OFFICIAL RECORD OF THE DEBATES OF THE AUSTRALASIAN FEDERAL CONVENTION (THIRD SESSION), HELD AT PARLIAMENT HOUSE, MELBOURNE, VICTORIA.
Thursday, 20th January, 1898.

Meeting of Convention - Petitions - Representation of Queensland - Suspension of Standing Orders - Official Record of Debates - Adjournment.

The members of the Convention met in the Legislative Assembly chamber of Parliament House, Melbourne, this day, at twelve noon, pursuant to the adjournment of the Convention at Sydney, on 24th September, 1897.

The PRESIDENT took the chair.

PETITIONS.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg to present a petition from 1,643 electors of the Province of South Australia, praying that the Convention shall adopt the principle of the Hare-Spence method of voting in the elections for the Federal Parliament. The petition is respectfully worded, and contains a prayer. I move that it be received and read.

The motion was agreed to.

The CLERK read the petition, as follows:-

TO THE AUSTRALASIAN FEDERAL CONVENTION.

The petition of the undersigned electors of the Province of South Australia humbly sheweth as follows:-

1. Your petitioners hold various opinions with regard to political questions generally, and adhere to various parties.

2. Your petitioners, while desirous of leaving undisturbed the rule of the majority, are anxious that the minority should not be absolutely silenced.

3. Your petitioners believe that under the ordinary methods of election by majorities the Senate in the Federal Parliament will be in special danger of being an Assembly not fairly or really representative of the electors.

4. Such danger will be greatly increased by the smallness, of the number to be elected from time to time, as compared with the very large number of the electors-

   Either party organization by the ticket system will secure to the major party (however small its majority) the entire representation, to the exclusion of the minority, (however large); or

   Multiplicity of candidates (through lack of organization) may give excessive representation to a minority and, even exclude the majority.
5. Your petitioners are convinced that the application of the Hare system of voting (similar to the system lately introduced in Tasmania) will insure that (as far as the number of representatives will allow) elected candidates will fairly and in due proportion represent all the electors.

Your petitioners therefore humbly pray that your House will, in framing the Constitution of Federated Australia, provide for the election - especially of senators - by means of the said Hare system.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have to present a petition from Dr. Andrew Ross, of New South Wales, praying that certain provisions may be made in the Federal Constitution with a view to the prevention of the conferring of titles, and also to provide for impeachment in cases of corruption. I beg to move that the petition be received.

The motion was agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF QUEENSLAND.

The PRESIDENT. -

I desire to acquaint the Convention that, in continuation of the correspondence with Queensland which took place during the session at Sydney, I addressed a letter to the Acting Premier of Queensland, and received from him a reply, both of which I will ask the Clerk to read, and I will then call on the leader of the Convention to move that it be recorded in the minutes.

The CLERK read the correspondence, as follows:-

FEDERAL CONVENTION, 1897.
(New South Wales.)
Parliament House,
Sydney, 24th September.

Sir,-Referring to previous correspondence re the subject of the adjournment of the Convention for the purpose of enabling Queensland to be represented thereat by representatives directly appointed by the electors of the colony, I have the honour to inform you that the Convention, at the instance of its leader, the Hon. E. Barton, this day unanimously adopted the following resolution:-

That this Convention desires to express its gratification at the announcement contained in the Hon. Sir Horace Tozer's communication, and its fervent hope that representatives of the people of Queensland will take part in its adjourned deliberations.

The Convention has now adjourned, and will re-assemble at twelve o'clock noon on Thursday, the 20th January, 1898, at Parliament House, Melbourne.
I have the Honour to be,

Sir,

Your obedient servant,

C. C. KINGSTON,

President Australasian Federal Convention.

The Hon. Sir H. Tozer,

Acting Premier of Queensland.

Chief Secretary's Office,

Brisbane, 29th September, 1897

Sir,-Referring to previous correspondence on the subject of the adjournment of the Federal Convention for the purpose of enabling this colony to be represented thereat, and especially to your letters of the 20th and 24th inst. respectively, communicating resolutions adopted by the Convention in favour of the proposed adjournment, I have the honour to express the gratification of this Government at the manner in which the resolution of the Legislative Assembly of Queensland conveyed in my telegram of the 17th inst. was received, and at the subsequent action of the Convention in regard to the adjournment of its meetings until the 20th of January next.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

HORACE TOZER.

The Right Hon. C.C. Kingston,

President of the Australasian Federal Convention, Adelaide.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move that the correspondence be recorded in the minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move the suspension of the standing orders for the purpose of enabling a motion to be proposed, without notice, with regard to making an official record of the debates of the Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

OFFICIAL RECORD OF DEBATES.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales) moved -

That an official record of the debates of this Convention be made by the Parliamentary Debates Staff of Victoria.

The motion was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Honorable members will recollect that at the time we adjourned in Sydney the Convention, in committee, had proceeded with the discussion of the clauses of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill as far as the 70th clause, except that one or two of the clauses prior to that clause had been postponed, and that the latter half of clause 52, on which we were then engaged, had been postponed. The proceedings will be taken up, of course, at that part of clause 52, relating to the functions and powers of the Parliament, which we had reached when we adjourned in Sydney. It now becomes fit to inquire whether the Convention shall proceed with its work today, or whether it shall adjourn, as usual, till tomorrow. I have no particular opinion on the subject. I have every confidence that the work of the Convention will be assiduously pursued until it is concluded; but I am informed that the Convention is not fully constituted yet that the Premier of Tasmania and some other members from that colony have been detained on board ship by adverse weather. The representatives from Western Australia have only just arrived, and I dare say that my right Honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) is very anxious to know what the Finance Committee are doing. Therefore, I should really like to take the sense of the Convention as to whether we should adjourn or not. I will put myself in order by moving that the Convention do now adjourn. If the majority do not wish that it should adjourn, I shall be prepared to withdraw that motion. It is only proposed formally to ascertain the wishes of the Convention.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I beg to second the motion. As a rule, I would not be in favour of adjourning at this early stage of our proceedings; but seeing that some of the representatives are unavoidably absent, and remembering that the Convention in Sydney, because some of the Victorian representatives could not get there, kindly adjourned the first meeting, so that we might all be present before we commenced our work, I think it would come with a bad grace on our part were we to attempt to object to the adjournment of the Convention at the present time. I have, therefore, great pleasure in, seconding the motion proposed by the, leader of the Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at nine minutes past twelve o'clock noon.
Friday 21st January, 1898.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITION.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL (Victoria). -

I have the honour to present a petition from the executive officers of the Australasian National League, with reference to matters now being dealt with by the Convention. I beg to move that the petition be received and read.

The motion was agreed to.

The CLERK read the petition, as follows:--

To the Right Honorable the President and Members of the Australasian Federal Convention, in session assembled:

The humble petition of the undersigned, the executive officers of the Australasian National League, humbly sheweth:

1. That your petitioners represent a large and influential body having a considerable membership in New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, who are deeply interested in the question of the federation of Australasia, now under consideration by the Convention.

2. That amongst the provisions of the Draft Constitution of the Commonwealth is one for the establishment in Australia of a Court of Appeal, the judgments of which shall as regards all cases between individuals, be absolutely final, and shall as regards matters affecting the proposed Commonwealth, or any constituent state, thereof, be also final, save in cases in, which Her Majesty the Queen shall be pleased to grant, special leave to appeal to Her Majesty.

3. That your petitioners are of opinion that there should be a Federal Court of Appeal; but humbly urge, that they ask not the concession of, a privilege but the maintenance of an important right, for the proposed extinction of which no adequate reason has been shown; which has not been withdrawn from their fellow subjects in Canada, and the abrogation of which right of appeal to the Privy Council would take away one of the highest privileges of a British subject. It would also seriously prejudice the material interests of Australia by depriving the British capitalist of his right to appeal to his own courts in serious cases, and thus prevent the inflow of British capital, upon which the colonies largely depend for their development; and it would constitute a serious menace to the integrity of the empire by severing one of the strongest existing ties between the Australian colonies and the British Crown, besides making Australia almost the only, self-governing part of the empire in which such a right would not exist.

4. Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that such amendments may be made in the Commonwealth Bill during the present session of the Convention as will preserve to Australian and British litigants in the Australian courts the final right of appeal to her Majesty in Privy Council.

5. And your petitioners will ever pray.

STATISTICIANS' REPORTS

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I would like to ask the leader of the Convention a question without notice. It is whether he could take steps to procure, and to have laid upon the table, the data upon which Mr. Coghlan has based his latest series of figures relating to federal finance? At the same time, I desire to call the honorable gentleman's attention to a letter by the Hon. Edward Pulsford, which appeared in the Sydney Morning Herald of Wednesday; and to, ask that copies of that letter be laid on the table. I have no doubt that it will prove, of the same advantage to the Convention as Mr. Pulsford's former letters did, in enabling honorable members to determine the value of Mr. Coghlan's figures.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Of course I have no power to command the laying upon the table of any return or information. All that I can do is to recommend to the executive authorities of this or that colony that the information be given. I shall ask the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales to lay upon the table if he can obtain possession of them-the data upon which Mr. Coghlan has acted or written, and also the further paper by Mr. Pulsford to which the honorable member has referred. Of course, I cannot, conceal from myself that a controversy of this kind is one of extreme importance. The question of whether any gentleman in a public position who brings forward figures is a statistician or a mere arithmetician depends upon his data. I must confess, myself, that I place no confidence in any statements of the kind' that we are accustomed to receive from statisticians unless the basis of their authority is disclosed to the Convention.

Mr. SYMON. -

Supposing there is no basis?

Mr. BARTON. -
If we do not have the basis of a statement disclosed, the conclusions are no more than a sum in arithmetic of which we have not the preliminary figures.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

If I am in order, I would also like to call the attention of the Premiers or Treasurers of the different colonies to the fact that, as far as I know, up to the present time, we have received no reliable statistics on all the salient matters relating to finance later than 30th June, 1896. It seems to me that, if we are to discuss federal finance early next week, we ought to have, some document laid on the table of the Convention bringing right up to the very latest date all the salient figures upon which we shall have to base our decisions.

PUBLIC DEBT.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria), pursuant to an order of the Convention (dated 26th March, 1896), laid on the table a return relating to the public debt of the various colonies.

The return was ordered to be printed.

POPULATION AND ELECTORS.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria) presented, pursuant to an order of the Convention (dated 6th September, 1897), an amended return showing the population and number of electors in each electoral district of New South Wales and Victoria.

The return was ordered to be printed.

DAYS OF MEETING.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I desire to ask the leader of the Convention, without notice, whether it is proposed that we shall sit tomorrow?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I shall not be favorable to any sitting on Saturdays until the urgency of any such proceeding is disclosed. I may say, while I am on my legs, that I think that during the first two weeks of the Convention it will not be necessary to sit at night and that I shall only suggest night sittings when I find that, it becomes a matter of urgency. I hope that we shall be able to conduct our business between half past ten o'clock in the morning and five or half-past, five o'clock in the afternoon.

FEDERAL FINANCE.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria) moved -

That a return be laid before this Convention showing according to the latest statistics, the annual expenditure of which each colony represented in the Convention will be relieved in respect of the following services and works (with interest thereon at 3 per cent.), to be transferred to the Commonwealth:- (1) Customs and Excise department; (2) Postal, telegraphic, and telephonic services; (3) Naval and military defence; (4) Ocean beacons, buoys and ocean lighthouses and light-ships; (5) Astronomical and meteorological observations; (6) Quarantine; (7) Census and statistics; (8) Currency and coining (Mint); (9) Weights and measures; (10) Bankruptcy and insolvency; (11) Copyrights, patents, trade-marks; (12) Immigration and emigration; (13) External affairs (Agency-General departments).

He said-I have been induced to ask for this return on account of the vagueness of the table of returns in Mr. Coghlan's pamphlet, referred to by Mr. Wise. In one of his returns on page 2, in giving the expenditure of which each colony will be relieved after the transfer of services to the Federal Government, Mr. Coghlan states that the total amount will only be £958,500. He says that New South Wales will be relieved of £418,500; Victoria, of £307,500; South Australia, £41,500; Western Australia, of £158,000; Tasmania, of £33,000; making a total of £958,500. I have reason to believe that that return, which on the face of it does not show the data on which it is founded, is based merely upon the services which are to be transferred immediately upon the establishment of the Commonwealth, by section 59 of the Bill, and that it does not take into consideration the whole of the other services and departments and works enumerated in my motion. I agree with Mr. Wise that it is desirable that a return of this kind, showing such important results, ought to set forth the data on which it is founded; and therefore I have been induced to table this motion. The returns, I think, can be easily and promptly compiled. The information will, I have no doubt, be of great; use to honorable members during the sittings of the Convention.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL FREE-TRADE.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia) presented "A Note on Intercolonial Free-trade in relation to Australian Federation as affecting Western Australia," by Mr. Edgar T. Owen, Government Actuary of Western Australia, and moved that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Sir RICHARD BAKER). - Before calling on any particular clause, I think it is my duty to point out to the committee certain irregularities which have occurred. During our last sitting in Sydney the Drafting Committee was authorized, by a resolution of the Convention, to suggest drafting amendments in clauses which had been considered. Inadvertently, no doubt, they also suggested amendments in clauses which had not been considered, and the amendments were put, as every honorable member knows, in globo. They were not seen by me. They were not seen by any one in the Convention, so that the somewhat anomalous position now exists that we have made amendments in clauses which we have not considered. I do not say that they are of importance, but, inasmuch as it is contrary to practice and to standing orders to work backwards in a clause, these amendments, if they were taken as having been properly passed, would prevent us from considering prior amendments in clause 69, and in other clauses, which had been suggested by the Legislatures. I intend, therefore, with the consent of the committee, to ignore these amendments, and to ask the leader of the Convention to move them again.

Mr. BARTON. -

Hear, hear.

Discussion (adjourned from 24th September, 1897) was resumed on clause 52, setting out the powers of the Parliament.

The CHAIRMAN. -

When the Convention adjourned we had reached clause 52. Sub-sections (23) and (24) were amalgamated, and Mr. Howe was about to move a new sub-section. I will now call upon the honorable member to proceed with his proposal.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

Sir Richard Baker, it is always a pleasure to respond to a call made by you, and with great respect I would again bring under the notice of the Convention the additional power which I desire to confer upon the Federal Parliament that is, the power to grant invalid and old-age pensions. My amendment will, I presume, come after subsection (24).

Mr. SYMON. -

Sub-sections (23) and (24) have been amalgamated.

Mr. HOWE. -

Then my sub-section will take the place of subsection (24). The amendment is to insert as a new sub-section.

Invalid and old-age pensions.

I have been long of opinion, after giving a good deal of thought to this question, that it could be more effectually dealt with by the Federal Parliament than by the Government of any individual Australian state. When we come to trace the history of this question we find that all the great philanthropists, and many leading statesmen, of the world are endeavouring, by all the means in their power, to solve the problem of how best to provide for the deserving and aged poor. We know that some of the countries in the old world have already adopted legislation dealing with this question, and we know that others are on the eve of doing so. Australasia has not been altogether asleep with regard to this question. Several of these colonies have, from time to time, appointed commissions to inquire into the question, and the province which I have the Honour to belong has recently appointed a Royal commission to inquire into the subject. We are a little behind one part of Australasia. I refer to New Zealand. That country has already passed through one branch of her Legislature a measure dealing with the question. We are more favorably situated for legislation of this kind than many of the countries in the old world inasmuch as our poor are not so numerous in proportion to the population; neither is their misery so great. It therefore follows that this ulcer of our civilization will be more amenable to judicious treatment. I know this is not the time nor place to discuss in detail the various systems which have been adopted by some countries, or the systems which have been formulated on broad lines of thought; neither, indeed, is it the time nor place for me to enter into detail with regard to systems, although there are one or two which I prefer. But I cannot conceive of any country being better situated to pass legislation of this kind with a greater likelihood of success than our own country. Here we have an extensive continent, divided from the rest of the world by thousands of miles of ocean, where the workers must essentially be almost always Australians, whose interests will be mutually bound together by kindred ties, and must always remain so. Therefore, we have a better opportunity for legislature successfully on a question of this kind than they have even in some countries in which the system obtains, I am quite willing to admit that the question of old-age pensions is one of great magnitude; but, looking at our isolated position, no country is more favorably situated for carrying out such a system. It is admitted on all hands that the existing means adopted for dealing with this great ulcer of our civilization are altogether inadequate, and that it is imperative that some other system more in keeping with the times should be adopted. I hope when it is adopted that system will not take from the people their self-respect. There is no reason why those who receive pensions from the State should be looked upon with contumely. Does any one speak with scorn of those who at present are pensioners of the State-men who have given their best services to the country, who have neglected their own interests in rendering those services? Certainly not. Then why should not the humblest worker in Australia, or in any other country, participate, perhaps in a more modest degree, in those privileges which at present exist? I know that when we review the industrial conditions obtaining at the present time, pervaded as these are with machinery the most efficient that the brain of man can devise, we find therein another reason why there is so much suffering, particularly among the aged, because all these factors tend to give the pride of place to youth and activity rather than to age and experience. I know there are records which prove conclusively that the virtue of thrift has been practised to a great extent by the people of Australia; the records of our financial institutions, savings banks, benefit and building societies, all show that that is the case. They show that the thrift practised by the people of Australia is unparalleled in the history of the world. But there is another side to this question, and a very gloomy and sorrowful side indeed. There are records of bankruptcy, of reckless, and in some instances corrupt, management, when the hard earnings of the people and the savings of a lifetime have been swept away-have melted away like snow before the noonday sun. Through this reckless and corrupt management men who thought they had provided for their old and declining age found themselves stranded on the cheerless shores of charity, and many of them have had to accept even amongst ourselves the pauper's lot. The pauper's lot in Australia or in any other country is to the deserving poor one of the saddest and darkest blots on our civilization. I know that we cannot speak with too much respect or praise of our benefit societies. I have been a subscribing member to those societies since I have attained manhood, and I claim to know a little of their inner working. So far as assistance in sickness or in case of accident is concerned they are unsurpassed; but as a means of providing for the aged poor, or providing for old age, they have not hitherto been a success. I claim to have read a great deal on this question, and to know something about the opinions of the workers of this country, and I have come to the conclusion that what is wanted is a national system, under which people who are subject to its laws shall run no risk of failure-so that those who subscribe to a certain fund should know that in their old and declining age they should not eat the bread of dependence. It is only a national system that can give such an assurance. We know that there are thousands and thousands who have attained the meridian of life, and that many have passed it. We know that many of these men have through various causes, and through no fault of their own, been unable to provide for their old age. That is a very serious thing indeed to them. They reason to themselves in this way:"Here have I given all my best services to the country; I have fulfilled all the obligations of a citizen, a father, and a husband in an exemplary manner, and I see nothing in front of me in my old and declining days but charity." We all know that it is the fear of poverty that drives many excellent men almost to despair. The Right Honorable Mr. Chamberlain, in speaking on this subject, denounced the present system obtaining for the relief of the aged poor. He said that of all the workers of Great Britain one out of every two, if he has attained to the age of 65 years, has to seek parish relief. As he said-"This inadequate provision for old age is a disgrace to the nation, and a danger to all social order." I have given this subject considerable study, and I have come to the conclusion that any system to be effective must be compulsory. We are met sometimes by people who dearly love liberty-and no one loves liberty more than I do myself-who say that it would be an encroachment upon the liberty of the subject if we compelled people to contribute to an old-age pension fund. All direct taxation, however, is compulsory, and I presume direct taxation is necessary for the good government of the country. If that be the case, does it not follow that a compulsory contribution to an old-age pension fund is for the good government of the people? and, more than that, it will wipe away for ever the stigma of pauperism from the people of Australasia. I hope we shall be able to formulate a Bill-I have no doubt we shall-that will be acceptable to the people of Australia, and be adopted by them; but I hope that the Draft Constitution which will be submitted to the people will contain amongst its provisions the power which I respectfully wish to insert. I am sure that if it does contain such a provision the measure will not be the less acceptable to the people of Australasia.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I sympathize most heartily with the sentiment which has animated the honorable member (Mr. Howe) in introducing this proposal at this stage. I shall not attempt to discuss the desirability of old-age pensions further than to say that I think them extremely desirable. The question we have rather to consider is whether this power should be conceded to the Federal Parliament at this stage, and it seems to me extremely undesirable that it should. The honorable member has said that his colony, and some other colonies, are behind at least one colony of the Australasian group-New Zealand. New Zealand is actively engaged in considering this question, and Victoria recently appointed a commission to inquire into the matter, and it may happen that those colonies, or other colonies, may be prepared immediately to proceed with some effective scheme for the provision of old-age pensions. But if, as we all hope, federation is achieved as the result of this effort, and that power is handed over to the Federal Parliament, those colonies will be unable to move until they have converted such other colonies as are not up to their standard on that point. Therefore, I think it extremely undesirable to put the provision suggested in the Constitution. It seems to me that it will be better to leave this matter as it is— a matter of domestic legislation—until under the powers of the Constitution the various states choose voluntarily subsequently to hand them over. Honorable members know that there is nothing to prevent the states at any subsequent stage from handing over by their own consent any subject which it seems to them can be better dealt with by the Federal Parliament than by the estate Parliaments. But in view of the position which this question has reached in the public mind— in view of the position which some of the states have taken up in reference to the question— it seems to me that it would impede rather than expedite the adoption of this principle if we were to put it in the Commonwealth Bill, because some of the opponents of the measure in the states may urge, and urge with effect, that the Federal Parliament would be dealing with this question, and therefore that we should not deal with it at this juncture. Not wishing to delay the business of the Convention, I shall refrain from saying more on this point. It is to me an extremely important point. It is one which might be discussed with very great interest, and with very great advantage if we had the time, but our object is rather to make a Constitution under which reforms of this character will be easily achieved than to discuss those reforms; and it seems to me that we shall be proceeding better— that we shall be conducing to a more speedy adoption in detail of this principle— if we leave it out of the Commonwealth Bill.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia).—

Had the honorable member who moved the insertion of this clause proposed to make it an exclusive power of the Commonwealth, then I think that the arguments used by the honorable member (Mr. Trenwith) would have applied; but I anticipate that he has no such intention, nor has any member of the Convention any intention to make this an exclusive power, but merely to make it one of the concurrent powers of the Commonwealth, under which the Commonwealth can act, at the same time not forbidding any individual state from acting.

Mr. HIGGINS.—

Would the honorable member give two pensions to the same person?

Dr. COCKBURN.—

Certainly not. I would simply leave it to the Commonwealth, at any time that the Federal Parliament thinks proper, to bring this power into operation. Of course it will not do so in the first instance, because at present the whole matter is in the experimental stage. But I see great difficulties in the way of any individual colony establishing a permanent system of old-age pensions unless it is shared in by the whole of Australia, because it stands to reason that if any one colony makes specially good terms for the treatment of the declining years of its citizens, there is a danger of those advantages being shared in by those who did not contribute in any way to the curing of them; and I say that, although the Parliaments in the separate colonies will have to experiment in this direction individually, nothing great will ever be achieved until the matter is taken up by the Commonwealth; and, therefore, I think we should give power in this Constitution to the Commonwealth to adopt a system of old-age pensions just whenever the common sense of the Federal Parliament thinks it proper to do so—to leave it a concurrent power, not an exclusive power; and I, for one, will have the greatest possible pleasure in supporting my colleague in this matter. As both speakers have said, this is not the time to enter into the details of any scheme, or to discuss the merits of a scheme. I believe it will be quite unnecessary, because I think we all agree that it will be well that a system of old-age pensions should obtain everywhere, and, believing this, I ask that this Convention should give power to the Commonwealth Parliament to take steps in this direction whenever the time should appear to it proper to do so.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

On the merits of the matter I am with the honorable member (Mr. Trenwith) and therefore I wish to be understood as having said all that he said. As to the point raised by the honorable member (Dr. Cockburn), I should like to point out that he is under a misapprehension. Owing to the necessity for maintaining laws on the subjects specified in clause 52 until federal

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Not so far as they are not inconsistent.

Mr. REID. -

Then my honorable friend is landed in this extraordinary position, that he seriously proposes that we are to have two systems of old-age pensions, and that each is to prevail so long as it is not inconsistent with the other.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

That would be the effect of the legislation.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

As soon as individual colonies work out a successful scheme, the Federal Parliament will adopt it, and then there will be one law—the federal law.

Mr. REID. -

That seems beautifully simple, but it really is not, I assure the honorable member. The sooner that honorable members realize this central fact that any one of the subjects specified in clause 52 is intended to be absolutely and exclusively within the province of the Federal Parliament the better. The structure of the clause is, as it is for the reason I have mentioned, that until there are some federal laws the state law must prevail to keep everything alive to keep the administration of these subjects alive. If the power were made exclusive honorable members will see what would happen. The moment the Federal Constitution was adopted and came into force all the state laws on these subjects would lapse, the subject would have passed away from the state into the province of the Federal Legislature. That would bring about a state of confusion which we and the draftsmen of this Bill were careful to avoid, so that the point put by my honorable friend (Dr. Cockburn) instead of making the proposition of the honorable member (Mr. Howe) more eligible really is rather against it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It seems to me that the point we have to discuss is twofold; first, whether this is exclusively a power which should be given to the state Parliaments and not to the Central Parliament, and second, whether, even in the very nebulous and doctrinaire shape we may imagine, this is a power which ultimately, by the evolution of things, may be taken over by the Central Parliament. Is it wise, at the present stage, to put such a power in the Central Parliament? I hold that this is essentially a line of distinction between centralization and real federation, that this is essentially a matter, from my point of view, which should be absolutely left to the local Parliaments. On the very principle of federation why should the states in one part of Australia have to bear the pauperism of the states in another part? It seems to me that it is one of those things which might give an immense amount of trouble in placing this Constitution before the people of the different colonies. We want to retain our autonomy in all matters essentially of local significance.

Mr. WISE. -

I differ from my honorable colleagues in the representation of New South Wales in this matter, and on one ground only—that it appears to me impracticable to devise any scheme for giving old-age pensions within the limits of any single state. Constituted as Australia is, with a population moving about from one colony to another, no single state could safely offer to the labouring population the inducement of a system of old-age pensions with a certainty that its resources would not be used by those who had no title by domicile or by having laboured in the state to the benefits of them.
New Zealand is slightly differently constituted, because there is not that steady flow of population from New Zealand to elsewhere that there is in these colonies. I think that there is a slight misunderstanding as to the object of this clause. It is not the intention of those who are engaged in framing a Constitution that all the powers and authorities conferred by clause 52 shall be immediately exercised by the Federal Parliament. On the contrary, we may expect that many of the powers and authorities conferred by this clause will continue to be authorized by the states, as has been happening in the United States, possibly for a century after the foundation of the Commonwealth. Further, and I do not wish in any way to extend my remarks, it seems to me that there is another consideration which ought to weigh with us in considering this proposal. If it is carried, and if the Federal Parliament should see fit to use the powers which would thus be conferred, nothing would be more likely to stimulate a feeling of interest in the continuance of the union than the fact that all the inhabitants of the Commonwealth depended on its continuance for their support in indigence and old age. It would strengthen the feeling in favour of the union, just as-if without pedantry I may go back to an historical example-the foundation of the National Debt strengthened the feeling in favour of William the Third and the Hanoverian succession.

Mr. Reid. -
Then it might have averted the Civil War if they had had it in America.

Mr. Barton. -
If they had pensioned all the negroes.

Mr. Wise. -
It might. I am not dealing with this matter from interests which are stronger than interests which arise from mere pecuniary advantages; and the interests which occasioned the civil war were not those which would be restrained by any consideration of £ s. d. At the same time, if we create in the mind of every citizen of Australia a feeling that he has a living pecuniary interest in the continuance of the Union, we do a great deal to remove possible causes of difficulty and danger in the future. But my main reason for supporting it is that I believe that it is utterly impracticable for any colony, working by itself, to establish a system of old-age pensions.

Mr. Glynn. -
The representative of New South Wales (Mr. Wise) has pointed out the chief difficulty which will operate in not allowing federal legislation upon the subject of old-age pensions. I can, I think, speak with some knowledge upon the matter, because I am a member of the commission which has been appointed in South Australia to deal with the whole subject. The great difficulty which will arise in formulating a scheme of national insurance is that the sphere of the operation of the business of the state would not be wide enough. Averages must be struck on a wide basis. In New Zealand they have found that they have had to abandon one class of State insurance—they have had no scheme of old-age pensions yet, but I refer to the industrial branch—because the limits of work were not wide enough to allow of any certainty between the premium paid and the business that would correspond to these payments. In Australia there is another difficulty which will be experienced, and it is a difficulty which will not operate so much in any of the older countries of Europe. Our population is comparatively migratory in character. No system of old age pensions, no matter, what you might adopt, would be financially satisfactory, unless the benefits were postponed from periods varying from 40 to 60 years. In Germany 70 is the limit; in Denmark, I think, 65; in French schemes which have been tried and regarded as unworkable there was a limit of something like 70 years. In this country, owing to the migratory character of our population, federal provision should be made because otherwise, after the coming into operation of this system in a state—say South Australia—a man leaving would lose his grip upon the benefits that would accrue to him in going to another colony. From the purely actuarial point of view I should rather prefer a system of federal insurance than a system of pensions provided by particular states. Again, it has been said by Mr. Reid that we shall be in this matter interfering with the power of state legislation, because the Federal Parliament will, while it legislates, have exclusive power. I do not, however, think that this is the operation of the section under the heading of "the States" to which the right honorable gentleman has referred.

Mr. REID. -

What I say is that when the Federal Legislature Legislates upon any matter dealt with in this clause its legislation will take the place of the legislation of the states, so far as they are consistent.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I understand the position of the right honorable gentleman, but you cannot have inconsistent legislation which will endow the Federal Parliament with the power of giving old-age pensions. Moreover, I think the more efficient way is to give this power to the Federal Parliament, trusting in the united wisdom of those who represent the colonies in the Federal Parliament, and believing, that they will not pass any scheme if after a little experience of the working of the Parliament they find that a scheme of the kind will be more effectively worked by the state Legislatures.

Mr. KINGSTON.

I shall be found supporting the representative of South Australia (Mr. Howe), and I trust that he will press the amendment to a division. I am fortified in the view I take by the reflection; that not only is the honorable member who has just sat down (Mr. Glynn) a member of the commission appointed in South Australia for the express purpose of considering this question, but Mr. Howe himself occupies a similar position, and the active interest he has shown in the subject, and the attention he has undoubtedly given to the consideration of it, and the ripe experience of both honorable members, entitles their view to receive the serious consideration of the Convention. We are much indebted to Mr. Howe for the mode in which he has brought the matter under our notice, appealing alike to our reason and to our sympathies. I cannot follow the objection which has been taken by some honorable members to the Amendment. It has been past to us that if we embody this power in clause 52 the effect will be to give exclusive jurisdiction to the Commonwealth Parliament. Is it to be believed that that will be the natural result? Certainly it would not. Section 52 is express in its terms, and is in contradistinction to section 53, which declares that the Commonwealth Parliament shall have exclusive jurisdiction in respect to certain specified matters. But we are not dealing with section 53, but with section 52, in regard to which the position is different altogether. Furthermore, by section 99 it is provided that all powers which, at the establishment of the Commonwealth are vested in the Parliaments of the several colonies are to continue, subject to the provision that where the federal legislation and the state legislation happen to clash, the federal legislation shall prevail. What, then, are we afraid of? All that is sought at the present moment is to give power to the Federal Parliament, if they see fit, to legislate upon this question. If they do not see fit to legislate for a time, the power which at present rests with the local legislatures will continue in full force and effect. And the result is that the gloomy predictions which are indulged in by some honorable members simply amount to this: That they are not prepared to trust the Federal Parliament in this matter. They consider that the probability is that the Federal Parliament will legislate in the matter. If the Federal Parliament, does not there can be no fear of the consequences. But it is feared that if they do legislate they will legislate in such a way as will be inimical to the best interests of the Federation and the states. Sir, I have no such fear. I think that we are calling into existence a body which should command the full confidence and respect of this community. I am inclined to confer upon them the greatest powers. And if there were any comparison between the provincial Legislatures and the Federal Legislature, I should be inclined to say that the probability is that the wisest provision would be for legislation upon this subject to be carried into effect by the body having the widest representation, and not by the Parliament of any particular state. I do trust under these circumstances—especially when we have the recommendation of gentlemen whose special business it has been to inquire into this question, and when we are told by them that any attempt to deal with this question provincially gives rise to great difficulties which can be more satisfactorily obviated by the federal body—it being, I say, their conviction that federal legislation can best grapple with the question, I would ask this Convention to trust the Federal Parliament which it is proposed to call into existence in the sure and certain hope that in the exercise of their powers they will legislate wisely and well.

Mr. BARTON. -

As far as my humble judgment extends, I can scarcely conceive of a subject as little fitted for federal action as this question. It seems to me to have been a recognized thing from the beginning that matters of external consideration and matters of cs, the management of their industrial concerns, and the making of their labour laws, we should nevertheless say to them—"You may ruin half of your people by land laws, ruin half of them by sumptuary laws, and, nevertheless, we, when you have done your work of ruin, will take over your poor as a Commonwealth, and pay them a pension." The responsibility should be made to rest with the power; and while the power remains—as it ought to remain—with the various states in respect to their territory, their land, and their social and domestic concerns, the result of the exercise by them of that power should remain with those states.

Mr. HASSELL. -

I have great sympathy with the amendment which has been moved by Mr. Howe, and I hope that he will press it to a division. I wish to accord my support to him. I think this is a question of such importance that it should not be left to the local Parliaments, but should be dealt with by the Federal Legislature. Therefore it is that I support Mr. Howe's amendment.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am sure that we are all very much obliged to Mr. Howe for the manner in which he has brought this matter before the Convention, but it seems to me that we have sufficient controversial matters to deal with already without increasing the area of difference. I agree entirely with what Mr.
Trenwith has said. Whether this is a proper matter for federal legislation or not, every one will admit is doubtful. Certain gentlemen who have taken a considerable amount of trouble in the consideration of the matter, have come to one conclusion, and certain other gentlemen who have considered the subject come to another conclusion. It is, at all events, a highly debatable question, and, being a highly debatable question, would it not be better to leave it out of this Bill at the present time? The Bill gives power to the states to commit this jurisdiction to the Commonwealth whenever they think it is the proper matter for federal action. I have every sympathy with my honorable friend who has proposed this amendment, and every wish to support him, but I am at the same time exceedingly anxious that no fresh trouble should be added to the troubles which are already almost more than we can satisfactorily deal with; and I can conceive of no addition to the Bill which will be more fruitful of differences and of controversy than that which is proposed by Mr. Howe.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

I think that all of us will agree that the representative of South Australia (Mr. Howe) has brought this matter forward in a manner which commands our sympathy; and we shall agree also that this is a question in which the people outside, especially the working classes, take a great amount of interest. I agree with what has been said by Mr. Reid and by Mr. Trenwith, that it would be wrong on the part of people outside to form the opinion that there is no sympathy evinced in this matter on the part of the members of the Convention. I should regret very much if people thought that there was that lack of sympathy on the part of honorable members in connexion with the question. But, at the same time, I agree with Mr. Trenwith that if an amendment such as is proposed were carried, there would be the greatest difficulty in resisting other demands which would be made to engraft upon this Constitution propositions dealing with a variety of subjects which would very much increase the perplexity that already exists in preparing a satisfactory federal scheme. If it be right that the Federal Parliament should deal with the cases of those of our fellow citizens who have been so unfortunate as to grow old without providing themselves with sufficient means of subsistence, would it not, be equally right to include under this Constitution, to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament, matters relating to our sick and infirm? If because we are brothers of Australia, the poor in one part are to receive consideration from the Federal Parliament, would not that also apply to those who are in our different hospitals—our different benevolent institutions? And how will we be able, if this amendment be carried, to resist an amendment moved by some other member of the Convention in the direction I have indicated? And if it be right in connexion with this matter, would it not be a debatable question as to whether we should not consider the whole question of empowering the Federal Parliament to determine the best form of education for our young children? If we carry this amendment we will be loading the Federal Constitution so heavily that it will cause a feeling outside, and particularly in our local Parliaments, that this Convention is attempting a system of unification rather than a system of federation? And if it be true, as has been stated-and I am not going to venture my opinion against the opinions of the legal members of the Convention-that the local Parliament will still be able to deal with this question, I will ask any of the practical politicians in this chamber and numbers of them have been connected with politics long before ever I thought of the subject—whenever the question comes up for consideration in the local Parliament, will it not be urged by those who are opposed to old age-pensions that the matter should be left to the Federal Parliament, with the result that nothing will be done, and thus great harm will ensue to a movement which it appears to me is not now in a practical way before the different colonies, and upon which we require further information? For these reasons I urge my honorable friend not to press his amendment to a division, as I believe he will thereby doing harm to a movement to which every one wishes success, no matter what his views on local politics may be, and which will better the unfortunate condition of those of our aged fellow colonists who, when distress comes on them, have no means of obtaining sustenance. If the amendment is pressed to a division, I shall be found opposing it, not because I have no sympathy with the feeling that has prompted it, but because I think we are loading the Federal Constitution too much, and that if we add this amendment, we cannot resist other amendments of a similar nature which may be proposed by other members of the Convention.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia).—

I rise to support the request that my honorable friend (Mr. Peacock) has addressed to my honorable friend (Mr. Howe)—not to press this amendment to a division. It is exceedingly undesirable that we should put on record either the carrying of this amendment or that we negative it. In either case our decision is liable to misapprehension. If we negative the amendment, that fact maybe used by the covert and sinister enemies of the federal cause in order to show that the Federal Parliament is not to be clothed with the power to do justice to those in distress and difficulty; and, on the other hand, if we carry the amendment, we shall undoubtedly be withdrawing from the states a matter which is one of purely domestic or local concern, and one which, despite the remarks of my honorable friend (Mr. Wise) on the subject, the state Parliaments are much more competent to deal with than the Federal Parliament can possibly be. If there are difficulties in the way of dealing with this question in the local Parliaments—and that is the only question which Mr. Wise urged in support of the amendment—if there are difficulties in the way of local legislation, as undoubtedly there will be, in dealing with a complicated and troublesome subject of this sort, those difficulties will be tenfold in the Federal Parliament, which will not only have to deal with the subject as a large national question, but will also have to recognise diverging interests and diverging claims in the different colonies. I wish to add a few words in support of what Mr. Reid has said as to the effect of inserting these provisions in the Bill. I think it cannot be too emphatically declared and too constantly borne in mind that the moment the federal authority legislates the legislative provisions in this Bill are exclusive. They are either exclusive or concurrent. If they are concurrent it would be most mischievous to have the power to legislate in regard to old-age pensions exercised concurrently by the Federal Parliament and the Legislatures of the states. Look at the struggles there would be; look at the opportunities for corruption; look at the difficulties that might be occasioned in the state Legislatures in connexion with a matter of this sort, supposing there was already a system of state pensions, and it was sought also to introduce a system of national pensions. But if this power is exclusive, as I have no hesitation in affirming my own personal view that it is, you may have in one colony a system of state pensions prevailing on a fairly liberal scale, and your national and Federal Parliament introducing another system which the state may regard as parsimonious, and yet the federal legislation will wipe away the local legislation on the subject. Now, it is clear that the opportunities for difficulties to arise through the door being open for all manner of discontent and bitterness on this subject will be something we cannot exaggerate, and which we ought to do our very best to avoid. This being, therefore, as I believe, a matter of purely local concern, it ought to be left to the local Parliaments, and I emphatically agree with Mr. Peacock that we have no more right to introduce this question than we have to introduce the control of education, which we all agree should be left to the local Parliaments. No one can feel more deeply than I do the earnest and thorough manner in which Mr. Howe introduced this subject to the Convention. Our sympathies are with him. Our feeling is—and I think the fact ought to be thoroughly well known—that this is a matter for domestic concern, just as all other similar matters are. Therefore, Mr. Howe will be acting wisely, and in that spirit which I am sure always influences him, and will promote the progress of our business, if he will withdraw his amendment, and not press it to a division.

Mr. LEAKE (Western Australia). -

In considering this amendment, the view that strikes me is that pensions may be of two kinds. There may be state pensions or there may be federal pensions; and, therefore, unless this provision is adopted, as proposed by Mr. Howe, what power will the Federal Parliament have to provide pensions for its Judges? I merely give that case as an illustration. Is it intended to deprive the Federal Parliament of the power to pension the civil servants of the Commonwealth?

Mr. GLYNN. -

This is altogether exclusive of that.

Mr. LEAKE. -

What power, without this provision, has the Federal Government to allow pensions?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Ample power.

Mr. LEAKE. -

Under what provisions?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Under its general control.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

They are exclusively federal.

Mr. LEAKE. -

If that is so, my objection is met. As I understood the arguments of most honorable members, the intention was to place the civil servants of the state on a more favorable footing than the civil servants of the Federal Government; but if the Federal Government has the power to control this question of pensions, well and good, because I take it it was never intended that the civil servants of the Commonwealth should be deprived of a privilege which the civil servants of the state posses.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would not have again addressed myself to this question, but for the importance which it has assumed, especially in view of the haziness in some honorable members' minds as to the real scope of this clause 52. I cannot conceive how any honorable member of this Convention can fail to understand that all these powers in clause 52 are powers which are inserted there in order that the Federal Parliament, as soon as possible, shall, make them exclusive powers of the Federation. Take the raising of customs, for example.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Oh, that is expressly provided for.

Mr. REID. -

Indeed it is not in this clause.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

But there is express provision elsewhere in the Bill.

Mr. REID. -

Then take borrowing money on the public credit of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That is as necessity arises.

Mr. REID. -

Take the postal, telegraphic, telephonic, and other like services. Take navigation and shipping; take the naturalization of aliens; take the waters of the Murray and the Darling.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

They say you won't let them take them.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

We will take them by-and-by.

Mr. REID. -

It is really almost startling to find that we have been on this Bill so long, and yet some honorable members do not see the foundation of the whole enterprise.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

That is what I am surprised at.

Mr. REID. -

And do honorable members seriously believe, seriously look forward to a vista of state and federal legislation on these 33 different subjects running concurrently? I could understand a lawyer enjoying such a prospect, but no other human being.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Not necessarily, but not forbidden.

Mr. REID. -

And therefore they are matters of discretion?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Yes.

Mr. REID. -

What an awful discretion! Now, turning away from that point to the merits of this matter, there is no member of this Convention who sees more clearly than I do that there must be some system in each of these states of the nature of old-age pensions. From experience in New South Wales, I see that the state of things in the colonies has become such that some scheme of the kind will be absolutely necessary. There is, all through Australia, a displacement of men who have risen in years, which really leaves the old men of these colonies in a most humiliating position, and I, for one, have come to the point at which I emphatically believe in a system of old-age pensions in connexion with the different states. But do not let us forget that under the state arrangement of such matters there are scores of systems which can be carried out, but under the federal jurisdiction the source of the revenue for these old-age pensions will be strictly limited to Customs or direct taxation. There is no power in the Federal Parliament to carry out ideas which have been suggested with great force in the different colonies that these pensions should be derived by a certain system of licences on places of popular entertainment—taxes on admissions to theatres and race-courses. In our colony a select committee reported that the fund should be made—I am speaking from memory—by some charge on public amusements, race-courses, and so on, and taxes on various persons, licensed book-makers, for example.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

That is provincialism, purely.

Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend surely sees that the provincial Legislature having the command of all these sources of revenue for old-age pensions will be in a vastly better position for bringing them into effect than a body which is limited, as this federal power will be, to find the money for these old-age pensions out of its particular sources of revenue. I would not have spoken again but for the importance which this matter has assumed. I can see that there is no prospect of this amendment being withdrawn, and therefore I cordially agree with the other honorable members who wish it to be understood that, in voting as we intend to do, it is not because we have no wish to see the system of old-age pensions established here, but because we believe the states will have sources for establishing such a system infinitely better than those at the disposal of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I do not rise for the purpose of closing this debate, but to thank honorable members, even those who have opposed the amendment, for the way in which they have discussed the matter. The Premier of New South Wales admits the desirability of—in fact, that he believes in-old-age pensions, but he considers that the question should be left to each individual state. Now, I have given this subject a great deal of consideration. I would not have occupied the time of this Convention a moment if I could have brought my thoughts to run in the same groove as his. The more I think over the matter, the more I read of the subject, the more I am convinced that it is one for a Federated Australia—that it is a national question. Do we not hear the Premier of each of these colonies tell us at the public banquets given throughout the length and breadth of the land that we want to constitute Australia a nation? Now, I say that the poor of the nation belongs to the nation, and not to any individual parish or any individual province. You have admitted here that, within the four corners of this Bill, the Federal Parliament will have power to pension its officers in high positions, and that they will not, and that they shall not, contribute towards old-age pensions which are received from the nation, but under my proposal I wish to bring these humbler citizens within the scope of this Act. It is my desire that the workers of Australia—the workers of this nation that is going to be—shall be participators, though in a humbler manner, of the privileges enjoyed by those placed in high authority. Notwithstanding the arguments of honorable members who have taken objection to my motion, I am actuated by a desire to secure true federation. I preached federation long before it was a popular cause in this colony, and many years ago I travelled throughout the length and breadth of my constituency advocating it. I would, therefore, be the last to oppose any obstacle to its consummation. I have brought forward this amendment not to weaken federation, but to strengthen it. Here, in Australia, we have a great continent, divided from the rest of the world by thousands of miles of ocean, and how much more easy will it be for United Australia to undertake the administration of a pension fund than it is for countries in the old world—take, for example, the great German Empire—to do so. The people in those countries are not all on the same plane, as we are in Australia. Their populations are made up of people of different nationalities. Yet the wise and learned of the great nation of Germany—a country foremost amongst the great nations of the earth—have introduced a measure giving to their workers that which I seek to give to the workers of Australia. It is more difficult to administer a system like this in a country like Germany, where the people are not all of the same race, and do not all speak the same language, than it would be here, where we are bound together by ties of kindred, and where we have common mutual interests. The workers of this continent must for ages be a migratory class, they must go from one part of Australia to another to seek employment; but even if they move from the Southern Sea to the Indian Ocean I want them all to be subject to the same law. But I do not want to pauperize them. My object is to wipe away pauperism altogether so far as the working and deserving poor of Australia are concerned. That will be done some day. All the philanthropists and the leading statesmen of the world recognise that fact, and why should we in Australia lag behind? Are we afraid to give power to the representatives who will be elected by the whole people of Australia to carry out the humane system of which I have been speaking? I see no reason why any impediment should be thrown in the way of my suggestion. We have not hesitated to federate the Postal departments of the various colonies. We say that every individual post-office throughout Federated Australia shall be subject to the control of the federal authority. Every one of these post-offices can be made an office of registration for the carrying out under the Federal Government of the scheme which I have proposed. So far as the remarks of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton) are concerned, I regret that his views should be such as he has expressed. He says that he does not wish to make this a national matter; that this is purely a provincial matter, and is a subject which should not be introduced here. That is the old cry. Leave the suffering and deserving poor to parish relief. That is what we want to abolish in Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That was not Mr. Barton's argument.

Mr. BARTON. -
I never said a word of the sort, nor a word that was like a word of the sort.

Mr. HOWE. -
Did I understand the honorable and learned member to ask why should one portion of Australia pay the cost of relieving the pauperism of another part?

Mr. BARTON. -
No, that was another honorable member's argument. What I said was this: That the states, by their social and domestic systems, might manufacture paupers and leave them for the Federation to pension.

Mr. HOWE. -
If we made it a national affair would not that be impossible?

Mr. BARTON. -
Not unless the federal authority takes over control of the land.

Mr. HOWE. -
I have already said that any system to be effective must be compulsory. If I have anything to do in the framing of an old-age system by the Parliament of Federated Australia I shall insist upon every worker contributing to a certain fund. As I have already pointed out, the best of our citizens now try to make provision for a rainy day. Do not the records of our financial institutions show that this is so? Have not the workers of Australia been praised for the thrift which they have exercised? Certainly that is so. But, unfortunately, as I have already shown, failure often overtakes these institutions. They collapse, and the provision which the workers thought they had made for their declining days vanishes. No system but a national institution, through which they can contribute from year to year during a vigorous life, and thus make provision for the time when they will be incapable of longer supporting themselves will give security to the workers. I have been told by some honorable members that I am preaching socialism, but I love liberty as much as any man does, and I do not wish to deprive any individual of his liberty. But there are some things which a nation can achieve which cannot be successfully carried out by an individual or any section of the people, and this is one of them. I have been asked by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon), whose advice I very often follow, to withdraw this amendment. If I had not given to this subject the attention which I have devoted to it for a considerable time, I should accept his advice; but I had thought over the matter long and earnestly before I introduced it to the notice of the Convention at Adelaide. I again brought it forward during our sittings in Sydney; and now, for the third time, I ask honorable members to give the proposal their support. If I thought that the carrying of this motion would jeopardize federation, or hinder it at all, I should not persist in it. I believe, however, that the carrying of the amendment will be of assistance to federation. If we can tell the workers of this nation which we are about to build up that whatever they contribute to a pension fund will be available for their future support, that they need not fear bankruptcy or corrupt and reckless management, and that their independence will be secured from manhood to the day of their death, I think that that will strengthen the great cause for which we are working. I thank honorable members for the kind way in which they have dealt with the motion, whether they have spoken for or against it. Of course I value chiefly the proffered assistance of those who will be found voting with me when a division is called for. I have every desire to oblige my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Symon), but I honestly feel that I should be doing myself an injustice, and that the cause which I have so much at heart would be jeopardized if I withdrew the amendment. Consequently, whatever happens, I shall push the question to a division.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I wish to occupy one or two minutes in relieving the Hon. Mr. Howe of a misapprehension which he has formed concerning my views upon this subject. I am not out of sympathy with the honorable member's amendment or with his proposal to establish state pensions. The question is one which has not reached the solving point with me. I am not quite sure whether it would not be an improvement to abolish poor-houses and destitute asylums, and spend the money which is at present devoted to their maintenance in the establishment of a system of state pensions. Some people may call this outdoor relief, others may think it a reward of toil; it does not matter in what way you phrase it. It may be that such a system would be a better system than that which we have now in the various colonies. All that I intended to say in my former remarks was that this was peculiarly a matter for each state to legislate upon; that as you left the land, which is really the source of every citizen's livelihood, in the hands of the several states, to establish a system of state pensions on behalf of the Federation would be to place in the hands of the states the manufacture of paupers, and to impose upon the Federation the responsibility of paying them pensions. I have not yet heard an answer to that argument. The honorable member (Mr. Howe) is always reasonable in all that he says, and has given us great assistance, sometimes sacrificing his own convictions to further the ends of federation; but I think that the advice of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) is good advice. The rejection of the motion upon division will be read by those who do not look further than the bare print to mean that the Convention is against the consideration of the case of those who are left stranded after a life of toil.

Mr. SYMON. -

Against the principle. It will be supposed that the Convention is a conservative body which callously disregards the necessity for relieving human suffering.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

And it will be used against the cause of federation at the elections.

Mr. BARTON. -

When the question of federation comes to be put to a vote throughout Australia, this statement will be used as a strong lever against the acceptance of the Constitution.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
That is a strong reason for accepting the amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

Nothing of the kind, unless we come to the conclusion that we are putting federation up to auction. If it is true that we want to popularize federation by adopting arguments and systems and propositions that are against our principles, then my honorable friend's suggestion is perfectly correct.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

We have to do what we believe is right.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, we have to do what we believe is right, without regard to the question of popularity one way or the other, and we are bound to act according to our own consciences. I take it we have no right, sitting as we do here, to gratuitously project a question upon the public in such a way that the decision, one way or another, will mean an attack upon the principles of federation from one section or another of its enemies. That is exactly the risk we are incurring. I am quite in sympathy with Mr. Howe, but I really do think that the advice that has been tendered to him is good advice. Knowing how strongly he is in favour of the consummation of federal union, I would put it to him again whether it would not be advisable not to run the risk of having this motion rejected, as it most certainly will be, and then having it said that those who reject it are against the principle which he advocates, when, as a matter of fact, the root of the principle, at any rate, is in the consciences and in the minds of all of us?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

In order that the issue may be placed clearly before those who criticise our action, it appears to be desirable to recall what has already been done. We must remark at the outset that the choice which is offered to us is, after all, largely a choice of procedure. It is not in the power of this Convention, while it allows clause 52 to remain as it stands, to altogether exclude from the purview of the Federal Parliament this question of old age pensions. That question can be remitted to the Federal Parliament at any time by any of the colonies which desire federal legislation from it.

Mr. BARTON. -

Under sub-section (35) of this clause?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It can only be universal if every colony consents to it.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is so.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

And any one colony can stand out.
Mr. BARTON. -

Under sub-section (35) it is not necessary for two colonies to agree.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It only applies to those who concur. That is exactly the distinction I am going to draw. The issue between us is not as to the adoption of old-age pensions, but as to whether a majority in the Federal Parliament should be enabled to adopt a system of old-age pensions without the unanimous consent of the colonies, or whether it should only be enabled to adopt the system for those colonies which desire it. Our difference, therefore, is much smaller than represented. If a division is taken I shall be found supporting the federal view of this question, inasmuch as I have enough confidence in the judgment of the people of Australia to believe that those whom they will return will have ability enough to surmount the very many difficulties in the formulation of a just scheme. If we refuse to place in the hands of the Federal Parliament this power to legislate because of the intricacies of the question with which it will have to deal, or because there are possibilities that the power may be unwisely used, we shall have to strike out a great many more sub-clauses in clause 52. But since difference between us here is comparatively minor, and as it is capable of being misrepresented, the advice offered to Mr. Howe appears to us to be sound. If he is satisfied that he will be in a minority—and if one can judge from the addresses already delivered he will be in a comparatively small minority—he will not be helping the cause he has at heart by pushing his motion to a division at present. On the contrary, he will be simply placing certain members of the Convention in a position which will necessitate explanations on their part that can be of no advantage to federation or to the measure with which we are now dealing. Consequently, the honorable member might, at this stage at all events, reconsider his position. If he will do so an opportunity can be afforded and I have no doubt will be afforded, to him, if, after mature deliberation, he feels it necessary to go to a division at a later stage. In the meantime, he will have the advantage of further consideration, and will not be committed to one course or another. To take up, briefly, the challenge of the leader of the Convention, I would say that it does not appear to me that the argument which carries so much weight in his mind is one that is at all final on the question. I cannot conceive the possibility of any colony wilfully, or even with its own consent, manufacturing paupers of any kind, or pursuing a policy which could lead to that end.

Mr. BARTON. -
I did not mean that.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I can conceive what I would term a tory land policy which would have the indirect result of manufacturing paupers, and I can understand that such a policy, by manufacturing paupers, might indirectly cast its burden on the federal community.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Not unless they choose to accept it.

Mr. SYMON. -

Try the single-tax policy.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That might relieve it of a number of its paupers. I do not make that statement of the single tax as such, but a land tax might have that result. The leader of the Convention points to the divorce which exists between the Federal Parliament and the land as contrasted with the state Parliaments, and their relation to the land, but the difference is not so wide as his argument would imply. For, after all, there does rest dormant in this Constitution a power of direct federal taxation which can reach the land if it ever becomes necessary to do so. Consequently if it be found that by injudicious or injurious land systems this burden is being cast on the Federal Commonwealth, the Federal Commonwealth will fortunately have within its own power a means of remedying to some extent any such law, and of placing the burden where it ought to be placed-on the land.

Mr. BARTON. -

Would not that be the only rational thing for the Federal Parliament to do-to put on a land tax?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Not necessarily, except in such extreme contingencies as the honorable member mentions, and even then I can see difficulties. The argument that affected me most, next to the argument of the leader of the Convention, was that used by Mr. Trenwith. Those who are in favour of old-age pensions cannot disguise from themselves the fact that the existence of such a power in the Federal Commonwealth would undoubtedly be an argument of considerable force that would be used in every colony against action on the part of that colony. Yet even this does not deter me, since it is so obviously a question which can in some of its aspects, at all events, be better dealt with on a national basis and in a federal way than by any single colony. I confess that in giving the vote I shall give, if this question goes to a division, I shall do so with some reluctance, because it may have the effect of postponing temporarily, at all events, the adoption of this system in colonies that are prepared for it, until the bulk of the people were prepared for federal action. This does not seem to be a great difficulty, and having weighed it as well as I can, and appealed to Mr. Howe to postpone the idea of taking a division, I would say again that the choice offered to us is, or may be made, one of means. To put it frankly, it is a choice between giving the majority in the Federal Parliament power to impose old-age pensions against the will of some colony that does not desire them, and permitting old-age pensions to be established only in such colonies as may request the Federal Parliament to undertake that task for them. The issue is not whether there shall be old-age pensions, but whether the Federal Parliament shall have power to impose on any colony a scheme of which, as a colony, it may not approve.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. - Does the honorable member intend to vote for the motion if it goes to a division?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Certainly; because this is distinctly a federal question, and that outweighs all other argument. The necessity of dealing with it implies the absolute necessity of dealing with it in a national way. I admit the immense difficulty. I agree with Mr. Wise that there will probably be a delay of many years before the Federal Parliament can attempt to legislate upon it. The proposal is novel to all of us, and naturally the Commonwealth would desire to see the effect of different systems tried in different colonies before attempting to select the best. In voting for this proposal I do so in reliance on the judgment and wisdom of the representatives of the federated people of Australia, confident that they will not leap the stile before they come to it, and that they will not attempt to deal with this question until they have obtained the experience necessary for guidance by studying the different state systems. But with that proviso it must be apparent to honorable members that this question cannot be finally and effectually dealt with except on a national basis. When the right time comes, and when the Federal Parliament finds itself fully equipped for its task, it will deal with the problem maturely, and ought to be able to equitably accomplish all that is desired.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I do not wish to take up the time of the Convention, but I must enter my protest against the mode of argument adopted on this question. It seems to me that we have to decide whether this is a matter for local supervision or for the supervision of the Federal Parliament; and for us to say that because there may be advantage taken of our action outside, or that it may be misapprehended, we intend to vote against our own principle is to my mind a very unmoral thing to do. This is a very nebulous question at the present time. It has never come to the forefront of practical politics in any of the colonies, and it must, more or less, go through the crucial test of large controversy under different conditions in different colonies. I say again, as I said in a few words at the beginning, that it is to me absolutely alien to the spirit of federation that the inhabitants of one distant part, perhaps, of Australia should have to pay for the local misgovernment and the pauperization of the people in another part of the continent. Instead of this motion being, as has been put by some honorable members, a great lever to carry this question before the populations of Australia, it seems to me that if the new sub-section were inserted in the Bill, I should be obliged on the public platform to say that it was a blow at federation. The more we narrow this discussion down to the simple question of the powers we would like to confer on the Federal Parliament the better. We have nothing to do with the merits or demerits of pensions to the aged poor. The honorable member was probably perfectly right in digressing a little when submitting his amendment, but we have nothing to do with the principle. The whole force of the argument is in favour of local administration, and the common sense of honorable members should lead them to exclude this question entirely from the powers to be conferred on the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I accept the challenge that has just been thrown down by the honorable member. He says that we must determine this question on the issue of whether or not it is a local or federal matter. I unhesitatingly declare that it is essentially a federal matter. I will give my reasons. In these colonies, as we all know, there are men who are in Victoria to-day who will be in South Australia presently, and who many be in Queensland later on. These men shift from state to state, and their case could not be dealt with by any sing

Mr. WISE. -

The wandering population cause a large part of the destitution.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That statement is perfectly correct. It would be impossible for South Australia to establish a system of old-age pensions, because she would never know for whom she would have to provide. Is she to provide for the natives of that colony? Many of them might have spent their lives in New South Wales. Is she to provide for those who are there to-day? Yesterday they may have been in Western Australia, and to-morrow they may be in Victoria. It will be impossible to deal with this question on narrow lines. I agree with what Mr. McMillan has said as to honorable members voting, no matter what the consequences may be, according to their conscientious convictions. I hope that they will do so; and I trust that we shall not see the honorable members who have to-day declared their adhesion to the principle of old-age pensions voting against the motion. I should be much inclined to doubt the sincerity of those honorable members who state that they favour old-age pensions if they voted against the motion, because the effect of their action would be to prevent the only effective means of introducing old-age pensions from being adopted. I would urge, therefore, apart from the ultimate consequences, that all those who are in favour of old-age pensions should vote for the motion.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I think it is scarcely necessary for me to say that I indorse the view held by Mr. Howe that it is desirable that those who have committed the offence of becoming old without becoming rich should have adequate provision made for the evening of their lives. I entirely dissent from and resent the expression of the honorable member (Mr. Holder), that any man who votes against this proposal is liable to be seriously doubted as to his views in favour of old-age pensions. We are here to consider, first of all, the adoption of a Constitution for the Federal Government of Australia, and we have been considering in connexion with that, how we can give a strong central government without infringing to too great an extent upon the powers of the respective states to deal with their own domestic affairs. We have spent the greatest part of our time in discussing what has been called state rights. I have said before, and repeat, that the best way to conserve state rights is to put nothing into the Constitution that is not absolutely necessary on national grounds, and to retain to the fullest possible extent the complete sovereignty of the states with reference to their own domestic affairs.

Mr. HOWE. -

This is a national affair.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I have no hesitation in saying that I agree with the honorable member. I believe that ultimately this question must be made a federal question, but I think it extremely inexpedient to make it a federal question at this juncture. It has been said that the whole subject is in a nebulous condition. That is undoubtedly true. It has not even made its appearance in a nebulous form in some parts of Australasia. It has assumed a concrete shape in some of the colonies, and if it is put in this Constitution those who are opposed to the proposal, and there are some strong opponents, will have placed in their hands a good argument for delay. They will say-"Do not proceed with this now, as there is power in the Federal Constitution to deal with the subject, and it can be much better dealt with federally than locally." I admit that, and I want my honorable friend to understand exactly my position. Even if it were in a nebulous condition in all the colonies, I, who hold it to be an extremely desirable principle, would favour its being placed in the Constitution; but I can see that instead of expediting the adoption of old-age pensions the placing of this proposal in the Constitution is calculated to retard it long beyond the existence of any person here. If it is left alone in its present condition, with the powers we have in this Constitution, it will be in the very near future adopted, I have no doubt, by some of the colonies. The honorable member (Mr. Howe) and the honorable member (Mr. Wise) were right in saying that the difficulty of administering the system locally will be found so great that the colonies that adopt it will agree to call upon the Federal Parliament to take it out of their hands.

Mr. Howe. -

That is the reason why I want to give them the power now.

Mr. Trenwith. -

They have the power in the Constitution as it is. We have been very careful to embody in this Constitution the most ample powers to the respective states to make federal questions what are now and what are to be in the near future domestic questions; so that, as their experience of federation increases, as they acquire greater knowledge of each other, and greater confidence in each other, it is to be reasonably assumed that they will hand over from time to time many subjects which they would be too jealous to hand over to the federal authority now. It seems to me this is one of those questions. As one who holds as strongly as the honorable member (Mr. Howe) or the honorable member (Mr. Kingston) that it should be a fundamental principle of every Government to provide for the old age and destitution of such citizens as may be left in that condition, I am afraid to put this proposal into the Bill, because I am confident that, instead of expediting it will retard the adoption of the principle. The Constitution for which the honorable member has been striving provides for a Parliament composed of representatives of the people in one branch in proportion to their number, and representatives of the states in another branch without regard to their number. Let us assume that this proposal were adopted, and that an immense majority of the people were in favour of old-age pensions. We shall have them struggling by means of the power in the Federal Constitution to achieve that end, and we shall have a very small minority resisting their desire; but if the question be left to the states, I venture to say, having heard the views of the Premier of New South Wales, and knowing the views of many of the people there, that in that colony they will establish such a system at no very distant date. With reference to this colony, I know that there is a commission now in existence considering the question with a view to submitting a report to the next meeting of Parliament. I feel confident that at no very distant date this colony will adopt some form of old-age pensions. Having done so, and if they discover, as the honorable member (Mr. Howe) thinks they will, and as I think they will, that there are great difficulties in working out any system locally, surely that will be a great inducement to them to take advantage of sub-section (35), which provides that the Federal Parliament shall have power over-

Matters referred to the Parliament of the Commonwealth by the Parliament or Parliaments of any state or states, but so that the law shall extend only to the state or states by whose Parliament or Parliaments the matter was referred, and to such other states as may afterwards adopt the law.

We shall have one or more states agreeing to make this a federal matter, and we should achieve our object much more rapidly by that process than by adopting this proposal.

Mr. HOWE. -

Does the honorable member believe in a uniform system?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I do.

Mr. HOWE. -

Then vote for my proposal.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I have been labouring to very little advantage if I have not shown the honorable member that a uniform system is much more likely to be achieved by proceeding slowly than by carrying the proposal now before us, which would mean that we should have to wait until we convinced everybody of the advisability of adopting the system. If argument were wanted I would refer the honorable member to the friendly societies of which he speaks. There have been innumerable instances where friendly societies have worked into uniform action in exactly the way I have indicated the various colonies will work into uniform action by the adoption locally of this system. Friendly societies frequently adopt in their respective branches views that spread, until they call upon their central governing bodies to take charge of certain matters in accordance with the principles adopted in the smaller area. So this Commonwealth, if constituted, will, in some of its parts, I think, almost immediately adopt this principle. Then we should have one other state adopting the principle, and later on another, so that having tried the proposal, having found out its advantages, and having discovered to the fullest extent the difficulty of working, they will call upon the Federal Parliament to assist them in giving effect to that principle which has had a trial, and which is gaining the confidence of the people by degrees. If we place this proposal in the Bill, when we come in this colony, as we shall very soon, to establish old-age pensions, we shall be confronted by our opponents with this strong argument which we shall have given them—that it is no use dealing with the question locally, as the Federal Parliament has power to deal with it, and probably will deal with it. We shall therefore be denied the opportunity of doing what we want to do locally until we shall have converted all the continent to our way of thinking. I prefer to do it tomorrow, or this year, or next year, rather than wait until we have converted the most conservative section in this colony to favour this most desirable institution.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I regret this matter has taken up so much time, but I wish to say a few words upon it. We appear to have made a bad beginning by discussing the question at such length. It seems strange that there should be so many advocates now for old-age pensions, when I was under the impression that the prevailing idea in the colonies was that the civil servants who had spent all their years until they had become old in the service of the country should receive no pensions. It seems that a newer light has been shed upon us, and not only are we desirous of pensioning those who have served the State—who have grown grey in its service—but we are also desirous of pensioning every one.

Mr. Howe. -

Only to keep him from starvation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What about civil servants, who spend all their lives in the service of the State?

Mr. Wise. -

We tax the rest of the community to pay pensions to the civil servants.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am of opinion that this question of old-age pensions has not yet become a very pressing one in Australasia, and I am very glad to be able to think that that is the case. There is no doubt, however, that, as time goes on, we shall have old and deserving poor here as they have in the older parts of the world. When that time does arrive I think it would be far better for us to allow the Federal Government to deal with this very great question rather than that each state should deal with it in its own particular way. At any rate, I am of opinion we should give the Federal Government power to deal with the question in this Constitution. I see no reason why that power should be withheld. And, as to all the arguments of my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) and others, that we should be imposing upon a colony some obligations which it does not want, why, sir, this Federal Constitution throughout will have that effect. It will impose on colonies obligations which they do not want. We thoroughly understand that before we enter into a federation, and it will be no greater hardship for one colony to have imposed on it an obligation in regard to the aged poor than it will be to have placed on it an obligation in regard to any other matter. I think that the arguments used by my honorable friends (Mr. Holder and Mr. Howe) as to the migratory habits of the people are weighty. Take, for instance, the Colony which I represent, and to which hundreds of thousands of people have migrated recently. These persons may be old—certainly some of them are—and may require relief soon. They may have spent the best years of their lives in one of the other colonies, and have come to us perhaps in the decline of life. I do not presume for a minute that those who come to that far-off country to seek their fortunes will necessarily become a burden on the State; but still I think it is only right that this matter should be dealt with on an abroad basis—on a national basis—and that when it does become necessary to deal with it it should be dealt with as a whole, and not by the states in different ways. My reason for voting with my honorable friend (Mr. Howe) is because I believe that the work will be better done, and will be more likely to give satisfaction to the people of the whole of this continent. I do not believe in one colony doing the thing in one way, and another colony doing it in another way. I can see no reason why the Federal Parliament should not deal with the question just as effectively and quickly as a state Parliament. In fact, I think that the Federal Parliament will be able to deal with it in a far better and more just way, and for that reason, if it goes to a division, I shall vote with my honorable friend (Mr. Howe).

Mr. ISAACS. -

I must confess that I have been impressed, as the arguments have proceeded, with the strength of many of them on both sides. The first question I propose to myself in connexion with this matter is—Is it purely a state question, or is it a federal question, or may it be a federal question? I should say that if I were convinced at the outset that it is purely a state question, then, irrespective of every other consideration, it ought not to find... a place in this clause. But I am not prepared to say that it is purely a state question. I have been very much impressed indeed by the strong arguments and weighty observations of many of my honorable friends on this question, and I am prepared to accept the position that it in all probability reaches far beyond the mere limits of any particular state; and if that position is true now in any degree, it will become increasingly true as the Commonwealth proceeds. The next question—and certainly that gave me reason for thought—was that put forward by one of my honorable colleagues, and supported by other members, that the insertion of this power may prejudicially affect the chance of the Bill being accepted. I, on full consideration, do not think that that is a correct argument, because it is not a proposal to ask the people to hand over to an independent body, once and for all, the power to legislate on this question. The people, when the Federal Parliament is constituted, will have the fullest control over their representatives, and they will have the power at any time of electing or refusing to elect any of their representatives on the question of old-age pensions as well as on any other question, and, therefore, the people maintain that control. It is merely a power given, and it is asking the people to insert in the Federal Constitution on this point, no more and no less than they will find in their state Constitutions at the present moment. Then it was urged that it would be depriving the states of the power because it would be an exclusive power. I do not quite follow that from a legal standpoint, although we must admit that it is true that if the Federation choose to exercise this power that power once exercised is paramount. That is true no more and no less of this particular subject than of all the other subjects included in clause 52, and, therefore, I do not give any undue weight to that. My honorable and learned friend, the leader of the Convention, did put a very important question, namely, that it was asking the Commonwealth as a Commonwealth to provide for the necessitous citizens of the state who had been rendered necessitous by the wrong policy of the states. Again, I answer to that there is no compulsion in the matter. It is a mere power to the Federation to do it if it thinks it just, and if it does not think it just it can refrain from doing it. It may say—"No, we will not remedy the mistakes of the states because the states alone are responsible for the misery into which their citizens have fallen," All I say to it is that that power may be exercised if the Federal Parliament thinks it just, and it may refrain from exercising it if it should be of the contrary opinion. Then my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan) said that it would be unjust for one distant part of the Commonwealth to support the poor and needy of another part. The same answer applies to that. If it is unjust, the Federal Parliament would refuse to do it. If the circumstances are such as my honorable friend Mr. McMillan apprehends, we need never fear the exercise of the power; and it really seems to me that that and various arguments of a cognate nature would be more strictly applicable to the discussion of a Bill of such a character if it were before the Federal Parliament than to the discussion of the question here whether it is right to include a discretionary power in the Federal Constitution. My honorable friend (Mr. Trenwith), with the earnest advocacy for which he is notable, and moved no doubt by the intense sympathy he has for the working classes, not only of this colony but of the whole of the colonies, laid some very forcible arguments before the Convention, and expressed his great reluctance—which we know he feels—at having to vote against the amendment of my honorable friend (Mr. Howe). The strength of his argument, which he put with tremendous force, was that it might militate against the adoption of any scheme for old-age pensions in a particular colony.

Mr. HOWE. -
Remove that fear, and he will vote with me.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If I thought that the result feared would follow, I should perhaps vote differently from the way I intend to vote, but I do not think it is so, because it is optional with the state to adopt the law or not as it pleases. We, no doubt, will hear persons urge that it is a matter for federal concern if the Federal Parliament chooses to exercise it. Well, there is a limit to patience, and if it is found in a state that the Federal Parliament will not move in the matter, then the answer may be fairly given to that argument that it is time for the state to move for itself. I am not now advancing an argument in favour of the adoption, or against the adoption, of the principle of old-age pensions. It is merely an argument in favour of including a power in the Federal Constitution. This is a question which we know is coming to the front more and more every day; it is assuming an importance that is daily increasing, and I think we should be hurting the cause of federation if we said now, once and for all, with our necessarily imperfect information, that we should exclude it from the powers of the Federal Parliament. I do not consider that the clause which empowers the states to refer it to the Federal Parliament is sufficient, because a state or two or three states may be perfectly willing to say—"We will refer it to the Federal Parliament if the other states will do it," and one or two states by standing out may prevent a reference by the states willing to refer it. Therefore, I think, on the whole, that we should be doing wisely in voting for the motion.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

This discussion appears to me to be assuming an importance which justifies me in saying a word or two more. I think, with all respect to honorable members, that there is a certain amount of forgetfulness of what we are trying to do. We are not going in for a consolidated Government. I suppose if the Federal Government had time to do it it would be able to manage everything better than the local Governments. We are handing over to a Federal Government certain limited authorities in the easiest way, preserving to ourselves all the authorities which we think we can better exercise. If there was a proposal to take over any of the assets of any of the colonies, or of all the colonies, there would be vehement resistance. Where there is a proposal to hand over the liabilities, I suppose it is not wonderful that there is a great agreement of opinion. For my own part, I think, as was suggested to me by one honorable member here, if we carry this proposal the difficulty of the surplus will practically have vanished. We will have the cause of federation most materially assisted by halving a responsibility thrown on this new Government which will prevent any earthly chance of there being more than enough to meet it. I do ask honorable members, with all earnestness, to think a little before they come to the conclusion that it is necessary in this instance to depart from the ordinary Constitution of a Federation by throwing in to the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth that which has never been done in any other country; that it is quite a matter of discussion whether it should be done in any country in which the experts on both sides express entirely varying opinions. Why should we begin by loading this Constitution with a thing which would be highly proper if we were going in for a consolidated Government, but which, at all events in my humble opinion, is quite inconsistent with the preservation of the rights of the states, with what ought to accompany it afterwards, and that is a collateral responsibility? I can understand in a moment that every Government of a colony will say-"Certainly, take over the debts; there will be no difficulty about that." If they said, take over any item of our revenue-if it was suggested that any item of our revenue should be taken over-there would be an equal concurrence of opinion vehemently against it. I want to know from what point of view this can be called federal? We keep our property; we are left to the free exercise of our brains and bodies; there is no interference with the individual; state rights are to be preserved. Surely, collaterally with that, state rights ought to be preserved too. And because, from the fact that people go backwards and forwards across the border, and that as the result of careful investigation there are found to, be difficulties in arriving at provincial legislation in regard to old-age pensions—which in themselves are capable of much discussion and difference of opinion—are we to remove from the backs of the states a responsibility legitimately falling upon them, and which, as my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) has said, may fall upon them as a result of their own local legislation?

Mr. HOWE. - Is not this question of as much importance as the question of weights and measures?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - They should be uniform.

Mr. HOWE. - And the questions of banking and exchange?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - They are scarcely in the same category. Those matters ought to be uniform.

Mr. SYMON. - Education is of much more importance.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - Yes; of much more importance. I say that the only arguments which can be used in favour of this proposal must ultimately result in saying—"No federation at all but consolidation."

Mr. REID. - Why not take over State banking? We could pay, the old-age pensions out of the profits.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - I, strong and sincere federationist as, I am, with very defined—many may think uncompromising—views as to state rights, am fair enough to recognise that rights and responsibilities are co-relative, and I entirely object to this proposal.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales—Omit "throughout the Commonwealth."

Mr. GLYNN. -
Looking at this matter hurriedly, I think it would be a mistake to strike out these words.

Mr. BARTON. -
We are all agreed.
The amendment was negatived. The sub-section was agreed to.
Sub-section (26) was agreed to.
Sub-section (27) was agreed to.
Sub-section (28), Influx of criminals.
After "criminals" insert "lunatics."
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Tasmania-
After "criminals" insert "paupers and lunatics."

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think it is necessary to add the words proposed. The words "influx of criminals" were inserted in the Bill in 1891 for a specific purpose, which it is not necessary to specify now, particularly as it is a purpose of which honorable members are well aware. Apart from that purpose, the result of the preceding sub-section dealing with "Immigration and emigration" covers everything.

Mr. WISE. -
Is there not power to deal with extradition? It seems to me that if there is no such power we are to say "Influx of criminals or extradition of criminals."

Mr. BARTON. -
The next sub-section will cover that.
The amendments were negatived, and the sub-section was agreed to.

Sub-section (29). - External affairs and treaties.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales-
Omit "and treaties."

Mr. BARTON. -
I propose to strike out the words "and treaties," in accordance with the suggestion of the Legislative Council of New South Wales.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I see an objection to striking out these words in reference to treaties. I am aware that similar words have been struck out in clause 7, but I doubt the policy of that. It may be wise to retain them.

The CHAIRMAN. -
We must be consistent.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I bow to your ruling, sir, but an opportunity for reconsidering the matter should be provided.
The amendment was agreed to.

Sub-section 30. - The relations of the Commonwealth to the islands of the Pacific.

Mr. BARTON. -
It has been suggested that this sub-section is embraced in the preceding one-"External affairs and treaties." That is arguable; it is quite possible that it may be true; but there are a very large number of people who look forward with interest to the Commonwealth undertaking, as far as it can as part of the British Empire, the regulation of the Pacific Islands. It may be, I think, as there is a doubt as to whether the one thing is included in the other, and as there are a large number of people who are interested in this question, that it is better in deference to their views to leave the words as they are. As the subsection may do some good, and can do no harm, I think that the objection should not be pressed.

Mr. KINGSTON. - It is taken from the Federal Council Bill.

Mr. BARTON. - Yes.

Mr. SYMON. - To solve a doubt, it might be wise to say in the preceding sub-section- "External affairs, including the regulation of the islands of the Pacific."

Mr. BARTON. - I have no objection to that, except that I should prefer to say "relations with the islands of the Pacific." If we put some such words in, it gets rid of the difficulty. We might say-"External affairs, including the relations of the Commonwealth with the islands of the Pacific."

The CHAIRMAN. - When we adjourned for luncheon we were considering sub-section (30) of clause 52-the relations of the Commonwealth to the islands of the Pacific. Did I understand the Hon. Mr. Symon to move an amendment, or only to make a suggestion?

Mr. SYMON. - No amendment, but merely a suggestion as to a matter of drafting.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). - Perhaps the matter might be left in this way. I take it that we have omitted the words "and treaties" in sub-section (29). If it meet with the approbation of the Convention, this matter-which is really, I think my friend will agree with me, largely a matter of drafting-will be taken a note of, and as there will, no doubt, be some stage at which an adjournment will be made to enable us to make drafting amendments, I will see that this matter is considered with the others.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). - I understand that the leader of the Convention will look at the words "and treaties," with the view to see how far, by omitting them, we would limit the powers of the Federal Parliament within the range of the powers that the Canadian Parliament already enjoys.
Sub-section (30) was agreed to.

Sub-section (31). - The control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia—Omit "river," insert "rivers."

The CHAIRMAN. -

There are several amendments in sub-section (31) suggested by the Parliament of South Australia, and all amendment suggested by the Parliament of Tasmania to strike out the sub-section altogether, and insert a new sub-section in lieu of it. I shall put the amendments in the order in which they come. The first amendment is to strike out the word "river," with the view of inserting "rivers."

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I support this amendment of the Legislative Council of South Australia to strike out "river," with the view of inserting "rivers." Of course, that has a prospective meaning which is given to it by the subsequent amendments, and in discussing it I presume it will be competent to refer to what will follow if this amendment is agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We can take this as a test amendment.

Mr. GORDON. -

As a test amendment. The object sought to be gained by our amendments is that the rivers which run through contiguous states should be placed under federal control, not only in the interests of the co-riparian states themselves, but in the interests of the whole of Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

What do you mean by rivers? Rivers and tributaries, or what?

Mr. GORDON. -

Well, there are two proposals to follow, one of which seeks to embrace all the principal tributaries, and the other to define the rivers placed under federal control, as the Murray, the Darling, the Murrumbidgee, and the Lachlan. Although I think that the whole of the tributaries should be included, if so large a scope to this amendment is objected to by New South Wales, I would be content to have it limited to the four great rivers which, by themselves or their continuations, run through New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, and then join the sea. I would not seek to make the scope of this subsection too inquisitorial, because there are many small tributaries which are not worth taking into account, but I would be satisfied with such a general control as would cover those four great channels, which form the water system of Australia. In asking the Convention to agree to this proposal, it will be necessary for me to discuss some of the arguments for and against the proposal which were discussed at the Adelaide meeting. Those of us who agree with the view I am now endeavouring to support, met with two classes of opponents at the Adelaide sitting. There were, first of all, those opponents who were led by the Hon. Mr. Reid, and who laid down the proposition, as I understood them, that the only rivers over which any joint control could be properly exercised at all were those which run through coterminous states, and only so far as they run through coterminous states. That is to say, there should be only joint control by the colonies over those rivers on either side of which the banks belong to different colonies. I hope to be able to show that this notion is hopelessly behind any modern idea of the reciprocal obligations of civilized nations. If I may say so, with much respect, the importance of this matter has so grown on me, and I believe on other members of the Convention, that I am disposed to think that we have, perhaps not improperly, been giving much time to the discussion of more or less doctrinaire matters, which might be left, to reach a solvent point, to the formative genius of the Federal Parliament, when it does get to work—matters to which we might attach the motto solvitur ambulando; while we have left somewhat out of sight this great practical and vital matter to the interests of the whole of Australia. It has almost been as if two men, entering into a partnership, were first to discuss and come to some mutual decision on theological questions, and defer the consideration of questions as to how they should share the losses or divide the profits of their partnership. However, I hope that the Convention at this meeting will restore the balance of importance which I think the subject demands.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Is this clause required at all, having regard to sub-section (1)?

Mr. BARTON. - The honorable member wishes to say "rivers" instead of "river."

Mr. GORDON. - Yes, and it is my intention to add either the words "and their tributaries" after the word "Murray," or to define the four rivers which will come under the control of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. - In the American Constitution subsection (1) gives control over all rivers to the federal authorities.

Mr. GORDON. - Yes; for the purposes of navigation and the prevention of obstruction; but it does not as I read the cases-and, of course, I express my opinion with all deference to that of more able lawyers than myself-give to the Federal Parliament such a control as would lead to a fair apportionment of the waters of these rivers for the purposes of irrigation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It gives powers to the Federal Congress to control the navigation of rivers which are navigable within more than one state.

Mr. GLYNN. -

But, a

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If by the use of water for irrigation purposes the navigation of the rivers was prevented, the Federal Government could interfere.

Mr. GORDON. -

I agree with the honorable member there. It is not intended in any proposition which I shall place before the Convention to promote irrigation at the expense of navigation. The honorable member (Mr. Glynn) has pointed out that, inasmuch as the Darling lies wholly within one state, it would not, as matters stand, come under the control of the federal authorities. The Darling is a stream which for geographical purposes has that name given to it for a portion of its course, but it forms part of a great system of water-courses. If any honorable member were to launch himself in a canoe at the head of either the Darling, the Murrumbidgee, the Lachlan, or the Murray, where would he find himself at the end of his journey? In South Australia.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

He would strike a snag.

Mr. GORDON. -

If the honorable member got into a canoe at the head of any of those rivers, and has not after a long political career lost the art of steering straight, he would at the end of his journey find himself at the mouth of the Murray, and in South Australia. All these rivers are part of one great system. I am now attempting to combat the proposition laid down by Mr. Reid that there should be no joint control over any river unless that river ran beyond the borders of any one colony. An expression to which I particularly take objection-and it is one which has been greatly used by the representatives of New South Wales-is that which terms such rivers "our rivers." Rivers which take their rise in New South Wales, but which run for huge distances through other colonies, cannot be described by the residents of New South Wales as "our rivers," using the term in the sense of exclusive and sole possession. They are no more the rivers of New South Wales in that sense than the sun which warms them belongs to New South Wales, or the air which sweetens them is the air of New South Wales. When the right honorable and learned member (Mr. Reid) referred to the rivers which, though they have their rise in New South Wales, form a continuous channel through Victoria and South Australia, and there mingle their waters with the sea, as being exclusively the property of New South Wales, he used an expression which has happily now no sanction in the code of any great people, and the right honorable gentleman forgot how far the sentiment of the world in this respect has advanced. Every great river in Europe—the rivers of France, of Germany, of Austria, and of Russia—has been conceded to the common use of all the nations. These nations may be armed to the teeth against each other, and their frontiers may be constantly darkened by the clouds of threatened war; but any exclusive claim to the great waterways which run from country to country has long been abandoned. They recognise that these rivers are requisite to the maintenance and the sustenance of the people of the continent, and with one consent they have agreed that they shall be managed by independent control in the common interest.

Mr. HIGGINS. - And the tributaries too.

Mr. GORDON. - Is it not extraordinary that nations which are hereditary enemies—nations whose soil has too often been wetted with each other's blood—should concede this principle, and that it should be denied amongst us who, as the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) said the other night, owe allegiance to one Crown, are one in race and nationality, are brothers dwelling in amity in a land which is ours from sea to sea? Is it not still more extraordinary that right should be denied at a time when we are sitting in solemn conclave engaged in making a compact which is to draw closer the ties which bind us? The ears of honorable members must still be filled with the "rustic cackle of their bourg." When they look at the proposition from a larger point of view they will agree that the proposition which I have advanced is one which is recognised by every civilized nation—even by those nations which are hereditary enemies.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. - Very poetical but not practicable.

Mr. GORDON. - Does the honorable member say that what is an accepted arrangement between countries like France, Austria, and Germany, is not practicable?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. - We are talking about the Murray and the Darling.
Mr. GORDON. -

The position is the same. The rivers in regard to which these arrangements have been made are rivers running through contiguous states. The Darling and the Murray also run through contiguous states. It appears to me that the cases are altogether parallel, though the rivers have different names. Of course I am bound to admit that the old lawyers—if those who take the opposite view from mine shelter themselves behind the reasoning of ancient lawyers—hold to the opposite contention. But theirs are reasons founded upon conquest, and are selfish, narrow, and long ago discredited.

Mr. BARTON. -

Are there any opinions by modern lawyers which support the contrary view?

Mr. GORDON. -

I think so. I shall submit the opinions of many eminent lawyers who are very much of the opposite way of thinking. It is only the opinions of the old lawyers that support the contention against which I am now arguing. It is too late for my honorable friends to shelter themselves behind parchment ghosts of this sort. Mr. Lawrence, an eminent authority, in his Principles of International Law, says that—"Usage has turned against this ancient rule in all civilizations." That is the rule of exclusive possession of a stream which runs from one country to another. The River St. Lawrence runs for most of its course through Canada. It drains twice as much of the water-collecting area of Canada as of America, and in 1824 the English Government set up this purely legal theory, to which the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton) has referred, and claimed the exclusive right of control in regard to that part of the St. Lawrence which runs through the Dominion of Canada. In the dispute with the United States Government, however, that contention was afterwards abandoned by the British Government. The case, however, is one exactly in point now. The St. Lawrence runs for most of its course through Canada, but for part of its course through the United States, and it has been conceded by the British Government that the Americans have the right to free passage on and the free use of that stream throughout its entire course as well in American as in Canadian territory. This is the form in which the argument is put in that great discussion:

The purely legal rights of states should be subordinated to the general interests of mankind, and that the right of all the riparian inhabitants to the full use of the stream rested upon the same imperious want, the same inherent necessity, which they all had of participating in the flowing element. It was a right of nature.
How much of the flowing element have you ever lost?

Mr. GORDON. -
The honorable and learned member might as well ask which of the other benefits that, according to his belief and ours, federation is to give us, have we already lost? We are seeking now to gain benefits. The honorable and learned member's interjection has not very much force. If this compact is made, it should be made upon lines which will leave no possibility of dispute or disquiet afterwards. Can the honorable and learned member say that if the Murray question is left unsettled there will be no possibility of disquiet, and a disquiet of the most serious nature? Another eminent constitutional writer, Mr. Wolseley, discussing the principle, says-

When a river rises within the bounds of one state and empties into the sea in another, the inhabitants of the lower state have a moral coequal claim to its use.

That is our case. This great river system has its rise in other colonies; but it flows through Victoria and South Australia, and Victoria and South Australia for that reason have a moral co-equal claim to the use of the water, and that use should be controlled in the interest of all the riparian co-proprietors. Mr. Wolseley continues-and this is the crux of the position-

Is such a nation-
The nation lower down the stream.
to be crippled in its resources and made to depend upon another's caprice for a great part of that which makes nations fulfil their vocations in the world?

Is Victoria relatively to New South Wales, and South Australia relatively to New South Wales and to Victoria, to be placed at their mercy or caprice for the enjoyment of that which was designed by Providence for the benefit of the whole continent? Can it be seriously contended as a matter of principle that New South Wales and Victoria can deduct so much water from these rivers as will leave them absolutely and only at a navigable point, and will allow South Australia to take nothing for the irrigation and fertilization of her land?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
That has not been attempted.

Mr. GORDON. -
It has not been attempted, but it has been threatened. The honorable member, with his knowledge of business, will see that that is not the point. If my honorable friend is going to enter into a contract he takes care to see that all the terms of it are clear, and beyond the possibility of dispute.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
And not one-sided.

Mr. GORDON. -
Yes. We wish the terms of this contract to be so clear that these principles shall be embraced in it beyond dispute.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Suppose Victoria has made reservoirs and improvements which increase the volume of the Murray.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
The people of South Australia do not propose to pay for that.

Mr. GORDON. -
The honorable member has not yet heard the whole of my argument. I am willing that the Federal Parliament, in its proper quota of contribution, should repay any money which has been expended or in the meantime will be expended in improving these rivers.

Mr. SYMON. -
The honorable member does not wish to deprive Victoria of the benefit of these reservoirs.

Mr. GORDON. -
Not at all. This is the point as put by Mr. Wolseley: Is it right that these lower riparian states should be crippled in their resources and made to depend upon another's caprice for a great part of that which enables nations to fulfil their vocations in the world? If the contention that New South Wales and Victoria can deduct from the waters of these rivers so much as will leave them only at navigation point is upheld, we in South Australia shall not be able to take one drop for irrigation purposes. Another writer, Mr. Hall, expresses the opinion that-

The freedom of rivers to all the riparian inhabitants is a sentiment written in deep characters in the heart of man.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Is Mr. Hall a lawyer or a poet?

Mr. GORDON. -
He is a lawyer; but occasionally even a lawyer has a vein of sentiment in his composition.

Mr. BARTON. -
It is when the lawyer is sentimental that he seems to suit the honorable member's purpose best.

Mr. GORDON. -
Well, this is a question of large fairness, into the consideration of which sentiment enters to a very great extent. It is not a matter to be decided upon the narrow dictates of old legal maxims; it is not only a question of international law. It is a question of State policy and international law, and the sentiment of friendship is rep

Mr. BARTON. -
I quite agree. You would tomahawk everything old, even if it were right.

Mr. GORDON. -
I should be sorry to see the honorable member meet with that fate when he is a little older. I believe some nations have been in the habit not only of tomahawking but of eating their old people. The honorable member will admit that his interjection is scarcely an argument. Listen, now, to Mr. Henry Clay, the great American statesman and jurist, a man whose opinion, I think, even the honorable member will treat with respect. He says-

The principle of international co-riparian right should be regarded as the spontaneous homage of man to the paramount Lawgiver of the universe by delivering his great works from the artificial shackles and selfish contrivances by which they have been artificially and unjustly subjected.

Mr. Clay had a streak of poetry in him, but the statement I have read is a streak of the soundest political wisdom, and I shall be glad to hear the honorable member dispute it if he can. I challenge him to dispute it. I might go on and give the honorable member other quotations; but I think I have given him sufficient to keep him engaged for some time if he is to answer them. I do not like to detain the Convention too long by citing authorities. All the opinions I have quoted except in the St. Lawrence case, in which the principle I am contending for was upheld, are the profound judicial opinions of men who were no mere partisans-men who had studied the question in the light of international obligations, and who were free from that kind of bias which I regret to see in the eyes of Mr. Barton.

Mr. BARTON. -
I have not said a word.

Mr. GORDON. -
The honorable member conveys a good deal by shakes of the head, and interjections. When analyzed, these interjections do not mean much, but he intends them to mean a great deal. The honorable member and others have, I think, been rather led astray in this matter by the bald and erroneous statements of people, in New South Wales, who say that we want their rivers.

Mr. WALKER. -
You want the waters of the rivers.

Mr. GORDON. -
We do not want the waters of the rivers in an unfair sense. We only want such control as is conceded in every civilized country in the world, and surely, as has often been put to the Convention, we can trust ourselves. Surely we can trust the Federal Parliament, in which New South Wales will have by far the largest voting power. Even if it had not by far the largest voting power, the great principle of justice would demand that this concession should be made. Now, I am going to deal very briefly with the second class of objectors—with those who agreed with me in regard to the right to navigation and free passage, but said that the contention could not be carried to the extent of mutual use and control for the purposes of irrigation. I confess to have been unable to make any distinction at all. If those honorable members say that there shall be mutual control and use for the purposes of navigation, I cannot see on what principle they stop short and declare that there shall be no mutual control and use for the purposes of irrigation. What magic is there in the word "navigation"? Navigation is only a purpose of mankind. It is something mankind requires, to use Wolseley's words, to enable them to fulfil their vocation in the world. I contend that the rivers of the great water system of Australia are much more necessary to the people of Australia for irrigation than for navigation. It will help them more to fulfil their vocation as a nation to have a free use of these waters for irrigation than for navigation. As it has been put to me by an honorable member, you can always construct railways, and you can always provide coaches to travel in, but you cannot make rivers. I repeat that rivers are more necessary for the purposes of Australia for irrigation than for navigation. Both claims rest upon the same imperious want—the inherent necessity of mankind. I shall be interested to hear any honorable member attempt to make a distinction in principle, so far as the rivers which run through contiguous states are concerned, between the right of those states to a mutual control in regard to navigation and their right to a mutual control for the purposes of irrigation. Such a control as I am contending for should be granted, apart altogether from federation. I say, with much respect, that it is a blot on the history of the colonies that there has been no mutual arrangement by which, these great rivers could be controlled for irrigation as well as for navigation. I am not going into the history of that dispute, but I think it is a blot upon the colonies that an arrangement has not been made. And how imperative it is to make it now, when in the infancy of these states quarrels have arisen. What will happen when we number the population of Australia by millions, and when the population presses with infinitely greater force on the means of subsistence in the valleys of this water system? We know how large the and spaces of Australia are. If quarrels arise what can settle them? Nothing but war or disruption. Only a few of us, I am afraid, have properly conceived the part which irrigation will play in the struggle of humanity in Australia. In time to come millions of people will, as they do in America and India, depend upon our irrigated land's for their means of livelihood. Is it just that the future of these riparian dwellers should be left to the caprice of the states above them? I appeal to Mr. Deakin, who has made a study of this question, and who knows the benefits which irrigation has conferred on both ancient and modern civilisations, to support me in saying that I am not overstating the importance of this question. It is not a local question at all. It is nothing less than a national question, and it is a national necessity that the problem should be solved. Article 2 of the irrigation law of Wyoming recites:-

Water being essential to industrial prosperity, of limited amount and easy of diversion from its natural channels, its control must be in the state; which, in providing for its use, shall equally guard all the interests involved.

Here again is a quotation which exactly describes my position. The water here is of limited quantity. It is easy of diversion. It could be diverted, and it has been threatened to be diverted, by colonies above us. This proposition states, and it is one to which we must all agree as a matter of principle, that in providing for the use of the water the interests of all involved shall be equally guarded. Can any one say that the interests of Victoria and of South Australia are not involved in the question of the use of the waters of these rivers? I should be surprised to hear any honorable member make that statement. If we all have an interest in the rivers, what is the objection to a joint control in the interests of all? In America, as I have no doubt it will be argued presently by some honorable member, the Federal Constitution did not provide for the control of the waters of the American states, but it is now a matter of general regret in America that no such provision was made. Mr. Kenny, who has written the leading book on irrigation laws of America-and is quite a modern book-says that in America the nation is regretting that the Constitution did not provide for the control by the federal authority of the river of America. He continues-

It seems strange that Congress should not have enacted uniform and explicit laws as to the disposal of the waters. If a uniform system had at first been adopted by the Government for the disposal of the waters of the natural streams flowing over the public domains, the difficult questions that now arise would have been avoided. The day is certainly fast approaching when the public will understand that irrigation is the concern not of the arid region only, but of the whole United States. Instead of a narrow sectional question, irrigation is becoming more and more each year a broad national problem. It is the question of our water resources that is now of the most vital importance. In the course of a few years irrigation will be recognised as a national necessity.

If irrigation is a national necessity and a national problem-if it is now a matter of regret that the American Government did not take over the control of the public streams of America-would not the same regret and the same conditions exist here? Irrigation will be ten times more a national necessity here than it is in America, and the regret will be ten times greater if we miss this chance of settling the question, and the Constitution does not provide for the control of these water channels. And, after all, what are we asking for? We are only asking for the right that every riparian proprietor enjoys under British law-the right that the man above him shall neither injure the quality nor diminish the flow of any stream designed for their mutual benefit and enjoyment. That is a right that is founded deep in natural justice. It cannot be said that we are asking for anything extraordinary or making extreme demands upon our follow colonists when we simply seek for that right which every riparian proprietor under British law enjoys. The tendency of modern legislation is to go even further than the common law doctrine in declaring that there shall be no exclusive property in running streams. The tendency of modern legislation is to say that while the riparian proprietors should have their rights under the law there is a higher, a paramount right, the right of the people who are the dwellers on the banks of these streams. That is an extension of the doctrine of riparian rights that is being acted upon by many of the Governments of the United States. It cannot, therefore, be said that we are robbing New South Wales, or making extreme demands on the generosity of that colony, when we are only asking for that which every man in New South Wales enjoys-the right to have the stream which flows through his land undiminished in quantity and uninjured in quality. That is all we are asking for, and how can it be said that the demand is unreasonable? I cannot, for the life of me, understand how honorable members should say that our railways should be subject to a joint control, and deny that the rivers should be similarly dealt with. It is universally admitted that some control over our railways should be insisted upon, in order to prevent them from being used by one colony to the detriment and injury of another colony. Where is the argument against the same control being exercised over the rivers, seeing that they can equally be used to the detriment and the injury of other colonies? On the contrary, is not the argument much stronger for the control of the rivers, which are the great natural channels, and which owe little or nothing to the hands of man. The railways are embraced within the delimitation of the state. They are put there at the expense of the state, and are the undisturbed property of the state. No such claim can be made to the rivers - those "channels of God," as old Kent calls them. It is conceded that there should be such a federal control of the railways as would prevent them from being used by one state to the injury of another, and that really gives away the argument so far as regards the rivers, which can be much more easily used to the injury and detriment of the other states. Now, to descend from principle to expediency, it appears to me that this great water system can best be administered and managed for the benefit of Australia by a scientific system of administration and control which should begin at its rise and extend its entire length. One does not want to be up in hydraulics or to be a conservator of water to know that detached systems of water conservation planned by different minds and carried out at various times cannot be so effective as those made on one scientific and continuous plan.

Mr. DEAKIN.

Hear, hear.

Mr. GORDON.

I am glad to have the honorable member's cheer because he is a student of the question. Such detached and haphazard schemes lead to dissipation and not to conservation of water. As a matter of expediency, I contend that what we are now seeking for will not be to the advantage of one colony but of all. I believe it will be under such a system of management that irrigation will be properly carried out. Those of us who have seen these immense floods which spread over the banks of the Darling and the Murray, scorning all the limitations of the New South Wales geographers, and which flow in a stream 50 miles broad, wasting all their fertilizing waters in the sea, are convinced that with a proper and scientific system of water conservation there will be sufficient water for the needs of a great part of Australia. I hope I have not detained the Convention too long in submitting these proposals, but I am deeply convinced of the vital importance of the question, and that we shall be truant to the solemn responsibilities we have undertaken if we do not settle this question now upon a basis which shall not only exclude the possibility of injustice, but which shall provide as far as possible for the just division of a bounty which Providence designed, not for any narrow portion of this great continent, but for the beautifying, the delight, and the support of it all.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria).

Without attempting to follow the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) through the many flights of oratory with which he has charmed us, and with the breadth of criticism which he has offered on all the issues involved, I rise for the purpose of submitting a few considerations, trusting that they will be of some service in the settlement of this issue. I propose to take advantage of this amendment to consider for a moment it is an inter-colonial traffic. The points of arrival and departure of the river traffic are very rarely in the same colony. The traffic of the Murray and its tributaries is therefore in its essence inter-colonial, and one would, therefore, suppose that it was properly open to, and required, federal control. The first broad question we have put is answered, since the facts of the case point naturally in the direction of the propriety of conferring upon the Federal Government, at all events, a power of control over what is practically the federal and inter-colonial navigation of the interior. That is prima facie a most reasonable demand, and would require to be rebutted by important considerations of expediency, if it were put aside. The next question is that, since the traffic is inter-colonial, and cannot be efficiently dealt with except by inter-colonial agreement or inter-colonial legislation-

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Is it possible to define "navigable"?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I think so. There is a great body of decisions in the United States, where the Federal Government have control of navigable streams, that settles by means of particular instances a certain number of principles which would allow of the determination of the question as to where a river begins and ceases to be navigable.

Mr. BARTON. -

It must also be remembered that there is a great quantity of water there.

Mr. REID. -

Are navigable rivers mentioned in the Constitution?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No commerce is mentioned, and naturally that is only affected where the river is navigable. While it is perfectly true that the rivers which were in the mind's eye of the framers of the American Constitution were the noble streams of the eastern states, it is well to remember that federal laws now apply equally to all the rivers of the west in the great republic. There the physical conditions are similar to ours. There are immense areas of arid country with streams having an intermittent flow.

Mr. BARTON. -

The framers of the American Constitution had no thought of that when they passed the provision with regard to the regulation of commerce.
MR. DEAKIN. -

That is the case. It was then only necessary to consider the utilization of water for navigation, and the question of irrigation was not in view. We have now to deal with a different set of circumstances. But the word "navigable" is largely defined in various American decisions, and, therefore, it might if necessary be readily defined for the purposes of our Constitution. I was about to leave that branch of the subject with the simple statement that it seems natural, desirable, and proper that what is really inter-colonial intercourse upon our rivers should be under federal control. Another question was touched upon in one very important aspect by the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) in his finished and elaborate discourse. That was the relation which this traffic upon inter-colonial streams bears to the railways of the colonies. He only considered it in a single aspect. He said, if it would be undesirable in a federal state to permit a continuance of a war of railway rates, it would be equally undesirable to permit of a war of rates as to river-borne produce. But there is another consideration that has been pressed upon the consideration of the Finance Committee and the whole of this Convention by the evidence which the late Mr. Eddy gave before the Finance Committee in Adelaide. It would lead me too far afield to refer in detail to that evidence, but it will be found on pages 160-163 in the report of the proceedings of the Convention in Sydney. It was there published for the first time. Although Mr. Eddy hesitated to say that the Federal Government should seek to take entire control of the river-borne traffic, because it is in private hands, and that would mean a serious interference with private trade and business, yet all his arguments went to support the contention which he in one part of his evidence admits, that some control is decidedly necessary in the interests of the railways, and also in the national interests. He points out that railway rates in many parts of the interior are determined by river rates, and that those river rates are open to very great alterations which defeat all possible calculations by the railway authorities as to the returns in any given year from any given rates. He points out that it is undesirable that this state of things should continue either in the interests of railway traffic or national interests. He seemed to think, not only as a railway man but as a citizen of these colonies, that it is essential if railway charges are to be subject in any degree to federal control, if the rates of carriage are to be fixed in any way by federal authority, that the aim of such control would be incompletely fulfilled unless power of some kind were given over the charges upon traffic which passes in competition with the railways, not along other railways, but along the natural water-courses.
of the country. The State has spent large sums in keeping there water-course open for the longest possible period in each year. If the railway rates are to be in any degree subject to federal control while this disturbing element remains, it will be a task of almost insuperable difficulty to fix them in those regions.

Mr. FRASER. -

It will not be more difficult than at present.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The honorable member knows the great advantage which the competing railway and river rates confer on growers of wool who can avail themselves of them. I can understand that it is an undesirable suggestion that there should be harmony between these rivals from the point of view of the producers. I only wish to point out that in addition to the many considerations so ably put by the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) one most important consideration is the effect of these water carriage rates upon the railway rates, and their effect upon the revenues of individual colonies or of the Federal Government. When we refer to the control of this great river system or any similar system in Australia for the purposes of navigation, we find ourselves confronted by the necessity, if the opportunities which these systems offer to us for the commerce of the interior are to be fully availed of, for constructing works upon those rivers which must far surpass the powers and resources of even the richest colony of the group. Many of these works must be undertaken outside the limits of any particular colony. Our rivers differ from the superb systems of the eastern states of America, inasmuch as they are often shallow and intermittent although liable to great floods. To secure a regular and even flow for the longest possible period during the year regulating works would be necessary which would extend from high up near the sources to their very mouths. In South Australia a proposition has been considered which would involve a very extensive deepening of the mouth of the River Murray that would improve the navigation so far as it would tend to admit larger vessels into the river system, but it would also tend to injure navigation by diminishing the duration of the period within which navigation is possible, because it would make the escape of the waters of the river to the ocean freer, and would tend to empty the river at an earlier period than at present.

Mr. HOWE. -

We did not make that proposition.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It has been proposed, and if the question of navigation is to be dealt with it ought to be considered.

Mr. SYMON. -

If such a work were ever carried out it would have to be a federal matter.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I am leading up to that. Whilst that work is desirable in the interests of navigation in one aspect it is not desirable in another aspect unless it is accompanied by additional works. The proposals which have been before the Government of New South Wales to deal with that great tributary of the Murray—the Darling—involving the construction of locks along that river—would have to be extended until they embraced the Murray itself. They would have to deal with the whole of the system from the mouth upwards so as to bring the river at proper intervals under the control of a system of works which, while allowing fuller access to navigation, would prevent the free escape of the waters to the sea. I merely mention this as an indication of the gigantic works which will be necessary. Not gigantic in cost in comparison with those undertaken in America at the head of the Mississippi and Missouri, but gigantic when viewed from the Australian standpoint; yet an expenditure which is absolutely necessary if that river and its tributaries are to be put to their best possible use for the purpose of developing the interior commerce of Australia. It would be equally necessary to cope in some way with the extraordinary floods to which this great system is liable. They can only be dealt with in the higher parts of the stream by a system of diversion or storage, or of diversion and storage, which might enable the level of the river to be maintained for a longer period than at present, regulating its flow, and at the same time affording an opportunity, during a season of plenty, to retain waters which would be of inexpressible value in seasons of dearth. If you once look at the question as I am asking the Convention to look at it, from the natural physical standpoint, the desirability of a federal control of what is practically federal commerce, by an expenditure upon works which must be federal to preserve navigation, you are brought face to face with the other question introduced by my honorable friend. This relates to the immense possibilities within the limits of the water supply which are afforded for the development of agriculture in the interior by means of irrigation. This was dwelt upon by the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) in Adelaide with great force, with great effect, and with no whit of exaggeration. He detailed to us some of the brilliant results which had been achieved in the interior of New South Wales by the construction of simple dams or weirs for the preservation of part of the waters which now flow to waste. There is no doubt that in the future New South Wales and Victoria, in pursuance of their policy of development, are likely to increase the number and scale on which such works are executed. Hence, the consideration of works for navigation has brought us face to face with the necessity from the irrigation stand-point of constructing other works on the same streams. Thus we find that the problem of irrigation becomes inextricably intertwined with the problem of navigation, and that the interests of one must be studied in connexion with the interests of the other. The interests of both can best be dealt with in common, and I venture to submit from the irrigation stand-point-the stand-point which impressed the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) and other representatives of New South Wales-that we have yet to learn that these two interests are necessary antagonistic. We have yet to learn that it would not be possible, by a federal system dealing with this river from its source to its mouth, to provide as much navigation as would be required, consistent with what I, in common with the representatives for New South Wales, take to be the first consideration in connexion with the river, and that is the distribution of as much of its waters as can be regularly or periodically made available to increase cultivation and settlement on the soil. Why should not those interests go together? There is no insuperable obstacle to prevent their being dealt with jointly. It may be proved from the local point of view that they should be dealt with together, in order that the best results may be obtained from both. It may be that to some extent the construction of works on the lower part of the river would be of material advantage to the inhabitants of the remote interior, as far as they improve its navigability and means of communication which are offered from the sea into the heart of New South Wales. But putting speculation aside, the real difficulty of this question is that there are three parties at present interested, namely, New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia.

Mr. GORDON. -
And all Australia through them.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Indirectly and remotely, no doubt. The Victorian interest is limited, and owing to the physical circumstances of the case the Victorian attitude can be impartial in this matter, because any gain which we can share in must be general, whereas our own interests are pretty well protected by nature and our own past exertions. We need look forward with very little alarm to whatever course is pursued. The difficulty is that New South Wales contains the Darling, the Lachlan-the head and body of all these streams-the Lachlan, the Murrumbidgee, and the Darling.

Mr. REID. -
It holds the whole of them.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
I said the whole of them.

Mr. REID. -
No; the honorable member said the body of them.

Mr. GORDON. -
Some of the tributaries of the Darling are in Queensland.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
They are not worth mentioning; they are insignificant. New South Wales holds the whole of those streams, and her representatives are placed in the difficult position that they are asked to yield apparently all the concessions which are involved in the acceptance of the federal control of this great arterial river system. South Australia, on the other hand, which is naturally most urgent for the federal control of this river-any control, though partial only being better for them than the entire absence of authority, from which it at present suffers in respect of the streams beyond its borders-is in the position of practically making no concession and reaping an immense advantage. Naturally, as I pointed out to the honorable member before he spoke, his pleas, sound as they appear to me, are received with some questioning by the representatives of New South Wales when his request, although evidently federal in nature and object, appears to be all to the gain of his own colony, and all at the risk, for it is no more than a risk, of New South Wales. Victoria, as I say, is asked to risk comparatively little or nothing by placing these main streams under federal control, but New South Wales is certainly asked to risk something; and, as it was very fairly put at Adelaide, the representatives of that colony view with proper anxiety a request to transfer the absolute control of the main tributaries of a river which they undoubtedly at present possess-which, in fact, they possess under any and every circumstance unless they choose to yield to appeals which are made to them. They naturally look with some suspicion on a proposal even to share with South Australia the control of these tributaries within their own territory.

Mr. DOBSON. -
But do they possess them in law?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Personally, I think so. If they do not I should like to see the law that could be enforced compelling them to give it up. For all practical purposes I think we may agree, however much we may differ as to the reading of their legal rights that the absolute control of the Darling is in the hands of New South Wales.
So as to make the River Murray run dry?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Suppose that New South Wales did make the river run dry, how are you to prevent them? In what court are you to sue them, to what code will you appeal, or who will enforce the verdict? I do not know.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is the right of the strong man to knock down the little man.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It may be the right of the strong, but it is a strong right as between different nations, which we practically are. We are independent of each other, and have no more power to enforce on New South Wales the execution of an unpalatable decree in regard to anything in her territory than we have to enforce it on Russia. That fact may just as well frankly be realized. The question is whether this matter cannot be laid before the representatives of New South Wales in such a form that they may see it to be consonant with their duty as representatives and the interests of their colony to consent to the placing of some power in this Bill with regard to the future control of this federal river-of the Murray system, with regard to navigation, and with regard to irrigation. Let us safeguard, if it can be done, any special rights which New South Wales may conceive that she possesses. The task, I admit, is difficult, but at the same time we have submitted tasks almost as difficult to the Drafting Committee, and if we thoroughly thrash out the main principles without going into the details of this question it may yet be possible to embody, either in this clause or, if necessary, in some more qualified clause which may be placed in another part of the Bill, a provision by which, when the opportunity arises, and when further information has been obtained, the complete federal control of this river system can pass to Federated Australia, when New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia are satisfied that their interests are not to be prejudiced thereby.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

In view of the reasons given by Colonel Home in his report is not the New South Wales scheme for irrigation impossible?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The report of Colonel Home is only known to me from a very brief newspaper extract, and I am not prepared to say yet whether the Government of New South Wales and their people are prepared to adopt that report without qualification or addition.

Mr. GORDON. -

It is confined to the Murrumbidgee only.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I am not even aware of that. What I am submitting is that it appears to me that we are entitled to put to this Convention—that is really to the representatives of New South Wales—the great advantages of every kind likely to be reaped by federal river control—federal control of its trade as preventing competition with the railways, federal control of navigation as enabling us to develop it best, and federal control of the whole system for the purpose of irrigation. This should prove, as it seems to me probable, for the greater benefit of all parties concerned in New South Wales. South Australia is called upon practically to make no sacrifice, and would reap a gain which is, under natural circumstances and apart from state rights, certainly due to her. Victoria would yield something and gain something, and remain about where she is, but New South Wales would have to be satisfied that in yielding to federal control these tributaries which are now within her own control she would also gain. I have detained the committee longer than I proposed. The whole question appears to be the manner in which the representatives of New South Wales will regard this proposal. If they cannot see their way to safeguard the interests of their colony, if they cannot see their way with the information before them to accept this proposal at present, or some proposal of a similar nature, I would urge them to consider whether we could not place a separate clause in the Bill, having a contingent effect if necessary, so as to provide, on the people of New South Wales or their Government being satisfied that the schemes projected by the Federal Government would not be an injury to them, that it should be possible for the Federal Government to enter into the federal control of this great system. Some such federal control, I believe, would be an enormous enrichment to all Australia, and would foster the development of the interior.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Is the honorable member in favour of the amendment suggested by South Australia?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I am in favour of it as far as making it apply to all rivers for navigation, as is proposed by the complete amendment; but as to irrigation, I am in favour of it only to the extent I have mentioned.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Does the honorable member consider that this sub-section gives absolutely to the Federal Government the ownership of the waters of the rivers?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I have not considered all the proposals of the South Australian
Mr. REID. -
It takes the use of the waters without paying the expense.

Mr. BARTON. -
What is the difference between taking away some of our waters and taking away some of our land?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Exactly.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
But it is not your water.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Do the words "the use of the waters thereof" mean the absolute ownership of them?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I think that those are the widest possible words, and if they do not convey an absolute ownership confer all the practical title to them. I agree with the honorable member that these words imply most absolute control on the part of the Federal Government. The query put to me by one of the representatives of New South Wales is whether there should be any greater right in the Federal Government to take away her water than to take away her land. The scheme which I am suggesting is not met by that analogy, because water, unlike land, is not a fixed quantity. In Australia it is a very unfixed and indeterminate quantity indeed. It may be possible, by perfect regulation of the streams, to leave to New South Wales practically all the water which she now enjoys, or can enjoy, on an unimproved river, and yet by means of its improvement, while leaving her all that water, to give much greater security to navigation, and to provide a much larger quantity for irrigation lower down. By putting this river as a whole under federal control, it may he possible to satisfy New South Wales that, while she loses nothing, the community of South Australia and her own residents, as far as they are affected by navigation, will gain a great deal. I freely admit that-as it is New South Wales that is asked to make the sacrifice upon this subject-the request is one to which I, as a representative of Victoria, can make no reply. It must be answered by the representatives of New South Wales. But I am appealing to them to recognise the federal aspect of this question-to recognise that federal aspect as far as they possibly can in this Bill without jeopardizing the interests of their own colony; so that when at some future time, with more knowledge at their command, they, or the people of New South Wales, can be satisfied that this federal control can be handed over to the Federal Parliament without serious loss to New South Wales, it may then be possible for the Federal Government to enter upon the control of this river scheme. That is what I am putting—no unreasonable demand, I think; but I feel that because New South Wales is the only colony that is asked to make a sacrifice in this matter, and is not yet prepared to make it, they should not shut the door on all future federal control of this great arterial system of Australia. It would be an immense gain to the continent as a whole if the river system could be federalized, if the federalizing of it could be effected without imperilling, the interests of New South Wales.

Mr. DOBSON. -

You speak of this water being in the legal possession of New South Wales. Can you point to any proclamation in which the Crown has given to one colony legal possession of a national river running through all Australia?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I cannot; and I think I can with safety challenge the honorable member to cite authorities giving any right to any other colony to challenge it.

Mr. BARTON. -

We are granted territories within certain boundaries, and one of the boundaries is a river; and unless there is something to show to the contrary the water of that river is ours.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

So I should say, unless I can be shown instances where national riparian rights have been recognised between states in regard to a single stream.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I think you would have to show that the Crown granted to one colony the main artery flowing through three colonies. The onus lies upon you to show that.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I confess to thinking that, in discussing the legal aspect, we should be opening up a question which, however interesting in itself from a professional point of view, we cannot pretend to settle authoritatively, and the discussion of which would lead to no practical gain. All we can do is to ask the representatives of New South Wales to consider this matter of river control in the most federal light, and to urge them to join with us in providing as far as possible, if not for the immediate, at all events for the contingent, federal control of, all the river systems of Australia whenever the Federal Parliament may deem that control necessary.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

It seems to me that it is for the Federal

Mr. GLYNN. -
I think, from the private conversations which I have had with some members of the Convention that the representatives of South Australia may congratulate themselves upon the slight advance which has been made in the recognition of the justice of their claim since the suspension of our sittings in Sydney, and I think also that it only requires that our case shall be comprehensively stated from all points of view to induce a considerable number of the representatives of New South Wales to support us in our amendment, by means of which we wish to establish, the recognition of our equities-I am afraid to use the word "rights" to the rivers of the continent. It has been, I believe, the comparative ignorance that exists upon the decisive points of the question that has prevented the recognition of our claim hitherto, but there have been indications during the speech of my honorable colleague (Mr. Gordon) in the form of interjections by one or two members, which have suggested to me a few aspects, of this question upon which it would be judicious to say a few words. We had an interjection from the leader of the Convention (Mr. Barton) to the effect that none of the waters of the River Murray have yet been diverted by New South Wales, and we have had the suggestion made by some of the representatives of Victoria-I think by Mr. Higgins and Sir William Zeal-that by granting the rights South Australia asks for, you will be virtually taking away certain reservoirs constructed in Victoria, the assumption underlying the argument being that the waters of these reservoirs are feeders of the rivers.

I will endeavour to challenge the innuendos which are involved in these statements, and if, in doing so, I trespass upon the time of honorable members to a greater extent than would otherwise be the case, I do so from a sense of the importance of the question. I take a different view from some honorable members-a view which is somewhat suggested by the argument of Mr. Deakin as to the expediency of placing the rivers under federal control. I say that the result of so doing would be of great benefit in the extension of the economies which we wish to achieve by federation, and in the expansion of our commercial intercourse, which is also one of our primary objects. I will first of all say that river traffic, as against railway traffic, is by far the more preferable of the two, and our idea is that we ought to improve the opportunities of river traffic we have in Australia. Take, for instance, the statement of an expert, General Hamley, who in an article in the Contemporary Review for April, 1891, states-

Fifteen years ago it would scarcely have been disputed that canals must give place to railways. The teaching of to-day, is, however, quite different. There is a widespread belief that inland water carriage may compete successfully with railways, and a general desire to bring the former mode of transit into more extensive use.

I might expand this point at considerable length, but I will content myself with quoting the evidence given by an expert before a canal committee of the House of Commons in England in 1883 upon the comparative merits of water as against railway conduit. In his evidence before that committee Mr. F.R. Condor stated that the cost of maintenance of works for equal volumes of traffic on canals is less than one-fourth the cost on railways, and the cost of conveyance of heavy material by canals is less than one-third that by railways. And he states that the economy of transport by canal is about 64 per cent. less than by rail. Now, these facts have been recognised widely in the old country, because we find an expenditure of from £10,000 to £11,000 a mile being spent upon the improvement of the canal systems even where there is railway competition. Coming to Australia, I will deal as far as possible with the arguments of the representatives of the opposing colonies, or of the colony of New South Wales, from these colonies own reports. Let me refer to a statement made by Mr. Gordon, a civil engineer whose name is well known to those who have looked into the matter. In his report to the provisional directors of the River Darling Navigation Company, about ten years ago, he stated-

Inland navigation, after having been for some time almost at a stand-still owing to the rapid extension of railways, has of late years exhibited a revival in England, and more especially on the continent, its numerous advantages, more especially the low cost of haulage and of maintenance, enabling it to contrast more favorably with railway traffic. When a river is canalized, and the navigation is independent of floods and drought, the one great advantage of railway communication-its regularity-disappears, while the capacity of the canal is much greater. The total cost of carriage on a canal or navigable river decreases in far greater ratio with the increase of traffic than does that by railway.

I think these few quotations ought to a large extent to support the position Mr. Deakin takes up, that it is to the interest of the colonies affected by the rivers, into which the rivers flow, or by whose territories the rivers pass, to improve these natural agencies of exchange, and to cooperate with us for the purpose. One of the first objects we have in view in this amendment is to improve these great water economies. Let us see what has been stated in New South Wales upon this point. Mr. McKinney, in a report to the Government in 1893, pointed out that the navigability of the rivers would be of enormous advantage to the State, and a great gain to New South Wales, because river traffic is cheaper for the public than railway traffic. Referring to the River Darling and the efforts of New South Wales to imperil its trade by preferential rates—and I will particularly ask the attention of the committee to this point, as the New South Wales system of locking is a most anti-federal system—he says—

Additional railways are certain to be constructed in the course of time, but the experience of the world proves conclusively that they will not supersede water traffic. Economic results are often obtained by working the two systems together, but the iron road cannot destroy canal or river services where there is a level competition.

Following his argument still further, and supporting it by evidence, Mr. McKinney states that in England 4,000 miles of canals have been constructed, and in France upwards of 8,000 miles of canals; and that about £60,000,000 has been spent in improving the water carriage of France, with the result that France has been enabled after a certain number of years, through the profits arising, to throw open these modes of transit gratis to the public. Now, what is the position in England? The railway companies, finding that the canals are likely, by force of competition, to beat them, are endeavouring, as far as possible, to buy up the canals, and according to the evidence given before the committee to which I have referred, and to more recent publications—down to the year 1896—about one-third of the canals of England are now under the management of the railway companies. With what result? That the moment a railway company obtains possession of a competing canal, it at once doubles or trebles its rates. Now, that speaks very highly as to what may be the result of the improvement of our river traffic by a system of federal control. Let me now come to the policy suggested by Mr. McKinney to New South Wales as a complement to the navigation of the rivers by a system of locks. He states that—

A peculiar difficulty has, however, always attached to the navigable use of the Darling. Nature, indifferent to the political lines which might afterwards be drawn on the map of Australia, fixed the geographical course of the river in a way that distinctly favours Melbourne and Adelaide against Sydney as shipping ports for produce. Able railway management—which we are challenging now by our policy—has lately succeeded in securing about half the Darling trade for Sydney in spite of the geographical direction of the river; but politicians and merchants, as may easily be imagined, are not satisfied with half of the trade. Their ambition or interest is to bring all New South Wales produce to a New South Wales market or shipping port. To convert the Darling into a permanent road to Melbourne and Adelaide at the expense of this colony is an idea too benevolent for serious contemplation. What has been considered for several years is the advisableness of canalizing the Darling, and of so administering the canalized river as to force the traffic to Sydney.

-a most anti-federal proposition. But it may be objected by New South Wales" We are not going to lock our rivers for your advantage." My answer is that in 1888 we in South Australia carried a motion in favour of a system of federal locking of rivers. I went over to see Sir Henry Parkes, who was then the Premier of New South Wales, being deputed to do so by the Government of South Australia, to ascertain if he would join with us in the federal looking of the rivers. Of course we know what the results of Sir Henry Parkes dicta on the question of joint action have been. The policy of New South Wales is simply to look the Darling and set up rights which will prevent the traffic going into its natural course to Victoria or South Australia, and thus arrive at the very reverse position of that, which we are endeavouring to reach by federation—the position which is the federal one on this question. The representatives of New South Wales inquire "What have we done?" Mr. Barton asked."Have we taken a single pint of your water up to the present?" Now, what is contemplated? The report from which I have quoted was furnished in 1893, so that the scheme has not had very much time to be carried out up to the present. We find from that report that the Government of New South Wales contemplate impounding the flood waters of the Darling in certain lakes, which have a storage capacity of 360,000 acres. I will point out what the effect of carrying out that scheme would be to South Australia and Victoria. The water that would be conserved in those lakes would be sufficient to keep up the flow of the river for about half the year.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Scarcely.
Mr. GLYNN. -
I have it on an estimate made by Mr. Burchell, an officer of the Water Conservation department of South Australia and one of the best experts on this question, that that is so.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You assume that it stays there all the seasons.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I think I shall be able to convince the honorable member, before I pass from this branch of the subject, that if you impound the flood waters of the Darling to the extent contemplated by New South Wales, you will destroy, for the greater part of the year, the navigability of the Murray, because a very high flood in the Darling means only a difference of 2 or 3 feet in the level of the Murray, and the Darling itself is kept up by the reflow into the river of the flood water from those lakes which they now seek to dam back. Their object, of course, is to use the water which has, up to the present, been the feeder of the river, but they will destroy the navigation of the Murray, for a part of the year, by pushing on their policy of irrigation. That will be done is further suggested by the fact that the amount of evaporation is about 5 or 6 feet per annum. So that, if you take into account the evaporation, and measure the quantity that will be impounded, the likelihood is that there will not be a single drop of reflow of the flood waters of the Darling after the project of New South Wales is carried out. That is one of the strongest objections that we, in South Australia, have to the contemplated policy of New South Wales. Then there is also in contemplation the conservation of water by reservoirs in Victoria—that is, of water from the rivers. The official reports state that there is an irrigable area for which works are contemplated of three and a half million acres in Victoria. The Victorian Government proposed to carry out water conservation and irrigation schemes which, had they been carried out—and it is only lately that they are beginning to find that those schemes cannot be carried out—would have taken a discharge equal to about 7 feet of depth on the Murray gauge at Overland Corner. In other words, that colony would divert an amount of water about double that which is required to keep up the navigation of the river. About eight out of ten of the schemes contemplated in Victoria in 1885 are for the diversion of water from the Murray. Mere pumping schemes we could not object to. For instance, Mildura where there is 10,000 to 12,000 acres under irrigation, generally takes the water when the river is in flood, and does not take more than one-eighth of the Murray's discharge at Morgan at summer level.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Does not that water get back into the Murray—a great deal of it?
Mr. GLYNN. - I do not think it does. However, we are not much, afraid of mere pumping schemes, but we are afraid of the effect that the carrying out of those storage schemes would have on the waters of the Murray. What would be the effect, independent of navigation, on South Australia of the carrying out of the water storage and irrigation schemes contemplated by New South Wales and Victoria? The mouth of the Murray has been mentioned. There are two or three lakes near the mouth of the Murray—the Alexandria and the Albert being the two principal ones—on the waters of which about one-third of a million of sheep depend. When the river goes down the waters of those lakes become brackish. The result of the diversion of water from the Murray will be to keep the mouth of that river at a very low level, and, consequently, it will be injurious to the interests of the owners

That in the opinion of this conference the commerce, population, and wealth of Australia can be largely increased by rendering navigable and otherwise utilizing the great waters of the interior, such as the Murray, Edward, Murrumbidgee, and Darling, and that the obligation of carrying into effect the necessary works to accomplish these objects devolves primarily upon the respective Governments having jurisdiction over such rivers.

That is a true and fair statement of the position assumed by us. I only ask honorable members to act in the spirit of that conference, which very largely reflected the commercial spirit of Victoria and South Australia at the time. In 1887, the Water Supply Commissions of Victoria and New South Wales, which had been appointed to consider the question of the Murray waters, arrived at the conclusion that those two colonies should divide between them the whole of the waters of the Murray, from its source to the eastern boundary of South Australia.

Mr. LYNE. -

What commission was that?

Mr. GLYNN. -

There were two commissions—one appointed by Victoria and another by
New South Wales.

Mr. LYNE. -

They did not arrive at any such conclusion.

Mr. GLYNN. -

They did.

Mr. LYNE. -

I beg pardon; I was president of the New South Wales commission.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I challenge the honorable member; they did arrive at that conclusion.

There was a preliminary report or proposal in 1887, and South Australia remonstrated against the tenor of that report through Sir John Downer, who will be able to bear out my remarks. The minutes of that remonstrance and the terms of the report may be found in the Blue-books, which are to be seen in the Library.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

What was the purport of that report?

Mr. GLYNN. -

The two commissions were appointed to deal with the question of water conservation. Their objects were more comprehensive than that of arriving at some common means of dividing the waters of the Murray, and I am only mentioning the fact that those commissions did arrive at that conclusion, and reported or suggested that it would be advisable-I am now quoting the tenor of the proposal-to divide the whole of the waters of the Murray from its source to the eastern boundary of South Australia, and its tributaries as far as How long, between New South Wales and Victoria.

South Australia remonstrated against that, and as the result of that action and New South Wales, we appointed a commission to consult with their commissions with the view of arriving at some common basis of federal action. The obstacle to anything being done was New South Wales. Victoria was exceedingly fair in the matter. Sir Henry Parkes was approached, and he played with the question by stating that nothing would be done while Mr. Deakin, then president of the Victorian commission, was absent in England. We were led to assume that when Mr. Deakin came back a joint meeting would be held; but in the meantime Sir Henry Parkes dissolved the New South Wales commission, so that the object of South Australia in appointing a Royal commission-to have a meeting of representatives of the three colonies-was frustrated. In every instance New South Wales endeavoured to frustrate joint action. That is borne out by the correspondence attached to the report of the South Australian commission.

Mr. REID. -

In other words, we have been slow to permit your interference with something that belongs to us.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I will deal with that point later on-as to whether the Murray belongs to New South Wales exclusively or not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do the rain clouds belong to New South Wales?

Mr. SYMON. -

That is what it comes to.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

And the heavens above.

Mr. REID. -

Victoria would stick to the Yarra till her last gasp.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Apart from international law, New South Wales contends that her claim is based on Statute law. She claims under section 5 of the Constitution Act, explained by 13 and 14 Vict., chapter 59, that the whole of the water-course of the Murray from its source to the eastern boundary of South Australia, "is and shall be within the territory of New South Wales." That is the basis of the claim of New South Wales. Then there is a letter from Sir Henry Parkes claiming complete control of the Murray, and objecting to South Australia even so using the waters of the Murray as to possibly interfere with the waters of the Darling higher up, or affect the normal level of the rivers. Sir Henry Parkes was not supported in that contention by his own press.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What was his press?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I refer to the Sydney Morning Herald and the Sydney Daily Telegraph. I do not mean that these were his special organs, but I say that he was not supported by the two leading journals of New South Wales. The Herald was of opinion that it would be "a grave mistake to say the Murray is ours," while the Daily Telegraph said that "it was never intended to give New South Wales the absolute ownership of the waters of the Murray, and to deny all right of user in them to Victoria." If they look at the Constitution Act it will strike honorable members, and particularly legal members, that what is given to New South Wales is not the waters of the Murray, but the water-course. If the River Murray flowed right through the heart of Victoria, and did not touch New South Wales at all, the position would be that Victoria would own the water-course, so far as the colony could own anything which belongs to the Crown-because the bed of navigable rivers is held to be vested in the Crown, and can only be vested in the subject as a matter of temporary trust-and the granting of the water-course would not confer a grant of the waters, as against riparian owners or states lower down. Therefore this claim on the part of New South Wales as based upon the right to the water-course is unsound. It is held in international law that the right to the use of water depends not upon the right to the water-course, but upon the right to the banks of the stream.

Mr. LYNE. -

Is it not somewhere provided that New South Wales shall have the right to the water down to navigation level.

Mr. GLYNN. -

No. I do not think the honorable member can show me a single statement in the Constitution Act or in the amending Act which gives more than the water-course to New South Wales.
Mr. REID. -

You are speaking of the Murray, not of the Darling and the Murrumbidgee, whose banks belong to New South Wales.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The position is no stronger in international law in the case of the Darling. There must be a reasonable and usual flow of the river left for the riparian owners lower down.

Mr. REID. -

If there is any clear international law regulating these matters how is it that all the nations have had to agree by treaty as to the use of such rivers—take, for instance, the Rhine. In every case agreements as to the use of these rivers have been come to by treaty.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable and learned member is a lawyer, and he is not such a political innocent as not to know that between states there is no such thing as law existing, except the right of the strongest.

Mr. REID. -

If you take it that way the question is settled, because we are stronger than you are.

Mr. GLYNN. -

There is such a thing as international comity, which between civilized states has within the last 100 years been held to be as obligatory as private law.

Mr. REID. -

Has it? In China we do not see much of that.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Among civilized states the obligations of international comity have been held to be binding in decency and conscience, so far as anything without a sanction can be binding.

Mr. REID. -

How does that proposition bear upon the proposal to federalize certain water in New South Wales, which is the proposal is not a proposal to recognise the comity of nations, or the morality of water-courses, but one to federalize certain rivers which are entirely within the territory of New South Wales.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I am glad that the honorable and learned member is making his speech now, because it gives me an opportunity of replying, which I should not otherwise have. But the honorable gentleman asked what has this to do with the question? We wish to apply the principle of international comity to the dealings of New South Wales with South Australia and Victoria. We have rights which, with the sanction of private law behind them, would be enforced in a court of justice. We have a right to the flow into our territory of the waters not only of the Murray but of the Darling.

Mr. REID. -
And we are giving it to you now.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The right honorable member proposes to stop it.

Mr. REID. -
No.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Well, I suppose the Premier of New South Wales will follow the suggestions of Mr. McKinney, who, in 1893, reported upon a contemplated diversion of water by the impounding of the feeders of the Darling, which would interfere with and diminish the flow of the Murray. A matter that is lost right of in connexion with the Act amending the New South Wales Constitution Act, under which New South Wales makes its preposterous claim to the waters of the Murray-

Mr. REID. -
We make no claim to them; we have them.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Then the right honorable member wishes to exercise what is simply the right of the strongest. The New South Wales Constitution Act was amended, as is apparent from the terms boundary of New South Wales, and therefore in the future there can be no question as to within which court an offender against the Customs Acts can be tried. I think, therefore, that the claim, so far as international comity and so far as statute rights are concerned, is an exceedingly weak one, and I challenge the representatives of New South Wales to show upon what principle, or by what analogy of private right or of public comity, they can justify their attempt to diminish the reasonable flow of the Darling into the Murray. The honorable member (Mr. Gordon) has very properly gone into the principle of international law, and upon that point I will not therefore touch; but we ought not to be behind the belligerent nations of Europe in this matter. In 1814 and 1815 the principles of international comity which ought to operate in these matters between nations, and by analogy between states, were put into operation for the first time, and the Elbe and the Rhine were placed under a system of joint control for the purposes of navigation and improvements in navigation. Then in 1828, as Mr. Gordon pointed out, a similar policy was extended to the relative claims of America and Great Britain to the River St. Lawrence. In 1856 and 1857 we find such an uncivilized country as Turkey declaring the obligation in conscience of these very principles which we ask to be extended to the consideration of the Darling and the Murray question. I will quote the statement of the effect of the treaty given by Mr. Twiss in his work upon The Law of Nations considered as Independent Political Communities, and I lay emphasis upon the word "independent" because there is no sanction applying to these relations:-

The Treaty of Paris (30th March, 1856) has applied to the River Danube and its mouths the same principles of law which had been applied by the Christian Powers assembled at Vienna in 1815 to the rivers traversing or separating their respective territories, and has recorded that this arrangement with the Ottoman Porte forms part of the public law of Europe. The right of empire over any of the great arterial rivers of Europe has thus ceased to confer any exclusive privilege of navigation upon the nation which enjoys that right. On the contrary, each riverian state is under a conventional obligation to remove all obstacles to navigation which may arise in the bed of the river within its territory, and to maintain the banks and towing paths and other accessories to the navigation in such a condition as will best facilitate the circulation of the merchant vessels of all nations.

A joint commission was appointed to make regulations for navigation and river police, to remove impediments to navigation, to construct any necessary works throughout the whole course of the river, to maintain the mouths and the neighbouring parts of the sea in a navigable condition, and to levy with perfect equality on the flags of all nations dues towards expenses. These are principles in operation by treaty between the belligerent states of the old world upon which I think we should act.

Mr. REID. -

We all recognise them.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Well, I hope the right honorable member will show us how they can be put into practice, or why those obligations do not fasten upon colonies which are within lines of mutual sympathy which have been applied to the nations of Europe. If it be among the objects of federation to establish by the removal of all artificial obstacles to its natural flow perfect freedom of commerce between the colonies, and to improve by co-operation the great instruments and arteries of exchange, the federal control of the rivers must be one of its fundamental conditions. Without this federation you place it in the power of one colony, by adopting a policy directed to meet its own selfish ends, to deprive the other colonies of cheap water carriage, and thus to prevent the river-ways from being made, as they could be made without much outlay, as mighty instruments in aid of production.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

Many of the arguments which have been urged in favour of the amendment totally ignore the one cardinal aspect of the case which presents itself to the colony of New South Wales, and that is that with our control of the water we have necessarily associated the control of the adjoining land. If you take away from the colony of New South Wales its right to control the waters of the Darling, of the Lachlan, and of the Murrumbidgee, you make our land asset worth practically 50 per cent. less. Navigation may present itself to the people of South Australia as the principal point to be considered with regard to these rivers, but what we have to consider in New South Wales is the creation of products. What is the use of leaving a splendid water-way for ships to ply upon if the people alongside that water-way are deprived of the means of using their land to the best of purposes—of employing it for the production of that which the ships are intended to carry? We have in New South Wales 220,000,000 acres of land, of which about 140,000,000 acres are dependent for their water supply upon the Murray and its tributaries. If you hand over to federal control the waters of this gigantic river system without taking over the control of the land and the liabilities which attach to it you leave a divided authority, with the result that neither the land nor the water can be used to the best purpose. I undertake to say that no member of the New South Wales representation could go back to his colony and persuade the people there that federation at the price of handing over the control of our great river system is a federation which could be accepted. We know that in these colonies, and more especially in the colony of New South Wales, with its great area of pastoral lands, one great requirement is the conservation of the water. Nature has been bountiful in providing water, but man has been improvident in its use. I pay little attention to the discussion today on the subject of irrigation, because irrigation is one of those things that may perhaps come in the distant future. At the present time it does not present its possibilities to my mind with any great force. But water conservation is a matter of a different character. We do not want the water of these great rivers for the purpose of diffusing it here and there to enable wheat and other crops to be grown. We want the water to carry on an industry that is to New South Wales of material importance—the pastoral industry—with some degree of certainty, and I say that we cannot do so if any other authority is to have the power of interfering with the use of that water. Then again many of the arguments used to-day are based on a mistaken idea of what these rivers are. When you quote to me international law, when you quote authorities as to what is held to be good law as between the nations of Europe, I would say—"Give us the rivers of Europe in Australia and we shall be satisfied to have the laws of Europe; give us the rivers of America and we shall be satisfied to have the law of America." Unfortunately, the rivers of Australia are totally different in their character from the rivers of almost every country in the world. Go to many of the tributaries that have been spoken of to-day as if they were streams of running water, and I will undertake to say that all, or, at any rate, two-thirds, of the members of the Convention would cross those tributaries and not know that they were crossing a river at all. They would see simply a depression in the soil and not a drop of water there. That is the condition of many of the tributaries of the Murray, not for a quarter of the year, but for a great portion of it. We have these water-courses without the water. There is no such state of affairs in Europe or in America, where the streams are fed by snow or by a watershed, with a more bounteous rainfall than we enjoy. We have here a totally new state of affairs, and to cope with it we must have some new laws. Our laws spring from customs, from convenience, and from experience. We have a river system that is totally different from that of other parts of the world. The law will spring up from the system itself. Here it is proposed to take the River Lachlan and to deal with it. Does Mr. Gordon know that a boat has never plied on the River Lachlan from the date of the discovery of the colonies up to the present time?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Then this proposal would not affect you?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

The Lachlan is a stream which practically has no outlet excepting into the Murrumbidgee. It overflows on to a vast reed bed.

Mr. LYNE. -

They would have to cut a canal.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Yes, and if they took the water away they would ruin the country higher up.

