various parts of the chamber-remarks which I am quite sure those who made them regretted almost immediately afterwards—no one can deny that all honorable members here have been striving, while not neglecting the interests of their own colony, not to push those interests forward unduly to the disadvantage or oppression of another colony. So much have I been impressed with that tone in the Convention, that on this matter I have almost separated myself from my colleagues in my endeavour to do what I thought was fair to Victoria. I recall this, not in any spirit of egoism, but in order to give all the strength and power that I can to the appeal which I am about to make to the committee. When this matter first came up in Adelaide, I pointed out to Sir George Turner—I believe he thought I had some ulterior purpose in doing so—that the general clauses, while being perfectly fair to New South Wales, would deprive Victoria of her weapon of preferential rates. I renewed that observation the other day, and my friends opposite know that in private I have expressed the same sentiment to them, and have made suggestions with a view of rendering amendments which they had in their minds more clear for the purpose of protecting the interests of Victorian trade. I have taken this course, not because I think it is just that Victoria should have the Riverina trade-I do not think the question of justice or injustice enters into it at all-I have taken this course because, all through, we who have had to bear the brunt of this federation movement in New South Wales, have insisted that the basis of federation must be the absolute acceptance of existing facts. That is the ground on which we, with enormous difficulty, have persuaded our people to accept the principle of equal representation in the Senate. We take the facts as we find them, and one of the most striking facts about this matter is that the trade of Riverina is to a very large extent now passing into Victoria, and that it is passing into Victoria by means of preferential rates, which we may condemn or approve, but which exist, and which have a certain operation.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
The Riverina trade belonged to Victoria twenty years ago.
Mr. WISE. -
I care not what the origin of it is. I take the fact as I find it. I am not going back into ancient history to say who is to blame. I find as a fact that there is this trade passing over the Victorian railways. I find as a fact that the railways of New South Wales have been built, and that by means of low rates, no preferential, a portion of the trade which would otherwise go to Victoria is taken to Sydney. I have done my best to get rid of that state of things, because I am on of those who, from the very beginning of this Convention, have urged the federalization of the railways. But I have always seen-and I do not depart from this position one bit-that there is no middle course between taking over the railways and leaving matters as they are.

Mr. FRASER. -
That is the point.
Mr. WISE. -
That is why I hope to satisfy Sir George Turner, for I know his openness of mind, that the amendment he carried yesterday-and which I do not believe would have been carried if there liked been a longer interval for reflection-has completely altered the situation, that it has just reversed a position that seemed to be advantageous in Adelaide, because, while keeping to Victoria the bulk of the instruments she uses to attract the trade, it takes every instrument out of the hands of New South Wales for bringing any traffic at all over her lines. In one sentence I can show why the plausible argument of "Trust the Federal Parliament, leave them to interpret the word reasonable or, the word unjust," can have no application to a matter of this kind. The real difficulty is caused, not by the impossibility of deciding between two rates which is reasonable or which is unreasonable, but because the very existence of some of the railway lines is unreasonable.

Mr. FRASER. -

There are too many lines.

Mr. WISE. -

The line running out to Hay, if we were under one system, is utterly unreasonable. You can put no rate on that line which an impartial tribunal will declare to be a reasonable rate to make the railway pay. You can put no rate on some other lines, even in Victoria, which an impartial tribunal will declare to be a reasonable rate. If we run out along the Lachlan, say to Wentworth, as is proposed, and stop there, no rate that can be imposed on those lines which will have the effect of drawing any traffic to them but must be declared to be unjust or unreasonable by any tribunal. It is the essential nature of the problem that you cannot solve it by appointing a tribunal to decide that point. It is the very existence of these railway systems which creates an insoluble difficulty.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In America they are allowed to take into consideration the fact of a rate being necessary to make a line pay.

Mr. WISE. -

I am not dealing now with that question, and I hope my learned friend will not allow me to conclude without reminding me again on that point. I will show exactly what I mean by a concrete illustration. A railway will be opened to Walgett in the course of a very few months. A railway is being continued now along the Lachlan, and may be carried on to the junction of the Lachlan and the Murrumbidgee, at Oxley, and then again down past Balranald on to the Murray. I do not say that that has been planned at present; but if our territory is to be fully developed, and if it is to be developed as a separate state, sooner or later that would have to be done. If the railways were all under one system that would simply be part of a trunk line running from north to South. But if you have to run the railways out there for the development of the territory of New South Wales, having regard to New South Wales alone, then I would ask honorable members to fairly put this question to themselves:
What rate can you impose for the carriage of goods, say, from Balranald, or from Oxley, or from Walgett, which will not of necessity be declared unjust to another state or unreasonable? And for this reason: That trade now goes through Walgett, some of it, down the Darling to South Australia. The trade that is done at Balranald goes partly to Victoria and partly to South Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - Not all the year round.

Mr. WISE. - The moment our railway comes, a portion of that trade is necessarily diverted, and who is to say whether that is unjust to South Australia, or unjust to Victoria? Why, sir, the very men who have been deprived of the profits of the trade which has been taken from them. Now, this is not a matter of politics or of policy; it is a matter of hard commercial business. Is there any matter of hard commercial business which a business man would hand over to be determined by the votes of his two rivals?

Sir JOHN FORREST. - Where are the other colonies?

Mr. TRENNWITH. - And where is New South Wales herself?

Mr. WISE. - That is the answer to the apparently attractive analogy - "Trust the Federal Parliament for the distribution of the surplus." One deals with a surplus as one deals with a question of politics, according to certain large general principles of policy affecting the welfare of the whole community. In this matter you are dealing with the property of one state only, because by the very geographical circumstances Victoria cannot give these low rates—she has not the extent of territory to do so, and South Australia cannot, except in the northern district where there is no competition. You are really dealing entirely with the property of one colony, and you are handing it over to whom? To a Parliament in which the majority will be composed of the men who are business rivals for the particular trade which is in disputes and you are giving them no guide as to how they are to determine. They are to pronounce, according to their own views, what is unjust, what is unreasonable. We have had an illustration of why that cannot be done, and Sir George Turner will correct me if I am inaccurate in my facts. The commissioners of South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales - and I ask attention to this as a concrete illustration showing that I am not indulging in any vague forebodings - on two, if not three, occasions, have come to an agreement as to what these rates shall be. They have agreed as to what is just, what is reasonable.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Not just and reasonable to the state, but just and reasonable to the railway itself. They only dealt with them from that standpoint.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
From a purely railway point of view.

Mr. WISE. -
That gives away the argument, because it shows that what may be held to be just and reasonable may be absolutely unjust to the railway system of New South Wales, because it would really mean that what is just and reasonable, having regard to the railway interests of each territory, may be held by the Parliament to be unjust and unreasonable.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The Parliament will prevent anything which is unjust and unreasonable to New South Wales.

Mr. WISE. -
I am pointing out that the Railways Commissioners of three colonies came to this decision, and the Government of the day—whether it was the Government of New South Wales or the Government of Victoria is immaterial to my argument—found itself unable to accept their recommendations, and for what reason? Not because the Government of Victoria thought that they were unjust or unreasonable. I do not know whether my right honorable friend was a member of the Government at that time.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I take the whole responsibility.

Mr. WISE. -
Why did the honorable member do it?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Because it was unjust to the colony of Victoria.

Mr. WISE. -
I am not questioning the policy of Victoria—I am not saying whether it is sound or unsound, for I would not be guilty of such an impertinence. The honorable member took that view because the policy of Victoria required that certain rates should be kept up for the purpose of drawing certain trade into Melbourne, and that is just from the Melbourne point of view. But does not that show the sort of considerations which will influence the Parliament when it has to decide on whether a rate is fair or reasonable? In the determination of a question of this kind Parliament will be moved by purely business considerations. Why should we expect the business men of South Australia and Victoria to take any other than the business view of the matter? I leave the other colonies out, because they are not directly interested, and we may assume that they will be equally divided. What I am urging is that this is utterly different from an ordinary matter of politics. The request is to hand over a matter of business, and to allow it to be decided simply by the money interests of a lot of merchants in Adelaide and Melbourne, each looking to their own pockets, and to their own pockets only. The people in Sydney who at present have all the trade are to say—"It is for you in Adelaide, our rivals, and for you in Melbourne, our rivals, to decide whether we shall keep that trade or not." Such a proposition has only to be stated to be self-condemned. That is where there is no distinction in Sir George Turner's amendment. "Unjust" and "unreasonable" remain equally ambiguous terms, equally incapable of any such definition as will insure that they will be interpreted in a manner that will not do injustice to the colony of New South Wales. The problem is insoluble from its very nature. It is insoluble, because the railways should never have been brought into existence to be run as competing systems. There is only one way to deal with it, and that is to take the railways over.

Mr. FRASER. -

And that cannot be done.

Mr. WISE. -

It cannot be done here, but if we get the Union I think it will be done within five years. No one would be a rash prophet to assert that. I will ask the Hon. Mr. Isaacs to give me his attention. I agree with the view I expressed in Adelaide, and I think he agrees with me too, that the general commerce clauses would prevent, or might prevent, the preferential rates charged in Victoria if Parliament legislated on the subject. My honorable friend (Mr. McMillan) asked why. The answer is that clause 52, giving power to Parliament to regulate trade and commerce between the states, has been held in the United States to authorize Congress to pass a law prohibiting preferential rates on the goods of one state over the goods of another.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The portion of the Inter-State Commerce Commission's report to which I referred previously bears that out, because it suggests that Congress should legislate to prevent the rate war.
contended that the matter should be left under that general clause. I did not think it fair then, and I do not think it fair now. If we intend to leave the railways as they are now, some statement must be put into the Constitution to that effect.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Would not that be a blot on the Federal Constitution?

Mr. WISE. -
I think it would.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It could never be altered.

Mr. WISE. -
I think it could easily be altered. And it would also be necessary to insert a proviso that the commerce clause shall apply so far as to prevent any colony from rising its railway rates as barriers. A clause to this effect would, I think, meet the case:

Nothing in this Act shall limit the right of any state to control and regulate railways upon its own territory, provided that no state may charge a higher rate upon goods from other states than upon goods of the same class moving within its own territory.

Mr. FRASER. -
In the same direction.

Mr. WISE. -
I do not think that is necessary. It is said that this would be blot on the Constitution. I expressed my opinion on that subject on a previous occasion. But if we cannot get union in the highest form, there is no reason why we should run the risk of losing union in the form in which it is attainable, especially when we are satisfied that the inevitable trend of events is to compel the federalization of the railways in a very short time. If that argument does not appeal to honorable members, let me point out how much Victoria would gain at the expense of New South Wales if an amendment were carried in the form I have suggested.

Mr. SYMON. -
What you prohibit is prohibited under the free-trade clause.

Mr. WISE. -
The proviso is only necessary because of the first part.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It forbids what they do not do, and it allows what they do.

Mr. WISE. -
That is an epigrammatic way of putting it. It will allow the colonies to carry on the interstate warfare of low rates as at present.

Mr. FRASER. -
No. At present they are charging lower rates for goods from the other colonies than for goods from their own colonies.

Mr. WISE. -

The proposal is to allow rates to be charged in Victoria as today that are preferential, and to allow rates to be charged in New South Wales as today that are differential, but which have the effect of giving preference. This state of warfare will continue, with this great exception in favour of Victoria, that if this is carried, the commerce clause with a proviso will apply to compel New South Wales to take off all the extra high rates now charged on Victorian goods between Albury and Cootamundra. Would not that be a substantial gain?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And it would compel us to take off the extra charges as against South Australia.

Mr. WISE. -

I am much obliged to the honorable member for that reminder. It would be a gain to South Australia, because the extra rates charged, which are really in the nature of a barrier, would have to be taken off, both on the Victorian and the New South Wales railways.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Sir George Turner's amendment gives the same protection to South Australia as that does.

Mr. WISE. -

That is the intention of it, but it leaves Parliament to determine whether a rate is unreasonable and unjust. It would have that effect, but it would have such other far-reaching effects that we may very fairly object to submit our destinies to anything so uncertain.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Your suggestion should take the place of Sir George Turner's clause.

Mr. WISE. -

Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We cannot go back.

Mr. WISE. -

It is a mere suggestion. I only want to emphasize to my friends from South Australia, who say that federation will be of no use unless we can get rid of the war in rates, that in attempting to get too much they may lose everything. I have never indulged at any period in the sittings of the Convention in any threats as to what is going to happen; I have never attempted to do more than present my views clearly; I have never used any arguments as to what the results might be in the other colonies, because I am confident that the good sense and fair dealing which have characterized the members of the Convention from the beginning will continue to the end. And it is only necessary that we should state our views frankly and clearly to each other, to be sure that our different relative positions are accurately understood, and then we can be satisfied that some conclusion will be come to which will be just and honorable to every colony alike.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

It appears to me that we have taken a day and a half in discussing whether we will express in this Bill what everybody says we mean. We had a most luminous exposition of the possibilities of the trade and commerce clause from Mr. O'Connor, in which he showed clearly that the trade and commerce clause, coupled with 200 years of American decisions, would cover anything that everybody asked.

Mr. FRASER. -

That is against private railways, though.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

There are no private intercolonial railways between the colonies, and there will be less and less railways that are not state railways in the future.

Mr. FRASER. -

And more difficulty in consequence.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

And, therefore, fewer and much less difficulties, because difficulties which would apply to private individuals owning a railway, as to the manner in which they should conduct their railway, could in no way apply to state institutions.

Mr. FRASER. -

I look upon it exactly the other way.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I have considered the amendment of Sir George Turner again and again, and I am endeavouring to find out in what way it differs from the trade and commerce clause as expounded by Mr. O'Connor. And I call his attention to this point, because I wish him to explain the difference he sees between them. My honorable friend explained with great clearness, in a most able speech, that the trade and commerce clause, coupled with the provision for intercolonial free-trade, would do all that was required, because the provision relating to intercolonial free-trade would give the High Court jurisdiction to prevent anything that was contrary to free-trade between the states, while the provision of the trade and commerce clause would give the Federal Parliament jurisdiction to legislate on the whole question, and the Federal Parliament could pass legislation to insure what was right and just to all the colonies, and to prevent any of the provisions of the Constitution being evaded. I would like my honorable friend to explain the difference between the trade and commerce clause and Sir George Turner's amendment.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I will explain now, if the honorable member will permit me to interpose for a moment. The difference is that under the principles of the regulation and control of commerce, as laid down in America, the Commonwealth could not, by legislation, interfere with any traffic which was purely within the limits of a state. Sir George Turner's amendment gives the Commonwealth Parliament power to interfere with traffic which may be confined entirely within the limits of a state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If it is unjust.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

May I ask, at this juncture, for the sake of information, one question? I understand that traffic entirely within the limits of a state could not be interfered with by the Commonwealth; but do the American decisions go to the length of saying that the trade and commerce clause of this Bill would not enable the Parliament to interfere, by legislation, with the traffic of a state which becomes interstate traffic, inasmuch as the proper port of outlet-I mean the natural port-for that traffic is in another colony I

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I don't think they do.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am afraid they go very much in the direction Mr. Symon indicates. I have a case on the point, which I will give the honorable member afterwards.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

To resume my remarks, I may point out that in these colonies-particularly in the colonies that are not well developed a number of railways are constructed which are never expected to pay of themselves, and which can only be made to pay in connexion with the land. They are made to serve the purpose of settling and developing land which would be no good without access to it, and, on the other hand, those railways would be no good without the land. Neither would pay without the other, but with the two going together, gain and not loss results to the state. Although a railway of that kind is not a paying mercantile concern, still it is a paying concern as a means of developing the land, and we should take care not to put limitations on, I won't say the right, but the duty of every colony to develop its own territory to the utmost possible extent. But what I am anxious to impress on the minds of honorable members is that neither Mr.
O'Connor's exposition of the meaning of the trade and commerce clause nor the amendment of Sir George Turner touches this point at all. It appears to me that, in spite of the remarks which Mr. O'Connor made just now, his exposition of what would be the powers of the Parliament in the trade and commerce clause is identical with the words inserted in the amendment of Sir George Turner. In fact, I would go a little further, and say that it might be found out, in the result, that those words are words of limitations and not words of authority at all.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Hear, hear. That is quite possible.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
It may be that, in the trade and commerce clause, there is a power, if the honorable member's exposition of it is right, and I think it is, to prevent the development of the lands of a state by means of railways, where the result of their construction, although highly beneficial to the colony internally, was to operate in a way prejudicial to some other colony. But surely that is a proper power, after all, for the Parliament to have. The first principle of federation is that each is to so use his own property as not to injure the property of his neighbour. That is the view which I understood Mr.
O'Connor took in his explanation of the clause, and that is what is put into words in the amendment of Sir George Turner. And why should it not be put into words in this Bill? I have been reading and listening to the debate that has been going on, and it appears to me that the very members of this Convention who believe that the provisions of the trade and commerce clause are broader than anything we can provide are yet the most strenuously against words that contain only a part of what the trade and commerce clause includes, on the ground that those words would alter the Constitution. I would really like the assistance of somebody in getting to the root of this matter. I say it in all good faith. It appears to me that we have spent a couple of days in fighting, not as to what we mean, but as to whether we should say it or not in this Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
And as to how we should say it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
And why should not we say it in the Constitution? What is the whole tendency of the federation movement? Are we to adopt a Constitution founded on general words which

[P.1439] starts here
require the support of a couple of hundred years' decisions of a foreign country to explain them?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

And those decisions are not binding on us.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Even in our own colonial legislation we have found it necessary to codify our laws. We codified the mercantile law of bills of sale and exchange.

Mr. LYNE. -

Does not Mr. O'Connor say that Sir George Turner's amendment goes a good deal further than the interstate law of America?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not see that it does. If it does so, it would have been better to amend it. As I said, we have codified our laws relating to bills of sale and exchange and our laws relating to goods. The whole tendency of legislation is not to cause people to look through a heap of textbooks to find out the law, but to so codify it that everybody can see and understand the law, and not have to pay a very high fee when they want to know the law. And are we to begin this Constitution, either against experience or through timidity, by rejecting the lines which we are adopting in the drafting of Bills in our respective Parliaments, in the general way of legislation, and by trusting this Constitution to an interpretation which can be in no wise certain, and for which, at all events, we shall have to go to foreign parts? I will be obliged if Mr. O'Connor will explain clearly (because he and I, in regard to federation, are in very great sympathy) in what way, and to what extent, Sir George Turner's amendment differs from the construction which he (Mr. O'Connor) places upon the words which give to the Parliament power to legislate with regard to the regulation of trade and commerce.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I did explain just now.

Mr. WISE. -

It would enable us to say the rate from Walgett to Sydney was unreasonable, because it had the effect of taking trade from South Australia.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The word used is "unjust." I am glad my honorable friend interjected. Mr. Wise believes in the federation of the railways as the only way out of the difficulty, and I expect most of us think so, too. I fancy that generally we are under the impression that one of the earliest parliamentary Acts of any consequence will be the taking over of the railways. After that is done, who will exercise the authority? We will trust the Commonwealth then. And there will be just the same influences in the Federal Parliament as are being
Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The railways would be the property of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Of course they would. If we are going to do an injustice and sacrifice the interest of one state to another, there is no reason why the Federal Parliament, under other circumstances, should not do the same and a great deal more. This is a power of veto - not affirmative legislation, but the power of preventing that which interferes with trade and commerce, or that which may be done in the interests of one colony with injustice to another. Do we want anything else than that? There should be no difficulty at all about the interpretation of the words, and I firmly believe that any interpretation put by the courts on this trade and commerce clause would be quite as broad, and it might be broader. In fact, I do not see where the limitation is. If you give a general power, that power may be exercised without limitation.

Mr. WISE. -

Only as regards interstate commerce.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Exactly.

Mr. WISE. -

Traffic within New South Wales is not interstate traffic.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

This only applies to interstate traffic.

Mr. WISE. -

No, it does not; Sir George Turner's amendment goes further.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I cannot see any words which take the amendment further. These are the words-"that is unjust to another colony."

Mr. LYNE. -

That interferes with the ordinary rates in New South Wales.

Mr. WISE. -

It is the very existence of the railway from Hay to Narrandera that is unjust to Victoria.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not know the details, but certainly there would be power under the Constitution to interfere with that railway.

Mr. WISE. -

Or to recoup us losses on expenses.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
If it were found that a railway, whether wisely or unwisely constructed, was being used, not for the development of the territory in which it was, and not for the legitimate trade, but for the purpose of doing an injustice to another state, where is the right and justice of a suggestion that there should not be some power to interfere? I hope no alteration will be made.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

Before we adjourn for luncheon, I think I am justified in making a few remarks on what took place yesterday, and what has taken place here today. The first consideration to be given, in questions of this character, is as regards federation itself. It is a strange position to assume, for one colony to start by threatening that the Convention is likely to be broken up because certain arrangements are not made to agree with the particular views of the representatives of that particular colony. Mr. Reid's speech, although it was splendid so far as the people of New South Wales are concerned, had not from beginning to end any proper logical deduction, and was most absurd in many respects in regard to railways. It appears that the Riverina country is a special portion of New South Wales bordering on the Murray. Victoria was more interested in that country years ago than New South Wales itself. Victoria made railways through the country in order to develop it. New South Wales found that the trade was going where it ought to go to Melbourne, which is the natural outlet for that part of Australia. The argument of Mr. Reid was that it had cost New South Wales a large sum of money to make railways in the Riverina district. What were the railways made for? Simply to take the traffic from that portion of the country to Sydney, against the interests of the settlers. There can be no doubt about that. Having gone so rapidly to work to invest money where it could not pay under the arrangements made, Mr. Reid, as representing New South Wales, now tries to make up the loss under a federal arrangement, which really ought to be of a more liberal character than the preceding one. The argument is that Victoria has put a log of burdens on the settlers by charging duties. These duties are abominable in my eyes, and it appears that there are some parties who wish to re-establish similar abominable duties in New South Wales. The people of Victoria say - "Very well, we will give you access to our ports by charging a less amount of money than we charges people in our own district who do not want to go to Sydney." Are the people of Victoria not justified in doing that? Does such an action not promote trade and traffic? I understood the leader of the Convention (Mr. Barton) to be exceedingly careful last night in trying to carry out his views, but when we find him giving a lecture to us for half-an-hour as to what we should do for New South Wales, it is going too far. Had I spoken at the time I am afraid I would have spoken with some heat, and I am glad to have the opportunity of looking calmly at the matter this morning. Who could agree with the last words in the proposal before the committee? It would be a "dead sell" to the people of Victoria if the words were accepted. It is desired to make a law applicable to New South Wales which would not be applicable to Victoria.

Mr. LYNE. -
So far as New South Wales trade is concerned.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
It is no use talking to you on the subject. We all know your position, and there are no arguments on your side.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I must ask the honorable member to address the Chair.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
The honorable member ought not to address me. What do the words "within the limits of the state" mean? Do they mean to give a special law to a special portion of territory in the Federation? Are we to agree to such a thing as that? This is a matter which does not affect my colony at all, and therefore I have a right to speak impartially. The Premier of New South Wales talked in his usual style yesterday, and asked what Tasmania had to do with the matter? Tasmania has as much right to talk about the principles of federation as the biggest man in New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is what you are here for.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
We are here for that purpose, invited by the very gentleman who turns up his nose, if he has any, and who speaks on behalf of New South Wales. The thing is in a nutshell; we want to do justice between all the colonies, and that no colony shall be favoured as against another. When you compare railways with rivers it is a misapplication of terms. One you make yourselves, the other was given by a power superior to your own, and you have no right to deal with it in the way you have done. You say you have lost everything; what have you lost? Up to the present time you have had everything your own way, but now you say we shall have nothing unless we agree to all your terms. It is a pity that the Premier of New South Wales did not start yesterday on that principle, and then we should know where we are. He now says - "We do not intend to let you have federation; we do not intend to let people of New South Wales join the Federation if you do not give us what we want." Let it be so. We in Tasmania shall not suffer if New South Wales does not join, because at the present moment we are in a better position with regard to New South Wales than any law passed by this Convention can place us in, because we have the benefit of free-trade with New South Wales, and a great benefit it is to us. If federation is carried, we shall not be limited by the abominable practice of this confounded protective system in Victoria; we shall get rid of that. But at present we have the benefit of New South Wales trade, which is of infinitely more importance to us than the trade with Victoria, with regard to which we have groaned for years and years. We do not intend to be placed under the heel of any community, barring our own. We shall be willing to join the Federation upon fair terms, but we are not to be put under the heel of New South Wales, Victoria, or any other colony. We are endeavouring to do what is fair, right, and just between the colonies, according, to practical common sense. But, because we do not agree with the representatives of New South Wales, we are told that we are not honest men. That is the sum and substance of the arguments used. I hope we shall endeavour to bring this matter to a close by dealing with it in the same way as we have dealt with other questions; that is, what is good for one is good for another, and what is bad for one is bad for another. We have tried to get federation over and over again, and we have never succeeded, and I am afraid, judging by appearances, that we are not likely to succeed on this occasion. It appears to me that we were nearer to federation in 1891 than we are today. The gentleman who upset everything then is the leader here today, and when he again threatens the abrogation of federation we ought to look at the matter with some degree of suspicion?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I suppose the honorable member does not refer to the leader of the Convention?

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
No. I apologize to Mr. Barton if he thinks that I threw any reflections upon him. I think he has taken a noble part in these proceedings. Last night, when he was overwhelmed by the position of New South Wales, I felt inclined to think that I ought to have less confidence in him; but he has taken a most independent honest straightforward part in our deliberations, and all the colonies ought to be grateful to him for it.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
I think the very honest and direct expressions of opinion by Mr. Douglas will be considered by all of us to be a healthy, breeze in this Convention, which ought to bring us back to our true relationships to each other. Although the clause proposed by Sir George Turner has been passed, I think we cannot get away from the fact that, if there could still be some clause drawn up which would prevent this aggregation of absurdities, it would be far better, even at this stage, to try and see if such a clause cannot be constructed. I think the wisest remark passed today with regard to this discussion is delay. It is one of those questions pre-eminently which we have had before us in which a further delay, not necessarily interfering with the progress of business, would be very beneficial on all hands. We have had the ablest lawyers in this Convention trying to solve what seems to be an absolute conundrum. If I understand the exact position, it is this: That we want to put in something which will give more definiteness to a certain phase of sub-section (1), clause 52; and at the same time we do not want to put anything into that declaratory clause which will be an actual injustice to present interests. Of course, I have no legal ability, but, as in one or two other cases when we have tried and abandoned certain clauses, it seems we are trying to do a something of which no human intellect is capable. However, I do think that the proposal of Mr. Wise comes as near to what is wanted as any proposal which we have yet heard. It seems to me it would be better, by a little delay, and by a certain mode of procedure which we have had before, to go back upon Sir George Turner's clause, and, if necessary, introduce this proposal by Mr. Wise, or some other clause which goes nearer to our purpose than anything we have had yet, because, after all, what have we been struggling to do? Let us be honest. We have been struggling to put in a direct negative of a previous clause. But the reason we have tried to do that absurdity in a great instrument like this, which ought to be perfect in all its parts, is that we of New South Wales believe that this matter is so essential to the success of federation, and that our position is made so peculiar by the work of the other day, that it is still necessary, by all means, before we part to see if we cannot get over the difficulty in another way. I shall not take the responsibility of doing anything, because I hold no official position here, but I think it would be better on the whole that this clause drawn up by Mr. Wise should be accepted, because it really seems to have a grip of the thing and to be absolutely fair in its consequences. It would be well to close this discussion, say at lunch time, and go on with it again in a couple of days, after we have finished the question of debts and other things connected with the financial clauses. I have not referred to this matter before, but I deprecate any of these extreme expressions of opinion, these threats, these things which might be well enough in a local Parliament when, perhaps, I am opposing my honorable friend (Mr. Lyne), but which, I think, are entirely out of place in a Convention where we meet, not with any party, not with any section, but on purely national and patriotic grounds as arbitrators, as negotiators, to put before the people a Commonwealth Bill.
which shall be fair to the whole of this great continent. Therefore, I say, having no official position here, I do not intend to move anything, but I would commend this to honorable members who, like myself, are very much in earnest, that whatever we do on the final vote of this Convention, every man should be prepared to subscribe his name to a document, if necessary, stating that he is prepared to go before the people of his own colony as a great propagator of the scheme of federation.

I rise to see if it is not possible that the conflicting opinions of honorable members may in some way be moulded into harmony. We have had extreme speeches from one side and from the other, because all who have spoken have not been so temperate as the honorable gentleman who last addressed the Chair. To my mind, the difficulty is absolutely insoluble. It was stated in Adelaide to be so, and those who have given attention to the matter consider it so now. The trouble is that both parties are trying to take advantage of each other, and neither will give way. There cannot be a shadow of a doubt that the attitude of Victoria in regard to New South Wales is most unfriendly. She is trying to attract traffic across the borders from railways which were constructed at great expense to the people of New South Wales. On the other hand, there can be no doubt that the New South Wales railway rates have not been framed solely and wholly to encourage the development of the resources of the colony. They have been made preferential with a view to drawing traffic to Sydney. This being the position of affairs, there is apparently only one course open to us, and that is to let the two parties go on fighting. The amendment of the Premier of Victoria was, I think, conceived in a truly fair and reasonable spirit in order to emphasize and to give special application to the provisions of clause 89, which are intended to secure freedom of trade and intercourse between the colonies. Were it not that the representatives of New South Wales feel so sore in regard to these preferential rates, which they call differential rates, I have no doubt that they would be willing to accept the amendment; but they are not prepared to give up what little advantage they think they got by charging excessively low rates over long distances, although they gain almost nothing by the freight. I cannot think that Victoria, on the other hand, gains very much by her system when the large discounts which are given upon the carriage of the Riverina produce are taken into consideration. In addressing the Convention upon the matter generally, I stated that there could be no doubt in the mind of every fair-dealing man that each state was entitled to be allowed to develop its resources in any fair and reasonable way it thought fit. I do not think any one could deny to New South Wales the right to develop her resources by charging fair and reasonable rates for local traffic. I think that that right should be continued to New South Wales absolutely; not the right to do injustice to Victoria, but the right to do the best for her own country and her own producers. To my mind the development of the country and the making the best of its resources for commercial purposes is of more importance than the gaining of a few pounds by attempts to take advantage of another state. In regard to the management of both rivers and railways the development of the country which they serve should be the first consideration. Although I feel that New South Wales has not dealt with these matters in a liberal spirit, I would not be a party to deprive that colony of any opportunity to develop its resources in a fair and reasonable manner. To meet the case, I have drafted the following amendment, which I now beg to move:-

That after the word "Constitution," in Mr. O'Connor's amendment, the following words be inserted-"Such laws shall not have the effect of preventing the development of the internal resources of any state."

I do not think the Convention should take any action that would prevent the development of the internal resources of any colony.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The Federal Parliament would not interfere with rates which were intended simply to develop the resources of a colony.

Mr. WISE. -

If the Federal Parliament did its duty, some of these railways would be shut up.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We had better, perhaps, pass no provision at all, and let New South Wales dictate the terms of the union.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

We might ask the representatives of New South Wales to draft a Constitution for us.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Why did they not bring it with them?

Mr. GRANT. -

The railways and the rivers are the chief factors in the development of the resources of a country, and I do not think there should be any interference when they are being managed with that object. I submit the amendment in the hope that it will be considered by the parties as a fair compromise.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I ask myself, and I am sure the majority of honorable members will ask themselves, whether it is possible to say anything new upon this subject. We have listened to arguments from the best legal minds in one direction and counter arguments from other legal minds, and these speeches have succeeded, as they usually do, in placing us in such a position that we cannot tell exactly where we are. I think that a plain statement of the facts should have greater weight with the Convention, as it will with the public outside, than the very keen argument used by lawyers on one side and another. I must thank my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan) for his little lecture upon the use of language here, though I have heard him when excited use extremely strong expressions. However, he is not usually excited. If the proper course had been taken when the Convention met in Adelaide, words would have been used by honorable members to express their meaning, not to cloak them. It would have been better to have had a little plain speaking, such as we have had during the last two days, when the question first arose for discussion. We have been fighting and talking round this question for the last twelve months, and it is now suggested by some honorable members that we should have a further adjournment, so that we might see if it would not be possible to settle it satisfactorily six or twelve months hence.

Mr. BARTON. - We are not going to do that.

Mr. LYNE. - I hope not. I have not heard an expression of opinion from the leader of the Convention on the subject before, but I hope we are not going to adjourn. Whatever Bill we are going to frame should be framed before the termination of this particular session of the Convention.

Mr. BARTON. - Unquestionably.

Mr. LYNE. - I think we should have arrived at a conclusion quicker if we had dealt with the question from the first exactly as we are dealing with it now. The fight was bound to come. I saw it looming in the distance. I saw that we were bound to have this fighting before we got to the end, and that we must know the result of the battle before the Bill could be finally framed. I was more pleased than I can express with the speech delivered last evening by the leader of this Convention.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - You were singular in that respect.

Mr. LYNE. - I do not think so. Though I have heard this morning some honorable members objecting to the terms of the speech, yet I think the terms were as strong and as conciliatory as it was possible to have them consistent one with the other. The speech showed to me what a strong feeling the leader of the Convention must have, wishing, as we all know he does so strongly, to pass a Bill which will be acceptable to the people of all the colonies, and especially New South Wales.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not think that any one has been referring to the leader of the Convention.

Mr. LYNE. -

We have had one lecture from Mr. McMillan today, and I do not want to hear another. I have said nothing derogatory to the leader, having only expressed my appreciation of what he said yesterday, and I have said that because I have heard some honorable members of this Convention, notably that stalwart young man from Tasmania (Mr. Douglas), making some very strong remarks concerning it.

Mr. BARTON. -

He made no attack upon me.

Mr. LYNE. -

He made an attack upon the tone of the speech, not an attack upon Mr. Barton personally. I repeat, it showed what a very strong feeling Mr. Barton and the New South Wales delegates have upon the subject, and I, for one, feel that it is of such a crucial character that upon it almost hangs the acceptance or rejection of the measure which will be framed by this Convention. That being so, I will try again to emphasize the difference between Mr. O'Connor's explanation of the law as it has been interpreted in America and this proposal. I understood the honorable gentleman to explain that the American law does not interfere with the management and arrangement of rates which affect the internal traffic of a state within its own boundaries, but those interpretations and decisions do affect the railways if they impose a rate which affects interstate traffic. The proposal of Sir George Turner which has been adopted affects the internal arrangement of the state of New South Wales whether that state touches Victoria or goes near the Victorian border or not. That seems to me to be the entire difference. If you leave its alone, and leave us to carry on our railways without putting on rates to fight Victoria-we do not want that-we shall be satisfied. And let me say this: That it was Victoria that first instituted these differential rates.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is a mistake.

Mr. LYNE. -
I know that it was so. The first, wool that I ever sent down to Melbourne I carried from near Albury by special arrangement with the Victorian railways as against New South Wales, and that was in the year 1876.

Mr. SYMON. -

What is the use of going into those matters of ancient history?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Let the dead past bury its dead.

Mr. BARTON. -

It was about the year 1876 that this system began.

Mr. LYNE. -

I have referred to this because it has been said that New South Wales instituted the warfare. It was nothing of the kind, and we do not wish to continue it, but we do not want New South Wales to be seriously injured by the proposed insertion of Sir George Turner's amendment, which will injure our railways to a very great extent. All we want to do is to be left to impose legitimate rates on our distant railways. It is not for the short distance railways that we require them, but for the long distance railways. It is differential rates of a legitimate character, not preferential rates, that we want to impose. There is one thing which I ask the Victorians to consider which is of great importance, and that is that the preferential rate, which is the fighting rate put on the New South Wales railways now, is put on because the Victorian fighting rate is there. We are putting on a high rate from a certain point in New South Wales, but New South Wales is prepared to do away with that altogether. If Victoria cannot compete with New South Wales in Riverina when we apply our own rates—not preferential rates of any character—to goods which would otherwise come to the Victorian railways, surely she ought to be able to do so. The geographical advantage, which she has in Riverina, that district being nearer to Melbourne than to Sydney, favours Victoria in regard to competition. In respect to the preferential rates of high character that have been referred to, the simple matter is that we have to deal specially with our railway line from Sydney to Bourke—and I would ask Mr. Douglas to pay attention to this—although that line does not come into competition with any of the other colonies or with any line in Victoria; but in consequence of the Victorian preferential rates, and of the low rate of freight on the River Darling to South Australia, we have had to make a specially low rate in order to bring our produce from Bourke to Sydney.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

No one objects to that.

Mr. LYNE. -
Yes, the South Australians and Victorians object to it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No.

Mr. LYNE. -

I have seen correspondence in reference to it.

Mr. GORDON. -

It is not objected to unless it is unjust to the other colonies.

Mr. LYNE. -

What is unjust to the other colonies? We had a great fight over the river question. The real bottom of the discussion was that, owing to the low freight rates on the River Murray for a distance extending over 1,200 miles, from Wentworth to Bourke or Walgett, the railway from Sydney to Bourke could not compete unless we put on a preferential rate. Are we to be so handicapped that we cannot put on a preferential rate, supposing that there is a differential rate on the Murray from Walgett to Bourke right down to South Australia?

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Where does the handicap come in if the settler gets his produce to market cheaper?

Mr. LYNE. -

I am putting this case to show the effect of railway competition at the present moment. This proposal of Sir George Turner will have the effect of preventing New South Wales having that preferential rate. But it has put on a preferential rate to prevent the carriage of the produce on the Murray. This amendment proposes to take away the power of New South Wales to put on that preferential rate, and to allow the whole of the produce of the Murray to go down to South Australia.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

What harm if it does?

Mr. LYNE. -

I appeal to my honorable friend's sense of fair play, whether it is a fair thing to allow that to exist under this Constitution?

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Decidedly. The object of federation is to make us all one, but you want to make us all six.

Mr. LYNE. -

No, the honorable member wants to make federation all Tasmania. If, as the honorable gentleman says, the object of federation is to make us all one, then why should one have a cheap rate from Walgett down to Adelaide—so cheap that it is absolutely impossible to obtain the goods for the railway, which is only about a fourth of the distance from Walgett to Sydney.
Mr. SYMON. -
But it is a good thing for your citizens.
Mr. LYNE. -
It is not, except for very few of them.
Mr. SYMON. -
Well, a few.
Mr. LYNE. -
There are a few large stations up there.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
Is it not good for your settlers?
Mr. LYNE. -
Here are the Victorians at the present time, and the Convention, by the vote of the majority yesterday, saying to us-"Though you are in this position you shall not put a rate on your railways which can compete with the water rate to South Australia." With all the expressions of desiring to do justice, and only justice, I say that is unjust and unfair.
Mr. DOUGLAS. -
But there is no water in the river.
Mr. LYNE. -
When there is water in the Murray that is the result. I know something about this matter. I remember that on one occasion the merchants of Adelaide sent their travellers to Wilcannia, Bourke, and Walgett

[P.1447] starts here
Mr. KINGSTON. -
Is that in reference to the river?
Mr. LYNE. -
It is in reference to the river and to the 66 per cent. discount which is given by Victoria, and which extends all over that country. I venture to think, and I am sure the good judgment of the Convention-of the majority, at any rate-will see that a colony like New South Wales is not likely to accept quietly a decision of that kind.
Mr. HENRY. -
Do you want that state of things to continue?
Mr. LYNE. -
I do not, but that state of things will continue or else New South Wales will lose the whole of her trade in that country if you allow the proposition which was carried yesterday to remain as it is. It will prevent us in New South Wales from putting on what is known as an ordinary long distance rate. It will prevent us from using our own judgment and putting on the long distance development rate we have been using, not intending to compete with any of the colonies, but purely for the purpose of developing our own territory.