Mr. REID. -

And leave the expense to us.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

We know that throughout Australia one of the first things to be done in order to make colonization possible is to secure the water by damming it up. Nature has done that so far as the Lachlan is concerned by means of the deposit of soil, the sedge, and the reed beds. To make that river navigable so as to carry goods, upon it to South Australia would simply be to fly in the face of all teaching as to what is best to be done in order to insure the permanent settlement of the country and to make it reproductive. Now, take the Murrumbidgee, which is partially navigable for a small portion of its length. The moment we attempted to divert any of the water of the Murrumbidgee, in order to increase the productiveness of the Riverina districts, we should be assailed with a charge of injuring the interests of the people lower down. Honorable members will bear me out in saying that if we had had during the last twelve months or two years a system by which we could have diverted some of the water running to waste from the Murray into the Riverina, we could have saved thousands dying. If we could by a system of water conservation give greater facilities for stocking and using the country, we should do much more good than by simply enabling ships to ply up and down the stream. After all, what is the great national purpose of the occupation of our country? It is to increase its productiveness and to so use the land that others may gain an honest and comfortable subsistence upon it. The moment you introduce any artificial scheme of railway construction or navigation which will interfere with the great material purposes of colonisation, you put the machinery of government to a wrong use. So long as you can make navigation subsidiary to the great purpose of colonisation and settlement, I shall be heart and soul with you in any proposal you have to submit. But to use the rivers for the carriage of products at the cost of productiveness is to put purely commercial interests above the interests of settlement.

Mr. SYMON. -
We do not propose that.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Now I will take the River Darling. Allusion has been made to the network of lakes along the Darling, which are fed by the flood waters of the Darling at certain seasons. If we did not conserve the water in those lakes, or rather if private enterprise did not do it, it would rapidly run away through South Australia into the ocean and be wasted.

Mr. GLYNN. -
It would keep up our navigation.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
The mere keeping of the water back does not interfere with navigation for a single day. Nothing that has been done in New South Wales in regard to the use of the water of the Darling has interfered with navigation. On the contrary, we have spent thousands and tens of thousands of pounds in rendering that river navigable, not for the benefit of the Government and the people of New South Wales, but largely for the benefit of the Government and the people of South Australia, who derive all the profits from the water carriage to their ports.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Mr. McKinney says in his report that Lake Menindie's reflow keeps the river up for three months.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Mr. McKinney's report was referred to the Public Works Committee of New South Wales, and it has not been adopted. It has practically been rejected by the Public Works Committee. Parliament was invited to carry out a portion of the scheme for looking the Darling but Parliament has not done so. One lock is being constructed at Bourke, and it will have the effect of making the supply of water for navigation more certain. The honorable member must know that where navigation is the principal object, the making of proper provisions for the water to escape simply makes navigation more secure. Nothing has been done by New South Wales with the deliberate intention of interfering with navigation. If we are to have a proper settlement of the land everything must be done to make the best use of the water that flows through our territory. We cannot do that by simply making the rivers available for navigation. We have, as has been pointed out with regard to Victoria, an absolute necessity existing for the diversion of the waters in the streams, but not for the absolute diversion of it so that it may never be returned to ks and weirs, and for what purpose? Simply in order to prevent the water continuing to flow down one channel. It is made to flow down several channels, and during nine months of the year the country is thus enabled to carry three or four times as much stock as before. Agriculture can also in certain limited cases be conducted profitably. Are we to stand idly by, having the control and ownership of the lands that are vested in the people of our colony, and having the responsibility of settling the people on those lands, and see taken away from us the control of that without which the lands are practically valueless-the water? Could any honorable member undertake to persuade the people of New South Wales that if a water supply were required for some country town along the Lachlan, say Forbes or Parkes, or along the Murrumbidgee, that the Federal Parliament would be as active in providing that supply as the local Government? This would be a purely local requirement, and the people would have a reasonable fear that they would not get justice from the Federal Parliament, who would have little knowledge of their requirements. What concern have the people of Western Australia or of Tasmania in the waters of the Darling? And yet this resolution only aims at the control of the rivers in New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON. -
Rivers passing through contiguous states.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
The Lachlan, the Darling, and the Murrumbidgee are certainly tributaries of another stream, and are not national rivers in such a sense that we should be asked to invite the people of Tasmania to share in the expense of making them navigable, and to take any part in the control of them. We should be absolutely unable to persuade the people of New South Wales that this would be a fair price to pay for federation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
What about the railways?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
When honorable members talk about the railways they forget this fact—that the Convention, time after time, has, by its vote, refused to make railway management or construction a matter of federal control. Having refused to relieve the Governments of the various colonies of the management of the railways, is the Convention now to ask the Government and the people of New South Wales to hand over the control of the navigation of the Darling to a Federal Government, which would use that river for the purpose of competing with the local railways? The case would have been very much stronger if the Convention had agreed to hand over the control of the railways to the Federal Parliament. We know that one of the first things that South Australia would ask the Federal Parliament to do would be to open the rivers to cheap carriage, which would compete with the railway system of New South Wales. There would be an expenditure on the part of the Federal Government for the purpose of promoting a competition with the local asset of the railways. The cheap carriage by water, aided by the federal expenditure to which New South Wales would have to contribute, would be destructive to the railways. I am quite sure that the vote that was arrived at before will be supported again by the delegates of New South Wales, because none of us could honestly go back to our constituents and recommend the adoption of a Constitution which contained a provision that would involve so great a sacrifice on the part of our colony.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
The representatives of New South Wales do the constituents of their own colony an injustice in stating so absolutely that they cannot recommend to them that which appears to be founded on the first principles of right, and which, from my experience of the people of New South Wales, I think they would be the first to agree to. So far as the law of the case is concerned, I agree with what Mr. Deakin has said. I agree that New South Wales has the control of the river within its territory. I believe that legally she can use every drop of water that is there, and I do not know of any precedent by which any other colony could interfere with her.

Mr. DOBSON. - Has the honorable member any authority for saying that?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - It is the authority of power. They have got the river and they can use it, and every other state can do the same if the remaining states will endure it. But the other states will not endure it. The preservation of the navigability of a navigable stream has become as well-understood law internationally as if it were incorporated in the Constitution of every State.

Mr. WALKER. - Suppose the stream is not navigable?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - Let us deal with one thing at a time. I first want to say something from the point of view that the stream is navigable. If we give the Commonwealth Parliament the control of navigable streams I think we have done enough, and the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) will say that we have done too much, to preserve the navigability of the navigable part of these streams and prevent the taking away of water from parts that are not navigable which would produce unnavigability in portions now navigable. That would be taken as elementary law between unfriendly nations which had no ties of brotherhood or kindly feeling. It is a recognised international right that no State should interfere with the navigability of a stream. The clause in the Bill as it was passed in Adelaide appeared to me to be founded upon an absence of any recognition of the most elementary principles of justice between antagonistic nations, and still less of kindness between those who should be kind to each other. I will take it first that this is a navigable stream.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Which?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - That which I am referring to, the control and regulation of navigable streams. I will allow my honorable friend to find out what that refers to later on.

Mr. ISAACS. - Do you assume that it is navigable in one colony only, or that it is navigable in two?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I am referring to a stream which runs through more than one state, and is navigable in more than one state.

Mr. BARTON. -

And forms a boundary between two states.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

That is quite immaterial. Like many others, I reserve the right to change my opinion upon this point; but as I am at present advised, I think it will be quite safe if we provide that the Commonwealth should have the control and regulation of navigable streams, because that would prevent the right which the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) seems to think they have in New South Wales to take the whole of the water for irrigation or any other purpose. I do not say whether they could or could not take all the water, but I understand the honorable member's argument to be founded distinctly on the right of New South Wales to take if they please every drop of water that runs through their territory. I say that, as far as actual legal and physical right is concerned, they have it.

Mr. SYMON. -

They have might but not right.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

It is legal in a strict technical sense, but it is most immoral; it would not be endured between two nations that were not friendly. I begin by saying that the control of navigable streams ought, as a matter of course, to be in the Commonwealth. I say that simply because between hostile States any interference with the navigability of streams running through more than one State would be distinctly considered as an unfriendly act which would justify war. We certainly ought not to begin our Constitution by making it possible to be so unfriendly. So far as the experience of foreign countries is concerned—leaving out of the question the different character of their rivers—all the analogies which we can get afford no justification for, at least, not providing that the Commonwealth should have the control and regulation of all navigable streams. It is very likely we ought to go further, and, for the very reasons given by the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers), that we should not go so far. That honorable member says there is no analogy between our case, in this and climate, and the cases from which the precedents are drawn. There is great force in his contention, but the conclusion that you have to derive from it is the very opposite of the one which he draws. The more and the climate, the more limited the rivers, the greater the necessity for water; the more reason there is, in justice and right, that no one state should absorb the whole of the water, and the greater necessity there is for having some fair adjustment to prevent wrong being done. The honorable member's argument brings me to identically the opposite conclusion to the one at which he has arrived, and so I think it would every member who looks at the matter from a fair point of view, and who does not too much consider his own particular interests.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

He says because the water is very valuable you have all the more right to rob it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

That is the case. Passing from that, I want to know where is the danger in all this? As far as justice is concerned, the control and regulation of navigable streams is founded on international right, and should, at the very least be embedded in any Federal Constitution. The guarantee to each colony for the reasonable use of the water for irrigation in this case recommends the same argument still further. But apart from this argument, founded on natural right and justice, I want to know where comes in the danger that my honorable friend anticipates to such an extent that he says he cannot recommend the Bill to the Parliament of New South Wales if this clause be inserted? Has the honorable gentleman no confidence in the Constitution that is going to be established, and in the Parliament that will be formed? Has he any reason to believe that it will begin by doing New South Wales or any other colony a gross and monstrous injustice? Let me point out to the honorable member at the beginning how initially strong is the position of the countries through which this river passes. This river, as has been truly said, has nothing to do with Tasmania or with Western Australia; it practically concerns only New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia. I would say to my honorable friend, where is your danger? We had proof as to where our danger was not very long ago, because when we were fighting for the first principles of international right with regard to this river, we had ten voting with us and every other soul in the Convention voted on the other side. So far as any anxiety which the New South Wales delegation ought to have at present is concerned, I think we have in this instance a very good proof of what is the real danger, that is, that in matters that do not concern the smaller states there will be a strong tendency on their part to support the larger ones. Our claim in this instance was founded on elementary right and justice. It was too clear, in my opinion, to admit of serious argument, that the control of any navigable stream within the Commonwealth ought, as a matter of course, to be in the Commonwealth Parliament. The provision limiting it and providing that the Commonwealth Parliament should have the control, but that it should begin from the boundary of New South Wales and Victoria and then run to the sea, was handing over the portion of the river that passed through South Australia, and leaving the New South Wales Government an absolute control in that portion of the stream that belonged to them. I hope that there is no such strong feeling on this subject in New South Wales as my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers) says there is.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is a strong feeling.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Then I hope it will be overcome. In New South Wales-a colony I have most affectionate feelings towards, and whose people I have no reason to do other than like exceedingly-I have not seen in my communications with them any such radical wrong-mindedness as would lead me to suppose that they want federation founded on an initial injustice, and on the establishment as law between friendly colonies of that which between rival nations would be considered a distinct act of war. I agree with practically everything that my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) said in his speech. At the present time I shall be satisfied if the words were put generally to give the Commonwealth the control and regulation of all navigable streams, because I think that that would be sufficient. But I only say that because I think that giving them the control and regulation of the navigable streams would enable them to preserve the navigability, so-that if water were taken from the tributaries to make the stream unnavigable, the Commonwealth would have the power to interfere. Keep the stream navigable, and let each riparian proprietor, each riparian state, take what it wants. simply preserving the international law which has been recognised for many a long year now, and you are not, I think, interfering with a private right.

Mr. LYNE. -

That is the law now in reference to the Murray between New South Wales and Victoria. New South Wales cannot interfere with the Murray so as to reduce the water below navigation level. That provision is contained in her Constitution Act.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

If that be so it must be altered. The question is whether we should begin our Federation by handing over to the Commonwealth a portion of a stream which belongs to one colony, and by refusing to hand over the source, at the same time leaving the source at the will and discretion of the colony in which it rises, and leaving us merely the outflow which they please to permit us to receive. I hope that this is not a matter for any feeling.

Mr. BARTON. -
Here is the provision in the Constitution which applies to the Murray.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Does it do that?

Mr. BARTON. -
It does not prescribe any level at all. It provides for the regulation of navigation between the two colonies.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
We have here what may be in the end a fruitful source of discomfort, very often petty, very likely sometimes large, but still having at its root a wrong. It is a bad thing to begin with a wrong when we have the opportunity, with all the well established law which is before us between rival nations, a means of coming to a perfect understanding and preventing future questions of dispute. Therefore it is that I sincerely hope that the representatives of New South Wales are not so prejudiced as my honorable friend says they are on this subject, and that the members of this Convention will do the best they can to educate them to a better frame of mind.

Mr. FRASER. -
I rise to say a few words on this very difficult question. I believe that if we insist upon carrying this amendment we shall still further complicate the mission which we all have so much at heart. I am satisfied that if we insist upon giving the control of all the navigable waters to the Federal Parliament the people of New South Wales will not accept the Bill. What we ought to aim at is to do the greatest good to the greatest number. I am convinced in my own mind that the waters of the river can be best utilized by irrigation. I do not say just now, I do not say during the next ten years, nor perhaps even during the next twenty years; but undoubtedly, in my opinion, the waters of these rivers can be used to better advantage by putting a dense population on the adjacent lands than by navigation. We have railways running in every direction, practically in all the colonies. In this colony we have too many of them; in the other colonies there are railways, and the river, of course, are at present competing with the railways. If you put teeming millions on the land adjacent to the Murrumbidgee, the Murray, the Darling, the Edwards, and other rivers which could be named, undoubtedly you produce an enormous quantity of things, and you thereby enable an immense population to live on the lands, which would be a much more advantageous thing than to keep open the water. The water-ways are only open for some months in the year, and practically goods go by railway all the year round. The waters of the Darling are only to some extent utilized for transit purposes. The railways do, by 99 times to 1, the traffic of the rivers-probably more than that proportion. I am only guessing at the proportion; but practically all the traffic of the colonies is carried by rail. If you provide in the Federal Constitution that all the rivers shall be kept navigable, then you shut out the possibility hereafter of these valuable lands being utilized for dense settlement. It is perfectly clear to me that New South Wales will not consent to this amendment. For thousands of miles the waters of these rivers flow through her territory entirely, and is it to be assumed that they are going to give way on this point? If they were to give way I think it would be a gracious act. I am not going to say that it would not be a gracious act. We cannot expect human nature to do a thing of that kind, and, therefore, it is hopeless to contend that they will yield this point. In Adelaide the division against the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) was 24 to 10, and I do not think the division in Melbourne is likely to be very much more in his favour than it was in Adelaide.

Mr. Howe. -

Yes, it is.

Mr. Fraser. -

I do not think so.

Mr. Lyne. -

It should not be so, at any rate.

Mr. Fraser. -

I do not think it should. I look at it from the practical stand-point-Are we going to have federation or not? If we are going to have federation, then we must get rid of these very difficult questions which are not absolutely necessary on the present occasion. I only rose to say that the question should not be pressed to a division. We have already dealt with the question, and no doubt the waterways, can be better utilized hereafter, as I have said. At present, I can assure honorable members that the waterways are not very largely used. I can quite understand South Australia being anxious to get the traffic of that vast Darling, the traffic of that vast Murrumbidgee, and possibly the traffic of the Edwards River and of the Murray River, but it would be almost impossible to get the other colonies to yield these points. Therefore, while I sympathize with South Australia, and while there is no doubt that the Murray is the natural outfall of all these waters, and that in a national sense, if we were one nation, they would be entitled to whatever traffic might come in that direction, I conceive that the difficulties in the way are so insuperable that I cannot vote for this amendment. Because I am so anxious to see federation consummated, I will not handicap the Bill by inserting amendments which I am satisfied will kill it before it is referred to the people for their acceptance.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

At Adelaide I ventured to take an attitude on this matter which was opposed to the attitude of my colleagues from Victoria, and the more I have thought on the subject the more I am convinced that the only true federal attitude is that which has been put forward by the representatives of South Australia. It seems to me that all they claim is not that New South Wales shall be deprived of the opportunity to use these waters for irrigation within reasonable limits, but that in using the waters for irrigation, within reasonable limits, they shall not deprive the River Murray of such navigability as it would have by nature, and in order to achieve that end they suggest that the matter should be wholly and unreservedly left to the control of the Federal Parliament, in which New South Wales will be represented.

Mr. LYNE. -

It is not navigable by nature.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If it is not navigable by nature, I do not think they will contend that it ought to be made navigable by art at the expense of New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON. -

They cannot claim artificial navigation.

Mr. LYNE. -

We can conserve the water with weirs and locks, and make the river navigable for all time.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

All that is contended for—and really it comes to a very narrow issue at the last—is that the whole matter shall be trusted to the Federal Parliament, and that the Federal Parliament shall be able to say what is to be done with the River Murray and its tributaries. Now, with regard to the exact words of the amendment, I think that the object of my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) will be well enough achieved if he simply uses the words the control and regulation of the waters of the River Murray and its tributaries, because the River Murray and its tributaries are an isolated phenomenon in this continent. You see a great river 2,400 miles long, with great tributaries, which touches in its course four colonies, namely, Queensland, New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia. And you see that the river draws its supplies from New South Wales and from Queensland, and from South Australia, and from Victoria. And when it is said that the River Lachlan and its water, and the Darling and its waters, and the Murrumbidgee and its waters, and so on, are our rivers—speaking of New South Wales—when I ask at what point do they become New South Wales rivers? If you look at the case of the Darling you will see that it is fed by the hills in Queensland. At what point, then, does it become New South Wales property? I say that you cannot sever a river from its tributaries, any more than you can sever an engine from its wheels, or a man from his arms. Do these waters become exclusively New South Wales property when they are in the clouds in the form of rain, or in the Queensland hills in the form of creeks? Is the Darling the property of New South Wales when it forms a part of that colony, or when it empties its waters into the Murray and passes through South Australia? The fact is that there is an attempt to make an artificial distinction between the Darling and the Murray, when there is no such distinction. The Darling is the Murray, and the Murray is the Darling, to a large extent. If the claim made by New South Wales be valid, New South Wales has a right to stop up the waters of the Darling and of the Lachlan, and of the Edwards, and of the Murrumbidgee, and monopolize them for herself; and Victoria has a right also to stop up the waters of the Campaspe and the Loddon, and keep them for herself. And if this is to be done, what is to become of the Murray? Is the Murray to be wiped out? And if the two colonies, New South Wales and Victoria, have a right to dictate as to whether the Murray is to become the mere bed of a dried-up stream, it will become simply foetid in its odour—almost as bad as our own River Yarra. What I will submit is that it is quite true that of the colonies represented at this Convention, only three are at present interested, and Tasmania and Western Australia have no direct interest in the Murray and its tributaries. In that respect I think that the representatives of Tasmania and Western Australia may be regarded as a sort of neutral arbitrators, and I think we may safely appeal to the representatives of those colonies, who are not so directly interested in the matter as the other colonies, to act as arbitrators, and throw their votes on that side upon which they think justice lies, regardless of consequences. My honorable colleague (Mr. Fraser) has said that if we vote in a certain way and succeed, we shall lose New South Wales from the federation. Well, I know this—we have already in this Constitution incorporated a number of provisions which New South Wales, it is likely, will not be able to accept; and as long as my honorable friend (Mr. Fraser) found that those provisions suited his own views, he said—"Let us vote against New South Wales views," but when he finds that the particular view is one that suits his own, he turns round and says—"Vote on my side or we shall lose New South Wales from the Federation." I am as eager for federation as any one, but I intend to vote on the simple principle of justice without regard to consequences in this matter, and although I know that there are a number in Victoria who think that this proposal will be injurious to Victorian interests, I say, as we are legislating for Australia, as a whole, it is our business to sink local interests and do what is right. There are, though, a few matters that have to be considered, and one is that Victoria and New South Wales have spent a large amount of money in surveying and making reservoirs for the conservation of the waters of the tributaries of the Murray-reservoirs on the Campaspe, the Loddon, and other tributaries. But for these reservoirs I am informed-I am putting it as strongly as I can against myself-the volume of water in the Murray would not be so much as it is; and it is said-"Here is South Australia coming in and asking to get the benefit of the River Murray, which is benefited by what has been done in New South Wales and Victoria; and she asks for this advantage without paying a farthing."

Mr. FRASER. -

The volume of the water in the Murray would be larger at times, but not so continuous as it is, except for this water conservation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But I should misunderstand the claim of South Australia and her representatives if I were to say that I thought that she wants to get the benefit of the expenditure incurred by New South Wales and Victoria without sufficient recompense.

Mr. GORDON. -

There should be a just apportionment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There should, as Mr. Gordon says, be a just apportionment, and I do not think there is a desire to rob Victoria and New South by reason of the expenditure incurred by New South Wales and Victoria. I am willing personally to trust the Federal Parliament in any adjustment between the colonies in establishing the control of the River Murray and its tributaries. I would say that the Federal Parliament should make an assessment of the amount of permanent increase of value that has been effected, and give back to New South Wales and Victoria what has been contributed. I do not think that more should be asked for than that. I admit that there is a secondary use for the water which has complicated this problem in Australia. The secondary use is, in consequence of our dry climate, for purposes of irrigation.

Mr. FRASER. -
It is the primary use.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is, at all events, a use so important that we cannot ignore it. But while admitting that irrigation is so important for the development of these colonies, I ask: Is it the irrigation of New South Wales lands alone, or is it the irrigation of Australia, we are looking to? I say it is the latter. There are two uses—two great national uses—to which the waters of a river can be put. The one is navigation and the other is irrigation. And that is the claim, as I understand, which is made by this amendment, namely, that the use of the waters for both purposes shall be put under the control of a body which will administer them for the benefit of the whole continent. The question does not affect Tasmania or Western Australia but it affects the other colonies represented at this Convention, and that is a strong reason for thinking that when it comes before a Federal Parliament in which Tasmania and Western Australia will be represented, the fairness and sense of equity of these colonies will induce them to see to it that no particular colony gets the benefit of the River Murray as against the others. Now, I was particularly anxious to speak upon this question because of the position I took up in Adelaide, with some hesitation—a position which had been taken up after such study as I have been able to give the subject. But I would submit to Mr. Gordon, who has introduced the amendment, that if he looks closely at the history of the development of the navigation laws in the United States he will find that this clause would be much better out of this Bill altogether, for his purpose, than in it. I mean to say that the clause as it stands would be better out. If this clause were out of the Bill altogether—as far as I have been able to read from Storey in his History of Cases upon the Constitution—under such a provision as the first sub-section of clause 52, affecting the regulation of trade and commerce with other countries, it has been held that Congress has full power to preserve the navigability of different rivers between the different states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That would not satisfy Mr. Gordon.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It would to a great extent. But I say if, on the other hand, you leave these words as they stand, there is a danger that the powers which are included in the first sub-section will be considerably cut down. I need not explain to Mr. Gordon, as a lawyer, that the expression of this control of the rivers in the one instance will lead to the construction that there is no control given in the first subsection; so that, assuming that the honorable member is beaten upon his amendment now before the Chair, I suggest that he should vote against the whole of this sub-section (31), and leave the matter to the operation of the first sub-section, which already exists. It may not give-all my honorable friend wants, but it will go much further in his direction than if the clause is left as it stands. I have, therefore, to say that so far as I am concerned, I shall give any assistance in my power to Mr. Gordon and his colleagues in the representation of South Australia in the attainment of their object—namely, to see that the great River Murray and its tributaries, which cannot be severed from the Murray by any natural process, shall be controlled for Australian purposes, as it is an Australian river.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I would suggest to my honorable friend the leader of the Convention that this debate might now be allowed to be adjourned. There is a great deal more to be said upon the subject. I wish to address the committee myself.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think it is right that we should now discontinue our sitting, and therefore I will consent to adjourn at this stage.

Progress was then reported.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I beg to move—

That so much of the standing orders be suspended as will enable a motion to be proposed without notice.

The motion I have to propose is with regard to one of our absent members.

The motion was agreed to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I beg to move—

That one week's leave of absence be granted to Mr. Brunker, on account of illness.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at fifty-eight minutes past four o'clock, until Monday, 24th January.
Monday, 24th January, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill—Foundation Day.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.
COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjournment from Friday, 21st January) was resumed on sub-section (31) of clause 52-
The control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia—Omit "river," insert "rivers."

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales).—
The clause which it is proposed to amend was the result of a somewhat prolonged and very full discussion of the whole question in Adelaide. That result, which was to a certain extent a compromise, and certainly involved a concession on the part of New South Wales, was arrived at by a majority of 15; the division was 10 to 25. I do not state this (Sir Richard Baker) in any way as an objection to the matter being re-opened. It is a matter of exceedingly grave importance. But I think that the fact of the division, and the discussion which took place before the division, should not be left out of consideration. I have said that this is a matter of grave importance, but it is a matter of varying importance to the different colonies. It is a matter of comparatively minor importance to Tasmania and Western Australia; they have no direct concern in it. It is a matter of what, I think, I shall be able to satisfy the Convention is of potential, almost problematical, importance to Victoria and South Australia. But if this amendment is carried it is a matter of immediate and vital importance to New South Wales. So, sir, I wish, in view of that fact, to place as shortly as I can again the view of New South Wales before the Convention. My honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) in the very interesting and admirable speech which he addressed to us, based his claim to carry this amendment, in the first place, on the ground that his position was absolutely justified in law. He appealed to natural law first of all, and then to international law; and, finally, he appealed to the federal sentiment, which, as he knows, actuates every member of this Convention. I hope that my honorable friend will pardon me if I treat very lightly his appeal, to natural law. The honorable member asked whether there was any reason why the River Murray should belong to New South Wales any more than the sun which brightens or the air which sweetens its waters. Now, that is a very pretty rhetorical figure, but by the same process of reasoning I have heard gentlemen satisfy themselves that there is no such thing as property at all, that "all property is robbery," and that we ought to "begin again." Well, it may be that in some state of society with which I think we have no immediate concern these arguments will prevail. But we have to take the world as it is at the present time, and the existing condition of things is that there is a law regarding property, and that law regarding property is settled by certain well-known rules. Fortunately, it is no part of our business and no part of our duty to those who sent us here to decide this question upon any fanciful consideration of natural law, but to take the facts as they are. Now, the honorable member, perhaps, came a little bit nearer to the real issue when he raised the question that by international law the right to the control of these rivers was in every country through which they passed. I do not concede that that is the law. I say that, in regard to international law, there is no clearly-settled law that any rights over rivers are given between adjoining States. And let me say here, as the honorable member referred to the view which appears to prevail that we are treating the other colonies—South Australia and Victoria—as if they were foreign States, that in law they are foreign States.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That may be termed unnatural law as contrasted with natural law.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

We may recognise that it is the feeling of comity between different communities that brings us here to do the work which has been assigned to us. But with regard to any question of law and right these colonies are foreign nations; and you must regard the matter as if you were dealing, say, with countries on the Continent of Europe in regard to concerns which might come to the issue of war over any question of international right. We must deal with this matter, in the first place, on the ground of what the different rights of the colonies are. It may be, and it is the case, that we are countries which, situated as some of the European countries are in regard to the Danube River, on different parts of the stream, the keeping open of that stream for purposes of navigation is so imperious a necessity for all parties concerned, that it has become almost a matter of international recognition that it is against the laws of civilization-

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Against the "comity of nations."
Mr. OCONNOR. -

Against the comity of nations, as my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) says, to interfere with the river for that purpose. And no doubt that is at the bottom of all those conventions which have been arranged from time to time for the control of such rivers. But my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) wishes to go a step beyond that.

Mr. GORDON. -

On the same principle.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

My honorable friend wishes to take up this position—that not only does international law give one country a right to free highway over all the streams of this river, but a right to enter and control every stream and every watercourse which feeds that highway of navigation. I say without any hesitation that there is no international law which supports that position, and I say further that it, would be an absurdity if there were any such international law. Consider for one moment the case in Europe alluded to by my honorable friend. Can it be imagined in the case of the Danube, for instance, that contentions or commissions that have been appointed to regulate the navigation of the Danube in the interests of all the parties concerned, would be given the control of every mill-stream and every feeder of a mill-stream all through Austria? It would involve hostile relations at once.

Mr. SYMON. -

Mr. Gordon does not ask that.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

But I shall point out that what he is asking involves that if it means anything. I think that the committee will see the strong distinction that there is between the international rights which are given over the navigation of the highway of commerce passing through different States and that other right to interfere with the sources which feed that river—that is to say, with the tributaries of it—which is involved in the amendment sought to be made by my honorable and learned friend.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Suppose the tributaries are necessary to keep up the full flow of the river?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

My honorable friend will pardon me if I pass on now and answer his interjection in the course of my speech. The position, therefore, as regards international law is open to the distinction I have pointed out. Now, let me take the matter as it is, according to the law which we claim regulates the rights of the different parties—New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia. At one time, inasmuch as all the colonies in the first place belonged to Great Britain, Great Britain, in carving out these colonies, might, if she thought proper, have allotted their territories in such a manner as to preserve the rights over these rivers in anyway she thought fit. She might have applied the same law of riparian rights in regard to the relations of these colonies with one another as exists in the case of individuals. But she did not do that. She granted the full right of self-government and control over the waste lands of these various colonies absolutely to the Legislatures of the different colonies. Therefore, you must take their rights as if they were the rights of communities self-governing in the most absolute sense with regard to these waters. There is one exception, and that is with regard to the position of New South Wales and Victoria. In the Constitution Act of New South Wales (18th and 19th of Vict., chap. 54) it is provided that one of the boundaries between New South Wales and Victoria shall be a straight line drawn from Cape Howe to the nearest source of the River Murray—that is important to notice—and that another boundary shall be from the river to the eastern boundary of the colony of South Australia. And it is further provided that the two colonies of New South Wales and Victoria shall have authority to make regulations for the navigation of the river by vessels belonging to the two colonies respectively. The rights, therefore, which were given when these colonies were constituted under the statute were these: That in regard to the Murray, which is the boundary between New South Wales and Victoria, those colonies are given full rights in respect of the control of navigation. With regard to all rivers inside New South Wales, the control of her territory, and the absolute grant of that control to her Legislature, gives her exactly the same rights which any self-governing community would have in regard to those streams. Now, there can be no question that those rights are absolute. Even though they were modified by international law, they give the absolute right to the use of the water under any circumstances whatever. And, remember, we are dealing here with this question on a legal basis only. Now, the rights which I have specified are the rights which New South Wales is bound to conserve for New South Wales, except in so far as it may be necessary for the purpose of federation to give any of them up or to make any concession in regard to them. We cannot forget that obligation. However desirous we may be to concede everything that will bring about the union of these colonies, we have no right to discuss this question upon any other ground except the absolute position in fact of New South Wales. What have we done? In pursuance of our desire to bring about a federation which shall have all the essentials of union, we have been perfectly willing from the first that the free use of these waters for the purposes of navigation should be handed over to the Commonwealth.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Which waters?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The waters not only of the Murray but of every navigable stream in New South Wales connected with the Murray system.

Mr. GORDON. -

The honorable member contested that in Adelaide.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I beg the honorable member's pardon. I shall show him that the Bill as it stands now gives a right to the control of the navigation not only of the Murray but of every portion of the navigable rivers of New South Wales connected with the Murray system.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is under the general clause.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes. I am not sure that the clause which the honorable member wishes to amend does not cut down that power, if it has any effect at all. We were willing to give this concession, and we have done it. From the comments made upon this matter both in the Convention and outside, I do not think that the full extent of the rights given under this power to regulate commerce are appreciated. Fortunately, we are not without authorities upon the question. There have been numberless decisions in America as to the rights which are given by the power to regulate commerce, and, inasmuch as the American Constitution has been interpreted upon principles of British law applied by the great jurists of America, it is only reasonable to suppose that our Judges in interpreting our Constitution will be guided very much by the same principles. Although there are certain

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does the honorable member think that the 1st sub-section would give power to the Federal Parliament to maintain the state rivers in a condition for navigation?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Beyond all question I do, and I hope I shall be able to satisfy the Convention on the point. In America the decisions have gone to this extent: They hold there that the control of navigation implies the power to remove obstacles to navigation. For instance, the commission which would have charge of this matter would be empowered to remove a weir in any river under the control of the Commonwealth which was an obstacle to navigation, or to remove a bridge which absolutely impeded navigation. A great many decisions have been given in America which absolutely settle this point. Not only do these principles apply to rivers which are boundaries between states; they also apply to rivers which are connected with such rivers, even though they may be entirely within one state. For instance, there is the case of the River Ohio. In regard to that river it has been decided that, although it is entirely within one state, yet, inasmuch as it is connected with the great system of water highways by which trade passes from one state to another, it is on that account under the control of the United States so far as it is navigable.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There is no attempt there to distinguish tributaries from main rivers.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No. Wherever a river is navigable, there the jurisdiction of the United States extends. I am willing to apply that principle here in the fullest possible way, that not only wherever the Murray is navigable, but wherever the Darling and the Murrumbidgee are navigable from their connexion with the main channel, they should come under the control of the Commonwealth, and be subject to its fullest powers for the keeping open of navigation at all times.

Mr. GLYNN. -

You cannot improve the rivers under these decisions.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

There I think the honorable member is mistaken. Not only does the power involve the right to keep open navigation, and to remove obstructions; it also involves the right to improve navigation and to make new channels for the purposes of navigation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is implied in the Bill as it stands.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes. I do not wish to refer to these matters in detail; but there is an extract from a judgment of Chief Justice Marshall, which honorable members will find in Hare and in Baker's Comments on the Constitution, but upon which I cannot lay my hands just now, which shows to what length this power extends. I have made these statements after a very careful investigation of the whole question of law, and I think the Convention will believe that the opinion I have given is the best I can arrive at upon the matter, looking at it neither from the point of view of New South Wales, nor of any of the other colonies, but stating the law as I find it laid down by the best authorities. These authorities go as far as this: That under the power to regulate commerce the right is given to regulate the navigation of every stream, not only where that stream flows between two colonies, but wherever navigation is possible. There is a right to protect that navigation from any impediments, and beyond that there is also a right to improve channels, and to make new channels for the improvement of navigation. I ask whether the granting of this power does not fulfil to the fullest possible extent the obligations which we are under here in entering into this Federation? Does it not fulfil to the greatest possible extent the whole obligations of international law But we have gone beyond that, and in the sub-section now under discussion, we have given not only the control of navigation so far as the Murray is concerned, but also the use of the waters of the Murray, a right which was given expressly for the purpose of enabling the commission which is to manage these matters to allow the water to be used for the purpose of irrigation.

Mr. GORDON. -

The clause gives you a larger concession than that which you are asking for.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The commerce clauses give control of navigation only; they do not affect irrigation. But the addition of the words "the use of the waters thereof;"
which were put in advisedly and as a compromise between what I may call the extreme views of the honorable member, Mr. Gordon, and some of those who support him, and the views of the representatives of New South Wales, was made expressly that in regard to one portion of the waters in dispute the federal authority might have the right not only of navigation but of use for irrigation. The clause therefore gives now in regard to that portion of the Murray which flows between New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia the use of the water for any purpose which may be wished. Let me point out for a moment what this means. As we all know, the matter of irrigation is of infinite importance to Australia, but in its actual working irrigation is in its infancy. We know very little about it.
Expensive experiments have been made in some of the colonies, but the way in which the irrigation practice and work of other countries is to be applied to the unusual conditions which obtain in Australia is a matter which is very much involved in doubt. So far as our colony is concerned, the latest advice we have had upon the subject from Colonel Home, whose experience in India entitled him to speak with the greatest authority, is not of a very cheering nature.
We have been advised to move slowly. Therefore, our experience in regard to irrigation is vague and indefinite. We know that irrigation will be a very good thing if we can bring it about, but how to bring it about in a way in which it will be effective, and not ruinous in cost, we have yet to decide. But, whatever we may know or not know in regard to irrigating, we are sure that the most important factor is the possession of sources of supply from mountain regions. In giving the control of the waters of the Murray, we give control of that portion of our river system which, of all the rivers in Australia, has the best collecting ground. The boundary of New South Wales, as I have pointed out, extends from the nearest source of the Murray to Cape Howe. The first tributaries of the Murray are in the very heights of the mountains, and collect supplies at altitudes which are absolutely essential to any permanent supply for irrigation purposes, so that this concession involves the highest and best sources of water supply which exist in Australia. But my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) is not satisfied with this. He wants to go beyond it and to give the commission which is to control the navigation of the Murray, the control of the tributaries of the Murray, or, in the alternative, the control of the Murrumbidgee, the Lachlan, and the Darling which, of course, practically means the same thing. Before I leave this matter I would like to deal with a point to which the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) referred, and that is, as to the control of the rivers where they come into competition with the railways. I would point out to my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Deakin) that the clauses in this Bill which constitute the Inter-State Commission give the Inter-State Commission the control of rivers for the purpose of enforcing and carrying out the provisions of the Constitution. That Inter-State Commission, if constituted as provided in the Bill, would, therefore, be not only an Inter-State Commission for the purpose of controlling railways, but also for the purpose of controlling and managing and regulating navigation. In its hands also would be vested the control of such rights with regard to irrigation as are involved in the sub-section I have referred to over the portion of the Murray in which all the three colonies are directly concerned. To go to the extent indicated by Mr. Deakin would be a long stretch of any legislative authority. The business of the carrier being a public business is always open to control by legislation, but I know of no law in any country which has gone beyond this-to see that the rates charged are reasonable, that they do not favour particular localities or persons or classes of goods. Further than that it would not be reasonable to go. You could very well imagine a state of things in which within all these lines a competition would be opened up on the rivers that would interfere with the railways. That is a matter that we must leave to the future. It cannot be discussed now. But the very power is given with regard to the control of the rivers which the honorable member desires, and it would enable the Federal Parliament to legislate in the directions he suggests.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Does not New South Wales oppose the Inter-State Commission altogether?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not know that it does. We have not come to the discussion of that question yet.

Mr. BARTON. -

The Inter-State Railway Commission-I have always supported it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I heard a good many arguments against it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is a very debatable matter. It cannot be dealt with now. I am merely pointing out that if the Bill stands as it we have already constituted a body with a power to carry out the views expressed by Mr. Deakin.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Only to a very limited extent.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Quite as far as would be reasonable, I think. Now, as I have said, the rights which are asked for by Mr. Gordon involve the control of every stream which is a tributary of the tributaries of the rivers of New South Wales, and I think I shall be able to satisfy the Convention that that must be so. It is quite evident that the control of this question of irrigation, if it is to be vested in the Commonwealth, must be placed in the hands of some commission, some body that will be able to deal with it.

Mr. GORDON. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, I think that will be admitted. If not, it will be in the hands of the Executive Government of the Commonwealth. A power to manage and regulate irrigation must of necessity involve a power to manage and control the supplies of water. Of what use would it be to give the right of controlling the Murrumbidgee, the Darling, and the Lachlan for the purposes of irrigation if there was to be no control over the sources of supply? Of what use would it be to construct weirs, dams, and other works in the rivers for the purposes of irrigation if it was in the power of the local authorities and of individuals to cut off the supplies which feed those rivers? I say, therefore, that the right of control for the purposes of irrigation must involve the following out to its sources of all the water which feeds these tributaries and which makes them useful.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Does not that indicate the necessity of striking out this arbitrary line-"where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales"?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not think it does. I do not see what application the honorable member's interjection has to my argument.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I am pointing out that there is a point beyond which the Federal Parliament can have no control.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Precisely. I have pointed out that that is as far as I, at all events, am prepared to go in representing New South Wales.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The sub-section does not appear to go as far as you are prepared to go. Mr. Gordon, it seems to me, desires to make it go as far as you are prepared to go.

Mr. GORDON. -

No; the sub-section is all right.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I am satisfied with the sub-sect

they are navigable as highways, but also that you should enter into every corner of New South Wales from which the water comes which supplies the sources of these streams, you are asking for something which cannot be granted, without giving you the control of the value of the land and of the settlement of New South Wales territory.

Mr. BARTON. -

It would be the same as federalizing our lands.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It would, because the value of the land is inextricably mixed up with the value of the water supply to it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

All conditions would apply to lands; all circumstances affect their value.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, there is this marked difference; that in controlling a highway of commerce for the purposes of federation it is necessary that commerce should have free play wherever the waters are navigable. That is all you want. When you ask for powers to use the waters in another way—in a way which would affect locally every acre of land in New South Wales—you are asking for more than the necessities of federation demand, and for more than can, in view of the vested rights of New South Wales, possibly be conceded.

Mr. GLYNN. - Suppose the local use of the water destroys navigation; what then?

Mr. OCONNOR. - As I have said, the control of navigation extends to the control of the water-ways.

Mr. GLYNN. - Would it stop you from keeping back the water?

Mr. OCONNOR. - No, it would not. The honorable member speaks on this question as if he were dealing not with a friendly power, not with a state that was willing to enter into arrangements such as might be necessary for the fair use of the water, but with a power that was intending deliberately to cut off every drop of water which flows down those rivers at the present time.

Mr. HOLDER. - A dry river bed is not much good for navigation.

Mr. KINGSTON. - New South Wales has not shown much anxiety to agree in the matter.

Mr. OCONNOR. - No, under present circumstances it has not. I will point out now to the Convention the justification for what I said at the opening of my remarks, and that is that the interest which Victoria and South Australia have in this matter is merely problematical.

Mr. SYMON. - Oh dear, no!

Mr. OCONNOR. - What has been the history of irrigation up to the present time? The only two cases in which irrigation to any large extent prevails upon this system of rivers taking it right through are Renmark, in South Australia, and Mildura, in Victoria.

Mr. KINGSTON. - We have ten other settlements in South Australia.

Mr. OCONNOR. - That makes the argument all the stronger. The honorable member says there are ten other irrigation settlements. Has there been any diminution as yet of the supply of water to them or to the other irrigation settlements in Victoria? Is there any possibility so far as we have seen of these supplies being diminished to any material extent.

Mr. GORDON. -

If there is no such possibility, why are you afraid of the amendment?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

For this reason: That I object to handing over to the control of a commission of the Commonwealth the management of that which makes the lands of New South Wales valuable and fertile.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It has the same effect with us.

Mr. HOWE. -

Yes; what about the other colonies?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Now, I have pointed out to the Convention what I consider to be the right of this matter. I have pointed out the extent to which we have gone already, which, I think, is a very great extent. I would ask, considering what has taken place in the past, whether there is any reasonable probability of the rights of any of the other colonies interested being prejudicially affected by any scheme of irrigation which we may introduce in New South Wales? Surely the comity and good feeling between the states after federation will not be less than it is now. If it is necessary, as it may be, to arrive at some modus vivendi with regard to the use of the water for irrigation purposes, is there any reason to suppose that a fair arrangement will not be made? For that reason I was very much struck with the suggestion of Mr. Deakin that, in view of the immense possibilities of irrigation, in view of the necessity which may arise of dealing with irrigation throughout Australia in one comprehensive scheme, it might be advisable to give the Commonwealth power to take over this question with the consent of the states, if that is not already implied clearly enough, although I think it is in the provisions of this Constitution. I, for my part, would be quite willing to make it plain that power is given to the Commonwealth to take over, with the consent of any state or states, and upon such terms as may be arranged, the control of any irrigation scheme. If that were done it would be possible to conserve all existing rights, including the rights which New South Wales has already granted to her own people, and to deal with the matter upon a fair basis. If some clause of that kind were inserted it ought to satisfy every reasonable person who looks at this matter from the point of view not of remote possibility, but of actual right and fact.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That would give either House of the New South Wales Parliament power to block it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No doubt it would give New South Wales power, by its Parliament, to refuse to assent to any such proposal. But let me remind the honorable member that we have these rights now, but we are giving you rights very much larger than you ever possessed before—the right of navigation over the whole of our navigable waters; we are giving rights of irrigation for the purposes of the Commonwealth, for that purpose which directly affects all of us; and that is all you can reasonably ask for. To ask for more is to ask for what is beyond the necessities of federation and the requirements of international law. I only wish to say, in conclusion, that I hope those honorable members who are not directly interested in this question will remember that it is a dangerous thing to overload the Federation with more duties and responsibilities than ought necessarily to be put upon it. Every additional load and additional responsibility which you place upon it is not only a difficulty to us in future, but a difficulty in some of the colonies in carrying this measure. We in New South Wales have difficulties enough to contend with, and since the settlement of this matter by the vote in Adelaide, possibly we have a further difficulty to contend with. I ask honorable members to consider whether we have not gone as far as can be fairly expected, and to remember that if you ask us to go further—that if you by a majority in this Convention carry something which we cannot possibly advise New South Wales to accept—you are placing a difficulty needlessly in the way of federation, and a difficulty which it ought not to be subjected to. As the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) appealed to the federal spirit here, I also appeal to the federal spirit. I ask honorable members to be satisfied with what is fair and reasonable, and not to expect to get everything their own way, but to remember that we also have to deal with rights and interests, and that we must not be expected, even for the sake of a federal union, to give up more than the people of New South Wales are prepared to concede.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

How far are you prepared to go, so that perhaps we may be able to meet you?

The clause is already in the draft as it is. That clause was the result of discussion; it was carried after a large division, and it represents the concession by New South Wales of the rights of navigation over the whole of the navigable waters of the Murray and rivers connected with the Murray, whether in New South Wales or not. It gives the absolute use and control of the waters of the Murray, not only for navigation but for irrigation purposes. That is the utmost to which I can go, although I am quite willing to accede to the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) that some clause might be inserted which will give the Commonwealth the opportunity, by the consent of the state, to take over the use of the waters of any state or groups of states for the purposes of irrigation. That, in a few words, is the position I take up.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The question put by the honorable member (Sir George Turner) is a very pertinent one, and we are indebted to the further explanation given by the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) in relation to the solution which seems to be apparent to his own mind of this very difficult question. It is especially important, because the amendment moved by the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) is really a verbal amendment; it raises only the general question as to whether a larger federal control shall be given over the great river system of the continent, or whether that shall be left to all the difficulties and differences that have already arisen, and which would intensify the difficulties and differences which may arise in the future. My honorable friend has not suggested precisely what is wanted to accomplish the purpose we have in view, and it is probable that the clause as it stands or the suggested amendment from South Australia may have to be recast. If that be the case we shall have an opportunity as this matter goes more into detail of meeting the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) in any suggestion which he may desire to put forward with the view of solving this difficulty, and not only of meeting it, but of dealing with it in the broad and federal spirit which I am sure animates every member of this Convention in dealing with one of the most difficult subjects to be disposed of in connexion with this scheme we are endeavouring to elaborate. Without committing myself absolutely to any mode by which elect is to be given to what is proposed, I say in general terms that I am in favour of, and intend to struggle for, a larger control, a wider power of doing justice, in the Federal Parliament up to, at any rate, the measure of the maintenance of the existing navigability of these great rivers. That is the measure which I have in view. The honorable member (Mr. O'Connor), in his exhaustive speech from the point of view of New South Wales, said he was perfectly willing that there should be free play given wherever the waters of the rivers are navigable. That is the whole distinction which my honorable friend, rather lightly, if I may venture to say so, passed over. Our desire is to keep them navigable. We desire that the Federal Parliament shall have and shall exercise such a control over all these rivers that navigation below shall not be impeded and lessened.

Mr. WISE. - Has New South Wales ever impeded the navigation?

Mr. SYMON. - I do not kno

Mr. HIGGINS. - They want to have their hands free to interfere if they think fit.

Mr. SYMON. - That is the position.

Mr. REID. - A very advantageous position to be in in reference to something which does belong to you.

Mr. SYMON. - Not from a federal point of view.

Mr. REID. - We are in that position.

Mr. SYMON. - The honorable member is putting the matter as it strikes his mind that these rivers belong to New South Wales. That is a great mistake. The honorable member says "We have got them." We all know that the honorable member is a statesman of the very first power, an orator of the very highest rank; but be is also a lawyer, and I know what he would say if an upper riparian proprietor on being asked to let go the waters in a stream passing through his property in order to give water to the house, the cattle, and the crops of a proprietor lower down said - "I will do nothing of the kind; the waters are my property; I have got them and I intend to stick to them." I am afraid that would not be looked upon as a very satisfactory answer to the claim of the man whose crops and cattle were perishing for water. Then the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) said that it was an entirely different position to look upon the relations of these colonies in connexion with rivers, because we were all friendly, compared with what it would be if we were unfriendly or hostile states. Now, we desire to keep friendly; we desire to place under the control of the Federation the settlement of all possible difficulties in order that these things shall not bring about difficulties and animosity, and possibly cause strife, in the future of this great Federation. Then the honorable member said we were not to overload the Constitution we are seeking to frame. If there is one subject more than another which ought to be embodied in this Constitution it is the control of these inter-colonial rivers in which two or more states are interested, and the perfect navigability of which, besides the use of them for purposes of irrigation, is of essential value to the whole national welfare. The question is one of very great gravity and importance; we have to face it, and, the sooner we deal with it and finally settle it the better. It intimately concerns the three colonies of South Australia, New South Wales, and Victoria. The honorable member says it vitally concerns New South Wales. That we shall all of us concede. But he is mistaken when he says it less vitally concerns South Australia. It concerns South Australia more vitally and in a higher degree than New South Wales.

Mr. WISE. -

But as regards South Australia we propose to leave things as they are; while in regard to New South Wales you wish to introduce totally new conditions.

Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable member will have an opportunity of pointing that out. How does that alter the position with regard to New South Wales?

Mr. WISE. -

This amendment will.

Mr. SYMON. -

Not at all. My honorable friend seems to think that we, in South Australia, are seeking to despoil New South Wales of everything.

Mr. WISE. -

It looks like it.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend will perhaps point that out. We are not seeking to abstract one single drop of river water to which they are entitled. We are not seeking to abstract a single inch of their soil. All we ask is that they shall place under the control of the Federation those rivers which they say are their property, the waters of which they say they can do what they please with, in order that those lower down the stream shall not be subject to injustice. That is all we ask. My honorable friends are taking an entirely mistaken view of the attitude of South Australia and those who are supporting their representatives on this question. Of course, it is our duty to respect the claims of New South Wales, as we do; but whilst we do that it is equally our duty to maintain our opinion. When it is said that this is a question which is vitally interesting to New South Wales and less vitally interesting to South Australia, I beg to point out to my honorable friend that it is deeply interesting to South Australia. It deeply affects us, because we have the best and most available part of the river for navigation, and also because we are entitled to use it for irrigation.

Mr. LYNE. -
Why should not we be entitled to use it for irrigation?

Mr. SYMON. -
New South Wales will be entitled to use it for irrigation.

Mr. LYNE. -
Not under this amendment.

Mr. SYMON. -
The honorable member is again doing a grievous injustice to us. We are not seeking to take a single atom away from New South Wales to which it is entitled.

Mr. LYNE. -
The question is-What are you going to entitle us to?

Mr. SYMON. -
No, it is not. We acknowledge the rights of New South Wales to the fullest extent. All that we say is-"You are going to set up a great Federation, a Parliament which is to be empowered to deal with all inter-colonial subjects. Let that Parliament deal with this question, upon which you and we cannot come to an arrangement." That is the whole essence of the subject. What is it we have got? We have got a navigable river, and not only a navigable river, but a navigable river with reasonable use of its waters for irrigation in our colony as well as in the other colonies. That, I may tell the honorable member-if you are putting it on the plane of property-is the right or property that we possess. We have a navigable river with the right to the reasonable use of its waters for irrigation. You have also a navigable river with the right to the reasonable use of its waters for irrigation, and those two rights are co-equal, as, I think, Mr. Deakin put it the other day. If we are to give up to the Federal Parliament the control of the river within our territory as far as we are concerned, we are asking New South Wales not to do one ha'porth more. And it seems to me that really a great deal of unnecessary fuss has been made about this subject. Certain tributaries of this river are in New South Wales. We do not seek to take them away.

Mr. LYNE. -
South Australia is creating the unnecessary fuss.

Mr. SYMON. -
No; New South Wales has been making a fuss on the point as to whether they are prepared, in order that this matter may be made absolutely clear, to hand over the control of these rivers to the Federal Parliament. Now, the tributaries of the River Murray are as much a portion of that river-their waters are as much a part of the Murray waters-as if, instead of being supplied from these tributaries, they were supplied from the clouds above. But if these tributaries are disconnected, if canals are cut, and if the waters of these tributaries are withdrawn, then the whole of the navigability of the Murray lower down, and the whole of the right of South Australia to the reasonable use of the water of that river for irrigation, will be destroyed.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
If canals are cut, they cannot take the water out of the watershed; it will come back to the river again.

Mr. SYMON. -
It depends on what they do with the water when they get it away. Still, I do not wish to discuss this matter from the point of view of the extent of the rights to be exercised. The representatives of South Australia do not wish to diminish the rights of New South Wales in any way whatever so long as the rights of South Australia are absolutely maintained. I will only say, in reply to Mr. O'Connor's question as to what our right is, that a riparian state higher up a navigable river cannot use or divert the water of that navigable river, either bonâ fide or wantonly, so as to prejudicially interfere with or destroy its navigability to a riparian state lower down the river. That is the position on which we stand.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Why do you want to take power to prevent New South Wales irrigating her lands?

Mr. SYMON. -
We do not want to do anything of the kind.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
But you are proposing to do so.

Mr. SYMON. -
Not for a moment. Again, the honorable member, it seems to me, does not appear to comprehend the question. We do not wish for one moment to take that power, and we should be exceedingly sorry to see that power taken in this Bill. Indeed, so far as I am concerned, if it is a comparison of benefits, if it ever came to that, I do think that it would be better, and more in the interests of the whole of Australia, that the whole of the River Murray should be drained, in order that the millions of arid acres in New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia should be irrigated and made fertile, should be made to smile with abundant harvests, than that navigation should be preserved. Now, I make that concession to my honorable friend. You can make a railway, but you cannot make a river; but I am willing to leave the control of the rivers of Australia to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Are you sure, from the legal point of view, that you have not already got what you want?

Mr. SYMON. -

That brings me to a point which Mr. O'Connor alluded to, and with very great force. I think he is mistaken, but if, as he thinks, the power is inferentially given by the existing Bill, I say let us make it clear.

Mr. WISE. -

Do you wish to preserve the navigation of the Murray?

Mr. SYMON. -

I say, if Mr. O'Connor is right, let us put this matter beyond doubt when we come to deal with the amendments to be made in the drafting of the bill. I assure my honorable friends from New South Wales that I have not the slightest intention of minimizing in any degree the opportunities they have for irrigating the lands of New South Wales, if that can be done without injustice to the other colonies.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The express ground of Mr. Gordon's amendment is to give the control of irrigation to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Yes, and Mr. Symon is speaking on a different matter altogether.

Mr. SYMON. -

No. All that my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) seeks is that the tribunal-the body we are creating—shall have the power, irrespective of the provincial interests and provincial feelings of New South Wales, South Australia, or Victoria, to deal with this question on a national basis. That is the whole thing we are struggling for.

Mr. WISE. -

You simply want to keep the river navigable—is that it!

Mr. SYMON. -

We are not asking the Convention to say that New South Wales shall not irrigate all those acres which Mr. Carruthers spoke about the other day; we are not asking, as Mr. O'Connor put it a few moments ago, that all those trickling rills away up in the north of New South Wales, or in Queensland—I believe some of them come from Toowoomba to feed this river—shall be handed over to South Australia, or even to the Federal Parliament. My honorable friend's amendment is that the control of the River Murray shall be federalized altogether, and also the control of the Lachlan, the Murrumbidgee, and the Darling, which, I think, is sufficiently specific for all possible purposes.
Mr. LYNE. -
He goes a great deal further than that.

Mr. SYMON. -
The rivers he intends to include are specified in a later amendment from South Australia. We are merely using the present amendment-substituting "rivers" for "river"-to have this general discussion, and to settle the question of whether a larger measure of control over this central river system of Australia is to be given to the Federation. It is perhaps not a strictly formal mode of procedure.

Mr. WISE. -
It is a very inconvenient method. There may be nothing to dispute after all.

Mr. SYMON. -
I am not disposed to disagree with Mr. Wise on the question of procedure. I think it would have been better if we had had this general discussion on a precise amendment designed to convey exactly what was intended. But the main principle, it seems to me, is perfectly clear-that, whether it is a friendly state or a hostile nation, it cannot claim anything as a right due to itself, the exercise of which would be injurious to another nation. Now, there is no legal ownership of the water in the River Murray. There is a user of the water in the river, and that user can only be exercised subject to the rights of the people lower down the stream. The same thing applies to individual states as applies to private individuals. The principles of justice governing riparian disputes between individual states are exactly of the same nature and character as the principles of justice governing riparian disputes between private individuals. But, as I have said, we are not here seeking to have any clause introduced in this Bill limiting the rights of New South Wales on this subject. It is true, as has been said, that you cannot enforce these riparian rights as between states in the same way as you can enforce them as between individuals. There is no court of law which can give effect to the claims of one state as against another. But we wish to substitute, for the courts of law that would operate in the case of individuals, the Federal Parliament, which would practically take, in relation to these states, which are only quasi-independent, the place that is now held by the Imperial Parliament. Suppose we have now a dispute between New South Wales and Victoria, or between New South Wales and South Australia, with regard to the control of the River Murray, or with regard to the use of the waters of that river, the only possible opportunity for redress would be-if the Imperial Parliament would interfere—for one or other of the colonies to appeal to the paramount authority—the Imperial Parliament—and the Imperial Parliament, of course, might or might not interfere. We are all subject to that paramount power. The same power that passed the Act referred to by Mr. O'Connor, placing the river bed of the Murray entirely within the territory of New South Wales, could deal with this question if it thought fit. Of course, it would lead to some difficulties, and, no doubt, to a very great deal of strong feeling, and perhaps the interference of the Imperial Parliament might not take place. But that paramount authority exists at this moment. If we federate, the influence of that paramount authority will be infinitely reduced, and in lieu of it we are seeking to substitute something else—the authority which we are here assembled to create. Now, why should we practically sweep away the possibilities of the interference of the present paramount authority by creating a Federal Parliament in these colonies—why should we accept this Federal Parliament as the body to deal out justice between the colonies on a momentous inter-colonial question, without making the provision now proposed for the control of the central river system of Australia? Of course we have taken a similar step, in effect, in regard to the judiciary; we propose to bring the judicial power more amongst ourselves—to enable ourselves to deal with it instead of leaving it to be dealt with by the Imperial authority. And I think that the Imperial authority would be reluctant to interfere in a matter of this kind at a distance of some 12,000 or 13,000 miles. I appeal to those honourable members of the Convention who have come from Tasmania and Western Australia, and who are not, of course, vitally or immediately concerned. That is the whole essence of this point—we wish to transfer to the federal authority the settlement of this question.

Mr. Wise. -

Without giving New South Wales the opportunity of making terms—is that it?

Mr. Symon. -

Why not? Making terms with whom?

---

[P.77] starts here

Mr. Wise. -

The other states.

Mr. Symon. -

When?

Mr. Wise. -

When the transference is agreed on. What are the conditions?

Mr. Symon. -
The conditions?

Mr. WISE. -

The conditions are not sufficiently known.

Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable member's idea of a compromise is the same as that of the counsel whose only idea of a compromise was to have the terms his own way. The honorable member says:"Name the conditions." What are the conditions he desires? Is it that New South Wales shall in the future occupy the same attitude towards South Australia on this question as she has done in the past?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The condition you ask is that New South Wales shall be liable to lose everything and gain nothing.

Mr. SYMON. -

Why not? You want to take away something which belongs to us.

Mr. WISE. -

We have never interfered with navigation.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am not talking about the past. For heaven's sake let us forget the past. We are going to begin a new sheet, and with a new plan.

Mr. REID. -

We are the only people who need not forget it, because we gave you inter-colonial free-trade in advance.

Mr. SYMON. -

We are greatly indebted, and I, as a free-trader, am deeply indebted to my right honorable friend; but we are not now dealing with inter-colonial free-trade. What we are dealing with is this question of an inter-colonial river system, which is no more the property of New South Wales than it is the property of South Australia or the property of Victoria; and we say, if there is one subject which is fitted to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament, and to be under federal control, it is this very one.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is the whole point of the federal question.

Mr. LYNE. -

If South Australia or Victoria comes to interfere with our rights at the present time, you will see what rights we have.

Mr. SYMON. -

That sounded so very bellicose behind me that if I had not turned round and seen my pacific friend (Mr. Lyne) there I should have thought that it was some veteran warrior talking about bringing out troops and all that sort of thing. We should see what would happen. If we are separate states, what will the result be? The result will be that we shall go on quarrelling about these things; that we shall have differences between us that they will never be settled.

Mr. WISE. -
We have never quarrelled yet about it.

Mr. SYMON. -
We want to prevent the possibility of quarrelling about it. We want to live in perfect amity.

Mr. WISE. -
Let us continue as we are.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
They disregard any communication we ever send along.

Mr. SYMON. -
Our experience-and I do not wish to go into details-has not been a very happy one in our endeavours to bring about an amicable arrangement with regard to these rivers. All we desire is to improve if we can, but to preserve, at any rate, this great inter-colonial waterway, and to do that for the benefit of all. Surely, as my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) says, there can be no more intensely federal purpose than that is. We have seen difficulties before, we may have them again. We want the control and adjustment of these difficulties if they arise to rest with the National Parliament instead of leaving a possible constant source of friction, which will cut both ways—which cannot fail to give rise to difficulties in the future. Is there any other subject, I ask honorable members, which is likely in the future if it is not left under federal control to give rise to difficulty and trouble? I do not know of any. My honorable friend (Mr. Howe) the other day spoke about an ulcer in connexion with old-age pensions. This, at any rate, would be a sore which might be opened at any moment, and unless we have the Federal Parliament to deal with it we shall be utterly powerless to bring about a satisfactory result.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If New South Wales and Victoria were private individuals, there is no doubt about your right to stop undue interference with these waters.

Mr. GORDON. -
That is a right founded on natural justice.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It is a legal right where individuals are concerned, but the difficulty is that the colony is not an individual.

Mr. SYMON. -
The only difficulty is, that as between states you cannot have the advantage of legal process or enforcement of legal decrees. If you are left without that, what have you to appeal to?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I would like to see the authority for it being a legal right.

Mr. SYMON. -
I would like to see the authority for that myself. If you leave it unadjusted you have either to deal with it by means of a treaty, and the whole of these treaties in relation to the Rhine and the Danube are an acknowledgment of the principle that the waters of these rivers are not the property of the immediate states through which they flow, but are of common concern to all the states interested, and it is because they must either go to war or the weaker must submit that they enter into these treaties in order to bring about a settlement of their difficulties.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
In the case of the Danube, they have no right to interfere with the tributaries; it is only the main river they can interfere with.

Mr. REID. -
That is the point.

Mr. SYMON. -
I recognise that. There are greater difficulties here than there are in other countries in connexion with the rivers, as my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) pointed out again and again the other day. There is no parallel to the condition of things in this country. You cannot find a parallel all the world over for a state of things where you have a navigable river, and where at the other end you have a number of small streams, and land which is thirsting for irrigation, and you can say exactly-"This is how it was dealt with in another case."

Mr. REID. -
It shows that there are two sides to it.

Mr. SYMON. -
I admit that. I do not want the Convention to settle that adversely to New South Wales. All I ask you to say is - "This is a federal matter; put your faith in the Federal Parliament." The object of the Federal Parliament is to do justice to the nation. It is created in order to deal with the very questions which cause animosities between different states, and the sole purpose my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) has in view in his amendment, which we support, is to place the control where it ought to be, and to put an end to all these possibilities of difficulties should they at any time seem likely to arise. It would be a blot on federation to omit the control of this river system from our Constitution. If we are separate, look at the position we shall be placed in. If we are separate, states may wrangle and fight it out as best they may. If they are big enough and foolish enough they may go to war over it. If we are united is the same state of things to continue? Are we to wrangle over the thing? Are these two states, with the Federation as a bottle-holder, to go to war if a dispute should arise? Why in the name of all that is federal, should we not place the water system under the control of the Federation to avoid these difficulties? That is all the amendment asks for. I saw the other day, and perhaps honorable members will allow me to read, a quotation showing how difficulties may arise, and how a claim has at present been made by Mexico against the United States. It is as follows:-

Mexico is now pressing claims aggregating 10,000,000 dollars against the United States on the ground that Americans have stolen and are now stealing a great part of the water that ought to flow along the bed of the Rio Grande to the sea. In its upper reaches the Rio Grande is wholly in American territory, and for 100 miles along either side of its banks the settlers have dug artificial trenches for the purpose of irrigating their lands. This has sensibly lowered the level of the stream, and there is no doubt whatever that great tracts of hitherto valuable land in Mexico have been greatly injured. If it were a navigable stream throughout its entire course it might be held that the United States would be bound by treaty to see to it that its value should not be impaired. But the Territorial Supreme Court has not only decided that it is not navigable, but has also declared further that, even if it were, the notion that the United States can be restricted in any way in the free use of the river is an error. If the Federal Supreme Court should affirm this decision Mexico will be entirely without legal redress. But the evidently strong moral claim she has to consideration will probably induce Congress to see if some plan cannot be adopted by which a part at least of the wrong may be straight.

Mexico, of course, is a foreign State in relation to the United States. She is a weak State. It is of no use for her to talk about going to war with the United States about robbing her of her waters, and she has no legal redress.

Mr. REID. -
Then she has no legal right?

Mr. SYMON. -
There are many legal wrongs without a remedy.

Mr. REID. -
No legal wrong without legal redress, but there may be many moral wrongs without legal redress.

Mr. SYMON. -
My right honorable friend does not want us to believe that a State has no legal redress simply because it is a State-

Mr. REID. -
No; if you throw yourselves on charity, and come to us, we will do with you as we have always done-treat you in the most handsome manner.

Mr. SYMON. -
You would not give us a cup of cold water if you could help it from these rivers. You not only do not give us a drink, but you put our remonstrances in your pigeon-holes.

Mr. REID. -
I am afraid that New South Wales is the colony which fell amongst thieves-I mean, got wounded on the road, and no one would heal her wounds.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
She is to make it up by stealing all the water.

Mr. SYMON. -
There we have an illustration of the position to which a small State may be reduced in consequence of the withdrawal-of the stealing, as it is called in this report-of the upper waters of the river on which it depends through its lower course for the irrigation of its territory.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Is that asserted to be contrary to the terms of a treaty between Mexico and the United States?

Mr. SYMON. -
Yes.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is a different thing.

Mr. SYMON. -
I am very much obliged to my honorable friend for pointing that out. If it is a navigable river, then there is a treaty which will give Mexico redress; but, unfortunately, the Territorial Court in the United States has held that it is not a navigable stream. If that decision is upheld, on appeal, then they are left absolutely without redress, unless by force of arms, or unless by an appeal to conscience and the sense of right on the part of the Congress. And the same thing, too, is likely to happen with Canada. We know quite well that great canals are being cut at this moment to connect the Canadian lakes with the Mississippi, and the Canadians are apprehensive that if that project is carried out the water of the lakes will be reduced by 2 or 3 feet, and that navigation will be interfered with. There is no redress there, because they cannot go to law between themselves. It is not likely that Canada will have recourse to arms, and the only plan will be to have some adjustment by means of a treaty the two states being independent of each other, in order that justice may be fairly done. All these difficulties will disappear if this control is given to the Federation. All these fears and apprehensions—groundless fears, as I think them—on the part of my friends from New South Wales, will disappear, and I feel sure that, on reflecting further on this subject, they will see that there is really nothing to be alarmed at in this amendment, and that it will be to their interest, as it will be to ours—to the interest of the whole Commonwealth of Australia—that the Federal Parliament shall be able to deal with this subject. They want the navigability maintained as well as we do; perhaps, they are not interested in that to the same extent as we are, but no doubt they wish the navigability maintained. Suppose we so interfere with the lower waters as to destroy that navigability, would not they have a right to complain, and who would settle it? Suppose it was possible to turn the waters of the Lower Murray over the whole of our north-eastern country so as to irrigate that land and make it prosperous, would not the people of New South Wales have a right to complain? Of course they would, and who would settle it? Let the Federal Parliament settle it. They want the upper waters for irrigation; we do not wish to prevent them for a single moment, only we wish that there shall be some authority to see that it is justly done, not in disregard of other interests which are concerned. They may prefer irrigation to navigation; we prefer to have them both. My honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) said the other day that both can go together. I thoroughly agree with him. I do not see why they should not go together; and, if they can go together, then there is no authority under this Commonwealth so competent to deal with it and to see that they do go together as the Federal Parliament will be. I do not wish to go into those other matters upon which my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) dilated, with regard to the power to remove weirs and so on under the Bill as it at present stands. That does not reach the difficulty which my honorable friend's amendment seeks to meet, namely, the prevention of the withdrawal of the waters from the affluents of the Murray so that navigation shall be utterly destroyed, or so seriously diminished as to reduce the value of the streams.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is what it means—that you want the control of all the sources of the river.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is not what it means.

Mr. WISE. -

Then what does it mean?
Mr. SYMON. -
What it means is to hand over the control to the Federal Parliament. Do you object to hand over the control to the Federal Parliament?
Mr. WISE. -
Could you stop us irrigating?
Mr. SYMON. -
We do not want to stop you doing anything.
Mr. WISE. -
But could you do so?
Mr. REID. -
They could not, but the Federal Parliament could.
Mr. SYMON. -
The Federal Parliament would be entitled to stop the diversion of the rivers.
Mr. REID. -
Three southern colonies could prevent New South Wales from irrigating her own soil.
Mr. SYMON. -
Here is an imputation upon-what shall I say? Upon the honour, the dignity, and the justice of the Federal Parliament. Let us trust them.
Mr. REID. -
That is the answer to all difficulties-"Trust the Federal Parliament."
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Suppose that any irrigation at any time from any of those rivers affected the navigation of the Murray, then there could be no irrigation.
Mr. SYMON. -
The Federal Parliament might say that it would be better that we should have irrigation than that we should have navigation.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Or they might not. At any rate, that is the position.
Mr. SYMON. -
The position we support is that we must leave the matter to the Federal Parliament.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Both for irrigation and navigation?
Mr. SYMON. -
For every purpose. You have no legal right to the water.

That is not proposed for the whole of Australia, but for a little part of Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -

For all Australia, where the conditions are the same.

Mr. REID. -

But you do not propose such an amendment; you look after your rivers alone. That is not federal.

Mr. SYMON. -

If there is any other place where the rivers system is the same, or where the conditions are the same, then we say the same rule should apply. But, unfortunately, the same conditions, so far as I am aware, do not exist anywhere else at this moment. This is the great river of our continent, and it is the river which multitudes-millions-in the future may depend on, not only for navigation but for irrigation. Therefore we say that all matters of that kind ought to be under federal control.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

To meet the difficulty of New South Wales, would you consent to the insertion of a direction that irrigation should be always the first consideration?

Mr. SYMON. -

Well, I would like to see that proposal drafted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I want to settle the difficulties between you two colonies.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is what I wish to do myself. The fact of the matter is that it is with the greatest regret, to some extent, that I find myself bound, on every principle of justice and fair play to my own colony and the colonies generally the only national way of dealing with this question is to bring it under the control of the Federal Parliament that I strongly support the amendment. Whatever shape the sub-section may ultimately take, the broad principle is what I seek to affirm—that there ought to be a larger and wider control, and that in order to secure that we should sink, as far as we can, all our provincial feelings—our provincial prejudices, if you please—and follow the great example which has been set us, as shown in the cablegrams the other day, in England, where the great parties subordinated all their personal and party differences, and put an end to party strife, in the presence of the great and imminent danger which threatened the empire. And so are we in practically the same peril. My honorable friends say they are going to New South Wales to tell the people there that with this condition it would be difficult to accept federation. I hope they will think twice or three times before they adopt a course like that; because, after all, this is not a matter which affects merely the interests of the state of New South Wales; it is a matter which affects the whole of the federated states, and it is one which, if settled in the way we propose, will tend not only to bring about the union which we all desire, but to make that union permanent, peaceful, and prosperous.

Mr. REID. -

I think every representative of New South Wales is fully prepared to respond to the invitation made by my honorable friend (Mr. Symon) that we should deal with this matter in a lofty spirit—in an Australian spirit—and that if possible we should rocket the views of our honorable friends from South Australia. At the same time, we cannot be altogether blind to the fact that, running through the Australian patriotism of my friends from South Australia, there is a pretty strong web of self-interest; and so it may be said there is in the case of the representatives of New South Wales. To my mind this will probably be the most instructive debate to the people of the Australian colonies that we have had yet; because the people who are asked to trust the Federal Parliament in matters affecting their individual, their local, interests, will really have a valuable object-lesson in this case. In this Australian Parliament we are now considering a question which more directly affects two of the proposed partners than the other three; and it will be very instructive to the people of Australia, and especially to the people of New South Wales, who are supposed to be more distrustful perhaps than the people of any other colony, to see how their interests are dealt with by the gentlemen who come into this Convention representing the various colonies. So, whatever may be the decision after this debate, I look upon it as a debate which will throw a flood of light upon that vague expression—"trust the Federal Parliament." It seems to me that that is a phrase which we only use when we get into difficulties and do not exactly know where we are.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You used it yourself in Sydney pretty often.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, under exactly similar circumstances. I felt that the financial problem had assumed such a situation that really human ingenuity seemed incapable of solving it, and I had to resort to this pious aspiration of "trust the Federal Parliament." It would be instructive to us, first of all, to know what class of amendments our friends from South Australia intend to support, because one House of South Australia suggests one solution of this difficulty, and the other House of South Australia suggests a very different solution. For instance, the sub-section, if passed in the form suggested by the Council of South Australia, would read thus:--

The control and regulation of the navigation of the Rivers Murray, Darling, Murrumbidgee, and Lachlan.

The Assembly's amendment, if carried, would make the sub-section read that, and something more--

The control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray and its tributaries, and the use of the waters thereof.

Now, honorable members will see that there is a substantial difference between the two sets of amendments. The set of amendments from the Council points to navigation only; the set of amendments from the Assembly points to navigation and "Use," which includes, of course, irrigation and irrigation in New South Wales as well as in the other colonies through which these waters run. I want my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) to tell us what set of amendments he is advocating, because it is important that we should know what he is driving at. I do not wish him to answer the question at once. If the matter has not been settled between the delegates from South Australia, I will leave the question to be replied to at a later period if he likes. It is important that we should know exactly the sense in which we are asked to treat this as a test amendment.

Mr. GORDON. -

Certainly; the sense includes the use of the waters.

Mr. REID. -

Then I understand the Assembly's amendment is the amendment which my honorable friend is advocating?

Mr. GORDON. -

Yes, excepting probably as to its not defining particular rivers.

Mr. REID. -

Then those of us who are not from South Australia, and those who are looking on more as umpires in this matter than as representatives specially interested, are to take it that the test amendment means this—that South Australia asks this Convention to put into this Constitution a power not merely to control all the navigation. I may point out that power as to navigation is already given under the general provision contained, I think, in the first sub-section of this clause. Clause 52 begins by giving the Commonwealth a general power over the regulation of trade and commerce with all countries and among the several states. Now, that is a very wide power. That gives the Federal Commonwealth absolute power over the Yarra and every river in Australia—the Derwent, and the Tamar, and every river in the Federation in connexion with which there is any inter-colonial trade, and where any sort of provision was being attempted to be made that would interfere with equal commerce. For instance, take this magnificent wharf system in the Yarra. If there was any attempt made at any wharf on the Yarra to distinguish between goods arriving from Warrnambool and goods arriving from any other part of the Commonwealth, under these general words I apprehend that the Federal Parliament could step in and make that regulation of no effect. So that, so far as commerce is concerned, we all know, or ought to know, what we are doing—that over every navigable stream in the Commonwealth, wherever it is situated, we are giving the Federal Parliament power to prevent any abuse of wharfage regulations, or navigation regulations, or domestic regulations which would have the effect of making commerce unequal. That really seems to me to give the Commonwealth a much greater power over us in respect to some of these rivers than perhaps some of us thought. But I say in regard to the federal power—the fair and honest power which lies at the heart of federation—I do not care what its consequences are, I accept them. Therefore, I cannot be accused—neither I nor my honorable friends from New South Wales—of disputing this proposition: That for every inch of water navigable in New South Wales, and capable of being used for inter-colonial trade, we give up any pretence to exclusive control, any power to make commerce unequal as between the colonies.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The American decisions go further than that.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, I know; they go to an extent which alarms me, because they go to the extent of interfering with irrigation improvements of all kinds.

Mr. GORDON. -

Only in so far as the improvements intercept the traffic.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, I am aware that that is not lost sight of.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Or as far as they affect inter-state navigation.

Mr. REID. -

Well, I do not oppose that power. I am certainly the last one to wish to interfere with a power of that kind, and we as New South Wales representatives should be the last to do so in view of the policy we have adopted in our Colony.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Would it not also be competent to interfere with the water being taken away?

Mr. REID. -
I must say that I am afraid so, and it raises up, I must tell honorable members, a very serious question indeed, even in its most unobjectionable form as affecting New South Wales. We cannot avoid that. But still I admit that we must be thorough in all matters that, are really federal and national and which affect the broad intercourse of the different colonies. Therefore up to that point, however far it may take me, I feel that I must go. But the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) goes further than that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

Well, I will show him how he goes further than that, and will also show my honorable friend (Mr. Douglas) if he will follow my argument. The honorable member (Mr. Gordon) tells us that it is the amendment of the Legislative Assembly of South Australia that he and his colleagues are fighting for. I will read that sub-section again as it would stand if amended as proposed:

The control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray and its tributaries, and the use of the waters thereof.

My honorable friend knows that he goes further than navigation-"the use of the waters thereof." It is an expression which contemplates the management of the irrigation on the banks of those rivers. If honorable members look at the map for a moment they will see what it means to New South Wales. The Lachlan runs to within 150 miles of Sydney. It runs across New South Wales for 400 or 500 miles. The Darling runs right across New South Wales for about 1,000 miles. There are any number of rivers, tributaries to the Darling, in the northern part of the colony. Take the Murrumbidgee and the Lachlan, which is a tributary of a tributary of the Murray; and yet, putting all international decisions aside, the honorable member includes the Darling and the tributaries thereof. Just consider what would happen in Europe if there were a settlement of the navigation of the Rhine, and one of the parties interested claimed not only the river and the use of the waters of it, but all the many thousand tributaries of the Rhine, and many of the thousand tributaries of the tributaries of the Rhine. Why, all Europe would be startled by such a "naked and unashamed" proposition. It would throw the nations of Europe into war at once, and if the proposition were by any chance adopted, it would involve an interference with almost every corner of every State of Europe. That would lead to a positively intolerable state of things. International law regards the main arteries of commerce, and does not pretend to deal with the water of tributaries which run through the internal boundaries of a State. But this amendment does. The Murray, and tributaries of the Murray, and the tributaries of the tributaries of the Murray, are included. Can it be pretended that that demand can be justified by any sort of inter-colonial law? Has my inter-colonial lawyer put forward such a position in the history of all this disputed question in regard to water? No; it has been reserved for my honorable friends from South Australia to attempt to make this new principle. It is a principle which has been pointed out as being one of immense importance to us in New South Wales. If we had within our territory one of those vast torrents of water such as may be said to be represented by the Rhine or the Danube, there would be no difficulty whatever in this matter, but in New South Wales, for reasons which are obvious, the matter of water is a matter of water supply, and is an affair of vital consequence to three-fourths, if not to the whole of New South Wales, inasmuch as three-fourths of New South Wales depend upon those four rivers for water supply, And for any sort of irrigation, even the smallest scheme. So that honorable members will see that practically, if they carry this amendment - situated as our commerce and as our people are situated in regard to our rivers - they are handing over to the federal authority a power over our internal domestic affairs at a vital point, which I fear our people will not be in a mood to accept. The honorable member (Mr. Gordon) says - "Trust the Federal Parliament." There is no argument in that. If the honorable member came forward, in his zeal for irrigation at large, and proposed a sub-section to the effect that all the irrigation of the Commonwealth should be under the control of the Federal Parliament, that might seem an absurd proposition, but it would have the merit at any rate of being a uniform one. But the honorable member simply picks out a bit of Australia in regard to a matter which affects the interest of his own colony, and wishes to federalize us for his own benefit. If he wishes to federalize irrigation he has a plain course to pursue. We federalize commerce; we give general powers as to that. We have proposed to federalize a number of subjects in this Bill. There is no objection to that. But our strong objection to the present proposal is to this general power of federalizing subjects being departed from, inasmuch as we in New South Wales and our vital interests are being federalized in a way that affects us as no other colony is being affected. Because federalization carries with it a change of status. An important change of status is involved in this proposition if it became part of the Constitution. Surely it will be admitted that there would not be an internal scheme of irrigation in connexion with that immense territory of New South Wales.
Or anything else.

Mr. REID. -

Exactly; I am dealing with the thing as it is. It is a simple proposition. If it were uniform, it would be different. My objection is—Why not discuss this matter in an Australian spirit? The honorable member (Mr. Gordon) has made that impossible by singling out a particular bit of Australia in respect to which his interests are involved.

Mr. GORDON. -

This is the only water system that runs through contiguous colonies.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, it happens to be the only one that affects the interests of the Honorable member. The observation of the honorable member, however, is not a federal observation, because any man with a zeal for placing a broad system of irrigation in the hands of the Commonwealth would not be deterred by the consideration that he had nothing to gain by it.

Mr. GORDON. -

But we are both interested.

Mr. REID. -

If it is a federal matter, why not make it generally uniform?

Mr. GORDON. -

It may lead to a federal dispute.

Mr. REID. -

Exactly. But I am bound to remind my honorable friend—I think it is about time that I should—that the history of this question is one that ought not to frighten him and his friends. It appears that there has been some delay in carrying out some correspondence many years ago about some inter-colonial control, but the absolute administration of these rivers has been, I think, as fair and as reasonable as anything ever was.

Mr. GORDON. -

Does the honorable member forget various schemes that have been suggested?

Mr. REID. -

Schemes suggested! Any man can suggest a scheme!

Mr. GORDON. -

Official schemes.

Mr. REID. -

Official schemes! How many official schemes appear and disappear? Has Parliament ever adopted any of them, or has the Government of New South Wales ever acted upon any of them? There are many sources of danger to individuals, but are any individuals lucky enough to get a protection against such dangers embodied in a Federal Constitution? I admire the zeal and determination of the honorable member to get all his difficulties solved in this way, but my objection to this proposal is that it is not federal, as this Constitution must be if it is to commend itself to the people of Australia. He might command the respect even of the people of New South Wales if he proposed a general scheme of irrigation. But he does not. He seeks to legislate with respect to the waters which may affect him individually as a South Australian, but says nothing with regard to the others. That puts the matter before this Convention in a very unfair light, because honorable members must see what the effect of such a course of action in connexion with New South Wales would be. So that, I say, I believe in pushing this matter to an extreme. Let the honorable member propose some general action with regard to irrigation in respect to the Commonwealth, instead of dealing only with these particular rivers. I must again remind the Convention, in justice to the colony which I have the honour to represent, that New South Wales has a railway running to a point on the River Darling, and has the strongest possible interest if it acted selfishly in not spending money for snagging the Darling. I say that if we had pursued a selfish course we could have thrown a certain amount of difficulty in the way of the commerce of South Australia by not spending money in clearing the Darling. But we have cleared the Darling. Never has a single anti-federal thing been done by New South Wales in connexion with this river system or in connexion with any one of these rivers. And more than that—when the honorable member quotes Clay about artificial contrivances to restrict commerce, one almost wonders whether he is aware of the Tariff that his own colony has imposed, and of the Tariff of New South Wales, which imposes no such artificial contrivances.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is King Charles' head again.

Mr. REID. -

It is hard to think that New South Wales should be accused or suspected of placing artificial shackles upon commerce in a system of this kind. It is too much—altogether too much. Not only have we cleared the Darling for our friends in South Australia-

Mr. GORDON. -

We cleared the Murray for you.

Mr. REID. -

Was it for us?

Mr. GORDON. -

Largely; the clearing brought down your wool.

Mr. REID. -
I thank the honorable member for his disinterested kindness in doing it; but, as a matter of fact, the policy of our colony has always been to recognize this neighbourly obligation in respect to the river systems, and we have done so. We have never put so much as a two-penny tax on a barge coming from South Australia—not a single two-penny tax. I should like to see that sort of thing more general than it is. I think that my honorable friends had better leave the moral aspect of the question of the artificial contrivances alone. We will take the thing on its merits. This is a point on which we feel that we should go further than even the general power contained within this Constitution, which concedes a great deal—think all that my honorable friends really want, looking to the decisions which I have seen upon the subject. But we have gone further than that general power. In sub-section (31) we have given not only the control and regulation of the Murray, which was given in the first sub-section, but the use of the waters of the Murray from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea. Here, again, we have not acted an ungenerous part. The Constitution which divided New South Wales and Victoria gave us the bed of the Murray and I fancy that was going a long way towards giving us the waters of the Murray.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
And a long way short of it, too.

Mr. REID. -
We have gone farther than that. We have allowed Victoria to lease various islands in the Murray. We have never raised any point against the use of the Murray by Victoria. The Victorian Government have carried out most enterprising and very serious schemes of irrigation from the Murray.

Mr. GORDON. -
New South Wales may not always be under the direction of my right honorable friend. The honorable member, Mr. Lyne, may be in power in the future.

Mr. REID. -
Exactly. What my honorable friend wants to do in the interests of his colony is one thing, and what this Convention should do is quite another thing. I give my honorable friend credit for going straight for everything he can get for his colony. I give every one of the South Australian representatives credit for advancing pretensions which might stagger ordinary individuals with a degree of moral enthusiasm which shows that South Australia has a peculiar climate.

Mr. GORDON. -
The right honorable gentleman evidently finds our arguments too hot for him.
Mr. REID. -

Having heard what I must call one of the ablest series of arguments upon a bad point I ever listened to, I now recall the Convention first of all to the principles of international law. We must consider, first, what is the present state of things. Has a proposition ever been made to a body like this, dealing with different interests and trying to reconcile them in a federal spirit, which has had the effect of depriving a country of the whole of its water system? That is the plain English of the power that is now asked for. In framing a Federal Constitution, if power is expressly given to the Federal Parliament, that power ceases to be a mere abstract power; it is an injunction upon the Federal Parliament to discharge the obligation it imposes. If the use of the River Murray, the Lachlan, the Murrumbidgee, and the Darling is vested in the Federal Parliament with our consent, we being members of the Commonwealth, we consent to a Constitution which not only enables the Federal Parliament to do what they like with us if we try to use the water, but puts into their hands a direction that they are to take over our rivers and administer them.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Control does not necessarily imply that.

Mr. REID. -

No. And if every one were like my honorable friend it probably would not mean that; but before a sensible man signs a deed which he cannot revoke he likes to see that he is being treated equally and fairly. When you tell a business man-"Oh, but it does not follow that they will do this or that," you are treating him like a child or like a person whom you do not believe to be fully educated. Why should we lose all our water system if no other water system is to be taken? If this is going to be such a harmless thing why not put the paint brush all over the continent? Why paint the water system of New South Wales "federal," and leave the systems of the other colonies to be managed by those Colonies?

Mr. GORDON. -

Because the New South Wales system is the only federal water system.

Mr. REID. -

It is the only thing that worries my honorable friend. He is the most consistent public man that I have ever met. We all respect the very great ability with which he puts forward every proposition, and there is no member of the Convention for whom we have a kindlier feeling; but we must argue out these matters of difference, though in a friendly spirit. When my honorable friend came to the Convention of 1891, there was only one nightmare that oppressed him, and that was how the commerce of Broken Hill could be secured to South Australia. My honorable friend has this great advantage. He can lift matters of the sheerest self-interest into the loftiest regions of benevolence, philanthropy, and even of religion. That is the sort of man who is dangerous. Honorable gentlemen who were in Sydney at the time of the 1891 Convention will recollect that the honorable gentleman's one question was-"Does the Bill secure South Australia in regard to the Broken Hill trade?"

Mr. GORDON. -

No. I then raised the whole railway question, which was not at that time thought to be serious, but which is now admitted to be most serious.

Mr. REID. -

Does my honorable friend recollect the intense anxiety which he displayed to ex

Mr. GORDON. -

Quite well, in the general interests of Australia.

Mr. REID. -

In the general interest of Australia, but still it was Broken Hill all the same. That is where the honorable member's two regions so happily coincided. We should all get to heaven if we could reconcile our morality with our interests in this way.

Mr. GORDON. -

The right honorable member will have to be a good deal fairer in his arguments before he gets to heaven.

Mr. REID. -

The fact was that in the year 1891 my honorable friend had a very keen eye to the railways as they affected Broken Hill, and to the rivers as well, and the only earnest strong speeches which he has made since the federal movement began happen, by accident of course, to have dealt with matters in connexion with which the business interests of his own colony stand out.

Mr. GORDON. -

Other interests have been safeguarded by other honorable members. One cannot do all things, like my right honorable friend. We cannot each of us be a Jack-of-all trades.

Mr. REID. -

While we have been looking after all interests, including those of South Australia, my honorable friend has not reciprocated.

Mr. GORDON. -

Well, I earnestly desire to reciprocate.

Mr. REID. -
The honorable member's reciprocity does not meet with my entire approval. I am anxious to point out to this Convention the extreme importance of any decision that we may arrive at in regard to this question. All Australia is looking on at a preliminary rehearsal of how federation will work when state interests come into play. Therefore, I make no apology to honorable gentlemen who have no direct interest in this matter, when I put upon them the very serious responsibility of acting as umpires. For the control of navigation, every inch of navigable water in New South Wales must be under the dominion of the Federal Parliament, in order that our rivers may not be used to favour the commerce of any one colony as against the others; but the federal way of carrying out this federal, object would be to make the power of the Commonwealth complete, not only over the Murray, and the Darling, but also over the Yarra, and the Clarence, and every river in Australia. If you want to take irrigation as one of the federal subjects, you must federalize it all over Australia. You cannot put one colony under the control of the Commonwealth and leave the other colonies free.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Wherever the action of one colony might affect the other colonies the matter should be under federal control.

Mr. REID. -

Might I suggest to my honorable friend, who is a very accurate reader of history, that the United States contain any number of very important rivers running through more than one state. I think my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) said that there was an express clause in the United States Constitution giving the control of the rivers to the federal authority.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I did not say so.

Mr. GORDON. -

It is universally regretted that such a provision does not exist.

Mr. REID. -

I have failed to find such a provision, and the universal regret seems to be felt deeply in this Chamber. I have found very little trace of it in my readings. I have never heard any outcry for want of this provision.

Mr. GORDON. -

I gave my right honorable friend an argument in favour of it from Kenny the other day.

Mr. REID. -

The United States Constitution contains the words which we have on the forefront of this very clause-"The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries and among the several states." We have deliberately adopted those words from their Constitution. If honorable members will look at a book which is open to us all, and which contains the judicial decisions upon the American Constitution, they will find that a vast number of decisions have been given upon these words, but they all maintain this central doctrine that under these words no water-way in the United States which is used for interstate commerce can be so treated by the state through which it flows as to obstruct that commerce. Therefore, honorable members must see that in adopting these words in our Constitution, New South Wales gives up the control of the navigation of her rivers.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is knocked on the head by subsection (31).

Mr. REID. -

No, indeed, it is not. The regulation of trade and commerce among the several states is not destroyed by those words. If it is thought to be destroyed by them, I am prepared to amend the sub-section with a view to preventing that result. My honorable friend (Mr. Symon) said-"We only want to keep these rivers navigable." To show the haste and the want of consideration which even able intellects like those embarked in this enterprise can be capable of, I would point out to the committee that one of the four rivers which have been referred to has never been navigated since New South Wales was occupied.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It will do no harm if it is simply kept as it is.

Mr. REID. -

I wish the venue was in Victoria instead of in New South Wales. I wish it was a question of the Ovens or the Goulburn being taken over.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I wish it were. Then we should do justice.

Mr. REID. -

Justice, according to the honorable member, is a vague and uncertain thing. It is what is called abstract justice, which is always wrong.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If in New South Wales we had carried out irrigation works which did not pay we should be glad to hand them over.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think that a fair talk would arrange these matters. This is a very unsuitable amendment.

Mr. REID. -

I think that the Convention should pause very carefully before coming to a decision, and that we could show the people of Australia, who are asked to trust the Federal Parliament, that they can begin by trusting the Federal Convention. And let me show in a very few additional words how rash this proposition is. Now, no jurist ever heard of has claimed that there should be a federal jurisdiction of any kind, or a joint control of any kind, over a river like the Lachlan. That is to say, a river that is entirely within the boundaries of one state, and is not navigable. That statement I make as showing how rashly this scheme has been prepared. If for irrigation, and if it is to be justified because irrigation is also to be exercised, let me point-out the extreme absurdity of the proposal in that light. What can be thought of a system which proposes to deal with the irrigation of three-fourths of a colony, leaving the other one-fourth unprovided for? What a marvellous-confusion we should have under this management as to the irrigation schemes of our runs and farms over hundreds and almost thousands of miles. A Federal Government would control and manage them. As to the rest of our irrigation schemes there would be local control and management. What justification could we have in going back to our people with a scheme of that kind? We should have to give a naked answer to those who said-"If you are going to federalize irrigation, why take three-fourths of the colony and not the other fourth?" We should have to say-"This is done to secure South Australia, which is very much afraid of the water being used to prevent its barges from going down to the mouth of the Murray."

Mr. GORDON. -

The barges would not be able to do that if you had your way.

Mr. REID. -

Is that fair? The Government of New South Wales have kept the river free for the barges of South Australia and have not charged one penny toll or licence. How preposterous such it statement is in view of the facts! I suppose it is a federal statement, but I do not trust that sort of federal spirit.

Mr. GORDON. -

Your officials have threatened to drain the Murray dry.

Mr. REID. -

Our officials! May I point out to the honorable member that if he had to be bound by all the tattle of his officials he would find himself placed in an extraordinary position.

Mr. GORDON. -

This is a solemn parliamentary report.

Mr. REID. -

Then I suppose it is accompanied by a statutory declaration.

Mr. GORDON. -
Does the honorable gentleman keep tattlers in the public service of New South Wales?

Mr. REID. -

If it is a solemn parliamentary report, then Heaven forbid I should use such an expression, but the officials who write reports for Parliament do not administer the inter-colonial relations of New South Wales.

Mr. GORDON. -

That may be so.

Mr. REID. -

Those who do administer these relations have never done an unfriendly act.

Mr. GORDON. -

So far. Does the honorable gentleman answer for posterity? He takes big contracts, I know.

Mr. REID. -

My suggestion to the honorable member is this: He has to prove that this is something more than a matter affecting the interests of South Australia.

Mr. GORDON. -

I think that is obvious.

Mr. REID. -

When the honorable member comes before the Convention with a proposition again, he will have to reconcile it to the proportions of the occasion better than he has done in this case. He will have to show that he has submitted a truly federal scheme, and not a scheme which divides New South Wales into two parts, and, as to one part, puts irrigation into the hands-so far as the farmers living on the banks of the streams are concerned-of a foreign power, and leaves the other part to the control of the state Legislature. He really must not come forward with a piebald proposition of that kind. Mr. Symon made the remark-"All we wish is to keep these rivers navigable." Now, does not the honorable member see that he gives up the whole case, that he admits that this is not a straightforward proposition, that he admits that, under cover of taking over this power of regulating the irrigation of South Australia, he does not care a dump about the irrigation of New South Wales, or the lands to be irrigated, but wants to secure the commerce of South Australia? Will the people of New South Wales hand their interests over to persons who act in that way?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not think they will.

Mr. REID. -

I should think not, and nobody could blame them. The people only wish to see their affairs handed over to the Federation on federal conditions, and I say that it is an unfederal condition to split my colony up in this way and take the control of irrigation and water over three-fourths of it, and as has been no irrigation drain upon them they have gone practically dry, becoming a series of water holes. Honorable members when they speak of keeping these rivers navigable practically enter upon a contract which is incapable sometimes of realization. My own belief is this, that the irrigation of a colony can be carried out even in the case of rivers like the Darling in such a way as not to destroy the commercial interests of any one colony in Australia. Whether that is so or not, we have given power in this Constitution, by these general words, to enable the federal authority to regulate the commerce on these waters—that is, in the control of the Murray at any rate. I should like very much to see this matter put in a shape in which it would be more palatable to members of the Convention generally. I am quite prepared for the proposition of Mr. Deakin. I admit it does not mean very much. It means this: That as the Federation begins to operate, as we hope it will, instead of there being any jealousy or distrust of the Federal Parliament, a different state of feeling will arise, and the people in New South Wales, South Australia, and Victoria who look with the greatest distrust on the things that might happen will come to see that in the end a federal control might be good. I have no objection whatever to a power which would enable the Commonwealth to treat with any state in matters of that sort. The advantage of that is that both parties being on their original rights a fair settlement could be arrived at. The honorable members from South Australia wish to begin this federal enterprise on our rivers by depriving us of our original rights and giving us nothing in return but a divided system of water control. Over a bit of New South Wales the local Parliament is to be supreme, and over the vast water system of the central and western divisions the control is to rest with the Federal Parliament. That sort of proposition cannot commend itself to the Convention, which is anxious where conflicting interests arise to solve them in a federal spirit, or, if that is impossible, to leave the two colonies which cannot be reconciled on a federal basis to a power in the Constitution to come in when time and reason and experience have shown a way in which either locality can give up its rights upon fair and federal grounds.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Would you be prepared to leave it to the Inter-State Commission or to the judiciary to decide if there was a dispute between South Australia and New South Wales with regard to the water, and allow the decision to be final?
Mr. REID. -

The proposition before the Convention is one which practically takes over the irrigation system of New South Wales.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I want to supersede that if I can.

Mr. REID. -

I want to deal with everything as it arises. I make no terms and I enter into no bargain. I will deal with each thing on its merits. I say on the merits this proposition is radically unsound, and will lead to a state of affairs so radically unequal and unfair that it will become very serious indeed. I am prepared, in the interests of commercial freedom, to take a course worthy of the traditions of my own colony and the policy which prevails in it, that is, to secure to all the colonies as fair and equal a use of our natural opportunities as we have ourselves.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is all we want.

Mr. REID. -

Then all I can say is that you should put it in better English.

[The Chairman left the chair at four minutes to one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at two p.m.]

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I think we must recognise that we have arrived at a very important stage in our deliberations, and that the matter which is now under discussion threatens to divide us in a way which we would all desire to avoid. I rise for the purpose chiefly of suggesting that this is a matter on which we should take the sense of the Convention by division as a list resource only, when all hope of amicable agreement and compromise fails. I am the more strengthened in this suggestion, from the belief that the cause of the colonies interested which has been so ably put before the Convention by the various speakers who have preceded me, only requires that careful consideration which I feel sure the Convention will be desirous of giving to it to insure a concession to their requests of everything that is fair and right under the circumstances. I am sorry to some extent that my right honorable friend the Premier of New South Wales spoke in quite the tone which he adopted. It seems to me to some extent that he did not altogether realize the reasonableness and substantial nature of our requests, and I venture to put it that this is a matter to which it would be best to address our most serious consideration, and not in the slightest degree to attempt to dispose of it with badinage, sarcasm, or anything of that sort. Therefore, I shall purposely refrain from following some of the remarks in which he indulged. But I think that I ought to say, with regard to the criticisms he levelled against my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon), that the position which that honorable member took up in Sydney in 1891 has, by subsequent events, been shown to be absolutely right. He may have been, and very probably was, foremost in suggesting then that it was idle to provide for the removal of inter-colonial barriers to commercial intercourse in the shape of customs duties if we did not at the same time provide for the removal of the war of railway tariffs. The same importance was not attached by all members of the Convention to his remarks as the honorable gentleman himself attached to them, but subsequent events have shown abundantly that he was right. I do not forget that one honorable gentleman who has been very emphatic in his denunciation of the proposals of the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) at the present time, at an early stage in our meeting in Adelaide rose in his place and put it that it was idle to adopt measures for abolishing the war of custom-houses if we were only going to transfer the seat of war to the railway stations. Similarly, I say here, it is idle for you to adopt measures for abolishing the war of custom-houses and the war at railway stations if you are going to transfer that war to the river-side. That is what seems to me likely to be done if we do not adopt some amendment of the sort suggested by the hon. Mr. Gordon. The honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) has told us, and rightly enough, that this is a question of the greatest importance to New South Wales. I say also that it is of the greatest importance to South Australia. Arid as the territory in New South Wales may be, the same remark applies with equal force to the territory of South Australia; and if by the action or enterprise of New South Wales we be deprived of those blessings in the shape of perennial streams flowing through two contiguous colonies which Providence has given us, and if they are to be absorbed for the benefit of one, or if the possibility of that be permitted, we shall be making a great mistake indeed. I trust all honorable members will do what they can for the purpose of laying down this principle That as regards our river system, where it can be properly termed of an inter-colonial character-important as it is in America, where the streams are great, and the necessities comparatively small; it is greater still in Australia, where the streams are comparatively small, and the necessities are indeed great-I do trust that we shall not separate on this occasion without having adopted a Federal Constitution which does provide that in the distribution of these natural bounties of Almighty Providence all must share and none must suffer. That, I venture to say, on behalf of South Australia, is all that we desire—that that which is naturally the property, advantage, and opportunity of different colonies should not be absorbed to the benefit of any one. I should like to say to my right honorable friend the Premier of New South Wales, that I am not attempting on this occasion to lay down any other principle more in detail than that which I have roughly indicated. What I am attempting is this: To act in furtherance of the resolution which was originally moved by the leader of the Convention in Adelaide; that is, to take to ourselves, as representatives of the people of Australia, the power of dealing with this question which is at present possessed by the Imperial Parliament. So far as I recollect, the resolution moved by the honorable member (Mr. Barton) was this:

That in order to enlarge the powers of self government of the people of Australia a Federal Government should be created with certain powers.

What is the position to-day? On this matter New South Wales-to put it at its broadest, simply as a question of law, to say nothing of the equity-can exercise her rights in connexion with the waters of these rivers, subject to the control of the Imperial Parliament, which by legislation can provide what is necessary and fit on the subject. What we suggest now is that when we are calling into existence an Australian Parliament charged with the duty of dealing with this matter of inter-colonial concern-of Australian national concern-that the powers of the Imperial Parliament should be transferred to the federal authority which we propose to call

I would ask the Premier of New South Wales what does he object to in that?

Mr. REID. -

May I put to you this question. Even from your point of view, do you justify the basis of this amendment in taking over irrigation in order to preserve navigation?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not attempt to deal with this question in detail. We have not got sufficient information for the purpose of enabling me to state definitely on what lines the legislation should proceed. What I do say is this: That we ought to give to the Federal Parliament which we propose to call into existence the power, when it deems fit, to legislate on this question (giving either the preference to navigation or to irrigation, I care not which, just according as its wisdom may decide in the future) in order to remove this fertile source of friction between colonies. I put it to my right honorable friend in this way: I have no desire to refer to recent history in connexion with this river trouble, but it is a live question; it is a subject which has already occupied the attention of several of the colonies interested. It is a matter on which we have addressed the Government of New South Wales with the utmost respect—and we shall be prepared to address them similarly in future—but without that fertility of result which we might have desired. Now, the question seems to me, are we, when laying the foundations of federation, with the necessary modifications, which we hope will endure for all time, to permit this question to remain beyond the possibility of being satisfactorily dealt with by that Federation and absolutely outside its jurisdiction, and to be a constant source of friction and irritation, which, under existing conditions, is has been found impossible to deal with? The Right Honorable the Premier of New South Wales has said that at various times and on various occasions the expression "Trust the Federation" has been used with more or less force. I confess that on a variety of occasions when I have used the expression I have used it most sincerely, believing that we are engaged in calling into existence a body in which the whole of Australia shall have confidence. I put it to the right honorable member what will be the position if this jurisdiction which we seek is given? Simply this, that if the Federation finds that it can interfere for the good of all concerned it will do so. If it comes to no such conclusion it will stay its hand. Which colony, I ask, has to run the greater risk? South Australia, with its comparatively small representation, or the senior colony of the group? But I put it on broader lines: Are we fearful of this Federation? For one, I am not. I have every belief in the wisdom of the body which we are proposing to call into existence. If we are fearful, that seems to me to be an argument for keeping out of it. My view is this, that there is no cause for fear, least of all on the part of colonies who will be so strongly represented in the house of Representatives as New South Wales naturally will be. I do ask honorable members not to pass by on the other side of this difficulty, which, if left unsettled and not referred to a tribunal of competent jurisdiction to be dealt with, must be a constant source of that destruction of the feeling of inter-colonial comity, which should prevail amongst the various colonies that we have the honour to represent, and a source of danger to the success of the Federation which we are here to constitute.

Mr. Reid. -

Is not your only anxiety now to preserve the navigability of the river?

Mr. Kingston. -

I tell the right honorable gentleman this—that I would welcome any fair arrangement on the subject.

Mr. Reid. -

Do you desire this power over New South Wales for irrigation purposes or for navigation purposes?

[P.94] starts here
Mr. KINGSTON. -
I desire it for the good of a
Mr. WISE. -
Is it navigation that you wish to preserve?
Mr. KINGSTON. -
If this water is useful for the purposes of irrigation, as I believe it will be, I think we ought to have our fair share of it, too. I do not want that New South Wales shall, under cover of an unlimited power of irrigation, be able to leave to us nothing more or less than a dry channel.
Mr. REID. -
Therefore, you want to take water for irrigation?
Mr. KINGSTON. -
I want New South Wales to concede to the people of South Australia and the people of Victoria, under this Federation, the same right, with reference to the use of these waters, as her courts would concede to the New South Welshman. Under this Federation, I hope it will not be a question of New South Wales, but of Australia—an extension, practically, for national purposes, of our various powers. The present legal position, on which I understand the Premier of New South Wales to insist with some degree of legal force, is this: That outside the boundaries of New South Wales no person has any right to complain of what use the waters of the River Murray are put to.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
We cannot have war, and we cannot have law.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
No, we cannot have war, because it is impossible for states which are component parts of the same empire to go to war; we cannot have law, because the New South Wales laws do not run for the protection of those who happen to live outside that colony. All we can have is Imperial legislation conferring rights on all. And we do not want—we do not desire to go-cap in hand, complaining to the mother country that our own fellow citizens of the British Empire—the people of New South Wales, which, properly enough, rejoices in the proud designation of the mother colony—claim the right to absorb all the waters of the River Murray, if it so pleases them. We are calling into existence a Federation within which we admit that custom houses should be abolished, that wars of railway tariffs should be stopped, and all I ask honorable members is to go one step further and say that, as respects the use of what are Australian rivers, Australian rights shall be regarded, and that those rights shall not be limited by any provincial jurisdiction. If it were necessary to encourage my honorable friends from New South Wales, I would ask them what have they to fear, with the magnificent representation that that colony will have in the House of Representatives, and equal representation of the states in the Senate?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If you give to New South Wales the advantage of her larger population in both Houses I think the whole difficulty will be gone.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

As long as the existing law continues, the existing position will continue. If the Federation does not interfere, such rights as New South Wales claims at the present moment will remain untouched. A majority of the House of Representatives will be necessary to effect any alteration of the existing conditions, and surely in a matter of this sort, in which South Australia and Victoria are just as much interested as any other colony in obtaining a peaceful friendly solution of the question, and are willing to remit it to the decision of a tribunal in which New South Wales is to be so strongly represented, it is an unnatural apprehension on the part of the representatives of New South Wales to fear any direful results.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

What about the tributaries?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

The tributaries? All I wish to say is this: for my own part, I would be prepared to concede that, so long as the navigability of the rivers in question is not interfered with, I would not require any special reference to the question of irrigation, relying on the supply of water which is necessary for the purposes of navigation as being sufficient also for the purposes of irrigation, although, at the same time, I do not omit to recognise that there may be a fine line drawn at a point at which the water may be sufficient for the one or the other of those purposes, and not for both. But the question which now chiefly interests me is this—Cannot we arrive at some unanimous friendly solution of the difficulty? I do trust that this Convention will not adopt any other means for a long, long time to come, except as a last resource, than an effort to secure, by amicable negotiation, that which we desire. I assure honorable members, on the part of the colony of which I have the honour to be one of the representatives, that we wish nothing more than is reasonable and fair. Embody any expression which may be desired by any honorable member of this Convention for the purpose of preventing us getting anything else, and we will cheerfully agree to it. And I put it to honorable members that, in framing a Constitution for Australia—a country in which, as has been well pointed out by Mr. O'Connor, water is a matter of absolute necessity, not only for the comfort of the individual, but also for the development of our resources-unless, as regards rivers which may be truly termed Australian, we make satisfactory provision for their use by the Australian people, and prevent the possibility at any time of their monopolization by one or other of the colonies interested, to the injury of the community, the Constitution will be lacking in one of the chief recommendations for its acceptance by the Australian people.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I anticipated, from the remarks which had fallen from previous speakers, that the last speaker intended to have made some definite suggestion to vary somewhat the proposition that has already been made by Mr. Gordon.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Well, you would not accept it, anyhow.

Mr. LYNE. -

I have not seen it. But I thought from what was stated, before we adjourned for lunch, that it was probable some suggestion would be made that might bring us nearer together. On this occasion I am extremely glad to find that the representatives of New South Wales are in harmony, and, I hope, unanimous, and I am very glad to be able on this question to support the Premier of New South Wales, a thing I do not very often do.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Perhaps he is wrong now.

Mr. LYNE. -

No; I hardly think he is wrong now. I think that, for almost the first time, he is right.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

When you do agree your unanimity is wonderful.

Mr. LYNE. -

But let me impress upon the Convention that we have to consider many things in carrying out the work in which we are now engaged, and I think that not the least amongst those matters is the duty of preparing such a Bill as is likely to be acceptable to the people of these colonies. Now, in framing this Constitution Bill, I have thought from the onset that we were attempting to import into the measure too many matters and too many subjects, and, if the proposal made by the Hon. Mr. Gordon is going to be carried, it will be the forerunner, and I think it should be the forerunner, of taking over our lands, our railways, our debts, and everything else, and practically relieving the states altogether from all matters of serious state consideration.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do your debts affect other colonies?

Mr. LYNE. -
No, I do not think they do; but I think that if all debts were taken over we would relieve the other colonies very considerably as far as their debts are concerned, because of our stability.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
We do not want your debts.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
That is because yours are the largest.

Mr. LYNE. -
I mention this matter not because I should support any such proposal, but because I think the proposal is of such a vital character that, if it is carried, we should go still further. I hope it will not be carried. For the sake of seeing this Constitution Bill passed by each state, I hope that this proposal will not be carried, because I feel satisfied that even at the present time in New South Wales the advance which was made to South Australia at the tail-end of the session in Adelaide—that was, to give rights over the waters of the Murray from certain points—is not viewed very favorably. If we go further and give absolute rights, not only over the Murray, but also over the Murrumbidgee, the Lachlan, the Darling, and all the great tributaries which fall into those rivers—I think it is useless to say that if those rivers only are named it does not affect the large tributaries which fall into them. Why, sir, the Darling is supplied wholly or nearly wholly by large tributaries, some of them in channels larger than the channel of the Darling itself. At the head of the Darling you have the Warrego, the Paroo, the Biree, the Culgoa, the Macquarie, the Namoi, the Bogan, and a number of large rivers which go to make the channel of the Darling; not to make its channel only, but to throw their waters for a width of 50 miles, in flood-time, over the lands of our colony. My honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) alarmed me somewhat when he gave his opinion of the immense power which was given over these rivers even by the proposal carried at Adelaide. If I understood him aright, he said that these rights extended, not only to the Murray, but to all the tributaries of the Murray. Every tributary I named just now is a tributary of the Murray.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
A tributary between certain points—a tributary between where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales down to the sea; only that portion of it.

Mr. LYNE. -
Every river I named comes between those two points.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Mr. LYNE. -
Yes, from where the Murray first forms the boundary between New South Wales and Victoria—that is, up in the mountains—down to the sea.
Mr. FRASER. -
You are quite right.
Mr. LYNE. -
I presume that definition was inserted because otherwise it would be from the boundary of the colony of New South Wales to the sea only, and it was intended to restrict, I take it, the power of the Federal Parliament over the Murray waters only in the channel of the Murray from its head to the sea. The honorable gentleman said that, in his opinion, that power was extended to every tributary of the Murray. If that opinion is correct, there is no necessity for this amendment, for that power already exists in the Bill. If that does exist, then I venture to say if it is definitely understood, and it must be definitely understood before this Bill is completed, it will not be satisfactory to the colony of New South Wales. As the president, for three years, of the Royal Commission on Water Conservation in New South Wales, I had something to do with the framing of a Riparian Rights Bill. The honorable member (Mr. Glynn) referred to the fact that a joint commission from Victoria and New South Wales reported to their respective Governments in favour of a combined commission to deal with the waters of the Murray. The honorable and learned member is somewhat in error. What did take place was that that Royal commission suggested that a joint commission should be appointed to take charge of the head-works on the head waters of the Murray. The reason why that suggestion was agreed to was that according to the Constitution Act of New South Wales, we have power over the bed of the river only to the Victorian bank. We have no power whatever to put a spade or a shovel into the soil on the Victorian side of the river, and, therefore, we have no power to construct any works which would extend on to the Victorian side. Moreover, it was known at that particular time that the Victorian Government was very active in constructing works to divert a large portion of the main tributaries of the Murray—and the main tributaries of the Upper Murray come from the Victorian side—over various parts of the colony of Victoria for the purpose of water supply and irrigation, and it was thought by the two, at any rate by the New South Wales Commission, that that would have the effect of diverting into other channels a large quantity of water which then went down into the Murray channel, and which would thus be lost to the Murray.
River. Considering all the conditions as they were then, it was thought advisable that the Murray River only should be dealt with by a joint commission from the two colonies. It was upon that recommendation being made that a protest, or rather an attempt was made by South Australia to get her finger in the pie; and Sir Henry Parkes, who, I think, led the Government of New South Wales at that time, refused to agree to any proposal which would give South Australia the same right as Victoria or New South Wales with regard to the Upper Murray. The banks of all the channels to which I have referred other than the Murray belong solely to New South Wales. It is not a question of one side of the river belonging to Victoria or to South Australia, and of another side belonging to New South Wales. In the case of all these large tributaries on the New South Wales side they belong solely to New South Wales at the present time, cause they are within the territory of that colony. New South Wales has completed a great many works for the purpose of storing the water, of improving navigation, and of irrigating considerable patches of country. These rights exist now, and what this amendment desires to do is to take away a portion, if not the whole, of these rights, from New South Wales.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Hardly that.

Mr. LYNE. -

It is that, and I will proceed to show as shortly as I can-and I think our speeches should be as short as reasonably they can be made-why I think that is the case. At the present moment, I think I am right in saying, the Murray is not navigable for a considerable portion of its course, and we all know that it is not navigable, nor, as a rule, is the Darling navigable, for more than three or four months in any year. If that is so now, and South Australia puts in a claim to have the whole of the water which is running into South Australia, because she says the Murray below the border would not be navigable, then that takes away rights, we have at the present time to divert any of that water which in a dry time is so useful and necessary in New South Wales. By doing that you take away the possibility of New South Wales obtaining to the fullest extent the use of the water for irrigation purposes. It was very wisely observed by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) that it is possible that the question of irrigation will take precedence over the question of navigation. I entirely agree with his observation.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

He added-You can trust the Federal Parliament for that."

Mr. LYNE. -
If we cannot trust this Convention we must be careful as to how we trust the Federal Parliament. The Premier of New South Wales pointed out, I think with great force, that the people of the colonies are watching the action of this Convention as some kind of a forerunner of what they must expect from the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

If it was assured that it would have the same personnel you would all be in favour of it.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am not sure of that. At any rate, I should be very cautious, as regards this particular question, as to how far I would agree to allow the Federal Parliament to deal with it, at any rate for the time being; and by the term "time being" I mean this, that I think the people of these colonies have to gain confidence in the Federal Parliament, and in the course of a few years, if that Parliament should become a reality, the people of any state will be far more likely to hand over their rivers, or their railways, or their debts, should that Parliament act in a manner which they approve than they are at present, when they do not know quite what it is going to be, or how it is going to govern.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the case with everything.

Mr. LYNE. -

It is the case with everything, but I think there will very likely be more confidence in the course of a few years in the proposed Parliament than there is at this moment. The representatives of South Australia say they want the waters of the Murray to run into South Australia for navigation purposes, more particularly than for irrigation purposes. What takes place now, I understand, is that each year those persons who have lands fronting the Murray in South Australia anticipate the flood waters to irrigate and fertilize their lands. They may desire that these flood waters should not be interfered with, because they would lose the fertilization of the land which they now secure. Their representatives might go a step further in their argument. If at any time they make the channel to the sea navigable-I do not think it is navigable at present-they may say that they want the water to flow down the bed in sufficient volume to keep open that navigation. The great fault I have found in all the colonies hitherto has been that they have allowed so much of the valuable water of each state to flow to the sea, instead of utilizing it for irrigation purposes. On every river, when we have had a great flood, instead of utilizing the water, it is allowed to flow to the sea. It should be the object of every colony to utilize as much as it is possible to do. One gentleman has said that New South Wales has done nothing towards conserving the waters of the Darling, or trying to make that river navigable. It is not navigable, as I have said, except for perhaps three or four months in the year; but already New South Wales has attempted to make that river navigable by building one weir and lock, and it is intended to carry on this work, and I think it will be carried on to its junction with the Murray. By these means, instead of having a river which is navigable for only three or four months in the year, we may possibly have a river which will be navigable at all times, by storing the flood waters in such volume as to give depth.

Mr. FRASER. -
No.

Mr. LYNE. -
Yes, I think it is quite possible. By doing that we do not in any way injure the flow of the river into the channel in South Australia. In fact, I think that instead of doing so we are likely to keep up that flow to a more standard level than it is kept up to at the present time, because the more the water conserved in and near the various channels in flood-time the more water will flow down the river at a dry time. I do not think, therefore, the South Australian delegates need have any fear that we are likely to injure the navigation of the river. But, as was truly said by Mr. Carruthers, this question is so bound up with our land legislation, and with the improvement of the lands in our colony, that the fact cannot and must not be ignored by any of the delegates from New South Wales, and I hope that fair treatment will also be accorded to that aspect of the question by the delegates from the other colonies. Mr. Carruthers said that it was a case of a divorce taking place between the water and the land, and so it is, because in our arid country we have land good enough for purposes of production; but in the western parts of our colony it is useless, except during a good season, unless we can utilize the waters to a greater extent than we have been doing in the past.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
What about the sunshine?

Mr. LYNE. -
We have that too, and we do not thank South Australia or any of the other colonies for it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You do not appropriate it.

Mr. LYNE. -
We do appropriate it, and it assists us very much. I may tell honorable members that a suggestion has been already made—and I do not think it will be long before it is carried out—under which something like £2,000,000 will be appropriated towards conserving the water at the head of the Darling and along its channels. In addition to that, what we desire to have free power to do is to divert the flood waters, perhaps for 50 or 100 miles, from the Darling, on each side, into the depressions that exist in that vast and country. The Government of the day have done but little in this respect, but private enterprise in some parts has done a great deal. I will just give one instance of this. There are two stations belonging to Mr. Tyson down on the Lachlan near its junction with the murrumbidgee, and some years ago, in a very primitive way, he diverted a part of the Lachlan waters through a dry channel—in fact, he either deepened or made the channel most of the way—40 or 50 miles into the arid back country, where he was unable to keep stock until be carried out that work. In one depression alone, which I saw myself, he created a lake which at most times is 60 feet deep. Are we to be deprived of all the rights we have to do such useful work as this? Because, unless we can utilize the water in this way a great part of our colony will remain unproductive, or practically unproductive, as it has been in the past.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Does the water get back into the main current afterwards or remain there?

Mr. LYNE. -
Some of it will get back but a great deal remains. Of course where you fill up those immense basins it must remain or it is of no use.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If that would stop navigation do you think it is fair?

Mr. LYNE. -
I do not think it will have any effect on navigation, as it can only be done in time of flood or half-flood.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Then the Federal Parliament would allow it.

Mr. LYNE. -
We can do it now, and we do not want any Federal Parliament to interfere with our doing what is of infinite use to our colony. That is only one instance of the manner in which the waters in flood-time are and should be utilized. There are many schemes extending right up to the heads of the Darling to carry on this system to a very large extent, and it cannot interfere with the flow of the river at any particular time. It is only when the river is very low—lower than it is at present—that any complaint can possibly be made. At this moment there is one place on the Murrumbidgee where the river is not more than 10 feet wide-between Hay and Narrandera-and the stream is scarcely running at all. Now, if we give up our present power, no one could use the waters of the Murrumbidgee under such circumstances, as the whole of the present stream is required to flow down into South Australia. I do not think that Mr. Gordon, in his speech, which I have read, although I had not the pleasure of hearing it, showed one case of a Constitution containing the power which he desires to place in this Constitution.

Mr. GORDON. -
No other country has the same imperious necessity that we have to provide for this.

Mr. LYNE. -
I do not think that this is the only dry country in the world; I think there are other countries where they require to use the small supply of water they possess to the very best advantage, and I challenge the honorable member to show one instance where there is imported into the Constitution of any country the power he is trying to give the Federal Parliament here.

Mr. GORDON. -
The same might be said of a number of powers we are incorporating in this Constitution.

Mr. LYNE. -
I said just now that I think we are incorporating too many powers. The honorable member quoted some writers as to the moral right of those states below other states to get the full force and full supply of water which should come to them, but in no case—not in Canada, in the United States, or in any other country-can I find, or has he shown, the existence of the power which he is trying to import into this Constitution. You are proposing to do something that we have had no experience of at all in the history of the world.

Mr. GLYNN. -
In the Californian Constitution there is a similar power as between individuals.

Mr. LYNE. -
That law exists in each state in Australia now as regards individuals. If one individual on a watercourse above another attempts to take away the right of the water flowing to the second individual, of course he can be prevented by law from doing so.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Is not what is fair as between individuals fair as between one colony and another?
Mr. LYNE. -
I do not think the honorable member is putting the matter very fairly, because in the colony of South Australia you have the Murray channel only—you have no tributaries. You have a

Mr. GLYNN. -
Oh yes.

Mr. LYNE. -
It may be so, but I never heard of it. That being the case, there is very little danger of any such course being taken by the state higher up as would reduce the river below navigation level. But I would like to point out to honorable members that there is a very important factor to which I referred at the outset; it is this—Supposing you import this proposal into the Bill, and you lose federation as a consequence, are you better off for carrying it than you would be by allowing matters to remain as they are and getting federation of some sort? It has been stated that it is possible to make a compromise. I myself cannot see that it is possible to make any compromise in this respect that would not give power to interfere with the supply of water that would be available for irrigation purposes. And if it is not possible to make a compromise that would prevent the interference with water for irrigation purposes, it is not possible to make a compromise at all.

Mr. DOBSON. -
The Federal Parliament would not interfere improperly; it would give you ample justice.

Mr. LYNE. -
That may be so, but the people of New South Wales, at the present time, do not know that it would be so, and their votes would be likely to be out against a proposal which would make this a matter to be controlled by the Federal Parliament. They know what their rights are now; they do not know what they might be then. Now, I would like to say one word with reference to an interjection which I made when Mr. Symon was speaking and which I do not think he took in the spirit in which it was intended. He was stating that the proposal did not desire to take away a right which now exists, and I made an interjection to show that we have is New South Wales, as you have in Victoria, the right to deal with, or use for irrigation purposes, any water flowing through our territory. I said that if there was an attempt at interference at the present moment by any of the other states with that right, it would very soon be proved what our rights were, the diversion of water in any possible way. We can in the colony of New South Wales divert water from the Namoi, from the Darling, from any of the branches I have referred to, from the Lachlan, from the Murrumbidgee, or from the Murray. If you insert this provision in the Constitution the state of New South Wales will not have that power.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If you apply that principle to every subject there could be no Federal Constitution at all.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am now only arguing in answer to the remarks of Mr. Symon. He said he did not intend, or the South Australian delegates did not intend, to take away any right which exists at the present time, but they cannot possibly introduce a proposal of this kind without taking away a very strong right which exists, and one of those rights which are the life-blood of our colony as far as increasing its production is concerned. We have added practically a new state to New South Wales in the discovery and development of artesian water supply. Every one who knows anything of the interior of our colony knows what a great boon that has been to us, but it is not sufficient to develop our colony to the extent that it will stand development, or to which it should be developed, and we want the flood waters for utilization to a greater extent than the artesian water can be utilized. I admit that this question of irrigation is one which must grow. It cannot be carried out in a day or in a week. It must be years before it will grow to that stage when it will be utilized to the fullest extent, and it would be an unwise thing to attempt to do more than to let it grow in the manner I have described. But what has Queensland to say to this? Queensland has not, I regret to say, joined this Convention, but the waters that are attempted to be attacked in New South Wales extend into Queensland. The heads of the Darling run very far into Queensland-up to Toowoomba, and north up to the range which divides the Gulf waters from the southern waters. That being so, do you think we are not now doing something towards preventing Queensland from coming into the Federation at some future date? If we frame, a proper Constitution and agree to federate, Queensland must come in, and I have no doubt will come in in a few years, if not at first. But you are now proposing to take a right over these waters of that colony, whose necessities are similar to those of New South Wales, and, in doing that, you are adding something to the Convention Bill which will assist to keep Queensland from joining the Federation. I agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) in what he has said, and I think the Right Hon. Mr. Reid has also said the same. It is not intended, I believe, to interfere with commerce in any way—with the commerce between the colonies. In New South Wales we have never placed a toll or a preferential duty on the steamers plying into South Australia or into Victoria, in order to keep the trade to our own colony, although I admit that a considerable amount of trade has been taken from our railways along the Upper Darling through the navigation of the Darling and the Murray being kept open by New South Wales.

Mr. GLYNN. -
A proposal was suggested in 1893 in the report of Mr. McKinney.

Mr. LYNE. -
A proposal was once suggested in Parliament, but was not carried, and we must only judge from what was done. If there are to be no preferential rates on our railways, and if we are to have inter-colonial free-trade, it would be a most unjust thing to attempt to wage a war of tariffs on our rivers when we did not wage such a war on our railways.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I do not think you could do it legally.

[P.102] starts here

Mr. LYNE. -
We can do it now.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I do not think so.

Mr. LYNE. -
We can put a differential rate on our railways.

Mr. DOBSON. -
But not a toll on a navigable river.

Mr. LYNE. -
I am not a lawyer, but lawyers will support me, I think, in saying that there is no law to prevent New South Wales from putting a differential toll on the Murray, or at any rate on the Darling.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
That shows the absolute necessity for Mr. Gordon's amendment.

Mr. LYNE. -
I am trying to show that there is no necessity for it at all, because this has never been done, although we have power at present to do it.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

How oft the sight of means to do ill deeds
Makes ill deeds done.

Mr. LYNE. -
We have gone to considerable expense in opening the water-ways as highways of commerce, but we have never up to the present time attempted to put any differential rates on any water-way. The honorable member intends to include the Lachlan in his proposal. It has been said before-and as I have some particular acquaintance with the Lachlan I can say that it is true-that the Lachlan never has been navigable. It has never been used as a navigable stream, and you could never make it navigable unless you made a canal 10 miles long from the Murrumbidgee to the deeper waters of the Lachlan, and then you would have to snag the river and make it deeper before you could make it navigable. I emphatically say that, as far as I can judge, it would be a very great blot upon the Constitution, and a hindrance to the acceptance of the Convention Bill when it is framed, if you embodied in it a provision of this sort. It has been said that you only want to take rights which the Imperial Government have now. But, sir, I should like to know whether the Imperial Government would attempt in any way-they never have attempted-to dictate whether we should be allowed to take certain waters from the rivers for irrigation purposes, or be restricted to a certain supply, or whether we should make certain rivers navigable or not? I venture to think that the Imperial Government would never think for a moment of attempting to do anything of the kind. One word as to the Inter-State Commission. I do not think that we have yet decided what the powers of that commission shall be. There is a great diversity of opinion as to whether the Inter-State Commission should have full power and sway over the whole of our railways regarding differential rates-I do not say preferential rates; I think they should have power over preferential rates; I cannot see any objection to the Inter-State Commission having power over our preferential rates only. But if you carry this amendment the result will be to place the rivers of the whole of the colonies under the Inter-State Commission, as well as the railways of the colonies. I venture to hope that the proposal will not be carried out, and that the good sense of this Convention will be such that it will allow this Bill to go to the people of New South Wales, and the people of the other states, in such a form that it is likely to be acceptable to them. But if you insert this provision in the Bill, I do not think it will be acceptable. I believe that New South Wales will stand out altogether. Surely South Australia will not desire that; and that being so, I trust that the Convention will permit the Bill to remain in such a form as will cause it to be acceptable to the people of the largest state of the group.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

If I follow a representative of my own colony, it is not for the purpose of differing from him, but because his speech has brought more nearly home to me what I have already felt here and at Adelaide-that there is a very wide scope for misapprehension in regard to the amendment submitted to this committee. Many of the speeches that have been delivered have never really grappled with the points raised by the speeches made in favour of the amendment, and my object in rising is to very briefly see if an endeavour cannot be made to bring the discussion to a very narrow focus, for the purpose of ascertaining whether-I will not use the word compromise-an amendment may not be agreed to, which will give expression to what I believe to be the general sense of every member of this Convention, including both the representatives of South Australia and New South Wales. I do not understand that the representatives of South Australia desire to deprive us in New South Wales of the right, to use our waters for irrigation. I am quite certain no one in New South Wales has ever proposed to deprive South Australia of the advantage she possesses in the navigability of the River Murray. We are, I think, entitled to a recognition by this Convention of the justice with which we have treated the neighbouring colony of South Australia with regard to this matter. No one can point to one single act of an unfriendly character on the part of New South Wales towards South Australia with regard to the navigation of the River Murray. On the contrary, as my right honorable friend the Prime Minister of New South Wales has pointed out, we have spent large sums of money, amounting to nearly £1,000,000, in the improvement of the navigation of the Darling-I do not say for the purpose, but with the effect, of increasing the volume of trade which passes down the Murray along the borders of South Australia. We have refrained from exercising what is undoubtedly our legal right to impose tonnage or wharfage dues on the ships travelling on the Darling or on vessels on the northern banks of the River Murray; and I think we may fairly ask, as representing the great colony of New South Wales, when we have acted in that friendly and considerate spirit, that we should be credited with the desire and the intention to act in the same way in the future. I may say that until this question was raised in Adelaide I had no idea that there was any disputed river question in existence, and I know that many of my colleagues in New South Wales were in exactly the same state of ignorance. When my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Gordon) first mooted the question we thought he was doing it in that spirit of jocularity which so much endears him to this Convention. For it was difficult to believe that his action was intended as anything but a joke. Now, my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Deakin) in a speech the pregnancy of which will, I think, be more appreciated when it is read than perhaps it was even by those who listened to it, indicated that there was no real difficulty in the way of a solution, because the interests of the various colonies in the question of irrigation are not antagonistic. I propose to approach this question as a federal question, because I think that the body of expert opinion was accurately voiced by Mr. Deakin when he pointed out that even irrigation works cannot be carried out to any great advantage unless they are regarded as works properly belonging to the Federal Commonwealth, and intended to benefit not the particular locality in which they are made, but the whole Commonwealth. Whether we regard the navigation of a river or the use of its waters for irrigation purposes - in either view it is a federal purpose. Both irrigation and navigation are properly concerns of the Federal Government. I shall start with that admission, which, I am sure, will commend itself to the representatives of South Australia; and I will ask them, when I start with that proposition, to follow me, so that we may see if we cannot recognise that there is a means of giving effect to our conviction that both irrigation and navigation are matters of federal concern, and yet respect the just rights of either colony. The representatives of South Australia are concerned, I apprehend, to secure the availability of the River Murray for navigation at all periods of the year, and they are afraid, not of anything we have done, but of what they imagine we may do in some remote period of time if, say, we have a body of men in power who are utterly lost to all sense of decency and justice. May I put this consideration to them? If a body of selected representatives from South Australia, meeting with the solemnity and the responsibility which their position imposes upon them, think it likely that any New South Wales Ministry will be so forgetful of the simple obligations of right and wrong as to divert all the head-waters of the Murray for their own local selfish purposes to the destruction of the trade of a neighbouring colony, can they wonder that the uninstructed voter of New South Wales may entertain a similar feeling and view when he is asked (as they now ask him) to place his confidence blindly in the honour of an assemblage of gentlemen one-third of whom will be composed of those who express this little lack of confidence in the gentlemen whom they (the New South Wales people) will choose as their representatives; and when he is asked to put it within the power of that body to deprive him and his fellow colonists of the possibility of making any use of 140,000,000 acres of their land? I take it that we are desirous of dealing with this matter as a practical question, bearing in mind the best means of getting this Constitution accepted by the people. I do not believe that the Federal Parliament will do any injustice; but I ask the representatives of South Australia to believe also that we will not work injustice against them. And when they ask us to leave this matter to the Federal Parliament, we may ask them to bear in mind our previous conduct, which we think warrants us in asking them to repose some confidence in us. When my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Symon) was speaking, I asked him whether the amendment would not put it in the power of the Federal Parliament to prevent us from using one drop of the water for irrigation purposes. He rather avoided the question, but I understood him to admit, in fact, that it would put it in the power of the Federal Parliament to do so; but he said that the power would never be exercised. He said-"You have power to stop our waters." Well, the same reply may be made—that power will never be exercised. Why should we, as practical men, be somewhat vehemently discussing possibilities which are never likely to occur? It was stated in Adelaide by the Prime Minister of New South Wales that New South Wales will renounce any latent rights she may possess (because it would be unfederal and dishonest to exercise them) to interfere with the navigability of the Murray. And an amendment was drawn up in Adelaide, and accepted, as carrying out the intention of securing permanently for South Australia the free navigability of the River Murray.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Not accepted.

Mr. WISE. -
Carried there; therefore accepted there.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It was carried after division.

Mr. WISE. -
Surely we can easily hit upon a form of words which will absolutely secure that full effect shall be given to what was intended in Adelaide, that the navigability of the River Murray shall be a matter of federal concern to secure. I agree with Mr. O'Connor that the words are already sufficient, but if there is any doubt it will be got over by inserting immediately before the word "control" the words "maintenance and," so that the sub-section would read "the maintenance and control of the navigation of the River Murray."

Mr. SOLOMON. -
And its tributaries?

Mr. WISE. -
I will point out in a moment why the tributaries cannot be included. I will deal now, however, with the Murray. We have had a step in advance since we met in Adelaide. There what was asked for was control of the Murray, and now the South Australian representatives want to include its tributaries. If we give under this Constitution an absolute assurance that the Murray will not be interfered with, what cause of complaint will the... representatives of South Australia have?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What of the Darling?

Mr. WISE. -

That is another matter. If the word "maintenance" is inserted the Federal Parliament will have power to prevent the waters of the Murray being interfered with, and will secure to South Australia the rights which occupancy and property give in the head-waters of that great river. The honorable member (Mr. Solomon) interacted that we ought to go further, and give the Federal Parliament the power to deal with the maintenance, the control, and the regulation, not only of the River Murray, but also of the tributaries thereto. I am not going to repeat the arguments which have been used on the question of the abstract justice of this proposal, but I would point out one instance in which such a scheme would be practically unworkable. The Convention has decided, much to my regret, that the railways are not to be taken over by the federal authority. One of the tributaries to the Murray-the Darling-is at certain seasons navigable as far as Walgett. I am afraid to say how many miles that is from the mouth, but it is considerably over a thousand. The New South Wales Government is about to construct a railway to Walgett. Now, if the suggested amendment were made, the Federal Commonwealth would be able to impose competing rates upon the whole of the River Darling, which might compel us to close the railway which we are now about to make from Narrabri to Walgett.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The railways are made for the people, not the people for the railways.

Mr. WISE. -

I am one of those who wish that that doctrine should be so fully recognised that the railways should be taken over by the federal authority, but I am now dealing with facts as they exist, with matters upon which the Convention has already come to a determination. I am pointing out how unfair it would be to give the Federal Parliament control of these great waterways which lie wholly within the limits of one colony, when that control is not necessary to secure what we have been told is the main purpose of the representatives of South Australia-the navigability of the Murray. A possible, and almost necessary, result of this control would be that these water-ways would be used in competition to the railway system which has been made at the expense of New South Wales for the development of her resources. Take railways and rivers over together, and no one will give a more hearty support to the proposal than I shall give; but if the railways are left to the various colonies, you cannot, as a matter of practical justice to the great colony which I represent, give to the Federal Commonwealth the control of our rivers, which are the only dangerous competitors to our railway system within our own borders. After the discussion which has taken place, it is only just that the people of New South Wales should have some guarantee that the power of maintaining and controlling navigation-assuming the amendment to be adopted-will not be used in such a way as to deprive us of the right to improve our land by irrigation. I therefore suggest that the following words should be added to the sub-section:

But not so as to prevent the reasonable user of the said waters for the purposes of irrigation.

The sub-section would then read:

The maintenance, control, and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof, from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea, but not so as to prevent the reasonable user of the said waters for the purposes of irrigation.

Mr. DOBSON. - By New South Wales?

Mr. WISE. - By every colony.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Would you still have the limitation as to the commencing point in the Murray?

Mr. WISE. - I do not think that is necessary.

Mr. KINGSTON. - Is not the honorable and learned gentleman's suggested amendment a limitation of the powers already conferred by the Bill upon the Federal Parliament?

Mr. WISE. - No.

Mr. ISAACS. - Who would be the judge of the reasonableness of the user?

Mr. WISE. - The Inter-State Commission.

Mr. SOLOMON. - If you inserted "and its tributaries" after the word "Murray" you would be giving a concession, and we might be inclined to meet you.
Mr. WISE. -

Is not the word "concession" misapplied? It is said that this is a matter in which the colonies of New South Wales and South Australia alone are interested; but in what different degrees are these colonies interested? South Australia interested in getting something which she has not got at the present time, while we are interested in keeping something which we already enjoy. That is why we offer, in what appears to me a perfectly fair way, to deprive ourselves of the power to exercise any rights which can reasonably be said to interfere with the rights of South Australia. But how can the right of our people to use the waters of the Darling at Walgett—provided that we keep the river open for navigation at the point where it enters South Australia—affect Western Australia, Tasmania, or even South Australia?

Mr. GLYNN. -

The right to navigation as far as Wentworth only is useless to South Australia.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

We have already got that without any concession.

Mr. WISE. -

By our permission, and subject to our good-will. I am afraid I have not made myself understood. I have endeavoured to approach this matter in a federal Spirit, and because I am prepared to trust the Supreme Court of the Federation or the Inter-State Commission with the determination of the question whether the use of the water will interfere excessively with navigation, an outcry is made—by whom? By the representatives of South Australia, who have been asking us all along to trust the Federal Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the words the honorable and learned member proposes to insert are not inserted it will be left to the Federal Parliament to judge of the necessity to come to a determination.

Mr. WISE. -

I do not think so. I do not know how any body of men appointed to interpret these clauses of the Constitution can come to any other conclusion than that they were drawn for the purpose of securing the navigation of the River Murray to the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Hear, hear; they have no right to consider irrigation.

Mr. WISE. -

Do honorable members wish that our right to use the water for irrigation should be preserved? If so, what is the objection to an amendment which will enable an independent body to determine whether our claim interferes with yours?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Is the honorable member willing to secure that the Darling should be navigable so far as nature has made it navigable?

Mr. WISE. -

I have no objection to that whatever; the objection I take is to such a wide vague amendment as that suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Solomon) which provides that South Wales themselves. It is not a question of trusting people, it is a question of committing the administration of an important national resource to the people who understand how to use it, or of committing it to a body of strangers, who, from mere ignorance, will not be able to use it properly.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You desire to have the right to monopolize that water.

Mr. WISE. -

I do not desire to propose any amendment now, because I think that a good deal may be done by quiet conversation, but I should like to see an amendment framed to provide that it should be in the power of the Inter-State Commission, or somebody to be appointed by the Federal Parliament, to adjust the rival claims of irrigation and navigation, and to prevent the navigability of the Murray becoming the dominant object of the Constitution to the deprivation of the settlers of New South Wales of the right to use the water of this river for the irrigation of their lands.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable and learned member agrees that some body should have the right to control the New South Wales Parliament in its dealings with the water of the Darling.

Mr. WISE. -

I am speaking of the Murray at the present time. The implied powers of the commission will extend to the Darling, to prevent any obstruction to the flow of the Murray.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Then why not say so?