Mr. SYMON. -
But you threatened a good deal as to the Broken Hill traffic, you know.

Mr. LYNE. -
No, that does not affect the Broken Hill traffic at all.

Mr. SYMON. -
It was intended to do so.

Mr. LYNE. -
No, it never was. The honorable member is quite wrong in saying that.

Mr. SYMON. -
I am glad to hear that.

Mr. LYNE. -
I think the railway to Bourke was opened before Broken Hill was discovered.

Mr. SYMON. -
I mean the continuation which is being built to Broken Hill.

Mr. LYNE. -
There is no railway being built to Broken Hill. There is a railway built to Cobar, which is, I think, 200 or 250 miles from Broken Hill. The question of Broken Hill never entered into any of the considerations I am referring to. We desire not to continue these fighting rates. I interjected, in consequence of what Sir George Turner said, that if Victoria continues these fighting rates, the responsibility will be thrown on New South Wales to meet them, and New South Wales can meet them. It is not a proper thing for a Federation to have to continue that state of things. But if you still allow the colony of Victoria to put on her preferential rates right over the large area of the western districts of New South Wales, then you must expect this fighting condition to continue. I do not want that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
How do you propose to stop it?

Mr. LYNE. -
Either the amendment moved by Mr. Barton or the amendment suggested by Mr. Grant will stop it. But, so long as we are only permitted to put on the ordinary long distance rates, then Victoria will not be allowed to put on a specially low rate to go through the interior of our territory, right from our southern to our northern border. That is all we ask.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Can Victoria interfere with your internal trade?

Mr. LYNE. -
She does; and under the proposition which has been carried she can interfere with our internal trade. I know that she does attempt to interfere, and gets a good deal of trade. The honorable gentleman has only to look at the maps which have been submitted to the Convention, to see at a glance from the colouring thereon the effect of the condition of things which exists. The Railways Commissioners of three colonies have more than once met and agreed to a business commercial rate over the whole of their railways. But what do we find immediately that takes place—and I conceive it would probably be the decision of the Inter-State Commission if such a body were appointed? I think you may reasonably say that the commissioners understand the question of commercial relations as well as, or better than, any one else, and an Inter-State Commission would probably do as much as the commissioners have been doing up to the present time. We find that immediately an agreement has been come to by the commissioners, the Government of Victoria step in and say—"No, that rate would prevent us from carrying out our preferential rate system in New South Wales, and getting a lot of the trade of Riverina and of the Darling River." More than once—I think twice the Government of Victoria have stopped any equitable arrangement which has been proposed by the Railways Commissioners of each colony. That must impress my honorable friend (Mr. Douglas) with the injustice of the state of things which exists. The right honorable member (Sir George Turner), I think very unjustly and very unwisely, said that corruption had been imputed to certain members who voted yesterday. The word "corruption" was never used.

Mr. GORDON. -

The word "tainted" was used.

Mr. LYNE. -

No, that word was used by the Premier of New South Wales in a different sense from that in which it was construed. I understood him to say that the Parliament to which this matter was to be referred might be a tainted tribunal, but that did not refer to this Convention in any possible shape or form.

Mr. BARTON. -

It only had reference to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. LYNE. -

It only had reference to the Federal Parliament. I think Sir George Turner was wrong and unjust when he said that accusations of corruption had been made against members who joined together and voted to carry the proposition which was carried yesterday.
Mr. BARTON. -
It was a mere misunderstanding on the part of Sir George. He misunderstood what Mr. Reid said.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I do not think he said it.

Mr. LYNE. -
I think he said that corrupt motives or corruption had been imputed to the representatives of South Australia, Tasmania, and Victoria, who voted yesterday for the proposition. I do not think that any one here imputes any such motive to those honorable members. I should be exceedingly sorry to allow any impulsive expression of mine to be interpreted in that way, because I do not think that there is any corruption at all. What I said at Adelaide—and I am sure I am justified in saying it now—was that this Convention is really the condition of things which will take place under equal state representation.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. LYNE. -
When the adjournment intercepted my remarks, I was speaking in reference to this Convention being much the same as we might expect under equal representation in the Senate in the Federal Parliament. In that respect I indorse the remarks which I heard made by one or two speakers—that this debate and the voting on this question, as on some others, is an object-lesson, and must be an object-lesson, to New South Wales as well as to the other colonies. Some honorable member (I think Mr. Douglas) said that Tasmania had no interest in this question. South Australia has, Victoria has, Western Australia has none, and by the equal representation in this Convention the combination of these states is enabled to carry a proposition of this kind, which we conceive at any rate—we may be wrong, but I do not think so—is detrimental to the interests of New South Wales. Now, sir, I have always, as you know, opposed the principle of equal state representation.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Does the honorable member think he is in order in discussing the question of equal state representation now?

Mr. LYNE. -
I think I am in order in referring to it in the way I am doing, because I only make that remark as a forerunner to another which I am about to make, and that is that I do not matter altogether to the Federal Parliament, were it not for equal state representation. If there was proportionate representation, I think that would have a very considerable effect on the minds of the people of New South Wales.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Equal representation is only to be in the Senate.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am aware of that. But, supposing this matter comes before the Federal Parliament, under the honorable member's clause as it is now, what is the result? It is dealt with in the House of Representatives, but it cannot become law until it passes the Senate, and, therefore, the Senate has full power to deal with the matter, just in the same way as we are dealing with it now.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The other states would be impartial; not having any interest in the matter.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am not quite sure that they would be.

Mr. WISE. -

It might be the impartiality of ignorance of the conditions.

Mr. LYNE. -

However impartial Western Australia is now, or however impartial Tasmania may be now, I think Sir John Forrest must recognise this: That in the Federal Parliament we shall not have representatives elected altogether in the way the representatives have been elected to this Convention. We will, perhaps, have in the first federal election a very severe party fight, perhaps in every state, and those party elements will be brought very prominently forward in the first Federal Parliament, so that the calm deliberations which usually take place in this Convention may not be found to take place in the Federal Parliament—even in that high, august, and powerful body which the Senate is to be. I am now directing attention to what has taken place in this Convention so far. A decision has been carried in favour of Sir George Turner's clause by the votes of the smaller states. However honestly those votes may have been given, the result will certainly appear to the public to be the result of a combination of smaller numbers and smaller states against the state that is most interested.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Even some of my own colleagues voted against me.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am not quite sure but that one or two of my colleagues voted against us, but they were in a very great minority. This only shows that there was a very great divergence of opinion.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It shows that there was no combination.

Mr. LYNE. -

Perhaps combination is hardly the right word to use, but there was in the minds of the majority who voted against New South Wales a misconception of the existing state of things. It has been admitted by many honorable members that this is a matter that affects Victoria and New South Wales principally. South Australia comes in almost incidentally. It is not concerned in the matter to the same extent as Victoria. This is not, therefore, a question which should be delegated to a Parliament that may, and that will be, in my opinion, composed of very strong party elements. One of the first duties of that Parliament will be to deal with the question, and we know how much heat it has caused even in the calm deliberations of this Convention. Mr.

The bridges that span the River Murray at various points on the Victorian and New South Wales borders. Wherever Victoria is erecting these bridges it refuses to employ New South Wales workmen.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There is no discrimination exercised. The contractor employs anybody he likes.

Mr. LYNE. -

Whether it was done at the instance of the Victorian Government or not, I do not know, but the contractor did refuse to employ New South Wales workmen, and representations were made on the subject. I mention this to show the feeling that exists at the present time, and which has had its origin to a large extent, if not wholly, in the fight which has taken place to secure the traffic from New South Wales.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Are we so infernally mean that because there is a fight between us we will not employ any of your men at 6s. or 7s. a day?

Mr. LYNE. -

You do not employ them. Everybody knows that I am in favour of a protectionist policy. I have nothing to say now against the fiscal policy of New South Wales. My object here is to try and secure intercolonial free-trade. However much I may approve of the Victorian protectionist policy, or a portion of it, I say that we were compelled to construct certain of our railways in consequence of the Tariff on the Victorian border. We had to give our people in the south and south-western parts of New South Wales facilities to enable them to get their produce to market. If we had not done this they would have had only one course open to them—to send their goods in bond through Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The main thing we take is your wool. We have no duty on wool.

Mr. LYNE. -

You attempt to take a great many other things. I recognise that the preferential rates that are imposed are of great advantage to the settlers in the Riverina. Their produce is carried to Melbourne or Sydney much more cheaply than would otherwise be the case.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

These rates are a burden on those living nearer to Sydney.

Mr. LYNE. -

Incidentally they may be. If the rates on the extreme extensions were not so low, it might be possible to reduce the rates over the shorter distances. Taking the whole railway system, it is, according to the commissioners, paying interest on the money invested. We have to give some little advantage to those settlers who, from the nature of their work, are compelled to live so far away from our metropolis. That is what we are attempting to do, and what Victoria is trying to prevent us from doing. As I said before, we are prepared to take off the high preferential rates which preclude trade from going to Victoria. That would be a great gain to Victoria. We are willing to allow produce to be carried on the Victorian railways at the rate we charge on our own railways. What more can Victoria desire? Surely it is not intended that the war of tariffs shall continue. Sir George Turner said he was prepared to carry on the fight. If so, we must be prepared to carry on the fight also, but it would be better in the interests of all the parties if we could agree to some arrangement that would put an end to this war of tariffs. It must not, however, be an arrangement that places New South Wales at a disadvantage in comparison with other colonies in regard to her own trade. We ask for the right not to impose high rates, but to impose developmental rates, throughout the whole of our borders. But we do not wish to do that in such a way as to interfere unduly with trade in Victoria or Queensland.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Do I understand the honorable member to say that we impose differential rates to attract from New South Wales produce other than wool?

Mr. LYNE. -

I believe that is so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

What other produce?
Mr. LYNE. -

I have not the rate sheet before me, but I think there are many other articles on which special rates are charged. There is, for instance, a special rate on stock. The whole object of the fight, so far as Victoria is concerned, has been to secure the traffic from Riverina and the sending of supplies from Melbourne into Riverina.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes, there is no question about that. The New South Wales delegates have gone further than one could have expected in the offer they have made. If Victoria does not accept some reasonable proposal, what is to be the result? There is really no halfway house. We must either be able to deal with our trade in our own way, not for the purpose of injuring Victoria, but simply with a view to the development of our own country, or else the Federal Government must take over both the railways and the debts and throw the whole thing into one pool. Now, Mr. Grant gave notice of an amendment, just before I rose to speak, in which he foreshadowed his ideas, and, without following the wording of that amendment, it seems to me to be fair in its incidence and to meet the case, if proper words were put in, that New South Wales requires to be met. Now, I have represented the border district, almost from the head of the Murray right down to the Albury district, for the last eighteen years, so I surely know something of the feeling of the people there. And I can tell this Convention that the feeling of the people there is to get, if they possibly can, the ordinary rates in both cases. I do not think that they want a preferential rate, such as is given in Victoria at present. I believe that they would be quite satisfied if they could get the ordinary rate to Melbourne, without any preferential incidence, and the ordinary rate to Sydney, that being what we know as the long distance rate. Now, I do not desire to occupy undue time over this matter, because it has been debated for a very long while, but I felt that it was my duty to explain the practical appearance of the thing to my mind. Not having a legal training, I cannot go into the intricacies of the matter as lawyers do, but I feel that New South Wales has gone a great deal further than she could have been expected to go, and I am not sure whether her representatives in this Convention have not gone further than our people will agree to, in making the offer that has been made.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Which offer do you refer to?

Mr. LYNE. -

I refer to the offer to take off our high preferential rates, which prevent goods coming to Melbourne.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

But you have got to do that under a provision of this Bill; you cannot help yourselves.

Mr. LYNE. -

If that provision has that effect on this matter it should have the same effect on everything else. But you are putting something of a declaratory nature in the Bill which directs the Parliament to go a great deal further, and if, as Sir George Turner says, New South Wales cannot put her high preferential rates on goods going towards Melbourne without this clause, owing to a provision in this Bill, then why not leave the whole Bill without this clause? It is our duty to try, in the interests of the cause which we have met here to serve, to frame a Bill which will be acceptable to all the colonies, and we have now to seek some solution of this difficulty which will be accepted by all the colonies. But unless it is of a very reasonable character, our solution of this difficulty will not be accepted by the people of New South Wales.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Do you support Mr. Wise's amendment?

Mr. LYNE. -

I think, judging from hearing it read, that it is a fairly good amendment, but I should not like to say that I will support it without having time to consider it carefully. Still, it seems to me to be a fair proposal, and, as at present advised, I feel inclined to support it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Mr. Wise's object is to let us go on fighting.

Mr. LYNE. -

Well, I do not want that; but if we cannot get a solution of the difficulty which is deemed fair to New South Wales, I am afraid there is no other course open to us.

Mr. DOBSON. -

How would Mr. Wise's amendment work as regards the Riverina traffic?

Mr. LYNE. -

As I said before, I have not read the amendment, and therefore I cannot give an illustration of that kind. Sir George Turner says its effect will be to let the war of railway tariffs go on as at present, but I do not think that that is a wise thing.

Mr. DOBSON. -

But cannot you give us your reading of Mr. Wise's amendment?
Mr. LYNE. -

I repeat that I have not had an opportunity of reading Mr. Wise's amendment, and, therefore, I do not know exactly to what extent it goes; but my desire is, and, I think, the effect of Mr. Grant's amendment will be, to enable New South Wales to put differential rates-developing rates-on goods carried to the extremity of our colony, but not preferential rates, either to prevent goods going to Melbourne, or to unduly draw goods to Sydney. That is what I desire to see, and that, I think, will be the effect of Mr. Wise's and of Mr. Grant's amendments. They are both of the same nature as far as Victoria and New South Wales are concerned.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

We are now considering an amendment with a view of putting an end to discriminations, but I think we shall soon have to discover an amendment to put an end to recriminations.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Oh, no; we are all in good temper.

Mr. BARTON. -

Mr. Lyne's speech was quite good tempered.

Mr. SYMON. -

But I think we should confine ourselves to the particular amendment under discussion, rather than go back to the more or less dark and troublous times with a view of arriving at a conclusion as to who is responsible for the unfortunate state of things that has arisen-unfortunate as far as regards the difficulties of the solution. My honorable friend also reproached Mr. McMillan for what he called his lecture on the heated language that has been more or less indulged in in this Convention. Now, I think that Mr. McMillan is not to be reproached for those remarks of his, but to be very greatly commended. I am sure that I and many others honorable members feel very, greatly embarrassed when we hear arguments pointed by statements to the effect that it is better to break up the Convention, or that the Convention had better break up, or statements that such-and-such a particular colony cannot possibly join the Federation. I think that before we make use of language of that kind, we ought to wait until we absolutely fail to come to some arrangement in the course of the negotiations, and until the dire necessity exists for our contemplating anything of the kind. There is no one in this Convention who has a either esteem for our honorable leader (Mr. Barton) than I have, or who places a higher value upon his great services to this Convention, and to the great cause in which we are engaged, but I confess I did feel a sense of pain last evening when I listened to the language, the warm language, in which he indulged at the close of the sitting.
Mr. HOLDER. -

It is warm weather, you know.

Mr. SYMON. -

I quite agree that our honorable leader did not use that language with any view of infusing temper into our discussions, but I must confess that warm language of that kind, delivered in that manner, has not the effect of creating a more salutary frame of mind amongst us, but it has rather the tendency to create a kind of bitterness of heart.

Mr. DOBSON. -

But why refer to all this?

Mr. SYMON. -

I do refer to it, because I wish to express once for all-I have never said that before-my sincere hope that language of that kind may not be used on any future occasion. It is not argument; it is simply a tendency to which I have ventured to call attention, and I, for one, feel that we shall much better and much more effectually advance the cause in which we are engaged if we act upon the belief which appeals to us all that we are here, not as an ordinary deliberative assembly struggling for victory or for the loaves and fishes on one side rather than on the other, but with a view of arriving by negotiation at a fair solution of these difficult problems. I also feel that we are entitled to consider the earnest suggestions made by the representatives of other colonies which are perhaps not so deeply interested in the question as those of Victoria or New South Wales. Whether we are more likely to be fair or not, we are here with the intention and determination of bringing to bear the best of our intelligence, and arriving at, what we desire to be, a just and honest conclusion. No honorable member, whether his colony be directly interested or not, should be reproached for any vote he may give. Such votes must be set down to their desire to arrive at a fair result. We appreciate the difficulties of the situation, and the difficulty is in framing a form of words proper and worthy to be inserted in the Constitution—words that will reconcile the conflicting interests of New South Wales and Victoria. That is the problem set us. There is one effectual way of solving the trouble, and that is, to federalize the railways. The danger that New South Wales apprehends in this amendment of Sir George Turner is that it would have the effect of federalizing the railways.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

To federalizing the profits, but not the losses.

Mr. SYMON. -
If that were the only objection to the federalization of the railways, I think it will be seen that that federalization and control is only with a view to protecting the interests of every citizen of the Commonwealth. If I thought that Sir George Turner's amendment tended in the direction of federalizing the railways, I should not have been found voting against it. It seems to me there is no middle course other than to insert in the Constitution practically a railway tariff between New South Wales and Victoria.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
You cannot.

Mr. SYMON. -
Of course you cannot; it is utterly impossible. The difficulty of the position is that, on the one hand, we are trying to avoid anything like the federalizing of the railways, and, on the other hand, trying to accomplish the same purpose. That may be accomplished by some other form of words, but both desires seem perfectly impracticable. Victoria wants the right to charge preferential rates.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Preferential reductions.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend says "preferential reductions." In saying preferential rates, I am using the expression that has been used hitherto. The word really ought to be "concessions." The result would be to give concessions to the trade of New South Wales, or any portion of New South Wales, to Victorian ports. That is really the essence of the whole question. I do not reproach-and I do not suppose anybody would-Victoria for taking such a course. Whilst Victoria is seeking by this method to benefit her traders and her ports, she is, at the same time, conferring advantages on the producer in the particular portion of New South Wales which that producer would not otherwise possess. The Victorian representatives, whilst admitting that position, say they are willing to leave the whole matter to the control and settlement of the Federal Parliament. That is a position to which, if it could be accomplished, I would give my entire assent. There seems to be nothing fairer than that the difference which may exist in regard to those railway rates should be left to a body which has the care of the interests of every citizen of the Commonwealth. For my part, so confident am I that the Federal Parliament would seek to do justice, if a form of words could be provided that would leave the exact matter in dispute to the Federal Parliament, so as not to leave too much scope, I would support it. That is the first solution of the subject. On the other hand, Victoria says, and says very properly-"Whilst we wish to preserve these preferential rates, we object to what New South Wales calls preferential, or long distance, or development rates, by which she may checkmate us in securing that trade or divert the traffic for her own purposes." If New South Wales did follow the course of having these differential rates so as to checkmate the preferential rates of Victoria, the Victorian concessions might go on increasing until we arrived, on the one side or the other, at the point of railway financial exhaustion. How are we to bring these two things together? New South Wales says she wants to retain her differential rates. She objects to leave that matter to the Federal Parliament, because she regards that as handing over to the Federal Parliament, without the federalization of the railways, the control and management of the internal affairs of the state. The only result that is sought to be brought about is that suggested by Mr. Wise's amendment. New South Wales, it appears, does not object to Victoria going on as now, so long as New South Wales is also allowed to go on as now.

Mr. WISE. -

We make a further concession. We actually give up the right to charge an extra rate between Cootamundra and Victoria, which we are charging now. That is about £10,000 a year.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is wiped out by the Constitution.

Mr. WISE. -

Exactly; we are prepared to do it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Exactly; so are we.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then that is already laid down by the Constitution. I do not really understand what the object of our having inserted clause 89 is, unless it is to prohibit, not only a barrier to free interchange by means of customs duties, but a barrier by means of high railway tariffs.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is like a magnet drawing trade, instead of obstructing trade.

Mr. SYMON. -

The intention is said to be to prevent the imposition of high rates on goods going from other states to the state which has, and is intended to have, under the amendment, the control and regulation of its own railways. It seems to me, in the first place, we are putting in this amendment, which substantially includes in a form of words Mr. Dobson's suggestion, a declaration in the Constitution that the existing war of railway rates is to
Mr. WISE. -

No, because each state will have it in its power to make any surrender it pleases, and can always surrender its rights.

Mr. SYMON. -

Of course they can do that at any time, and so they can at this moment.

Mr. WISE. -

We cannot agree on the terms now.

Mr. SYMON. -

No, and there is nothing in the Constitution to impose any terms; it is only postponing the evil day and perpetuating an evil which, if we intend to do away with it, we should do so now, once and for all. If we are to lay down any principle in the Constitution it is a principle which will get over this difficulty which has arisen, and the strife arising out of this competition in connexion with our railways. If my friends from Victoria are agreeable to accept the amendment, the matter is one which so deeply concerns the two colonies, I shall consent to anything that has any essence of fairness and equality about it; but I object to putting in this Constitution what is tantamount to a declaration that the railway strife which everybody has been deploring for a whole week shall continue so long as the two rival states please.

Does my honorable friend think that the general commerce clause would allow Victoria or allow us to continue our differential rates, while it would prevent Victoria from having her preferential rates?

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not; I do not agree with my honorable friend's view of the law.

Mr. WISE. -

If you can satisfy Victoria on that point we will be quite content.

Mr. SYMON. -

I will come to that in a moment. No one can possibly have a higher appreciation of my honorable friend's desire, which is the desire of all of us in this matter, than I have.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

He is the reasonable man of the New South Wales delegation.

Mr. SYMON. -

He is entitled to be described as one of the reasonable men, but I will not discriminate. We do not want any discriminating Tariffs.
No preferences.

Mr. SYMON. -

We all admit that there is no fairer man in this Convention than Mr. Wise, or one more inspired with the sentiment of bringing about a conclusion of our labours satisfactory on all grounds of justice to all parties. Therefore, in making the remarks I have, I did not want to depreciate in any way the effort he has made in this amendment to arrive at a solution. It seems that, after a week employed in convincing each other of what, I dare say, we were convinced of before, that these competing Tariffs, preferential rates, and so on, are highly undesirable, it is wrong to place in the Constitution a declaration that the same state of things is to continue until the states themselves on their own motion choose to alter it. I should like to see some provision which would leave the matter in some way or other, under the restrictions I have already briefly indicated, to the Federal Parliament. I will appeal to my honorable friends from New South Wales to say whether they cannot devise some form of words which will have that effect, and at the same time not be exposed to the most pungent and many just criticisms of the amendment already carried, and in connexion with which Mr. O'Connor's amendment has been suggested? I submit to them whether they are not placing the interests of their people as citizens of the state above their interests as citizens of the Commonwealth. We must not forget that while there ought to be no interference with the control of the state railways by the state itself for all purposes of trade, that, after all, the interests of the citizens of the state are the interests of the citizens of the Commonwealth, and if the Commonwealth Parliament desires to secure the interests of the citizens of the Commonwealth, that would be to the interests of the citizens of the state. These railway tariffs ought to be so adapted that the two interests would be identical and the citizens of the state ought to have the advantage, for example, of sending their goods to the nearest port rather than that they should be tempted to send their trade to a particular port in a particular colony. That is the whole essence of the matter, and that is the point my honorable friends from New South Wales have overlooked. They wish that the interests of the state in its trade relations should rather dominate the interests of the citizens of that state as citizens of the Commonwealth. I think the latter is what ought to prevail.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That is what I wanted implanted in the Constitution, not that this war should continue for ever.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am sure that is what my honorable friend intended, and that is what I commend to my honorable friends from New South Wales. The body which is to control and deal with the interests of the citizens of the Commonwealth, is the Federal Parliament. I feel confident that the Federal Parliament may be trusted to see that no injustice whatever is done; that the interests of the connexion with this matter of the railway lines as in connexion with any other part of the Constitution. Now, I come back to what Mr. Wise has directed my attention to, that is, clause 52, sub-section (1) the trade and commerce provision. My objection to Sir George Turner's provision, with the addition proposed in Mr. O'Connor's amendment, is this: The first part of it I do not object to at all. That is the part of it which hands over the power of legislation to the Federal Parliament in connexion with railway matters, except that it seems to me to be a limitation of the provision as to trade and commerce; first, because it eliminates from the control of the Federal Parliament the rivers; and, secondly, because if the provision as to trade and commerce is large enough, any additional words introduced are liable to be construed as a limitation. But the second part of Sir George Turner's amendment, it seems to me, goes a great deal too far, and it is because of that second part that Mr. O'Connor has proposed his amendment. So far as the amendment is intended to be a limitation upon the second part of Sir George Turner's provision, I feel bound to support it. The point in the second part of Sir George Turner's amendment is that it hands over to the Federal Parliament the control of the railway rates within the state. The proposal is not limited in any way to the interstate rates, or to trade and commerce between the states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Limiting it in that way leaves Victoria in an unfair position, as everybody admits.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not admit that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not interstate commerce between Riverina and Sydney, but it is interstate commerce between Riverina and Melbourne.

Mr. SYMON. -

I will come to that in moment. My honorable and learned friend's remark bears rather upon sub-section (1) of clause 52. It seems to me that that provision, coupled with the provision for an Inter-State Commission, will amply meet the whole case. I cannot for the life of me see why there should be any objection to providing for an Inter-State Commission so long as care is taken to guard against the limitation of the generality of the provisions as to trade and commerce. I regret that I do not agree with the view taken by the honorable and learned member as to the restricted operation of the trade and commerce clause. His fear is that it would enable the federal authority to interfere with such a state of things as exists in Victoria in regard to concessions operating to withdraw trade from portions of New South Wales; but that it would not enable the Parliament to put a stop to the system of checkmate, as I may term it, which exists in New South Wales. I am not aware that a similar condition of things has ever existed in America.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Well, something very close to it.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not express this view at all dogmatically. I am trying to assist the committee in arriving at a conclusion, and it is my opinion that the condition of things existing in regard to the railways of these three colonies has never existed in America. The element of development has never conflicted in America with the principle of free passage to a convenient port, and I feel that it would be impossible for the Convention to settle a matter like this upon cases cited from the American courts. We are not a court to determine this matter. If we did determine it our determination would not be final. We must feel that we are not the tribunal that can be expected to deal with this matter in such a way as will insure that justice shall be arrived at. At the same time, we can look upon the American decisions as likely to contain guiding principles. If in this country we have a condition of things in regard in the management of railways which has never existed in America, we must ask ourselves if that affects trade and commerce in the larger sense. If it does, it is my belief that the Federal Parliament will be competent to legislate upon it, and the Federal Judiciary to deal with it. In my opinion, the best solution of the matter is to leave things as they were. All these amendments are only heaping up one difficulty upon another. I have tried to frame a form of words to get over the difficulty, but I have found it impossible to do so, and unless some provision can be devised which will leave the matter to the Federal Parliament, subject to the restriction that the interests of the citizens of the Commonwealth are to be considered above the trade interests of any particular port, I think our only course is to leave the matter to the interpretation which may be placed upon the Constitution as we have framed it in regard to the regulation of trade and commerce. I cannot see what the provision for the regulation of trade and commerce is here for, unless it is to embrace trade and commerce in the largest... acceptation of those terms.

Mr. BARTON. -

That has been my position all through.

Mr. SYMON. -

The leader of the Convention said last night, with the greatest possible truth, that a majority of honorable members thought that this provision would cover the case of the rivers. If that be so, why should it not also cover the case of the railways? Where you are taking goods from New South Wales into Victoria to a port of shipment, surely the transaction concerns trade and commerce between the states. It concerns trade and commerce between the states that Victoria should, on the one hand, give concessions in order to secure that these goods shall come to her ports, and that New South Wales, on the other hand, should impose rates to induce them to go to other ports. Looking at it in its largest interpretation, it seems to me that the provision in regard to trade and commerce is ample to cover the position that we are now dealing with, and that the more we try to adjust all these differences, which will be better adjusted in the future under the federal authority, the more entangled we shall be in a mass of contradictions, and things will be placed in the Constitution expressly which should be conceived and expressed in general language. That is the view I take of this particular matter. If the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) is put, I shall vote for the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Grant), because I think that the immunity of rates upon the ground that they are intended for the development of traffic is open to the objection stated by the Premier of Victoria this morning. I think that any amendment which is inserted should preserve to New South Wales the right to develop, by means of a railway tariff, if she chooses, the resources of her country. That it is her state duty as well as her state interest to do. On the other hand, the principle of the Constitution is that in matters relating to trade and commerce between the states freedom of intercourse is to be considered the dominant principle. On these grounds, and in the absence of some provision which will leave the matter to the Federal Parliament, subject to some such restriction as I have indicated, I will support, for the present at all events, the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor), as the honorable member (Mr. Grant) proposes to amend it. I hope, however, that this decision of the committee will not be considered final, and that either upon the next clause, which deals with the Inter-State Commission, or perhaps at some later time, after we have had a further opportunity to consider the whole matter, some more satisfactory agreement may be arrived at.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
How much longer will you be?

Mr. SYMON. -

I hope we shall not be much longer. At the same time, my right honorable friend must know that, apart from its material interests, this question is one upon which feeling runs strong between the two colonies chiefly concerned, and we have sometimes to consider feeling as much as material interests. I reserve to myself the right to suggest or to vote for what may be a better arrangement, if one can be proposed.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

My honorable and learned friend says that he is inclined to support the amendment of the honour and learned member (Mr. O'Connor), as it is proposed by the honorable member (Mr. Grant) to amend it. Let us see where that leads us. Mr. Grant has moved the insertion of the words "Such laws shall not have the effect of preventing the development of the internal resources of any state." The consequence of that will be that if the law is one that has the effect of preventing the development of the internal resources of any state it is to be void. That is to say, the Supreme Court is to go into the whole question of whether the railway regulation is one that interferes with the development of the internal resources of a state. Can we conceive of the Supreme Court undertaking any such investigation? How is it to be done? The most serious political controversies would arise, and these are to be determined, forsooth, as questions of dry law or questions of fact-to be determined, I suppose, by the Judges, because that would be preferable to their being determined by a jury of any particular state-as to whether the internal resources of a state are to be developed under that particular law. Is that a provision which we are going to put into this Constitution? Having disposed of that point, let us see how the proposal of Mr. O'Connor will stand. The proposal is that a rate that is unduly low is not to be prohibited if such a rate is imposed for the development of traffic between places within the limits of the state. That is to say, a rate may be unduly low, and still be valid if it is to be for the development of traffic between Albury and Sydney, because those places are within the limits of New South Wales; but if we are to get the traffic from Albury or any other part of Riverina to Melbourne, Albury and Riverina not being within the limits of Victoria the rate imposed for obtaining that traffic is to be held bad. Is that fair play? Then Mr. Symon says he will support the, proposal; but the honorable gentleman voted against our clause yesterday. I do not charge him with any inconsistency in doing anything that would abrogate that clause today but surely we cannot arrive at such a conclusion after the vote we gave yesterday. We are told also that we do not require anything else in the Constitution, because the matter is made perfectly plain under the trade and commerce clause. But what will happen? Let me remind honorable members that there is by no means certainty in America as to how that provision operates. As lately as March, 1896, a case was decided upon this very point. and let me read the passage to show honorable members what danger the people of Victoria will be in if they accept the proposal that we should say nothing about the matter in the Constitution. The case I refer to is that of The Cincinnati, New Orleans, and Texas Pacific Railway Company v. The Inter-State Commerce Commission. It is reported in vol. 162, United States Reports, page 184. The head-note is as follows:-

When a state railroad company whose road lies within the limits of the state enters into the carriage of foreign freight by agreeing to receive the goods by virtue of foreign through bills of lading, and to participate in through rates and charges, it thereby becomes part of a continuous line, not made by a consolidation with the foreign companies, but by an arrangement for the continuous carriage or shipment from one state to another; and thus becomes amenable to the Federal Act in respect to such inter-state commerce; and having thus subjected itself to the control of the Inter-state Commerce Commission, it cannot limit that control in respect to foreign traffic to certain points on its road to the exclusion of other points.

Now, suppose the converse—that is that the railway company had taken the foreign traffic simply between its own borders, not by virtue of any arrangement with regard to foreign bills of lading, and had in no way connected itself with any traffic outside its borders. It is plain that the court would have held that the trade did not come within the scope of the Inter-State Commerce Commission. In other words, New South Wales, in relation to the Riverina traffic, would not be affected by the Inter-State Commerce Commission, but Victoria, if she did, as she would be bound to do, in some way connect her railways with the carriers in New South Wales by some arrangement, then that would fall within this case. I bring this matter forward in order to show how dangerous it would be for Victoria to think that she could rely on the position which Mr. Symon thinks is the correct one. It would leave Victoria in the unhappy position of some day finding that she could be restrained by New South Wales. Now, let me also, while I am on this matter, refer to another point in connexion with this case. The position in America is exactly as it would be here under the clause which we passed yesterday. The Inter-State Commerce Commission is not empowered, either expressly or by implication, to fix rates in advance; but, subject to the prohibitions that their charges shall not be unjust or unreasonable, and that they shall not unjustly discriminate, so as to give undue preference or disadvantage to persons or similarly circumstanced, the Act to regulate commerce leaves common carriers as they were at the common law, free to make special contracts, looking to the increase of their business, to classify their traffic, to adjust and apportion their rates, so as to meet the necessities of commerce, and generally to manage their important interests upon the same principles which are regarded as sound, and adopted in other trades and pursuits.

That is precisely the position we take up—that New South Wales shall be left free and unchallengeable in all her internal arrangements, provided they do not act unjustly to other states. Because it is possible to affect the operations of the Victorian railways by internal charges made on New South Wales railways just as Victoria is able to affect New South Wales railways by charges on her own. Therefore, we say, let us look to the substance, not merely to the form, and consider what is just and fair. I would invite my honorable friend's (Mr. O'Connor's) attention to a book which is, perhaps, the latest work on the subject of railways, and which deals with the question of discriminative charges. The volume is Wood On Railroads. It deals with, I think, all the English and American cases and Acts on the subject. On page 639, section 195, the subject under discussion is dealt with in a most masterly and exhaustive fashion. I shall only quote one passage from page 665, section 203. It is under the heading of "Statutory Regulations-continued: State Statutes; Inter-State Commerce."
The author says—

The principal limitation to the power of the state Legislatures to regulate railroads is imposed by the construction which the courts have given to the clause of the Federal Constitution vesting in Congress exclusive power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the states. The stupendous effect which this brief provision, through willing hands, has exerted might well be the subject of a great deal of remark, if the occasion afforded. It has been invoked more often than any other part of the Constitution, as a ground upon which to have state legislation declared invalid. If it had the effect merely to prevent state legislation from operating outside of the limits of the state, no objection could be made.
But, at the present day, it has acquired such an increased power that it has robbed the states of their power of control even over matters purely domestic which happen to have become tainted, though ever so slightly, with an interstate odour. In the famous Original Package decision the Federal Supreme Court declared that the state of Iowa had no power to exclude intoxicating liquors from its limits, nor any power to prevent its sale within the state if the sale is made, in the original unopened package. The baneful effect of this decision was immediately remedied by Congress by means of what is known as the Wilson Bill; but the remedy, while it corrected the evil immediately in hand, by no means obliterated the evil effects of the decision.

It proceeds at length to deal with the question of railway rates. I am not going to read any passages bearing on the question, because a good deal has been said about that already, but there is a short passage at page 675 which I will read-

So that the right of the state to fix the rates of charges by railroad companies is confined entirely to transportation, beginning and ending within its limits.

That is the trouble which is affecting our minds. The right of Victoria to fix these rates of charges will be confined entirely to transportation, beginning and ending within its limits. The case that I have cited shows that the transportation is held not to begin and end within its limits, if there is even a contract by which it is connected with some outside transportation.

Mr. BARTON. -

So long as it operates on goods the subject of that contract.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -

The goods must come across to be affected.

Mr. ISAACS. -

New South Wales in taking Riverina goods to Sydney will not be affected by it, because they do not come across, and that is why I say it is so unfair to Victoria that we should leave it untouched. Then we have the clause which we inserted yesterday. It seems to me perfectly fair and right, and the proposition of Mr. O'Connor, with or without Mr. Grant's suggestion, would seem to leave us in a position even more unfair than we would be in if we put no distinct provision in it. Therefore, I do hope that these proposals will be withdrawn or rejected.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I had no intention to join in this debate, nor shall I join in it now at any length. But one or two remarks have been made by my learned friend (Mr. Symon) which, I think, he will consider it right that I should make some reply to. I am very sorry to learn that my learned friend was pained at any speech I made yesterday. It will be recollected that at the time that speech was made honorable members generally were somewhat in a condition of tension, from which tension, certainly, I, in my acute apprehension for the future of this movement, which I have so much at heart, was not free. I do not think that while I was making my remarks there was absent a fire of interjections which was calculated to be rather irritating to any speaker. I am not aware of having consciously said a word which was personal in its application. I am not aware that I made the slightest imputation of motives against any honorable member. What I had to say was said from a feeling of dread lest we were committing ourselves to courses which might frustrate the whole of our work. It was extremely natural to any one having the confidence of the Convention-as I believe I have-that remarks should be made highly expressive of the dread which one felt on such an occasion.
It was from that motive that I spoke, and I believe that, speaking from that motive, what I said will be interpreted in a perfectly generous spirit by the Convention. I have been accused, if I may mention it, in some newspapers of having gone so far as to say that the motion of yesterday was an attempt to get at New South Wales. Now, that is a very cruel remark to make.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not think the honorable member will be in order in referring to newspaper comments on our proceedings.

Mr. BARTON. -

Perhaps, sir, it is better that I should refrain from mentioning any newspaper, but I may say, without referring to any newspaper, that I have carefully read the report of the remarks I made yesterday, and I find that there is not in those remarks one syllable or one sentence that imputes to the representatives of Victoria any design to do anything which was corrupt or dishonest. And, if I may have leave to say so now, I did not accuse them, and the thought of accusing them of any corrupt or dishonest conduct never entered my head. If anything I said last night has, in any respect, wounded the feelings of any honorable member-and I am quite sure that anything I said was not so intended to do-then my regret that even any misunderstanding should cause pain is freely expressed now. I do hope, however, that what I said may not be stripped of its effect by any feeling of irritation which may exist, because the feeling which dictated what I had to say was a feeling entirely in the interest of and for the furtherance of the work of this Convention. Now, I am not about to canvass the American decisions which my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) has cited. I can quite see the effect of the case which he cited from volume 162 of the United States law reports. I can quite see also that, while the normal state of things would be that a state should regulate its own internal traffic, so far as it is purely internal, without interference from any body whatsoever, while at the same time holding itself, as it must, subject to the legislation of the Commonwealth and to the control of the Commonwealth in matters which affect commerce among the states-I can quite see that the position of Victoria would be affected by a strict interpretation of that rule. And in my remarks yesterday I pointed out that, under the circumstances, it was perhaps too much to demand that Victoria should be entirely affected by that rule to the full extent to which the decisions would carry it. What I am concerned in now is that there should be some way out of the difficulty which has arisen. And I feel inclined myself to give support to the suggestion which has been made by my honorable friend (Mr. Grant). I cannot help remembering that Mr. Grant may be regarded as railway expert, that he has considerable practical and technical knowledge on subjects of this kind, which most of us cannot hope to possess, and, therefore, which we cannot communicate to others. I feel, also, that the proposal comes from a peacemaker, and is designed for the furtherance of the work of this Convention without doing injustice to any state. These are the grounds which dispose me, if I can get nothing better, to accept the honorable member's (Mr. Grant's) suggestion, while I do, at the same time, wish it to be understood that I think we should, all of us, be safer and better if, without any of these limitations and endeavours to explain what is, on the whole, clear, we were to rely on the trade and commerce clauses with any such limitation as may be necessary, if there is one necessary, to prevent any absolutely unjust operation on the colony of Victoria. What seems to me to be the difficulty is that Sir George Turner's amendment, if not limited in some way, moved as it is for the purpose of preventing what its mover considers an injustice to Victoria, will inevitably work more danger and more injustice to another colony. It is in that light that I regarded his amendment last night, and I regard it now in the same way, as one of the most serious things that have ever happened during the whole currency of this Convention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not desire that.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am sure that my right honorable friend has not the slightest idea in his thoughts of working any injustice by any proposal he makes. I am only speaking about the effect the amendment may have if it becomes a part of the constitutional law of the country. I understand that Mr. Grant is willing that his amendment should read somewhat in this form:--

Nothing in this Constitution shall prevent the imposition of such railway rates by any state as may be necessary for the development of its territory, if such rates apply equally to goods from other states.