Mr. WISE. -

Because, as a matter of practice, to give the power directly would entitle the commission to exercise jurisdiction over every part of these great water-courses, and in regard to every matter connected with them. The honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) mentioned a fact which perhaps has not impressed the Convention as it should have impressed them, that over £3,000,000 of private money have been expended in New South Wales in the last few years upon the pledge of the Government that the right to the use of the water would be given to the people who have carried out the expenditure.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Has the honorable and learned gentleman a fear that the Federal Parliament would refuse that right?
Mr. WISE. -
I dare say not but if the honorable member were in the position of the people who spent this money, would he give his vote for federation and take the risk? Would he advise any one who came to him for counsel to hand over his property to four or five others and trust them to make a fair division afterwards? I do not think he would. There should be an independent body to which all questions in dispute might be referred. I do not think it is beyond the power of the Convention to arrive at some form of words which will constitute a body with final power to adjust rival claims.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Does the honorable and learned member admit in any way whatever that the Parliament of New South Wales should be controlled in its powers in regard to the use of river water for irrigation?
Mr. WISE. -
Certainly.
Mr. ISAACS. -
If the honorable and learned member makes that admission, no doubt a provision can be framed to suit him.
Mr. WISE. -
Speaking for myself alone, I am prepared to make the admission. What I would not admit is that an authority should be constituted which, by the very terms of the jurisdiction conferred upon it, should be entitled to a roving commission to go from one end of our territory to another, without whose consent not one ounce of water could be taken for irrigation purposes.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
There is a very small difference between the honorable and learned member and the honorable member, Mr. Gordon.
Mr. WISE. -
I began my remarks by saying that there is the widest opening for misunderstanding in this discussion. I agree with almost every word uttered the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) just as I thought I disagreed with every word spoken by the honorable member (Mr. Gordon). The difficulty arises from having too wide an amendment. This has led to consequences which the mover of the amendment probably did not foresee; but it is a difficulty which ought to be, and which I trust will be, overcome. Before I conclude I should like to make two or three observations upon the general aspect of the case. Reference has been made to the analogies of foreign countries. Since these remarks were made, I think by Mr. Gordon, I have taken the trouble to look up the foundation of the law relating to the control of rivers running through various countries in Europe. I find that it rests—and I am not going to weary the Convention by citing authorities at length—on certain articles in the Congress of Vienna, which can be seen in the Library, and that those articles are strictly limited to the rivers. The Inter-State Commission has no power whatever to exercise a single act of authority over any of the tributaries.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There is no attempt there to draw the water away in large volumes.

Mr. WISE. -

No, and there has been no such attempt here. I regard Mr. Deakin as somewhat of an expert on this question. I understood him to say, and I think correctly, that a well-devised scheme of irrigation would have the effect of adding to the volume of available water in a river rather than of diminishing it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Might have.

Mr. WISE. -

At all events, it is not necessary that the use of water for irrigation purposes, if it is properly conserved and properly applied, should impair the navigability of a river.

Mr. LYNE. -

With proper methods it would increase the volume of the water.

Mr. WISE. -

Mr. Lyne, who speaks with authority, assures me that if water were conserved for irrigation purposes, and proper methods were adopted, the volume of water in the main stream would be increased and not diminished. To show how small the matter we are contending for is, I am privileged in having the opportunity of reading a telegram sent by one of the highest scientific authorities in Australia, Mr. H.C. Russell, the Government Astronomer of New South Wales. I think the Convention will be surprised if these facts can be accepted, as I do not doubt they can, to see what a trivial matter this dispute is about. Mr. Barton wired in these terms, under date 21st January:

Kindly wire immediately your estimate of average quantity of water which runs out of the Murray into the sea yearly, and the quantity which, under a system of looking, might be used by New South Wales without impairing the river navigation in its course below our boundary. Do you think any conservation scheme likely to be adopted in Sydney would probably impair South Australia's facilities for navigation?

Mr. Russell's answer is as follows:

The average quantity of water which runs out of the Murray into the sea each year amounts to 3,000,000 of tons of water on each square degree of the Murray basin, and would maintain the river constantly 10 feet deep at Euston. I estimate that 10 per cent. of this would cover all that would be used under a system of locking, and this would not impair the river navigation below the boundary.

I do not pretend to speak upon this matter at all with the authority of an expert, but I do say that the receipt of a telegram of this nature from Mr. Russell justifies us in paying the greatest possible attention to some words that were used at Adelaide by Mr. Deakin. Mr. Deakin was urging Mr. Gordon to withdraw his amendment, and he pointed out that the time was not yet ripe for determining the matter in dispute or including a question of so much difficulty and importance in the Federal Constitution. He said-

There is no reason why some arrangement should not be made between the several colonies before this Constitution can be accepted. The work of collecting data must go on for some time before any colony can risk the loss of any of its rights and privileges-rights and privileges which mean life and subsistence to those inhabiting the and interior of these colonies. Before the colonies can enter into any inter-colonial agreement there must be a far more searching inquiry, and the accumulation of a great many more data than are at present amassed. Before any conference or committee could venture to arrive at a settlement of this great and vexed question, which must be settled-but which cannot be settled here-we must be much better acquainted than we are with the needs and possibilities of our vast arid-area.

After having listened to words of warning of that kind from one who has made a study of this question of irrigation, and having obtained such information from the highest scientific authority to whom we could apply, can it be wondered at that those of us who are charged with a trust on behalf of the people of New South Wales should hesitate before we come to an agreement which would put absolutely at the disposal of a body whose composition is not yet known the power of dealing with one of their most valuable assets? We meet you very fairly if we say we will surrender any power which we may at present possess to injure you. We may fairly ask you to be content with that, and not to insist upon depriving us of the advantage of having inserted in the Constitution a clause for our own protection in regard to one of the most vital matters of self-interest. You who represent the smaller-colonies contended strenuously for equal representation in the Senate, and did so upon a ground I supported—that it was necessary for you, in the Federal Constitution, however much you might be willing to trust the Federal Parliament, to have an enduring embodiment and safeguard of your vital national interests. To us it is just as vital that we should have the control of our public lands. The use and control of our public lands is impossible unless we are allowed to have also the power of making use of the waters of our rivers for the purposes of irrigation. Do we not meet you perfectly fairly when we say that we are willing to comment to the appointment of a body that shall hold a just balance between navigation and irrigation, relying upon either the justice of the Federal Parliament or the integrity of the judicial body whom the Federal Parliament will appoint to see that the interests of both colonies are protected? I do venture to express the hope that before the debate closes a practicable way will be found out of this difficulty, which does not appear to be nearly as great as has been represented, owing in part to the vagueness of the amendment. I press on Mr. Gordon to withdraw his amendment. If it be the sense of the committee, I will move now that we insert the word "maintenance" before the word "control" in the earlier part of the clause. If the committee would prefer it, the discussion might be allowed to proceed a little further, and some form of words might then be agreed to which would conserve the legitimate interests of either colony.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

The difficulties that we have to contend with in connexion with the question of the control of our rivers seems to be somewhat increased, as Mr. Wise has stated, by the vagueness of the amendment. If the honorable member would read the succeeding amendments, he would find that they are not so vague as he chooses to think. The honorable member expresses the opinion that the representatives of New South Wales would be quite prepared to concede all the rights that the representatives of South Australia claim as to the navigation of the Murray. But while he admits that this is a question for absolute federal control—a question upon which we should trust the Federal Parliament—he tells us that the control of the Darling, the Murrumbidgee, and the other tributaries which have a vital influence on the waters of the Murray should be left to the sweet will of New South Wales alone. We have heard a good deal of the sentiment—"Trust in the Federal Parliament." We heard to-day from the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales that this sentiment is not one of those which should be used except on occasions when you are in a very tight corner and do not know what other argument is possible. I have been inclined, in my innocence of political life, perhaps to construe this sentiment of "Trust in the Federal Parliament" more liberally than the honorable member has done. If we are prepared to hand over to the Federal Parliament, as we do in this Constitution, the control of many great and important subjects, such as our post offices, our telegraphs, our defences, immigration and emigration, and a host of others which I need not particularize, surely on a question of this kind, which might be a serious cause of friction, and friction which, if the colonies were more nearly on a level in the matter of population and importance, might lead to warfare, we might trust the Federal Parliament to act as arbiters. I cannot for the life of me understand why so many of the representatives of New South Wales, while agreeing that the Federal Parliament is not likely to do injustice, still fight against giving it any powers which affect their particular colony. It is all very well for some of those honorable members to tell us, as they have told us over and over again during the sittings of this Convention, that if the representatives of the smaller colonies, who are not particularly interested in some vital point, allow themselves to be led astray by the arguments of this or that colony, and vote in a particular direction, the Constitution will be such as they, the representatives of New South Wales cannot recommend to the people of New South Wales. I confess that I, for one, am nearly sick of the continuous raising of this bogey. It is all very well for Mr. Wise to say that on the question of the rights of the states to equal representation in the Senate, New South Wales or some of its members gave way. There was no doubt about that point. If it had not been conceded early in the meetings of the Convention, there would have been no federation, and no question of it. In South Australia equal representation was a sine qua non of federation. It would have been useless to continue the debates of the Convention if that one point had not been conceded by a majority of honorable members at the start.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If New South Wales had her due weight she would not be afraid to trust this question to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

New South Wales will have her due weight. She will have a large representation in the Lower House, which will have the power of the purse. She will not only have her due weight, but, as far as my opinion is concerned, very much greater weight than the simple value of her population entitles her to. She will get a representation in the House which will have most to say on all leading questions, the House which will control the purse, control the Government, and, to a great extent, control the policy of the Federal Parliament, above that of any of the other colonies. As to the question of the Senate having a veto, in most matters it is a veto that would only be exercised in the most difficult and most important circumstances, and that would be exercised with the very greatest care.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member think that his remarks are strictly pertinent to the question?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I am speaking now in answer to an interjection. Other questions have arisen in which we have been told that New South Wales could not come into the Federation unless what she demanded was conceded. We have heard to-day from the Right Honorable the Premier of New South Wales that "Trust in the Federal Parliament" is a sentiment that is only to be used when one gets into a corner, and has no other outlet. Another member of the New South Wales delegation (Mr. Lyne) has told us, with a great deal of self-congratulation, that we should consider ourselves extremely lucky.

He points out that New South Wales has not imposed differential tolls upon traffic on the Darling which would completely rain our trade on the river, and suggests that the experience of the past may be repeated in the future. It seems to me that this is a question that might reasonably be left, if we intend to trust the federal authority with anything at all, to the Commonwealth Parliament, considering, as we may do, how that federal authority will be constituted—considering that it will be somewhat of the type of this Convention, having a large number of its members not interested vitally so far as their constituents are concerned in this great question, and not influenced by inter-colonial jealousies. We may well trust such a Parliament with a question of this kind. The honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) has made a comparison between the rivers of Europe and America and the rivers of Australia, for the purpose of drawing this conclusion: That whereas the rivers of Europe and America are such magnificent streams, the mere taking of any portion of their waters does not affect the rights of those living in the lower portions of those countries.
through which they flow; and that, on the other hand, we have rivers in Australia which are dry for a considerable portion of the year, and the waters of which are very much more valuable to the states through which they flow than they are in other countries. What is to be deduced from such an argument? Is it that we have less need for legislation and power of arbitration in such a matter; or is it not rather that here, where we have rivers which are dry in certain seasons of the year, and where the waters are so much more valuable to the people on their banks than is the case in Europe and America, there is all the more need of federal independent authority to control the use of those waters? The amendment of the House of Assembly of South Australia proposes simply to add, after the word "Murray," the words "and its tributaries, and the use of the waters thereof," omitting all the rest of the words. Judging from the arguments of the last speaker-and I followed them pretty closely-I gathered that this amendment should very nearly meet the position laid down by himself and other members representing New South Wales. All that South Australia really claims, or asks for, is a fair right that the navigation of the Murray River and its tributaries should be preserved. As to the question of irrigation, I really do not think that the delegates of South Australia need have very much anxiety about it if the navigation of the Murray and its tributaries-

An HONORABLE MEMBER. - So far as navigable.

Mr. SOLOMON. - Yes; I do not refer to all the little streams, creeks, and branches which stretch out to the borders of Queensland, because, after all said and done with regard to the waters of the Darling, in the wet seasons New South Wales is indebted to Queensland. If Queensland tried to impound those waters and prevent them from flowing into the Darling during wet seasons, the New South Wales delegates would be just as eager to have the question referred to an independent tribunal as we are at the present time. If the New South Wales delegates were prepared to accept a slight amendment of sub-section (31) as it stands, so as to include these words, "and its tributaries," and if they like they could put in the words "navigable tributaries," so as not to include all the smaller streams and creeks that feed the reaches of the Upper Darling-

Mr. WISE. - That would introduce a lot of difficulty with regard to the interpretation of "navigable."

Mr. SOLOMON. - "Navigable" cannot be defined in any Act; it is a question for expert
Mr. WISE. -

According to English common law no river is navigable unless the tide ebbs and flows in it.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I am not so presumptuous as to debate decisions under English common law with so many learned members in this Convention. I would rather do away with all questions of law, and consider the question of natural justice as it affects the colonists of the various states. If we put in this Bill simply that the control and regulation of the Murray and its navigable tributaries should be placed in the hands of the federal power, we shall be meeting New South Wales as far as irrigation is concerned, and I think we may meet the requirements of the people of South Australia. As to irrigation, a great deal too much has been made of it. I do not agree with those speakers who say that the impounding of the waters of the Darling for great irrigation works might tend to keep the navigation of the lower portions of this stream open for a greater portion of the year. I think, on the other hand, our experience has been that the taking away of the waters for irrigation, especially at great distances, from the banks of the stream-such as was proposed in the last scheme in New South Wales, storing it first in natural lakes or depressions-does decrease the flow in the river unless the filling of these lakes and depressions and artificial reservoirs is completed in seasons when there is an overflow of water, and when it can be done without injustice to the lower portions of the river. Here is an instance where the federal authority could best exercise control. It should be able to say to the authorities in New South Wales: If you construct immense works far up the Darling these reservoirs should be filled only in such seasons and at such times as will not do an irreparable injury to those who occupy the country lower down the stream. For this reason I think that the suggestion of the right honorable member (Mr. Kingston) might very well be considered by honorable members. He suggested that if this question of irrigation is made of such moment in New South Wales we might well accept some compromise which would simply deal with the navigation—which would simply place in the hands, of the Federal Parliament the protection of the navigation of the Murray, and for that purpose the control of the Darling, and the Murrumbidgee, above it. I do not say that the amendment of the House of Assembly of South Australia fully and completely meets the case, but when it is sought to add, after the amendment of my honorable friend has been dealt with, the words "and its tributaries" after the word
"Murray," I feel that it would be necessary to insert an additional word. We have no idea when we say the "Murray and its tributaries" of including every creek and little stream in the watershed of the Murray, the Darling, and the Murrumbidgee, and placing them under the control of the Federal Parliament. If the word "navigable" were introduced before the word "tributaries," I believe that we should meet the wishes of many of the representatives of New South Wales, and prevent an injustice being done at any time to the people of South Australia. It is not my desire to delay the Convention at any great length, although I consider that this in one of the most important points we have to deal with. But I do hope, following on the lines indicated by the right honorable member (Mr. Kingston) and also by the honorable member (Mr. Wise) although not so clearly, that the Convention will see its way to come to a compromise on this question. An amendment should be so framed as to protect the navigation of these rivers without in any way interfering with the necessities of New South Wales with regard to water for irrigation purposes.

As this debate has proceeded, there have been really two separate points made. One is, the rivers of Australia treated as navigable; the other, the rivers of Australia as used for other purposes, irrigation, or whatever the case may be. As far as the first is concerned, the Premier of New South Wales says it was never contemplated that there should be any interference with the navigability of that which is navigable. At the same time, I cannot help remembering that he said that during some portions of the year, or at times, the river was not always navigable; that it was only a series of ponds, and that there might arise doubts. However, those doubts do not occur to me, nor have I the fears expressed by the honorable member (Mr. Wise) with reference to the construction that might be placed on what is meant by a "navigable streams" I have no doubt that if it came to be a question of legal construction, the meaning of the words "navigable stream would be taken in connexion with its surroundings, and that the question would be decided from an American stand-point rather than in accordance with the decisions in England. The next question we have to consider now is not whether under the general Constitution this clause we have inserted is practically unnecessary, and whether or not, under the general provision of trade and commerce, which contains all the words in the American Constitution, we have all the protection we require. The question, first of all, is whether we should leave this entirely to judicial decision, or, when we are making a new Constitution, we should place our meaning in plain and unmistakable words. Seeing that we are all agreed as to the intention of the Constitution to prevent, one state from interfering with navigable streams so as to interfere with their navigability, I do not think there can be very much harm in saying something that will convey that impression without our being forced to litigation and judicial decision. But the matter does not end there, because, as was pointed out exceedingly well by the Premier of South Australia, the matter rests in these colonies on an alternative basis, to which we have to give every consideration. It may well be in the future that the navigability of any river we have would bear no comparison in the interests of each of the states with its uses for other purposes. If we only use in our Constitution words providing that the rivers which are now navigable shall be kept navigable, we may have to go through the complicated process which will be necessary to alter the Constitution before we can do what, perhaps, every man in the state thinks ought to be done. I listened with great interest to th

Does not the Murray concern us?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Not after it leaves New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

We gave up some hundreds of miles of the Murray.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not want to go into elaborations. I concede that New South Wales gave up something, but they took a good deal more. They only began to give up something where the Murray bounded themselves and Victoria. They handed over to the Commonwealth the course of the river along that boundary, and, with equal generosity, they handed over to the Commonwealth all the river where it belonged to South Australia, and gave us, or rather intended to give us, nothing in return. I do not know that they did not give us something. I am inclined to think that, as time went on, and as appeals were made to the judicial tribunals, it would be found that they had given more than they intended to give up. But, still, that would be a bad understanding on which to make a friendly arrangement. We believe that they are giving up something they did not intend to give up; but I think that this agreement ought to begin with a perfect understanding, and not with any of us having any well founded opinion in our minds that by the force of judicial decisions a result will be obtained different from what was intended at the time we made the agreement. Now there is no wish, as has been said, to interfere with the rights of New South Wales. I have no doubt that the Commonwealth will do every justice to that colony, and I have no doubt that New South Wales will have the power in the Commonwealth to compel justice to be done to them, even if there were any disposition on the part of some to do them less than justice; but I protest, in the first instance, against the supposition that the Commonwealth will be founded in injustice, and will have no disposition to do justice to the different states, and it is only in a secondary way that I put it that, even if it was intended to do that injustice, with the power that New South Wales would be able to exercise, there would be no possibility of carrying such an intention into effect. The Murray runs through the territory of three colonies. Let it be the subject of the control which we have already agreed to on matters of much more importance, and of more vital interest to us. Having shown all the trust we possess on those more important and more vital questions, do not let us show distrust on this particular question, which is as peculiarly a federal concern as any other matter within the four corners of this Bill, and of as much interest to all Australia as the provisions with regard to free-trade and other things. We give the Federal Parliament power to pass social legislation of the highest importance; we hand over to them our dearest relation-the relations of parent and child; we give them unlimited power of taxation; we commit to them the whole of our commerce by telling them that they, and they alone, shall settle the bounds of taxation and other important powers, and then, forsooth, we are to begin by distrusting them in a matter which may, in the outcome, prove infinitely small in importance, or which may, in the outcome, prove large, although I do not think it will, but which, though it prove unimportant, may well produce infinite irritation. We are asked to hold our hands and refuse to transfer to the Federal Parliament the power to control the navigable rivers of Australia, because New South Wales says-"We have the River Murray, under our Constitution-how can we be interfered with?" Well, we all have everything under our Constitutions, and we are all, handing over something-we are all making sacrifices. The very essence of the agreement is the handing over of jurisdiction that we exclusively possess, and we only ask New South Wales, who is already willing to make concessions infinitely greater, not to let the sweetness of the agreement be interfered with by the possibility of friction on a matter of smaller moment like the one now under consideration. I agree with Mr. Kingston that we ought to go further than anybody has proposed up to the present time-that, in the ordinary course of our natural life, circumstances may occur that may make the navigation of our rivers trifling and contemptible compared with their importance for other uses; and, therefore, I think it would be well to so broadly frame our provision with regard to rivers as to preserve their navigability only so far as is necessary-to except from that liability the necessities of each state, which may be found out and developed from time to time. From that point of view I beg to submit an amendment. If honorable members have any prior amendments-I do not know that they have-I will ask them to withdraw them to enable me to get a test by proposing, as I now do, the omission from sub-section (31) of all the words after "The control and regulation of," with a view to the insertion of the words-all navigable streams, but so as not to prevent the fair and reasonable use by each state of the waters thereof for irrigation or other reasonable purposes.

The effect of adopting that amendment will be that it will be in the power of the Commonwealth to preserve the navigability of the rivers, if they are navigable, and the Commonwealth will have no control if the rivers are not navigable.

Mr. LYNE. - Would that embrace all the rivers?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. - I think, it would be better to put no limitation. We do not know exactly where it will begin, and how it will end. First of all, I seek to make the primary object the preservation of the navigability of such streams as an navigable, but, at the same time, should circumstances require it, and the opinion of the Commonwealth sanction it, to allow that navigability to be interfered with by the necessary use by each state of what is fair and reasonable for their own purposes. The effect of my amendment will be simply this-instead of having an appeal to the discretion of the Imperial Parliament to alter the Constitution and restrict the rights of any particular state that is so using its powers as to be injuring other states, to give the Commonwealth that power. That is the cardinal idea that has been actuating us all through. We say:"We are brothers, and we want to be fair and just. We will be fair and just, and we will establish a Constitution on such lines that we cannot but be fair and just." And yet, when this very subsidiary matter crops up, New South Wales says:"We have got absolute power over these rivers," whereas they have not in reality, because the Imperial Parliament can control their power. But the basis on which we all act on these matters of purely Australian concern is that we do not wish to appeal to the Imperial Parliament, but to establish a Federal Constitution on just lines, which will enable us to deal with our own affairs without appealing to anybody outside. It is from that point of view that I move this amendment, not at all desiring to adhere slavishly to its words, but quite slavishly to the idea of the amendment. I think we should not define any particular stream. I entirely object to defining the Murray. I entirely object to the provision as inserted in Adelaide. I objected at the time. I considered that so far from its being an extension of our authority, it was a distinct limitation of it, because under the general scope of the Bill we already had the control of the Murray, and of every other navigable stream within the Commonwealth. so as to preserve the navigation thereof. That would follow from the other portions of the Bill. The only necessity of any provision being inserted was to insure the use of water for purposes other than navigation, and when we inserted that provision we put a strong argument into the mouths of those who chose to argue that, even as to navigability, the River Murray, in the colony of New South Wales, was outside the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth, and possibly we may have settled the question of tributaries, or, at all events, have offered a strong argument that the Commonwealth would have no concern with the tributaries. Now, I have no particular desire to see any words introduced in respect of the tributaries.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But you want to cover them.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think that if a stream is navigable it must be made navigable from water supplied from somewhere else, and when the Commonwealth has the control of the navigability of the stream it will have the control of everything that is necessary to make that stream navigable. About that I think there is no doubt. I do not want to use too many words in my amendment. I would like to use fewer words than I have done, if any honorable member can suggest them-the fewest possible words which will give the greatest possible jurisdiction, covering words-and I only suggest these words because I fancy that they convey an idea which is in the minds of a great many members of the Convention at the present time. The New South Wales representatives say-"Certainly, as far as any portion of the rivers in Australia are navigable, empower the Commonwealth to protect the navigability of those rivers, but, as far as the use of the water of the rivers of New South Wales for irrigation is concerned, you must leave us to ourselves." The result of that might be disastrous, because if the commanding condition is that the navigability is to be preserved, then New South Wales would not have the power to use the water they required for themselves, and the results would be injurious to all. Therefore, make the navigability of the rivers your first consideration, but make this qualification of it, that anything fair and reasonable-and the Commonwealth would be the judge of that—can be done by any state for the purpose of using the waters for irrigation or any other purpose, even though it destroys their navigability. I think if we have an understanding founded on that basis we shall, at all events, begin well, and we will have no necessity to appeal either to arms, which we cannot appeal to, or to the Imperial Parliament, which I am sure we wish to appeal to as little as possible.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does the honorable member's amendment include navigable streams purely within a state?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I thought at first of inserting the words "running through two or more states."

Mr. ISAACS. -

But I mean to say not open to interstate commerce.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think the power of the Commonwealth should not be limited. I do not think there is much fear of its being exercised unjustly. As far as my amendment is concerned, I will be very willing to listen to any suggestions other honorable members have to make, but I thought, on consideration, that to impose a limitation like that might be to raise very difficult questions, and to very much interfere with the power which the Commonwealth can, but need not, exercise in its discretion, and to limit the usefulness of that power at a time when we wish to exercise it.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Inasmuch as the amendment suggested by the honorable and learned member (Sir John Downer) comes before the amendment which is now before the committee, it will be necessary that the latter should be withdrawn in order to enable the other to be put.

Mr. GORDON. -

I will withdraw it with pleasure.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I would suggest to my honorable and learned friend (Sir John Downer) not to move his amendment now. If my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) withdraws his amendment, I would like to move the one I suggested, namely, to insert the word "maintenance," which would come before the amendment of Sir John Downer.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I have another amendment here.

Mr. WISE. -

I would suggest to honorable members that they should submit their amendments for consideration and that we should then adjourn.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This is a matter of such vital importance having heard other members' views on the question, I do not wish to speak myself to-day—I think it will be desirable thing, as we shall be adjourning within three-quarters of an hour, that a vote should not be taken to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will not put Sir John Downer's amendment. I shall keep it as a suggestion.

Mr. GORDON. -

I withdraw my request for leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

In that case I am anxious at this stage to hand in a form of words I have drawn up, having listened to the debate with a great deal of care, and seeing that the Convention is going to come to a conclusion which very likely we can adopt. I have long thought that the difficulty with us is more in clearing our own ideas than in trying to reconcile conflicting views, and, if I may say so, I agree heartily with the object which the honorable member (Sir John Downer) has in the words of his amendment. The only thing is how we can best secure the approbation of the whole Convention on an important matter of this sort. I think that the words of his amendment are a little too broad, in that they give to the Federation the control of the rivers; and then with regard to showing that the state has a right to interfere for irrigation or for reasonable purposes, it puts on the state the burden of showing a justification for interfering with the waters flowing through it. I think that the burden of proof ought to be the other way. Having regard to the fact that the lands of the colonies still remain under the control of the state Parliaments, to be administered by the states, I think it proper to say that the waters which go through those lands should be absolutely under the control of the states, except for the specific purpose of the navigability of navigable waters. It is very important to put on the Federal Parliament the burden of showing a right to interfere, and therefore, I put the matter in this form—"To secure the navigability of all navigable waters which, in the course of their flow or after joining other waters, touch the limits of more than one state." In this amendment my honorable friend (Sir John Downer) uses the word "streams," and a question may arise whether that word involves main streams or whether it involves all tributaries, no matter how small they may be.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

"Navigable streams."
Mr. HIGGINS. -

Suppose the Edwards a navigable; a question may arise as to whether there was any intention to affect a tributary like the Edwards. I take it that the intention of a majority of the members of this Convention is to preserve the navigability of the Edwards although it is a tributary. And, therefore, I have got the word "waters" defined in this way "which in the course of their flow, or after joining other waters, touch the limits of more than one state." I think honorable members will see that there is no doubt that, under those words, the Edwards, the Murrumbidgee, and all other tributaries would be included if, and so far as, they are navigable. As I spoke on Friday, I do not feel justified in making another speech. I only rose to make this suggestion. Of course I will not press it if, after the deliberations which are to take place, I understand, on the adjournment of the Convention, between the representatives of South Australia; and the representatives of New South Wales, it be found that any other form of words will meet the purpose. I only hand it in as my mite towards the solution of this question.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member intend this to be in substitution of the clause?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, just in the same way as Sir John Downer's proposal is intended to be.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK (Tasmania). -

The leader of the Convention very much anticipated what I was about to say. What I was about to recommend, and what I will recommend now, is that we shall take no division on this subject this evening, but that those immediately concerned shall have an opportunity, between this sitting and to-morrow's sitting, of considering some means by which we can arrive at a unanimous and amicable settlement of the subject. It seems to me that there is very little that need divide South Australia and New South Wales in this matter. The representatives of both colonies, I believe, are animated by an earnest and honorable desire to settle the question of the control of these waters on terms fair to each colony, and, necessarily, all the other members of the Convention must have the same desire; and, inasmuch as we find that South Australia disclaims the idea that she would deprive New South Wales of the right of irrigating from her waters, and New South Wales disclaims the idea of interfering with the navigation of the Murray, I do not see any real difficulty in the way of that amicable solution which we all desire to see brought about. I believe that the Bill, as it stands-for some of the lawyers in the Convention are of that opinion—contains a provision which sufficiently safeguards South Australia in regard to the use or misuse by New South Wales of the waters that make the Murray River. But if the provision we have already be not sufficient, there is a disposition on the part of both colonies to make some further specification to make the matter clearer than it now stands, so that the interests of those concerned in the navigation of the Murray shall be absolutely safeguarded. Although their waters cannot be taken from Tasmania and Western Australia, and although those colonies can hope for nothing from the waters of the rest of Australia, still they have a very material interest in this question, when it comes to be a matter of federal concern, because it is quite possible that the Federal Government, supported by the Federal Parliament, may go in for a very costly system of irrigation works, and a very costly system of locking the tributaries of the Murray; and there is no doubt that, if that were done, Western Australia and Tasmania would have to share the cost. They would gladly share any expenditure it was desirable, in the interests of Australia as a whole, that they should share. I merely mention the fact to show that we have a living, if only a prospective, interest in the solution of this question. I support the proposal of the leader of the Convention.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales) -

As one who is fairly well acquainted with most of the rivers running through New South Wales, it has always struck me that it was unjust to that colony that the right to deal with these rivers, starting in the New England district, and extending right down the Darling to the Murray, for the purpose of developing her territory, should be taken away from that state. We have heard a great deal about the difficulties in federating our railways, and one of the strongest arguments used against the federation of the railways was that if the Commonwealth controlled the railways, the states would be unable to develop their respective territories. With regard to these rivers, so long as the control of the navigation alone is given to the Commonwealth, and not interfering with the rights of irrigation in regard to the state, I can see very little difficulty in it. I am one of those who believe it is incompatible to have navigation and irrigation. We have no source of supply in Australia which gives sufficient water for both purposes, and if the Darling River is made navigable in ordinary seasons, as it is in flood-times, from Walgett to Wentworth, then in dry seasons there will be absolutely no water for irrigation. Now we in New South Wales look forward to the development of an enormous territory lying away to the west of the Darling, and lying to the east from the junction of the Narran River. We hope by means of irrigation to be able to occupy that country. At the present time we have from 7,000,000 to 10,000,000 of acres of land in that country absolutely unoccupied from the want of water and through the presence of the rabbits. If the control of this river and every subsidiary stream is to be taken away from the state, then you may say good-bye to settlement in that portion of the territory of New South Wales. It will be absolutely impossible to settle that country, unless the state can establish a system of irrigation to supply water throughout the length and breadth of it. People, unless they have travelled through that country, can have no conception of the magnitude of its area. Most of these rivers which are spoken of as tributaries of the Darling are generally dry. It is only in an extraordinary season that the Darling is navigable, and if it is made navigable in all seasons, then it will be impossible to draw the water away for irrigation purposes. I think these proposed suggestions, that irrigation and navigation should go together, are absolutely impossible and worthless. We have heard a great deal from South Australia, and, as I said at the Convention in Adelaide, South Australia was not treated with that courtesy which, as a neighbouring state, she was entitled to in regard to these waters. I have yet to learn that South Australia has made any attempt to utilize the waters of the Murray for the development of her own country. But the moment the Government of New South Wales appointed a commission—of which my honorable friend (Mr. Lyne) was, chairman—to consider this question of conservation, that moment South Australia got up in arms, and it has been a nightmare to her public men ever since, that New South Wales is likely to do, with regard to the waters flowing through its territory, what they themselves have never attempted to do.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Look at the village settlements.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Your village settlements! On the banks of the Murray River you are starving settlers at the expense of the state. We do not want that kind of settlement.

Mr. GORDON. -
Renmark is just as prosperous as any settlement on the Murray.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
We want to irrigate country, and let the people depend entirely on their own ability to settle the lands. Without the water it will be absolutely impossible for the people to do so. As I asked before, why not federate your railways? No, you will not do that, because the answer to that is: Each state wants to develop its own territory, and they are not going to depend on the Commonwealth for that purpose. I am surprised that the South Australian people do not say federate our coal mines. Why not federate them? It would be just as reasonable to make our coal mines federal as to make our waters federal. Why not federate the coal mines, and declare that they shall be controlled by the Commonwealth? While I would be very willing to concede the Murray River and some portion of the Darling, I certainly would not concede anything which would prevent our own state from developing its lands in its own way, and these proposals which I have heard made by the right honorable member (Sir John Downer) and suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Symon) will, I think, prevent the state of New South Wales from developing its own territory. Honorable members must realize, when they begin to speak of irrigation, that Australia is unlike, perhaps, any other country where a system of irrigation has been established. We recently, in New South Wales, employed one of the greatest known experts, and what was the result? His report was that you had better leave things as they are. If the Darling is to be taken from us for the purpose of navigation to South Australia, and the Murray is to be taken from us, what are we to do with our intermediate country? Because it was proposed that the control of every one of the streams, whether navigable or not, should be handed over to the Commonwealth, and it was pointed out in Adelaide that if that were done New South Wales would have no power to enter on any irrigation works whatever in the New England district, because to do so would be interfering with the tributaries of the Namoi, and affecting the navigability of the streams. I hope some reasonable and fair amendment will be suggested which we can all accede to in the morning, and which will have the effect of preventing things being done which will hinder the development of the territory of New South Wales;

inasmuch as any proposal having that effect would certainly not be acceptable to the people of that country.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

Allow me, sir, to suggest a form of words which may commend themselves to many honorable members as suitable for insertion in substitution for the existing proposal. Clause 52 begins as follows:-

The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have full power and authority to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth, with respect to all or any of the matters following, that is to say:-

I propose to insert the following sub-section:-

Navigable rivers flowing in, through, or between two or more states, so far as may be necessary for the improvement of their navigability, with a just regard to the necessities of water conservation and irrigation.

The CHAIRMAN. -

If any other honorable member wishes to propose an amendment, he may as well state it now. The whole of the amendments will be printed to-morrow.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have written out something which may be considered by honorable members. I think we are now in the stage in which one will not be supposed to be very hard and fast in any proposal he makes. I simply suggest this proposal for consideration. The matter is too important, I think, to be the subject of any rigid or obstinate proposal at the present moment.

Navigation and the irrigation of the River Murray from the point at which it becomes the boundary of New South Wales and Victoria to the sea, but so that the state or all the citizens of the state may continue in the

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

It is with some reluctance that I address the Convention at all on this subject, after the very long and somewhat desultory debate which we have had to-day. It seems to me that the proposals, first of my honorable friend (Sir John Downer) and now of Mr. Symon, have added very much to the complication of the whole question. It would be far better for us to keep clearly before us the one issue which we have had from the very beginning of this discussion—the question to what extent you can secure the navigability of the Murray without interfering with the rights of the particular states affected. Now, of course, any one in discussing this question—especially a layman—feels under a great disadvantage, because there are two large subjects involved: The question of law, and the technical question connected with water conservation and irrigation; and I feel, from the debate which has taken place upon this subject, that we are not at all well versed on either of these matters. Indeed, it seems to me, from what I have heard, that it is a question, as the Bill now stands, whether there is not an implied right of the Commonwealth to do exactly the thing which New South Wales is trying to prevent.

Mr. BARTON. -

Sub-section (1) of this clause allows the Commonwealth to regulate trade and commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not think the question of trade and commerce should be mixed up with this question. It is a very specific question, upon which depends the prosperity of a large portion of the colony of New South Wales. After all, if we go to the root of the question, it is one involved in the rainfall of these colonies. We have rainfall now in two ways. Some parts of our colony have a very small rainfall throughout the year—only 5 or 6 inches; other parts have a rainfall which comes at specific periods with tropical severity. And it is absolutely necessary, if these portions of Australia are to be made fit for cultivation, that that water should be conserved. The fact is that the question that we have got to deal with is not so much irrigation as the conservation of water. My difficulty is this: Can you frame any clause by any human inventiveness by which you will prevent a colony like New South Wales interfering with the navigability of the Murray, and at the same time not give over, absolutely to the Commonwealth the sovereign rights over that stream? I do not believe you can. I believe it is simply either a question of handing over either the whole matter to the Federal Commonwealth, or making such specific provisions in the Bill as to keep the control of the river system intact in New South Wales. Now, so far as South Australia is concerned, the question is a very simple one indeed, because South Australia might be able to use a large amount of the water of the Murray for irrigation or conservation purposes without interfering with the navigability of the river, and it would be hard to say at any particular time that they were interfering with it. On the other hand, take the position of the Darling and the Murrumbidgee. These two rivers are at times simply pools. And there is another matter connected with the case of these rivers. We have had too little in this debate of a practical character. A large amount of the volume of water that flows down these rivers never reaches the Murray at all, and the conservation of this water does not affect the question of the Murray in any respect. It does seem to me that we, as representatives of New South Wales, have got a very serious charge in this matter. I have never been accused of a want of federal spirit. I have been ready in everything of large import which clearly applies generally to the Commonwealth to leave the matters in the hands of the Federal Government. But I feel that this is one of those questions which is not at all analogous with the position taken up in regard to trade and commerce, railways, and such like questions. We have in this matter to deal with the effects of our action upon the people of our own country, and it would be suicidal for us—and I am not now threatening—in any way to load this Bill with any general power which may create suspicion and alarm. It is far better in the interests of federation that we should leave to the future some extension of the federal spirit than that now, even though ideally right, though right in the abstract, we should put into this Constitution an elastic provision such as that proposed by my honorable friend, which may be very poetical, which may be in the direction of justice, but which, after all, so far as I can see—without any legal knowledge—is practically the same thing as handing over the whole power. I would like to be informed by any legal member of this Convention whether if the proposal of my honorable friend (Mr. Symon) becomes part of this clause it is not practically and essentially everything that South Australia desires?

Mr. ISAACS. -
It does not include the Lachlan, Darling, or the Murrumbidgee.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You never can tell what is a navigable river. You might have this position—that a colony by the expenditure of its own money might make a river navigable during a certain part of its course, and then under the proposed provision of this Bill it lapses entirely into the hands of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -
This does not give them control over any of those rivers.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I think all this extraordinary question with regard to the possibility of the navigation of the River Murray being a slight matter compared with irrigation, ought not to intrude itself. We have two main questions before us—the question of the navigation of the Murray, and the use of its tributaries. Will any one tell us at the present moment that those tributaries are navigable rivers? They cannot in any sense be considered navigable. If they are not navigable rivers now, the question is: Has not New South Wales the right from this time on, from the creation of this Commonwealth, to deal with them not as navigable rivers, but as streams for the conservation of water? Because if, at the beginning of the Commonwealth's work, there was an embargo placed upon the management of these rivers, which are so intimately connected with the development of our great landed estate, it would create an amount of friction, which is one of those things which we are absolutely bound to avoid in framing this Constitution, and would tend to confuse the meaning of the Bill. I have heard some contradictory remarks by some honorable members upon this point. At one time they tell us that we should make our Constitution so clear that there can be no reason to mistake its purport. On the other hand, there is a proposal to introduce a fine poetical set of words, which leave it practically to the benevolence of the Central Government to do as it pleases. To my mind it is better to face the one question: Whether it is possible for us to introduce any words into this Constitution which will enable the navigation of the River Murray to be kept intact, and at the same time not interfere with the powers of conservation or irrigation which belong to the states. If I could see any solution of the difficulty in that way, I should be the first to embrace it, but it does seem to me that this is one of those things in which you can have no compromise without practically giving up your principle. Therefore, I, as far as I can see at the present moment, shall, personally speaking, only be agreeable to such a provision being made in this part of the Bill as will definitely state that, for purposes of its own, all rights should remain intact to the colony of New South Wales in those great tributaries. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton) consulted me when he was sending the telegram to Mr. Russell, and I asked him to inquire—and this is a very important question—if we could, under any plan that might be adopted for the conservation of water in the tributaries of the Murray, interfere with the navigability of the main river?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Mr. Russell assumes that the whole of the flood water would be kept back by locks, which is impossible.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The question is one so full of technicality that it is difficult for an ordinary person to give an opinion upon it, but will any one tell me how any Government could possibly adjudicate upon a matter of this kind? It is well enough to say that you will have a special commission for railway rates, and to deal with other matters which a dozen business men sitting together could easily settle among themselves; but this is a very much more complicated question. Who is to say to what extent the navigability of the Murray is being interfered with? We know well enough that at certain times the Murray is almost dry in parts. Supposing that at such a period water derived from tropical rains in Queensland were conserved in distant parts of the Darling—which water, if not conserved, would simply sink into the sand and never find its way to the sea—would not the Federal Government say—"We are not quite sure that the conservation of this water is interfering with the navigability of the Murray; but the Murray has gone down below its navigable point, and as we are the trustees of the river, we say that, at any rate, the chance is that it is being interfered with." The conditions of these rivers are so complex that it is impossible to frame a rule which it would be safe to put into the hands of such a tribunal. It is not as if we in New South Wales were showing an anti-federal spirit; we are not asking for anything which really belongs to the other colonies. Will any man tell me that a river like the Darling, which winds and meanders for hundreds, probably for thousands, of miles entirely through New South Wales territory, can, in any sense, be looked upon as a federal river? It seems to me that all argument is against the contention of my honorable friend from South Australia.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The navigability of the Murray frequently depends upon the flow of the Darling.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Yes; but who is to say when it does? Supposing that, owing to the prevalence of unusual conditions, the flow of the Murray is reduced below navigation point if the weirs and locks upon the Darling are removed, the navigation of the Murray may be improved to some slight extent, though probably not at all; but, on the other hand, a large number of settlers will be absolutely ruined. The more this question is looked into, the more complicated and dangerous it appears. It is one of those things which ought to be allowed to work themselves out in the experience of the Commonwealth. Instead of attempting to face it in this heroic way we ought simply to do what appears to be bare justice, and leave it to the development of the future. It is very well known that, in all matters where mere local politics can be cast aside, I have always thrown in my lot for federation, and generally with the smaller colonies; but I think that the absolute unanimity of the representatives of New South Wales upon this point should tell very strongly upon the verdict of the Convention. If I might refer the matter, as one or two other honorable members have done, to the representatives of the two colonies which appear to form the jury upon this occasion, I would say to them that I think that the whole burden of proof lies upon the other side, and that, as the representatives of New South Wales have given such strong expression to their unanimous feeling upon the subject, they ought to hesitate before voting against what we believe to be the real interests of our colony and what we consider to be the opinion of our people. Although I should be sorry to prevent any attempt at what is called compromise, I am very much inclined to think that in regard to this matter an endeavour to that end will only lead to a waste of time. If we stick to the text of the Bill, and make the federal authority the negotiator between the states, I think we shall serve the interests of federation better.

Progress was then reported.

FOUNDATION DAY.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have ascertained from Sir George Turner that next Wednesday, which is kept as a strict holiday in New South Wales, is also observed as such in Victoria, and the probability is that honorable gentlemen would prefer not to sit upon that day. We are not under the same urgency as to time as we were under in Adelaide; therefore, I shall not press honorable members to sit then, as I know that I can rely upon their co-operation at a later stage of the session.

The Convention adjourned at five minutes to five o'clock.
Tuesday, 25th January, 1898.

Petitions - Representation of Queensland - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

I have the honour to present a petition from the Christian Endeavour Council of New South Wales, numbering 15,000 members, in which a respectful request is made for the recognition of Almighty God in the Commonwealth of Australia Bill. I beg to propose that the petition, which is respectfully worded, be received and read.

The motion was agreed to.

The CLERK read the petition, as follows:-

The petition of the undersigned humbly sheweth-That,

At a meeting of the Christian Endeavour Council of New South Wales, representing 15,000 endeavourers, held in Sydney, 10th December, 1897, the following resolutions were unanimously carried:-

First. That in the opinion of this council no scheme of federation will be acceptable to the great body of the people of this colony which does not recognise Almighty God as the Supreme Ruler of Nations and Fountain of all Law and Authority; and Second. That in view of the Strong Conviction held by us on this subject, your petitioners would humbly pray that such recognition be inserted in the preamble of the said Constitution or in one of the clauses thereof.

And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria) presented two petitions from electors of Victoria, praying the Convention, in framing the Constitution of Federated Australia, to provide for election, especially of senators, by means of the Hare system of voting.

The petitions were received.

REPRESENTATION OF QUEENSLAND.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I beg to give notice that I will move, at the meeting of the Convention this day week-

That this Convention desires to express its deep regret at the fact that no opportunity has been afforded to the people of Queensland to take part in its deliberations.

The PRESIDENT. -

I would like to remark, with reference to that notice of motion, that although I do not propose, at this moment, to rule it out of order, I will require to consider very carefully whether it is within the functions of this Convention to deal with a matter of that description.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

At the last sitting of our Convention I was the only member who dared to express the opinion that Queensland was not earnest in its protestations about joining the Convention. My honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) said I would live to regret the words I had then uttered. Now, I want to show the Convention and the public of Australia that I do not regret the words I then uttered, because what I then said has all been proved to be correct. Of course, Mr. President, if you think the motion is out of order I withdraw it at once; but, if it is out of order, so was the motion of Mr. Barton, offering the congratulations of the Convention to the Queensland people.

The PRESIDENT. -

I do not think that the motion proposed by the leader of the Convention was out of order, but I do take the responsibility, after having heard the honorable member, of ruling that the notice of motion which he has given is out of order, as attempting to express the opinion of this Convention with reference to the conduct of a Government which is not represented here.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from Monday, 24th January) was resumed on sub-section (31) of clause 52-

The control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia-

Omit "river," insert "rivers."

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I desire to ask if the various amendments are in print?

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendments are in print, but proofs of them have only just come in. They will be handed round now.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

They should have been available overnight.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I have no control over the printing-office. I understand it is the wish of the committee that the amendment which is before the committee, to strike out the word "river," with a view of inserting "rivers," be temporarily withdrawn in order that the prior amendments may be moved. I shall put it formally to the committee.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

That was the case at one part of yesterday's proceedings. I asked leave to withdraw my amendment, but afterwards I got leave to withdraw my request to withdraw my amendment, so the position stands that the committee is discussing the substitution of the word "river" for "rivers."

The CHAIRMAN. -

I never put it to the committee that the amendment be withdrawn. As a matter of fact, it is not the amendment of Mr. Gordon, but of one of the branches of the Legislature of South Australia.

Mr. GORDON. -

Yes, except that, as I assumed charge of it, you allowed me to make the request to withdraw it. I made that request, but afterwards I begged leave to withdraw my request to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Undoubtedly. At the present moment the question is that the word "river" be omitted, with a view to the insertion of the word "rivers," but I understood that it was the wish of the committee, that that amendment should be withdrawn from consideration at present. Whether that is so or not it is for the committee to express an opinion. Of course, any one member can object to the amendment being withdrawn. I will put it that the amendment before the Chair be withdrawn for the present.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

What is before the Chair now?

The CHAIRMAN. -

Nothing but the clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

When this matter was being discussed in Adelaide very few of us thought that it was of the vast importance which its discussion here during the last two or three days has proved it to be, and when the division was taken very few of us thought that the result of that division might or might not be vital to the interests of any one colony. On that occasion I myself was in very grave doubt as to what was the proper course to pursue, and I then voted against, the proposals of South Australia, knowing that by so doing I would have another opportunity at the adjourned meeting of having the matter more fully discussed, and ascertaining in reality what was the best course to pursue—and, therefore, while on that occasion I took up a position adverse to the colony of South Australia, it must not be thought that because I voted in that way on that occasion I am bound now, after fuller thought, and after hearing all the discussion, to vote in the same direction. The colony of Victoria is interested to some extent in this provision with regard to the waters of the River Murray. As far as I have been able to ascertain from the Water Supply department of this colony, we really do put into the River Murray more water than the colony of New South Wales.

Mr. LYNE. -
In the upper parts, but not in the lower parts.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Well, all along the river, as far as I have been able to ascertain.

Mr. LYNE. -
Oh, no.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
At all events, we do put into the River Murray a very considerable amount of water, and a very large amount also comes from a portion of Queensland. So that Queensland, New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia all contribute towards the supply of the water in that particular river. Now, I think the debate has shown us that no one colony desires to do anything that is unfair or unreasonable to any of the other colonies. New South Wales simply says—"We have got this river, and you are asking us to make a compromise by giving away something and giving us nothing. That is not a compromise." However, I do not propose to debate the question, which has been so fully thrashed out, as to whether the waters in question, by law, or by international law, or by any other means, really belong to the colony of New South Wales. A portion of the water falls from the heavens in that particular colony; but I say that, so far as I can see, that water ought to be considered as common property. Some of the colonies are anxious that the water should be so conserved as to have the rivers that are now navigable hereafter, and they are afraid—more especially the colony of South Australia—that particular colony is afraid that if New South Wales has the sole control of the water of the river and its tributaries, New South Wales may so deal with those waters as to prevent the river being navigable in South Australia. I myself have no fear that anything of the kind will happen. In the past, New South Wales appears to have dealt with the waters in such a way as not to unduly interfere with the navigability of the river, and I believe that if we do not federate New South Wales will pursue that line of action in the future. Then New South Wales appears to be afraid that they will not have the same control of the waters in question if this control is handed over to the Federal Parliament. They appear to be afraid that they may then be treated in such a way as not to be able to irrigate portions of their lands which they desire to be able to irrigate, and which undoubtedly they ought to be permitted to irrigate; but I think that the answer to that is in the figures quoted by my friend (Mr. Wise) yesterday. He showed that such an immense quantity of water was carried away by this river that there is no fear of either colony being injured—that anything that New South Wales might possibly do with regard to taking water away for the purpose of irrigating cannot affect the navigation of the Murray, and I am certain that anything that South Australia is likely to do with regard to navigation is not likely to interfere with anything that other colonies may do with regard to irrigation. We have frequently heard the expression "Trust the Federal Parliament." My friend, the Premier of New South Wales, naively confesses that he is prepared to trust the Federal Parliament when the difficulties are so great that he cannot see any way out of them.

M. - When he cannot do better.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Probably when he cannot do better. Now, I do not think that that is the course this Convention ought to take. We are here, as I have previously said with regard to the financial question, to negotiate with each other—we are not here to legislate. Our business is to endeavour, in the way we have been doing the last few days in these discussions, to meet the difficulties raised by one colony and another. It is our duty to endeavour to meet those difficulties, and find some solution if solution be possible; and until we are fairly satisfied in our own minds that a solution is absolutely impossible we have no right, in view of the solemn duty cast on us by our electors, to attempt to shirk a task which it is undoubtedly our duty to perform. In view of the circumstances, we have now to look at the various amendments which are put forward, and see whether, from the mass of matter which is submitted for our consideration, we can possibly devise some scheme which will be fair and equitable to all the colonies. I gave utterance to my views by an interjection yesterday—that I believe that irrigation ought to be our first consideration. It is true that the navigation of these particular rivers is very valuable to South Australia. I confess it is also very valuable to Victoria; but I think that the question of irrigation is far more valuable, at all events to Victoria, than the question of navigation. Still, I do hold the view given utterance to by my colleague (Mr. Deakin) that the two subjects can easily be worked together, if we set our minds to work and devise a proper scheme. My difficulty is this: Can we, sitting here, 50 of us, devise that scheme? I believe we cannot. I believe that if we have all the amendments before us we will simply be wrangling over them. We will have all our leading lawyers taking a word here and a word there, and quibbling about them—endeavouring to point out that the proposal with the particular word in question in will mean that a certain course of action will be pursued, while other men, on the other hand, will argue equally strongly and forcibly that the proposal with that particular word in will mean something entirely different. I believe that if we attempt here to deal with all these amendments we will probably spend a large amount of time, and we may get up bad temper, which has fortunately been absent from our discussions in the past, and we shall not arrive at a very satisfactory solution. New South Wales is vitally interested, South Australia is also interested, and so is Victoria in a lesser degree. I have been thinking over the matter, and I have come to the conclusion that, as in other matters, perhaps not so important, we have asked a certain number from our body to meet with a view of endeavouring to formulate something satisfactory, and that as that has worked well, it ought to do so on this occasion. My suggestion is that, as tomorrow is our great national holiday—Foundation Day—some of our delegates who do not desire to be present at the sports or the regatta might well spend an hour or two in discussing this matter around a table. I feel certain that if we were to select two from New South Wales, two from South Australia, and two from Victoria, it would be a wise step. I leave the other colonies out as not being equally interested, although I have no objection to two from each of the other colonies being on this committee if it is thought advisable by the Convention. I feel no hesitation in saying that if six gentlemen meet together in the manner I suggested, with the valuable discussion which has taken place in the past and the information they now have on the whole subject, knowing the desire of this Convention that all colonies should be treated fairly and properly, and knowing also that our main object is to preserve the navigability of the Murray and its tributaries, and to prevent the improper use of the water of any of those tributaries so as to interfere with the navigability of the Murray, the committee might very easily, from all these amendments, or by their own judgment and wisdom, suggest a scheme which we would all be prepared to accept. When I speak of the tributaries of the Murray, I do not speak only of those in New South Wales, because whatever is done with regard to the water coming through New South Wales—whatever restrictions may be placed upon its use—I feel that in justice the same restrictions must be placed on water coming from Victoria. We have discussed this matter very fully. I have no desire to unduly trespass on the patience of the Convention. My own view is that we should put irrigation as the first consideration, and navigation as the second; but I feel, after studying these amendments and considering the question, that we shall fail unless we carry out the suggestion which I have made for the consideration of the Convention and our leader. I feel satisfied that if a committee, such as I suggested, can agree upon a scheme which will be acceptable to themselves, it will be equally acceptable to the members of the Convention. I make this suggestion as a means of settling the difficulty, and of saving the time of the Convention.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I regret that since we rose last evening some agreement has not been arrived at. I hoped, when we rose yesterday, that this difficulty would have been arranged before we met this morning—that the Drafting Committee, or some other body, would have considered the various amendments suggested; and would have evolved from them, or from some other source, a compromise or a modification in some form which, by general consent of the states, might have been agreed to. I regret that has not been done. I think that, perhaps, the next best thing is the suggestion of the Right Hon.
Sir George Turner. I rose chiefly to express the hope that that suggestion might be accepted by the leader of the House; and that, presently, we might have this very great stumbling-block removed from the path of our progress. I want, however, as I am speaking, to say a few words on the general aspect of the case, and I shall strive as far as possible to say what has not been said, so as to avoid travelling over familiar ground from the point of view of South Australia, and how it affects her rights. Frequently the only method of reaching the settlers along the Murray River, either to send goods to them or to bring their produce to market, is the river itself. We have not along the river parallel with it any railway line; therefore the whole of the settlers along the river, and they are a rapidly increasing number, are dependent upon the river as a means of transit. At present the river is exceedingly low—I mean the portions which are wholly within the South Australian border, the South Australian territory being on both sides—and there are portions of the river there which are not navigable. The settlers are not able, except at heavy, cost and great delay, to get goods there or to send their produce to market. While that is the position in South Australia, I wish to show how the River Darling affects the question. I believe that far up the River Darling at present there is a freshet coming down, the result of recent floods. At the point which it has reached at present there is a 3-ft. rise. We are so accustomed to watch the freshets in the Darling as affecting the navigability of the Murray, that we can say almost to a day when that freshet will reach Overland Corner, a well-known point on the Murray. We have been in the habit of calculating these things, the navigability of the lower river depending upon them for many years past, and I do not hesitate to say that the hope of many settlers today, on both banks of the river in South Australia, is fixed on this freshet coming down—a freshet which takes its origin not only within the boundaries of New South Wales, but in other streams coming from the distant colony of Queensland. That mere statement that the navigability of South Australian waters is dependent upon a freshet taking its origin in the distant colony of Queensland, and passing for hundreds of miles through the colony of New South Wales, shows what an important question this is from a federal point of view. Besides that, we have on the river banks those who are making a living, and developing territory, by irrigation. I quite agree with what was said by the Premier of Victoria to-day, and by other members yesterday, as to the importance relatively of irrigation. As to the navigability of the river, we find that in many parts of the world a navigable river is not regarded as being so valuable as railway communication. Especially in the United States we have frequently seen railways made on both sides of a navigable stream, thus indicating the superior efficiency of railway transit under certain conditions over river transit. If that be so—and it has been shown in the United States—I think the time will probably come at no very distant date when we shall have railways along the river banks, which will be preferable even to the waterway as a method of transit for goods. Therefore, I am quite prepared to admit that navigation may become of secondary importance to irrigation. I believe that in New South Wales, and in South Australia, as well as Victoria, we shall in the future see, perhaps, hundreds of people getting a living by the navigation of the river, but we shall have more thousands of people than there are hundreds engaged in navigation who will be getting a living by means of irrigation on the banks of the river. That being the case, I should be very sorry to do anything here to-day which would make the navigation of the river the first and only consideration of the Convention. I think we should secure to all the advantage of a fair use of the water for the purposes of irrigation. Now I come to the point of view which particularly interests this Convention. I have shown that for navigation and irrigation the waters arising in Queensland and flowing through New South Wales are important to New South

Wales and South Australia, and the waters of the Murray are important to Victoria, New South Wales, and South Australia. But now comes the question of pressing importance from the point of view of the right of the several colonies in these bodies of water. It has been said by New South Wales that they have the right of possession, which constitutes nine points of the law. The honorable member (Mr. Lyne) cheers that statement. I venture to say that there is something behind even possession. If we grant, as we must, that New South Wales has possession of the waters, the origin of them as I have shown to a large extent, as far as the Darling is concerned, is not in New South Wales but Queensland. I ask New South Wales if she would like Queensland to say-
"These waters belong to us we shall absorb them all; they shall not flow through your territory and benefit the state of New South Wales"? South Australia takes up precisely the same position with regard to New South Wales as New South Wales would, I am sure, take up in case of emergency with respect to Queensland.
Supposing that difference did arise, I admit freely, as claimed by several speakers, that, up to the present, New South Wales has not absorbed the whole of the waters of the Darling, and I do not think it is likely that in the near future she will absorb them. But we have had proposals, and not only proposals by Government officials, concerning whom remarks not too complimentary were made yesterday, but we have also had definite proposals made by Ministers of the Crown and other persons in responsible positions in New South Wales. We have had letters from Premiers of New South Wales; we have had, in the earlier sittings of this Convention, from a gentleman who speaks with no less authority than the present Minister of Lands-Mr. Carruthers-statements as to the right of the colony of New South Wales to absorb, if she pleased, every drop of water that now comes through the Darling into the Murray. I ask whether this Convention-whether, at least, members who come from the colony which I, among others, represent-can lightly regard statements such as these?
Mr. WISE. -
Has the honorable member read Colonel Home's report, in which he shows that those proposals are utterly impracticable?
Mr. HOLDER. -
No doubt from his point of view that may be the case. While I should be pleased to spend time in discussing the general question of irrigation, on which I hold strong views-having carefully looked into the matter for years past-I am not going to be led off into a general discussion now. I simply say, in passing, whilst that report suggests that immediate probabilities are not in the direction I am discussing, I venture to believe that, as time passes by, it will be possible, from a profitable and other points of view, to utilize, if not the whole, a very large proportion of the waters coming down the Darling to the Murray. I say that, in view of the official statements of persons in high authority, we have a right to regard as a possibility a large absorption of those waters. However, I want to say just here that there are many works connected with the waters of the Darling which might, and I think will, be carried out in future by New South Wales, which will largely benefit that state, and at the same time will largely increase the navigability and flow otherwise of the river lower down. One of the greatest advantages connected with the natural features of the rivers running through these colonies arises from the presence of the billabongs, as they are called, or the back waters. Into these back waters the stream flows in flood-time, instead of passing rapidly down. These billabongs hold an immense volume of water, and from them it slowly comes to keep up the flow of the river for many months after the flood proper has passed. I am speaking with knowledge, because I have travelled on both the Murray and the Darling, and I know precisely the full effect of what I am saying and the value of these back waters. If by artificial means these back waters are multiplied, and the water is conserved by locks being placed in the channels leading out of them, and in other ways they are made to contain larger bodies of water, that will not only benefit the state in which the back waters are situated, but will very largely tend to increase the time during which the river will be navigable, and to spread over a longer period those seasons in which, lower down the river, water can be taken out for irrigation.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Will it not interfere with the navigation of the river to put locks there?

Mr. HOLDER. -
I have not yet refer

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I mean to put locks on the billabongs.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Locks on the billabongs would not diminish, but would increase the navigability of the river. The locking of very many of these large natural reservoirs-and some of these natural reservoirs are enormously large-would tend to lengthen by months the period of navigability of the river.

Mr. LYNE. -
That would only be supposing the water was allowed to flow back again.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
And not in all seasons.

Mr. HOLDER. -
My reading-and I appeal here with great confidence to my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin), who is an authority on irrigation—shows me that in India very large bodies of water find their way back into the river, and that in the course of a few miles of their length two or three times the flow of the river system is taken out for irrigation, which must mean that, while all the water does not find its way back, a large quantity of water finds its way back again and again. That may or may not be so—only experience can tell us—in relation to our rivers; but judging by what has been seen in other places we may expect that a similar result will accrue within the borders of South Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

In dry country?

Mr. HOLDER. -

Even in dry country there must come a point of saturation when, owing to the absorption of millions of gallons of water, the subsoil will hold no more, and then all that is applied to it, except that which evaporates under the sunshine, will flow back into the river in some way or other. In my opinion, it is possible to very much increase the utilization of the waters of the upper rivers, to very largely develop the resources of the country alongside of those rivers, without in any way diminishing the navigability of the rivers, and without to a very large extent diminishing the possibilities of irrigation lower down their courses. However this may be, I want to come to the question of what are the present rights of the colonies lower down the rivers in respect of these waters. Supposing that as time goes by any of the states higher up the rivers should be led by experience, experiment, or otherwise, to take large bodies of water out of the rivers to the detriment of states lower down, what would be done? Supposing that we remain as we are, that the federation we are all earnestly hoping for does not come about, and that the states remain apart as they are, and that large schemes for irrigation and for utilization of the rivers are put in hand by New South Wales, and by locks and other means the flow of water lower down is diminished, I ask what is the remedy which South Australia would have? It is said that she has no legal right. It is said that she could do nothing, that she would have to put up with what New South Wales would send her in the shape of surplus waters which she permitted to flow down the channel of the river. I hold that South Australia has, if not any legal right, a very large right, and I think she has a way in which she can assert that right. Whatever may be the case in law—and, as I am not lawyer, I am not going to argue that—

Mr. DEAKIN. -
The honorable member was once Attorney-General.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I was, but I am not now. Whatever the legal position may be, surely South Australia occupies lower down the river, in relation to states higher up the stream, in equity the same position which she would occupy if she and they were individual persons. Suppose that instead of New South Wales being a colony it was a person, and that instead of South Australia being a colony it was a person; then, surely, South Australia would have some rights? That colony would have a court in which she could enforce those rights, but that court is lacking in the case of states taking the place of individuals. If South Australian rights of the character to which I have referred were detracted from in any way she would certainly appeal then to the British authorities. The Imperial authorities have made our boundaries, and the Imperial authorities would be the court to which we would go.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

And they would not interfere.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We have had correspondence with New South Wales on these questions, and we have in contemplation, in certain events, the making of the appeal to which I have referred to those authorities, who undoubtedly have the power to deal with the matter.

Mr. LYNE. -

And they would not interfere.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I do not agree with the two interjections I have heard on my left, which declare that in case of such appeal the British authorities would not interfere. I think they would, and I believe there are some gentlemen in this Convention who would agree with me. I think if it was shown that her rightful share of the waters of the rivers was being denied to South Australia, or to any colony lower down by a colony higher up the stream, the Imperial Government would interfere to the extent of requiring just such division of right between the various colonies as would exist between individuals in one colony. What South Australia asks on this occasion is that that court of ultimate appeal, in such cases as those to which I have referred, shall no longer be the Imperial authority, but shall be the federal authority. I remember that, when in Adelaide, we had some preliminary resolutions brought up as a basis on which to frame our Federal Constitution, and one of these preliminary resolutions to which our leader paid great attention was one which referred to the enlargement of our powers of self-government. I can conceive of no enlargement of our powers of self-government more important than that to which I have referred. Here is a power which to-day, if it rests anywhere, rests with the Imperial Government. We want to transfer the power of ultimate decision of riparian rights, questions between states from the imperial Parliament to the Federal Parliament, from the Imperial authorities to the federal authorities. That transference is in direct pursuance of the line of argument of our leader, is in direct pursuance of the line of argument of my honorable friend (Mr. Wise), who yesterday spoke on the other side of this question, and of many other members here who have taken a position which is opposed to that which I am taking now. I ask them to follow up the line of argument which they have used on previous occasions, and to grant what South Australia asks, that in this important matter of inter-state riparian rights all the powers to-day possessed by the Imperial Government and the Imperial Parliament shall be transferred to the Federal Government and the Federal Parliament. That being granted, South Australia has nothing more which she wishes to ask. She believes that she has rights to-day, and she wants to pass on those rights, unimpaired by any word or clause in this Constitution, to the federal authorities. She will not tolerate the inclusion of anything in this Federal Constitution which makes those rights less, or the enforcement of them more difficult; but she will be content, without the insistence of any enlargement of her rights, to pass on those rights unimpaired from the present Imperial authorities to those of the Federation which is to be. I ask who will object to that? Will the colony of New South Wales object to that? Is she so fearful of the position she holds-so uncertain of the ground on which she stands-that she will not permit these rights and these powers to be transferred from far-off England to our own colonies? Is she so fearful of the Federation which is to be that she will not intrust it with the decision of these matters so vitally important to three of the colonies here represented, and to a fourth, which we wish was represented? I do not want to ask that this Constitution should enlarge the powers of South Australia; I do not want to ask that they shall even be defined in the Constitution; I am quite content that they shall be passed on for whatever they are worth. My friends from New South Wales tell me that they are worth nothing-let it be so. Others in the Convention say that they are worth a great deal—I think so. But whatever they are worth, little or much, let us pass them on unimpaired-unhampered by any qualification or limitation-to the Federal Parliament and the Federal Government. Now, with that thought in my mind, I look at the amendments which are before us this morning. I find that the first amendment, although it is proposed by a South Australian, and by one who holds strong views on this question, really would operate to diminish the powers of the federal authority as constituted in this printed Bill; and I, for one, am not content with that. If we cannot get more than is in the Bill, a larger scope for the federal authority, a freer hand for the federal authority, then let us take what there is. I think if all these amendments were withdrawn, the Convention would pass the clause as it stands. Then, wherefore comes the opposition from South Australia to diminish what the Draft Bill gives us? I do not think that that can be acceptable. Then I come to the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise), and I see there precisely the same result.

Mr. WISE. - Will the honorable member allow me to interpose?

Mr. HOLDER. - Certainly.

Mr. WISE. - I would like to inform the committee that I wish to withdraw that amendment in favour of one to be moved later on by my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Barton).

Mr. HOLDER. - That will save me any necessity for referring to that. I come, then, omitting the amendment of my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) to that proposed by my honorable friend (Mr. Symon). I do not think that his amendment will help us at all; that it does not make the position any stronger than the Draft Bill, if as strong, and it introduces a provision as to having just regard to the necessity of water conservation and irrigation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - You want it without a just regard?

Mr. HOLDER. - No; I do not want to insert such words in the clause, which would imply that in all matters the Federal Parliament would act without a just regard to anybody and everybody. If we insert in one particular clause a requirement to this effect, surely we imply in all other clauses where it is not inserted that there would be an absence of this just regard. I do not think there will be. If we insert these words here we had better go back and insert them in every other clause, so as to provide that in all matters, financial, constitutional, or otherwise, the Federal Parliament shall act with a due and just regard to the rights of everyone. I think we may assume that; therefore, I hope we shall not insert a clause which seems to suggest that. We have no right to assume any such thing. Then I come to the amendment suggested by our leader. I understand that it is not to be moved, and discuss that. I come now to the amendment proposed by my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins), and, of them all as they stand in print, that seems to me to be the one which best of all meets the difficulties of the case "to secure the navigability of navigable waters which in the course of their flow, or after joining other waters, touch the limits of more than one state."

[P.133] starts here

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
That saves the Yarra.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We will include the Yarra, if it will satisfy you.

Mr. REID. -
You will have to make some alterations.

Mr. HOLDER. -
No doubt that amendment, as it stands, would exclude both the Yarra and the Swan, but, seeing that no federal questions arise concerning the use of the waters of either, I think that they ought to be excluded. We are dealing with federal questions, and federal questions alone. I hope, therefore, that in our amendments we will carefully exclude any matters which are of purely local concern. I have already stated the view I hold as to the importance of irrigation in the future, and the amendment of my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins), while it secures the navigability of navigable waters, leaves out of consideration altogether this, which I believe will be the larger and ultimately most important use of the waters of the river.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Is not that the dangerous part of the clause so far as New South Wales is concerned? Will not the people of New South Wales say that it would have that effect, and make it a reason for refusing to join in the Federation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It would be dangerous to both colonies.

Mr. HOLDER. -
On that point I would say this: I listened very carefully to what the Premier of New South Wales said in reference to this matter. I do not think anybody from South Australia has the slightest desire to place the whole control of irrigation in the hands of any federal body. The lands belong to the states. We are contending that they should continue to belong to the states, and therefore the application of the water to the land must be a state question. I want here to say that I do not think quite a fair use has been made by some of the speakers from New South Wales of the area of land through which the rivers flow. We have had hundreds of millions of acres of land referred to. We know from the best and most recent authorities, that the area which can be irrigated from these streams is relatively small. The area through which they flow is one thing, and the area irrigable is another.
Take the colony of South Australia. For nearly 300 miles the River Murray flows through South Australia. The country adjacent to the river—taking the word adjacent to mean 20 or 30 miles on either side of the banks—is a very large area. The area irrigable from that river, even if we took every drop of water out of it, would be relatively very small. It is not therefore quite fair to talk about hundreds of millions of acres of land being dependent upon the waters of this river.

Mr. LYNE. -
Is not the honorable member mistaken?

Mr. HOLDER. -
The figures mentioned were 140,000,000 acres.

Mr. WISE. -
Hear, hear.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Of that area, if every drop of water were taken out of the rivers, a very small proportion would be irrigable, and therefore it is not quite fair to use these figures in their largest sense.

Mr. WISE. -
The land might be made more profitable by water conservation.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Yes, and the conservation would increase and not diminish the flow of water. Taking the average seasons, it would prevent the floods from being quite so high, but it would also prevent the river from remaining low for so long. Honorable members who have not seen the Murray in flood can hardly form any conception of the difference between that stream in flood and at ordinary times. To-day there is just a narrow stream between clearly-defined banks, but in flood-times the water spreads itself out for miles on either side. We do not mind these extreme floods being diminished, because that would increase the volume of water which flows down between times. I would therefore desire to see water conservation encouraged.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
At whose expense must that conservation be carried on?

Mr. HOLDER. -
At the expense of the states who receive the whole benefit of the use of the water.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
South Australia will contribute nothing towards that.

Mr. HOLDER. -
South Australia would certainly conserve the water. The honorable member, I am quite sure, is fair-minded in this matter, and will listen to the point I am going to put. I say that each state would conserve the waters of the rivers flowing through its own territory, and would do so for the purpose of using them. It would get the benefit of using them, and that would repay it for the expense of conservation. But this conservation, no matter where it was carried out, would be for the general improvement of the river navigation at every season of the year. It will be seen from what I have said, that what I desire is to pass on, unimpaired, the rights of the various states as they exist to-day-to simply transfer from the Imperial authority to the federal authority the decision of those rights and equities, and I fancy that the following words would practically meet the views of the South Australian representatives. I would suggest that we should strike out all the words of the sub-section, and insert in lieu thereof-

Navigability of all navigable waters flowing in two or more states-and the exercise of all powers at present possessed by the Imperial Government in relation to the regulation and control of riparian rights in respect of waters flowing in two or more states.

These words would not impair or diminish the rights of any state. They would simply take over whatever power is to-day in the hands of the Imperial authority and place it in the hands of the federal authority. They would bring the determination of this issue from the other side of the world to this side-from those who know nothing about us to ourselves. I cannot conceive of any argument being used successfully to oppose or upset that proposition. I do not want to move it myself.

Mr. REID. -

The only thing is that there is nothing in it. The Imperial Authority has power to-morrow to abrogate all the Australian Constitutions. But who would put that forward as a serious argument?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I would not dream of putting it forward as a serious argument.

Mr. REID. -

Is it a serious argument to suggest that the Imperial Parliament would interfere with our water-courses by legislation?

Mr. HOLDER. -

I have said that I believe that if an appeal were made to the Imperial Parliament on the question of the rights of South Australia, such rights as she would possess if she were an individual and New South Wales were an individual, those rights would be safeguarded. Those rights are all that we want to protect in the Federal Constitution.

Mr. REID. -
The Imperial Parliament would give us protection, too.

Mr. HOLDER. -

It is said that this gives nothing to South Australia, because we have no rights at present. If that is so, I grant that it would not give us anything. We say that we have rights, and that we should have those rights preserved. If they mean nothing, that is our business. If they mean much, as we think they do, we ask those who say they mean nothing to give us what they say means nothing, and we shall be bound to accept it. All we ask for is the preservation of whatever we have to-day, without decrease or diminution. I hand this suggestion of mine to the leader of the Convention in the hope that he may find it useful in the preparation of a clause, which I should be pleased to see accepted unanimously, so as to avoid what we should all deplore, the splitting up of the Convention into sections on a matter so important as that which we now have before us.

I might be allowed, sir, to say a word or two in continuation of the rather hurried delivery of last night. I speak now entirely in view of the appointment of a committee, which, I presume, will consist of legal members of the Convention. It seems to me that most of the amendments that have been proposed have simply had a tendency to cloud the real issue, and there are sufficiently able men, learned in the law, on both sides, to prevent anybody getting the better of anybody else. We should, therefore, keep before us the simple issue, which is with regard to the tributaries of the Murray. Shall the question of erecting irrigation works for the conservation of water lie absolutely in the hands of the state or in the hands of the Federal Parliament? That is the question. It is all well enough to say "We will indicate some very nice direction to the Federal Parliament, in order to make it act justly." But can you introduce into a clause any direction of that kind which will not imply absolute jurisdiction? You say you cannot have two conflicting powers. You must create a sovereign power in every case. It seems to me, therefore, that it would be idle and futile for a committee to meet, and attempt to draw up any superfine cobweb of sentences which, after all, would not mislead people here, and even if it did would cause incalculable trouble in the future. I consider, with all my federal sentiment, that this is so absolutely a necessity for New South Wales that any other direction, excepting that to which we agreed in Adelaide, would so surround the matter with suspicion in the eyes of our people that it would be absolutely useless for us to go away from that bed-rock. I cannot tell, as a layman, to what extent that particular sub-section gives implied powers-owing to decisions in the American Commonwealth-to the Federal Parliament in dealing with these matters. It is not for me to say whether these words, which are very comprehensive, imply a right to deal with the subsidiary streams of the Murray. But surely the argument, as I said last night, used by several honorable members, that we ought to make clear our intentions, should prevail in this case. What I want is to make clear the intention of the Convention that the rights of the Commonwealth shall be considered by the state, and that it shall be left to the honesty of the states to see that no irrigation or water conservation works that are not absolutely necessary are carried on so as to interfere with the navigation of this great stream. That is my position. It does not matter what are the exact conditions prevailing now in the arid country of New South Wales. Nobody knows what the conditions are, and nobody knows what the conditions of the future will be. The question of irrigation and of water conservation must be left to local control. Every scheme will emanate from the state Parliament, and the whole evolution of this question must come locally. If there is to be a dispute as to the control of those waterways which are solely and entirely within any one state, the whole weight of argument is in favour of leaving the control to the state, trusting to the honour and righteousness of that state to deal fairly with the question of navigation.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Do you claim a right to dry up the Murray?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
We may reduce the thing to a reductio ad absurdum. I say that if we have not the right to take, under certain circumstances, every drop of water in those rivers, then we have no right at all.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
You claim that right.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
We say there is no fear-

Mr. KINGSTON. -
But you would do it if you pleased.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
We say there is no fear of any reasonable works that we may erect drying up our streams and interfering with your navigation. But we say, why not trust us? You say, on the other hand-"We will give you the fullest permission to do everything that is reasonable." You believe you can give us the power to do everything without interfering with the navigability of the river, therefore why not trust us? It is a question of who is to be trusted.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
We say-"Trust a body representative of all."

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
That body has to be threshed out yet, and it may be a corpse before we are done with it. I will take an extreme case. I will take a case in which the Murray is reduced to a state of non-navigability, and in which there is a tremendous drought in New South Wales. I will assume that if certain water was let loose from conserved parts, that water would add very much to the volume of the River Murray. Indeed, it might make it navigable. The question then arises: Which is to be considered first, the navigability of the River Murray or the great system of irrigation upon which thousands of settlers would depend? That is one case. You may call it absurd; but it is better for us to see the principle we are dealing with. It is better to have nothing covered over with the cobwebs of rhetoric or verbiage. I have never shown an illiberal spirit in dealing with federal matters. As time goes on, by the education of our people and by a national spirit being evolved, many of the things we are now dealing with in perhaps a narrow way will be broadened out and will come under federal control. We are dealing with essentials of the matter now, in the hope of being able to frame a Constitution which will be accepted by the people of the different states. This matter is absolutely vital to us.

Mr. SYMON. -
You cannot divide the responsibility for irrigation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You cannot divide the responsibility at all. If you once give the Federal Parliament the right to interfere with these tributaries you cannot afterwards make any diminution of its powers; you cannot draw the line between the control of the navigation and the control of the conservation of water. It is absolutely absurd and childish to imagine the contrary. The federal power must in its own domain be absolutely sovereign. Therefore, let us put aside all these differences and compromises and decide once for all whether these streams which touch different territories, or upon which the main stream depends, shall be under federal control, or whether the states shall reserve to themselves all rights connected with streams flowing wholly through their territory.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
We have already had a long debate, and as [P.137] starts here
I think almost everything has been said on each side which can be said, I do not propose to add more than two or three words. But if the discussion has led the last speaker to the conclusion that there is any number of delegates here who desire that the control of irrigation and of the details connected with it should be a federal and not a state matter, it has led him to a conclusion at which I have not arrived. I do not anticipate that a member of the Convention proposes to take the right to use the water of a river for irrigation purposes out of the hands of the state through whose territory that river flows.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Whoever owns the land must own the water.

Mr. REID. -
Does not an amendment which interferes with the use of the water of four rivers take the right to control irrigation out of the hands of the state through which they flow?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The right honorable member sees no objection to the federal use of the water when the interests of South Australia are concerned. What is the clause at present in the Bill? The representatives of New South Wales have all strongly protested against the Federal Parliament or any other body controlling the use of the water for irrigation purposes within their own territory, and yet I believe they are prepared to stand by the clause which gives to the federal authority a right to do this so far as that portion of the Murray which is wholly within South Australia is concerned.

Mr. REID. -
We only give that right of interference where a river forms the boundary of two or more states.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The clause at present in the Bill gives the Federal Parliament the control and the regulation of the use of the waters of that portion of the Murray which is wholly within South Australian territory, a right which the right honorable gentleman says should not be given to the federal authority in regard to the water of the rivers within New South Wales territory. The position seems to me to be most inconsistent.

Mr. GORDON. -
It is the position of the wolf and the lamb.

Mr. REID. -
Yes; but you have not got hold of the lamb yet.

Mr. GORDON. -
I referred to the right honorable gentleman as the wolf.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The honorable member (Mr. McMillan) has come to a wrong conclusion altogether if he thinks that we want to take the control of irrigation out of the hands of the states and to make it a federal matter. We want the Federal Parliament to interfere, not in the use of the waters of these rivers, but to prevent abuse. We want the federal authority simply to have the same powers as foreign nations have in the case of rivers flowing through two States.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I did not say that the federal authority would abuse its power.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

All we are pleading for is that the Federal Parliament shall have the same power as is recognised as coming within the domain of the comity of nations. The Danube is a river flowing through different states, but, although there is an international agreement providing for certain facilities to be given to the inhabitants of those States in connexion with the use of the river, does the honorable member mean to say that the control of the river is given to any nation except that through whose territory its waters are flowing?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But the tributaries of the Danube are not given over to any general authority.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Well, all we want is that the federal authority shall have the right of inhibition when any colony is unduly using the waters of a river to the detriment of the natural rights of those who have an equal claim to them. I am perfectly willing to trust the Federal Parliament in this matter, although I know that South Australia will have very little voice indeed in it. Although this question is so momentous to us, and although we shall have so little weight in its decision, I think that the common sense and the love of fair play of the Federal Parliament will be such that, notwithstanding the preponderating representation of New South Wales, we may safely leave it in their hands. I think that we are asking for no more than justice. We simply ask that New South Wales and other colonies shall not have the right because of their position to destroy, by the abuse of the waters of the rivers, the natural rights that those lower down have now, and would have, I believe, under federation, even if there were no clause inserted in the Bill. I do not know that it would have been necessary to have put a clause in the Bill were it not for the pronounced attitude which those in New South Wales who have a right to make official utterances on the subject have taken. As the honorable member (Mr. Holder) has pointed out, we have had a statement from the Secretary of Lands for New South Wales, which in importance stands far and away above any telegrams which may arrive... from Mr. Russell or any other of the influential residents and civil servants of that colony.

Mr. GORDON. -

The right honorable member (Mr. Reid) tells us that the civil servants are tattlers.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I think that the utterance of a Minister is of far more weight than the official telegram of a public servant, however high in rank he may be. We have the statement of the Secretary for Lands in New South Wales that the whole of the waters of the River Darling will be required for irrigation purposes. He told us that every sup of water will be required for the thirsty soil to enable people to occupy the land profitably." With an official utterance like that before them, can honorable members wonder at the alarm of South Australia? The right honorable member (Sir George Turner) has told us that there is no cause for alarm; but, with an utterance like that before us, I say that we have cause for alarm, and that we are justified in asking that our natural rights in this respect shall be safeguarded.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

This subject has been debated at great length and with great ability, and I do not purpose occupying very much time in connexion with it; but the utterances of the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) seemed to me to raise the question whether a river running through two or more colonies can belong to any one of them, a question which, I think, must be answered in the negative. A river which runs through two or more colonies must belong equally to each of them.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Do you mean the land or the water.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The water.

Mr. REID. -

There is no dispute upon that point. In the Bill we apply that principle to the Murray, which is such a river.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The question is how far you propose to apply the principle, because the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) claimed the right for New South Wales-though he admitted that he was reducing the thing to an absurdity-to take every drop of the water of the rivers which are tributaries to the Murray. If New South Wales can do that she can entirely deprive the other colonies of the use of the Murray, and the inference is that the Murray belongs to New South Wales, and it is only by the grace and at the pleasure of that colony that it is permitted to trickle through the other colonies. I have no hesitation in saying that his contention is neither right nor just. A river upon which the other colonies depend to as great an extent as New South Wales, and which flows through the other colonies, is as much theirs as it belongs to New South Wales; and, inasmuch as there may and probably will arise conflicting interests in connexion with the use of the river a tribunal ought to be created, its members being representatives of the various parties concerned, to decide any disputes. That, it appears to me, is what is sought for by the honorable member (Mr. Gordon) and other honorable gentlemen who have supported him.

Mr. REID. -

The Federal Parliament would not be such a tribunal.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It would be such a tribunal, with some other advantages added; it would be composed of representatives of the parties interested in proportion to their interests, as calculated upon the number of their citizens, and it would have in addition three or four disinterested and impartial umpires to see that fair play was given to all concerned.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If necessary, the Federal Parliament could create a special tribunal.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I would suggest the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) and the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) clouded the issue, in presenting with such force the argument that the management of irrigation in New South Wales would be taken out of the hands of the Government of that colony.

Mr. REID. -

I was addressing myself to the amendment before the Chair, which clearly intended that.

Mr. WISE. -

The whole difficulty is in the drawing up of a suitable amendment.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I take it that in each of the colonies there are a number of things over which the Central Parliament has control, but in the management of which it does not interfere. Take in Victoria our somewhat complete system of local government. The Central Parliament has control over all the municipalities, but it creates laws under which the municipalities, not the Central Government, shall manage the affairs of the localities. And I take it that when we arrive at some means for giving the Federal Parliament control it will provide machinery under which the various municipalities can manage their own affairs under such conditions as will not be prejudicial to the welfare of any of the colonies concerned. In looking at the amendments which have been presented, it seems to me that that submitted by Mr. Symon will best meet the case. The amendment suggested by the honorable member is as follows:-

Navigable rivers flowing in, through, or between two or more states, so far as may be necessary for the improvement of their navigability, with a just regard to the necessities of water conservation and irrigation.

I understand that there has been an objection to the use of the word just." Well, perhaps, in inserting it here, it may be vaguely implied that, if it were not inserted, the control by the Federal Parliament would not be just."

Mr. SYMON. -
That is a very hypercritical objection.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
I think it is an hypercritical objection, but, in order to meet that objection, I would suggest that the amendment would be better if we substituted the word due" for the word just." Mr. McMillan has conceived a condition where, in the interests of New South Wales, she might with propriety stop every drop of water from flowing into the Murray. I submit respectfully that there might easily arise a condition of things under which the Federal Parliament would be justified in restraining New South Wales or any other colony from using the waters for certain purposes, in order to retain them for certain other purposes. For instance, the Murray, running as it does for hundreds of miles through three colonies, is used by the people contiguous to it for domestic and stock purposes. While production is extremely important, and must be encouraged by every fair and legitimate means, production under some circumstances becomes secondary altogether to the preservation for the moment of human life. If we can conceive a time when the Murray would be so low that to use its waters at any point in New South Wales or elsewhere would render it inaccessible for the purposes of stock and domestic supply, I have no hesitation in asserting my opinion that the Federal Parliament would be justified in restraining during that period New South Wales from using its waters for irrigation purposes.

Mr. HOWE. -
What would become of the irrigation colony then?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
The irrigation colony would suffer undoubtedly.

Mr. HOWE. -
It would be ruined.
Mr. TRENWITH. -

It would suffer, as the whole continent would suffer.

Mr MCMILLAN. - The other extreme that I put is that the Federal Government would have the right to allow the Lachlan or the Darling to run to a dry bed, in order to keep up the navigability of the Murray.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

What I say is that the circumstances of the hour would be within the full cognisance of the tribunal we create, and if irrigation were more important than navigability I have no doubt that a competent and just tribunal, such as we would create, would take that matter into consideration. But if, on the other hand, both navigability and irrigation became secondary in consideration to the more important necessity of the preservation of the waters of the Murray for stock and domestic purposes, the Federal Parliament would have the power to decree for the time being what should be done in connexion with these waters, not at one particular point, but at any point where it seemed to be necessary to interfere. Thus we would create a tribunal having the interests of all the parties concerned at heart-having the interests of justice and fair play at heart-with power to ascertain from day to day and from hour to hour all the circumstances surrounding the whole question. If New South Wales can spoil the River Murray at its sweet will, by the same rule Victoria or South Australia can spoil the Murray by action within their own dominions at their sweet will. Let us suppose an equally absurd case with that suggested by Mr. McMillan—that South Australia said—We will not have this Murray in our dominions at all; we will dam it back, and throw its waters on to New South Wales and flood out part of that colony." I confess that that is an absurd contingency. But suppose such a contingency arose, what would be the attitude of New South Wales? She would say that she was unjustly treated, and ask, if need be, for the interposition of the Imperial Parliament. I think she would do that. Neither of these contingencies is possible, but still some modified evil between these two extremes would easily be possible; and there seems to me to be nothing unfair, nothing unreasonable, nothing to be afraid of, in submitting to the Federal Parliament the control—not the management—of the Murray, in the same sense that a policeman has the control over the citizens of a state; a controlling influence which never interferes with the citizen unless he proceeds to do wrong, and then only controls his actions in so far as that control prevents him from doing wrong. If this is an illogical proposition, the action of the New South Wales Government within its own dominions is illogical with reference to its own citizens. But neither New South Wales nor any of the other colonies nor the Central Government claims to control all riparian rights. If it happened that a stream started upon the property of an individual in New South Wales, the New South Wales Government would step in and say to that individual-
"You shall not use that water in such a way as will injure other citizens; we do not want to restrict your liberty to do as you like, except in so far as in doing so you are prejudicing the interests of other people." If this is a logical position with reference to the relation of the state with its citizens, surely, under the Federation, the various states are to the Federation as the citizen is to the state, and the Central Parliament created has as much right to interfere to maintain the due interests of all its constituents as the Central Parliament of the state has to control its citizens within its own domain. Mr. O'Connor seemed to me to admit this in his argument yesterday morning, in the course of his temperate, carefully thought-out, and extremely able speech;

but he contended that we have all that is necessary under the clause as it stands, because, I understood him to argue, if in New South Wales anything were done by the New South Wales Government to destroy the navigability of the Murray at any point, the clause gives sufficient power-read in conjunction with decisions which have been given in America upon the same point-to restrain New South Wales from so acting.

Mr. BARTON. -
You refer to the trade and commerce clause?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Yes. But trade and commerce is not all that is involved in the consideration of this question. Irrigation in these colonies is becoming daily more and more important, and may become so important as to overshadow the question of navigability. If it do become so important it will become so in connexion with the different colonies, not merely in connexion with New South Wales. Therefore, it seems to me wise and necessary that, in order that this extremely important aspect of the water question should be placed upon such a basis as to give security to the minds of all the persons who are to enter this Commonwealth, it should be under the control of the Federal Parliament. I said in commencing that I did not purpose addressing the committee at any length upon this subject, and I have said more than I had intended; but if the matter is pressed to a vote, if no compromise can be arrived at satisfactory to all parties, it seems to me that I ought to vote--indeed, I shall do so--for the amendment of Mr. Symon, with the alteration I have suggested--which, I understand, meets with Mr.
Symon's approval, although the objection to the word just" is, as he has said, some what hypercritical. With the alteration of the word just" to the word due," I shall vote for that amendment.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I think it may be advisable if I submit the form in which I originally deemed that this question should be put to the committee. I think I am right in saying that at present there is no proposal before the Chair, although many amendments have been submitted to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. -

There is no amendment at present before the Chair.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Then I will suggest the amendment which I think will meet the case.

Mr. BARTON. -

I will ask my honorable and learned friend not to formally move an amendment at this stage.

Mr. GLYNN. -

If the leader of the Convention wishes that I should not do so, I will not move an amendment formally at this stage, but I prefer the form of amendment which I have drafted to any others that have been suggested, with the exception of that of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins). I think we should be definite as to what we are doing, and it seems to me that the words used in nearly all the amendments that have been suggested are not definite. The word navigable," for instance, will lead to a question of interpretation after the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, it will lead to the question whether the British law or the American law applies.

Mr. GLYNN. -

According to my reading of the American decisions, I think that the Darling would not be held to be a navigable stream. Indeed, I have had put into my hands a decision given in England in 1889, according to which it seems to be clear that the Darling would not be considered to be a navigable river. Wherever there is an interruption, even for three or four days, of navigability, it has been held that the river in question is not really a navigable river.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The decisions require that it shall be subject to the ebb and flow of the tide.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Exactly so. It is, as suggested by Mr. Isaacs, a question of the ebb and flow of the tide, so that the analogy of the English and American decisions would lead us to this position: That if we carry out any of the amendments which have been moved in which the word navigable" is used, the Darling would not come within the scope of the Federal Parliament at all. I think that what we should do is to say what rivers we want to take over. We should specifically mention the Murray and the Darling. I do not want to take over the tributaries of the River Murray, but I regard the Darling as a main river. I would leave the control of the Darling and the Murray to the Federal Parliament, but would take no cognisance of the Murrumbidgee, the Lachlan, the Edwards, and other tributaries. I do not believe that South Australia would wish the Murrumbidgee to be dealt with in the same way as the Darling and the Murray. But we have a great trade from Bourke to Goolwa. There are times, when the Darling is high, when the export trade from New South Wales to South Australia touches from £1,200,000 to £1,400,000 a year, but when the river is low the trade runs down to £100,000 a year. This is one of the considerations that operate with us. It is one which should affect, also, the delegates from New South Wales, because these exports touch the settlers in their districts. The route selected for export is the cheapest. I would point out to Mr. Carruthers that, in the recommendation of Mr. McKinney, that the Darling should be locked, he points out, as among the chief considerations, the fact that the carriage of goods from Walgett to Wilcannia would, under locking, be reduced all round by £3 per ton, and he refers to the enormous benefits which this would confer on the settlers of New South Wales. If, as the result of giving federal control, we decide on a system of locking, the benefits will not be confined to keeping up the export trade, but there will also be enormous benefits to the settlers in Riverina itself, by the lower cost of haulage as against the railways. Now, I would suggest as an amendment, in order to make this thing definite, to strike out all the words after the first word in the sub-section and insert the following:-

The maintenance and improvement of the navigability of the Rivers Murray and Darling, and the apportionment on, as far as possible, the principles which determine the riparian rights of individuals of the waters of such rivers.

I cannot see on what ground of equity New South Wales can object to her rights being determined by the same principles that operate between individuals of any particular state. These riparian rights are declared by the highest tribunal in the land on an equitable principle as between individuals, and I cannot see what objection New South Wales can urge to the same principle being applied between states. Analogies occur in the Californian Constitution, and all we ask is to adopt the same principle of justice in dealing with streams in which different states are concerned. The effect of the amendment would be to leave the normal average flow of the Darling to continue. The flood waters would not be interfered with, but we are entitled to say that the normal flow of the Darling into the Murray should not be intercepted by any irrigation in New South Wales—and that it will be intercepted is apparent by what is contemplated in New South Wales. The proposal of Mr. McKinney is that the water of 70 lakes on the Darling should be impounded, and those lakes contain a discharge which, if it is allowed to reflow into the Darling, will keep up its navigable level for six months in the year. In 1892 he stated that Lake Menindie alone had a storage capacity which would keep up t of 69 other lakes? Undoubtedly, the navigation of the Darling will be six months less in the year than it is at present.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
The lakes are only filled during flood-time.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I agree with that statement, but I would point out to Sir William Zeal that the main consideration which operates with us is this—the Darling system of lakes is filled by flood waters from the river. When the waters begin to subside, those lakes reflow into the river, and the navigation of the river is kept up for six months by the reflow of those lakes.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Is your anxiety irrigation or navigation?

Mr. GLYNN. -
Mainly navigation, but both; and I will tell the honorable member why. According to Colonel Home's report, which was presented to the New South Wales Government, the capacity of the Darling for irrigation under a system of locking or conservation by locks is exceedingly small. He states that you cannot go beyond about 50,000 acres, whatever you do, and one of his reasons appears to be this: The annual evaporation from the lakes, according to Mr. McKinney, is about 95 per cent. of the total storage capacity. When the water reflows throughout a great portion of the year back again the evaporation is checked, but if we stop the water and keep it in the lake the evaporations continue. For that reason Colonel Home particularly challenges the value of the Darling or of any schemes of conservation in connexion with it for purposes of extensive irrigation. I think Mr. Carruthers will admit that there was a damper thrown on the contemplated schemes of irrigation in New South Wales by Colonel Home's report, and Colonel Home, Mr. Carruthers described, at the Adelaide Convention, as one of the greatest experts in the British Empire on irrigation. What we say is that if you cannot, without an enormous waste of water, carry out the contemplated schemes of irrigation in New South Wales, you should allow the Federal Parliament to say whether navigation should supersede irrigation, or whether the two should be combined by a system of locking. That this matter is one of vital interest to South Australia I need not point out. Another matter to which I wish to call attention is this: Mr. Russell telegraphs to say, that the discharge of the rivers would keep up a continuous flow of about 10 feet throughout the year, and that therefore the amount of water to be deflected by these contemplated schemes would make no substantial difference in the navigability, but he does not mention that you cannot keep up an average of 10 feet throughout the year. Sometimes the discharge is only 100,000 cubic feet per minute, while sometimes it is millions. Does Mr. Russell say that you can so adjust the average throughout the year as to maintain a flow for every month of 10 feet deep? The proposition is monstrous, and this is one of those statements which we ought to carefully examine, because they often have the result of throwing dust in the eyes of honorable members. Under a system of locking the result would be this. The discharge at Overland Corner goes down to 120,000 cubic feet per minute. Now, under locking we would always keep a minimum of 350,000 cubic feet per minute, and that is the navigable discharge. Supposing any system were arrived at of apportioning the water between the various colonies without locking, and supposing that South Australia got a compensation discharge of 50,000 or 60,000 feet per minute without locking, that would be of very little use for four or five months of the year, because the navigable discharge might not be reached by 150,000 or 200,000 cubic feet per minute. But the moment you keep the river near the navigable discharge, at for instance 300,000 feet per minute, then a compensation of 50,000 feet per minute would bring it up to navigable point. Therefore, if the Federal Parliament has this power, and admits a system of locking, in order to make navigation effective, a slight compensation discharge from New South Wales into Victoria would be sufficient to keep up the navigation of the river, whereas, for navigation, the compensation discharge, without locking, might require to be six times as large in order to effect the same result. I ask honorable members, therefore, to accept the amendment I have suggested, which is definite, and which excludes all tributaries. This proposal would have the effect of making the Darling navigable, allow trade to go by its most efficient course, and make the Darling always have a permanent discharge of 350,000 cubic feet per minute.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You would not give New South Wales the right to take any water?
Mr. GLYNN. -

Not so as to diminish the normal flow as far as Victoria and South Australia are concerned. It would have the right to take so much of the water as would not reasonably interfere with the normal flow. Suppose the normal flow into Victoria or into South Australia in a particular month were 200,000 feet per minute, New South Wales would be entitled to take any surplus over that normal average flow for purposes of its irrigation. New South Wales says:"We do not want to touch the ordinary flow of the river; we want to intercept floods." Now, I would point out that that power would not be very much diminished by the application of the principle of riparian rights, under which there is an average flow, from time to time, which must not be intercepted by the owner of the banks higher up. The Federal Parliament ought to have competence, on materials in its possession, to determine what was the average flow of the river for every month of the year from New South Wales into Victoria, and from Victoria into South Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That would have to depend on the rainfall, would it not?

Mr. GLYNN. -

We have had gaugings taken during the last ten or fifteen years in South Australia, and we know the discharge of the river at every point in South Australia, Victoria, and even New South Wales, at every particular month. All we ask is an apportionment before locking, or, if there is to be locking, an apportionment after locking, of the waters for each month of the year from these rivers between the various colonies on some equitable basis. Such a proposition was made in 1890, by a commission that sat to consider the question in South Australia, as I mentioned before. My accuracy on that point has been challenged by Mr. Lyne, and therefore I may state that in 1887 we appointed a Water Commission to discuss the question of inter-colonial rights as regards the rivers with the commissions of Victoria and New South Wales. When our commission was appointed Sir Henry Parkes gave notice that he was going to dissolve his commission, but Mr. Gillies interposed, and said that this would not be fair to South Australia. Sir Henry Parkes then said that the final report of the New South Wales commission would be delayed for one month, and it was so delayed. In its report there was a recommendation made by that commission that there should be a conference between the commissions of the three colonies to discuss some fair method of apportioning the waters of the rivers.

Mr. LYNE. -

What commission was that?

Mr. GLYNN. -
The Royal Commission on the Conservation of Water in New South Wales, which sat in 1886-7, and, I think, sent in their report in 1887. I intend to read an extract from its report which was presented, I think, in the middle of 1887, and which suggested a very fair means of arriving at some definite apportionment of the surplus waters. The report refers to the fact that Mr. Deakin was then absent in England in connexion with the Imperial Conference. I may remind honorable members that the commission of New South Wales, with the commission of Victoria, made definite proposals for the division of the waters of the Murray, as between themselves alone. Objection was taken by Sir John Downer, as representing South Australia, to such an apportionment, and we appointed a commission with a view of meeting the commission of the other colonies, so as to determine upon some equitable scheme of apportionment. As I have already said, as soon as we appointed our commission, Sir Henry Parkes announced that he was about to dissolve the New South Wales commission, but owing to the intervention of Mr. Gillies, he simply intimated that the final report of his commission, would not be presented for another month. Within a few weeks afterwards he gave notice that he intended to dissolve that commission, so that through the action of New South Wales—the dissolution of its own commission—there was no possibility of having a conference between the Water Commissions of the three colonies. In its final report, the New South Wales commission recommended that there should be a conference. One, extract from the commission’s report is as follows:-

Soon after that date—

Referring to the return of Mr. Deakin from England.

it may be practicable for representatives of the three colonies to confer together upon the subject, with a view to submit to the Government of each the conditions upon which the flood waters of the Murray and its tributaries may be best conserved and equitably appropriated.

Now, that is the principle, I say, which should underlie the action of the Convention.

Mr. LYNE. -

Who made that recommendation?

Mr. GLYNN. -

It is a recommendation from the Royal Commission of New South Wales—your own commission—but, unfortunately, the action of the statesman (Sir Henry Parkes) prevented that recommendation being acted on, because he immediately afterwards dissolved the commission.

Mr. BARTON. -
Do you mind stating that recommendation again?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I will read the whole of the extract from the report, as follows:-

It was anticipated that the conference would have taken place before now, but as the president of the Victorian commission (the Honorable Alfred Deakin, M.P.) found it necessary to leave Victoria to attend the Imperial Conference now being held in London, the date of assembling was deferred until his return. He is expected to arrive in Melbourne in June or July next. Soon after that date it may be practicable for representatives of the three colonies to confer together upon the subject, with a view to submit to the Governments of each the conditions upon which the flood waters of the Murray and its tributaries may be best conserved and equitably appropriated.

Mr. LYNE. -

I think you have made some mistake there. I do not think that is in the report of the commission itself.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Of course the report and the minutes of the commission are available to the honorable member. I was technically wrong, perhaps, the other day in using the word recommendation instead of proposals, but it is a distinction without a difference. The two commissions met, and reduced their recommendations to writing; but, as they did not send in a final report, those recommendations were called proposals, not recommendations. At the same time, they are the conclusions which were arrived at, and they are, therefore, more or less authoritative. I ask the Convention to express its opinion on this question which is definitely before us, and to say that this Bill is only to give the riparian states such rights against one another, as in the ordinary exercise of justice the courts would grant to one individual as against another.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

We have had a very interesting debate, and I think the time has now arrived when the suggestion of the Premier of Victoria could be very usefully put in force, namely, that two or three members from each of the colonies interested should confer together

[P.146] starts here
to see if they cannot provide for some satisfactory settlement of this very important matter. I should hardly like to see the number of members representing each colony at that conference limited to two, because in that case one or two members of the Convention who have taken an intense interest in the subject would probably be left out. No one would like to see the Premier of South Australia choose one of his colleagues and leave Mr.
Glynn and Mr. Symon unable to take any part in that conference. But it is quite enough for us to ask that such a conference shall take place, and leave it to the Premier of each colony to choose two, three, or four, or any number, of his colleagues, to attend that conference. In rising, as a representative of Tasmania, to address myself to this question, I am reminded of the fact that we who are of Tasmania and Western Australia have been told that we have no direct interest in the matter. In one sense that is correct, but in another sense we have a direct interest. That is to say, each of us does his utmost to accomplish the only thing we were sent here for, namely, to devise a right and just Constitution for Australasia. And with a view of enabling me to give my vote on principles that are just, I desire to bring one or two matters before the leader of the Convention, so that I may get from him, as I always do, some very useful information, which will guide me in giving my vote. I must confess that my sympathies, from the commencement, have been with the colony of South Australia, because I cannot get rid of the fact that every individual in every state known to the British Empire, and other empires also, has his riparian rights; and I have been very much astonished indeed to hear honourable members from the parent colony of New South Wales, while admitting that fact as regards individuals emphatically denying it as regards states. I ask why, if we are here to federate, and to talk about one people one destiny, are we to deny that there can and ought to be such things as riparian rights between states as there are between individuals? It appears to me that for the New South Wales representatives to meet us here and say - "Because the Crown did" - or did not - "vest the ownership of the sources of these great streams of this great water-way, the Murray, in our own colony, we are going to federate and to shelter ourselves behind the fact that the grant of the Crown gives it to us absolutely" - which I do not believe - "or that, if the Crown did not give it us, we have actual possession, and no power short of bayonets and guns can take it away from us," appears to me to be thoroughly contrary to the spirit of federation. Therefore, what I desire Mr. Barton to tell us, if he will, is how can we try to frame a Federal Constitution and deny to the states, in reference to these great waterways, what is not denied to the humblest individual in those states? I think that the very last 6s. 8d. I earned in Tasmania before I came to the Convention was paid by an unfortunate man who came to me and said - "I have a stream rising on my land, and I have turned off the water in order to irrigate my potatoes, but here is a letter from the man immediately below me, who objects to my doing so." "Well, my friend," I replied, "I am sorry to say that the man below you is quite right in objecting to your diverting the water to irrigate your potatoes." To this he rejoined - "What, cannot a man water his spuds?" And I answered - "No, not if you prevent the man below from having water enough to boil his billy." The man was not satisfied with my opinion and therefore I had to get down Addison on Torts and satisfy him on the point.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
And you charged him 6s. 8d. for that?
Mr. DOBSON. -
Yes, I did.
Mr. GORDON. -
It is costing a great deal more than 6s. 8d. to settle this question.
Mr. DOBSON. -
What is my stumbling block in the matter is that this is not only a question of justice, but a question of right, and are these states to be denied under this Constitution a right awarded by our courts of justice to the humblest individual within those states? That is a point I cannot get over. Now, in the arguments that have been urged before the Convention there seems to me to have been some little shirking of the main question—How are we to control and vest the ownership of these great water-ways, not for the purposes of navigation, but for the purposes of irrigation? I think that to some extent we may dismiss the question of navigation from our minds, for two reasons—first, because the Premier of New South Wales has told us that his colony have not the slightest objection to keep open to navigation for all time, as far as they can, the great water-ways of that colony as far as they now exist as navigable streams, so that each state may carry on its commerce. And, as I read international law, which I presume will have something to say on this question, no toll of 2d. per ton, which the Premier of New South Wales talks about, can be put on any craft plying its trade on a navigable stream, although it may pass from its own state into the boundaries of New South Wales. Coming to irrigation, who is to say when the moment has arrived when the question of irrigation is to supersede in its importance the question of navigation? Is that to be left to each state to say? Is New South Wales to say—"We want all the water for irrigation," when South Australia may say—"We want the Murray kept up to its natural level for the purposes of navigation"? On the other hand, is South Australia to say—"We are convinced that irrigation is so important that we are going to irrigate our lands"? And are the people of New South Wales to say—"We must keep up the navigation of the river for our own territory"? Therefore, this is intensely one of those matters which must be absolutely under the control of the Federal Parliament. The time will arrive, at all events I look... forward to it, when irrigation will be of more importance than navigation; and, when that times comes, we shall find that we have made a very great blunder in framing this Constitution if we have not put this important matter under the control of the Federal Parliament. It appears to me that, of all the amendments before the committee, not one is so useful or so good in its scope as the clause we have in the Bill. The clause itself is wider in its scope than any of these amendments. I think it would do more ample justice; and I think our friends from South Australia will be making a mistake if they accept any amendments in preference to the clause in the Bill. But, further, I see in two or three of the amendments an interminable amount of litigation confronting us in the future. How can you say that the Federal Parliament is to control the waters of these streams for the purposes of navigation, having due regard, or having regard, to the necessities of irrigation? There is an enormous lawsuit staring us in the face for years to come if these amendments are adopted. Now, I have only one more thought to express before I sit down in reference to the part that shall be played in our Federal Commonwealth by the Federal Court. In South Australia, I ventured to say that I preferred that important questions of law, and also of fact, should be remitted to the Federal Court by a direct power in the Bill, far before the creation of your Inter-State Commission. By all means have the creation of your Inter-State Commission, if you please, but I would certainly prefer that a matter of this sort, bristling at all these points with law-although the members of the Convention representing New South Wales say they wish to get rid of law-requiring the very nicest application of expert evidence to this question of water conservation and so forth-I would infinitely prefer to have power in the Commonwealth to refer a matter of such vital importance to the Federal Court. You are going to establish that court at the greatest expense, composed of the most eminent men, men removed entirely from all political, and, we hope, all state influences. That is the one tribunal that can help us in this important matter, and unless the Federal Parliament have absolute power to remit it to them, our Constitution will contain a blunder. It is on this point that I require more light and knowledge.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This debate has been so full, and the arguments on each side have been so thoroughly put forward, that I do not propose to detain the committee at any length. I rise mainly for the purpose of expressing my concurrence with the suggestion of Sir George Turner.

Mr PEACOCK. - Hear, hear; it is far the best.
Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think the differences are so wide that they cannot be thrashed out in friendly conference. I would not suggest that there should be any formal select committee, or that any number of representatives of each colony should be specified, because at a consultation of the kind suggested matters will not be tested by vote at all; it will be merely a case of Come, let us reason together." I would suggest, therefore—indeed I propose, if the committee agree with me, that it be left to each of the three delegates concerned to select the manner in which their colony should be represented at the conference, whether by one, two, three, or whatever number it may be. What is desired is that the collective views held by these representatives should be put forward, not that there should be any voting or any conflict, but that there should be a mutual understanding come to, and I have not interfered with the debate until the present, so far as to express concurrence with Sir George Turner's suggestion, because I held the hope that by letting the debate go on to what is probably its legitimate conclusion—and probably it has come to that now—we might save further argument hereafter. I think there will not be great difficulty in arriving at some conclusion among the representatives of those three delegations, which conclusion can then safely be adopted by the whole Convention. I think we have advanced a great deal further than the point at which we had arrived last night, because we have the admission from the honorable member (Mr. Holder) as I understand it, and he generally speaks very plainly, that the irrigation question is not a federal but a state matter; and I think it will not require very much argument, if one were disposed to argue now, to convince the Convention that that is so. The real question between us is this: To what extent are certain rivers navigable, and to what extent are they to be kept navigable? If so, what line can we lay down so as to prevent these powers of navigation on the one hand and of water conservation and irrigation on other that injustice should not be done on one hand or the other? That, is the question which awaits that conference which I hope will be held. It is because I think the matter can be put in that way that I do not anticipate any failure in the conference suggested. I am not disposed, looking at what we have to do in this consultation, to endeavour to solve any of the difficult questions which my honorable friend (Mr. Dobson) has just put. I was a little interested in that conflicts, which might be described in his own words almost as the battle of the billy and the spuds, but I do not think, when we try to resolve this matter into its original elements, that there is any great co-relation in the position of the states interested with regard to the flow of the water through other states and the position of individuals with regard to their riparian rights.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
There should be in a Federation.

Mr. BARTON. -
If that is to be the case in a Federation, that is to say, if we are to give the Federation at once control of the apportionment of the water, and convert into a federal matter that which the honorable member, (Mr. Holder) admitted to be a state matter -

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I think you misunderstand him.

Mr. BARTON. -
I understood him to admit it practically without qualification.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
No.

Mr. BARTON. -
The feeling I have about the matter is this: We do not propose to federalize the lands of the state. It is a question of hands off, and the territory of any of the states is not to be touched, except so far as it may be necessary to carry out a constitutional power given under this instrument. If you take away from a number of the settlers in New South Wales the use of the water, if you hand over to any authority the power to diminish the application of the water for the use of their land, it is practically saying to them that you are taking the control of their land also. This body of settlers, not inconsiderable now, and which we hope will become larger, because they inhabit land which with the proper application of water will be extremely valuable, have the right to say this: You are not federalizing the lands of New South Wales; we are inhabiting a portion of that territory which cannot be reasonably utilized without the application of the waters of these rivers. If you federalize the water you might as well federalize the land, for, as far as we are concerned, one goes with the other—one is useless without the other. That is the position they occupy. I put it to the common sense of the Convention whether that is not a position which must be conceded to be reasonable. We have met to frame a Federal Constitution. We have not met to make an amalgamation. Our purpose is to leave the various provinces in the first instance their territory, because that is the very kernel of the question. To take away their territory is to amalgamate. To leave them their territory is to federate, provided that you unite in all matters beyond that. The position taken up is this. We have met for the purpose of making a Federation which involves the retention of the soil by the individual states. The retention of the soil which borders on these rivers is only a retention in name, if you do not give us the use of the water by which alone we can make that land available for our use-

Mr. ISAACS. -

Apply that to South Australia, too.

Mr. BARTON. -

Supposing you do apply it to South Australia, the question does not become a federal question, merely because one or more states are interested. If the line of demarcation in this matter is the retention of the soil, that must carry with it the means of the development of the soil. If we are right in saying, as we have hitherto said in this Convention, that the railways should not be taken over because they are the instrument for the development of the land, there is equal reason for saying that each state should have the means for the conservation of water and irrigation, as a provincial matter and not a federal matter.

Mr. GORDON. -

It is conceded there must be

Mr. BARTON. -

That is in order to prevent infringement of inter-colonial free-trade, because we make inter-colonial free-trade an absolute condition of the Federation, and we propose, therefore, that there should be no power to render nugatory that provision for free-trade by any conflict of railway or river rates. We must all concede that.

Mr. REID. -

We all concede that.

We simply make that provision because we do not wish to give any one power to make inter-colonial free-trade nugatory. The question here is quiet distinct. Any consideration which might impel you to constitute some tribunal to deal with railway rates is a consideration which does not apply at all to the question of the use by the various states of their water. I am suggesting that some arrangement may be come to which will not interfere with the right possessed by individual states to carry out works for water conservation and irrigation. I am pointing out the position taken up by the settlers on the soil when it is proposed to deal with the use of the water, in order to show the extreme importance of this question to the representatives of New South Wales in the Convention. Honorable members will absolve me from making threats to the Convention. I have never been one of those who have said-"You must give us this or we shall have to go away, and it is no use going any further." I do not propose to say anything of that kind now; I simply propose to state what I know to be the facts of the case, leaving the rest to the judgment of the Convention. If you say that you are not going to take away our soil, any colony whose soil it was proposed to take in any degree would at once retire from this Convention. I want to put the case to you whether it is not almost the same thing to say you are going to federalize the waters in these rivers? It might be possible for us to ascertain something of this sort: To what point this River Murray—I will not say also the Darling; that might be taken into consideration—is navigable, in order to maintain that navigability, not perhaps to extend it, but to deal with the existing conditions so as to be able to insure that any of the states through which the river flows shall have a reasonable distribution of the water. That is what we have been trying to suggest, and that is why I think the suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner is so good; because, looking at the matter from different stand-points, we find it difficult in framing these amendments to carry out what we all concede is a just principle. In order to enable the suggestion to be given effect to, I beg to move that the sub-section be postponed until clause 69 has been disposed of.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I support the suggestion which is made by the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria, and any course which makes for the possibility of amicable agreement, rather than an affirmation of a principle forced by a majority on a minority of this Convention. At the same time, I would say to our leader that I think, to some extent, he misunderstands the remarks of my honorable colleague (Mr. Holder). I did not understand my honorable friend (Mr. Holder) to put it that he was prepared to concede to any colony an unlimited use of the waters of the rivers for the purpose of irrigation. What he did concede, and what I do not think has ever been disputed, was that the matter of irrigation works was a subject for provincial control and administration, but as regards the consumption of the water for that purpose, a regulation of the quantity to be taken by each state was a federal question affecting not only the state constructing the irrigation works, but other states lower down the stream. I merely rose to make this explanation.

The motion for the postponement of the sub-section was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would now suggest, sir, that you do leave the chair, and that, in the meantime, the leaders of the three representations should meet and arrange the basis for this consultation. It can be arranged in this chamber at once. I beg to move that the Chairman do now leave the chair, report progress, and ask leave to sit again to-day.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported, and leave obtained to sit again at two o'clock.

[The President left the chair at twelve minutes to one o'clock p.m. The Convention resumed at two p.m.]

The Convention again resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion was resumed on clause 52 (Powers of the Parliament).

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I had it in my mind to suggest a new sub-section to follow sub-section (31), and to be called sub-section (31A). Honorable members will notice that clause 86 provides that all lands and other property used in connexion with any department of the public service, the control of which is taken over by the Commonwealth, is to vest in the Commonwealth. But that is only in respect of those departments which are taken over, and it is only at the time of taking over. Further needs are not provided for in any way.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Of these departments?

Mr. BARTON. -

No, of the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth has no power under the Constitution except as conferred by that clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will not sub-section (37) of clause 52 cover it?

Mr. BARTON. -

We thought of that. The question is whether it is sufficiently clear that that provision would give the Commonwealth power to legislate for the resumption of lands.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There is another clause relating to the acquisition of any part of the territory of a state.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is clause 53. Then there is clause 105, which gives the Parliament of a state power to surrender any part of the state to the Commonwealth. There is no express provision in the Constitution for the acquisition by the Commonwealth of any property the acquisition of which might become necessary. It has been suggested to me that subsection (37) of clause 52 might give a sufficient power of legislation for that purpose, but there is a doubt on the subject. I would suggest that the following new sub-section be inserted after subsection (31):-

The acquisition of property on just terms from any state or person for the purposes of the Commonwealth.

I would like to hear the views of honorable members as to whether they think sub-section (37) is sufficiently comprehensive.
The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member move the new sub-section? There must be something before the Chair.

Mr. BARTON. -

I will move it pro forma. I can withdraw it afterwards if discussion shows that it should be withdrawn.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I was about to draw attention to the matter to which the leader of the Convention has referred. In the Constitutions of Canada, Switzerland, and the United States express power is given for the acquisition by the Federal Government of lands for public purposes. It has been suggested that the general power given would cover this, but I do not think that that is so. At any rate, in the United States Constitution there is a provision that the Congress shall have power to exercise authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the state in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful business. Under the Constitution of Switzerland, on payment of a reasonable indemnity, the Confederation has the right to use or acquire drill grounds and buildings intended for military purposes within the Cantons, together with the appurtenances thereof. It is so also in Germany, where the Constitution says that the right to construct fortresses within the territory of the empire shall belong to the Emperor, who shall ask for the appropriation of the means required for that purpose, if not already included in the regular appropriation. In Canada, the Constitution provides:

The several provinces shall retain all their respective public property not otherwise disposed of in this Act, subject to the right of Canada to resume any lands or public property required for fortifications or for the defence of the country.

In these Constitutions there is a general section giving express powers for the acquisition of property which may be required for the purposes of the Commonwealth. In this Bill there is only a power to take over existing buildings.

Mr. BARTON. -

And property at present in use.

Dr. QUICK. -

Yes. There is no power to acquire the land of any state, say, for the purposes of a federal court-house or a federal custom-house.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If that is necessary, for the purpose of the Federal Judicature it is all included in sub-section (37).

Dr. QUICK. -

It is very doubtful whether, a general provision of that kind would give this express power. Then there is no machinery in that clause for determining the mode in which the Commonwealth is to acquire the land of a state.

Mr. BARTON. -

Clause 53 does not give a power for the acquisition of land. It simply sets out that authority shall be exercised over it when it is acquired.

Dr. QUICK. -

The Commonwealth would be crippled in its future operations if express power were not given in the manner suggested.

Mr. GLYNN. (South Australia). -

I think that the new sub-section should be inserted. I had intended moving a similar amendment in connexion with clause 53. Under sub-section (2) of that clause, the exclusive power is limited to any territory acquired by surrender from the states, but no power is directly given to acquire territory, or, having acquired it, to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over it. According to the American decisions, subsection (37) of clause 52 would not cover what is required. In Sheppard's Constitutional Text Book reference is made to a provision in the American Constitution similar, to sub-section (37), and it is stated-

This clause does not in terms grant any new power or enlarge or diminish any of the powers elsewhere granted. It simply authorizes Congress to make use of such particular means as may be necessary or proper in order to execute the general powers conferred by the Constitution upon the Federal Government or any department or officer thereof.

There being no power given to acquire territory, clause 53 would not cover the ground that is sought to be covered by the proposed new sub-section.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I am not at all satisfied that it would be advisable to insert this new sub-section. It comes on us somewhat as a surprise, and I would like to have further time to consider the effect of it. It might enable the Commonwealth to run the states into enormous expenditure. The leader of the Convention will see that whatever property has to be acquired will probably be acquired out of states money. The states have to collect a certain amount of Customs-at least the Commonwealth will collect a certain amount of Customs, and the surplus will be handed over to the states. If we increase these powers of purchasing property we may enable the Commonwealth to incur enormous expenditures. I think it is shown by some notes I have with regard to Canada and other places that that has really been the result of a power of this kind. If it were so here the states Treasuries would be the sufferers.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Their functions are much more extended.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I know that, but still the honorable member will recognise that where there is a power, the body having that power would probably extend it to its utmost limit. If they go a little further than we intended, or a little beyond that strict reading of the Act, how are we to stop them?

Mr. BARTON. -

One answer to that is that if you give this power to acquire landed property on just terms, you would have the compensation regulated by the provisions of an Act which would probably involve arbitration or the verdict of a jury. If, on the other hand, you allowed the acquisition to be carried out by contract, as it would have to be without a clause of this kind, it would be more expensive, and would entail a greater diminution of the surplus returned to the state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I should object to the use of the words just terms" on the ground that they are not proper words to put into the Constitution. We assume that the Federal Parliament will act strictly on the lines of justice. But what I desire to say is that this has come upon us a surprise. We did not know that this amendment was to be moved, and we have had no opportunity of considering its effect. The object of the leader of the Convention may be a good one, but I would urge upon him to allow the matter to remain in abeyance If he would intimate that he would either recommit the clause or deal with it on the report, and he would in the meantime circulate the amendment he would give us an opportunity of making inquiries and ascertaining what the probable effect of the amendment would be. We might then be able to meet his views. I would urge him not to press the new sub-section at the present time, because that would be rather unfair to us, seeing that we have not had an opportunity of considering it.

Mr. I.A. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I would join with Sir George Turner in asking that a little time be given for the consideration of this amendment. I would draw Mr. Barton's attention to the fact that acquisition would mean compulsory acquisition—that is, acquisition by the Commonwealth against the will of the state, which would reverse the principle that has been adopted in the Bill that a state should not be compelled to give up any portion of its territory. Clause 105 provides that the Parliament of a state may at any time surrender any part of the territory of that state to the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. -

That clause requires a separate Act for every acquisition of territory by the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes. What I wish to point out is that we must be careful that we do not in this rough-and-ready fashion bring about the reversals of principles already laid down in the Bill. Clause 53 embodies a provision which exists in the United States Constitution:-

The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have exclusive powers to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to the following matters:- . . . . . . . . .

II. The government of any territory which by the surrender of any state or states, and the acceptance of the Commonwealth, becomes the seat of government of the Commonwealth, and the exercise of like authority over all places acquired by the Commonwealth, with the consent of the state in which such places are situate, for the construction of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, quarantine stations, or for any other purposes of general concern.

That provision makes the fullest recognition of the right of the Commonwealth to acquire lands, with the consent of the states, for any purpose of general concern. If we are to reverse that position we ought not to do it hastily, and if it is the desire of honorable members to insert this sub-section, the Bill must be altered very materially in several respects. For these reasons, I would ask that a little more time be given to us for the consideration of the matter.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I shall be perfectly willing to adopt the suggestion which has been made upon the understanding that at some future time I shall propose a sub-section similar to this, or the insertion of a new clause of similar effect in some other part of the Bill. It has been suggested to me that the sub-section might be inserted now, but upon the understanding that I shall assent to a recommittal if there is a desire on the part of honorable members to consider the matter further. The 2nd sub-section of clause 53 is not intended to confer powers at all. The sub-section only gives to the Federal Parliament exclusive powers of legislation in regard to the government of territory which has been acquired by the Commonwealth for military and other purposes.
Mr. ISAACS. -

Taken in conjunction with sub-section (37), it would put the federal authority in the same position as the federal authority of the United States occupies.

Mr. BARTON. -

When you hand over such powers as are included in the naval and military defence of the Commonwealth, you unfairly and unwisely restrict those powers, if you make it necessary to procure separate legislation for the acquisition of any lands required for the purposes of defence, because you make the federal authority subject to the dictation of the state authority in regard to each transfer. This convinces me that power must be given to the federal authority not to acquire lands compulsorily, but to legislate upon the subject as I have suggested in the sub-section. However, if honorable members prefer that the sub-section should be withdrawn, I shall consent to that course upon the understanding to which I have already referred.

The sub-section was withdrawal.

Sub-section (32)-

The control of railways with respect to transport for the military purposes of the Commonwealth.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales-

After transport" insert but only."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Might I suggest that the insertion of these words is unnecessary? The sub-section originally read-

The control of railways with respect to transport for the purposes of the Commonwealth.

It was then sufficiently clear so far as the interpretation which a court of law would put upon it was concerned, because the word transport" is to be accepted in the ordinary sense of the term-the transport of arms, men, and munitions of war generally. But it was thought necessary in Sydney to make the wording clearer for the benefit of laymen who might read the Bill, and therefore it has been suggested that the words naval and military" should be inserted.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg to move that the words naval and be inserted before the word military.

The amendment was agreed to.

The sub-section, as amended, was agreed to.
Sub-section (33)-

The taking over by the Commonwealth, with any consent of the state, of the whole or any part of the railways of any state or states upon such terms as may be arranged between the Commonwealth and the state.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I wish to move that the words with the consent of the state, be omitted. I am not going into the railway question again, because it has been thoroughly argued in both Adelaide and Sydney. What the Convention seems to have negatived is the proposal to provide in the Constitution that the railways shall be taken over by the federal authority. I think that, without going so far as that, the Federal Parliament might be armed with the power to take over the railways, even though some of the states might not consent to it. As the Bill stands, if five of the colonies federated, and three of them were willing that the railways should be put under federal control, the other two could say-We will not allow it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think the words or states should come out.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I wish to strike out the words I have quoted. The position then would be that the Federal Parliament would say-We will take over the railways. Under the Bill as it stands the railways cannot be taken over except with the consent of all the states. Any one state could object to that and say-Our railway system must bot be taken over. Among the appendices to the Proceedings of the Sydney Session of the Convention there was a report by the Chief Railway Commissioner of New South Wales, in which that gentleman agrees with the Railways Commissioner of Victoria, that it would be exceedingly improper to take over any of the railway systems without taking them all over.

Mr. BARTON. -

Would the Federal Parliament take over one of the narrow-gauge lines of Northern Queensland, which do not connect with any inter-colonial system?

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is a matter of detail, but I cannot see that it would cause any harm. Most of the railways in existence are feeders to the main trunk lines, and there could be no harm in taking over one or two lines not connected with the main lines.

Mr. FRASER. -

There would be difficulties in the way of a change of rolling-stock, and in other directions.
Mr. GLYNN. -

The federalizing of the railways would soon get over those difficulties. One of the results of this step would be that the suggestion of the late Mr. Eddy, that there should be an abolition of the break of gauge, would be carried out. His proposal was that we should agree at once upon some uniform gauge—say the 4ft. 8 1/2in. gauge—and order all rolling-stock with a view to its ultimate accommodation to that gauge. When you had sufficient rolling-stock the rest of the work could be done almost in a week, and the change would not nearly so expensive as some honorable members anticipate. If my amendment is agreed to I shall propose further amendments, with a view to making the clause read as follows:

The taking over by the Commonwealth of the whole of the railways of the states, upon such terms as may be arranged between the Commonwealth and the several states.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I shall support the amendment, as I am one of those who were originally in favour of the federalizing of the railways, because my conviction as to the advisability of that course has been strengthened by the discussions which have taken place during the last twelve months. I do not propose to renew any old debate or to awaken old controversies, but I hope that a division will be taken upon this amendment, so that we may see if there has been any development of federal sentiment in this direction. I am quite content to leave things as they are, because I am confident that within five years of the accomplishment of federation the separate railway systems of the colonies will be found so inconvenient and intolerable, that the natural trend of events will complete the federalizing of the various lines. For these reasons, and without further remark, I shall support the amendment.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I shall be found supporting the amendment, because I always have been, and still am, entirely in favour of the federalizing of the railways. The committee, however, have dealt with this question, the general feeling of the Convention being that it would be undesirable at the present time to introduce a provision with that object into the Constitution which we are framing. More or less of a compromise was agreed to in the shape of sub-section (33), which gives the Commonwealth power to take over the railways either in whole or in part with the consent of the state. Pursuing a sentiment I have always entertained, I think we should trust the Federation. We must always remember that in deciding this question the Federal Parliament will have the advantage of the opinions of representatives from every colony, and I am confident that justice will be done by them in the negotiations as thoroughly as if the consent of the states was obtained.
severally. It seems to me that it is to whittle down the question of the subsequent federalizing of the railways to a very small matter if we are not prepared to allow the Federal Parliament, with the assistance of the representatives from every colony, to deal with this subject. If the amendment is resisted, I think it will be upon those who resist it to give reasons why the Federal Parliament should not be trusted with this power. I think we are all agreed that the probability is that in the future the railways will be federalized.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is it proposed that the Commonwealth may c

Mr. SYMON. -

The effect of the amendment will be to leave it to the Federal Parliament to determine whether the whole or any part of the railway systems shall be taken over. Now my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) proposes to move a subsequent amendment to withdraw the part of the sub-section with regard to taking over any part of the railways.

Mr. WISE. -

I could not support that.

Mr. SYMON. -

Nor could I, for this reason-I think we may in this matter have to go step by step. It may-I think it must-become imperative before many years have passed away that the great trunk lines should be federalized, and it seems to me to be insufficient for us to make a provision which will prevent the federal authority from taking over the great trunk lines, simply because the states are opposed to the taking over the whole. It may be that in Victoria-as my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) has said is the case in Queensland-there are many railways that are so disconnected with the general federal system, that it would be undesirable or inconvenient or not particularly beneficial that they should be taken over.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Because they would not pay well.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do, not think we should assume that the Federal Parliament will act upon that principle. But if they did, the representatives of the colonies would be there to see that the interests of their various colonies were looked after, and I think that we may rest assured in such a matter-which everyone of us recognises to be, although perhaps impracticable now, of real federal concern in the interests of all-that it is right that we should make provision so that the main trunk railways may be taken under general federal control in some way or other. We should devise some means whereby the Federal Parliament should have a free hand—that Parliament being ourselves in Parliament assembled—to deal with the interests of every state as a whole, and with the interests of the nation as a whole. We shall then be doing a good thing. Of course, it would be unjust in the last degree that railways should be picked out and those which are paying taken over, whilst those which are not paying are not taken over. But, I venture to think that the representatives of the different colonies concerned would take good care that the Parliament did not take any such step; and, more than that, the sense of justice of the people of the nation would prevent any such thing taking place. But I say: Let us leave this to the Federal Parliament in the broadest possible way. Look at the barriers you are putting up if the Federal Parliament has to ask the consent of a state to the taking over of any of its railways. You are throwing the whole thing into a contest, perhaps about some particular railway which has become a matter of very exacting bargain. Justice will be done by leaving out the words with the consent of the state." Leave it to the federal authority altogether, and let them take over all the great trunk lines, or if they think proper the whole of the lines. My own view is that the whole of the railways should be federalized at the earliest possible moment. It has been suggested-"Would you apply that to our suburban lines, and so on?" I say-"Yes." There is no more reason why the federal authority should not control every line of railway throughout the length and breadth of Australia than that these lines should be under the control of the states.

Mr. ISAACS. -
   That is a long way from state rights.

Mr. SYMON. -
   It does not affect state rights. Let the whole railway system be taken over.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
   It would affect the bonds of the states.

At any rate, Mr. Glynn's amendment is not that. We are not suggesting that a power of that sort should be enforced; we are not asking for a declaration of that kind, but that it shall be left to the Federal Parliament, consisting of representatives of all the colonies, to deal with this question.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
   This sub-section provides for-
   The taking over by the Commonwealth, with the consent of the state, of the whole or any part of the railways of any state or states upon such terms as may be arranged between the Commonwealth and the state.

It leaves the whole matter for a bargain to be made between the Commonwealth and the state. The Commonwealth can, if it choose, take over all the railways of a state upon such terms as may be agreed upon, or it can take over a part of them upon such terms as may be arranged. But if we carry this amendment, we are going to give power to the Commonwealth to take over the railways of one state which may be paying, and leave the railways of another state which may not be paying; or to take over a portion of the railways of one state-the trunk lines-and leave the cockspurs (which are the unpayable portion) with the poor unfortunate state. The honorable member (Mr. Symon) desires to take over all the lines of the state, but the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) says "Oh no, we will only take over the trunk lines." Now, if you are to take over the trunk lines and leave the cockspurs, what about the management? You would have the federal authority managing the main lines, and the local bodies managing the smaller portions, although they must necessarily use the main lines for the purpose of working the feeders, or rather, as we find them here, the suckers. I can understand the proposal to make it compulsory for the Federation to take over the whole of the railways, good, bad, and indifferent.

Mr. SYMON. -
I don't object to that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
But other members naturally will. The railways of New South Wales, according to their published reports, pay very well. The railways of Victoria at the present time do not pay. In a few years' time we hope they will. At the present time they pay 3 per cent., whereas we are paying 4 per cent. on the money we borrowed to construct them. As time rolls on we shall be reducing our interest and increasing our earnings, and we hope that then we shall be making a profit on our railways. The great objection to the proposal is: Are we going to take over the existing railways merely, or are we going to take over also the building of future railways? If we take over existing, railways merely, are we to leave the states to build new railways as they think fit to compete with existing lines? If, however, we are going to take away from the state the power of building new railways we take away the chance of developing the state's territory, because it is, well known that a state may with its eyes open build non-payable lines for a very good purpose-the purpose of developing its territory.

Mr. HOLDER. -
We had better leave the sub-section as it stands.
Sir. GEORGE TURNER. - We build many lines with our eyes open knowing that for a period of years they cannot pay; but if we did not build them we should have to leave a large portion of our territory uninhabited. Therefore, it is better for us to settle our country, and by settling it, although we lose a little upon our railways at first, we ultimately derive large profits from the people who settle on the lands, cultivate them, employ labour, derive a large amount of money from our customers, and pay a considerable sum into the state revenue. The proposal now made seems to me to put us in a false position altogether. Let us either go the whole length and say that we are prepared to compel the Commonwealth to take over the whole of our railway systems-let us do that with our eyes open, knowing that it means that in the future railway construction can only be carried out by the Commonwealth-and I am afraid that if we attempt to go to that length we shall find a very large number of people in the different colonies who will at once say: We are not going to intrust the power of opening up and developing the State to this federal body, which function is no part of their duty"; let us, I say, either do that, or retain the sub-section as it stands in the Bill. This sub-section appears to me to go the full length that we ought to go at the present time. It gives power to the Federal Parliament to make a bargain with any state to take over the railways of that state or a portion of them. I fail to see why we should go any further, unless we go the full length and say-"We are prepared to make it compulsory for the federal authority to take over all railways, good, bad, and indifferent, present and future."

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I agree with very much of what Sir George Turner has said, and also with what one of the newspapers-quoting some one else-has said, that it is objectionable to overload the Bill. I say, either take over all the railways with all responsibility attaching to them, or else say that you will only take over the railways the states agree to give over to the Federation. I am perfectly sure that the states would not agree to the Commonwealth having power to take what railways it thinks fit. I am quite sure that the states will not agree that the Commonwealth should have the physical power-not that they would do it-of taking over those railways which they think would pay and rejecting those which they did not like. It appears to me that there is no way in between. You have either to take the railways over absolutely-that may be either a good thing or a bad thing; at all events you know what you are doing-or retain the sub-section as it stands. If you give the Commonwealth the power of choice of taking over what railways it pleases without consulting the states concerned, it might elect to take over some particularly well-paying railway in Western Australia. I know that they would not do it as a matter of fact, but they would have the physical power to take over some well-paying railway which had no connexion with the main trunk lines of Australia, and for no other reason except that it was exceptionally good as a revenue producing line.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Then they must pay more for it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

We are really dealing in this amendment with a great many other amendments. If you are going to take over the whole—if you are going to strike out of the sub-section the words with the consent of the state" you will have to strike out also the rest of the words down to the word terms," because the object of Mr. Glynn will, it appears to me, be defeated by leaving in all the words about terms which may be arranged between the Commonwealth and the state.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But Mr. Glynn wants to strike out those words or else to alter them.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I only want to understand my honorable friend's position, because, as he knows, I would not willingly misrepresent him. I understand that what he means is to strike out the words upon such terms as may be arranged." So that the sub-section will then read—

The taking over by the Commonwealth of the whole or any part of the railways of any state or states.

What my honorable friend wishes is for the Commonwealth to take over such railways as it thinks proper, leaving the terms on which they are taken over to be settled by arbitration. I do not agree with that either. You have either got to provide—and it is a matter worthy of a great deal of thought whether it may not be worth while to provide—for taking over the whole of the railways, or you have to say, if any are to be taken over at all, that the state must be consulted as to each particular taking over. There is no betwixt and between—you have either to do one or the other. I have often thought that it would be better to take them all over.

Mr. FRASER. -

It is really impracticable.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I see what difficulties would arise in respect to taking them all over at present, because it would involve a proposal to the effect that the whole of the railway systems of Australia shall be conducted by the Central Government.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Then the states could not develop their territories.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Then, as my honorable friend says, the states could not develop their territories. I am not prepared at the present moment to think that the states are sufficiently developed to justify, perhaps, any of them in saying that no further internal development is possible, and that there are no other matters, so far as railways are concerned, exclusively for themselves to deal with. As far as South I look to more than the present.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is a monetary detail though.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

What about taking over the debts which paid for those railways?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Exactly; they must, if they are going to take over the railways, take over the debts as well; that is undoubtedly.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They must deal with the railways as a whole.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Of course, they must not only take over the present railways, but take over all future railway development; and, if they take over future railway development, they will have to take with it all responsibilities connected therewith. They will have to take over, at the same time, all expenditure connected with the railway development of every colony, present and future. I wish it could be done; but I am quite sure that it will not. I am anxious to see Australia federated; and, therefore, I do not desire to insert conditions which, I think, will certainly prevent federation being brought about. This particular sub-section, unsatisfactory as it may be to myself, and unsatisfactory as it is to a great many of my friends, still will, I think, prevent any extension of feeling throughout Australia such as would handicap the great cause of federation. There are only, as I have said, two things to do—you have either to take this sub-section as it is, or to take over the present and future railway systems of Australia. I am quite sure that we shall not carry federation with such a condition as that which is now proposed. Is it worth our while, then, to spend our time in discussing a proposal which will undoubtedly so handicap the sub-section as to make federation impossible for many long years to come? I believe the Commonwealth will take over the railways. I believe they would find it impossible to carry on their business without taking over the railways; but they will be in a better position to understand the conditions on which they can take them over than we are now. They will have all the materials before them; they will know their necessities; they will know what can be gained and what can be lost. Therefore, I do not think we can do better than, when conferring power on the Commonwealth respecting the rights of each state, to say to the Commonwealth-"You can take over the railways, but you shall not take them over without the consent of the state which is concerned." This sub-section has been a matter of much consideration with me, and a matter of the greatest doubt; but both in the cause of what is fair and just, and, above all things, in the cause of what is expedient, in the greater interests of federation, I hope the sub-section will be passed exactly as it stands.

Mr. Howe (South Australia). -

I will follow the advice tendered by my honorable friend (Sir John Downer). I do not intend to take up the time of the Convention unnecessarily, but this is my position: If the federal authority takes over the whole of the railways, I ask will they insist upon every future line of railway that is constructed in any individual state being placed under the supervision of the central authority, or will they allow the separate states to develop their own individual territory? If the federal authority takes over the whole of the existing railways of Australia, I do not see how any individual state could construct another mile of railway unless under the authority of the Federal Parliament. Now, in the present state of railway development in Australia, this would prohibit the necessary opening up of the individual states by railways. Consequently, unless we would have carte blanche to construct railways in our individual states, without appealing to the federal authority for power to do so, I could not consent to this amendment. Take the case of South Australia. South Australia has a territory three times as large as that of the parent colony, yet, so far as railway development is concerned, we are simply in our infancy, and should we give ourselves away as a state, should we give up our state rights to such an extent that we would have to appeal to the Federal Parliament before we could construct a railway, perhaps to some mining district that had recently been discovered? We know how difficult it is, even with the knowledge possessed by those legislating for a particular state, to pass a development line through Parliament in our individual states. How much greater would be the difficulty if we had to get a Bill passed in the Federal Parliament.

Mr. Higgins. -

Are you not assuming that Mr. Glynn wants that? He has not said that he does so.

Mr. HOWE. -

Does it not follow as a matter of common sense that, if the federal authority takes over the whole of the railways of a state, they would not permit that state to make other lines unless the Bill passed through the local Legislature were indorsed by the federal power? Such a proposal as that suggested by Mr. Glynn would impede federation for a time, instead of assisting it, and for that reason I intend to vote against it.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

I am sorry that we have not accepted this sub-section as it stands in the Bill. If we are going to discuss over again clauses that have been discussed repeatedly, I do not know when we shall finish. I submit that if the federal authority will take over the railways, then the federal authority must take charge of all the extensions, and, of course, that is utterly impossible. The people would cry out like one man against such a thing. There are many parts, even in this colony, where we are overdone with railways, that require railway extensions. There are more parts in New South Wales, and still more in Queensland, that require railway extensions. They are extending railways very largely in Queensland advantageously, and there are parts of New South Wales where they can also carry out railway extension advantageously. Now, it would be intolerable that those local extensions should be subject to federal discussion. The members of the Federal Parliament would not be conversant with the merits of the case. It is for the state to develop itself. The lands belong to the state, and the railways go with the land. So I say also of the waters to some extent. Therefore I hope that this Convention will not spend much time in debating over again what we have already adopted and have decided upon. This sub-section is good enough as it stands, and I hope we will leave it as it is.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

In reply to the suggestion of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, who took a very fair view of the question, I would like to say a few words. His suggestion was that we would be impeding the operations of a state subsequently in developing certain parts of a district if this amendment were carried. Now, I think that does not follow, if you do not deny them the power of asking the Federal Parliament to construct any line, the Federation either taking the risk itself or being guaranteed by the state.

Mr. FRASER. -

Then there would be divided management, which would be absurd.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Certainly not; the honorable member misunderstands me. propose that railways for the future should be constructed by the Federation. But the Federation might either say itself: "We will construct this line," or the state might say that, although the line would show an apparent loss at first, it regarded the line as a development line, and was willing to give a guarantee to pay the amount between what was realized on the line and what was required to make it pay. The state might regard that as the price paid for a development railway. In Switzerland the cantons have relegated the power of constructing lines to the federal authority; but they send in requisitions for lines, and guarantee the federal power, which carries out the lines on those conditions.

Mr. FRASER. -

The case is quite different in Switzerland; there are millions travelling there.

Mr. GLYNN. -

We hope Australia is not going to be stagnant—that the possibilities of the future do not end with the passing of this Bill. If so, we had better stop at once dealing with these matters. I think I am entitled to rely on what Mr. Oliver and Mr. Mathieson have said. They state that the proposals for an Inter-State Commission will probably lead to great difficulty in the development of railways. They do not approve of an Inter-State Commission. They say that the conditions in America are entirely different, as any one will admit who considers the fact that, while here we have only 7,000 or 8,000 miles of railway, in America they have some 200,000 miles in 44 states. Mr. Eddy suggested taking over the railways, and in a report which was published in the Sydney Daily Telegraph while the Convention was sitting at Sydney, the solution of the financial difficulty that was offered by the Statistical department was the taking over of the railways and effecting consequent savings.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The proposal was very different; it was to have separate book-keeping for each state.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is purely a matter of machinery, but Mr. Eddy's suggestion, as published in the Daily Telegraph, was to have central control, with local management acting under it. Mr. Eddy wanted to have one system of management applicable to the whole of the railways of the continent, and one way of obtaining that would be to give the complete control and ownership of the railways to the federal body. I would ask, therefore, that the words with the consent of the state" be struck out.
Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -

I very much regret that objections have been made to the proposal of the representative of South Australia (Mr. Glynn). It is purely a matter of drafting, it seems to me, and his proposal would make the sub-section read very much better. I think we should leave it to the Federal Government to arrange terms with the state. It seems to me that if the words with the consent of the state" and the words or any part" were left out, the sub-section would be in every respect more complete and distinct, and every purpose would be gained which has been urged by the various honorable members who have spoken. There can be no doubt that it would be utterly impossible to satisfactorily take over merely a part of any railway system. If a railway system in any colony be taken over it must be taken over in globo. It would not be possible to discriminate between certain portions of a system and the whole system. Therefore, I think that the words or any part" should certainly be left out. Then with regard to the terms on which the railways would be taken over, the subsection states distinctly that it is to be upon such terms as may be arranged between the Commonwealth and the state." There are two parties to every bargain that is made, and it would be for the Commonwealth and the state to come together, and to adjust the terms on which the railways of the various states were taken over, those railways being remunerative in different degrees. Of course, the terms on which they would be taken over would have reference to the remunerative character of the traffic; and, therefore, I can see no reason whatever why this sub-section should not be passed with the alteration brought forward by Mr. Glynn.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do I understand that you would have arbitration if they could not agree?

Mr. GRANT. -

I do not think they would be likely to disagree. The matter would be dealt with from a purely business point of view. The remunerative character of each railway is shown in the annual reports. There is not a fraction of a copper concealed; and, therefore, an absolute calculation could be made of the value of the railways to the Commonwealth as against the state. I do not think that the clause could be framed in a clearer or better manner than that suggested by Mr. Glynn, in order to do justice as between the respective states. The next sub-section deals with the question of the construction of railways, and the extension of such railways as have already been constructed. Now, I see no difficulty whatever in that-not the slightest difficulty. There are various financial ways for extending railways already in existence and for constructing new railways. I can easily conceive that a state would be willing to

Mr. FRASER. -

That would be arranging for private companies' railways and Government railways.

Mr. GRANT. -

Any state or the Commonwealth could give up a certain portion of land for the construction of a new line or the extension of an existing railway; or, on the other hand, it might be done by the state undertaking to guarantee the payable character of the railways that were to be constructed or extended—by, in fact, subsidizing the Commonwealth as against the state. Sub-section (34) seems to provide all the necessary machinery for that, so that I see no difficulty in the matter. The only thing that I see that is objectionable is the wording in the 33rd sub-section as it stands—"with the consent of the state" and or any part." If those words were eliminated

I think that every objection of every honorable member who has spoken would be adequately met, and the drafting of the Bill would be materially improved.

Question-That the words with the consent of the state" proposed to be omitted stand part of the sub-section-put.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This amendment is scarcely necessary. The sub-section is quite clear without this proposed addition. It is only a matter of adding words. As between the Commonwealth and the state, I suppose the consent of the state and of its people can scarcely be expressed except by Act of Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Government Gazette and Governor in Council.

The amendment was negatived.

The sub-section was agreed to.

Sub-section (34)-

Railway construction and extension with the consent of any state or states concerned.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales-

That after the word extension," the words but only" be inserted.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I wish to draw attention to the word concerned." I have already consulted the leader of the Convention, and pointed out that the word lacks clearness and definiteness. It is quite possible that a state might conceive itself to be concerned, although no part of a proposed railway touched its territory, and it might be some distance from the territory. What was originally intended, I think, was that the consent of a state should be necessary if the line proposed to pass through it or touch it. If it is intended to enlarge the scope of the subsection, so that some other state besides the one in which the railway is to be made should have the right to object, that should be distinctly expressed.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I quite agree with my honorable friend. I think it is really a matter of drafting. I will take all that the honorable member has said into consideration, and see whether we cannot reduce the clause to something like the form which has been suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs).

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I trust the Drafting Committee will not amend the clause in any way which will make it narrower. It is the very width of the word concerned that is its recommendation.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Every state would be concerned.

Mr. WISE. -

Precisely. Suppose the Federal Parliament, for any reason, agrees to construct a railway wholly within the territory of one state, which would have the effect of diverting the traffic of a neighbouring state, the neighbouring state would be highly concerned that the federal expenditure should not go to create a competing railway system, and it should have the power of protesting.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

You cannot prevent them from protesting.

Mr. WISE. -

I think they should have more than the power of protesting.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Then you will have to pass a Railway Bill, not through one Parliament, but all the Parliaments of the states.

Mr. WISE. -

Exactly so. In the last division I felt the impracticability of giving federal control and the power to construct any railway.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Why not go further, and prevent a state from constructing any railway?

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

The remarks of the honorable member (Mr. Wise) go to show that by retaining the word concerned" he really wishes to nullify the division just taken. That was to prevent railways being handed over to federal control. I am very glad the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) has called attention to this word concerned," because it will have the effect that the honorable member (Mr. Wise) says it will have, that is to make every state Parliament interested in the construction of almost any railway, or at any rate any railways near its borders.
Mr. WISE. - Any railway constructed by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. LYNE. - I therefore think that the clause should be made more explicit, so as to express the view taken by the Convention up to the present time, that we are not going to place the state railways under federal control.

Mr. WISE. - If the honorable member's view is carried out the Federal Government might construct a railway to the border at Wentworth, and the New South Wales state Parliament would have no right to a voice in the matter.

Mr. LYNE. - I do not think the clause will have that effect. My object is to support what has been already said, that the railways in the various states shall not be interfered with without the consent of the individual states. We should not be obliged to go to any other state to get its consent to the construction of a railway within our own borders.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). - There seems to be really a question involved in this which ought to be decided by the Convention. Some honorable members have expressed the opinion that it would not be right, without the consent of a particular state, that federal money should be spent in making a railway in another state, or to divert the traffic of that state. I must say I am inclined to the opinion of the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) and the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) that it is better to determine this point at once rather than to leave it to the Drafting Committee. I would suggest that it should read railway construction and extension in any state, with the consent of that state." I beg to move-

That after the word extension" the words in any state" be inserted.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). - I wish to ascertain from the leader of the Convention what is the particular object of this clause. Does it mean that any two states cannot agree to make a railway from one state into the other without the consent of the Federation?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). - No. It means this: That if the Federation wishes to construct a railway in any state, it can do so only with the consent of the state in which the railway is to be made. Having obtained that consent they can carry it out.

Mr. DOUGLAS. - Then this will prevent two states making a railway.

Mr. BARTON. - I may mention that, under the very next sub-section, if two states were to agree about a Bill which not one of them could pass singly, dealing with railway construction, they could refer that matter to the Commonwealth always providing that, in the legislation by which they referred it, they placed the apportionment of the money to be spent also in the hands of the Commonwealth.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I am sorry to occupy the attention of honorable members again, but this has really become a matter of substance, and a very serious one. If this amendment be carried, and the sub-section be altered in the direction suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) we shall be opening a most dangerous door for log-rolling, which may be to the prejudice of good government.

Mr. LYNE. -

If amended as proposed by Mr. Barton it will be clearer.

Mr. WISE. -

If I thought that I would support it, but as I understand it the amendment would be that the money contributed by the taxpayers of Tasmania, Western Australia, South Australia, and the whole of the Commonwealth could be applied to the construction of a railway wholly within the limits of one colony, and, however that railway may affect the traffic of the other colonies, not one of them would be allowed to enter any other protest than that which could be entered by their effective voting power in the different Houses of Parliament.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

What more do you require?

Mr. WISE. -

That might be sufficient in ordinary circumstances, but we can easily conceive circumstances whereby the practice which is known in the state Parliaments as log-rolling could have effect, and where an arrangement could be made. For instance, an arrangement might be made to construct a railway from Melbourne to Euston by federal money, the larger proportion of which would be contributed by the taxpayers of New South Wales. The representatives of Victoria would be exceedingly gratified to have such a railway made, and the representatives of South Australia might be gratified by the construction of another railway also abutting on the boundaries of New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is what happens when all the improvement committees are sitting in America.

Mr. WISE. -
Why should we run that risk?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Will you show us how we can avoid that risk?

Mr. WISE. -

The Supreme Court would hold, in a case of that kind, that New South Wales was concerned in the construction of the railway; and, unless her consent was given to its construction, the Act of Parliament authorizing its construction would be invalid.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That only means that New South Wales will have to be taken into the log-rolling.

Mr. WISE. -

If every one is in the log-rolling I do not call it log-rolling.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Is that the definition of log-rolling—that you are all in it?

Mr. WISE. -

I think that this amendment requires very much more serious consideration than it has received. It is not purely a verbal amendment. It is an amendment placing a very large power, capable of very great abuse, in the hands of the Federal Government. It is an unnecessary power, because one cannot conceive why any railway should be constructed within the limits of a separate state to injure the trade of a neighbouring state for any such purpose, and unless the trade of a neighbouring state will be injured no protest is likely to be made by the neighbouring state. It will not, in the words of that sub-section, be concerned so as to withhold its consent; but if it is concerned so as to withhold its consent it seems to me that the power of refusal to sanction the expenditure of money which is in a large part contributed by itself should be conferred on it by the Constitution. The sub-section as it stands is a safeguard against the abuse of the federal power. It in no way limits the power of the Federal Government to construct railways within the borders of a single state; but all it says is that if that railway should in any way injure neighbouring states they, being concerned, shall have the opportunity to withhold their consent to the expenditure of the general moneys of the Federation. We have had difficulties arising in South Australia. Suppose the railway to Broken Hill had not been constructed, and the Federal Executive, in order to get the vote of New South Wales, which is the largest vote, agreed to construct a railway from Broken Hill to Wilcannia, and from Wilcannia to Sydney, and not to connect it with the South Australian border-
Mr. SYMON. -
South Australia would have to be consulted.

Mr. WISE. -
You would have no power under this amendment to be consulted. Suppose, in order to get the great preponderating vote of New South Wales in the Federal Parliament, we were to propose to run a railway from Hay to Wentworth so as to draw all the River Murray trade to Sydney, would not South Australia say that she was concerned in that, and that she ought to be allowed to protest, and that federal money ought not so be spent unless she gave her consent to the proposal? It seems to me, however we look at it, that there is no occasion for the amendment. All along I have consistently objected to this piecemeal power of dealing with the railways. If railways are to be constructed at all by the Federal Parliament with the consent of the states, then it does appear to me that every state which is involved—every state whose taxpayers contribute money towards its construction—should be allowed to have an effective power of protest against the abuse of that power to their injury.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
So they have through their representatives.

Question—That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted—put.
The committee proceeded to divide.

Mr. WISE. -
May I be allowed, sir, to withdraw my call for a division?

The CHAIRMAN. -
As there is no objection, the call for a division is withdrawn.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
I think there has been a misapprehension by honorable members, and I want to know, sir, if you cannot assist honorable members to come to what is really the wish of the committee? A number of honorable members wished a vote—and I was amongst them—so as to retain the clause as it is.

Mr. REID. -
So was I.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I put the question quite clearly, that the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted, and the Ayes passed to the right of the chair, and the Noes to the left. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise) asked leave to withdraw his call for a division, and as there was no dissenting voice, it was withdrawn.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
I do not know whether there was any misapprehension as to what the nature of the amendment was. Finding only three honorable members sitting on this side with me, I did not wish to put the committee to the delay of having a division; but, as soon as I had applied for leave to withdraw my call for a decision, I found that a very large number of honorable members were in favour of my view. Which way a division would have gone I do not know, but it would not be a waste of time to have a division now. I do not know, sir, whether the rules will allow the question to be put again?

The CHAIRMAN. -

We cannot go back. A decision has been arrived at on the question; but the committee will have an opportunity to reconsider the matter.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

May I say, sir, that none of us here was under any misapprehension as to the question which was put. We all heard the question very distinctly. We were engaged in moving from one side to the other, and, as there was a good deal of conversation, I think none of us—certainly I did not hear the request for leave to withdraw the call for a division. I was taken entirely by surprise, and, if there is a more convenient way than to allow the question to be brought on later, I would ask you, sir, if you would considerately allow the committee to go back and dispose of the question at once, as it is a matter of great importance. We did not wish to debate it at length. It would be very much better, sir, if you, in your wisdom, could devise some means of having the question dealt with now.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I am afraid that it would lead to endless confusion if, after a division was taken, and the question was settled, it was re-opened.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

A division was not taken.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It was decided on the voices.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I do not know the rules which govern the proceedings of the South Australian Assembly when it is in committee; but I know that in New South Wales, when an evident misunderstanding has occurred, the Chair always gives the committee an opportunity to put itself right. I think, when it is evident that a widespread misconception has occurred, the Chair generally lends itself to the wish of the committee to put itself right, otherwise the Convention is left in a most unfortunate position through misadventure.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I would also urge, if it be at all possible, that a division be taken. It is wiser that we should have the matter settled now than that we should leave it in such a state that it could be said that a mistake had been made. The practice in our Parliament is the same as that described by the Premier of New South Wales. If the Chairman of Committees is satisfied, from the expressions of opinion of honorable members, that a mistake has been made, and that difficulties may arise in consequence of that mistake, he simply says-"I will put the question again." He does so, and then it is competent for any honorable member to call for a division. I would urge that that course be adopted now. It would satisfy every honorable member, and it would enable us to do now what otherwise we might have to do later on.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It appears that, owing to numerous conversations, there has been a misunderstanding as to what the question was, and as to how it was put. I will, therefore, put it again.

The question having been again put, the committee divided-

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg now to move, as a consequential amendment-

That the words any state or states concerned" be omitted, with a view to the substitution of the words that state."

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would ask honorable members not to hold conversations when I am putting a question. Honorable members complained just now that they had not heard what the question was, in consequence of the conversations that were taking place. I think, therefore, that I am justified in asking them to keep silence.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I was under the disadvantage you have referred to, owing to the incessant conversations in the chamber. I wish to have an opportunity of saying that I have a very strong objection to the whole of this sub-section unless it is restricted to railways for defence purposes. Any confusion in connexion with the powers of the Federal Government, and any exceptional powers, would be likely to create great mischief in the future. In this Constitution we have left the control of the railway systems of the states to the states, and this power to construct railways on the part of the Federal Parliament is an entirely new departure from the structure of the Bill, and a most extraordinary one. We have just said that the railway systems of the states shall be kept absolutely free from interference by the Commonwealth, and for good reasons. All these reasons lead me to inquire why in the next breath we should give the Federal Parliament, even with the consent of a particular state, the power of undertaking the task of railway extension and construction. For defence and military purposes that is perfectly justifiable.
For any other purpose it is absolutely unjustifiable. If we study the history of America, where such powers are so persistently abused, we can see that it might easily become a question in the Federal Parliament that would exercise a malign influence upon the public life of the Commonwealth. For instance, take my friend (Sir John Forrest). No more upright public man exists in the world than Sir John Forrest; but if a Federal Government should tempt him with a trans-continental railway to Perth, I should tremble for his public virtue. I am putting the strongest case, and we all admit it. I would have no trouble with my friend (Mr. Gordon); but I do put it to the committee that we should clearly understand what sort of railways this power is intended to refer to and what sort of railway construction. It should be no other sort than that connected with the military necessities of the Commonwealth. I admit at once that that is an excellent power to give, but for any other purposes it is a dangerous power to give. It often occurs in Federal Constitutions that words intended for one purpose are persistently used for every other purpose but that. I would like the leader of the Convention to just consider this point. Would it not be well to limit this power of railway construction in the Commonwealth, so long as our basis is as at present, to railways connected with the military defences of the Commonwealth? Can my honorable friend, or any other member of the Convention, suggest any other sort of railway which the federal authority under our present decision as to railway control should have the power of constructing, even with the consent of the state? I see a great difficulty in the matter, and, as at present advised, I shall vote against the whole sub-section, unless it is altered as I suggest.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

It seems to me that sub-section (34) necessarily follows on sub-section (33). If you give the Commonwealth power to take over part or the whole of the railways of any state or states, some powers of construction must follow, in order that they may improve or perfect the lines taken over.

Mr. REID. -

Let that be defined.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The two things must go together. If the Commonwealth is given power to take over lines it must be given some power of construction. At the same time, I am entirely against the amendment at present under consideration, that the construction of any railway should take place without the consent of the states concerned.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I trust that the committee will not take the narrow view suggested by the Premier of New South Wales. It appears to me that there are some cases, besides those suggested by purposes of military defence, in which it may be a wise act for the Federal Commonwealth to construct railways with the consent of any state through which they must pass. An attempt has already been made to draw a broad distinction between trunk lines and branch lines. It has been considered whether it would not be advisable for the Federal Parliament to take over certain trunk lines, leaving their branch lines in the hands of the several states. That proposal has been rejected as impracticable; but it might be practicable and desirable that the Federal Parliament should construct trunk lines of its own which would doubtless be of use for purposes of defence, and which could also serve other purposes. A trunk line from the eastern colonies to the extreme west, which would mean a great saving of time in the transit of mails to and from Europe, and an increase of expedition in our trade communication with the old world, might justifiably be constructed by the federal authority. The construction of a transcontinental line—the continuation of the South Australia line—to place us in rapid communication with the seas to the north of Australia, and to encourage commerce, so far as a railway can, between Australia and the other countries of eastern Asia—a commerce to which the greatest attention is now being directed in Europe—might also be constructed.

Mr. Reid.—

The honorable member need not go any further; he has captured the Convention—two tens at any rate.

Mr. Deakin.—

If necessary I shall endeavour to show that the interests of New South Wales would be served by railways of this description, and that the construction of main lines of communication such as I have described might very properly be undertaken by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. Reid.—

Then there would be two railway managements in the one state. A trunk line must have merchandise.

Mr. Deakin.—

That might happen. A trunk line would have to pass through some of the colonies, and if the railway systems of the colonies through which it passed were not taken over by the federal authority there would be two systems of management in those colonies. The way in which I think that difficulty should be removed is indicated by the vote I give on the division immediately preceding the last division. I have a certain amount of sympathy even with the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise), because I saw that by proposing to tie the hands of the Federal Parliament in connexion with the construction of trunk railways he was strengthening the case for the earlier taking over of state railways by the Federal Government. Still, it appears to me that the construction of trunk railways should form an exception.

Mr. Reid.—

I might see a great deal in the honorable member's argument if in New South Wales we had a few trunk lines to make; but ours are all made.
Mr. DEAKIN. -

But the interests of New South Wales in lines such as I have referred to are very great indeed. Her merchants would freely use both of them. These appear to me to be some reasons why we should leave the power of construction, as at present proposed, with the Federal Parliament. Before I sit down may I be permitted to lay before the Convention a suggestion which has been made to me by the Premier of Victoria? We have not provided in the sub-section, though perhaps we might do well to provide, that the Federal Government, if it thought that in the federal interests there should be uniformity of gauge between any two points, shall have power to arrange for such uniformity. The cost of the change might be apportioned between the states, or part of it might be provided by the Federal Government. It must be remembered that when we speak of the Federal Government we speak of a Government which will represent all the states of Australia, and all the interests of those states, and surely our object should be, within reasonable limits, to intrust that Government with the widest possible powers.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

The honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) anticipated some of the suggestions I was about to make, but he has not suggested the precise amendment which I think would meet the views of the Premier of New South Wales, and of the majority of the members of the Convention. If the words for federal purposes" were adopted they would include not only railways designed for purposes of defence but also railways required for the carrying of mails and similar purposes. It would be useless for us to empower the Federal Parliament to construct and extend railways if we did not also give them power to maintain and to regulate them. In the earlier sub-section we had the word regulation," and I think that the insertion of the word maintenance" is also necessary.

Mr. BARTON. -

The power to construct involves the power to keep in repair.

Mr. BROWN. -

I hardly think that the power to construct carries with it authority to regulate traffic.

Mr. REID. -

Surely it does.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is a sub-section at the end which gives incidental and necessary power.

Mr. BROWN. -
If that is so my contention is met; but I agree with the Premier of New South Wales that there should be some qualifying words such as the words I have suggested.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I shall support the clause in its wider sense. There can be no doubt that, as time goes on, the powers of the Federal Government will increase, and who can tell what our future requirements may be? The honorable and learned member (Mr. Reid) said that he would only approve of the construction of railways for strategical purposes, but is not every railway used for those purposes?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The New South Wales railways are.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It seems to me that in times of difficulty all these great trunk lines will be most useful for strategic purposes. In regard to the observation of my right honorable friend the Premier of New South Wales that I could easily be bought over-

Mr. REID. -

I meant that you would be the most difficult to be bought over.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I can only say that we have already built our railways up to within 400 miles of our boundary, and we shall be quite able to build other lines for ourselves when we can agree with our friends to join us on the border. As far as we are concerned, we should like to see a great trunk line running across the continent from east to west, and another from north to south, and we look forward to seeing this accomplished. Western Australia does not ask for anything which is not reasonable. We are not here to ask for concessions, but simply for the treatment to which we are entitled. I do not think it should be forgotten that, although we are probably not so important as some of the other colonies represented here, we are the owners of one-third of this continent, and no Federation will be complete unless it embraces that great western third. We are the possessors of a revenue of £3,000,000 a year, and we have a trade of £10,000,000 a year. The Federation that would leave out one-third of the continent certainly would not be the Federation that we are all looking for. I think that we should be wise in giving the Commonwealth power to construct railways. There will be quite sufficient security for the rest of Australia in the fact that, before a railway can be constructed, the Parliament of the Commonwealth will have to agree to it; and it seems to me that if the Parliament of the Commonwealth has to agree to the construction of a line New South Wales need not be afraid, because she will have a very large share of the representation in the Lower House to guard her interests. It would block the road altogether, however, if the Parliaments of the different states had to agree.

Mr. WISE. -

Not every one of them.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Every one would consider itself interested. This would mean that the Bill would have to pass through every Legislature, and that every Legislature would have to agree with the action of the Commonwealth; and this would have the effect of the Commonwealth never doing anything at all. This sub-section has been in the Bill from 1891 up to the present time, and I hope that, with the amendment proposed by the leader of the Convention, it will remain here. If it does not remain some other words will certainly have to be introduced, because it will be foolish to give the Commonwealth power to take over railways or parts of railway systems, and not give them power to construct and extend those railways in such manner as may be necessary.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO (Tasmania). -

I understand that the objection of my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) to this sub-section is that it would result in duality of management and control of certain railways. But every railway constructed under this clause would be constructed with the consent of the state concerned, and if that state gave its consent it would consent to that duality of management, and would not suffer from it.

Mr. REID. -

It is the other state that I am thinking of-the state that does not get the railway.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO. -

That objection is disposed of by the fact that we have given the Commonwealth power to take over railways with the consent of the states. If we have given that power it follows, as a matter of course, that the Commonwealth should have the power of extending those railways.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I have been surprised at the hacking and hewing of this very innocent sub-section, which was meant to be merely the complement of the preceding one. It amounts only to this-to give power to the Commonwealth that if it, with the consent of the states, takes over railways, it should have the right of extension of those railways. All of us, I think, agree practically with that.

Mr. REID. -
I do not object to that if that is all that is wanted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If there is any blunder there will have to be some recasting of the sub-section altogether, because certainly there should be a sub-section as a complement to sub-section (33), which indicates what I think is the view of the Convention, that no railways shall be taken over unless the full right of extension and construction is given. I must say that, as far as the question of limiting the powers of the Federal Parliament is concerned, I think it is a very serious step. I have hitherto opposed any attempt to limit what I consider to be the sovereign rights of the Federal Parliament, and I doubt whether we have any right to put into this Bill any embargo upon that action. The right honorable gentleman (Mr. Reid) thinks that the power in question should be confined to defensive purposes or strategic purposes, but it seems to me that that would rather be a blow struck at the spirit of federation. I think we all look forward to the time when, by the interlacing of these lines, and the increase of population, probably the whole of the railways of Australia will be under one Government. But we all think that the time is not ripe for that yet, and that it would overburden our Federal Constitution at present. But for us to go further and say, because that is the status we accept as far as the state railways are concerned, we should put an embargo upon the power of the Federal Parliament to construct a truly federal line for purposes already agreed upon, would be a mistake. We cannot pretend to foretell the future exigencies of this country, and we must recollect that if we put an embargo of that kind, it would make it extremely inconvenient for the Federal Government to do what is necessary. Therefore, it seems to me that some amendment will be necessary to make this sub-section purely the complement of the previous one; and certainly I think we ought not to place any restriction upon what I call the inherent power of the sovereign Government.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

In looking at the sub-section as it stands and its relation to the previous sub-section, it seems to me that the sub-section under discussion is not full enough to cover those arguments which have been used by honorable members of the Convention who have spoken previously. It is pointed out that under this sub-section the Federal Government will not have power to deal with the extension of railway systems in those states the railways of which may be taken over. Now, the amendment which the leader of the Convention is to move does not cover the point at all. If it is necessary to give the Commonwealth power to extend railways in any state the railway system of which has already been taken over by the Commonwealth Government by the consent of that state, it should be distinctly and clearly stated that that is so. If, on the other hand, as pointed out by the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales, it is intended to give a free hand to the Commonwealth Parliament to construct railways in any state with the consent of that state, then undoubtedly his objection to this sub-section as leaving the door open to log-rolling of a dangerous character has a great deal in it which is worthy of the consideration of this Convention. The right honorable gentleman said that he would like to limit the construction of railways or the extension of them in any state to the purposes of defence. I would like to point out to him that the consent of the state would not be necessary for the construction of railways for defence purposes. That should be entirely a matter for the Commonwealth Government or Parliament to decide upon, irrespective of the consent of any state whatever. A previous sub-section of this same clause gives to the Commonwealth Parliament the power and control of all the railways throughout the length and breadth of the federated colonies for defence purposes. If an extension of this clause is sought to enable the Commonwealth to extend or construct railway lines for military purposes, it should not be with the consent of any state, but without the consent of any state whatever. It strikes me that the objections raised by some speakers as to the danger of limiting the power of the Commonwealth Parliament are not well founded, because we have in a previous sub-section given the Commonwealth Parliament the power to take over by bargain-by mutual consent-the railways of any state. In this sub-section, as a natural corollary, we should provide that the construction and extension of railways by the Commonwealth Parliament should only be undertaken in the states where the Parliament of the Commonwealth have previously taken over the railways. I do not know exactly the position of the amendment before the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment is to strike out all the words in the last line, and insert in lieu thereof that state." The sub-section, if amended in the manner suggested, would then read-

Railway construction and extension in any state, with the consent of that state.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I will ask the leader of the Convention if he will withdraw his amendment temporarily, to enable me to move a previous amendment which I will indicate before I ask him to withdraw his own. After the words in any state," I wish to insert the railways of which have been taken over by the Commonwealth."

Mr. ISAACS. -

What railways? All or a portion?

Mr. BARTON. -

Would you make your amendment read the whole or any part of the railways of which have been taken over by the Commonwealth”?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then the sub-section can be overcome by taking over a few miles of railways.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I have no doubt that an astute politician like Sir George Turner could get over the difficulty in some way, but, at any rate, we want to lay down in this Constitution something to indicate that it is not desirable, as the Premier of New South Wales said, to give an open and free hand to the Federal Parliament to construct railway lines in any state with the consent of that state alone.

Mr. LYNE. -

Why not confine your amendment to any state all the railways of which have been taken over?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That would make it still better.

Mr. FRASER. -

It would make it still worse.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

No, it would make it still better. Although it was suggested laughingly and in a jocular way by the Premier of New South Wales, when this federation is accomplished, there may be a very great danger of such a concession to the Commonwealth as the power to construct and extend lines of railways in any state being used in order to capture the support of members representing a particular state, it is no use blinking at what we know to be an absolutely common occurrence in our local Parliaments. the larger Parliament will only be a reflex of what the smaller Parliaments are. The same little tricks of politicians will, probably on a larger scale, be carried out in the Parliament of the Federation, and sometimes the construction or extension of railways at the cost of the Commonwealth might be proposed by the Federal Government simply to obtain the support of representatives from a particular state.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

There are to be two Houses of Parliament.
Mr. SOLOMON. -

Undoubtedly; and each state is to be equally represented in the Senate, so that the particular state interested in the construction of a new line might have in the House of Representatives only a moderate number of members, but in the Senate would have equal representations—a very large number—which is a much stronger argument in favour of my amendment.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

The Senate will never do wrong.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I am not supposing for an instant that such a thing will actually occur. Let us hope that with a Federated Australia our politicians will improve both in political morals and in their ideas of what is necessary for the good of the whole Commonwealth, but, to take the suggestion of Mr. Lyne in this matter, and thus make my amendment still stronger, if the leader of the Convention will kindly withdraw his amendment, temporarily, to allow me to move mine, I will propose the insertion of words which will provide that only in a state in which all the railways have been taken over by the Commonwealth shall the Commonwealth have power to construct new railways and extend existing lines. I beg to move—

That after the words in any state" the words if the whole of the railways have been taken over by the Commonwealth" be inserted.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I have thought, in previous discussions in connexion with the Constitution of the Federal Parliament, that there would be very little risk of the clashing of national and state interests, but it seems to me that if we are to alter this sub-section in the way it is proposed, to give the Federal Parliament the authority to construct in any particular state any railway to the construction of which that state may consent, we shall increase the probability of clashing of the description to which I have referred to a most alarming extent.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Are you not going back on a decision we have just come to?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

No.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not object to your doing so; I voted with you.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

What is now proposed is this, that, although the construction of any railway for military or strategic purposes may be handed over to the Commonwealth, under this proposal a railway which may not be a federal necessity in any sense of the word may be constructed by the Commonwealth if the necessary majorities can be obtained in both Houses of the Federal Parliament, so long as the consent of the state in which that railway is to be constructed is given. That is the simple qualification.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But you have to get the consent of a majority of the states in the Senate.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Undoubtedly.

Mr. REID. -

As years go on, there will be two political parties running in both Houses of the Federal Parliament as there are in America.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I have no fear as to the propriety of conferring on the Federal Parliament every power that is necessary for national purposes, but it does seem to me that there is danger to be apprehended from this proposal. I know of no public works more likely to engage the attention of Parliament, provincial or otherwise, than the construction of railways; and if we are to confer on the Federal Parliament, with the consent of a state, the power to construct railways in that state, a railway may be constructed to the injury of another state—possibly a competitor with an existing line—and if we empower the Commonwealth to bring into existence rival railway lines, we shall increase the probability of friction and provincial jealousies by inviting the Federal Parliament to enter a sphere of jurisdiction which it is in no way called on to enter.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I wish to say one word on the very much larger question which, by the permission of the Convention, has been raised by the Premier of New South Wales. It is exceedingly amusing to hear all the arguments which were used in opposition to the taking over of any part of the railways of the state used to support a proposition which, if it is carried without qualification or amendment, will introduce the most complicated railway system that has ever been seen on any continent. This sub-section seems to me to be utterly illogical. It probably was intended that this sub-section which we are now discussing should only apply in those cases in which the whole of the railways were taken over; otherwise it is nonsensical. The strongest argument that those of us were pressed with in opposition to the taking over of part of the railways of a state was that it would be introducing two railway systems—the running together of two separate managements, with all the inconvenience and difficulties which would arise from that. Now it is proposed under this sub-section that you should have that state of things which we have been condemning under the other sub-section, with all the incidental opportunities for what has been called log-rolling, and so on, before those lines come to be constructed. We do not contemplate under this Bill that there should be a great public works policy under the Federal Parliament. The longer we can keep the Federal Government out of it the better; but you are going to hand over this machinery of public works in order to bring, about that very state of things which you say is objectionable—the existence in one state of two railway systems and managements. It seems to me utterly preposterous. At the same time, I do not intend to oppose the introduction of that complication for this very simple reason, that it is introducing what ought to be introduced, the control by the federal authority of the trunk lines. I admit every word of the arguments used against this sub-section. It would be far better omitted from the Bill; it is inconsistent, mischievous, and absurd. But I see it may be a lever to bring about the federalization of all the railways; and on that ground, and that ground only, I am going to vote for it.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I wish to suggest another point which I conceive to be of greater practical importance than any yet mentioned. It is with reference to the sub-section which we have passed. Clearly under that sub-section it is contemplated that the whole of the railway system of the state may be taken over by the Commonwealth, by consent. I submit that, if that state hands over its railway system to the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth should not be under the necessity to ask the consent of that state to its policy of railway extension or construction; because this remarkable state of things would follow, that a state having handed over the whole of its railways, which means railway extension and construction, it would still have a veto on the management of the federal power. After the Federal Government had paid millions of money to a state for its railways, that state would have the power to veto any proposed work for the further benefit of the whole enterprise. The state could come in and say we will not consent unless you do this, that, or the other. That would be after the state had got full consideration for its railways in the shape of hard cash.

Mr. BARTON. -

Possibly that might make the federal authorities say they would not take over the railways.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It might make that one of the terms arranged.
Mr. REID. -

Exactly; but what I would suggest to the leader of the Convention is that, inasmuch as this matter seems to suggest great difficulties, it should be postponed. It seems that there will have to be some alterations in the clause, because, clearly, no matter what agreement maybe made between the state and the Commonwealth, if the law of the Constitution requires the consent of the state to each extension, I am afraid no agreement would be binding. At any rate, it would be a matter of contention whether a blank consent of that sort would deprive the state from coming in afterwards and refusing to consent to a particular proposal. I do not wish to press my views on this matter after having mentioned them, but I think this subject will give rise to a long debate, and it might be well to let it stand over.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

On reflection, I am inclined to adopt the view just stated by the right honorable gentleman. That is to say that, if the railways of the state have been entirely taken over by the Commonwealth, it would unnecessarily hamper the Commonwealth to require the consent of that state to any further construction. If the whole system is taken over by the Commonwealth it should have power to develop the system, otherwise the incongruities are manifest. I intend to withdraw my amendment for the present, in order to make room for the honorable member (Mr. Solomon) to propose his amendment. I would suggest to him that his amendment would be better if the words he intends to put in, with its consent," were omitted, so that the sub-section would read railway construction and extension in any state if the whole of its railways have been taken over."

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Or without such consent where the whole of such railways have been taken over. That should be added.

Mr. Barton's amendment was temporarily withdrawn.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I should like to suggest to the leader of the Convention another difficulty which shows the necessity of further consideration. Leaving the case where the whole of the railway system has been taken over, we may contemplate a case where part of a railway system has been taken over. Now, as to that part taken over, and important as the area of country served by that part might be, clearly the Federal Parliament, having taken over an important system of lines, should have unfettered power of construction and extension.

Mr. BARTON. -

I quite see that the power should not be limited where the whole railway system has been taken over.

Mr. REID. -
I see a difficulty even in the other case where only a part of the system has been taken over.

Mr. BARTON. -
The question is surrounded with difficulties.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
Although I am not in favour of any colossal system of public works being vested in the Federal Parliament, still, if railway construction is to be undertaken at all, it will primarily and chiefly be necessary in territories of which the provisional administration is vested in the Commonwealth. I should like to ask the leader if he knows of anything in the Bill at present which provides for this? I cannot see anything. Clause 115 gives power to make laws for the government of any territory surrendered by a state or placed by the Queen under the authority of the Commonwealth. Would that include laws for the construction of railways? The second part of clause 53 provides for the general government of any territory surrendered for the purpose of the seat of government to the Commonwealth; but I do not think it covers the question of a territory simply provisionally vested in the Commonwealth. It would be necessary for railways to be constructed in such territory; and I ask the leader of the Convention to see whether it would not be advisable to add to the clause some words, such as In any state or territory."

Mr. BARTON. -
I think it very likely will.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It may not be absolutely necessary, but it is desirable.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I think it is.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
You would not say that they could not make a piece of railway on their own ground-in their own dockyard.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Yes, they can.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
If they can make a railway in their dockyard, why cannot they make a railway elsewhere in their territory?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
A portion of the Northern Territory of South Australia may be handed over, and undoubtedly if it were, it would be necessary for the federal authority to have power to construct railways there. I would ask the leader of the Convention to look into this matter, and if necessary to choose some words to be inserted.

Mr. BARTON. -

Hear, hear.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member (Mr. Solomon) wish me to put his amendment in that form?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I would like, sir, to fall in with the suggestion of the Premier of New South Wales and of the leader of the Convention by eliminating the words with its consent."

The CHAIRMAN. -

As the amendment now stands, it is after the words in any state," just inserted, to insert the following words, if the whole of the railways have been taken over by the Commonwealth."

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I do not at all agree with the argument that, because the whole of the railways of a state were taken over by the Commonwealth, that state should in the future have no voice whatever in the direction in which future railways should go. It seems to me that the state would have just as much interest in the direction which railways should take in the future as if it had not handed over to the Commonwealth the control of its railways. It appears to me that if it were a condition of the taking over that the people of that state should for the future have nothing to say in regard to the routes of railways, or the places to be tapped by railways, they would be giving away one of the greatest factors in the development of their territory. For a state to say-We will hand over these few miles of railway which we have constructed, and by doing so we will hand over to you, living far away from us in another part of Australia, the right to determine what part of our territory shall have railway communication," would, I think, be an absurd proposition, to which no state would ever agree. Another question would have to be considered, and that is whether, in handing over its railway system, a state should be debarred from building any further railways on its own account. It might be a reasonable proposal that it should not build any more railways on its own account; but it certainly ought to have a voice, and it would demand to have a voice, in the direction which future railways should take. Otherwise, it would be giving away the greatest factor of all in the progress and development of its territory. I hope that honorable members will not vote for a proposition that a state, in handing over its railway system today, should for ever give up all its rights to be consulted in regard to future railway extensions. It seems to me that if that were the case no state would be so foolish or would act so suicidally as to think of doing so.

I, for one, object to the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Solomon). I understood, when this sub-section was adopted at Adelaide, it was intended to confer on the Federal Parliament power to construct national or trans-continental railways irrespective of the state railways. I submit that, if this amendment be inserted, it will cut down or fritter away that power, and will tie the hands of the Federal Parliament to such a serious extent that you may as well strike out the sub-section. The effect of the proposal is that this power is not to come into operation until the states have transferred to the Federation the whole of their state railways.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Until some do.

Dr. QUICK. -

Well, any state. It may be that a state does not choose to transfer to the Federal Parliament its state railways, and, consequently, it may have the power vested in it to resist the construction of any federal railways. For instance, suppose that the Legislature of South Australia refused to transfer its state railways, the Federal Parliament would not be able to construct a trans-continental railway connecting the eastern railway system with that of Western Australia, nor would the Federal Parliament have the power to connect the Northern Territory with South Australia, or to connect the railway system of New South Wales with that of Port Darwin. I submit that the power of railway construction will be reduced to a perfect shadow and a perfect sham if the words of limitation now proposed to be inserted are inserted. I, for one, do not at all concur in the suggestion which has been made—that this power was only intended to be brought into operation merely as a complement to the taking over by the Commonwealth of a portion of the railways. I understood it to be an independent power, a power which could be brought into exercise for national purposes at any time, irrespective of and without the consent of the states in the transfer to the Federation of the state railways. I hope, sir, that the sub-section will not be frittered away in the manner which is proposed, but that it will remain in its original form, conferring a real power, and not a visionary or shadowy power, on the Federation.

Mr. REID. -

In other words, colonies which have trunk lines will pay for the colonies which have not.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
Before the question is put, sir, I should like to express my accord with what has just been said by the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick). The whole power of railway construction which it is intended to give would be absolutely neutralized if it were made a condition that it could not be exercised except in a case where the whole railway system of a state would be handed over. There are very few cases that we know of where the whole railway system of a state could be handed over. In nearly all the colonies there are suburban railways. These suburban railways are very important, a very large amount of money is invested in them, and they pay very well. They would not be likely to be handed over, and they would not be required for federal purposes. If you make this condition you simply set up a condition which is impossible. I do not understand the argument of some honorable members in regard to this matter. The principle on which we give this power at all is that it may be necessary for the Federal Government to take action in regard to very large and important works of trans-continental railway construction, and for two reasons. In the first place, it is very difficult to obtain the amount of funds necessary in any one state to carry out the work. In the second place, the work must be carried out as a whole, and can only be done by the federal authority. It should also be done in some uniform way. Why should that power not be granted? If it is to be granted at all, let us grant it effectually. It is very true that log-rolling occurs, and that it may and probably will occur, in regard to matters of this kind. Unless we are to have an ideal Parliament, filled by an ideal set of men, I suppose there always will be something of that sort. After all, we must remember that the people elect these Parliaments and watch over them, and public opinion is always keenly alive to what is going on in these Parliaments. To say that you cannot trust this power in the hands of the federal authority means that you cannot trust the people themselves. Let us either refuse to give this power or give it in an effectual way.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg now to move-
That the words any state or states concerned" be omitted, with a view to the substitution of the words that state."

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Is not the sub-section complete as it stands, and sufficient for all purposes?

The original words were"railway construction and extension, with the consent of any state or states concerned." I proposed and carried an amendment to insert after the word extension" the words in any state," with a view of making a further amendment to omit the final words any state or states concerned" and substituting the words that state." The sub-section would then read:"railway construction and extension in any state, with the consent of that state."

The amendment was agreed to.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Should we not now insert the words or in any territory"?

Mr. BARTON. -

I take the sub-section as not having been finally dealt with. It is full of difficulties, and I am not quite satisfied of the correctness of the vote I have given. It seems, so far as I can now determine, to be a right one, but if, at the recommittal stage, there is a large number of honorable members, something like as many as we know are in favour of another view now, I shall not interpose any objection to the reconsideration of the clause. Any amendment of the kind indicated by Dr. Cockburn could then be dealt with.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

I think this would be the time to move the addition to the sub-section that I suggested when I spoke a few moments ago. It appears to me that, in the case of railways for defence purposes, there should be no necessity whatever for the consent of any state. There is a previous subsection which deals with the taking over and the control of all existing lines for military and defence purposes; but this sub-section, which refers to the construction of new lines only, gives power for the construction or extension of such lines with the consent of the state through which they pass. It appears to me that it would be an improvement to the sub-section if we were to add except in cases of lines necessary for defence purposes."

Some legal member of the Convention might suggest better words, but this is certainly a point that needs looking to if we do not want to make it necessary that the consent of any state should be obtained for the construction of lines for military and defence purposes. As the clause at present stands, it would be necessary-no matter whether the lines were for the development or extension of existing lines-to obtain the consent of the state. That would involve, perhaps, the passing of a Bill in both Houses of the state Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Would not your proposal get rid of the consent of the state altogether inasmuch as every line would be used for defence purposes?
Mr. SOLOMON. -
I do not think so.
Mr. ISAACS. -
Can you imagine a case where the state would object to a line being constructed for defence purposes?
Mr. SOLOMON. -
There might be such a case.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Could a line be constructed without some negotiations-with the state even for defence purposes?
Mr. SOLOMON. -
Undoubtedly. We are laying down a very hard-and-fast line as to what the powers of the Commonwealth Parliament are to be. We have altered this clause so as to provide that the Federal Parliament shall only extend existing lines or construct new lines with the consent of the state. That would exclude them from constructing any lines for defence and military purposes, excepting with the consent of the state. Why should the Federal Parliament in so urgent a matter have to wait until the state gives its consent by an Act passed by both Houses of the Legislature? When the Federal Parliament decides that a line is necessary for military and defence purposes there should be no delay and no question of private interests should arise.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
What about compensation?
Mr. SOLOMON. -
That is a question of detail. No private interests should be allowed to delay or to prevent the Commonwealth Parliament from constructing a line necessary for defence and military purposes. I therefore propose to test the feeling of the Convention upon the point.
Mr. BARTON. -
Say-'or without such consent where such railways are for defence purposes.'
Mr. SOLOMON. -
I will accept the suggestion of the leader of the Convention. I beg to move that the following words be added to the sub-section:- or without such consent where such railways are proposed for the military defence of the Commonwealth.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I suggest to my honorable friend that he should accept the statement of the leader of the Convention in reference to this sub-section. I see many difficulties in it myself, and I propose to give some attention to them; but in the meantime I am prepared to allow the sub-section to go as it is upon the assurance we have received. Let me point out one serious difficulty created by this very amendment. Suppose the Constitution enables the Federal Parliament to do what these words intend that it shall do, and it builds a railway for defence purposes, that railway can only be used for defence purposes—it cannot be used for any other purpose. The Federal Court would never tolerate an evasion of the statute, whereby a railway built with the consent of the states for military purposes only should afterwards be converted into a mercantile line. The leader of the Convention has put the matter so fairly to us all that it is our duty now to think the matter out, and if we find that the sub-section as it stands is seriously defective will be better to test the matter at a later period.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

I have much pleasure in accepting the suggestion of the right honorable gentleman, and with the consent of the committee I shall withdraw the amendment, in order that we may have an opportunity of looking at the sub-section again, and, if necessary, to recommit it.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

At this point I move-

That the following new sub-section stand after sub-section(33):-

"Conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes extending beyond the limits of any one state."

I moved in connexion with this matter at Adelaide, but at Sydney our time was so limited that I then intimated to honorable members that I should postpone the matter until our meeting in Melbourne. This seems to me the most convenient place for the insertion of a provision of this nature. What I wish is that the Federal Parliament shall have power to make such regulations as it thinks fit for the termination and prevention of widespread industrial disputes. I do not ask the committee to say that courts of conciliation and arbitration shall or shall not be created. I simply desire that the Federal Parliament shall be empowered to create such courts if it thinks fit. Without some provision such as I suggest it will be impossible for the Federal Parliament, no matter what disputes may arise, to create a court to bring about a settlement of them. In adopting my amendment honorable members will simply be leaving the matter to the Federal Parliament. The issue before us is whether the Federal Parliament should be precluded from legislating for the prevention of labour disputes.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Does the honorable member's sub-section imply compulsory arbitration?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not ask the committee to say that arbitration shall be compulsory, or even that any steps shall be taken to secure the settlement of industrial disputes; I simply wish to give the Federal Parliament power to legislate on the subject. Whatever honorable members may think, the experience of New Zealand shows that this matter is at least within the pale of practical politics. Nothing has struck me so much in dealing with the Bill as the want of recognition in it of the momentous change in regard to industrial matters which is now taking place all through the world. In this Constitution we appear to be ignoring the peculiar circumstances which surround us. It is quite true that in the American Constitution there is no such provision; but at the time it was framed there was not the industrial difficulty that exists now. I do not regard courts of conciliation and arbitration as likely to finally settle all industrial disputes, but I regard them as a very valuable means of mitigating the pain which an era of change will create. A change is going on, whether we approve of it or not, and we should do our best to meet it, and to prevent, even by temporary means, the disaster and distress which must follow upon diversion of trade and industrial disputes. Every morning there appear telegrams in the newspapers dealing with the engineers' dispute in England, or the dispute in the cotton trade, and we are not without our own experience of shearers' disputes and shipping disputes. Of course, I shall be told that this is a matter for the states. I admit that if a dispute is confined to a state, it ought to be dealt with by that state. But I ask this committee, in the name of common sense—suppose you have a shipping dispute, how can any one state deal satisfactorily with that dispute? Suppose you have a dispute of shearers. You have an organization of shearers all through Australia—an organization extending through Queensland, South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales; and, on the other hand, you have the employers of the shearers all uniting on the opposite side. How, I say, can any state deal with a dispute of that nature which is inter-colonial? I do not want to overburden this Constitution with matters which may endanger its acceptance. I cordially agree in that principle, but I draw the line here: If we find a matter which cannot be dealt with so effectively by the states, and we find that it in a matter of grave concern to the people of Australia, why not put it in this Bill? We do not say that the power shall be exercised, but that it may be exercised; and I do not think, no matter how conservative, no matter how cautious, any member of this committee may be with regard to changes in the law, it will be found that I am asking very much when I ask them to join with me in voting that the Federal Parliament shall have at least its hands free to act if it thinks fit. I am going on the principle of Trust the Federal Parliament." I understand that that principle has been thrown over summarily by the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales, but I still adhere to it. I say that we may trust the Federal Parliament to be as wise as ourselves, to say the least of it. The chief objection to the proposal is that you cannot distinguish between disputes which extend to the other colonies and disputes which are confined to one. But is that so? Sir John Downer was, I think, the principal opponent to this amendment in Adelaide; but I was hoping—perhaps hoping against hope—that I should have his adhesion on this occasion. At all events, I want to face the most difficult part of this problem and not shirk it. The most difficult point was, I think, put by Sir John Downer, in Adelaide, when he said that you cannot say that a dispute exists beyond a certain colony. If one speaks as a lawyer—and I suppose that Sir John Downer spoke as a lawyer

You, too, I hope.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Only with great diffidence. It is true that, legally speaking, a dispute between employer and employee is a dispute between man and man, but I appeal to the experience in South Australia and New Zealand, where there has never been any difficulty, so far as I can learn, in deciding that a labour dispute has not been confined to individuals, but is a dispute to which a very large number of individuals are parties. What you have to prove, in order to bring in the Federal Government, is an agreement between a number of persons; and in 99 cases out of a 100 that would be admitted, whilst in the hundredth case the conspirators, the persons acting together, would be easily proved to be doing so. There is no less difficulty in proving a conspiracy in the law courts than there would be in this case. Cases have been dealt with in the New Zealand courts where the whole thing depended upon there being an organization on the one side and the other, and there has never been the least difficulty in deciding about the parties to it being in unison. We spend a great deal of money in settling disputes between individuals to preserve the peace between private persons. Judges and juries go to a great deal of trouble with regard to disputes arising between John Smith and Bill Sykes as to private affairs between them.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

And over matters involving not more than 5s.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Yes; or even matters involving less than that. But we have no courts which provide machinery for settling disputes which arise, where not only are individuals concerned but where hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of people are concerned, and where not merely the interests of the people in the dispute are affected but hosts of people and families dependent upon them are affected, and where the whole course of trade may be diverted, as there is danger of trade being diverted in consequence of the engineers’ strike in England.

Mr. GLYNN. -

In the one case you can enforce the decision, and in the other case you cannot.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am not speaking now as to whether the decision can be enforced or not. In New Zealand decisions are enforced by means of penalties. I am prepared to trust the Federal Parliament, being confident that they would not make a law which they could not enforce.

Mr. GLYNN. -

A penalty applicable to tens of thousands of workmen, or even thousands, could not be enforced.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Does the honorable member mean to say that an organization would not back up its officers? An organization would not allow a penalty to be borne by an officer for obeying the organization. I ask honorable members not to be deterred by the difficulty in regard to machinery to be created by the Federal Parliament, after full discussion and investigation, but to simply say that they will not hold their hands nor tie the hands of the Federal Parliament in dealing with a matter of so much importance. I am quite sure that honorable members will be prepared to face this difficult question, and I only ask them to enact in substance that the Federal Parliament is not to be absolutely deprived of this power. I merely want to leave the thing open, and I think I may appeal even to those who are opposed to conciliation and arbitration in labour disputes in this respect.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not propose to ask honorable members to prolong the debate now. It is a very important subject which my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) has been referring to, and no doubt it will be debated at considerable length. Therefore, as it is understood that we should not prolong these sittings beyond five o’clock, I beg to move that you, sir, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.
Progress was then reported.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg to move-

That the Convention, at its rising, do adjourn until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at five o'clock, until Thursday, 27th January.
Thursday, 27th January, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill - Hours of Sitting.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from Tuesday, 25th January) was resumed upon clause 52 (Powers of the Parliament), and on the following new sub-section, proposed by Mr. Higgins, to follow sub-section (33):-

Conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes extending beyond the limits of any one state.

I supported this proposal at Adelaide, and I see no reason for not doing so again. It may be that there would be very little scope in the Federal Constitution for the operation of such a provision as this, but I think that a fair and comprehensive survey of the federal arena will show that there will at least be some scope for its operation, though somewhat limited. Even in the Constitution as drawn there is a provision giving the Federal Parliament jurisdiction in the case of navigation and shipping, and this would apply to labour disputes in connexion with navigation and shipping. This new sub-section would give the Federal Parliament jurisdiction in regard to labour disputes commencing within a state, and extending beyond the limits of that state. There is no doubt that there are difficulties connected with this subject. It may be that we are passing on to the Federal Parliament another insoluble problem-insoluble apparently as regards the method of settlement and the enforcement of the award-but I do not know that we are bound at the present stage to suggest solutions or methods of solution. It will be for the Federal Parliament to devise some means of giving jurisdiction to a competent tribunal, and of conferring upon that tribunal power to enforce its decisions. At any rate, I concur with Mr. Higgins in his argument that industrial disputes of late years have assumed such magnitude and importance in all civilized countries that it is incumbent upon any Parliament having jurisdiction to grapple with the question and to find some means of solving it. Take the great dispute which has been raging in England during the last few months; consider the millions of money lost through there being no machinery for the settlement of the dispute, and for the enforcement of the settlement. I am not without hopes that Parliament in the future-I may even say at the present time-will be able to find some means of the acquiring jurisdiction and enforcing its decisions. At any rate, I think the Convention should show its appreciation of the importance of this question by not shunting it from the Federal Constitution but finding a place for it there, leaving it to the Federal Parliament to discover some means of introducing conciliation and arbitration of the kind proposed.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL (Victoria). -

I think, sir, it goes without saying that this proposal of Mr. Higgins is one which should commend itself to the good sense of the Convention. It seems to me that the difficulty in dealing with such disputes will arise when the decisions is given against the men. So far as the masters are concerned, there will be no difficulty whatever in enforcing penalties against them; but if the award goes on the other side, how is any machinery which human ingenuity can devise to be put in force to compel the men to observe the award? That is the great difficulty.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is true.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

We have at the present time on the statute-book of Victoria and Act of Parliament which gives power to deal with disputes somewhat in this fashion, but so far it has been a dead letter, because, as Mr. Higgins will probably say, up to the present time no event had occurred which has called for the application of the provisions of that Act.

Mr. BARTON. -

Does the Victorian Act provide for compulsory arbitration?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

I think that the Convention might accept the new sub-section. There is no harm in it, but there will be great difficulty in giving effect to it under certain circumstances.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

This is just one of the matters on which we ought to pause, and that we should weigh very carefully before we come to any definite decision. It is one that opens up a vast area for discussion. We cannot hide ourselves the development that has taken place in connexion with this question during the last few years. I am aware that there are in this Convention honorable members-especially, perhaps, the Premier of South Australia—who have given enormous attention to this subject. But to those who look upon this question as having enormously dangerous possibilities, it is a matter of vital importance as to whether it should be put as a federal power or left entirely to the states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What are the dangerous possibilities?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Well, I do not wish to argue any of these questions in detail.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is a mere matter of information.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not think we have to discuss the policy of any of these matters, or to enter upon any long arguments with regard to their desirability or otherwise. We are here to say, especially in connexion with the particular proposal under consideration, whether any power should be given to the Federal Parliament, or whether the power should not be left entirely to the states. I am strongly of opinion that this matter ought to be left absolutely to the states, and the present stage of our proceedings, whatever may be the future of the Federation, we ought not even to indicate that this is a subject for federal control. It seems to me that, in many of these questions in which it is attempted to give federal control and to clear away difficulties in the future, we shall by giving that federal control simply be laying the foundation of greater difficulties. Looking at this subject from a practical stand-point we have this point to consider. These labour disputes will arise in different states owing to special conditions existing in those states. They may overflow into another state They may purposely be made to overflow in order that advantage may be taken of any provision of this kind. Then are you going to say that the Commonwealth Government is to interfere in a dispute simply because it goes over the range of two states, when it may be a dispute in some particular industry which has nothing to do with the general welfare of the Commonwealth. There is another very serious aspect of this question. There is a clear line to be drawn between the functions of the Federal Parliament and the functions of the state Government. Up to the present time we have laid it down as a principle that the whole industrial life, the inner life of each community, which can be better regulated over a moderate area, should be left entirely to the state. I can conceive of no more potent influence of trouble in the future than the giving of paramount power to the Federal Parliament to interfere in trade disputes. It is all well enough to say that it is only to apply when more than one state is affected, and it, is all well enough to say that the power need not be exercised at all. That very weak argument has been running through many of the proposals made to overload this Constitution.
Once you put a power in clause 52, you give by implication practically the whole case away to the Federal Parliament. Now, I do not of course profess—and I always make this admission when I have not studied a question very closely—to understand this subject of conciliation and arbitration in trade disputes as thoroughly as some honorable members who have given years of attention to it. But, on the other hand, we have not to consider the merits of this question in itself. We have to consider whether it is one of those things which, at the present stage of our federal evolution, so to speak—we ought to include in the powers which are to be more or less exercised by the Federal Parliament. I am as anxious as any one to see that all large national questions that should come under a Supreme Parliament like that of the Federation are given over to it. But, at the same time, I believe that a great deal of the success of our efforts will depend upon the fact that, while keeping clearly in view the sovereign character of that Parliament, we do not infringe in the slightest degree upon that local autonomy which is the basis of federation. I am therefore strongly against the inclusion in the clause of this subsection, even with the qualification that it is only to refer to trade disputes extending beyond the limits of any one state. I hold—and every year of my political life has made it a more sacred principle to me—that the less the Government do, except in acting as policemen in trade disputes, the better for the community. I do not want to insert in this Constitution a provision which by implication will show a trend of thought of a certain character, to which I need not further refer. I do not want it to be presumed for one moment that we desire to give to the Federal Parliament the right to interfere in trade disputes and in the ordinary business and commerce of the country. The less the Government has to do with these things the better, and the more clearly it is understood that the Government is not to interfere excepting for the preservation of law and order the sooner these disputes will be likely to end.

I trust that the amendment will be carried. It seems to me that it will probably be a mistake to discuss the mode in which this power, if given to the Federal Parliament, is likely to be exercised. We might better confine our attention to the consideration of the question whether a power of this sort is capable of being beneficially exercised in the interests of the community, and in that regard it seems to me there is no room for doubt. What have we chiefly to deplore at the present day in connexion with our various industries? The prevalence of strikes and lock-outs—barbarous modes of settling differences, which should, if possible, be adjusted amicably. I need hardly refer to what has recently been happening in Great Britain—the engineers strike. There we have had a protected struggle ending, so it seems, in the success of the masters. But, however that may be, productive of injury, not only to both men and masters, but to the great industry in which all are engaged; and various particulars which have already been supplied show how it has affected the trade of Great Britain. It was argued by the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) that the State should only act as the policeman, but it seems to me preferable to provide against the necessity for police interference at all. I think we can do that, not by arranging for the arbitrary interference of the Government in matters of this sort, but by giving power to a competent authority to provide facilities which will enable the parties to a dispute to agree by the establishment of courts of conciliation, and, if they desire it, of courts of arbitration, which should have the power to enforce their award upon those who invoke their interference. The subject is a difficult one, and we recognise its difficulties, and I think we might give the Federal Parliament credit for as much wisdom. The members of that body will recognise these difficulties just as we do, and will avoid any arbitrary or unwise interference. The position to-day is that whilst in each state we have the power of making what provision we please in regard to a matter of this sort, there is no Parliament which can interfere with any efficacy where the dispute extends beyond its provincial boundaries. The honorable member (Mr. McMillan) has been kind enough to refer to the interest which I have taken in this matter for some considerable time. I recollect that upon the very first occasion when I rose to introduce a scheme of this sort to the South Australian Parliament I felt oppressed by the consideration that, whilst we could provide satisfactorily for local disputes, we could do nothing in regard to disputes which extend over a larger area, because, of course, those outside our boundaries could resent the interference of a court of limited control. What I feared then has since been proved by case after case, and notably by the maritime strike, which affected not only ourselves, but other colonies. We have, however, been able to provide for the passing of a measure for industrial conciliation. That measure has not as yet been attended with the success which

Might you not say that of almost any measure of local autonomy.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I might. I might say that the High Court of Australia will, in the natural course of things, command a greater respect than any of our local courts, great as is the respect which they very properly command.
Where a strike of the dimensions to which I have already referred occurs, will it not be a good thing that there should be a body charged with the duty of reconciling the parties by peaceable persuasion and all the arts of conciliation, before the struggle has developed to a degree of intensity when pacific interference is worse than useless? I am a strong believer in the propriety of assisting the parties to a dispute to establish courts of conciliation in times of peace. Such courts are much more likely to be productive of good results if the trouble can be nipped in the bud than if you allow it to develop, and you have no means ready in initial stages to prevent its extension. It seems to me that you might just as well attempt to organize a fire brigade satisfactorily in the midst of a conflagration as attempt to establish a court of conciliation when the parties to a dispute are practically at each other's throats and determined to do all they possibly can to use to the utmost the strength which they possessed.

Mr. LYNE. - How can you do any good, unless you make arbitration compulsory?

Mr. KINGSTON. - By these courts we only provide facilities for the settlement of disputes. In South Australia we have a State Board, the president of which is charged at all times to reconcile the parties to industrial disputes by all peaceable means whenever the nature of these disputes is of such a character as to become a matter of public concern. The masters and men are equally represented, and where the efforts of the president fail the board has power to inquire into the matter, and to make a non-enforceable report. It frequently happens, however, that in cases of this description it is of the utmost advantage that the public should be enabled to form a right conclusion by having a declaration of the merits of the dispute by a body compelling such respect as one composed of equal representations from masters and men, and presided over by an impartial president. I think it would also be a good thing-I am merely showing how the powers asked to be given to the Federal Parliament might be advantageously exercised-if provision was made to afford facilities for the registration of local boards of conciliation, which might similarly be ready at all times at the instance of the parties to their constitution to do what is necessary to prevent strikes and lock-outs.

Mr HIGGINS. - That is the arrangement in New Zealand.

Mr. KINGSTON. - Yes, the New Zealand and South Australian provisions are very much alike. I think you might go further, however, as we do in South Australia, and provide for the creation of a private board by a simple agreement between the parties. I do not ask the Convention to come to any conclusion as to the mode in which this power should be exercised; but I ask honorable members to say that it is a right and proper thing to give to the Federal Parliament the power of dealing with these questions in such a way as it may think fit whenever they assume an aspect of federal importance. The leading feature of this Constitution is that the Federal Parliament should have power to legislate for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth." By what means are the peace and order of the various colonies most disturbed, and their good government threatened, at the present time? By strikes and lock-outs. Shall we not then be wanting in our duty if we do not give to the Federal Parliament power to legislate in such a way as will prevent strikes and lockouts, and enable industrial questions of the greatest difficulty to be amicably settled between the parties, upon considerations of right and wrong rather than because of the relative strength of the disputants.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I entirely disagree with the Premier of South Australia. I think this proposal is quite unnecessary. It goes to the root of the preservation of the entities of the states and the rights of contract possessed by their citizens. In my opinion, the proposal must be a failure unless there is added to it something which those who advocate it will not be disposed to agree to. No law of this kind can be effective without a sanction. There must be a vindicatory power somewhere. Where is your vindication to come in here? Are you going to have a federal army to control the people in times of a trade dispute? If that is the proposal, who are the people who will rave against it more than those whom my honorable friend says he is assisting?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The Federal Parliament will have power to maintain the laws of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN. -

How could it make men work for a fixed rate of wages for, say, six months?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

In New Zealand the payment of penalties is enforced against the funds of the unions?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Even the argument that New Zealand has done something is not sufficient to satisfy me of the correctness of the present movement.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am aware that nothing will satisfy the honorable member.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Nor do I object to it because it comes from New Zealand. What I say is, that this is not a federal question at all. The people of the various states make their own contracts amongst themselves, and if in course of their contractual relations disagreements arise, and the state chooses to legislate in respect of the subject-matter of them, it can do so. It has been done in South Australia and in New Zealand-not in any of the other colonies, I believe.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

It has been done here.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No; it is merely nominal here.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think it is nominal everywhere, so far as its practical effect is concerned.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is effective in New Zealand, and fairly effective in South Australia.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Well, I don't know. My honorable friend knows, perhaps, better than I do how effective it is in South Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I know what the Judge said who has had charge of its administration.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am not aware that it has been of the slightest effect in South Australia. I have yet to learn that it has been of any use at all. I was rather in favour of making the experiment in this direction when it was proposed in South Australia; and I am now watching the working of these arbitration courts with great interest, although, as I have just said, I have seen no advantage arising from them in South Australia at present. We are now asked to hand over to the Federal Commonwealth a power of legislating with regard to internal concerns affecting every man, woman, and child in every state. Every agreement they make, so long as a sufficient number of them combine together to kick up a row, may be made subject to review before a tribunal. To pass legislation of this sort is in itself an invitation to extend the area of raising quarrels. Such legislation will tend to make such quarrels national, so as to create a power of interfering between individuals who are not satisfied with the contracts they have entered into. In the end it, must result in the establishment of some military or other force strong enough to vindicate the decisions of the court, which step I am certain would not accord with the view of those who advocate the establishment of these courts. I hope that honorable members will think a little carefully about this question, because if they do I believe that they will come to the conclusion that the power which each state has at the present time to legislate in respect to its own industrial disputes is quite sufficient. An industrial dispute cannot extend beyond the limits of any state. These are individual disputes. A certain class of workmen say-"We are going to insist on being paid so much a day" in one part of Australia, and they arrange with other workmen in other colonies to make the same demand. But the disputes are confined to each state.

Mr. GLYNN. -

What about American disputes?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

What of the shearsers' strike?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Cannot you prove concert, or conspiracy, or agreement to act together?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Suppose you do, that would not do anything to prove the wisdom of making complaints originating in an unimportant place extend to the rest of Australia, and of giving jurisdiction to a court to determine between the whole of the parties.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There has never been any practical difficulty in showing the existence of an organization either on one side or the other.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

When an organization makes a demand in one colony there has never been any difficulty in getting other organizations elsewhere to extend the dispute. It is really compulsory arbitration that is asked for. It is called conciliation, but it is main force.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

There is no compulsion, but you must."

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I want to know what you can do when you have exercised your main force? What is asked for cannot be done, and, in the meantime, so far from being a source of producing peace and quiet, a power of this sort will actually invite the very differences which it is sought to prevent, and will deceive unfortunate persons by the supposition that in the event of there being a dispute there is a court of law that can not only decide, but that can compel their masters to concede what they desire. I think we should not overload this Bill too much. This is certainly a question on which there will be great difference of opinion, and which, if decided in the affirmative, will interfere very materially with the rights of each state to make, its own laws with respect to the contracts of its own people, and with regard to its own internal concerns.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I have the misfortune to differ altogether from my honorable and learned friend (Sir John Downer), and I desire very strongly to support the amendment of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins) in this respect. I do not agree with the proposition that providing a remedy for a known evil invites a recurrence or an extension of that evil. We know that, unfortunately, these great evils of labour disputes do arise, and are, in fact, becoming more extensive as time goes on; and we are all desirous of providing some comprehensive and sufficient power of dealing with them. We have before us now a most lamentable instance of a trade dispute in England, and, unfortunately, there is no authority which is powerful enough to cope with the difficulty, notwithstanding that it is causing immense uneasiness and distress and loss in the realm of England. I do think that if there were in existence here a distinct and powerful enactment on the part of the state for the constitution of a tribunal, both sides having confidence in its capacity to decide satisfactorily and in the wisdom of its de

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

How would you enforce the court's decision?

Mr. ISAACS. -

We are not discussing a form of Bill to deal with the matter now, but we are debating the wisdom of giving power to the Federal Legislature to consider this question in the future, or to refrain from dealing with it if it think fit. If the Federal Legislature see its way in the course of the development of events to legislate satisfactorily, it should have power to do so, and if it find that its attempt to do so is not effectual, it will be able to repeal its enactment.

Mr. LYNE. -

Would it not weaken the power to deal with the matter in the states if the Federal Parliament were to legislate?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not think that this proposal affects the power of the states at all, because we know that at the present time trade disputes do extend in many cases, at all events, beyond the limits of particular states.

Mr. LYNE. -

Take a case where a dispute does not extend.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then this provision does not apply at all. That is just the distinction which I wish to bring home to the minds of honorable members.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Suppose one state does not believe in this power, and a dispute arises which involve every state; would not this provision give power to the Federal Parliament to interfere in the state that did not believe in the provision?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Undoubtedly.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

So it should.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It would give power to the Federal Parliament, just as the power to regulate inter-state trade and commerce enables the Federal Parliament to prevent any obstruction of that inter-state trade and commerce. It is only when the matter becomes an inter-state dispute interfering with trade and commerce—which is, by general consent, a concern of the Federal Parliament—that the power can be exercised. This appears to me to be only the natural complement of the first sub-section of clause 52. Its tendency will be in the direction of peace, and to quieten fears and give confidence in the calm and easy working of the trade and commerce provision of the Federal Constitution.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I rise to say that I hold strongly to the same opinions as I entertained when this subject was debated at considerable length and with great earnestness in Adelaide. I think that the insertion of this power in our Constitution is unnecessary, and will be absolutely mischievous. In fact, if this is to be carried out, it will create the greatest possible difficulty and complication, notwithstanding which all it does is simply to embody an expression of the sentiment of kindliness and good-will.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That is something.

Mr. SYMON. -

But I say that this Constitution is not the place in which to introduce a merely barren expression of good-will. Unless it is going to be made use of in the strongest possible way—in a way which will have the effect, as Sir John Downer has pointed out, of creating the greatest possible difficulty between the various states—it is no use putting it in at all. We all, as Mr. Isaacs says, deplore most deeply the industrial strife which results in wide spreading and most mischievous strikes. There is not a man in this chamber who would not gladly join in bringing about some means—if it were possible—of preventing them by what is called conciliation. But this amendment in its very terms is a contradiction. It provides for conciliation and arbitration for the prevention and settlement of industrial disputes."

How on earth are you to apply conciliation, to apply arbitration, at all, unless first of all you have a dispute? To insert this amendment as it stands seems to me to be simply the insertion of a series of words; and stripped of these idle words the amendment simply means that the federal authority is to exercise complete power over all industrial matters. Is that the wish of this Convention? Is it the desire of the representatives of any state that their industrial affairs shall be placed under the control of the federal authority?

Mr. DOBSON. -
That is hardly what it means.

Mr. WISE. -
The authority constituted could fix the rate of wages for the whole of Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -
The illustration which Mr. Wise has given is a good one. This provision means enforcing the same wages all over Australia.

Mr. WISE. -
It deprives the workers of local self-government.

Mr. SYMON. -
Why should you interfere with the laws in the different colonies affecting the relations of masters and servants, which are purely a matter of domestic legislation? Why should you hand over that purely state function to the federal authority?

Mr. BARTON. -
Would it be a benefit to the workers to have the same rate of wages fixed throughout the Federation?

Mr. SYMON. -
That is undoubtedly a practical way of putting the question. I do not want to now occupy time in dealing with the question in detail as to industrial matters, but what I particularly want to point out is that, however blessed this word conciliation" may be (and there is not one of us who would not give almost everything if we could see it properly applied), but whatever virtue there may be in the blessed word, it is a contradiction in terms as applied to these industrial disputes. You cannot bring about conciliation in disputes of that character without compulsion.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It has been done in New Zealand.

Mr. SYMON. -
We have had on our statute-book for some years a law framed with the greatest care, displaying in every line the greatest ability, and the strongest desire to give effect to this system, and it has practically been a dead letter.

Mr. WISE. -
So it has been in New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON. -
There is a provision in that Act to enable trades unions and masters unions to register under it. That is the only portion of it which would enable it to be carried into its fullest effect. There are other provisions, but I do not refer to them. As far as I know, there is not at the present time one trades union or masters union which has registered under that Act. What does that mean?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Bad machinery.

Mr. SYMON. -
It means that none of these bodies believe in it as a law which ought to be brought into effective operation upon them. That is all it means. At the same time, I do not say for one moment that because that Act has been on our statute-book practically inoperative, as many people believed it would be, for years, that that is any reason why this power should not be given.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
What became of the last strike in Adelaide?

Mr. SYMON. -
It fizzled out. It was unfortunate, and nobody can but feel a sense of regret that it should be so, but the Conciliation Act which we have was practically inoperative to deal with the case.

Mr. BARTON. -
Was not there an award?

Mr. SYMON. -
There was no award under the Conciliation Act so far as I know, but there was a great deal of feeling, and many broken heads; there was a great deal of intervention by the law, which might have been avoided if there had been some system. But supposing you introduce a system of conciliation—and I frankly admit it is no reason because a statute may be inoperative in one colony that a law passed by the Federal Parliament would be inoperative—but how are you going to enforce conciliation upon 100,000 men who are engaged in a trade dispute? How are you going to enforce the award of any board or body of arbitrators in connexion with a matter of that kind? Take the case which the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) referred to, of the engineers' strike in Great Britain, which has been a national calamity—which has driven trade from her borders, so much so that rivals in trade on the Continent have been actually contributing funds with the view of supporting this terrible strike. How on earth could the decree of any court of conciliation be enforced upon the men on strike in that case?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Do you not think it is very probable that the British Parliament will legislate for such a case?

Mr. SYMON. -
The best answer to that is that, in a unified state like Great Britain, with all the power and strength of the Imperial Parliament, they have never been able to deal with such a state of things as that. The word conciliation is mere verbiage, and it has been impossible to enforce the decree of any arbitration board.

Mr. ISAACS. -
There is no reason why it should not be tried in future.

Mr. WISE. -
It has been tried.

Mr. SYMON. -
Would my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) show how it can be enforced?

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is another question entirely.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend will hand that over to the Federal Parliament. I do not want to hand over to the Federal Parliament too many of these difficulties. This, in my view, should be solved by the local authorities themselves. They are the people to deal with their own questions of industrialism. I do not want to enter into a discussion as to the modes of carrying out this proposal; that will be a matter for the Federal Parliament if we decide to introduce this power. But I will put to my honorable friend what is a practical question in connexion with this power. Who is to decide as to when an industrial dispute extends beyond the limits of a state? Who is to decide when a dispute originating in South Australia enters into the colony of Victoria, so that Victoria shall be put under some kind of martial law?

Mr. ISAACS. -
It is a question of fact, like anything else.

Mr. SYMON. -
Undoubtedly; but who is to decide it? Is it the Victorian Executive? Did I understand my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) to say of course"?
Mr. HIGGINS. -
   No, I say certainly not.
Mr. SYMON. -
   Then who is to decide?
Mr. JAMES. -
   The Federal Bill will dispose of that.
Mr. SYMON. -
   How is the Federal Bill to say when a strike spreads from one colony to another? Suppose one shoemaker steps over from Bordertown to Horsham.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   There might not be a lawyer at the head of affairs, and whoever was there would not know what to do.
Mr. JAMES. -
   You may be certain the lawyers will be there.
Mr. SYMON. -
   That would be the only means of carrying this out to a successful issue. As an honorable member suggests—and it illustrates the position—supposing a firm has branches in different cities, and there is a strike in the branch in South Australia, and an air of discontent in the branch in Victoria, would that be sufficient to call down the interference of the federal authorities? What I say is that it will not be in your Bill; it will not be in this Constitution; it will not be for the Executive; but it will be for the Federal Parliament to decide that, and you will hand over to the Federal Parliament one of the most pregnant sources of heat and passion that ever was invented.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
   Will you not trust the Federal Parliament with this as well as with the customs duties?
Mr. SYMON. -
   What relation has this to customs duties? The industrial life of the state is considered by all of us (subject to this exception, it may be) a thing of purely domestic concern. We do not want to interfere with the domestic life, or with industrial life, except in the last resort. If you are going to introduce such a thing as this it must be the Federal Ministry which will have to decide, subject to the Parliament, and you will introduce the greatest complication and intensity of feeling that was ever seen.
Mr. BARTON. -
   We do not propose to hand over contracts and civil rights to the Federation, and they are intimately allied to this question.
Mr. LYNE. -
There is the case of the Lucknow strike.

Mr. SYMON. -
Take the case of that strike, or the case of any other strike where you send to another colony for free labour—that might be right or wrong, but we are not discussing that now. Free labourers come over to a colony where the feeling is intense; they had difficulties in front of them in the colony whence they came—is that the development of a strike in both colonies? Is that extending the strike to the second colony? These considerations show the boundless ramifications of such a question, and they ought to make every one of us pause before we throw such an apple of discord as this would be into the Federal Parliament. We shall have a sufficiently fine crop of difficulties without overloading the Federal Parliament, and without introducing matters of this kind, about which, undoubtedly, passion will rage in the most intense degree. We cannot help it. We all know from what is going on around us what will happen. Although we may all be desirous, as we are, of putting a stop to strikes, there is no way in which it can be accomplished except by leaving it to the law and to the states, which deal with industrial matters—with masters and servants—and which are more competent to settle the differences, and more competent to appreciate all these local necessities, than any federal body can possibly be.

Mr. DOBSON. -
How can the law of a state deal with a maritime strike?

Mr. SYMON. -
How can the Federal Parliament deal with it?

Mr. DOBSON. -
How can any state deal with such a strike?

Mr. SYMON. -
It is a local dispute in a state. My honorable friend does not seem to see that a maritime strike does not take place on the high seas. A man comes into port, and he leaves his ship.

Mr. DOBSON. -
You cannot speak of that as a local strike.

Mr. SYMON. -
When a maritime strike takes place the men when they come into port leave their ships.

Mr. DOBSON. -
In that case it would not be a local strike—it would be national.

Mr. SYMON. -
The dispute must arise in some port.
Mr. SYMON. -
That is another reason. When the last maritime engineers' strike took place it began either in Melbourne or Sydney.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Where did it end?

Mr. SYMON. -
In some place.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
In two colonies.

Mr. SYMON. -
It never took place in South Australia.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It ended in the same places where it occurred-Melbourne and Sydney—and how could the Victorian law deal with that?

Mr. SYMON. -
Does my honorable friend, who is one of the most profound and acute lawyers in Australia, really put a question like that to me? The Victorian law did deal with that strike and every incident of it. The Victorian law could not bring these people together, and metaphorically knock their heads together, which would perhaps have been the best thing to do; the Victorian law did not say Come together and let us reason out the thing." No power in the world can do that.

Mr. BARTON. -
It is the original dispute and not the subsequent strike which requires to be settled.

Mr. SYMON. -
A strike is the outward and visible sign of the real dispute between these parties. I appreciate the reference made by the honorable member (Mr. Dobson), but I think be must see that a maritime strike is like any other strike. The relations between the parties are determined by the contract in the place where it occurs. The maritime law of England governs all Australia; the Merchant Shipping Act, with some local modifications, is applicable everywhere, and there is no more difficulty in dealing in each port with a maritime strike than there is in dealing with any other strike. The point here, as the honorable member (Mr. Barton) has remarked, is the original dispute. How are you to deal with that? How are we to deal with the two bodies who join in the conflict? What is a court of law to do?
An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

How does a court of law do anything at present?

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend knows that if a striker strikes a free labourer, or vice versa, and that goes to a court of law, you can deal with it by the instrumentality of the court of law.

Mr. JAMES. -

The honorable member was saying that we should leave the parties to settle the disputes their own way. We do not allow masters and servants to do that in every case.

Mr. SYMON. -

You allow them to settle their disputes in their own way by law.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The defendant never wants to go to law.

Mr. SYMON. -

Of course not. I do not suggest that we should resort to the primitive method of settling disputes by fisticuffs or trial by combat.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Strikes are almost as barbarous. We want to settle disputes by a less barbarous form.

Mr. SYMON. -

Will my honorable friend tell me, first, how he is going to settle the dispute which has produced the strike; and, secondly, what possible benefit it will be to remove this from the local jurisdiction, and to hand it over to the federal authority? My view is that it is purely a matter of domestic concern, that if we hand it over to the federal authority we shall be introducing greater difficulties than we could even hope to cure, and that it will be an invitation to mischievous men-it may be on the other side, but we are not touching that question now-to increase and extend the area of the strike in order to bring about something like civil war. That is a prospect which I dread, and I trust that honorable members will not allow a mere feeling of sentiment, the pleasure of seeing the word conciliation" in this Bill, to lead them away from the practical issue of how they are to justify the federal authority being intrusted with this great power.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

The honorable and learned representative of South Australia, who has just resumed his seat, has pointed out innumerable difficulties in connexion with leaving this question to the Federal Parliament. I respectfully submit, however, that by earnest men difficulties should be looked upon not as insuperable, but simply as things to be overcome if the end justifies the effort. I think it is impossible to overstate the importance of this question.
It is true that there are many and great difficulties in dealing effectively with this question; but that all seems to me to point to the necessity of endeavouring to deal with the question and to overcome the difficulties. It is true that legislation on the question has not anywhere yet fully met the difficulties of the case; but it is true also that legislation has to some extent minimized those difficulties. It is true also that conciliation, both voluntary and legislative, has been tried, often without effect, and often with very desirable results. Wherever legislation is undertaken or considered upon this question, the desirability is discussed of securing some means that will make the decree of an arbitration board effective, and the same argument as that which was used by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) is continually used with effect—how will you enforce a decree of a court on hundreds of thousands of men? All who have studied labour or industrial difficulties know that the principal base on which they are fought out is public opinion. If we could by some means create a tribunal which would inspire the people with confidence, and compel the parties in conflict to submit their case to it—and I think that is possible—a decision by such a tribunal would have an immense effect upon public opinion, and would, if it did not settle the matter satisfactorily, at any rate bring the struggle to a close. Industrial struggles are becoming more injurious every year, because our industrial system is becoming more complex every year. In the past it was possible for a number of men to strike and injure very few but themselves, or for a number of men to lock out and injure very few but those immediately interested. But our industrial system has become so complex that it is possible, and, indeed, it often happens, that the parties to a dispute are very few, but that the parties indirectly and seriously injured are very many. Thus it is possible for a handful of men, by refusing to go on with work under the conditions which prevail, or by throwing out of work a few under the conditions which prevail, indirectly to render workless many times more persons than those originally engaged. Having in view this important aspect of the case, it becomes all who think on this question to see if some means cannot be adopted whereby the evil of industrial conflicts shall be minimized. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) points to the efficacy of state legislation for dealing with industrial disputes. In consequence of the continually increasing complexity of our industrial system there scarcely ever happens an industrial dispute of any magnitude, at any rate in the colonies, without it spreads its effect over the borders of two or three, and sometimes of all the colonies. This was notably so in the maritime strike which took place some years ago over the difficulties with the marine officers. That dispute, at some time or other of its existence, existed, I believe, in every one of the colonies, including New Zealand, and if there had been any means of compelling a decision—not necessarily of compelling acquiescence with the decision, but of compelling a decision—

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Does not that follow?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

That does not seem to me necessarily to follow, although it would be a splendid thing if we could devise some means by which equitable obedience could be commanded. I would make it compulsory on the court to arrive at a decision.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You would make it compulsory for the parties to appear.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I would make it compulsory for the parties either to appear or to submit to a decision ex parte. If it was made compulsory for them to appear, or, at any rate, compulsory for the court to arrive at a decision on such information as it could get, I think it would have an immense effect in minimizing the evil effect of industrial disputes. I have been associated for twenty odd years with one of the interests that are involved in these disputes. During that time I have been connected with the conduct of one side of the disputes, and so terrible do I consider them to be, that I can fairly and safely say that I have never counselled a strike. I have felt that if it could be avoided by any possible means it should be avoided and it was only when every other effort had been tried, as far as I could, that I have ever sanctioned or taken part in any conflict of this character. Failing some legislation on the point, these disputes must continue to occur. Evil as they are during their currency, it cannot be denied that they have done a great deal of good; but they do the good, when they do good—and they very often fail to do good—in a very brutal, cruel, and unscientific manner; and if any means can be devised by which the brutality and cruelty involved in these conflicts can be avoided, and the good assured, it is an object worthy of the efforts of the very best men that can be got to achieve it. It seems to me that, in handing over this question to the Federal Parliament—and I may say here that my views have undergone some change since I first began to consider the question—we do not deal with it; we merely say that it is an important subject which ought to be within the power of the Federal Parliament to deal with. It seems to me that we are not justified in troubling ourselves very much about how the Federal Parliament can deal with such questions.

If the Federal Parliament finds it impossible, as up to the present time the state Parliaments have found it impossible, to deal effectively with the question, the probability is that it will not deal with it. At any rate, it seems to me that it ought to have the power to deal with the question; and I earnestly hope that, as time goes on, and as attempt after attempt is made to deal with this important question, an experience will be gained which will eventually enable the Federal Parliament and the state Parliaments to deal effectively with what, up to the present time, the latter have failed to deal with effectively. As an active participator in the disastrous maritime strike of 1888, I know that one side in the dispute was for the whole time of its currency appealing for a settlement of the dispute by conference, or by the appointment of an independent tribunal, by which the parties should agree to be guided. Unfortunately, whenever a conflict of that character arises, generally one party, and often both parties, to the dispute, feel that they are strong enough to win—that they can win anyhow—and therefore why should they submit to possible concessions? That is always the difficulty; and there ought to be imposed by the whole of the people, in defence of the whole of the people from these disastrous conflicts between sections of the people, some power to compel the parties to submit their case, and to guide them in bringing the conflicts to a close, or in continuing them if it is thought desirable so to do. Now, in the conflict which is near its close in Great Britain, the people of the civilized world have been interested. In some measure the people of the civilized world have taken a part in that conflict, only guided by such information as was conveyed to them by partisans; partisans who have an interest, and who are justified, under the circumstances, in presenting their side of the case as strongly as it can be presented, and in weakening the case of their opponents. So that the people, while acting, while fighting, while carrying on a conflict by means of this assistance and sympathy are very often misled, because of the inadequate and sometimes garbled and warped information that they receive. Surely a tribunal constituted in such a manner as we have a right to assume that it will be constituted if the Federal Parliament had power to deal with it, would at least be a tribunal so constituted and composed of such men as would give an assurance to the people that, whatever view was taken, the information submitted was reliable, and would be a fair and trustworthy guide for the people to exercise their predilections in connexion with. I hope, therefore, that this power will be given to the Federal Parliament. I confess that, like Mr. Symon, I think it highly improbable, at first, that the Federal Parliament will be able to deal with it very effectually, but I submit to the honorable gentleman and others who think with him on this question that, even in that event, the inability of the Federal Parliament to deal with it will do no harm. We shall be no worse off than we are now if it transpires that the Federal Parliament is unable to deal with it effectively, but if there should be some sensible method of dealing with conflicts of this character in the way we contemplate, in supporting this proposal, it is necessary, in consequence of the inter-colonial rather than the state character of many of these industrial disputes, that the Federal Parliament should devise the scheme, because, in that case, however extensive the ramifications of the disputes in question, whenever they were touched by the tribunal that was to deal with them they would be touched in every part and corner of the Australian Continent, and, if federation becomes as complete as we hope, in every corner of Australasia, at one and the same time. Now, that seems to us to be a very desirable consummation. We had, in conjunction with the maritime strike to which I have referred, an extremely important and to these colonies extremely disastrous conflict in connexion with the pastoral industries. The shearers' strike went on at the same time as the maritime strike-a part of it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

And it was settled the moment the two sides were brought together.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Yes, as Sir Joseph Abbott points out, it was settled eventually by means of voluntary conciliation. When the people got together, and reasoned together on the matter, when they could be induced to do that, they came to a mutually acceptable settlement. But that is the difficulty that creates the necessity for legislation-to get people who are, angry with each other, who are calling each other names, and saying bad things about each other, to get machinery by which they can be compelled, as it were, to come together-because when they do come together, experience has taught us, in hundreds of cases, that what appeared to be insuperable difficulties-what appeared to be differences of opinion about which they would fight to the death-have disappeared almost immediately. Those difficulties and differences have only required to be touched by the finger of reason, and they have vanished into thin air and left nothing behind. I remember, and, probably Mr. Symon will remember that-some eleven or twelve years ago there was a conflict in the boot trade in South Australia. They were warring to the knife and they threatened on each side to sell their shirts before they would give in. I had the honour to be sent by a trade union organization here to report whether assistance should be forwarded from this colony, and I was fortunate enough to suggest successfully that the disputants should come together, and talk the matter over. They had a conference at which they did me the honour of electing me as arbitrator. That conference sat, and drew up a set of regulations which were so satisfactory that both sides appeared to think that they had, achieved something, and were satisfied, and the result of that mediation and that conciliation was that for eleven years in Adelaide, there was never any difficulty that they were not able to settle by voluntary conciliation.

Mr. SYMON. -

The difference is that that was voluntary, and this would be compulsory.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Well, I was coming to that point. Lately, within the last few months, they have had another fight there. Being so successful on the previous occasion, I felt that possibly I might bring these parties together again, and I took the trouble and went to the expense of going to Adelaide. But the circumstances were different, one party to the dispute saying at that time that it felt it had no need for conciliation, and it was so certain of winning that it would not consent to meet the, other party voluntarily and conciliate. Now, if there had been an effective conciliation or arbitration law in South Australia—which there is not, although they have done what they could do, and what shows, perhaps, the necessity of trying to do more—if there had been an effective law upon the point, the authority created under that law could have said to those two parties—"You are breaking the law, you are causing distress to South Australia, you are doing injury to the people of this country, and you must submit your dispute to the arbitrament of a body having not only your interest but also the interests of the whole community at heart." And then, as eleven years ago, I have not any doubt that an end would have soon been put to the difficulties which divided those people, and that, were calculated to continue to divide them until one side was beaten, and that have led to a state of affairs in the boot trade of Adelaide now that every citizen of South Australia, I am sure, deplores, because wages have been brought down inordinately, and men are working under conditions of discontent and hardship that would not have existed, I believe, if there had been what we are aiming to get—what all progressive men on this question are endeavouring to secure—the means by which the people who are engaged in a conflict that injures, first of all themselves, and indirectly all those who are in connexion with them—a body which when such conflicts arise, shall have power, not to take the disputants and knock their heads together, but to say that they must come together and state their cases in the presence of persons who have the capacity and the desire to sift them, to analyze them, to say to the people of the colonies which side is right, to say how far-as often happens-both sides are wrong, and how far either the one side or the other is wrong and thereby to give an accurate and fair index to the people as to how their sympathies should go. I think that if this matter is grappled with, as it will and must be grappled with, that there will be a time, difficult as the problem is, when there will be found some means not only of arriving at an equitable decision, but of enforcing obedience to an equitable decision.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

As one who has already recorded his vote against the proposal of Mr. Higgins, I desire to say an this occasion that I intend to vote for that proposal. It may appear somewhat inconsistent for me to do so, but I was very forcibly struck by the arguments of Mr. Kingston that the proposal, was a just and fair one, and the arguments of Mr. Symon convince me that the proposal is just and fair. Mr. Symon said that this was a mere proposal, and simply idle words. Well, if it is-

Mr. SYMON. -

I said it was either that or-

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I took the honorable member's words down at the time.

Mr. SYMON. -

Will the honorable member permit me; I said it was either that or a mischievous proposal.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Did not the honorable member say it was idle words?

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, certainly.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

If the proposal is simply idle words, what harm can we do by inserting it in this Bill?

Mr. BARTON. -

That would not be a good justification for altering the Bill all through.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

If the insertion of these words has the effect of satisfying a sentiment which we know largely prevails throughout a certain class in Australia-if they are only idle words, what harm will be done by inserting them in the Bill? Mr. Symon argued, in reference to the insertion of those words, more as if be were pointing out what the Bill would or would not be, rather than as on a proposal to give the Commonwealth power to deal with this question. I can really see no harm in giving the Commonwealth power to deal with the question. Mr. Trenwith has referred to the fact that very often these industrial disputes are easily settled if the parties to the disputes can be brought together. Mr Symon asks-"How can you enforce an Award or determination against 100,000 working men?" Well, we know that it is absolutely impossible to do so. But we also know that the working men, at least in this 19th century, are just as amenable to public thought and reason as anybody else, and are just as amenable to public opinion as the masters themselves. And, although these awards cannot be enforced against them as a matter of law, I can say, from my own experience, that I believe they to the conciliation court. An award was made, and the men's unions universally condemned that award, but every one of them loyally submitted to it, and business went on without any of those quarrels which might have disorganized the whole of that particular trade. I am not quite sure whether the dispute was in the building trade or amongst the shoemakers-it was either the one or the other.
Mr. TRENWITH. -
It has often been so, anyhow.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
What we want to do is to give the Federal Parliament power to bring these parties together. I do not care whether any good results come from it or not. Very often these strikes occur because the parties are not brought together to talk over their differences. Take the case of the shearers' strike.
Neither the pastoralists nor the shearers would agree to come together to discuss the questions in difference between them; but take the case of an ordinary dispute between masters and men, they will meet each other if these courts of conciliation are established, and they may be able to reconcile their differences. Why should not organizations of trades unionists and masters, which represent very largely the industries of the colonies, be brought together to reason out their differences, and thus prevent disastrous strikes as far as possible? No better example than that of the pastoralists' and shearers' unions could be given to show what may be done if the parties to these industrial disputes can be brought together.
During that dispute I was Speaker of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales. I did all I could to induce the Trade and Labour Council in Sydney to try and persuade their body of men to meet the pastoralists, and I did the same with the pastoralists' organization. But each side stood aloof.
Neither the one nor the other would give way and say-"We ask for this conference." But finally they did come together, after all the mischief was done; each one gave the other something, and each went away perfectly satisfied that they had gained a victory. Now, we hear a great deal of blustering during these strikes, and it is an unfortunate thing for nine-tenths of the working men that their leaders talk a great deal too much, and talk a great deal of rubbish. If those labour leaders said less and worked more earnestly half the mischief that arises from strikes would not exist. But we hear a lot of this blustering. For instance, in the course of the shearsers' strike, it was said that no wool would be allowed to go out of Australia unless it was shorn by unionists. That sort of thing does not tend to bring about the settlement of disputes. However, in this particular dispute, as soon as the men and masters met in a conference extending over some days, they mutually gave way; each gave away something, and each went away satisfied that they were the victors. If this is only a sentimental proposal—if these are mere idle words—what harm can come from giving to the Commonwealth power to legislate upon this subject? Does it follow that the Commonwealth will legislate upon it? The Commonwealth may determine to leave the whole question to the states themselves to settle, but if this power is not given to the Commonwealth, in no instance can they interfere in a dispute, although they may be deeply interested in it. There is no man in this colony, I do not care what his position is, whether he is rich or poor, who is not indirectly affected by a very large strike. Men who are unconcerned with these strikes altogether, we all know too well, suffer from the strikes, and those concerned in the industrial warfare are often dragged down to poverty and discontent by means of these strikes. Well, I do not care what means you take to put a stop to this sort of thing, even if it is only by insetting a sentimental proposal—mere idle words—in this Bill, if it will have the effect of putting an end to these disastrous industrial struggles.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I wish to say a few words in connexion with this question, because I wish to separate the national aspect from the local aspect. It has been admitted on all hands that conciliatory legislation in the various states has, at all events, done no harm if it has not achieved some good. I can imagine, myself, no greater disaster that can happen to any nation, if we are to be a federated one, than, for instance, a coal strike in the state of New South Wales. Now, supposing there was some dispute in the coal mines that might be settled by the Federal Parliament creating a tribunal that might stop it, perhaps, in its early stages, and suppose we had a continuance of that coal strike, I say that the long continuance of such a strike in New South Wales would be very disastrous to every state in Australia. I know that not long ago, when the dispute arose between the coal-owners and the coal miners, many industries in the various states of Australia were paralyzed in consequence. Now, it seems to me that this is one of those affairs in connexion with which the federal authority should have power to intervene, because such a dispute interferes with the industrial life of the individual states. It may be that hundreds, aye, thousands, of artisans and mechanics, who have no sympathy, perhaps, either with the coal mine owners or the colliers themselves, will have to suffer, and their families have to suffer, through the long continuance of the cessation of the working of the coal mines in New South Wales. That is one reason why it seems to me to be necessary to give power to the federal authority to create a tribunal to deal with such a question as this. We remember that during the great maritime strike, not long ago, many industries were paralyzed, the workers in which had no sympathy with that strike at all. Nevertheless, great disaster fell upon the whole of the people of the states in consequence of that dispute. I submit that if we say we are willing to give to a state power to interfere, and to try to settle any industrial disputes within that state, then, if we are to create a nation, why should we not, on the same reasoning, give power to the national authority to intervene, if necessary, when the dispute interferes with the industrial life of the nation? For these reasons I intend to support the amendment of Mr. Higgins.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I think the honorable member who has just sat down has shown, from what is going on in his mind, a confusion of ideas with regard to the purpose and object of this amendments confusion which I think is rather prevalent. No one can have more sympathy than, not only myself, but several other members who have taken the same view with regard to the disastrous consequences of strikes which the honorable member has just pointed out, and I think that all of us in our several colonies have done our best by way of legislation—which is only in the experimental stage—to deal with the matter. It must not, therefore, be assumed that those of us who oppose the placing of this power in the Federal Constitution are any less sympathetic with those troubles and disasters, which affect not only the workers but the whole community. We base our opposition to the insertion of this clause in the Federal Constitution upon this ground only—that the matter is a matter not for federal control but for state control.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

How could you deal with a shearing strike or a shipping strike in that way? How could that be a matter for state control?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I would point out to the honorable member that, after all, when you come to deal with these cases so as to settle them, you must settle the dispute between the original parties. You don't get rid of the dispute between the original parties by settling the extension and the indirect effects of the dispute; you must settle the dispute itself. Now, the dispute occurs in one state, and the dispute generally depends on the terms of a contract or on the terms of employment, so that, however widespread the consequences of that one dispute may be, in order to arrive at a settlement of a strike you must settle the dispute. Therefore you have to deal with a matter arising in a particular state subject to local conditions, and referring to a contract made by parties living in that state. It is a matter, therefore, which really, except in regard to its consequences, the Federal Commonwealth has no concern with. However, I will not pursue that aspect of the question for the present; I wish rather to deal with a statement and argument of the honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott) which seemed at first sight to have some weight; that is, that if this is a mere form of words, mere idle words," why should we not put it in the Constitution?

Now we are often asked not to regard the details of this legislation, but I say that in dealing with this question we cannot avoid that. If we give this power to the Commonwealth, it behoves us to see how it is likely to be exercised; because it depends entirely on the way in which it is to be exercised, whether it should be granted or not, even if it be within the scope of federal power.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Surely it is for the people to say how it shall be exercised.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The right honorable member says that it is for the people to say how it shall be exercised. I quite agree with him, and it is because I see and I think any one who reflects must see-that it will be exercised in the one direction-a direction which it would be disastrous for the Commonwealth that it should be exercised in by the Commonwealth-that I am opposing this proposal. As I have said, the whole of this legislation is in the experimental stage. I think in all the colonies-certainly in New South Wales, South Australia, and New Zealand, and perhaps in other colonies-what is called conciliation has been tried. Now, I think I am not stating the case too strongly when I say that the result of that experiment has been a disastrous failure.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Oh, no; not in New Zealand, any way.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That certainly has been the result in New South Wales, where a great deal of trouble was taken, not only to give opportunities to establish conciliation courts, but where the government actually established a conciliation tribunal presided over by a man in whom the whole community had the greatest possible confidence, and where they kept up a department with all the machinery of registration and everything else that was necessary to bring the thing into full operation. Yet, time after time, the result showed its utter futility. When we consider the number of strikes that have been interfered with and settled by means of boards of conciliation in other parts of the world, I think it must be generally admitted that we have gone through the first stage of this experimental legislation, that is, the stage which leaves these matters to conciliation and voluntary peaceful methods, and I think that if the verdict has not been given already, the verdict certainly will be, when the matter comes next to be dealt with, that that stage has shown the utter futility of voluntary methods. Then can any one doubt that the next stage will be compulsory arbitration

Mr. HOLDER. -
The power of inquiry in South Australia has been most salutary.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The compulsory power of inquiry.

Mr. HOLDER. -
They get the fear of public opinion before their eyes on both sides.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
When the honorable member says they get the fear of public opinion before their eyes he means really this-that probably the business man, the manufacturer, rather than have his accounts and his books ransacked for twenty or thirty years back, often submits to what he considers injustice.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Oh, no.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I do not want to go into the question of the actual working of the thing in any particular colony at all, but I say that the next stage of legislation will undoubtedly be some form of compulsion.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
That means that the people will require it, and are you going to say that they shan't have it if they want it?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The right honorable member, with all respect, is begging the question.
The real question now is, not whether the people want it, but whether the power should be given to the Commonwealth, that is to say, the whole of the Commonwealth, to enforce the compulsory reference of disputes in one particular state. If this power to legislate is given at all, the next step in legislation must be, if it is to be effective, to grant compulsory powers, and you have to regard this matter as if the power was to be exercised in that way. Honorable members cannot deny that it can be exercised in that way, and the probabilities are that it will be exercised in that way.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If the Federal Parliament is wise, will it not refuse to do an unwise thing?

Mr. BARTON. -
Are we not to assume, if we grant this power, that it will be fully exercised?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I would ask the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) is he in favour of some form of compulsion?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I am not in favour of anything at present but of leaving the thing to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The honorable member, however, has given some attention to the subject, as he has to all subjects of a social character, and I would ask him what is his own opinion? If the honorable member is afraid to disclose his opinion to me-

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I am not afraid of disclosing anything to you, but I want to make no false issue, but to leave the thing absolutely to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The honorable member is mistaken in saying that this is a false issue. We must consider how the power is likely to be used.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Will you trust the Federal Parliament?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I will trust the Federal Parliament when it gets a power of this kind to do what it considers to be effective, and the only way in which it can deal effectively with this matter is to make the power in some way compulsory. I will trust the Federal Parliament with any matter which is a matter of federal concern. The best way of proving that this is not a matter of federal concern is to inquire how it is likely to operate if the power is to be exercised in the way in which it is certainly likely to be exercised.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Surely that is not a correct principle to go upon? Before giving a man a vote would you inquire how he is likely to use it?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That is not an analogy.
Mr. ISAACS. -

It is very like one.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

When you are dealing with a power of this kind, the very best way to discover whether it is a federal power is to consider how it may be exercised. I do not say for a moment that I would interfere with the right of any state to place this matter upon a compulsory footing. Any state may make that experiment if it thinks fit. Personally, I am not in favour of such a provision, but I say that on this short ground I oppose the introduction of this power into the hands of the federal authority; because I feel convinced that compulsory power would be sought for, and would be obtained. Now, in the first place, it would be a most dangerous thing to bring the federal authorities into conflict—not with a particular locality and a certain number of men in dealing with one of these cases, but with the whole Commonwealth. I say, as Mr. Symon has said, that you have in that an element of difficulty and danger which we should not needlessly expose the Commonwealth to. I really got up, however, chiefly to point out that it is a dangerous argument to use in favour of this power being inserted in the Constitution that it consists merely of idle words." If it is put in the Constitution it will be exercised, and if it is exercised it will be exercised in the direction of enforcing by the powers of the federal authority interference with contracts in a state, the carrying out of which must depend originally upon an agreement, and in the second place upon conditions which are undoubtedly local. The enforcement of such a power might, under certain circumstances, not only be absolutely against the best interests, but even against the wishes, of the state in which it may be required to be enforced. I hope the result of this discussion will be that, however much we may feel in sympathy with this social experiment, we shall say that it is one to be conducted in our own states, and that we shall not add this further power to those quite sufficiently large which have been vested in the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

It appears to me that the reply to my honorable friend is that there are already embodied in clause 52 a number of powers which, under perfectly conceivable conditions, may involve the Federal Government in the most serious relations with certain classes in the various states, and that in no case has that been urged as a reason why we should not confer those powers. I admit that the danger depicted by the honorable member may readily occur, but the whole of the legislation with which we have to deal is subject to greater or lesser danger. We have all recently seen that in the great Republic of the West the questions which come under the headings of currency" and coinage" have threatened to rend the Union asunder. It is impossible to refuse to permit the settlement of great federal issues by the Federal Government simply because they involve dangers, unless the Federal Government is to deal only with minor and unimportant questions, and to be a kind of glorified Federal Council, instead of, as we intend, the popular and central Government of the whole of Australia.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is an argument for unification.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

All arguments for federation are arguments for that degree of unification, necessary for national interest and national ends. Mr. O'Connor also urged that as yet this question was only in its experimental stage, and that the legislation on the subject in Australia has not been by any means conspicuously successful. It has been partially successful in New Zealand, but nowhere else, although in some form it has been attempted in several colonies. I admit that the honorable member has made a correct statement of the facts. I was under the impression that a greater measure of success had been attained in South Australia, but am now better informed. What does that lead to? Does it not lead to a recognition of the fact that in all these delicate and intricate social questions there will have to be an abundant series of cautiously-conducted experiments before we can hope to arrive at a final settlement?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

What is the next step?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I admit that I am impressed by the extreme intricacy of this question, and the difficulty the Federal Parliament will have in dealing with it. But the Federal Parliament will have the same difficulty in dealing with a variety of issues, such as the financial issue, the question of Customs and the measure of protection to be extended to Australian industry. And yet in those cases we trust the Federal Parliament. Why should we not do so in this instance also? Mr. O'Connor asks what is the next step? The honorable member's argument was that most of the experiments in Australia have been in the voluntary stage, and that the next experiment will be in the compulsory stage. So far as I can forecast the future, I agree that that is likely to be

so. That adds to the difficulty of the situation and the complexity of the problem, but neither difficulty nor complexity need deter us if we believe this to be distinctly a federal question, that is to say, a question which will become a federal question when it has extended beyond the limits of a single state. I do not regard the proposal as a form of idle words, or as conferring a power that is to be allowed to remain unused. At the same time, this is a power, like many others, not likely to be exercised by the Federal Parliament for many years to come. The Federal Parliament will be impressed by the importance of the experiments that are proceeding in the states. It will watch them carefully, and will deal with the subject as soon as it feels it is competent to do so. It will be under no compulsion to accept any solution of these difficulties until it feels that it has obtained a satisfactory solution. The argument of Trust the Federal Parliament" appears, to me to be applied most properly in this connexion. The other plea which I would venture to urge is one which carries weight with many other honorable members. It is that, as far as we legitimately can, we should strengthen the Federal Parliament and the Federal Government. Wherever we can detect a federal interest or power we should provide for it in advance, without waiting for public clamour or the long agitation leading up to an amendment of the Constitution. We should provide in advance for all conceivable federal contingencies, strengthen the Federal Government, and trust the Federal Parliament to use its powers wisely.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I desire to say a few words, because I am going to support the amendment, whereas on a former occasion I voted against it. In matters of this kind it is exceedingly difficult to prevent one's sympathies running away with one's judgment, and after the able speeches of Mr. Higgins, Mr. Isaacs, and Dr. Quick, which appealed to my sympathies, came the sledgehammer arguments of Mr. McMillan and Mr. Symon. I think it must be clear to a majority in the Convention that these honorable members have rather tried to stifle their sympathies, and have very carefully and quite unintentionally exaggerated in every particular the difficulties surrounding the simple amendment of Mr. Higgins. My honorable friend (Mr. Symon) even picks to pieces the wording of the amendment. Mr. Higgins does not mix up conciliation and arbitration in the way Mr. Symon would lead us to suppose. The amendment means conciliation for the prevention of disputes, and arbitration for the settlement of them, and I have no fault to find with the language used. Then Mr. Symon said that he would not take up the time of the Convention in considering the mode in which the Federal Parliament might carry out this power if invested with it, but in the next breath he stated that the Federal Parliament, if it had this power, would fix wages for the whole of Australasia. Mr. Wise interjected that by giving this power we should hand over the regulation of industrial disputes of every kind to the Federal Parliament. Now, I would ask, are not these exaggerations which we have a right to call attention to? I think that they are. Mr. Symon insisted, with very great firmness, that a maritime strike was purely a local matter. Now, may I, with every respect insist with equal firmness that a maritime strike could in no sense of the word be a local matter? It must be a national matter. I am sure every honorable member knows the great and gigantic strides which are being made in all parts of the world in the direction of organization. I need only refer to the political organizations of America, to your federal labour associations, and to your federal employers’ associations. These associations are becoming more scientific and powerful, and I can hardly understand any honorable member saying that a maritime strike would be local. Just in the same way as our Most Gracious Majesty the Queen touched the button and flashed a message of gratitude and goodwill to all the people of the empire, so the time has now come, or will shortly come, when the secretary of a federated labour society will touch a button or write out a little cablegram, which will be flashed throughout all Australasia, and will make any strike a national strike in every sense of the word. I cannot, therefore, agree with those honorable members who say that this is not a matter of federal concern. Mr. Higgins only asks us to give the Federal Parliament power to deal with those strikes the influence of which has extended beyond the borders of a single state. Mr. Symon asked what power would determine whether a strike had so extended itself. That power would, I presume, rest with the Federal Court. If the Federal Parliament, in the opinion of any individual, oversteps its authority, the Federal Court will be there to say whether it is right or wrong. I think that Mr. O’Connor was mistaken, although he has very good reasons for assuming, that the next stage in this matter will be that of compulsory arbitration. The Convention should not, however, allow itself to be influenced by that argument. I do not look forward to the time when it will necessarily be compulsory. The Federal Parliament will wait for the psychological moment. This is about the last question it will touch until it can touch it usefully, and in the interests of commercial life. Honorable members seem to think that if they give this power to the Federal Parliament the Federal Parliament will rush in and use it without reason and common sense. I can come to no such conclusion. Supposing the Federal Parliament contented itself with passing a modest Act constituting a tribunal of five persons. It might be provided that the Chief Justice or one of the Judges of the Federal Court should sit on this tribunal, and that there should be associated with him two or more gentlemen representing the employers of labour, and two or more gentlemen representing the employees. Would not a tribunal of that sort be capable of doing untold good in the settlement of labour disputes? After the first week or two of the engineers' dispute was it not seen that the employees must lose? Did not the newspapers teem with information about the hours and conditions of labour in other countries of the world which showed that the employees must lose? What happened? The Engineers' Association went on spending funds which ought to have been used in other ways, and particularly for the benefit of the widows and orphans. There ought to be a law to prevent an association from doing anything of that kind. If they had had a tribunal, and especially a tribunal with the dignity, the power, and the importance of a federal tribunal to refer the matter to, this engineering dispute might have been settled two or three months ago and millions of money saved. Why should the Convention refuse to give to the Federal Parliament the power to do so useful a work? One reason why I do not anticipate the time when this matter will be compulsory is that I believe that most industrial disputes can be settled by the force of public opinion. It is to the public that employers and employed look for sympathy and for help. As soon as either side realizes that public opinion is against them they feel the necessity of seeking a settlement. If a court or tribunal of this kind were established-and I do not care how simple or how powerless it is - it will at least be a step in the right direction. I may illustrate what I mean by reminding myself, and telling the Convention, of the first fight I had when a boy at school. The boy was about my own size.

Mr. BARTON. -

Did you only have one?

Mr. DOBSON. -

Yes, only one stand up fight. I do not admit for one moment that I was getting the worst of it, but I do admit that when a mutual friend came and took my opponent's arm and led him away in one direction, and took my arm and led me away in another direction-

Mr. PEACOCK. -

You were very glad?

Mr. DOBSON. -

Well, I was not sorry. I take it that there is no body of persons in the world whom it would be more difficult to persuade that they were wrong than a number of employees fighting for what they think to be right and just on behalf of themselves, their wives, and their children, against their employers. I do not see the common sense or wisdom of refusing to the Federal Parliament power to create some simple tribunal whereby the employees on the one hand, and the employers on the other hand, could be led away in the peaceful fashion I have just described, and a strike averted which would be fraught with danger to the whole of the Australian Continent.

Mr. LEAKE (Western Australia). -

When this question was before the Convention in Adelaide I had no opportunity of casting my vote for or against the proposal, because with other members of the Western Australian delegation I had already returned to my own colony. For that reason, I do not wish to give a silent vote upon this occasion. It is my intention to vote against the amendment, because I am impressed with the argument that this is a matter not so much for the Federal Government as for the states Governments. The contention that to insert the proposed words would do no harm because they are more idle words does not seem to me to be based upon sound reason. If honorable members have been impressed by the warning given to us by the Premier of New South Wales a few days ago, they will see that words of this sort are not inserted in the Constitution. If this power is given to the Central Government the states Governments will be deprived of the right to legislate upon the subject.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Not at all.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

When the power of the Federal Government is once exercised of course it will.

Mr. BARTON. -

The moment the device of extending a dispute so as to put it under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government is adopted the state Government will be unable to act.

Mr. LEAKE. -

I confess that I think the insertion of the proposed words might deprive the states of a right which they now have. If strikes and industrial disputes were always to be universal perhaps the better medium of settling them would be the Central Government, but I cannot bring myself to believe that they will always be universal. In my experience industrial disputes depend a great deal upon local conditions, and that being so, surely the best authority to settle them is the local authority. We know that, in different colonies, we have varying rates of wages, and we have unionists and non-unionists. In some of the colonies the unionists are more numerous than in other colonies. Now, how can the Central Government, without that local knowledge which is so essential in dealing with difficulties of this kind, apply themselves to the proper settlement of a dispute? Surely it is better that the states should be allowed to settle the disputes which occur within their own boundaries. If we test the practicability of the proposed arrangement by the experience of the past, we shall find that we are, asking the Central Government, to accept a very great responsibility upon an enormous scale, which the states have been-unable to meet on a small scale. It seems to me that it is unnecessary to burden the Constitution with this provision. I am entirely in accord with the views which the honorable and learned member. (Mr. Symon) has expressed upon this question. A good point was made by the honorable member (Mr. Trenwith) when he said, that perhaps the best tribunal for settling these matters was that of public opinion. After all, that is but a sentimental tribunal, but if sentimental questions are to be settled by some sentimental controlling power, perhaps the Central Government may be able to exercise that power. Another point occurs to me. As I said before, we must not assume that industrial disputes will always be universal throughout the continent. Under the Federation there may be a sub-division of states. Suppose, for the sake of illustration, a dispute occurred in an isolated colony like Western Australia. The chances are that if a strike were to occur in any of our big mining centres, it would, considering our peculiar conditions, in no way affect our neighbours upon this side of Australia. Could not such a dispute be better dealt with by the local authorities than by the federal authorities?

Mr. HOWE. -
There would be no occasion for the federal authority to interfere.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The federal authority could not interfere. The dispute must be one extending beyond any one state."

Mr. BARTON. -
That gives a direct incentive for the extension of the dispute.

Mr. LEAKE. -
Of course, it is not necessary for the purposes of my argument that the dispute should be a mining dispute; it might be a dispute affecting some other industry. Then, again, disputes might arise in Tropical Australia, in that part of the continent where there may ultimately be new states. A different condition of affairs would prevail there to that prevailing in any other part of Australia: but such a dispute might extend over the border of another state, in which case, if the amendment were carried, it would come under the jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament. But would not the authorities of the states in which the dispute occurred be in a better position to take steps to bring it to a conclusion than the federal authority? I apologize to the Convention for having detained them on this subject, but under the circumstances I did not wish to give a silent vote.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to add to what has been said by some honorable members in opposition to the insertion of these words, speaking from the point of view of the possible efficacy of legislation upon this matter, that the question of the adoption of compulsory arbitration and conciliation was very largely gone into by a Labour Commission which sat in England some seven or eight years ago. That commission examined close upon 500 witnesses, the greater number of whom were representatives of labour, and their decision was, as expressed in an article by Mr. John Rae, in the Contemporary Review, that an Act of Parliament should not be passed to interfere with what is being done by voluntary co-operation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But there has been a forward movement since that time even in England.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not think the position of affairs there has altered very much during the last six or seven years, or that the well-thought-out recommendation of representatives of labour-recommendations based upon the evidence of members of the several labour societies could have been upset within that time. Here we have from Mr. Rae, who as a writer is one of the greatest upholders of labour, the statement that the witnesses who were examined on behalf of labour organizations would have nothing to do with compulsory state interference. Mr. Rae cites the evidence of several witnesses. In preface to an extract from the evidence of one of them, he says-

One thing was clear-they would have nothing to do with State arbitration or a State-appointed arbitrator. I say," said Mr. Trow, let Parliament mind its own business. We know better what man to select for an arbitrator than Parliament does. We do not want them to foist upon us an arbitrator."

Going further, we have the evidence of Mr. Knight, a representative of capital, who is cited by Mr. Rae in justification of his conclusions:-

"I speak," he said, from long experience of the organization that I represent here to-day, and I say that we can settle all our differences without any interference on the part of Parliament or any one else."

Since 1866, when the late Mr. Mundella established a board of conciliation for the hosiery trade, there have been numerous boards of conciliation established in connexion with various trades. Their operations begin by the establishment of the board through the medium of both sides... to the dispute. They discuss the matter amicably, and if they can come to no agreement it is referred to arbitration. The mode of enforcing the award of the arbitrators is expulsion from the society. If the decision is against members of a capitalist organization, the officials of that organization are supposed to enforce the mandate of the board by expelling such of its members as refuse to recognise it. If the decision of the board is against the demands of workmen, if they do not comply with that decision, they are expelled from their organization. In Middleborough no less than 400 members of a trade society were expelled because they did not accept the wages awarded by a board of arbitration.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
And yet it is said that it is impossible to enforce these awards.

Mr. GLYNN. -
In these cases the decision come to is the decision agreed upon by those who are interested in the dispute, and, urged by the dictates of conscience and common sense, each side says,-"We are bound to follow out the express mandate of a committee in whose voice we have influence to the extent of one-half;" but if the arbitration were compulsory by Act of Parliament the various trades societies would say-"We know quite as well what should be done in this case as any board of compulsory arbitration, and we refuse to give you the moral adhesion which we should give to the award of any court voluntarily created. We defy the state to say that it has more than a moral power to enforce this award." If the state decreed that 10,000 or 12,000 workmen should accept for a definite time lower wages than they were asking for, could that decree be enforced?

Mr. SYMON. -
On the other hand, what would prevent an employer from shutting up his shop if an award were given against him?

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes. Would a mandamus be issued if he did not open his shop?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You can impose a penalty for disobedience. Of course, while you can lead a horse to the water you cannot make him drink.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I would not lead a horse to the water if he were not thirsty. We have seen the growth of voluntary machinery, which 25 years' experience in England has shown to be efficacious, and by substituting for it the principle of compulsion you must, if you do not nip in the bud, at any rate interfere with the early growth of the principle of conciliation and arbitration.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If the principle is bad the Federal Parliament will not adopt it.
Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable member must be an innocent in political life if he thinks that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Why should not the Federal Parliament be as wise as we are?

Mr. GLYNN. -

No doubt, but that is not going very far. On a simple point like this, we have had something like 25 different opinions, so that there are two years has simply repealed the efforts of earlier legislators who worked on philanthropic lines. I should be prepared to vest this power in the Federal Parliament if I thought that it would do any good or that it would not do harm, because I think we ought to arm the federal body with any power which may be efficacious for the purposes of good government, and which will not annul the existing rights of the states. But I am of opinion that you will tie the hands of the state by enacting legislation of this character, because it will be impossible to say where the line of demarcation is.

There may be a strike in one colony, and there may be manifested sympathy and support towards the strikers from other colonies without an absolute strike taking place in those other colonies. It will then be difficult to say whether the manifestation of that sympathy and that supply of funds does not constitute an extension of the dispute. A provision of this sort would, in fact, be full of difficulties of interpretation, and, instead of having a settlement of disputes, you may have a complication. Further than that, some lawyer might apply to the court for a mandamus to prevent the Federal Parliament going into the matter at all, on the ground of possible interference with state rights. For these reasons I shall be found voting against the amendment.

In the first instance I think that the onus should be placed upon those who wish to add to the subjects on which the Federal Parliament is to have jurisdiction of giving reasons in favour of their proposals. No part of this Bill has received more careful consideration from the various bodies who have dealt with it than this particular clause, so that when an honorable member wishes to introduce a new subject of federal jurisdiction, the onus is placed upon him of showing that there is some distinct advantage to be gained by it. I have no doubt that those who are in favour of the amendment moved by the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) do believe that a distinct advantage would be gained by making this a federal subject. There is a tendency in these days, especially among those who are very anxious to bring about an amelioration of all the ills which flesh is heir to,
to intrust knotty problems to some new authority, in the pious hope, that matters which human wit has hitherto never been able to settle satisfactorily will be settled by some such tribunal. I fear that this attempt to settle the matter of trade disputes by referring them to some new jurisdiction will only lead to an extension of the evil. Because we must see at once that this proposal has a very serious disadvantage in it. The honorable member does not propose to hand over all trade disputes to settlement by the Federal Parliament. He hands over only those trade disputes which extend beyond the limit of one state. Cannot we see that giving any such power must result in a most unfortunate state of things arising? For instance, let us suppose that there are several sets of laws in existence dealing with this subject—one in a particular state, which are not interfered with by any federal law; different laws in each of the other four states; and then a federal law which may be radically different from all the others. Just consider the temptation under those circumstances to shift the venue of a particular trade dispute from a particular state. If the employers in the trade dispute in a particular state think that the federal law and its administration are more likely to suit them, look at the incentive there is to extend the mischief and evil into another state, or more than one other state, in order to shift the venue of the tribunal which will try the dispute. There is at once, I say, an incentive to shift the venue if the employers think that the federal tribunal will be likely to suit them best, and they will be tempted to extend the dispute in order to suit their own personal interests. So it will be with the other side—the working men—if they think that, the federal; tribunal will best suit their interests.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
As if the Federal Parliament would not deal with such a case!

Mr. REID. -
I cannot conceive of a Parliament which could deal with contingencies of that kind.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It is quite possible for the Federal Parliament to draw the line, and to allow the tribunal to decide whether a particular case referred to it is a bonne fide dispute pertaining to one colony or not.

Mr. REID. -
We are drawing the line here.
But we say that the dispute is only to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament when it is a dispute existing in more than one state.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Yes, that is so.

Mr. REID. -
That is all I am addressing myself to; and I am showing that such a provision will tend to enlarge the area of trade disputes, for the very reason that in a given dispute the employers might be disposed to extend the working area, or the men might be disposed to extend the area, in order to get the advantage of having the dispute settled by the federal tribunal. Now, I am one of those who quite believe in the compulsory investigation of trade disputes. I have quite come to that conclusion. But a proposal that the Federal Parliament shall provide for the compulsory investigation of trade disputes passes my comprehension. It seems to me that any such proposal would put a premium upon one side enlarging the area of the mischief. Under all the circumstances, it seems to me that it will be better for each state to deal with this matter locally. I am, to a considerable extent, in sympathy with those who are agitating upon this matter, but I think that it is one that can be best dealt with by means of laws passed by the various states. While I am personally in favour, however, of the compulsory investigation of trade disputes in particular states, I am opposed to a compulsory federal investigation of local trade disputes.

Mr. DOBSON. -
A compulsory federal investigation of all trade disputes?

Mr. REID. -
Yes. I have pointed out how a local trade dispute may be extended and made into a federal dispute.

Mr. HOWE. -
The federal law will take care of that.

Mr. REID. -
I am delighted to know that these matters are to be settled so easily, but I would like to say that this Constitution settles the federal law. What are we asked to do by means of this amendment? It provides in point of fact that in case a trade dispute extends beyond one colony the Federal Parliament shall have-

Mr. KINGSTON. -
"May" have.

Mr. REID. -
May? This is a still more extraordinary state of things.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
"May" deal with it.
Mr. REID. -

If there is to be an option, and the Federal Parliament may deal with one class of trade dispute whilst the local law may deal with another-

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I did not say that.

Mr. REID. -

Then may" means that There can be no word may used in a matter of this sort. It must be a power of active legislation to meet the circumstances of this sub-section. And it would not be competent for the federal power to go into the bona fides as to the extension of a trade dispute. If a dispute be existent between two colonies or more the federal tribunal would have to deal with it, and the local power would be disfranchised from dealing with it. That is what I am afraid of. In order that matters may be dealt with federally, we have put a power in the Constitution which enables the states to hand over any matter to the federal jurisdiction. In connexion with this matter I take up the same attitude as I took up in relation to the old age-pensions. I say that it may be a subject which may be made federal in the future. In that event, the states can hand it over under sub-section (35) to the Federal Parliament. But at present the view I take of the matter is that I think it would be better that we should not insert the proposed new sub-section.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I intend to support the amendment of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins). I must, however, say that I am not generally in sympathy with the proposals of the honorable member, and I have hesitated in my own mind whether, in following the honorable member in this matter, I am on the right track. But, for all that it may not be thought so, I have some liberal instincts, although my liberalism is not of the type of that of the honorable member or of many of those who generally support him. I have a greater regard for individual rights, I think, than probably the honorable member has. But my reason for supporting this amendment is that I think the Federal Parliament will be better able to deal with the subject, and will deal with it more moderately, than the local Parliaments will be likely to do. I think that it will not be so likely to be influenced by party feeling as local Parliaments will be. It is no use shutting our eyes to the fact that these industrial disputes have arisen and will arise in the future, and I see no reason why this Parliament which we are to erect should not have the power to deal with these matters. I hope that it will be able to exercise that power with greater moderation and more wisdom than the local Parliaments are likely to do, and for that reason I intend to support the amendment.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at two p.m.]

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I desire before a division is taken to express briefly my appreciation of the fair, frank, and courteous way in which the amendment has been treated on both sides. I think the reason why the discussion on this as well as on some other clauses has taken such a long time is that honorable members feel that they are now engaged on the final stage of this Bill, and that the people of the various colonies will appreciate the care which is taken at this stage before they make any final commitment. While I render my thanks to honorable members, I must say the unkindest cut of all came from the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, who is supporting my amendment. The honorable member very frankly stated that I have not got a proper appreciation of the rights of property, and that I do not respect what a man has rightly earned as I ought to do. I was not aware that I had in any way interfered with his spoons or anything belonging to him, or on what ground he says I do not respect the rights of property, in this instance. I thought it was the habit of lawyers to be always upholders of property and order. The principal objection to lawyers always appears to be that in deciding the question of meum and tuum they are apt to make them suum. But apart from the difficulties which have come from behind me, I am glad to have the support of the right honorable gentleman in that matter. The only doubt I have, after all the debate, about the correctness of my view is that I am supported from such a quarter. I must say I think the issue has on several occasions been obscured during the debate. The issue is not whether there is to be arbitration or not-the issue is not as to what kind of arbitration or conciliation there is to be—but the issue is whether the hands of the Federal Parliament are to be tied, so that no matter how distinctly federal the dispute is, how widespread that dispute is throughout Australia, the Federal Parliament shall have no power to deal with it. I would remind you that the very effect of this federal scheme is to render disputes Australian, which are at present Victorian or purely New South Wales. For instance, we are giving the Federal Parliament the whole power of dealing with the customs duties. That involves the question of particular trades and their protection. At present the dispute in the boot trade is confined to Victoria, as to the Victorian bootmakers, because they have to deal with one kind of conditions, and a dispute in New South Wales as to the bootmakers' wages, and so forth, is confined to New South Wales, because they have to deal with a different set of conditions. When we make federal the whole of the customs duties, when we deal with the colonies as a whole, you will find that the conditions of the different trades throughout the colonies will be assimilated, and that there is far more likelihood of the disputes spreading over the several colonies. Assuming that a dispute spreads over the several colonies, I ask what possible remedy do the opponents of this amendment suggest? They simply stand blind and helpless before a condition of things which every one ought to face, and they offer no suggestion whatever for the purpose of meeting the most Review of Reviews, dealing with an article in the National Review upon compulsory arbitration, it is said that the employers are always against it. Its adoption is always favoured by the whole of the trade unionists. If there is a strong feeling amongst the workers of Australia that conciliation and arbitration are against their legitimate interests you may be sure that the law will not be passed. I agree thoroughly with the writer of this article that the resistance to conciliation and arbitration always comes from the side of the employers. One of the chief objections raised against my proposal is that there are no means of enforcing an award where there are a great number of people interested. It is said if 100,000 workers are interested, how are you to enforce the award? Now, I find that in the National Review article the scheme in New Zealand has been described. The scheme there is that to deal with such conflicts there are local boards of conciliation composed of equal numbers of masters and men, with an impartial chairman. They are armed with full powers for taking evidence and compelling attendance. The award of the local board is not made enforceable by law, but it is a friendly recommendation to the disputants. If the disputants do not act upon the recommendation there is an appeal to a final tribunal, consisting of a Supreme Court Judge, with one assessor selected by the employers, the other by the employees. That court is able to give an enforceable award if it thinks fit, and that is final. The article says-

After inquiry into any industrial dispute the court gives its award. This can be either legally enforceable or not, as it thinks advisable. If it is to have legal force it is filed in the Supreme Court, and then has the weight of an ordinary submission to an award. That is to say, either party to it can, by leave of a Judge, get an order exacting a penalty for its breach. The penalty, be it noted, is not to exceed £500 in the case of any individual employer or trade union. Should a union's funds be insufficient, each member is liable to the extent of not more than £10. Costs are in the arbitration court's discretion.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Have not all the unions to be registered? Is not that the basis of the Act?
Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not know whether that is the case in New Zealand, and I do not know that it would be essential but the point is this: It is said you cannot enforce these awards. But what is the fact? In New Zealand, since the Act was passed, there have been sixteen disputes referred to the boards. The article proceeds-

The trades concerned have been the bootmakers, seamen, gold miners, tailors, coal miners, bakers, furniture makers, builders, and painters. During that time there have virtually been no strikes or lock-outs. Out of twelve disputes settled about one-half of them were settled by the boards without appeal to the court.

That I also take to be a very significant fact. If the local board of conciliation gives its decision public opinion knows upon which side to veer. At present the public do not know on which side the merits stand; but if they know there is an impartial board to inquire into the dispute the chances are very strong that public opinion would veer round to and carry out the decision. And my honorable friend (Mr. Trenwith) is quite right in saying that what they look for is the play of public opinion on these disputes. There is also one great advantage which employers appear not to recognise. It gives them to a large extent a certainty for the next two or three years. The New Zealand law is that there is to be an agreement filed for a period which is not to exceed three years. If there is one thing in commercial transactions which commercial men want, it is to have some certainty as to the conditions under which they are to work for the next two or three years. The article continues:-

One of the advantages to the employer is that the verdict, filed in the court, and legally binding for three years, unless terminated by mutual agreement, enables him to make his calculations on an assured basis. If unions fear incorporation as an invitation to harassing litigation by the employers, Mr. Reeves points out that unions can please themselves about becoming corporate bodies for general purposes;" what is not optional is their corporate liability for costs and penalties incurred under the Act.

The mode of enforcement, then, in New Zealand is by going against the funds of the union. Suppose you had, during the last shearsers' strike, to enforce an award against the Shearers' Union, which we all know extends over all Australia, and whose union funds, therefore, are inter-colonial; and suppose you had a New South Wales law which bound the shearers of New South Wales, how could you reach the Shearers' Union funds when those funds would be quickly transferred to Victoria? I ask honorable members, in the interests of the employers themselves, how you are to deal with a case of that sort? Any practical man knows that the best mode of enforcing the award, if it is to be in its final result compulsory, is to go against the funds of the union, but here you have no measures to your hand. Are we to remain helpless—are we to remain inert? Are we in no way, in making a Constitution in the year 1898, to recognise the gravest questions, involving all our social life, all our industrial life, all our private life, as these disputes do? It has been said "Oh, it is a mere dispute between man and man; every employer has a certain contract with a certain employee." That is very true. There is a contract; but are we to leave it simply to the employer and the employee to fight it out, seeing that the results are so very grave not only to those people but also to those who are behind the employer and employee? Who has suffered most by this dispute as to the engineers in England? Is it the employers or is it the employees? Is it not the families behind the employees? Is it not the general public, who find the whole trade of engineering leaving England? The State has come to this: That it cannot afford to stand idle and to allow these disputes to be carried out to their bitter consummation. It is quite too late for that. All I ask for by this amendment is that just as Victoria can deal with Victorian trade disputes, that just as New South Wales can deal with New South Wales trade disputes, that just as Great Britain and Ireland can deal with disputes in the United Kingdom, so the Federal Parliament shall be enabled to deal with disputes which are Australian. The fact is that we want to do just the opposite of what my friend (Mr. McMillan) has said. He said let legislation be confined as far as possible to keeping law and order. I think the true principle is to prevent as far as possible, to keep the policeman back as the ultimate sanction and ultimate means of sanction. We want to keep the policeman back to the very last. But, according to this principle, which my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan) has put forward, you are to bring the policeman in as soon as ever the employer and employee have a quarrel.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

He did not say that at all.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is not fair. He did not say that at all.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If we take the remarkable case which my honorable friend (Mr. Dobson) referred to the other day, and which the leader of the Convention described as the battle of the spuds and the billy, in that case, strictly speaking, there were two men who could fight out the quarrel if they wished; but the state says-"No, we will not allow you to fight out the quarrel; we must keep the peace." The two are prevented by the State from resorting to fisticuffs.
Then the State says-"You may do whatever you like, but you must keep the peace; and at the same time we will decide for you as individuals what your rights are with regard to this water." The State therefore interferes between private individuals, and am I to be told that the State is to interfere where there is a dispute merely affecting two individuals, and is not to interfere where there is a dispute which affects hosts of individuals, which affects whole interests of the State, which affects the peace and order of the state, and where the happiness and the means of subsistence of thousands of families perhaps are dependent on the quarrelling between these individuals? Then it is said-"We are throwing the apple of discord to the people." I ask honorable members are we throwing a bigger apple of discord here than they are in referring the whole question of free-trade or protection to the Federal Parliament? Is this a larger question than the question of free-trade or protection? Is there any, thing which excites so much difference of opinion amongst the people as the question of free-trade or protection, and the industries which will be affected by the determining of that question? All I wish honorable members to affirm in this amendment is that the hands of the Federal Parliament shall not be tied, no matter what eventualities may occur, from the making of legislation for federal purposes where the dispute is federal, and I sincerely hope that we shall be able to go to the country with a statement that here we have a means of effectually dealing with a federal matter in a federal manner.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have not risen for the purpose of making a long speech, because I am one of those who hold the opinion that when what one has to say has been as well. said by others it is unnecessary to express that opinion again. I should like to say a word with reference to a remark which fell from my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott). When my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Symon) said the words proposed to be inserted were either idle or mischievous, Sir Joseph Abbott asked, if they were idle words, what harm was there in inserting them in the Constitution. I hope that reasons of that kind will never be accepted. With every respect to my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott), we are not about to make a Constitution which we consider it advisable to fill with this project or that project simply because we think that the insertion of it will do no harm. A federation is supposed by all of us to be something which we undertake for the positive good which it brings, for the positive improvements in certain conditions which it will bring about, and we propose to federate in those matters which cannot be carried out by local legislation and administration, or which cannot be so effectually carried out by those means. The contest between us here to a large extent is as to whether the questions of arbitration and conciliation may not be as effectually dealt with by the local Parliament as by the Federal Parliament, whether there will be a substantial improvement in the condition of things, and whether this is a class of dispute or a class of subject which is comprehended within the purview of what we regard as federal concerns. I am not going to traverse the ground which has been covered on that particular. As my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Symon) has so effectively and thoroughly dealt with the arguments which were used on the side of the proposers of this amendment. I intend to content myself with adopting in the main the conclusions he arrived at, and in voting with him; and I might here suggest that, as this matter has been so thoroughly canvassed, it is about time that we came to a decision.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO (Tasmania). -

As one who voted in Adelaide on this subject, and as one who believes to the fullest possible extent in the value of boards of conciliation and arbitration, if such boards and courts can be arranged, I desire to justify in some measure my giving the same vote as I gave then. This amendment does not hand over to the federal power the entire dealing with industrial disputes over the whole of the Commonwealth, but only over so much of the Commonwealth as may be affected by those disputes. It therefore imposes upon the various states the necessity for having courts of conciliation and arbitration to deal with the matters affecting their states only. That seems to me to be an admission of the principles principle which I think must be admitted in the present circumstances—that anything whatever in the nature of government or administration which can be better dealt with by a state than by the Commonwealth shall be left to the state. I claim Mr. Deakin's emphatic indorsement of that principle, and I claim his vote, because his vote if he goes with me will affirm the principle. It surely must be better for the employees that their disputes should be settled by courts which know all the circumstances, which understand the condition of things best, than that they should be settled by possibly a distant tribunal which is ignorant of the environment and particular conditions affecting any industry in any one of the states. We

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Is there power to do it? I do not think there is.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO. -

That is mentioned as one of the contingent powers.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That was said by an objector.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
And a necessary power to be exercised for the effective settlement of a dispute.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
That was said by a critic.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It must be so.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
And as in the case of wages, which necessarily vary according to varying conditions within a state, so it must be remembered that there are many other matters which are largely ruled and governed by local conditions. I see the matter just as strongly now as I did in Adelaide. I see that it is a matter which should be left to the adjudication of the states; and I would urge further that, by the interference of the Commonwealth Government in matters affecting the different states as to industrial disputes, there will be a probability, possibly more than a probability, of very serious friction arising between the Commonwealth and the states. When the honorable member who moved this amendment rose, I quite thought that he rose with the intention of withdrawing it. After seeing that that amendment, moved by himself as an extreme liberal, and supported by some as extreme liberals, came to be supported by extreme conservatives, or I may say Tories, I was all the more confirmed in that idea when he admitted that the support of my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) almost convinced him that he had better leave this matter alone.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Perhaps he will withdraw it now.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I thought he would then, and I hope he will now withdraw it as something which will not be to the interest of labour or to the interest of the states.