The limitations here are two: First, that a rate is saved from prohibition if it is merely necessary for the development of the territory which belongs to a state, and, secondly, that a rate is saved from prohibition if it applies equally to goods from other states. If the rate on goods carried across the border from one state to another is equal, it is not subject to prohibition, and if in a state a rate is imposed not affecting the interstate traffic, but simply for the purpose of developing a tract of territory, it also is free from prohibition.

Mr. ISAACS. - Who is to decide that question of fact?

Mr. BARTON. - The words seem to make that clear. Why should not the court decide it?

Mr. ISAACS. - It is a political question.

Mr. BARTON. - No, it is a question of evidence as to whether the rate is a necessary developmental rate or not. I take it there would be no difficulty in giving legal effect to a prohibition of that sort, and something of the kind is necessary in order to adjust the relations of the two or three states most intimately affected by these provisions. I am not pretending that I can show that Mr. Grant's amendment is perfect. That is a question which a railway expert can best determine. But that it makes some approximation to justice, that it takes some of the sting out of Sir George Turner's amendment, that it helps to secure for any state immunity from interruption and interference on the part of any body when it is solely engaged in the development of its own internal resources, is, I think, clear. I doubt whether there can be, so far as I am at present advised, any better qualification of the effect of Sir George Turner's amendment than this, and I am very much disposed to support it. If the Right Hon. Sir George Turner will read the amendment with his own, and see the way in which the one bears upon the other, he will, I think, come to the conclusion that this proposal cannot affect his amendment excepting in preventing injustice that might otherwise arise. I hope that some such amendment as Mr. Grant has submitted may be found to be acceptable to the Convention. If it is accepted a step will, at any rate, have been taken towards making peace in our proceedings and restoring what we consider to be the balance of justice. Let it be perfectly understood that we who come from New South Wales are not seeking to interfere with the just development of anybody else's territory. We are not seeking to interfere with the rights and privileges of other states in the management of their own internal traffic. All we ask is that we should be allowed to regulate our internal traffic in our own way, so long its we do not usurp the functions of the Commonwealth. To that we submit. If a rate of ours has the effect of creating an unjust preference as against another state, so far as interstate commerce is concerned, we have all along been and are ready to say at once that we will submit to the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth. We do not consider that we have a right to impose a rate which will necessarily have the effect, or which has the effect, in its operation, of interfering with fair commerce between state and state. But, on the other hand, while we submit to the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth to that extent, we want it to be clearly understood that we do resist any interference with regard to those matters which cannot affect interstate traffic, and which therefore belong to our own traffic solely. That is our position, and as Mr. Grant's amendment goes somewhat to sustain that position, without unduly limiting the hands of the Commonwealth, it is a reasonable proposition that that amendment should be accepted, and it will have my vote.

I desire to ask permission to alter my amendment. I may say that this new amendment goes very much further than anything that has yet been proposed in the way of dealing with the railways, and it may be considered as having been conceived in an entirely federal spirit. It gives to one state all the advantages that another state enjoys. Should any state make any laws or regulations for its own internal traffic, the neighbouring state will get the full advantage of these laws and regulations. This is, of course, a sequel to Sir George Turner's amendment, which makes the Parliament the arbiter in the first instance of all traffic arrangements. That amendment would have been quite sufficient, and the amendment that I propose only makes it a little more explicit, and, I think, a little more federal. Sir George Turner proposes that, in the first instance, the Parliament shall exercise control so far as all regulations relating to rates are concerned. The primal settlement of the rates and of the regulations is to be in the hands of the Federal Parliament. There can be no objection to that. The Federal Parliament will be composed of the representatives of all the states, and we may assume that they will do justice between each state. I have no fear that they will take the New South Wales or the Victorian view. There will be sufficient force in the Parliament to do absolute justice to all parties concerned. We might safely be content with Sir George Turner's amendment, which gives the Parliament power to make any laws and regulations having reference to the traffic on the railways. My amendment simply carries that proposition a little further. It goes to the extent of giving to New South Wales the benefit of any rates imposed in Victoria, and of giving to Victoria the benefit of any rates imposed in New South Wales. Goods could then be sent from Melbourne to any town in New South Wales territory on the same terms and conditions as similar goods sent from any part of New South Wales into Victoria.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

How can that be possibly worked out in practice?

Mr. GRANT. -

The Commonwealth Bill will, under your proposal, make laws and regulations in reference the traffic on the railways, and in doing so they will see that the amendment I propose is given effect to. Therefore, if my amendment find favour with the Convention, I think that the clause as it will then stand will be of a most federal character, in point of fact, it will accomplish the federalizing of the railways to all intents and purposes. Such being the case, I hope my amendment will be accepted by the Convention, and that honorable members will all consider that they have advanced a step further, very much further, than has hitherto been contemplated, and that should this amendment be carried we need trouble very little about the federalization of the railways, because that will be, to a great extent, accomplished. And under the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, the controlling power will be that impartial tribunal, the Parliament of the Commonwealth—a tribunal which we will all respect, and to whose decisions I hope we shall all bow with satisfaction and pleasure. Sir George Turner has asked to whom the reference will be, in case of dispute. Of course, in this, as in all other cases, the reference will be to the High Court, but that will only be a reference on the laws and regulations made by the Federal Parliament. It is not that the High Court would have to frame the laws and regulations, but that any reference to the court would simply be on a dry question of the interpretation of the laws and regulations made by the Federal Parliament. Therefore, I think there should be no objection to the matter standing as it does—that the High Court should be the eventual arbiter in case of dispute, because the court would only be called upon to interpret the views of the Federal Parliament. I therefore ask leave to withdraw the amendment standing in my name, with a view to re-submitting it in a slightly altered form.

Mr. Grant's amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -

I now beg to move-
That we insert, before the word "Notwithstanding," the following words:--
"Nothing in this Constitution shall prevent the imposition of such railway rates by any state as may be necessary for the development of its territory, if such rates apply equally to goods from other states."

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I trust we will adhere to the decision of yesterday. A substantial majority of this Convention agreed that, on this much-vexed question of the rival railway rates between the states, the matter should be left to the sense of justice of the Federal Parliament. That was the amendment carried at the instance of the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria, and although I have heard a good deal said since as to the inequity of doing anything of the sort, I resent the suggestion that the Federal Parliament will be, as it has been termed, a tainted tribunal, or one on which we cannot rely to do justice on a matter of this sort. We have confided much graver questions to the arbitrament of the Federal Parliament. We have granted to them the power—nay, we have imposed on them the duty—of deciding every year how what we must estimate from the first year as a sum of between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000, and annually increasing, shall be distributed among the states. In the matter of that distribution state interests naturally and directly arise, and to suggest that the Parliament, which, at the instance of the Finance Committee, has been intrusted by this Convention with such powers, is likely to be false to its trust when asked to decide a matter of much less consequence, although a matter of considerable importance, seems to me to be asking honorable members to assent to a position which we cannot possibly accept. Either the Federal Parliament is to be trusted, and will be a pure tribunal to decide a matter of this sort, or it is a body which we cannot trust with the much graver issues that we have already resolved to give it power to decide. The question now is the amendment proposed by Mr. Grant, and I can hardly think that the members of the Convention generally recognise what will be the full force and effect of that amendment if carried. It seems to me that it will utterly whittle away the proposition that was assented to yesterday at the instance of Sir George Turner. What did we decide on? That the Federal Parliament should have power to regulate this matter in the interests of justice between the states. What did we intend to prevent specifically? This undue cutting of rates to the extent of drawing from any state trade which properly belongs to it. If we leave the matter in the way it was left after the division on Sir George Turner's Amendments the Federal Parliament will have power to do justice between the states in this respect, but if we carry the amendment now suggested, the question will then be taken away from the final power of decision by the Federal Parliament. The High Court, it seems to me, is, to a considerable extent, introduced by the amendment on a question of policy but, further, the proposal is made plain that if you grant these rates to goods from other states equally with goods which belong to your own state the Federal Parliament will have no power to interfere. Why, sir, these suction rates, as, I think I am justified in calling them, are intended for the purpose of drawing goods from other states on to the lines where those rates prevail, and this amendment simply means that as long as you treat goods from other states with the same liberality as you treat the goods of your own people consigned by rail, the Federal Parliament shall have no power to interfere. Assent to that amendment, and New South Wales can go on doing, in connexion with these matters, what she has been doing in the past, to the detriment, not only of her own railway revenue, but to the injury of trade which, geographically, belongs to other portions of the Commonwealth, and to the injury also of the railway revenue of those states. Are we to be told, sir, that after all the argument which has been addressed to this question, and which resulted in the decision of yesterday, we really did not know what we were voting on, or that we did not properly understand the question? I am of opinion that we did know and understand what we were about, and I trust that honorable members will see that the amendment now proposed means depriving Sir George Turner's amendment, which we carried yesterday, of all practical results. Under these circumstances, I trust we will adhere to the decision that we came to yesterday.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I have already spoken on this matter so fully that I certainly do not propose now to say very much, but I do regret that the Premier of South Australia does not pay some attention to a set of considerations which, although they do not affect his colony, are very serious matters in one of the colonies invited to join in this union. And I must press on my right honorable friend to recollect that the very basis of this attempt at federal union was that, as far as possible, consistently with federal union, the rights of the several states, and the sovereignty of the several states, should be preserved. Indeed, the original resolution, upon which the whole movement was based, spoke of the voluntary surrender of rights and privileges. We have gone largely forward up to this point, with a great deal of success, on these essential lines. We have endeavoured to deal with broad principles, irrespective of the way in which they may affect this or that part of Australia. For the sake of these broad principles we have all been willing to leave the actual working of the Constitution, in any precise direction, to the fortune of party warfare in the constituencies after federation is accomplished. This Convention has refused to take over the railways of the several states. The Convention cannot escape from the consequences of that decision. I do not know how Mr. Kingston voted on the question as to whether the railways should be taken over.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I voted against it.

Mr. REID. -
Then I must press on my right honorable friend that, since he is one of the ardent friends of union, and he has arrived at the conclusion that the railways of the several states should not be taken over by the Federation, he ought in common fairness-

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Are you ripe for it?

Mr. REID. -
My right honorable friend must not overlook the fact that those who refused to accept the financial responsibility for the working of the states, must be very slow in their efforts to deal with the management of the states concerned.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is not the reason.

Mr. REID. -
I have quite enough to do with my right honorable friend (Mr. Kingston) at present, but I am quite prepared to deal with my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) presently. One of my right honorable friends is more than enough for me at a time. I know I need not endeavour to show how the proposal affects New South Wales, in order to quicken Mr. Kingston's ever-ready sense of equity and justice. I have only to come before him, representing, as I do, another colony which has a large railway system, and point out to him that when he is in favour of practically handing over the management of the railways of New South Wales-

Mr. KINGSTON. -
No.

Mr. REID. -
 Practically.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
No.

Mr. REID. -
Because those who can annul your rates-
Mr. KINGSTON. -
When unfair to another state.

Mr. REID. -
Those who can decide on the rates, practically have all the incidental powers of railway management. As one honorable member said here yesterday, if you can control the rate of interest a bank charges on advances, you can control the bank. I feel sure my right honorable friend's (Mr. Kingston's) sense of justice will return to him.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Will you go further and say that if you control the railway rates you control trade?

Mr. REID. -
Well, I think I could say that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Then what is the good of intercolonial free-trade?

Mr. REID. -
What is the good of what?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
What is the good of intercolonial free-trade?

Mr. REID. -
I am not talking about intercolonial free-trade.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I am sure you are not.

Mr. REID. -
I am not talking about inter-state trade. I have said over and over again that I am absolutely in favour of inter-state trade—that is intercolonial, is it not?—even in reference to the rates on the railways being subject to the control of the Federation. My right honorable friend seems to lose his ordinary control, if I may say that of the President of this Convention.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I am not President sitting here, you know.

Mr. REID. -
But my veneration for my friend follows him wherever he goes. Surely he will recollect that, under the general words giving a power to regulate trade and commerce among the states, there is an absolute power in the hands of the Federal Commonwealth to prevent every colony represented in the Federation from placing intercolonial trade at the slightest disadvantage. My right honorable friend cannot deny that.
Either by cutting or raising prices?

Mr. REID. -
Will my right honorable friend deny what I say?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I asked you a question.

Mr. REID. -
Will my honorable friend deny what I say? He will not; because he cannot.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I say it is not clear.

Mr. REID. -
What?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I say it is not clear.

Mr. REID. -
My right honorable friend says it is not clear; although we have had a similar Constitution, with similar words in it, which has been the subject of judicial decisions for 50 or 60 years, all through which the application of these words has been admitted.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Of undercutting.

Mr. REID. -
I am talking of inter-colonial free-trade. My answer to the right honorable gentleman (Mr. Kingston) when he speaks of intercolonial free-trade, is, that we have cheerfully, without any reserve, granted to the federal power absolute control over any rate on our lines which affects intercolonial free-trade-any rate which creates a discrimination in favour of our own people as against people outside our boundaries throughout the Commonwealth. On the same broad principles, which make a uniform Tariff and establish intercolonial free-trade, we have handed over to the Commonwealth absolute power over our internal railways for preventing discrimination between the trade of another state and our own trade. I believe I re-echo the convictions of a majority of the Convention when I say that if it is put in plain black and white that no state shall have any power to establish preferential rates-that is, rates distinguishing between the people of that state and the people of other states, and distinguishing between the trade of a state and the trade of other states-so as to make it certain that, on any internal line, the rates should not be made unduly high in a certain direction in order to prejudice those outside the boundary-the majority of the Convention would agree. If that be so, I am willing to have it placed in black and white in the Constitution, in plain English, and not regard it as a subject to be settled by some accidental decision of the Federal Parliament. I am willing to have it put that no state shall have any right to do these things, and these are the only things of which complaint can be made. The question is, are we prepared to put in the Constitution some plain definite terms, so as to prevent things of this sort being done, or are we going to leave the matter to a political tribunal? I think such a departure would be unprecedented. I do not know of any federal body in the world that assumes the power put in this Constitution with reference to the railways of the states—a power providing that the railways shall be a subject of debate in Parliament. I do not wish at all to repeat what I went over yesterday. All I wish to say is, that if this Convention has made up its mind to adhere to Sir George Turner's amendment, let us have some convenient method of carrying it out. It is no use wasting time over the matter. If there is not a general disposition to deal with the matter on some better terms than those settled by Sir George Turner's amendment, the sooner we know the better. But, so far as I am concerned, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am prepared to go a great way with any honorable member who proposes to put in black and white a power against states to prevent them from having two rates over their lines—one for a certain trade outside their borders, and another for a certain trade inside their borders. I am prepared to absolutely prohibit that, and not to leave it to a court or Parliament to consider; so I am prepared to do away with and prohibit such rates as I believe we have in New South Wales to-day, which make a difference between goods coming up from Albury to Wagga Wagga as compared with goods travelling from Wagga Wagga to Albury, subject always to this condition, which is a legitimate incident of railway rates, that the longer distance goods travel the smaller the charge. Subject to the legitimate operation of that principle, I am perfectly prepared that no such rates should remain, or that we should give the Federal Parliament power to abolish any rate which distinguishes between goods coming from the southern or western districts from another colony. That being so, I wish to ask is more than that asked for by a majority of this Convention? Without taking over the railways is there a greater interference or power of interference asked for with our internal railways and traffic? I believe that if honorable members were polled on these propositions it would be found that the majority are in favour of going so far, and no farther, and that a majority is in favour of putting what we do in a plain proposition, so that it shall bind every one and be understood by all before the Constitution is established. One of the great objections to the form in which the matter stands at present is not only that there is a grave objection to the tribunal, but that a still stronger objection is that these words are so vague that there could be no certainty of a principle upon which a decision could be arrived at.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Will not Mr. Grant's amendment make them more palatable?

Mr. REID. -

I admit that it would be much more palatable.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Will you accept Sir George Turner's amendment and Mr. Grant's?

Mr. REID. -

Of course I cannot accept Sir George Turner's amendment on any terms. I hope that is not surprising to any one who has listened to me for a day or two.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Not to any one who has listened for the last day.

Mr. REID. -

When did I say that I would accept one word of Sir George Turner's amendment? I thought the heat got white yesterday on that subject. All my objections to Sir George Turner's proposition remain, and I cannot accept it in any shape or form. But I am willing to accept the more moderate proposals which have the merit of being definite. Mr. Grant's proposal is an improvement on Sir George Turner's proposal.

Mr. ISAACS. -

He is proposing it as an addendum.

Mr. REID. -

We will go on putting addendum after addendum until everybody gets what he wants. Can I put in my little addendum? If so, I would put it all right. Cannot any one see that trying to settle all these matters in the Federal Convention by definitions—it is not carried out anywhere else—will lead to each one wanting to have his own little addendum and his own little definition attached to the Bill? I hope we shall be able to come to a solution of the matter which will avoid the objections to Sir George Turner's proposal, which first establishes no definite rule, and then leaves the matter to the chances of political warfare. We want to be in a position to go back and tell our electors how they stand on vital matters. I defy any honorable member to go back to his electors and define the position.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is easy enough. It is left to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

To interfere when necessary.
Mr. REID. -

That is the position. My honorable friend can go back cheerfully to his electors, because any railway in his province is at conflict only at one point and with one colony, that is Victoria. Their lines are not affected by the conflicting considerations which the New South Wales railways are. How can I tell the electors of New South Wales that while the Convention declined to grant a single penny of a guarantee against losses arising from our management of our own railways and our own railway traffic, they assume to themselves the right, in the very sweeping language of the right honorable member (Mr. Kingston), of interfering when necessary? We have not yet come under the heel of a lordly interference of that character. When I am dealing with business concerns, involving millions of money, it will be a long time, when dealing with the undoubted rights of our own people and traffic, and our own financial responsibility, before I allow gentlemen whose only responsibility is that of talk to manage our railways. Take them over, and pay for them. That is equitable; you can do what you like with them when you have paid for them. But there is too much of this attempt to take over the benefit of state property, in the shape of railways, when they interfere with trade, without realizing the financial responsibility of the cost. Give me some guarantee that if the railways of Riverina have to stop owing to this interference, when necessary, that the loss which New South Wales has incurred will be made good, and the problem will become an easy one. But I cannot face the problem without some such guarantee. If we at any time had had in this Bill anything which went to the extent of this proposal, I would not express so much surprise, but ever since we began the consideration of this Bill we never had this pretension put forward. I do hope we shall be able to hit upon some form of words which will be free from the objections which New South Wales has so strongly to Sir George Turner's proposition. Very often I find myself advocating what I think is a just consideration to New South Wales, separated from my colleagues and learned friends (Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor). In my opinion, sometimes they have been almost, in their great anxiety for the cause of federation, too easily disposed to look away from the interests of New South Wales. But surely honorable members, who have seen the thoroughly broad attitude which those honorable gentlemen have always shown towards the federal movement, must see the significance of the cause which brings those honorable gentlemen and myself absolutely into line. Honorable members must see that there must be some very strong reason for the leader of the Convention taking up the position which he has taken.

Mr. DOBSON. -
You are the awkward boy. You have put yourself out of line. Mr. Barton supports Mr. Grant's amendment.

Mr. Reid. -
I am talking of Sir George Turner's amendment.

Mr. Dobson. -
We think we will be able to graft this on to Sir George Turner's amendment.

Mr. Reid. -
I will not object to that if you allow us to put in a few words. If you give us our turn I do not mind it; but that is what I am objecting to.

Mr. Higgins. -
One negatives the other.

Mr. Reid. -
There is no doubt the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) will have his turn; what I want is

Mr. Higgins. -
A very unwholesome mixture.

Mr. Reid. -
Yes. Let me point out this in all fairness. The fault of Mr. Grant's much better proposition is that in the Federal Parliament, where New South Wales would have odds of two to one against her, or if Queensland joined the Federation, of three to one, this difficulty would arise in connexion with the railways of Riverina. The question would arise whether those railways were for the development of the resources of Riverina, and how would it be decided? It might well be argued against the operation of the clause in our favour: "No, these rates are not to develop the resources of Riverina. Your railways there are white elephants. They are not wanted, and the rates you charge are intended, not to develop the resources of Riverina, which has been commercially annexed to Victoria, but to keep the trains running." But would not that be one of the most legitimate reasons for establishing low rates? Is it not a vital principle of railway management that rates must be designed so that the trains will pay working expenses and interest upon the cost of constructing the lines? My objection to the proposition of Mr. Grant is that if the tribunal which had to decide the question came to the conclusion that the rates were low simply that the trains might be kept running and the interest paid, they would decide that that was no legitimate reason for them. We should be told that there is a river running down to the land where the just men grow-South Australia-that there are railways to take the resources of Riverina to great outlets.
which are 300 miles nearer than the great outlet in New South Wales, and we should be asked—"How under these circumstances can you say that the maintenance of your railways is necessary for the development of the resources of Riverina?" Even under Mr. Grant's provision our property would be left to the chance view which might be taken of the construction of these words.

Mr. DOBSON. -
By the High Court.

Mr. REID. -
By any court.

Mr. DOBSON. -
With technical evidence before it.

Mr. REID. -
Exactly. No man in the world will put his property, at all events if it is a large one, into the hands of another person, unless that person gives him a guarantee for its security. If we are given such a guarantee, I will withdraw my opposition to these provisions. If not, I would point out that we cannot go back to our colonies unless we can assure the electors that our railway system will not be ruinously affected by federation.

Mr. HOLDER. -
The experts say that the abolition of these cut-throat rates would largely increase the railway revenue.

Mr. REID. -
Of course, I do not pretend to be an expert, but we have a few experts in New South Wales, and I have had the benefit of their advice. Quite apart from the matter to which my honorable friend refers, and looking at the lines merely as something which we have to keep going, I can assure the honorable gentleman that under these provisions there is no certainty that our railways will not be thrown upon our hands as worthless.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
How can that be?

Mr. REID. -
I really do not know, except that that is the best possible opinion upon the subject. My right honorable friend is a sort of political Almighty, who is able to solve all these troubles in a moment. Unfortunately, I cannot consult him; he is not my engineer-in-chief for railways. I have to take the advice of the New South Wales experts.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Then it must be a very barren country, that is all I can say.
Mr. REID. -
That is not all you can say. You are always saying more than that. For instance, you are always telling us about the revenue and the trade of another bit of country. I am dealing with the trade and the railways of Riverina.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is a fertile country.

Mr. REID. -
Yes, it is. The right honorable member is quite correct, although I believe he has never seen the country.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
And yet your railways will not pay.

Mr. REID. -
I do not find that my right honorable friend's interjections, are bringing me to any satisfactory point. All I can tell him is that, in spite of his expression of opinion, I am advised in a different direction by those who know something about the working of our railways. I regret that I cannot assume the free and easy mind which my right honorable friend has in regard to this matter. Since the provision of the honorable member (Mr. Grant) is not entirely satisfactory to us, I would infinitely prefer to see the whole matter deferred for more mature consideration. It does not seem to me that we are now any nearer a friendly settlement than we were at first, and I think we all desire a friendly settlement. After what my right honorable friend has said, I am compelled to again state the position of New South Wales. I should be very glad if we could have some more time to look calmly over this matter and confer together, in the hope that we may hit, not upon vague questions to be determined, we do not know how, but upon certain definite rules which will govern the traffic of our railways so far as it affects the interests of sister states. If we could put definite principles into the Constitution instead of leaving all these matters to be settled afterwards, it would be a great improvement. I do not pretend to have any weight as a lawyer, but I say, unhesitatingly, that if the Premier of Victoria were to refer his amendment to three of the leading members of the bar of this colony, together with the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins), at least two of them would say that his amendment is the less likely to secure the object which he has in view.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) does not say that.

Mr. REID. -
Then you have a good man on your side; but I know some others who are of a contrary opinion. At any rate, the right honorable gentleman will admit that he has laid down no principle for the guidance of the tribunal.

Mr. GORDON. -

Except that of justice.

Mr. REID. -

I have never met with that principle—at least, not since I have been here.

Mr. GORDON. -

So I gathered from your position.

Mr. REID. -

Quite right; I am a martyr. Surely the honorable gentleman knows to what chaos the affairs of a country would be reduced if you wiped out all its statute law and said to the Judges—"Let justice be your maxim; apply the principle of justice to every case you try." After a year it would be found that it was wiser to lay down definite principles for the guidance of Judges, and infinitely safer, both in the interest of those seeking justice and of those administering it. The advantage of the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) was that it laid down a principle.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Some of us cannot understand why New South Wales should object to the amendment of the Premier of Victoria. It gives you all you want.

Mr. REID. -

I only object to it because its wording is such that any mistake is possible under it, and the odds being two to one against me I will not risk the possibility of a mistake. If I were compelled to take risks, I do not know that I would not as soon take them under these words as under any others that could be devised. But I absolutely object, in the interests of federation and of the good feeling, not only of the people of the colonies but the members of the Federal Parliament, to any more of these burning questions than are absolutely necessary being left to be settled by the Federal Parliament. We have, of course, to leave the Tariff matter to be dealt with by the Parliament, because there is no other tribunal that can deal with that. But with reference to applying the principles of justice, I think it will be better to put a just principle in the Constitution than to leave the matter to chance, because the effect upon the people will be bad enough for us all if we have to say that vital matters are left to chance, which are capable of having definite principles applied to them. Cannot we put in this Constitution one or two principles to meet the case?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

What would you suggest?

Mr. REID. -

I should be happy to confer with my right honorable friend for the purpose of agreeing upon some principles which we could embody in a form of words and allow them to be put in the Constitution. Then we should all know how we stood. I can tell the Convention that this matter affects the revenue of New South Wales to the extent of about £250,000 a year—that is to say, the railways which will come within the scope of this clause would affect our revenue to that extent. We cannot leave great interests like that in such a position. I do hope that we shall come to an agreement. It is a difficult matter, and we know that difficult matters are better fought out after some preliminary consideration than in any other way. I, simply in the interests of federation, feeling that if matters are left as they are a very vital position will be left in an unsatisfactory state, assure my honorable friends of my readiness to assent to any proposition for a conference upon the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not want to unduly limit the debate, but I feel bound to point out that the clause inserted on the motion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner is not now under discussion at all. It has been inserted in the Bill, and no one has moved to strike it out, which, indeed, could not be done at the present stage. The only question we have before the committee for discussion now is the amendment proposed by Mr. Grant.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to make an alternative suggestion to the amendment of Mr.
Grant, and I do so because Mr. Reid has said that certain general principles might be put into the Constitution, and I make the suggestion as a contribution to that effect. Mr. Reid has said that he knows of no Constitution in the world in which an attempted interference with internal traffic, such as has been proposed and inserted at the instigation of the Victorian representatives, has been attempted. May I remind the Convention that that has been done in Germany, where the interests in regard to railways were much more difficult to deal with than the railway question is here? Prussia, I think, owns something like 15,000 miles of Government lines, of which it had some at the time of the establishment of the German Constitution, and a considerable mileage of private lines were held in Prussia irrespective of the Government lines. But what was done there? They did not stick to existing interests and say—"You are not to surrender a single thing." They made a very large federal surrender. I am not saying this to the prejudice of the position of the representatives of New South Wales, because I voted with them in the last two divisions in the interests of what I considered to be fairness, but I make the statement for the guidance of the Convention; and I should like to refer more particularily to what has been done in Germany under circumstances affecting interests far more difficult to deal with than ours. The forty-second article of the German Constitution states that-

The Governments of the federal states bind themselves, in the interest of general commerce, to have the German railways managed as one system, and for this purpose to have all new lines constructed and equipped according to a uniform plan.

Becoming more specific, the forty-fifth article of the Constitution provides-

The empire shall have control over the tariff of charges.

These are very significant words-"control over the tariff of charges"-affecting both Government and private lines. But the Constitution becomes still more specific and more interfering with state and individual rights as it goes on. It provides-

It shall endeavour to cause-

1. Uniform regulations to be speedily introduced on all German railway lines.

2. The tariff to be reduced and made uniform as far as possible, and particularly to secure low long distance rates for the transport of coal, coke, wood, minerals, stone, salt, crude iron, manure, and similar articles, as demanded by the interests of agriculture and industry. It shall endeavour in the first instance to introduce a one pfennig tariff as soon as practicable.

So I say that there is in Germany a limit to private and Government rates on railways which I suppose would be simply shocking to some of the representatives of New South Wales, if embodied to the same extent in this Constitution. But I desire to make a suggestion which I think is really just, is not an interference with New South Wales, arid is fair to Victoria. I say that an amendment of this sort might be put in without reasonable objection by the representatives of either of the states concerned:-

The Parliament, in any law providing in respect of long-distance rates for the execution and maintenance upon the railways within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce, shall provide for, as far as possible, uniform rates, in proportion to the distance, irrespective of state limits of the place in which the traffic originated from the place of consignment.

The effect of this is, that as the law, as expressed in the first part of the amendment, must be in respect to the trade and commerce under subsection (1) of clause 52, it will not deal with internal traffic; and, again, that the distance can be fixed, not from the terminal point of the railway, where the shipment was made, but from where the traffic originated-from, for instance, the squatter's residence, the wool-shed in fact. How can New South Wales think that the passage of such an amendment as that will be in derogation of her state interests, coloured by her federal sense of what we are going to do? We cannot view these interests merely as state interests, because the Federal Constitution involves to some extent a subordination for greater co-ordination of those interests to the welfare of the whole. By passing such an amendment you will be giving Victoria a fair advantage from long distance rates by which she is deprived by her geographical limits. By not limiting the place of consignment to the railway you will put your rates far beyond the terminal point. It seems to me that this proposal would be free from the objection which applies to Mr. Grant's amendment.
Undoubtedly it would be a condition under Mr. Grant's amendment that the legislation should be for the development of the territory of the state. Now, that is open to two meanings. It would be the subject of contention in the Federal Parliament, and would, perhaps, have to be referred to the Supreme Court, where the necessity for evidence upon the point in dispute would be enormous. But the suggestion I make is absolutely free from that objection.
I think our friends from Victoria could not complain under the suggestion I have made, nor would there be any ground of complaint on the part of the representatives of New South Wales.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

In consequence of the suggestion you have made, sir, as to the matters we have been discussing being somewhat out of order, I will refrain from replying to the speech of my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) with regard to the various matters he has dealt with. I will simply say this: So far as I understand, he will not, under any circumstances, with or without Mr. Grant's amendment, accept the clause which was passed at my instance yesterday. If he had been prepared to accept that clause, I should have been prepared to endeavour to meet him with regard to Mr. Grant's amendment. My objection to this amendment-

Mr. REID. -

Will you allow me to put in one little addendum?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, if you will allow me to draft it for you.

Mr. REID. -

On my instruction?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I will draft it for you.

Mr. REID. -

On my instruction?
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I will draft it satisfactorily to you in three or four words.

Mr. REID. -
Very well.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The proposed addendum to the clause we dealt with yesterday provides that-

Nothing in this Constitution shall prevent the imposition of such railway rates by any state as may be necessary for the development of its territory.

I do not want to prevent the imposition of any rates which are honestly for the development of the territory, but I do not want in these words to have a power where it might be colorably alleged that the rate was for the development of the territory, whereas, in truth and in fact, it was for an entirely different purpose. The great difficulty I see with regard to these words, if we accept them, is this: We have declared that we will leave the Federal Parliament to say whether any rates imposed by a state are undue, unreasonable, or unjust to any state, and, if they be, then there is power to prohibit them. Mr. Grant's amendment puts a limitation that I would not object to as a direction, or an instruction, or a commandment to the Federal Parliament. My honorable friend, I believe, intends it as such, but, as a matter of fact, it is not. The wording, as I have read it, would leave it absolutely open to this course of proceeding: New South Wales might have made a rate which was objected to by Victoria; the Federal Parliament, after full discussion, after hearing all that can be said, after making inquiries, either by a select committee or by an Inter-State Commission, to get the fullest information, might have declared that it was not necessary for the development of its territory, and that therefore it was a bad rate. But there would be nothing to prevent an appeal from that decision to the High Court. The High Court would have a perfect right, it seems to me, under the wording of his amendment, to re-investigate the whole matter, perhaps by a jury—a jury it may be from the state interested, or before the Judges alone, as inquiring into a matter of fact. They would have to go into the whole of the circumstances—the rights of the producers; the rights of the merchants in different colonies; the rights of the railways as railways; and a large number of other questions. And then, on the facts before them, they might say that the two Houses of Parliament were absolutely wrong in the decision they had come to, and that this particular rate was honestly for the development of the territory. They would over-rule, on what seems to me to be clearly not a judicial but a political question, the decision of the Federal Parliament. Can we put into the Constitution any words which will allow that to be done in a matter of this kind?
Mr. REID. -

You admit that it would be a political question to the Federal Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It would be a political question for the Federation to decide.

Mr. REID. -

Well, the odds are against you, like the Irish jury.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

All along, those who have opposed the clause we passed yesterday have had only one objection to raise to it, namely, that they cannot in a matter of such serious importance to New South Wales trust the honesty and justice of the Federal Parliament. That is the one objection they have harped on both yesterday and to-day. To endeavour to meet my honorable friends, if they will come a little of the road to meet us, and do away with that difficulty which I see, I, personally, will raise not the slightest objection to this addendum, if it is made perfectly clear that the question of whether it is or is not for the development of the territory is to be decided by what I believe to be the proper tribunal—the Federal Parliament. Mr. Grant, I understand, intends his amendment to be in that direction. He could never for a moment think that we would give such a power to the High Court as to over-rule the Federal Parliament on pure questions of political facts.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is a direction to the Parliament in the first instance.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And no more.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If Parliament goes outside the lines laid down in the Constitution then the court can interfere.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then my honorable friend fairly admits the whole of my contention.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If you strike out the words proposed it would have no value.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The whole effect of this amendment will be to transfer the decision of that important question from the one tribunal to the other—that New South Wales is to have two chances. It is to have a chance in the Federal Parliament, and, having failed there, it is to have a second shot by way of appeal to the High Court. I think the majority of this committee will not agree to that.

Mr. BARTON. -
Do you mean to say that applies to New South Wales alone?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Certainly not; I am taking it by way of example. It will apply to all colonies in exactly the same position. New South Wales seems to be anxious to get into that position. The other colonies are not anxious to get into that position. If my honorable friends can see their way to consent to the insertion of a few words so that it may read "by any state as may in the opinion of the Parliament be necessary for the development of its territory," I will not object. I think that is carrying out my own view, that if the rate is honestly for the development of the territory, then a state should, and I believe would, under the clause we have passed, be allowed to carry that rate into effect. I am perfectly content to leave it to the Federal Parliament to say whether it is for the development of the country, or whether it is simply, as was put in some of the amendments to-day, for the development of the traffic.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

The vote I gave yesterday was only a tentative vote. I preferred the amendment moved by Sir George Turner to that moved by Mr. Higgins, but now we are placed in this position—that the leader of the Convention and the Premier of New South Wales tell us emphatically that they can, on no conditions, accept the proposition which we carried. If, in lieu of that one, I can get one which appeals to my common sense as reasonable, and which I hope will give satisfaction, perhaps, to New South Wales and also to Victoria, I leave myself free to vote for any further amendment which may be proposed leading to that issue. I notice that the Attorney-General of Victoria, with that acuteness which we all admit he possesses, smiles at the position which I am placing myself in.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No. I will tell you what he said.

Mr. HOWE. -

I am very glad to find that I have unintentionally done my learned friend an injustice.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You said that you were prepared to accept any alteration which would be fair to all the colonies, and he said-'So are we.'
proposition from a business point of view, knowing what politics sometimes lead to, and the votes which sometimes are arrived at, we cannot altogether condemn the action he has taken. The position of New South Wales is peculiar owing to her remotest terr

They will be there to take a personal interest in our affairs.

Mr. HOWE. -
The Attorney-General of Victoria will admit that-

If self the wavering balance shake
'Tis rarely right adjusted.

That is the fear that animates the Premier of New South Wales. The producers should have the blessings of this intercolonial free-trade afforded to them from the centre of Federated Australia to its circumference. But we cannot deny to each state the right to charge differential rates for the purpose of developing its own territory. The difficulty is that, on the long lines of railway belonging to New South Wales, and abutting on to our borders, the differential rate becomes a preferential rate, and we feel it.

Mr. BARTON. -
We have never objected to any preferential rate being stopped.

Mr. HOWE. -
I will put myself in the position of a producer of New South Wales. I will say that I reside somewhere near the Victorian border. New South Wales imposes differential rates to attract trade to Sydney, but the natural port geographically is Melbourne. As a producer under intercolonial free-trade my best market may lie just over the borders of Victoria. I should not like New South Wales to impose a rate which would prohibit me from sending my produce over, say, the 100 or 150 miles of railway which abuts on the Victorian border. I think the producer can claim protection against anything of that kind, and if Mr. Reid or the leader of the Convention will agree to an amendment that will give them such protection, I think I can see my way clear to vote for it. When the right time came, I should then reconsider the vote I gave on Sir George Turner's amendment. I know very well that it is useless for the Convention to insist on a proposition which the representatives of New South Wales tell us they could not recommend to their people. We want federation, and surely we are not going to allow a matter of this kind to part us. Surely, amongst the able body of men assembled here there are brains enough to devise some provision that will be just and acceptable to New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia. I have drawn out an amendment, which I would put as a proviso to the amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. O'Connor. It is as follows:-

Provided that no state shall charge an unduly high rate on goods moving from one state to any part of another state.
   I only throw this out as a suggestion for the consideration of honorable members.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
   You will have to define what an unduly high rate is.

Mr. HOWE. -
   That is a matter that the Inter-State Commission would have to determine. It is useless to try to thrust a proposition upon the representatives of New South Wales when such men as our leader and Mr. Reid tell us that they will not recommend any Bill containing such a provision to their people. I presume that they do not make that statement without duly considering the position.

Mr. BARTON. -
   It would not make any difference if we did recommend it.

Mr. HOWE. -
   No, you are satisfied that your people would not accept it. We must, therefore, try to compromise. Unless we do this we cannot during the present session of the Convention hope to bring the matter to a satisfactory conclusion. If the Premier of South Australia will weigh the words I have uttered, and will apply that great mind and brain of his to solving the problem, I have no doubt that an amendment may be proposed that will meet the case, and will bring the conflicting colonies together.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
   I beg to move-
   That the amendment be amended by the insertion, after "may," of the words "in the opinion of the Parliament."
   Without this alteration I do not think the amendment will have the effect that Mr. Grant desires.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -
   I do not know that I can accept the amendment, as it altogether alters the effect of the clause. The clause agreed to on the motion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner makes the Parliament the originator in all matters of railway rates and regulations. Under my amendment a state must make its regulations in accordance with the laws and regulations previously passed by Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -
   The question is whether the Parliament or the High Court is to determine whether a rate is made for purposes of development or not.

Mr. GRANT. -
In the case of dispute I would rather have the authority of Parliament, which would be a much more satisfactory tribunal than the Supreme Court. I do not, however, think that the words the Right Hon. Sir George Turner proposes to add are necessary, because Parliament would have supreme power in the making of laws and regulations. And if the state made a law or regulation which conflicted with one previously adopted by the Federal Parliament, it would be pronounced by the High Court to be bad and vicious. Therefore, I do not see the necessity for the alteration of my amendment which Sir George Turner now proposes; but, at the same time, I say unreservedly that if the sole object were to deal with such questions, I should certainly prefer the Federal Parliament rather than the High Court.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The difference between the two positions is this: If you insert the words of Sir George Turner's amendment, the matter is then in the discretion of the Federal Parliament alone. The Parliament can form any opinion it likes, and is responsible to no one. Whatever opinion it may come to cannot be considered wrong, and although the rate in question may be absolutely necessary, as demonstrated over and over again, the Parliament can refuse to consider it necessary, with this result, that the very evil which we, who were against Sir George Turner's proposal carried yesterday, complained of handing over the management of railways practically to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, while leaving their ownership in the states—would be carried a step further by the amendment which Sir George Turner has just submitted. I do not think that Mr. Grant desires that. I do not think that an amendment designed to prevent what was characterized as the odious operation of Sir George Turner's proposal of yesterday should be frustrated in this way. I do not think it can be Mr. Grant's intention to let that provision be altered so as to assume the same direction as the provision whose evil consequences it was framed to obviate.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If Sir George Turner's amendment is not carried, the Supreme Court could overrule the solemn decision of Parliament on this question.

Mr. BARTON. -

Let my honorable and learned friend apply that principle still further, and then, when Parliament makes a law, we will find him arguing that the High Court ought not to determine the meaning of that law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Oh, no; that is a very different thing.

Mr. BARTON. -

A very different thing, but, in the opinion of the honorable member, a difference that does not apply to the construction of this provision.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I would apply the same construction to this provision if it be passed, but I am giving reasons why it should not be passed.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the honorable member says that under this provision, if passed, the High Court could not over-ride the decision of Parliament, my answer to him is that we want to extract that evil from the provision.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Mr. Grant never intended to do that, I am sure.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think he did, because when he was making his speech on his amendment, he said the High Court would be the arbiter in case of dispute. Mr. Grant spoke in favour of leaving the final decision to the High Court. Of course, he may have been a little shaken in his determination by what my right honorable friend advanced, but I hope he will not be, on reconsideration of the matter. I desire to point out to him, and to honorable members generally, that the effect of adopting Sir George Turner's present amendment would be to put into this provision the very evil we complained of in Sir George Turner's proposal of yesterday, and, indeed, it would simply intensify that evil, as far as New South Wales is concerned. Instead of having an ameliorating effect on us, it would simply amount to jumping on us. That is the only phrase to apply to it. I hope we shall find a way out of this difficulty.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Not by talking about jumping on you.

Mr. BARTON. -

I hope the honorable member will not be too delicate about a matter of that sort, because he is an old parliamentarian, and he knows that in Parliament we use figurative expressions.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

He had better not try to jump on you.

Mr. BARTON. -

So long as he gave me an opportunity of reversing the operation, I should not mind so much. I do not think that we shall find any way out of the difficulty by carrying Sir George Turner's present amendment, because I know, of my own knowledge, that it would intensify the difficulty.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If Mr. Grant's amendment is carried without my present amendment it will kill the clause we passed yesterday.

Mr. BARTON. -
I wish it would, but I do not think it will. Mr. Grant's amendment merely amounts to making one exception on the provision which Sir George Turner carried yesterday. It means this: That while Parliament may forbid preferences and discriminations when it deems them to be undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any state, a rate shall not be construed to be undue, unreasonable, or unjust, when made by a state if it is necessary for the development of the territory of that state, and if it applies equally to goods from other states. That is the whole effect it has on Sir George Turner's clause. If it had the effect of completely overturning Sir George Turner's clause, I should be very pleased, but I cannot honestly say that it has more than the effect I have pointed out. If this amendment of Sir George Turner is carried, it simply repeats the trouble in the clause which was passed at the instance of the right honorable gentleman yesterday. Our objection will be intensified by putting similar words in this amendment, because they will deprive the provision of its ameliorating effect, and leave it entirely barren. As far as we who represent New South Wales are concerned, it will be simply offering us dead sea fruit. I hope that better counsels than these will prevail, because I am myself relying on the sense of justice of the whole Convention, and I am not at all with those who think we are trying to take any undue advantage of each other. Gentlemen coming from different colonies cannot be expected to see the same thing through the same pair of spectacles, and, therefore, one can be very well excused for not seeing this matter in the same light as some other members of the Convention. But we may be able to arrive at something which will accommodate our varying views, something which we can take back to our constituents without fear of the rej

Mr. ISAACS. -

If it is not carried, it will leave Victoria in exactly the same position of unfairness that she was in before.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think so. How can there be unfairness so long as the rates apply equally to goods coming from other states?

Mr. ISAACS. -

It means a fight before the Supreme Court in every case.

Mr. BARTON. -

Let us just consider that? Is not that an argument which would entitle us to strike out one-half of the provisions of this Bill? When any law is made for the regulation of trade and commerce, if it in any respects exceeds, or is thought to exceed, the authority given by the Constitution, that can be taken to the High Court, and if any law made under the 37 powers contained in clause 52 exceeds the rights conferred by that clause, is it not also open to be taken to the Supreme Court? And must it not be open for the protection of the individual and the states? The same principle is applied to this clause, but objection is raised here to any matter in dispute being taken to the Supreme Court, when no similar objection is raised in respect of the rest of the provisions of this Constitution. I think that that is enough to dispose of Mr. Isaacs' objection. I hope that this amendment will not be persisted in, because it will be taken in other quarters as rubbing in what was done yesterday. That is the meaning that will be put on it. I am not saying anything in this respect but what I know myself, and I am sure my honorable friends will credit me with telling them what I really believe in this matter. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not be persisted in. Rather than that should be done, I would like to see a little delay. Rather than that we should have any trouble of the kind, it would be better if some of us were to consider the matter together, and see if we could not adjust our views, so as to do justice amongst the states. I should be quite willing, if a majority of honorable members desire to see this matter considered at a sort of consultation or conference, or desire to see a postponement of the clause until after the new clauses were dealt with. In the meantime, any asperity remaining will have cooled down, and we should be able to smile at each other, as Sir George Turner and myself are smiling at each other now. We have been talking a very long time about this matter, but no time is too long to avert disaster, and nothing but disaster will follow unless some means are taken to bring more closely together those who hold such very doubtful opinions on the subject.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Supposing the whole thing could be decided by the High Court or an Inter-State Commission?

Mr. BARTON. -

If the matter could be decided by the High Court it would have a very different aspect. But instead of leaving it to the High Court, we have left it to Parliament, which might vary as time went on, and might be the scene of combinations for the purpose of expressing what otherwise Parliament would not express.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Would you accept an Inter-State Commission?

Mr. BARTON. -

The clause provides for an Inter-State Commission. If Sir George Turner will consent to submit a proposition in reference to an Inter-State Commission, showing in what way he proposes to limit the powers which may be conceded to it, and if we could accept that proposition, his clause would no longer be necessary.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am trying to meet you by departing from my own idea.

Mr. BARTON. -

We will never find a basis of adjustment in Sir George Turner's clause, and no one says that with more reluctance than I do. No one regrets more bitterly than I the amount of time consumed in this debate, but, if we are to have a state of things that will not be disastrous to the desire of every colony for federation, the best plan is to take time for consideration.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There will have to be another Convention, because Sir John Forrest and the Western Australian delegates are going away next week.

Mr. BARTON. -

There only remains the inter-state clause, which could be postponed with the present clause, and there is nothing between but the public debts clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That will take some little time.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The clause as amended cannot be postponed. But if all the amendments are withdrawn, they can be proposed by way of new clauses.

Mr. BARTON. -

I take it there will be no objection to that. Sir George Turner's clause stands as having been inserted in the Bill, and the remaining clauses are those of Mr. Grant, Mr. O'Connor, and Mr. Wise.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Mr. Wise's proposal has not been put.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then there are only two proposals before the Chair. I understand Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Grant have no objection to temporarily withdraw their proposals in order that the suggestion of the Chairman may be carried out. It only remains for Sir George Turner to withdraw the few words at present, on the understanding that there will be another opportunity of bringing them forward.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

What do you mean by another opportunity?

Mr. BARTON. -

When we consider the new clauses.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We will never have the matter in our minds so clearly as we have now.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
Take your beating.

Mr. BARTON. -
Do not talk about taking a beating. No one will deny that I can take a beating as far as it affects my own interests, but, as it affects the whole interests of federation, no man ought to take a beating in the sense my friend suggests. I commend the suggestion of the Chairman, because I believe it will lead to the clause being considered before Sir John Forrest and his colleagues will have to leave; whereas, if we leave it till the recommittal stage, they will have gone to a certainty before the matter can be reached.

The CHAIRMAN. -
May I suggest that Sir George Turner, Mr. Grant, and Mr. O'Connor ask leave to withdraw their amendments, and that then the first part of the clause as originally proposed be inserted in the Bill? We go on then and finish the next three clauses, and then we go back to the reconsideration of clauses.

Mr. BARTON. -
These can be proposed as new clauses at the stage we are approaching. There will be the public debts clause, and a few new clauses between, and that will give time for the reconsideration of this matter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Mr. Reid has said he will not accept my clause under any circumstances. That being so, I believe from my experience of previous conferences that my proposal would be hopeless.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not suppose any formal proceeding is necessary. The more formal a proceeding is the less likely is it to be successful. I suggest that the movers of amendments should lay their heads together and see if they cannot agree on something. I am sure nobody would be more willingly to do that than Sir George Turner. Any other course would put the whole matter off until after the Western Australian delegates have left.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I join in the suggestion that Mr. Barton has made, and only wish to add that, instead of the carrying out of the suggestion resulting in any delay, it will really be a saving of time. If this clause be postponed until after the new clauses, we shall reach the matter sooner and more effectually than if it were left a matter to be dealt with on reconsideration. If the position of New South Wales is unchanged, and they decline to accept Sir George Turner's amendment, I presume they would have to reconsider this clause.

Mr. BARTON. -
They would have to.

Mr. SYMON. -
I mean we should have a vote arrived at with the accession of the strong feeling we have already seen, whereas, if we calmly and quietly let the thing stand over, not to a fixed time, but till after the new clauses have been dealt with, we may arrive at a discussion of the point tomorrow.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
What will be gained by getting at it tomorrow?

Mr. SYMON. -
We are all anxious to arrive at a conclusion. There is no element, I am sure, of hostile feeling on the subject; at least I hope not. It is a mere question of arriving at a form of words to carry out the intention we all wish to give effect to. I put that as strongly and emphatically as I can. I have stated my own objections to Sir George Turner's amendment, and I do not want to deal with the matter again. I hope we shall arrive at something which will intrust to the Federal Parliament the settlement of this matter on a basis agreeable to every one.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I thought it was arranged that we should sit until half-past five.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
Since I mentioned half-past five there has been a strong disposition to rise at five, and since then we have risen at five. I therefore do not propose to ask honorable members on this occasion to sit for the extra half-hour. I think it would be very much better to sit until half-past five on those days when we do not sit at night. It is regarded as a severe strain to do so on those days when we have night sittings.

[The Chairman left the chair at two minutes past five o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at thirty-five minutes past seven o'clock p.m.]

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I shall be sorry if my rising to say a very few words should defer for any length of time coming to, a decision upon this matter. I regret that some arrangement has not been come to which could have been accepted by all, although, probably, not satisfactory to any particular colony. I regret, also, that during the debate we should have had so many expressions of opinion as to the result of the voting which has already taken place, which may unduly influence honorable members. We are here to do the best we can-to apply ourselves to the best of our judgment to the various matters that come before us. It does not assist matters when we hear - shall I call them threats - at any rate, strong expressions that if this does not pass, or that if something else is passed, there will be a failure of the project upon which we are engaged. I am here at very great inconvenience, and I am very anxious to get away as soon as possible. If I thought for a moment that any decision which we might arrive at, or any decision that we have arrived at, would result in this great work being a failure, I should have very little hesitation in leaving at a very early opportunity. But I take it that is not what we are here for.

We are here to frame the Constitution as best we can. When we see the work completed it will then be time for us to express opinions as to whether it will be acceptable to this or that particular colony. After all, we are in committee now, and if the decisions we arrive at are such that they do not commend themselves to honorable members there will be another opportunity for recommitting the Bill, and bringing up the question which does not meet with our approval. I have followed this debate as an onlooker, taking a great interest in the matter; but still it is not one in which my colony is particularly interested at the present time. It seems to me that a great change has come over this Convention since we met in Adelaide. At that time we had high-sounding, patriotic speeches; we were all desirous of framing a Constitution which would be worthy of this great continent which have a right to call our own. No localism or parochialism was apparent at that time, but, as months have gone by, localism and parochialism have come very largely to the front, especially in one or two matters during our sittings in Melbourne. That is especially the case, I think, with regard to the question now before us. It was an unfortunate circumstance, I think-and I have expressed this opinion before-that the meeting of the Convention in Sydney should have occurred so close to the general elections in Victoria, and I think it is particularly to be regretted that the Convention should be holding its final sitting here almost immediately preceding the general elections in New South Wales. We must all recognise the difficulty that Members of Parliament have in debating questions with the sword of Damocles in the shape of a general election hanging just over their heads. We must therefore take cum grano salis the fears expressed by honorable members who are so close to a general election.

Mr. REID. -
Would you like that to be said of yourself?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not know; the right honorable member has said a good many things that I did not like.
Mr. REID. -
But would you like that to be said of you?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I am saying what I believe, and I think it is reasonable; do not you?

Mr. REID. -
I think it is an unworthy thing to say.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Is it not reasonable?

Mr. REID. -
It is reasonable to a certain mind.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
My friends from Victoria have not taken exception to the statement so far as they are concerned. But if there is anything in what I have said that the right honorable member regards as offensive, I shall at once withdraw it. I am not saying it with that object at all.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
And the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) said something of the same kind in Sydney.

Mr. REID. -
Surely we have a sense of responsibility quite apart from general elections.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Did not you suggest something about the general election in Victoria when we were at Sydney?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I think that all through the framing of this Constitution Bill, from the time when it was first drafted and approved of in 1891 up to the present time, all the speeches we have heard have referred to freedom of trade and intercourse between all the colonies as one of the greatest blessings—indeed, the greatest boon—that we would acquire when we become a Federated Continent. We all understood, and I think we have all expressed, that after Australia was federated trade would be allowed to go free and untrammelled—that the barriers of Custom-houses would be removed, and that trade would go in the direction that it thought best—that is, in the direction which was most beneficial, without being trammelled by Tariffs and barriers of Custom-houses.

Mr. REID. -
We are all with you there.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Now, we all know that one of the greatest battles that have been going on for many years between the four colonies which adjoin each other is the battle of the railway tariffs, which has been carried on to an extraordinary height by the desire of each colony to get as much of the trade of its neighbours as possible. We know that legislation in Queensland has been passed with the object of preventing the traffic going to New South Wales, where exceptional advantages were given, and with the view of taking it to Brisbane. We know that Victoria for years past, and at the present time, has given inducements for railway traffic away up to Bourke and all over Riverina, and also that New South Wales has been doing the same thing. And I do not think that I can acquit South Australia of this either. She, too, has been doing her best to get as much trade as possible in the direction of Adelaide. No doubt it has been to the advantage of the producers, but this advantage has been given to them at the expense of the whole community. I do not suppose that the railway revenue has benefited by these low rates, the great object of which has been to draw trade to certain centres—Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, and Adelaide. A very unfair competition has been the result of this system. I should like now to refer to a remark made by the Premier of New South Wales in regard to the railways of Riverina. We know that the lines of railways from Junee westward are not very extensive.

Mr. Reid. -

One is 160 miles in length.

Sir John Forrest. -

That is not a very great distance. The right honorable member has told us over and over again that if the control of these matters is left to the Federal Parliament these railways will be useless. I interjected, because I could not understand that reasoning, that this was a fertile country. It cannot be said of a fertile country which has good rivers running through it that any railway there will be idle. Surely railways running through fertile country would not be useless, whatever laws were passed.

Mr. Reid. -

If a railway does not pay working expenses it is a bad line.

Sir John Forrest. -

These railways will carry the produce of the district, whether it goes to Sydney or whether it comes to Melbourne. All the produce that is carried upon them now will continue to be carried on them for all time.

Mr. Reid. -

I am sorry that I did not let you have a chat with our Chief Commissioner for Railways.

Sir John Forrest. -

I have looked at the map, and I can see that all the traffic from the Riverina district goes to Junee, and from there north to Sydney or south to Melbourne. The traffic will continue to travel over these railways even if the Federal Parliament is empowered to say to the New South Wales Government: "You shall not carry produce at rates which injure another colony." The Premier of New South Wales said that the Convention had refused to take the responsibility of the railways, and that, therefore, we must not in any way interfere with their management. I interjected: "Not for that reason." The reason why I did not vote for the taking over of the railways was because I regard the railways of Western Australia—and I think the same remark will apply to the railways of all the colonies—as the life-blood of the community. They afford means of transit and open up territory. What is more, they are, as a rule, great producers of revenue. I do not know of any other colony, with the exception perhaps of one, where the state railways are not a great asset. I know that in our colony the railways are one of our great revenue-producing instruments. But that was not the reason why I voted against the proposal. I do not think any one voted against it because he was afraid of the responsibility of taking over the railways. As self-supporting and reproductive works, they would be amongst the best assets the Commonwealth could have. Taking the whole of the railways of Australia, they are not only self-supporting, but also reproductive, and, therefore, my honorable friend was altogether wrong when he said that we were afraid for the Commonwealth to take over responsibility for the railways. I would vote tomorrow for taking over all the railways of the colonies, and not be afraid of the responsibility; but the reason why I voted against the provision was different altogether. We use the railways for opening up our territory, and giving a means of transit to our colonists, and we desire to extend them in any way we wish, at the time and in the direction where they are required, untrammelled by any other authority. Now, it occurs to me that, with all the provisions in this Bill, and all the statements in our speeches in regard to trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth being free, we should be careful not to allow barriers just as severe to be erected in regard to our railways; because, if we allowed the railways to remain altogether in the hands of the states without any control by the Commonwealth, it seems to me that our boast of free trade and intercourse between all parts of the Commonwealth would be merely idle words.

Mr. REID. -

But the objection is to too-free-trade and intercourse. That is the trouble here.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I think both high rates and low rates may be used in the direction of interfering with free trade and intercourse.

Mr. REID. -
Still you cannot say that low rates are not in the direction of free-dom of intercourse.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I have heard of a war of railway tariffs that would be just as bad as a war of customs duties, and that would injure the people, if not individually, at all events collectively, just as much as no doubt such tariffs have done in the past. I have no doubt that those persons who are very conversant with the management of railways—my honorable friend (Mr. Grant) for instance, if he had a free hand in one of these great colonies—would be able to make railway rates which would injure an adjoining state just as he chose. I am quite sure that Mr. Grant's ingenuity would be sufficient to make low rates injure an adjoining state as much as high customs duties would injure it. I do not propose to say anything more. I think if we are to have this free intercourse for trade and commerce throughout the Commonwealth, we should provide for it in the Bill. My honorable friend, the leader of the Convention, has told us that he does not want anything but the trade and commerce sub-section of clause 52, which he considers to be sufficient. Well, if it be sufficient to prevent this interference of one state to the injury of another state, why not make it even more clear?

Mr. BARTON. -
Because it is clear enough already.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have lawyers in the Convention who differ with regard to that point. I am not competent to give an opinion.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think the lawyers really differ as to that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Surely if it be the case that the sub-section in question is sufficient, there cannot be any objection to making it even clearer. I cannot understand why there should be any objection to the provision moved by my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner). It simply says—"You shall trust the Federal Parliament to do what is right in this matter, and if a state is acting unfairly towards another state the Federal Parliament will come in." The Federal Parliament will not have any power of initiative; it will not go out and meddle with the business of other people till a case is brought before it. It will not have any primary jurisdiction, but it will have to act when a complaint is made.
Mr. BARTON. -
Did you say that the Federal Parliament will not have any primary jurisdiction?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I mean without a complaint being made.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, it will; it can do as it likes.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not think so.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, it can.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Mr. BARTON. -
The High Court cannot act unless complaint is made, but the Parliament can act whenever it likes.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Only on motion.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
A Parliament is generally glad to let sleeping dogs lie, and I do not think it is very likely that the Federal Parliament will move unless there is a desire that it should. We have heard all through this Convention—at Adelaide, Sydney, and Melbourne—that we should have faith in the future, that we should trust the Federal Parliament, knowing that it will do right, and that it will be just; in fact, we have handed over to the Federal Parliament the complete control of our finances. Every honorable member who is intrusted with the management of the financial affairs of a colony has handed over the one great wealth producer we have absolutely to the Federal Parliament, and trusted to its sense of justice to give us back what we are entitled to. Surely we are taking a greater responsibility in handing over our great revenue producer—the Customs—to the Federal Parliament than the right honorable gentleman is in handing over to that body the right to say—"You are acting unjustly to your neighbour, and we shall not allow you to do so."

Mr. REID. -
In that case we do not put in the special words Sir George Turner is putting in here. We put it on the broadest possible lines for them to decide, and we are willing to do that. It is these special words which are being put in that we object to.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
All I want is that in case of a dispute between two states the Federal Parliament shall have the power to say let right be done. Any one who objects to that proposition, and expects us to declare that there should be no power to say that right shall be done in regard to warring railway tariffs is not asking us to agree to what is reasonable. The Treasurers who are willing to hand over the Customs revenue to the Federal Parliament are, I think, taking upon themselves a greater load of responsibility and a greater burden than the right honorable gentleman is doing when he hands over to the Federal Parliament simply the right to say-"Let justice be done in the case of a dispute," and to decide how justice is to be done. I hope that the debate on this matter will come to a conclusion. I shall have no hesitation in giving my vote. I regret very much that so different a tone seems to be actuating honorable members at the present time in regard to the colonies they represent from that which actuated them months ago. I think that self-interest is more rampant now than it was, that we are trying to bring forward dangers which do not exist, and which never will exist. The power in the Federal Parliament to say that right shall be done will be sufficient, and you will find that there will be very little reason for complaint. I have heard, and I believe it is generally admitted, that this war of tariffs would have been decided long ago by the various engineering authorities if it had not been for the political authorities. What is the desire in creating this Commonwealth? The desire is to have free-trade unrestricted, that it shall go its own course. If that is so, I cannot see what there is to fear. Each state will manage its own business in its own way.

Mr. FRASER. -

Its own railways?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes, so long as in its arrangements it does not do injustice to any other state. If it does, that state will have a right to complain to the Federal Parliament, who will be able to deal with the matter. I prefer that procedure to an appeal to the High Court. We shall probably have a provision in the Constitution giving a right of appeal to the Privy Council, and these matters will then have to be determined not only by the High Court, but also by the Privy Council. It has been said that the Federal Parliament will be a tainted tribunal. I was surprised to hear the Right Hon. Mr. Reid use such an expression. If I had time I could refer to the magnificent oration he gave us in Adelaide, and to speeches he delivered subsequently, in which he extolled up to the height of heaven almost the wisdom and the patriotism of the Federal Parliament. Now he tells us it will be a tainted tribunal, and he seems to think that the determination of these matters will rest with the representatives of Victoria and South Australia. Where will the representatives of Western Australia and Tasmania be? They will occupy an independent position, and will they not be able to judge between the combatants and to use their influence on the side of justice? What I regret most in connexion with today's debates is the expression of the opinion that the Federal Parliament will be biased, and that it cannot be trusted to do justice in a dispute as to a railway rate between one colony and another. I have no forebodings of that sort myself. I think it is the tribunal that will give the most wise and the most speedy decision, and I shall continue to support Sir George Turner's clause. I am against the provisions of that clause being in any way altered so as to make them practically of no effect.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

So much has been said on this question that it is hopeless for any of us to expect to say anything new. At the same time, two arguments have been used against the proposal carried by the Convention, and which it is proposed now to extend, that I want to reply to. One of these arguments is that that proposal might seriously diminish the revenue of the states concerned. It is said that we want to take over the railways of certain colonies, and that in doing so we might strike a serious blow at the finances of those colonies. It is also said that the railway experts are entirely against the course which this Convention has favoured. What do they say? I will quote the very railway expert who is chiefly relied on by the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales as supporting his argument. That officer, Mr. Oliver, when reporting to his Government, under date 7th May, 1895, said, in reference to the proposed cessation of these cut-throat rates and the acceptance of an agreement by the colonies interested:-

Whether this be so or not-

That is whether or not the steps then being taken resulted from previous correspondence originated by New South Wales.

it is highly satisfactory that the conference took place, as if the agreement which has been arrived at is finally confirmed, all complications in connexion with the traffic in question will be removed, each colony will receive reasonable payment for services rendered, and the producers and consumers will in like manner pay fair and reasonable railway rates.

So that there it is set out by the very person on whom Mr. Reid chiefly relies that the result of the abolition of these cut-throat rates will be that the railways will receive an increased, and not a diminished, revenue.

Mr. REID. -

You the basis of a certain agreement, which you are not giving us, and which was not accepted.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I meant to speak only a very short time; but I shall have to occupy a longer period if these interjections continue, because I must meet them. The agreement fell through because it was objected to by Victoria, but now Victoria, from having sought, on Tuesday, to have a free hand to maintain this strife, has, yesterday and to-day, happily changed its attitude, and, instead of wishing to have a free hand to maintain the fight, Victoria is willing that both sides shall lay down their weapons. Therefore, the honorable member's ground of objection falls entirely away. It has been said that we are not giving this agreement. Well, the agreement was arrived at by representatives of the Railway departments of all the colonies, and I have no doubt that it was an eminently fair agreement.

Mr. FRASER. -

That is denied; I have heard it denied.

Mr. HOLDER. -

This is the first time that I have heard that denied. However, I will start a little further back, and I will say that, as far as the railways are concerned, it was a good and fair agreement, and the only persons who could find any fault with it were those who had more in view the political aspect of the question, and perhaps the attracting of trade and commerce to the city of Melbourne as against the city of Sydney, or to the city of Sydney as against the city of Melbourne. From the railway point of view, as it is from that point of view that the objection to this scheme is being raised, and, therefore, it is from that point of view that I am answering it, the agreement was an eminently fair agreement, one which it was very desirable should be given effect to, and I do not believe that the Federal Parliament, or any authority it might constitute to deal with this matter, would be less fair than that conference of railway experts It would have at its disposal similar railway experts' opinions, and would no doubt adopt, in substance, the agreement then arrived at. Therefore, on the authority on which Mr. Reid chiefly relies, I say that that agreement, or anything similar to it, would have the effect of increasing and not diminishing the railway revenue in New South Wales as well as in the other colonies, and would result, as Mr. Oliver says in that minute, in reasonable payments to the railways for services rendered. In the same minute, a little further on, I read this sentence:-

While it is possible that the New South Wales railways cannot carry more wool, or, perhaps, quite so much, a better income will be derived.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
    Hear, hear; that is the point.
Mr. HOLDER. -
    This statement refers to the direct result of the agreement, so that we have Mr. Oliver's authority for saying that absolutely, under any such agreement as this, the benefit to the railways will be very large owing to the increased revenue to be derived. That is enough on that head. I come next to the opinions locally on this question, as given in the Sydney Daily Telegraph of Tuesday last. That paper is at the head-quarters of the feeling of opposition alleged to exist to the acceptance by New South Wales of a Constitution in which any of these proposals are included.
Mr. REID. -
    The Daily Telegraph is strongly in favour of federalizing the railways.
Mr. HOLDER. -
    The paper is not discussing the question of federalizing the railways.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
    Is the article signed or is it a leader?
Mr. HOLDER. -
    It is a leader in the Daily Telegraph of Tuesday last. I suppose the arguments in the article are so strong that it is desired to discount them before I read them.
Mr. REID. -
    I have not read the arguments, but I have no doubt they are strong. The leaders in the Daily Telegraph are always good leaders.
Mr. HOLDER. -
    I will read the arguments in the article, and no doubt their weight and importance will have due effect. After referring to considerable discrepancies in the rates made with a view to attracting trade, we have the words:-
    Of course, some persons and interests have benefited by this policy. It may, indeed, be thought that Sydney, generally speaking, has benefited by it.

I direct particular attention to the next words:-
    But the cost to New South Wales has been very much greater than the gain to any part of it, even if the gain could have fairly been conferred.

The writer, who is referring to elaborate statistics on which his arguments are based, shows that, even taking Sydney into consideration, and the benefits that may result from the concentration of trade there, the loss to New South Wales is much greater than the gain to any part of New South Wales. We want to remove the loss, and allow the gain to swallow up any loss to which the present system leads. I read further:-

Some tables quoted in the Leader illustrate the suicidal folly of the attempt which has been made by our railway administrators to make water run up hill, so to speak.

That is precisely what those patent arrangements for the railway traffic do. They take the traffic in the opposite direction from the one in which it ought to go. This influential journal, which is the paper supporting the Premier of New South Wales, and is one of the leading and one of the most important and influential journals, takes the very same ground that we have been taking in the Co.

That is a very frank admission that, bad as Victoria is—and Victoria is shockingly bad—New South Wales is worse still. I must read the closing few sentences of the article, which seem to me very powerful indeed:-

It is regrettable that the exigencies of railway administration should involve an infraction of it—

That is of the policy of freedom of trade.

and establish a system which can only result in public loss and inter-state friction and ill-will.

These are very strong words, and we could not have better. This has been prevalent all these years, but the Convention, if it is worth anything, will put an end to it.

Mr. REID. -

You never read to us the Wagga Express on the river question.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The article proceeds:-

It is impossible that such a state of things should long endure, and for no reason is federation more desirable than that it will abolish political boundaries within Australia,—

That is the very thing we have been fighting for.

and permit the trade of every district to find its most suitable outlet.

Could you have anything better than that?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

What paper is that?

Mr. HOLDER. -

The Sydney Daily Telegraph of Tuesday last. One might think that the writer of the article had been sitting here during the last few days, and, having heard the arguments used, had gone back to his office and summarized in very excellent form the strongest arguments used by those who have taken the same side as I and others have taken against those railway hostilities. I think that is enough on that point. I have replied to the two arguments which I think have had most weight with the Convention, and I now pass on to another phase. I do not think we ought to postpone this matter until we settle it. It will never be fresher in our minds than it is now; we will never be more seised of the facts than we are now. The only thing we could do by an adjournment would be to give further time for whipping. If there is any place or business concerning which whipping is unworthy it is a Convention such as this. But I want to take higher ground than that. I want to make an appeal to the Convention. There are 50 of us here who have the grandest opportunity that any men in Australia have ever yet had. We have been elected, most of us directly, and others indirectly, by the people of these colonies to do a certain work. I ask whether this Convention will separate without having done that work for which we were sent here; without having done it in such a way as that it is likely to meet with acceptance by those we represent? If we separate without having framed a Constitution which is fair and just to all, a Constitution which, at least, we 50 who are here will be prepared to advocate, we shall stand confessed as unworthy of the trust reposed in us, and unequal to the task which we have been called to perform.

Mr. FRASER. - What about trying to do too much?

Mr. HOLDER. - I do not think we are trying to do too much. I should like to know what that remark bears upon. If my honorable friend means that we are trying to do too much in putting an end to this railway war, I say that is not too much, and that a Federation which contemplates, as some desire it should, the maintenance of the railway war is a Federation not worthy of the name.

Mr. HIGGINS. - It is trying to do too much to have a Federation without ending this war.

Mr. HOLDER. - What is proposed is not even an armed truce. What is desired by those who wish us to interfere in no way with this railway war is that the several colonies shall maintain in full activity the most powerful engine against each other that they can possibly wield, that is, the railways, to injure each other. Are we going to form a Federation which will leave every colony with its hand on its neighbour's throat? That is not such a Constitution as we could recommend to the acceptance of our constituents. We shall not go far enough if we do not go sufficiently far to prevent the maintenance of that unfriendly unbrotherly attitude. I am making an appeal to the Convention-I am appealing to honorable members-that we should not close our proceedings until we frame a Constitution that we who are here, at least, can recommend; that we should not separate until we frame a Constitution which shows every probability of being accepted by our constituents. If the people fail to accept the Constitution our work will be in vain, and we shall have our work disavowed by those who have sent us here as their agents. We cannot contemplate that possibility; we must meet each other in some way. We must compromise this question in such a way as to have peace with honour, not with dishonour to any one, but peace with honour to all, and yet the right thing be done for the final abolition of these unfriendly border rates. It may be fairly argued, after these remarks, that I should suggest some way out of the difficulty. I am loath indeed to try and make a suggestion of this kind, because I know how irreconcilable is the attitude taken up by some persons during the last two and a half days. I am sorry it has been so irreconcilable. I do not think that personal comments or the impugning of motives is the way by which, in a Convention like this, we are likely to draw closer or bring the colonies nearer. We must recollect that when we speak heated words, they are published in the press and go before our electors.

Mr. REID. -
I wish the honorable member would bring up a cool southerly.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I hope we can rise superior to the circumstances of weather.

Mr. REID. -
I cannot; I am not thin enough.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
We ought to strike an average between the two honorable members.

Mr. HOLDER. -
If that would enable the honorable member to compromise this difficulty, I could earnestly wish that he were thinner; but we must take things as they are. We shall surely prove ourselves able even to rise above such weather as we are now enduring. However, I shall make a suggestion. It is that, while the Premier of New South Wales should abandon his antagonism to the parliamentary decision of this question, and abandon his advocacy of the High Court as the only means of a solution, the other party should abandon also the attitude they have taken up. It seems to me there are objections to an appeal to the High Court, and that the Parliament is a somewhat cumbrous body to deal with such a question. It may not be sitting more than three or five months in a year, at any rate, after the first session, and it is a very cumbrous body to which to refer such complicated and difficult questions as railway rates and the questions that will be raised... constantly all the year round. I am not going to assent to the validity of the argument of the Premier of New South Wales as to its being a tainted or unworthy body; it will be the highest court of appeal in this country on all important political questions, and surely we ought not to discount it before it comes into being by any such remarks. At the same time, I do admit the force of the argument that it is a cumbersome and unwieldy body to deal with such questions. On the other hand, if there is one thing which the constituents we represent dislike more than another it is the referring of so many grave questions to the High Court. It is inseparable from any scheme of federation that the High Court shall be in many things superior to the Parliament elected by the people. It is nauseous to many people to find that not only those matters in which it must be superior to the Parliament—matters connected with the federal compact and the deed of partnership—but also that many matters of public policy, such as railway questions, upon which certainly this Convention is competent to lay down rules, should be referred to this High Court. It is also to be considered that when we bring all these matters to the arbitrament of the High Court it will involve enormous cost, and we have also to remember, as Mr. Howe has remarked, that it will involve great delay. If we refer all these railway and other matters to the High Court, I am afraid we shall leave things in about as unsatisfactory a condition as they can possibly be left in. But there is a body which will be judicial in its nature, a body which will, I hope, consist, as an honorable member suggests, of practical men. I hope it will be a body, perhaps, not constituted as Mr. Grant wants it to be, of the Railways Commissioners of the colonies, but certainly constituted of men who understand railway business, and who, from their high position and responsible offices, will be almost a High Court themselves, with the extra advantage of being absolutely free from legal technicalities, and possessed of practical knowledge. That is a body to which we can refer all these matters. If we do that, I think we shall then have done our best; we shall not merely have made a compromise that will satisfy nobody. We shall have done the best, and we shall have done better than if we had referred these matters to the High Court or to Parliament. We shall have referred them to that body most able to deal with them, and most freely and cheaply accessible to those who will have to bring questions under their notice. I would suggest that instead of inserting the words "in the opinion of the Parliament" in the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Grant), we should insert the words "in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission." If this compromise is accepted, I would also suggest the substitution of Inter-State Commission for Parliament in the clause which was inserted in the Bill upon the motion of the Premier of Victoria.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
That clause has already been dealt with.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Yes, but it could be amended upon recommittal. The whole matter of what rates were fair and what rates were unfair, of what rates did, and what rates did not, tend to the development of territory, would thus be referred to a board of experts who, being acquainted with all the facts of the case, would be in a much better position than either the Parliament or the High Court to decide these matters. I make this suggestion, and I shall be sorry if it comes to nothing. On the other hand, I shall be very glad if it allows those who have been fighting so long some common foot-hold of agreement.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

Before dividing I wish to define my position in regard to this amendment. I hope that we shall have a division to-night. The difference between us is not a matter of drafting, it is a matter of principle; and I think it will help to an ultimate settlement to know how the numbers stand. I thoroughly agree with the last speaker that we should not postpone our decision any longer. We have been discussing the matter for days, we have had amendment after amendment proposed, and it is of no use to continue discussions about forms of words when there is a matter of substance upon which we cannot agree. The matter of substance is as to whether there shall be any attempt, in however slight a degree, to interfere with internecine tariff wars. I intend to vote for the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Grant), and against Sir George Turner's amendment of the amendment. I intend to vote for Mr. Grant's amendment, because it carries with it the principle I have advocated that each state, if the railways are not federalized, should have perfect liberty to make developmental rates, and to develop its own territory in its own way, provided that it does not overstep a certain line. I shall also vote for the amendment because of the reflex action which it will have upon Sir George Turner's clause. It may have the effect of giving a wholesome construction to that clause which it has not got at the present time. I have said before that that clause--and I have looked at it carefully--allows New South Wales to impose any differential rates which she likes, and to any extent, while it takes away from Victoria the power to impose preferential rates. The more I think of it, and the more I speak to others about it, the more I am convinced that that is the position; and I find that others are coming round to my view. Mr. Grant proposes to, insert these words:--

Nothing in this Constitution shall prevent the imposition of such railway rates by any states as may be necessary for the development of its territory, if such rates apply equally to the goods of other states.

Nothing in the Constitution is to affect devel

Mr. REID. -

Surely the Parliament will have more important work to do than that of acting as an Inter-State Commission!