Question-That the new sub-section proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put.

Berry, Sir G. Isaacs, I.A.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I wish to call attention to this sub-section, which, like several others in this portion of clause 52, represents a power first conferred upon the Federal Council, but which, as it appears to me, if allowed to remain in its present restricted form-suitable enough as that may have been to the Federal Council-is altogether unsuitable to the differing conditions of the Federal Parliament. In the original draft of the Federal Council Bill the proposal was framed in clause 16 as follows:-

The Governors of any two or more of the colonies may, upon an address of the Legislatures of such colonies, refer for the consideration and determination of the Council any questions relating to those colonies or their relations with one another, and the Council shall thereupon have authority to consider and determine by Act of Council the matter so referred to it.

The draftsman who advised the Imperial Government altered that including it in section 15 of the Imperial Act constituting a Federal Council, where it forms the last part of subsection (i). The first part of the sub-section gives the Federal Council legislative authority in respect to the several matters following, and the clause before us, freely translated, follows:

Any other matter of general Australasian interest with respect to which the Legislatures of the several colonies can legislate within their own limits, and as to which it is deemed desirable that there should be a law of general application.

Now, that appears to be ample for all the legislation which the Federal Council could have dealt with. That body has no Executive, has no Budget, and undertakes no expenditure. That body is the mere creature of the colonies, is dependent upon them, except within a very limited area, and, in fact, altogether for any expenditure it may be necessary to incur. Now, during the discussion of the question of old-age pensions, when I referred to the possibility of that matter being dealt with under this sub-section, I evoked a comment from Sir John Downer, which called my attention in a particularly pointed way to a present weakness of the sub-section in this respect. It may well be that some matters referred by the several state Parliaments to the Federal Parliament, in order that common legislation may be passed for one or more colonies, may require legislation involving some expenditure—expenditure which must be undertaken in order to give effect to that legislation. It might be for the ordinary machinery administration—the payment of salaries of certain officers—or it might be the power to levy certain fees and collect certain charges; or it might involve direct taxation; but in all such cases it appears to me that the present sub-section may be inadequate. For instance, if reference be made to sub-section (3) of this clause 52 it will be found that the Federal Parliament has only the power to raise money by systems of taxation which shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth. Consequently, if any legislation referring to any less number of the colonies than the whole of the colonies, and which involved any expenditure, was passed by the Federal Parliament, although those colonies were willing to vote that expenditure, the Federal Parliament might have no power to raise that money. The only possible means of the Federal Parliament obtaining that power would be if it were conferred in the provisions of the referring statutes passed by the referring colonies, but unless those provisions exactly agreed—and agreement would be extremely difficult to arrive at—the probability is that the law would be inharmonious and fail in its effect. I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that he should consider whether there should not be such a modification of sub-section (3), which provides for the raising of money by the Commonwealth, as would allow of a reference by two or three colonies desiring to intrust the Federal Parliament with the task of framing legislation for them, and enabling the Federal Parliament, if so called upon, to provide for the raising of the necessary revenue in those colonies. That would be one means of meeting the difficulty. Another means might be that when two or more colonies had determined, under sub-section (35), to refer to the Commonwealth Parliament any matter which required the raising of money from their citizens, it should be possible, for the Commonwealth, in regard to those particular matters, to provide for the necessary taxation to be levied in those colonies by the central authority, instead of leaving them to the very difficult task of coming to an independent agreement among themselves as to all the details of the method by which the money should be provided.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Strike the sub-section out.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is the best solution of the difficulty.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That may be so.

Mr. GLYNN. -

We may have a conflict of laws under the sub-section.

Mr. BARTON. -

Such laws can only apply to the referring states themselves.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

They would not be, in the strict sense of the term, federal laws.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, they would only apply to the states which referred the matters to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Exactly; but those laws can be adopted by the other states. If two or three colonies join in requesting the Federal Parliament to pass a statute on a particular matter applying only to those two or three colonies, and that law has been enacted and proved to work well, the remaining colonies of the group may adopt it, and finally

[P.217] starts here
you may have the Commonwealth in this position, that every colony in the group has adopted, as far as it can adopt, that particular law, which then ought to be a federal law. This contingency is perhaps provided for. That being so, it becomes necessary for us to consider whether we should not also provide for the other contingency. If all the states of the group except one, or if three of the larger colonies, or any three of the colonies, required a common statute in regard to a particular subject, and the administration of that statute involved the raising of money, the Federal Government ought to be able to provide for the levying of that money under the same law if so requested by those concerned.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Will you briefly restate the point?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
My point is that by the requests of different colonies at different times you may arrive at a position in which all the colonies have adopted a particular law, and it is necessary for the working of that law that certain fees, charges, or taxation should be imposed. That law now relates to the whole of the Union, because every state has come under it. As I read clause 52, the Federal Parliament will have no power, until the law has thus become absolutely federal, to impose taxation to provide the necessary revenue for carrying out

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Is that not implied?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
If it is implied, would it not be best to make it explicit? The parentage of this clause, as I have shown—originating as it does in a body with practically no financial power—casts a certain suspicion on that reading of it, although, of course, the provision when embodied in this Act would have a different effect. Still, why not make it clear whether we mean that, when the Federal Parliament has passed federal legislation for some of the colonies, we shall allow that same legislation to deal with any necessary raising of revenue from those colonies which may be required to give effect to the legislation?

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
I think the point taken by my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) is one well worthy of the consideration of the Drafting Committee, and probably the difficulty to which he has drawn attention could be obviated by some such provision as that which he suggested. But this matter has struck me also from another point of view, and it seems to me that the provision affords an easy method of amending the Federal Constitution, without referring such amendments to the people of the various states for their assent. Now, either when the state Parliaments have referred these matters to the Federal Parliament, and the Federal Parliament has dealt with such matters, that becomes a federal law, and cannot afterwards be repealed or revoked by the State Parliaments-that is one position, and in that case, of course, the reference once made is a reference for all time, and cannot be revoked, so that to that extent it becomes an amendment of the states' Constitution, incorporated in and engrafted on the Federal Constitution without the consent of the people of the various states. On the other hand, if that be not so, and the states can, after making such reference, repeal such reference, what is the result? You have a constant state of change—no guarantee for continuity or permanence—in this class of laws, and this might lead to a great deal of confusion and a most unsatisfactory state of things. My principal objection to the provision is that it affords a free and easy method of amending the Federal Constitution without such amendments being carried into effect in the manner provided by this Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

I cannot understand how it gives an opportunity of amending the Federal Constitution.

Dr. QUICK. -

In this way. At present clause 52, which we are now discussing, deals with the powers of the Federal Parliament. It defines those powers in specific terms, in specific paragraphs. Very well. Then, if under this sub-section power be given to the state Parliaments to refer other matters to the Federal Parliament, to that extent the powers of the Federal Parliament are enlarged, and therefore there is an enlargement of the Constitution. This enlarges the power of the Federal Parliament, and when a law is passed by the Federal Parliament, it becomes binding on the citizens of the states the Parliaments of which have made reference; and if these laws are binding, I say they become federal laws, and those federal laws may be administered by federal courts. Consequently, these referred powers become federal powers, and to that extent this becomes a means of amending the Federal Constitution.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

The state Parliaments may refer some subjects to the Federal Parliament without the consent of the people.

Dr. QUICK. -

True, the state Parliaments may refer some subjects to the Federal Parliament without the consent of the people of the states—that is my point-and to that extent the powers become grafted on the Federal Constitution in a manner directly different from the mode provided by this Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

You can make amendments in your Constitution without referring to the people.

Dr. QUICK. -

That is so, but there is a distinct provision here that there is to be no amendment of the Constitution without first such amendment being passed by the Federal Parliament, and then submitted to the people of the states, and there must be a majority of the people and a majority of the states before such amendment can become law. In this case also, I have to use an expression which has been frequently indulged in by Mr. Symon, that another mischievous result will follow from this power of reference. Supposing a state Parliament is troubled and bothered with an agitation upon a certain question—say, that of old-age pensions—and the state wants to get rid of a troublesome problem, it may simply, out of its inclination to get rid of the difficulty, pass a Referring Bill shunting the question on to the Federal Parliament, and the matter may there be hung up on account of other difficulties. Once a state has referred a matter to the Federal Parliament of course it cannot deal with it itself.

Mr. BARTON. -

And it cannot repeal the law referring the matter.

Dr. QUICK. -

There seems to be a difference of opinion on that point. I myself agree with the Premier of Victoria that there is power to repeal, and, consequently that the power of reference is not an ultimate power; it may be repealed, and what is the result? It would lead to a most unsatisfactory state of affairs. My view is that the sub-section should be struck out altogether.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think we are greatly indebted to Mr. Deakin and Dr. Quick for raising this question. The only wonder is that it has not struck us at an earlier stage of our proceedings how very mischievous—to repeat a word which has just been attributed to me—this sub-section may possibly become. I do not know, whether a state, after referring a particular subject of legislation to the Federal Parliament could not revoke the reference. My own personal view is that it could. It could revoke the reference, but if the Federal Parliament has acted upon that reference, and legislated upon it, then I think that legislation becomes federal legislation, and could not be revoked or interfered with in any way by the State. If, as
Mr. Deakin has said, they have appealed to Caesar, they must be bound by Caesar's decree, Caesar in this case being the Federal Parliament. The law so passed by the Federal Parliament would become federal law for all time until the Federal Parliament repealed it. Now, if the state happened to change its mind on this particular matter, what would be the result? The reference to the Federal Parliament may have been a mere political contrivance for the moment, as Dr. Quick has pointed out, to get rid of some troublesome question. But if the state at some future period desired to legislate on its own account, and to deal with the matter, which perhaps was a matter of purely local concern, it would be faced with another portion of the Constitution, which says that no state law shall prevail if it is in conflict with the federal law. A majority in Parliament, in order to get rid of a difficulty, might refer it to the federal authority, and then we might find subsequently the people of the state hampered by the impossibility of their retracing their steps, and carrying out legislation which they considered necessary and desirable. I think, myself, that the better way would be to strike out this provision altogether. It is inconsistent, it seems to me, with the foundation of our Federal Government. We declare here specific powers to be intrusted to the Federal Parliament, and by those we should abide, except so far as the matter is controlled by sub-section (36). It ought not to be competent for any state to get rid of a troublesome matter of legislation by saying-"We will refer this to the Federal Parliament." It is obvious that, as has been pointed out by Dr. Quick, this provision would extend powers to the Federal Parliament to a degree which would depend upon the hazard of the moment. Now we are doing all we can, by debating the matter day after day, to secure that those powers may be as precise as possible, and be brought within the limits of the necessities of the case. But here we are giving to any state the power of sending on to the Federal Parliament, for debate and legislation, some matter which it is purely for themselves to deal with, and I do not think we ought to put it in the power of states to relieve themselves from their own responsibilities in legislation or administration by any such easy contrivance as this might turn out to be. I think the provision is really in by mistake. I was not aware until it was pointed out by Mr. Deakin, that it had its origin in connexion with the Federal Council Act, though I know it exists there. It might be applicable in that case, but it is not applicable to the Federal Government we are now seeking to establish. I would also point out that sub-section (36) really gives a very wide power in connexion with the exercise of legislative authority to the Federal Parliament, a power which I fancy would, if it were desired to extend power to the Federal Parliament, meet the case. Sub-section (36) enables the Federal Parliament to make laws with respect to-
The exercise within the Commonwealth, at the request or with the concurrence of the Parliaments of all the states concerned, of any legislative powers which can at the establishment of this Constitution be exercised only by the Parliament of the United Kingdom or by the Federal Council of Australasia.

Mr. DEAKIN. - That is a different thing altogether.

Mr. SYMON. - I am not quite sure whether that is a desirable provision to leave in.

Mr. ISAACS. - It is much too large; I intended to call attention to it.

Mr. SYMON. - I think this matter was brought up before, and it is a much more serious matter than honorable members might at the first glance be disposed to think. I believe it would enable states, in a matter of purely local legislation, to refer the matter to the Federal Parliament for it to deal with. I have not referred to the provisions of the Federal Council Act, but I think the concluding words of sub-section (36), if left in at all, should certainly be very carefully considered. I do not know what they mean or how extensive they may be.

Mr. DOBSON. - Could you give any illustration of a matter which would be referred to the Federal Parliament by one of the colonies?

Mr. SYMON. - Not of what would be referred, but of what might be referred. I will choose one which it might be very proper for us to refer to the Federal Parliament—the question of the disputed boundary between South Australia and Victoria. The reference would probably be quite ineffective, as the Federal Parliament would not deal with a subject of that kind at the invitation of one state.

Mr. BARTON. - If they did the settlement could only extend to that state.

Mr. SYMON. - But look at the invitation which this would give for the engendering of heat, passion, and discussion in the Federal Parliament. Look at the difficulties that would be raised on the part of the Federal Parliament in having a matter of that kind brought under its notice at all. There might be other matters of social concern, and one was mentioned by Mr. Deakin, that of old-age pensions.
Mr. DOBSON. -
That would hardly come under this provision. The financial part of it would operate against its being referred.

Mr. SYMON. -
As Mr. Deakin has put it, supposing such questions were referred, how is the Federal Parliament to deal with them without some enabling powers with regard to finance?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
If a state referred question of state finance it might be dealt with.

Mr. SYMON. -
Does the honorable member say that that would be a desirable thing to do?

Mr. BARTON. -
Is it not for the people of the state to determine whether it is desirable?

Mr. SYMON. -
Is it desirable to shunt on to the Federal Parliament a power that we have not settled in the Constitution? Would not this reduce the powers of the federal authority to a mere fluctuating quantity? My view is that we should strike this provision out altogether, and amend if necessary the succeeding subsection (36). We could then do whatever may be desirable within proper limits.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
I cannot see any of the difficulties which Mr. Deakin, Mr. Symon, and Dr. Quick anticipate in connexion with this sub-section. This, of course, is to be an inelastic Constitution, which can only be altered after great thought and with much trouble. We define what are to be the boundaries of the Constitution of the Commonwealth. We leave everything else to the states. It may be that questions may afterwards arise which concern one, two, or three states, but which are not sufficiently great to require a complete revision of the whole Constitution, with all the troublesome proceedings that have to be taken to bring about a reform. It would much facilitate matters if these questions could be referred to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It would not be an easy process. You know how hard it is to get even two colonies to agree to anything.
It would not be too easy.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Nothing should be too easy. We have the power to alter the Constitution, but it is a power that can only be exercised with great difficulty. We also have a power of quasi-arbitration, which the Commonwealth Parliament can exercise in an easier way, although not without some difficulty, at the request of one or more states. Now, is not that a good principle? I do not think many honorable members will say it is not. It is suggested that we are allowing the states to throw upon the Federal Parliament a responsibility they ought to take themselves. My answer is that every state wants to aggrandize itself, to increase its authority, and it will only be in very extreme cases that the states will resort to this means of getting rid of a difficulty. In an extreme case, is there any harm in having a comparatively easy method of reference, not to troublesome negotiations, nor to the Imperial Parliament, but to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -

It might be impossible to dispose of the matter excepting in that particular way.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Yes.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Take a case of dispute regarding a boundary.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Yes, the cases might be infinite. Take a question of disputed territory, for instance. What could be more proper than that Victoria, if she became reasonable for once, should say—"Look here, we know we promised to do it; we know we have broken our promises; we acknowledge our transgressions, and will refer the matter at once to the Federal Parliament"? Who would blame her? Certainly not South Australia. Even in connexion with the question of rivers some point might arise that might concern two or three colonies, and that could not concern all the colonies. That, again, might be a proper matter for reference, but it could not be a common matter of legislation in respect of every state. I will now take the points Mr. Deakin makes. He doubts whether this power of legislation will carry with it a power of raising the necessary money to give effect to the legislation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The states themselves will determine that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Yes, the honorable member has given the answer.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Read it with sub-section (3).
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I do not think that sub-section affects the matter in the slightest degree.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Sub-section (3) refers to the raising of money for the purposes of the Commonwealth itself.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Yes, and it can, in my opinion, have no relation to this question. When a matter is referred the Parliament of the Commonwealth will have unlimited powers of legislation.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
To the extent of the reference.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Exactly; but the parliament will be entitled to make a law about it which will be as good as any other law. The only thing is that it will be limited in its area of application. Within the limits of the reference, it could deal with finances or any other question. I can see no difficulty at all in carrying out the sub-section in that respect, and I do not think that it wants any addition. We have practically to consider this from the point of view of a question of policy. Is it worth while to leave to the states a power of referring disputed questions that may concern one or more, but may not concern all? What possible difficulty can there be? It may be said that this should be left to the people, but the Parliament can decide. This Bill, before it can go home and can assume the form of an Imperial statute, will have to be submitted to a referendum of the people of each colony. It is only after that has been done that it can be made an Imperial statute, and why should we not give this power of reference to the states if it is a power that would work well? For my own part, I do not think the sub-section requires even verbal amendment. It will work quite well as it is so far as machinery is concerned. In regard to the principle, I think it is a very advisable power to confer, and I hope the sub-section will be agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
My honorable friend (Sir John Downer) has put in better language than I could have employed many of the views I was going to present to the Convention. The object of the sub-section I take to be this. The foregoing sub-sections deal with matters upon which authority is to be given to the Federal Parliament to legislate with regard to all the colonies. They are admittedly matters of common concern. Then it was thought that there might be other matters that might turn out to be matters of common concern, but that are not yet regarded as such or have not yet arisen in any way. In the course of the existence of the Commonwealth questions may arise that we do not foresee, and without any amendment of the Constitution the states may if they choose refer them to the federal power. Or it may be that any two states, unable each of them separately to legislate beyond their own boundaries, may ask that this power to legislate may be given to them without the necessity to go to the federal authority. It is perfectly plain that two separate states, even if they legislate in exactly the same terms, cannot carry the effect of their laws beyond their own boundaries. There may be a difficulty, political or otherwise, as to leaving it in the power of any one state to refer to the Federal Parliament matters of purely local concern. If there be any objection on that ground, I suggest that it can be got rid of by saying that this power shall be limited to matters which may be referred by two or more states to the Federal Parliament. That, I think, would obviate any of the difficulties which Mr. Symon has foreshadowed, and would carry out what we really want. No state, so far as I can imagine, requires to refer to the Federal Parliament the passing of any law that is to affect itself alone. But if it agrees with another state that some law; not to be of universal application throughout the Commonwealth, but to affect it and that other state alone, should be passed, power should be given in some such clause as this to ask the Federal Parliament to enact that what both states desire shall be of common application to them.

Mr. SYMON. -

Could you put that in sub-section (36)?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not wish to anticipate what I have to say upon sub-section (36). I think that that sub-section requires amendment, and that it is too large for more reasons than one. But in my opinion the object of sub-section (35) would be better obtained by striking out the power of one state to refer its own purely local concerns to the Legislature of the Federation, and by limiting this power to cases where two or more states desire to be bound by the federal authority.

Mr. BARTON. -

Does the honorable and learned member say that sub-section (36) is too large? I would like to mention that we left out some restricting words because we thought that the provision was restricted by the whole scope of the clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Well, I do not wish to confuse the two sub-sections. I think that Mr. Symon's objections will be met if we use the words matters referred to the Commonwealth by the Parliaments of any two or more states." A state Parliament may say-"We will not deal with this matter; we will refer it to the Federal Parliament." Some honorable members may think that a shirking of responsibility. I do not attach any weight to that contention, but I do not think anything is substantially gained by keeping in the provision.

Mr. BARTON. -

If a state Parliament wants to shirk its responsibility it can fall back upon the referendum.

Mr. ISAACS. -

With regard to the other point that a state may repeal a law, I do not agree with that argument. If a state refers a matter to the Federal Parliament, after the Federal Parliament has exercised its power to deal with that matter the state ceases to be able to interfere in regard to it. Moreover, when the Commonwealth has passed a law at the request of any Parliament or Parliaments, and the Parliament of a third state adopts it, it adopts a Commonwealth law, and it requires the consent of the Commonwealth to get rid of that law. In my opinion, there is no power of repeal with the states, and I feel no doubt that I have read among the decisions of the United States, one which is to the effect, although I cannot just now lay my hands upon it, that when a state has, with the consent of Congress, made certain enactments the power of Congress is required to repeal those enactments.

Mr. REID. -

Otherwise the provision would be perfectly idle. A state would refer a matter to the Commonwealth, and, not being pleased with the precise manner in which that matter was dealt with, it would immediately repeal the law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; the state might just as well pass the law for itself.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

A law once passed under this provision becomes a federal law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, and nothing less than the federal authority can get rid of it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

With regard to the particular sub-section which we have now in hand, I have not been brought to see that any dangerous power is given in it, or that there is any reason for an alteration. Let us take first the suggestion of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin). The Federal Parliament can only deal with such matters as a state or states refer to it. A state may refer to the Federal Legislature a certain subject without referring, or expressly excepting from the reference, any financial dealing with that subject. In such a case the Commonwealth could only legislate upon the subject so far as its financial aspects were not concerned. If the whole subject were referred, not excepting finance, the Commonwealth could legislate to the whole extent of the reference. I think that the words used in the sub-section are ample for either case. The difference with regard to sub-section(3) is this: It is plain that that sub-section refers only to the raising of money by any mode of taxation for general Commonwealth purposes. Like all the rest of these sub-sections, with the exception of one or two which contains special provisions, it concerns matters relating to the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth," and the word "Commonwealth" means prima facie the whole Commonwealth. In this sub-section, however, there are special words which prevent the law applying to the whole Commonwealth, and these are the words quoted by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin):

But so that the law shall extend only to the state or states by whose Parliament or Parliaments the matter was referred, and to such other states as may afterwards adopt the law.

It seems to me that if there is any raising of money intended by the states to be delegated to the Commonwealth-and they can only delegate their legislative authority to a certain extent, provided for by the Constitution-that will be expressed in the reference, or it can be excluded from any reference. In the one case or the other the Commonwealth can only proceed as far as the extent of the reference. Then there was the objection of the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick), that this provision affords an easy method of amending the state Constitution without the use of the referendum. But at the present time the state Constitutions do not provide for the use of the referendum. The government of the states is by a majority of the representatives of the people, and it must be constitutionally assumed that when a majority of the two Houses of Parliament make a law the people speak through that law. If the people choose to speak through a law made in this way, there is no evasion of responsibility when an appeal was made to a superior authority for the settlement of a difficulty incapable of settlement by the relations of two bodies at issue. This is not a restriction but an enlargement of the legislative powers of the states, which I think is in the spirit of democracy, and one that we should grant.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia).

I want to ask the leader of the Convention a question, his answer to which will influence my vote on the subject before us. The sub-section upon which we are dealing and the following sub-section are the only ones which provide for an extension of the powers of the Commonwealth. I have been looking up the clauses in Chapter VIII., and I do not see that under them any extension of the powers of the Commonwealth can be dealt with. I want to know whether I am right in supposing that under these clauses no extension of the powers or scope of the Commonwealth would be possible, because I think that under that chapter, if any alteration of the Constitution of the Commonwealth is desired, the states, to obtain it, must first have a law passed by the Commonwealth Parliament? Now, suppose it is proposed to enlarge the power of the Commonwealth, by placing under its control the administration of Crown lands. First of all, the Federal Parliament would have to pass a law upon this subject, and that law might be held to be ultra vires. There would be no power to submit anything to the electors without Parliament first of all passing a Bill, which, however, would be from the outset outside its power. I should like to know from the leader of the Convention whether my view of this matter is correct?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

What I understand my honorable friend (Mr. Holder) to ask is this: Suppose it were desired that extra-legislative power than now exists should be granted to the Commonwealth-as, for instance, to take under its control questions relating to Crown lands, and so on—whether an alteration in the Constitution in that direction would be ultra vires? Now, the Bill provides, in Chapter VIII., that the provisions of the Constitution shall not be altered except in the following manner;" which, to my mind, means that if the processes specified are adopted the provisions can be altered in any way. I take the provision to mean that authority is given to the Commonwealth under the processes here specified to alter this Constitution in any manner, so far as it deals with the affairs of Federated Australia, and not with affairs outside the dominion of Australia. Consequently, if it were proposed to add a legislative power of the kind suggested by Mr. Holder, I take it that as Chapter VIII. provides first for the passage of the proposed law by an absolute majority, and then for a referendum, the law would have no effect unless the majorities of the several states agreed to it. So that not only the Commonwealth but the states would have to agree to the passage of the law. Then any objection to that law becoming a new part of the Constitution of the Commonwealth would vanish; because, I think, so much authority is conceded by Chapter VIII.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I think that the difficulty is that Chapter VIII. does not give power for an amendment of the Constitution, except by implication, but simply opposes limitations in the mode of the exercise of the power of amendment. I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that we might add a clause permitting the alteration of this Constitution, subject to the provisions of Chapter VIII. That would include amongst the powers of the Parliament a power which is very necessary, and which it is no doubt intended to give by the Bill, but which is not at present provided for as clearly as might be.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

In connexion with the point raised by Dr. Quick that this provision might lead to an amendment of the Constitution otherwise than under clause 121, I would like to suggest that the reference would be as to a specific point. It might be to settle a particular matter of legislation, but not a general power. But we are still in this dilemma: That the state might, by referring the matter to the state Parliament, deprive itself of the right of repeal, and thus take away the general power of legislation from the state Parliament. As I understand, a state Parliament cannot at present abrogate its own powers. It might pass a particular Act or it might repeal an Act, but here the Parliament of the state is giving away some power without the consent of the people of the state. We are giving power to the state Parliament to give away their sovereign powers without the consent of their people.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

To commit political suicide.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is really what it amounts to. It certainly requires serious consideration.

The subsection was agreed to.

Sub-section (36)-

The exercise within the Commonwealth, at the request or with the concurrence of the Parliaments of all the states concerned, of any legislative powers which can at the establishment of this Constitution be exercised only by the Parliament of the United Kingdom or by the Federal Council of Australasia.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales.) -

I might mention as to this sub-section that there is a difference between its language and the language of the corresponding sub-section in the Bill of 1891. The difference is this:-In the Bill of 1891, after the words "legislative powers" there came the words with respect to the affairs of the territory of the Commonwealth, or any part of it." It was considered unnecessary to retain those words, because the whole scope of the legislative authority is that the legislation should be for the peace and good government of the Commonwealth itself. Inasmuch as the Commonwealth cannot make any laws except for the peace, order, or good government of the Commonwealth itself, we thought that it could not make laws except with respect to the affairs of the territory of the Commonwealth or any part of it.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Will this give power to legislate with reference to a part only?

Mr. BARTON. -
Only to the extent of the reference made. It must be a matter referred with the consent of the Parliament, so that it would only apply to the extent of the reference made.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I must say that I am not very clear about this sub-section, which has puzzled me very much. In the first place, the words exercise within the Commonwealth" of certain legislative powers are puzzling. All our legislative powers are to be exercised, within the Commonwealth, and I do not know what the words mean in this particular instance as distinct from any other legislative power. The effect of the whole matter may extend beyond, but the exercise of the power is to be within the Commonwealth, and it is to be exercised at the request or with the concurrence of the Parliaments of the states concerned. Then the sub-section uses the words any legislative powers which can at the establishment of this Constitution be exercised only by the Parliament of the United Kingdom or by the Federal council of Australasia." Those last words will have to come out. Part of this Act will come into operation as soon as it is passed.

Mr. BARTON. -
The covering clauses.

Mr. ISAACS. -
And they repeal the Federal Council Act. So that there will be no powers remaining in that Act at the time of the establishment of the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -
This sub-section giving an increased authority imports authority over the Federal Council of Australasia.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No, it is done at the establishment of this Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -
I quite see that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If you keep these words in the final words will have no effect.

Mr. BARTON. -
These words at the establishment of the Constitution" might be altered.
Mr. ISAACS. -

One is inconsistent with the other, but I am looking at this also. I should like to get as much power as possible in this Bill. At the same time, I should not like to send it home saying that something should be altered which the Imperial Parliament will be disinclined to do seeing that the universal assent of the colonies has been obtained. Is the Imperial Parliament likely to assent to this— that the Federal Parliament may exercise, at the request of any state, any of the powers which the Imperial Legislature may exercise? That is to say, it might exercise powers which might be in conflict with treaties, Imperial legislation, and so on, or, at all events, with the principles of Imperial legislation. The clause is very wide, and wants some modification.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It would be a Bill liable to reservation under the usual circumstances.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It might or might not be; that would depend on circumstances. The power of reservation is in the hands of the Governor-General. I have not the slightest objection to see the largest powers given to the Federal Parliament; but, independent of verbal criticism, it is rather a long way to go to ask the Imperial Legislature, so to speak, to place all its powers in the hands of the Federal Legislature. It will be remembered that Lord Carnarvon was very anxious in the case of the Canadian Federation Bill that no alteration should be made.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I will undertake that the matters to which my honorable and learned friend has referred shall receive consideration when the drafting stage is reached. I dare say we shall have a short adjournment for drafting amendments, many of which are in order already. I can see the force of what the honorable member has pointed out, that we have amended in the Bill the covering clauses providing that it is the Constitution, and not the whole Act, which is delayed in its operation until the date fixed by the Queen's proclamation, and that the covering clauses have effect from the date of the Royal assent, which will probably be some months before the proclamation takes effect. In that case the words as to the Federal Council would become inoperative, as referring to the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth. It might be necessary, therefore, to put other words in this clause to meet that objection. In putting other words in the Bill it might be necessary to put in the words Federal Council," as they may give an extension of powers which would be desirable; that is, an extension of power at any rate equal in its elements to that which the Federal Council possesses. The same attention will be given to the other points indicated.
The sub-section was agreed to.

Sub-section (37)-

Any matters necessary for, or incidental to, the carrying into execution of the foregoing powers or of any other powers vested by this Constitution in the Parliament or the Executive Government of the Commonwealth or in any department or officer thereof.

The CHAIRM. - In this sub-section the House of Assembly of Tasmania have suggested an amendment to leave out this sub-section, and insert a new one. The Drafting Committee in Sydney passed a number of verbal amendments, which should first come under consideration.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The verbal amendments were made by the Drafting Committee, as shown by the Bill before honorable members. In order to put the sub-section as amended by the Drafting Committee before honorable members, I intend to omit the whole of the subsection now before the committee, and propose the substitution of the sub-section as amended by the Drafting Committee.

As this deals with matters necessary and incidental to other powers, it is obviously desirable to make the clause as wide as possible, so that there may be no power of legislation which the Commonwealth possesses in which it will not have full scope, that is to say, all the necessary and incidental powers for making that legislation effective. These amendments by the Drafting Committee were made in a part of the Bill which we had not reached at the meeting in Sydney, and they still require, the assent of this committee. This alteration was practically unauthorized; but, as it was plainly verbal and for the extension of the clause, we thought we were justified in making the suggestion at that stage. Now it becomes necessary, under the Chairman's ruling, which, I think, is perfectly clear, to make these amendments formally. I beg to move that sub-section (37) be omitted, with a view of substituting the following:-

Any matters necessary for, or incidental to, the carrying into execution of any powers vested by this Constitution in the Parliament, or in either House thereof, or in the Government of the Commonwealth, or in the Federal Judicature, or in any department or officer of the Commonwealth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move that the further consideration of clause 52 be postponed until after the consideration of clause 69. I may mention that certain members are obliged to return home, and that they will be back again on Monday. They are deeply interested in this question of rivers. Among them
I might mention the honorable member (Mr. Lyne) and the honorable member (Mr. Gordon). It is questionable whether we should not postpone this clause so that it will not be decided to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We can postpone it again if we come to it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I quite agree with what the honorable member has suggested. For that and other reasons it would be wise to allow the matter to remain in abeyance.

The motion for the postponement of clause 52 was agreed to.

Clause 53. The Parliament shall, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, have exclusive powers to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Commonwealth with respect to the following matters:-

1. The affairs of the people of any race with respect to whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws not applicable to the general community; but so that this power shall not extend to authorize legislation with respect to the affairs of the aboriginal native race in any state.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I am not sure that I properly grasp the meaning of the sub-section. I understand that there is to be some amendment made in the sub-section.

Mr. BARTON. -

We are going to suggest that it should read as follows:-

the people of any race for whom it is deemed necessary to make any laws not applicable to the general community; but so that this power shall not extend to authorize legislation with respect to the affairs of the aboriginal race in any state.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My observations were extended much further than that. The term general community" I understand to mean the general community of the whole Commonwealth. If it means the general community of the whole Commonwealth, I do not see the meaning of saying that the Parliament of the Commonwealth shall have the exclusive authority to do that, because any single state would have the right to do it under any circumstances. If it means less than that-if it means the general community of a state-I do not see why it should not be left to the state. We should be placed in a very awkward position indeed if any particular state is forbidden to pass any distinctive legislation in certain well-known instances. For instance, if Victoria should choose to enact that Afghans shall only get hawkers' licences under certain conditions which are not applicable to Europeans she may be debarred by this sub-section from doing so. I do not know how it will affect our factory law in regard to the Chinese which does not operate beyond the confines of Victoria at all.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Why single out the Afghans?

Mr. ISAACS. -
If any other race possess the same characteristic as the Afghans I will put them in the same class. At all events, the expression general community" means the whole community of the Commonwealth. I do not think that this has any application. If it is to have any application at all, it seems to me to be intended to debar the state from passing legislation-necessary legislation, but purely confined to that state. I do not think that that sub-section ought to be there at all if that is the meaning of it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I think the original intention of this sub-section was to deal with the affairs of such persons of other races-what are generally called inferior races, though I do not know with how much warrant sometimes-who may be in the Commonwealth at the time it is brought into existence, or who may under the laws of the Commonwealth regulating aliens come into it. We have made the dealing with aliens, which includes a certain degree of coloured immigration, a power of the Commonwealth, and we have made the dealing with immigration a power of the Commonwealth, so that all those of the races who come into the community after the establishment of the Commonwealth will not only enter subject to laws made in respect to their immigration, but will remain subject to any laws which the Commonwealth may specially devise for them. There is no reason why the Commonwealth should not have power to devise such laws.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
An exclusive power?

Mr. BARTON. -
It ought to have an exclusive power to devise such laws.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
If it does not exercise it can the state exercise it?

Mr. BARTON. -
Once the Commonwealth legislates with reference to the question of aliens and immigration, its legislation displaces the state law.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Suppose it does not legislate?

Mr. BARTON. -
You may suppose that it will not legislate, but I think we will have to assume that it will.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The difficulty is that there will be an interval before it does.

Mr. BARTON. -
At any rate, we must assume that these powers will be exercised. If we are going to assume that they are not going to be exercised, we had better not put them in the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Why make this exclusive?

Mr. BARTON. -
I was going to explain when I was interrupted that the moment the Commonwealth legislates on this subject the power will become exclusive. Of course it is contended, and there is a great deal of force in the contention, that there is a doubt about the expression used, which comes from the Bill of 1891-"Special laws not applicable to the general community," and there is, I should imagine, considerable difficulty in coming at a right form of expression in that regard. What is intended is-and I think what was clearly intended by the Convention of 1891 was-that immediately the Commonwealth came into force there should be a law, if the Commonwealth deemed fit, passed for the regulation of the affairs of people of such races. Of course, as my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) suggests, the expression general community" may raise a doubt. It may be that the words should be not applicable to the state in which they are," but whether that be so or not, as to the question of the exclusive nature of the power, I entertain a strong opinion that the moment the Commonwealth obtains any legislative power at all it should have the power to regulate the affairs of the people of coloured or inferior races who are in the Commonwealth. Some persons may say that it will provoke difficulties with the states. I do not think that it will. I think that the states will be prepared to see the general importance of legislation on this subject, and legislation passed with a knowledge of what may in some cases be almost the international relations which will exist in reference to these people. I take it that the proper authority for that purpose is the Commonwealth; and whatever we may say in reference to the advisability of a mere expression here, as to which care will of course be taken-theme matters; are being carefully gone through now-the policy of the sub-section, which is that the law shall be exclusive, ought to commend itself to the members of the Convention.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
While I agree with the views expressed by the leader of the Convention with regard to the purport of this clause, and as to its necessity, it does not appear to me to be properly drawn in order to meet the purpose of the draftsman, and I would suggest that all the words after the word whom," in the first line, be left out, with the view to insert the following words:-

laws have been passed by the Commonwealth in respect of their immigration into, or emigration from, any part of the Commonwealth.

If the sub-section is so altered it will give the Commonwealth exclusive jurisdiction over the affairs of the people of any race with respect to whom laws of the Commonwealth are in force in respect of their immigration into, or emigration from, any part of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I take it that that is merely striking out the exclusive power.

Mr. WISE. -
I have not made myself clear.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It leaves the domestic control to the states.

Mr. WISE. -
It leaves the domestic control to the states. The object of the clause is a proper and, indeed, a necessary one. If the Bill takes the power to regulate the entering of a foreign race into any part of the Commonwealth, then the race, the moment it enters into the Commonwealth, must be under the protection, of the Commonwealth, and it is impossible that there should be any conflicting jurisdiction between the Commonwealth and the state.

Mr. BARTON. -
The Commonwealth will have the control of external arrangements.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If the Commonwealth does not pass a law, you admit the right of a state to deal with the subject.

Mr. WISE. -
Undoubtedly.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But if the Commonwealth does pass a law, that law is paramount.

Mr. WISE. -
It is paramount.

Mr. ISAACS. -
What is the necessity for this sub-section then?

Mr. WISE. -
I will answer that question in a moment. Until the Commonwealth passes a law relating to immigration the state has exclusive jurisdiction over that subject, and as long as the state jurisdiction can be exercised the state alone should be able to control the rights of the aliens in respect to whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws not applicable to the general community.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That would not do, because we have already passed a provision which gives paramount power to the Federal Parliament.

Mr. WISE. -

That is what I am pointing out, but until that power is exercised by the Federal Parliament jurisdiction remains with the state. The object of my amendment is to provide that the moment that power is exercised the regulation of the rights of the aliens in question shall be transferred from the state to the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would not that be so without any further provision?

Mr. WISE. -

I do not think it would.

Mr. BARTON. -

Many of the persons in question are not aliens, but come in under the immigration power only.

Mr. WISE. -

We hope to see the Commonwealth embrace the whole continent, and it might be found desirable to establish practically a colony in which black labour might be employed.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is no sub-section dealing with aliens except the one dealing with the naturalization of aliens.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The sub-section is naturalization and aliens."

Mr. WISE. -

If it was found desirable to establish practically a colony in which black labour might be employed, the Commonwealth would, and ought to, have the exclusive power of providing for the passage of those alien labourers from that colony into the southern parts of the Commonwealth if they were allowed, for temporary purposes, to remove from the northern to the southern colonies, and they should be absolutely under the protection of the powers of the Commonwealth. But until the Commonwealth has passed a law dealing with the emigration of alien labour from one colony to another, it is only right that the state should retain the power it now possesses in regard to aliens.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Is passing from one colony into another immigration within the meaning of this Act?
Mr. WISE. -
    I think so. Under the terms of my amendment it certainly is.
Mr. ISAACS. -
    Your amendment would not touch the class who are not aliens.
Mr. WISE. -
    Yes, it would, because the Commonwealth would have no power to pass any law relating to the immigration of any section of the community unless they were aliens. The Commonwealth Parliament is to have no power to deal with the movement of population except paupers, lunatics, and aliens, and under section 52 it is to exercise full powers with regard to any or all of those three classes. All that is designed by my amendment-and it appears to me that some such power is necessary-is that if the Commonwealth Parliament undertakes to deal with the movement of population in regard to one or more of those three classes-paupers, aliens, and lunatics-the persons whose movements are fettered by the Federal Parliament shall have the right to look to the Federal Parliament for protection, and for the full security that the Federal Parliament can give.
The words of the clause are vague, and not very easily construed. Of course, if the leader of the Convention prefers it, I will postpone the formal submission of my amendment so as to give further time for the consideration of the matter.
Mr. BARTON. -
    We had better leave it over for consideration.
Mr. WISE. -
    Then I will merely give it as a suggested amendment for consideration rather than formally propose it now.
Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
    The difficulty is to determine why this particular sub-section should find its way into this clause instead of forming a sub-section of the previous clause 52.
Mr. BARTON. -
    Because the powers in clause 52 are all concurrent powers, and these are all exclusive powers.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
    I understood that was the difference, and a glance at the following two sub-sections of clause 53 shows that they are matters upon which the Federal Parliament will have sole authority, and upon which, naturally enough, the local Parliaments never could have, or expect to have, any authority. But, although this provision is linked with them and placed in the exclusive clause, it deals with questions which are being dealt with, which have been dealt with, and which probably in the future will be dealt with by the several states.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

And in which aspects they can only be dealt with by the several states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

If so, this sub-section has found its way into the wrong clause, and should be included in clause 52 rather than in clause 53. We have Acts in some of the colonies relating to the Chinese; in other colonies there are, or may be, Acts relating to Afghans. In the northern colonies there are statutes relating to kanakas. All this legislation is in existence at present, and the leader of the Convention admits that, until the passing of an Act by the Federal Parliament dealing with these people, the several Acts of the several Legislatures relating to these several peoples would remain in force.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

So they would if this sub-section is passed.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

If so, this provision is not exclusive in the strict sense of the term.

Mr. WISE. -

I doubt if they would remain in force.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

But they are preserved.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

There is the first issue. That is the first point we have to determine. Clearly, it would be most unwise and unwarrantable to propose that, on the establishment of a Commonwealth, all laws relating to aliens should be repealed, because there would be a certain interregnum when there might be a condition of relative lawlessness.

Mr. WISE. -

The amendment I propose will get over that difficulty, because it does not give the Commonwealth power until it passes a law in respect of the immigration of aliens into, or their emigration from, any part of the Commonwealth.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I am not certain that, while the honorable member's amendment will relieve us from one difficulty, it will not plunge us into another, by depriving the states of all future power of dealing with alien races. What more power do we desire for the Federation in regard to these special races than would be conveyed to the Commonwealth by the inclusion of this subsection in clause 52? What power is it that we desire to give to the Commonwealth in this matter which would not be given if there were a properly expressed sub-section introduced into clause 52, enabling the Commonwealth to legislate in regard to these matters, and casting the duty of legislating in respect of them on the Commonwealth; but until the Commonwealth passes such legislation, leaving the existing legislation of the colonies in full force and effect, and, still leaving to the colonies power to pass special legislation on the subject, in so far as it did not conflict with the federal legislation? I think it is highly desirable that such provision should be made. I am not satisfied that the state of opinion in these colonies is at that even level which would enable us at once to pass an Act, complete in every particular, and applying to the whole group. It might conflict with what was absolutely vital, for example, to Queensland, and we all hope that Queensland will eventually become a part of the Federation.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Section 100 preserves the existing legislation.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes; and section 101 provides that when a law of a state is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth, the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid. But that only brings me back to my first difficulty. Why is this sub-section included in clause 53, instead of in clause 52, and what is the effect of that arrangement? The other matters under clause 53 are clearly matters on which the Federal Parliament alone can legislate-matters on which the state Parliament could never pass legislation. This sub-section, on the contrary, relates to an issue already dealt with by the several states, and that will continue to be dealt with by them unless the absolute prohibition of this Act is imposed. If it is imposed it will be a very serious matter indeed in Queensland, Victoria, and, I think also, in New South Wales. The first question I have to put to the leader of the Convention, and upon the answer to it any further arguments I may have to address will depend, is what reason there is under these circumstances for including this in clause 53? Ought we not to transfer it again to clause 52? We desire to give to the Federal Parliament the amplest power to deal with any and all of these particular races; but there should still be reserved to the states, subject always to the supremacy of the Federation, a power to deal in any special manner with any of the people of such races who are now or may hereafter be within their limits. I take it the amendment proposed by Mr. Wise would absolutely prohibit that.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
If this is left as an exclusive power the laws of the states will nevertheless remain in force under clause 100.

Mr. TRENWITH. - Would the states still proceed to make laws?

Mr. BARTON. - Not after this power of legislation comes into force. Their existing laws will, however, remain. If this is exclusive they can make no new laws, but the necessity of making these new laws will be all the more forced on the Commonwealth. The amendment proposed by Mr. Wise is one that might possibly be considered desirable if this were to be converted into really a power that was not exclusive. At any rate, it might have the effect of rendering that power exclusive after legislation with regard to aliens and immigration had been adopted. I am not quite sure at present whether it would be advisable to adopt the amendment. I agree with what has been said already. My impression is stronger than ever it was before that this sub-section is one that needs amendment, but I would like to say again that it is desirable that the moment the Constitution comes into force the policy of this sub-section should prevail, which is that the Commonwealth should have exclusive legislative powers with reference to the affairs of such people as the sub-section is intended to cover. That is demonstrated to me by the fact that the Commonwealth will have control of the external relations of the whole of the continent and of Tasmania. These external relations may be very pertinent to any legislation that will have to be adopted, so that you may have the complication, if you do not insert a provision of this kind, of having the states continuing to legislate in respect to a matter in which they have no responsibility, while the external relations, the explanation of all these matters, and the responsibility for them to the Imperial Government, will rest with the Commonwealth. That would be an undesirable condition of things. There are other reasons which could be put very strongly if it were necessary to speak at length, and which would show that the Commonwealth should have this exclusive power. Questions which relate to the whole body of the people, to the purity of race, to the preservation of the racial character of the white population, are Commonwealth questions, and should be so exclusively. Of course it may be urged that it would be better for the Commonwealth to wait until it had exercised its legislative powers with regard to aliens and immigration. I venture to dissent from that view. I do not know why it is necessary for the Commonwealth to wait until it has legislated with regard to the introduction of aliens, or of coloured races not being aliens, before it deals with the affairs of those people of coloured race who are already settled in Australia. If that were so, we should for the time being be left without exclusive powers with regard to the large number of people of coloured race already in Australia. Now, the preservation of every inch of the shores of Australia from immigration of the kind indicated, except to a certain limited extent, is one of the most desirable powers to place in the Constitution. But the very reason which makes the preservation of the continent as a continent to the Federation as a whole Federation so necessary as one of the powers is a reason that applies with just as much force to the affairs of the people of such races who have already been admitted and are at present in the Commonwealth. If it is necessary to give the Federal Parliament power to make laws for their regulation, not applying to the rest of the people of the Commonwealth, it is necessary to give it at once upon the establishment of the Commonwealth. The best way to bring about legislation of that kind is to make the power exclusive. The Commonwealth will then be in this position: The laws which at present pertain

in the states with reference to these people will remain with nothing in them which is against the interests of the Commonwealth, unless the Commonwealth at once legislates. To make the power exclusive conduces at once to its speedy exercise by the Commonwealth. For every reason this provision should not be transferred to clause 52, but should be implanted in the Commonwealth as an instant, mild exclusive power.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

While, I quite agree with the, views of the leader of, the Convention as to this power so far as regards the immigration of coloured races and aliens, I cannot see the force of his argument with reference to the local management of these people. Aliens who have been admitted within our shores will more or less permanently settle in one state or the other, and they should, I think, be entirely under the Government of the state in which for the time being they reside. Mr. Deakin has hinted at some grave objections to giving the Federal Government an exclusive power over these people. The Attorney-General of Victoria has given one very striking example of the necessity of the Governments of the states having authority in this matter, and that is as regards, the licensing of Afghans as hawkers. It is the practice to issue to them a licence different from that which is given to other races. That might very well constitute a difficult question in the state of Victoria, whilst it might not be of the same importance in other states. In Tasmania it is quite possible that it may come to be a grave question whether the Hindostanese who are British subjects shall be allowed to continue the practice of hawking as they have been doing for some time past. That might develop into a very large question indeed in Tasmania, and it should be a matter for settlement by the state and not by the Federal Government.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I trust the leader of the Convention, will carefully reconsider his position, and the apparently strong views be holds with regard to persons of foreign race. I agree with Sir Edward Braddon, and other honorable members who have spoken, that when these people are once admitted to Australia their control and management should be strictly a local affair. It is not a matter with which the Federal Government should interfere. The Government of this and of other colonies should have full power to make such laws relating to health, to factories, and to the licensing of these persons as they may deem to be fair, just, and reasonable. The great difficulty I see with regard to this clause is in connexion with the making of the power exclusive. If we put this provision in clause 52, as soon as the Federal Parliament chose to exercise its power to legislate, the state laws now in existence would cease to exist.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Does the honorable member say that they would lapse?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, if they were inconsistent with the federal laws. We must all realize that the first and most important business with which the Federal Parliament will have to deal will be that connected with the Tariff and other financial matters. Can we assume that for some years at least the Federal Parliament will attempt to deal with the matter mentioned in the first paragraph of this clause? For probably three, four, or five years, we shall then be in this peculiar position: The Federal, Parliament alone will have the power to legislate upon these matters, The state Parliaments will have no power to legislate, because of the exclusive power of the Federal Parliament, and thus, although there may be an absolute necessity for legislation, none will be possible. Surely honorable members will not agree to a provision which makes such a position possible. If, however, we place this provision in clause 52, the Federal Parliament would have the most ample powers to deal with the matter to which it relates whenever it chose to exercise them; but, in the meantime, the right of the states to regulate these matters would be preserved to them. I do not desire to move any amendment for this purpose, but I trust that the leader of the Convention will carefully reconsider the matter, because I feel that if we pass the provision as it stands, we may hereafter do a great injustice to the several states.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I think it is generally admitted that there should be uniformity of law with regard to the races for whom it is necessary to make special laws. The basis of all these laws is that the particular people in question require to be dealt with specially in the general interests of the community, and if they require to be dealt with specially they should be dealt with under some uniform law. I think it will also be admitted that if they are to be dealt with by a uniform law the sooner that law is put into operation the better. Otherwise one state may deal with some particular class of aliens upon specially favorable terms, the effect of which would be that aliens from all parts of Australia would congregate in that state and make the difficulty of dealing with the whole question very much greater. I think that is admitted by Sir George Turner. It is admitted by him that there should be uniformity in these laws, but he says that if the Federal Parliament does not choose to legislate at once power ought to be given to the local Parliaments to deal with the question until the Federal Parliament chooses to legislate. I should like, however, to remind the honorable member of this fact: In the first place, where any local Parliament has made laws, those laws are continued by clause 100, and, as a matter of fact, most of the Parliaments have made laws in regard to these matters. The point at issue is: Is it desirable that the state should have power to go on making separate laws dealing with aliens until the Federal Parliament shall legislate?

Mr. ISAACS. - Why not?

Mr. OCONNOR. - If the Federal Parliament is endowed with this power absolutely, there is no doubt that pressure will be brought by all the states to cause that body to legislate upon this matter at once, and it will legislate upon it. But if the states have power to deal with these matters locally they may in many cases avail themselves of this power, and when the Federal Parliament comes to deal with the subject, and to apply an uniform law, it will be met by the vested interests which have been created by the laws of the states. I say that we should have as few difficulties of that kind as possible. Let us deal with these matters as they exist at the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth. Where laws exist at the time of the adoption of this Constitution they will be preserved; but do not let us give power to the states to make new laws which will create new difficulties and complications. That is my reason for differing from the view of Sir George Turner that this provision should be transferred from amongst the exclusive powers of the Federal Parliament to the powers conferred under clause 52. I should like to add a word in regard to the suggestion of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise). No matter what the necessity for uniformity in these laws may be, the honorable and learned member says that you must wait until some law has been made by the Commonwealth in regard to these particular races. But why should we wait? What possible connexion is there between the making of a law preventing aliens from entering the state and the making of a law to control their mode of living while in that state? I can see no necessary connexion between the two. It seems to me that it would be hampering the power of the Federal Parliament to make it a condition precedent to legislation with regard to aliens within the borders of the Commonwealth, that it should legislate with regard to outside matters. For instance, if you wish to deal with the question of legislation regarding Chinese or Japanese actually here, there would be very little difficulty, but if you wish to make a law dealing with their introduction into the state, you may be brought face to face with the obligations of treaties entered into by Great Britain and other difficulties of that kind which cannot be surmounted.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The same thing exists now.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That does not apply to dealings with races within your own territory. When other people come within your borders they must submit to your laws.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

These laws must relate to the time when they are within your territory, because the distinction is drawn between them and the general community.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, but I am dealing with the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise). He wishes to make it a condition precedent that what may be the very difficult step of passing a law making arrangements with the outside world should be taken before you deal with aliens within your own borders.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Everything the honorable member expresses a wish to do could be done quite as well if this provision formed part of clause 52.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I agree with the honorable and learned member, but I do not think that any opportunity should be given to the state to make laws dealing with these matters before the Legislature of the Commonwealth has dealt with them, for the reason that every law which is made dealing specially with a matter of this kind will create difficulties when a uniform law comes to be
Mr. DEAKIN. -
    The Federal Parliament can remove them.
Mr. OCONNOR. -
    But you are setting up obstacles to uniformity and creating vested interests, which are always difficult to deal with.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
    Unless this clause is carefully reconsidered, we shall have to vote against it.
Mr. OCONNOR. -
    I do not suppose the honorable member would suggest that the clause is unnecessary.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
    It is out of place.
Mr. OCONNOR. -
    The question is as to its position. The honorable member objects to its position.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
    Yes.
Mr. OCONNOR. -
    With regard to the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise), I think the general sense of the committee will be that it is a matter of substance with which possibly the committee will deal. With regard to the position of the sub-section, that is no doubt a matter of importance, but it need not necessarily be decided now.
Mr. ISAACS. -
    That question means whether it is to be exclusive or not.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
    If we allow the provision to stand where it is proposed to put it, it will be decisive.
Mr. OCONNOR. -
    Well, it appears to me in the right place.
Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
    I respectfully submit in connexion with this clause that the necessity for legislation in regard to aliens differs in the various colonies, and to give to the Federal Parliament exclusive powers to legislate would produce inconvenience. This is obviously so, for the reason that what is necessary in one state in connexion with the treatment of aliens may be altogether unnecessary and perhaps inconvenient in another state. Assuming that such contingencies may arise, any uniform legislation must work to the detriment of some state; whereas if, as suggested by Sir George Turner, it is made optional on the part of the Federal Parliament, wherever any great pressure arises, or a necessity for uniform legislation occurs, to legislate, then the Federal Parliament will undoubtedly take the question up and by its act achieve exclusive control in that connexion so far as it chooses to legislate. But even then it may leave to local autonomy to deal with the question in some connexion in a manner which may be necessitated by the different circumstances of different localities. Take the colony of Victoria. We have legislation in the form of a new Factories and Shops Act, which affects the Chinese in a manner such as no other colony has yet thought it necessary to affect them. It may happen that no other colony will think it necessary to legislate in that way. But there can be no reason why the legislation which is thought necessary by the Victorian people should not be permitted to continue in Victoria. I have given this illustration because it appears to me that the circumstances of different localities may involve different necessities in connexion with the treatment of aliens. It may be possible that in South Australia, or in New South Wales, or Tasmania, it may be necessary to take some action with reference to aliens that may be extremely beneficial to those colonies, and inconvenient or possibly irksome in Victoria. If the sub-section is, as suggested, taken from its present position and placed in clause 52, it will leave power for the states to legislate as they think proper until the Federal Parliament sees the necessity for bringing about some degree of uniformity. I would submit to honorable members that the whole of our work points to the necessity for giving nothing to the Federal Parliament to do that can be as well done in the interests of the states by the States themselves. What we are endeavouring to do is to constitute a new power which shall do some things which we cannot do as well as separate states. But we wish to avoid handing over to the new power anything that will take from us that sovereignty we now possess, unless it is absolutely necessary to do so. It does not seem to me to be necessary to make it imperative in the Constitution that the sovereignty of the states or their local autonomy in this connexion shall be removed. If the Federal Parliament does not wish to legislate on the subject the local Parliaments should have the power to legislate as their local requirements dictate.

Mr. DOBSON. -
They can do that now.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
They cannot do it if we carry this clause.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Yes they can.
Mr. TRENWITH. -

It seems to me that immediately the Constitution is adopted the local Parliaments can no longer carry any legislation into existence upon this subject—that they cannot perform one act of legislation after the Constitution is effected.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Read clause 100. They can go on altering or repealing, if they like.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It seems to me that if you use in this Constitution the term exclusive power that means that you exclude all others, and once that power is created there is no other power to legislate. I confess that in a Convention such as this, where we have so many and such able lawyers, I speak with great diffidence upon such a subject.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Clause 100 would not permit new legislation on the subject.

Mr. DOBSON. -

It could be altered to permit that to be done.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I think we should remove this clause, and then we should not require to alter clause 100. Give exclusive power where it is essential in respect to such matters as may be deemed to be necessary to be dealt with by the central authority. That seems to me to be extremely necessary. This is an extremely perplexing question, and one which has given perhaps as much trouble as any other question to the various states.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It should be an Australian question, should it not?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

For some purposes.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

For all purposes.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

And whenever the Federal Parliament thinks that it should be an Australian question, the Federal Parliament can, if this sub-section is, as suggested, made part of clause 52, make it an Australian question. But if the Federal Parliament does not see any reason for Australian action that is no reason for depriving the states of autonomy. Therefore, I hope that we shall not take away from the states the power of legislating if we can help it. I can conceive some conditions which may arise in a state where some aliens became extremely objectionable, but in another state they might be considered desirable citizens. It would be a mistake to give to the Federal Parliament exclusive power to deal with such conditions, when, in dealing with them uniformly, it might embarrass one country whilst giving satisfaction to another. Of course, the danger pointed out by Mr. O'Connor is, I see, patent. That is, a state might impose such conditions with regard to aliens as might cause the interests of other states to suffer in that respect. Whenever such conditions arise, if this clause were placed among the sub-sections of clause 52, it would give the Federal Parliament power to say to that state—"You must not continue to act in that way to the prejudice of the Commonwealth. In order to restrain your doing, we shall pass a federal law dealing with that aspect of the alien question."

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Supposing one local Parliament makes laws of so severe a character as to drive all the aliens into other states.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

That might cause a remonstrance to be made from the whole nation to the federal authorities.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Suppose that is the case, and that this clause is included in clause 52, the Federal Parliament will have all the powers which it is proposed to give it here, except that it will have to act after instead of before. That is all the difference. Whenever a necessity arises on behalf of the interests of the Commonwealth to deal with the question of aliens by one authority, the Federal Parliament can deal with it, and at once. I object to taking away powers from the states now that may or may not be exercised by the Federal Parliament. I feel that this question of the treatment of aliens will be more difficult in the future than in the past. We have an indication of that from what was said by the right honorable member (Sir Edward Braddon) as to the difficulty in Tasmania in dealing satisfactorily with British subjects coming from Hindostan. He says that is a difficulty there, and that it will have to be met by special legislation. That has happened in the past. Other colonies have seen the necessity for special legislation, and it might as easily have happened that in some other colonies, on account of evils arising therefrom the influx of this alien population, they had instituted special legislation. Tasmania might not pass such legislation, because within its borders the evil had not previously arisen. The aliens legislated against might pass into Tasmania; then the Federal Parliament, having the power, would prevent the state which was being embarrassed by the influx of a number of these aliens from taking action on its own account so as to prevent the inflow of the aliens.
An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Cannot you give us credit for more intelligence, so that if we saw an evil existing in me part of Australia we would recognise it?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

My experience has shown in this Convention that the intelligence which honorable members possess is very much circumscribed, and their mental horizon reaches their own border, but goes with great difficulty beyond it. We have seen that in the discussion we have had lately. We have had it in other discussions, and dealing with difficulties which we have not yet been able to solve. I do not see that there is any great reflection cast upon honorable members by making those remarks. It is very difficult for people to see from a distance the evils that other people are suffering. It is only another illustration of the old adage that no person can tell where the shoe pinches except the man who wears it. We are as a rule very indifferent about the pinching when we do not wear the shoe ourselves.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Why not take the broad view of the question?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I am trying to take the broadest possible view of it. When local difficulties arise the Federal Parliament may not deal with them. If we carry this clause, and if the Federal Parliament does not deal with those difficulties, the local Parliament will not be able to deal with them; and there certainly should be power given to the local Parliament to deal with such difficulties. There should be power given to the local Parliaments to deal with questions which are of no special concern to the Federal Parliament. I earnestly hope that this clause, instead of being where it is, will be transferred as suggested by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), and others. We do not object to the Federal Parliament having this power when the necessity arises and when they choose to act. That is executive power to deal with a special phase of the question; but to refuse to give any power to the states in this matter, no matter how great the pressure may be on them or on any one state, will be extremely unwise, and it will be doing something which will materially prejudice the passage of this Commonwealth Bill in the respective states. There is a very strong feeling in the colonies upon this point. Some of them would very reluctantly give up their power to deal locally with the question of aliens. I dare say they would give up the power readily if there were any assurance that certainly and quickly the Federal Parliament would deal with it. But it is obvious, from the nature of the task which will be before the Federal Parliament, that it will be some very considerable time before it can deal with this question. For instance, the Federal Parliament will have to deal one way or the other with the Tariff question-with the question of free-trade and protection; we know that that will take a great deal of time. Then there are the questions of finance, quarantine, ocean lights, and a number of other things, each of them very difficult to settle, and on which there are great differences of opinion, and, consequently, it will take a long time to settle them.

Mr. BARTON. -

The only way to make the Federal Parliament deal quickly with this subject is to give them the exclusive power of dealing with it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

There are so many other important questions which the Federal Parliament will have to deal with.

Mr. BARTON. -

There are few questions of more importance than this.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I agree with the honorable member as to the importance of the question, and I would not have taken up so much time in dealing with it if it were not so. It will be extremely important to the Commonwealth, and to the states, and possibly it will be important in one aspect to one state, and in another aspect to another state. Uniform legislation, if it is made imperative, may possibly cause inconvenience to various portions of the Commonwealth. I recognise that in admitting aliens to the colony there ought to be uniformity, but in the treatment of aliens when they are in by the Commonwealth it might easily happen that the best interests of the Commonwealth might be served by permitting aliens to be dealt with in one way in one part of the country, and in another way in a different part.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

When I suggested the amendment which is now under discussion, I had no conception that there would be any difference of opinion as to the policy of the clause, and the amendment, which is purely verbal. It now, however, appears that the policy of the clause is strenuously attacked. I have listened to the observations on the other side with feelings of amazement. I have either utterly misapprehended the speech of the leader of the Convention, or I cannot apprehend the attitude taken up by the delegates from a was a desire to give a larger power to the Federal Government of dealing with the immigration and emigration of races whose presence we might for one reason or another think undesirable—a larger power than can be now exercised by any single state. If my ears did not deceive me, I heard the Right Hon. Sir George Turner say they did not wish to give executive power to the Federal Parliament to deal with this question.

[P.239] starts here

Mr. ISAACS. -

Exclusive power.

Mr. WISE. -

Of what use is it to confer a power on the one hand on the Federal Parliament, and then to leave it in the power of local communities to establish little plague spots in corners of this continent which will defeat all the objects of federal legislation?

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is not the question at all.

Mr. WISE. -

The difficulty we have to meet in New South Wales is in connexion with a colony which has not the same stringent law in regard to Chinese immigration as we have, and whose alien population drift across our northern border without its being possible for us to check that immigration. Of what use would it be for the Federal Parliament to pass a law declaring that every alien of a particular race shall pay a poll tax if it was open to the state Parliament, on the following day, to pass a law giving to every alien of that race a bounty of twice the amount of the poll tax?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Do you think for a moment that that is what we are contending for?

Mr. WISE. -

I do not.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then why do you put such words in our mouth?

Mr. WISE. -

I will tell my right honorable friend why I do. It seems to me that the purport of this sub-section has been entirely misunderstood by the representatives of Victoria, and that in using the arguments they did they have looked at this matter having regard only to the peculiar conditions of their own colony, and disregarding altogether the wider federal aspect of the question. The difference between the honorable member (Mr. Trenwith) and the right honorable gentleman was, if I understood them aright, very marked. What I have just said does not apply to the argument of my honorable friend (Mr. Trenwith), as I understand it. I understand him to be only questioning the position of the clause, but the right honorable gentleman, unless I misunderstood his remarks, went much further.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am quite willing to put it in clause 52, but I say it is wrong to put it in clause 53, because the Federal Parliament will not deal with the question for a number of years.

Mr. WISE. -

Will my right honorable friend allow me to express to him my regret for the misunderstanding which has arisen? I certainly understood the right honorable member and his Attorney-General to say—and I took their words down—that they do not desire that the Federal Parliament should have exclusive power.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Exclusive power; but you do not agree with us as to the meaning of the word exclusive."

Mr. WISE. -

I think there are others at this table who are under the same misapprehension.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will my honorable and learned friend allow me to interpose for a moment?

Mr. WISE. -

Certainly.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The difficulty is this: If the power is put in clause 52 the Federal Parliament can deal with the subject, and, if the Federal Parliament deals with the subject, that law will be paramount, and no state can legislate against it. The meaning of giving exclusive power, in relation to any question, is that only the Federal Parliament can deal with the question, and if the Federal Parliament does not choose to deal with it then the state cannot deal with it. All we ask is that the state may have power to deal with the subject till the Federal Parliament chooses to make a uniform provision, and whenever it chooses to make a uniform provision the power of the state is gone.

Mr. BARTON. -

Which makes matters worse.

Mr. WISE. -

I do not regret that I fell into the error I did, because it has led to this explanation. I am not alone, I may say, in the error, for there are others here who were under the same misapprehension. The matter narrows itself down to a very small compass. Perhaps the Attorney-General of Victoria has not given full attention to this matter that there is no more sure means of securing that which we desire, namely, a uniform law dealing with this subject, than by depriving local Parliaments of the right to pass new legislation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am rather of the opinion the other way.

Mr. WISE. -

There is no question which is more urgent, there is no matter which the people of Australia are more likely to look to as an immediate consequence of the Federation—and in that respect I agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Trenwith) that it is one of the very first questions which will be dealt with—there is no greater assurance that the Federal Parliament will deal with this question than to remove it from the sphere of the state Parliaments, and to force it on the attention of the Federal Parliament as the first matter of their concern.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

They can do that just as effectively if you place it in clause 53.

Mr. WISE. -

If that is the only difference between us, it is a very small one.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

The difficulty, to me, seems to be as to what is meant by the word affairs." Perhaps the leader of the Convention will tell us. I take it that it means the control of those people after they have arrived in Australia. If it was intended to mean their introductions I have no doubt that the most of us would be in accord, because I think every one is of the opinion that the introduction of people of any race, especially coloured races, is a matter which should be in the control of the Federal Parliament. I take it that the word affairs" would mean the control of alien races after they have arrived in this continent. In my opinion the control of the people, of whatever colour they are, of whatever nationality they are, living in a state, should be in the control of the state, and for that reason I should like to see this sub-section omitted.

MY. SYMON. - Why did you vote for the question of conciliation and arbitration being a federal subject then?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am not dealing with that question at this moment. I do not see myself that this sub-section is necessary, because I hold that if it is passed the control of every one living in the state should be within the province of that state. Take the colony which I represent. We have made laws controlling a certain class of people. We have made a law that no Asiatic or African alien can get a miner's right or do any gold mining. Does the Convention wish to take away from us, or, at any rate, not to give us, the power to continue to legislate in that direction? We have also made laws regarding hawking. Certainly they apply to every one, I believe, at the present time.
We have had to abolish hawking—not liking to offend the susceptibilities of British subjects, we had to abolish hawking altogether. But we would much rather have applied our legislation to a certain class of the people. I think I have some right to speak on this subject; and, no one, at any rate, will be able to say of me, or of the colony I represent, that we desire to encourage the introduction of coloured races, because ours if; the only colony in Australia with a law at the present time which excludes from its territory coloured people. Other colonies have talked about it a great deal.

Mr. REID. -
You don't exclude them.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Yes, we can exclude them.

Mr. REID. -
Under the Natal Act?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Yes, unless they can read and write English they certainly can be excluded. I think that there is no desire on our part to do anything to encourage either in Western Australia, or any other part of Australia, undesirable immigrants. I take it that under clause 52 immigration is a subject within the power of the Federal Parliament to deal with. I would not mind if it were one of its exclusive powers. There may be difficulties in regard to the introduction of persons who are not altogether desirable. But I cannot for the life of me see why we should desire to give to the Federal Parliament the control of any person, whatever may be his nationality or his colour who is living in a state. Surely the state can look after its own affairs. It may require to place a restriction on a certain class of people. As I said, we place a restriction in regard to the issue of miners' rights. We also provide that no Asiatic or African alien shall go on a township on our goldfields. These are local matters which I think should not be taken away from the control of the state Parliament. For that reason I would like not to give this subject a place in either clause 52 or clause 53, but to leave it as a matter to be dealt with by the local Parliaments in their wisdom and discretion.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I think the remarks which have been, made within the last 30 minutes only show how easy it is even for men of very profound knowledge to make very serious mistakes, and I include myself, not, as a man of profound knowledge, but as one who is apt to make mistakes. I think the general idea all through has-been that this sub-section of clause 53 was intended to deal with the admission of aliens.

Mr. BARTON. -

Not with the admission of aliens, but with aliens after they are here.

Mr. REID. -

No; but there has been as we have seen here lately, considerable confusion on that point, because I know that quite a number of commentators on this Bill have always looked on this sub-section as a provision which handed over to the Federal Parliament the exclusive power of dealing with aliens, and even this afternoon I have heard more than one observation to that effect. In fact, it is only within the last few minutes that the discussion has gone away from that view. I venture to say that the view which Sir John Forrest expressed is the correct one, and that this sub-section really refers to the method in which aliens shall be dealt with when they become members of the community in the physical sense.

Mr. BARTON. -

I don't think the speakers generally have been making the mistake you mention. Certainly Mr. Isaacs and Sir George Turner did not.

Mr. REID. -

I have heard observations that would have been perfectly correct if this sub-section had not that meaning. However, that sort of thing has been happening all through; there is nothing unusual in it. I agree with Sir John Forrest that it is certainly a very serious question whether the internal management of these coloured persons, once they have arrived in a state, should be taken away from the state. I am prepared, however, to give that power to the Commonwealth, because I quite see that it might be desirable that there should be uniform laws in regard to those persons, who are more or less unfortunate persons when they arrive here. Therefore, in that sense I am prepared to say that the clause should stand as it is. But I do not know that the difficulty does not still remain—that if there is no federal law, and until there is a federal law, the local law would not go.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

No, the local laws are preserved under section 100.

Mr. REID. -

Will that cover the difficulty? We will suppose that this Constitution has been created. Supposing the Imperial Parliament has originated over this continent one executive power, having exclusive authority to make laws for certain subjects. It is a very serious question whether, the moment that power comes into force, the existing laws remain.

Mr. BARTON. -

They stand to the extent to which they do not conflict with the federal
Mr. REID. -

It strikes me that the provision on which honorable members have based that opinion was more intended to deal with the difficulty arising under clause 52.

Mr. BARTON. -

That might be the primary intention, but it covers both.

Mr. REID. -

If it does, I will be perfectly satisfied, but I am afraid the words of the provision will not apply to the clause which speaks of the exclusive legislative powers of the Commonwealth. Clause 100 speaks of All laws in force in any of the colonies relating to any of the matters declared by this Constitution to be within the legislative powers of the Parliament of the Commonwealth." Well, these are powers which are declared under this special section to be within the exclusive" power of the Commonwealth.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Therefore they are within the power of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -

If that is so, I have no objection to the clause as it stands.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It prevents you amending your state laws.

Mr. REID. -

There is a concurrent power as to the introduction of aliens which is available to the state.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The concurrent power does not exist as to new legislation.

Mr. REID. -

There is a concurrent power, first of all, with reference to immigration and emigration of aliens.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Not after the Federal Parliament has legislated on the subject.

Mr. REID. -

I quite agree; but that is the whole question. All the legislation we are aiming at is legislation preventing the introduction of certain races of aliens and their becoming members of this community. That is the salient point. Whilst they are members of the community we can deal with them in a very ordinary way.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Not under that clause, because its power is exclusively in the Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID. -
But you say that the laws in force in any state at the date of the commencement of the Commonwealth will remain in force until the Commonwealth Parliament legislates on the subject, and if that is so—if those laws are not annulled by the creation of the Commonwealth—I am quite satisfied to leave the Bill as it is, because if the matter is a pressing matter at all I feel perfectly confident that the Federal Parliament will deal with it by having it brought exclusively within their jurisdiction.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I want to give an illustration which seems to me to prove the possible danger of leaving this clause as it is. In Victoria we have legislated on this question. We passed a tentative measure for three years. In one of its parts that measure deals with this question of aliens. At the expiration of three years we shall desire to legislate on the subject again. If experience proves that measure to be a wise one, we shall desire to renew it, which, of course, will be making a new law; but if this clause is carried as it stands we shall then be too late.

Mr. BARTON. -

Well, you had better make haste, and renew that law before the expiration of the period within which you can re-enact such a law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But we have to wait for three years to get the experience of the law.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again. I am sorry that we cannot pass this clause before adjourning, but I do not like to keep honorable members any longer, after they have been sitting for seven hours. I think it is the general desire of honorable members that we should adjourn at four o'clock tomorrow afternoon, or a few minutes afterwards, and, if that course is suggested then, I shall probably have no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

HOURS OF SITTING.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move—

That this Convention do now adjourn.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

Might I ask the leader of the Convention to seriously consider the progress we are making with our work?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is already a matter of very serious consideration.
Mr. DOBSON. -

I will not trouble the honorable member then. It is not for me to say whether the progress we have made is good or bad. I hope it is good, but most certainly it is exceedingly slow, and I think the leader of the Convention has, out of consideration to honorable members, halted about calling upon us to sit in the evening in future in committee. I think we are getting on so slowly that we ought to sit two or three evenings a week now. I am perfectly certain that when we have sat here for three or four weeks, the great bulk of us will be longing to get back to our homes and our work, and the grave danger of rushing the more important matters at the last may be avoided if we seek to make up for the time lost in adjourning over holidays, and through early rising, by sitting sometimes in the evening.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

With regard to the suggestion about sitting at once at night, I am bound to have confidence in honorable members, and to believe that no undue time will be occupied in the discussions of the Convention, and I do not hesitate, so early, to call upon them to make the sacrifice which is involved in sitting at night. The Convention has been summoned at such a time that the public business of the colonies does not suffer by our sitting, perhaps, a week or two longer than we otherwise would have done had some of the Parliaments been approaching the session, and we are bound to bear that fact in mind. At the same time, I do recognise the slow progress that has been made, and I think honorable members will see with me that it will be our general duty to refrain from making lengthy speeches in regard to matters that have been debated over and over again; so that I anticipate there will be a number of clauses upon which we shall have very little debate, and, therefore, this slow progress will be compensated for later on. It must be recollected that the matters about which discussion has taken place—the question of rivers, the dealing with aliens and coloured immigrants residing in the various colonies, and such questions, as that of conciliation and arbitration are of the very highest importance, and that they do justify some serious debate. We shall shortly come to clauses upon which I hope I shall not be considered as in any way unfair if I ask the Convention to say that the matters with which they deal have been settled and do not call for lengthy debate. They have received the common consent of this Convention, at any rate at two of its sittings, as well as of a previous Convention, and for these reasons I shall ask honorable members to bear with me if I suggest that when we come to those clauses we should use expedition.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Is the question of deadlocks to be re-opened?
Mr. BARTON. -

That question is of immense importance. Whilst I might personally be opposed to any proposal with the intention of re-opening the question, I should, nevertheless, feel bound if a request were made by any large number, of honorable members to say that it should be re-opened. The financial clauses will come before the Convention presently, and I may here intimate that the Finance Committee have made progress. They have only one more question to consider, together with the questions that have been submitted to them by the Drafting Committee with regard to their intention in one or two particulars. They are going to meet to-night. When they have completed their work there will be no loss of time in drafting the clauses.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I rise for the purpose of protesting against the constant statement that slow progress is being made. I deny that slow progress is being made. The matters that we are engaged in debating are of the highest consequence. We have met here in this the third session of the Convention for the purpose of completing this work. It is our bounden duty not to leave the chamber finally and for good until the work is completed. If we do we shall be humiliated and discredited from one end of the country to the other. As this is the final opportunity we shall have, every point ought to be thoroughly and exhaustively dealt with. So far as I am individually concerned, I am not going to abate one jot of my interest in these subjects, or in the duty of dealing with them, because of some insinuation on the part of persons who do not attach the same importance to them that it is a waste of time. We have not wasted one moment of time. Some of us ought to protest against these constant insinuations as to the time being badly occupied.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think there has been any suggestion made excepting now.

Mr. DOBSON. -

There has been no suggestion of the kind the honorable member indicated. I hope the honorable member does not mean what he has said.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I join with Mr. Symon in saying that we have not wasted time; but I rise to ask the leader, of the Convention to consider very carefully the remarks that have been made by Mr. Dobson. I agree with him that we might give at least some evenings in the week to the consideration of these important matters. What I am afraid of is that we shall, within two or three weeks, come to a time when some honorable members will be obliged to leave, and when we shall have to debate large questions in a thin Convention. It would be better to sit two or three evenings now than to delay matters until that contingency is reached. I would ask the leader of the Convention to consider whether we could not sit two or three evenings next week.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It makes no difference to me, because I do work in the evenings as it is, but it will make a difference in another respect. If the Convention refrains from sitting at night for the present the Drafting Committee will have more time in which to do the work intrusted to them. If there are night sittings there will have to be a long adjournment hereafter. There will, therefore, be perhaps no loss of time in continuing the present proceedings. I shall be ready to propose night sittings quite as early as will be agreeable, I think, to the majority of honorable members.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

The labour and anxiety imposed on our Drafting Committee from the first has been so intense that in the interests of this Constitution I shall protest against any arrangement of our sittings the effect of which will be to throw on these gentlemen a strain absolutely beyond human endurance. There is no more critical work than that which the Drafting Committee has in hand-no work which would task men more in every sense-and if we sat at night, and the Drafting Committee had to sit, as they would have to do, after we adjourned, we should not only put an inhuman strain

The Convention adjourned at seven minutes past five o'clock.

[P.245] starts here
Friday, 28th January, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill - Representation of Queensland.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on subsection (1) of clause 53 (Exclusive powers of the Parliament), which was as follows:-

The affairs of the people of any race with respect to whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws not applicable to the general community; but so that this power shall not extend to authorize legislation with respect to the affairs of the aboriginal native race in any state.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I have always been under the impression that this clause embodied, certainly, one of the most valuable powers to be conferred upon the Federal Parliament, and have indicated that view during my federation campaign as a strong argument in favour of federation, inasmuch as this power gives the Federal Parliament control over the immigration of aliens. But the discussion which has taken place upon the matter shows the importance of debate. I think that no time has been wasted in the discussion of subsection (1), which is worthy of full ventilation. I would like to bring even more closely under the notice of the Drafting Committee the real import and significance of the provision. My honorable friends in the representation of Victoria yesterday drew attention to a point of considerable importance as to the possible effect of this sub-section in preventing the local Legislatures from dealing with the alien question up to a certain point. There can be no doubt as to the desirability of conferring unlimited powers on the Federal Parliament to prevent the introduction of foreign coloured races. It may be thought that that power is conferred on the Federal Parliament under other clauses in the Constitution. This subsection, as I understand it, is restricted in its operation to people of certain races when they are within the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth. I would like to suggest whether it is wise to withdraw all power and jurisdiction from the Federal Legislature upon such people within certain limits. Sir John Forrest, yesterday, touched upon the fringe of the subject I am discussing when he mentioned that there are certain laws in Western Australia which prevent certain coloured races from having miners' rights, or from going on the gold-fields, or holding hawkers' licences.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

There is a similar provision in our Mines Act.

Dr. QUICK. -

And in the Victorian Mines Act there is power to insert in the covenants of a mining lease a provision that the employment of Chinese labour shall not be permitted to be a compliance with the labour covenants of the mining law. That is, of course, an important power to be held by any Parliament, and it is a power which is restricted within the territorial limits. It is not proposed in this Constitution to take away from the state Legislatures jurisdiction over mines and minerals. I would, therefore, like the Drafting Committee to consider whether this sub-section, as it stands at present, will not prevent the Parliament of Western Australia from abstaining from granting miners' rights to coloured aliens, and prevent the Parliament of Victoria from continuing to enforce the proviso that the employment of Chinese labour shall not be a compliance with the labour covenants of the mining law?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Read clause 110 in connexion with that.

Mr. BARTON. -

That applies rather to the administration of the laws, I think.

Dr. QUICK. -

The clause alluded to by Mr. Deakin says-

A state shall not make or enforce any law abridging any privilege or immunity of citizens of other states of the Commonwealth, nor shall a state deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

It may be that that clause supports the view that the state would not be able to impose disabilities upon coloured aliens.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It goes further.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It has been held under a provision such as this that you cannot cut a Chinaman's pigtail off.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

No more you should.

Dr. QUICK. -

I will respectfully suggest—Why should the Federal Parliament desire a power, or why should a power be conferred upon it, of interfering with what is a state right, a power of interfering in the development of the state's mineral, agricultural, or other resources? And why should not the state be able to say what should be a compliance with its own labour covenants? And why should it not impose its own terms and conditions upon the development of its own territorial resources? While I am anxious to equip the Commonwealth with every power necessary for dealing with the invasion of outside coloured races, I do not see why, at the same time, the local Legislatures should not continue to enjoy local state rights within certain limits; and I would suggest to the Drafting Committee to consider whether they could not insert at the end of this clause a provision to meet the case I have described. I am not referring to the exclusive powers of the Federal Parliament. You may, if you like, give certain exclusive powers as to determining the confinement of these races within certain areas, or regulating their admission, or keeping such aliens out altogether. But is not such a power sufficient for all the purposes of the Commonwealth? I would suggest whether the states should not have reserved to them such comparatively minor rights as those which Sir John Forrest has mentioned, and which I have called attention to.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I do not know that I am often found disagreeing with my honorable and learned friend (Dr. Quick), but in connexion with this matter I do disagree with him strongly. He puts it that the state is the landlord of the soil of its territory, and has, therefore, a right to dictate as to the terms on which that soil shall be worked.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

By its lessees.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

By its lessees or any one else. Pushed to a legitimate conclusion his argument would amount to this: That the state might dictate as to the right with which each person could step ashore on to that soil. I do not think the matter should be viewed solely with regard to our dealing with alien races, who will chiefly come within the scope and purview of this sub-section. We ought to deal with the matter not on local or provincial, but on broad Australian lines. I know that in this respect I differ a good deal from many with whom I generally work in sympathy, but the view which I venture to propound is this—that if you do not like these people you should keep them out, but if you do admit them you should treat them fairly—admit them as citizens entitled to all the rights and privileges of Australian citizenship.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

And compel them to observe the same rules as other citizens?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes, compel them to observe the same rules as other citizens, but impose no special rules intended for their special injury and to emphasize what some may consider the degradation of their position. Sir, I think that in connexion with this coloured races question we should do whatever we can for the purpose of keeping out coloured races, and I recollect with considerable interest and some pride that I had the pleasure of being associated with Mr. Deakin at the Chinese Conference in 1888, when an Australian policy was agreed to—a policy which had the effect, to a very considerable extent, of limiting the introduction of these coloured people. I think that subsequent events have shown, not only the wisdom of that policy, but also that, if it had a defect, its only defect was in not going sufficiently far.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

My honorable friend indorses that opinion, and there is no doubt that, in view of our proximity to the crowded millions of the East, we must look very closely into the question as to whether or not restriction should not be replaced by absolute prohibition, in the interests of what is generally and properly known as the white Australian. The matter was considered a couple of years ago—I think it was at another Conference in Sydney—when further legislation was agreed to, and that legislation has been passed by the senior colony and by South Australia, but it has not yet received the Imperial assent. Now, it seems to me that there has been no substantial difference of opinion as to the propriety of dealing with this question as an Australian question, and I trust that in framing federal legislation on the subject we will adhere to that principle, and that we will not encourage the policy of dealings with the coloured races by various provinces on different and varying lines.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The difficulty is as to those we have got here now, you see.

Mr. SYMON. -

They are no worse than those who may come in future.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We have got those coloured people who are here now; we have admitted them, and I do trust that we shall treat them fairly. And I have always set my face against special legislation subjecting them to particular disabilities, whether it is, as in one province, by declaring that a solitary Chinaman shall constitute a factory—

Mr. WALKER. -

It is disgraceful.
Mr. KINGSTON. -

I am not going to say whether it is disgraceful or not. I disagree with it. As I was saying, I have always set my face against special legislation subjecting these coloured immigrants to particular disabilities, whether it is, as in one province, providing that a single Chinaman shall constitute a factory, or whether, as in our colony, it is the prevention of the ownership of mineral leases by Chinamen. I think it is a mistake to emphasize these distinctions. Keep these coloured people out if you do not want them here, but if you admit them and do not want them to be a standing source of embarrassment in connexion with your general government, treat them fairly, and let them have all the rights and privileges of Australian citizenship.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Would you give them the right to vote?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not think we ought to give them the right to vote.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

They are here now, and they are naturalized citizens.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Then that is an additional reason for according them the full rights of citizenship, and, as regards not giving them the right to vote, I put it to honorable members that the proper course is to decide that question by Australian legislation, and I should be undoubtedly found supporting a proposal which, as regards future arrivals at the least, would prevent them being admitted to the exercise of the franchise.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You would not give them all the rights of citizenship, then? . - I would not allow them to come here in the hope of exercising those rights, but I trust also that they will be kept out. There is no doubt whatever, it seems to me, that one of the most important subjects that the Federal Parliament will have to deal with as regards the regulation of these coloured immigrants-a subject second only in importance to that question-is the question of the Australian treatment of those immigrants when they are here; and just as I think that every one of those subjects ought to be dealt with by federal legislation, so I think that, only in a secondary degree, the same remark applies to the question of how the coloured people who are here shall be dealt with. The result will be, if one colony is allowed to subject these coloured people to special disabilities, to force them into the other colonies where they are more favoured, but no more wanted. The broad view of the matter, which I venture to adopt, is that it is an Australian question, and should be dealt with by the Federal Parliament, land by the Federal Parliament only. Some question has been raised as to whether or not this power-if conferred on the Federal Parliament in the shape in which we find it in the Bill-will prevent the local Legislatures from dealing with the question pending federal legislation.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
That is the whole point.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
That is the whole point at issue. My hope is that it may be made perfectly plain that, whilst the local Legislatures can retain, if they please, the benefit of what they have already done, they ought not to interfere further with the matter, after the Federal Parliament is established, but the Federal Parliament should be left to deal with it, and, by being made practically the only body competent to deal with it, should be forced, at an early date, to deal with it, and to deal with it on Australian lines, as broad and fair as possibly may be. I cannot help thinking, however, that if we pass the sub-section in the shape in which we have it before us at the present moment, until the Federal Parliament deals with the matter, the local Legislatures will have jurisdiction to amend their laws, either in the shape of liberalizing them, or of greater stringency towards these coloured races.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Clause 100.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Clause 100 has some reference to the matter, but a more important point was the one taken by Mr. Clark, then Attorney-General of Tasmania, and concurred in by Sir Samuel Griffith at the Convention in 1891. Mr. Clark called special attention to the use of the expression-"the people of any race with respect to whom it is deemed necessary to make special laws not applicable to the general community" and he asked-"By whom is it to be deemed necessary?" The answer, of course, is-"By the Federal Parliament." Mr. Clark asked:"Do we know when the Federal Parliament will deem it necessary to make special laws not applicable to the general community?" And the answer is-"Not until the Federal Parliament exercise that power."

Mr. TRENWITH. -
But whether the Federal Parliament deem it necessary to make such special laws or not, their power to do so is exclusive.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It is only exclusive in connexion with the question that arises after the declaration by the Federal Parliament that it is necessary to make such special laws.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is too fine to risk this on, anyhow.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I hope it will be made perfectly clear, but in an altogether different direction to that which I think is the view entertained by Sir George Turner. The right honorable gentleman puts it that it is too fine to risk it on that point. I say not only was it the opinion of Mr. Clark, but also of Sir Samuel Griffith, that it was unnecessary, and Mr. Deakin gave in his adhesion to that view. However, let us make it clear. But I hope that we shall make it clear in this direction, that as regards this matter and the treatment of alien races in Australia, both as to their immigration and the terms on which they are permitted to take up their abode amongst us, the Federal Parliament; and no other shall have anything to do with it.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I so strongly sympathize with the broad and generous views expressed by the last speaker that, except that this is a question of very great moment, I should hardly have felt it necessary to occupy the attention of the committee even for the very few seconds I propose to do. This is a very much larger question than one of drafting. It has travelled a long way beyond that stage. In this discussion two points have been raised. One is more or less a matter of drafting—a technical matter—and that is the point which was raised yesterday by my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) as to the meaning and effect of the word "exclusive," and as to whether this particular provision is not out of place in this series of sub-sections dealing with matters in the exclusive ambit of the Federal Parliament—whether it ought not more properly be placed in clause 52, and whether if we retain it where it is it may not have the effect of creating a sort of interval between the coming into force of the Federal Constitution and the enactment of a federal law dealing with the subject of this sub-section. That, I think, is substantially the point which has been put from the first aspect—that is to say, when this Federal Constitution comes into force it simply operates as a barrier to all legislation by repeal or alteration on the part of a state with regard to any existing laws dealing with people of the nationalities which are referred to, although circumstances may arise to render it absolutely necessary that some alteration should be made. That is a very serious and a very important question, and, although I am disposed to think if this sub-section is retained where it is under these exclusive provisions, the effect will be to erect such a barrier as I have indicated, still it may be open to doubt as to whether that is the effect of the word "exclusive." But to solve the matter, and to save it from all doubt, I agree with the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) that it would be very much better to place this provision in clause 52, so that until the Federal Parliament does legislate on the subject the existing laws of the states shall prevail, and that if the states should find it necessary to alter or modify or change those laws in any way they shall be at perfect liberty to do so. That, at any rate, would be consistent; it would be proper; and it would save the hiatus of legislation which might otherwise occur, and conserve to the states that right which they now possess, and which it might be absolutely necessary, in their own interest, they should exercise. But the second question is one of much wider and more far-reaching consequences. It is one of great constitutional substance. It is whether it is proper at all that this power, described in this sub-section, should be conferred on the Federal Parliament.

Mr. DEAKIN. - Solely.

Mr. SYMON. -
In clause 52 we have given to the Federal Parliament the power of dealing absolutely with immigration. If we have given that power, then incidental to that power they will have an exclusive jurisdiction as to the status and citizenship of people who come into this country. If, therefore, the Federal Parliament are to have this entire control of the citizenship of the nation, then they have a right to say who shall be admitted to that citizenship and who shall be excluded, and they must also have the power to define the terms of that citizenship. They may say that they will admit the coloured races-those whom we describe, as aliens-to the full advantage of the citizenship of Australia. They may give a limited citizenship if they like. They may impose any terms or conditions, or they may, I apprehend, admit these people, and confer on the states themselves the right of regulating the control within the boundaries of the particular states. There may-and this was a point which was put by my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) yesterday, at least as I understood him-have to be varying laws, according to the different degrees of latitude in the various states, which may require differentiation in relation to these particular people. Well, the Federal Parliament would have perfect power to confer on the state the right to discriminate in that way if it chooses; but it seems to me, in common with the last speaker, that it is the federal authority alone which has to deal with and define and control the national citizenship.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Is it to do that positively as you propose, or negatively as we propose?
That is the difference between us. We do not object; but we say that that control should be negative—that is to say, that until the Federal Parliament legislates, for instance, in regard to the employment of Chinamen in mines, the local laws ought to operate now and hereafter. It is only a difference between positive and negative.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

The fight is over a shadow.

Mr. SYMON. -

I think, as my honorable friend puts it, the fight is over a shadow; there is really no substantial difference between us. It appears to me that we have been under some misapprehension, and the very pointed address to which we have just listened has been founded on an assumption of difficulty which has not been suggested. What I understood my honorable friend to desire was, that the power of regulating these coloured races, to use the expression which is best understood, shall be left entirely with the states.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

No.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Only until the Federal Parliament deals with it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Negatively, instead of positively.

Mr. SYMON. -

As at present advised, I see no particular objection to the proposal to leave it with the states until the Federal Parliament defines what that citizenship shall be. Otherwise, of course, the result might be that you would neutralize absolutely the power which you are giving to the Federal Parliament, because, if you left it to the state to say how these people should be employed, under what conditions they should be licensed in particular vocations, you might defeat your federal legislation by starving the people you admit.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

And the Federal Parliament can always pass a law overruling the state law if that law is a bad one.

Mr. SYMON. -

What you want to do is to maintain your existing laws, with the power, of course, till the Federal Parliament legislates, of altering them as you please; but until the Federal Parliament legislates with regard to the admission of these people, and the quality of the citizenship which they are to possess—whether it is full and free like our own, or more limited; and until they also interfere with your internal regulation of affairs with these people your laws are to operate.
Mr. DEAKIN. -
And any amendment of them.

Mr. SYMON. -
If, in opposition to the view which was just taken, you have the power, in the interim between the establishment of the Federal Constitution and the passing of the federal law, to alter them, those alterations will have the same effect as existing legislation on the subject. Therefore, it seems to me, if that is the whole matter in dispute, it does not raise quite so large a question in substance as I anticipated. I thought, from the view which was expressed yesterday, no doubt from my misunderstanding it, that the whole question of the separate control of the states over the alien races, once admitted, was to be reserved to the states, and I emphatically concur in the speech which we have just listened to. It is monstrous to put a brand on these people when you admit them. It is degrading to us and our citizenship to do such a thing. If we say they are fit to be admitted amongst us, we ought not to degrade them by putting on them a brand of inferiority.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -
I have listened with great pleasure indeed to the speeches of the two last speakers. It is so very seldom that they are in accord with each other on questions of this kind, that I could not help marvelling that they should come together on a question of this magnitude. The honorable member (Mr. Symon said it was monstrous, for a civilized community like the Australians, to place a brand of degradation upon those alien races once we admit them. I think our first duty is to consider the welfare of our own kindred. Do you ever find British labour going to these eastern countries and competing with the labour there? Certainly not.

Mr. WALKER. -
Engineers go there from our country.

Mr. HOWE. -
Simply because those races have no engineers of their own. We send capital into those countries. We benefit them in that way, and we do not take hordes of people to compete with the labour of eastern countries. I have no objection to treat them fairly well when they are in Australia, but the Government ought not to go out of its way to grant them licences when there is a power of restrictions and when the Government can refuse any one a licence. Why should we grant them mineral licences to compete with our miners on gold-fields, and hawkers' licences to compete with our Australian hawkers?

The CHAIRMAN. -
I would ask the honorable member if he thinks his remarks are strictly relevant as to which body should have the power to deal with this matter?

Mr. HOWE. -

I am coming to that. If this law be passed as proposed, I am in accord with the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) that the federal authorities should have supreme power, and that the laws in the states should be operative until the federal law is passed. I am quite in accord with the Victorian members who say that those local laws should remain in full force and vigour until a new law is passed by the federal authority. I have no fear that the law passed by the Federal Parliament of Australia will be one that will be less exclusive, as against these alien races, than any law obtaining in any state at present.

Mr. WALKER. -

Do you think they will pass a more exclusive Act?

Mr. HOWE. -

Yes; I think the cry throughout Australia will be our first duty is to ourselves, and that we should as far as possible make Australia a home for Australians and the British race alone. It is not our duty even to go out of our way to create competition between the aliens residing in our midst at the present time against our own flesh and blood. I shall support the contention advocated with so much force and ability by the Victorian members, as I consider that the welfare of the colonies, as against alien cheap labour, depends upon the local laws being maintained in full force and vigour until a federal law is passed.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I do not intend to extend the debate, and therefore I shall only say a word or two. I have not been under any misapprehension with regard to the real issue before us. I am inclined now to alter my mind, and to say that this sub-section ought to be included in the 52nd clause, and for a reason that perhaps has not struck some honorable members up to the present time. I hold that the placing of this subject in the Bill as an exclusive power restricts, to some extent, the discretion of the Federal Parliament, because, in the earlier stage of our federation, it may be considered right not to interfere too much with the autonomous powers of the different states. It might be a wise discretion to leave everything exactly as it is for some years to come. If the states have not over-reached what is fair to the position of a citizen pure and simple, then, on broad grounds, the Federal Parliament may think it best in the early stages of federation to do nothing at all; whereas, if you make this an absolutely exclusive power, it is more or less a direction that, at the very earliest moment, a uniform law shall prevail throughout the whole continent. It seems to me, therefore, that on the whole it would be better to include it in the other concurrent powers, leaving the Federal Parliament, as I think we ought in all matters, the fullest possible discretion to deal with matters according to their own views.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I quite agree with the contention brought forward by the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) yesterday that this ought to be a concurrent, and not an exclusive power. It is a fair question for the states to legislate upon until legislation inconsistent with their action is introduced by the Federal Parliament. I may say it is a matter which is beyond the stage of theory. Special legislation, as touching alien races, became, in South Australia, a matter of great importance in administration. In the Northern Territory of South Australia there is a large preponderance of Chinese, as against the white population. It was found that the Chinese themselves were not prospectors, but they followed the British prospectors, shepherded them, and as soon as any discovery was made by one or two enterprising men of our own race, the Chinese, who would not undergo the risks themselves, came down upon the mine and destroyed all possibility of its being worked by our own people.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Would not the whites murder them?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

There were only a few whites, and the murder might turn out the wrong way. For years and years the people in the Northern Territory clamoured to Parliament for the prevention of these occurrences. For years Parliament turned a deaf ear to their entreaties, but at last an Act was passed precluding the Chinese from going on to a gold-field until a certain number of years after its proclamation. I understand that has placed the matter on a satisfactory footing, and that the Act has worked very well. It seems to me this is a power which might require to be local in its exercise. Not only should the states have power to legislate in the interim until the formation of the Commonwealth, but afterwards until the Federal Parliament chooses to pass a law, and even after that so long as the state law is not inconsistent with the federal law on the subject. Of course, the Federal Parliament must have power to legislate on this subject. That is an absolute national necessity. But until the Federal Parliament chooses to legislate in such a way as to over-ride the state law, certainly the states should have this power. It is a pure question of state rights and local government. It would be disastrous in a huge continent like this, where conditions vary so much, to make it necessary for any particular state to get the ear of the Federal Parliament before it could get legislation in this direction. I have pointed out how exceedingly difficult it was, even within the limits of South Australia, for a distant part of that territory to get the ear of Parliament. How much greater will be the difficulty to get the ear of the Federal Parliament on a matter which perhaps only concerns one particular part of a particular state. The states themselves should have the power to legislate in this matter as long as their legislation is not inconsistent with the federal legislation. I quite agree that with regard to immigration the Federal Parliament must have the whole power, so as to be able to restrict undesirable immigrants; but it is not only a question of keeping out alien races. We have them with us. As I have said, in our Northern Territory we have a preponderating population of Chinese. I can quite well see that other problems, not perhaps quite identical with that of keeping the Chinese off new goldfields, but yet problems of a similar character, may arise. Therefore, it is not sufficient that we should retain the right of our own laws as they stand, but it is necessary that the states should have the right to take the initiative in any matter which might have a local bearing, and which might not concern the whole of Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

In order to bring this matter to a head, I intend to move an amendment. I have consulted the Drafting Committee as to its form, and beg to move—

That the words "The affairs of," first line sub-section (1), be omitted.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have no objection to taking it that way.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I think it must now be perfectly clear that what we desire is, not to deprive, the Federal Parliament of its paramount power in every respect in regard to any dealings with the races referred to, but to leave to the several states, until the Federal Parliament legislates upon the alien question, the operation of all legislation already passed, and the right to legislate in the future until the Federal Parliament thinks fit to supersede it by specific legislation. For instance, the Federal Parliament might well pass a general law applying to these races without making any reference to their employment as miners or hawkers, and any state legislation in regard to those occupations which might be in existence would continue, or now legislation regarding them might be introduced. When the Federal Parliament chooses to make regulations in regard to the employment of aliens as hawkers and miners, the state legislation will cease to have effect. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) said—Hand to the Federal Parliament all powers connected with aliens, and allow them to give back certain powers to the state." We say-Instead of taking these powers from the states and giving them back again, let us leave them with the states until the Federal Parliament chooses to assume them."

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I do not think it makes any substantial difference whether you put this provision in clause 52, or leave it where it is. The Federal Parliament has first to say what races it is: necessary to make regulations about.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is giving a rather limited meaning to the words "deemed necessary."

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

There must be some body which deems it necessary, and the only body to which the words can refer is the Commonwealth Parliament. What very substantial difference does it make whether we leave the provision as it stands or put it into clause 52? True, if the provision is left where it stands, the Federal Parliament will have exclusive power in connexion with this matter: but that body will only have exclusive power when it chooses to exercise it. It is only when the Federal Parliament has passed legislation dealing with the people about whom regulations are to be made that this exclusive power will have arisen. The only matter for the committee to consider is as to the expediency of leaving the provision here or of putting; it into clause 52. Wherever it is, it will, upon the passing of the Constitution, operate as an intimation to the Federal Parliament that this is a matter of national import, upon which they are expected to legislate.
Once within the Commonwealth citizens should be able to go freely from one state to another; there should be no lines of differentiation between states. If races are admitted into one state, and are not free to go into another, the inconveniences of administration, especially on the borders, will be very great. It has been thought well that there should be a uniform law throughout Australia in respect to the citizens of Australia, and it was considered that this provision should be put into a separate clause giving exclusive powers, in order to emphasize the fact that the Federal Parliament should legislate upon this matter. In my opinion, whether you put the provision into clause 52, or leave it where it is, its substantial legislative effect will be the same. As to the meaning of the words, "the affairs of the people of any race with respect to whom it is deemed necessary," in my opinion it is the Federal Parliament who must deem it necessary.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What is the meaning of the statement that the state cannot legislate for the whole general community?
Mr. BARTON. -

That is by way of description. A law made by the state does not apply to the general community.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

My argument is that deemed necessary means deemed necessary by the Parliament of the Commonwealth. Assuming that I am right, I ask to whom does this clause extend? The persons named by an Act of the Commonwealth Parliament. When the Commonwealth Parliament deals with this subject, its legislation will over-ride any local legislation, no matter whether you put the provision in clause 52 or leave it in clause 53. What the representatives from Victoria want is exactly what is provided here, but the provision is put where it is for the purposes of extra emphasis, and to indicate to the Federal Parliament that they are expected to make over-riding and general legislation in regard to this vital question. I think honorable members are, almost without exception, strongly of opinion that there should be federal legislation upon this matter, and I therefore believe that it will meet the wishes of honorable members if we leave the provision exactly where it is, as a means of hurrying up the Federal Parliament and causing it to legislate in this matter as soon as possible.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

I am in perfect accord with much that has been said by the right honorable member (Mr. Kingston), the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon), and the honorable member (Mr. McMillan); but I must admit that I see great force in the remarks of Sir John Downer. If we wish to compel the Federal Parliament to legislate upon this

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. WALKER. -

I am glad to hear from Mr. Deakin that the intention is that the local legislation shall after a time be absorbed by the federal. But unless we leave this power under clause 53, the local legislation may go on for an indefinite period. I, for one, cannot understand why, when once a man has paid the poll tax, or whatever charge is imposed, and has been admitted to Australia, he should be treated differently from others. With regard to the poll tax, the view taken by the Chinamen in Sydney amused me. They said-"We do not ask you to vote against the poll tax; those of us who are already here are quite satisfied with the law as it stands."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I desire to call the attention of the leader of the Convention to an apparent vagueness in the word "exclusive," to which reference has not yet been made. The word "exclusive," no matter at what time the power arises, whether on the coming into being of the Commonwealth, or the exercise of the power by the Federal Parliament, may mean, and I believe does mean, that the power of the state to legislate ceases. On the question of whether the exclusive power under this provision comes into being with the establishment of the Commonwealth, I would call the attention of the leader of the Convention to clause 84. That clause seems to indicate that this exclusive power arises the moment an Act is passed. It speaks of the exclusive power of enforcing customs duties being vested in the Federal Parliament, but the second paragraph says-

But this exclusive power shall not come into force until uniform duties of customs have been imposed by the Parliament.

It would appear that without that limitation the exclusive power would come into force at once, and the position would be as stated by the Victorian representatives. If you pass this clause as it stands the state could no longer legislate with regard to Chinese.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the exclusive power is given without any restriction, I think it would arise immediately on the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Having regard to the wording of clause 84, I think that is doubtful.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is a special case.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Clause 84 was intended to mean that the power referred to should not be exclusive until uniform duties of customs had been imposed.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is no exclusive power for a period of two years, but by a proviso the power becomes exclusive at the end of that time. Where there is no such proviso the exclusive power must operate, at any rate, from the date of the election of the Federal Legislature.

Mr. GLYNN. -

There seems to be some doubt as to whether the exclusive power arises upon the establishment of the Commonwealth or on the exercise of the power of legislation. The doubt seems to be removed by clause 84. It is said that if we put this provision in clause 52 the exclusive power may be postponed until legislation takes place. But may you not then have a concurrent power, and may not the competence of the local Legislature to legislate in the matter be continued as long as the legislation is not in contradiction of federal legislation?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That is the point.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Yes, and there is still a vagueness in the word "exclusive." If it is doubtful whether the exclusive power commences with the foundation of the Commonwealth, and if it is possible that it may only come into being on the passing of legislation, may it not still be said that on the passing of exclusive legislation the power of the local Parliaments to legislate is extinguished, but that on the passing of concurrent legislation that power does not cease?

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I think that enough has now been said on this subject by honorable members both sides of the chamber, and I have only a very few remarks to offer. It appears that if the sub-section remains where it is state laws will be valid until federal legislation, but the states will not be able to alter or improve those laws during the possibly long interval between federation and federal legislation. Under these circumstances, as we leave to the states for an indefinite time the power of maintaining the laws they have, we should grant to them the power of improving those laws. It would recommend the Constitution more to a large number of persons if we put the sub-section in clause 52, thus enabling each state to legislate on this matter until the Federal Parliament comes in and legislates for all.

Question-That the words "the affairs of" proposed to be omitted stand part of the sub-section-put.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move that all the rest of the sub-section be omitted with a view to its being transferred, in a shorter form I hope, to clause 52.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sub-section (2). - The Government of any territory which by the surrender of any state or states and the acceptance of the Commonwealth becomes the seat of government of the Commonwealth, and the exercise of like authority over all places acquired by the Commonwealth, with the consent of the state in which such places are situate, for the construction of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, quarantine stations, or for any other purposes of general concern.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

As to this sub-section, there are one or two matters which I should like to point out to the committee, and then leave it to them to say if they are matters of drafting or matters of substance. I think myself that they do partake of substance. This is the sub-section which relates to an exclusive power to be given to the Commonwealth to deal with territory or certain pieces of land required for Commonwealth purposes, the territory being for the seat of government, and other pieces of land being for the construction of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, quarantine stations or for any other purposes of general concern. Now there is no necessity, I take it, for the words in the first, second, and third lines of the sub-section, "by the surrender of any state or states and the acceptance of the Commonwealth," because they are provided for by clause 105, which is a special clause.
providing for the surrender of territory by a state and its acceptance by the Commonwealth. Then, with reference to the second, the parenthetical part, of the subsection, to be found in the words "with the consent of the state in which such places are situate," I think these might also be well left out. This is not a clause which deals in any way with the powers to acquire land, whether it is the acquisition of land for the seat of government or the acquisition of land for an arsenal, &c.; and therefore this kind of expression is not required. I think, therefore, that both these portions of the sub-section should go out, one being already provided for, and as to the other, it should be provided for, either in a separate clause or by some provision such as I suggested in clause 52, which would apply equally to the acquisition of land by the consent of the state, or to such compulsory acquisition as might be justified by any law. I take it that this clause is not the place for either of those provisions, and, apart from questions of drafting, these words unnecessarily encumber a portion of the Bill which deals only with powers to be given by the Commonwealth to itself by its own legislation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is not the whole gist of the matter the consent?

Mr. BARTON. -

No; we must give the Commonwealth the exclusive power to govern territory which may become the seat of government. The Commonwealth may not think fit to acquire or accept the surrender of any territory for the seat of government; it may either follow the precedent of Canada, or it may acquire a piece of territory for the seat of government and federalize that.

Mr. REID. -

Once it is federal territory won't all the powers of legislative authority be implied?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Look at clause 115.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have clause 115 in my mind. I do not think you can well do without giving power of this kind in this part of the Bill. Clause 115 refers to making laws for the provisional administration and government of any territory surrendered by any State to the Commonwealth, and that applies more generally.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Ought not that provision to be in sub-section (2) of this clause?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think not. It applies more generally to acquisitions of territory, which may become territories under that name, and, therefore, be subject to that kind of legislation which precedes their admission as states. It does not refer to a piece of territory for the seat of government, but to territories in the general sense of the word. This sub-

That the words "by the surrender of any state or states and the acceptance of the Commonwealth" be omitted.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

One point I wish to put to the leader of the Convention has partly been anticipated, but not wholly. This clause-clause 53-defines exclusive powers which are given to the Parliament, and a later clause, clause 115, to which the leader of the Convention has alluded, refers also to an exclusive power of legislation which is to be possessed by the Federal Parliament for the provisional government of territories, or, as they have been happily termed, embryo states. What I am at a loss to discover is why two clauses should be needed or placed so far apart. Should not clause 115, as the power of legislation there conveyed is an exclusive power, be included in clause 53, where the exclusive powers are supposed to be found, and not be relegated to another portion of the Bill, where, it seems to me, those powers are at all events not equally in place?

Mr. BARTON. -

It was thought advisable to leave that provision regarding territories where it is-under the head of "New States"-because it refers particularly to that kind of territory which afterwards develops into a new state.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Yes, but it is an exclusive power, and might as well be placed in the clause relating to exclusive powers.

Mr. BARTON. -

Is it not logically in better place where it is?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is logical where it is, and it would also be logical if included in clause 53. However that is a question for the Drafting Committee. I would also ask is the word "territory" in this second sub-section the proper word to use, inasmuch as "territory" has a specific meaning based upon American experience, as indicated by clause 105 and clause 115? Would it not be better to substitute another term, say, "area" or "part of state"?

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I would like to be quite sure that in making any improvements in drafting we do not really make any important alteration in substance.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is an important alteration; it may be right, but it is important.
Dr. COCKBURN. -

I think there is. It is quite right that the Federal Parliament should have no power without the consent of the state concerned to take territory for its capital, for example. I think the consent of the state should be required in that case, although in most cases I do not think there would be very much trouble about it.

Mr. BARTON. -

If you refer to clause 105, you will see that it can only be done with the consent of the state.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

On the other hand, Sydney might object to have her harbour and 10 miles roundabout taken away by the Federal Parliament, and its administration withdrawn from the local Government.

Mr. BARTON. -

Clause 105 is quite clear on that point.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I would like to be sure of that. Would there not be some right of pre-eminent powers in the Federal Parliament, unless it was restricted by this Act, to take any land anywhere it chose?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; so there ought to be.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I do not think there ought to be. Whether or not there ought to be is a matter for debate and for settlement by this Convention as a question of principle, and not as a mere matter of wording. Now, take the second part of the sub-section, in which power is given with the consent of the state for the construction, say, of a quarantine station. I question very much whether the power to establish such a station as a leper station, for example, ought to be given to the Federal Parliament without having to consult the wishes of the state in which it is proposed to establish such an institution. The Federal Parliament will be a distant body, and it may not be exactly apprised of all the local conditions. It may want to establish a leper station in some part of Australia where its establishment would be most disastrous to the interests of the communities in the vicinity, which ought, I think, to have a voice in a matter of this sort. These words are put in to make it abundantly clear that the federal capital shall be chosen only with the consent of the state concerned, which consent would, of course, be given in most cases. I should like to have the matter I have referred to made perfectly clear. It is open to doubt at present, I think, whether the Federal Parliament will have power to take any land for the purposes of government without the consent of the state concerned. I do not think the Federal Parliament should have such a power, and I should be sorry to see it have such a power by the mere insertion of certain words which were not intended to have that meaning. I should like this committee to be clear as to whether or not it is intended that the Federal Parliament should have power to take land from any state without the consent of the state.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I think the honorable member who has last spoken is quite right; but there is a great distinction between the two classes of matters dealt with in this sub-section. I think that the seat of government of the Commonwealth ought to be in quite a different position to such matters as the construction of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and so on. Dr. Cockburn will recollect that there is no such power for the acquisition of land for the ordinary public purposes of the Commonwealth.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Might not the power be included in the general powers of sub-section (37)?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No. The only powers that can be held to be given are those which are expressly given. It will be wise, later on, to add a clause which I think the Convention will see the advisability of adding, restricting the power to acquire land to acquisition for the public purposes of the Commonwealth; and I think it should then be made very clear that no power is given in that clause to acquire land for a federal capital without the consent of the state interested. Because it is quite clear, from the nature of things, that it is quite impossible that a power of that kind could be carried out without such an amount of friction and difficulty as might lead to a great deal of trouble.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Why should not the Federal Parliament buy land from a private owner for the purpose of an arsenal without the consent of the state?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Exactly so. I do not think the honorable member apprehends what I am saying. I admit that for all such purposes the Commonwealth would have the power either to purchase or to acquire compulsorily on fair terms.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Without the consent of the state?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Undoubtedly; because in regard to defence there should be a paramount power for the Commonwealth to act as might be thought necessary, and there should be a similar power with regard to quarantine and other matters.
which are of general concern. But with regard to the acquisition of a piece of land for the seat of government, which must embrace a large area and be an exceedingly important matter for the state in which it is situated, the Commonwealth should not have power to obtain such land without the consent of the state. That can be dealt with when we are dealing with the general clause, giving power to acquire land for the use of the state.

Mr. Higgins. - Does not clause 105 answer that objection?

Mr. O'Connor. - No; that is simply a permissive power to the Parliament of the state to surrender any portion of its territory.

Mr. Isaacs. - And saying what shall happen if they do.

Mr. O'Connor. - Quite so; but that clause does not deal with the question as to whether the Commonwealth may acquire land for any purpose.

Mr. Symon. - Is that power of the state necessary in this Constitution at all?

Mr. O'Connor. - I do not know that it is.

Mr. Symon. - I think it is an interference.

Mr. O'Connor. - Of course the state can deal with its own territory, except that when it does surrender land for the purpose of the Commonwealth, that land will, according to the latter part of clause 105, "be subject to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Commonwealth." That may be necessary. The state may have no power to give up exclusive jurisdiction over any portion of its territory, and it is just as well to clear that up. What I rose to point out on this matter was that in dealing with the question of the acquisition of land, the point raised by Dr. Cockburn should be considered. I do not think that the matter is affected one way or the other by the words which are the subject of the present amendment, because all territory will be acquired lawfully under the Constitution, and it is territory acquired in that way which is dealt with under this sub-section. This is not the proper place to indicate how the property is to be acquired. That matter must be dealt with by another place; so that it does not matter whether the words, "by the surrender of any state or states and the acceptance of the Commonwealth," are here or not. I think, as a matter of logical arrangement and drafting, all that need be dealt with here is the matter of handing over, and we can deal with how the territory should be handed over in some other way.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It has occurred to me since I previously spoke that there was a consideration which might make it wise not to carry this amendment now. Apart from other questions which have been raised, I think there is a question of construction which should suggest to us not to make the amendment at present. It is plain that the Commonwealth should have the power of exclusive government of any territory taken over for the purpose of government, when it becomes federal territory. But suppose the Commonwealth follows Canada, and the seat of government does not become a federal district, such as Washington has become in the United States, then the ordinary power of local Government would exist with regard to that place.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Including the local laws with regard to crime.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, police matters would be included. If the Commonwealth undertakes the government of a piece of country only 10 miles square, it must completely govern that country, including the establishment of its own force of police. If it follow the Canadian precedent, the ordinary operations of provincial Government subsist there, and it is only the exclusive powers of Government which are exercised. If we leave out these words, there might be implied a power to assume the whole government in the place which might be made the seat of Federal Government, whilst without an authorization of that sort it would not be necessary for the Commonwealth to assume governing power over it all. The original provisions of the Bill would appear at first sight to be probably wiser than the suggestion made, which confines a power of exclusive government to any place which becomes the seat of

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I think the leader of the Convention is right in withdrawing this amendment. I will point out why. We have now reached a subject which is full of consequence to us all, move especially in respect to one or two points with which Mr. O'Connor dealt. This sub-section is to a large extent based upon the American Constitution, Article 1, section 8, clause 17, and the object of giving this exclusive jurisdiction to certain limited cases, namely, in the case of territory acquired by the Commonwealth with the consent of the state, is very plain. There is, no doubt, in the first place, that the United States Government is, and the Commonwealth Government here will be, a Government of limited, of enumerated powers; but as to these powers, the Commonwealth Government will be supreme, and for the purposes of these powers—for everything necessary and incidental to them—it will be unlimited in its acquisition of means to carry out those powers.

Mr. WALKER. -
Yes, by sub-section (37) of clause 52.

Mr. ISAACS. -
And even independent of that provision. It has been held over and over again in the United States that it is one of the attributes of sovereignty that the Supreme Government shall be unfettered in carrying out the powers intrusted to it, and for the purpose of carrying out those powers it has the right to acquire land compulsorily. No express power is given in the United States Constitution, and the Supreme Court of that country has held that no express language is necessary. That power was exercised for the first time, I think, in 1875, but it has since been exercised, beyond all doubt, on several occasions.

Mr. REID. -
For what purposes?

Mr. ISAACS. -
For public purposes—only for the purposes committed to it by the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
In the Constitution of the United States there is a general power given for all purposes incidental.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Oh, the same as we have here.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Is not the supremacy of the United States Government a little different from the supremacy of our proposed Federal Government?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Not in this respect. The supremacy, as far as the powers committed to it are concerned, would, in this respect, I apprehend, be exactly the same as the Supremacy of our Commonwealth Government in relation to its powers. In the case of Kohl v. United States, which was decided in 1875, on this very question of the right of the United States Government to compulsorily take property within the state for its public purposes, the court said this:—

It has not been seriously contended during the argument that the United States Government is without power to appropriate lands or other property within the states for its own uses, and to enable it to perform its proper functions. Such an authority is essential to its independent existence and perpetuity. These cannot be preserved if the obstinacy of a private person, or if any other authority, can prevent the acquisition of the means or instruments by which alone governmental functions can be performed. The powers vested by the Constitution in the General Government demand for their exercise the acquisition of lands in all the states. These are needed for forts, armories, and arsenals, for navy yards and light-houses, for custom-houses, post-offices, and court-houses, and for other public uses; If the right to acquire property for such uses may be made a barren right by the unwillingness of property holders to sell, or by the action of a state prohibiting a sale to the Federal Government, the constitutional grants of power may be rendered nugatory, and the Government is dependent for its practical existence upon the will of a state, or even upon that of a private citizen. This cannot be. No one doubts the existence in the state Governments of the right of eminent domain—a right distinct from and paramount to the right of ultimate ownership. It grows out of the necessities of their being, not out of the tenure by which lands are held. It may be exercised, though the lands are not held by grant from the Government, either mediately or immediately, and independent of the consideration whether they would escheat to the Government in case of a failure of heirs. The right is the offspring of political necessity; and it is inseparable from sovereignty, unless denied to it by its fundamental law. Put it is no more necessary for the exercise of the powers of a state Government than it is for the exercise of the conceded powers of the Federal Government. That Government is as sovereign within its sphere as the states are within theirs. True, its sphere is limited. Certain subjects only are committed to it; but its power over those subjects is as full and complete as is the power of the states over the subjects to which their sovereignty extends. The power is not changed by its transfer to another holder.

Then the court went on to say—

But, if the right of eminent domain exists in the Federal Government, it is a right which may be exercised within the states, so far as is necessary to the enjoyment of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution.

The whole judgment proceeds in that way. It has been followed in several cases, and I think it has been laid down more than once in express terms that, for the purpose of carrying out the powers expressly given to the federal authority in the Constitution, the right of eminent domain is an essential attribute, and therefore I do not entertain the slightest doubt that, as in that case, and as in several other cases, the United States Government has, even without the consent of the state, taken land so far as it was necessary for the exercise of its public duties, we should have the same right here. I will now proceed to show the meaning of this sub-section. This sub-section does not say that the Federal Government is to have the power to take that land. It assumes that the Federal Government has that power, but when the Government does take land, compulsorily or by purchase, in a state as its possession, it takes that land certainly by virtue of its sovereign power of eminent domain, that is, the highest dominion. But it does not hold that land as sovereign, it holds the land as proprietor. Now, where it holds the land merely as proprietor, without the consent of the state being given to it, it is quite plain that the jurisdiction of the state should run, except, of course, so as not to interfere with the performance of the governmental functions of the Federal Government. But, as far as punishing crime is concerned, as far as any other ordinary state supervision relates, not inconsistent with the performance of the supreme functions of the Commonwealth, the ordinary state law will run. But the United States have provided, and we, I understand, propose to provide here, that, where the state consents to the Federal Government acquiring any land, either by purchase or compulsorily, it thereby consents, and that consent is equivalent to the admission of the right of the Federal Government to exercise exclusive jurisdiction in respect to that particular portion of territory. And if the state does not choose to give its consent, it says, in effect-"You may take this land, it is true, by virtue of your sovereign right, for your sovereign powers, but you hold it as proprietor; you can carry on your post-office, your court-house, or anything you please, but as regards ordinary state laws outside those functions our state laws prevail. Where the state, however, is asked by the Federal Government to consent to the excision of a piece of land from its own territory for governmental purposes, and does consent, then the exclusive right of the Federal Government to govern that portion of land attaches to it, and this is what the sub-section we are now considering intends to enact. Therefore, I think that the leader of the Convention is right in not pressing this amendment, and that we should be doing well to keep in the words "with the consent," because it does not relate to the acquisition of property, but to the exercise of jurisdiction over the property when it is acquired.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In the sub-section which we are just about to dispose of the Drafting Committee suggested, and the Convention accepted the suggestion, to leave out the word "other" in the expression "or for any other purpose of general concern." I think it is a very proper amendment to make. It will restore the matter to the condition in which honorable members found it in their Bills as printed. I beg to move—

That the word "other" be omitted from the sub-section.

The amendment was agreed to, and the sub-section, as amended, was adopted.

Sub-sections (3) and (4) were agreed to.

Clause 53, as amended, was adopted.

Clause 69. - On the establishment of the Commonwealth the control of the following departments of the public service in each state shall become transferred to the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, that is to say:—

Customs and excise:

Posts and telegraphs:

Military and naval:

Ocean beacons and buoys, and ocean lighthouses and light-ships:

Quarantine:

The obligations of each state in respect of the departments transferred shall thereupon be assumed by the Commonwealth.

The CHAIRMAN. - In this clause the first amendment is suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales. It is to omit the word "On" at the beginning of the clause, and to insert in its place the words "as soon as practicable after."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There are two suggestions made with reference to this particular part of the clause. One is to make the clause begin with the words "As soon as practicable after the establishment of the Commonwealth"; and the other is to make the clause begin with the words "On a date to be proclaimed by the Governor-General after the establishment of the Commonwealth."

The CHAIRMAN. -

The Council and Assembly of Tasmania make a suggestion which is substantially the same as this suggestion.

Mr. BARTON. -

The Tasmanian suggestion is that, instead of the words "On the establishment of the Commonwealth," we should adopt the words "On the day fixed by a proclamation issued for that purpose by the Governor-General." That is practically the same amendment as the last one I read. The difficulty which these two amendments are suggested to meet is a practical one, and I think we ought to adopt one of them. The clause as it is provides for the immediate vesting of these departments in the Executive Government of the Commonwealth, which term perhaps ought to read, "the Government of the Commonwealth." I think it is clear that there will be a great deal of inconvenience about the immediate investiture of these departments in the Government of the Commonwealth.

Mr. FRASER. -
You will not have the machinery ready.

Mr. BARTON. -
The Commonwealth itself does not come into force till after a date named in the proclamation, consequently there will be no Executive Government of the Commonwealth till the date fixed in the proclamation, which happens to be also the date named in the beginning of this clause. That will give rise to a very practical difficulty, because the departments will be handed over before the Government of the Commonwealth will be fully constituted and in working order. Therefore, it will be far better either to prescribe that the handing over should occur as soon as possible, or to adopt the words "On a date to be proclaimed by the Governor-General after the establishment of the Commonwealth." Perhaps the latter would be the better of the two amendments. I would suggest that we negative the one which has just been proposed, and adopt either that of the Parliament of Tasmania or that of the Legislative Council of New South Wales.

The amendment to omit "On" was negatived.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales-
After "On" insert "a date to be proclaimed by the Governor-General after."

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
If we leave out the words "Executive Government of the," so as to make the clause read "transfer to the Commonwealth," it will be quite sufficient, and avoid difficulties. I beg to move-

That the clause be further amended by the omission of the words "Executive Government of the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -
There is an amendment proposed by the Drafting Committee to transpose "Military and naval." There are several other amendments suggested by various Parliaments, but they are all concerning matters which the committee has already decided, and therefore I shall not put any of them.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
Under the head of "Posts and telegraphs," I would draw attention to the fact that that line remains in the condition in which it was before the insertion of the word "telephones" under the heading of "General powers." Under subsection (5) of clause 5, perhaps posts, telegraphs, and telephones would come together and could not be severed very well. I suggest the insertion of the words "and telephones" in this clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

Those are the only like services we know of at present.

Dr. QUICK. -

I beg to move-

That the word "and" after the word "Posts" be omitted, with the view to the addition of the words "and telephones."

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

To hand over the telephones of a state to the Commonwealth seems to me to be an absurdity.

Dr. QUICK. -

It has been done.

Mr. REID. -

They are worked by the same departments, and that is the only reason why they are handed over.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The object of the amendment is to make the Bill consistent with itself.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I want to make it as inconsistent as I can in that respect.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I would like to ask, sir, is it held that we cannot alter this clause because we have inserted in clause 52 the subjects of postal, telegraphic, and telephonic services?

Mr. BARTON. -

Not that you cannot, but that it will be inconsistent.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not say that you cannot, but this clause is simply as to the date when it should be handed over.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I was suggesting for your consideration, sir, whether it would not be competent for any representative to move to strike out the words "Posts and telegraphs;" and that would not be inconsistent with sub-section (5) of clause 52, because all the sub-section does is to give power to the Federal Parliament to legislate on this subject, a power which need not be exercised, and, even if exercised, might be exercised only to the extent of controlling the state's mode of management of these works. It does not necessarily decide that the control of the departments should be handed over. I respectfully submit that matter for your consideration, sir, and I know that your decision will naturally be to allow the fullest debate consistent with the rules of the Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I think the honorable member is right. It does not necessarily follow that the power given by clause 52 need be exercised.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I beg to move-

That the words "outside the limits of any state" be inserted after the words "Posts and telegraphs."

Mr. REID. -

Foreign cables-Banjoewangie.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would suggest to the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) that it will perhaps be better if we adhere to decisions we have practically arrived at at this stage, and bring up these questions again when we are reconsidering the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -

If you decide afterwards on recommittal to leave out of clause 52 the legislative powers about post and telegraphs, then you will have, by consequence, to recommit this clause to strike out these words.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I do not want to leave out that clause because the post and telegraphs are not-

Mr. BARTON. -

May I explain to my right honorable friend. We need some power of the kind here, because there must come a time for the Commonwealth to legislate about posts and telegraphs and to take over the departments. If we make it read that it shall take place on the date of the proclamation by the Governor-General it will only take place when the Governor-General will take that action by publishing a proclamation. Then it would follow the action of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I shall be glad to fall in with the views of the Chairman, and move the amendment at another time. My object in wishing to take from the Commonwealth control of the posts and telegraphs is that there is no necessity for the Commonwealth to take over that control. If there is one subject that is federated sufficiently at the present time it is the posts and telegraphs. We do not want federation in order to deal with that subject. All the posts and telegraphs of the civilized world are federated. With the exception of having the same stamp throughout the whole of Australia, there is not a single advantage which we could gain under a federal form of Government which we have not got now. But this clause will take away from the local Government the right to build telegraphs and post-offices here, there, and everywhere throughout its territory, and will be interfering; with local Government and local requirements. Every one knows that not only in these colonies, but throughout the civilized world, there is a Postal Union which we all form part of, so that we have already all the advantages of federation. To take away from the local Government the control of posts and telegraphs will not be doing any good; it will be very irksome, and will cause irritation, which will interfere with the smooth working of the new form of Government. I do not say that in 100 years it will be irksome, but it will be at first. When we are building up our different states, and when the erection of new post and telegraph offices and telegraph lines is a matter of daily occurrence, to have to go 1,000 or 2,000 miles to a central authority, in order to do what we now have a right to do for ourselves, will be regarded as very irksome and irritating, and will certainly do no good.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I agree with the remarks of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, and I think it will be a mistake for the federal authority to take control of these matters, because, at present, on this subject, we have federated to the fullest extent of our requirements. I should like the right honorable gentleman to adhere to his intention to strike out the words in this clause.

Mr. REID. -

It would not be right to deal with the subject in such an unexpected way.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is not unexpected.

Mr. REID. -

It would not be fair to do so without notice.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

If we cannot-strike out the power in clause 52, I should like to see the power struck out here. The difference is this: That under clause 52 legislative action would be required, whereas if the words are allowed to remain here the post-offices can be taken over by executive action.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Strike out both.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

We may succeed in carrying one omission, but not both. I believe that the right honorable gentleman could succeed in striking out the words in this clause.
Mr. REID. -
He will not take honorable members unawares.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
If the right honorable member says there is a danger of any one being taken unawares, of course we shall not proceed. If we cannot strike out the power in both clauses I should like to see it struck out, here. If the posts and telegraphs had to be taken over by legislative action, I do not think the Federal Parliament would undertake the necessary action, because when the subject was debated they would see that the present system of administration would be better than consolidated administration, and that we already have all that is required. If, however, it depended only on executive action, as this clause implies, I think the federal authority might take over the posts and telegraphs without considering all that would be implied thereby.

Dr. Quick's amendment was agreed to.

Dr. QUICK moved -

That after the word "telegraphs" the words "and telephones" be added.

The amendment was agreed to.

The sub-section, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON moved -

That the words-
Ocean beacons and buoys, and ocean light-houses and light-ships: Quarantine," stand part of the clause.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I want to call attention to the last two lines of this clause.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
If the honorable member will move to omit the last two lines of the clause, with a view of dealing with them at a later stage of the Bill, when there is an opportunity, that would be acceptable.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I shall gladly accede to that request, as I feel there would be a difficulty in striking out the last few lines. I beg to move that the following words be omitted:-

The obligations of each state in respect of the departments transferred shall thereupon be assumed by the Commonwealth.

The amendment was agreed to, and the clause, as amended, was adopted.
Clause 52 (Legislative powers of the Parliament).

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

What remains of clause 52 to be considered is the question of river control, and, acting upon the understanding come to yesterday, I propose a further postponement of the clause in order that honorable gentlemen who have gone away upon that understanding may have an opportunity to be present during the discussion of the question.

Dr. QUICK. -

"The people of any race" section might be re-inserted.

Mr. BARTON. -

I was going to put that provision into the clause when we come to consider it.

The clause was further postponed until after the consideration of Chapter III.

Clause 71. - The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in one Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other courts as the Parliament may from time to time create or invest with federal jurisdiction. The High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and so many other Justices, not less than four, as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia-

Insert at beginning of line "Until Parliament otherwise provides,"

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Before this amendment is dealt with I should like to indicate an amendment which I wish to ask the committee to consider. I wish to make the last sentence of the clause read:-

The High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice, and, until Parliament otherwise provides, the Chief Justices of the states. In the case of the illness or death of the Chief Justice the powers of the Supreme Court may be exercised by the other Justices, being not less than three.

Of course, the insertion of the words proposed by the Legislative Council of South Australia would upset my amendment, and perhaps I might be allowed to mention the reasons which have operated with me to again bring forward a proposal which at Adelaide obtained practically no support. Sir Samuel Griffith, in a pamphlet which he has published upon the work of the Convention, suggests that the Supreme Court at the beginning should be composed of one or two Federal Justices, while the Justices of the states might be utilized in the meantime. I think honorable members will see that such a suggestion is reasonable. Should we in the beginning have machinery which is not likely to be called into execution very often? If honorable members will look at the original powers conferred upon the Supreme Court by clause 77 they will see that perhaps not once in six years will these powers be exercised by the Federal Court. They are confined to matters relating to the representatives of other countries; arising under a treaty between states; litigation to which a state is a party; and litigation in which an officer of the Commonwealth is to be made subject to a prerogative writ. In very few case will there be an application to the original jurisdiction of the Federal Court. Again while that jurisdiction is original it is also appellate, so that the application may not be made to the Federal Court but to the subordinate court, and the appellate jurisdiction may not be called into existence at all. Then we have to fall back upon the delegations under clause 52. It is extremely probable that during the first two years of the Federal Parliament legislation will be confined to such a question as the arrangement of uniform customs duties. The passing of the Tariff will take a whole session, and during the first ten or fifteen years very few of the matters delegated to the Federal Parliament will become the subject of legislation. If there were such expedition as to make all these matters the subject of legislation, the chances are that the functions of the Federal Parliament would be exhausted in 25 or 30 years.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do you not think that for the first two years there would be a large number of cases, arising under the Constitution, to be settled by the Supreme Court?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not think so, and I will tell you why. In America, they had at the start thirteen states. There was far greater likelihood of disputes, under the Constitution, arising between those thirteen states, because their mutual feelings prior to 1787 were those of antagonism rather than sympathy, and they were practically forced into union. But what was the experience of the Federal Court for the first 30 or 40 years of its existence? In 1801 there were only ten cases awaiting trial.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You have given more powers to this Parliament than were given to the American Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes, but bearing in mind the fact that we are giving this Parliament a wide jurisdiction, I think that the constitutional points arising will be few. In 1801 there were only ten cases awaiting trial in the Supreme Court of the United States, although the Union waft composed of thirteen states as against a probable maximum here of five, and possibly only four states. In the five years following 1801 there were 120 cases before the Supreme Court, and the average number of cases between 1820 and 1830 was only 58 a year. Now, of course, the Federal Court is practically overloaded, but that is because of the enormous crop of private legislation, which we do not anticipate here. We know that there is a marvellous complexity of affairs in America, where they have 44 states, and enormous mercantile concerns, such as railway companies and other large companies, which create a condition of things that we need not anticipate here for a generation or two.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Shall we not feel the complexity here?

[P.267] starts here

Mr. GLYNN. -

We shall feel the complexity to the extent of the clashing of interests which may arise. But this clashing of interests cannot be very great, where there are only four or five states.

Mr. REID. -

Is this relative to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. -

No, I do not think it is. I understand that the honorable member is showing why the amendment of South Australia should not be carried, because of some amendment which he wishes to move.

Mr. GLYNN. -

If the South Australian amendment is carried it will make it impossible for me to carry my amendment. I propose to make the appointment of the Chief Justices obligatory, and I propose to give power to the Parliament to appoint other Justices in lieu of the Chief Justices.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Then vote against this amendment, and move your own amendment later on.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I am giving reasons for my amendment now in order that it may be fairly considered upon its merits before the South Australian amendment is dealt with. I might mention, as regards the point referred to by the honorable member (Mr. Higgins), that we are giving a wider sphere of duty to the Federal Court by taking in local appeals, appeals from the state courts-

Mr. HIGGINS. -

And far more subjects are remitted to the Federal Parliament for discussion and legislation.

Mr. GLYNN. -

There are a few more. Of course, that affects the consideration of my remarks, but subject to this slight discount I think they remain open to fair consideration. With regard to appeals from state legislation to the Supreme Court, before these appeals come to the Supreme Court they must filter through the state courts, and we may measure their probable number by the number of appeals that now go to the Privy Council. I do not say that the proportion will be the same, because our courts will be more accessible, and because there are very great delays in England before a case goes to the Privy Council. Sometimes a case has to hang over for two years; but still we must measure to some extent the chances of local appeals by the few cases, and they are comparatively few, that are sent to England. It may be objected, as it has been in Adelaide, that you are creating a tribunal in which some members of the court will be actuated to some extent by state prejudices. I may say, in answer to that, that in the majority of cases at all events the point of dispute will be between individuals and not between state and state. As between individuals, there is practically no opening for prejudice. You may have the Chief Justice of a state sitting again in judgment upon a verdict he has already given. But there will be four other Judges from the federated states and the Chief Justice of the Commonwealth, and the chances are that the operation of prejudice will be checked in that way. But we recognise at present that it is advantageous to have a Judge sitting on a question which he has decided in another court. We have sent Chief Justice Way to England as the representative of Australia on the Privy Council, with the possibility of his taking into consideration a decision that he gave in South Australia.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Would he sit in such a case?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I have known a case in which a Judge sat as a Court of Appeal from a district court decision, and be again sat in Court in Banco and reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal. I was in the case myself, and I remember with pleasure, as showing the freedom from preconceptions of the Judges, the fact that the reversal did take place. This shows that courts are not operated upon very much by prejudice, and it seems to me that it would be an advantage rather than otherwise to have a Judge sitting on a question the whole facts of which have come before him in a lower court.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
That was your experience when the verdict went your way.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Decidedly. Very often points of law are coloured by the facts of a case, and we know that the facts do not, except in a synopsis, come before the Judges in the higher tribunal. The objection from the point of view of prejudice, which was largely relied upon at Adelaide, is not capable of being too strongly insisted upon. I think for this reason that we ought not at the start to overload the Federal Constitution with judicial machinery. We can by using the Chief Justices of the other colonies make a saving of £10,000 or £12,000 a year, and as Parliament finds that the judicial machinery ought to be extended, an opportunity will arise by the fact of the power being reserved to abrogate the right of the local Chief Justices to sit and to substitute other Judges. The federal character of the tribunal must be amply recognised and preserved by the establishment of a Federal Chief Justice, and that is part of my amendment, and the part which makes it different from the suggestion of the Parliament of South Australia.

Mr. Barton (New South Wales). -

I desire to intimate, as early as possible, that I, for one, intend to stand by the clause. I do not believe in accepting any amendment which will subject the judiciary system of the Commonwealth that judiciary system, which is to be the arbiter in any dispute that may arise between state and state or between state and Commonwealth—in all its constitution, and under all circumstances, to legislative changes. I do not think that that is a desirable thing in any sense of the word. No matter at what low limit you place it, or what the number of Judges is, the foundation of the judiciary system should stand on the bedrock of the Constitution, and words which may be taken advantage of to make change after change, which would enable the Parliament to alter arrangements upon the faith of which the various states will enter into this agreement, should not be inserted. Insert these words—"Until the Parliament shall otherwise provide," and it means this: That the Parliament may at any time pass an Act to destroy the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth, and to destroy the power vested in the Parliament to create other federal courts, or give federal jurisdiction to certain of the state courts.

Mr. Higgins. -

Although the Supreme Court is to be the arbiter between the states and the Commonwealth.

Mr. Barton. -

Yes, although the Supreme Court is to be the arbiter between state and state or state and Commonwealth. This amendment would place it in the power of the Commonwealth to make such alterations as would practically destroy this power. That is an objection of principle which goes to the root of the amendment. We ought on no consideration to consent to any alteration which would subject the foundations of this court as an arbiter between the states to the risk of legislative changes. We have used the words "Until Parliament otherwise provides" for many purposes in order to give elasticity of legislation to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, and to avoid the necessity of resorting to a referendum of the people for making minor changes. But this would be no minor change. It would be a structural change in the whole fabric of the Constitution. These words "Until Parliament otherwise provides" were never intended to be inserted for the purpose of enabling Parliament to structurally change the Constitution. This is the argument I have against the amendment suggested by Mr. Glynn. I would also like to say now that in this clause it should be provided, as it is at present, that there shall be a Chief Justice and a minimum n is necessary to the constitution of this source of arbitrament, to which we all attach so much importance. The proposal that the court should be constituted of Judges from the various provinces, or of the Chief Justice from each province, is one to which I would also offer opposition, and on this ground: The formation of this court should always be open to be made in such a way that it would embody the best talent available to the Commonwealth for the constitution of so important a tribunal. It is intended to be a court with high appellate powers. It will have to decide disputes between the states and between the states and the Commonwealth. If so, in its constitution there should be every opportunity afforded of gathering together the best talent available from end to end of the Commonwealth, and a restriction of its constitution to a choice of the Chief Justices of the various states, however good they may be, would, instead of keeping up to that court its federal character, which is the most important part of its character, impart to it a provincial character. It would also lead to the suspicion that the Chief Justices chosen from the various states were intended to be in some sort of way the representatives of provincial interests, and that it was not intended that the court in its impartiality should be representative of the Commonwealth as distinct from the provinces.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The tenure of the Judge would depend on the laws of the state.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, the constitution of the highest court of the Commonwealth might depend on any law the state might from time to time make.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
The amendment that we are considering is the insertion of the words
"Until Parliament otherwise provides"; but Mr. Glynn has enlarged the scope of the discussion by suggesting a further amendment. I desire to call attention to that amendment. I think honorable members will agree with me that a more nondescript tribunal could not very well be constituted than that which he proposes. He wants to strike out all the words after "and," in the fifth line, and to add "Until Parliament otherwise provides the Chief Justices of the different states in the Federation." The effect of that would be that we should have a Federal Chief Justice, and that the Chief Justice in each separate state would become, immediately he crossed the border of his own state, into federal territory, a Puisne Judge of the higher court. We should then have this extraordinary sort of olla podrida, a Federal Chief Justice owing his position, his emoluments, and his judicial allegiance to the Federal Parliament, and four Puisne Judges in one sense under him who are Chief Justices in their own court, and who owe their judicial allegiance and their emoluments to the separate states.