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think the right honorable gentleman is right. Strongly as I feel the need for federal control in regard to these rates, I do not want to interfere with a state in the development of its territory. The effect, however, of inserting the words "in the opinion of the Parliament" will be that, before New South Wales, say, can impose a developmental rate, she will have to ask for the opinion of the Parliament in regard to it. If we concede to New South Wales the right to make honest developmental rates—rates which are not imposed to attract trade from other colonies, we should not compel her to go cap in hand to the Federal Parliament for its opinion upon those rates. Looked at practically the proposal is absurd. You must leave the colony a free hand in the imposition of rates for developmental purposes, provided that a certain line is not overstepped. That line is purely a line of intention.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Will not New South Wales be free until the Parliament has legislated?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think not, and I will tell you why. How would a Government, or how would Railways Commissioners, be safe in imposing developmental rates before they knew that the Federal Parliament would consider those rates honest developmental rates? Upon this ground I shall oppose the amendment of Sir George Turner. I am strongly of the opinion of the last speaker that a board of experts would be the most useful tribunal to deal with questions of fact in regard to the action of rates, and it was to carry into effect that opinion that I framed my amendment, which has been laid on one side for the present. My idea was that the Inter-State Commission, as a jury of experts, would decide whether a rate was an honest developmental rate, and, if it was, it would allow it. I am as willing as anybody is to trust the Federal Parliament; but a member speaking in his place in Parliament knows that his constituents are watching him, and members are more likely to vote for what is the interest of their constituents than for what is merely and absolutely just. I take it that in these discussions we are pursued by the Nemesis of the false principles which we have embodied in the Constitution in regard to the Federal Parliament. New South Wales would be much more willing to trust her railways to the Federal Parliament if she knew that she would have a proper representation there. I also, in conclusion, would say this: I strongly deprecate—and I speak as an independent member of this Convention—the strong expressions which have been used by our premiers in saying that we may as well throw up the idea of federation. I feel that the matter under discussion is one of great importance, but we have had matters before us that are ten times more important than this. It is our duty never to nail the flag to the mast and say that we will give up the idea of federation if this thing or that is not carried. We must wait until we see the Bill as a whole. I was very sorry to see the Premier of our colony—which is as strongly federalist in its convictions as any colony in the group-following (if I may say with respect) the bad lead set by the Premier of New South Wales, and saying that if what he contends for is not granted Victoria will not come in. We all have to accept defeats in the course of these discussions, and I hope that we shall not have that carpet-bag argument used any more, but shall wait until we can gravely study the Bill as a whole and see if we can possibly accept it.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales).—I propose, as the mover of the amendment now under discussion, to say a few words in answer to what has been said with regard to it.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria).—If my honorable and learned friend (Mr. O'Connor) intends his speech as a reply upon the debate, I should like to say a few words before the discussion is closed. I would like to point out one or two reasons why we should agree to the amendment of Sir George Turner. I was very much struck—and I wish to acknowledge the point at the earliest possible moment—by a very important reminder which we had from Sir John Forrest in the course of this debate. It had been well pointed out previously—I attempted to do so myself, and at another stage it was done more effectually by Sir George Turner—what an absurd position we shall be getting into by refusing to accept the amendment which he has suggested, and by merely voting for Mr. Grant's amendment. It was well observed that if Mr. Grant's amendment were adopted we might find ourselves in this position: That one state might impose a railway regulation—in good faith, no doubt—to which another state might—with equal good faith and honesty of purpose—object as being unfair and unjust to the complaining state. Under the clause which my right honorable friend the Premier of Victoria carried, a complaint could then be made to the Federal Parliament to act as arbitrator in the matter and annul that provision. The Parliament—I cannot for an instant believe that it would be the tainted tribunal which we have heard so much about—

Mr. REID. -

There is no taint about it. It would be honest self-interest. There is no taint in honest self-interest.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am using the very word which was used here; the term is not my own.

Mr. REID. -

If you have upon a jury a man who had an interest in the case, the term you might use in regard to him would be that he was tainted with self-interest, although he might at the same time be an honest man.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But the Federal Parliament will be "tainted" with self-interest to that extent in regard to pretty well every question that comes before it; that is to say, the members will have the interest of their several states at heart.

Mr. REID. -

There is the same taint in regard to state rights, although the representatives of the smaller states are not prepared to give them up.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We will ask the Federal Parliament to decide between the conflicting interests of rival states. Very well, what does it do? It investigates the matter.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

How?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Honestly, we assume, by means of the Inter-State Commission, or any other means it chooses to employ. It examines merchants, agriculturists, pastoralists, railway experts, and brings to the test of the evidence it procures all that human science and skill and experience can give to it. And then the Parliament decides the question.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

How?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Having come to the conclusion, it decides, we will say, to annul the regulation in question.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

How decide it; by an Act?

Mr. ISAACS. -

By an Act of Parliament; and having passed an Act of Parliament, under the amendment of my honorable friend (Mr. Grant), unless altered by the proposal put forward by my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner), the state whose regulation had just been annulled could apply to the Supreme Court and ask for a reversal of the solemn decision given by the Federal Parliament. I should say in passing that the threat of a possible appeal to the Supreme Court would no doubt be held over the head of the Parliament during the debate on the very question, and the Parliament, having given great attention to the consideration of the question would be open to the ignominy of having its decision reviewed by the Supreme Court, which would have evidence brought before it to induce it to reverse the Parliament's decision. What a miserable position to which to reduce the highest court of all-the Parliament! And what a position in which to place the Supreme Court! The court would find itself compelled, as a jury, to come to a decision of its own on these very complicated questions involving political considerations, and we should have the Supreme Court in conflict with the Parliament of the Commonwealth, not on questions of law, but on questions of fact, requiring for their determination the multitudinous considerations I referred to yesterday.

Mr. DOBSON. -

No, upon a principle which ought to be engrafted here.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will my honorable friend say that he can take up a document like an Act of Parliament, and decide on the mere words-the cold type-he sees before him, that a measure expressed within the four corners of such a document is or is not beneficial to the development of the country? Would he leave out of consideration all the evidence of commercial and social life around him, and would he carry a question of party warfare or political struggle on to the floor of the very temple of justice itself? It seems to me absurd to believe such a thing.

Mr. DOBSON. -

It is merely a question of interpreting the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But Sir John Forrest carried the matter to its legitimate conclusion, and what he pointed out was that, not only could this very matter of the development of a state be appealed from from the Federal Parliament to the Federal Court, but under our Constitution (as some honorable members desire it to be), the question might be carried to the Privy Council. Now, imagine the people of the Federation having a question of the development of a state, a political question, taken, for the first time in British jurisprudence, to be determined by the Privy Council! Mr. Grant's amendment is admitted to be such a one as would enable that course to be adopted, and the state would have an opportunity to avail itself of the permission granted by the Constitution. The position has only to be studied to be objected to. And unless we wish to depart from the even course which has been adopted in this Constitution, and all other Constitutions, of referring to the Supreme Court matters of law, and matters of law only, and keeping zealously and earnestly from its determination questions of politics, we shall be making a very grave mistake indeed. There is not a single instance to be found in this Constitution or any other of a parallel nature. I admit at once that if you put this clause in, it will be a matter for the court to determine, but I am urging reasons why you should not put it in. Where do you get, in the whole of this Constitution, any reference of a political nature to the High Court! There is a dividing line drawn in many places where the states are told-"You are to have your powers intact up to a certain point, and where the Federation is told-"You have your powers from a certain point," and a court may determine where that line exists in a large number of cases. If we refer to the decisions in America, we will find them determined, not upon such evidence as will be necessary in the case we are now considering, but upon the words of an Act of Parliament, upon a decision of the court itself, and upon legal arguments addressed to the tribunal. How can such a question as we are now contemplating be determined in that way? I should say that we would be putting a strain on the Constitution which it would be almost impossible to bear. And if we were told that the Federal Parliament was over-ruled in a question of internal policy, a question of a political nature, by, first, the High Court, and then the Privy Council, I think the position would be intolerable. It has been said that the railways are not the property of the Commonwealth, and that therefore it should not be given this negative power of overruling any regulation having the effect of oppressing another state. Let us take the course of commerce. The commerce of a state is not the property of the Commonwealth, and yet, although we do not give the Commonwealth the power of regulating the commerce of a state, we give to it the power of preventing one state in its commerce from oppressing any other state. We give to the Commonwealth the over-ruuling power of preventing barriers being erected, and preventing one state from doing an injustice to the commerce of another state. In the one instance we give it to the court, because a court can say from the four corners of an Act of Parliament whether its necessary effect is to obstruct commerce. But when you are told about a railway regulation, and you are asked to say whether it is calculated to develop the resources of a state, a very different set of considerations arise, and you cannot tell from the mere consideration of these words whether they are calculated to develop, on the whole, the resources of the state. Therefore, if the court has to consider whether it would be beneficial from a railway point of view and injurious from an agricultural point of view, more or less useful from a pastoral point of view, more or less beneficial from a mining point of view, and to weigh all the advantages and to sum up the difficulties, and then come to its conclusion as to whether, on the whole, it is calculated to develop the resources of the state, it is idle to put it on the plane of the duties of the High Court or refer the question to a judicial power at all. The more it is thought over the more, I think, we can dismiss it from our consideration. it astonishes me very much to hear some of the arguments from my friends from South Australia in support of this. It is only the other day we heard, with masterful eloquence and almost unexampled irony, the lash laid round the proposal of South Australia with regard to the rivers. We heard them told that it was a mere sordid question of South Australian barges, and now we find some of these honorable gentlemen willing to submit to the argument in favour of New South Wales bales and bullocks. The very point they failed to gain for South Australian barges they will yield to New South Wales bales and bullocks. Victoria has never held out threats, and I am sure never will; but we have heard a good deal of-I will not say threats, but uncommonly near to threats-from some of our friends from other colonies; and they are perfectly right if they think that their colony will not accept certain proposals to say out manfully what they think about them. Victoria has been driven backwards, step by step, losing revenue, losing bounties, and losing various other things, and now she is asked to submit to a most injurious position with regard to her railways. There is a limit where concession passes to surrender, and we cannot afford to go to that limit. The other day when we asked with regard to bounties for developing our resources that we should have the opportunity to put on those bounties, and at the same time said that we were willing to submit to the overruling power of the Federal Parliament, we were told by the representatives of New South Wales that that was wrong. But now, when it becomes a question of her railways, New South Wales forgets all this argument with which she repelled the advance of Victoria and says-"No, with regard to the railway bounties we want to give our people, we must give them, and we will not have them questioned even by the Federal Parliament." It must go as a question of law to the Supreme Court, make it as difficult as you like, but for developing their resources they must give bounties, and they will not even have the overruling power of the Federal Parliament. Is that fair? Let us deal with this matter with an even hand. The clause passed at the instance of Sir George Turner is a just and fair clause, and unless we adhere to what we did, and unless we insert in these words of Mr. Grant the words of Sir George Turner, as suggested, we will not only go back on what we have done but we will go back on the principles of fair play.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Do you think that an Inter-State Commission will be better than the Federal Parliament?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am perfectly willing to have an Inter-State Commission, and I may point out to my honorable friend that our proposal includes one.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Why not say so directly? Parliament could not do that, and you might as well say so.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friend is perhaps right; I am inclined to agree with him I am perfectly willing to yield to that if it is a necessary part of any bargain, but at the same time in the Constitution of the United States they have no provision for an Inter-State Commission.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Because they, had no railways at the time.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And yet they have an Inter-State Commission. They can alter it whenever they like, if they find better means, as progress advances, or if they alter their minds. I have not the slightest objection to an Inter-State Commission being appointed by Parliament. But it was pointed out as an objection just now to Sir George Turner's words that it would require Parliament to consent before the rate was imposed. Really, I was astonished to hear that, because we have put in words which merely substitute Parliament for the High Court. We are not responsible for the wording of Mr. Grant's amendment. However the words of his amendment run, we understand Mr. Grant to mean that the Federal Parliament, in making laws such as are included in Sir George Turner's amendment, should not have the power to make laws to annul state regulations, if those regulations were made for the purpose of developing the resources of the state. But the state is to have power to make its original law as it likes, subject to revision by the Parliament, as we hope, and by the High Court as some honorable members think. All we desire to do is to raise the one simple question whether it shall be the High Court or the Parliament. There can be no doubt about the effect of it, and, therefore, I think the arguments I have just heard should not prevail. I do hope that we will not put ourselves in the somewhat farcical position we shall be in if we fail to carry this amendment. And, therefore, unless some agreement be arrived at which will satisfactorily settle the matter from all stand-points, I hope we will retain the ground at which we arrived yesterday after long and laborious contest, and, I am sure, after the fullest consideration had been given to the matter.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

We have been discussing for two and a half weeks—that is, for more than half the sitting of the Convention here—two questions of rivers and railway rates, in which we are told that Tasmania and Western Australia have no direct interest. But, as I pointed out before, every member of this Convention has a direct interest in framing a Constitution which will not redound hereafter to his discredit. I have done my best during to-day and yesterday to see if, having thoroughly thrashed out this matter, and said all that is to be said, we could not settle the matter by a private conference between the leading men of the two great colonies interested. If these leading men cannot or will not come together, or if they think that no good would ensue from a friendly conference, and the matter has to be settled here, I crave indulgence for a few minutes to explain the position I take up, and the principles which will guide me in giving my vote. To me the question is complicated by two difficulties. First, there is the difficulty of inserting in the Constitution words which will, to some extent, conserve the conflicting interests of the two great colonies of New South Wales and Victoria; and, secondly, there is the vital point of whether the Parliament or the High Court shall decide in cases of dispute. I am almost bowed down by fear in differing from my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) and many other honorable members who are more capable than I am of forming an opinion on a subject of this sort. Many questions have come before the Convention in regard to which I have felt great doubt as to whether I was right or wrong. I may be wrong, but I venture to say that the Convention will make a fatal blunder if they hand over to any tribunal but the High Court a question of this kind. I am altogether opposed to referring a matter in which Victoria and New South Wales are interested up to the very neck, and which, even in this Convention, has caused so much heat and warmth, to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HOLDER. -

It is a question of policy.

Mr. DOBSON. -

No, it is a question of principle. If you put the principle into the Constitution, the High Court is the only tribunal which is capable of interpreting it.
Mr. HOLDER. -

An Inter-State Commission could do that better.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I desire to use that argument to show how weak and tottering the Convention are on this point. When we discussed this matter in Adelaide we were not confronted with the difficulties that now surround us. What was the universal cry of honorable members? It was that this was a technical and a professional matter, that neither the Parliament nor the High Court were capable of dealing with, and that an Inter-State Commission of expert railway men must be established. The representatives of Victoria have now succeeded in getting an amendment inserted in the Bill—and I am glad of it, although I could not vote for the amendment because it left this question to the Parliament—and they are now throwing over all their principles and arguments. In my opinion, this is the last question that should be left to the Federal Parliament. My honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) has referred to the delay that would be caused by an appeal to the High Court. But fancy the delay that would take place if this matter had to go before two Houses of Parliament. Supposing that in the Lower House the representatives of the other colonies were equally divided, and New South Wales had the support of half the number and Victoria the support of the other half, Victoria might be out-voted by two, three, or four votes, as we know the population of New South Wales is increasing at a greater ratio than that of Victoria. Then when it had passed through the House of Representatives it would have to go to the States House—the Senate—which would probably disagree with the House of Representatives, especially if self-interest was strong and party feeling was running high. You would put the matter into the saucer to cool. The saucer would perhaps cool it, and send it back again. I would ask the Right Hon. Sir George Turner to reflect on the delay that would be caused by the adoption of this plan.

Mr. REID. -

And a successive Parliament might arrive at an opposite conclusion, and there would be no certainty.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I am trying to point out that self-interest would form a strong element in the determination of these questions. We have had instances of it in this Convention. We are all losing our tempers, and getting irritated.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We are all in the best of temper.

Mr. DOBSON. -
It may be only for the moment; but do you suppose that the member's of the Federal Parliament, in dealing with such a matter, would be in the best of temper? Squatters from the Riverina might be elected members of the Senate or the House of Representatives. They would be vitally interested in this question. They would probably side with Victoria, and you would then have representatives of New South Wales voting against their own colony, not in the interests of federation, of enlightened patriotism, or of a higher national life, but solely in the interests of their own pockets-going against their own state and allying themselves with a colony which was hostile to their own colony in order to save their pockets.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Better not have a Federal Parliament at all, then.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That is no argument against it. If we do our work well and incorporate the principles which we as framers of the Constitution think are right and just in this Bill, we can safely leave it to the High Court to interpret those principles and to apply the facts to them. Has any honorable member, even my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs), attempted to answer the argument of Mr. Barton, who takes up the same position that I have taken up from the very beginning on this question, but who has put it far more ably than I can do? This is to be the one sole question on which you are to refuse to allow the High Court to be the interpreter of the Constitution.

My honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) has told us-and he did not qualify his words-that this is the most important thing we have ever had to consider. That may be slightly the language of exaggeration, but I agree with him that it is a most important matter, and this most important matter is to be another exception, another blot on your Constitution. You are not to put your principles in the Bill, but you are to capsize the whole thing over to the Federal Parliament, and to ask them to lay down the policy, to lay down the law, and everything else. I cannot take that view. I desire to be logical. I desire to be consistent, and I have heard every honorable member who is a frequent speaker at this Convention ram home with all his force and weight the fact that the High Court is our guardian, is the interpreter of the Constitution, is the tribunal which is there to say whether a state on the one hand or the Commonwealth on the other infringes the principles of the Constitution. Yet now, in order to get rid of a difficulty which we are afraid to face, we are going to withdraw from that High Court one of the very greatest functions which it might fulfil. In reference to the merits of the question, my position is very much that of my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins). I desire, on the one hand, to do nothing which will take away from Victoria what I may speak of as transactions with Melbourne, their stations were financed in Melbourne, and they scarcely ever talked of New South Wales or of going to Sydney. Therefore, to a very great extent, the colony of Victoria has developed the Riverina traffic with her railways, and has to some extent a vested right in it. Consequently, I shall vote in every way I possibly can that Victoria shall not be deprived, when she enters the Federation, of anything that she has now and ought justly to retain. But my friend, the Premier of New South Wales, has driven home a very pretty shot, between wind and water, at the protectionists of Victoria. He says-"You shut our producers out of your market. You not only wanted to feed your dog with its own tail, but you wanted to feed your dog with the tail of my animal; and, therefore, I had to build railways to the border to bring down the produce of our outlying producers to a free market, as against your protected market." That argument appeals to me, and, therefore, while I am in favour of protecting Victoria on the one hand, I am perfectly in accord with Mr. Grant's resolution-the idea of which first entered my head after hearing the speech of Mr. Higgins-that you should allow New South Wales into this district with rates for developing her territory. That, I think, ought to be done. Does any honorable member of this Convention suppose for one moment that your three or four Judges sitting in the Federal Court, after having some six or eight of your railway experts before them, would not, in 24 hours, be able to tell exactly whether a railway rate was put on with the honest intention of developing an outlying territory, or under the guise of development, but really as a preferential rate, to deprive another state of its natural traffic? It is idle to think your High Court cannot do that. They will have before them every bit of expert evidence you can possibly give them, they will cross-examine those men in a quiet, calm, and judicial way, they will suck their brains, and get everything they can from them, and when they have done that they will commence to apply the experience of a lifetime in sifting evidence, their grasp of all branches of the subject, and their faculty for applying facts to principles, and, with all their judicial knowledge and experience, they will be able to arrive at a sound conclusion. Therefore, I say, let this matter be determined, not by an Inter-State Commission, but by the High Court. The members of an Inter-State Commission would have within their own minds a knowledge of these technical things, and would apply the facts to their experience, but they would arrive at their judgment without the assistance of the judicial knowledge which your High Court would possess. Therefore, your High Court would be an infinitely better tribunal than any other you could possibly erect. However, if it will settle the question, I will vote for the Inter-State Commission. Still, I do not believe in it. I regard it as an unnecessary expense, because, after the first year or two, you will settle these questions, and you will not want your Inter-State Commission. Still, I will gladly accept that as a compromise, although in adopting it we shall be departing from principle and making our Constitution lop-sided, through taking from the High Court one of the very functions which it exists to carry out.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

The amendment of Sir George Turner is really only an elaboration of the fault which made his previous proposal most objectionable. Our principal objection to the amendment on my proposal was that it handed over for determination to the Parliament matters affecting the rights of New South Wales in regard to the rates upon her own railways, and with reference to her own traffic. Mr. Grant's amendment put my amendment in another form, which I am ready to accept for the present. But Sir George Turner seeks to entirely neutralize that amendment by handing over to the tribunal whose jurisdiction we objected to in regard to deciding preferences and discriminations the task of deciding whether or not a rate was made for the development of a state. Is it not idle to suppose that the faults which would prevent what we consider a right and just decision in regard to discriminations and preferences do not apply equally to handing over to the same tribunal the task of deciding a question as to whether a railway rate is for the development of territory? And therefore it is that Sir George Turner's amendment appears to me to completely neutralize all the benefits which we seek to derive from the amendment of Mr. Grant. Now, I was very much interested in the speech of my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) dealing with this matter. He lifted the veil only a little, but quite sufficient to indicate to us what was in his mind as to the method by which these questions were to be settled.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I intended to lift the veil altogether.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Well, the honorable member lifted it quite sufficiently. He pointed out the method in which these questions, which would be questions of fact, would be decided. Now, a question for the Federal Parliament to determine probably would not arise until some dispute had arisen between states as to whether certain rates were discriminating or not, and that dispute would not arise until a considerable amount of friction and irritation had occurred between the states in reference to the question in dispute. Because disputes of this kind are not taken up by Governments, and do not come before Parliaments, until a considerable amount of pressure is brought to bear upon them. Not only must the dispute have reached those dimensions, but it must have reached dimensions sufficiently important to be made the subject of Government action, because we cannot suppose that a subject of this kind would be brought before the Federal Parliament by any less authority than the Executive Government, and you may be very well assured that in the Parliament of the Commonwealth we shall have parties upon some lines. Whether they are state lines, lines of fiscal policy, or on whatever lines they may be formed, there will be parties. I presume that the Commonwealth Government will be carried on on the party system, and so you will have the disputed question brought up by a Government which is kept in office by a party. Now, how are the facts on which the dispute will be decided to be obtained? There must be a basis of facts on which to rest the decision. And how are those facts to be obtained? By the usual method of a parliamentary select committee. Now, I do not wish to make any reflection on Parliament, but it is evident to any man who knows anything about our parliamentary system that a select committee of Parliament, no matter how high may be the character and integrity of the men who compose it, is not the proper tribunal for the decision of any fact in a question of this kind.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No one suggested that the parliamentary committee should be the tribunal.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I am quite aware of that. If the honorable member will be, as patient with me as I was with him, he will find that I am not assuming that a parliamentary committee will be the tribunal; but it will examine witnesses, collect evidence, and make a report, which will be taken up by the Executive Government, and there can be no question that upon its report the deliberations of the Parliament of the Commonwealth will take place. The dispute will be taken up by a Government with a party bias, and the inquiry will be conducted by a select committee, whose report will be brought before a Parliament in which parties must be rampant, and there made the basis of the decision of Parliament, and I say that such a procedure in a matter of this kind will not commend itself to the members of this Convention. The decision will be come to upon the question of whether a rate is a discrimination and preference, or whether it is unjust as a matter of policy, so that this question of how far the rates of New South Wales are to be interfered with by the states of the Commonwealth is to be decided, not upon the justice of their claims, not upon their rights in any way, but as a matter of the policy of the Commonwealth. Now, we in New South Wales object to the settlement of our rights being effected upon the basis of the policy of the Commonwealth. We are quite willing to submit to any process which will hand over the control of unjust rates, in regard to interstate traffic, to any tribunal which it may be thought fit to intrust with the decision; but we do object to have the decision as to what rate we shall charge on our rail-ways handed over to the Federal Parliament. The honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), in his very able speech, appeared to me to appeal with a very considerable amount of skill to a prejudice which we all know exists in all assemblies against too much judicial determination. My honorable friend painted, in very strong colours, the delays which must take place in the determination of such questions by the High Court. Does the honorable gentleman forget that there are scores of matters in the Constitution to be determined by the High Court, and which must depend on the finding of that court, on questions of fact? If the High Court is to be of any value in the Constitution it must be prepared to decide all questions involving disputes between states, and all questions involving the assumption by the state or by the Commonwealth of some power which the Constitution has not given it. You have only to turn to the decisions of the American courts to find scores of cases in which the principal matters to be considered were questions of fact, to which the Constitution was to be afterwards applied. You cannot turn over a page of the Constitution without finding matters that must come before the court, which is the highest arbiter. I hope honorable members will not be led away by the suggestion that this is a matter which it is

\[P.1500\] starts here

intended to leave to the consideration of the court. I would call the attention of Mr. Grant to the fact that the amendment would be a direction to Parliament that in making its laws in regard to rates it should follow the direction of the Constitution. The probabilities are that in 99 cases out of 100 the direction of the Constitution would be followed. It is only in those cases in which Parliament goes outside the lines which the Constitution has marked out, that the court would have any jurisdiction. The court is only a means of keeping Parliament within the lines of the Constitution, and only in such cases would the aid of the court be invoked. Within the lines in which Parliament has power, Parliament will be absolutely free, and it is only when it exceeds those lines that the High Court can be called on to determine the question. There are no terms that have been more misused than those of "Trust the Federal Parliament." No one is more ready to trust the Federal Parliament than I am, and to trust it fully and frankly, in regard to any matter which, I think, ought to be handed over for its consideration. As a matter of constitutional policy, I am willing to trust Parliament to the uttermost; but our objection to handing over this question to Parliament is, not because we are afraid to trust it, but because, from its very constitution, Parliament is absolutely unfitted to deal with it. Mr. Holder has reminded me of a suggestion he made in the course of his exceedingly temperate and lucid speech on this question. The honorable member suggested that the determination of this question should be handed over to an Inter-State Commission. I admit that an Inter-State Commission is an infinitely more capable body to decide a question of this kind than either the Federal Parliament or the court in the first instance. But I say that, whether this question is to be submitted to the decision of an Inter-State Commission or not, it depends entirely on the scope of the question you remit for their consideration. I would have no objection to remitting to the consideration of the Inter-State Commission any question regarding the justice or reasonableness or propriety of traffic rates between states.

Mr. Higgins. -

That would leave them no work to do.

Mr. O'Connor. -

I beg the honorable gentleman's pardon. If the honorable member knows what has been done under the Inter-State Commission Act in America, he will know that the only jurisdiction which is conferred is jurisdiction in regard to traffic.

Mr. Higgins. -

There are 44 states there, and five here, with a huge territory.

Mr. O'Connor. -

I am not arguing now on the question of the policy of establishing an Inter-State Commission. I am perfectly willing to hand over to the Inter-State Commission the determination of those questions-questions which are suggested in the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment-if those questions are restricted to matters arising on inter-state commerce. But I object to hand over to the Inter-State Commission questions affecting the rates on New South Wales railways as to our own traffic. Although the tribunal is not so objectionable, the principle of my objection is as strong as ever. We cannot hand over to the consideration of a tribunal, or any body, the determination of what rates shall be charged on our own railways in regard to our own traffic within our own state. That principle is on the basis of the agreement to retain in the hands of our own Government our railway management. If the assent of New South Wales is to be obtained to the suggestion of Mr. Holder, some consideration should be given to the suggestion I have thrown out as to the limitations of the functions which are to be intrusted to this body. I hope the committee will not assent to the amendment of my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner). I hope the committee will not assent to any proposition which takes away the whole life and purpose of Mr. Grant's amendment. I am willing to which own the railways.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I should like to ask Sir George Turner whether he will consent to move his amendment in this shape: "In the opinion of the Inter-State Commission," instead of "In the opinion of the Parliament"?

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

The Convention having already affirmed that the words should be: "In the opinion of the Parliament," I cannot move to alter it, but in order to settle the whole question, if all parties are willing I am perfectly prepared to accept the decision of the Inter-State Commission instead of the decision of Parliament.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Before that is done, I should like to point out that Mr. Grant's amendment is intended to follow clause 95A, which I moved to insert the day before yesterday, and to which I understand there are no objections. My clause is-

The Commonwealth shall not give preference, by any law or regulation of commerce or revenue, to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof.

That relates solely to laws made by the Commonwealth. Mr. Grant's amendment is as follows:-

Nothing in this Constitution shall prevent the imposition of such railway rates by any state as may be necessary for the development of its territory if such rates apply equally to goods from other states.

The amendment now before the committee is to insert, after the words "as may be necessary," the words "in the opinion of Parliament." It is now intended to substitute for these words-"in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission." If that were done, it might necessitate Sir George Turner consenting to amend his new clause in the same direction.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The two must hang together.

Mr. BARTON. -

The whole scope of my Clause (95A) is with reference to the Commonwealth. It was suggested by the Chairman that all these amendments might be withdrawn, and 95A passed, upon which there should be a postponement of the remainder of these provisions, which would be dealt with as new clauses. That view has not been acceded to. What I should like to point out is this: We are dealing now with a clause which relates to the Commonwealth only. If we amend Mr. Grant's amendment so as to arrange for the control of the Inter-State Commission in these matters, the amendment will be in the wrong place.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The amendment will have to be added to the clause we passed yesterday. It cannot go with the clause with which we are dealing now.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, it might have to be added to the right honorable member's clause.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

On a point of order, I would ask is it not a fact that the new clause proposed by Sir George Turner is already in the Bill, and that what we are now discussing is a new clause of three lines proposed by the leader of the Convention, and to which the honorable member (Mr. Grant) wishes to add certain words?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Yes. What I would suggest is that the proposed new clause of three lines should be inserted as a separate clause, all the amendments being withdrawn to enable this to be done. The honorable member (Mr. Grant) could then move his amendment as a new clause. That would get rid of one difficulty.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes; that would get rid of one difficulty. Having considered the matter, I am still of the opinion that the words "as may be necessary," which, I think, it was agreed upon all hands, left the provision for the interpretation of the High Court, should remain as they are without any amendment. If it is decided to substitute another tribunal for the High Court, we are driven back upon this position: The imposition of railway rates for the development of territory is, in the first instance, a work for the state concerned to carry out. Therefore, the clause should read-"such railway rates as may be necessary, in the opinion of the Parliament of a state for the development of its territory." For this reason: If we are to leave the imposition of railway rates by a state subject to the opinion of the Federal Parliament, it will be impossible for any state-and I think this was pointed out by the honorable member (Mr. Higgins)-to impose rates without being in the constant fear that, no matter what those rates may be, or however fair, the Federal Parliament may interfere in regard to them, to their utter destruction. There will be thus no continuity in the framing of rates of this
Mr. HIGGINS. -

Does the honorable and learned member think there is need for the insertion of these words, having regard to the provisions of clause 96?

Mr. BARTON. -

I was coming to that. Clause 96 says-

The Parliament may make laws constituting an Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain upon railways within the Commonwealth, and upon rivers flowing through, in, or between two or more states, the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

I am not certain that the words "and upon rivers flowing through, in, or between two or more states" are necessary, if under the provisions relating to trade and commerce the navigation of rivers is made a matter upon which the Federal Parliament can legislate. It will be absurd to limit the jurisdiction of the Inter-State Commission to rivers "flowing through, in, or between two or more states," if the Commonwealth Parliament has power to regulate trade and commerce generally, and, therefore, to make laws of application to all the rivers in the Commonwealth without distinction at all. This is a case in which it is dangerous to make limitations. It is dangerous to say that the Inter-State Commission is limited to particular sorts of rivers; and in the same way it is dangerous to say that the commission shall be limited in respect of railways. When one considers the whole matter of the province of the Inter-state Commission, if it is properly appointed, we should make it a commission whose functions extend over the whole matter of the regulation of trade and commerce, without any limitations which, I think, I am entitled to characterize as absurd limitations. Its authority should extend over all sorts of traffic, because all sorts of traffic are so entirely interwoven, as we shall find when the Federation begins to work; the business of common carriers, whether by means of rivers or railways, is so interwoven that if you do not give the commission permission to deal with all kinds of traffic, and to have all classes of such business under its jurisdiction, you may frustrate all its decisions. That would be rather a breeding of complications. Therefore, if your Inter-State Commission is to have any power at all, its power should be co-extensive with the trade and commerce clause. It should be a commission to which the Commonwealth delegates its powers, passing for that purpose a law imposing such limitations as the Commonwealth is entitled to impose, giving to the commission under that law adjudication over the whole field of intercolonial trade and commerce. That would be a logical way of dealing with the question. I think honorable... members will see that, as far as the Inter-State Commission is to have power, it would be a mistake to limit its power. Its power should extend to all matters with which the Commonwealth can deal in regard to trade and commerce, so that there will be one tribunal to which all such matters can be referred—always subject, however, to appeal to the High Court in any case where the Inter-State Commission may go wrong in its law. That latter point is one with regard to which the Drafting Committee have a strong opinion. It does seem to me to be a mistake to place words about the commission in any clause of this character, because if you give power to the state Parliaments to legislate with reference to their regulations, so far as they do not infringe upon the Commonwealth regulations, as to trade and commerce, those powers should be such powers as the state Legislatures feel to be necessary, provided they are within the terms of the Commonwealth Constitution; and, as the that, the over-riding power of the Commonwealth in the regulation of trade and commerce will be sufficient to keep the states straight. Therefore it is that I think it would be a mistake to insert words about the Inter-State Commission in this particular amendment. We should leave matters of this kind to the discretion of the state Parliament, always recollecting that over the state Parliament hangs the sword of Damocles in the shape of the High Court, and that, should it infringe on the powers committed to the Commonwealth by the Constitution, it will certainly be checked. I think the matter should be looked on in this logical spirit. It is not a matter affecting one state against any other. It would be better not to make any limitation of this sort in this clause, but to put the clause providing for the establishment of an Inter-State Commission in such wide language as will enable that commission to have jurisdiction over all such subjects; and then the object we have in view will be attained without trouble to any of us.

Mr. Reid (New South Wales). -

I wish to ask you, sir, if the amendment of Mr. Grant is relevant to this particular clause! It puzzles me rather if it is. The general words are words restraining the Commonwealth from giving preferences to one state over another.

The CHAIRMAN. -

That is why I suggested just now that this amendment should be withdrawn, that the clause as proposed by Mr. Barton should be inserted, and that afterwards Mr. Grant should move his amendment as a new clause.

Mr. Reid. -

I think that would be generally convenient, because the two things do not connect. The general words restraining the Commonwealth from giving preferences do not fit with Mr. Grant's amendment, which deals with the matter from quite another point of view—which deals with the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth over things done by the states. A restraining power in the Commonwealth to prevent certain things from being done by the states is a different class of subject altogether.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It will not take a minute to do as I suggest. I suggested, some four hours ago, that it should be done.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The proposal, then, was that this should be postponed until Monday.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No; till we met again.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Hanging it on to Sir George Turner's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

You cannot go back.

Mr. REID. -

We cannot, unfortunately, do that. I have an amendment to propose which I believe, from inquiries I have made, will meet with general acceptance, and will help us very much in New South Wales in connexion with this matter. But those of my friends from Victoria who wish to vote with me on it ask me to move that it be inserted next to the words which Sir George Turner has put in the Bill. If the suggestion of the Chairman is adopted, Mr. Grant is quite agreeable, in view of the facts I have mentioned to him, to withdraw his Amendmen

Mr. BARTON. -

Yours cannot be voted on at the present stage.

Mr. REID. -

With consent it can.

Mr. BARTON. -

Not even with consent.

Mr. REID. -

I can move it as a new clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It can be put in as a new clause.

Mr. REID. -

I will move my amendment here on the understanding that afterwards it will be added to Sir George Turner's clause, because the concession which has been extended to Mr. Grant should certainly be extended to me. Mr.
Grant, in view of the request of my Victorian friends that my amendment should follow Sir George Turner's clause, has very courteously consented to allow his amendment to stand aside for a moment, as mine does not conflict with his.

Mr. BARTON. -

It looks as if your proposal would be rather better if it came next to Mr. Grant's amendment than next to any other clause.

Mr. REID. -

I am quite agreeable to take that course, except that my friends front Victoria are willing to accept my amendment if it is put next to Sir George Turner's clause, and they are not willing to accept it if it is put next to Mr. Grant's amendment. I am only anxious to get my words in, and afterwards the thing can be put in a harmonious shape.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Tell us what are the words of your amendment.

Mr. REID. -

It does not affect Mr. Grant's amendment; it is an equitable recognition, which I think most honorable members are agreeable should be in the minds of any authority which determines this conflicting question:

Due consideration shall be given to the financial responsibilities incurred in connexion with the construction and working expenses of state railways.

That is a matter of equity.

Mr. HOWE. -

That is an instruction to the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. REID. -

To meet the views of my friends, I wish to put my amendment next to Sir George Turner's, and it will follow then in the parliamentary clause, but still, if the Parliament will have to be guided by this provision, clearly any other authority which deals with the matter will have to be guided, too. And it will be a matter of drafting to put it so. For instance, if we appoint an Inter-State Commission, clearly they will have to be guided by the same consideration, so that it will not be hostile in any sense to that clause. With consent, and on the understanding that the thing is put right afterwards in the Bill, I would ask my honorable friend (Mr. Grant) to withdraw his amendment for the present.

[P.1505] starts here

The CHAIRMAN. -

Sir George Turner's amendment is the first amendment to be withdrawn.

Mr. REID. -

Perhaps Sir George Turner will withdraw his amendment to enable Mr.
Grant to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

May I make a suggestion before the right honorable member does that? It seems to me that a difficulty may arise. Although the Right Hon. Mr. Reid's amendment is not put as a proviso, it really affects principally the amendment proposed by the Hon. Mr. Grant. Mr. Grant's amendment is to protect the imposition of railway rates by any state, so far as they may be necessary for the development of its territory, and so long as they may apply equally to goods from other states. That is the English of it, and Mr. Reid's amendment should come in there, because it is intimately allied with that protection.

Mr. SYMON. -

Why not add it to Mr. Grant's amendment?

Mr. BARTON. -

There is an intimate alliance between the two amendments. The one thing really hangs to a large extent upon the other. The question of the legality of the imposition of a rate is, according to Mr. Grant's amendment, to be decided in favour of the state if it is a development rate, and it applies equally to goods coming from other states. Then it is most natural that due consideration should be given to the fact that the state has incurred financial responsibilities in connexion with the construction and working of state railways. It would, for these reasons, be better to take the two proposals together. Mr. Reid's amendment cannot be taken at the present stage unless we report progress, and go through the laboured form of giving a fresh instruction to the committee. It could, however, be added to Mr. Grant's amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If Mr. Grant would withdraw his amendment there would be no difficulty.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is a difficulty. Mr. Reid's amendment cannot be considered now because he wishes to append it to the new clause inserted on the motion of Sir George Turner.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

He could append it to your clause, on the understanding that it should be transposed afterwards.

Mr. BARTON. -

I expected to hear that interjection. But the two proposals have nothing to do with each other. The one is a prohibition to the Commonwealth against preferences, and the other is an enactment that the state shall have due consideration in respect of its financial responsibilities. There is a way out of the difficulty. Mr. Reid's amendment can be put as an addendum to Mr. Grant's, and that is obviously the proper course to pursue. We can decide afterwards whether we will pass the whole provision as it will then stand. There is no limit to the power of the committee in the matter. If it is inserted as an amendment to the original clause there does not seem to be any ground for it to stand on. It would, therefore, have to be put as a new clause, and to come in at the new clause stage, which Mr. Reid does not want.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would point out that we are proposing to take all the new financial clauses now.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then I understand that, independently of Mr. Grant's amendment, Mr. Reid's amendment can be taken by-and-by as a new clause?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -

There can be no objection to that. In the meantime, it seems obvious that Mr. Grant's amendment will either have to be put or to be withdrawn.

Mr. REID. -

Then Mr. Grant's amendment need not be withdrawn. I will move mine as a new clause after Mr. Grant's is dealt with.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

It appears to me that the proper thing to do is to ask Mr. Grant to withdraw his amendment at present, and for Mr. Reid to move his.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You mean that Mr. Grant's amendment should be withdrawn temporarily?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -

We have had the debate on Mr. Grant's amendment, and therefore we had better deal with it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, or we shall have the debate over again.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

As far as this matter is concerned, it is in the interests of the Convention that Mr. Reid's proposal should be considered first. It may be unnecessary to consider Mr. Grant's amendment if we carry Mr. Reid's. In that event, nothing more may be required. I have been under the impression, from conversations I have had with the honorable gentlemen interested in that amendment, that they intended it to be tacked on to Sir George Turner's amendment, and that nothing else should be added. With that view I cordially agree. Speaking for myself, desiring to keep my mind clear, and not to mix up the different amendments, and looking on the proposal of the Premier of New South Wales as, perhaps, a way out of all our troubles, although it will make very little difference in the whole concern, in my opinion, I hope that the arrangement that was made between Mr. Reid and Mr. Grant will be adhered to. Mr. Grant wishes to withdraw his amendment, and I trust that he will be permitted to do so temporarily, to allow Mr. Reid's to be moved.

Mr. REID. -
Oh, you have now told Mr. Grant he may prejudice himself by taking that course.

Mr. BARTON. -
You have simply put him on the shelf.

Mr. REID. -
You have said enough to put him on his guard.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I did not mean to say anything in the way of imputation.

Mr. REID. -
It is not an imputation; it is a credit.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I do not think it will alter the point of view of Mr Grant at all. You ask him to withdraw his amendment, and from my point of view it would be more convenient if that course was adopted, and Mr. Reid moved his amendment first.

The CHAIRMAN. -
If the amendments are withdrawn by consent, and Mr. Barton's clause, as originally proposed, is inserted, I call on Mr. O'Connor to move his amendment, if he wishes. I shall then call on Mr. Grant to move his amendment as a new clause, if he wishes, and on Sir George Turner to move his amendment to it, if he wishes, so that we shall have got rid of the difficulty of tacking on to Mr. Barton's new clause provisions which do not relate to it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
To facilitate the proper carrying out of our work, I beg to withdraw my amendment.

Sir George Turner's amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -
And I beg to withdraw my amendment.
Mr. Grant's amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I also beg to withdraw my amendment.
Mr. O'Connor's amendment was withdrawn.
New clause 95A was agreed to.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I do not intend to move my amendment.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -
I beg to move-

Nothing in this Constitution shall prevent the imposition of such railway rates by any state as may be necessary for the development of its territory if such rates apply equally to goods from other states.

I would have preferred that my clause had been taken as part of Sir George Turner's new clause, because it is not complete unless it [P.1507] starts here simple and practical, and may be explain in a few words. We have had a great deal of legal acumen displayed in discussing the clause, but it has had the effect of hiding the principle involved, and of clouding the question rather than elucidating it. I take it that the words of Sir George Turner's clause give absolute control over the railways to the Federal Parliament; it is, in fact, a federation of the railways as regards their management.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If you do not spoil it by any other amendment.

Mr. GRANT. -
We are asked by Sir George Turner's clause to bring the management of the railways under the purview of the Federal Parliament. One of the first proceedings of that Parliament will be to make laws to provide for the regulation of the railways in all matters relating to the traffic, and to provide against the preferential and differential rates of which we have heard so much. If I am right in assuming that the Federal Parliament is to be all-powerful in the matter, the question is whether that Parliament would give full and proper attention to the wants and necessities of each individual state. Thinking that it would not, believing that a state should certainly be able to look after its own affairs, to some extent at least, I have taken the liberty of proposing the words which are in my motion. If these words are taken with Sir George Turner's clause, I think it follows that a state would only make laws relating to its local traffic after the Federal Parliament had made general laws applying to all the states. Therefore, I do not think there would be the difficulty which has been pointed out by preceding speakers, or that a state would be liable to have its laws which were passed for the regulation of local traffic interfered with by the Federal Parliament. A state would be careful enough in framing rates to have regard to the law already imposed by the Federal Parliament, and consequently it would exercise its discretion under the law in giving to the citizens of the state all the advantages which its Government desired for the development of the resources of the state. That, I think, is the legal position of the matter. It has been amplified and explained in various ways, but it may be put shortly in this way: That the Federal Parliament will, under Sir George Turner's clause, first frame laws and regulations to apply to all the states, and, subject to these laws and regulations, each state will have liberty to frame its own Tariff for the benefit of its own citizens, and the development of its resources. An attempt has been made to introduce into this clause the matter of an Inter-State Commission. But at present we have not decided that we will have such a commission, and, for my own part, I see no reason for it. It would be far better to leave to the Federal Parliament the constitution of an Inter-State Commission, should that Parliament deem such a body advisable or necessary. There is no need for us to trouble ourselves about the establishment of an Inter-State Commission, when it is by no means certain the services of such a commission would be required. At any rate, in regard to the subject-matter of the present discussion, I see no opportunity for the intervention of an Inter-State Commission, nor do I see any necessity for the intervention of the Federal Parliament. Having once constructed a code of laws applicable to all the states, the remedy for any breach of those laws would necessarily be an application to the High Court, as has been so much better shown by previous speakers. The application would be a very simple one. The High Court would not have to decide upon any complicated set of circumstances or on the general policy of railway administration, but it would have to decide whether a state had infringed the law made by the Federal Parliament. I do not agree with the amendment proposed by Mr. Reid, and therefore I was rather reluctant to have my amendment
I regret very much that my honorable friend has thought fit to press his amendment on now. I would be very glad if he would allow it to remain in abeyance until we have endeavoured to settle the difficulty in another form, which will, I believe, be satisfactory to all the members of the Convention. It appears to me absurd to say that nothing in the Constitution shall prevent a state imposing any rate, subject to the controlling power of the Federal Parliament, under the two clauses in regard to trade and commerce and freedom of trade.

Mr. BARTON. -

You think that the trade and commerce clause and the freedom of trade clause are sufficient.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Perhaps that is just a little too far. I think Mr. Barton will tell us that that is wholly unnecessary from one point of view. In another view, if there is to be a restriction on what we carried yesterday, then, I say, it is improper. Unless the words which I have moved, and which I am reluctantly compelled to move again, be added, I will certainly be compelled to vote against the amendment altogether. Mr. Barton seems to think we ought to give some power to the state to do everything; but I do not think we are likely to allow the Parliament of any state to impose those rates. I regret that my honorable friend has thought wise to press his amendment, because I believed we had arrived at a stage when the matter would probably be settled satisfactorily to everybody in a way that we could say was honorable to all. I am afraid that the way in which we shall have to vote now will probably injure what many of us have, during the last two or three hours, been desirous of carrying. I should be glad if my honorable friend would withdraw this until we had dealt with the other matter in a way which will satisfy all of us. If not, I beg to move-

That after "may" (line 3) the words "in the opinion of the Parliament" be inserted.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I am reluctant to do anything against the wishes of the Premier of Victoria, but I see no other way of getting a vote upon the question. I, therefore, beg to move-

That the amendment be amended by the omission of the word "Parliament," and the insertion of the words "Inter-State Commission."

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

Will there be any objection, as a matter of form, to putting the amendment as far as the words, "but in the opinion of," so that those who desire to see this matter left to the decision of either the Federal Parliament or the Inter-State Commission may have an opportunity of voting for the insertion of these words? When we have dealt with them we can go on to consider whether we can insert the word "Parliament" or the words "Inter-State Commission."

Mr. BARTON (Now South Wales). -

Would not that put us in this position: That the words "in the opinion of"
might be inserted in the new clause, so that it would be necessary that this matter should be decided according to the opinion of some authority, while the committee might determine that neither "Parliament" nor "an Inter-State Commission" should be the authority? The question put from the Chair will be "That the words proposed by the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) stand part of the proposed amendment." If that is resolved in the negative, the question will be "That the words proposed by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Holder) to be inserted be so inserted."

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will put on one side, for the present, the proposed new clause. The words we are now considering are "in the opinion of Parliament." An amendment has been moved to strike [P.1509] starts here out "Parliament" and to insert "Inter-State Commission." If that amendment is carried, I shall have to put the question "That the words 'in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission' be inserted."

Mr. BARTON. -

Do you intend, sir, to put the whole form of words "in the opinion of" each time?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -

If you do that, there will be no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will put the question "That the words 'in the opinion of Parliament' be inserted." If that is negatived I will put the question "That the words 'in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission' be inserted."

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I shall object to that. There are a large number of honorable members who believe that this matter should be subject to the opinion of either the Parliament or the Inter-State Commission; but the effect of putting the amendments in the way you have stated, sir, will be to divide the forces, and, perhaps, to beat us.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

The right honorable member's observation has no point, because if the words "in the opinion of" be carried, but neither the word "Parliament" nor the words "Inter-State Commission" inserted, the result will be worthless. The insertion of the words "in the opinion of" will not help you; they will be a mere thread of old rope.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I will ask you, Mr. Chairman, to put the amendments in the manner to which we are most accustomed. It will then be proposed that the word "Parliament" be struck out of the amendment, and the words "Inter-State Commission" inserted. If the word "Parliament" is struck out, vote will be taken on the question of the insertion of the words "Inter-State Commission." Then the question will be put "That the amendment be inserted in the clause," which will give full opportunity for the expression of opinion. I think that this course should be adopted, because I heard the word "jockeying" used just now, and I believe that it will avoid any suspicion of what is known as jockeying."

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

May I be allowed to make another suggestion, which I think will meet the difficulty? I have proposed the insertion of the words "in the opinion of the Parliament." It is quite competent for Mr. Holder to move the insertion before the word "Parliament" of the words "Inter-State Commission," and then, if that were agreed to, it would follow that the word "Parliament" would be struck out. If, however, that were not agreed to, all who desired to do so would be at liberty to vote for the word "Parliament."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have not the least objection to that course being pursued.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I must put the matter in the proper technical manner. Mr. Holder has moved to strike out the word "Parliament," with the view of inserting the words "Inter-State Commission."

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I am quite willing to adopt the course suggested by Sir George Turner. I therefore beg leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. Holder's amendment to strike out the word "Parliament" was withdrawn.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I now beg to move-

That the words "Inter-State Commission" be inserted before the word "Parliament."

The amendment was agreed to without a division.

The amendment to strike out the word "Parliament" was agreed to.

The amendment to insert, after the word "may," the words "in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission," was agreed to.

[P.1510] starts here

The CHAIRMAN. -

It is proposed to insert the following new clause, as amended, in the Bill:-

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I beg now to propose the following new clause, to follow the clause which has been inserted on the motion of Mr. Grant:-
In dealing with questions affecting railway rates, due consideration shall be given to the financial responsibility incurred in connexion with the construction and working expenses of state railways.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

This is hardly what I agreed to, and I am not going to vote for it. What I said was that I would vote for the insertion of the words commencing with "Due consideration," on the distinct understanding that those words should form part of the clause which we carried yesterday. I did that because I did not want to have any doubt in my mind as to whether the insertion of these words would give the High Court of the Commonwealth power to interfere with anything done by Parliament. This clause contains words that I strongly object to-the words "In dealing with questions affecting railway rates." If it is inserted as a new clause it will give to the High Court the very power that I and many others have been strenuously fighting against, and unless the words are withdrawn-and I will not move an amendment-I will vote against the clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

Do you wish it to read "Due consideration shall be given by the Parliament"?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No, I have not insisted on Parliament being mentioned. I wanted the amendment to read "Due consideration shall be given," and to have it added to my amendment, because it would then mean due consideration by the Parliament. The insertion of the words "by the Parliament" in this particular clause might appear to be invidious, and I do not insist on them. I must, however, ask my right honorable friend to withdraw the first words of the clause. I am quite willing to have the remaining words added to the clause that was carried yesterday.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would ask the right honorable member whether his objection is that the words "by the Parliament" are not inserted, and whether it is his intention to support this proposal on condition that in the re-drafting of the Bill it is made a part of his own clause?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do no ask to have the words "by the Parliament" inserted, because they are some what objectionable.

---

[P.1511] starts here

Mr. BARTON. -

You did not say so yesterday.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I do not say so now. They are not objectionable to me, but they were objectionable to my right honorable friend. I desire that the clause shall commence with the words "Due consideration," and it if, an honorable understanding among ourselves, which I have no doubt will be carried out, that the Drafting Committee will add them to the amendment we carried yesterday when dealing with the Bill at another stage.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

My right honorable friend is perfectly correct. That was the agreement we arrived at. But, unfortunately, from the force of circumstances, it was impossible to carry out a condition precedent, which was that I should get my proposal added on to the right honorable member's new clause. I have added the words to which he objects simply because I am now moving a new clause instead of an addendum to a clause already in the Bill. I am perfectly willing to withdraw all the words down to "due." I simply inserted them to indicate what was meant. But I am perfectly willing to withdraw all the words before the word "due," with the consent of the Convention. As my right honorable friend objects to them I cheerfully withdraw them, and leave my amendment in the form in which my right honorable friend approves of it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

As a member of the Drafting Committee, I may say that as it appears to be the desire of the committee that this new clause, if passed, should be attached to Sir George Turner's clause as an additional proviso, I have only to know it, and that will be carried out by the Drafting Committee.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I think this amendment should be printed. Mr. REID. - It is a simple thing.

Mr. GORDON. -

It is anything but a simple thing.

Mr. REID. -

We could finish it in a minute or two.

Mr. GORDON. -

If such a nebulous thing is to be attached to the clause, we ought to have an opportunity of considering it. What authority is to enforce it?

Mr. SYMON. -

An Act of Parliament. It is to be tacked on to Sir George Turner's clause.

Mr. GORDON. -

If Parliament does not enforce it, what is to be done? The whole thing is too nebulous and too uncertain.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question is that Mr. Reid have leave to amend the proposed new clause. Leave being given, I will put the clause in its amended form.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I fully agree with the remarks of my honorable colleague (Mr. Gordon). We are now having a clause introduced without the slightest opportunity for its consideration.

Mr. REID. -

I submitted it to you about an hour ago.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

And I told the honorable gentleman I did not like it.

Mr. REID. -

And this is how you are showing it?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I will give my honorable friend some of the reasons which induced me to come to the conclusion that it ought not to be accepted. First and foremost, who is it provided shall give due consideration to these questions? The Parliament. We are going to embody a provision of this sort in the Constitution. What does that mean? It means that in other matters where we do not similarly provide Parliament can deal with them without due consideration.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But they won't.

Mr. BARTON. -

Will they?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Have honorable members ever seen a precedent of such a character in a Constitution? What is to be the result of the absence of consideration, and who is to determine whether or not that consideration has been given? Is it another attempt to let in the decision of the High Court? It seems to me that if you provide as a hard matter of fact in this clause that consideration shall be given to this particular matter, you must at least imply the existence of power in some tribunal to say whether or not the provisions of the Constitution Act have been complied with. Now, there is only one tribunal for this purpose, and it seems to me possible that, after an Act has been adopted by the Federal Parliament dealing with this question of the railways, a question might subsequently be raised in the High Court as to whether or not the consideration, which by the terms of the Constitution Act was required to be given, had been given, and, if not, that the High Court should have some power with reference to the validity of that particular Act. If something of that sort is not intended, the words are so much surplusage, and the whole clause waste paper; and I object to the insertion of a provision of this sort in the Constitution. Further, what is the particular matter which the Federal Parliament is enjoined to give its consideration to? The financial responsibility of the state in connexion with a railway in respect of which the rates are under consideration. It seems to me that this is an attempt to insert a direction that its railway rates, however unfair, should not be attempted to be interfered with, except in the shape of a guarantee against loss given to the state by which the railway has been constructed.

It does not mean anything of that kind.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Then what does it mean?

Mr. BARTON. -
It is plain enough on the face of it.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I have ventured to suggest to honorable members the only reasonable meaning that can be attached to these words. Although I welcome anything in the shape of an amicable arrangement and an equitable compromise on this very much vexed question, still at the same time I think that we are introducing a blot in the Constitution by the insertion of a provision of this character, which is either meaningless or worse, and I hope it will not be assented to.

The new clause, as amended, was agreed to.
Progress was then reported.
The Convention adjourned at thirty-three minutes past ten o'clock p.m.
Friday, 25th February, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-five minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Clause 96-The Parliament may make laws constituting an Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain upon railways within the Commonwealth, and upon rivers flowing through, in, or between two or more states, the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

Amendment suggested by the Assembly of South Australia-
Omit "may make laws constituting," insert "shall constitute."

Mr. BARTON.-
This amendment involves a difference, and I am not quite prepared to say whether it will be an improvement or not; but I would like to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that, if this alteration is adopted, the clause, instead of giving the Parliament leave to make laws constituting an Inter-State Commission, will make it compulsory on the Parliament, as far as you can direct a Parliament, to pass such laws. Of course, Parliament may, nevertheless, take its own good time about doing so. I thought it well to draw the committee's attention to the nature of this proposed amendment. In view of what has been done in regard to the Bill, it might or might not be an improvement to rather widen the scope of this clause, as I mentioned yesterday, and make the powers as to the Inter-State Commission unrestricted with regard to railways and certain classes of rivers, while extending those powers to all species of traffic under the trade and commerce clauses. It suggested itself to my mind, in the course of our discussions yesterday, and I dare say it may meet with the approval of the committee, that the leave given to the Parliament to constitute an Inter-State Commission perhaps ought not to be restricted in the way in which it is restricted as the Bill at present stands. If it is necessary to give the Parliament power at all, Parliament should have that power in an unrestricted form, so as to enable the Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain the trade and commerce provisions generally.

The CHAIRMAN.-
Instead of putting, as the question, the proposal to omit, "may make laws constituting," as suggested by the Assembly of South Australia, I will put it that the first word "may" be omitted, with the view of inserting "shall," so as to enable other amendments to be proposed.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I would like to suggest to the leader of the Convention that the form in which the amendment of Mr. Grant was carried yesterday necessitates, if effect is to be given to it, the appointment of an Inter-State Commission, because it provides for certain powers to be exercised by that body. The amendment now before us turns the power of the Parliament to constitute that commission into a direction to constitute it, and there would be a difficulty, as has been pointed out by our leader, in giving effect to that provision. If we intend that there shall be an Inter-State Commission, let us say so in the Constitution. It seems to me to be idle to put in this Bill a direction to the Parliament to constitute an Inter-State Commission. If we intend that that commission shall be appointed, let us say, within the four corners of the Constitution, that there shall be an Inter-State Commission, just as we say in the Bill that there shall be certain other tribunals. Then it will simply necessitate an executive act to appoint the commission. Of course, some legislation will be necessary to regulate the powers of the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That is provided for in the next clause.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I would suggest to our leader that the better course would be, if we alter this clause, not to put in the Bill a direction to the Parliament that it shall legislate to constitute an Inter-State Commission, but rather, in so many plain words, say that there shall be an Inter-State Commission, and, then without any further interference of Parliament, that body can be created.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Who will create the Inter-State Commission?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It would be an executive appointment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Oh, surely not.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Some legislation would be necessary for the purpose of defining its powers.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, its powers and status would have to be defined.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Carrying out Mr. Kingston's view, there ought to be a provision in the Constitution that there shall be an Inter-State Commission.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Those are the very words I am suggesting. If we intend to have an Inter-State Commission, let us say so in the Constitution in the plainest possible way.

Mr. BARTON. -

As we have done about the court.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Do I understand Mr. Kingston to move an amendment?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I was suggesting one to the leader of the Convention.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not know whether I quite understood Sir George Turner correctly yesterday to say that if Mr. Grant's clause was amended there would also have to be an amendment made, at the proper time, in his own clause, dealing with the Inter-State Commission, by inserting similar words. That is the suggestion which Mr. Holder made, and I understood Sir George Turner to say that be would accept it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I accepted that, as far as I was personally concerned. I said it was a compromise, and that, to settle the matter, I was prepared to accept it.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am asking this question more as a member of the Drafting Committee than otherwise, because, looking at the clause we are now dealing with, which speaks of constituting an Inter-State Commission for the purpose of executing and maintaining the trade and commerce clauses; and then, looking at Sir George Turner's clause, I find it says—

The Parliament may make laws to provide for the execution and maintenance upon railways within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce, and so on. Well, lest there should be any danger of a repetition, or anything of that kind, I would like to know whether Sir George Turner thinks that these provisions should be placed in one clause entirely, instead of their being in separate clauses, with the possibility of repetition or clashing by our speaking in this clause of the maintenance of the trade and commerce provisions by the Inter-State Commission, and then speaking, in Sir George Turner's clause, of the Parliament making laws for that purpose? We know perfectly well that ordinarily the sub-section giving power to regulate trade and commerce gives power to make laws dealing with that subject. So, in any case where there is a legislative power proposed to be given, this is a mere repetition. Therefore, I felt a little embarrassed about the matter, and should like to know what my right honorable friend thinks about it.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

As attention has been drawn to Sir George Turner's clause, which has been carried, I beg to point out that the earlier portion of the clause seems to be somewhat limited in its operation. It is confined to making laws for "the execution and maintenance upon railways within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce." Now, that is very limited. Probably Sir George Turner will consider the advisability of making it more general.

Mr. BARTON. -

It might lead to the implication that there was no power to make laws in regard to any other avenues of trade than railways.

Dr. QUICK. -

Yes, and that it did not include roads and rivers. I think the subject might be referred to the Drafting Committee.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think that it is a mere drafting amendment that is required. We should take the sense of the Convention with regard to it.

Dr. QUICK. -

I have mentioned the matter to Sir George Turner, and no doubt be will move something to make the provision harmonize with the rest of the Bill. I agree with Mr. Barton as to striking out the words in clause 96, to which he has referred. The clause as it stands would restrict the operations of the Trade and Commerce Commission to railways and rivers only, whereas the powers of the commission should be applicable also to roads and ocean navigation between the various states.

Mr. BARTON. -

Its powers certainly should not be confined only, to the rivers described in the clause, but should extend to all rivers that are navigated.

Dr. QUICK. -

The clause would, as it stands, confer on the Inter-State Commission a more limited power than is contemplated by this committee. Of late, in Victoria, I regret to say, road traffic has been superseding the railway traffic in many respects. So that it will be desirable that the Inter-State Commission, in the constitution of which I thoroughly concur, should have jurisdiction over all avenues of communication. Consequently, the limiting words in clause 96 should be struck out. I also hope that Sir George Turner will see his way clear to giving the Inter-State Commission jurisdiction to deal with the preferences and discriminations which are contemplated by his clause. I think it should not only be sufficient hereafter to harmonize these particular provisions but also to harmonize with the other clauses of the Bill. The other clauses, as well as the Inter-State Commission clauses, give the Parliament power to make the laws, and the Inter-State Commission the jurisdiction to enforce those laws, and especially to prevent preferences and discriminations.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

It seems to me that the great question-I am not going to speak with regard to the technicalities, which are more for the legal members to deal with-which we have to decide is whether, in the first place, the Inter-State Commission is to be a non-political body-practically a judicial body-outside all political influence, and whether its decisions are to be final? I think we must all consider the question of the range of the duties of this body in view of what it is going to be. It is very clear that there are many things that might have to be adjudicated upon by Parliament, such as laws and regulations of a political character; and, if I understand the object of this tribunal aright, it is to be practically a non-political tribunal of a judicial character to interpret the Constitution. Therefore, it does seem to me that we shall have to put certain restrictions upon it, in certain directions, to indicate what its functions are. I understand that one of its chief functions will be to interpret and adjudicate upon matters arising out of the trade and commerce

Mr. HOLDER. -

To administer rather than to interpret.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Perhaps I am not using the right term.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

"Execute and maintain," those are the words.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

To "execute and maintain"; and if we are going to have a tribunal of this kind-and I assume that we have practically carried the principle, by arrangement at any rate-then we ought to decide that it shall be as nearly as possible

Mr. KINGSTON. -

An independent body.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Yes, an independent body, introduced into the Constitution very much as we have introduced the Supreme Court; a body established by the Constitution, and free from all political prejudices and unnecessary control. With our knowledge of what we intend this body to be, we have first to decide its character and scope, and the principles upon which it is to be founded, and then other matters will flow from those definitions.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I am afraid that we shall be getting ourselves into a maze if we do not take care. I would point out that great as are the advantages of having an Inter-State Commission, it is very problematical in America, at the present time, how far the Inter-State Commerce Commission there has been beneficial, and how far not. There has been considerable discussion upon the question, and no later than December, 1897, in the Forum, there was a paper by one of the members of the Inter-State Commission—Mr. Prouty, I think—who dealt with the question of pooling. This paper was the latest of a very extensive series of articles dealing with the Inter-State Commission in relation to railways, and the conclusion come to was that it is very problematical how far the commission has been beneficial and how far not.

Mr. HOLDER. -

They have to deal with private railways in America, but our Inter-State Commission will have to deal with state railways.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That point is perfectly irrelevant, if I may say so, to this question. The difficulty is exactly the same.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The two cases are different; in one case the railways are owned by private people, and in the other the state owns the railways.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But the courts have pointed out that there is no real distinction in that respect. Even private railways get their authority and powers from the state, and are practically dealt with in America, so far as the Inter-State Commission is concerned, as state corporations. Much as I am in favour of the constitution of such a commission, I think it is a mistake to constitute that body under the Constitution. I think it should be created by Parliament, with certain duties allotted to it. What will be the result of constituting the commission under the Constitution? You will have the Parliament in certain respects independent within its own sphere; you will have the Supreme Court independent of and checking the Parliament; and then you will have the Inter-State Commission deriving its powers and functions from the Constitution itself, and therefore independent of and superior to Parliament within its sphere, independent of the Supreme Court, and of every other power in the Commonwealth. I am entirely in favour of the Inter-State Commission or some such body being appointed, but I want it to be created by the Parliament, endowed with its proper functions, and, as in America, letting the Federal Parliament have power to modify the laws from time to time according as it sees the necessity for so doing. Sir George Turner's clause, as it has been passed, provides that the Parliament may make laws for the execution upon railways of the trade and commerce provisions, and may forbid improper and unjust discriminations and preferences. But if we say that there shall be an Inter-State Commission instituted by and deriving its authority from the Constitution, and deriving also its powers from the Constitution, having express power under the Constitution to forbid any preferences and discriminations which it may deem unjust, Parliament has no power to interfere, and the commission is finally independent alike of the Supreme Court and of Parliament. We may find ourselves in this position: We shall have a tribunal called into existence which will be practically the fifth wheel of the coach, and we shall find ourselves, perhaps, with an incubus which we shall be glad to get rid of, but which we cannot remove. I think we should make provision for the Parliament having power to create an Inter-State Commission—having the duty ascribed to it, if you like, to create that Inter-State Commission; but certainly what we ought not to do is to create it ourselves, endowing it with such powers and functions as may hereafter make it obstructive to the whole machinery of government.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I voted with Mr. Isaacs against giving power to the Inter-State Commission to protect state railways against federal legislation. We were beaten on that division. I was very sorry for it, but I am bound to loyally abide by the decision of the Convention, and to do what I can to give effect to it. It seems to me that when in one clause you provide that the decision of the Federal Parliament on the subject of state rates can be reviewed or abrogated by the Inter-State Commission, if you are going to allow the Constitution to remain in this shape, that the Federal Parliament can either appoint that commission or hold its hand, you run a very great risk of the Federal Parliament refusing to do anything, or delaying to do anything, to call into existence a body which will in the slightest degree review the Parliament's decisions. And although I voted as I have already mentioned yesterday, I call the attention of this Convention to the necessity of creating, so far as they can, this Inter-State Commission independently of any subsequent legislative Act on the part of the Federal Parliament. As has been stated by Mr. McMillan, it is necessary, if you are going to intrust this commission with powers of the character which have been suggested, that you should secure it in its office and render it altogether, so far as you can, absolutely free from control by the Federal Parliament. What is the good, I venture to ask, of having a commission to review, to some extent, the decisions of the Federal Parliament on a matter of state rates, if that commission owes its existence to the Federal Parliament, and is subject to the Parliament for the continuance of its existence, and if its constitution may be repealed or altered at any time?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think the idea was to give a fixed tenure.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes. What was provided in the clauses which came before the Constitutional Committee in Adelaide was that there should be an Inter-State Commission; that that Inter-State Commission should be constituted by the Constitution, and that its members should be practically independent of the Parliament. They will have power to declare that, notwithstanding federal legislation, state rates of a certain character are essential to the development of the territory of a state, and shall not be rendered nugatory by federal legislation.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is, only state rates which may in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, be necessary for the development of the country.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes; but as you put that matter altogether within the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, it is their decision on the point as to whether those rates are necessary which decides whether or not the federal legislation shall apply. The Federal Parliament can legislate as it chooses, but as long as the Inter-State Commission certifies that the rates sought to be attacked by the Federal Parliament are necessary for state development, the Act of the Federal Parliament will not apply. I will ask honourable members of this Convention: If the Inter-State Commission is to have power to abrogate, if it thinks necessary, federal legislation, is it not absolutely necessary, as pointed out by Mr. McMillan, that this body should be independent of the Parliament, and should be as secure within the realm of its jurisdiction as the Judges of the High Court? This matter was thoroughly recognised by the Constitutional Committee which met in Adelaide. I think that the provisions relating to the constitution of the commission were first brought under our notice by Mr. O'Connor, but certain it is that, as the Bill came up from the Constitutional Committee, in Adelaide, there were provisions dealing with this most important subject. They were as follows:-"The members of the commission." In the first instance, I think, it was provided "may." That was a little defect, but it was cured by the subsequent provision. "The members of the commission shall hold office during good behaviour; shall be appointed by the Governor-General, with the advice of the Federal Executive, may be removed by the Governor-General by such advice, but only upon an address from both Houses of Parliament in the same session praying for such removal; shall receive such remuneration as Parliament may from time to time determine, but such remuneration shall not be diminished during their tenure of office." By a provision of that sort security was given to the members of the Inter-State Commission in the discharge of their high and important functions similar to the security which is given to the occupants of the highest official positions. This Convention having now determined in the clearest possible terms to confide to the Inter-State Commission, in its absolute discretion, the settlement of the question as to whether or not state rates are necessary for local territorial development, and so should be exempted from the operation of federal legislation, I do think that it is a necessary corollary that we should secure the members of that commission in the discharge of their duties almost to the same extent as we secure the Judges of the High Court.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

What became of that provision in Adelaide?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It was struck out; but there was not, in Adelaide, a positive declaration, as there has been here, that in a matter of this sort, state against Federation, the Inter-State Commission is to decide. I suggest, therefore, to the leader of the Convention that he should do two things-first provide that there shall be this commission, and follow that up by a clause similar to that which we had in Adelaide, securing the members of the commission in their offices, making them independent, removing from them all considerations of fear or favour which might embarrass them in the discharge of the duties intrusted to them.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

There are two considerations involved. The first is whether the Constitution should enact that there shall be an Inter-State Commission; second, whether there should be some enactment in the Constitution guaranteeing the status and constitution of the committee, as proposed in Adelaide. With regard to the first question, a very important matter to be considered is the form which the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's amendment is to take subsequently. It will be very important to consider the form the amendment giving power to the Parliament to forbid discriminations will eventually take. If that amendment provides that the Inter-State Commission is to be the judge as to discriminations and preferences, I do not think there will be any necessity to insist upon the appointment of the Inter-State Commission by the Constitution, because then the question with regard to the exercise of power by the Inter-State Commission can only arise after the Inter-State Commission has been appointed and has acted with regard to any of these questions of rates. If, on the other hand, the provision in Sir George Turner's amendment remains as it is, that is to say, that Parliament may determine preferences and discriminations, then, in order to carry out Mr. Grant's amendment passed yesterday, it will be necessary to enact that there shall be a commission.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is no doubt that Mr. Grant's amendment creates a great difficulty.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is Sir George Turner's amendment that creates a difficulty.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I understood from Sir George Turner last evening that on the recommittal he will be willing to alter his amendment, so as to make it refer to the opinion of the Inter-State Commission. If we have my honorable friend's assurance to that effect—and I think that is the opinion of the Convention—we may, as a matter of drafting, amend the right honorable gentleman's amendment to provide for that, and then there will be no necessity to do anything more than to give the right to Parliament to constitute the Inter-State Commission.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I shall be very glad if the honorable member will tell us more fully exactly what he means, and how he would propose to make it read.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The necessity for the amendments which were carried last night arose from my right honorable friend's amendment carried the day before, which was as follows:-

The Parliament may make laws to provide for the execution and maintenance upon railways within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce, and particularly to forbid such preferences and discriminations as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable, or to be unjust to any state.

An amendment has been carried upon that, as follows:-

Nothing in this Constitution shall prevent the imposition of such railway rates by any state as may, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, be necessary for the development of its territory, if such rates apply equally to the goods from other states.

Supposing that the right honorable gentleman's amendment remains as it is, this will happen: That Parliament will legislate to forbid the discriminations or preferences; but the protection given under Mr. Grant's amendment cannot operate until the Inter-State Commission has been appointed.

Mr. ISAACS. - Protection!

Mr. OCONNOR. - Protection or exemption, or anything you like.

Mr. ISAACS. - There is a very great difference.

Mr. OCONNOR. - That is to say, the restriction of the power of Parliament to deal as it thinks fit with the imposition of rates.

Mr. ISAACS. - But Mr. Grant's amendment is only a restriction of the power of the state to impose rates.

Mr. OCONNOR. - I am quite aware of that; but before Parliament can come to a conclusion as to whether a rate is discriminating or preferential, under Mr. Grant's amendment, it must take into consideration the question of whether, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, it is necessary for the development of the territory. Before that consideration can come before Parliament there must be an Inter-State Commission to pronounce an opinion upon it.

Mr. KINGSTON. - Surely not.

Mr. HIGGINS. - At all events, the protection given to New South Wales does not arise until there is an Inter-State Commission.

Mr. OCONNOR. - Exactly; that is another way of putting it.

Mr. KINGSTON. - Not if your construction is right, because you say there must be a commission before Parliament can legislate.

Mr. OCONNOR. - It is the same thing. Let me put it in another way. Without the appointment of an Inter-State Commission, legislation may take place under Sir George Turner's clause dealing with discriminations and preferences; but, by Mr. Grant's amendment, Parliament has not a free hand in dealing with these discriminations and preferences. Its hand is restrained if in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission a rate has been made for the development of territory, and, if so, that must be considered. Very well, I say that Parliament cannot have that element before it until the Inter-State Commission has decided or pronounced an opinion. That means it is necessary for the Inter-State Commission to be appointed; that is, if things remain as they are. If that is so, it would be clearly necessary in my view to provide mandatory words in the Constitution that the Inter-State Commission shall be appointed and to provide the way in which it is to be appointed. On the other hand, if I understand the honorable member's suggestion as carried out yesterday, that is to say, that he is willing to amend his clause so as to make the consideration of preferences and discriminations subject to the opinion of the Inter-State Commission-and the honorable member seemed to assent to that suggestion yesterday-then, inasmuch as the power to interfere with rates cannot come into existence until the appointment of the Inter-State Commission, the limitations cannot come into operation until the exercise of the power, so that both will come into operation together, and there is no necessity, therefore, to provide in a mandatory way for the appointment of a commission.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Cannot Parliament legislate in the first instance? Does not the Inter-State Commission declare an exemption afterwards? Parliament is not bound to hold its hand until the Inter-State Commission deals with the question.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I did not say or intend to say that. What I say is that the full effect of Mr. Grant's amendment cannot arise to any state until the Inter-State Commission is appointed; therefore it would be unjust to leave to Parliament the unfettered power to deal with these rates, and, at the same time, provide no machinery by which protection could be given.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is not Sir George Turner's clause directed merely to the power of Parliament to annul any rate that is made by a state which it thinks is unjust-I mean the latter part of it?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not think so. I think Sir George Turner's clause would enable Parliament to pass an Act describing what shall be preferences and discriminations.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I agree with that.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Probably that would be done; a particular rate would not be selected, but classes of preferences and discriminations would be described in a general way; in other words, a general principle would be laid down.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But if the honorable member is going to have it altered, as suggested, that the latter part shall read as the Inter-State Commission may deem unjust, then Parliament will not have that power.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I think it would, because Parliament would have power to obtain the opinion of the Inter-State Commission on any question, not only as to a special rate, but as to a class of rates, or upon the principle on which discriminations and preferences should be dealt with.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Would the Parliament be bound to carry out that opinion, or could it carry out any other opinions it thought fit?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If the clause is amended as I suggest, and as the right honorable gentleman seemed to assent to yesterday, by making the Inter-State Commission the judge of discriminations and preferences, then Parliament could not legislate without the opinion of the Inter-State Commission with regard to this matter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And would have to legislate upon that opinion.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Would have to legislate upon that opinion, or, if it passed legislation in such a way that the Inter State Commission afterwards considered was improper, the Inter-State Commission might set aside any rate or any principle of rate decided upon.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It would never do to let Parliament pass a law which the Inter-State Commission could set aside. That would be terrible.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

There must be one or the other. If you set up an Inter-State Commission for the performance of any duty you must enable it to perform that duty effectually. The commission must be able to consider the principle of discrimination and preference before Parliament passes any enactment, or it must have the power to decide any matter by the application of principles which it thinks desirable to apply. If the suggestions to amend the right honorable member's clause by putting in certain words relating to the Inter-State Commission is carried into effect, it will not be necessary at the present time to provide that there shall be an Inter-State Commission, because, inasmuch as the Parliament will not be able to legislate effectually until there is such a commission, the commission will probably be appointed for both purposes. I hold the opinion very strongly that, inasmuch as it is quite evident from the form in which these provisions dealing with railways and rivers are taken now, it is absolutely necessary that there should be an Inter-State Commission to deal with the questions which will be raised. If there is one thing more important than another in the constitution of the commission, it is that it shall be absolutely above every kind of prejudice or influence which may come from provincial sources. If it is important that not only the Judges of the High Court, but that all the Judges, shall be given a tenure of office which will place them above all political interference, surely it is still more important that individuals who have to deal with matters of the highest interest affecting states, interests

which may arouse the most intense political excitement, should be placed upon the same footing of independence. The only way to secure their independence is to guarantee it in the Constitution. Now that we have arrived at the opinion that there should be an Inter-State Commission, and that it should be charged with real duties, we should take care to insure that the power is exercised by a commission which will be in every sense worthy to carry out the duties imposed upon it. Therefore, I should like a statement from the Premier of Victoria as to what his intentions are with regard to the amendment of the clause which was inserted upon his motion.
That may operate upon the question whether we should or should not make this provision mandatory by the appointment of a commission. Whatever the honorable member's view may be, I think that it is very desirable that, if we give the power to appoint the commission, some provision such as has been read should be inserted in the Constitution.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think the honorable and learned member's remarks rather illustrate the tangle into which we have got with regard to these railway rates. But, having got into it, we must try to discover the best way out. I do not quite agree with the honorable and learned member as to the effect of what we have done, so far as it can be ascertained. It appears to me that under the clause put in upon the motion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, the Federal Parliament has the absolute right, at the earliest possible moment it chooses, to deal with the entire railway question. Its power to deal with it seems to me absolutely and entirely unrestricted so far as this particular clause is concerned. I think that that was my right honorable friend's intention when he moved the clause. Running upon parallel lines with it is the power of the state to do as it pleases-subject to a restriction I shall point out-in regard to railway rates within its own territory. The moment that the Federal Parliament has dealt with the entire subject-of course upon general terms, not dealing with any particular rate or any particular class of goods-if its legislation conflicts with what has been done by the state, the Inter-State Commission will come into play and will declare whether any portion of what has been done by the state is to be supported upon the ground contained in the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Grant).