Mr. GLYNN. -

You have that in the case of the Privy Council at the present time.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is a very bad thing, and the sooner that anomalous judicial body—the Privy Council—is wiped out, for that and for other reasons, the better. I am obliged to my honorable friend for giving me at this preliminary stage so valuable an argument. But then, as my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) interposed a moment ago with an exceedingly pregnant suggestion, they will all owe their tenure of office—not only their judicial allegiance and emoluments, but their tenure of office—to the state. Then see what an extraordinary position these Judges would occupy in a High Court so constituted. I could understand the suggestion, although I think it would not be one which would meet with the approval of any reflecting man, that the Judges of the different state courts, or a selection of them, should constitute the High Court of Justice; but to say that you should have a Federal Chief Justice appointed by the federal authority, and, as I say, owing undivided allegiance, if I may use such an expression in relation to judicial affairs, to the National Government in its highest sense, is a position of matters which I am sure could not possibly commend itself to any one. I certainly did not bear any argument that was at all convincing on the question of the desirability of making such a change as this, but my honorable friend must also have noticed that by so altering the clause you are limiting the choice of the Federal Executive in the selection of its Judges. It would be perfectly and absolutely competent for the Federal Executive to choose the men who are to occupy this commanding position in the High Court that we proposed to establish from existing benches, which would comprise men of great experience and great judicial knowledge.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Do you think retirement should be necessary?

Mr. SYMON. -

I think retirement ought to be compulsory. I think they should not hold a divided office with a divided allegiance, if I may so express it. At any rate, there is nothing to prevent the Federal Executive from having the benefit of the experience, the wisdom, and the learning of the existing occupants of the judgment seat in Australia if they so choose. But if you introduce this into the Constitution, you are limiting the power of selection by the federal authority, limiting their choice, and binding them down to the selection of one Judge—the Chief Justice—from the whole of the judicial power of Australia, whether on the bench or off it; and as to the other Judges—whether the number is two or four, is, as Mr. Barton said, a matter of minor importance—limiting their choice to the existing benches, I think it cannot be too strongly emphasized that such a state of things would be extremely unsatisfactory. You are sending an arbitrator from each state to sit on the judicial bench, who will go, as arbitrators often do, as a partisan. Judges are human beings.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Judges do not act in that way.

Mr. SYMON. -

I was talking about arbitrators. Everybody recognises the fact that when a matter goes to arbitration, each of the rival parties selects the man whom be thinks most likely to give judgment in his favour.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And be is called an indifferent person.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, he selects an indifferent person who is to be a partisan, and then these two between them choose an umpire. You will have a dispute between South Australia and Victoria-no, such a thing is not possible—or rather between Victoria and New South Wales, and the amputations and the insinuations that may possibly be made as to the views which these respective Judges would take can be imagined. Then you would have a Federal Chief Justice, having in the long run to occupy the position of arbiter between them. Do honorable members really think any of the Chief Justices of the different colonies would consent to occupy such a subordinate position as that of Puisne Judge in this tribunal?
Mr. KINGSTON. -

It is a higher court.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is a higher court, no doubt, but his position in that court would be that of a Puisne Judge. The Chief Justice in his own colony would be called His Honour the Chief Justice, but in the Federal Court he would be His Honour Mr. Justice so-and-so. The whole thing is absurd and ridiculous as a constitution for this court. If any special advantages could be associated with it, I, for one, would be willing to give it my very best consideration, and favour its adoption if it could possibly be shown to be advantageous, but that has not been done so far. My honorable friend referred to Sir Samuel Griffith as supporting this. Now, I do not know that we ought to be over-influenced by Sir Samuel Griffith's views, which seem to me to be a little permeated by hypercriticism. If my honorable friend, however, had read the passage in Sir Samuel Griffith's very valuable contribution to the criticism of this subject he would have found that this is a mere tentative suggestion. All Sir Samuel Griffith says is that it is worthy of consideration. He admits that the arguments in favour of an independent Federal Judiciary "are obvious and are no doubt very cogent," and he merely suggests at the end of these criticisms that "it is worthy of consideration whether it might not be wise to empower the Federal Parliament, if they think fit, to make laws authorizing the provisional constitution of the High Court in whole or part by Judges of the state courts." This amendment, in my opinion, would be futile, and would be a blemish on the Constitution we are framing. But the great argument against it is that which was so forcibly used by Mr. Barton, namely, that by adopting this you are doing something which is utterly opposed to the whole basis and principle upon which this High Court is founded. The object is to create a court which shall settle all these difficult constitutional questions. It is to be clothed with all the powers of a High Court of Appeal, and it will in this respect I disagree with my honorable friend—it will have an immense amount of business from its very first inception. We know the difficulties that we have had in construing different provisions, and we are aware of the difficulties which the Drafting Committee have experienced. The High Court will be the tribunal to which the interpretation of this Constitution will be committed, and to which will also be committed—that is to say, if those who constituted the majority of this Convention before have their way again—the vast body of appeals in relation to the ordinary litigation of the country. My honorable friend thinks that cases under the Constitution will be few, but I disagree with him in that. I think that in all probability they will be many but whether they be few or many, the High Court should not depend for the discharge of its duties on the convenience of a Judge of another court in another state, whose time may be greatly occupied with his own affairs. He has to do his own work, and to perform his own duty, and if, the Judges of the separate state courts discharge their functions thoroughly, as we know they do, they have very little time for entering on a new jurisdiction, and bringing upon themselves an additional responsibility.

Mr. BARTON. -

They all complain of overwork now.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

When there is an application, for a mandamus under the original jurisdiction it will be very hard to get the Judges to attend to hear it.

Mr. SYMON. -

This would involve the thing which we are all against, that is, Judges sitting to hear an appeal from their own judgment. As Mr. Barton has pointed out, there are several very important considerations which have to be taken into account; but the main objection is that the whole object of our constituting the High Court is to get, as Sir Samuel Griffith says, a strong and independent-tribunal entirely detached from the states, and if we adopt this amendment we shall be getting a hybrid tribunal which will be open to the objections which have been already stated. It will, at any rate, be certainly open to the objection of placing upon the shoulders of the local Chief Justices the lowered dignity which they would assume in becoming second or third or Puisne Judges of this other court, and of placing also upon their shoulders an additional burden of work, which, if they do their own work in their own states, they would have neither the time nor the opportunity to perform satisfactorily. Therefore, I say, on all these grounds it would be a fatal blow to the Federal Court we are seeking to create if this amendment were adopted.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

As regards the amendment now proposed, I shall be found recording my vote against it, because I think we ought to provide, in as clear a way as we possibly can, how the Federal Judicature shall be constituted, and remove it beyond the sphere of parliamentary control. We have already made great efforts in that direction at Adelaide. I think they were fairly successful, but now to introduce into our work a limitation seems to me to be striking a blow at the security of the court. I cannot follow my fellow representative (Mr. Symon) in the views he has expressed as regards the amendment of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Glynn), and I shall probably be found, when the time comes, recording my vote for that amendment.

Mr. SYMON. -

You will reflect a little before that time comes.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

There will be an opportunity for reflection in the ordinary course of events. But this is a matter to which I have given a considerable amount of attention. I think Mr. Symon has put the case too strongly when he says that if you avail yourself of the services of the Chief Justices of the different colonies, they will owe allegiance to the colonies from which they come, and will regard themselves to some extent in the light of partisans, and justice on the broadest aspect will not done. If we were to consider this matter having regard to who the Chief Justices

Mr. ISAACS. -

You would not carry the matter of state interest into the Australian High Court?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

One of the most important subjects which is likely to come under the notice of the High Court of Australia is where the federal authority ends and the state authority commences, or vice versâ. On a matter of that sort there may, in the natural course of things, be the greatest amount of feeling, and I ask honorable members to consider whether if my honorable friend's (Mr. Symon's) argument has weight in suggesting bias-

Mr. SYMON. -

I did not suggest bias; I merely illustrated the position.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not wish to put the matter an stronger than Mr. Symon put it in suggesting what possible influence the Judges might be affected by.

Mr. WALKER. -

Unconscious bias.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I do not care what the term is. I am suggesting what Mr. Symon suggests as to the provincial Judges, and I am asking whether the same remarks would not apply with equal force to the constituted authority if appointed by the Federal Government? It seems to me that if there was any strength in an observation of the character to which I have referred, honorable members should rather come to the conclusion that substantial justice to the merits of the case will be done without regard to the source of the appointment of the Judges. The matter can be best met by the proposition of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Glynn) that there shall be a representation of both sides, the states and the Commonwealth-the Commonwealth by the Chief Justice appointed under the federal authority, and the states by the Chief Justices of the different provinces.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at eight minutes past two p.m.]

Mr. KINGSTON.-

When we adjourned, I think I had said sufficient for the purpose of showing that there is no more reason for the Federation to be apprehensive of injustice at the hands of Judges, who, to use an expression that has already been used, owe their allegiance to the states, than for the states to be apprehensive of injustice at the hands of Judges who owe their allegiance to the Federation. The fitting solution, I think, is found in the proposition of my friend (Mr. Glynn), which is that there shall be a representation of both the Chief Justice of Australia, the highest officer in the Commonwealth responsible to the Federation, and the other Judges, more numerous, and selected on account of the positions which they occupy in respect to the provinces. I would like, further, to say that I think there is nothing in the contention that the Chief Justices of the different provinces would be unwilling to accept positions of the description suggested. I know of no higher position in the gift of the federal authority than the position of Judge of the High Court in Australia.

Mr. REID.-

I know that one of the Chief Justices is strongly in favour of such a constitution of the Federal Court.

Mr. KINGSTON.-

That is Sir Samuel Griffith, Chief Justice of Queensland?

Mr. REID.-

No, I allude to another Chief Justice.

Mr. KINGSTON.-

I am glad to hear from Mr. Reid that not only is Sir Samuel Griffith, a gentleman whose name commands respect in federal circles, and everywhere else, and who occupies the high position of Chief Justice of Queensland, in favour of a proposal of something of this sort, but that another gentleman occupying a similar distinguished position favours the same proposal. I do not see how it can be seriously contended that the post of Judge of the High Court of Australia is in the slightest degree inferior—it scenes to me to be in many respects considerably superior—to that of the post of Chief Justice in the provinces. If I recollect rightly, there was a meeting some years ago in this city of various representatives of the judicial benches of the different colonies, in which a proposal, something of this sort, met with considerable acceptance, but I am sure that my friend
(Mr. Symon), who has indulged in some gloomy prophecies as to the difficulty of getting the Chief Justices to accept a position of this kind, would have some difficulty in referring to any particular instance in which any such difficulty would be probable or natural. Another reason, and that is the reason which was urged with great force by my friend (Mr. Glynn), is the necessity of economy. We should, above all in the early stages of the constitution of this Federation, be careful lest we involve the Commonwealth in an unnecessary expense—in expense which is altogether out of proportion to the necessities of the case. It seems to me that, although this Bill is in a preferable shape to that in which it originally saw the light, in that it contains no appropriations within the four corners of the Constitution, of any huge sums for judicial salaries, yet, if we do not carry an amendment such as is now suggested, we shall take away from the Commonwealth a facile means of providing all that is required, at least in the earliest period of the history of the Constitution, at the least possible expense. I am sanguine that if a proposal could be submitted to Australia as to whether or not it would be satisfied with a court constituted, as suggested by my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn), of a Federal Chief Justice and the Chief Justices of the colonies, there would be a practically unanimous assent to the proposal. I think that a court so constituted would be eminently satisfactory, and would, at the same time, enable the Commonwealth to secure in an economical manner every efficiency which could possibly be desired. I would ask who are they who, in the natural order of things, we can more respect than the members of the judicial benches of the Australian Colonies? In creating a tribunal of this description we will at least remove, it seems to me, from the sphere of federal politics the great majority of judicial appointments, and enable the Commonwealth to be served with a degree of efficiency and economy which can be in no other way secured. In these circumstances, whilst I shall be found resisting the amendment which is now proposed, I do trust that some proposal on the lines of that which is suggested by my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) may be adopted. Something has been said as regards the impropriety of Judges sitting in courts of appeal to review their own decisions. Some colonies have adopted legislation prohibitory of any such course being taken. It has been done in Queensland, and, I think, also in New South Wales. We have not yet placed any such legislation on the statute-book of South Australia; but I do think that the position which is sought to be affirmed by legislation of that character is a right and proper one, and, whilst avoiding speculating as to the probability of a similar course being adopted in the colony from which I come, I would be perfectly prepared to see a principle of that sort embodied in the Constitution. Possibly it may not be considered a matter of constitutional importance sufficient to require a declaration within the four corners of the Constitution, but, so long as it is left to the Federal Parliament to deal with it, all that is necessary may be secured. Under these circumstances, I think we shall be meeting the public wish for economical and efficient administration of justice in the higher spheres by adopting a proposal of the character referred to. I shall be found at the right time recording my vote in favour of the proposal suggested by my friend (Mr. Glynn).

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I shall vote for the clause as it stands. There are questions of the very greatest importance involved in this discussion, particularly in the amendment proposed by the South Australian Council, and to a large extent in the suggestion made by my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn). The amendment which is suggested by the South Australian Council goes to the very root of the Constitution. The very essence of this Constitution is the establishment of a Commonwealth which is not to interfere with the rights conferred on the states, and a tribunal to decide when those rights are imperilled. To provide that the Parliament-the very tribunal whose jurisdiction is intended to be questioned, or over the exercise of whose jurisdiction there is to be a supervising power-should itself be the authority to decide what the tribunal should be that is to sit in judgment on itself, in disputes between it and the states, is to make an attack on the very cardinal principles on which Federal Constitutions are established. I really do not think that in this committee there will be a great deal of difference of opinion on the subject that that amendment ought not to be agreed to for one moment. I disagree also with the suggestion of my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn), that you should in your Constitution fix, without really knowing very much about it—if of course, I am speaking of the committee as a whole—the tribunal that is to be established at the initiation of the Commonwealth. Each colony I suppose, knows and has varying opinions of the excellency of its own tribunals. The other colonies have some knowledge of the gentlemen constituting the Supreme Courts of those colonies, but who can be said in this Convention to have an accurate knowledge of the abilities of the Chief Justices of all the colonies?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

And who will be, too?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Still less of those. I want to put the argument in its strongest light, and, therefore, I do not refer to fixture Chief Justices, who, of course, only some one who is not here possibly can decide. I prefer to confine myself to the more narrow limits, of which, in the ordinary course of things, we may have some knowledge. I ask how many honorable members of this Convention can honestly say to themselves that they are competent to express an opinion, not merely about their own Chief Justice, but about the Chief Justices of all the other colonies?

Mr. SYMON. -

But this would arrogate to this Convention what is really the function of the Federal Parliament.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

My honorable and learned friend has said exactly what I was coming to. In ignorance of the details of the subject, and having the most general views about it, we are to take upon ourselves the important functions of the Executive of the Commonwealth, by deciding, in the first instance, who are to be the men who will have the greatest part in forming this Commonwealth; because honorable members must not forget that, although we form it in form, they form it, to a large extent, in substance. With them rest the vast powers of judicial decision, in saying what are the relative functions of the Commonwealth and of the states. With them rest the interpretation of intentions which we may have in our minds, but which have not occurred to us at the present time. With them rests the obligation of finding out principles which are in the minds of this Convention in framing this Bill and applying them to cases which have never occurred before, and which are very little thought of by any of us. With this Supreme Court, particularly in the earlier days of the Commonwealth, rests practically the establishment on a permanent basis of the Constitution, because with them we leave it not to merely judicially assert the principles which we have undoubtedly asserted, but with them rests the application of those principles, and the discovery as to where the principles are applicable and where they are not. As was felt in America, and in every Federation which has had any permanence, there comes the necessity of a tribunal to stand between the states and the Commonwealth, of such dignity and held in such esteem, so free from all possibilities of influence or corruption that the general people of the Commonwealth will recognise that the jurisdiction has been well placed, and must be properly exercised. Now, what is proposed to be done here? The question of expense I attribute no importance to at all. It is so small that it is not worthy of serious cons

Mr. DOBSON. -

It means £50,000 for the first few years.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
No, it may mean £10,000 or more; but suppose it means £20,000 a year, divided amongst the whole of Australasia.

Mr. SYMON. -

£20,000 in order to secure the best kind of justice.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Where is the importance of £20,000, compared with the placing of our Constitution on a basis which will recommend itself to everybody, and its vindication by a tribunal about which there can be no question? The point of view of expense is parochial to the lowest degree, and not worthy of one moment's serious consideration. Now, as to the motion that the Chief Justices should be as a matter of course members of this court, I say, first of all, you are placing the appointment of the Judges out of the Commonwealth which you have created, and you are giving it to the states, which is a direct invasion of the other principles which we are all trying to establish. They may be good, they may not. That depends upon whether the state appointments are good or bad, and whether the states happen to exercise their power of appointment wisely, or whether they do not.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would you disqualify the provincial Judges?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I will come to that presently. The power of appointing the very highest tribunal, on which, after all, the duration of the Commonwealth must rest, is not to be exercised by the whole Commonwealth, but is to be exercised by each independent state, and appointments of greater or less efficiency may result. I will now deal with what the Premier of South Australia has suggested. Would you disqualify the Judges of any of the states? I say, certainly not. In all probability the selection would be made from them to a very large extent. If, for instance, Sir Samuel Griffith were selected, I do not suppose there would be any complaints on the part of many people in Australasia, and so there are other persons, or one particularly, whom we have placed in all important position in the conduct of our affairs here, with respect to whom, if placed in a position of importance in the judicial authority of the Federation, I do not suppose there would be any difference of opinion. I would not limit the area of selection in the slightest degree; but I would do two things. I would do this-I would say that a Judge of the Federal Court should not occupy the dual position of Judge of the Federal Court and Judge of any state court.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

That is taking the power out of the hands of the Federation, even if they desire to do that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Not at all; the Federation has no control over the state courts, and no right to dictate to the state courts, but the Federation has a right to dictate to itself, and the Federation, dictating to itself, will say-Our Judges shall by no possibility be mixed up with the local concerns of any state or with local politics." From that point of view, we in no way limit the area of selection; otherwise we know that, owing to the infirmities of human nature, men might come into the position with prejudices here and there. That is inevitable. We have only certain material to deal with, and we must deal with that material in the best way we can; but, doing that, we say whatever local limitations you have now, they will not be extended by allowing the Judges to occupy the dual office of a Judge here and a Judge there. My honorable and learned friend, the Premier of South Australia, gave away the whole situation when he said he was prepared to accept a provision that a Judge should not sit in the hearing of appeals from his own decisions. Why should he not do so? Because he would have a natural prejudice in favour of the judgment which he had given. That is founded on the general infirmity of human nature.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It is a conclusion which he has arrived at, and in which he will have to be disturbed.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
And on which he does not like to give way.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I hope not.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
The honorable gentleman is so removed from the passions and weakness of humanity, that it has never occurred to him that each a thing could take place. But that is not the case, with weaker men, whom I have met in my time. I have known men to adhere to a thing because they have said it previously. I have known men to vote against their convictions because they said:" How can I give way when I have expressed a strong opinion?"

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That must have been in South Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
No; it has occurred in the course of Sir John Downers travels.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Probably the people I have met have been of the weaker sort, but I have known that to occur, and I need not go a thousand miles away for examples. I might even find them in Victoria, when gentlemen who, even in this present Convention, during the course of its sittings, have entertained grave doubts whether they should adhere to opinions they have vehemently expressed, but who at the same time said, after expressing them so strongly, they could not see how they could go back on their previous statements, although I am sure they will do so ultimately. I am merely referring to this as an instance of the weakness which I am most painfully conscious of in myself, and I am perhaps judging my fellows by an unfair standard in reasoning from my own feelings and experience on this subject. I think that this great tribunal, of such dignity, with such responsibility, should be removed from all possible thought or shadow of prejudice or influence. If a Judge might be prejudiced in favour of his own decision so that he should not be allowed to sit upon a tribunal which is considering it, will not the same argument, though in a much smaller degree, apply to the colony which that decision might materially concern? The Judge, in the case which my honorable friend has conceived, who has decided in a certain way, should, he thinks, be excluded from being a member of a court of appeal sitting to consider his decision. Does not my honorable friend consider that he might go a little further, and say that where a question materially concerns one colony—South Australia, for example—there might be an unconscious prejudice? If he thinks that there would be no unconscious prejudice, does he not think that other people might believe that there was?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

If you regard that, where are you?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

It is almost as important that the administration of justice should be thought pure as that it should be pure. In order to produce a tribunal with such a big jurisdiction as this will have, which would be beyond all risk of public suspicion, you should surely provide that the Judges should occupy no other position than that of members of this tribunal. By that means you will have your Constitution well established in the first instance, and supported afterwards by a tribunal in which the people will have confidence. The question of expense, divided as it will be amongst these great colonies, I look upon as of no importance. We are all indebted to Mr. Glynn for his great thoroughness. He has given us some American statistics to show how small the work of the Federal Judiciary is likely to be in the first instance. I thought there was a little of the wisdom of the serpent when my honorable friend stopped at the year 1820.

Mr. GLYNN. -

From 1820 to 1830 I gave the average of cases as 58 a year.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I thought that my honorable friend did just as well to stop at a time before commerce began to make the great strides which it has since been making, and before the judicial business of the Federal Courts had become out of all proportion to that which they originally transacted.

Mr. DOBSON. -
The honorable member (Mr. Glynn) admitted that the business of the Federal Courts had grown very considerably.

Mr. SYMON. -
The Supreme Court of the United States has not a tithe of the jurisdiction which we are conferring upon this court.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Of course not. But in any case an analogy drawn from the work of the Supreme Court of the United States in 1820 or 1830 must be illusory. The courts then had nothing to do in comparison with what they have to do at the present time, and in comparison with what our courts will have to do.

Mr. DOBSON. -
How many cases does the honorable member think there will be in the first five years?

Mr. BARTON. -
How many cases do you think there will be?

Mr. DOBSON. -
About half-a-dozen.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I am glad that my honorable and learned friend has got that answer. This court is not only to have a considerable original jurisdiction, but it is to be the Appellate Court for all the courts of Australia. I will ask the question: How many appeals are there from Australia at the present time—that is, from New South Wales, Queensland, Victoria, South Australia, Tasmania, and Western Australia?

Mr. DOBSON. -
I am only alluding to appeals where the states complain that the Federal Parliament has infringed state rights.

Mr. SYMON. -
Take Canada as an illustration. Last years decisions are contained in a volume 6 inches thick.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I will first of all deal with the answer I have got. My honorable friend would propose to give this court an appellate jurisdiction in any case.
Whether it is to be a court of final jurisdiction is another question. I do not think any honorable member is prepared to say that the Federal Court should not be a Court of Appeal from the Supreme Courts of all the colonies. The question between us is: Whether it is to be a court of final appeal, or under what circumstances shall an appeal be allowed to the Queen in Council. Therefore, there was great relevance in asking how many appeals there are from the colonies.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I am serving the appeals which have reference to the Constitution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I venture to say that that is not a fair severance. If every one of us, including my honorable friend, is agreed that the Federal Court should be a Court of Appeal from the Supreme Courts of the colonies, my question is a pertinent and relevant one. If my honorable friend thinks it should not be a Court of Appeal his objection is pertinent and his answer relevant. Otherwise, his answer is unsatisfactory. This court will have a good deal to do only in dealing with appeals from the different colonies; but the matter does not end there. Does my honorable friend suppose that at the initiation of this Commonwealth the relative powers of the states and the Commonwealth will not be the subject of a good deal of question?

Mr. DOBSON. -
Yes, after the first few years.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
On the contrary, I should say during the first few years. After the first few years the difficulties will have all gone.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Then we must be doing very bad work.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Yes. At all events, we will try to make the Constitution as clear as possible.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
We are not of necessity doing bad work because we do not make provision for everything. We are dealing with the most intricate of all mercantile concerns. We have enough analogies and decisions in connexion with the American Constitution to assist us, but we have no guarantee that the views of our Federal Judiciary will always be the same as those of the American Judiciary. There may be some circumstances for which, with all ingenuity, we shall be unable to provide. In my opinion, from the very first there will be plenty of work for the Supreme Court to do to justify the establishment of this tribunal, even apart from the necessity for a constitutional Court of Appeal. In the meanwhile, of course, we have to do the best we can to make matters so clear that there need be no necessity to go to courts. The very fact of the establishment of a tribunal in which the citizens of the Commonwealth have perfect confidence, and which they know will decide only according to justice and right, will not create litigation, but prevent it, and will be a guarantee to every man, woman, and child in the Commonwealth that that which has been enacted will be carried out.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

As one of the Judiciary Committee, I think it will not be amiss for me to say that I object to both of these amendments, and I will state my reasons. I have been a good deal impressed by the argument of economy, which is really the chief argument in favour of the proposal; but if this court is to fulfil an essential function in the Commonwealth, we should not, in this Convention, adopt a cheeseparing policy. The saving of a few thousand pounds—even if it amounts to a few thousands—is a small matter as compared with the great issues which will depend upon the constitution of this court. The proposal of the South Australian Parliament is practically to allow the Federal Parliament at any time to change the character of this Supreme Court of Australia. As I interjected, so I repeat now, the Supreme Court of Australia is to be the arbiter between the Federal Parliament and the state Parliaments, and it would be most dangerous to allow the Federal Parliament a power to change the constitution of a court which will have to decide between its wishes and the rights of other parties. I would also submit that it is even more important to preserve the independence of this Federal Court in the Australian Constitution than it was in the American Constitution we have the three authorities—the Executive, the Legislative, and the Judicature—all distinct. The Executive is not controlled by the Legislature, and the Legislature is not controlled by the Executive is not controlled by the Executive; but here under responsible government—and we all assume that this Constitution will give us responsible government—the Executive and the Legislature must pull together. So long as the Executive is the creature of the Legislature so long the Legislature and it must be in harmony, and therefore we have two great powers—the Executive and Legislature—under the Australian Constitution having a great interest to pull one way, and having every temptation to so mould the character of the High Court as to get it to adopt their views. I am not speaking of merely theoretical danger. I would ask those honorable members who are familiar with what happened in connexion with the income tax dispute in the Supreme Court of United States to bear me out.
They will remember how it has been said—I hope unjustly—that, with a view of getting a reversal of a previous decision with regard to the income tax, certain Judges were appointed to the bench in America, and the income tax decision was reversed. I agree with Sir John Downer to a large extent. It is important, not only that we should keep the bench pure, but that, like Caesars wife, it should be above suspicion. In the American High Court it is the practice on occasions for the court to reverse its own decisions. The House of Lords does not do that. If that power is exercised, as I suppose it will be, in Australia, as it is in the United States, the danger will be still greater, because Parliament, by altering the number of Judges, and by making stipulations as to their appointment, could so mould the character of the High Court as to get from it a decision conformable with its own views as against the views of the state Parliament. It has been said that there will not be enough business for the court. I do not think that what happened in the United States affords any clue to the business that will be done here. In the early years of the Constitution of the United States there was very little federal business. There were then no inter-state canals, and the relations of state with state were much less intimate than they have been since the introduction of railways.

Mr. SYMON. -

What was their commerce then?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Owing to the conditions of travel it was impossible that there could be such inter-state relations and inter-state difficulties as there will be under the complexity of modern commerce, and we in Australia will share in the complexity of modern commerce, although we cannot suppose that with our small population we shall have as much legislation and as much litigation as America had in the Federal Parliament and in the Federal Court. May I also indicate to Mr Glynn, in regard to the matter of the appointment of Chief Justices, that under this clause the Executive can, if they think fit, appoint it Judge of any of the state courts as a Judge of this court?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would you be willing to make it clear that one man might hold the two offices?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think it is clear enough. The Executive have power to appoint any one.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

To hold the two offices?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Yes, but I shall point out presently why it would be inexpedient for one man to hold the two offices. Mr. Glynn is hardly correct in stating that Sir Samuel Griffith, in his Notes, recommended that the Chief Justice of each state should be appointed to the Bench of the High Court. I have in my hand his recommendation.

Mr. WALKER. -

He did not say Chief Justices, but Judges.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes. Sir Samuel Griffith says it is worthy of consideration whether it might not be wise to empower the Federal Parliament, if they think fit, to make laws authorizing the provisional constitution of the High Court in whole or part by Judges of the state courts. There is that power here. The Executive can, if they think fit, appoint any Judge. I am sure I shall not be misunderstood if I say that there is nothing in the character of the Chief Justices which render them necessarily more fit to be appointed to the High Court than any of the other Judges of the Supreme Court of a state. It is not unfair to remind honorable members that of all the Judges of the states those who are most frequently appointed by political influence are the Chief Justices. It has not, very fortunately, been the ordinary rule of late years; but in England the position of Chief Justice is more of a political appointment than that of any other Judge on the Bench. In these colonies there has been a tendency in the same direction. The Chief Justice is no more fitted merely by virtue of his office to be a Judge of the Federal Court than the Puisne Judges are. There is also this point to be considered: That if the amendment be adopted, until the Constitution is changed—and it takes a great deal to change a Constitution—the Federal Executive will be limited in its choice of Judges to the Chief Justices. It will in this respect be tied hand and foot, no matter what may be the conditions under which any state appoints its Chief Justice. It is quite true, and very happily so, that under the different Constitutions of the different states of Australia it is the practice to appoint the Chief Justice and all Judges of the Supreme Court during good behaviour. But there is nothing to hinder the Judges being made elective, as in America. There is nothing to hinder the tenure of Judges being made for a certain number of years, as in America; and I can only say, from my slight experience of the working of American courts, that I sincerely hope we shall never have our Judges elected. I sincerely hope that we shall give them the strongest tenure, and make them as independent of any man's favour and any man's hate as we possibly can. Therefore, I submit that it would be a dangerous thing for us to limit the discretion of the Federal Executive to the man whom a state might happen to appoint.
Mr. BARTON. -

Supposing a state changed its method of appointing Judges, and made them elective? Then you would have an elected Chief Justice in the state, and the Constitution prescribing that he should be a member of the High Court. Would not that destroy all the security we wish to take?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Quite so. I think I included that point in my statement, but it has been put very clearly by the leader of the Convention. You leave the states absolutely free to alter the tenure of their Judges as they like. You leave a state absolutely free to say how long a Judge is to hold his office, and also whether he shall be elected or appointed. All these conditions are left to the state, and is the Federal Executive to be limited-to be tied down hand and foot-to the appointment of whomsoever the state chooses to appoint? In these, as in other matters, I say trust the Federal Parliament, trust the Federal Executive. Let us give, as far as we can, unlimited discretion to it to get the best men, no matter where they may come from. Then there is this point, that to take the Chief Justice of each state would be a grand mistake, for this reason—it would be a mistake to drag the equal representation of states into this matter of the Judiciary. Of course, the Convention has its own view with regard to the equal representation the states in the Parliament, but I think it would be a grand mistake, at all events, to drag that into the question of the Judiciary, where a man has to act as an arbitrator, and not to look at the interests of this person or that person, but to look at what is just and what is the law. Supposing you drag in the Chief Justice of each state, there will be a strong tendency for him to feel himself the representative of his colony, and nothing could be more damaging to the cause of the Federal Court than that. I say he ought to go there wholly indifferent.

Mr. HOWE. -

He need not take part.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I say, with all respect, that it would be his duty to take part, as the law had put him there.

Mr. GLYNN. -

We could easily provide for that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I certainly think it would not be right to put the Judges in the position of feeling that they are delegates from the particular states. Then I would ask one thing further. I do not know how it is in the other colonies, but in our courts, at the beginning of the year, the Chief Justice arranges the list and fixes what the work of each Judge will be for each month-Assizes, Criminal Court, Nisi Prius, Full Court, and so on. Now, supposing an urgent application comes on for a mandamus under the original jurisdiction, in which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against the Commonwealth. That class of cases is one which should be dealt with urgently on the moment. There may be many a time when the whole of the machinery of government may depend upon whether the officer of the Commonwealth is to do thing, or to do that. Supposing there is an application under the original jurisdiction for a mandamus or prohibition, are they to wait until they call arrange that all the Chief Justices of the five or six Colonies find a month in which they could sit to hear this application for a mandamus? I feel that here there would be a practical objection, on which I would appeal to business men. Are the delays of the courts to be added to by having the High Court of Australia to wait until they can find Chief Justices able to give a few days to this thing or that thing? A banker, for example, wants to have his cases decided quickly.

Mr. HOWE. -

The Judges can go home on twelve months leave of absence when necessary.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not understand the honorable member's interjection. At all events we ought not, under the plea of economy-though we ought to regard economy-to commit ourselves to a measure which may injure the efficiency of the court and the rapidity with which the court is to do its work.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

It requires a certain amount of courage for me, as a layman, to speak on a subject of this sort, but as I had the honour of a seat on the Judiciary Committee I presume I am supposed to have looked into this matter. The Privy Council at the present time, I understand, desires to have representatives of the colonies on that body, presuming that such Judges have a special knowledge of colonial law. The Chief Justice of South Australia is a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council, and, I believe, recently sat on the Council. One advantage of having a choice, at all events, of state Judges for the High Court would be the probability of having some person there who would have a special knowledge of the laws of the state in which

I take leave to submit, as a question deserving of serious consideration, whether the work that would fall to a Federal Supreme Court is likely for some years to be sufficient to warrant the immediate creation of a complete separate judicial establishment.
Mr. SYMON. -
That was not the opinion he expressed in 1891.

Mr. WALKER. -
I am not responsible for his opinion in 1891. I believe it is not unusual for some lawyers to change their opinions according to the side by which they are engaged from day to day.

Mr. BARTON. -
You ought to have learnt more than that on the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. WALKER. -
Of course, Sir Samuel Griffith admits that-
The arguments in favour of an independent Federal Judiciary are obvious, and are, no doubt, very cogent. It might indeed be necessary-
And I think here we shall agree with him.
to have one or two exclusively Federal Judges to preserve the continuity of the tribunal, and to organize and supervise its machinery.

When the time comes, I trust that Mr. Glynn will slightly amend his proposed amendment, so as to have, at all events, two Judges who are purely Federal Judges, and that temporarily the quorum of Judges necessary may be made up by Judges of the state courts. With regard to the difficulty which my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins) has alluded to of getting representatives from the state courts, that might be obviated by their obtaining leave of absence now and again for three or four months to attend the Sittings of the Federal Judiciary.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
How are they to foresee which months they will be wanted in?

Mr. WALKER. -
I understand, although not a lawyer, that there are certain vacations-ordinary vacations-and, moreover, that it is not a matter of difficulty, as Mr. Howe interjected just now, for the Judges to obtain leave of absence pretty frequently for one reason or another. Surely then such an important matter as the laws of the Federation would justify the respective Supreme Courts in granting leave of absence. Be that as it may, I agree with Sir John Downer that after a time the matter of expense is not to be considered very greatly. At first, however, it is a very serious matter. Every day we find persons objecting to federation on the ground of expense, and they seem to think, uncharitable people as they are, that the constitution of this Convention, which only includes 24 lawyers out of 50 members, affects, to some extent, our opinion with regard to the necessity for a Federal Judiciary.

Mr. REID. -
If the people think that, why did they elect the 24 to the Convention?
Mr. WALKER. -

I think that they showed their wisdom in that. I have very great respect for the legal fraternity myself, and I do not wish to speak of them except in the most complimentary manner, but as a layman it is my intention to support Mr. Glynn, if he will amend his amendment in a certain direction. Of course, at present we are not dealing with the whole subject of appeals to the Privy Council. When the time comes to debate that question I shall have an opportunity of saying something more on the subject.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

While we all respect the opinion of Sir Samuel Griffith, we have to act on our own judgment in this matter, and I think our own judgment must tell us that such a proposal as my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Glynn) has made will not bear serious consideration for a moment. It is open to the objection at once that gentlemen representing primarily their own colonies because they do so are to have seats on the Bench. The very statement of that proposition is enough to defeat it. My right honorable and learned friend (Mr. Kingston) said: Why not take the reverse of this proposition, and why have Commonwealth Judges only? Well, sir, what is a Commonwealth Judge? A Judge who has equally dear to him every part of the Commonwealth, and who has no partiality for one part more than another.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

He is to prefer the whole to the part, because there may be disputes.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, he should prefer the whole as it stands, as he thinks it really is, rather than seek the advantage of any particular part. No one would suspect a Commonwealth Judge of favouring one part of the Commonwealth more than another, and it is for that reason that the whole of Australia would have confidence in him. I can see that there is a question of economy concerned, but I do not think that that question should be countenanced for one moment in this regard. Economy may be very expensive, and in the administration of justice it is altogether too expensive. If there is one moment more than another when a strong Judiciary is needed, in which unbounded confidence is to be placed, such a Judiciary is required for this Commonwealth when the Constitution first comes into operation. We are taking infinite trouble to express what we mean in this Constitution; but as in America so it will be here, that the makers of the Constitution were not merely the Conventions who sat, and the states who ratified their conclusions, but the Judges of the Supreme Court. Marshall, Jay, Storey, and all the rest of the renowned Judges who have pronounced on the Constitution, have had just as much to do in shaping it as the men who sat in the original Conventions. I therefore think that, at the beginning, we should take the utmost care to establish a Judiciary to effectuate the work we are here preparing. I do not think we can guard against everything. I know very well that the Parliament will have an immense power, and we know that the Executive in America, as Mr. Higgins has said, have degraded the influence of the Supreme Court. But that has been done in a way that could not be prevented, and we cannot prevent it here. There will, however, be less reason for it here than in America, and I will tell honorable members why. What was done in the United States? Shortly after the American war there was an issue of United States notes, and the question arose (which was carried to the Supreme Court) whether Congress could make those notes legal tender. It was decided by the bench—not the full bench of nine Judges, because one of them was ill or absent from some other cause—that the notes were not legal tender. The American Constitution—and this is the lesson which we ought to learn—is practically not susceptible to amendment. There was no means whatever of amending the Constitution so as to do what the people and Congress desired, to make the notes legal tender. What was the only way open? It was this. It just happened that a vacancy took place on the Supreme Court Bench, and then Congress passed a Bill adding one to the number of the Supreme Court Judges, and they took very good care to appoint a man to that position Upon whom it was known they could rely. The question was again agitated, and the Supreme Court Bench reversed

the former decision. That was one of their ways of amending the American Constitution. I trust we shall remember that instance when we are dealing with clauses relating to the amendment of the Constitution. What I have described was done by the republican party, but the other party cannot claim to be much better in principle. What happened at the last Presidential election? The democrats, knowing the decision of the Supreme Court as to the income tax—a most unfortunate decision, because it says (in accordance no doubt with the Constitution) that direct taxation must be according to population, and not according to the capacity of the individual to bear it—came to the conclusion that they would have to carry their point by altering the Supreme Court, and there was accordingly a proposal in the platform of the democratic party to take the same course as was taken in regard to the United States notes. We cannot prevent Parliament adding to the number of the Judges of the Supreme Court. We can only prescribe a minimum, at all events, so that there shall be a strong guarantee to the Commonwealth, when it comes into operation, that there shall be a bench of such ability as we can secure, and in which we can all place confidence in the fairness and impartiality of its decisions as to the meaning of this Constitution and every part of it. That duty of course will not end with the first few years of the Federation, but I again say that the proposal of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Glynn) should not be supported by this Convention.

Mr. LEAKE (Western Australia). -

I object to this proposal on two grounds-on the one hand that it is inconvenient, and on the other hand that it is inconsistent. It is inconvenient for this reason: That the Chief Justices of the different colonies are prevented from discharging the duties which devolve upon them in their own various states. Take, for instance, the case of a Judge coming from the remote West. He would have to be away from his local duties for such a considerable time that it must necessarily interfere with the due administration of justice in his own courts. In Western Australia, as also in South Australia, we have three Judges. The Full Court consists of three Judges. And how in these colonies, in the absence of the Chief Justice, could the business of the courts go on? It would have to be suspended during the absence of the Chief Justice. The proposal is inconsistent, I submit, upon this ground-that while the Chief Justices of the colonies are drawing their salaries from their particular states, the Federal Government would not be paying their Judges the full amount of their salaries, but would be asking the states to contribute in that direction. With regard to the question as to insufficiency of work for the Federal Judges, I agree with those honorable members who have ventured to say that there will be ample work from the very commencement for the whole Federal Bench. Moreover, it seems to me that if you place the Federal Judges in the position of ex officio members of the High Court, you will derogate from the dignity of their position. On these grounds I intend to oppose the amendment. It has been said by other members that the choice of the Federal Government is limited. Why should that choice be limited merely to the judicial bench, and not to the bar of Australia? There are honorable members sitting in this House representing New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, who are well qualified to adorn the Judicial Bench of Australia.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I find that we are discussing one thing, whilst the amendment before the Chair is another. The sooner we get back into some regular practice the better. I would suggest that we should dispose of the amendment before the Convention, which, as I understand, proposes to insert in the beginning of the clause the words "Unless the Parliament otherwise provides." It occurs to me that one of the essential features of this Convention should be a federal judicial power. That is a power that is absolutely necessary, and I shall therefore prefer to vote against the amendment, because the amendment would make the judicial power of the Commonwealth the creature of the Federal Parliament. The clause, as it stands, places the Federal Court in the bed-rock of the Constitution.

The amendment was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will point out to Mr. Glynn that there is an amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of South Australia to omit all the words from "a," immediately preceding the words "Chief Justice," with a view to the insertion of the words "Judge from the Supreme Court of each state, one of whom shall act as the Chief Justice." I will put the question-That the words proposed by the Legislative Council of South Australia to be inserted, after the word "a," be so inserted. If they are not inserted, then Mr. Glynn can move his amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

It is now proposed by Mr. Glynn to insert, after the word "and," in the seventh line of the clause, the following words, "until Parliament shall otherwise provide, the Chief Justices of the states." So that the latter part of the clause will read, if this amendment is carried-

The High Court shall Consist of a Chief Justice, and, until Parliament shall otherwise provide, the Chief Justices of the states.

Question-That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The next amendment, to omit the words "not less than four," is suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, and the Legislative Council of Tasmania.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I think this is a most sensible amendment, because the effect of the amendment will be that if it be found necessary to have four Judges of the Supreme Court, in addition to the Chief Justice, there would be no difficulty in the way, but it might be, at the beginning of the Commonwealth and for a very long time, that the Chief Justice, with two other Justices, would form a sufficient bench.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I think that the amendment has a great deal more meaning in it than perhaps the honorable member who has just spoken would suppose. At first I myself was disposed to think that the number of Supreme Court Judges of the Commonwealth might be left in the hand's of the Federal Parliament, but an argument that has been used by Mr. Isaacs just now very strongly points to the conclusion I think, that it is just as important that the minimum number of Judges of the Supreme Court should be fixed as that the court itself should be constituted. The argument in favour of the amendment is simply an argument that it will save expense. I cannot perceive any other argument in favour of it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Well, that is a good one.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is under certain circumstances, but it all depends upon what price you pay for the money you save, and it may be very dear economy.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
They could always be added to.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

One of the reasons why you wish to place this Constitution upon a foundation which will insure that you will have a tribunal which will equitably and impartially decide between the states, is that that is the guarantee of fairness which each state and each individual has in the foundation of the Constitution. One can quite foresee occasions in which the interpretation of a law—whether it be a state law or whether it be a Commonwealth law—may involve exceedingly high feeling in the states and in the Commonwealth. It may be a matter of the most immense importance to the Commonwealth that a particular law should be decided to be valid. It may be a matter involving political issues of a very grave character, and it may be that the whole question in issue between strong contending parties in the state will have to be decided by a Judge or by the Judges of the Federal Court. One can easily understand that if a decision is given against the view of a strong majority in Parliament, there will be very great temptation to an Executive, in the event of a vacancy occurring, not to fill up that vacancy if, by so doing, it can insure a majority in the court of the states.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Look at it the other way.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is exactly the same kind of case which the Attorney-General of Victoria alluded to in the instance he cited in the history of the United States.

Mr. GORDON. -

If they can appoint in that way, there is nothing in your argument.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

If they can appoint another Judge undoubtedly, but if, by not appointing a Judge, they can get a majority or an equal number in the court which will decide the question as they wish, there will be a strong temptation on the part of the Federal Government to do that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is much easier to do that than to appoint another Judge.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is much easier to do that which involves not making an appointment, than to make an appointment which will involve an expenditure of money.

Mr. SYMON. -

And which will be much more open to criticism.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It would be obvious to every one that it would be done for one purpose, and that was to secure a particular decision.

Mr. GORDON. -

You would have to get a Judge to die first.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Perhaps this power will have to be carried out in the first instance by the passing of a federal statute which will appoint a certain number of Judges and fix their remuneration. No additional Judge can be appointed without passing a new Act, and the object of passing a new Act will be so obvious that the probabilities are that, except in circumstances of very strong temptation, the Federal Parliament will not pass any such Act; and if it does it will have to be by the concurrence of both Houses of the Federal Parliament. The appointment has to be made by the Executive, and the Executive, representing only the majority in the House of Representatives, may feel so strongly about one of these measures that it may omit to make an appointment, and what is there to force it to make an appointment if these courts are to be constituted of such number of Judges as may be determined? What we should secure in the appointment of the Federal Judiciary is that its constitution shall be certain and, above all things, that its constitution shall be such that neither by any act of commission, nor by any act of omission, it shall be rendered ineffective or warped from its purpose of deciding according to the most absolute right upon all questions of the Constitution. Inasmuch as the only argument in favour of this amendment—that is, the saving of the expense which may be involved in the appointment of one or more extra Judges—is a very weak one, especially when we remember that you will always have just the same vigilant criticism of expenditure in the Federal Parliament as you have in the local Parliament, and you will have just the same strong objection to increasing the number of judicial officers that obtains, and very properly obtains, all through Australia, you can very well trust to that to insure economy; but do not, by carrying an amendment of this sort on the ground that you are effecting an economy, run the great risk of placing in the hands of the Federal Parliament and the federal authority a means of interfering with the courts of justice.

Mr. LEAKE (Western Australia). -

I hope that the committee will not accept the amendment. This question was very well thrashed out before the Judiciary Committee. The principal reason which influenced the members of the committee in fixing the minimum of four Judges was that, inasmuch as the Federal Court would really exercise in chief an appellate jurisdiction, it would appear to be inconsistent that by any possibility two Judges of Federal Court should have it in the power to upset the decision of five or seven Judges in a state.

Mr. FRASER. -
It is the weight of numbers.

Mr. LEAKE. -
I think there is always wisdom in numbers. We have been told that very often.

Mr. SYMON. -
And there is strength.

Mr. ISAACS. -
And safety.

Mr. LEAKE. -
I would rather accept the unanimous judgment of seven Judges than the divided judgment of three Judges. For that reason, I think we had far better make this judicial body as powerful as it is possible for us to do. Nobody can say that small matters will first arise. It is quite possible that the first appeal to the Federal Court may be one of first and prime importance, and it is improbable the first decision of the Federal Court can by any possibility give rise to friction or dissatisfaction either in any one of the states or in the Commonwealth. For these reasons I oppose this amendment.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
The whole object of this clause is to establish by the Constitution a Federal High Court. If this amendment is carried the result will be that you will have a Federal High Court established without any fixed minimum to constitute the bench. The thing seems to me perfectly absurd. There may be a difference of opinion as to whether we should have a minimum of two or a minimum of four. That is another thing; but if you wipe this out altogether you may as well wipe out the whole thing. If you are going to establish a court which is going to be symmetrical at all, you must have it constituted in some way or other with a minimum, leaving it, of course, as the exigencies of business require, to be increased by the federal authority empowered to do it.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I rise to ask you, sir, to put the question on this amendment in such a way that I shall not be precluded afterwards from moving to strike out "four," with a view to insert "two" in lieu thereof. I am not prepared to vote for the amendment now before the committee, but presently I shall desire to substitute the word "two" for the word "four," because I do not agree with the honorable member (Mr. Leake) that the decisions of this court will be the more weighty because of the greater number of Judges of it. I believe that the knowledge of the Judges, their learning, their experience, and the weight of the men themselves, will be the chief factors in the respect paid to any decision of the court.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I will put the question in such a form that the proposition as to whether there should be a minimum or not can be decided. The question is-
That the words "not less than" stand part of the question.

Mr. PEACOCK (Victoria). -
I hope that this amendment will not be accepted. One of the strongest reasons which prevails in the minds of the public outside for accepting the Federal Constitution is the fact that a strong Federal Court will be established. I am only a lay member of the Convention, but my experience of the Judiciary Committee, and my general reading, have shown me that the liberties of th

Mr. HOWE. -
But there is no need to be extravagant.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
Quite so; but the question of a few thousand pounds ought not to be taken into consideration. When we remember that this Federal Court will have to deal with important matters affecting the liberties of the people, we are all desirous of seeing a strong Federal Court established, and appeals should be decided without incurring the large expenditure which is now involved in the case of appeals to the Privy Council. I am confident the people are desirous of not seeing this provision weakened—that they would rather see it strengthened. I therefore hope the amendment will be rejected.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK (Tasmania). -
I cannot see that the amendment will weaken the Federal Court, inasmuch as it does not suggest that the number of Judges should be limited in any way. It only strikes out a limitation which is undesirable at the present time. We talk a great deal about trusting the Federal Parliament and Executive. May we not well trust them to fix upon the number of Judges required in this court in the first instance, to fix upon a number which will be sufficient and necessary, and, I hope, competent to do all the work of appeals? That can be very well done whether we strike out these words and insert nothing else, or whether we strike out the word "four" and insert "two" instead of "one." I shall certainly support the amendment that you, sir, are now going to put, and the retention of the rest of the clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I think it would not be economy—it would be simply parsimony—to cut down the number of Judges. After the fullest consideration that I have now been able to give to the matter, I think it would be a great inducement for the people of the various colonies to accept the Constitution in view of the immense issues at stake in that acceptance, if they know that there is a guarantee to them within the four corners of the Constitution, and that it is beyond the power of the Federal Parliament to alter it, that we shall have a Supreme Court of a certain magnitude and power. Do honorable members who support the amendment consider that if there was a question relating to their state involving, it might be, practically the existence of that state, its power of taxation, its rights over rivers, over territories of various kinds, that they would be more content to have that immense question decided by five Judges than by three-by two it might be?
There might be one on either side, and that would mean that the state would have its future position determined under the Constitution of the Federation, and under their own Constitution, by the casting vote of one out of three. I am prepared to believe that the people of these colonies, when they are told that they are committing these vast issues to the Federation, and that the provisions in this Constitution go safeguarded by a Supreme Court of not less than five Judges, will feel an immensely greater amount of confidence in saying "Yes" to the great question which I hope will be soon submitted to them.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

My honorable friend (Mr. Peacock) spoke of expense as a matter in which we should not play to the gallery; but I can assure the honorable member that the gallery is more interested in the question than any other, because they have to find the money. The gallery may criticize this provision in its present shape in this way. There are a great many allusions made, and perhaps improperly made, as to the number of lawyers in this Convention, and it might be an object of sinister criticism that we should be careful to provide that there shall not be less than four Judges. It might be an observation upon that, that if it is necessary to fix a minimum it is necessary, in order to secure the independence of the court, that there should be a maximum, because you can swamp a court of five if the maximum is left open to the Executive. There might be only perhaps one of a majority in some moment of great political excitement, when, perhaps a burning question would be before the federal tribunal. When we turn to the United states, and the honorable member (Mr. ISAACS) knows better than I do what has happened in that great country in reference to the bench-

Mr. ISAACS. -

The only difference is that we can at present judge of our existing requirements, but we cannot tell what will be the future requirements of the Federation.

Mr. REID. -

I fancy that it is not always the most numerous bench that is the strongest; it does not follow. I have seen in the law reports some knotty questions referred to a large number of English Judges, perhaps fifteen, and I have found that the decision was given by eight Judges to seven. I do not call that a strong bench, or a strong decision. It is a very weak decision and a very weak bench when the members are divided in that way. The number does not always show the strength of the bench; that would depend upon the individuals upon the bench. Whatever the number may be, whether it is one, three, or six, it strikes me it would be quite possible that, with the Chief Justice and two Judges, we should have a stronger bench than if there were the Chief Justice and four Judges. I mean in the intellectual sense, and in the sense of commanding the approval and confidence of the public. I quite see that it would not do to limit this in any very arbitrary way, but if there is to be a limit on one side there should also be a limit on the other, in the interests of the independence of the bench. Therefore, under the circumstances, I am prepared to vote for an amendment which will fix both the minimum and the maximum. Of course, if the working of the Constitution requires a larger number later on, there is no doubt that would not be a matter of political excitement in the states. A time could be chosen when it would not be, and it ought not to be very difficult to get an amendment of the Constitution on that point. In the great United States there are 70,000,000 people, and it will be a long time before we have such a population. I believe that on constitutional questions the quorum of the United States Federal Bench is nine, and on other questions five. If we allow for the development of numerical strength, and if we have a court consisting of the Chief Justice and four other Judges, we will provide a very strong Supreme Court for many years to come.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What words would the honorable member suggest?

Mr. REID. -

The present amendment, I believe, is to alter the clause so that it should read "not less than two."

The CHAIRMAN. -

The present amendment is to leave out "not less than" so as to decide whether there should be a minimum or not.

Mr. REID. -
I am not in favour of such an amendment. I am in favour of an amendment defining a maximum and a minimum. If that fails, I am in favour of having neither a maximum nor a minimum.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

The argument of my right honourable friend (Mr. Reid) is one which has often recommended itself to me when I have held strong views upon a subject, and have felt that the people were against me. I have known the superiority of one man to the many, and the advantage of having a dictator who understands exactly what he wants, and can avoid that appearance of weakness which arises from differences of opinion.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Providing he is of your own mind.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Of course. The proposal now before the committee is to leave it absolutely to the Federal Parliament to say whether there shall be one Judge or a dozen. As to that, I think my honorable friend and myself are entirely agreed.

Mr. REID. -

Cannot the honorable member see the danger of a provision which leaves it open to the Executive to appoint any number of Judges?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is not the Executive, but the Parliament, who appoints the Judges.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

This court, after the establishment of the Constitution, will not merely have to decide as to the relative powers of the state; it will be a Court of Appeal from the Supreme Court of the various states. Those courts may be composed of any number of Judges up to six or more, and I think that an appellate tribunal of two would not, under such circumstances, give satisfactory results. The same argument might be used, in degree, in connexion with any less number. The first thing we have to do is to establish a Supreme Court composed of a sufficient number of Judges to enable the people to place confidence in it. The suggestion of the honorable member (Mr. Holder) was that the number of Judges should be limited to two.

Mr. WALKER. -

Not less than two.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Well, I think that such a provision would be unsatisfactory upon the face of it. It might be, as the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) put it—that one man might have brains enough for the whole concern. One man might be able to manage the whole Commonwealth better than any number of men could do it, but he would not give satisfaction, because other people would differ from him in opinion. You must have more than one Judge, if not to produce competency, to preserve confidence. The question is, what minimum can we fix? Four is a very low number.

Mr. WALKER. -

Four, and a Chief Justice.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think that that is a smaller number than was at first proposed. I think that the original number was seven, and that in Adelaide we reduced it. If we go on in this way we shall reduce the Supreme Court to a condition which I think will be extremely unsatisfactory, so far as the probability of obtaining the confidence of the people is concerned. There are two propositions before us. The first is to leave this matter to the Commonwealth; and there is a great deal in what the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) said upon this question. If we leave the matter to the Commonwealth we are giving it power to appoint a tribunal which is to decide upon the conflicting claims of the states and the Commonwealth.

Mr. WALKER. -

Do you not trust the Commonwealth?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Of course we trust the Commonwealth entirely, within the sphere of legislation that we bestow upon them. We trust their discretion absolutely; but when we come to the constitutional question of the legal rights of the Commonwealth we define them by fixed legislation. Otherwise there would be no object in having a Supreme Court to decide between the Commonwealth and the states upon perfectly bonâ fide questions. We trust the Commonwealth entirely within the limits of the Constitution, and in respect to the exercise of the powers we bestow upon them. But we have two objects. One is to preserve the states, and the other to establish the Commonwealth. Therefore we have a third party, the Federal Court, which is to have no voice in the exercise of the discretion of either of them, but must decide when either party is acting beyond its constitutional rights. If we establish this body we ought to establish it ourselves. The argument that it is to stand between the Commonwealth and the Parliament is a very powerful argument in support of the contention of the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) that we should establish this body ourselves, and not leave to the Commonwealth the power of frittering away the protection we give by the establishment of this tribunal.

Mr. BARTON. -

You must make the Constitution yourself; but you must trust the Commonwealth for legislation within the Constitution. That is what we mean.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

And that is what I mean.

Mr. REID. -

Still you do not leave the Commonwealth the option of saying that there shall be only three Judges.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The view which the right honorable member took, though I do not agree with the manner in which he introduced it, had the merit of being absolutely logical. If you have to establish this court fixed and immutable, to stand between the Commonwealth and the states, establish it fixed and immutable, and do not give to the Federal Parliament the power of appointing more Judges than you have nominated. At the same time, I do not think it expedient to adopt this course. I think it would be wiser to leave the provision just as it is. I think that, the proposed number of Judges is certainly not too large.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Not too large as a maximum.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

You cannot tell.

Mr. REID. -

There is no enthusiasm about appointing Judges of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

There is no enthusiasm about appointing Judges anywhere; but when disputes arise between the states, or between a state and the Commonwealth, there will be much enthusiasm in finding out the value of the power which is to decide between them. Under these circumstances I think it well to fix a maximum, and to leave to the development of events the appointment of new Judges, if that becomes necessary. The position of the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) is quite logical. If you follow it to the bitter end, all the arguments in favour of appointing the tribunal and fixing the number of its members point to the necessity of making that number permanent. Still, we have to add to that a little, and, having provided that this number shall be fixed, I think we should leave it to the development of events to decide whether more Judges should be appointed. For my part, I hope the clause will remain as at present. To say that the Commonwealth can decide as they please would be practically to take away a large proportion of the protection. They might appoint one man to do what they wanted. They might, of course, appoint four men to do what they wanted, but, still there is a certain safety in numbers. I agree with Mr. Reid that, after all, the opinion of one man may be better than the opinion of a dozen but still, in the establishment of our judicial tribunals, we have always found it necessary to appoint Judges in numerical proportion to the importance of the work they have to do. Under these circumstances, I think four is the lowest number we should fix in the first instance.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

As there seems to be some diffidence and modesty on the part of legal members in dealing with a question of this kind, I might be allowed to wind up the debate. It seems to me that the question of expense and of the work to be done ought not to enter into this discussion. We have simply to decide what is the number of Judges that will meet with the confidence of the people of Australia. If I recollect rightly, there was a great deal of discussion on this question before, and Mr Symon, who was the principal member of the Judiciary Committee, had his views altered on that question.
It does seem to me, having regard to the momentous matters which this tribunal will have to decide, that we must have: a sufficient number to give that friction of human intellect which is so necessary. Of course, if you get a Marshall as a Chief Justice, and two other men of equal calibre, that might be sufficient, but taking things according to ordinary chances it seems to me that we should require a tribunal of at least five Judges to give complete satisfaction. Furthermore, although this is a court of a peculiar character, I take it there will be cases of different kinds and, although I am not a lawyer, I know that the legal fraternity give their attention to the different views of any subject with which they have to deal. In a tribunal of that kind you would probably have all the varieties of intellect and knowledge necessary. But I doubt whether that would be so if the number of Judges were, less than five. The whole question should rest on the appropriateness of the number, and the legal members of this Convention know how to deal with that point better than the ordinary layman.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There is a difficulty arising out of this clause which has not yet been pointed out. On the coming into force of this Constitution, it will be necessary to constitute a Federal Court as soon as possible, because there will be business coming to it by way of appeals from other courts, not to speak of the possibility of cases arising under its original jurisdiction, that will have to be attended to. As the clause stands now, the High Court is to consist of a Chief Justice, and so many other Justices not less than four, as Parliament may from time to time prescribe. The question has to be considered whether the Judges, other than the Chief Justice, would not have to be appointed after the passing of a prescriptive law by Parliament. In that case the functions of the Supreme Court, excepting in so far as the Chief Justice could exercise them, would not in the meanwhile come into operation. After the passing of a prescriptive law, the appointments would be made by the Governor-General in Council. This is a difficulty that may arise. Unless it is made clear that the Chief Justice and all the original members of the High Court are to be appointed in the first instance by the Executive, there is a danger of there being no Federal Court, excepting in so far as one man can constitute it, until a law has been passed by the Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

At what salary would the one man constitute it?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is very hard to say. This is a difficulty that might very well be taken into consideration by the Convention. It has been arranged that we shall adjourn early to-day, and I thought that I might mention this matter, in order that some of my legal colleagues in the Convention might bring their acute intelligence to bear upon it to see if there is not some way in which the Federal Court could be constituted, at as early a period as practicable, of a Chief Justice and some minimum number of Judges.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That particular point was noticed by the Victorian Parliament, as will be seen from one of the amendments suggested by them.

Mr. BARTON. -

It has not been noticed in the Convention, and it was not noticed in the New South Wales Parliament. It is worthy of attention, because honorable members will see the immense importance of placing the Federal Court in such a position that it will be able to deal with the business that is brought before it at an early period. If that is not done, the business will have to wait until all the preparations are made for a general election, and until Parliament has dealt with other urgent matters and is in a position to pass the necessary Act. In the meantime the cases will either not be brought before the court at all, or those who have them in hand will suffer a denial or a delay of justice.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will the honorable member look at the amendment suggested by the Victorian Parliament in clause 72? It was to insert after "Shall," in subsection (1), the words "have such qualifications as the Parliament may prescribe and shall."
Mr. BARTON. -
That would scarcely touch the difficulty, which is that until Parliament has passed a prescriptive Act no Federal Court can sit.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Of course, but the point was under consideration.

Mr. BARTON. -
I would suggest to honorable members that we should consider some modification of the clause, with a view of meeting that difficulty. My own view is that some provision should be inserted, by which there could be appointed, as early as possible, the Chief Justice and a minimum number of Puisne Judges-say three-and that that should be the number of the constituted court until Parliament thinks it necessary to make an increase. I throw this out as a suggestion before I move to report progress, because I think we are all interested in seeing that this matter takes proper shape. I beg now to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

REPRESENTATION OF QUEENSLAND.

The PRESIDENT. -
I have to report to the Convention the receipt this afternoon, from the Acting Premier of Queensland (Sir Horace Tozer), of a letter which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CLERK then read the following letter:-

Chief Secretary's Office,
Brisbane, 25th January, 1898.

Sir,-With reference to my letter of the 29th September last, and to previous correspondence on the subject of the adjournment of the Federal Convention for the purpose of enabling representatives of this colony to take part in its deliberations, I beg now to inform you that, as soon as practicable after the return of the Prime Minister from England, a Bill, of which I enclose a copy herewith for your information, was prepared to provide for the representation of the colony at the Convention. The Bill was introduced, and read a first time, in the Legislative Assembly on the 11th November, and the second reading was moved on the 20th of the same month. An amendment proposed by Mr. G.S. Curtis, junior member for Rockhampton, having for its object the withdrawal of the Bill, was carried by 29 to 27.

The Government, having made a determined endeavour to give effect to the resolution of the Assembly with the result above indicated, did not feel it possible to do anything further in the matter, and it only remains for me to express the sincere regret felt by the Government that their efforts in the cause of federation have not been supported by Parliament.

I have the honour to be,

(For the Chief Secretary) Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

HORACE TOZER.

The Right Hon. C.C. KINGSTON, P.C.,

President,

Australasian Federal Convention.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move that the letter be recorded on the minutes.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

At an earlier stage I predicted, not only in South Australia but at the Convention in Sydney, that there was no sincerity in the proposals of the Government of Queensland with regard to this question of federation. I pointed out over and over again that the Government of Queensland never submitted a proposal to the Legislature which they could reasonably expect would be accepted by the people of Queensland. It is idle to say that it was on account of the action of Mr. Curtis that the Bill was rejected; the Bill was rejected because the Queensland Government were afraid to trust the people with electing the members of the Convention. If in the earlier stages, after the agreement of the Premiers in Tasmania, the Government of Queensland had taken the same steps to seek the same legislation as the other colonies did, I have not the slightest doubt that they would have been successful with the Parliament of that colony. But what did they propose? They proposed to allow the two Houses to select members to send to the Convention. Naturally enough that was rejected by the people of Queensland. They have never yet made a proposal by which the people of Queensland have been offered an opportunity of selecting their representatives.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That was done in this Bill.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

No. I maintain that the Government Bill did not do that. It did not give to the Queensland people that opportunity which Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, and Tasmania have given to the people of those colonies. I am very pleased to have this opportunity of saying all that I desired to say on a previous occasion. I only hope the leader of the Convention will see his way to send a congratulatory address to Sir Horace Tozer for having written this letter to the Convention.
Mr. WALKER (New South Wales) rose to speak.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -
Mr. President, I desire to ask you, on a point of order, whether this discussion is in accordance with our standing orders?
The PRESIDENT. -
I think the discussion is in order in connexion with the consideration of a communication from the Government of Queensland. It was my duty to bring that communication before the Convention, and it opens the subject.
Mr. WALKER. -
With all due respect to my honorable and learned friend (Sir Joseph Abbott), he has evidently spoken under a misapprehension. The very Bill which was defeated was intended to carry out the intention settled upon by the other colonies except Western Australia.
Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
No.
Mr. WALKER. -
With regard to making Queensland one constituency, I may point out that any one who knows anything about the politics of Queensland must know that there are three divisions in that colony. At the present time Her Majesty has the prerogative of dividing off from Queensland any portion of it on receiving a petition from the inhabitants; but it came to the knowledge of the representatives of Northern and Central Queensland that if Queensland came into the Convention no separation of Queensland could ever take place unless the Parliament in Brisbane consented, and that is really the reason why-I think very foolishly-the representatives of Northern and Central Queensland opposed the Bill. I believe that the Queensland Government acted honestly in this matter right through. I believe in the honesty of Sir Hugh Nelson. He has not been what you might call a strong federationist, but he is an honorable man, and when he says a thing he means it. I beg, as an old Queenslander, to repudiate the idea that the Queensland Government has acted otherwise than honorably.

[P.295] starts here

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I would like to point out that what has been, urged by Sir Joseph Abbott may be very truthful as comment, but it does not really affect a motion of this kind, because it is our duty to record this matter on the minutes in pursuance of the course which was followed before. We had correspondence from Queensland which asked us to make an adjournment for them, and we acceded to that request, first placing the correspondence on the minutes. It is only in accordance with the fitness of things, therefore, as well as an act of official courtesy, that the Queensland Government should send the communication which has been read, and that we should put that communication on the minutes, in order to make the history of the matter complete. This is the whole object of the motion. For my part, I do not find fault with the action of the Government of Queensland with regard to their Bill. I read the debate on that Bill carefully, and it seemed to arise from the unfortunate inter-provincial divisions which exist in Queensland—not locally defined, but, nevertheless, very strong—that such a course was taken as resulted in the defeat of the Bill. The Ministry themselves offered to listen to a proposal of the kind made by Mr. Curtis if brought forward in committees proposal for the division of the colony into three for purposes of voting. They said they might not vote for that proposal, but, nevertheless, they would accept the amendment if it was carried. They made the fairest possible offer, in my opinion, and it was not their fault that the proposal was not accepted. Of course I have nothing to say with reference to the attitude of the people of Queensland. How far they are in favour of federation will be disclosed when they take a vote on the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at seven minutes past four o'clock, until Monday, 31st January.
Monday, 31st January, 1898.

Leave of Absence: Mr. Brunker - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

In the absence of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, I beg to move the motion standing in his name:--

That one week's leave of absence be granted to the Hon. Mr. Brunker, on account of illness.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from Friday, 28th January) was resumed on clause 71, which was as follows:-

The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in one Supreme Court, to be called the High Court of Australia, and in such other courts as the Parliament may from time to time create or invest with federal jurisdiction. The High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and so many other Justices, not less than four, as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe;

and on the amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, the Legislative Assembly of Victoria, and the Legislative Council of Tasmania, to omit "not less than four."

The CHAIRMAN. -

In putting the question I will leave out "four," in order that the number may be afterwards decided.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Since we met on Friday, following out the suggestion I then made that there should be some means by which the judicial machinery of the Commonwealth might be put in motion as soon as occasion required.

and also having in view the general feeling that seems to exist that a minimum and maximum number of Judges would be a wise thing to provide, I have drafted another amendment. Of course, before this amendment can be put, leave would have to be given for the present parliamentary amendment to be withdrawn, as mine is a prior amendment.
I suggest that the latter part of the clause be amended to read as follows:-

The High Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and three other Justices. The Parliament may, nevertheless, increase or diminish the number of Justices from time to time, but so that there shall be not less than three nor more than six Justices in addition to the Chief Justice.

Of course, the numbers are subject to alteration.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

How does the word "diminish" come in?

Mr. BARTON. -

Because Parliament may have increased the number to more than three in addition to the Chief Justice, so as to have, say, five Justices, and it may afterwards seem good for Parliament to decrease that number. The word "diminish" is, therefore, necessary to prevent the decrease below the minimum number, so that Parliament will have a free hand within the limits of the minimum and maximum prescribed.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

But not to affect any existing Judge.

Mr. BARTON. -

Of course. Parliament would not do that. The mode of expression I have used in my amendment is something like that adopted in a previous clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I am afraid I cannot put that amendment, because I think the committee have already decided that the words "and so many other Justices" shall stand. Therefore, we cannot amend any part of the clause prior to those words.

Mr. BARTON. -

In that case I shall have to make an alteration of my amendment.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I feel rather sorry that Mr. Barton has suggested this amendment. It is by no means an improvement on the clause as it stands, even if the intention was carried out. It would be better, I think, to leave the phraseology of the clause as it is, and provide "not less than three nor more than six," rather than to put it in this somewhat ambiguous way, by giving the subsequent power to the Parliament to increase or diminish the number from time to time, in an amendment which seemed to suggest, in fact required, the explanation which my honorable friend gave, that it was not intended to interfere with the Judges already appointed. I would suggest that even if the substance of the amendment were approved of, it would not be advisable to insert it in exactly the shape in which Mr. Barton has read the amendment. But I entertain also an objection to the substance of the amendment. In the first place, although perhaps not so strongly, I think it is inadvisable to reduce the number of Justices from four to three. I was originally of opinion, when the Judiciary Committee discussed the matter at some length, that probably the Chief Justice and two other Justices might be a sufficient minimum. It was then pointed out very forcibly that it was contemplated—of course, quite irrespective of appeals to the Privy Council—to clothe the High Court of the Commonwealth with appellate jurisdiction from all the states courts, so that this tribunal of three would be sitting as a Court of Appeal from judgments delivered certainly by Full Courts of three Judges in the states, and, in the case of Victoria and New South Wales, by courts, I think, of a larger number. The actual number was pointed out at the Judiciary Committee—I do not at this moment recollect it. That view of the matter was very forcibly impressed on us, and the result was we felt that, in order to create—quite irrespective of the matter of Appeal to the Privy Council, on which difference of opinion might very well be entertained—it was desirable to have a strong Federal Court, a court not only strong in ability, but strong also in numbers, which undoubtedly adds to the strength of any tribunal or any body of men. Of course, if you go on reducing it to its smallest dimensions, you may say that if you have a sufficiently strong Judge, one Judge would be ample, but I do not think that would commend itself to honorable members. We often say that the best government in the world is the government of a despot, so long as you get a benevolent and enlightened despot, and so, if you could get that ideal man of sufficient strength and power and ability, you might be able to constitute the one man a High Court which would give universal satisfaction. But I think all of us will agree that, where you have a tribunal which is to be the interpreter of the Constitution, which is to be really, as between the individual citizens and the Commonwealth, the guardian and security of their liberties; and which is to be, as regards the states, the guardian and security of their interests and their rights; then I think it is well to secure not only intellectual power and judicial eminence, but to add to that, within, of course, reasonable limits, the numbers that would create—I use the word without any apology—an imposing tribunal. Now, those were the reasons which influenced us, and which have confirmed in my mind the desirability of retaining the number of Justices of the High Court that is in the measure as it now stands before us—the number which was in the Bill of 1891, a minimum of four; and I feel perfectly certain that if we do that we shall, so far as its composition and so far as its constituent elements are concerned, create a tribunal which will inspire confidence amongst the people of United Australia. The only reason, the one argument, which has been urged against having four Judges is the matter of expense—that by reducing the number to three, or, as my honorable friend's proposal makes it, to four altogether, we shall be economizing. Now, what would the economy be?
What is it suggested as probable—I do not say final—the salaries of the Justices of the High Court may be? Well £15,500 a year. If you are paying the Chief Justice £3,500 a year—
Mr. WALKER. -
That would not be enough.
Mr. SYMON. -
Well, of course, I am assuming that if you did pay your Chief Justice £3,500 a year, and each of the other Judges £3,000 a year, you would get then the cost of the Judiciary, for the Judges, at some £15,500 a year. Now, by adopting Mr. Barton's amendment you will be saving £3,000 a year.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
Are the salaries fixed, then, already?
Mr. SYMON. -
I am afraid the honorable gentleman has not been doing me the compliment of listening to what I have been saying.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
There is nothing stated about salaries in the Bill, is there?
Mr. SYMON. -
Nothing whatever. I have been assuming. How much does my honorable friend think he would save by cutting off one Judge?
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
If we could do away with the whole lot we should save a good deal.
Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend does not want to see justice administered at all. Like the Gentiles, he seems to be a law unto himself, and he would like to be a law to everybody else.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
We are better off without the lawyers. They take up all the time of the House.
Mr. SYMON. -
That is a matter of opinion. I am addressing reasonable men, and I am pointing out, in regard to the assumption that a saving of £3,000 a year might be made, that that is not worth considering as against the constitution of a strong and acceptable court. Nobody knows better than the honorable member (Sir William Zeal) that we are now creating, from the states which now exist, a nation as separate, in great national respects, as though it were upon another continent. This nation, if it is constituted only of the states which are represented here, will have a population of something like 3,200,000 people. Now, on the other side of the world, there is a country called Scotland, which has a population of 4,000,000, and in that country there are no less than thirteen Judges. The cost of judicial salaries there amounts to £50,000 a year, of which the Lord Justice-General gets £5,000, and the Lord Justice Clerk £4,800. In addition to the High Court, there are also the Sheriffs courts, which are in some respects analogous to what our state courts will be, and which cost something like £20,000 more. If the tribunal which we are creating would cost £15,000 a year, my honorable friend's proposal would result in a saving of £3,000 a year, or, if the number of Judges were cut down to two, of £6,000 a year. I think that we shall be doing well if, in order to create such a lofty and powerful tribunal as each one of us desires, we give it a constitution which will clothe it with the confidence and commend it to the acceptance of the people of the continent. It seems to me right that we should fix a minimum in regard to the appointment of Judges, because that leaves to the voice of the people the determination of what they think would be a sufficient number to make a competent court. We are asking the people to pass judgment upon this Constitution, and we ought, I think, to leave it to them to say what number of Judges will constitute a court which will meet with their approval. But it would be very inadvisable to fix a maximum. Whether we should appoint two, three, or four Judges is a debatable matter; but I beseech honorable members not to introduce a provision fixing a maximum number, because that will have the effect of limiting for all time, notwithstanding any expansion that may take place in the judicial business of the country, the number of Judges constituting the court, unless an amendment of that nature has been taken that in framing these provisions expense should be cut down as much as possible. The method adopted in the United States of having circuit courts, and so on, all over the country has been wiped out here, so that the Federal Parliament may save that expense, and the Parliament has been given power to vest the judicial control of matters not to be dealt with by the High Court in the state courts. I therefore hope that my honorable friend will not press his amendment in the shape in which it is now, and that we shall fix a minimum but not a maximum.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I find that the amendment suggested by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton) can be put if the amendment now before the Chair is withdrawn. The question before the Chair is the omission of the words "not less than," with a view to decide whether there should be a fixed number or a minimum.
Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I think we had better test the feeling of the committee on the clause as it stands. It is about time that we cane to a vote. It seems tome that all the arguments which have been used go to affirm the wisdom of the original provision.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL (Victoria). -

I trust that the Convention will not agree to the proposal that there should be three Judges and a Chief Justice, because two will be ample. There may be no work for this court to do for the first two or three years, and is the Constitution to be so overweighted with expense as to be discredited before the people? What led to the rejection of a former Constitution? It was the enormous expense which it involved. It has already been said that these judicial offices have been allotted.

Mr. BARTON. -

Who says that?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

It is common talk out-of-doors. I can only tell honorable members what I hear. What is the position of affairs at the present moment? In this colony we have six Judges—a Chief Justice and five other Judges; and in New South Wales they have, I believe, six Judges and a Chief Justice. Are we to multiply these legal officers until the colonies cannot bear the load? Is it necessary that this enormous expense should be created? It seems to me that it would be better that there should be some small amount of injustice perpetrated than that the colonies should be weighted down with an expenditure. Honorable members are proposing now to overload the Constitution, as its provisions contrast with the Judiciary of Canada.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Canada is very greatly weighted with Judges.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

The Chief Justice of Canada gets only £1,650 a year.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, but how many are there?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

And how many are we going to have? We are going to have a Chief Justice for every colony, and large executive appointments as well. It is all very well for the honorable and learned member to advocate the appointment of these Judges. He is one of the cloth, and this is only bringing grist to the mill. We notice, however, round the chamber that, when one lawyer gets up and swears that thing a black, there is always another to follow him and say that it is white. This is the way in which the time of the Convention is wasted. I trust that the lay members of the Convention will not be parties to this extravagant and gross waste of the public funds. I intend to propose that the words not less than four be struck out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

As one of the cloth, I am glad upon this occasion to be able to agree with my honorable friend. I feel that this matter has now been thrashed out, and that it is time we should come to a vote. I am of opinion that this court will for many a long day have little or nothing to do. I cannot see where the work is going to come from until doubts and difficulties arise in connexion with the working of the Constitution. Therefore, in my opinion, two Judges and the Chief Justice will be ample. I voted for a small court in Adelaide, and I intend to do the same not if we come to a vote upon the question; but I am quite prepared to leave the whole matter to the Federal Parliament, because this is, I think, one of the cases where we may fairly trust them. I believe the Federal Parliament will be of the opinion that a Chief Justice and two Judges will be all that are required for many a long day, and when the necessity arises they will have full power to increase the number.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the leader of the Convention desire that the amendment be withdrawn?

Mr. BARTON. -

It seems the general desire to take a vote upon the clause as it stands. I prepared the amendment with a view to meeting what appeared to be the drift of debate, but the debate is now taking a different drift, and I am not responsible for that.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

In Adelaide I voted for the clause as it stood, and I propose to do the same again now. The remarks of the honorable member (Sir William Zeal) were extremely unwise and ill-judged when he referred to talk outside about the appointments to these offices having been allotted. That is so absurd an idea that it is difficult to imagine that there is such talk outside; but, at any rate, if there is it ought not to be repeated by members of the Convention.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

"A Daniel come to judgment."

Mr. TRENWITH. -

We must consider what this court will be, how important its functions, and how necessary it is that it should inspire complete confidence in the people. From the first it is to be the custodian of the Constitution. It must decide upon all occasions whatever questions of constitutional difficulty arise. Parliament itself may offend against the Constitution, and the court will then have to curb it. I think it highly improbable that the Federal Parliament will desire to violate the Constitution, but if it did it would have a distinct interest in limiting the number of Judges, and in influencing their mental complexion. Therefore, while we may assume that at the first the court will not have very much outside business to do, it is reasonable to think that constitutional difficulties at first will be more numerous than they will be later on when the states become better acquainted with the working of the Constitution. It is while the Constitution is new, while there is perhaps uncertainty in the minds of the people, and possibly also in the minds of the Federal Parliament, as to its exact bearing, that this court should be strong and capable, if need be, of putting a proper curb upon the action of the Federal Parliament and upon the action of the states. It has been said that this discussion has lasted a long time, but the subject is so important that I felt bound to offer these few remarks before I voted on the clause. We had better spend a few thousands of pounds a year more than is absolutely necessary to secure that certainty which would come from having a court against which no person could cavil.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

It seems to me that if we provide in the clause that there shall be a Chief Justice and not less than two Justices, we shall not be in any way tying the hands of the Federal Parliament. On the initiation of the Federal Government there may be difficulty in filling up a number of offices suitably or at once. If a Chief Justice and two Justices were appointed, the Federal Parliament could at anytime appoint more if necessary. It has been argued that a maximum should be fixed, but that is not essential. An Act of Parliament would have to be passed to provide for the salaries of the Judges, and there is a sufficient security against the appointment of too many Judges. If we provide for the appointment of a Chief Justice and not less than two Justices, we shall, I think, do all that is necessary to serve the purposes of the Federation.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

With reference to what has fallen from Sir John Forrest, I would say that it is of considerable importance that we should fix a maximum as well as a minimum. Unless we do that, we shall place in the hands of the Federal Parliament the power to control, by additions to the Federal Judiciary, the findings of that body in a way that is most undesirable.

Mr. SYMON. -

So we, would in any case within the limits of the maximum.
Mr. KINGSTON. -

I acknowledge that; but once the maximum is reached the Federal Parliament could not interfere any more. It was well pointed out by Mr. Isaacs that American history affords instances in which this sort of thing has been attempted. I think the honorable member mentioned one case in which it was done. He laid great stress on the possibility, unless you provide a minimum, of the federal authority refusing to fill up a vacancy, and in that way obtaining control of the Federal Court. Bad as that may be, it is not attended with half the risk that will arise if you give the federal authority absolute powers as regards the increase of the number of the Judiciary. It may happen during a contest between the Federal Government and the state, that a vacancy may be caused by the death of a Judge whose decision has been obnoxious to the federal authority. The vacancy might not be filled up. But give power to the federal authority to increase the number of the Judiciary to an unlimited extent, and you give an even greater power than is possessed by certain Governments with reference to additions to a nominee Chamber, or by the Imperial Government with reference to the creation of new lords. We must consider the fact that this body is to be created for the purpose of holding the scales fairly between the states and the Federation. At any rate this is one of its purposes. If in the Constitution you give the Federal Executive-a possible party in a serious conflict between the states and the Federation-an unlimited power to increase the number of Judges it seems to me that you will be placing in the hands of the federal authority a power that it is not necessary it should have, and which would be capable of being exercised to the very serious disadvantage of the states, who should be equally protected under the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I desire just to say one or two words that have been called forth by the remarks of Sir William Zeal, who, on this occasion, as on some others, has mistaken some strong personalities for arguments. They are weak arguments but strong personalities.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Then they would not influence you.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am sure that reason seldom influences my honorable friend.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

It never influences you.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I should like to point out in one or two words how utterly ignorant the honorable member is of the judiciary system of Canada.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
I am following your example.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The honorable gentleman's position as President of the Legislative council of Victoria ought to teach him to keep order.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
So ought yours as Attorney-General.

Mr. ISAACS. -
In Canada there is a Supreme Court. In that Supreme Court there is one Chief Justice and there are five Puisne Judges. In the province of Ontario there is a Court of Appeal, with one Chief Justice and three Puisne Ju

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
Tell us what their salaries are.

Mr. ISAACS. -
In the province of Quebec there is a Court of Queen's Bench, with one Chief Justice and four Puisne Judges, and then there is a superior Court strongly analogous to our Supreme Court, with one Chief Justice and twenty-seven Puisne Judges. In addition to that, there is a Justice of the Vice-Admiralty Court; and yet Sir William Zeal wants the committee to believe that we are going far beyond Canada. I mention these facts to show how much weight can be attached to the honorable member's argument.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I do not wish to delay the vote, but I desire to remind honorable members of the intimation that I gave on Friday, that I intend to support the retention in the clause of the words now under discussion, but that I shall afterwards propose the insertion, after "than," of the words "two nor more than." The latter part of the clause will then read-so many other Justices, not less than two nor more than four, as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
It is very desirable that we should fix a maximum, because, in such a vast territory, the most plausible pretexts may be advanced at any time for an increase in the number of the Federal Judiciary. We shall, I presume, have circuit courts, and, under the plea of adding to the number of circuits, it would be possible to increase the Federal Judiciary almost to an indefinite extent.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -
I have listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the honorable members who have preceded me in this debate, and I am rather inclined to think that, although this sudden cry of economy may be very popular in some quarters, we can obtain economy in the establishment of the Federal Judiciary at far too great an expense. The Bill drafted in 1891, like the Bill that is now before us, provided for one Chief Justice and four Judges as a minimum, and that seems to me to be fair and reasonable. I cannot for the life of me understand why honorable members should insist so strongly on economy in connexion with this very important matter.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is most important to the smaller states, too.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

It is important to all the states, and more particularly the smaller states. The other day we passed, with hardly any comment, a clause which provided for the payment of the members of both Houses of the Federal Parliament at the rate of £400 a year. That is a great deal more than is paid to the members of the local Parliaments, and it will involve an expenditure of about £50,000 a year. The Members of Parliament can be replaced at any time, and they will be of very little moment individually as compared with the Judges of the Supreme Court. I am surprised that this cry of economy has been raised on so important a point. It is all very well to say that for years to come the Federal Court will have nothing to do, but, as Mr. Trenwith said just now, during the first years of the Commonwealth that court may have some most difficult and intricate questions submitted to it in regard to the interpretation of the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

Those will be the most critical years.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I agree with the honorable member. In the first few years when we have just come together, and before the little roughness have been smoothed over, there will be more liability to friction as between federal and state interests than subsequently. To kick up such a fuss, if I may use so common a term, about an expenditure of £15,000 or £16,000 a year on the Federal Judiciary, to which we shall look for protection of the interests of the various states which may be, and will be in the Lower House, represented in an unequal manner in the Commonwealth, appears to me to be rather absurd. We shall not only look to the Federal Judiciary for the protection of our interests, but also for the just interpretation of the Constitution: This Federal Court will also be a Court of Appeal. Honorable members point to the few appeals to the Privy Council; but that is explained by the delay and expense, which places that mode of obtaining justice entirely out of the reach of men of moderate means. We have all had a great deal to say about this Federal Court. Most of us, when we were candidates for election to the Federal Convention, placed great stress upon it as affording a means of bringing justice within easy reach of the poor man. It is a court to which persons could appeal who could not afford to go to the Privy Council. It is ridiculous to attempt to estimate the number of appeals to this court by the number of appeals to the Privy Council.

Any one who has had any experience of the difficulty and expense of appealing to the Privy Council will understand that advantage will be taken of this court by hundreds of colonists who simply could not afford to appeal to the Privy Council. I do not think that the minimum fixed is at all too high. With regard to the fixing of the maximum, I was surprised to hear our President, who has professed over and over again his willingness to trust the Federal Parliament, say that if there was no limitation the door would be left open for the Federal Parliament to do the grossest wrong.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It has been so in the United States.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
We have heard too much about the example of United States all through the meetings of this Convention. If the Constitutions of the United States and Canada has been burned before the Convention met we should have done more practical work, and we should probably have evolved a Constitution quite as suitable, if not more suitable, to the people we represent.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
We would not have had equal representation.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I think we should. The people of Australia are, I think, even more strongly in favour of equality and fair play than the mixed population of the United States. The honorable member will, at any rate, admit that the principle of equal representation in one House has been conceded by all sections.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The subject of equal representation is hardly relevant to this clause.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
The Federal Judiciary will have to interpret the Constitution, and I think, therefore, that the question of representation has a bearing on the clause. I do not wish, however, to follow the example of some honorable members by occupying the time of the Convention at any great length. I shall vote for the clause as it stands. It is a wise provision—it has been carefully framed, and I think that it will commend itself to the people of the colony.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I intend to vote for the clause as it stands, but I wish to call the attention of Mr. Symon to the form of the amendment that Mr. Barton has suggested. The substance of the amendment should be made to accord with the sense, and with this difference. Under the clause as it now stands it will be impossible for the Federal Government to appoint Judges or the Chief Justice until Parliament has passed an Act. It might be a very desirable thing to appoint Judges before Parliament has an opportunity of passing and Act, because immediately on the establishment of the Constitution a number of matters will be withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the local Judges. In a variety of cases the jurisdiction of those Judges will no longer exist. It is highly desirable that that state of things should be provided for by giving the opportunity and power to the Federal Government, and before Parliament has actually time to pass a Bill, to make these appointments. The difference between the clause as it now stands, and the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Barton), is this, that as the case now stands, nothing can be done until Parliament fixes the number of Judges. After federation, as the honorable member (Mr. Barton) proposes, the substance will be retained exactly in the same way, but the Government will then have power to appoint these new Judges in addition to the Chief Justice, and then their remuneration and other matters will be fixed by Parliament afterwards. It is only a matter of form, but it is a matter of very great importance with regard to the powers exercised by the Federal Parliament. I would suggest to the leader of the Convention that he might modify his amendment, which could be easily done, so as to accord with what I think is the general feeling of the Convention that the clause should stand as it is, but that we should put it in such a form that the powers might be exercised at once instead of waiting until a Bill is passed by Parliament. The clause would then read: The High Court shall consist of the Chief Justice, and not less than four other Justices. The Parliament may nevertheless increase the number of Justices from time to time."

Mr. ISAACS. - I hope no Judges will be appointed until Parliament meets.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is a matter of great importance, and I think it wants pointing out.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not want to prolong the discussion, but if there is no power taken to constitute a Supreme Court which can sit as a Full Court with the powers given here, cases may arise in which the absence of such a court would breed disorder. The only way out of the difficulty is to allow the Executive to make a complete court in the early stages of the Federation, in order that such important business as may arise may not be left undealt with. That is the object of what the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) has read out. It is not to interfere with the question of a minimum, but to prevent such a state of things arising as would occur if Parliament delayed to pass a Bill to deal with the judicial offices, and, in the meantime, there being no appointments made, business might arise the non-dealing with which might be disastrous.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable member does not intend to move that now, until we deal with the other question of "not less than."

Mr. BARTON. -

I shall vote now for the retention of the number four; but I wish to point out with regard to this suggested amendment that, unless we adopt some such form, a difficulty might arise and lead to disaster.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I hope the Convention will not accept the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor). There will not be an Executive that the people will be inclined to trust until Parliament assembles. Who is to say that the choice of the people will be a certain six persons? What will be the consequences of delay? Absolutely nothing. There will be no federal legislation to give a decision upon. There may be some appeals, but they would only be suspended for a few months. Parliament must meet in six months, and then there would be ample power to make provision for Justices. The body to have a say in these appointments should be an Executive which has the preponderant voice of Parliament supporting it; not an Executive Council probably appointed by the Governor-General. That would be at complete variance with all our notions of parliamentary government.

Mr. BARTON. -

The honorable member forgets that the Executive must be responsible to the Federal Parliament which meets in a few months.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Does the leader of the Convention suppose that the Governor-General would be justified in selecting executive officers before Parliament meets?

Mr. REID. -

He must do so.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not know so much about that; it would be opposed to all our notions of parliamentary government. The primary duty of the Governor-General will be to call Parliament together, to know who is to preside over the departments.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Who will look after writs and other machinery?

Mr. GLYNN. -

The first Parliament will be called together without delay. By the Constitution the Governor-General has an obligation laid on him to call Parliament together at an early date. With regard to the proposition of appointing two additional Judges with the Chief Justice, I will strongly support it. The honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) has quoted Canada, but he might have taken the example of the United States. There, the circuit courts do an enormous amount of business, and they only have two Judges in each circuit, who are paid less than £3,000 a year each.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I only cited Canada to show that the observations of the honorable member (Sir William Zeal) were not founded on fact.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable member (Sir William Zeal) might have supported his arguments by the example of the United States, where the Judges are paid small salaries and do an enormous amount of business. Two Judges there do an amount of circuit business which will not be done by the court here for twenty years.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I strongly support the view expressed by Mr. Glynn, and although I ventured to interject when the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) was speaking, I quite grant that the Governor-General must nominate his Executive to bring the Parliament into existence. But to intrust an Executive that has never been appointed by the people-selected we do not know on whose advice or by what means—with the power of Constituting our Supreme Court—perhaps the most important appointments in the whole of the Commonwealth—would be subversive of everything we have been led to expect. The people would be very much astonished and grieved if we gave them a Constitution under which it could be supposed for a moment that the Judges of the Supreme Court were to be appointed by some power independent of and anterior to Parliament. Under such a law the people would have not a single word to say in the selection of the Supreme Court. What confidence would they have in such a court? I hope that such a proposal will not be made, and that the feeling of the Convention will be seen to be utterly against the adoption of such a proposal. A serious blow would be stuck at the confidence of the people in the Constitution if we were not to frame our Constitution by adhering to the principles of responsible Government as we know them.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

As a lay member, may I be allowed to say a word or two? I would support the honorable members (Mr. Barton's) view. The Constitution would be somewhat lop-sided at the start unless the Judiciary were appointed; but I would suggest to the honorable member (Mr. Barton) that he should subject the appointments to the confirmation of Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That would be so necessarily. They could not draw any salary until an Act was passed.

Mr. FRASER. -

But that would get over the objection freely uttered that very bad appointments might be made. Therefore, if the appointments that might be made were subject to the approval of Parliament or the Executive of Parliament, that objection would not hold good.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

And they could not act in the meantime until Parliament met.

Mr. FRASER. -

Yes, give them the power to do so.

Mr. REID. -

Once appointed, by whomsoever appointed, the offices would be for life, subject to good behaviour. No Parliament in the world could move them except for cause.

Mr. FRASER. -

That could be easily altered, so as to make the appointments subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. REID. -

No, that would make them political officers.

Mr. FRASER. -

You are going to make them political officers in another direction, because the Executive of the Parliament will appoint them.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

We do not want that.

Mr. FRASER. -

How are you going to work the Constitution for the first few months?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Just as they did in the United States and Canada.
Mr. FRASER. -

With regard to the Judges, surely we need not run to the United States, and Canada, and other countries to find out how many Judges are required. We have our wits about us. We know that the Judges are not overworked now, and that they are not likely to be. Persons are frightened to go to law now. The reason why there are no lawsuits is that people are afraid to go to law—they know that if you win you lose, and if you lose you are done for.

Mr. REID. -

The honorable member is evidently a layman.

Mr. FRASER. -

I know the feeling of the lay public, and I know they will rather submit to an injustice, or arrive at some settlement, than submit to the law, which is so costly and uncertain. The Judges in Canada have not a tithe of the salaries paid in Australia. I think we can trust this matter to the Parliament, as a few thousand pounds either way are not worth talking about.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I suggest that we take a division on the clause as it stands, instead of enlarging the debate in connexion with these constitutional questions as to when the Judges should be appointed and as to the number of them. Even if appointed by the Executive, which might be appointed before Parliament assembles, the Judges could do no work until Parliament met and passed a Judiciary Act, which would give them a court to sit in and a court to enable them to do their business, so that it is not worth debating at present.

The amendment that the words "not less than" be struck out was negatived.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That the word "two" be inserted after the words "not less than."

I need not go over the debate again. The many speeches delivered show to my mind the importance of fixing a minimum. As to the importance of fixing a maximum I would direct attention to the speech of the Attorney-General of Victoria, who proved clearly the mischief that had arisen, not that might be expected to arise, in the United States for the want of a maximum. I hope, therefore, the Convention will accept the suggestion that the minimum should be two and the maximum four. It has been argued that four would be so small that an amendment of the Constitution will be required before many years pass. I think that for the next 50 years at least four will be an amply sufficient number. If no amendment of the Constitution is required for 50 years we may be very well content with the work we have done here. I understand there are a number of honorable members who are prepared to fix two as the minimum, but who are not prepared to go so far as to fix the maximum at four. If the word "two" be inserted I will move the insertion of the words "not more than."

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia.) -

It will be competent afterwards to move the omission of the word "four" in order to insert any other number.

Question - That the word "two" be inserted after the words "not less than" - put.

Mr. HOLDER moved -
That the clause be amended by inserting, after the word "two," the words "nor more than."

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I should like to say one word with regard to this amendment. My argument in the Convention a few days ago has been used in a manner that is not warranted. I pointed out what a strain had been put upon the Supreme Court in America, and also that that was because of the insufficiency of the provisions in the American Constitution for amending that Constitution. It was acknowledged right through America that it was a wrong thing to treat the Supreme Court in the way they did by increasing the number of the Judges, not because the amount of work warranted that increase, but because this was the only practical way open to the American people of amending their Constitution. The evil was admitted to be a great one. But there was a greater evil behind it, namely, a continuous struggle for an alteration of the bench. America had just passed through a terrible civil war, and she did not want to have another struggle. The increase of the number of the Judges was an admitted evil, but it was resorted to in order to avoid a still greater evil. We, I hope, will have no such excuse, but the people of the Commonwealth will be free to increase or to refuse to increase the number of their Judges, just as we in our colonies are free to increase or decrease them at the present time. There is no temptation whatever for us to increase or decrease the number of our Judges for political purposes.

Mr. FRASER. -

No Government dare do it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Exactly; no Government dare do it. The people would not allow them. If it were suggested for one instant to put an additional Judge on the bench for the purpose of over-riding the decisions of the court upon any particular question, t

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

My honorable friend (Mr. Holder) admits that his reason for this amendment is to guard the Federal Parliament we are creating from its own corruptibility. I say that that is a disgraceful ground upon which to base an argument, and this would be a disgraceful amendment to put in the Constitution for any such reason. We have no right to attribute to the Federal Parliament any such possibility of corruption. An attempt of the kind would, I am certain, result not only in the expulsion of the Government from power, but would produce a revolution. I do not think that the people of this continent would tolerate even the semblance of such corruption. I cannot predicate conduct of that kind to the Federal Parliament. If I could believe such conduct to be possible I would not adopt Mr. Holder's amendment, but would wipe the High Court out of the Constitution altogether. Why is a limit inserted when if the number of Judges may be enlarged there is a possibility of corruption? If you fix the minimum at four it gives the Federal Parliament power, if it wants to corrupt justice on the bench, to do so. Either you must make the number an irreducible minimum, without a possibility of extension at all, or you must leave it as it is. There is no middle course unless you write on the face of this Constitution—"This Federal Parliament is likely to be corrupt."

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I simply wish to say, in reply to the honorable gentleman who has just sat down, at in my view the Federal High Court a vital point of security in connexion with the whole Constitution, and if it be right that there should be a minimum number of Judges, I think there should also be a maximum. I think so for many greater reasons than those which have been given. It is of no use for honorable members to point to the abuse of this provision in the United States and say "Such a thing will never happen here." We do not know what the vicissitudes of the future may be. Mr. Isaacs has shown that in a certain event, where popular feeling is highly excited, the way to secure an amendment of the Constitution is to secure a majority on the Supreme Court Bench. Well, we are very virtuous in our English communities, I have no doubt, but I think it is rather better that we should make the position of the Supreme Court absolutely certain, as nearly as we can, by preventing any danger of swamping the bench.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You would allow the bench to be swamped up to the number of six.

Mr. REID. -

You may be sure that if there are six such appointments open they will all be filled up. I do not contemplate a single good appointment under this Constitution remaining vacant.

Question-That the words "nor more than" be inserted-put.

The division bells having been rung,

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia) said -

I desire to ask leave, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw the call for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The representative of South Australia (Mr. Holder) asks leave to withdraw his call for a division.
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I object.

Mr. FRASER. -
Mr. Holder merely wishes to save time.

Now, I assume, sir, that the word "four" will come out.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The word "four" must come out, otherwise it will read nonsense.

Mr. HOLDER moved -

That the word "four" be omitted.
The amendment was agreed to.
The clause, as amended, was adopted.
Clause 72. The Justices of the High Court and of the other courts created by the Parliament:
    I. Shall hold their offices during good behaviour:
    II. Shall be appointed by the Governor-General in Council:
    III. Shall not be removed except for misbehaviour or incapacity, and then only by the Governor-General in Council, upon an address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same session praying for such removal:
    IV. Shall receive such remuneration as the Parliament may from time to time fix; but such remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria-
    After "shall" insert "have such qualification as the Parliament may prescribe, and shall."

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
The Legislative Assembly of Victoria has made this proposal, and I think it will be found to be a necessary one unless we decide to do what I hope we shall not decide to do, namely, to allow the Executive to appoint the Judges before Parliament has any voice in the matter. Clause 71 provides for the number of Judges, but there is no word in the Constitution as to whether they may be appointed straight away or whether you must wait for Parliament to make any provision with regard to their qualifications. There is no doubt that Parliament will have to make a provision in any case for their salaries, but I think we ought to make it perfectly clear that they are not to be appointed until Parliament has a chance of saying something about it, and at the very outset I think we ought to leave the qualifications of the Judges in the hands of some persons responsible to the people. The Legislative Assembly of Victoria, having seen the possibility of appointments being made before Parliament meets, before responsible Ministers are appointed, has made this proposal, which honorable members will find on page 44 of the schedule of suggested amendments. The reason why the Legislative Assembly of Victoria thought it necessary and important that these words should be put in was because it signifies on the face of the Constitution that the appointments are not to be made except with the consent of Parliament. I therefore support the proposal.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
This amendment is not in the least degree necessary, even in order to carry out the object which my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) has in view. According to clause 71, as it has been carried, it is impossible for these Judges to be appointed until Parliament has fixed the number of them.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
   No.

Mr. ISAACS. -
   Why?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
   I beg your pardon.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
   Not more than two.

Mr. ISAACS. -
   You can appoint the Chief Justice and two Judges.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
   That is a minimum, but the actual number to be appointed must be such as Parliament may determine.

Mr. ISAACS. -
   Parliament cannot diminish this. You can only appoint a Chief Justice and two Judges.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
   The Chief Justice may be appointed, but the number of the other Judges is not being fixed, except that a minimum of not loss than two is fixed. I really cannot understand this fear that the first Executive will do something extraordinarily wrong in the appointment of the first Judges. No salary can be voted or paid until the Parliament has met, and the Federal Executive will have to face the consequences of that as well as every other executive act when they meet the Parliament. To insert a pro-vision of this kind, not for the direct object which the words would suggest, but for the indirect object of tying the hands of the Executive till Parliament has met, seems to me altogether unworthy of the trust we are supposed to place in the Executive which will be created under the Constitution. There is no necessity whatever to place these words in the first subsection, because of course Parliament will have the power to decide what the qualifications of the Judges shall be. Parliament, in deciding to make these appointments and the way in which they are to be made, necessarily, has the power to declare what qualifications shall be necessary.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
   Can you appoint a Chief Justice without knowing what he is going to get?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
   You can offer it to him.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Of course you can. As my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Symon) remarked, it will be impossible for the Judges to exercise any jurisdiction till a statute has been passed fixing the procedure by which they are to move. I would suggest to my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) that the object he has in view is quite sufficiently attained by the clause as it is, and that to insert a provision of this kind face of it, but for an indirect object which is altogether unworthy of the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do you think that the Chief Justice could not be appointed without the insertion of these words?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I said before that the Chief Justice can be appointed, but he can perform no duties, and his remuneration cannot be in any way fixed until Parliament meets.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Why should it be so?

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

If the desire is to prevent the possibility of the temporary Executive, which will be constituted before the meeting of Parliament, or to put it in a direct shape, to say that they shall have no power to do anything of the kind, I would ask my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) to direct his attention to the whole scheme in the Constitution, the basis of which is that nothing is intended to be done in regard to the Judiciary till Parliament has met. First of all, you must single out some one to take the office, and get a kind of private understanding—if we can attribute anything of that kind, for the possibilities of human nature are immense—but there would be no salary. In the second place, I doubt very much if either the Chief Justice or either of the two Judges could be appointed legally under the Constitution till Parliament has met. We must look at this measure not as a rigid Act of Parliament but as a Constitution, and the whole intent of the Constitution is that no such appointment is to be made till Parliament has provided the judicial machinery; the Act called in the United States the Judiciary Act, under which the Judges hold the appointments, and by virtue of which they exercise their offices. Suppose you appoint Judges, it would be a perfectly idle performance; they could do nothing; they would be simply floating in an uncertain state, and till Parliament met there could be no conclusive appointment to office, because there would be no salary. The whole thing would simply be nugatory. If my honorable friend's object is simply to bring about that result, you might as well put in the Constitution what the Judges are to wear. You might as well prescribe whether the Judges shall wear wigs and gowns.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Why was it put in by the Judiciary Committee that their remuneration shall be such as Parliament provides?

Mr. SYMON. -

It was done to avoid the possibility of it being left to the Executive, or of the Executive assuming that they could fix it, and leave it to Parliament afterwards. The attire of the Judges may very well be left alone; at any rate, I appeal to my honorable and learned friend on broader grounds than that. I say to him the intention of this provision is, seeing that there is no judicial machinery, that Judges shall not be appointed at all till Parliament has met.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Is there any doubt about it?

Mr. SYMON. -

No doubt whatever.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would suggest to my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) that this is not the place to deal with that very important question as to what shall be done by the first Executive prior to the assembling of Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am not proposing that.

Mr. REID. -

It is a matter of some importance, and I rather sympathize with the view which my honorable friend takes. It will happen inevitably that the first Government will be chosen by the Governor-General, in the absence of any electoral body or parliamentary body. But it may be very desirable to insert in this Constitution that such an Executive, beyond the necessary acts of government, and the acts of calling Parliament into existence, shall not have power until Parliament is assembled. And the moment Parliament assembles they become responsible Ministers, because if Parliament chooses to keep the Ministry in office by not expressing any disapproval of them, from that instant they become responsible Ministers. It is too serious a difficulty to be dealt with in a piecemeal way. I hope we shall try and get through this clause with some expedition.

The amendment was negatived.

Amendments suggested by the Legislative Assembly of Victoria-

After "behaviour" insert "but may be removed by the Governor-General in Council upon an address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same session praying for such removal."
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I would like to explain why the Legislative Assembly of Victoria suggests the insertion of these words. In the United States-

Mr. FRASER. -

We have had enough of the United States—we know all about the United States.

Mr. REID. -

Why don't you give Canada a turn?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I have no doubt that the honorable member's knowledge of Canada is about equal to his knowledge of the United States. In the United States Constitution it is provided that Judges shall hold their office during good behaviour. No mode of removing them is mentioned, except that by a construction of the Constitution they are held as civil officers to be liable to impeachment. Impeachment means that the House of Representatives may make a charge against a Judge, and when it does the Senate sits as a court and decides the question. There is no appeal from the decision of the Senate. In England the provision is that the Judges hold their office during good behaviour; but they may be removed upon a vote by both Houses of Parliament. In all the colonies it is the same. In this Constitution the wording of the section introduces a new feature, and it seems to me a very difficult one. It is quite right to say that the tenure shall be during good behaviour. It is also quite right to say that the Judges shall be removable by the Governor-General in Council upon an address from both Houses of Parliament in the same session praying for such removal. But the difficulty that I see here as likely to arise is, that the Judges can only be removed by the Governor-General acting upon an address from both Houses, provided that their Honours have been guilty of misbehaviour or incapacity. Now, it does not make the removal final. It does not make the judgment of the Governor-General in Council and of the two Houses of Parliament final. That is the weak spot in this proposal. I can conceive that a Judge—if such an unfortunate thing should happen, as I hope never will, as that a Judge should be removed upon an address from both Houses—will turn to this Constitution, and he will see that the Judges are to hold their office during good behaviour and that they shall not be removed except for misbehaviour or incapacity, and then only by the Governor-General in Council upon an address from the two Houses of Parliament.

Mr. SYMON. -

Those words make the decision final.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No. The honorable member will forgive me for saying that there is an element of doubt. It may be construed that that is so, but I doubt it. The Judge may say:"You have your two Houses and the Governor-General, and you have only power to remove provided I am guilty of misbehaviour or incapacity." Where is there anything in the Constitution making the two Houses a court of justice, as in the United States making the Senate a court of justice? I strove to put this matter to the Convention on a former occasion, and I would ask them to consider it again. In Canada it is not so, in England it is not so, and in all the colonies it is not so. The Judges are appointed during good behaviour, "but"-this is the word used-they may be removed upon an address from both Houses. Now, it is said, and said very fairly, that you are not to have the Judges dismissed upon the mere whim of the two Houses of the Commonwealth Parliament, but I would first of all like to remind my honorable friends that no other proposal is made; and, secondly, that there is the Senate whose concurrence is necessary to their removal. Now, the Senate is the States House, and it will take care that no Judge is removed because-I am merely putting, a conjectural case-he has given a judgment in favour of a state as against the Commonwealth.

Mr. SYMON. -

Do you contend that a Judge should be removed by a majority of both Houses, even though he has not been guilty of misbehaviour?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I should say "No" to that, but I say that, as in England and in these colonies and elsewhere, you must leave the final determination whether he has been guilty of misconduct somewhere. If the question is not to be, finally concluded by the votes of the two Houses, then by what is it to be finally concluded? Take the case of a Judge who says:"It is true that the, two Houses have passed a unanimous vote for my removal, but I maintain that I have not been guilty of misbehaviour or incapacity. It is true the Houses have considered the matter with all the gravity, fairness, and deliberation with which two legislative bodies have to decide on so weighty a matter. Still I would appeal"-Where? To the Supreme Court, of which he is a member, and in the decision of which question every one of his brethren is interested. Now, sir, I would like to put that case seriously to my honorable friends. Are we to suppose that the two Houses of the Legislature will corruptly lend themselves to the removal of a Judge as for misbehaviour or incapacity when he is not fairly chargeable with this? Should we not leave the matter as it is left in England, as it is left in these colonies, and as it is left in Canada, under the 99th section of the Canadian Act, to the two Houses, one of which is there for the defence of state rights? Suppose, to take the case of the danger which is apprehended, very lightly I hope, that a Judge gives a judgment which conflicts with the notions of the House of Representatives as to the validity of a Commonwealth law as opposed to the states, there is the Senate which has not only passed the law in question, but which is there to defend the rights of the states as against any proposal to remove a Judge, and I would seriously ask my honorable friends whether they would allow this Constitution to go into operation with so serious a question staring them in the face as that? I should say that every precaution should be taken to guard the Judges securely in their tenure, and they ought to be left to enjoy their tenure for life, subject only to removal for misbehaviour or incapacity. But I maintain that you must leave the final determination of that question in some responsible body. You must not allow the solemn verdict of two Houses of Parliament on this question to be challenged anywhere. If you do, what will be the result? To carry the case I have supposed one step further, the Judge is removed, or is attempted to be removed, by a vote of the two Houses. We must always suppose that any Judge would have the fullest and fairest opportunity of defending himself before the two houses. If the one House does not give him that opportunity I cannot but suppose that the other will. Now, I assume that these votes are passed, and the decree goes forth for his removal. He appeals to, the legal tribunal, and suppose that that legal tribunal decides that he has not been guilty of misbehaviour. He is restored to his position, but what a position him would be then! The two Houses of the Legislature, representing not only the people as a whole but the states as well, have said that the Judge ought to go, and if, owing to the action of the legal tribunal, he cannot be thus got rid of, I ask: would there be any longer any confidence in his judgment? He would be a marked man.

Mr. BARTON. -

Certainly he would be a marked man if he appealed to the bench against the decision of Parliament in such a case.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; but if the decision was challengeable at all he would have the right to appeal.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

How do you propose to prevent its being challenged?

Mr. ISAACS. -

The amendment is to strike out the words "for misbehaviour or incapacity, and then only."
The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) is referring to the wrong sub-section. Sub-section (1) is now before the committee—that the Judge may be removed by the Governor-General in Council.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is the same point exactly. It is only putting this in another way. He may be removed by the Governor-General in Council "upon an address from both Houses of the Parliament praying for such removal."

Mr. REID. -

If you add to the words "praying for such removal," the words "upon the ground of misbehaviour or incapacity," I think you would get rid of the difficulty. Make it necessary that the addresses shall allege misbehaviour or incapacity.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I quite agree with my honorable friend (Mr. Reid). To remove any misconception, these words should be added, so that the Houses may show that they are not attempting to remove a Judge for anything but misbehaviour or incapacity.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Do you put sub-sections (1) and (3) together?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Sub-section (3) would be practically unnecessary then, and I would be prepared to strike it out. I am quite prepared to accept the suggestion of Mr. Reid. What I desire to do is to prevent such a calamity, such an impasse, arising in the working of the Constitution, as that the decision of the two Houses of Parliament, representing the will of the people in its very highest form, should be challengeable in a court of justice on this question.

Mr. SYMON. -

You want to make the resolution of the two Houses final?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I want to put that beyond dispute.

Mr. FRASER. -

That will cause very great danger.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I want to follow the English Constitution, the 38th section of our own Constitution, and the 99th section of the Canadian Act. I want to lay it down distinctly that a Judge shall not be removed under any circumstances, except for misbehaviour or incapacity; but I want the verdict of Parliament—the verdict of the States House by itself, the verdict of the; people's House by itself, the conjoint, independent, and separate verdicts of these two Houses to be final and unchallengeable. I am quite willing to accept the words suggested by Mr. Reid.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I think I am responsible to some extent for the form in which sub-section (3) now appears.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We are now discussing sub-section (1).

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Of course; but to a certain extent the meaning of sub-section (1) is controlled by sub-section (3), and it seems necessary to discuss the two together in considering what provision we are to make. I think the intention of the Convention at Adelaide was this: To prevent the Judges being removable at the whim and caprice of both Houses of the Legislature. If you give to the Federal Parliament the uncontrolled power of securing the removal of Judges by passing addresses for that purpose, you make the judicial position, altogether insecure, and, you undoubtedly place the Judiciary in a position in which they ought not to be placed. Each Judge should feel that as long as he is fit to discharge his duty, as long as he behaves himself in his high judicial office, he can; be touched by no one, either state or Federation. He need, fear no one-he will favour no one. At the same time, it would be highly undesirable, whilst limiting the power of the Parliament to interfere to cases of misbehaviour or incapacity to allow the decision of the Parliament on matters of that sort, which no doubt will be pronounced with due consideration of the gravity of the issues, to be challenged by any inferior tribunal elsewhere. I do not think, as the clause now stands, it would be capable of being challenged, but if it can be made clearer that the addresses of the two Houses are only to be passed on the finding of misbehaviour and incapacity, and that that finding once declared by those two bodies shall not be challenged in the slightest degree, well and good.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the words suggested by Mr. Reid were added they would carry out that idea.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I commend the matter to the attention of the Drafting Committee. I am inclined myself to think that the clause is clear enough at present, but if we could make it more clear so much the better. I would suggest that if we add after the words "misbehaviour and incapacity" the words "found and declared by both Houses of Parliament," or insert similar words at the end of sub-section (3), and in express terms state that the finding of the two Houses on this subject shall not be challenged in any way, that might be an advantage. We are all agreed that it is desirable to protect the Judges so long as they behave themselves in the best sense of the term, but at the same time on this question of good behaviour or misbehaviour we should make the position of the Federal Parliament unchallengeable and without appeal.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

I was very pleased indeed to listen to the remarks of the Premier of South Australia. To make the Judges amenable to a resolution, even of both Houses, which resolution might be passed on false evidence, would, I think, be a great mistake. Evidence might be trumped up by a Cabinet which was anxious to get rid of a Judge. Of course, I am putting an extreme case. A resolution might be passed by the House of Representatives in a hurry, and it might be submitted to the Senate on false evidence. The Judges would not be in a position to defend themselves properly. I think the clause as it stands is good and safe enough, and to make the Judges amenable to a resolution that might be rushed through in a hurry would be a very unsafe thing indeed. I therefore hope that the alteration suggested will not be made.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would like to suggest to my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) that perhaps the amendment might come in a better place if it were, as he suggested it was in addressing the Convention, an amendment on the third of these sub-sections.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not care where it comes so long as it is inserted.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the amendment was proposed on sub-section (3) we should be enabled to pass the present subsection now. At the drafting stage I intend to transpose the first and second sub-sections, as they ought to have been transposed before. We might test this amendment on the third sub-section.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I have no objection.

Mr. BARTON. -

I take it that my honorable friend would wish the sub-section to read—

Shall not be removed except for misbehaviour or incapacity, but may be removed by the Governor-General in Council on addresses from both Houses of the Parliament, on the ground of misbehaviour.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is not quite it.
Do I understand that that does not go far enough?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think that the view of my honorable friend of transposing the second sub-section so as to be the first is a good suggestion. Sub-section (1) will then be sub-section (2), providing for the Judges holding their positions during good behaviour, and then my amendment could be inserted in subsection (2), as it is in the 38th section of the Constitution Act.

Mr. SYMON. -

Why not make it a separate sub-section?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I have no objection to that—I do not care where it comes in.

Mr. BARTON. -

I quite understand now. I may say that in the Convention in Adelaide, in 1897, I took the view which my honorable friend (Mr. Kingston) took then, and I think to a large degree holds now, that the position of the Judges in relation to Parliament is a very different one in the case of the Federation from what it is in the case of the states. I hold that opinion still; but Mr. Isaacs has pointed out so many difficulties and dangers which may arise from leaving the sub-section in its present position that I am rather inclined to coincide with him in the suggestion he has made. We may have a Judge some time who is not only impracticable, but who may, to a certain extent, be losing his mental capacity. He may not present that condition to his brother Judges, because there is always, I think, in such cases a desire to—

Be to his faults a little blind,
And to his virtues very kind.

That is human nature, and in saying that, I make not the slightest imputation on any Judge in the land. What I mean is that those who are associated with one another in friendly communion during a long period of years become, as they ought to become, confidential and intimate friends; and the Judges of the High Court are no doubt likely to have such intimacy with each other that, as friends, they will be the last to see a defect of the kind we have in view.

Mr. REID. -

And should be the very last persons to have such a question thrust on them to determine.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, they should be the last persons to decide such a question with regard to a brother Judge. Their own good taste would urge them to ask to have such a burden removed from them, and I really think such a burden ought not to be put on their shoulders—that it should not be left to the Federal Court, as a Court of Appeal from Parliament, to decide on the capacity of a brother Judge. I was unable to see the full force of this objection when my honorable friend urged it in Adelaide, or, rather, I should say that my sense of the importance of preserving a proper relationship between the Judiciary and Parliament in the Federation over-awed my objection as I felt it then. Mr. Isaacs has now put it so strongly that he has quite convinced me, and I shall support the amendment which reduces things to the only proper position. We cannot conceive such a thing happening, for the safety of and with benefit to the Commonwealth, as that a Judge, having committed some misdeed, or having lost his capacity, should find himself so utterly opposed to the decision of Parliament upon the matter that he should turn round and appeal to his brother Judges for a decision in his favour. We ought not to put him or the Federal Court in that position, and I do not think that it would conserve the dignity of the court if we were to impose such a task upon it.

Mr. FRASER. -

How can the accused Judge defend himself against a resolution proposed in each House of Parliament?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think there can be no objection to the proposal on that score. I cannot conceive of the Federal Parliament condemning any Judge unheard. Although Parliament may sometimes be swayed by passion, may sometimes be misled, may sometimes be influenced by popular clamour and sometimes by other causes—

Mr. FRASER. -

By Cabinet influences.

Mr. BARTON. - Still, in matters of that kind, which concern their relations towards the highest officers of the land, I have always found the votes and proceedings of Parliament perfectly fair, and I do not think there would be any likelihood of the Commonwealth Parliament condemning a Judge without giving him full opportunity of being heard.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

May I suggest whether it would not be advisable to transpose sub-sections (1) and (2)?

Mr. BARTON. -

I will move that now, in order to facilitate the amendment of Mr. Isaacs.

The CHAIRMAN. -

If it is the wish of the committee I will transpose sub-sections (1) and (2) as a matter of clerical work. We had better, perhaps, finish sub-section (1), and then transpose them afterwards. I will put the question that sub-section (1), as it now stands, stand part of the clause.

Sub-section (1) was agreed to.

Sub-sections (1) and (2) were then transposed.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question now is that sub-section (2) stand part of the clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I am quite willing to accept the view of the leader of the Convention, and after the sense of the Convention is taken to leave it to the Drafting Committee to carry out the intention.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should like to be sure that the sense of the Convention is with the view I hold with my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs). We can take the decision of the committee on the word "not." If we keep the word "not" in, we will take it that the amendment is carried.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Why not join sub-sections (2) and (3), as is done in Canada.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is what I first proposed, but I am willing to leave it to the Drafting Committee to determine how it shall be done.

Mr. GLYNN. -

This matter was most amply thrashed out in Adelaide, and Mr. Higgins suggestion to give this power to the Federal Parliament was not agreed to.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I understand that the proposal is this—that whilst you provide that the Judges shall hold their office during good behaviour the question of misbehaviour or incapacity has, to be referred to the Federal Parliament for final finding.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

If Parliament has to decide on the misbehaviour, you may as well strike out the other part of the provision altogether, because it is a mere subterfuge.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Oh!

Mr. FRASER. -

I mean to say that possibly it may be a mere subterfuge. Parliament may decide on incomplete evidence, and, as far as I can see, the Judges will not have the opportunity of appearing and defending themselves before Parliament. Parliament may come to a hasty decision. If you make the clause provide that the resolution of both Houses must be passed in two sessions of Parliament, there will be some safeguard, but to have it passed in one session, perhaps at the behest of popular clamour, would render the position of the Judges of the High Court of the Commonwealth insecure.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I have heard so many statements lately with regard to what the Federal Parliament may or may not do that I am beginning to doubt whether we are taking a wise step in creating the Parliament at all. It seems to me that we are suspecting that it is a Parliament which, the moment it comes into existence, is going to do everything that is wrong and improper and nothing that is right. Mr. Fraser appears to be in grave doubt as to whether the Judges of the High Court of the Commonwealth will get any fair play, in the event of being charged with misbehaviour or incapacity, and, indeed, as to whether they will have a chance of being heard at all. Now, can we imagine a deliberative body like the Parliament of the Commonwealth removing one of the Judges of the Federal Court unless on the strongest possible grounds, and for the best possible reasons, and after having given everybody the fullest opportunity of being heard on every point in question? Surely we cannot for a moment imagine that any body called into existence to carry out the affairs of the Federation would ever think of taking any step to remove a Judge without giving him a full opportunity of being heard?

Mr. FRASER. -

It is only a majority in either House, and the majority may be only one in either House.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is a matter for the maturity in both Houses to determine, and then the Governor-General in Council has to carry it out.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The whole system is to secure the independence of the Judges.

Mr. REID. -

The object is to make the Judges independent.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Undoubtedly.

Mr. REID. -

And that would do so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes; the object is to make the Judges independent, but not independent to such a degree that they cannot, if just cause be shown, be controlled. Surely if a Judge had lost his brain altogether, Parliament would not allow him to continue to sit on the bench and carry out the duties of his judicial office. Such a thing might be done if there is no provision of this kind in the Bill.

Mr. REID. -

And if a Judge lost his brain, he would be the last man to believe it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Then is no doubt of that, because many of those who are confined in our hospitals for the insane are perfectly certain that they ought not to be there.

Mr. SYMON. -

They are perfectly certain that all the world is mad except themselves.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is generally the feeling of those unfortunate individuals. Now, what we desire is that while the Judges shall have an absolutely safe position as long as they carry out their duties, if it is found that they are guilty of such gross misbehaviour that they ought not to remain on the judicial bench, or if it is found that they are incapable of carrying out their duties, then some body, some tribunal, must be able to remove them, in the interests of the Federation, in the interests of the people. Well, we are prepared to place that trust in the hands of the Federal Parliament, and I venture to suggest that we shall meet the difficulty if we make the clause read-

Shall not be removed except by the Governor-General in Council upon an address in both Houses of Parliament in the same session praying for such removal on the ground of misbehaviour or incapacity.

That will make it perfectly plain that a Judge is not to be removed unless he has been guilty of some misbehaviour-reckless behaviour that will mean-or unless he is incapacitated from carrying out his duties, and it will also make it perfectly clear and certain that if the two Houses of Parliament said the Governor-General in Council come to the conclusion that either of these things has arisen no other tribunal shall be required to finally determine the matter.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should like to know whether it is or is not the desire of Mr. Isaacs and Sir George Turner that the address of the two Houses of Parliament should state on its face that the removal of a Judge is desired because his misbehaviour or incapacity has been proved? That would insure the Judge having a hearing. It seems to me that rise introduction of those words might be a greater safeguard to the Judge, while it would prevent Parliament from lapsing into any mis-trial of the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I shall put the question in the manner suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales and the Legislative Council of Tasmania. It is the same amendment as is suggested by Sir George Turner. The question is that the words "for misbehaviour and incapacity and then only" proposed to be struck out stand part of the sub-section. If these are omitted, the other words can then be inserted at the end of the clause.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I shall be found supporting the amendment as indicated by my friend (Sir George Turner). I do not think that any of us desire now or ever have desired that the removal of any Judge should be upon other grounds than misbehaviour or incapacity, and I do not believe any of us would desire to see on the bench of the High Court or of any other court in the Commonwealth a Judge occupying his position, and attempting to discharge his duties, if he was chargeable with either of these matters. The only point is whether the final decision of the question should be left to the body described in the clause, namely, the Senate and the House of Representatives, followed by the Governor-General in Council. I entirely agree that they ought to be the complete and final judges of the matter. It would be impossible and absurd that there should be an appeal to the tribunal of which the accused Judge-if I may use the expression-was a member; because he would continue to be nominally a member of the bench until his formal removal from it. I do not think any of us could contemplate such a state of things as that would produce with equanimity or satisfaction. On the other hand, I do not agree with honorable members who think that the Senate and House of Representatives should unite together for the purpose of removing a Judge upon other grounds than those of incapacity and misbehaviour. Therefore, I am perfectly content to leave the final decision to them. In the United States a Judge is removed upon impeachment before the Senate.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

That gives him a right to defend himself, which he would not have here.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Will the Executive have power to suspend?

Mr. SYMON. -

It will have an implied power of suspension. My honorable friend (Sir William Zeal) speaks of the necessity of securing to an accused an opportunity to defend himself, but I am satisfied that the Federal Parliament would give an accused Judge the amplest opportunity to do that.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Well, no provision is made for that.

Mr. SYMON. -
There is no necessity for such a provision. The principle is inherent in every British conscience, and in every British breast. I do not think the Federal Parliament will turn renegade to the principle of the British Constitution and refuse a hearing to an accused. I support the amendment, and I hope that the modification suggested by the leader of the Convention will be adopted.

The amendment to omit the words "for misbehaviour or incapacity and then only was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the words "upon the grounds of proved misbehaviour or incapacity" be added to the sub-section.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

We want to make it perfectly clear that the decision of the Houses as regards the matter of fact shall be conclusive. I would, therefore, suggest to the leader of the Convention whether we might not make the amendment read-"upon the ground of misbehaviour or incapacity, proved to the satisfaction of such Houses."

Mr. REID. -

I do not think the word "proved" is necessary, because the two Houses would not adopt addresses unless they considered the misconduct proved.

Mr. BARTON. -

There might be a defect in their method of arriving at a conclusion.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I understand that the Drafting Committee will not be bound by the form of words adopted by us now, and that if the amendment is carried they will frame the clause using

Mr. SYMON. -

Hear, hear.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sub-section (4) was agreed to, and the clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 73-The judicial power shall extend to all matters-(1) Arising under this Constitution or involving its interpretation. . . .

[P.319] starts here

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

There is a word at the beginning of the clause about which I should like some information from a member of this Judiciary Committee. The word "matters" seems to me a very wide expression. Of course it is necessary that the expression should be wide, but I am not quite clear as to the full extent of its meaning. I presume that when we come to questions arising under the Constitution the term will be restricted to such subjects as are really judicial matters. In the United States Constitution the words used are "judicial cases." The question may arise as to whether the term "matters" may not include matters partaking of a political nature. I should be very glad if some of my honorable friends would enlighten me upon this question.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is a good thing to have a wide expression.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, so long as the expression is not too wide. Questions have arisen in the United States as to the right of the court to interfere in matters which are strictly political.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The court can only adjudicate according to fixed principles of law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, but this is a very wide expression, and one worthy of consideration. I have tried to think of a word which would satisfy me better, but I have not been able to do so.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

My honorable and learned friend puts both sides of a case so well that he often answers his own questions, and I think he has done so in this instance. We want the very widest word we can procure in order to embrace everything which can possibly arise within the ambit of what are comprised under the sub-section. As my honorable and learned friend will see, it would be of no use to adopt the word "case" or "controversy."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It maybe held that there must be a plaintiff and a defendant.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes; I was going to indicate that. In the United States Constitution the words "cases and controversies" are used. Is the word "matters" used there?

Mr. ISAACS. -

No. I think "cases" is used in one place and "controversies" in another.

Mr. SYMON. -

I think we are using the best word here. The word "matters" merely indicates the scope within which the judicial power is to be exercised, but no matter can be dealt with until it comes before the authorities in the form of a case or some judicial process which will be regulated by the Judiciary Acts. It does not strike me that the word is too wide.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

The view taken by the Attorney-General of Victoria has also suggested itself to me. The fear that this word might give the Supreme Court power in quasi-political cases is not altogether without foundation. What would there be to prevent the Government of the country from going to the Supreme Court under this section on their own motion to obtain an ex parte interpretation of the Constitution? That is guarded against in the United States Constitution, which says that the judicial power "shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution." The United States court has no jurisdiction except where there is a plaintiff and a defendant, and both sides of the case are represented. The words used here are "shall extend to all matters." I think that the use of those words affords ground for the apprehension expressed by the Attorney-General of Victoria that the construction might be made too wide, and might give the court jurisdiction in matters which were not cases.

Mr. SYMON.

It could not.

Dr. QUICK.

What would there be to prevent the Federal Government from going to the Supreme Court ex parte and asking for an interpretation of the Constitution? On the other hand, the use of the word "cases" would confine the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to cases to which there were parties.

Mr. SYMON.

It could not.

Dr. QUICK.

What would there be to prevent the Federal Government from going to the Supreme Court ex parte and asking for an interpretation of the Constitution? On the other hand, the use of the word "cases" would confine the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to cases to which there were parties.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia).

I do not think there is any danger of the Supreme Court being asked to decide upon a political matter. In the Privy Council Act the word "matters" is used, but it has been decided that matters of policy cannot be referred to the council. The word "matters" was decided upon by the Judiciary Committee after a long discussion, and we there had the help of two laymen. I would, however, draw attention to Subsection (8), where there is the only possibility of ambiguity. The clause provides that-

The judicial power shall extend to all matters between stalls.

I think that provision ought to be qualified in some way.

Mr. ISAACS.

Higher up there is a sub-section relating to matters "arising under any treaty."

Mr. GLYNN.

I think that sub-section should be struck out, because the power of the Judiciary cannot extend to a treaty.

Mr. BARTON.

I think the word "matters" means such matters as can arise for judicial determination.

The sub-section was agreed to.
Sub-section (2) was agreed to.
Sub-section (3). - Arising under any treaty.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I would point out that the judicial power cannot extend to a treaty. I think this subsection should be struck out. The court cannot decide upon a treaty, otherwise it might abrogate the Imperial law or polity upon the question at issue.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
Some day hereafter it may be within the scope of the Commonwealth to deal with matters of this kind, and why should it be necessary to amend the Constitution in order to give the express power? It cannot do any harm to leave this provision in the clause.

Mr. REID. -
A treaty might be made in regard to the control of the rivers by New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -
Quite so; or the Commonwealth may have control of treaties having relation to the South Seas or some parts of the East. This provision may be necessary at some future time, and for that reason I think we should leave it in the clause.

The sub-section was agreed to.
Sub-sections (4) and (5) were agreed to.

Sub-section (6). - In which the Commonwealth, or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, is a party.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I should like to call the attention of the committee to this sub-section, and to ask for a consideration of the points whether it gives any right or action in substitution of a petition of right against the Commonwealth I If it does not what does it mean? The Commonwealth will under this provision take the place of the Crown. In parts of the Bill the, term Crown" is used in contradistinction to the word "Commonwealth," but in other parts of the Bill the terms are synonymous. You cannot abrogate tile laws as to a petition of right by implication. I would ask whether, under this provision, an action for torts or contract might be maintained against the Commonwealth without a petition of right?

The sub-section was agreed to.

Sub-section (7). - In which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
The doubt I had about this sub-section has been increased by what Mr. Isaacs has just said to me. The question is whether the words "a writ of mandamus or prohibition" are not rather words of limitation that might be held to exclude other proceedings which might become equally necessary on behalf of or against the Commonwealth, such, for instance, as all injunction or a writ of habeas corpus. I put it to Mr. Symon whether these words may not operate as a limitation in what we agree is a very widely-drawn clause? The bulk of the words of this clause come from the American Constitution.

Mr. SYMON. -

We want to make this clause as wide as possible, and I do not think the words referred to will operate as a limitation. They were intended to direct attention to the fact that the judicial power of the High Court was to deal with these matters of mandamus and prohibition, and it seems to me it would be safer to leave them in than to take them out.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

The view of the leader of the Convention is right. I do not think that these words are in the American Constitution. I have before me section 2 of Article 3, and looking at it hurriedly I do not see the same provision there.

Mr. BARTON. -

I fancy it is in some part of the American Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not know where else it would be. I should say that if we put in these words the inference will be irresistible that if they had not been put in the court would not have had this power. If we trust certain classes of cases to the Federal Court, the mode of enforcing its decrees will be necessarily included within its powers. Whether that power is effectuated by a mandamus, or a prohibition, or an injunction, or a writ of habeas corpus, is a matter for the court's jurisdiction or for provision by the Federal Parliament. I think I am safe in saving that the power is not expressly given in the United States Constitution, but undoubtedly the court exercises it. In a recent and most interesting case in the United States, that of in re Debs, the court had no hesitation in issuing an injunction. If an injunction were asked for here the court might ask why the words "mandamus or prohibition" had been inserted in this clause.

Mr. DOBSON. -

What words would you put in?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I would not put in my words.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

This provision was in the Bill of 1891, and I thought it was taken from the American Constitution.
Mr. ISAACS. -
In my opinion it would be better to omit the sub-section.
The sub-section was struck out.
Sub-section (8) was agreed to.
Sub-section (9). - Relating to the same subject-matter claimed under the laws of different states.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I do not know whether there will be any difficulty in connexion with this sub-section.
Mr. BARTON. -
It is in the American Constitution.
Mr. REID. -
The words are very wide, and might they not include a case which did not fall within the jurisdiction of the court naturally, but in which jurisdiction was sought, simply on the ground that two or more states happened to have a claim to the same thing? For instance, I do not know whether our friends might not, under these general words, bring in the water rights question.
Mr. ISAACS. -
It is all governed by the word "matter."
Mr. REID. -
That is a wonderful word. The word "matter" occurs in sub-section (9). I think, under these circumstances and for the admirable reason suggested by the honorable member, I need not pursue the matter further.
Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
Would it not be advisable to insert in this clause words giving the Federal Court power to determine questions of boundary disputes between the various colonies? I do not know whether such a power is given by subsection (8).
Mr. BARTON. -
The words are wide enough for it.
Dr. QUICK. -
Of course a boundary dispute could not arise under the Constitution, or under any legislation proceeding from the Federal Parliament. What the meaning of the words "between states" is I am at a loss to understand, because sub-sections (1) and (2) point to disputes arising under the Constitution or under any laws made by the Parliament.
Mr. BARTON. -
This is similar to the power in the American Constitution, which is described as "controversies between two or more states." It was thought that the words "two or more" were unnecessary.

Dr. QUICK. -

It would, I think, be wise to give the court power to deal with boundary disputes. Disputes may arise in the future of greater magnitude than any that have arisen in the past.

Mr. BARTON. -

Does not the honorable member think that the words "between states" cover it?

Dr. QUICK. -

I do not think so. What law would it be decided by?

The sub-section was agreed to.

Clause 73, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 74. - The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe, to hear and determine appeals from all judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences of any other Federal Court, or court exercising federal jurisdiction, or of the Supreme Court of any state, whether any such court is a court of appeal or of original jurisdiction; and the judgment of the High Court in all such cases shall be final and conclusive.

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the conditions and restrictions on appeals to the Queen in Council from the Supreme Courts of the several states shall be applicable to appeals from them to the High Court.

Amendment suggested by the New South Wales Parliament-
After "jurisdiction" (line 1), insert "where the parties consent."

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

This amendment opens up the whole subject of appeals to the Privy Council, and I think I may fairly ask the leader of the Convention to postpone the consideration of the clause until after lunch.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have no objection.

[The Chairman left the chair at five minutes to one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at two p.m.]

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

The proposal of the New South Wales Parliament, shortly stated, is one which will preserve the right of appeal to the Privy Council, unless the parties divest themselves of that right of appeal by mutual consent. It simplifies the procedure as against other proposals where the right of appeal is maintained, in that no additional hurdle for litigants to have to overcome is created. That is to say, if the parties choose to let their case be decided by the High Court of Appeal in the colonies, there will be no appeal to the Privy Council.
Mr. ISAACS.

You would want the consent of both parties.

Mr. CARRUTHERS.

If either party objects, then the appeal will have to go to the Privy Council. It will commend itself to honorable members in this respect: That if we are going to have an additional Court of Appeal constituted in Australia, having the Privy Council as the final Court of Appeal, it will simply mean adding to the expense of litigation, making it impossible for men of comparatively, moderate means to undergo the expense of pursuing their case from court to court. It will simply be the means of creating another court, in which litigants will not have finality, but in which lawyers will have full play for their faculties.

Mr. ISAACS.

But that is not proposed; that is guarded against.

Mr. CARRUTHERS.

This proposal at any rate has this merit, that it does not create an additional court to those which litigants have now to face. There will be but one Court of Appeal, and that court, wherever it may be, the Privy Council or the Court of Appeal in the colonies, will be a final Court of Appeal. I would never vote for any proposal which made litigation filter through the Supreme Courts of the various colonies, through the High Court of the Federation, and finally leaving a right of appeal to the Privy Council. That would be multiplying law, and as a community we should have no ultimate decision better than we have at the present time. This proposal is followed by consequential amendments later on, which will give effect to the whole view which I have shortly summarized. I have always been in favour of the preservation of this right of appeal to the Privy Council. Listening to the debate which took place this morning my views, if it were possible to strengthen them, were very much strengthened by hearing the arguments of Mr. Symon, Mr. Isaacs, and others in favour of having the colonial court, the High Court, so constituted as to place it above the possibility of political or parliamentary influence, so as to make it in truth the guardian of our Constitution, impervious to all outside influence from the other component parts of the Constitution itself. You will never get a court so free from these influences which render it liable to attack, so free from local bias and control, either by the Legislature or the Executive, as the Privy Council is. We can never imagine that the Privy Council will be influenced by the state of parties in Federated Australia.

Mr. SYMON.

Nor have you any right to imagine it in respect to the High Court.
Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

We can never imagine that a Government will swamp the Privy Council; we can never imagine that such an occurrence could take place as in America, which led to a judicial scandal. The Privy Council will be, in all truth, the bulwark of our Constitution, being so far removed from the party conflicts and those things which create party conflicts in Federated Australia. If honorable members argue, as no doubt they will argue, that it is necessary to have a strong court in the colonies as the guardian of the Constitution, I do not know of any court that can be constituted which will be so strong as that great Appeal Court—the Privy Council—which is so far removed from those things which are an element of weakness in any Australian court. But I go on very much higher grounds than the mere thought of safeguarding our Constitution. I am reminded that the resolutions which we have passed, this Bill which we are now framing, and the union which we are hoping to consummate, declare that this is to be a union under the Crown. We reserve to ourselves the right to make laws, but before those laws can become operative they have to go to the Queen for her assent. We are not denying to the Crown the right of refusing to ratify the legislation passed by the Parliament under this Bill. We have reserved to the Crown the right of giving or withholding its assent to that legislation. In every respect, except this one, we have been careful, in framing this Constitution, to keep the spirit of the text up to the words that "it shall be a union under the Crown." Here is the most manifest of all the links which have bound us in the past, and up to the present time still bind us, to the Crown. This is the one tangible and visible element of union now between these colonies and the mother country.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is simply a court.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

We know that our Governors have no real practical power; this is the only other visible link connecting us with the old country. As far as our laws are concerned, we have no link so tangible and visible as the link which binds our Judiciary here to the Judiciary of the mother country.