Mr. KINGSTON. -
The commission would have power to declare an exemption.

Mr. SYMON. -
It might be expressed in that way. The Inter-State Commission will have a function similar to that possessed by the High Court, but in regard to other matters. It will declare whether the rate imposed by the state is in conflict with the legislation of the several Parliaments. If it is in conflict, there will come the further inquiry whether it is to be exempted from the bar placed upon it by the Federal Parliament, upon the ground that it is necessary for the development of the state territory.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The Inter-State Commission must decide whether the rate is necessary for the development of the state territory.

Mr. SYMON. -
Yes. If that provision were not in the Constitution the matter would be left to the Parliament of the state, whose enactments might be over-ridden by the Parliament of the Commonwealth. If by virtue of the amendment agreed to last night the Inter-State Commission is now substituted, that body will inquire into all the necessities of the case and give its certificate upon the facts. This certificate will give an immunity to the particular rate or class of rates in connexion with which it is granted from the legislation of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It would bring the rate within the constitutional exception.

Mr. SYMON. -
My object is to point out that, however defective in some respects these provisions may or may not be, there will be no conflict between the powers of the Federal Parliament and of the state in relation to railway matters which may not be adjusted by the Inter-State Commission. This being so, it seems to me that the introduction of the Inter-State Commission into the clause providing for this exemption renders it necessary to make it obligatory under the Constitution to appoint the commission. It would be absurd to give a protection—I call it an immunity—to the state in relation to these railway matters, depending upon the action of an Inter-State Commission or any other body, if we did not make the creation of such a body imperative. It seems to follow almost as a consequent amendment on what we have done that the permissive provision in the clause should be made obligatory. When we have done this it follows that as there is an element of policy, the existence of which no one can deny, it will be even more necessary than in the case of the Federal High Court—which is not to deal with matters of policy, or matters tainted with policy, to use the expression of another speaker—that the tribunal which we are creating should be above the breath of political intrigue. To secure this, I think, some provision should be inserted similar to the provisions which we have inserted in regard to the Judges of the High Court. Whatever may have been the case as the Bill left us after the Adelaide session, it seems to be imperative now, to give effect to what has already been done, that we should introduce into the Constitution provisions binding the Federal Parliament to create an Inter-State Commission, and placing the Inter-State Commission, when created, on a level which will raise it above the possibility of the suspicion that its judgments or actions have been in any way influenced by political considerations.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I have to make a suggestion. I foresaw this tangle last night, and therefore I voted against the insertion of the words "in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission," although I should prefer to see these rates imposed subject to the opinion of an Inter State Commission, rather than subject to the opinion of Parliament, for obvious reasons. I foresaw that it would render obligatory at first sight the creation of an Inter-State Commission, and I hoped that we should leave the hands of the Federal Parliament absolutely free in regard to the creation of such a body. I think that the argument of the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) was very logical. He said: "If you are going to protect New South Wales in regard to rates which, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, are properly developmental rates, you must have an Inter-State Commission to give effect to that protection." At the same time, I agree with the Attorney-General of Victoria that it would be a lamentable thing to put this obligation upon the Federal Parliament. I would suggest this way out of the tangle: That we should make the creation of the Inter-State Commission permissive as hitherto, with the understanding that upon recommittal we strike out the words "in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission."

Mr. HOLDER. -
You will not be successful in having them struck out,

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I think that the honorable member has conceived-and I say it with all respect-an undue prejudice, an undue sense of danger, in regard to the courts.

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am voicing the opinion of the great majority of the people.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The honorable member is not in order in rearguing this question.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I did not mean to do so. I was merely about to refer to it in reply to the honorable member's interjection. My suggestion is this: It is now put to us that we must make the appointment of the Inter State Commission obligatory. I agree that you must make it obligatory if you preserve the clause in its entirety, retaining the words

I in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission," but I hope that we shall not retain those words. With regard to the Inter-State Commission, if they have merely to deal with matters arising under the provision in regard to freedom of trade and intercourse and preferential rates, there will not be enough work for them to do.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Their powers would be much larger than that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I feel that we shall have a difficulty in getting the people to accept a Constitution which makes the creation of a team of highly-paid officers obligatory upon the Federal Parliament. The argument which I and others have heard so frequently outside, and it is in the main an unjust argument, is that this Constitution will create a number of highly-paid officers who will have but very little work to do. What I want is that the Federal Parliament should be left free, although I thoroughly agree with my friend (Mr. O'Connor) that as a corollary to the amendment of Mr. Grant's clause—an amendment which Mr. Grant does not want-you make the creation of an Inter-State Commission obligatory. I hope we shall not make it obligatory, and then, if there be a recommittal, Mr. Grant's clause can be struck out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I do not think it is necessary, when we constitute this Inter-State Commission, to have highly-paid officers permanently. I do not anticipate that we are going to appoint an Inter-State Commission which may work for one or two months in the year and be paid for the whole year.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But the Inter-State Commission must be absolutely independent of Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I take it the Inter-State Commission would be appointed by Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

By the Executive, you mean,

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Well, they would be appointed probably by the Executive, and it is questionable whether they would be removable except under certain conditions. I think we are mixing up questions which ought to be kept separate. When we come to discuss the tenure of their office, I shall be perfectly prepared to leave them fairly independent. At the same time, there is no necessity to pay high salaries to men who will only work a portion of the year. I make these remarks in reply to Mr. Higgins, who seems to think it is necessary to have a permanent body drawing high fees.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I did not say there should be a large staff. What I said was that the Inter-State Commission should be independent of Parliament, and have no fear in consequence of any action they may take.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

My honorable friend said we were creating a large body of men drawing heavy salaries.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What I said was simply that you must have a body of highly-paid men with a fixed tenure.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

With regard to the main difficulty, I confess we appear to have got into a tangle. My own desire is that we should leave the sole decision of all questions to Parliament, so that Parliament may, on finding their decisions to be wrong, have power, from time to time, to amend legislation so as to act fairly and justly to all the states. The amendment proposed by Mr. Grant has undoubtedly created a difficulty, and does not carry out the design of the mover, and certainly does not carry out my desire. My desire is that there should be restriction on the power of the Federal Parliament. My desire is that, while we give to the Federal Parliament power to make laws for the execution and maintenance of all provisions as to forbidding preferences which are unreasonable and unjust, that power should be restricted in cases where the rates are imposed purely for the development of the country. In the case of such rates, the power of the Parliament to declare them unjust or unreasonable should cease. I should be glad to see the amendment altered so as to carry out our desire. I think we should leave the Bill as it is, and as it was when I spoke yesterday—that we should leave it to the Parliament to make those laws. I am prepared to go further and say that Parliament shall not constitute an Inter-State Commission.

Mr. DOBSON. - Leave it permissive.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - It might be left permissive, or I am perfectly willing to fall in with the views of those who think the power ought to be made compulsory. We ought not, however, to go the length of constituting an Inter-State Commission in the Constitution. If we leave it to the Federal Parliament to appoint such a commission, Parliament will have full power to rectify any difficulties which may occur.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - You would give certain status to the members of the commission?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - If an Inter-State Commission is appointed, it should have a fairly independent tenure, something like that of the Railways Commissioners. I do not believe in having an Inter-State Commission which is to be a mere farce, or a parliamentary puppet which could be turned out of existence. That would not be a proper provision to put in the Constitution. I do not go the length that Mr. Kingston goes in saying we, in the Constitution, should appoint an Inter-State Commission. I am quite willing to leave the matter optional. Having done that we still leave to Parliament powers to make laws providing for the execution of the Act in regard to trade and commerce, and to forbidding preferences. But I would leave it to the Inter-State Commission to carry out those laws from time to time. In the first or second year of the existence of the Federal Parliament, it would be impossible to draw a hard-and-fast line which would be applicable ten years afterwards. We are new country with new developments, and as years go on, what might be just and proper now might in the future become improper and unjust. I, therefore, think we ought to give power to the Federal Parliament to constitute the commission, and leave the carrying out of the laws to a body with a proper tenure.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Would the Inter-State Commission not be administering matters in connexion with the Constitution?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Parliament could only pass laws where the powers to pass those laws are conferred by the Constitution.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You want the Parliament to lay down rules and the Inter-State Commission to administer them.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I think that is the only course we can properly pursue. I desire to make this body a good body.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Your view seems to be in direct antagonism to the other view.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Which other view?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

To the other view that in the Constitution it shall be provided that Parliament shall administer the laws.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I object to the question of the Inter-State Commission being made obligatory in the Constitution. Let Parliament be bound if necessary to adopt this Inter-State Commission, and give that Inter-State Commission as reasonable and proper a tenure as may be thought fit. Parliament, from time to time, can declare what the laws are to be within the terms of the Constitution, and it would, then be the duty of the Inter-State Commission, independent of Parliament, to carry out the laws.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I hope the clause will be left as it stands, making it permissive, and not obligatory, on the Parliament to appoint an Inter-State Commission. While there may be great force in argument of Mr. Kingston, that what we did yesterday would logically point to our making the Inter-State Commission part of the Constitution, we must all admit that what we did yesterday was a compromise. I can quite understand that as the federal spirit and the desire for harmony increases, we shall hardly, if ever, desire to call into play an Inter-State Commission. With Mr. Higgins, I think it would be a very great mistake to compel Parliament to appoint highly-paid officers. As the practical Premier for Victoria has pointed out, there is no reason why the members of the Inter-State Commission should be permanently paid. They might be called together and paid 100 guineas for a small case or 200 guineas for a large case. My thoughts are tending in the direction that when federation comes about it will be found that two colonies, if they have any dispute, would be quite willing in nine cases out of ten to have that dispute settled by their own officers through negotiation, or, if not, would probably consent to have the dispute settled by the High Court. In Victoria and New South Wales are the most skilled railway men in the Southern Hemisphere. When the names of Mr. Speight and Mr. Eddy are mentioned, where could equal or superior men be found? Any dispute which might arise might, under the circumstances, be referred to a body certainly not more capable than the officers advising them. I do not believe that men would be found to form an Inter-State Commission equal in experience to those now managing the railways of this country. A simple course would be to let the railway experts go before the High Court in order to strengthen the case, and then to let the High Court decide. I do not believe that, for years to come, an Inter-State Commission will be necessary.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

For the purpose of taking the sense of the Convention, I hope the leader (Mr. Barton) will see his way to accept the suggestion. I move that the words "There shall be" be inserted before "the."

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment to strike out "may" will be withdrawn for the present, in view of putting the proposal of Mr. Kingston to insert "There shall be" before "the."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think there may be some difficulty about this. If it be stated in the Constitution that there shall be an Inter-State Commission, having certain powers, I am not sure that it might not be interpreted to mean a direction to the Commonwealth to appoint a commission at once. That would not do. It is intended that the powers of the commission shall be within the limits of the Constitution as defined by law. That might raise a difficulty of interpretation, and I suggest to Mr. Kingston that he should leave it-

"Parliament shall constitute an Inter-State Commission." I was not in the chamber when Sir George Turner spoke, and he will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand he seems to think that the Inter-State Commission should merely have such powers as the Parliament may grant to it. I think the Inter-State Commission should have some of the powers expressed in the Constitution in regard to water traffic.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

What I said was, that I thought Parliament should declare, generally in regard to trade and commerce, and that the Inter-State Commission should be practically an independent body to carry out the law of Parliament from time to time; that law being, of course, in the Constitution.
Mr. BARTON. -

We are about to say that an Inter-State Commission shall be appointed to execute and maintain the Commonwealth provisions relating to trade and commerce. I understand that the general sense of the Convention is that the restriction to railways and rivers should disappear; that the Inter-State Commission should deal with commerce throughout the states without any restriction. Then the clause would read:-

The Parliament shall make laws constituting an Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain within the Commonwealth the provisions of this Constitution relating to commerce.

That seems to me to be the charter of the Inter-State Commission.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Would you add "and the laws for the time being passed by the Parliament"?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think that is unnecessary. They will have to maintain the constitutional provisions with regard to trade and commerce. It is obvious that we must give a certain amount of discretion to Parliament, and Parliament having a commission already in existence will not pass any laws relating to trade and commerce without leaving the determination of those laws to the Inter State Commission. It may be only a difference of form, but I think there would be no advantage in adding the words suggested. We are giving in the Constitution power to the Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain within the Commonwealth the provisions relating to trade and commerce. Then we have in Mr. Grant's amendment the determination of certain other matters confided to the Inter-State Commission, and I understand that the Right Hon. Sir George Turner consented yesterday to have similar words inserted in his clause. It is clear then that the provisions we are inserting in the Constitution in relation to trade and commerce will be under the jurisdiction of the Inter-State Commission, and that is really all we want. We might go further and make some provision as to the laws, but that is unnecessary. It is inconceivable that Parliament would pass laws, and take away from the Inter-State Commission the power of adjudicating on them. What I do want to impress on honorable members is that there is no necessity to say that there shall be an Inter-State Commission. If we say that Parliament shall constitute an Inter-State Commission, then we make it clear that it is the Parliament, and not the Executive, that is deal with the commission in the first instance and to define its powers. That is necessary, as we might otherwise find the Executive Government taking this as a direction to appoint an Inter-State Commission before a statute had been passed, and then there might be some trouble with the High Court.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I do not propose to differ from the leader of the Convention in regard to the wording of the clause, but I should like to see the appointment of this Inter-State Commission provided for completely in the Constitution, so that the states and the Federal Parliament would know what body would have the right to decide this vexed question of state developmental rates, and what powers it would possess in that direction. It does not appear to me to be of very considerable importance whether we say that there shall be an Inter-State Commission or that Parliament shall constitute an Inter-State Commission, so long as we omit to deal with the matter within the four corners of the Constitution. In the way we have it at present, even with the amendment I have suggested, it will be necessary before the Inter-State Commission can be properly constituted, or can have any powers of adjudication or administration, that the Parliament should deal with the subject. The carrying of the amendment I have suggested would not therefore entirely effect what I desire. I should infinitely prefer that the leader of the Convention should introduce complete clauses dealing with the whole subject, and not leave to an Act of the Federal Parliament, which may be interested in connexion with the settlement of disputes, the regulation of the powers and the determination of the existence of the body which is to decide these disputes. If the Hon. Mr. Barton cannot see his way to deal with the whole thing completely in the Bill, somewhat on the lines on which the High Court is constituted, and armed with the necessary authorities for the discharge of its duties, I shall not divide the committee on the question of whether or not there should be a declaration that there "shall be an Inter-State Commission" or that "Parliament shall constitute an Inter-State Commission."

Mr. BARTON. -

I shall adopt the honorable member's suggestion as to the tenure of office of the commission, and I may propose the reinsertion of the clause brought up by the Constitutional Committee in Adelaide, with perhaps the omission of the third sub-section.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I am obliged to the honorable member, but perhaps he will go further and completely call into existence a body of this description without having any necessary recourse to the Federal Parliament. It is a body which should depend on the Constitution for its existence and authority, and it should not be left to the Federal Parliament to make or to mar it.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

It would be a great mistake to make the appointment of the Inter-State Commission compulsory. It will have to be composed of experts, and they will have to be well paid, although they will have very little to do. We cannot appoint a tribunal at a cost of a few hundred pounds per annum to decide on issues which, though seldom arising, are of such magnitude. We agreed to an amendment last night providing that in considering railway rates the amount of capital invested and the necessity of making the railways profitable should be taken into account. In that way we require the Inter-State Commission to act as financial experts, and to say whether a certain rate, which would be held to be a discriminating rate but for the fact that the railway would be run at a great loss without it, would be tolerated even when in many respects it is against the principles of the Constitution. That amendment was agreed to last night, and agreed to, as I think, very hurriedly. In addition to this, there is a possibility that the Inter-State Commission may be a failure. There is an article in the Forum of September last which shows that the Inter-State Commission in America, taking into consideration the powers with which it is vested, is a failure. In its seventh report the commission asked for powers of rate-making and other powers of interfering with rates which are not simply interstate rates, and it says that without these powers the work it is called upon to do by Parliament will be frustrated.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

It is dealing with private companies.

Mr. GLYNN. -

No doubt; but if the Inter-State Commission in America has been to some extent a failure simply because it cannot make certain rates we may use that fact as an argument for the statement that if we constitute a body here without arming it with extraordinary powers it may also be a failure. In America there are 44 states, with a railway mileage of 180,000 miles. Here we have the affairs of about three states to deal with. Here we are going to constitute a body-to do what? Not to interfere with general rates, but simply to determine whether any rate is preferential and contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. There will be very few meetings of the commission, but the members of it will have to be well paid because they will require to be experts. I would also call attention to this fact, that by making the appointment of the Inter-State Commission compulsory, and giving it power to carry out the general provisions of the Constitution with regard to trade and commerce, you will enable it to exercise control over inter-colonial telegraphic rates and other matters. Is it contemplated that the commission shall be a jack-of-all-trades, having to decide on river rates, and to determine such questions as to what is territorial development, what is the financial returns of the various lines of railways, and what is a fair intercolonial telegraphic rate?

Mr. BARTON. -

All they can do is to maintain the provisions relating to trade and commerce. They will have nothing to do with the question of telegraphic rates.

Mr. GLYNN. -

It has been laid down in America that the Inter-State Commission could get from Parliament power to exercise control over the telegraphic rates.

Mr. BARTON. -

Parliament could give them that power, but it is not likely that it will do so.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

We are not handing over the posts and telegraphs to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I understand that, but what I say is that if Parliament did not legislate at all with regard to telegraphic rates, the federal tribunal could say whether any one rate was unduly fair to one colony and unfair to another. If we appoint a commission with general powers with regard to trade and commerce similar to those we are vesting in the Supreme Court, we, by implication, give power to that commission to deal with intercolonial telegraphic rates. We should not do that. The Railways Commissioners of New South Wales and Victoria, Messrs. Oliver and Mathieson, point out, although it may be said that they are prejudiced, that the appointment of such a commission is altogether unnecessary. They state that if the matter is left to themselves they can do all that is required, and they point out also that the duties of the commission will be altogether different from those which fall within the scope of the commission in America.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

There is nothing in the clause to prevent the Railways Commissioners of the respective colonies being members of the commission.

Mr. BARTON. -

Very possibly the chief commissioner of each colony will be appointed.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That may be done, but I do not think it will be, because the Inter-State Commission will have to deal, not only with the question of railway rates, but with the question of the development of territory. Surely you are not going to appoint a board of Railways Commissioners to determine what is the true policy of development, say, in New South Wales.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

They might form a part of the board.

Mr. GLYNN. -

If the difficulties I have indicated exist, we should not make the appointment of the Inter-State Commission compulsory. There is a feeling in the Convention that the railways will be taken over in five or six years, and is the Inter-State Commission to remain after that time? It must, if its appointment is made compulsory, because it will still have some duties to perform in connexion with the rivers and the telegraph systems. It will practically have nothing to do, but we should be unable to abolish it. I would, therefore, far rather leave the matter to the Federal Parliament, and take the risk of any little political influence that might be brought to bear on the work of the commission. That would be the least of two evils, and, if a division is taken, I shall vote against the compulsory appointment of the commission under the Constitution.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I am entirely in sympathy with the position which my right honorable friend has taken up. But I go a little further than he does. I confess, sir, that my present view has only arisen in consequence of what has been done during the past few days. If nothing had been done of the character which has been done, I should have been perfectly satisfied to have followed the structure of the Bill. But we have to recognize the altered complexion which has been put on the Bill, and a most important alteration it is. From the first moment, I think, we considered the propriety of having some authority to check any infringement of the spirit of intercolonial free trade and intercourse. I think the universal idea was that there should be some tribunal appointed to look after such matters, and that is the structure of the Bill. But since these words have been inserted, which, instead of leaving such matters to an independent tribunal, put on the Parliament the duty of practically doing this work, we will have to make up our minds once and for all whether we are going to have one or two tribunals to deal with these matters. If we have two, they are bound to conflict; I think it follows that there must be one, and one only. Then the question is, is that one to be an Inter-State Commission, or is it to be the Parliament? I think most of us will agree that for obvious reasons, which we need not waste time in mentioning, a compact commission would relieve the Parliament of an infinite amount of labour, and, perhaps, of conflict, as it consists of not one body but two independent bodies. If these matters were all left to independent experts the time of the Parliament would be saved, and many other good results would come. I go further, and say that only some such tribunal will give perfect confidence to all parties, and such a tribunal is calculated to give perfect confidence to all parties. The question is, which is to be the tribunal? Is Parliament to be a rate-supervising, rate-revising, and rate-annulling body, or are we to have a special body for that purpose? I think the Convention will probably see that it is worth the trouble and expense, in view of all the difficulties and the feeling engendered, to have some independent tribunal. If we are to have an independent tribunal, we must make it at least as independent as is the Federal High Court. We should follow the language used in connexion with that body. I think my right honorable friend will agree with me that, instead of using "shall" for "may," we should insert a provision of this sort:—

The power of executing and maintaining the provisions contained in this Constitution relating to trade and commerce upon railways and rivers within the Commonwealth shall be vested in an Inter-State Commission.

That is the language which is used in another part of the Bill in reference to the High Court, and it is used deliberately to make the High Court a part of the Constitution, to prevent the Parliament from destroying it or repealing it.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Make it independent of Parliament.

Mr. REID. -

I think it would give much reassurance to the people who are anxious about these trade matters if they felt that at any rate they would be determined by a tribunal having the independence of a High Court, although not the High; Court itself. I do not want to take up any time, as so much time has been taken up with these matters. To recapitulate, since words have been put in, I think it is necessary to have a tribunal to carry out the powers involved in those words instead of the Parliament; that if there is to be such a tribunal it must be made thoroughly independent, that it should be a part of the Constitution, and should not owe its powers or its position to any Government or to any Parliament.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Will you deal with the point touched on by Mr. Glynn just now, namely, the probability of the railways vesting in Parliament within five years, and of there being no necessity then for the Inter-State Commission?

Mr. REID. -

As to the tenure of office of the commissioners, I do not wish to follow it up so minutely as that, but simply to put the thing itself in the bed-rock of the Constitution. I hesitated to follow the rest of the clause relating to the High Court, such as the condition that the Judges shall hold office during good behaviour, because I felt that it might work out inconveniently. I do not wish to tie the matter up more than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That would only deal with the office, not with the limitation of the Constitution.

Mr. REID. -

If the railways are taken over the rivers are left, and questions may arise of public roads, trade and commerce generally, so that under any set of conceivable circumstances the Inter-State Commission is a body which will be useful. We do not want to make it an expensive body; we do not want to lay down that there shall be so many commissioners, or to make any provision of that sort. I would leave that entirely to the Parliament. I am perfectly satisfied that, once we put the thing in the Constitution, the Parliament

will do all that is right in connexion with it. I think the plainer course will be to support the amendment of my honorable friend-to put in the word "shall," with the understanding that we will have this subsequently put in the form I suggest.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Is not the tenure of office one of the most important things?

Mr. REID. -

I am perfectly satisfied to leave that. I do not apprehend that sworn officers put in such a position will do anything but what is right and just. I do not want to complicate the matter, because I quite see that these things may become so unimportant in time that it will be an inexcusable expense to maintain highly-salaried experts in such positions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Useless officers.

Mr. REID. -

It might turn out to be so. Although it might be objectionable, still this arrangement might commend itself to the wisdom of Parliament-the Railways Commissioners of the three colonies should act. I want to leave it open to the Parliament to exercise its wisdom on all these matters, but I want to put into the bed-rock of the Constitution that these matters shall be settled by such a tribunal, and out of Parliament. Of course, this will involve the recasting of the clause, but we have faced that position from the first. I think we have all admitted that those amendments which have been made require to be put together in a different form. The whole thing must be recast, but I will vote for my honorable friend's proposition that the word "shall" be inserted, simply as an indication that we wish to make this Inter-State Commission a part of the Constitution, and, subsequently, a clause can be framed which will deal with that. At present, we merely wish to test the feeling of the Convention, and I think my honorable friend's amendment will do that in the simplest way.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment of the Right Hon. Mr. Kingston is to put in "There shall be," and to strike out "The Parliament may make laws constituting."

Mr. REID. -

Then something else will follow.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No; "There shall be an Inter-State Commission."

Mr. REID. -

I will vote for that, as amounting to an expression of opinion that we should have an independent commission, as part of the Constitution, and then, afterwards, the necessary words may be put in.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The words "The Parliament shall constitute an Inter-State Commission" would be perhaps more elastic than those which are suggested by my right honorable friend (Mr. Kingston). As my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) has pointed out-and I think we are all indebted to him for painting it out-circumstances may arise under which the necessity will no longer exist for the Inter-State Commission. Imagine, by an arrangement between the states under the powers given in clause 52, the railways becoming vested in the Commonwealth. In that case the very great probability is that the questions which would necessitate an adjudication by an Inter-State Commission will no longer have any existence. It would be saddling the Constitution with a continuous expense to provide that there must always be this commission, when in point of fact it will then have nothing to do. That is the danger I foresee from the amendment.

Mr. REID. -

If it is left open to the Parliament to decide the tenure of office nominal commissioners can be appointed, for that matter.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the matter is left open to Parliament all my objections are satisfied. I want the Constitution in its terms not to raise any implication that there must be an Inter-State Commission always in existence without fear of circumstances arising which would render it a needless expense, and simply cumbering the ground.

Mr. REID. -
So long as we do not put any tenure in the Bill, we do not embarrass the Commonwealth in filling up the commission from time to time as it pleases.

Mr. Barton. -

I am rather inclined to make some provision about the tenure of office; but I think, under the circumstances I have mentioned, that a tenure of a few years, renewable from time to time, would be a sufficient one, and then of course that tenure need not be renewed if the necessity for the commission died out. Perhaps that would be the better way to put it. Under the circumstances, I think it is better either to leave in the words "The Parliament may" or to say "The Parliament shall constitute an Inter-State Commission." Then they may constitute an Inter-State Commission under a law which may fall into desuetude, and as it falls into desuetude they can cease the appointments, and leave off paying the

Mr. Reid (New South Wales). -

From my reading of these matters, I do not think we will ever be in such a position that such a body's services will not be required. In the manifold ramifications of trade and enterprise of all kinds, and in the extension of business over more than one colony, I feel sure that a number of matters are bound to arise. But the great point with me is that I wish to reassure the people of the colonies that at the present time all these vexatious questions will be settled by a competent and independent tribunal. And to secure that object, which is an immediate and pressing object, I think we should provide in the Constitution for the appointment of this commission, leaving the Parliament to exercise a discretion as to the length of the appointments, and so on; and if in the course of time it turns out that the labours of the commission are reduced to a minimum, it will be quite open for the Parliament to accommodate the facts to that state of things, by having nominal appointments.

Sir Edward Braddon (Tasmania). -

We decided yesterday that matters concerning disputes as to railway rates and so forth should be determined by a tribunal called an Inter-State Commission. We have left the matter at this point, that there is no other tribunal provided in the Constitution by which these matters can be settled. It seems to me, as a natural consequence, that we have no choice but to include in the Constitution a provision for the appointment of an Inter-State Commission, which, we have agreed, shall decide these matters. I do not think that this need involve any very great expense. I cordially agree with the suggestion of the Premier of New South Wales that the best choice the Parliament could make in selecting the members of the commission would be the Railways Commissioners, and, that being so, I do not think that the expense of the Inter-State Commission, whose services would not be continuously required, would be anything that need alarm us. If I thought that we were going to create a body of highly-paid officials to sit permanently, and to enjoy their salaries permanently, whether they had anything to do or not, I should be found recording my vote against it; but I do not think we need fear that. I hope that we shall be able to proceed to a division and settle this matter with as little delay as possible.

Mr. Moore (Tasmania). -

I hope that this machine that you are now creating will be under the control of the Parliament, and I think that the word "may" is much more to the point than "shall" in this clause, which should not be mandatory. If you create an Inter-State Commission with all the powers you intend to invest in it, it would not be at all an independent commission if you appoint a Railways Commissioner for each of the colonies on that commission. It would be a very defective commission, and I am sure that if you appoint a commission at all those who constitute it should be entirely independent of the Governments of the colonies. This kind of thing is growing. We are adding part after part, and expense after expense, to the Constitution, and I think that whatever machinery may be necessary in this case, it should not be mandatory on Parliament, but that Parliament should have the control of it, so that Parliament might, from time to time, appoint that commission whenever it was necessary to decide state questions of a railway character. That is the only way in which you can avoid the great expense which will otherwise follow the appointment of such a commission as that. I do not intend to go into this matter very extensively, but my idea with respect to it is that we should limit all the expenses as far as possible, and that to create a huge body of this kind-to appoint an Inter-State Commission with all the staff and paraphernalia that there may be in connexion with it-will land us in a very large expense. We are comparing great things with small things. We are comparing a little place with about 3,000,000 inhabitants, like Australia, with a much more populous country. We are trying to draw comparisons between these colonies with their small populations and the United States of America with their population of between 60,000,000 and 70,000,000 people. Now, I think that in creating an institution of this kind, which may require to be remodelled, or changed and altered as time goes on, it would be a great mistake to make it mandatory, to give it a distinct power in itself under the Constitution, and I again urge that it should be under the control of Parliament, so that Parliament may change or alter it from time to time as may be found necessary in the public interests.

Mr. BRUNKER (New South Wales). -

Without wishing to detain the committee, or to discuss this matter very fully, I would like to offer a few words on the question now before us. I think I shall express the opinion of every member of the Convention when I say that the trend of the discussion, during the last two or three days, leads to the necessity for the appointment of such a commission as that now suggested. Something has been said with regard to the expenditure concurrent with such an appointment, but I contend that, in the interests of federation, no expense should be spared that is necessary to abrogate the irritation, inconvenience, and loss which have obtained between the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria during the last twenty years. I consider that the appointment of this Inter-State Commission is the true solution of the whole difficulty that has created the conflict which necessitated the discussion that has taken place on this important subject during the last two or three days. I do not speak from a theoretical standpoint, and, as an illustration, I would like to suggest to the members of the Convention the very great advantages that have arisen in New South Wales since we have had Railways Commissioners who, by the power of Parliament, and consequently the will of the people, have been able to act independently, in the interests of the whole country. And all that honorable members have to do is to refer to the statistics furnished by the Railways Commissioners, showing the profits that have been derived in New South Wales from the railways, as compared with the railways of the other colonies, to demonstrate how perfectly the system has worked in a very much smaller degree than that which it is proposed to initiate under this Constitution. With regard to the duties of this commission, there is no doubt they would have to be controlled in a very large degree by Parliament, but that control would simply tend to the definition of their duties, something in the same form as our Railways Commissioners in New South Wales are appointed by Act of Parliament. Because we must always remember that Parliament is bound to remain supreme as representative of the will of the people. Still, we must be very careful in framing this Constitution to embody it in terms that will create a controlling independent body. They must be independent in the interests of all. And with regard to the functions of this body, it has been stated by an American writer that-

The Inter-State Commerce Commission is a semi-judicial body, by which the federal statutes forbidding unjust discriminations in railway rates, in inter-state freight or passenger traffic, prohibiting certain sorts of combinations in railroad management, &c., are interpreted and enforced.

Now, I think the duties defined here to a very large extent will devolve upon the commission which we propose to appoint under this Constitution. I wish to offer these few remarks, because, although in a much smaller degree, we are enjoying in New South Wales advantages which have resulted by the action of our Railways Commissioners, and the excellent work they have done, and I regard our experience in that respect as a proof to us, combined with the trend of this discussion, which has embraced almost all that can be said on the subject, that the appointment of this Inter-State Commission will be a solution of the whole difficulty. I may add that I was very pleased last evening when I heard this suggestion made by Mr. Holder, who, I confess, has to a large extent induced me to consent to the appointment of this commission, to which, at a previous stage, I was somewhat opposed. I hope that, whatever may be the result, there will be, nothing done that will detract from the powers or the-control of Parliament, because we must all recognise that Parliament is a body which expresses the supreme will of the people. But we must also bear this fact in mind, that however strict in integrity the members of the Federal Parliament may be, still there are always prejudices that will arise through the local interests members of Parliament have to represent, and we, of course, who are old parliamentarians, can fully recognise this. We do not want to be guided by theory in a matter of that kind: we know from practical experience exactly how these prejudices do arise, and it matters not how the Parliament may be constituted, these prejudices will arise in some of our highest and freest institutions, and we must avoid any of these political innovations being made upon the action of a body which we hope may reign supreme, and independent, so far as the traffic and the trade and commerce of the different colonies are concerned.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

I should like, to know whether we are discussing the question of the appointment of an Inter-State Commission simply as regards railways and, rivers, or upon the general question as regards trade and commerce, because the clause we have been discussing simply relates to railways?

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question under discussion is as to whether it shall be compulsory or optional on the Parliament to appoint this Inter-State Commission.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Yes; but for what purpose is the commission to be appointed-as regards the rivers and the railways, or also connected with them, trade and commerce in general because those involve entirely separate questions? If it is simply as regards railways and rivers, it seems to me, that the Parliament should appoint the Inter-State Commission, but that it certainly should not be restricted in its choice of the members of that commission to the Commissioners of Railways, who are much more likely to be prejudiced than independent persons appointed by Parliament, from time to time, to carry out the object which this Inter-State Commission is to be appointed to carry into effect. To provide that Parliament shall appoint three of the Railways Commissioners—one from South Australia, one from Victoria, and one from New South Wales—and that those commissioners are to be under Parliament, would, it seems to me, be a great deal worse than leaving it to Parliament altogether, because the Railways Commissioners are much more likely to be prejudiced than are Members of Parliament, who have no interest in the matter. There are two colonies represented in this Convention who would not be particularly interested in the results of this commission, but, as regards the other three colonies, it is very evident that there must be an independent body authorized to arrange matters between them. And I quite agree with Mr. Reid when he states that he would not go further at the present time than to appoint an Inter-State Commission and leave the matters of detail and rates with the Federal Parliament. That, it appears to me, is a much better course of procedure. The idea of appointing as members of this Inter-State Commission men for life, as our Judges are appointed, or for good behaviour, would, it appears to me, be going in the wrong direction altogether, inasmuch as in all probability, as things settle down, this body will have little or nothing to do. The Inter-State Commission will only be brought in casually, and for that reason the members of the commission ought not to be paid a fixed salary, and create a staff of officers who will not be required. At present, as I understand it, the vote proposed to be taken is simply on the question as to whether this Inter-State Commission shall be appointed, not going any further than that. It appears to me that it would be desirable, inasmuch as we have practically decided, to a certain extent, on the appointment of an Inter-State Commission, that we should now affirm that, and agree at once to the appointment of the commission, but I feel that we ought to stop there, and leave the rest to Parliament.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Perhaps I might make a suggestion to the committee which will enable us to pass on to other matters. If a vote were taken on the proposal that the word "shall" be substituted for the word "may," so as to make the clause read "Parliament shall," and if that be decided in the affirmative, it might be taken as a direction to the Drafting Committee to redraft this and the following clause, so as to provide for the desires that have been expressed by the committee during the debate, which are very easy, on this occasion, to gather. It would not be a very difficult matter to redraft these clauses to meet the views of the committee.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

We want a test vote as to whether it shall be obligatory or not on the Parliament to appoint an Inter-State Commission.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, and if such a vote is carried, as far as I can see at present, the Drafting Committee would be likely to put the two clauses together in some such shape as this:-

There shall be an Inter-State Commission, with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament front time to there deems necessary, but so that the commission shall be charged with the execution and maintenance within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution, and of any laws made thereunder, relating to trade and commerce.

That is to be the charge of the commission, but the extent of the powers of adjudication and determination necessary to enable them to carry out their charge must, from time to time, be le

Mr. REID. -

We do not object to that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is it quite clear as to railway rates coming under the trade and commerce clauses?

Mr. BARTON. -

There is no question about that

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think so.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think there will be any question of that at all. I think that we will all admit that railway rates will come under the trade and commerce clauses, and I think that the Drafting Committee may go so far, in dealing with Sir George Turner's and other amendments, where they find that a suggested new clause or anything of that kind contains what is obviously a repetition of powers already given, as to bring the matter before the Convention, in order to see that the repetition does not occur. Those would be pure matters of drafting. After the clause I have just suggested, I would follow up-with a clause something like the one that was brought up in Adelaide for regulating the tenure of office of the commissioners. I think it would be better if, instead of appointing the commissioners during good behaviour, they were appointed, like the Railways Commissioners, for a definite term of years, so that if ever the necessity for the appointment of an Inter-State Commission died out, by the transfer of the railways, or otherwise, Parliament would have the matter in its own hands.

[P.1535] starts here

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The commissioners might be appointed for five years.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, for five or seven years, as our Railways Commissioners are appointed. We have found seven years a convenient period. However, that is a minor matter. I merely make the suggestion in this way, and I ask the committee to take a vote as to whether the appointment of this Inter-State Commission shall be made compulsory or optional with the Parliament. It appears to me that possibly some clause like that which I have suggested might meet the case by combining the two provisions in one clause.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

The point which I wish to make is this: Should not the Inter-State Commission be constituted under the Constitution instead of being the creation of the Federal Parliament, as it is intended in some respects to control the judgment of the Federal Parliament?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think the Federal Parliament would be obliged to appoint the Inter-State Commission anyhow. Otherwise, Sir George Turner's clause and that of Mr. Grant could not be put into operation.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It must be appointed, but I am inclined to think that proper provision should be made within the four corners of the Constitution for the appointment of the commission. You cannot expect the members of a commission which owes its very existence to the Federal Parliament to exercise the absolute independence which you might like, and which it would exercise if it owed no such allegiance. As to the question of expense, I hardly like the suggestion that the Railways Commissioners' services should be utilized. The commissioners are the servants of the several Governments, and that absolute independence which is so desirable could not be expected from them. But there is no necessity for any great expense. Probably very little will require to be done, and the offices will be high and honorable, and be valued as such. The remuneration need only be commensurate with the services rendered. I have every disposition to facilitate the action of the leader of the Convention, but I am sorry that he does not see his way altogether to provide for the constitution of this commission in the Constitution. No doubt, however, we shall have an opportunity of amending the clause, and of further considering the matter by-and-by-

The amendment for inserting the words "There shall be" was agreed to without a division.

The amendment striking out the words "The Parliament may make laws constituting" was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

There is an amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia with reference to the rivers; but, inasmuch as it appears to me that that question has been decided, I shall not put the amendment. The question now is, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I understood that the qualifying and limiting words with regard to railways and rivers were to be eliminated.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I intended, that being the sense of the committee, to give to the commission the execution and maintenance within the Commonwealth of the provisions of the Constitution relating to trade and commerce. That is a widening, but I think a necessary widening, of the powers of the Commission, and I understood that it met with the entire approval of the Convention. I will suggest that we might now pass these clauses as they stand subject to my bringing forward a reprint of them in the shape in which I think the committee intend that they shall stand.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I beg to move-

That the words "upon railways" be struck out.