Mr. SYMON. -

Would not the link be the same if the Lords Justices were the Court of Appeal?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Of course the link would be the same, so long as the court were constituted by the Queen as the Appeal Court of the empire. I do not say the Privy Council is composed as well as it might be. I am not arguing as to the wisdom which has been shown in the mother country in constituting this council as the Appellate Court for the empire. I say that the Privy Council, and the right of appeal to the Queen in Council advised by her law advisers there, is the one real visible link that now remains binding us to the Crown. I do not speak merely on sentimental grounds, nor do I say that sentiment should over-ride utility, but sentiment should have a great deal to do with this matter, unless it is shown that the sentiment is founded on false premises and leads us to false conclusions. In the initiatory resolutions we resolved that there was to be a union under the Crown, and we should, before we change that state of things, see that there is some clear and manifest evidence to show that the change is desirable. Has such evidence been adduced? There have been no petitions to us asking for this change. I defy any honorable member, to show that there has been since we have had representative government in Australia any agitation which could by any honorable member, however desirous for the change, be termed widespread for an alteration of this character.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
There are very few interested in the appeals.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
People are satisfied with this right of appeal to the Privy Council. No discontent has been created by its practice and operation. Surely the onus is upon those who desire this change to show that it is asked for by the people, and that it is a change that is warranted. Especially when we are framing a Constitution to unite us under the Crown should we be very chary of snapping the one last visible link that binds us to the Crown, the more so when that link is one that less been felt, and felt agreeably, by the people to be one binding them to their own advantage. I remember that in Adelaide great stress was laid upon the fact that if we take the right, (as it was alleged we were taking it) to frame our own legislation, to make our own laws, we should also have the right to interpret those laws. But we do not here ask for the right to frame our own laws. Under this Bill it is provided that no law shall become operative until the Royal assent has been given to it, and there is a special power for the reservation of that Royal consent. I say that that is a right and wise thing to provide for, that no law should become operative until the Crown has manifested its consent to it; and if the Crown has a right to be consulted, the Crown should also have the right to interpret those laws upon the requisition of any subject affected thereby. Otherwise, we might have this state of affairs—that the Royal assent is given to a law that, interpreted by some local judicial body, is not made to operate the same way as it would appear to operate when interpreted by the Crown acting by the advice of its legal advisers. Then, again, we have great emphasis laid on the fact that this Constitution would not abridge the right or liberty of any subject of the Queen in these colonies, but would rather enlarge them. I say that it is abridging the privileges of a subject of the Queen when you take away from t

But you are giving him a better right in lieu of it.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

That is a matter upon which the honorable member holds a strong opinion, but he has never yet succeeded in showing me or those others who differ from him in what way the right was better. It does not appear to me to be better to give up going to the fountainhead of justice and to go to some local source of justice instead—a local source about which the honorable member might argue from week's end to week's end without proving it to be better than the present local sources of justice. I have said so much upon the point with regard to past practice and the right which ought not to be curtailed. I know that this proposal will be met at once by the objection that carries a great many people away with it, that the abolition of appeal to the Privy Council will result in cheapening the processes of law by bringing the ultimate decision nearer to the litigants, and making it easier for the poor man to prosecute an appeal. It only requires a little reflection to show that no more delusive argument could be brought forward than that of cheap law for the poor man by means of a Federal Court of Appeal.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The poor man never goes to the Privy Council.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

A man is generally a poor man when he leaves it.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

We know that this Court of Appeal would not be one that would go wandering about taking justice to the very doors of people. We are not likely to be led away by any argument of that character. This court, whenever it is constituted, will sit in the capital city of the Federation. To that court, wherever it may be situated, appellants will have to bring their cases. I ask the representatives of Western Australia whether it will be cheaper for their constituents to bring their cases from Perth to some inland town of New South Wales or Victoria, or take their cases, as now, to London? Again, so far as regards the bar that will have to be retained for the conduct of these cases, we know very well that when cases are tried in London there is a choice not from a bar of ten or twenty or fifty members, but from some thousands of men practising in the city. A litigant is not limited in his choice. But if the High Court is constituted in the capital city of the Commonwealth the possibilities-nay, the probabilities-are that that capital city will not be one of the great cities in which lawyers now congregate, but will be some inland town selected far away from where the courts are constituted at the present time; and the probabilities that the litigants will have to pay very high fees to get men to leave their practice at Melbourne, Sydney or Adelaide, to conduct cases at the Federal Court. There will also be a very limited choice of men indeed. Laymen do not need to be told that lawyers' fees in Australia are not lower than fees in the mother country—I go no further than that; and men cannot expect to be served by the bar before the High Court of Australia for lower fees than those for which they would be served by the bar appearing before the Privy Council at Westminster. Therefore, I think, on the score of economy, there is very little to induce litigants to favour the establishment of a High Court of Australia. Far more expense is likely to be incurred at the local court, and eminent barristers capable of taking these cases will be likely to demand their own terms. Altogether the probability is that there will be more expense instead of less attaching to the trial of cases before the High Court of Australia. Then again, there, is surely some importance to be attached to the argument of preserving uniformity of decisions in our laws. It will be, some guarantee to the people within the Commonwealth, and a, greater guarantee to the people outside the Commonwealth, who may have large business transactions with Australia that will go on increasing and increasing many fold when federation is accomplished, that their interests will not be sacrificed, when, if they are engaged in disputes, and recourse has to be had from the lower courts to the final Court of Appeal in England, the decision ultimately will be according to the uniform law of the empire. I will not amplify that portion of the subject, because it has been referred to in the letter which is before honorable members, written by Mr. Justice Richmond, of New Zealand, in 1891. There is a portion of my argument which I shall make no apology for referring to, and that is that, with our limited choice of the bar in Australia, there is very great difficulty in getting competent men to occupy seats upon the bench. There will be just as great difficulty in the future, if we add to the number of judicial officers. The choice is too limited for us to be sure of getting men capable of filling these highest judicial positions, and, if we add probably five or six more to the number of Judges who have to be appointed-if we have to take men from the Benches of Western Australia or Victoria, of Tasmania or South Australia or New South Wales-it is very questionable indeed whether it will be possible to fill up their places satisfactorily. We know that it is very difficult indeed in Australia to induce eminent lawyers to leave the active practice of their profession to take seats on the bench. It means a great sacrifice to some of them, which they are not willing to incur, and you cannot have always as efficient a bench as you have in the Privy Council as it is at present constituted. Therefore, we are likely to sacrifice the efficiency of our Judiciary in adding to the number of our Judges in Australia; and we are likely to sacrifice the bench we have already provided without expense to us in the mother country. Then again (I say it almost with bated breath) in these small communities there is always actuating men in public life, even on the judicial bench, an unconscious bias, whereby their minds and their decisions are (it is likely to be said) prone to be affected.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

In what direction is the bias?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

We know that we can trust our Judges in all cases, but still in small communities such as this it is no wrong thing to say that-through our surroundings and acquaintances, and through almost every man in the community knowing everybody else, through our small public life, and our small circle in social life-men are so well known to one another, and things that influence people in public and private life are so widespread and so active, that men are apt to be biased by these influences; and, even if they are not biased, they are apt to have their decisions questioned, because bias will be attributed to them. Even where there is not actual bias, there is often unconscious bias, which makes a man give his decision, if not in a manner opposed to the evidence before the court, at all events with the influences I have referred to affecting his mind. Judges have to try cases in Australia, an very often before the cases come before them, they know a good deal as to the private life of litigants. Consequently, they sit on the Bench with a certain amount of unconscious bias. This consideration has always been used as an argument against the efficiency of Judges sitting in small communities, where the local surroundings are so keenly felt by reason of the community being so small.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is a very good argument for the abolition of the courts of justice in the colonies at present.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Not at all. My honorable and learned friend must see that you must not strain the argument against it, that it is better to go to the source of justice where it is pure and undefiled. If he cannot always get to that source of justice pure and undefiled, surely my honorable and learned friend would not refuse to take any justice at all. Unfortunately, in all small communities, there are influences which provoke a bias, and in many cases provoke an unconscious bias which lead men to decisions which probably may be questioned hereafter. I will give one instance of it in a case which was tried in New South Wales. In the case of Alison v. Burns the Judges decided that the intention of the Legislature with regard to the rents to be paid by the squatters was of such-and-such a character, and they interpreted the law accordingly. The Privy Council interpreted the law in quite the reverse way. There is no doubt that our local court was governed in its decision largely by the fact that the members of that body had been present in the colony when the legislation was being passed, had heard or read the debates in Parliament, had a great knowledge of the circumstances outside of those facts which were brought in as evidence. Unconsciously, the Judges got an idea into their heads that they knew the intention of Parliament better

than was shown in the four corners of the statute itself: The Privy Council had no knowledge of the debates in Parliament, of the circumstances of the past, or of the requirements of the Treasury. It reversed the decision of the local court. That reversal necessitated the passing of new legislation. To put the question beyond all doubt, that new legislation embodied the real intention of the Parliament of New South Wales, and followed the decision of the Privy Council. Now, there is an instance which shows that there are certain influences governing the minds of the Judges, which shows that by some unconscious bias they were led to a decision which was very properly set aside by the Privy Council. Moreover, it is always a wise thing to have some corrective influence behind Judges-I do not care what position they occupy and the Privy Council has always exercised a corrective influence over the doings of our local courts. It is well for men, no matter how high they are placed, to know that there is some power behind them, to know that there is some body which can review their decision. They are less likely to pursue a wrong course when they know that their decision can be set aside and reviewed by some other court. For these reasons, I commend the proposal of the New South Wales Assembly to the Convention, and I hope that it will be carried.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I would ask you, sir, as a matter of convenience, whether it is desirable to discuss this large question of Privy Council appeals on this particular amendment? It will confuse the whole issue very much. The amendment which is now under our consideration is to insert the words "with the consent of both parties." The effect of their insertion will be to destroy the power of appeal we propose to give to the High Court unless both parties consent. I do not believe there is any man here who desires that. We wish the High Court to have the power of appeal. The issue between us is whether that shall be final, or whether the parties shall, after that, at the instance of the appellant, take it to the Privy Council.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Some think that the appeal ought to go direct to the Privy Council and not to the High Court here.

Mr. SYMON. -

Very good.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Either one or the other.

Mr. SYMON. -

No doubt. The place, I think, at which it might be much more conveniently discussed, would be at the end of this clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Or on the next clause.

Mr. SYMON. -

Or on the next clause. I do not think there are any honorable members here who are desirous of absolutely destroying the High Court we have taken the trouble to create in an earlier clause.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Would there be a double appeal?

Mr. SYMON. -

No; because a provision could be inserted in the next clause. At least, I understand that some honorable members desire that there should be an optional appeal, that is, that it should be at the option of the appellant to go to the Privy Council without going to the High Court of Appeal. But this is to make it necessary to have the consent of both parties before you can go to the High Court.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

On every appeal?

Mr. SYMON. -

On every appeal. The thing is a contradiction in terms. The successful party would say-"I do not want to appeal," and therefore what is the good of putting in a provision of that kind?-The successful party would never consent; he would say to the other You can do as you please." I would suggest to my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers) whether it would not be better to dispose of this amendment, and then to deal with this very important question of Privy Council appeal on the last words of the clause, which makes the judgment of the High Court in all cases final and conclusive. There we can raise the issue and know what we are driving at.

The CHAIRMAN. -

This amendment was suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, and we are bound to dispose of it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

Without entering on the merits of the question, I would also urge on my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers) that if he attempts to discuss the amendment on this particular clause we will get into a state of confusion. I intend to support him as strongly as I can in his contention that the right of appeal should not be taken away from any of our citizens who desire to go to the Privy Council. But I cannot, vote for this amendment, because it would mean that whenever a case was tried, and one party wanted to appeal to the court within the Commonwealth, he could not appeal unless he obtained the consent of the other party, and the end would be that the other party of course, would not consent. I would suggest to my honorable friend that his wiser course is to allow this clause to go as it is, to discuss the question on clause 75, and, if in that clause we, succeed in making such an alteration as will enable an appeal to be made either to the High Court here or to the, Privy Council, then the Drafting Committee necessarily must make alterations so as to bring clause 74 consistent with clause 75. If he persists in taking a vote on clause 74, I am afraid that many of us who desire to support him will have to vote against him, and by that means he may lose what we are anxious that he should gain.

Mr BARTON (New South Wales). -

It may be that my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers) would really desire, in place of the amendment, he is moving now to assimilate the law of this Constitution to that which exists in Canada, under which the Queen in Council may grant leave, to appeal in any case, and under which, as honorable members know, the principles on which leave to appeal has been granted have been laid down by the Privy Council itself.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We want to do more; we want to give power to the High Court here, to allow appeals.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am rather inclined to support the Bill as it stands, but if we are to have the matter decided I take it that the real broad battle between us is this—Whether the appeal shall be limited as it is proposed to be limited by the Bill, or whether it shall be open to the Queen in Council to grant special leave to appeal in any case. What has been done in Canada is this: After the words "final and conclusive" in a similar provision the following words occur in their legislation-

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not contained, in their Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

No; the Constitution gave power to the Dominion Parliament to constitute a Supreme Court. That power was exercised in the year 1875, and in section 47 of the Canadian Act 38 Vict, Chap. XI., I find this provision-

The judgment of the Supreme Court shall in all cases be final and conclusive, and no appeal shall be brought from any judgment or order of the Supreme Court to any court of appeal established by the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, by which appeals or petitions to Her Majesty in Council may be ordered to be heard; saving any right which Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of her royal prerogative.

The intervening words after the words "final and conclusive" will not affect us here. In a case decided on the operation of this section-Johnston against The Trustees of St Andrew's Church-the intervening words, with reference to any court of appeal established by the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland, were decided by the Lord Chancellor to be merely hypothetical words applying to any court, apart from the Privy Council, which might be constituted, so that those words may be left out of consideration here.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That will not carry us any further than clause 75 does.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am only pointing this out as a matter of drafting, because I am not at all satisfied that I should support this amendment. What this amendment would do if placed at the end of the first paragraph of the clause would be to make it certain that the Privy Council could grant leave to appeal in any case of petition to appeal, and the result of that would be, if carried, I take it, that clause 75 would have to be struck out of the Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Would that carry us one step further than clause 75 does?

Mr. BARTON. -

A great deal further, because clause 75 limits the cases of appeal to those matters-

In which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any state, or of any other part of her dominions are concerned.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Are there any decisions in which that power has been construed differently?

Mr. BARTON. -

There are some. The words of limitation in clause 75 my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) suggests may be left out, and that would achieve the same object. The Privy Council has never narrowed the appeals from Canada down to the point to which this Bill proposes to narrow them down. This Bill prescribes for only certain specified cases which I have alluded to; but in Canada there is still held in reserve by the Privy Council power to grant leave to appeal in any case in which there are large and important issues involved, and the class of cases has been laid down very specifically by the Privy Council. It is quite clear there is a disinclination in England, to cut down this Privy Council jurisdiction, which is held to be a part of the Queen's prerogative. It is not discussed as we are discussing it here as part of the subject's sacred right to appeal. It is discussed as part of Her Majesty's possessions by way of prerogative, and the disinclination there is to cut down that prerogative.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is the outcome of the old Crown colony time.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, it is simply the Queen's own jurisdiction to hear her subjects' humble petition from any part of her possessions, and that is exercised in judicial matters by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. What I wish to lay before honorable members is this: If it is desired to place the legislation which will ensue from this Constitution on the same footing as prevails in Canada, the few words I hold in my hand will amply carry that out in the same way as is done in Canada. Therefore, I suggest to my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers) that if he wishes to take a test vote on this question the best way to do it is not to support the amendment he is now dealing with, which I think would be only provocative of confusion, but to move an amendment at the end of the first sub-section similar to that which I hold in my hand, and there the whole matter could be fought out. And if he succeeded in carrying that amendment, then I, for one, would no longer contest the necessity to strike out clause 75.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Would that give an alternative right of appeal to one court or the other? Would it not mean that you would have to go first to the Federal Court, and then, its decision not being final and conclusive, to the Privy Council.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, it would read in this way:-
The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe, to hear and determine appeals from all judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences of any other Federal Court.

That means that they have jurisdiction. It does not mean that every appeal must be brought to them; it means they have jurisdiction to hear when an appeal is brought to them.

or court exercising federal jurisdiction, or of the Supreme Court of any state, whether any such court is a court of appeal or of original jurisdiction; and the judgment of this High Court in all such cases shall be final and conclusive.

If there is to be any exception to that provision the exception would be best created by passing an amendment such as I hold in my hand, and then it would be optional still to a person to appeal to the High Court, or to petition for leave to appeal to the Privy Council, and the Privy Council would decide the matter on the lines which they have laid down already in regard to Canada. Possibly it might be a little more restricted, but one cannot predict that it will, because there is evidently a considerable reluctance to part with what is considered a prerogative right, and the probability is that the Privy Council would lay down lines on which appeals would be heard precisely as they have laid them down in regard to Canadian appeals. That, I take it, is really what our friends who do not concur with us in this matter are aiming at. I should say that if an amendment of that kind were carried, it would be impossible to support clause 75, The whole matter would hinge upon such an amendment.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Is it not an objection to Mr. Barton's amendment, that we are creating another Court of Appeal in state cases, because an appeal may be taken to the High Court and afterwards, by consent, further on? I understand that the object of Mr. Carruthers' amendment is to render an appeal to the High Court optional, but Mr. Barton's amendment would make it open to appeal to that court in all cases and to go further in some. I do not agree with Mr. Carruthers' amendment, but I would suggest that an informal amendment has been suggested by the New South Wales Assembly—that the words ought to be inserted in the fifth line, after "or." I doubt whether it is not a verbal mistake to put them in the first line. The point is this: If the words are put in the beginning of the clause, then you put limitation upon the right of appeal in federal cases, which is not intended; but if you put the words after "or," in the fifth line, the right of appeal in all federal cases will be absolute, which is intended. But there can only be an appeal from such judgment in state legislation where both parties consent. That is what is intended, and it is evidently a grammatical mistake made by the New South Wales Assembly to suggest the insertion of the words in the place it does. I would ask you, Mr. Chairman, whether it would not be competent for you, on the suggestion of an honorable member, to put the amendment after "or" in the fifth line, and so accomplish what is aimed at? That might be done, I think, because if an amendment is suggested by a local Parliament which would not be in order if proposed by an honorable member here, you would have power to reject that amendment or to propose it in its proper place.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The committee may reject the words where the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales have asked them to be inserted. It may afterwards agree to a proposal to insert the same words lower down, because they would not be dealing with the same question over again. The insertion of the words lower down would have an entirely different meaning.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I desire to say that I shall be found supporting the fullest and final authority of the local court of appeal. But I would suggest that it is highly undesirable that we should carry the amendment now proposed, because the effect of it will be that, to give the High Court of Australia this jurisdiction, the consent of both parties will be necessary. If you want to give an alternative appeal, not an accumulative appeal, you should confer, I would suggest, original jurisdiction on the High Court; but if the parties desire or agree to avoid going there, and prefer to go to the Privy Council direct, then, by the consent of both parties, let that be done. I think, however, that in founding a Constitution for Australia we should make a provision conferring, independent of any consent, proper jurisdiction on the court we are proposing to call into existence.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

- I beg to move-

That the words "with such exceptions and" be struck out.

This is a limitation of the power of appeal, a limitation of the general vesting of the appellate power under this clause, by rendering it competent for Parliament to say in what cases there shall be an appeal and in what cases there shall not. As the clause reads, the High Court shall have jurisdiction "with such exceptions" as Parliament may prescribe. It is in the power of Parliament to say that even in some federal cases and cases of state appeals the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court shall not exist—the High Court will only have jurisdiction "with such exceptions and subject to such regulations" as Parliament may from time to time prescribe. Now this word "regulations" must mean something different from "exceptions". "Exceptions" means a deduction from the powers of the court, and there must be a significance given to the word "exceptions", which is wider than the word "regulations". Therefore, I think it will be in the competence of Parliament to say that the right of appeal, even from federal courts, may be cut down, and also the right of appeal from state courts. Now, that was never intended. I drew attention to the point at the meeting of the Convention at Adelaide, but it was scarcely considered. In America, time after time, demands were made to emasculate the jurisdiction of the courts when the decisions were against the opinions of the construction of the Constitution that were dominant at the time. In 1803 the whole jurisdiction of the circuit courts was thus interfered with, and in other cases the jurisdiction was cut down in order to forestall decisions which were expected to be unfavourable. It will be seen, therefore, that we cannot expect that ideal of purity of motive on the bench which has been talked of by some honorable members. Courts are human. From 1801 to 1835, during Marshall's jurisdiction, the complexion of the American courts was federalist, while for ten years afterwards it was democratic. Attempts were made by Parliament to forestall the decisions of the courts, or to interfere with their constitution by increasing the number of members on the bench. We should be anxious not to put in words which will render it competent for the Parliament to state that in certain cases within the limits of clause 73 appellate jurisdiction shall not exist even in federal matters. They might also, under this provision, declare that the right of appeal upon state matters will exist only in exceedingly few cases. There is not a clause in the Bill which expressly gives appellate jurisdiction except this clause. It is given by implication in clause 77, but not expressly. I think it would be better to leave it only by implication rather than not to strike out these words. In my opinion, the retention of the words "with such exceptions and " would allow too great an interference with the appellate jurisdiction.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I hope the amendment will not be accepted. I find that the words to which Mr. Glynn takes exception are the words which are used in the United States Constitution, Article 3, section 2, which, of course, deals only with federal matters. In that section one sentence states—

In all other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

If they were willing in the United States to allow exceptions even with regard to appeals in federal matters, then a fortiori I think the Federal Parliament ought to be allowed to make exceptions in connexion with the High Court, which is to deal with appeals in matters of all sorts and from all courts, otherwise a man might protract litigation ad infinitum on the most trumpery case. For instance, if there was an order made by a Judge as to the form of pleading—that a man must make a statement of claim more definite-then, according to my honorable friend's amendment, an appeal about a statement of claim or declamation, could be carried up to the High Court of Australia, and the High Court would have its time taken up with the wretched question as to whether a certain word should be put into a statement of claim.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Or about some matter involving only a matter of 40s.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes. Supposing a man was convicted of being drunk and disorderly, and was fined or ordered to be imprisoned for a certain number of hours; if he were rich he might carry the thing to the High Court, and the time of the High Court might be taken up by such a trumpery matter as that. In this, as in other matters, we must trust the Federal Parliament to a very large extent. I think the whole machinery of the Act will become ridiculous if the people are to be told that, no matter how trumpery a case may be, the litigant shall have power to oppress the other side by carrying it to the High Court of Australia.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I beg to move—

That after the word "state" the following words be inserted, "or of any other court of any state from which an appeal now lies to the Queen in Council."

I propose this amendment merely because of the condition of things in our own colony, in which there is another Court of Appeal from which an appeal now lies to the Privy Council, an intermediate Court of Appeal which is seldom availed of, but which exists.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I am inclined to think that the words suggested are necessary with regard to all colonies. In Tasmania we have no appeal in certain mining cases, and there may be other colonies which have no appeal in other cases. I think the appeal should be given in all cases where the state gives an appeal itself. You do not want to interfere with the local law, and confer an appeal from our Supreme Court where we do not grant such an appeal now. I would ask Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor whether it is meant under this clause that an appeal will lie in any criminal case? The word "sentences" is used. That may mean a sentence of condemnation in an admiralty suit, but does it also mean an ordinary sentence in a criminal case?

Mr. HIGGINS. - That is covered by the words "with such exceptions as Parliament may from time to time prescribe."

Mr. DOBSON. - No doubt that would cover it.

Mr. ISAACS. - I believe it would include that, but there is power in the Federal Parliament to except.

Mr. DOBSON. - Of course I am aware that it is of no use saying that we should trust the Federal Parliament, and then in every other sentence show that we distrust them; but, at the same time, I think the Act should make it clear whether you intend to confer the right of appeal in criminal cases. I can understand that Parliament must have jurisdiction to make limitations, and to say that you shall not appeal, say, in any case involving less than £500 or £1,000; but I do not know that we should give the Federal Parliament the right to say that you shall not have an appeal in an admiralty case, and you shall have an appeal in a criminal case. I think the Constitution should decide these matters.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). - The words in clause 74 are as wide as possible. They cover every possible species of decision, civil or criminal.

Mr. ISAACS. - I think, they are the same as in the Privy Council orders.

Mr. OCONNOR. - Yes, they follow the same words. To take the illustration of Mr. Dobson, an adjudgment of guilty in a criminal case is the judgment of the court. The jury find the verdict, but the judgment is the judgment of the Court. So that every possible case is covered. Now, it appears to me that we must suppose that the power to grant these exceptions or limitations which is given to the Federal Parliament will be exercised with ordinary common sense, and with a due regard to justice. We cannot suppose that the Federal Parliament would deprive a criminal of his right of appeal any more than any other litigants in cases of less importance. The right of appeal in criminal cases is, therefore, fully preserved, and will not be withheld by the Federal Parliament.

The amendment was agreed to.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales and the Legislative Council of Victoria-

Omit "and the judgment of the High Court in all such cases shall be final and conclusive."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I trust that these words will not be struck out. I am quite prepared to find that somebody will propose an amendment to follow them, to reserve the Queen's right to grant leave to appeal; but I do not think that either side would like to take away the final and conclusive nature of the judgment of the High Court of the Commonwealth, except subject to what is done in the way of appeal to the Privy Council. Therefore, I submit that the words proposed to be struck out are absolutely essential and cannot be dispensed with.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I do not propose to raise any objection to these words remaining as part of the clause, but I intend to endeavour to add a few words afterwards, in order to give the right of appeal to the Privy Council in certain cases.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We are voting on this amendment on the understanding that words will be added giving the option of an appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. SYMON. -

Somebody will have to move that amendment, then.

The amendment was negatived.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I do not wish to traverse the ground which has been so well covered by Mr. Carruthers, who has put fairly before us all the reasons which could be adduced why we should not take away absolutely the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I feel that the reasons that he has adduced are, or ought to be, sufficient to convince us that if we take away altogether the right of appeal to the Privy Council we will be taking a step which the people of the Federation hereafter will have cause to regret. Clause 75 provides that-

No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state, or from the High Court or any other federal court, except that the Queen may, in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any state, or of any other part of her dominions are concerned, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.
I understood at Adelaide that those words correctly interpreted the judgments which had been given by the Privy Council on applications for appeal, and that by incorporating those particular words in this statute we would be giving to the people in our Federation exactly the same right of appeal which the people in Canada have at the present time.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
And although you thought that you voted against us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Certainly, because I did not know of any reason why the right of appeal should be restricted. At present any person who feels aggrieved, except against mere trumpery judgments—because there are certain reasonable limitations which no one can object to—has the right to apply to the court in the colony for permission to appeal to the Privy Council, and, failing that, has the right to appeal direct.

Mr. SYMON. -
Except a poor man concerned in a case of £200 perhaps.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I am afraid that his £200 would be very little good to him after the case was over, even if he succeeded in his appeal.

Mr. SYMON. -
Why should he not have the right to appeal?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
He has the right to appeal. In all cases for over £500 with us he has the right to go to the Queen direct and ask permission to appeal.

Mr. SYMON. -
Do you think he would be likely to get it?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I do not know. If he has the means to do so, he has the right to go to the Queen direct and ask for permission to appeal, and if he has not the means, we cannot by any statute give him the means to do so.

Mr. SYMON. -
And there are 10,000 litigants who have not the means to appeal to every one who has the means.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Very likely; but why shut out the one who has the means from appealing to the highest court of the realm, which we have all the right to appeal to at the present time? Again, other cases may be tried within the Commonwealth which affect persons outside the Commonwealth. We have large contracts with people in England, who will have to be bound by our laws here, and they will not be able to appeal to the Privy Council, even if they think that the decisions of our courts here are not correct.

Mr. SYMON. -

Why should not that be so?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Why should they be shut out of the right of appeal to the Privy Council simply because they reside in another part of the empire? They should have the same right of appeal as all other citizens have.

Mr. SYMON. -

Except in Great Britain and Ireland; they have not the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

In Great Britain and Ireland they have the right of appeal, although perhaps not to the same body as we have the right to appeal to here. I quite agree with Mr. Carruthers that we do not desire to add more hedges or more ditches. But we do say that the person aggrieved should have the right of appeal to the one court or the other. I would not support the contention that the rich litigant should have the privilege of dragging the other man, whether he be rich or poor, through all the courts of the colony, including the High Court of Appeal here, and then the right of appealing to England. I say that the man who is beaten and desires to appeal should have the full right to select the Court of Appeal. I would allow him to appeal to the High Court here, if he so chose, on the condition that if he got beaten he must stop, or I would give him the right to go to the Appeal Court in England, where, if beaten, he would have to stop. But then there is the case of the man who is dragged before the High Court here and beaten, and he should have the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

That would be a double appeal.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, he would be a glutton for litigation; you must have finality somewhere.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It would not be a double appeal.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If the Federal Court and the Privy Council differ as to the law, what is to guide the Supreme Court of Victoria or of New South Wales?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The decision of the Privy Council.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I mean to say, if the Federal Court and the Privy Council differ in two cases, what is to guide the courts of inferior jurisdiction here—if the Privy Council has taken one view of the law and the High Court of Australia another?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Undoubtedly, as part of the British dominions, we ought to be bound by the decisions of the highest court in the realm.

Mr. SYMON. -

According to your argument the two courts will be equal?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I did not say that they would be equal.

Mr. SYMON. -

But they must be equal if you give the alternative appeal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I would rather see this High Court that we are talking so much about, and which is going to be a terrific expense for very little benefit, taken away than I would see the Privy Council taken away. But I do not want the High Court to be taken away, because that court would be useful in many cases. At the same time, I think we can very easily preserve, in all cases where it is necessary, the full right of appeal to the Privy Council. I would say that no appeal should take place except by permission of the High Court or of the Queen in Council. It should be quite competent where the High Court had decided a case to make an application to that court for leave to appeal to the Privy Council. If the High Court allowed it, of course the appeal could go to the Privy Council, but if the High Court refused it I would still allow the parties to ask the Privy Council for leave to appeal. But where a person of his own motion had selected the High Court to finally decide the matter, he ought to be prevented from going further, though I would not prevent any one else from going to the Privy Council. I have not attempted to go through the reasons which lead me to take this attitude, because I think they have been fully stated by the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers). In order to test the matter, though I am not perfectly satisfied that the words I propose to add are exactly the words that the Drafting Committee would like to adopt, I beg to move that the following words be added to the clause:—

except in cases where an appeal may be allowed either by the Privy Council or the High Court.

Mr. WISE. -

Why not take the words that are used in the Canadian Act?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
If we add the words "saving any right which Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of her royal prerogative," that will give no power to the court here. Why should the parties be put to the expense of applying to the Privy Council for leave to appeal?

Mr. BARTON. -

Because then the poorest man could get an appeal if the case was important.

Mr. WISE. -

The honorable member's amendment would make an additional step in the litigation, which would be in favour of the rich man.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Not at all. I give the right to apply to the Queen in Council for leave to appeal, but I also go a step further and give the right to apply to the court here for that permission.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

But the court would make rules regarding the matter, and they would probably fix a certain amount as a limit.

Mr. BARTON. -

£500.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think it is a great mistake to deal with this matter in the Convention at all.

Mr. WISE. -

I am rather inclined to agree with the honorable member, but still I am coming round on this question.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Why should a litigant have to go to the Queen in Council to get leave to appeal?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Quite so. A litigant has the right to appeal now in all cases involving more than £500, and in other important cases he may get leave to appeal. I do not want appeals to be made upon trivial matters, nor do I think it likely that such appeals will be made. We know that the appeals which take place now concern matters of great importance, affecting not only the parties to the litigation but hundreds of other persons as well. I am not particularly wedded to the words I have suggested, but I desire to have some provision embodied in the Constitution which will preserve to us the right of appeal to the Privy Council. The provision in the Bill, to my mind, instead of enlarging the rights of the people of the Commonwealth, limits them.
Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
I would suggest that in order to get this matter settled the honorable member should alter the first word of his amendment, and instead of beginning with the word "except;" begin with the word "saving." We could then take a test vote upon the question. Those who are in favour of making the decision of the Federal Court final and conclusive and of keeping the clause as it stands would vote against the insertion of the word "saving." If the vote was carried against those who are in favour of the clause as it stands, we could then determine upon the actual form of amendment, and agree upon one which might be more suitable than that which has been moved by the honorable member. There are two matters to be considered. First, the opinion of the Convention has to be taken as to whether the clause should remain as it stands. Would it not be better to take a test vote upon a single word? Then, if that were carried in our favour, we could insert the provision of the Canadian Act, or any other amendment we thought suitable.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I have no objection to that.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
The real matter of substance that we are so anxious to determine is whether the right of appeal to the Privy Council should or should not be taken away except in certain specified cases. That is expressed clearly in the first words of section 75 as they were agreed to in Adelaide. Would it not be very much better to deal with that provision substantively? If the vote is that that portion of the clause should be retained, we do away with appeals to the Privy Council except in certain specified cases, or we can retain these words and add, after the word "except," anything that my honorable friend desires. I understand that we have finished with clause 74.

The CHAIRMAN. -
No.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK (Tasmania). -
I shall support to the fullest possible extent the principle of the amendment moved by the honorable member (Sir George Turner). I do not think anything more calamitous could occur than that we should deprive the people of the Commonwealth of the right to appeal to the Queen in Council, a right that, as Britons, they should be allowed to exercise, and one which is enjoyed at the present time by every man in every part of the empire. The Premiers, who were my colleagues in our recent visit to England, know the very strong feeling which exists upon the part, of the British Government, or at any rate upon the part of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, that the tie between the colonies and the mother country.
should be retained. At the present time there are very few tangible and substantial ties between us, and of them I think this in possibly the most precious. All the people from end to end of the colonies profess the greatest possible loyalty to the Throne and to the Sovereign who sits upon it. We all, I believe, desire to remain members of the great British Empire, and we wish to continue British subjects with all the rights of British subjects, and of those rights this appeal to the Privy Council is a very considerable one. I would repeat what was urged at the Convention in 1891, that by depriving the people of these colonies of the right of appeal to the Privy Council, we should be sapping the foundation of that Constitution, which is avowedly a Constitution under the Crown. I hope, and hope with every possible confidence, that in this, our final dealing with this matter, we shall by a large majority decide to retain the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
This matter has been discussed so thoroughly and on so many occasions that I shall do little more now than state how I intend to vote. I consider that if the right of appeal to the Privy Council is to be maintained as heretofore the federal tribunal should have no jurisdiction over appeals from the colonies. Such an arrangement will simply interpose an additional obstacle in the way of that finality which is the one thing to be aimed at in any judicial reform. With the addition of the words "saving Her Majesty's prerogatives," we shall have the benefit of a court which will be final; as to all matters that involve no great principle or no serious question as to the correctness of the decisions; of the High Court of Australia. Any litigant who is on sound ground, that is to say, who, in a petition which would not cost much, could set forth facts for the consideration of the Queen in Council which would go to show that the High Court had, decided contrary to the law of the empire would no doubt be granted a right of appeal to the Privy Council by the Queen under her prerogative. Let the High Court for all practical pu

Mr. SYMON. -
And the option to be with the appellant litigant.

Mr. REID. -
I say, rather have no Australian Court at all if that state of things is to continue. With references to the Judges, I do not think they would like to have it thrown on them to decide on their own judgment when they should say no to an application, to appeal to the Privy Council and when they should say yes. They would have to frame rules in order to secure some sort of uniformity, and the effect of those rules, would be to establish a normal state of appeal from the Federal Court to the Privy Council. Let us look the thing straight in the face. Are we going to maintain the relations that we have at present without the Federal High Court or not? If we are in favour of maintaining the present system we need no Federal High Court for such appeals. If, on the contrary, we think that we have sufficient judicial ability to decide the average case correctly, let this be a final Court of Appeal, and the Queen by her prerogative will deal with all those difficult and important cases which may in the course of the jurisdiction come up.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
Whatever may be the final decision upon this matter, and it really assumes to my mind, more importance as it is discussed, I hope that, the proposal of the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria will not be accepted because it would lead to the greatest perplexity and uncertainty, and to a want of finality as to the law. I still ask for an answer to the question of what is to happen where you have got two final Courts of Appeal for the same country? Which final Court of Appeal is to settle the law? It is not of so much importance what the law is as that the law be certain.

Mr. WISE. -
And speedy.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Yes, and speedy.

Mr. ISAACS. -
And cheap.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That goes without saying. Honorable members who are engaged in commercial transactions will admit that there is nothing so irritating to a man as not to know the law by which he is to be guided. There is no country in the world which has a system such as the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria suggests with two Courts of Appeal, each of which is final and conclusive, and cannot be over-ruled by the other, and by either of which all litigants are to be bound. I can understand the suggestion, although I do not approve of it, to have an appeal to the Privy Council after the High Court of Australia; but I do not think honorable members are disposed to give one more means to the lawyers of earning fees, bad as the times may be. They are not inclined to multiply appeals. To come to the root of the matter, I may say that it is our business in framing the Constitution to see that the different departments of the State shall assume the full responsibility of nationhood, subject always to the Crown. We ought not to shirk those responsibilities. The more fully we take them upon ourselves the more fully will the people respond to them, and the better will be the work that is done. We should not shirk a task which was taken up, no doubt, with a considerable degree of hesitation by the states of America when they seceded from England. They took upon themselves, at a time when their population was similar to our own, the framing of a court whose decisions should be final. I ask is there any court in the whole world which has such influence and whose opinions are so weighty as the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States? whose decisions are read and cited and acted upon frequently in the House of Lords and the Privy Council.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You would not allow of an appeal from America to England.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No, but I would object to a system under which you would have an appeal either to America or to England, when you would have the poor unfortunate people who have to act according to law uncertain as to whether they were to act according to the American decisions or the English decisions. With regard to the argument of the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers), I think he has put the argument in favour of the Privy Council as strongly as it can be put; but it is all nonsense to talk of this as being a matter of popular right and demand. There is no popular demand. Not one man in 100,000 cares a snuff about a Privy Council appeal. Very few people go there-only a few wealthy corporations and a few working against them particularly. Who cares about the Privy Council or the Privy Council appeals? It is not a matter of popular rights. It is simply a question of whether we here, in framing a Constitution, are too timid to take upon ourselves the responsibility of carrying out rights between party and party. Of course, I admit there is no popular demand for it. But I ask, is there a popular demand that the appeal to the Privy Council should be given? As the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) suggested, I think that he is quite right in saying that we ought to object to any right honorable gentleman in this chamber giving any opinion upon this matter of the Privy Council.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I did not put it in that way.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I did not want to state it as my own opinion, but I think it is an excellent point. Still it is not a popular cry, and not one man in 100,000 cares at all about it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If the members of the Privy Council here are fair representatives of it, the Privy Council ought to be popular.
Mr. HIGGINS. -

If they were all on the Judicial Committee, I admit that we should have very good decisions. Coming to the serious part of it, I do not think that any answer has yet been made to the argument adduced with such weight by the honorable member (Sir John Downer) at our last meeting in Adelaide. There has been no answer to his argument that if you intrust the Federal Parliament with the making of laws affecting the life, liberty, and property of every one of the people of Australia, why on earth should you not intrust to the Federal Judiciary the power to interpret these laws? There is no answer to it. The honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) says that the Queen has still to give her consent to these laws. Is not that very like cant? Does the Queen refuse her consent to those laws?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Sometimes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

She has done so very lately.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There might be a Bill passed decreeing that the honorable member (Sir John Forrest) and his Ministry in Western Australia should be suspended by the neck until they were dead. I am not sure that in that extreme case Her Majesty would refuse to give her consent. I believe that with tears in her eyes and with much regret she would give her consent to such a law. The consent of the Queen to an ordinary Act of Parliament is given, very properly under constitutional government, almost as a matter of course. It is only in those cases where there is any interference with the rights of states or with other British subjects that there is ever a refusal to give assent. If there is any difficulty with regard to the matter, I think the honorable member (Mr. Wise's) suggestion to adopt the same words as are in the Canadian Act would not be taken amiss, although, with all respect, I think they are perfectly useless. I have here the case of Prince v. Gagnon, vol. 8, Appeal Cases before the Privy Council, in which the Canadian Act giving the right of appeal to the Privy Council on Her Majesty's prerogative was discussed. It was a case involving £1,000, and the question was whether a transaction between father and son amounted to a gift or a sale. There was first a decision in the court that it amounted to a gift. There was then an appeal in Canada to the Queen's Bench, and they held upon the same particulars that it was a sale. There was an appeal again to the Federal Court in Canada, and they held that it was a gift. It then went to the Privy Council, the members of which said it was only a question involving £1,000; it did not involve any question of magnitude, of law, or of public interest. The report says-

Their Lordships, having looked into the case, see that it involves nothing whatever beyond this £1,000. There is no grave question of law or of public interest involved in its decision that carries with it any after consequences, nor is it clear that beyond the litigants there are parties interested in it.

Their Lordships then proceeded to apply the principles laid down in certain cases, and said-

They are of opinion that they ought not to advise Her Majesty to exercise her prerogative by admitting an appeal in a case depending upon a disputed matter of fact in which there is no question involved of any magnitude.

Of course, when they speak of magnitude, they are referring to the amount of money involved. They say-

In which there is no question involved of any magnitude, or of any public interest or importance, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to refuse liberty to appeal in this case.

Mr. REID. -

But that would mean that the case would be different, and would be of very great importance if a question were involved, having a far-reaching effect, and raising an important legal principle.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I would prefer to take the clause as it stands, because I think that the sooner we feel in a Federal Court of this sort that we throw the full and final responsibility upon them the more that court will face the responsibility, the more weighty will be its decisions, and the more it will have respect in the eyes of the people in this country. But, at the same time, rather than that the honorable member's (Sir George Turner's) amendment should be carried, I should prefer to adopt the words in the Canadian Act. However, I shall vote against both. I shall vote in favour of making our Australian Court as weighty as we can in the eyes of the people. I am quite sure that the people will not regard it as sufficiently weighty when it feels that the decisions of that court may possibly come, to be over-ruled in a committee numbering certain Judges from South Australia, from India, and other parts of the world.

Mr. WISE. -

I should like to ask how the Chairman intends, to put the question?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I understand that the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) has agreed to the verbal amendment proposed, and I will put it in this way:-

Saving in cases where an appeal may be allowed either by the Queen in Council or by the High Court.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

In order to bring the discussion to a point and to get to a division, yielding to a suggestion from the Chairman, I propose to amend the amendment by omitting all the words after the word "saving" with the view to insert the following in their place:-

Any right which Her Majesty may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of her royal prerogative.

In order that the committee may understand exactly what, they are voting for, I desire to explain that if the amendment I have moved be carried, that is, the amendment on, the honorable member (Sir George Turner's) amendment, that, will restore our Bill to a similarity with the Canadian Act. For my own part, I believe in the Bill as it stands. Therefore although I shall vote for the amendment I am now moving, because I prefer that alteration to the alteration proposed by Sir George Turner, when the further question comes to be put, that the clause as amended, or that the words as carried, be added to the clause, I shall then vote

Dr. COCKBURN. -

The honorable member moves an amendment on the amendment of Sir George Turner, and then he votes against both.

Mr. WISE. -

Yes; I do so because a vote was given the other day under a misunderstanding. Sir George Turner has moved an alteration proposing, the addition of certain words. They have the effect of giving an additional power to the Privy Council, at the discretion of the High Court here. I am opposed to that, and if any alteration is to be made in the Bill as it stands, I prefer an alteration to assimilate our law to the law in Canada, that is to say, an alteration giving to the Privy Council itself a right to say what appeals shall be made. If my amendment be carried, I shall still vote-when the question comes to be put that these words be added to the clause-on the negative side, because I prefer to keep the Bill as it stands. In my view, clause 75 gives effect to the decisions of the Privy Council, and makes still more clear the rules which the Privy Council has laid down for its own guidance in the advice which it gives to Her Majesty in allowing or disallowing an appeal.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK (Tasmania). -

I hardly know why the honorable member (Mr. Wise) has taken the trouble to move this amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

He does not like either of the amendments, but he likes his own better.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -
Of course we can see the object of it. He prevents a decision being given directly upon Sir George Turner's amendment, and then reserves to himself the right to slaughter his own.

Mr. REID. -

He does not like the sharp edge of Sir George Turner's, and, therefore, be blunts half of it.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

The more I think of it the more I come to the conclusion that it is a mistake to finally decide this matter at all. They have not finally determined it in the Canadian Constitution, and what is proposed now by Mr. Wise's suggestion is to bring our Constitution into accord with one particular Act of the Parliament of Canada. Now, there are other Acts in Canada that do not allow an appeal to the Privy Council at all; as, for instance, where the Privy Council has decided from the wording of an Act—the words of which were that the judgment of the court should not be susceptible of any appeal—that there was no appeal to the Privy Council. I think that the proper course here should be for the Convention, seeing the divergence of opinion among representatives here, and knowing that there is also a divergence of opinion outside, not to attempt to finally settle this matter in the Constitution. We should leave it for the people as represented in the Parliament to decide the matter. I should say that it would be preferable, inasmuch as we have adopted clause 74 as far as we have, to put in a saving, clause to say, "saving or except where otherwise provided by the Parliament"; leaving the High Court decision to be absolutely final and conclusive, except that the Parliament might, if it thought fit at some future time, provide that there should be an appeal to the Privy Council. That would leave the Parliament utterly free to do as it wished. The desire of the people might change upon the question from time to time, and supposing the majority of our people were to be demonstratively in favour of leaving this appeal to the Privy Council at the present time, they might in five years hence change their opinion, but they could not give effect to that change except by an alteration of the Constitution. I think we have made a mistake here, as we have in other things, in attempting to provide in the Constitution matters which should be properly attempted by means of federal legislation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The character of the High Court should be a matter for the constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; but whether its decisions should be subject to appeal or not need not be.
Mr. SYMON. -

That is a matter that should be provided for in the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In the very clause which we have dealt with we have acted otherwise, because that clause says "with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe." To constitute a High Court will undoubtedly be a matter of considerable expense. I do not say that it will be a matter of undue expense. This is going to be a body of great, and, as Mr. Symon has said, of imposing power and weight, and I think it is a great mistake to say that we shall make this tribunal a tribunal of appeal from our present Supreme Court, and then allow under any circumstances, except what are mentioned in clause 75, a further appeal to the Privy Council. I consider that it is allowing undue weight to wealth, because it is not within the power of a man of limited means to go to the Privy Council, more especially when he has had the previous expense of going to the High Court. It is difficult enough as it is for a poor man to prosecute an appeal, and, if his resources are to be further straitened by means of this intermediate appeal, I doubt very much whether his rights will not be forfeited through the failure of his pecuniary resources, and through the superiority of the resources of his antagonist. I have seen cases in this colony where the power of appeal to the Privy Council has been exercised, rightly and fairly under the law as it is, but as, for instance, in a case which I have in my mind's eye—with the effect of making it absolutely impossible for the poor litigant to be represented.

Mr. SYMON. -

I have known a poor litigant to compromise rather than go to the Privy Council with an appeal.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think that the difficulty that exists is great, and it will be still greater if we interpose this High Court jurisdiction, giving power to go to the Privy Council. I think we should retain clause 75 as it stands, allowing an appeal to the Queen in Council in certain public cases, but beyond that, where it is a mere matter of litigation between individuals, I think the High Court of Australia should be left to deal with them. I therefore find myself in the regrettable position of having to differ from my right honorable and learned friend and leader (Sir George Turner) with regard to this matter. It is not often that we do differ, and I regard myself as unfortunate in having to differ from him now, but by the exercise of the best judgment I have with regard to the matter, I think, in the interests of everybody, more especially of those litigants who are limited in means, we should not hesitate to adhere to the Bill in this respect as it stands.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not know whether I shall call down any ridicule from my right honorable friend (Sir Edward Braddon) in what I am going to say, but I am in the same position as my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Wise) is. If there is to be any alteration of this Bill as it stands; if the limitation on appeals contained in clause 75 is to be out out in favour of some form of appeal to the Privy Council generally, then I would rather see this Constitution assimilated to the Constitution which has flowed from the Canadian Act, than see the amendment of my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) carried. I think it would be far better that we should, if we are to depart from the Bill as it stands, tread in well-known paths-paths that have been proved as those of Canada have been proved, and as to which the people of Canada at any rate do not seem to express any great dissatisfaction. The question whether we should leave the appeal as it stands in clause 75 or assimilate the practice here to the Canadian practice is a very different one, and as between these two I, on the whole, prefer the Bill as it stands. We are four times as far as Canada is from the central Court of Appeal, and when you consider the greater difficulties and the time which must be occupied in these circumstances, it is a reasonable thing, on the whole, that the right of appeal should, in some degree, be restricted to the most important cases which may be defined. Agreeing, up to that point, with my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs), I do not agree with him that we should leave out a precise definition of this subject from the Constitution, because I am of opinion that the ultimate authority of the court we are about to create is nearly as important a question as the jurisdiction which you will give it. If you are going to give it a jurisdiction and leave it to future events to say to what extent that jurisdiction can be effectually exercised, I think you will be leaving that uncertain which you ought to make certain in the Constitution. I think, on the whole, I shall find myself supporting clause 75, and, therefore, not supporting the amendment of Mr. Wise when the question is put—that the words proposed to be inserted in the clause be inserted; but when the question is put as a whole, I, preferring his amendment to that of Sir George Turner, I shall, up to that extent, be found voting with Mr. Wise.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

It is, I think, the most comforting thing that lawyers can possibly have experience of, to find so many honorable members of the Convention thrusting business upon them in this most unasked for fashion, and insisting that the people of this country shall have yet another Court of Appeal, through the purgatory of which they may be dragged by the successful and, perhaps, more wealthy litigant. I was exceedingly gratified to hear the view expressed by my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs), and it embodies the view which, from the very beginning of this matter—when it was discussed in the Judiciary Committee, and at the Adelaide session—I have held. But I do not quite follow the views of some other honorable members who have suggested that there should be a reservation of power on the part of the Privy Council to give special leave to appeal in any particular case in which they might think fit. Nor do I agree with the amendment, which would, in general terms, save the Queen's prerogative; because the only purpose we have in view in dealing with this matter is, of course with Her Majesty's assent, to take away that prerogative. At present it is under no statute that this appeal exists—the whole thing is provided for by means of Orders in Council. Therefore, if you reserve, by the words which are suggested, the Queen's prerogative, you are reserving in substance exactly the power of appeal which exists at the present moment, and which may be provided for by means of Orders in Council just in the same way as it exists here. I am greatly astonished to hear my right honorable friend (Sir Edward Braddon) talk of the substitution of one of Her Majesty's Courts of Appeal for another as sapping the foundations of our Constitution.

Mr. DOBSON.—
That is a quotation from an 1891 speech.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT.—
Only "idle words."

Mr. SYMON.—
Yes; as my honorable friend interjects, those are mere idle words. They remind me of the petition which was presented to the Convention a few days ago, of which, when it was presented, it ought to have been said, not that it was respectfully worded and contained a prayer, but that it was extravagantly worded, and contained a prayer which actually went the length of saying that this matter of constituting under this Constitution another Court of Appeal—its quality, of course, is a matter which may be open to debate would constitute a serious menace to the integrity of the empire. Why, sir, when I observe that this emanates from a body called the Australian National League, I wonder what foolish people could have put their heads together and written anything so absurd. We are not dealing with the foundations of the empire; nor are we dealing with anything which is going to menace the integrity of the empire. We are simply creating a court which we all admit is absolutely essential. We have decided to establish a Federal Judiciary. It is to be a High Court, supreme over all other courts, federal or state. It is to be established by the Constitution. It is to be part of the bed-rock of the Constitution, to be placed there by the voice of the people of Australia, who have to vote for the acceptance or the rejection of the Constitution when framed. It is to be a court which is to guard and secure the freedom of every citizen. It is to protect the rights of the states; it is to interpret the laws which the Federal Legislature is to make; and yet it is said-and it astounds me to hear it said-that this same court is not fit to dispense final justice in matters of commerce and so forth to the people of this continent. Now, that is the issue. What is the good of our having these idle and absurd rhetorical expressions used in connexion with a matter of this kind? Of course, hitherto, we have had no intermediate tribunal between the Supreme Court of the state and the Privy Council, except in South Australia. But now we have a High Court of the Commonwealth, and yet, as I interposed a few minutes ago, some people are such gluttons for litigation as to suggest that we should make this a Court of Appeal, and, lest people should not have enough of litigation, we should send them to yet another court. As my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) said in Adelaide, where is it all to end? There are some people who are so anxious to fight for their rights, or at any rate to exhaust their opponents, that there is no limit to their desire for Courts of Appeal, but where is this to end? If this is to be a court such as I have described, then surely it is competent to deal with every question that may concern the commercial and business and other relations of the people of the Commonwealth you are going to establish. If it is not, then let us do away with it altogether. Let us be content with the courts of the states and the Privy Council as the interpreters of the laws we are considered to be competent to make here. It may have been thought that there are some reputations on the competence of the Privy Council. My objection to the continuance of the Privy Council is not on the ground of want of competence at all. That it is a competent court I do not deny, and I do not think anybody else denies it. Though the seats in the Privy Council are occupied by men of the very highest eminence and distinction, trained in that noble body of jurisprudence called the common law of England, still that very training is, to a certain extent, a limitation when we have regard to the nature of the constitutional questions which will be brought before them for consideration. What training—and I ask this with all possible esteem, in fact, with the highest admiration for the power and competence of that court—what training or experience or knowledge of the questions to arise under the Federal Constitution has that court? They will approach the subject as students. They will approach the subject with all the disadvantage of a long life spent in a different environment, under totally different conditions.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The Judges of the Supreme Court were students to start with.

Mr. SYMON. -

But the Judges of the High Court in this Commonwealth will have grown up with the subject.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

They are just dropping the feeding-bottle.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then if they are just dropping the feeding-bottle-a not inapt expression-they will be dropping it for the Judges of the Privy Council to take it up, and I should prefer those who have escaped from that condition to those who are just entering upon it. But can it be doubted for a moment that, if both courts approach the matter as students, in the one case you have a body who are dealing with it 12,000 miles away, and, in the other case, you have a body who are dealing with it amongst ourselves body constituting the High Court, in which we repose the safeguarding of our liberties? But I wish to call honorable members' attention to this also, as allusion has been made to Canada, that it is notorious that the Privy Council has failed to interpret the Canadian Constitution in the large spirit which is essential in dealing with a Constitution which must be elastic. I will read to honorable members a quotation, merely prefacing it by saying that I am not disparaging the Privy Council at all, but only pointing out that they are guided by a more rigid adherence to what is literal, as though they were interpreting simply an Act of Parliament, rather than by a regard for those great constitutional principles which throw light upon and assist in the efficient interpretation of a Constitution. Bryce, on page 509 of his book-I commend the quotations very strongly to the attention of honorable members, because this is a much larger question than the mere form of words we are to use in this Constitution-in pronouncing a eulogy upon the work of Marshall, the famous Chief-Justice of the United States, says-

That admirable flexibility and capacity for growth which characterize it (the American Constitution) beyond all other rigid or supreme Constitutions is largely due to him, yet not more to his courage than to his caution.

Now, what does he say about the Privy Council, contrasting it with that?- Had the Supreme Court been in those days possessed by the same spirit of strictness and literality which the Judicial Committee of the English Privy Council has recently applied to the construction of the British North American Act of 1867 (the Act which creates the Constitution of the Canadian Federation), the United States Constitution would never have grown to be what it is now.

Now, there you have a criticism by a valuable authority as to the limitations on the capacity of the Privy Council, at any rate on their willingness to interpret the Constitution with a view to that elasticity that ought to prevail; and Bourinot, in a valuable article which appears in the Arena of March last, writes-

Several cases involving constitutional issues of great moment have already come before that learned body (the Privy Council), and on more than one occasion the decisions of the Supreme Court have been reversed-

And yet in spite of that fact he goes on to state-

...the general result so far has been to strengthen confidence in the Canadian tribunal.

There we have the experiment. The experiment has been made in connexion with Canada, where these questions have gone from the Canadian Supreme Court to the Privy Council, and the result, in the estimation of a great constitutional writer, notwithstanding the reversals that have taken place, has been that the confidence of the Commonwealth in the Canadian Dominion has been greatly strengthened in their own High Court. Now, why should we pass through this experiment again? Why should we not be content with the experience that has been already gained? Then it may be, indeed it has been said that these appeals that are talked about are appeals going to the Privy Council in matters involving the common law. Now, what is the present condition of things? Is it not a fact that the colonies have concurred in sending an Australian Judge, as Mr. Chamberlain said in his address to the Premiers, to strengthen and instruct the Privy Council? I am proud myself that the lot in that respect, has fallen on South Australia. I am, as we all are, gratified that the distinction should be conferred on the Chief Justice of our colony, and I am willing to admit that as a token of goodwill and conciliation on the part of the Imperial authorities it is valuable. But I am candid enough, at the same time, to admit that the whole thing is rather a farce, because, on the one hand, it cannot be to strengthen the Privy Council, so far as the common law of England is concerned. The Judges of the Privy Council are at least just as competent as the Judges of Australia to interpret the common law of England. It cannot be to strengthen the Privy Council so far as the statute law of the colonies is concerned, because the Judges of one colony are no more competent to deal with the statute law of the other colonies than the Judges of the Privy Council would be. But at the same time, having concurred in the desirability of appointing an Australian Judge to a seat on the Privy Council Bench, it is impossible for us to say that we are satisfied with the Privy Council as previously constituted, or with the Privy Council under these conditions in relation to the ordinary Australian appeals. And how long, I ask with Mr. Isaacs, who pointed out that we are establishing a great court to deal with great questions, are we to be in a condition of tutelage? Are we for ever to be unequal to the task of appointing a final Court of Appeal?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I have not argued against the honorable member's view.

Mr. SYMON. -
No, I am accepting the honorable member's argument, which is strongly in favour of the view I am putting. If we are not now fit to dispense final justice-we, a people, as represented in this chamber, of over 3,000,000-I want to know when we are to be fit to do so? It is for honorable members who say that we are not fit now to tell us how much longer it will be before we are fit, and how much more training we are to undergo? We must begin somewhere, and at some time. When is it to be? At what stage are we to escape from the swaddling bands of infancy in regard to the administration of justice? I ask honorable members to treat this not as a mere matter of sentiment in relation to the existence of a particular court, but as a great question, involving the nationhood we are seeking to establish. I understood we were creating a nation which is to be self-contained, self-sufficing in every possible respect, and we are surely abandoning that position if we admit that we are unequal to the function of creating a High Court of final jurisdiction.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If we can make our own laws, we can interpret them.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is exactly it. The very foundation of the Constitution rests upon the fact that we have statesmen equal to the task of governing the country, and that we shall have legislators equal to the task of legislating for it. If we have laws made within our boundaries, surely we ought to have them interpreted within our own boundaries. I should be sorry to see the High Court confess itself unequal to the task of dispensing final justice to the citizens of the Commonwealth. Why should we go 12,000 miles to get a final decision? Some honorable members seem to think that nothing. Why should we send five miles for a loaf of bread if we can buy a very good loaf across the street?
Mr. PEACOCK. -
That is a good protectionist view.

Mr. SYMON. -
Then, again, why should we allow a wealthy and unsuccessful litigant to drag his less wealthy opponent 12,000 miles away to get a final decision.

Mr. REID. -
Your arguments and the climate have melted all opposition.

Mr. WALKER. -
Let us divide.

Mr. SYMON. -
Will the honorable member vote with me? I am anxious to see him voting for what is just. There is only one other thing that I should like to say, and that is with regard to the expense of these appeals. It is not only the question of counsel's fees. There are expenses connected with the whole of the details of sending an appeal to England. Honorable members seem to think that you can get a decision in a week or two, and that there is no particular trouble. But the condition of things is quite different. It is only a few years since a Royal commission sat in Victoria to inquire into the question of inter-colonial legislation and a Court of Appeal, and on page 14 of their report they insert the following passages from the London Times, of 22nd June, 1870, though, of course, the condition of things has greatly improved since then:-

We have no hesitation in saying that the condition of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is simply disgraceful.

Again, Lord Westbury and Lord Cairnes are reported to have said-
That a beaten suitor can, by appealing to the Privy Council and giving security for £400, hang up his adversary for half-a-dozen years, and so either weary him into a compromise, or at least deprive him of the fruits of his victory for a period long enough to frustrate the very object of the suit.

If honorable members will only read the report of the commission they will be perfectly satisfied that no wiser provision has been inserted in the Constitution than that which takes away the right of appeal to the Privy Council, and constitutes the High Court of Australia the High Court of Appeal. I have lately had the figures taken out, and honorable members will hardly believe that for 33 years the average amount of time occupied in deciding cases sent from South Australia has been two years and one month, and for the last seventeen years two years and five months. In connexion with Victorian appeals, for 23 years the average time has been one year and eleven months, and for ten years two years and ten months. In New South Wales, the average for 23 years has been one year five and a half months, and for ten years one year and five months. In Queensland, the average has been for 23 years one year nine and a half months, and for ten years one year and six months. In Tasmania, they have had only one appeal, which took one year and nine months to decide, and, in Western Australia, the average time occupied in deciding appeals for 23 years has been two years and one month, and for ten years two years and four months.

Mr. BARTON. -

Does not the feeding bottle question come in here? These are rather longer periods than an ordinary baby requires.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes. The expense of these delays is, of course, enormous. There is one more point to which I should like to call attention. It is said that we are denying to the people of Australia a right possessed by all other British subjects. Now, there are 40,000,000 people in the British Islands who have no right of appeal to the Privy Council. A Privy Council appeal is really an anachronism and an absurdity. Law reformers in England think there should be

Clause 75. - No appeals shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state, or from the High Court or any other federal court, except that the Queen may, in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any state, or of any other part of her dominions, are concerned, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales—Omit "no," line 1, and insert "an."

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

As I understand it, the amendment would simply reverse the intention of the clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes.

The amendment was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The other amendments suggested by the Legislative Council of New South Wales are consequential, and I need not now put them.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 76. - Within the limits of the judicial power the Parliament may from time to time-

I. Define the jurisdiction to be exercised by the federal courts other than the High Court:

II. Prescribe whether the jurisdiction of the federal courts shall be exclusive of, or concurrent with, that which may belong to or be vested in the courts of the states:

III. Invest the courts of the states with federal jurisdiction within such limits, or in respect of such matters, as it thinks fit.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I scarcely think that either sub-section (2) or (3) is necessary. Under the first clause of Chapter III., "the Federal Judicature," the judicial powers of the Commonwealth may be vested in any courts that Parliament may from time to time create or invest with federal jurisdiction. Under that provision there is ample power to say that a state court shall have federal jurisdiction.

Mr. WISE. -

This gets rid of the doubt that was raised in the United States.

Mr. GLYNN. -

If there was a doubt, I would withdraw the objection, but these two sub-sections do not appear to be necessary, because under clause 71 a state court may be invested with federal jurisdiction. If this provision is inserted, it may be construed as a limitation of clause 71. As regards sub-section (2), once you invest a court with jurisdiction, its powers in federal matters must be concurrent, they cannot be exclusive.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think we had better retain both sub-sections. The first gets rid of a question of legal construction that might arise as to whether an investiture with federal power would mean a complete investiture, or whether there could be any limitation when once the federal power is given. I do not say that that is a probable construction, but the sub-section gets rid of the difficulty. I see no objection to giving Parliament an express power to define the jurisdiction to be exercised by courts other than the High Court.

Mr. Glynn thinks that the words in clause 71, "invest with federal jurisdiction," are sufficient, but there is a doubt about that, and we had therefore better retain the sub-section. I did not quite clearly follow Mr. Glynn's objection to the other sub-section, but it seems to me that it must be left to the Federal Parliament to decide whether the jurisdiction of the Federal Court shall be inclusive or concurrent with that of the state court. There is no other authority to decide it.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I would suggest to the leader of the Convention whether be ought to retain the words "other than the High Court." Under clause 74 it is evident that the Federal Parliament will require to legislate in connexion with the High Court as to exceptions and regulations with regard to its jurisdiction.

Mr. BARTON. -

I will take a note of that.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I should like to mention that there is almost an imperative reason for keeping in those words "other than the High Court." Clause 73 provides what the judicial power is. Clause 74 states what the High Court shall have jurisdiction over. Clause 77, which we are going to deal with, provides that the High Court shall have original jurisdiction, as well as appellate jurisdiction, in certain matters, and the Federal Parliament is not to be at liberty to define the jurisdiction of that High Court so as to take away any portion of it. Then sub-section (1) of clause 76 is to give power to the Federal Parliament to define the jurisdiction of federal courts other than the High Court. It cannot create any.

Mr. BARTON. - And the judicial power has been defined already.

Mr. ISAACS. - But if the Federal Parliament chooses to create any Federal Court other than the High Court, it may define the jurisdiction of such Federal Court. Then sub-section(2) of clause 76, as the leader of the Convention has pointed out, says that the Parliament, in defining the Jurisdiction of the federal courts, shall prescribe whether that jurisdiction shall be exclusive or concurrent with that of the courts invested with federal jurisdiction. In sub-section (3) it provides for the investiture of state courts with federal jurisdiction in certain matters;

Mr. SYMON. - How are you going to define the exceptions to the jurisdiction of the High Court?

Mr. ISAACS. - The jurisdiction of the High Court is not to be touched except by this Constitution, and except as in section 74, where express power is given to the Parliament to except from the appellate jurisdiction of the High Court.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 77. - In all matters-

I. Affecting public Ministers, consuls, or other representatives of other countries:
II. Arising under any treaty:
III. Between states:
IV. In which the Commonwealth, or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, is a party:
V. In which a writ of mandamus or prohibition is sought against an officer of the Commonwealth:

the High Court shall have original as well as appellate jurisdiction.

The Parliament may confer original jurisdiction on the High Court in other matters within the judicial power.

Mr. BARTON. - I should like to transpose the sub-sections so that (2) will be (1),(1) will be (2),(4) will be (3), and (3) will be (4), and I intend to move that subsection (5) be omitted.

The CHAIRMAN. -

With the consent of the committee, I will make those suggested alterations.

Sub-sections (1),(2),(3), and (4) were agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg to move that subsection (5) be omitted.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

Before that is agreed to I should like to point out that very likely the reason why this provision with regard to a writ of mandamus or prohibition was inserted specially was that, being a prerogative right, and being a matter to which the Queen is

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 78. - The jurisdiction of the High Court, or of any other court exercising federal jurisdiction, may be exercised by such number of Judges as the Parliament prescribes.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am going to suggest an amendment of this clause. In order to simplify the clause, I beg to move-

That after the first word, "The," the word "federal" be inserted; that the words "the High" be omitted, with the view of inserting the word "any," and that the words "or of any other court exercising federal jurisdiction" be omitted.

Amendment suggested by the Legislative Council of Tasmania:

After "Judges" insert "and in such part of the Commonwealth."

The amendment was negatived, and the clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 79. - The trial of all indictable offences cognisable by any court established under the authority of this Constitution shall be by jury, and every such trial shall be held in the state where the offence has been committed, and when not committed within any state the trial shall be held at such place or places as the Parliament prescribes.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have an amendment to propose in this clause. I think it is a little more than a drafting amendment, however. I beg to move-

That the words "established under the authority of this Constitution" (line
2) be omitted, and that the words "exercising federal jurisdiction" be substituted.
The amendment was agreed to.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia:
Omit "shall be by jury, and every such trial" (line 3).

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I hope that the committee will seriously consider this amendment. It was proposed in Adelaide, and by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia. The object of the proposal is to render the Federal Parliament as omnipotent within its own authority as the existing Parliaments of the states are at present. I do not see why we should put any limit on the Federal Parliament within its own jurisdiction such as is proposed in this clause. We are making trial by jury a fixture.

Mr. WISE. -
Hear, hear.

Mr. GLYNN. -
We should give the Federal Parliament as much latitude in deciding whether trial by jury should be perpetuated as possible. We should not render its power less great than the power which is possessed by the states at present. It is for that reason that the suggestion is made by the Legislative Assembly of South Australia, and I trust that the words in question will be struck out.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -
I think that the clause as it stands is a necessary safeguard to the individual liberty of the subject in every state. It does not interfere with the right of every state to alter its laws and to deprive its citizens of their liberty of being tried by a jury of their fellow countrymen, but it does say that the Federal Parliament shall be compelled to submit any person accused of a breach of the federal laws to trial before a body of his own fellow citizens, in the state to which he belongs. If this clause were not here offenders under the Federal Parliament might be removed under an executive act from one part of the Commonwealth to another, to be tried by resident magistrates, and the Federal Executive would be given authority which might permit them to tyrannously interfere with the liberties of every subject in the community.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
The only argument I have heard in support of the argument of my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) was that which O'Connell used in the House of Commons. He said that he was concerned in a case in which a prisoner was being tried for murder. The case was tried in Ireland. The one witness who was called for the defence was the murdered man. There was no doubt as to his identity, but the jury found the prisoner guilty.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I feel very strongly that, no matter how much we may value trial by jury as a piece of machinery, it is not a matter for this Constitution at all.

Mr. WISE. -

It is only for indictable offences committed under laws passed by the Federal Parliament.

But why should we make it a matter for the Constitution, which cannot be affected by anything the Federal Parliament may do, that there shall be a jury for the trial of any indictable offence?

Mr. WISE. -

Because it is a safeguard of liberty.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If the honorable member were speaking a hundred years ago he might have expected his remark to be applauded when he spoke of trial by jury as being a necessary safeguard of liberty.

Mr. WISE. -

I am speaking of modern times and in view of the decisions of Courts of Equity.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

A Court of Equity would not be able to imprison the honorable member, except be were guilty of contempt of court, without trial by jury; they would have no power to put him in prison for an indictable offence, even supposing that the honorable member were guilty of an indictable offence. It would be, in the mouth of any one else but my honorable and learned friend, mere clap-trap to say that trial by jury was a safeguard of liberty at the present time. I agree that it is as well to have a jury in criminal cases; I should like to see the system preserved in such cases. But that is not the issue. The issue is whether we are to stereotype this in the Constitution, and to say, no matter what changes may come about in legal procedure and in the mode of dealing with crimes, that we must have a jury, and that nothing but a change in the Constitution can bring about an alteration. I can tell honorable members that under a similar provision in the American Constitution there has been a great deal of embarrassment, because they have not been able to alter the criminal procedure in order to suit the exigencies of modern times.

Mr. GLYNN. -

They have no power to take a majority verdict, for instance.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That may be right or wrong; they cannot have assessors in commercial cases. No matter how important the case may be, nor how large the interests at stake, they have to take the verdict of a common jury composed of men taken out of the street, as it were, although the case may involve huge interests, and be very complicated. There is more and more a tendency for the frauds which take up the time of the criminal courts to be of a complicated nature, often involving difficult questions of accountancy. And is it fair to say that there should be no power to say what class of men shall try a case of that kind? In Victoria, where there have been charges made against the directors of public companies, there has been a general feeling that ordinary juries are not competent to go into the difficult questions of accountancy involved.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

This matter does not cover cases of that kind, but relates to matters which are undoubtedly offences under the Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But the instances I have given serve as an illustration. Under the American Constitution, which is still more stringent, they have no power to vary the constitution of the jury; the kind of jury must always be the common law jury. In dealing with federal functions, or functions which come under the federal law, we should not restrict the Federal Parliament from making its own procedure. I may remind honorable members that the Federal Parliament will have power to deal with bankruptcy law, with company law, and other complicated matters. In view of such intricate affairs being delegated to the federal authority, is it not possible that there will be difficult matters of accountancy cropping up in cases tried under the federal law? I shall, therefore, have much pleasure in supporting Mr. Glynn in this amendment. I may say also with regard to the latter part of the clause, that I think it is still more objectionable. Why on earth should the trial necessarily take place in the state in which the offence is committed? The offence, or alleged offence, may be one which is backed up by the sentiment of the people in the state in which it is committed, and it may be very hard indeed to get a conviction there. My view is that what we want to get is justice—to get the law carried out, right or wrong, and in order to get justice it may often be expedient to have the, trial conducted in a place far removed from where the offence was committed. For instance, if the customs law happens to be agreeable to eleven out of twelve states, but the twelfth state objects to the law, and an accusation is brought against a man in the twelfth state, why on earth should not the trial be removed to where there may be an impartial verdict given?

Mr. BARTON. -

Is not every state big enough to have a trial in?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It may be big enough, but every state may have different interests.

Mr. WISE. -

A man ought not to be punished for what twelve jurymen think to be right.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It depends upon what the jurymen are. Suppose they happen to be twelve pals of his.

Mr. WISE. -

That is his good luck.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Suppose the twelve jurymen happen to be inclined to favour the offender. I do not mean to say, as a rule, that a man ought not to be tried among those who are his neighbours, but I hold that we ought not to put this as a rigid condition within the four corners of the Constitution Act. I shall support my honorable friend now, and if he succeeds in this amendment, then I shall support him if he moves to leave out the latter part of the clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I do not think there is any safeguard at all such as the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise) has stated. He says it is to safeguard the right of every person charged with an indictable offence to have a jury. To my mind, it is a very proper thing to do. I think, in our present state of development, a man is entitled to have a jury in a case; but it is no fetter on the Federal Parliament, because, when it creates an offence it may say it is not to be prosecuted by indictment, and immediately it does it is not within the protection of this clause of the Constitution. In the United States Constitution, the corresponding clause is "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury," which is a very different thing; so that if the Congress of America were to declare any act or default to be a crime, necessarily it could not go on to say, or use any words, or make any provisions by which a person could be deprived of a jury.

Mr. WISE. -

Do you think that public sentiment would ever tolerate the punishment of imprisonment for an offence which was not triable by indictment?

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is done every day. A man is tried before a magistrate and gets twelve months or two years' imprisonment.
Mr. WISE. -
Two years?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Two years, by a court of summary jurisdiction?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I will not bind myself down to two years, but it is certainly a year's imprisonment that he gets.

Mr. BARTON. -
Then you ought to have very good magistrates.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I will say, two years at all events, and in the Court of Insolvency one Judge sits and has power to inflict imprisonment to a very considerable period. Whether it is right or whether it is wrong, I think a man should have, for what are known as criminal offences, a right to a jury. But this clause as it is framed will not conserve that right. It does not use the word "crime"—it uses the words "indictable offence"; and all the Legislature has to do is to say that an offence shall be prosecuted by information or shall not be tried by indictment, and there is no right to a jury at all. The moment the offence is not an indictable offence, then it ceases to be one which comes within the purview of this clause.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
You may trust the Parliament not to increase the list of offences to be dealt with by summary jurisdiction.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Then you may trust the Parliament not to wipe out the right to a jury? I am not arguing against the right to a jury, because I think that, except in certain cases of summary procedure, a man has a right to have a jury, and public sentiment would not at this day allow that right to be swept away. If this is intended to fetter the Federal Parliament it partly fails in that intention.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I would like, in order to have this point a little more carefully considered, to point out that this is one of the original amendments which were put in the American Constitution. At the meeting of nine states in New York in 1765, in the Declaration of Rights against England, it was declared that trial by jury, which it was then feared was being attacked by England, was one of the inalienable rights of every British subject in the colonies, and many of the states which took part in that Declaration of Rights in 1765 subsequently refused to join unless a similar provision was put in the American Constitution. I ask on what grounds are we to follow the precedent of America in this matter? There is no reason why we should do so. It is simply the copying, without the existence of the same necessity, of a clause in the American Constitution. On the ground that you should not fetter the omnipotence of Parliament, I hold that the words ought to be struck out.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I shall vote with my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn). Although at first I was inclined to say that these words ought to be put in, I think now they are very much better left out. I think that in cases where it is desirable that a man should be tried by a jury the Federal Parliament will confer that right. If there are cases in which some other mode of trial ought to be prescribed, I think we may rest assured that the necessary provision will be made by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I beg to move-
That, after the words "every such trial shall," the words "unless Parliament otherwise provides" be inserted.

Mr. WISE. -
That gives the Executive power to change the venue.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No-the Parliament. It will simply give Parliament the power to declare under what circumstances and in what cases there shall be a discretion to have the trial in any other state. The law as it stands in the present Bill is that the trial, as a matter of constitutional law, shall be held in the particular state where the offence was committed. I propose to enable the Federal Parliament to say that in certain cases and on certain Contingencies, and with certain restrictions and limitations, the trial may be held in some other place. I think that is simply another instance of trusting the Federal Parliament to put the matter on the best basis.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

The only class of cases contemplated by this section are offences committed against the criminal law of the Federal Parliament, and the only cases to which Mr. Higgins' amendment would apply are those in which the criminal law of the state was in conflict with the criminal law of the Commonwealth; in any other cases there would be no necessity to change the venue, and select a jury of citizens of another state. Now, I do not know any power, whether in modern or in ancient times, which has given more just offence to the community than the power possessed by an Executive, always under Act of Parliament, to change the venue for the trial of criminal offences, and I do not at all view with the same apprehension that possesses the mind of the honorable member a state of affairs in which a jury of one state would refuse to convict a person indicted at the instance of the Federal Executive. It might be that a law passed by the Federal Parliament was so counter to the popular feeling of a particular state, and so calculated to injure the interests of that state, that it would become the duty of every citizen to exercise his practical power of nullification of that law by refusing to convict persons of offences against it. That is a means by which the public obtains a very striking opportunity of manifesting its condemnation of a law, and a method which has never been known to fail, if the law itself was originally unjust. I think it is a measure of protection to the states and to the citizens of the states which should be preserved, and that the Federal Government should not have the power to interfere and prevent the citizens of a state adjudicating on the guilt or innocence of one of their fellow citizens conferred upon it by this Constitution.

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 79, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I understand that there is likely to be some debate on clause 80, and I therefore propose, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In moving that the Convention do now adjourn, I would like to remind honorable members who may not have heard the arrangement that has been made as to the order of procedure that, after clause 80 has been dealt with, the sub-section of clause 52 relating to the rivers will be taken.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

May I ask the leader of the Convention when the report of the Finance Committee will be brought up, and also when he thinks a day will be appointed to consider that report? I take it that we shall make a terrible blunder if we put off this very important matter until late in our sitting so that we shall not get the benefit we expect to obtain from public criticism.

Mr. BARTON. -

I can give the answer at once.

Mr. DOBSON. -

All I wish is to get the report on at a very early date, so that the numerous people throughout Australia who are interested in the terms of the bargain we are about to make may have time to give us their criticism of the financial proposals, and that we may have the benefit of the greatest amount of public criticism we can get.

Mr. BARTON. -

I received, late on Saturday, the conclusions of the Financial Committee. There has been no time yet to put them into the shape of clauses. They will be reduced to the shape of clauses, which will then be sent to the Financial Committee for them to peruse, and when they have said whether those clauses as drawn represent their intentions the clauses will be printed, and will be dealt with in due course. If we have reached the financial part of the Bill before the clauses are in print, of course it will be necessary to postpone the consideration of those clauses.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at seven minutes past five o'clock.
Tuesday, 1st February, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill.
The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.
COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.
Clause 80. - No person holding any judicial office shall be appointed to or hold the office of Governor-General, Lieutenant-Governor, Chief Executive Officer, or Administrator of the Government, or any other executive office.
Amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, and the Legislative Assembly of Victoria-Omit the clause.
Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
This clause was not originally in the Draft Constitution, but was inserted in Adelaide. At the time I opposed its insertion, and I have gone through the debates since to see if there was any reason why I should change my mind. But I have found no sufficient reason for doing so, and I shall, ask the Convention to look into the facts, and see if it would not be well to reverse the previous decision. The object of the clause is to prohibit Judges from taking the position of Acting Governor, which they can take at the present time in either of the colonies. I can conceive of no person more able or more fit to take the position than one of the Judges of the High Court. We want persons of high position, independent of all other persons in the state, to step into the place rendered vacant by the temporary absence of the Governor-General, and it seems to me that there are no persons in the Commonwealth so well fitted to meet the case as either of the Judges of the High Court. The only person besides them that I could think of might be the Commander of the Forces; but certainly the position would be a very inconsistent one for him to occupy. More at the mercy of the Executive as a servant of the state than the Judges, he would be quite out of place in the position. It may be said that one of the Governors of one of the states should occupy, the position in the temporary absence of the Governor-General. But we must all admit that under the Federation the state Governors would be persons of much less weight and influence than the present Governors of the colonies. It is quite expected that one of the results of federation will be a weakening of the position now held by the Governors of the states, and we shall have an officer at the head of each state who will be much less qualified to fill the office of Governor-General.
than either of the persons of whom we think when speaking of the Governors of the colonies. I shall vote against this clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I agree with Mr. Holder that this clause is a mistake. More than that, it seems to me to be a blot on the Bill. Why should we debar gentlemen who hold high judicial positions from occupying the post of Acting Governor-General when we do not attempt to debar the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or even the Premier of the day? In addition to that, I think that this clause really takes away the right of the Queen to appoint whom she thinks fit to represent her in any portion of her dominions. Why should we put in the Bill a clause like this, which is aimed at a particular class in the community?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

A class who can look very well after themselves.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

They are a class, as Sir John Forrest says, who can generally look after themselves very well, and who are a necessary evil to keep the rest of the community honest.

Mr. GORDON. -

You are speaking of Victoria.

---

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It is more especially to South Australia that the remark applies. Looking at the proposal in all seriousness, there is no reason whatever for the insertion of the clause, and I hope that the Bill will be made as it was originally, leaving it entirely to the Queen to appoint whom she thinks fit to represent her in this portion of her dominions.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I hope the clause will be allowed to remain where it is. It seems to me to be a mistake to mix up the judicial with the administrative in the way which is the custom at the present time. In my opinion, the system prevailing in most of the colonies of Australia does not work well, even now. It either has the effect of weakening the Supreme Court, or else you find that the Governor for the time being occupies a seat on the judicial bench. Those who have had any experience of government must know that the system has been found very inconvenient, and I think that the inconvenience will probably be greater under the federal form of government. We have heard a good deal of keeping the Judges independent and aloof, occupying their high positions altogether apart from local politics. But if this clause does not find a place in the Bill we shall have the Chief Justice or one of the Judges of the High Court acting for the time being as the head of the political organization of party government. Even now the existing system frequently places the Chief Justice in a peculiar and awkward position. The only argument that would prevail with me would be that there would be a dearth of men capable of occupying this temporary position; but as that argument does not prevail now, we should keep the Supreme Court altogether independent of the Government. Of course, if it is said that there are no persons in the community, and are not likely to be any, who are competent or suitable for this high office temporarily, it would be a very good argument, and one having force with me; but unless that is the case—and I do not think it will be the case and as we are not making this Constitution for to-day or to-morrow, but for all time, it will be much better to keep altogether separate the judicial and administrative parts of the Government.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I hope the committee will stand by this clause. The arguments used by Sir George Turner and Mr. Holder are very well when applied to the state Governments because there the Judiciary is not necessarily brought into contact with political questions. But I do not think it can be too strongly emphasized that the position of the Judiciary in the Commonwealth is altogether of a different character. The Chief Justice or any Judge of the Federal Judiciary may at any time be put in the position of having to decide a question which may become a matter of burning political moment—a question of the validity of a law which may affect very largely the interests of a state and the Commonwealth, and may at any time become a matter of heated controversy between a state and the Commonwealth. The only authority for deciding such a question will be the Supreme Court—the Judiciary of the Commonwealth. It will therefore be altogether a wrong thing to put it in the power of the Government to appoint to any office in which be will be brought into contact with the Executive Government a high officer who may be called upon at any time to decide such questions. The difference between the two positions is so strong that it appears to me to be only necessary to point it out. I can see that there may be inconvenience in following this course, but it is much better that inconvenience should occur in the selection of persons to fill this appointment than that it should be within the power neither of a judicial officer or of the Executive Government at any time to put the Judiciary in a false position in regard to the Commonwealth. Because, as has been said before, it is necessary not only that the administration of justice should be pure and above suspicion, but that it should be beyond the possibility of suspicion; and it would be impossible that a high judicial officer who had to decide these questions, which may at any time become political questions, should also be in the relation of having to be advised by the Executive Government—perhaps advised to grant a dissolution of both Houses of Parliament in regard to a dispute which may have arisen in relation to the validity of a statute; or be might have to decide a question arising as between state and Commonwealth. On these grounds, I hope that the essential difference between the Governor-General of this Commonwealth and the Governor of the states will be recognised, and will prevent the committee from altering the clause from its present form.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I am amazed at the weakness of the arguments which have been urged in favour of the clause, because if any one can put reasons strongly my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) can. What is the reason which we put to the people for this clause—what is the substantial reason for the clause? It was passed, after a very short debate in Adelaide, on the ground that it would interfere with the impartiality of the bench. How on earth will it interfere with the impartiality of the bench if one of the bench happens to be a Lieutenant-Governor for a short time? First of all, will it interfere with the impartiality of the bench? And, from the other aspect, will it interfere with the impartiality of the Governor as Governor in deciding as to a dissolution, and so forth? There has been no suggestion as to who is to take the post in case a Judge does not take the post. Under the Victorian Constitution there are only three classes who are forbidden to take part in Parliament-Judges, convicts, and clergymen. Unless you have a Judge appointed I suppose you must take a convict or a clergyman to be Lieutenant-Governor. At the same time, I think that Sir Samuel Griffith, in his Notes, has put this matter in a nutshell. We have no right, in this Constitution, to dictate to Her Majesty to who shall be her agent. Her Majesty has a right to pick such agent as she thinks fit in any part of the colony, and we have no right to say—"You shall not do so and so." There is an ulterior motive in this particular clause. There is an ulterior motive, with the view of forcing the Crown to appoint a particular personage, who will have a high office in connexion with the Senate, as Lieutenant-Governor.

Mr. WISE. -

Is that Sir William Zeal?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No, I have not referred to Sir William Zeal; he would be the last person to whom to impute anything on that score. I think the people of the colonies will require some further explanation for this clause. It is perfectly apparent that that ground of impartiality will not do. With all respect to my honorable and learned friend (Mr. O'Connor), that is all mere clap-trap. Impartiality will not be interfered with in the slightest degree. And then, sir, I would ask, is there any colony in which the temporary appointment of a Judge as Lieutenant-Governor has made any serious inconvenience?

Mr. HOLDER. -
No.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Yes.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If the experience of Western Australia is different I should like to hear it. We have had the Chief Justice; acting dozens of times as Lieutenant-Governor in Victoria, and there has never been the least inconvenience. The Chief justice carries on his judicial duties, and perhaps, on one day in the week, or one afternoon in the week, he attends at the Executive Council and signs documents as a constitutional Governor as a matter of course. There are very rare cases, indeed, in which a Governor or Lieutenant-Governor has to exercise a discretion. The only case I can think of is in granting a dissolution, and in that case he acts upon the advice of his advisers. But my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) says that there is no analogy between the case of an ordinary Judge and the case of a Federal Judge. Now, this clause is not confined to Federal Judges.

Mr. SYMON. -
Yes, it is, distinctly.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It says-

No person holding any judicial office-

Mr. SYMON. -
That is acting in the capacity of Governor-General.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That is-

No person holding any judicial office shall be appointed to or hold the office of Governor-General or Lieutenant-Governor.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is in the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No, it is not.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
What is the Bill for?
Mr. HIGGINS. -

If my honorable friend will look at the debates in Adelaide, he will see that it was put deliberately that any judicial officer, whether he is in the state, or whether he is in the Federation-

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, there was a reason for that. The question was asked whether, if you excluded a member of the High Court, you would allow a Judge of a state court to be appointed to this office in the Commonwealth, and it was at once agreed that they all ought to be excluded.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The leader of the Convention is quite right in his recollection; it was put deliberately, and therefore the reasoning of my honorable friend is beside the point.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It refers to the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The leader of the Convention has just explained that it means this-that no person holding office as Judge, even in Victoria or New South Wales, of a state court is to hold the appointment of Lieutenant-Governor of the Commonwealth.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Quite so.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But the point which my learned friend (Mr. O'Connor) made, and which honorable members will admit now goes by the board, was that this only applies to the case of a Federal Judge. It applies to all Judges, and Her Majesty therefore would have no power to appoint the Chief Justice of New South Wales to be her agent for the purpose of a Lieutenant-Governorship throughout Australia. There is no sufficient distinction between a Federal Judge and an ordinary Judge in regard to this matter. A Federal Judge, we all hope, will be a constitutional Lieutenant-Governor if he is any kind of Lieutenant-Governor; and, after having laid down the law in a very important state and federal case, he will have to follow the advice of his constitutional advisers as to granting a dissolution or not. As we all know, in ninety-nine cases out of every hundred a Governor or Lieutenant-Governor has simply to follow the advice of his advisers; and even as to granting a dissolution, he follows the advice of his advisers. My honorable and learned friend will not be able to point to any case in which he thinks it at all likely, within the reasonable bounds of chance, that a Federal Judge will find the duties of Lieutenant-Governor to conflict with his federal duties. I sincerely hope that there will be more attention given to this particular clause on this occasion, and that it will not be passed without a very keen examination.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I hope that the clause will be passed as it stands unless there is some verbal alteration necessary in order to make clear exactly what it means. A great deal of looseness has been prevalent as to this matter in the different colonies, but I do not hold that, although there may have been no miscarriage of justice and no absolute inconvenience or error in the state judicature, that applies in the case of the Federal Government. We have not made the same absolute distinction between the Executive and the Legislature and the Judiciary in the cases of a state Government as we have done in the case of this Federal Government. We have implanted in this Constitution this great high Supreme Court, which practically marks the Judiciary off from the other branches of Government, except that the Executive has to make the appointments to the bench. Therefore, it does seem to me that although this custom may have been in vogue for years, and no difficulties may have arisen, that is no argument as a matter of principle in dealing with this great Commonwealth Bill. Now, apart from that, it has always shocked me to see a Chief Justice occupying the position, even temporarily, of Governor of a colony, and at the same time sitting on the bench of the Supreme Court. It does seem to me that the two positions are utterly inconsistent. You might even have a case in which a criminal might be condemned to death, and the Lieutenant-Governor might be the Judge who had tried the case. The only argument of my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) and of others is, cannot we trust the Judges? Have they ever made any mistakes? We can trust them, because the Australian Bench has been one of the purest in existence, and we do not doubt for a moment that any of these men would do his duty without any conscious bias in any matter he had to undertake in government. At the same time, we are dealing with great principles, and the argument which says-"Whom are you going to appoint in such a limited community?" is no argument at all. Then again, we are told that this provision interferes with the Queen's prerogative. There are lots of things, probably in this Bill, which interfere with the Queen's prerogative. We have to indicate what we believe to be the basis of this Constitution in all its parts, and I think that the principle which we lay down-that this great Judiciary shall be, not merely not under the heel of the Executive and Legislature, but shall be absolutely isolated and apart, is one of the truest principles in this Bill.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
It seems to me that we are taking a rather extreme course in putting a clause of this character in the Constitution. There are practical difficulties, from whatever point of view we look at this matter. Some one must occasionally act for the Governor-General. Who is it to be? Is it to be a man in the political life of the country?

Mr. ISAACS. -

The President of the Senate or the Speaker of the other House.

Mr. HOWE. -

Why should not the senior Governor of the states take the position?

Mr. REID. -

A more objectionable idea has never been put in this Convention than the one the honorable member has just uttered. Which Governor?

Mr. HOWE. -

The senior Governor.

Mr. REID. -

The senior Governor! Here is a Governor whose jurisdiction is entirely apart from the federal jurisdiction constitutionally holding two offices, for practically he is Governor of a state and Governor of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HOLDER. -

He might be acting for the Governor-General in Sydney for a week.

Mr. REID. -

At that particular time there might be some friction existing among the states, which would cause the appearance of a state Governor in the seat of the Governor-General to excite considerable feeling. I think the safer plan will be to leave the matter entirely open. No one wishes to take the Chief Justice from his high duties for a single day if some better arrangement can be made. The best arrangement which can be made is the arrangement which is made at the particular time the difficulty occurs. The objection to this clause is that it absolutely prevents you from acting in any case. Let us suppose now that some other proposition was adopted. We know that it occasionally happens that a vacancy, temporary or permanent, occurs, but even in that case it would be impossible for the Chief Justice to act. I do not think there is any necessity for the clause. I think the Chief Justice of the Commonwealth at all time will command the respect of the people, whether he acts in this capacity or whether he does not, and would give infinitely more confidence to the people of the Commonwealth than the Governor of a neighbouring state, who is absolutely removed and away from a favorable position of observation, and who owes no responsibility to the Commonwealth. Surely the radical objection to appointing the Governor of a neighbouring state is seen in that one thing. Whoever fills this post should owe some responsibility to the Commonwealth. I admit the Governor-General is looked upon generally as only responsible to the Queen. That is a superficial view of his position. He owes a great responsibility to the people whom he governs, in an honorable and effective sense, and so would any officer of the Commonwealth acting in this position; but an officer of another state may owe a divided duty. Under all the circumstances, while I do not say that the Chief Justice should occupy this position—I do not for a moment take up that position—I think we might well leave this Matter to the Federal Parliament, or to Her Majesty's Ministers at home, whichever it may happen to be, or to both. I think it would be safer to leave out the clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

If we look at another portion of the Bill, which I presume we may do for the purpose of discussing this clause, we will find that in clause 119 it is provided—

The Queen may authorize the Governor-General from time to time to appoint any person or any persons jointly or severally to be his deputy or deputies within any part or parts of the Commonwealth, and in that capacity to exercise, during the pleasure of the Governor-General, such of the powers and functions of the Governor-General as he deems it necessary or expedient to assign to such deputy or deputies—

Now, that is a general power.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It might not be while he was there.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It might not be while he was in the jurisdiction.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It might be while he was away for a few months.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Under his instructions, the Governor of Victoria has power to appoint a deputy during his absence, and there is nothing in this Bill to prevent the Queen from authorizing the Governor-General, who is her agent in law, from appointing a deputy to exercise his office, whether he is present or absent. But this clause which we are now discussing is a restriction upon that. Why should we make a restriction in the case of a particular clam of individuals? Are we going to seek through the whole of our civil officers to see who are to be ineligible for that post? Why not exclude the President of the Senate, and say that it would be very improper and unjust that the President of the Senate should ever be Acting Governor-General, because there might arise a position of antagonism between the House of Representatives and the Senate? In the same way disqualify the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Proceeding like that, why not enumerate all of those whom we think unfit, for any reason, to assume that position, and where shall we end? It seems to me that the only proper and sensible course, if I may say so without disrespect, is to leave the matter entirely open as the Right Hon. Mr. Reid has said, and leave it to the working of the Constitution to determine from time to time what is the proper course. Why should we now once and for all put a fetter upon the Constitution in this respect? The Chief Justice will be perhaps the most independent man in the whole community. He will be placed altogether above the reach of party, and he will be in a position where he will seldom have an opportunity of doing anything of a strictly political nature. His duties will be mostly administrative but if his turn should come, I have not the slightest doubt he will act as fairly and impartially as Chief Justices have in the various states up to the present time.

Mr. SYMON. -
Do you think that because he would perform executive acts well that that is a good reason for joining executive acts to judicial duties?

Mr. ISAACS. -
My honorable friend is falling into this error: He is arguing as if there is a provision in the Bill that the Chief Justice should be Acting Governor-General.

Mr. SYMON. -
No; we want to prevent that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Whatever our opinion may be here, formed on insufficient evidence, we ought to leave it to the judgment of those who come after us to say whether in their discretion the Chief Justice or any other person shall at any particular juncture occupy the t

Mr. REID. -
Parliament might pass a law at any time in accordance with experience.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Exactly. Parliament might pass an Act preventing the Chief Justice from taking the position.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It is not a question of persons. Is it not a question of principle as to whether a person should combine executive with judicial functions?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Why mention Judges any more than the President of the Council or the Speaker of the Assembly? I should say, if I were to express an opinion on the matter, that the Chief Justice would be infinitely more impartial than the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives; but whom are we to appoint? Are we to appoint the Governor of a state, who will occupy not only a dual position, but absolutely antagonistic positions? Suppose there is a quarrel between the state Parliament and the Commonwealth Parliament, what a terrible position it will be for the Governor of a state to be in! Of course, this is a matter on which each one may act according to his own impression, but we shall make a mistake if we put in this restrictive provision, while, if we strike it out, we shall not make the Chief Justice Acting Governor-General. It will be left entirely to the Governor-General, acting upon his instructions or in any other constitutional manner. What I contend is that we should not fetter the power to be given to the federal authorities.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

The arguments of the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) which did not recommend themselves to the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) were simply unanswerable. They were delivered with great temperance, and they were all the more effective probably on that account. We are making a new Constitution, the very basis of which is to take care of the powers of the Commonwealth and to conserve the powers of the states. From that point of view, we appoint a protector of the Constitution; that is, the Supreme Court, which is to be in a calm ether of its own-removed from party strife and political passion. The argument as to the present practice of appointing Chief Justice in the different colonies as Acting Governors has very little bearing, as the honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) pointed out, upon this question, because the basis of this Federal Court is that it is the tribunal to conserve the Constitution. It is said that, if you are going to shut out the Chief Justice, why not shut out the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of representatives?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

There is no possible analogy. The President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, truly enough occupy a certain judicial position in the Houses over which they preside; but when it comes to a question of the administration of the Commonwealth, they have nothing to do with it, and there is no reason why they should not be appointed.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Suppose there were a quarrel between the two Houses?

Mr. ISAACS. -
And a dissolution asked for.

Mr. REID. -

Caused by something which the Senate did; that would be a nice position for the President.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I quite understand that, and I agree with the Right Hon. Mr. Reid that that would be a strong reason for not appointing those officers. But it is not a reason that goes to the root of the Constitution, as this would. We can all imagine cases where the Chief Justice of the High Court, whose business it is to take care, when appealed to, that the Executive does not exceed its functions, might have to sit in judgment upon his own acts. Although in a certain play that we had amongst us, which we have witnessed with a good deal of satisfaction, the character of Pooh-Bah gave us a great deal of amusement, we do not in any way want to introduce such a character into this Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would not the same difficulty arise in a state where a Judge of the Supreme Court might have to pronounce on the acts of the Executive? Therefore, there is no difference.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

As I was going to say when the interjection was made although the arguments are conclusive, in my opinion, against this being allowed for a moment in the Commonwealth, I do not mean to say that it is the best possible state of things to allow the Chief Justice to take the position of Acting Governor in the states. It is only for convenience that that is done. It is only because of the small area of selection that the Chief Justice is appointed to the position.

Mr. SYMON. -

And whilst they occupy it the bench is deprived of their services in all matters in which the Government is interested.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

But when we have this Commonwealth established we shall have a broader area of selection. We shall not be restricted to the extent that the colonies are in finding somebody whom Her Majesty may consider fit for the position.

Mr. DOBSON. -

But the honorable member proposes to limit the area in this clause.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No; only in one matter. We say, as a question of principle, that the protector of the Constitution must not be a portion of the Executive, and the argument is unanswerable. On the face of it it is wrong. It might not work very badly in the result, and we may be attaching at least as much importance to the question as it deserves; but, as an abstract principle, I do not think there are many members of this House who would not say that, if you can possibly avoid it, the Executive and the Judiciary should never be filled by the same person. I hope that this clause will stand substantially as it is at present. We cannot be too careful in the foundation of our Constitution not to interfere with the functions of Parliament. I believe in largely trusting the Federal Parliament, but we have to fix the relative positions of the Commonwealth and the states, and the time to do so is at the initiation.

Mr. HOLDER. -
That is a strong reason for not allowing the state Governors to take the position.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
In reference to the suggestion about the state Governors taking the position, I cannot see much objection to that. In all probability that is the manner in which Her Majesty will act in selecting the temporary Governor-General instead of selecting the Chief Justice.

Mr. REID. -
That will be quite open to be done if this clause is left out.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Quite so; and that is the reason why I would not make the limitation more than the circumstances require, and the only limitation I am in favour of is that the protector of the Constitution should not hold this office.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
When I came here this morning my sympathies were largely with those who are in favour of the retention of the clause; but, after listening to the debate, I have come to the conclusion that we should not do anything to limit Her Majesty's prerogative. Yesterday, in deciding not to allow an appeal to the Privy Council, except in a very roundabout away, we did something to sever the connexion between the home country and ourselves. I may be wrong in that impression, but unquestionably I desire to support those who wish to maintain Her Majesty's prerogative in this matter. I find, in glancing through a paper I have here, that some of the reasons for maintaining Her Majesty's prerogative are summed up.

Mr. SYMON. -
Is that by Sir Samuel Griffith?
Mr. WALKER.-
Yes. He says-
If the Sovereign is to retain any prerogative rights in respect to the Commonwealth, the choice of her own representative would surely be included amongst them.

If it is desired by the Parliament at any time that the prerogative should not be exercised by the Sovereign in a particular way, an address indicating their desires is more in accordance with usage and constitutional theory than an enactment purporting to limit its exercise.

I shall not go further with this matter beyond stating that I have found reason to change my opinion, and that I intend to support those who wish to retain the prerogative of Her Majesty.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia).-
If Sir John Forrest will allow me, I should like to utter a sentence in order to support his views, and to say a word in favour of the clause, for which I share the original responsibility. I am sorry that the honorable member (Mr. Walker) has changed his mind in such a short time as has elapsed since he entered the chamber to-day; but I know what very great influence Sir Samuel Griffith has over my honorable friend, and probably it was the existence of this pamphlet in his pocket, quite as much as the arguments which he has listened to today, which have not been very forcible, that convinced him he ought to change his mind. I think my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) used a somewhat exaggerated expression when he talked about the insertion of this clause as a fetter on the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS.-
What else is it?

Mr. SYMON.-
If my honorable and learned friend had pointed out how it would be a fetter on the Constitution I could understand it; but so far as the clause itself is concerned it is, in fact, a mere request. We cannot take away the Queen's prerogative, and, in fact, this is a request to Her Majesty. It is not a prohibition, although Her Majesty assents to it. So far as the Commonwealth is concerned, it is a mere indication that we believe and desire that one of the three parts of the Constitution which we are seeking to establish-the Judiciary-which to a certain extent is co-equal with the other two, and is intended to be kept absolutely apart from the other two, shall be so kept absolutely apart. And I also think, with great deference, that we are needlessly widening the area when we import into this discussion the question of the independence of the Chief Justice of the Commonwealth. We all believe, and have no doubt whatever, that the Chief Justice of the Commonwealth will be as absolutely independent as the Chief Justice of every separate colony is now. But that is not the question we are dealing with. Honorable members have taken, if I may say so, not so much a narrow as a shallow view of this subject. The point is whether we are to keep, even in appearance, the Judiciary of this Commonwealth, in which is reposed the care of every interest, individual and state, apart altogether from the Executive. That is the question we have to determine. We are not called upon to go by a process of exhaustion, and to say who shall be eligible, and who shall not. There is, of course, as has been exemplified, room for wide difference of opinion as to whether we should ask Her Majesty to exclude the Judges from these appointments.
Why should not half-a-dozen Lieutenant-Governors be appointed to hold office in succession

in the absence of the Governor-General? I do not suggest the appointment of the President of the Senate. Mr. Higgins said "There must be some sinister motive. It is the Senate. This is a cruel and sinister device on the part of the small states to strengthen the Senate."

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I did not say that.

Mr. SYMON. -
What does the honorable member mean when he talks about ulterior motives and the constitution of the Senate? We know the effect any reference to the Senate hag upon the honorable member's mind. We are not going to determine who is to hold the office. We are only going to determine, in accordance with every line of this Constitution, that the great tribunal we have established, not as a mere state tribunal, but as a part of the Constitution, to preserve the rights of individuals and states, shall not be mixed up even in appearance with the Executive.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
This applies to other Judges.

Mr. SYMON. -
Yes, to every one holding judicial office.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Not only under the Federation, but also under the states.

Mr. SYMON. -
And so it should. We are not seeking to interfere with the appointment of Acting Governors in the states, although I feel bound to support what my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) has said, that even the existing systems in the states is a highly inconvenient, improper, and disadvantageous one. We know that the Governor is the chief executive officer, and we know also that he is supposed to be the leader of fashion, and the leader of society. Is that a position in which the Chief Justice should be placed? And I say that that is a far higher ground to take than the question of his eligibility to the particular office. In order that honorable members may see that this is not a view entertained simply by people in these colonies, I will read one sentence from a despatch from the Duke of Newcastle to a former Governor of South Australia, Governor Daly, dated 20th January, 1862. It is as follows:-

To separate the functions of a Judge from those of a Governor is one of the first precautions which society adopts in order to secure itself from injustice, when it becomes capable of political and judicial organization.

That is an excellent axiom, and one that, I am sorry to say, has been departed from in our state administration. I should like to see it returned to. In the plan of a model Constitution offered by Mr. Dudley Field some years ago, there was this provision:-

No Judge, except a justice of the peace, shall hold any other office of public trust under the Government of the United states, of this state, or of any other state or country.

Those are the principles upon which we should proceed.

Mr. DOBSON. -

And upon which we have not been acting.

Mr. SYMON. -

We have been acting, I admit, differently, and, as I think, with all deference to those who entertain a contrary opinion, wrongly. There is no analogy between the position of the Judiciary in the states and in the Commonwealth. The Judiciary in the Commonwealth occupies a position entirely of its own, referable only to the Federal Constitution, and the Judges there ought to be kept aloof in semblance as well as in reality from everything pertaining to the Executive. If not, we may come back again to the old condition of things under the Privy Council, when the people who had to quell a riot were also the judges who tried the offenders. Such a thing is an anomaly. I hope that the clause will be retained, not on any small issue, but on the broad principle that we should keep the Judges of this tribunal, in appearance as well as in reality, apart from the Executive.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

The quotation from the Duke of Newcastle's despatch which has been read by Mr. Symon loses some of its force when we recollect that it has since then become the firmly-established practice of the Colonial-office to select, as a rule, for the discharge of the duties of Lieutenant-Governor, the Chief Justice of the province. I think also, and no doubt there are many here who can speak with similar authority, that the practice has been found to work well, and that no better selections could have been made than have been made in these colonies in the persons of our Chief Justices. If they were excluded from the area of choice, I do not see how it would be possible to make a selection which would give equal general satisfaction in any one of the colonies or in the Commonwealth. What sort of man do we want in the position of Governor-General? It seems to me that we want first a man who is no partisan, and, secondly, one who, when he has a discretion, will exercise it in a semi-judicial way. And yet what is the proposition? The proposition is to absolutely exclude from the area of choice the individual who, in the natural order of things, should possess the highest judicial faculties, and should be absolutely free from partisanship.

Mr. SYMON. -

This is not a question of partisanship, but of keeping the Judiciary apart from the Executive.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I agree with the view of the Premier of New South Wales. Do not let us attempt in a matter of this sort to tie the hands of those who are to come after us. Do not let us endeavour in too many instances to practically declare that we are the people, and wisdom will die with us. No doubt it is capable of argument that it might be possible to find some one better fitted to fill a position of this sort than the Chief Justice. I confess that I do not know where he is to be found. I am sure that in our various provinces no happier selection could be made. For years past this has been the practice so far as the states are concerned. If it had not given general satisfaction an address from the popular branch of the Legislature would have secured what was desired.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That shows the necessity of this provision.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Has any such address been proposed? Has the matter even been mooted? In what cases, I would ask, has this practice of selecting the Chief Justice failed to work well? I do not intend to go into the question of whether or not it would be possible to find some one else to fill the position. I will not indulge in speculation as to whether the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the Lower House might be selected. I hope that no such choice will ever be made. If you take the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the Lower House, and the Chief Justice, or a Judge of the Federal Court, and compare the probabilities of finding in either of them absolute freedom from partisanship and faculties of the highest judicial character, it seems to me that the result must be in favour of the latter. Do you want judicial faculties for the exercise of vice-regal functions? I think that you do. To put into the Constitution a provision which is absolutely unprecedented, and to declare once and for all that every man who has distinguished himself by the possession of the faculties to which I have referred, and by having had high judicial office conferred upon him, shall be disqualified from acting as the head of the Executive, would, it seems to me, be a great mistake. Leave it to those who come after us. Credit them with the possession of a certain degree of common sense. We have the practice of the past to strengthen us in the position that is now sought to be attacked. It has never previously been attacked on the floor of any Legislature, and I do trust that we will not put the stamp of disqualification on members of the Judiciary, even with reference to the temporary occupation of the chief seat in the Executive.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

There are, I believe, certain broad principles that ought to be clearly defined in the Federal Constitution, and of these one, and by no means the least important, is the absolute independence of the Judiciary. There is no analogy between the position of a provincial Chief Justice and that of Chief Justice of the Federal High Court, and, therefore, the appeal the Premier of South Australia has made to the experience of the past ought to have no weight with the committee in estimating the value of the proposal now made. I am not going to occupy the time of the Convention by repeating what has been already said, but I will ask you to face this practical question. A Judge of the High Court is supreme interpreter of the Constitution; and is there not something utterly incompatible between the position of the supreme interpreter of the Constitution, and that of the chief executive officer? The Chief Justice might be advised by his Ministers on the Monday to affix his name to a proclamation. He would be bound to take that course. On the Tuesday the matter might come before him in the Supreme Court, on an application for habeas corpus or prohibition, and he might have to declare illegal that which his Ministers advised him on the previous day to declare legal. Could we imagine anything more likely to bring the high office of Chief Justice into contempt than such an apparent conflict?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Could not the same thing occur under our Constitution?

Mr. WISE. -

It could not occur, because there is no power given to any Judge under a state Constitution to declare any Act of Parliament ultra vires.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Not if contrary to the Constitution?

Mr. WISE. -
That question has been raised and has been settled by the Privy Council.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, in the case of McLeod; and the Privy Council said that if the New South Wales Parliament made the Act in the way in which it was contended it was made it would be beyond their jurisdiction.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The Constitution is not above the Parliament, as it is here.

Mr. WISE. -
There is something in what the honorable member says. There is a broad essential difference between the functions of the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth in interpreting the Acts of the Parliament of the Commonwealth and the functions of the Supreme Court of any province in interpreting the Acts of the Parliament of the province. I am not going into legal quibbles to point out where that distinction lies; it is sufficient for my argument that it exists. We know that the way in which the constitutionality of Acts of Parliament has been tried in America has been in many instances by appeals being made against the acts of executive officers purporting to act under them. The executive officers act upon authority purporting to be conferred upon them by the signatures of high officers of state. In our colony the high officer of state who gave the authority would be the Governor or the Acting Governor, and therefore if the clause is struck out the Acting Governor may be called upon as Chief Justice to reverse an act to which he had made himself a party on the previous day.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
This is a subject which has been argued from an intensely technical standpoint, and one which it is very difficult to follow in all its ramifications but it is one upon which each of us must vote, and, as I have resolved to vote for the clause, it seems only right that I should give one or two reasons for doing so. The Premier of South Australia laid great stress upon the fact that in the various colonies the Chief Justices have been appointed Acting Governors, and that no inconvenience has been occasioned by the arrangement. But it seems to me that there is no analogy between the two cases. In the various colonies Parliament is a High Court from which there is no appeal except to the Imperial authorities; but in the Constitution that we are framing the Chief Justice will be the head of a High Court, superior in questions of interpretation to Parliament itself. To my mind, he should not be asked to descend to Parliament—I do not use the word in an offensive sense—and become a part of the Executive, when, as has been pointed out, and as is obvious, he may be called upon to pass judgment upon his own acts. I do not see that that is at all an improbable contingency.

Mr. HOLDER. -
They would not be his acts; they would be the acts of the Executive.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
They would be the acts of the Executive sanctioned by him.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Not sanctioned by him, only done in his name.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
That was one of the points I was about to urge as a reason why the Chief Justice should not be placed in the position of having to perform an executive act in the performance of which he would have practically no option. The attaching of his signature to a proclamation would make him, at any rate mechanically, a party to it, and subsequently he might have to adjudicate upon this act which he had been compelled to perform, and which was at least an act of his own hand. I think that is a sufficient answer to the contention that in our state Governments the appointment of Chief Justices as Acting Governors has not created inconvenience. It does not follow that because the practice has created no inconvenience in connexion with the Constitutions with which we are acquainted, it will not create something anomalous in the practical working of the Constitution which we are framing, by which the Chief Justice and

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The clause prohibits state Judges from occupying the position of Acting Governor.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
I do not understand it so.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
The clause says-"No person holding any judicial office."

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Well, I will not pursue that point. I am stating my reasons for voting for the provision which prevents the Chief Justice of the High Court of the Commonwealth from acting as Governor-General. If by any means the convenient arrangement which at present exists in the states can be continued, I see no reason why it should not be continued, but I object to the Chief Justice of the Federal Court being made temporarily part of the Executive, when one of his primary and most important functions is to see that neither the Executive nor any other branch of the Federal Parliament oversteps its constitutional powers.
Mr. PEACOCK (Victoria). -

We have already spent an hour in discussing this question, and I think every one has already made up his mind as to how to vote upon it. To me it appears that those who are arguing for the retention of the clause should give very much better reasons in support of their views than have yet been advanced. The clause contains restrictions preventing certain officials from occupying particular positions. I have listened very closely to the statements of our legal friends, but all the instances they have given have been based upon the most imaginary possibilities. If there should be this restriction with regard to judicial officers, I do not know why we should not go further and put in restrictions as to other officials. I think that those who are arguing for the retention of the clause should show us-the lay members of the Convention and the people outside-what persons might be selected to fill these positions. The argument of the Premier of New South Wales cannot be answered. The contingencies and difficulties which have been spoken of have never arisen in the experiences of the states, and if they should arise in the experience of the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth Parliament, which we have been repeatedly told that we should trust, can be left free to deal with them. For these reasons I shall oppose the clause.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

My mind has been fluctuating a good deal about this clause. I was at one time rather disposed to think with those who would leave this question to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament. I was strongly with the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) when he proposed the clause in Adelaide. Since then I have been very much impressed with the argument that the matter should be left to the Federal Parliament; but, upon reconsideration, I think that perhaps it might be better and safer to retain the clause. It has been argued that the clause is an interference with the prerogative. If there had been no interferences by legislation with the prerogative there would not be one-half so much freedom in the community as there is to-day. The prerogative is a power which has either been slowly suffering decretion and loss, or it is a power which so far as it has been allowed to continue in its full nominal force has become something which is used in trust for the community.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

A weapon of the Executive.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. So far as the Executive may in these days be gaining more power than they should have, it is a weapon in the hands of others than the Crown. There is this argument about the prerogative that we are proposing to diminish it, and that, therefore, we should leave the matter to the legislation of the Federal Parliament. But if it is undesirable that we should deal with this matter, because it is a matter touching the prerogative, is it any more desirable that the Federal Parliament should deal with it? That is the way in which it appears to me, and that is why I have resolved to vote for the clause. If the matter is to be left alone because it is a matter touching the prerogative, then the other half of the argument of those upon the other side, which is that it should be left to the Federal Parliament, cannot stand. If it should not be dealt with as a matter of prerogative, it should not be dealt with either by the Federal Parliament or by ourselves. As I take it, what we have to consider is, is this a matter of absolute constitutional principle? If it is, should it be left to be dealt with by the Parliament or implanted in the Constitution? I believe that it ought to be implanted in the Constitution. It has been urged that there is practically no difference between appointing the Chief Justice of the Commonwealth to be Administrator of the Government and appointing any other person such as the President of the Senate to fill the position. I think there is a considerable difference. If you appoint the President of the Senate you are simply appointing to the performance of certain executive and legislative functions a person who is already in a branch of the Legislature, whereas if you appoint a member of the High Court you are appointing a person whom it should be our desire to keep separated by every safeguard we can possibly devise from interference with executive and legislative business.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If the President of the Senate is in the Legislature he must be a partisan.

Mr. BARTON. -

That does not follow, because he has to hold in the Legislature a semi-judicial position—a position which, in a great measure, prevents him from being a partisan. Upon the impartiality of his decisions a great deal will rest.

Unless you appoint impartial men to these positions their decisions will suffer.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

His only duty is parliamentary impartiality.

Mr. BARTON. -

I take it that the habit of impartiality is the same whether you put this or that adjective before it. I cannot recognise any difference between judicial and parliamentary impartiality in the exercise of judicial functions. But there is not the same risk in appointing a person whose functions are in a large measure akin to those afterwards to be imposed upon him as there is in appointing a person whose functions are the opposite. If I voted against the clause I should be of opinion that neither the Chief Justice nor any judicial officer should be appointed Acting Governor to the Commonwealth, but I should vote against it because I thought, that the matter might be better legislated upon by the Commonwealth Parliament. I now think, however, that as this is a principle of the Constitution it should be implanted in the Constitution. Some misunderstanding seems to have been created by the words "No person holding any judicial office." But there is an obvious reason for that. If you are to exclude the Judges of the High Court from participating in functions of this character, it would be obviously more improper to allow those functions to be performed by lower judicial officers, and perhaps officers of a state, and not of the Commonwealth. If the reason is a good one, that the members of the High Court should be separated from the performance of these functions, then it is not desirable that these functions should be open to others whose very appointment to them would be considered an incongruity. That is the reason why the clause is so extensive as it stands, and if an amendment is proposed to cut down the clause in this particular, I shall certainly resist it, although it is not without a considerable deal of doubt and hesitation that I support the clause itself.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I do not rise to reply, but I want to intimate my intention to take another step, should this amendment be negatived. Will you, Mr. Chairman, put the first five words of the clause as a test of the question whether we shall place in this Constitution any restriction on the right of choice? If the Convention is against me on that, then I am going to move the insertion of words to prohibit the mixing of the legislative functions with the functions of the office of Governor-General. The great argument is that we must keep distinct the executive, legislative, and judicial functions; and, if that argument is to have weight, I am going to take good care, if I can secure it, to prohibit the holding of this executive office by any person who is a Member of Parliament.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I simply wish, before the division, is taken, to point out that whilst some honorable members seem prepared to irrevocably limit the choice of the Crown in case of a temporary vacancy in a high office of the Crown, not one of those honorable members has suggested any other person or any other official as a possible occupant of that office.

Question-That the words "No person holding any judicial" proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause-put.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I beg to move-
That after the word "judicial" the words or parliamentary" be inserted.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
Say "or legislative."

Mr. DEAKIN. -
"Or parliamentary" is better.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I think there is one solid reason why this amendment should be rejected, because it emanates from those who first declared themselves against any limitation whatever, and who now want to double the limitation in the clause.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
Oh, no, that is not fair.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I am afraid that these solemn difficulties of the Constitution are not to be got rid of by the play upon words which my honorable friend, the leader of the Convention, has indulged in. We are willing to leave this matter perfectly open to the Federal Parliament, and to the necessities of the future times of this Federation, and we now find that there is a very strong determination, in spite of what we believe to be the obvious sense of the matter, to provide that the road to the Governor-Generalship, when it is vacant, shall not be obstructed by a certain class of officials. The power of the Governor-General is a power which is always exercised, if properly exercised, in a judicial manner, and this Convention has now expressly excluded the highest and most independent officers of the Commonwealth, whose office not only trains them to judicial discretion, but, by their oaths, binds them to it as a matter of daily life and habit. And yet we find, immediately my honorable friend wishes to bind the Convention down to the logic of its own position, an attempt to brush this question aside. Now, the election of the President of the Senate is the object of this division. So far as it can have any object, it is that the road shall be made clear for the occupancy of the Governor-Generalship, in a time of vacancy, by the President of the Senate. And I say that, because, if the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is excluded, the President of the Senate is the next natural choice of Her Majesty, if Her Majesty's discretion is fettered. Now, let us see what position that will land us in? The President of the Senate is not in the position of the President of the Legislative Council at all. The President of the Legislative Council is a Crown officer, and does not vote.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
How is he a Crown officer?

Mr. REID. -
Because he is appointed by the Governor in Council.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
In South Australia he is elected.

Mr. REID. -
I am speaking of the fact that in our colony the Queen appointed the President of the Legislative Council next the Chief Justice to occupy this position in times of emergency. Well, in our colony we always thought it an objectionable thing, and we always strongly protested against it, and urged that the head of a body which might be at serious issue with the other branch of the Legislature suddenly became another estate of the realm in dealing with disputes between two of those estates. And in the case of the President of the Senate, he is a gentleman who by this Constitution has the right of voting, he is elected by the Senate, so that he peculiarly is the mouth-piece of the Senate, and he is sent into the Senate by an active political representation of the state. Now, who can dream of such a person being put in such a position that Her Majesty will really have no discretion but to appoint him? Because the Queen must choose the next eligible distinguished personage in the state. If she is told that she must not choose a Judge, she must choose the President of the Senate.

Mr. Walker. -

Or, say, a Governor of a state.

Mr. Reid. -

Well, the idea of going outside the Federation for some one to temporarily occupy the chief seat in the Commonwealth seems to me the most extraordinary idea in the world.

Sir William Zeal. -

It has worked very well in this colony.

Mr. Reid. -

Have you sent out of your colony for another Governor?

Sir William Zeal. -

Yes, for Sir William Robinson.

Mr. Reid. -

Well you have done so many strange things here, that I have never been able to follow you.

Mr. Isaacs. -

That was an appointment by the Queen.

Mr. Reid. -

Do I understand that in that case the Legislative Council sent over the straits or to Western Australia for a Governor of the colony?

Sir William Zeal. -

No; the Government of the day probably.

Mr. Reid. -

Well, I used to think that the Queen had something to say on these points, but it may be a mistake on my part. My very strong objection is this—we have now limited Her Majesty's choice. We have prevented Her Majesty... from appointing an occupant of a judicial office to the post of Governor-General, and we have practically bound Her Majesty down to appoint the President of the Senate.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Whom do you substitute?

Mr. REID. -

I do not say that my honorable friends had any such idea, in taking the course they have taken, but will the honorable member suggest any other high personage in the Commonwealth whom Her Majesty would more naturally think of?

Mr. SYMON. -

My right honorable friend himself, if he were then out of politics.

Mr. REID. -

That is just the sort of view I have been afraid of, because I say that that sort of personage, who has played a conspicuous part in politics, and happens to be out of politics at a particular time, is absolutely the worst person to put in the position of Governor-General. And it really seems to me that we are getting into a perfect mania of creating billets under this Federal Constitution, and that we must have another office now, a paid office, of Lieutenant-Governor, the occupant of which shall be ready to take the place of the Governor-General when a vacancy arises. However, I have such confidence in the logic of the Convention—if in nothing else, about it, in its thorough logic—that I feel sure that, having prevented the judicial power of the Commonwealth from taking this position, we will proceed to prevent the political potentialities of the Commonwealth from doing so.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I think that in dealing with a question of principle like this, all these personal considerations should have no weight. It is not for us to say who shall be appointed; it is for us to say what it is right to do in this Constitution. Now, there is no analogy between the two positions. Under responsible government, as we have it—not on the American basis—under responsible government there is a direct link between the Executive and the Legislature, but we purposely follow the American rule by absolutely isolating the Judiciary from either the Executive or the Legislature. Therefore, even if there was a chance of somebody connected with the legislative part of the Government being introduced into the position of Governor-General temporarily, that is no reason at all why we should put him in the same position as a member of the Judiciary.

Mr. REID. -

Do you approve of the President of the Senate being appointed
[P.372] starts here

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

No, I do not approve of anybody connected with the Legislative being made Lieutenant-Governor, but I am simply answering the argument now that, if you exempt one, by analogy you should exempt the other. I say there is no analogy between the two cases. I should be very sorry to see the day when the President of the Senate, who occupies a certain position with regard to the states, should be in the position of Lieutenant-Governor any more than the Speaker of the House of Representatives. But I do not look forward to either contingency. It is a very poor argument, to my mind, to throw aside a sacred principle in this Constitution because at the present moment we do not see any one but a Chief Justice capable for the position. I think, myself, we must argue these things strictly on the principles. The difficulties that may arise in the future are not for us, to deal with, so long as we make the bed-rock of the Constitution beyond danger.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I think that, accepting the vote which has just been taken, we ought at least to be consistent. We have set to work to exclude one set of officers from the possibility of choice by Her Majesty as Governor-General for the time being; and, having done that, we ought not to hesitate to exclude those whose presence in that position would be infinitely worse. I will just point out how it would be infinitely worse. A Chief Justice, placed in the position of Governor-General for the time being, is independent of any man. When a request is presented to him by a Minister, say, for a dissolution, he simply decides the matter according to his better judgment, and he says:"I am responsible to none." But take the position of any parliamentarian, whether he is President of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives, or any other man in Parliament. What will he think? Apart from any struggle between the two Houses, of one of which he is a member, apart from any party contest in which he may have participated, he thinks to himself:"What will be popular with my constituents? I have got to face the next election." Is not that an overwhelming reason why we should, if we set about the work at all, exclude at least men holding parliamentary positions from the possibility of being placed in such a trying situation? I do not hold with the vote which we have just given, but, having taken that step, I think we shall be worse than inconsistent if we do not carry the amendment now proposed by Mr. Holder.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
It seems to me an extraordinary thing to hear the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) talking about consistency. He has utterly misapprehended the position upon which a majority of this Convention has proceeded in retaining this clause. The ground on which we have proceeded is a ground of principle.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And I want to maintain the principle of separating the legislative, executive, and judicial offices.

Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable member has not made his argument a bit clearer by his interjection. The position of the matter is simply this: We have not proceeded on the principle that we wish to define in the Constitution who is to be Lieutenant-Governor. We do not intend that by this clause. We do not intend to go through a process of exhaustion, and to enumerate all those who we think may be ineligible for the position, either on the ground of their being mixed up with parliamentary affairs, or with other affairs. The only reason for our retaining the clause is that we consider that the Judiciary should be kept absolutely apart from everything in relation to the Executive, and that it should not wear even the semblance of being mixed up in any way with it. That is the principle on which we have proceeded.

Mr. REID. -

Does not your principle include the objectionableness of elected Members of Parliament occupying the position of Governor-General?

Mr. SYMON. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

I only wanted to know.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am obliged to the right honorable member for putting the question, but my principle does not ideal with that matter at all. There may be scores of people who some of us may say would be very eligible, but who would be open to many grave objections by others. There are grave objections to the selection of the President of the Senate—the gravest possible objections objections which, I think, would be fatal in the estimation of the Imperial advisers in dealing with that subject. My honorable friend (Mr. Holder), a few minutes ago, said we should leave the exercise of Her Majesty's prerogative untrammeled.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You are not acting consistently now.
Mr. SYMON. -

I am not interfering with the prerogative. It would be unnecessary to make this provision, even in the case of the Judges, if a practice

Mr. REID. -

I am only annoyed at the disappointment of not seeing you Governor-General some day.

Mr. SYMON. -

There might be a greater objection to me in that position even than to my right honorable friend. But the position, so far as we are concerned, is that we desire to indicate that we wish the Judiciary kept consistently within the limits of the Constitution. It is in furtherance of that view-in order to make it harmonious with the rest of the Constitution-that we have put this in. There is no analogy between that and the eligibility of other persons whom we might think of, and name for the position. I do not hold the view which some of my honorable friends entertain, that there is an objection to the Governors of colonies in successive seniority taking this position. I think, myself, that that would be a most eligible thing to do—that in the absence of the Governor-General the senior Governor of a colony, and failing him the next senior Governor of a colony, and so on in succession, should perform the duties of Acting Governor-General. I see no objection to that.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

What about the difficulty of his going to the seat of government?

Mr. SYMON. -

I see no difficulty about his going to the seat of government, any more than about our coming here to attend this Convention, and the easiness of his duties would be another reason for his holding the position. But we are not to decide this. All we say is-Keep the Judiciary by itself, and leave all the rest to the exercise of Her Majesty's prerogative, with a wide field of selection." My right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) knows that, in his own colony, an ex-Chief Justice, Sir Alfred Stephen, held the office of Lieutenant-Governor with satisfaction to the colony for many years. Why should not there be many other men who might hold a dormant position as Lieutenant-Governor in the same way? It does not follow that there should be any salary while he was not exercising the functions of the position. So far as I know, no salary has ever been, or ever will be, paid to a

Lieutenant-Governor until he assumes the functions of the office, and then, I believe there is some arrangement for his participating in the salary of the Governor. But there are heaps of people who might be selected. I say that the Governors of the colonies, or, short of them, any fair-minded enlightened citizen, would be perfectly open, perfectly able, to exercise the functions, and hold the position. It is ridiculous to suggest that the field is barren if you take away the Judges, or even if you take away the President of the Senate, or any parliamentary functionary. I am not in favour of the appointment of any parliamentary functionary; but there is no reason whatever, by analogy with the principle which we have embodied in this clause, that would operate as regards any other single individual.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I do not desire to detain the Convention more than one or two minutes, because I think that it is time we finished dealing with this subject. But there is one very important point which has occurred to me that makes me feel more strongly than ever that we ought to debar any legislative officer from this position if we debar the Judiciary. When the matter was being discussed in Adelaide, I asked that if we were to debar the Judiciary, we should also debar the legislative officers, following the ground taken up by Mr. Holder. But we have now altered the Constitution so that at a very important time it might be necessary to decide whether there should be a dissolution of the House of Representatives alone, or whether there should be a dissolution simultaneously of the House of Representatives and the Senate. Now, would it not be a fearful position to put the President of the Senate, or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in that he should have to decide whether the dissolution should be of the House of Representatives alone, or of the Senate and the House of Representatives at the same time? I submit that that would be a most improper position in which to place such an officer, and as we have gone the length of saying that no judicial officer shall be eligible for this position, we ought, if we are to be consistent, to go the full length of prohibiting everybody who can have the slightest interest from occupying the position. I do not believe myself that we ought to prohibit anybody; I believe that we ought to leave the matter free and untrammelled to the prerogative of the Queen. But as we have done this, having done it, the only consistent position we can take up is to prohibit everybody who we think might be placed in a false position if he were to occupy the position of Lieutenant-Governor. Seeing the very serious difficulty that might arise in the way I have pointed out, and what the Governor-General for the time being would have to decide, this is, it seems to me, a very strong reason for carrying the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Holder), and so taking away from the occupant of the position any question whatever of self-interest.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I think the object of both sides of the Convention in this matter is to avoid partisanship on the part of whoever holds the office of Governor-General for the time being. We thought that there was no danger of partisanship on the part of one who held a judicial office, but the Convention has thought that there may be some danger of partisanship in that way. Now, if there is danger of partisanship on the part of a Judge, there is a much greater danger of partisanship on the part of one who is elected to the Legislature, who holds an office in the Legislature, who represents a state or a number of people— one who has to answer to his constituents. A Judge of the courts has to answer to no constituency but his own conscience, but the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives has to answer to his constituency, and he is by virtue of his election more or less of a partisan. The position we take up is, therefore, a very logical and right one. If you think you are right to tie Her Majesty's hands and limit her discretion in appointing her agent at all by virtue of this danger of partisanship, there is much more reason for limiting Her Majesty's discretion in the matter of one who holds office in the Legislature than of one who holds office on the bench. May I remind honorable members that there is a dormant commission in every colony? I suppose there will be one under the Federation. This dormant commission has to be addressed to whoever holds office for the time being, but is not necessarily addressed to him by name. For instance, there have been in some of the colonies Lieutenant-Governors, like Sir Alfred Stephen, who was not in office; but you will find, in the ordinary course, in the event of a Governor-ship falling vacant, and there being no one to represent the Queen, there is a dormant commission in the colony addressed to the office, not to an individual, because the office must be permanent, whilst the man is not. Now, therefore, as there must be a dormant commission in order to carry out the machinery, that commission must be addressed to some office. If you do not address it to a judicial office it must be addressed either to an executive office or an office under the Legislature; and I think the Prime Minister of New South Wales is perfectly right in saying that almost necessarily, from social and other reasons, it will be addressed to the President of the Senate. The result will be that the President of the Senate, who will be elected by his state to the office of a kind of ambassador, will be a partisan; and yet you give him a position enabling him to stand as an arbiter in questions of dissolution or so forth. So that he will be able to say whether he is personally to go to a dissolution or not. You actually make him the person to say whether he shall face his electors or no. I think if we desire to prevent partisanship we should let that prevention apply all round, and especially to a greater danger than has been provided against already.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
In justice to myself, I think it necessary to say how I intend to vote with regard to the matter under discussion. I voted before against limiting Her Majesty's prerogative, and I shall continue to do so.

Question so resolved in the negative.

The amendment suggested by the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales and the Legislative Assembly of Victoria for the omission of the clause was put and negatived.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We now have to go back to clause 52, sub-section (31).
Clause 52—Sub-section (31). - The control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

In order to give some definiteness to the discussion of this river question, I think I will now propose the amendment which I have prepared. I may say that it is one that takes to some extent the character of a compromise, and one which I think should recommend itself to the good sense of the representatives of New South Wales, as I believe it will also secure the sympathy of the other members of this Convention. What I, at all events and I am sure my South Australian colleagues also desire is that whatever solution we arrive at will have the effect of being a fair compromise. I may remind honorable members that, in speaking upon the question formerly, I made a suggestion that the Federal Parliament might have power to maintain and improve the navigability of the Rivers Murray and Darling, and to apportion on the principle that regulates riparian rights between individuals the surplus waters thereof. I am going now to make a suggestion which will not go quite as far as that. I think we are reasonably entitled, on the principle of the comities that regulate opposing interests between nations, and allow full ownership of inter-state streams, to the fall terms of the amendment which I suggested on a former occasion: That is, to maintain, and in the interests of the Federation - of New South Wales as well as South Australia and Victoria - to improve, the existing navigability of the Rivers Murray and Darling; because the improvement of those rivers would be of exceedingly great use in conserving the waters for the purpose of irrigation in New South Wales, and would raise the river to a permanent level of 4 feet. Sometimes zero is reached for as long as twelve months. In 1886 the navigation of the Darling was only possible for two days; and if honorable members will look at the map which I had prepared some four months ago, and which is now in the appendices of the New South Wales Convention, they will see that the navigation of the Darling sometimes stops for two years, and is sometimes continuous for two or three years. There is ample water passing down for an average permanent level of 4 feet being maintained in the water of the Darling, as well as securing a considerable surplus supply for irrigation. The proposal I made was a fair one in the interests of New South Wales, as well as Victoria and South Australia - that power should be given to the Federal Parliament to hit upon some system of keeping up the navigability of the river, and also utilizing... the waters of the Murray and the Darling for irrigation. That can be done effectively by some joint system of locking. Now, New South Wales may object for some reason or another to giving the Federal Parliament power to improve the river, but I say that New South Wales cannot reasonably object to empowering the Federal Parliament to keep up the existing navigability of the river, nor can they object to some sort of a ban being placed upon the power of New South Wales to destroy the natural navigability from month to month of that river. The proposal which I am going to ask the committee to consent to is that the existing navigability shall from time to time be maintained, and that when the three riparian colonies agree upon a system of improvement the Federal Parliament shall have power to carry it out.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Have you had your amendment printed yet?

Mr. GLYNN. - I have shown it to some of the representatives of New South Wales. Of course my object is that the matter may be fairly considered, without any haste. I will now read the amendment which I have the honour to propose:-

The maintenance and, with the concurrence of the riparian states, the improvement of the navigability of the Rivers Murray and Darling.

I think that honorable members will agree that that is fair enough.

Mr. WALKER. - Excluding tributaries?

Mr. GLYNN. - So that the Federal Parliament will have power to keep up the existing navigable discharge of the rivers.

Mr. REID. - Beginning with taking possession.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. - What do you mean by "existing"?

Mr. GLYNN. - I do not know what the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales means by "taking possession.

Mr. REID. - How can you have maintenance of existing navigability without taking control of the rivers?

Mr. GLYNN. - I will tell honorable members what will result from this proposal. The Darling is a peculiar river. Sometimes there are within a period of two or three months from three to four floods, with rapid declensions of level between. There are times when the river rises from 1 foot to 40 feet within a month. I think that that map which was prepared will show that on several occasions there have been three successive floods on the Darling within a month. The policy of New South Wales, if unchecked by the Federal Parliament, will be to cut off the floods for the purpose of local irrigation. The power of the Federal Parliament would extend to prevent New South Wales from cutting off the floods so that the existing navigability of the Darling lower down, and of the Murray, should be stopped. I think that it is a power which it should have, because a flood of 25 feet at Bourke may mean a flood of only 15 feet at Echuca. It may mean a rise at Wentworth of perhaps 10 feet, and at Overland Corner the extent of the rise may be measured by a few feet. The flood waters of the Darling take sometimes two months to reach South Australia, so that the policy of New South Wales (being pushed out) would amount to this, that by cutting off floods of 30, 35, or 40 feet higher up the Darling River you are destroying the ordinary levels of the river lower down, and of the Murray. What we want to do is to preserve the existing navigability of the Darling River lower down, and of the Murray, and give power to the Federal Parliament to say that wherever irrigation will result, by huge schemes of diversion, in the destruction of the ordinary navigable discharge from month to month of either the Darling or the Murray it shall be stopped.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Are all the South Australian representatives agreed as to this amendment?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I think I can fairly say that the representatives of South Australia will accept this.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Will the representatives of New South Wales accept it?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No.

Mr. LYNE. -

They won't.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I am submitting it to the representatives of New South Wales for their consideration. I do not think we would be justified in the interests of our colony in backing down one step behind this proposal. It is a limitation of the powers which will be vested in the Federal Parliament under subsection (1); because, under that provision, as honorable members know, they will have the power to improve the navigability of the rivers-

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Why not be satisfied with that?

Mr. GLYNN. -

The difficulty I am in is to know what New South Wales will accept. We have made proposal after proposal, and we are wanting the representatives of New South Wales to say specifically what they will accept. I believe that the adhesion of South Australia would be given to some proposal of this sort. I am putting a fair proposition before the Convention. There is thus, then, in this proposition, the power to conserve existing rights of navigability, and whenever New South Wales joins with Victoria and South Australia in determining to improve the river in the interests of the Commonwealth, that power shall be vested in the Federal Parliament.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Do you leave no power to New South Wales to improve the Darling, unless with the assent of South Australia?

Mr. GLYNN. -

That power is not excluded by the terms of the amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You would still leave New South Wales that power to improve the Darling.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable member is quite right. If New South Wales wishes to improve the Darling it will not be prevented by this provision from doing so. It would be better for the system of improvement to be federal, because the improvement of the Murray must run with the improvement of the Darling, otherwise the continuity of navigation would not be kept up. I may tell the honorable member that the power exists to do it; but that New South Wales will not do it will be evident from this fact—that New South Wales already declares in a report that they are not going to adopt a system of locking on the Darling which will allow the flow of commerce to go to Victoria and South Australia, and that if they do lock the Darling, auxiliary to that will be a system of preferential rates to prevent the flow of commerce to Victoria and South Australia. I am speaking now from the declaration in the report of 1893 by Mr. McKinney. Under the Federal Constitution the power to impose these preferential rates is taken away, and, by consequence, the inclination of New South Wales to lock will also diminish. But if New South Wales does wish to lock, the power exists to do so. I feel perfectly confident that, as time goes on and the subject of navigability is more closely studied, the people of New South Wales will see that for navigation and irrigation it is very largely to their interests that the river should be improved by some joint system of locking. It is in the hope of that being eventually done by the consent of all the states that the representatives of South Australia are willing to allow the improvements to be done only with the consent of all the states which are interested in the river. That is to some extent a very large concession to be made by South Australia, and it is one which should recommend itself to the acceptance of the representatives of New South Wales. My object in submitting this amendment is that the matter shall be fairly considered, that nothing shall be done with haste, that no settlement shall be arrived at which will not be one recognised to be, on the face of it, fair as between parties taking very strong points of opposition, and in order to put into some definite form a proposition which South Australia will be prepared to accept, and which, I believe, ought to receive the adhesion of other members of this Convention.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

The honorable member who has moved this amendment, very considerately says that South Australia is prepared to allow New South Wales-

Mr. HOWE. -

He did nothing of the sort.

Mr. LYNE. -

He used the word "allow."

Mr. HOWE. -

No, he did not.

Mr. LYNE. -

He said "to allow New South Wales to improve the navigation of the Darling, with the consent of South Australia."

Mr. GLYNN. -

Not with the consent of South Australia.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, he said "with or without the consent of South Australia."