The motion was agreed to.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I beg to move-

That the words "and upon rivers flowing through, in, or between two or more states," be struck out.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I understand that if this amendment is agreed to, the way the clause will read will be, that the "Inter-State Commission will be charged with the execution and maintenance within the Commonwealth of the provisions of the Constitution relating to trade and commerce"

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then the commission will have to say whether the action of any particular state is contrary to this provision, whether relating to railways or merchandise, or to bounties, or to anything of the kind. Well, it seems to me that a body of railway experts are having a duty cast upon them that will not only supersede the powers of the Parliament altogether, but will be contrary to what we desire.

Mr. BARTON. -
They need not be rail-way experts necessarily. Their powers would be defined by the Parliament, and there would be an appeal to the High court.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It seems to me to be superseding the powers of the Parliament. I am afraid of it.

The amendment striking out the words and upon rivers flowing through,
in, or between two or more states" was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The clause now reads-

There shall be an Inter-State Commission to execute and maintain within the Commonwealth the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
The clause as it stands seems somewhat restricted. It does not take into consideration Sir George Turner's clause. I understand that the object was to give the Inter-state Commission jurisdiction to determine what are preferences and discriminations which are unjust to any state.

The CHAIRMAN. -
We cannot go back to clause 95.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
I think the clause will be restricted as it stands. It provides that there shall be an Inter-State Commission-to, execute and maintain within the Commonwealth, the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

I think there should be added the words "and any laws passed by the Federal Parliament." If the leader of the Convention will not agree to add those words I shall have to move an amendment to that effect myself. We have another clause in the Bill which shows that the Federal Parliament may pass laws with certain restrictions, but grave doubts may arise as to whether the commission has power to say anything except what arises under this Constitution.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It will be-too much to say "any laws passed by the Federal Parliament." It might apply to marriage and divorce, for instance.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Not such questions as those. Perhaps, however, the amendments have indicated might have the effect which Mr. Kingston suggests if the words were put in the wrong place. I think the clause should, read: "The provisions of this Constitution and any laws passed by the Federal Parliament relating to trade and commerce." If the leader of the Convention will not accept an amendment of that kind, I shall move it as an amendment.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I do not think that the words suggested by Sir George Turner are necessary. The provisions of the Constitution include the power to legislate, and, therefore, the provisions of the Constitution include everything which is necessary to carry out the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But the Inter-State Commission is to maintain these laws, not the Supreme Court.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

"Maintain" simply means supervise the carrying out of the laws. The laws will be in the hands of the Executive.

Mr. BARTON. -

The commission can only leave the powers of administration which the Parliament gives to them.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Exactly. The statute constituting the Inter-State Commission, which gives the commission its status and powers, will lay down the lines on which it is to act. These powers will be defined within certain limits. The words suggested by Sir George Turner do not seem to be necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Constitution.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

We are beginning to feel some of the difficulties which have arisen from our substitution of the Inter-State Commission for the Parliament. Just now I cordially agreed with Mr. Reid in his suggestion that this Inter-State Commission should be constituted of the Commissioners of Railways, believing that the duties of the Inter-State Commission should be almost exclusively those relating to traffic in regard to railways. But now we discover that this tribunal is to deal with every possible matter relating to trade and commerce. Never mind what appeal there is to the High Court, I object that we are giving to this body the responsibility of deciding in matters of every sort relating to trade and commerce. We cannot accept the wish expressed by Mr. Reid that the Railways Commissioners should be these experts. The Railways Commissioners might know nothing about the subjects which will have to be referred to this body. If there is to be a commission of three appointed, many questions besides those relating to railway disputes will have to be decided.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They would at least want the qualifications of Supreme Court Judges.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

They will want more, because they must have a considerable technical knowledge of various matters.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

They could always get technical evidence.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

I do not see how we could safeguard ourselves in this particular unless it is by saying that this commission shall be appointed by the Parliament from time to time as occasion arises, and for particular questions as they arise.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would not that be very dangerous?

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

The whole thing is dangerous and difficult, as we have made it for ourselves. I was not one of those who made it so.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I confess I did not quite follow the argument of Mr. O'Connor when he said that the law made by the Federal Parliament is a provision of the Constitution because it happens to be made within the powers conferred upon it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; I say a provision of the Constitution within the meaning of this section.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I think if the honorable member considers the matter he will be disposed to think that he has laid it down a little too broadly. Suppose the Federal Parliament has exercised its powers of legislation on this subject, can it be said the Act it has passed is a provision of the Constitution?

I rather think that a provision of the Constitution, as meant by that clause, are those declarations as to the freedom of trade and otherwise inserted in general terms for observance by all concerned.

Mr. BARTON. -

There are several provisions as to trade and commerce. Sir George Turner's new clause is a provision relating to trade and commerce.
Mr. KINGSTON. -

As regards all these things within the four corners of the Constitution, I thoroughly agree that they are provisions of the Constitution. Sir George Turner's proposal as to the question of special guardianship with respect to railway rates, is a provision of the Constitution, but as to all laws relating to trade and commerce, I understood Mr. O'Connor's answer to be that those laws, being made within the powers of the Constitution, they would be provisions of the Constitution. I do not think so.

Mr. REID. -

They would follow from that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Can they be termed provisions of the Constitution?

Mr. REID. -

Yes, for the purpose of that clause.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I would ask my honorable friend to consider the question; I confess I am unable to support his view.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

In support of the contention of Mr. Kingston, I would point out that section 73, referring to the judicial body, distinguishes between a power arising under the Constitution and a power arising under any laws made by the Parliament. There is a clear distinction; consequently, I submit that the words proposed by Sir George Turner and those to be added afterwards would restrict the provisions of this Constitution.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There is something in that point, and I will make a suggestion that it should read in this way-

The execution and maintenance of the provisions of this Constitution and of any laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That would do.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Might not the provisions of this Constitution refer to all provisions?

Mr. BARTON. -

No; the words relating to trade and commerce would cover that.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Dr. Quick is quite right. There is a distinction already drawn in the Constitution.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

This ought to be considered a little more. The question is now whether you are setting up this Inter-State Commission in rivalry to the powers of the Federal Judiciary.

Mr. BARTON. -

We are going to provide for appeals from the Inter-State Commission to the High Court.

Mr. SYMON. -

That may get over the difficulty, but you have to be very careful in a general clause like this to keep it as narrow as possible.

Mr. BARTON. -

I would not dream of giving these powers to the Inter-State Commission unless there was an appeal to the High Court.

Mr. SYMON. -

That gets rid of the difficulty to some extent, but, as an honorable member suggests, it creates another difficulty, and I think the question ought to be more fully considered.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Parliament will define the powers.

Mr. SYMON. -

Of course, this is all to be under the consideration of the Drafting Committee, and we shall have another opportunity, perhaps, of putting it in an intelligible shape.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That after the word "Constitution" the following words be inserted-"and any laws made thereunder."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This will now stand that the Inter-State Commission is to have jurisdiction with regard to the provisions of the Constitution, and of any laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce. Now, how far is that to extend? Does it extend to the provisions of Sir George Turner's clause in relation to preferences and discriminations, which will not touch on the trade and commerce clause, but which may be deemed by Parliament to be unjust to a state by reason of being too low?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

My view is that preferences and discriminations are subject already to interference. They could be brought before the High Court; they are an infringement of the provisions relating to trade and commerce, but the law with regard to these matters is now better defined by the clause of Sir George Turner which we have inserted. I do not think the addition of the words forbidding preferences and discriminations leads to the inference that preferences and discriminations are not infringements of the laws relating to trade and commerce. It is clear that carriage by railways under rates which are preferences or discriminations is trade and commerce, and is the inter-state commerce aimed at if it passes from state to state.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 97-The commission shall have such powers of adjudication and administration as may be necessary for its purposes, and as the Parliament may from time to time determine.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I wish to suggest that this clause might now be allowed to stand as it is. I have undertaken to draft a clause which will combine these two in a more definite form.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I wish to ask whether, in these two clauses-96 and 97-there is not a clear conflict of duty between what the Inter-State Commission has to do and the powers of Parliament? As I understand the amendment of Sir George Turner, Parliament will maintain and execute certain rules.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

Parliament is to pass laws.

Mr. DOBSON. -

It appears to me to be extremely confused.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

That is the reason why I suggested a redrafting of the clauses. It will probably take this shape:-

There shall be an Inter-State Commission, with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament from time to time deems necessary, but so that the commission shall be charged with the execution and maintenance within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution, and of any laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce.

That would meet my honorable friend's objection. There is no real conflict between the clauses.

Mr. DOBSON. -

My point is, can the Parliament give away the powers to the Inter-State Commission which we, by Sir George Turner's amendment, have conferred on the Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -

You cannot give the execution and maintenance of these provisions, but the question of adjudicative and administrative powers are to be vested by Parliament.
The clause was agreed to.

[The Chairman left the chair at five minutes to one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

The CHAIRMAN. -

Before putting clause 98, I wish to call the attention of the committee to proposed new clauses, which are to be found on pages 57 to 59 of the tabular statement of amendments suggested by the Legislatures. There is a series of new clauses with reference to public debts proposed by Tasmania, and on page 61 there is a proposed clause-93A-also proposed by the Parliament of Tasmania. Inasmuch as this proposed new clause 93A is simple, and deals with one specific point, namely, whether the Commonwealth should have power to lend to the states or not, it will perhaps be convenient to put that clause first. Therefore I will put the question that the proposed new clause 93A be inserted in the Bill. That clause is as follows:-

The Commonwealth may from time to time lend to any state on such terms and conditions as the Parliament may prescribe any sum or sums of money borrowed on the public credit of the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I would ask, sir, whether it is wise to put this clause first? As the Bill stands at present there is no compulsion on the Commonwealth to take over all the existing debts; but suppose the Bill is altered, and it is made compulsory on the Commonwealth to take over all the debts, then I think it would probably follow as a matter of course that future borrowings would have to be through the Commonwealth only. I think it would be rather unwise to decide this question first, because the decision of it in many of our minds would hang on the question of whether it was compulsory to take over the debts or not. It would be better to let this stand over until the other question is settled.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will put it in any way that is considered most convenient. I will put any new clause first which is submitted.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Mr. Chairman, would you not allow clause 98 to be taken? As Sir George Turner has pointed out, these clauses may be conditional on making the Commonwealth take over the debts at once. I have a clause which will run into this, but it is purely conditional on the carrying of another amendment to take over the debts. The three long clauses suggested by Tasmania are simply methods of doing the same thing, so that they might be discussed in connexion with clause 98.

The CHA. - I will put it in whatever way seems best to the committee.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It seems to me that the suggestion of my right honorable friend might be followed, and that then 93A might, if necessary, be inserted as a separate clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would call the attention of honorable members to clause 92A, which has been suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Tasmania. Is it advisable to put it before this clause? It provides that upon the establishment of the Commonwealth the whole of the public debts of the states shall be taken over by the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is another proposal to carry out something to effect which other amendments have been suggested. I think that if you put the general clause it would be possible to discuss the advisability of taking over these debts.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No doubt it will be competent for honorable members to discuss all these clauses together. The question that occurs to me is which is the best way of putting them to enable the committee to come to a decision in regard to the various amendments.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I think the best way would be to put the clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Then, I will put the clause:-

Clause 98. - The Parliament may take over the whole or a rateable proportion of the public debts of the states as existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, and may, from time to time, convert, renew, or consolidate such debts, or any part there-of; and the states respectively shall indemnify the Commonwealth in respect of the amount of the debts taken over, and thereafter the amount of interest payable in respect of the debts shall be deducted and retained, from time to time, from the respective shares of the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth which would otherwise be payable to the states, or if there be no surplus revenue payable, or if such surplus revenue be insufficient, then the amount shall be charged to and paid by the respective states wholly or in part. The rateable proportion of the debts of the several states to be taken over is to be calculated on the basis of the populations of the several states as ascertained by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Perhaps I may be allowed to move an amendment which I have drawn up to deal with this matter. I beg to move-

That all the words after the word "The" be omitted, with a view to the insertion of the following words: "existing public debts of the states shall be taken over by the Commonwealth at the date of its establishment, and the interest thereon shall be a charge on the consolidated fund. Each state shall indemnify the Commonwealth in respect of the amount by which its debts exceed the average amount of the debts of all the states, after such debts have, for the purpose of ascertaining their relative values, been reduced to and expressed in a debt of the average currency and rate of interest of the debts of all the states. The Commonwealth shall be deemed to be indebted to a state in the amount so ascertained by which the reduced debt of the state is less than the average amount of the reduced debts of all the states."

If this amendment is carried, its effect will be to make the taking over of the debts compulsory. The Constitution will then vest the debts of the state in the Commonwealth from the very start. I should like to refer to one or two objections which are generally urged to any proposal to allow the Commonwealth to take over the debts of the states at once. The honorable member (Mr. McMillan) urged a few days ago that by taking over the debts at the start you did not settle the financial difficulty. I do not think that any one who proposes that the Commonwealth shall take over these debts suggests that this is a method of solving the difficulty connected with the apportionment of the surplus. You cannot possibly by taking over an equal amount of annual liability determine the share that the several states will get of the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth. What you can do is to get over one difficulty. You can at all events absorb the whole of the surplus. After the apportionment of the surplus has been determined, the aggregate is practically wiped out by the liability being taken over by the Commonwealth. It will not, therefore, be an objection to the proposal that it does not solve the financial difficulty. I do not think that any advocate of the assumption of the debts at once would say that you could possibly determine how the surplus should be divided amongst the various states. We have endeavoured to solve that part of the difficulty in the previous clauses, and the question now remains whether it would not be better for the Commonwealth to assume liabilities corresponding approximately to the aggregate of the surplus, and, there to get over the difficulty of making periodical payments to the states, and whether you would not, by doing that, remove any timidity from the minds of the state Treasurers as to their liabilities for their public debts. From the moment you take over the interest upon the public debts, there can be no fear that the liabilities will not be met.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Suppose the state fails to indemnify the Commonwealth, what then?

Mr. GLYNN. -
How can that contingency arise?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The Commonwealth is to take over the debts of the states, and the states are to indemnify the Commonwealth for what is taken over and above the average.

Mr. GLYNN. -
But the Commonwealth also takes over corresponding sources of revenue. With the exception of the railway fund, it takes over the whole of the consolidated revenue, and the powers of direct and indirect taxation. If that were not sufficient to pay off the annual interest upon the debts, it could be extended.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That is not the point. You say that each state shall indemnify the Commonwealth. That is a debt from the state, not from an individual.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I will explain what I mean by that in a few moments. This is not only a suggestion to take over the debts, but to do it in a way which will be mathematically correct, and which may result in a liability for a certain balance of debt—in the case of South Australia, for instance—having to be covered by the state.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
But how can you compel the state to fulfil the obligation of indemnifying the Commonwealth?

Mr. GLYNN. -
If the liability is created, and the state retains, say, the railways, the railway revenue can be impounded. Suppose there was a surplus revenue beyond the interest, you would deduct any liability from it. If there is no surplus revenue, the state will have assets, and that will enable the provision to be enforced. Under the Constitution the Commonwealth could sue a state.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
But how could you get at the assets?

Mr. GLYNN. -
A private individual can get at the assets of a creditor by obtaining execution, and a process could be issued by the federal courts for the impounding of the assets left in the hands of the state. The assets left in the hands of the state will amount to about 62 per cent. of the total capital debt. We are giving over to the Commonwealth two sources of revenue—the revenue derived from posts and telegraphs and other departments, and the power of direct and indirect taxation. If that is not sufficient you fall back upon this 62 per cent. of assets.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Surely you would not suggest that the Commonwealth should obtain execution against the state and sell its railways. That would bring about civil war.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not say that this contingency would ever arise; but if the Commonwealth takes over the debts of the states, and its sources of revenue are not sufficient to pay the liabilities, it will be able to fall back upon the state assets. It is extremely doubtful, however, that it will ever have to do this. If this is a bar to taking over the state debts, the Commonwealth never can take them over. Another objection usually urged against all attempts of this sort is that if the Commonwealth takes over the debts it must also take over the railways. I put it to the Convention, however, that there is really no necessary connexion between the debts and the railways. There is no specific charge of the debts upon the railways. The debts of the states are charged upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund, of which the railway revenue forms part; but the railways are not specifically mortgaged for the payment of debts. Leaving out Queensland, the debts of the five colonies, according to the returns presented to us in Adelaide, amount to between £140,000,000 and £150,000,000.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Supposing the interest on the South Australian debt is £1,000,000, and the Customs take over £660,000, and South Australia fails to pay, what is the Commonwealth to do?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I have endeavoured to reply to that already. If you confer a right of indemnity against a state, surely a method of procedure to enforce the right may be found.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I want a practical means.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I cannot give, any more practical means than I have up to the present. Besides, the indemnity is provided for even in the clause as it stands. I say there is no necessary connexion between the debts and the railways. The debts are 50 per cent. more than the value of the railways. In the case of some colonies, the railways represent a far greater proportion of the debts than in the case of other colonies. In Victoria, about 78 per cent. of the liabilities were incurred for the purpose of the railways. In the case of New South Wales, the ratio is 71 per cent.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
In Victoria that expenditure consists largely of renewing old lines.

Mr. GLYNN. -
We cannot go into these particulars and ascertain to what extent the debt of the railways consists of renewals. These are details I am not bound to enter into. I have called for and obtained a return as to what capital consists of, but I say that these details cannot affect the question of taking over the debts. In the case of Tasmania, about 50 per cent. of the debt is represented by railway assets. These disparities show there is no necessary connexion between the debts and the railways. One cannot balance the other. Another objection is urged that you cannot, by taking over the debts, make large savings by conversion. The advocates of the immediate assumption of the debts never said that large savings could be made. You cannot possibly convert, before bonds mature, without giving cash or premiums representing the difference in the value between the old and the new rates, or giving an extended term equal to the difference. If you change 41 per cents. to 4 per cents. you must give the bond-holders an equivalent.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Or increase the currency of the loan.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Would not your proposal give the bond-holders the benefit of the premium?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I do not think it would. As regards conversion, I do say there will not be great immediate savings by the taking over of the debts. I have examined every English conversion of magnitude from 1749 to 1888.

Mr. FRASER. -
You were very industrious.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I had to be industrious in connexion with a Bill drafted for our own Government. There have been very few conversions.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
There have been only six.
Mr. GLYNN. -

In all the cases of these conversions the bonds had either matured or were capable of being redeemed at not more than a year's notice.

Mr. FRASER. -

That is the whole point.

Mr. GLYNN. -

In 1888 between five and six hundred millions of the English debt was converted by Mr. Goschen. That consisted of two classes of stock-new 3 per cents. payable at once, and reduced 3 per cents., which could be redeemed on twelve months' notice. Any credit that accrued to Mr. Goschen for the success of that scheme was not due to the fact that he changed one stock into another. He could do that if the bondholders were willing. The credit to Mr. Goschen lay in the fact that he so gauged the possibilities in declaring he would pay or convert, as to risk the alternative of being called on to pay cash in case the new stock was not accepted. If he had been forced by the bond-holders to pay between five and six hundred millions of cash, he could not have done it. The gold would not have been available.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If they had had the cash it would not have been invested.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That was one of the factors, I dare say, that guided Mr. Goschen. But Mr. Goschen did get éclat for the success of his scheme, because he gauged the desire to accept the 3 per cents., reducable to 23/4, in lieu of cash.

Mr. HOLDER. -

He had the power to compel them to come in, which we have not.

Mr. GLYNN. -

He had the practical power, as I explained, but that has nothing to do with the position which I am assuming now as to the credit due to Mr. Goschen. In that scheme the redemption-of one stock was possible at once, and in the other stock at twelve months' notice.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

He could have forced them to accept payment.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I am not sure, before maturity. I do not think he could. But redemption was, as I have shown, at his option.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is the whole point.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Sir George Turner did the same thing here not twelve months ago.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The point is not whether Sir George Turner or Mr. Goschen are entitled to any credit.

Mr. Higgins. -
Mr. Goschen held the whip hand.

Mr. Glynn. -
The point I wish to emphasize is that you cannot convert, except loans are maturing, without giving compensation. I say that between the dates I have mentioned there has not been a single conversion scheme in which the moneys could not have been paid by the Treasurer on not more than twelve months' notice given. We do not, therefore, say that large conversions are possible on the assumption, of the debts. The objection urged by Mr. Holder seems to me the most telling I have heard. Mr. Holder stated that if the debts are taken over at once you practically give the bond-holders a premium, which is measured by the additional security represented by the federal liabilities. The stock will go up, but if you do not render it compulsory you can make terms and so secure, if not the whole, part of the premium.

Mr. Howe. -
How can you make it compulsory?

Mr. Glynn. -
I say make it compulsory to take it over.

Sir William Zeal. -
Sir George Turner held 4 per cents. current, and he called them in and issued 3 per cents., for which he obtained a premium.

Mr. Glynn. -
That, if anything, strengthens my position.

Sir John Forrest. -
He had the right to call in.

Mr. Glynn. -
The statement I have made is not affected by what Sir George Turner did. I am anticipating, for the purpose of replying to a statement which was made by Mr. Holder in Sydney, and which told with considerable force, that, by taking over the debts at once, you stop the power of the Treasurer making terms with the bond-holders for a general security.

An Honorable Member. -
It will be a Commonwealth security.

Mr. Glynn. -
I should like to see whether the premium is likely to be of such magnitude as to set off the great advantage accruing from taking over the debts at once. Now, I ask the Convention are the quite sure that the federal security will a first be better than the state security?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The states, at present, have not only certain powers of taxation which are being handed over to the Federal Parliament, but they have the railways, which are not being handed over. The have general assets which the Federation will not possess, so that, as a matter of selling out assets and using taxation powers, the states are in a better position than the Federation. The Federation will not have general assets for some time. Is not the solvency of a state greater if it has, in addition to the powers of taxation, realizable assets, and we know that the railway assets of the whole of the five colonies amount to £100,000,000? Is not that an important factor, and is it not quite likely that the bond-holders would consider the security of a state better than the security of the Federation?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
What are the states' assets?

Mr. GLYNN. -
Anything that a state can sell, or any power of taxation it possesses.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Including the railways?

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes.

Mr. FRASER. -
The whole world would consider the federal guarantee better than the state guarantee.

Mr. GLYNN. -
That is merely a statement. I avoid making general statements in the Convention unless I can support them by facts.

Mr. FRASER. -
Look at Canada.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Let us look at Australia for the present. For the first five or six years the Federation will undoubtedly be on its trial. Before it can gain a reputation for solvency, it must do something to justify it, and do honorable members think that the English creditors are going to jump at this federal security until they see how the forces operate in the Federal Parliament? I very much doubt it. Again, the moment the Federation adds on a new debt to the existing debts, that, of course, will have a tendency to discount the value of the old debts. I would point out that the Federation may, at the beginning of its career, and in connexion with the departments taken over, have to borrow to some extent. All these borrowings must affect, the value of the federal bonds. Canada has been referred to. Let me refer to America, where they did take over the debts within a few years from the foundation of the Confederation. Undoubtedly there was then, a rise in the value of American bonds. Why was that? There were three, debts taken over. There were the confederal debts which were of two classes-one the debts due to outside creditors, and the other the debts due to internal creditors. Then there were the state debts. These debts amounted altogether to about 80,000,000 dollars, and before they were taken over the bonds were at an extraordinary discount, because the liability of the states and particularly of the Confederation, for these debts was challenged. The first proposal that was made in the American Congress was to pay off only a certain class of the debts-the outside ones-and to leave the creditors to any remedy they might have for the others. Mr. Hamilton urged that all the debts should be paid off, and the moment this suggestion was made there was a rise of from 15 to 20 per cent. in the value of the stocks, because it really amounted to a suggestion of a guarantee. It must not be argued from the fact that there was such a rise that there will be a similar rise here.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Were they, at par before?

Mr. GLYNN. - They were under par, because it was exceedingly doubtful whether there was any liability at all for these debts. They were debts that were incurred during the Revolutionary War principally, and many of them were made up of arrears of interest, and the Confederation had no executive powers at the time under which they could enforce payment. It is, perhaps, an argument from analogy for taking over the debts that, within a year or two from the establishment of the Union, all the debts of the United States were taken over by the Confederation. In Canada, the debts were also taken over at the start, although there were differences of rates per head there. It is true that in America, and in Canada, to some extent, there was a rise in the value of the stock, but they had large assets in the shape of public lands. For the first sixty years after the existence of the American Confederation the revenue was very largely increased by the sale of the national estate. These were assets that belonged to the federal body. Here they will not belong to the federal body, and, therefore, I say that the security of the federal body in America is greater than it can be here for many years to come. Let us see what will be the effect of passing clause 98. That clause provides that existing public debts may be taken over either partly or altogether. The words "existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth" have been taken from the Canadian Act. At all events, they are in the Canadian Act, and they are applicable there, but not here. In Canada the whole of the debts were taken over at once, and therefore it was perfectly right to say that the existing debts should be taken over. If you are to limit the debts to be taken over hereafter to the existing debts of the Commonwealth, you may subsequently find yourselves in this position: That you will be unable to take over any new debts incurred by the states, or to take over debts the character of which has been varied. It will be quite possible to increase the total debt liabilities of the colonies within a few years by merely changing the character of the debts, and without any corresponding increase of interest. As the high-priced loans mature, conversion loans will have to be floated. These will be new borrowings, and they will not come within the terms of clause 98, which says that the existing debts must be taken over. Take the case of South Australia, for instance. Her debts at present amount to 23 1/3 millions. By contemplated conversions within the next eighteen months or two years the debts of South Australia will probably be increased to 26 millions, Certain debts will have to be incurred in order to clear off accounts with the Northern Territory. The result will be that you will have a higher capital in-debtedness, while the interest will only have run up, taking the probable rates into account, from £931,000 to £985,000. We are therefore in this dilemma: That in the case of the colonies—and I only cite South Australia as an instance—there will be large conversion schemes within the next few years that will change the character of the debts and probably increase their volume without any corresponding increase of interest. If that is so—and if honorable members will look at the appendix to the Adelaide Convention reports, they will find that conversions may, take place to a large extent during the next ten years; the average currency being only twenty years—the Federation may not be able to take over the debts to the extent of more than two-thirds of their present amount, because, in the case of the remaining one third, the character of per capita basis, according to the population of the colonies. That does not result in an equal amount being taken over. If you take the amount of a debt on a per capita basis it may result in one colony giving a far greater proportion of its debts over than another.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is equal, per head, isn't it?

Mr. GLYNN. -

It may be an equal amount per head. It is not representing an equal capital amount. The idea of the clause is, of course, to get an equal amount taken over when anything is taken over.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You mean equal in proportion to population.

Mr. GLYNN. -

It may mean that, but I am entitled to point out that, by taking over an equal amount in proportion to population, you will be taking over a very much different amount, and it will result in inequalities in the capital amount, at all events. Several proposals have been given, notice of for taking over the debts at once. For instance, the Tasmanian proposal, is to amalgamate the debts up to an amount represented by the lowest capital indebtedness of the five states.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

On what page of the schedule is it?

Mr. GLYNN. -

It may be seen on, I think, page 57. The amount to be taken over by amalgamation—that is, the pooling amount—is to be determined by that amount which is represented by the lowest per capita indebtedness of the states to be federated. If, for instance, Western Australia had the lowest amount, say £34 a head, that sum would represent the amount up to which the debts of the states are to be amalgamated without any further consideration. There will, of course, be excesses to be accounted for, and each state is to be debited with the excesses over this capital amount. But a suggestion is made that these excesses may he wiped off as the population in the various states increases. The reasoning is that as, on a per capita basis of distribution of the surplus, which was the one in the Bill at the time these amendments were drawn up, you assume that each state makes an equal contribution per capita to the revenue, that if there is an increase of population in the states the aggregate amount paid on a per capita contribution will be increased. That is the position taken up by Tasmania.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Would the honorable member mind repeating that last statement?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I admit that it is rather involved, and I speak subject to correction by my friends from Tasmania. They say you assume that each state pays an equal amount to the revenue. After a time, of course, that will be an admissible assumption; on a per capita distribution it, would be an assumption, and these calculations are based principally on the Customs revenue. Then, it is argued, if the population of a state increases, that state will be paying more in the aggregate to the Treasury than it paid before, when the debts were taken over, and the debt should therefore be proportionately reduced. The addition to the population, it is also said, will bring down its capital indebtedness. I cannot follow the position which is taken up by Tasmania, because it makes no allowance for a corresponding increase in population, and consequently corresponding additions to the federal revenue in the states which have no excesses—the states with low indebtedness at the time the debts are taken over. The one objection I see to the Tasmanian method of amalgamating the debts is that it does not take into account the differences in the rates of interest and in the currency. If you amalgamate up to an amount determined by the per capita indebtedness solely, you do not take into account the relative values of the loans as determined by varying rates of interest and varying currencies.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You propose to rectify that anomaly by your amendment.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I propose to rectify that anomaly, and I will endeavour, in a few words, to show how it can be done. At Adelaide, the Convention was presented with a return on which, presumably, the Tasmanian amendment is based; it is No. 12 of the statistical papers in the appendix to the Votes and Proceedings. There, five colonies are set down as having a total capital indebtedness of £140,000,000; and the average currency is put down as 21 years, and the average interest as 3.846. These rates have been struck, not by converting each loan of each colony into some common stock which might be the measure of the relative values of the whole, but simply for a certain year the average rates of interest, without respect to the currencies, have been taken. The average rate of interest, 3.846, simply shows an average of the total rates paid at a given time on all the loans.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It does not take into account the amount of each loan.

Mr. GLYNN. -
It does not take into account the currency of each particular loan. You cannot, with mathematical correctness, take over the loans unless you do this, and this practically is the suggestion made by my amendment. You take some common stock, say a stock that would, at the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth, at average rates fetch about par. You may take a stock for 25 years if you like at 3 per cent.; then you take each loan of each colony, and say what capital amount that loan would represent if converted into that common stock. Having done that with each loan of each colony, then you find out what is the average capital indebtedness of all the colonies in these converted loans.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
What do you mean by the average capital indebtedness?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Suppose, for instance, you take a stock of twenty years' currency at 6 per cent., and you convert that stock into a stock of 25 years' currency at 3 per cent. The capital amount expressed in the new stock, being the stock which you will take as the common stock to determine the relative values of all the loans, would be the true relative capital indebtedness. That is, that 6 per cent. stock valued in the new or common currency would be the true capital indebtedness of that loan in relation to the other loans of the colonies after conversion of all in a similar manner. That, then, would give accurately the relative capital values of all the debts; and the operation of conversion for this purpose need not take a day to do. I submitted the proposition to the Commissioner of Audit in South Australia, and he says that it is mathematically correct, and that it can be done. Whatever then would be the average of the total debts, after being converted in this manner, of all the colonies would be the point on which would binge any liabilities that would remain to be discharged by, or credits given to, some of the states. South Australia, for instance, having a larger debt per head, would be liable after this conversion for £6,000,000 or £7,000,000 on the present total indebtedness, and my clause suggests that you would debit a colony with its excess over the average after conversion. In this manner the debts would be amalgamated, but where there were no excesses over the average the Commonwealth would be liable to the state to the extent of any deficiency under the average.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Victoria would stand the lowest.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Probably it would, or it might be Western Australia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Do you think we would get anything back out of the Commonwealth?

Mr. GLYNN. -

The proposal also provides for that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is all I am interested in.

Mr. GLYNN. -

You debit all excesses over the average amount, and the Commonwealth is to be indebted to a state which has a sum less than the average amount. There can be no inequality there.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes. A state which is below the average amount has a loss for which the Commonwealth would be liable, but a state which is above the average amount would be liable to the Commonwealth for its excess.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You say that a state that is below the average has a loss. How do you make that out?

Mr. GLYNN. -
Because it would contribute to the capital indebtedness of the other colonies whose indebtedness was greater than its own. That is the reason.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Out of what fund would it pay its contribution?

Mr. GLYNN. -
Out of its consolidated revenue. Its contributions would be to the total interest, and therefore involve an excess over its true liability. Hence the credits to equalize. Of course, the honorable member may doubt the wisdom of this proposal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Is the state to retain a part of its public debts and hand over the balance to the Commonwealth?

Mr. GLYNN. -
It is to hand over all its existing public debts to the Commonwealth, but the Commonwealth is to allow the state, by the issue of federal bonds or otherwise, some compensation for the additional liability which it takes over beyond what it ought to take over, beyond what its true proportion of the indebtedness is.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Why not take the lowest scale of borrowing instead of taking the average?

Mr. GLYNN. -
That might be done. The excess would then be greater. The total liabilities of the Commonwealth to the state, and the state to the Commonwealth, in question would not, by taking the average, amount to more than £15,000,000. My estimates are not given on the basis of the conversion of the debts to a common stock, but they are approximately correct. Therefore, if debts amounting to £140,000,000 were amalgamated, you would only have a total difference of about £15,000,000, which is not much to take into account. There is no loss on the one side or the other. I respectfully submit this method of conversion for the consideration of honorable members. I would point out that the longer we delay the conversion of our loans the greater the difficulties of conversion will be, when the character of our debts has changed. Some five years hence we may not have to deal with a total indebtedness of £140,000,000, but of £200,000,000 and consolidation operations will then, of course, be considerably hampered.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I cannot see how you meet the point raised by Mr. Holder that you are giving the advantage of the conversion, in the shape of a premium, to the bond-holders, instead of retaining it with the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The premium to the bond-holder is problematical, but that difficulty could be got over, if necessary, in a way that would not result in the loss of that possible gain, because it is only, at worst, the loss of a possible gain. It might be provided that the existing debts of the states shall, as against the states only, be taken over from the start, and that until the Commonwealth assumes the liability for the debts, the states, not the Commonwealth, shall be liable to the public creditor therefor. For the purpose of absorbing the surplus, the debts of the state might thus be taken over by the Commonwealth, but you need not give the better security of the Commonwealth to the creditors themselves until you make an arrangement with them for a quid pro quo. In that way you would take over the public debts as against the states at once, but not as against the creditors, and by that method you would wipe off practically the whole of the probable surplus. It will also have this very great advantage, that the state Treasurer would know how his financial accounts would be from year to year. He would be able to say "this liability has gone from us."

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Providing it raises a corresponding revenue.

Mr. GLYNN. -

If it does not do that, it means repudiation, which we need not take into account. We may presume that the Federal Parliament will do what the Constitution says it ought to do. My amendment will render compulsory, from the start, the taking over of the public debts.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I think we have come to a stage when we ought to economize time as much as possible, and I fancy we shall do that best, at the present juncture, by first taking the amendments suggested by Western Australia, which are printed on page 63 of the tabular statement of amendments prepared by the Parliamentary Draftsman of New South Wales, circulated amongst honorable members, because the first amendment is whether it shall be "may" or "shall." That amendment raises a distinct issue, namely, whether debts shall be taken over by the Commonwealth compulsorily or not. Each of the other questions may be discussed alone, after that is determined, which would be a better course than confounding them together.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Can we discuss that without knowing the conditions that would be laid down?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I am afraid that if we do not take care we shall have the same debate three or four times over, but if we were first to discuss the question whether the word should be "may" or "shall," we should avoid needless repetition to a considerable extent.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I suggested that we should take the Tasmanian amendment first, but that did not appear to meet with favour, therefore, I put the clause, to which an amendment has been moved by Mr. Glynn-to insert the amendment that is in print-and, therefore, I am bound to put that question to the committee first. If, however, Mr. Glynn chooses to withdraw his amendment, the suggestion of Western Australia to omit "may" and insert "shall" can then be put, and that will decide the question of whether the taking over of the state debts by the Commonwealth shall be compulsory or optional.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
The solution the Chairman suggests is the true one; but you could insert "shall" instead of "may" in my amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Will you do that?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I do not want to pin myself to that amendment. If any honorable member wants to challenge the position I am taking up he can propose that amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
I have given a great deal of attention to this matter since we first met in Adelaide, and the opinion I then held, both in regard to the railways and the debts, is as strong to-day as ever it was. I do not mean by that statement to say for one moment that I am not in favour, under certain conditions, of the Commonwealth taking over both the railways and the debts. Any business man will see that that is what must come sooner or later. The consolidation of the debts of these colonies would, doubtless, give a higher tone to the market, and the future schemes that may be adopted could, of course, be ultimately better adopted by the Federal Parliament than by the different states. But the very speech of the honorable member who has just sat down, opening out his scheme, has exhibited innumerable difficulties, and has shown us into what a quagmire we will get here if we attempt to solve this problem by the adoption of any intricate scheme. It is all very well to say in a few simple words that the Commonwealth should take over the debts of the states, but it would be utterly unfair to leave absolute power with the Federal Parliament to take over these debts on any scheme which their wisdom might suggest. The scheme of Mr. Glynn means that these debts, which in a certain number of years will run out, and be converted at the lowest possible rates, should be taken as they now stand, with all their disadvantages, and that certain states should have to pay up certain deficiencies. Well, that would be a nice proposal to make to any of the present states who may, in times of great impecuniosity, have launched loans with high rates of interest. Those states would naturally say-"No; from what source are we going to get the money to pay up the deficiency? Are we going to get it from our consolidated revenue, or are we to issue a new local loan in order to raise the necessary funds?"

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Mr. Glynn says that the states will not have to pay any more than they are paying at present.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Mr. Glynn knows that some states must be indebted to the Commonwealth for a certain deficiency after ascertaining the average of interest liability.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That would not increase their liabilities at all; it would not add to their present liabilities.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It must add to the liabilities of the states in one sense, so far as I can see. There are only two modes: Either to leave these debts as they are subject to the consent of the state and the negotiations of the Federal Parliament in the future, or to take them over bodily. But what does that involve? It is all very well to get rid of a certain liability upon the states, but this involves, according to the honorable member himself, making such a Tariff by the Federal Parliament that it will be able to cover the interest as well as the federal expenditure. Then there is another point which, to my mind, is very strong. It is this: That there is a connexion between the debts and the railways which, from my point of view, I cannot dissociate. The railways and the debts are absolutely and inextricably bound up together. Therefore, for us to say to the Federal Parliament that the debts which are left with us... for the present can be taken over upon any scheme except an absolute scheme for taking them all over at the present rate of interest would be absolutely unfair to the states. Is it fair for us to put into this Constitution an arrangement by which these debts with different rates of interest pertaining to them shall be taken over by the Federal Parliament, and the whole Commonwealth made responsible for them? Let us remember what the character of these debts is. It does not seem to me to be departing from that simple principle with which we have started that there are certain matters which are to be left to the states mixed up intimately with their particular life and assets, to say that these debts ought not to be interfered with, except with the consent of the states, by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is your point that the interest is different or that the security is different?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It is this: You have a large number of debts in the different colonies, and you have some of those debts connected with railways which are paying a full rate of interest. You have other debts which have paid for railways that are not returning a full rate of interest. You have some colonies in which, perhaps, the charge upon the debt is entirely interest producing. You have other colonies where it will be difficult to say where the assets for the debts are. The whole question is so complicated—as can be seen by the different schemes suggested here, such as the scheme of Sir Philip Fysh—that it seems to me absolutely impossible for this Convention to deal with it.