Mr. LYNE. -

I took the words down, and he said "with the consent of South Australia."

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, he was asked a question, and he said with or without the consent of South Australia.

Mr. LYNE. -

He further said that a ban must be placed on New South Wales to prevent her from injuring the navigation of the river to South Australia. The proposals he refers to as numerous, and as having been made in connexion with this river, have all been proposals to take away from the colony we represent some right which exists at the present time, and I, for one, am not prepared, on an important matter of this kind, which is the life of the interior of our colony, to give away a right which exists at the present moment. I regret exceedingly that the map, which I think the New South Wales Minister of Lands has with him, is not presented to honorable members here in the chamber, so that they may be able to see really what this proposal means to New South Wales.

Mr. DEAKIN. - It is hanging up in the corridor here.

Mr. LYNE. - I have not seen it, but my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers) has a map here, which I think, will convince honorable members that this is perhaps the most serious proposition which has been made regarding the interior of New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS. - Do you say that your Minister for Lands is going to explain that?

Mr. LYNE. - No. I say he has a map, and I regret that it is not here, so that it may be seen by honorable members at the present moment; because it shows the trouble and the expense which New South Wales has gone to in surveying and contouring the whole valley of the Darling, giving the heights above water-level on nearly every

Mr. REID. - In some years.

Mr. LYNE. - In some years-and in most years-has the Darling for a number of years past been navigable. That being so I maintain that it is not a navigable river and it has only been made as navigable a it is during that time by the expenditure of money by New South Wales; and a proposition coming from South Australia which places navigation above irrigation and conservation cannot be satisfactory to New South Wales. There is an area of about 149,000,000 acres of land drained by the Darling River and its tributaries, running like fibres right through every portion of this area-149,000,000 acres of land which is, not absolutely, but to a very large extent, useless, unless the waters throughout the whole of that basin can be conserved, and can be used first for conservation and irrigation. I speak of conservation, for the purpose of conserving water in all directions to maintain the stock. which the land is carrying at the present time.

Mr. GLYNN. - How many acres of that area of 149,000,000 acres can irrigation affect?
Mr. LYNE. -

The honorable member must not attempt to try to show that I said that 149,000,000 acres of land can be irrigated. I have had sufficient, and indeed a great deal of, experience in connexion with the matter of irrigation, and I know that it is only a very small proportion of the country adjoining any river, no matter where it is, which may be irrigated. But irrigation at the present time and for many years to come is a secondary consideration to conservation and distribution. That is the great point which we have to consider throughout these and plains near the headwaters of the Darling. I thought, when I saw the clause which was inserted in the latter days of the session in South Australia—I mean the clause 31, giving certain use and certain powers over the waters of the Murray—that by far too great a concession had been given to South Australia. And, as some representatives of South Australia have said already, that there is an inherent right which may be obtained for South Australia by an appeal to the Imperial Government, let that inherent right remain, if there is such a right, and let it be dealt with after the Federal Parliament comes into existence; strike out clause 31, and leave the whole question to be dealt with under sub-section (1) of clause 52, which intrust the Federal Parliament with-

The regulation of trade and commerce with other countries, and among the several states.

I think, as it was put by the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) the other day, when the matter was being discussed here, that we, in New South Wales, do not wish or intend to attempt in any way to interfere with the navigation, if navigation exists in New South Wales, either to divert trade to or from South Australia or Victoria. I think it has been shown in past years that we have had no such intention, nor have we now any such intention. Any proposition to keep to South Australia or to Victoria the rights of navigation, or the rights of trade on a navigable river, I do not think will be contested by New South Wales for a moment.

Mr. DOBSON. -

What is the specific objection to the amendment of Mr. Glynn?

Mr. LYNE. -

If that amendment is carried we cannot deal with the improvements of our rivers or with the distribution of water from our rivers as the state may desire without the consent of South Australia and Victoria.

Mr. GLYNN. -

You can improve, but the Federal Parliament cannot improve without your consent.
Mr. LYNE. -
I understood from the statement of the honorable member that the consent of the other two states must be obtained before this matter can be dealt with.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Before it can be done by the Federal Parliament, but you can improve without that consent.

Mr. LYNE. -
What did the honorable member mean when he said that a ban must be placed on New South Wales to prevent her from injuring the navigation of the Murray in South Australia?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
You want to forbid the banns?

Mr. LYNE. -
We do not wish to do anything of the kind. We object—at least I object altogether—to a ban being placed on New South Wales to deal as she may think fit with the waters of the Darling, of the Lachlan, or the Murrumbidgee, or of the other tributaries running into the Darling, until such time as this matter can be agreed upon by the various states.

Mr. GORDON. -
That is what we want to do. We want the various states to agree now.

Mr. LYNE. -
Yes, you want the various states to agree to prohibit New South Wales from doing what she has during all time had the privilege of doing.

Mr. GORDON. -
We only want to prohibit her from doing what you say she does not want to do—that is, interfere with navigability.

Mr. LYNE. -
Anything that places the navigability of the rivers above water conservation will not be acceptable to the delegates of New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON. -
Will you accept an amendment which excludes that dominance?

Mr. LYNE. -
I should like before I give an answer to know thoroughly what the wording of the amendment is. I am prepared to give all rights of navigation in navigable rivers so long as the proposal excludes the right of any state lower down to prevent New South Wales diverting the water to the dry plains.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is consistently with the necessities of irrigation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Preserving navigability. That is the whole point.

Mr. LYNE. -

Yes. If navigability is preserved I do not see why words could not be imported which would give New South Wales the right to deal with the conservation of water as she desires. Unless some words can be ingeniously devised to do that, I do not think any proposition will be acceptable to the members from New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -

I think when you have time to read the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Symon), you may find, as I do, that you can accept it. I will accept the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Symon).

Mr. LYNE. -

I have read it, but I must say I do not think I can accept it. That amendment says: "navigable rivers-flowing in one or two or more states so far as may be necessary for the maintenance and improvement of their navigability, with a just regard to the necessity of water conservation and irrigation" What is a just regard? Who is to decide what is a just regard?

Mr. SYMON. -

Put in "adequate."

Mr. LYNE. -

The Federal Parliament is to decide what is a just regard, and that is taking away a state right.

Mr. SYMON. -

No; the intention of it is simply to prevent irrigation being subordinated to navigation. That is to say, irrigation shall be looked upon as paramount by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. LYNE. -

I disagree with the honorable member. I do not think it goes so far as that. New South Wales would be restricted under this amendment from dealing as she has been dealing with water conservation within her own boundaries. As the Minister for Lands says, she will not know where she is. I do not think I can vote for such an amendment. Mr. Glynn's amendment says "the Maintenance and with the concurrence of the riparian states." That is to say with the concurrence of all the states.

Mr. GLYNN. -

No; "the riparian states" only means those which adjoin the river banks.

Mr. LYNE. -

It does not say with the concurrence of any individual state, but with the concurrence of the riparian states. That means the three states-Victoria,
New South Wales, and South Australia. It says-"the improvement of the navigability of the Rivers Murray and Darling."

Mr. GLYNN. -

By the Federal Parliament, but the power of the state remains until after the concurrence is obtained.

Mr. LYNE. -

If the honorable member will put this clearly-that by the rejection of the proposal by New South Wales the Federal Parliament cannot interfere-I think the proposition will be worth considering.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is the very thing that is done by that proposal.

Mr. LYNE. -

I cannot see that it has that effect.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

It would prevent the carrying out of works of irrigation.

Mr. LYNE. -

That seems to me to be the case. It is a very difficult problem and I think it will be better to strike out sub-section (31) of clause 52, and to let all the rights now existing remain. Let South Australia preserve the rights which she may have now as to the water which, passes through New South Wales. Probably she could assert her rights at the present time. If we allow things to remain as they are without importing the 31st sub-section of clause 52 into the Bill no harm will be done to New South Wales. But there is one thing I wish to impress upon the Convention, as one who earnestly desires to be able to go back to New South Wales, and to heartily support the Bill which is to be framed here. That is not to import any matter that will make it still more difficult for New South Wales members to support the Bill strongly when they return. Feeling strongly in favour of federation, I do not say that even if this provision be imported I will not support the Bill; but, however much I might desire to do so, the probability or possibility of getting a sufficient number of voters in favour of the Bill will be very much jeopardized if you interfere with this state right.

Mr. GORDON. -

Although two of your leading daily papers are in favour of the attitude taken up by South Australia.

Mr. LYNE. -

I do not pay much attention to those two daily papers, and I never did. If the honorable gentleman will look at the country press throughout New South Wales he will find that as a whole they are as strongly opposed to any interference with the state right in the waters of New South Wales as I am. The two newspapers to which the honorable member refers represent probably the feeling of a good many people in the city. But I have been in New South Wales since those articles were written, and I venture to say that the conductors of those two newspapers see now that they made an egregious blunder, and the constituents of those two papers are absolutely opposed to the views expressed in those articles. If I thought that those two morning papers knew more of the subject than I do, I would be inclined to pay respect to their views; but I think I know as much of the subject as they do, and perhaps a great de

Even though they are Ministerial papers.

Mr. LYNE. -

Quite so. If I thought that they interpreted the feelings of the people of New South Wales better than I can, I would in justice say at once that I am wrong; but I feel very strongly that their interpretation is not correct. I feel certain that to import in any way words into this Bill which would give navigation priority over irrigation and water conservation would be unfavorably received in New South Wales. In a few years I am sure that the necessity for navigation on those rivers will cease. In a map to which I have referred, I notice that South Australia has a railway to a place called Morgan. That is only a short distance from the boundary of New South Wales, and that railway must, before many years, be carried from that point to the border of New South Wales. What will then become of the navigability of the river? The navigability of the Murray below Wentworth will be a very secondary consideration, and very few steamers will ply upon the river there. If you want an example as to what takes place when railways are extended, I would ask you to look at the Murrumbidgee from Hay up to Wagga Wagga. At one time they had no other means of sending away their produce or of obtaining goods except by teams or by using the river. Our Government went to the expense of snagging the river, dredging many portions of it to keep it navigable. But since the railway was made from Wagga Wagga to Hay, I do not think there is a steamer on the river more than once in twelve months, or perhaps once in two years. From Hay down to Balranald on the Murray, the river is of course still the highway for a certain amount of produce, but the traffic is much more limited than it used to be. If you look at other places where railways have been made from Victoria to the river—for instance, at Swan Hill—you will find that the Murray is not utilized to anything like the same extent as it used to be for the, purposes of navigation. The river from Echuca to Albury used to be a well-used highway, but that has ceased to be the case since railways were extended to those towns. Bridges have been built across the river which prevent steamers coming up to Albury from Echuca except when the river has been very low, and the water is considered to be more important for the purposes of irrigation than of navigation. The time must come when that will be the case with all those rivers, especially the Darling, which has only been an intermittent highway up to the present time. It will be found cheaper for New South Wales to run a railway to certain points on the river to tap the traffic, or to run railways side by side with the water-course, so as to convey produce to various points, rather than to attempt to keep the river navigable. The work contemplated and commenced by the present Ministry of locking the river—and one lock has already been completed—will be more for the purpose of conserving water than keeping the river as a highway. The only effect of those works in keeping the river navigable will be to carry produce from the various jetties and wharfs along the river to a terminal point of the railway system, such as at Bourke. In the future, no doubt, there will be similar terminal points at Walgett, Wilcannia, and Menindie. The stream will be kept navigable simply to connect those different points, and not for the purpose of conveying traffic to any great distance up and down the river. Therefore, it must be apparent to all members of the Convention that the most we can look for in the future is the conservation of water in every possible way for the purposes of irrigation. If honorable members will take the trouble to look at the map to which I have referred they will find a chain of lakes which are sometimes mere dry indentations, miles away from the river, which are filled with water only at flood time or half flood. If we were not allowed to store water in those large indentations the prosperity of that part of the country would be very seriously affected. In the flood of 1870 the water went from the Lachlan along the Willawra billabong to a sand ridge about half-way between the Lachlan and the Darling. At the same time the water from the Darling came through a chain of these indentations, covering the country until the water stretched from the Darling to the Lachlan, being only divided by this sand ridge to which I have referred. Honorable members will understand from this how very important it is to New South Wales to have power to impound as much water as it possibly can when there is abundance of it. There is another fact which must not be lost sight of. If we can store water in these large inland seas, because that is what they are, in times of flood, it will affect the rainfall of the colony very much, because evaporation from these large areas of conserved water is likely to produce a better rainfall for some years afterwards. All these matters have to be taken into serious consideration. In South Australia, where the river has no tributaries, where they have simply the bed of the river, I do not think there need be any fear of injury being done, because the water of the river higher up may be used for irrigation and water conservation instead of navigation.

[The Chairman left the chair at one p.m. The committee resumed at two p.m.]

Mr. LYNE. -

Following on what I previously stated, I wish to inform the committee of a matter that was within my own knowledge, and that took place at the time when the Victorian and New South Wales Commissions were sitting and taking evidence regarding the Murray River. The suggestion was then made that a joint commission should control the Murray River. I gave the reasons for that in speaking on the subject on a former occasion, and it is unnecessary to repeat them now. It is, however, important in this connexion, because the speeches made by the proposers of the many amendments from South Australia went to show that what they want is the continued maintenance of the navigation of the Murray through South Australia. When that suggestion was made by the two commissions in connexion with the water question, it was with the view of getting the two colonies to establish and construct very large dams and conservation works at the head of the Murray. We have already given to the Federal Parliament power to control the navigation of the Murray, and this should remove the fear which evidently exists in the minds of the South Australian delegates that New South Wales may do something which will interfere with the navigation of the river. The Federal Parliament will have the right to construct any and all kinds and classes of conservation works at the head of the Murray, and there are natural basins in which water enough could be stored to keep the Murray navigable at all times, irrespective of the Darling, the Lachlan, and the Murrumbidgee. If that is the only reason why the South Australian delegates are anxious to obtain control of a portion of the waters of the New South Wales rivers, there is a solution of the difficulty. It is in the power of the Federal Parliament to conserve water enough in the vast water-sheds at the head of the Murray, where the Snowy Ranges are, to keep the river navigable to an even greater extent than it has been in the past. That does away with the claim to divert a quantity of water from the other rivers for that special purpose. If the South Australian delegates want only to secure the navigation of the River Murray, the power that they require has already been conceded, and there is no necessity whatever to interfere with any of the waters of the Darling or the other tributaries higher up. As I said previously, the chief purposes to which the waters of Australia will be applied in the future are conservation and irrigation. The question of navigation will sink out of sight perhaps before twenty or twenty-five years have passed over our heads. If a sufficient volume of water has hitherto flowed down the River Murray there should be no complaint at all from South Australia as to the action that is being taken by the delegates from New South Wales at the present time. At the Convention of 1891, certain resolutions were moved, but I am not sure about the wording of them. At the Adelaide Convention, Mr. Barton submitted a series of resolutions. One of these was—

That trade and intercourse between the federated colonies, whether by land or sea, shall become and remain absolutely free.

If the fear is that a toll or preferential rate may be charged on any of the navigable waters which will have the effect of impeding commerce, I take it that the Federal Parliament would have power to step in and veto any such proposal. The River Darling is not navigable at the present time, but in the course of a few years the New South Wales Government will probably expend a large sum of money upon works that will enable that river to conserve a great deal more water than it does now. The water by right belongs to New South Wales, and in a season of drought it could be taken into the dry parts of the colony to keep the stock alive. What is the use of having a river to carry produce upon if you destroy the power of the country to raise that produce? In this particular case the country will remain almost in its normal condition, unless we have an opportunity by artificial means of increasing the productiveness of the territory we own on the western water-shed. If its productiveness is increased, and the produce can be carried at less expense to a South Australian port than to a New South Wales port, it will be to the interests of South Australia to extend her railways to our border, and the distance would be very short from Morgan. That being so, I really think that the various claims made by the representatives of South Australia should be abandoned. I would impress upon honorable members the advisability of not importing into this Bill a variety of subjects of a controversial character that will raise objections in the minds of the people. You may take my word for it that we shall have all that we can do to get the people of New South Wales to accept even a reasonable Bill. If you import into the Bill a variety of subjects that will strengthen the position of its opponents you will strike a heavy blow at the bed-rock of federation. It would be much better to leave out of the Bill any of those subjects that can afterwards be dealt with by the Federal Parliament with the concurrence of the individual states than to insert any provision in it that might wreck the chances of its acceptance by the population. Under these circumstances, I appeal to the representatives of South Australia not to press this matter, and I appeal to the committees not to import into the Bill a provision having a very serious aspect, so far as the electors of New South Wales are concerned. I think that it would be better to leave this matter in the hands of the states, much as we have left the control of the railways with them. As a state may, if it thinks fit, hand over the control of its railways to the Federal Parliament, so the states might be allowed, if they chose, to hand over their waterways. Suppose, for example, that New South Wales did not feel justified in expending £4,000,000, or £5,000,000 in opening up channels through her dry country, and in diverting flood waters, and the Federal Parliament said: "If you hand over the control of these rivers to us we will carry out the works," the probability is that New South Wales would immediately hand over the control of the rivers to the federal authority. Under these circumstances, I hope that honorable members will not import into the Constitution a provision which I think even the leader of the Convention must feel will seriously impair the prospects of its acceptance in New South Wales, when we go back and ask our people for the 80,000 votes which we require.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I do not think any one who has listened to the temperate and detailed statement made by the Honorable member (Mr. Lyne) with regard to the real meaning of the rights which are asserted by the representatives of South Australia with regard to New South Wales territory, can under value the importance of this question to the representatives of New South Wales. We are not here to decide this matter upon first principles. If we were here simply to decide this question upon the absolute rights which should be distributed to the people inhabiting these watercourses throughout their entire length we might be in a different position; but we are here representing certain rights and interests, and the question for us is, to what extent is it necessary to give up these rights and interests for the sake of securing federal union? I do not propose to travel again over the lines which I took in addressing the Convention upon this matter a few days ago; I wish now to throw out a proposal for the consideration of the Convention. It appears to me that we are now at a stage of the discussion when we have stated our own claims very fully. We know very well what is required upon each side. Our duty now is to come to a settlement of our differences, and it is with a view to offering for discussion a solution of our difficulties in a practical form that I have risen to address the committee. I wish to speak with all possible moderation in regard to this or any other view, and while I believe that the suggestion I am about to make embraces the only way out of the difficulty, I shall be willing to listen to any criticisms or comments upon it with an open mind, and to come to any settlement which does not require the giving up of more of the rights of New South Wales, than we ought to give up. To my mind the fairest, and, if I may say so, the most statesmanlike solution of this difficulty is to leave out the sub-section which we are now discussing, and to rely entirely upon the rights which are given under sub-section (1) of the clause. I regard the sub-section now under consideration as a limitation of the general rights which are given under sub-section (1), and I think that most lawyers who have paid any attention to the matter will agree with me.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The first part of the sub-section?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes. I think most lawyers who have paid attention to the matter will agree with me that the very wide powers over navigable streams which are given in the first part of sub-section (1) are, to a certain extent, cut down by sub-section (31). In my opinion navigable, I think we should give it the same rights in regard to all navigable rivers, both those which form highways between different states, and those which are highways from the sea into the interior, so that all the waters of the Commonwealth may be under the control of the federal authorities, so far as that may be necessary to secure free passage and intercourse for commerce. Therefore I would strongly object to any provision limiting the general rights of control of navigable waters given in the first part of sub-section (1). I have said that I consider that the fairest and best solution of the difficulty is to leave out sub-section (31) altogether, because it restricts in a very large degree the operation of sub-section (1). Let me remind honorable members again of the powers which are given by sub-section (1). The Commonwealth has placed in its hands the control of navigation and of all navigable streams, in so far as this may be necessary to keep navigation open.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Does the honorable and learned member use the word "navigable" in the sense of all rivers which, even in the interior, where their waters are quite fresh, are in fact navigable?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Undoubtedly. I use the word "navigable" in the sense in which it is used in America.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There it is confined to rivers which are affected by the ebb and flow of the tide.
Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; quite the other way. The English decisions limit the use of the word "navigable" to rivers affected by the ebb and flow of the tide.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

And so do the American decisions.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The rivers over which I would give the Commonwealth power of control are all rivers which are in fact navigable and capable of becoming the highways of commerce. To give an illustration. The Murray, which is navigable, would come under the control of the Commonwealth, as would also the Darling, so far as it is navigable.

Mr. WALKER. -

And the Tweed?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, the Tweed also. If at any time any state were to add a stream to the system by making it navigable, that stream would come under the control of the Commonwealth. So much for the area of control; now for the nature of control. This includes not only the maintenance and regulation of navigation-that is to say, the control of ships passing up and down-it also includes the maintenance of navigability by the removal of obstructions of any kind.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

And the prevention of irrigation where it interferes with navigability?

Mr. GORDON. -

Does it cover that?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It includes not only the removal of obstructions, whether in the way of weirs or dams or any construction of that kind which interfere with navigability; it also includes the power to increase navigability by deepening channels, and by closing old channels and opening up new ones. Now, with regard to the meaning of "navigability." If in any part of the River Murray which is now navigable a weir were constructed for purposes of irrigation which interfered with the navigability of the river, the Commonwealth would undoubtedly have power to remove that obstruction in order to render the river navigable.

Mr. GORDON. -

We are all agreed upon that point.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I am reminding the Convention again of the full powers given by subsection (1). The sole question that remains between us is this: To what extent does this power of controlling navigation over-ride private rights or public rights in regard to irrigation which may be possessed in the different states?

Mr. GORDON. -
That is the crux.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That is the question upon which we find it so difficult to agree, because, in the first place, to come to any settlement of it is to come to a settlement without a full knowledge of all the circumstances and surroundings, and to give up in a definite way rights which it may not perhaps be necessary to give up in order to secure the object at which we are aiming.

Mr. SYMON. -
We only ask for the appointment of a tribunal.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
What I propose is this: To leave the whole power of control to the Commonwealth, as provided by sub-section (1). That involves the proposition that, when any question arises as to how far the right to irrigate possessed by any individual or any state should be allowed to interfere with the rights of navigation, it shall be left to the decision of a federal tribunal. Any matter of controversy that arises will come within the jurisdiction of the Federal Court, and be decided by them.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Would not the court be restricted to saying that irrigation was perfectly lawful so long as it did not prevent the navigability of the river?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Undoubtedly.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Such a decision might possibly leave no water for irrigation to South Australia.

Mr. BARTON. -
South Australia is not making any trouble about water for irrigation.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Yes; the representatives of South Australia claim the right to water not only for navigation but also for irrigation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If they do not, I have misunderstood them.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
There is a division of opinion upon the point. The extreme claim made by the representatives of South Australia no doubt embraces both navigation and irrigation, but other claims have since been made, as appears from the various amendments, which do not go beyond requiring water for navigation.

Mr. GORDON. -

The claim made by me never went further than a just apportionment of the water for irrigation.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, but the honorable member claimed the apportionment of the water for irrigation. Later claims do not go so far as that. The representatives of South Australia now only require it to be insured that the navigability of the river shall not be interfered with by any cause whatever, either by irrigation or anything else.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is a concession.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If South Australia does not wish to secure the right of irrigation the matter is very simple.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The representatives of South Australia will, I think, be inclined to take the view that so long as navigability is absolutely secured to them that will be a very fair settlement of the matter.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is a concession.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not care whether it is or is not a concession; that is a matter we need not trouble about. We are willing to give that. As far as I am concerned, I am willing to leave the whole of this question to the federal tribunal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

As to what rivers?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

As to all navigable rivers. I was pointing out, when Mr. Isaacs interrupted me, the principle on which, it appears to me, the Federal Court would regard this matter. I should take it that the Federal Court would, in the first place, decide that the power had been given to the Commonwealth to regulate and control the navigability of navigable rivers, which would imply all the powers I have already alluded to. I take it, further, that the Federal Court would also assume that all powers necessary to carry that out effectually would be given to the Commonwealth. And I take it that they would further consider, assuming those powers were given, that all rights, which would interfere with the carrying out of those powers, in the hands of private individuals, whether of irrigation or other rights, would be deemed to have been taken away as far as they interfered with the fall power of maintaining the navigability given to the Commonwealth by sub-section (1). Now, whether in any particular case, or under any particular circumstances, the rights exercised by a person or a state using water for irrigation interfered with or took away from the rights necessary for preserving navigation would in all cases be a matter to be decided by the court, whether on the claim of an individual, or on the construction of a statute of a state, or on the construction of a statute of the Commonwealth, and the question then coming before that tribunal for decision would have the advantage of being decided with a full knowledge of all the particular circumstances, with all the evidence brought in a proper way before the tribunal, and, in addition to that, it would be brought before a tribunal which would have the absolute right to do what we cannot do now, and that is to decide absolutely and definitely the rights and the principles upon which the decision should proceed.
Mr. LYNE. -
Just as the Privy Council would do.
Mr. OCONNOR. -
No, the Privy Council could not do that in all cases. There is no common basis of right, no common code of law to which both parties could appeal; but in the case of a matter brought before the federal tribunal there would be a common basis of right, that is to say, a decision between the merits of the conflicting rights of navigation and the right of the state or of the individual to irrigation. I merely throw this out as a suggestion which commends itself to my mind as the simplest and most statesmanlike way of solving this difficulty, and, as far as I am concerned, I am quite willing that the matter should be left in that way to the decision of the federal tribunal.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Does not my amendment carry out your view exactly, then?
Mr. OCONNOR. -
I do not think, with all respect to the honorable member, it does, because, as I pointed out before, any of these provisions cuts down the general scope of the trade and commerce clauses; and, although I am perfectly willing to allow the freest possible control of navigation over all our rivers that are navigable, I should want the Commonwealth to have the same powers in regard to all other navigable rivers within its limits. Therefore, my suggestion is that we can best settle this question by leaving out subsection (31) altogether, and relying upon the broad fixed principle which is embodied in sub-section (1) of clause 52, leaving it to the federal courts to decide the question of the conflicting rights, which, under all the circumstances we find ourselves unable to agree on.
Mr. HOLDER. -

Will you expressly say that by putting in here "inter-state riparian rights"?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, because that would introduce an element of great doubt and difficulty. We say there are no interstate riparian rights at the p

Mr. HOLDER. -

You say that the federal courts should decide. Give them the power to decide.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

But it might be construed that, by using an expression of that kind, we were giving riparian rights that did not exist before, by the very provision the honorable member would propose. I shall go in that direction no further than the proposition I have made, which I throw out to the Convention for its consideration.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

I to some extent concur with my honorable friend who has just resumed his seat that, so far as navigation is concerned, there would be very little danger to any of the colonies if the Commonwealth took the power of regulating navigation over all navigable streams, including the Murray or any of its tributaries which might be navigable. But the difficulty which the representatives of New South Wales have to face is this—that if by conceding the right of controlling the navigation or of improving the navigability of a stream, there is an implied authority to the Federal Government to control also the use of the water, to take away from the local states the right they now possess to use the water for the development of their resources, then a very grave difficulty will have been imported into the Constitution. And it is a difficulty which New South Wales must be prepared to face at the present time. It is a difficulty that prudent men must foresee, and in framing this Constitution we will not be acting truly as representatives of our colony if we do not see that some provision is made which clearly defines that to concede the control of navigation is not also to hand over the control of the waters. Now, as I said before, a great deal of the support, given to this proposal from South Australia arises from a total misconception of the character of the rivers affected. If honorable members, study the Darling River system and the Murray River system, so far as it affects Queensland and New South Wales, they will see that the Darling is a stream which is not navigable for any great portion of the year, and certainly a stream not deriving its navigability from the rainfall along the Darling itself. If you wish to control the navigability of the Darling, in the sense that you are to control the use of the waters by conservation, so that them will always be a full flow in the Darling, to be effective in that purpose you must also control the flow the tributaries, because if the main tributaries flowing into the Darling were closed up by weir or locks there would not be enough water one day in twenty years in the Darling itself to carry even an ordinary pulling boat. That is to say, that the rainfall of the region through which the Darling proper flows is almost as small as that of any settled region of Australia below 10 inches a year, never sufficient to make the Darling flow. So you, have to look to the tributaries of the Darling. And in the same way, but nothing nearly to the same extent this applies in regard to the Murray I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that if proposal is made to conserve the navigation of the Murray and the Murrumbidgee, and to improve the navigation of those streams, to be effective it must also deal with the tributaries. And if it is not to be effective, why make it at all? You bring at once into the future local self-government of New South Wales, and hereafter of Queensland, an element of uncertainty which alone will be ruinous to the best interests of settlement. We will be unable to undertake any work of water conservation in this great river system in New South Wales with the federal authority having control of navigation, because the federal authority may at any time set aside those works as being contrary to the power delegated to the Federal Government.

Mr. GORDON. -

Does not that proposition mean that the Federal Government would do what is unfair under those circumstances?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

It is not a question so much of what the Federal Government might do; they might act honestly, fairly, and reasonably towards the people concerned, but no person would know how the Federal Government would act, and, therefore, no person would be in a position to embark capital in water conservation, because he would have no certainty, having no prescience, of how the Federal Government might regard his doings. For instance works of a gigantic character will have to be carried out on the watershed of the Darling before that country can be settled Honorable members may be surprised to know, when I tell them, but it is a fact, that in the colony of New South Wales pastoral holdings embracing an area of over 1,280,000 acres have been abandoned simply because of the inability of the people to obtain a fair water supply. Not one but several holdings have been abandoned because of the natural difficulty of obtaining a fair water supply. It is not a mere question of the expenditure of small amount of capital. The state is not embarking in expenditure to meet the requirements of that part of the colony at present, but some day we hope to see the state embark in expenditure to meet the requirements of settlement there, by making water provision. And when that is done it will require the expenditure not of hundreds, but of thousands and hundreds of thousands of pounds. And the state will not be in a position to risk the expenditure of money in those water supply works, nor will any private individual, when the whole work may be condemned as inimical to the navigation or navigability of the Darling.

Mr. HOLDER. - Nor can we spend money in South Australia if you have the power to take the water away next day.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. - It is absurd to use an argument of that character. There has never been any such unreasonable proposal emanating from New South Wales.

Mr. HOLDER. - But you claim the right to do so.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. - We claim the right to use the water for the development of our own territory, not for the purpose of wanton waste.

Mr. HOLDER. - No one has suggested that.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. - And we claim that we have the right to settle the lands and the people on the lands, and the right to use the water in conjunction with the lands for that purpose; but we have never made any such proposal, nor are we so lost in regard to the interests of others, that we would injure the people of another colony by depriving them absolutely of all water. My honorable friends of South Australia have sat very silently by while water has been taken away from their people, not by New South Wales, but the moment New South Wales proposes to take a drop of water from the Darling or the Murray, they are up in arms at once. Now, if it could be shown that any such proposal has been entertained-because proposals may be made; there is nothing in that-by the people of New South Wales to seriously injure the rights of the people of South Australia, there would be some strong argument adduced for having some hard-and-fast rule in the Constitution to prevent such proposals being put into operation. But I will undertake to say that if it were necessary to drain the Darling dry in the interests of that large area of land-100,000,000 acres along the Darling-which belongs to the Crown, to the people of New South Wales, which is still unalienated-if it were necessary, in the interests of improving that land, and making it carry a teeming population, to drain the Darling dry, it would pay New South Wales to do it, even if that colony had to pay an immense sum in compensation to South Australia.

Mr. GLYNN. -

What percentage of that area can be utilized in the way of irrigation?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

A very small percentage. I do not pay very much regard to irrigation. I never have laid great stress on the question of irrigation, but I have laid great stress on water conservation and the necessity that exists for the reconstruction of the rivers of New South Wales. That is to say, we have to put the water back into channels through which it has not flowed within the memory of man. When we have those channels made for us we can have that water radiated over a far greater territory than it is at present, and we can make the possibilities of pastoral occupation, which must precede closer settlement, far greater than they are now. We shall never have irrigation until we have close population, and we shall never have close population until the pioneer work of settlement has been done by the pastoralists in the far west. And we cannot have that pioneer work done to any great extent unless we place within the reach of the pastoralists every facility for the conservation and the use of water, which is absolutely necessary to enable them to carry stock. The work which has been done on the tributaries there—because it is useless to talk of the work that has been done in the main channels—is already stupendous. I have read with some surprise articles in New South Wales papers which speak as if we had neglected these regions. The neglect may have been neglect largely on the part of the Government, if there has been neglect at all, but, so far as the occupants of the soil are concerned, there has been very little neglect indeed. Take the Bogan River, for instance, which has as large a water-shed as almost any river which flows into the Darling—a water-shed of 4,930 square miles—coming from country where there is a rainfall of 20 inches. Again, take the Macquarie, which runs parallel, and which has a water-shed of 10,359 square miles, with a rainfall of 27 inches. Both of these rivers come from districts where we have a fairly large rainfall, and with large drainage areas. But for the work done on the Bogan by the settlers—the pastoralists—that river would have been from year's end to year's end just a dry course, but by the construction of dams along it a very large volume of water has been conserved. If those dams were cut and destroyed, as being inimical to the interests of navigation, there would be no perceptible rise in the Darling from end to end. That would not influence it any more than Mrs. Partington with her mop succeeded in keeping back the Atlantic. On the Macquarie, there has been an expenditure by the Government of large sums in the construction of two weirs, in order to divert water from the main Macquarie channel into two other channels, which give an additional 300 or 400 miles of water frontage to the pastoral lands in the west. That work has simply utilized, as nature intended, the rainfall in the best way, instead of allowing it to go into one channel, where it was lost to almost every human being, running into reed beds, and trickling out again into the Darling, in a narrow stream which one could almost jump across. The work done by private enterprise on these tributaries of the Darling has been no small work. That work has rendered population possible, has added largely to the production from settlement, and has given revenue to the Government as well as profit to the people. And all of that work in the future would be jeopardized the moment you have a dual authority controlling the right to the use of the water—one authority claiming that the natural flow from the rainfall should not be diverted so as to impede or injure navigation, and the other—the local authority—claiming that that water ought to be used to assist in the development of the land, which is the great responsible asset left in the hands of the local authority. That conflict is bound to occur, and we would be unreasonable men if we did not make honest provision for it. Which is to be the paramount right? That is the question I have to face in my mind, and that is the question which, I think, every member of the Convention ought to face in his mind. Which is to be the paramount right—the right of navigation or the right of water conservation? We have reached, I hope, an era when no man will place the mere right of navigation along streams, especially in these and regions, above the right to use the water for the purpose of creating production, without which no navigation would be profitable or necessary at all. It is a matter essential to the settlement, occupation and development of those and regions that there should be a reasonable right to use the water, not merely for the purpose of irrigation. I hope honorable members will disabuse their minds of any arguments relating to the present requirements of irrigation. We require to be allowed to use the water, to conserve it, and re-adjust its flow so as to provide water for waterless tracts, which at present cannot be occupied by reason of the scantiness of water. I give my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) all credit for making this proposal in the interests of the great colony he represents, in order to do away for all time with the danger of conflicts, which may be, disastrous to the Commonwealth, and which he certainly seems, to fear might be disastrous to South Australia. The honorable member attached a rider or corollary to his proposal at Adelaide, which I have now, before me. One of his amendments which was amended and carried, provided for giving control over the River Murray to the Federal Government. He also proposed to provide an uninterrupted passage for ships between the River Murray and the ocean—showing how largely the attention of South Australia is directed not to the ordinary navigability of the Murray, but to making, the Lower Murray navigable, and having an outlet in the way of an ocean port at its entrance. The honorable member must know that the expenditure of any large sums of money to give an uninterrupted passage for ships between the Murray and the ocean must, the moment it is carried out, largely diminish the body of water in the river itself. The reason the Murray has been kept open for navigation so long is because of the impediments at its mouth; and the sooner you open a

Oh, yes, the honorable member is mistaken.

Mr. FRASER. -
No.

Mr. GORDON. -
There is already a steamer going regularly from above the Murray mouth to Port Victor.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
That is news to me. I always understood that navigation was impeded at certain points in the Murray, and that all goods were transhipped to Port Victor.

Mr. GORDON. -
I have been through myself on a steamer.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
In order to make out the case for handing over the navigability of the Darling as a paramount right, over the ordinary rights of water conservation, you must show that the Darling is a navigable stream. Now, I have returns here which will not be gainsaid, showing the days on which the Darling was navigable from the 1st January, 1882, to the 26th March, 1896, inclusive. In 1882 the river was open for navigation for 84 days, and closed for 281 days. Surely that is not a navigable stream.

Mr. GLYNN. -
That is the reason why we want this—because you say it is not navigable.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
You are not entitled, under a claim to some existing right, to claim a right which never existed. You are not entitled to claim that the Darling is-navigable and that being navigable stream, it should be handed over to the Federal Government. I am showing that it is not a navigable stream within the meaning of that term. In 1883 it was open for 44 days and closed for 321 days. That is to say, it was only open for 12 per cent. of the days in that year. In 1884 it was open for 21 days and closed for 345 days. In 1885 it was open for 31 days and closed for 334 days. In 1886 it was open for 222 days (or 61 per cent.), and closed for 143 days. In 1887 it was open for 269 days (or 74 per cent.), and closed for 96 days. Then there is a sudden drop. In 1888 it was only open for 82 days. Now, history repeats itself, and what do these records show? In one year you have the river open for nearly three quarters of the year, and the next year you have it open only for about one-tenth of the year. Now, immediately there is a similar drop there will be inquiries made by the federal authority as to what was the cause of this falling off in the navigability of the river, and it will be very hard to persuade men that the cause of it is, simply that the drought has begun to make its effects known. You will have at once put in jeopardy all those works which may have been constructed in a time of a plentiful supply of water. Evidence will be brought, and it must be remembered that evidence is easily procured amongst men with rival interests. to serve men who have embarked their capital in shipping enterprise on the river, or in importing warehouses at Bourke, or in transhipping warehouses on the Murray mouth. These men will have rival interests to serve, and evidence will very soon be got to show that an expenditure of money on a weir, the diverting of water into an old channel, or the blocking up of a lake, has affected the navigation of the river. It will be very hard for men who have expended their money in water improvements to gainsay such evidence brought by persons interested. There will be jeopardy at once to enterprise, and no man who has any sense, and; no colony with any sense will embark one shilling of capital in enterprise which may be threatened at any moment with annihilation by a conflict arising in this way-a conflict arising from a dual authority. Now the average for these fourteen years of the time, when the river was open is 49 per cent. of the days of the year. That is a trifle under one half. The period when it is wholly open is during the period of the tropical rains, during January and February. I think these statistics will show that, so far as the Darling is concerned, it is not within the meaning accepted by English or American legal writers of the term "a navigable stream," to the navigation of which the Commonwealth could be said to set up any claim, or any state set up any claim.

Mr. HOLDER. -

To what point of the river do these statistics refer?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
I take it the point will be from Wilcannia.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That is a long way up.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I will hand the honorable member the statistics and he can look them over for himself. This proposal seems, unfortunately-I say unfortunately advisedly-to be directed largely to New South Wales. This debate has been criticised as a duel between New South Wales and South Australia; but I wish to direct attention to the fact that our proposals in New South Wales have robbed the Darling, the Murrumbidgee, and the Murray of a very small proportion of the water, whereas the proposals carried into effect in Victoria must have largely diminished the flow of water in the Murray. Yet this work has been going on, and there has been no complaint that the navigation of the Murray has been impeded by what has been done at the instance of the Victorian Government. I should like to enlighten the members of this Convention as to the works—for which I give great credit, to the Government of Victoria—which have been done by that Government; works such as we are to be prevented from carrying out. I think no one has risen to show that there has been the slightest injury to the navigation of the Murray by the construction of the works I am about to mention in connexion with the Victorian tributaries of the Murray, the Mitta Mitta, the Broken River, the Goulburn, the Loddon, the Campaspe, and the Ovens. Most of these are very important tributaries coming from a colony whose average rainfall is about 32 inches per year. Some of them are mountain streams with a very impetuous flow; some of them are navigable—for I understand that the Goulburn has been navigable as far as Seymour. Indeed, some of these streams are just as navigable streams as the Darling may be said to be a navigable stream. The Goulburn has been intercepted at Murchison by a weir 40 feet in length, largely diverting the whole of the summer supply into two great canals. We have never done anything of that kind in New South Wales. We have never diverted a river by the construction of a weir in this way. Does any one say that this work impedes the navigation of the Murray? No. Possibly South Australia does not see any chance of navigating the Goulburn as far as Seymour and diverting a portion of the trade of Victoria in that way; therefore, not having any interest in sending to Seymour for cargo, she does not propose to interfere with the Goulburn River, which Victoria can with impunity block and bar. The western canal, which is partly constructed, is designed to carry 103,000 cubic feet of water per minute, and the eastern canal, the head-works of which have [P.394] starts here been completed, will, when finished, carry 21,000 cubic feet per minute; that is to say, the two channels, when in operation, will carry 124,000 cubic feet of water per minute. Works on the Campaspe have been carried out to the extent of £53,000, the effect of which is to intercept and divert the whole of the ordinary discharge of that stream. That discharge is not sufficient, however, to irrigate the whole area which it is proposed to deal with. On the Loddon, works for the interception of the whole of the ordinary supply have been constructed at a cost of £174,000, and, as in the case of the Campaspe, the whole flow of the Loddon would be insufficient for the irrigation intended to be carried out; and proposals have been made for the diversion of the waters of the Ovens and the Broken River. Then from the Murray works constructed at the instance of the Government draw a large supply. It appears that Victoria takes from the Murray water for the irrigation of 97,000 acres in the Cohuna Trust, 6,500 acres in Koondrook Trust, and so on. Taking the total area, works have been constructed by the Government drawing water from the Murray proper for the irrigation of 166,800 acres, and taking as a basis a statement of the Victorian Government this area will require a supply of 80,000 cubic feet per minute. To this has to be added the case of Mildura, where water is taken to the extent of 66,000 cubic feet per minute from the Murray. This shows that the total area diverted from the Murray and its tributaries by the Victorian Government is: From the Goulburn River 124,000 cubic feet per minute, from the Campaspe River 10,000 cubic feet per minute, from the Loddon River 20,000 cubic feet per minute, from the Murray (for trusts) 80,000 cubic feet per minute, and from the Murray, for Mildura, 60,000 cubic feet per minute-making a total of 294,000 cubic feet per minute.

Mr. SYMON. -

But I understand that Victoria is willing that all her tributaries should be placed under the control of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

My honorable friend and his colleagues have not proposed to interfere with Victoria and its tributaries. There is no proposal to interfere with the Campaspe and the Goulburn. It is only New South Wales that has to suffer-New South Wales, which has not done anything to interfere with the water of its tributaries at all.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Deal with them all alike.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

My honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) may intend to be consistent. He may be prepared to break down the dam on the Goulburn River, but I should like to know how any proposal to interfere with the irrigation works that have been constructed for the benefit of settlers in this country would be received?

Mr. FRASER. -
It would be nonsense to do it.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
There is no proposal to do it, and I complain that the whole proposal is directed towards the one colony-New South Wales. How can we go back and say that we have tolerated a proposal of this character, while we have to stand by and see proposals carried into effect in Victoria—which we do not complain of—interfering with the tributaries of the Murray?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I said the other day that we were perfectly prepared to place the whole of our tributaries under the control of the Federal Parliament if New South Wales would do the same.

Mr. REID. -
Then they cannot be worth much.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
When the people of Victoria began to understand that this might mean interfering with the water trusts that have been established, in order to benefit South Australia, there would be the same feeling here as has been raised in New South Wales. What do the facts which I have stated mean? I have told the committee that 294,000 cubic feet per minute are taken from the Murray for Victorian works. This is 5,000 feet in excess of the entire quantity which it has been proposed to take from the Darling, the Murrumbidgee, and the Murray combined, by any proposal which has been made to the New South Wales Government.

Mr. HOLDER. -
As the Bill stands the Murray is federalized.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
I do not want to be drawn from the course of my argument. The works I have mentioned have actually been carried out by Victoria, and they divert water to the extent of 5,000 cubic feet per minute more than would be effected by all the proposals of the Government engineers in New South Wales to divert water from our three great rivers, the Darling, the Murrumbidgee, and the Murray combined.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The waters in Victoria are taken from a flood discharge, which otherwise would be wasted.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
My honorable friend knows very well that we cannot take any water in New South Wales unless it comes by flood. We do not get it from springs. In what other way does it come? We have only one region from which water comes from snow. We have to depend upon the floods. But what we object to is that if this proposal is put into full effect you must control this conservation of waters from floods, from snow, or from any other source, if you are going to have any effective control of navigation. We object to making navigation the paramount purpose of the streams of Australia. I can remember that a little time ago in Melbourne - Sir George Turner may remember it, too - some people, in consequence of the prolonged drought, asked for a day of humiliation and prayer; but a wise bishop said he would not give his consent to it.

Mr. Higgins.

It was not a Sydney bishop.

Mr. Carruthers.

The bishop said that the Almighty sends us enough water here, if we would only take care to store it up in time of flood, and make use of it in times of scarcity. But here we have a proposal made which is to tie the hands of the colony, which depends largely, and whose great pastoral industry must depend, on the storage of the water; a proposal which is to tie up the hands of the local authorities so that we cannot store any water for fear that we risk the navigability of a stream which flows into the neighbouring colony of South Australia. We do not forget these things; we do not forget that Victoria is allowed to do these things with impunity, but New South Wales, which has done nothing of this character, is for all time to be burdened and injured by these restrictions. In addition to these works, which are really in operation in Victoria, proposals have been placed before the Government of that colony for the interception of the whole of the ordinary supply of water, in the River Ovens, and for the establishment of several additional trusts—which will depend on the Murray for their supply of water leaving this arch-offender, if there is any offence at all—and I say there is no offence, that Australia federated or unfederated, can never be a land carrying any great population until we have altered the face of the earth by providing from the plenty of the floods a sufficient quantity of water for all time to make settlement certain—now we come to the next offender, South Australia. We find that it has given a concession at Renmark similar to that which is given at Mildura, allowing it to take 60,000 cubic feet per minute for that settlement. More water is allowed to be diverted to Renmark than the New South Wales Government has sanctioned for irrigation on any one of these three rivers.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Do you say that more is being diverted?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

South Australia is taking more water away from the navigable waters of the Murray than is being taken by New South Wales from any one of the three rivers.

Mr. GLYNN. -

It does not take a seventieth part of the summer discharge, and Mildura only takes a sixtieth part of the summer discharge.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

It may only take that proportion, but the concession is given.

Mr. GLYNN. -

You seem to be talking of concessions not of facts.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

It is not the fault of the Government that Victoria does not take it, because the Government has given them authority to take it. Suppose the Government or the people of New South Wales were to run away from their contracts, and to say-"Oh, they do not work up to the contract," you give them the right to take up to a sixtieth part of the summer discharge. And so with Mildura. You surely have not given them that right without knowing that it is a good thing to allow them to do it. Let us see what is being done in New South Wales. The Government works for utilizing the waters of the Murray, or its tributaries, for irrigation which have yet been carried out, are at Hay on the Murrumbidgee, and at Wentworth on the Murray. The quantity of water which may be raised at the former place is 480 cubic feet per minute, and at Wentworth it is 640 cubic feet per minute. Now, that is the total amount of water diverted from the Murray, or the Darling, or the Murrumbidgee by all the Government proposals for the irrigation of the colony of New South Wales. There has been 1,200 cubic feet per minute diverted as against 249,000 cubic feet taken in Victoria, and 60,000 cubic feet which may be taken in South Australia. When it was proposed to construct a canal from the Murray, at Bungowannah, near Albury, in pursuance of the idea which was always strong in my mind, not of irrigation but of the reconstruction of rivers, that is, filling old courses, taking the flow of water close by the homesteads of the settlers, not necessarily for the purpose of feeding their wheat crops, but in order that there might be a plentiful supply, or, as my honorable friend (Mr. Dobson) said, to boil your billy not to waste the water, but to bring it up to those who want it in the literal sense of the word, who, with their stock at times dying of thirst, want it; when it was proposed to divert a portion of the upper waters of the Murray—to divert a third of the water which the Government drained from the Murray and its tributaries not a third of the whole supply of the Murray, but only a third of the total quantity which the Victorian Government divert, from the Murray by its scheme—the proposal was met with indignant protests from Victoria and South Australia.

Mr. REID. - Naturally.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. - And that work has never yet been carried out, largely on account of the protests which were entered against it by the two sister colonies, whom we did not wish to offend by ruthlessly acting on what we considered to be our just rights. Then again, the proposal, which is now under consideration, to divert water from the Murrumbidgee to the extent of a fifth of the quantity of water met with a similar reception and the Victorian Government asked New South Wales to arbitrate on the portions of the waters still left to New South Wales, and to limit the rights of New South Wales to deal with that balance. I would not have referred to these facts, because facts they are, with regard to the history of this water question, if it had not throughout this debate been urged, as if New South Wales were the chief culprit in regard to robbing South Australia of the water necessary to carry on its navigation. We have done very little to divert water permanently from the Murray. We have done a great deal, and I hope we will do a great deal more, towards the reconstruction and impounding of waters for the purpose of enabling the country to be settled, and any proposal in this Bill which interferes with that purpose will be detrimental to the best interests of the people of all Australia, not merely the people of New South Wales—because it is just as much to the interests of the people of Tasmania and Western Australia that there should be prosperous settlement in the central regions of New South Wales, as that there should be prosperous settlement in any regions in their own colonies. Now, a great deal of stress is laid on the point that the Darling River is one which is largely fed by the waters of Queensland. I heard honorable members from South Australia ask what right has New South Wales to impound waters which do not come from the New South Wales rainfall, and claim those waters as her own? It may surprise honorable members to hear that, except in very rare periods, possibly less than two months out of twenty-four, the Darling waters which may be impounded for the beneficial purposes of New South Wales, are waters deriving their source entirely from the New South Wales rainfall. It is true that we have devastating floods at times from the Queensland rainfall, but we would sooner be without those floods than with them.

Mr. HOWE. -

We should not.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

In 1891, when the Darling was a stream over 100 miles wide, it cost the Government of which I was a member some thousands and thousands of pounds to repair the damages done to public property from flood waters coming down from Queensland. We had a stream flowing over 100 miles wide, and keeping a large portion of our territory for a month or six weeks under water. These are rare occurrences, but that is what the Queensland water generally does to us. Honorable members will not forget this, that the main tributaries of the Darling, those which come to feed the Darling, are the tributaries in New South Wales. Take the Culgoa, the tributary which flows into the Darling River at Brewarrina. The Culgoa at Brewarrina is a stream on which you could not take an ordinary pulling boat with any degree of safety, yet when the Culgoa gets into Queensland—it is only an affluent of the Balonne—it is almost as great a stream as the Darling itself. Where does that water go to? It is not any evaporation which loses it, but it is lost by soakage somewhere so that that great stream of Queensland, when it does come down, comes down almost as a danger to New South Wales. The Warrego, in Queensland, in many parts is a stream of permanent water. The Warrego, in New South Wales, lower down, where it ought to be affected by the Queensland flow of water, is a dry bed with no water for nine months out of the year, and yet in Queensland it is almost a permanent stream. Although in Queensland, it is a permanent stream, the Queensland water does not reach us in ordinary seasons. It is absorbed by the thirsty soil or it goes to form a subterranean water supply. Speaking of the Warrego, it is characteristic of the waters of those tributaries in that western country that you may have a thunderstorm in one part of the river causing it to run a banker, while 50 miles lower down you can walk across the bed of the river without getting your feet wet. There are no similar cases in any other part of the world. We cannot draw in the old world laws to govern and regulate these streams. If a man is to be refused the right to dam the Warrego it means that the water will run to waste, and in 24 hours afterwards, except in the case of small pools, there will be nothing left of the thunder-storm waters. Honorable members must not think that we get the advantage of the rainfall in Queensland, where they may have, perhaps, 24 inches in a day in this or that place. That water does not reach the Darling; most of it is absorbed by the soil. The rivers of New South Wales, the McIntyre and the Dumaresq, come from a region where the annual rainfall is about 21 inches. The Gwydir is a permanent running stream, the Naomi the same. The Castlereagh is not a permanent stream, but it comes into the Darling in a fair volume. The Macquarie is one of the largest of our rivers, and is one of the most peculiar streams. It flows for 200 or 300 miles through our territory, giving a great water supply to cities like Bathurst, Orange, and Dubbo, and then it loses itself in the wilderness. Although the Macquarie is one of our grandest streams, a man can step across it at its junction with the Darling. When you have these anomalies, it is dangerous to say that any authority, federal or otherwise, should be able to claim the right to the flow of these waters into the Darling or the Murray. Provision might be made to maintain navigation, and if any honorable member can make a reasonable proposal that the expense of carrying out works to maintain the navigation and the expense of dredging and snagging the Darling should be a federal matter, we would go heart and soul with him.

Mr. GORDON. -
That is involved in our proposal.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
We have spent £80,000 or £100,000 in snagging the Darling, and what have we got from it? We have simply diverted trade from New South Wales to other colonies.

Mr. HOWE. -
Where has most of that money been spent—beyond Bourke?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Honorable members may make provision to snag the river beyond Bourke if they like, but what South Australian representative would be so foolish as to propose such a thing in the Federal Parliament when he knew the trade would not go down to South Australia? We have locked the Darling at Bourke in order to make it navigable from Bourke to Brewarrina, and we hope to make it navigable much further, in fact, right up to Queensland. We are doing all that at our own expense, and we do not ask any one to join us. We have made the river navigable for the benefit of South Australia by spending £80,000, in snagging the river between Bourke and Wentworth.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
We have also spent £20,000 in making the river navigable.

Mr. REID. -
The South Australian people did not do that in order to provide trade for other colonies.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
If it means that we are to hand over the control of our waters to the federal authority and to divide the control of the waters with the federal authority, then the price is too dear. No matter what people may say, or what people may write, who do not understand this aspect of the question, no greater disaster could be inflicted on the interior of New South Wales at this juncture when men are awakening to the fact that closer settlement is impossible without water conservation in the interior. No greater injury could be done to New South Wales than to divide the authority which controls the water. During the last session of our Parliament we passed a Water Rights Act, which, for the first time, laid down the law with regard to the ownership of water in the streams of New South Wales. Until the passage of that Act men knew nothing of their rights. They spent their own money at enormous risk to themselves. £25,000 was spent on the Yanko Cutting, on the Murrumbidgee River. What was the result? A harvest of litigation to-day. After the passage of the Water Rights Bill in New South Wales, the position of the Crown, and of the riparian owners, was well defined, and we have now inaugurated a new era, when more capital will be spent and more enterprise devoted to the storing and proper distribution of water, which will bring about increased profitable occupation of the land. At this juncture, if you raise any doubt as to the local administration of these rights, you will jeopardize the best interests of the people settled in that part of New South Wales. We tell those who would give control of the navigation to the federal authority to make navigation subservient to the local interests with regard to the use of the water. I invite my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon), who has taken this matter in hand on behalf of South Australia, to make his proposal clear and well defined, so that navigation and improvement of navigability shall merely mean the removal of those obstructions which from time to time are placed in the river. But let him not give the Federal Parliament paramount authority over those local rights, which should still remain in the states for the use of the water for conservation and local purposes.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I have been a listener to this debate for a considerable time, and I hoped there would be no necessity for me to say anything with reference to it. My object in speaking is to appeal to those honorable members who are interested in this matter to come to some conclusion with regard to it. A short time ago we had a debate which lasted for two days or more on this subject, when all those who took a prominent interest in the matter spoke and exhausted themselves. We were then asked to defer coming to a decision until there should be a conference. That conference took place, but I never heard what was the result of it.

Mr. HOWE. -

We see the result now before us.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It seems to me the only result of the conference has been that we have given time to the combatants to refresh themselves, and that they are here to-day ready to go over the whole of the ground again. To me this subject has become somewhat tedious, although I admit that it is a most difficult question, and one requiring grave consideration. I really think that the conference ought to have done something in the direction of meeting the difficulty. I understand South Australia asks that the present position of affairs should not be interfered with in the future. I understand that she asks that the privileges which she now enjoys should be continued under the Federal Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

She asks for a great deal more than that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I do not think she has any right to more privileges than she enjoys at present, but I think South Australia has some reason to be very careful when she hears, as we have heard from the representatives of New South Wales, that they claim that they have a right to take every drop of water out of the Darling. That has been said by more than one honorable member. It has also been stated that the people of New South Wales would never think of doing such a thing. If that is the case, there is no reason why some provision should not be made in the Constitution under which South Australia might continue to enjoy the privileges which she has had for so many years.

Mr. LYNE. -

Leave things as they are and she will have those privileges.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am not prepared to support those who would deny to New South Wales a right to use the water of all the tributaries of the Darling and the Murray. It seems to me that that would be an unreasonable demand, which would every much interfere with the development and progress of New South Wales. There is one difficulty, and it is a very grave difficulty, on the question of whether navigation or irrigation should be paramount. I altogether favour irrigation being paramount. I do not attach much importance, and I dare say my friends from South Australia will not agree with me, to the River Darling as a means of transit. From the information given to us it would appear that it is not at all a certain means of transit. It is only available now and again; and I believe the time will come when it will cease to be a means of transit, owing to the greater advantages offered by the railways. But then, of course, there is the question of the navigation of the Murray, which might be influenced very largely by the waters of the Darling and the other tributaries of the Murray being used for irrigation. South Australia has a right to protect herself against that. If those who are particularly interested cannot come to an agreement it seems to me that the only way out of the difficulty is to make the provision inserted in the Constitution so wide that the question will be left to a considerable extent, to the Federal Parliament. I do not wish myself to be an arbiter in the matter. I should much prefer that those particularly interested should come to a reasonable conclusion. If they cannot get all they want they should make the best possible bargain, and not be at arm's length, as they seem to be at the present time. My principal object in rising was to urge honorable members not to discuss this matter all over again. We have had two days of it, and it seems to me we shall have two or three days more if we are to re-discuss the whole question. There is a limit even to the endurance of the delegates to the Convention. I do appeal to honorable members to try to shorten the debate as much as possible, and I hope it will not be necessary to go to a division, but that some mutual arrangement which will be fairly satisfactory to all parties will be arrived at.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). - I think that the committee should now be prepared to come to a determination on this subject. After the long discussion the other day, and after the masterly, and exhaustive explanation given to us to-day of the position of New South Wales by Mr. Carruthers, I see no reason why we should not come to a decision at once. In the first place, no one desires that sub-section (31) should remain in the Bill, and it might be struck out. New South Wales does not want it, and South Australia does not want it, because it limits the powers which by implication are contained in the first sub-section. We might, therefore, start by making a clean sweep of sub-section (31). The next step I would suggest would be to have two divisions if need be. One would be on the question of whether the whole subject of inter-state rivers should be left to the Federal Parliament or not. I would suggest the insertion in clause 52, giving the Federal Parliament power to legislate on certain matters, of the following words, which, I think, would effectuate the purpose of those who hold with me:-

The adjustment of riparian rights as between states as to all waters which in the course of their flow or after joining other waters touch more than one state.

If that were adopted the effect of it would be not to decide whether irrigation is to be paramount to navigation, or navigation to irrigation, or whether conservation and storage, are to be paramount to both; but simply to treat the question of the River Murray and its tributaries—and I take these as being, par excellence, the federal rivers—as a federal matter.

Mr. REID. -
Your language is wide enough to include the Queensland tributaries.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Quite so, and we hope that Queensland will be in the Federation eventually. But this amendment will only give the Federal Parliament power to deal with the colonies in the Federation.

Mr. REID. -
To what extent?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It will give absolute power to adjust riparian rights.

Mr. LYNE. -
You take the power away from the states altogether.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No. As I understand the question of riparian rights as between the owners on the bank of a stream up high and down below, an owner up high has a right to use the waters in any way he thinks fit without let or hindrance, provided he does not infringe upon the equal rights of the owner down below.

Mr. REID. -
That is not the law as between states.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No. The difficulty which the New South Wales representatives have, and which have been so ably stated by Mr. Carruthers, with the responsibility and knowledge which he possesses as Minister of Lands, is that they feel that, owing to the peculiar conditions of the Australian climate, they must make some use of the waters of these rivers. My amendment would not prohibit them from making use of any of the waters of those rivers provided they did not infringe upon the equal rights of South Australia and the other colonies by diminishing the flow.

Mr. REID. -
You know that South Australia, as a matter of law, has no possible jurisdiction over the waters of the Darling.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That is so.

Mr. REID. -
And although they have no jurisdiction, and, therefore, no legal rights, you ask us to give up the legal rights we possess, and to jeopardize our vital interests of water conservation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think as between friendly states you ought to be equally just in your dealings with those who occupy lands high up the river and those who occupy lands below. It is quite true that South Australia has not got an army with which she could go and besiege the Parliament House of Sydney to compel the New South Wales Parliament to do a certain thing.

Mr. REID. -

What grievance has she got?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Supposing that New South Wales were the owner in fee simple of all the land along the Darling in New South Wales, and that South Australia were the owner in fee simple of all the land along the Murray down below where it runs into the Southern Ocean, there is not the slightest doubt that South Australia would be able to get an injunction to prevent New South Wales from using the waters of the Darling so as to diminish substantially the normal flow.

Mr. REID. -

Where would such an injunction be got?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am assuming that they are owners in fee simple. Of course, I do not speak with the responsibility Mr. Carruthers feels as Minister of Lands having to administer a most complex law. I speak as a private member of the Convention, whose only desire is to get a speedy determination of this dispute. I ask how can South Australia submit to a condition of things such as was so frankly and so fairy stated by the honorable member (Mr. McMillan), who asserted that New South Wales is entitled to take every drop of the water of the Darling for its own purposes, without making any arrangement with South Australia?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I simply said that the right must be somewhere.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The honorable member was, as usual, perfectly logical and correct. If the New South Wales claim amounts to anything, it amounts to what the honorable member stated.

Mr. BARTON. -

Is not that the law?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If you were private owners it would not be the law, but inasmuch as South Australia has no power to enforce its claim, you must come to an agreement.

Mr. BARTON. -
Is it not the law now?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
All that South Australia asks is to be
The adjustment of riparian rights as between states as to all waters which in the course of their flow or after joining other waters touch more than one state.

Assuming that the committee are unwilling to go to the extreme course-I do not call it extreme-of leaving this matter absolutely to the Federal Parliament, I think that a compromise such as that provided for by the words of my other amendment might be adopted. The effect of my other amendment is to assert for South Australia the undoubted right she would have at law, if there were a law applicable to the circumstances. If you secure the navigability of the river to South Australia, she will eventually be able to use the water to which she is entitled as she thinks fit. The honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) has shown that New South Wales is interested in the way in which South Australia uses these waters, and that by the widening and deepening of the mouth of the Murray the course of the river may be very greatly affected. Why then should not New South Wales leave to the Federal Parliament the control of the mouth of the Murray, so as to insure that the interests of New South Wales shall not be injured? However, we all understand how our minds are made up now, and therefore I would suggest that we should drop out subsection (31), and adopt my proposed amendment in its place.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
I think that the representatives of New South Wales will agree with me that the proposal of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) is worse than any suggestion which has come from South Australia. South Australia, I believe, does not care a fig about the navigability of the River Darling, except so far as the keeping open of the river for the purposes of trade is concerned. So far as I can ascertain, the South Australian Government, up to the present time, have done nothing to utilize the surplus water of the Murray for the purpose of rendering its lands more valuable than they were previously. I have heard something said about village settlements, which probably could be sustained with a few gallons of water per week or per month; but, with the exception of Renmark, I know of no other place in South Australia where an effort has been made to render land more valuable by the use of water in irrigating it.
Mr. HOLDER. -
The South Australian irrigation settlements have large areas under irrigation.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
The representatives of South Australia say-"We must preserve our rights as against New South Wales." They are to be able to use these waters as they think proper; but we are not to use them except for the purpose of navigation.

Mr. GORDON. -
That is not contended.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
That is the effect of every proposal which I have heard. In Adelaide I did not object to the Darling being handed over for the purposes of navigation, if it was insured that there would be no interference with the tributaries of that river. It was proposed then, by the representatives of South Australia, that the Darling should be handed over to the Federal Parliament. I have not the slightest objection to that being done if we are to be allowed to utilize the streams which flow into the Darling, or which are created by the Darling in flood time, for our own purposes. But if we are to be told that we are not to conserve these waters, by whose use millions of acres of land may be rendered valuable, but must allow them to flow down into the river, and if that be an essential condition of federation, I, for one, will oppose federation as strongly as it is in my power to do so. If we are to give up these rights and get nothing for them and I do not see how anything could compensate for the loss of the right to conserve these waters at the very source—I shall oppose federation. Let me take as an illustration of my position, the case of the Lachlan, which begins to flow near Goulburn, within 120 miles of Sydney, and runs to Balranald, losing itself in ordinary seasons in a swamp known as the Reeds, and ultimately emptying into the Murrumbidgee. Are we to be told that the people in Goulburn, 400 or 500 miles away, are not to interfere with any of the streams in their district, because by doing so they would be interfering with the navigability of the rivers lower down? I say that that is a monstrous proposition. I admit with regard to the whole of the Darling country that New South Wales has done very little to produce settlement there. In the early days the whole of the country was settled by South Australians and Victorians, and very little of the capital which went there came from New South Wales. The natural flow of trade from the district has always been to South Australia. But if we in New South Wales chose to act in that selfish spirit with which we are charged, how easy it would be for us to interfere with the navigability of the river. I have represented in the New South Wales Parliament, for ten or twelve years past, an electorate through which the Darling flows, and during that time I have never lost an opportunity of impressing upon the Government the necessity of rendering the river navigable. For what purposes? For the purposes of trade. I think I am before both free traders and protectionists, because I have always urged that trade should be allowed to flow where it is most profitable to the producer to send it. I have gone so far as to urge the construction of a line of railway from Hay to Deniliquin, and I have urged the opening up of the Darling, although I knew fall well that none of the trade of the district would go to Sydney, but that it would go to South Australia. I have always recognised that if our producers can benefit, no matter to how small an extent, by sending their produce to a neighbouring colony, it is to our interest to enable them to do so. If we wanted to be selfish, all we should have to do would be to wait for one flood to come down, and there would be no navigation afterwards. Honorable members can hardly conceive what the Darling is. I have seen it, even when steamers have been trying to get up and down, a mere gutter, not broader than this chamber and at other times I have known it to be absolutely dry. I have seen boats loaded with goods for Bourke stuck for twelve months at Wentworth, and for nearly eighteen months at Wilcannia. That was before we had a railway to Bourke. If we liked to be selfish all we need do is to say-"We will not keep this highway open." New South Wales has never dealt as generously with the Darling as she should have done. In the olden days we used to pay £50 a mile for the maintenance and the keeping open of our main roads; but since 1864 or 1865, when Captain Cadell began the snagging of the Darling, we have only spent about £60,000 upon the river, with the exception, of course, of what has recently been spent on the construction of a weir at Bourke. That is through the whole course of 1,250 miles. Well, if we had spent on the Darling even the amount that was granted for the maintenance of a first-class road, instead of having spent £60,000 on that river from 1864 or 1866 to the present, we would have spent over two millions of money on the Darling. I have never been able to impress my views on this subject upon those in authority in Sydney, but I say that we pay too dearly for the trade of our remote districts, and that it will be very much better for us to let that trade drift away to its natural outlet, if by doing so we can benefit our own settlers. If we can enable those people, by sending their produce to other colonies rather than forcing them to send it to Sydney, to get more money for their produce, that will be a benefit to New South Wales which New South Wales ought to be satisfied with. But when we are charged with selfishness about this Darling River, when we are told that we are greedy about it, and it is shown by Mr. Carruthers that we have never taken anything like the water that has been taken out of our rivers for the purposes of an irrigation scheme, which, as far as Victoria is concerned, has been an absolute failure-

Mr. DEAKIN. -
You are quite under a misapprehension them. First of all, much of the water flows back again, and there is little loss on account of any diversions we are making.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
That is something uncommon.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It is a fact, nevertheless. And our irrigation scheme is not a failure.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I am very glad to hear that your irrigation scheme is not a failure. Most people in New South Wales have pointed to it as an absolute failure, and as successful only in places where the rainfall is sufficient without irrigation.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Thousands of people have been maintained on our lands during the last few years who would have been ruined but for irrigation.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I am very glad to hear it. Your scheme of irrigation has been held up in New South Wales as an object-lesson against costly irrigation works. Now, as I said before, I am not concerned about the navigation of the river. I would willingly be one of those to keep up that river as a highway, not for the convenience of the people of South Australia, but for the benefit of those of our own producers the natural outlet for whose produce is South Australia. But when we are told that we are not to interfere with our rivers and tributaries in New England, and with our streams 120 miles above Sydney, and that the whole colony is to be condemned with regard to these waters, which it has never attempted to utilize, whatever the result may be, I would never be a party to any such concession as is now demanded. I will be delighted if any scheme be proposed by which this matter can be settled. I think that possibly South Australia has been treated discourteously with regard to her proposals for utilizing the water of the river, and that at times South Australia has been treated contemptuously in reference to the correspondence on the subject and therefore I do not wonder that they are irritated.

Mr. LYNE. -
That is not our fault.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I know that it is not our fault; but I also know that South Australia has been so treated. I have heard it said that it would have been very much better for our own colony if the district of the Darling River had been left to the blackfellow instead of being opened up to settlement. I do not agree with that view, because we get enormous sums out of the trade of that district as the entries of the Custom house will show. I think that we shall be sacrificing the interests of New South Wales too much if the navigability of the rivers is to be maintained at the expense of every stream throughout the colony.

Mr. Howe. -
We do not ask for that; we never asked for that.

Sir Joseph Abbott. -
But the control of the navigability of the Darling River carries with it the control of every stream that flows into the Darling. What is the good of the South Australian representatives saying—"We never asked for that," if the rivers are to be kept navigable down to Adelaide under the authority of the Federal Parliament? To say to New South Wales—"You have no right to make the reservoirs or weirs because you are interfering with the navigability of the Darling and Murray," is to make a claim which New South Wales cannot concede. The term is too, broad and comprehensive for us to accept. But if the representatives of South Australia can come to any middle course which they can show us to be just and fair, I am sure many of us will be willing to agree to it. If they will clearly show me, for one, that they do not propose to interfere with the feeders of the Darling River to any extent, and to take the control of those feeders from the state, they will find me, at all events, voting with them for the maintenance of the navigability of the Darling.

Mr. Holder (South Australia). -
I join with Sir John Forrest in expressing the hope that this debate, already much prolonged, may speedily come to an end. At the same time, there are two or three points which I wish very briefly to put by way of restating the case for South Australia, and I also wish to offer a word or two of comment, which will perhaps make it clear that South Australia, never contemplated for one instant anything in the nature of a trespass on the territory or the water rights of New South Wales. References have been made in the debate on several occasions to the possibility of South Australia’s claim involving the possession of irrigation works or works of water conservatism on the Darling and its tributaries. Nothing of that kind has been thought of by me for a single moment. We always realized, every one of us, that the water of the river and its local application was a matter too closely associated with the land to be removed from the local control of the local state Governments; but what we have said all along is that, in our opinion, we had, if not legally, then otherwise, in some other way which I will express presently, a, right to require that, whatever New South Wales might do in her own territory-and she

What will you do?

Mr. HOLDER. -

That is one of those details into which I do not wish to go just now, because I desire to speak as shortly as possible. Our position is that when the waters come within the borders of South Australia we have our right to our share, and we say that that right shall be exercised, not only for the purposes of navigation, but for whatever purposes South Australia may please. That is precisely the position. I have said already that water conservation and irrigation will probably in the future outweigh altogether in their importance, in relation to these rivers, the mere question of transit. However that may be, our claim is that, while New South Wales may do as she likes with her share of the water, we equally, within our boundary, shall be at liberty to do as we wish with our share of the water. It is simply a question of shares.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Will you tell us what your share is?

Mr. HOLDER. -

It has been said that South Australia has no legal right to any share at all; and the word legal has been severely strained. If instead of being states, we were private individuals, there would be no question of legal rights. We should have our legal rights, and the question is whether, in framing, this Federal Constitution, we are going to plant within it a law which might be all very well between states at variance with each other-states foreign to each other -but which is quite out of place between friendly states which are members of the same Constitution.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The water does not belong to New South Wales, Victoria, or any other colony; it is the public property of Australia.

Mr. REID. -

And yet we have got it.

Mr. HOLDER. -

So has every land holder up the stream got the water, but that fact does not entitle him to take away from the land-holder below him the latter's share of the water.

Mr. REID. -

It entitles him to take his own share, but not the other man's.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Here, the question of legal right comes in. We are giving away some of our legal rights under this Constitution. We have the legal right to levy customs duties on New South Wales goods imported into South Australia, and we are giving up that right.

Mr. REID. -

We have already given up our legal right in that respect. We have swept such duties away.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We are surrendering that right under this Constitution.

Mr. REID. -

We surrendered it in advance. You are surrendering it in the hope of getting customs duties up to your level all round the federated colonies.

Mr. GORDON. -

That is where you are making a mistake.

Mr. REID. -

I do not think so.

Mr. GORDON. -

Ask Mr. Lyne.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am quite sure that when New South Wales abandoned her duties of customs she did it, not for our sakes, but for her own sake.

Mr. REID. -

Still, she was a good sort of neighbour to have.

Mr. HOLDER. -

A very nice neighbour. We hope that the same neighbourly spirit will come in with regard to the question of the waters. I am showing that we are abandoning the legal right we have now of taxing the goods of New South Wales and other colonies, and coming into a friendly agreement, by means of which there shall flow through all the channels of commerce the goods of all the colonies, and I say that what we are doing in regard to trade and commerce we should do also in regard to riparian rights. The point upon which I am now is this: Here is a question of legal right which would exist between us as individuals, and which we wish shall be sustained between us as members of a friendly group of states. Let me refer for a moment to the peculiar position which would arise if the contention of the representatives of New South Wales were assented to. Imagine a case where a resident in New South Wales has property situated on the Darling, but higher up than the property of another citizen who is also resident in New South Wales. The man who is lower down the stream can enforce his right, as against all those who are above him, to a certain flow of water. But there may be below the man who is situated lower down the stream, another person having property also on the Darling waters, but situated within the borders of South Australia—all the property-owners, however, being within the federal area. But the mere fact that the dividing line between South Australia and New South Wales separates one man from another, places the man who is within the borders of South Australia in an entirely different position to the others. The others can enforce a legal right, but, according to the contention of the delegates from New South Wales, the man on the South Australian side, simply because he resides in another state of the Federation, can enforce no such legal right. The matter has never been made clearer than it has been this afternoon by the speech of the New South Wales Minister of Lands (Mr. Carruthers), by whom we are asked to leave this very important matter to be a means of friction and dispute between the states. I contend that if we have no legal right which can be enforced in any court of Australia, we have a right which would be recognised—a right which pertains to us all—of appealing to the Imperial Government. But why should we do so?

Mr. REID. -

How much will you sell that right for in cash?

Mr. HOLDER. -

Here I would allude to some remarks made by Mr. O'Connor. The honorable and learned member has suggested: Why not strike out this sub-section and leave the rights of South Australia where they are, so that she can appeal to the Federal Court? I rather agree with that suggestion. Surely it is far better, if we are to form a self-contained Federation which is to make its own laws, and administer its own affairs, that an appeal upon this or any other important question should be made to a body within our own borders, rather than to a court in the old country across thousands of miles of ocean.

Mr. REID. -

Then you give up the question of control? All you want is the right of appeal against possible misuse?

Mr. HOLDER. -

We have never sought the right of control in the sense in which the right honorable gentleman uses the word. It is the right a land owner can enforce against another landowner higher up the stream which South Australia has asked for. We wish to allow so important a matter as this to be settled without reference to an authority 16,000 miles away, and to provide that the reference shall be to authorities within our own borders-to the High Court of the Federation, carrying out the legislation of the Federal Parliament. Mr. O'Connor, I think, fenced a question which I put to him while he was speaking; I do not say that he fenced it knowingly. As the honorable member was speaking I thought his mind was working in the same direction as my own; but as soon as he came to be asked the question whether the right to which he referred included the right of pumping water out of the Darling to the detriment of navigation, we got no answer from him.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Perhaps the honorably gentleman will allow me to explain now. The position I took up, and which I take up now, is this—that the Federal Court will have the right to decide whether in any case the use of water for irrigation purposes is derogating from the right of the control of navigation given in sub-section (1) of clause 52. I go no further than that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Then we come back to the control of navigation alone, and it is more than that that we have been contending for and wish to secure, either by the omission of this clause altogether, or by its omission followed by something else. If Mr. O'Connor had gone so far as to set out clearly that the Federal Parliament and the High Court should decide all these matters, I could have joined with him, being prepared to rely on the good offices and fairness of the Federal Parliament. But the honorable member will not agree to that. He will not agree to put in the place of the sub-section we are now discussing words giving the federal authority express power to legislate and determine in these questions. And that is just exactly what we say the Federal Parliament should have power to do. We cannot decide today which is the more important, irrigation or navigation.

Mr. REID. -

You have only one interest though.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We cannot decide a question of that sort at present, but we wish the decision of it to be given to the Federal Parliament, which will include representatives of all the states concerned, and where there will also be others to arbitrate between the states most nearly interested, as is the case in this Convention. We want this reference, and because we want it we think that we had better get it by distinct provision in the Constitution, than by means of something implied, which might or might not give effect to what it is said we might receive from it. South Australia simply desires this, and no more. She desires no control over New South Wales, and no power to interfere with works carried out in New South Wales, but simply the right to prevent what the New South Wales Minister of Lands has suggested as a possibility—the draining of the Darling dry. Surely with such a phrase as that in our ears we cannot be expected to leave ourselves without protection.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would you mind saying definitely: Is it in navigation only that South Australia is interested, or in irrigation also?

Mr. HOLDER. -

We are concerned in navigation but we are concerned to-day also in irrigation. We have large areas to-day under irrigation cultivation, the water for which purpose has to be taken from the Murray. We cannot be sure whether irrigation or navigation will be the more important to us in the future. I think it possible that we may have more concern for the one than for the other, though I cannot any for which we shall have the more concern. It is impossible to answer the question now. We want power to use the water for the one purpose or the other, according to which may be of greater importance to us.

Mr. REID. -

That is what you want to deprive us of.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We do not want to deprive New South Wales of any such power. We wish to leave that colony as free as ourselves to use her rightful share of the water for any purpose she pleases. Who is to determine what is the rightful share? The Federal Parliament. What has New South Wales to answer to this? Her representatives have no answer to give. They cannot say what their rightful share is. They leave us simply with the power of reference to the British Government; and I say in this matter, when we are framing a Federal Constitution, we should leave all such references to our own authorities. Now, as to the form of the sub-section as it stands, I see the full force of what my honorable friend (Mr. Symon) said just now. It gives away the position as far as South Australia is concerned, and leaves us worse off than we should be if it was not there. What does it do? As it stands it is a distinct limitation on the other powers in the Constitution. As it stands, it permits the federal authorities to come within territory which is wholly South Australian, and to determine how we who are down the stream shall use every drop of the water in the river. It may say to us "You shall take
Mr. DEAKIN. -
You cannot suppose that there is any risk in that.

Mr. HOLDER. -
No, but we are handing over very large powers concerning the lower river to the Federation.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Which they can only exercise for your benefit. They have no motive to do anything else.

Mr. HOLDER. -
The point I want to make is, that while we are asked to hand over these large powers concerning the Lower Murray, New South Wales, on her part, says, concerning the upper waters "No, theme waters shall not be federalized."

Mr. REID. -
It is quite the opposite. We are giving the Upper Murray just the same as the Lower Murray. You are always after the Darling.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It is the Upper Murray of which I am speaking. South Australia is perfectly prepared to see the Murray federalized if the Darling, which is a very important feeder to it in the way of both merchandise and water, in federalized too. But South Australia is not prepared to see the river within her borders federalized, while other colonies see so much danger in the federalization of the water that they will not dream for their part of any such action

Mr. FRASER. -
Your waters must be used for your benefit only. They cannot be used in any other way.

Mr. REID. -
In reference to our share of the Murray, we give you federal control exactly the same as federal control is given over your waters. The Murray is treated in exactly the same way, whether it is in your colony or in ours.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Persons up stream have less interest relatively in the lower stream than those down stream have in the upper stream, and those who are interested in the upper river, and who have less interest in the lower river, ask us to make an entire surrender of our rights and powers concerning the lower river, while they will make no surrender of any kind at all in respect of the waters of the upper river in which we are more concerned than they are concerned in those which flow through our borders, and that is what South Australia objects to. We had better omit the present sub-section and have nothing than leave things as they are. But I do, hope that even yet it will be possible to expressly refer this very vexed question to the Federal Parliament, so that it may have power to deal with it. New South Wales says that it is giving away something which she has. No, it is not, if she has any right to it. Does she believe that any right she possesses will be diminished by the action of the Federal Parliament?

Mr. FRASER. -

She is jeopardizing her rights.

Mr. HOLDER. -

That is to say, that all this talk about trusting the Federal Parliament does not apply to that state which will have the largest representation in it.

Mr. REID. -

The Federal Parliament will control federal things.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I will not be drawn off my track, for I will not speak much longer. I will only say, in reference to the remark of the premier of New South Wales that he wants the Federal Parliament to have federal control in federal things, that to my mind there can be no more federal question than the question of inter-state riparian rights.

Mr. REID. -

Where they exist.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Riparian rights which exist either with appeal to the local authority or with appeal to the British authority, I do not care which—riparian rights appear to me to be a federal question, and therefore one which should be left to the decision of the federal authority. I hope that it will be possible to find some phrase by which, without any injury to the self-respect of either party to the dispute, this whole question may be referred to that authority which alone is competent on evidence to deal with it, which alone will have all the facts before it—which will be able to adapt its legislation from session to session or from term to term to the changing facts it has before it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Perhaps, notwithstanding Sir John Forrest's remarks about the length of this debate, the fact that I have not occupied the attention of honorable members for above three or four minutes in the whole course of it may justify me in seeking to put forward the position I hold, and in putting forward that position the first matter of importance is to inquire, what is the principle about which we are debating? I take it that we shall not be able to decide many questions which will arise under this Constitution precisely upon the principles upon which they would be decided in a British court of justice. That is to say, that there are powers and necessities arising under this Constitution which must be construed more in the light of American decisions than they can possibly be construed in the light of such decisions, for instance, as are given in England about navigable waters. Obviously, of course, the decisions about navigable waters in England will not apply. That criterion which limits the navigable water to the distance of the ebb and flow of the tide, has plainly no more applicability in this country than it has in America. Although it was set up by my learned friend (Mr. Wise) the other day, I must say at once that I abandon any such contention as that, and I think our rights will have to be regulated as regards navigation by considerations something like those which prevail in the courts in America. Now, I wish to take the stand that this sub-section should be struck out, and that no other sub-section should be inserted in its place. I wish to take the stand that the rights which are contended for, so far as they are federal, are confined to rights of navigation, and that so far as they are rights of navigation they should be made applicable to the whole Commonwealth, and not to one or two rivers of New South Wales. When we are constituting a Commonwealth which is to regulate the trade and commerce of the whole of the federated colonies; when we find that a part of the regulation of trade and commerce is inevitably the regulation of navigation; When we also provide that the trade between all these colonies has to be absolutely free-what are we also providing? We are providing, as I shall show under the American decisions, that the control of navigation is under the authority which is intrusted with the control of trade and commerce, and the regulation of that navigation is as important in the case of any navigable water on the whole continent and Tasmania as it is important in the case of any river which flows between New South Wales and South Australia, or between New South Wales and Victoria. Now, with reference to this, I should like to quote a passage from Hare's American Constitutional Law, page 441, which lays down the principle rather clearly:--

We have seen that wherever inter-state or foreign commerce extends, the power of the United States goes with it for its protection, and may be exercised within the boundaries of the state when such action is requisite for the attainment of the object. The authority of Congress is consequently not limited to marine navigation, but includes all the waters of the United States through which intercourse takes place among the states, and with other nations

That is to say, that, where a vessel sailing from New South Wales to Western Australia enters a river in Western Australia which is navigable, the control of that river for navigation is as completely intrusted to the Commonwealth under a provision of this kind as if you had special words for that purpose.

The ebb and the flow of the tide, which is the test of navigability in England, and marks the line at which the prerogative of the Crown ceases and private ownership begins, is as much out of place here as it would be if applied to the Rhine, the Danube, the Ganges, or the Nile; and every stream or lake which can be traversed by ships or steamers, and affords a continuous channel for the transportation of goods or passengers from state to state or abroad, is as much within the power to regulate commerce as the sounds, straits, and estuaries which give access to the waters of the sea.

There is the principle laid down in perfectly unequivocal terms.

Mr. GORDON. -

Will that apply to rivers which are only intermittent?

Mr. BARTON. -

I will come to that presently. I will quote a passage from the same author, which will take my honorable friend a little further in his argument. On page 459 of the same volume, I find this passage:--

Rivers are a means alike of internal, interstate, and foreign commerce, and may consequently be regulated both by the states and by the general Government-subject, nevertheless, to the general principle that a state may not adopt any course which is at variance with the laws made by Congress, or that will injuriously affect trade with her sister states or foreign nations. It follows that while the United States may improve the navigation of a bay or river by removing bars or shoals, or turning the whole force of the current into a single channel, the right is not exclusive, and may be exercised concurrently by the state.

Of course, with this limitation, that where the Commonwealth or the United States legislate, to that extent the legislation of the state drops. It goes on:--

It was accordingly held in the case last cited, that the state of Alabama might tax the city of Mobile for the improvement of the bay or harbor on which it is situated, although the effect was to charge the city with the entire expense of an improvement in which the whole state was interested.

There was a case where the state was allowed to tax a city within the state for the purpose of navigation, because the powers were concurrent; although, if the power had been once exercised with reference to that part of the state by the United States Congress, to that extent the right of the state of Alabama would have disappeared. The report goes on:--
The improvement of harbors and bays, and of navigable rivers flowing into them, is within the power of Congress over commerce; but so long as Congress does not see fit to act, the way is open to the states.

In these two passages are to be found the principles which here, as much as in America, would deal with the control of navigation. Let me give one or two instances from the United States decisions to show the way in which this power is practically illustrated. I find, in reference to the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheatstone, 1:-

Commerce is traffic, but it is also something more. It is intercourse—it describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches. It comprehends navigation.

To show again that that includes navigation, I will cite the case of Cooley versus The Board of Wardens. I am quoting from Baker's Annotated Constitution, which is a digest of these cases. It says-

The power to regulate includes the regulation of navigation, which comprehends the power to prescribe rules in conformity with which navigation must be carried on—Cooley versus Board of Wardens, 12 How.

That shows the extent to which the right over navigable waters is possessed where the instrument which admits the power of a state admits also of the application of the general rule of the Constitution. In the case of Pennsylvania versus Wheeling Bridge Company, 13 How. - it is reported:-

The River Ohio is a navigable stream, and as such is subject to the commercial powers of Congress, which have been exercised over it; and if a bridge is so erected across it as to obstruct navigation it is a nuisance, and an Act of the Legislature of Virginia authorizing its construction would afford no justification to the Bridge Company.

I also find here the following with reference to a case which I shall cite further on:-

If a river is not of itself a highway for commerce with other states or foreign countries, or does not form such highway by its connexion with other waters, and is only navigable between different places within the state, then it is not

That tends further to answer the doubt of the honorable member (Mr. Gordon). Then I find another case, The United States versus Coombs, 12 Peters, 72. The report says-

Under this clause Congress possesses the power to punish offences of the sort enumerated in the 9th section of the Act of 1825. The power to regulate commerce includes the power to regulate navigation as connected with commerce both foreign and inter-state. It does not stop at the boundary line of the state nor is it confined to acts done on the waters or in the necessary course of the navigation thereof. It extends to acts done on land which interfere, obstruct, or prevent the due exercise of the power to regulate commerce and navigation both foreign and among the states. Any offence which thus interferes with, obstructs, or prevents such commerce and navigation, though done on land, may be punished by Congress under the general authority to make all laws necessary and proper to execute its delegated constitutional powers.

I think the two passages I have read from Mr. Hare's well-known volume establish clearly what is included within this power to regulate commerce among the different states, and with foreign countries, and to what extent in the exercise of that power the Parliament would be entitled to go, not only to maintain, but to improve navigation. I want to make these things clear, and I do so frankly to show to what extent I, for one-and I hope other members from New South Wales will go with me-am prepared to go in leaving this power to regulate trade and commerce unlimited in its widest form, only making this condition, that if you leave untouched that power to regulate trade and commerce, you serve the whole Commonwealth alike. We shall then leave the navigation of New South Wales in the same position as the navigation of every other state; that is, we shall have federal control of navigation. That is the position I take up. It amounts to this: That this power to regulate trade and commerce is so large-that the powers which can be conferred by itself on the Parliament by its legislation are so sufficient for the regulation of navigation and all matters relating to trade and commerce-that the Commonwealth can want no greater power with regard to navigation. I shall vote against any proposition, any sub-section, which seeks to limit in any way the power to regulate navigation in the waters of one state or any other state. I claim that it must be co-extensive with the limits of the Commonwealth. If you make the power co-extensive with the limits of the Commonwealth you can only justly do that by leaving this power of regulating trade and commerce untouched and unrestricted. That is the position I take up with regard to navigation. In order to show more fully what this navigation is, I would cite a short passage from the Daniel Ball case, reported in 10 Wallace, Supreme Court, U.S., page 563. I find these words:-

This was an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. The first question presented for determination was whether the steamer was, at the time designated in the libel, engaged in transporting merchandise and passengers on a navigable water of the United States within the meaning of the Acts of Congress.

This is the passage of the decision which, I think, will be found material under the present circumstances. Upon the first of these questions Mr.
Justice Field, speaking for the Full Court, said—

Upon the first of these questions we entertain no doubt. The doctrine of the common law as to the navigability of waters has no application in this country. Here the ebb and flow of the tide do not constitute the usual test, as in England, or any test at all, of the navigability of waters. There no waters are navigable, in fact, or, at least, to any considerable extent, which are not subject to the tide, and, from this circumstance, tide water and navigable water there signify substantially the same thing. But in this country the case is widely different. Some of our rivers are as navigable for many hundreds of miles above, as they are below, the limits of tide water, and some of them are navigable for great distances by large vessels, which are not even affected by the tide at any point during their entire length. A different test must therefore be applied to determine the navigability of our rivers, and that is found in their navigable capacity. Those rivers must be regarded as public navigable rivers in law which are navigable in fact, and they are navigable in fact when they are used or are susceptible of being used in their ordinary condition as highways for commerce, over which trade and travel are or may be conducted in the customary modes of trade and travel on water.

Mr. SYMON. -

Does that refer to intermittent or continuous navigation.

Mr. BARTON. -

It seems to me that the power which I have shown exists for regulating trade and commerce extends to the improvement of the navigation, and it could be applied to rivers with an intermittent flow.

Mr. GORDON. -

What would be the case when the ordinary condition of the river is that it is navigable only for half the year?

Mr BARTON. - I should say it applies to their ordinary condition as rivers, not as mere chains of water-holes. The report goes on to say—

And they constitute navigable waters of the United States within the meaning of the Acts of Congress, in contradistinction from the navigable waters of the states, when they form in their ordinary condition, by themselves or by uniting with other waters, a continued highway over which commerce is or may be carried on with other states or foreign countries in the customary modes in which such commerce is conducted by water.

In these extracts I have endeavoured to show how large a power I am willing to concede with reference to the navigation of rivers, but I claim, that it should be extended to the navigation of all navigable waters within the limits of the Commonwealth. There cannot be any reason of justice why they should be limited to rivers which only concern two or three states. If every navigable river is to be treated alike, and to be under the same law, then let that law apply to its fullest capacity; and subject to the necessary result of the interpretation of the question of what is a navigable stream at a particular time, let all this be a matter which shall go to a tribunal far better than the Commonwealth Parliament or the Parliament of a state—because either of these may be parties to a dispute—the tribunal which alone is not a party to the dispute—the Federal High Court.

Mr. LYNE. -
    Would not that mean handing over the whole thing?

Mr. BARTON. -
    It would mean handing over the navigation of the rivers, so far as they are navigable. To that extent I am prepared to go. In giving a power to regulate trade and commerce, you are giving a power to regulate navigation.

Mr. GLYNN. -
    Have you defined navigability?

Mr. BARTON. -
    I have endeavoured to show how far it is defined by the extracts I have read. They show that a stream, not only which is capable, but which is susceptible, of navigation is a navigable river within the meaning of the power to regulate trade and commerce.

Mr. DOBSON. -
    Or that joins with other rivers?

Mr. BARTON. -
    Yes. When I come to the other question of irrigation, I come, notwithstanding my desire to be absolutely conciliatory, to a point which I, as representing New South Wales, cannot afford to concede. As I have said, I would vote against every sub-section which did not give a right to the Commonwealth over all navigable streams. There must be no singling out of New South Wales rivers or of Victorian and New South Wales rivers, or of South Australian and New South Wales rivers. I should, therefore, vote against any proposition which did not concede the whole right of navigation. But such a proposition is unnecessary, because the point is bodily conceded already. I must say, on the question of irrigation, that I regard that as a provincial right.

Mr. HOLDER. -
    So it is, but inter-state riparian rights is another question.

Mr. BARTON. -
    There are no such things as between two states when one has a legal right and has not consented to surrender or restrict it in any way by convention or agreement. Any actual right of a state to the waters which flow through its territory cannot be voted away from it excepting by its own consent, and therefore in the absence of an agreement it is beyond contest that the legal right remains. Mr. Holder said-"We have a right which would be recognised by the Imperial Government" I do not think South Australia has such a right, and more than that, if my memory is not at fault, I have an indistinct idea that some ten or eleven years ago a reference was made from South Australia. There was an appeal by correspondence, and they were told that the Imperial Government could not interfere. I do not wonder then that Mr. Reid asked Mr. Holder how much he would take in cash for the right. If that has been the experience, I do not suppose the thing would be worth much if it were put up at auction or offered for sale in any other way. But then we are told that there is a moral right. I cannot concede that there is a moral right. Take the case a little further, and suppose that Queensland were engaged in the Convention. Queensland has within her territory a large quantity of the headwaters of the Darling which she is entitled to use. How should we stand if, in a Convention like this, Queensland being represented, we set up against Queensland the same claim that South Australia sets up against us?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It would be very just.

[Page 414] starts here

Mr. BARTON. -

It might be very just for a man to ask another for a portion of his means, but the other would be entitled to retain what he had got. It might be just to ask it, and if the other man were afflicted with a peculiar benevolence, he might grant it. But who gave us a right to come here and be benevolent? We were elected to represent New South Wales, and not to give away a part of the patrimony of New South Wales.

Mr. HOWE. -

To be just?

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, in a way which recognises all legal rights as sacred. If you are going to base the Constitution upon a kind of justice which would mean simply generosity to South Australia it would be very exceptional in its character.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Supposing that Queensland held back all her water?

Mr. BARTON. -

If she did we should negotiate with her, but we were not sent here to negotiate about our provincial rights. We were sent here to federalize those things which are in their essence federal. The application of the water to the land that is in our own territory is a provincial right, and we have no authority to make it the subject of any federal legislation. Let us endeavour to arrive at a reasonable adjustment. Why not, instead of South Australia claiming to have not only the navigability of some of these rivers, which would be readily conceded, but also the use of the water, make an adjustment which is within every ratio of law, and which is in consonance with federal rights? Let the power of navigation go to its full extent, as under the provision relating to trade and commerce, but let that which is purely provincial—the application of your own water to your land—be left outside the compact.

Mr. LYNE. -

How would that affect the water in the tributaries?

Mr. BARTON. -

It might enable the Federation at some points to build up the banks so as to improve the channel. It would permit of the stopping, not of the whole stream, but of one or two or several channels in order that the others might be made stronger. Whether it would include a power to prevent the diminution of the water in any tributary is another matter. I take it—and I want to be perfectly frank—that the power of the Commonwealth to keep up navigation would be limited by the extent of the legislation which it enacted itself. It would have no power to do anything under this provision unless it passed an Act, and it would be limited by that Act. Whether, it would give a power to prevent the diminution of the flow of a tributary is a difficult question. That brings me back to the real argument, which is that it is for the Federal Court to decide to what extent the legislation of the Commonwealth is within the powers of the Constitution, and questions of that kind can only be decided upon the passage of an Act of Parliament.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Is it not clear that, the navigation of the Darling not being continuous, that river would not be affected by the provision in sub-section (1)?

Mr. BARTON. -

No. I do not think "continuous" means continuous in point of time; it means continuous by way of course. It is a word which applies to the course of the river, and not to the period during which it flows. I wish to define the position which I occupy with regard to this question. I may be going further than some of my colleagues wish to go.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will the honorable and learned member clear up a doubt which is in my mind? Does he take up this position-that for the purpose of maintaining, and, if necessary, of improving the navigability of rivers, he agrees that the Federal Parliament shall have power to use the waters of the Darling, even though this use may deprive New South Wales of some of the water for irrigation purposes?

Mr. BARTON. -

I agree that the federal authorities should have power to use the water to enable them to keep up the navigability which they find, and to improve it to the extent which is laid down in the cases to which I have referred. That may involve some detraction from the use of the water for navigation purposes, but to that extent I must go, or else I should not be honest in the matter of federation. I want to leave the whole question of navigation to the laws of the Federal Parliament, and I wish to see these laws, when they exceed the rights of the Commonwealth, decided upon by the Federal High Court. I think the only way to secure that is to strike out the sub-section. We want in this Constitution to secure inter-colonial free-trade. We all admit that there can be no federation without inter-colonial free-trade, that federation is idle unless between state and state there is absolute freedom of commerce and intercourse. We propose with respect to the railways-and I hope we shall carry out the proposal-to constitute an Inter-State Commission, which will also have certain powers with regard to rivers. All the powers of the Inter-State Commission will be summed up in the maintenance of the trade and commerce clauses of the Constitution. It is plain that in dealing in this way with the railways, we wish to provide that they shall be managed so that there shall not be any such preferential rates as will amount to the infringement of the freedom of inter-colonial trade. If we place the rivers under the same commission, ought we not to leave this provision in its widest state, so that in connexion with the clauses which apply to the Inter-State Commission we may be sure that, whether we are dealing with railways or with rivers, entire freedom of trade between the colonies shall be preserved? If that is so, and if it is incident to the freedom of trade that the channels of trade should be kept free-which it must be-must it not be clearly the right of the federal power to control navigation?

Going as far as I do in this matter, I feel impelled to assert what is the other side of the question, the other part of the contention. I do not anticipate danger from the fact that there will be one authority—the federal authority—which will control navigation, and another authority—the state authority—which will control irrigation, because when there is any conflict between these authorities the Supreme Court will settle it quickly and finally. In this respect I have no fear. But the claim that it is not just for New South Wales, not to take more than her share, as it is called, of the waters of the rivers which flow through her territory, but to deal with them as she pleases, is a proposition to which I cannot assent, and that is why I think it is desirable that this provision dealing with trade and commerce should be accepted with all its consequences, and in its full concession to the federal power. But to propose that anything should be done beyond the adoption of such a provision is to interfere with the rights of the state which I represent, and which I have no authority to give up.

Sir George Turner. -
Do they ask you to go beyond that?

Mr. Barton. -
Yes. If South Australia will consent to the striking out of this sub-section, and to the throwing out of any sub-section except that dealing with trade and commerce, upon which the decisions are undeniable and amply extensive, I shall be content with that solution of the difficulty; but the moment the representatives of that colony set up a claim to the use of the waters of these rivers, I shall oppose it, because I have not received the permission of the electors to give up their rights.

Sir George Turner. -
Can you not put the effect of these decisions into the Bill, so as to satisfy the representatives of South Australia?

Mr. Barton. -
The effect of these decisions is to explain the meaning of the words "trade and commerce," which are identical in both Constitutions, and the best thing to do is to repeat the words. Where a phrase has been expounded and made clear by decisions upon principle, the best way to obtain the benefit of those decisions is to adopt that phrase.

Mr. Gordon. -
Our courts would not be bound by American decisions.

Mr. Barton. -
No; but it would be impossible for them to be bound by the English decisions in regard to the navigability of rivers. It is inconceivable that the High Court would deny the applicability of the American decisions. I think every lawyer will agree that the result of the decisions of the High Court would be palpable beforehand, and that the court would hold that the power to control navigation must go with the power to regulate trade and commerce.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The Judges might say that the rivers here were different from the American rivers, and therefore their decisions might differ from the American decisions.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think that would be said, because the Judges would be shut up to one of two courses; they would have to follow either the American or the English decisions. It is inconceivable that the English decisions, under which rivers are considered navigable only so far as the influence of the tide is felt, would be considered to apply here. The evidence would make such a decision impossible.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The decision would be upon an English Act of Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes; but the conditions would make the American decisions much more applicable than the English decisions ever can be.

Mr. GORDON. -

The difficulty is whether or not those American decisions could be applied to the Darling.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is what I am pointing out. The court would have either to limit the definition to the extent of the tidal ebb and flow, or extend it to the susceptibilities to navigation. There can be no question as to what they would do in the case of rivers like ours. What I suggest is that there is a course open to this Convention which would be just, effective, and not aggressive. It is just, because it puts the matter into the hands of the highest tribunal we are constituting; it is effective, because the decisions show how enormous, and yet how right and federal, the power is that I suggest should be given. It is not aggressive, because it does not touch the right of any state except those rights which we claim here to federalize, that is to say, such matters as trade and commerce; it treats all the rivers alike as between the states.

Surely, therefore, it is the best proposition yet put forward. It sends the matter to the best arbiter, the best tribunal we have—our own High Court, which we have decided is the best—and is it not better that, instead of having conflicts between states, instead of having discourteous correspondence, there should be a means created whereby, if you adopt this course, there will be a constitutional mode of settling such questions beyond all doubt, and for all time? I recommend this decision to the Convention, because it means going much further on the question of navigation than New South Wales has ever offered to go before, but not further than the interests of the federal power require. I recommend it because it conserves to New South Wales those matters which belong to her as a province, and which the federal power should not require from her, because they are not parts of the federation. This is the true solution of the difficulty, and if we can by this means enable the proceedings of the Convention to go on to their proper close, we shall do a great benefit to the whole of Australia.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I desire to make some observations upon this question, but I feel that at this late hour it is undesirable for me to do so.

Mr. BARTON. -

I will move that the Chairman report progress.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Perhaps I may be permitted to say, with regard to the observations of the leader of the Convention, that I understand it is the desire of South Australia to make sure that the decisions referred to will apply here, and, with that view, to try to put some words actually into the Constitution—I think we have come very near to each other now—which will carry that out. To-morrow I shall suggest for the consideration of the Convention, some words which I have here in print, which will be circulated, and which, while perfectly fair, will even insure to New South Wales as good, perhaps better, conditions as regards her own powers over the water than she would have under those decisions. Of course, these words are subject to modification. They are only to be proposed with a view to insert a principle, and to make sure that certain points mentioned in the course of the debate will be definitely settled.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Where would they come in? Read them.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They would form one of the powers of Parliament in sub-section (31) of clause 52. My amendment reads as follows:-

The navigability of rivers which by themselves or in connexion with other rivers are in fact permanently or intermittently navigable for trade and commerce with other countries or among the several states. But so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation to such extent as in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission is not unjust or unreasonable, having regard to the needs and requirements of any other state for such purposes.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to.
Progress was then reported.
The Convention adjourned at five minutes to five o'clock.
Wednesday, 2nd February 1898.

Finance Committee - Commonwealth of Australia Bill - Western Australian Statistics.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I should like to know when we are likely to obtain the report of the Finance Committee? The time is going on, and I do not want the question of finance to be left over until the last few days of the Convention and then hurried through. It is a very important question, and if it is possible to obtain the committee's report now, the Convention should have it. If we cannot get it at present it should be made available as soon as possible.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

All I can say is that the Finance Committee have come to a conclusion; but at a conference between the chairman of that committee and the chairman of the Drafting Committee it appeared that there were one or two questions which had arisen incidentally, and on which further instructions would be necessary. The opinion of the Finance Committee was taken, and from the information given to the Drafting Committee it seemed that the matter had given rise to some further questions, which would have to be settled. Honorable members will understand how difficult it is to give precise instructions to the Drafting Committee, and how one question leads to another. The Finance Committee will have to hold another meeting, and then their instructions to the Drafting Committee will be completed, and the clauses will be drawn.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on sub-section (31) of clause 52 (Powers of Parliament), which was as follows:-

The control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I beg to move-

That the sub-section be omitted, and that the following be inserted in lieu thereof:-

The navigability of rivers which by themselves or in connexion with other rivers are in fact permanently or intermittently navigable for trade and commerce with other countries or among the several states. But so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation to such extent as in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission is not unjust or unreasonable, having regard to the needs and requirements of any other state for such purposes.

I perceive with a considerable amount of pleasure and satisfaction what seems to me to be an approach between the representatives of South Australia and the representatives of New South Wales, in regard to this very difficult and important question. When the discussion was first opened by my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) in his very able speech, and he was answered by some of the honorable members from New South Wales, it appeared that the distance between them was very great indeed. The claims of South Australia were made to rest on grounds that I should find it very difficult to support to their full extent. I must also say that the answer given by New South Wales seemed to be altogether too uncompromising. I believe I am correct in stating that there are now indications of a considerable abatement on both sides of the position originally taken up. But I am not quite clear even now as to the extent to which this approach has been made. At the first it appeared that we from the other colonies would have to take up the very unenviable position of arbitrators between altogether unwilling disputants, but I believe, and I hope, that in the end we may be able practically without any real difficulty, and perhaps unanimously, to adopt some scheme—whether it is that which I have suggested, or some other—that will commend itself as being the best obtainable for both colonies. It would be very unfortunate if the Convention broke up with the feeling that the discussion of this matter had only eventuated in utter disappointment and soreness to both sides. I agree with those honorable members who deplore the possibility of there remaining any source or point of friction—continuous friction—and perhaps eventually ill-feeling, which would deepen as time went on, with regard to this question. It is important that we should deal with it now to some extent, and that we should do so in the light of experience. I think, therefore, that I shall be justified in bringing the teachings of experience a little more fully before the Convention than has hitherto been done, because the future of Australia may depend in a very large measure upon the course we adopt. I regard this as a federal question, and it is on this ground that I should hold with those who propose to deal with it here. I must say also that if it became necessary to decide on the point, I could not agree with Mr. Gordon and some others of my honorable friends from South Australia who rest the claim upon international law. Treating it as a matter between utterly independent States, I am not able to satisfy myself that there is any such thing as a right in the question. I can find no analogy. I have looked again at the various authorities, including the very excellent work of Mr. Hall, to which Mr. Gordon referred. Mr. Hall, we know, was one of the first international lawyers of Europe, and his death has left a gap that it will not be easy to fill. He is most distinct in his opinion that no such right exists. It only applies to navigation at the best-to the free right of navigation. But even as regards that point he rests it purely on convention, and not by any means upon international law. He is followed in that view by another recent international lawyer, Dr. Walker, of Peterhouse College, Cambridge, and a few words from his work will convey, very shortly, but clearly, what I believe to be the result of the later international law. On page 37 of his Manual of Public International Law, 1895, he says-

These various Acts-
That is, treaties and negotiations.

render clear the fact, to which the remarks of the Russian, Austro-Hungarian, and German representatives at the Conference of Berlin were calculated to draw attention, that, although-the doctrine of the freedom of navigation of great rivers has advanced in general favour, the new order has arisen by virtue of particular treaty entered into by the interested nations, not by the outright recognition of a general law, and the right of riparian states to regulate the traffic has been, in each instance, formally acknowledged. In no case have we witnessed a recognition of any natural right such as that which the United States, in harmony with her earlier Mississippi experiences, asserted in the navigation of the St. Lawrence in 1824.

At the conference held in Berlin in 1885, in relation to the African rivers the Congo and the Niger, although Count Bismarck did assert that the expectation of the states to have free navigation through the territories of other riparian states had passed into the domain of public law, his view was dissented from by every other representative present. We may take it that there is no such right. There is undoubtedly what has been properly called an increasing and more enlightened policy of permission on the part of states through which rivers pass. There is a disposition on the part of those states, for their own benefit, as well as for comity with other nations, to permit of free navigation through their territory, not only of the rivers, but also now of some of their tributaries.

Mr. BARTON. -
That is navigation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes. It is subject to the consent of the nations, and it is limited purely to navigation, and I may say that, even as regards navigation, the somewhat freer permission that was granted in regard to the Elbe and another river by the Congress of Vienna in 1815 has been departed from, and the rule made more rigid, by an arrangement under which vessels have to pay customs dues at every frontier they pass on the river. So far as this claim is based upon international law or natural right it has never been admitted. In one instance it was asserted, as a matter of inherent necessity and of natural right, by the United States, in regard to the Mississippi, in relation to Spain. It was also asserted in connexion with the St Lawrence, but Great Britain never admitted it, and when, in 1854, she entered into a treaty with the United States to permit free navigation she expressly stipulated that she could withdraw that permission whenever she chose. It was only in 1871, when the Geneva arbitration claims arose, that Great Britain, taking that noble stand she has taken on many occasions of offering peace to the world, while standing firm when occasion demanded, agreed to allow for ever the free navigation of the St. Lawrence to the people of the United States. Great Britain then obtained a corresponding right with regard to the Yukon, the Stikine, and the Porcupine Rivers, now celebrated in connexion with Alaska. These were mutual concessions.

Mr. BARTON. -

All you can say to another nation is-'Will not you come to some agreement?'

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, and the mutual concessions in this case were limited absolutely to navigation. I do not think any one could put his hand upon any treaty which goes beyond that. Passing from the question of international law, my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) touched upon a point which I think invites the deepest attention of the Convention from another aspect. It had relation to what is called the new law of riparian rights in the and area of America. I believe that this matter has hitherto received an all too limited notice. The question is one which offers for us the most interesting consideration, and, as a Convention of representatives of all Australia, we ought to pay the most careful attention to the experiences, more especially of late years, of that important region. This question is so important that, in the opinion of many of the greatest statesmen of the United States, it is threatening to produce a peaceful revolution of their institutions. It has already overturned many cherished ideas, it has absolutely reversed the British common law of riparian rights, and, at the present time, it is setting up a series of problems which America has yet to face. The pamphlet of one of her most noted writers is causing a demand in some quarters for a revision of the Constitution.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

In California alone the introduction of this principle of the British common law into their Constitution cost them tens of millions of dollars.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; but that has been altered. The United States is almost equally divided by the 100th meridian of latitude. The population of the whole territory is about 70,000,000 people, of whom about 64,000,000 live to the east of the 100th meridian, while the remainder live to the west of it. In what are known as the eastern states, we have all the civilization of Europe. We have the institutions that we know in British communities—the laws, generally speaking to which we are accustomed. All the great problems of our civilization are there. We have great cities with their social difficulties, just as they exist in the British Islands, and the conditions are becoming still more like those of the British Islands every day. On the west of the 100th meridian a wholly new organization of society has appeared. It is true the climate is varied and attractive, that they have every range of physical condition from Montana on the north to New Mexico on the south, and from Nebraska on the east to California on the west. But prolific as the soil is, diversified as the climate is, great as are their opportunities in many respects, in this one particular they are severed from the civilization of the east. The region is arid; it is rainless.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Relatively.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is practically rainless; it is a desert. People cannot live thereat least they cannot thrive there under the conditions which prevail in the eastern states. The difference in population bears witness to very fact. Some years ago an attempt was made, and with success, to alter these conditions. In the west there are some seventeen states, containing 800,000,000 acres of arable land, from 10,000,000 to 20,000,000 acres of which have been reclaimed and turned from a parched desert into prolific arid smiling gardens.

[P.421] starts here

Mr. SYMON. -

The land has been made to blossom as the rose.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes. Horticulture, agriculture, and pastoral pursuits are being followed with a greater or less degree of success. This country contains the territory to which my honorable and learned friend referred the other day, that through which the Rio Grande and its tributary the Pecos flow. I am not going to refer to the great work which has been done by the use of artesian water in that district; I wish to confine my remarks more particularly to the irrigation which has been carried out from the rivers. Under the common law of England, as we know it, the riparian owner lower down the stream has a right to have the flow of water above undiminished to any appreciable degree. The upper owner must not pollute, he must not obstruct, and he must not sensibly diminish the flow of water. In 1848, when gold discoveries first began to attract attention in California, the miners wanted water to work their claims, but they found that the exigencies of the situation prevented them from carrying on their work and developing the resources of the country if they adhered rigidly to the English common law affecting riparian rights. They therefore set up their own customs, and taking water from the rivers they did not return it to them. Cases were brought into the courts, and the courts immediately said-"We cannot be bound by the customs and the common law of England in this respect, because our circumstances are wholly different from those of England. In England the climate is moist, and is well supplied with water, in fact it is to a great extent over supplied with water. The problem there is, not how to get water, but how to get rid of it-how to drain the land. We know that Drainage Acts have been passed there, and commissions have been appointed to inquire into the best means of dealing with this difficulty. But when we come to California the circumstances are wholly reversed. The problem here is how to get water, how to conserve it, and how to conduct it on to the land." They, therefore, held that the miners were entitled to use the water of the rivers irrespective of the claims of those below.

Mr. GLYNN. -
As against men who did not want to use the water lower down.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The law of riparian rights there is that the first man to appropriate the water has first claim to it.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Is that fixed by judicial decision or by statute?

Mr. ISAACS. -
It has been fixed in every way. It was first fixed by the recognised customs of the miners; it was then acknowledged by the judicial decisions of the state courts. It has also been acknowledged by the legislation of the various states, by the legislation of the United States, and by the Supreme Court of the United States. In every possible way has this new law of and America, which is the only law which would have led to its conquest-to use an expression employed the other day-been acknowledged.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Does it not apply to mining only?

Mr. ISAACS. -

No.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

It first applied to mining.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In California it arose out of the requirements of the miners, and the course pursued by the courts of California was followed by the courts of other states; and a law based upon the inherent necessity of the situation has been adopted throughout, I believe, the whole of the arid regions of America, viz., the western states.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

But this is not the law of America.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is a law which has application not only to mining, but which it has been found necessary to apply to milling, to manufacturing, to horticulture, and to agriculture. Without it the great region of which I am speaking would be uninhabitable, and one-half of the United States would be incapable of development. It has been said-and the saying is one which may be repeated, because of its applicability to a great part of Australia-by a man who is called a genius in regard to these matters-that irrigation is not a substitute for rain, but that rain is a substitute, and a mighty poor one, for irrigation. What has irrigation done for the western states of America? It has not only made occupation and development possible, but it gives certainty of production.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

What has all this to do with the question we are discussing?

Mr. LYNE. -

The honorable and learned member is arguing in favour of the position taken up by New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Irrigation in these states has given certainty to the operations of the farmers, the agriculturists, and the horticulturists.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The law that the honorable and learned member speaks of seems to me very much like the right of the first robber.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The reason why I am referring to this matter so closely is that I am in favour of putting irrigation before navigation. I think that the Convention should support the view that irrigation has a prior claim to navigation, so far as the rivers of this country are concerned.

Mr. LYNE. -

The honorable and learned member has not made that claim.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; I think I have.

Mr. SYMON. -

We are all agreed as to the general principle, but there are exceptions.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I want to point out why in the amendment I have proposed I have placed irrigation before navigation.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

The diggers in this colony have been doing it for the last 40 years.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The position is simply this—I believe that the future of Australia may depend very much upon the attitude that we take up in regard to this matter. If we place the navigation of the Murray and of the Darling before irrigation we may be doing a great wrong against the future development of the continent. We do not know to what extent the water may be required for irrigation. We can make railways and roads, but we cannot make rivers. We can, however, improve the rivers that we have, and I, therefore, want to make a change if I can from the view taken in the United States Constitution, which places navigation first and leaves irrigation to the states to do as they please about it. I should like to point out, especially to those of my honorable friends who have asked me how these facts apply, that the law of first appropriation has been found a necessary one to adopt, but it has been modified to some extent. The way in which it has been modified in California of later years is this: Where there are several persons who have rights of irrigation, or to the user of water for other purposes, it has been laid down that the use must be reasonable as between themselves.

Mr. GORDON. -

Hear, hear; that is the principle.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In the case of Harris v. Harrison, 93 California, 676, it was decided by the Supreme Court of California that the common law right of riparian ownership which prevails in British communities has been modified and enlarged, so as to secure reasonable user, and that the reasonableness of the user depends wholly upon the facts. In this particular case, both the plaintiff and the defendant required the use of the water to-the extent of the full power of the stream, and the court said, as the courts have said in other cases-"We must apportion these rights relatively, and the only way we can do so in this case is to say that, at certain times, the plaintiff shall use the whole force of the water, and at other times the defendant." In other cases these reasonable rights have been adjusted, not by time, but by quantity; but in all cases in later years, so far as I have been able to discover, and as late as 1895, the courts have set themselves to secure a reasonable and proportionate use of the water.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

What courts does the honorable and learned member refer to-they state courts or the Federal Courts?

Mr. ISAACS. -

The state courts. I may point out that the new law of which I am speaking-the western states law-has been recognised in the United States courts, and I may mention the name of a case in which it is so recognised-Jennison v. Kirk, 98, United States, 453.

Mr. BARTON. -

These irrigation laws of the states are, of course, untouched by the Constitution; they are upheld.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Of course they are upheld, but the United States law has, by various alterations, commencing in 1886 and coming down as late as 1890, recognised this right of prior appropriation. I do not want to dwell any longer on this point than is necessary, but I want to urge that the new law has been recognised, and that its reasonable exercise has been recognised. Now, how does that apply here? If we merely strike out sub-section (31) and leave the court to exercise its jurisdiction upon the first sub-section of clause 52, it means undoubtedly that navigation is to be the prior consideration, and it means more than that, as far as I can judge, because it means that as long as a state-say, New South Wales-leaves sufficient water for the navigation of the river, it may use all the surplus water for irrigation of its own lands without regard to the claims of South Australia. I do not think that was intended by my honorable friends from New South Wales, but it would, I believe, have that effect. I am not afraid of putting in a special clause to carry out what I believe to be our intention. We have already limited sub-section (1) in a way in which it is not limited in the United States, by making special references to customs and excise, navigation and shipping; and I would say to the leader of the Convention that we ought not to be afraid to put in another clause with a view to making this matter definite and certain. "Navigation and shipping" is taken from the Canadian Act. It is specially mentioned there besides trade and commerce, but the Canadian Act provides, in the first place, that the Dominion Parliament may legislate in all cases whatsoever, and then, without prejudice to the generality of that power, it goes on to enumerate certain other matters, so that I do not think that the mere adding another clause, specifying the power, would in any degree depart from the course we have already adopted. Now, I should like to say this that I would not have urged another suggestion if I could have found, in any of the proposals previously made, something that would have met my view altogether. Mr. Symon's suggestion comes nearest to it, but I think that that suggestion would leave New South Wales just as it is. I think it would leave New South Wales with the power to take all the water that it requires for irrigation, irrespective not only of the claims of South Australia for irrigation, but also of the claims of South Australia as regards navigation.
Mr. LYNE. -
And you want to take that power away, I suppose.
Mr. SYMON. -
I do not think my amendment will do that.
Mr. ISAACS. -
I would like my honorable friend to consider his suggestion from that point of view. What I think is fair is this—we should vest in the Commonwealth the navigability of these rivers.
Mr. REID. -
What does the word navigability mean?
Mr. ISAACS. -
I should say that it means everything connected with the navigability of the rivers, as we ordinarily understand the word.
Mr. REID. -
That shows how vague the term is.
Mr. ISAACS. -
It means everything connected with the maintenance of the navigability of the rivers—their improvement and control.
Mr. LYNE. -
And of the tributaries?
Mr. ISAACS. -

No, only rivers that are themselves highways of commerce for inter-state intercourse.

Mr. LYNE. -

How about the tributaries that carry volumes of water into the main river?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not propose to touch them.

Mr. LYNE. -

But the navigability of the rivers depends on those tributaries.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then it would give the control of them which the Federation has under the first sub-section of clause 52; it would make no change in that respect. But still, in intrusting the navigability of these rivers to the Federation we should place irrigation in the first position, and we should leave each state to exercise its own will even independently of navigation, so far as regards conservation and irrigation, and limited only by one consideration, namely, the corresponding requirements and rights of other states.

Mr. LYNE. -

That is no consideration for New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Well, now, I am sorry to hear that. The honorable member will see that the rights of New South Wales will be preserved-the powers of New South Wales, for I think the word powers should be used instead of rights in the honorable member's meaning. New South Wales has an enormous territory covered by these waters, compared with South Australia. We are told that she has nearly 150,000,000 acres which would be served in a greater or less degree by the River Darling and its tributaries, whereas South Australia has, at the most, 500,000 acres that could possibly be irrigated by these waters, and if we take those figures into consideration-showing, as they do, that New South Wales will have a claim on these waters about three times as great, as far as extent and quantity go, as South Australia-I think the honorable member will see that New South Wales is giving up very little indeed.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is not the case, though; you are talking of two different things.

Mr. LYNE. -

And we are told that we cannot exercise that right or power of irrigation without the consent of the other states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The honorable member is mistaken, and he will see, on reflection, that I am endeavouring to support the rights of New South Wales, so far as they are consistent with the rights of South Australia. I admit that New South Wales should have, and has, a right over irrigation and conservation. That is antecedent to the right of navigation. I believe that, as in the states of America, the settlement of the land—the development of its productive power—should be the first consideration; but I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that South Australia has an equal right to that consideration, and all I claim is, while putting irrigation and conservation in the first rank as regards its position relatively with navigation, I think we ought not to shut out the claims of South Australia, which, I believe, are legitimately made in this respect. Why should South Australia be left with a dry channel?

Mr. BARTON. -
She never is.

Mr. ISAACS. -
She might be, as far as irrigation is concerned. As far as navigation is concerned, she would have the power to navigate.

Mr. LYNE. -
And we have given to the Federal Government the right to a better river than South Australia has now, by water conservation at the head of the Murray.

Mr. ISAACS. -
When the honorable member urges that this is a matter entirely between the two states, and not a federal question, I wonder if he will adopt that ground of argument on the question of railway rates to the Riverina province? Will he say that that is a federal or is not a federal question? And if he is told that Victoria can do anything she likes on her own railways in the way of attracting trade from Riverina, will he say—"I acknowledge that"?

Mr. REID. -
I take up that position.

Mr. LYNE. -
So do I.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It is not the position that has been taken up hitherto.

Mr. LYNE. -
You should not carry your special railway rates into New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS. -
We do not enter New South Wales one bit; we simply remain on our own ground, and say, with regard to certain persons and certain goods that are sent there, we will carry their goods at a certain rate. We have a perfect right to do that, and when the representatives of New South Wales say they are going to have that altered, are they not interfering with Victorian rights in the same way as they are now talking of New South Wales rights being interfered with?

Mr. Reid. -

I have never asked for any such power over the Victorian railways. We can deal with them ourselves.

Mr. Isaacs. -

We will see what the representatives of New South Wales will do, when we come to the sub-section relating to the railways, about putting them on the same basis. I think the railways should be dealt with on a federal basis, and that it would be a most unfederal action to refuse to have them dealt with on a federal basis. But the question of this water is in exactly the same position. We are willing to let the free course of trade prevail between the various colonies, as regards the railways, and we want the natural course of water to run unimpeded.

Mr. Reid. -

There is a difference between water and trade.

Mr. Isaacs. -

Well, I cannot sever the two in considering this question. The honorable member has heard the leader of the Convention state the law most distinctly-law which has been followed down to as late as 1896 in the United States in Gibson's case that the question of this commerce and trade is inseparably bound up with the navigation of the rivers. Now, if that is so, how do the representatives-of New South Wales draw a distinction between rivers as a highway for commerce and railways as a highway for commerce? I see no distinction as far as this question is concerned.

Sir William Zeal. -

The one is naturally made and the other is artificially made.

Mr. Isaacs. -

Well, that distinction is certainly artificial. But I urge on my honorable friends who base their claim on the ground that what concerns two colonies directly, and only two colonies, is not a federal matter, to remember that argument when they come to deal with the question of the railways. I can quite understand their position, and I think it is a legitimate ground to take, and I sympathize with my honorable friends from New South Wales when they take up this ground, that what they claim is so vitally important to New South Wales that they are not justified in giving it up even for the sake of federation. I can understand that grounds which is solid ground-ground that we cannot approach, ground that we cannot contradict-if New South Wales, which has free power to say "Yes" or "No" to federation when this Constitution is framed, thinks that she is paying too high a price for federation. But that is another question. It is not the same question as saying that this subject is not a federal matter. To my mind it is a federal matter, but I admit that we cannot get anything into this Constitution—anything federal or otherwise without the assent of each state so far as that state is concerned. New South Wales has a perfect right, in that sense, to stand outside this Constitution, and say—"No; if this Convention insists upon that as a condition of federation, New South Wales will have none of it."

Mr. LYNE. -

Is it a good thing to risk that?

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is for my honorable friends from South Australia to say whether they will take the risk, but if the question is put fairly and squarely to the Convention, I feel bound to say that the solution I have suggested, which is to a large extent what has been suggested more or less definitely before, is such a solution as I shall feel compelled to vote for, because if we are obliged to take up a position which none of us desire to hold—the position of arbiters in this matter—we must simply vote as best we can to preserve our chance of securing federation, and, at the same time, not inflict an injustice on any one state. Now, I have put this proposal before honorable members, and I should just like to point out how it operates. The first portion of it gives to the Federation the navigability of rivers which by themselves, or in connexion with other rivers, are in fact permanently or intermittently navigable for trade and commerce among the several states. That would include the Murray and also the Darling, because the Murray by itself, and the Darling in connexion with the Murray, would be permanently or intermittently navigable for trade and commerce among the several states. If it stopped there, I should say it would bear out the construction which the leader of the Convention put yesterday. I think it would amount to nothing more or less than a proposal entirely within the first subsection of clause 52.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

But making it clearer.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not know that it makes it clearer except for this, that we do not know whether our courts will take the same view; we cannot predicate that. We have British courts here, and a certain line of decisions, and we are not sure that our courts will follow the course adopted in the United States.
Mr. LYNE. -
    If we are prepared to put up with such a risk as that, don't you think that the others should also be prepared to take a risk?
Mr. KINGSTON. -
    Why risk anything?
Mr. LYNE. -
    Why risk anything which South Australia wants? You are ready to risk everything which New South Wales wants.
Mr. ISAACS. -
    I do not say that you should take any risk at all. The worst which can happen to you is that the courts should not follow that line of decisions, and if they did follow that line of decisions, it would be all the better for
    New South Wales.
Dr. COCKBURN. -
    Have we not taken it out of the purview of the courts by vesting it in the Inter-State Commission?
Mr. BARTON. -
    The difficulty I find, Mr. Isaacs, is that if you carry a sub-section like the first part of your proposal it may have a very considerable effect on the legal construction of the trade and commerce sub-section afterwards in other particulars.
    . - That is the real danger.
Mr. ISAACS. -
    I have been looking at that, but the same danger applies to the provision relating to customs and excise, because they are included in the first subsection, too.
Mr. BARTON. -
    Very slightly. In the American Constitution there is the provision to lay and collect taxes, but here, as in Canada, we are splitting it in two-putting the power to impose customs and excise in one sub-section, and the power to raise money by any other mode or system of taxation in another.
Mr. ISAACS. -
    My honorable friend is right, and, if my recollection is right, it agrees with his recollection as regards Canada. But there is this important distinction in the Canadian Act. It gives absolute powers, and then it goes on to specify certain particulars, but says that they are not to prejudice the generality of the main object of the clause.
Mr. BARTON. -
    That is true.
Mr. ISAACS. -
    That makes all the difference. You may strike out every one of the particularized subjects in the Canadian provision and still have them there by virtue of the general words, but we are not doing that. We are following the United States precedent of enumerating the powers. Therefore, if you put in the trade and commerce power-

Mr. BARTON. -

It is all in one subsection in the Canadian Act.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The power to raise money by any other mode or system of taxation we have put in a separate paragraph in the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is practically the same as the United States provision to lay and collect taxes.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is a different subsection. The "regulation of trade and commerce" is the power under which the regulation of customs and excise between the states takes place, and that, therefore, would, in our Constitution, include any other sub-section relating to customs and excise; but we have taken the precaution to set it out specifically. Having done that, we therefore are departing from the principle of keeping everything in one sub-section.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

We have done that with navigation and shipping too.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am not sure that we have not done it with some other things; but, at all events, I do not think that that consideration ought to outweigh the desirability of meeting the views of South Australia in this respect, and putting, as far as we can, by a lot of decisions, express and explicit words into the Constitution which will satisfy the desires of a colony that regards this matter as of the highest importance.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

You can expressly declare that it shall not limit the effect of the general words.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, you can. Then my amendment goes on to provide that irrigation should take the first position, but so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation to such an extent as in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission-

Of course, you can substitute any other body you choose for the commission, and you can add words such as "any other body created for that purpose by the Federal Parliament." That expression is only put in as a suggestion. I am sure the Drafting Committee would carry out the views of this committee in that respect, as they have so kindly done in every other.

is not unjust or unreasonable, having regard to the needs and requirements of any other state for such purposes.

I understand that some honorable members have some difficulty about these last words. I would point out that unless these last words are put in South Australia will have no guarantee whatever, because it would mean that any State—that would be New South Wales in the first place—might take the waters to such an extent as would not, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, be unjust or unreasonable, having regard of course only to the question of navigation.

Mr. LYNE. -

Do you take away the whole power of New South Wales, and give it to the Inter-State Commission?

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friend either has not followed me—

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

You cannot satisfy him.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Very well.

Mr. LYNE. -

Why not take the whole thing at once?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then the last words are intended to protect the reasonable and proportionate rights of South Australia, and the position would be simply this: Directly this Constitution went into operation every state could take as much water as it pleased, for conservation and irrigation; New South Wales could take whatever she wanted, and if South Australia complained they would go before the Inter-State Commission, and that body would say whether New South Wales was taking more than her fair share. If New South Wales was not taking more than her fair share, having regard only to South Australia's needs for similar purposes, she would be uninterfered with, and the Federation itself could not come in and stop New South Wales from taking the water, simply on the ground that it was interfering with navigation.

Mr. SYMON. -

The last part of your amendment seems to disregard the needs and requirements of the state from which the water comes. Would it not be better to say "having regard to the needs and requirements" of all states.
interested?
Mr. ISAACS. -
That is a matter of wording. I am quite willing to adopt any verbal alteration; I am only trying to explain the principle of the amendment, but as to the wording of it, I am quite willing to fall in with the views of my honorable friend, if he thinks that any other form of words will better meet the idea I have endeavoured to interpret.
Mr. WISE. -
Has the honorable member considered how far his amendment will or will not confer rights to the tributaries to navigable streams?
Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not think it would go beyond the rivers which are in fact permanently or intermittently navigable.
Mr. LYNE. -
Did not you say that it would, where the flow was sufficient to stop the navigability?
Mr. ISAACS. -
No. I have said all along that there should be no such control over anything but the rivers which are in fact navigable.
Mr. OCONNOR. -
That is according to the honorable member's definition, which, of course, would include the Darling.
Mr. ISAACS. -
It would include the Murray and the Darling; it would include, of course, every river running to the coast.
Mr. BARTON. -
Is your construction of that that the waters of the tributaries could be taken by a state into which they ran, to any and every extent?
Mr. ISAACS. -
I think that the waters of the tributaries could be taken to any extent for the purposes of conservation and irrigation; subject, of course, to this, that the power to control navigation would come in.
Mr. REID. -
That is the whole difficulty. Will my learned friend allow me to put this point to him?
Mr. ISAACS. -
Certainly.
Mr. REID. -
On the Darling there are some irrigation schemes going on; the river is running low, and it is perfectly clear that if these irrigation schemes are continued it will cease to be navigable. Now, would not the Federal Parliament have the power of stopping these irrigation works in order to maintain the navigability of the Darling?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No, not under my amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -
It would have the power to legislate in such a way as to prevent that.

Mr. REID. -
Have you any objection to make that clearer, if there is any doubt about it?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No.

Mr. REID. -
I think I can suggest something which will make that clearer.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I shall be very glad to accept anything.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
That is what he does not want.

Mr. REID. -
If it is to be accepted, I shall endeavour to make it as clear as possible.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I thought I had made this, at all events, clear, that irrigation was to be the first consideration, and making it the first consideration I stated-and I wish to repeat that my intention is, and I hope the words I have put here embody that idea-that if New South Wales and South Australia and Victoria are in accord as to the quantity of water to be taken for irrigation by each respective state, the claims of the Federation over the navigability should be subordinate to the state claims. I think that will meet every reasonable demand on the part of the colonies. I hope some such scheme will be adopted. I think, as I said before, it is essential to the future development of Australia; and if that can be done by any form of words, I care not in what form, I shall be glad to give any such proposal my support.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
I should be very sorry, after the long debate on this very important question, to add to it anything which was not, absolutely necessary. I shall try, in the few remarks I intend to make, not to repeat any of the arguments which have been used. I have very carefully considered all the numerous amendments. I have also considered the latest amendment by my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs), and I listened with great pleasure, as far as I could understand it, to his very able speech, full of erudition and legal ability. But it seems to me that we are no nearer the question than we were when we started. After all, it is well for us to get at the facts of this case. It is well enough to wander over the universe, it is well enough to tell us the law of riparian rights, but it is to me a matter of such practical importance that I want to see the solid ground on which I am standing; I want to grasp absolutely the facts of the case and to hold them. Let us look at the case again. We have a stream called the Murray, and with regard to the navigation of that river and the use of its waters we are all more, or less agreed. The principal matter in contention now is the question of dealing with the Darling, and we have had some very profound arguments making an analogy between the personal right of individuals in one state, and urging that water is an antecedent right to that of navigation, it is absolutely necessary that, for the purposes of our state, the waters of that stream-running not for 100 or 200 miles, but for at least 1,500 miles, meandering through a large portion of our territory-should be kept inviolate. Now I come to the real part which is at issue. We have had a lot of amendments, all trying to get over an absolutely insuperable difficulty. With a great deal of refinement, the honorable member who has just sat down, in his speech (in which to me the issue was very largely clouded), said in one breath that he considers irrigation paramount; but he said in the next breath, that if you give the right of navigability, you must give the right on every stream and every tributary. There is no getting away from that. If the right of navigation is given to the Federal Parliament, which will be the paramount power on this continent, you must give by implication the right to impound the waters right throughout the whole system. There is no question about it. If we are to have clear definitions in this Constitution, what is the good of introducing any one of these different proposals, which, after all, leave the matter as it was before; not merely leaves it as it was before, but practically by implication gives over the whole of the rights to the Federal Parliament. Now, we simply hold this, that in the first place, the Darling River is not the main body of the Murray River, which we have already agreed to give over to the Federal Parliament. We hold that it is essentially a

New South Wales stream in every respect, and that it is essential to the future development of New South Wales, without which navigation is of no use. We hold that that stream should be kept, if necessary, absolutely for our purposes. I was derided by some honorable members and by the press for saying that if you reduce the thing to an extreme argument we had an absolute right, under certain conditions of drought, to take every drop of water out of the Darling River. I say that anything placed in this Constitution which does not clearly and effectively give us that right gives us no right at all.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That will not be given to you.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Is there to be no friendly negotiations between the Federal Government under this Constitution and the states Governments? Is there to be no possibility, when any right seems to be impaired or any unfriendly act seems to be done, for the Federal Government to deal, by negotiation, with the states Governments? I have no doubt, myself, that in the years to come there will be large schemes to render navigable the Darling River, but when these schemes are propounded, interfering as they probably will with contracts of the state, interfering with the enormous expenditure by private individuals, there will have to be some quid pro quo given if the inherent rights of New South Wales are sacrificed for the benefit of the whole community. But before we know what we are doing and what these rights are—before we know what the conditions of irrigation and water conservation may be in the future—we are asked now absolutely to render it impossible for New South Wales to retain her own rights and assets. Now I come to the question of the first subsection of clause 52. With all due deference to my honorable friends who know more of the legal aspect of the question than I do, I say distinctly that if that carries with it the right to insure the navigability of the different rivers, and if that right carries with it the right to interfere with the Darling, then it is not sufficiently satisfactory for us. It is our sacred duty in this Convention, by every possible means, to prevent litigation in future. Mere litigation on matters which everybody allows remains with one power or the other, especially with the Commonwealth, is a matter of no importance, but it is very different in any matter which would create friction between the states, and perhaps paralyze federation at its very base, because you are dealing, if I may be allowed to say so, with the strongest and most populous, and, at any rate at present, the wealthiest colony of the group. Any danger arising out of any looseness of expression in this Constitution which would bring about friction between that great power New South Wales and the rest of the Commonwealth would be absolutely deplorable.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Is the power of the Commonwealth to be overlooked?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
There is no use my honorable friend saying that; I am only pleading for clear definitions. I am not going to threaten what New South Wales will do. Whatever we agree to by a majority in this Convention, I will try to get the Bill passed in my own colony. We have to frame the Bill, and things have to be determined ultimately by a vote. But I say it is a crime for us to attempt to leave any matter of such enormous importance without an absolutely clear and satisfactory definition.

Mr. LYNE. -

It will be very difficult to get the Bill accepted without that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I think enough has been said now to show honorable members that we, the delegates of New South Wales, consider that this is one of the most vital matters. I believe, as far as I know, there is absolutely no discord in our ranks.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You will not go so far as the honorable members (Mr. Barton, Mr. O'Connor, and Mr. Wise). They all go further than you do.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

They do; but at the same time they may see more clearly than I do that there is no risk to these rights of New South Wales. But I do not see that clearly.

Mr. LYNE. -

Neither do I.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I am willing to be advised, and if there is any legal opinion which I would take it would be the opinion of those honorable members, including Mr. Higgins. But it does seem to me, weighing with my own common sense all the arguments which have been adduced, that it would be most deplorable after these interminable arguments for us to imagine that we had protected these rights and then when we went back to our colony to find that we had betrayed them. It is all very well to take opinions in this Convention, but these opinions will be sifted and sounded elsewhere. Although, perhaps, I would not be so responsible as some of my legal friends, still we are all responsible more or less. If I may appeal to my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs), I think that he will allow that he has practically failed to solve the problem. He has introduced one of the worst proposals that has yet been introduced.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Why?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Because it takes in the question of an Inter-State Commission, which is not before us at the present time.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
    It is in the Bill already.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
    But it may not be in the Bill when completed.

Mr. ISAACS. -
    I explained that you could alter these words to what you like, so as to create what kind of body you might like.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
    What I would point out is, that it makes no difference what sort of body you appoint if you merely erect a tribunal to decide an uncertain point. What we want is absolute certainty.

Mr. ISAACS. -
    Absolute control.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
    Absolute control of the River Darling from beginning to end, trusting to the State that it will be as reasonable and gracious in dealing with that great river as the Federal Parliament would be.

Mr. ISAACS. -
    Does the honorable member think that if political pressure were put on the New South Wales Government that they would leave a single drop of water for South Australia?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
    I am sorry to have to repeat myself, but I want to say again that, before ever the Federal Government can deal with this subject (and I think the honorable member will allow this), large questions will have arisen, probably, on that river, with regard to the conservation of water. Contracts will be made under the state Government, and there will be a network of interests and responsibilities which will have to be faced. The very fact that the state is absolutely in possession of the river now, that the first process of developing it for water conservation purposes will have gone on long before the Federation is formed, clearly shows it is an absolute state right which ought to be conserved. I do not believe that morally New South Wales would have the right to take all the water out of that river and attempt to interfere with the navigation of the Murray. Still, she must be herself the guide of what she does.

Mr. HOWE. -
    This is the federal spirit.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
    The federal spirit is right enough.

Mr. SYMON. -
It is federal water, not federal spirit.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Will you not embody a grave moral right like that in the Constitution?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I do not think we can embody a moral right in the Constitution, or give effect to resolutions of a moral character. I believe in being straightforward as to what we believe to be our rights in New South Wales. I want to bring the argument down to the simple issue that we have been contending for instead of having the debate unreasonably prolonged by elaborate legal dissertations upon riparian rights in other parts of the world, and upon conditions with which we have nothing to do. Therefore, it would be far better to leave the clause as it stands with the exception of the use of the waters. We have got a substantial concession now for federal purposes in the whole control of the Murray. I should like to see introduced into the present clause, some words similar to those suggested by the honorable member (Mr. Symon), that the Federal Parliament should not interfere unnecessarily with the proper use of the waters. I think, myself, it would be far better and save a great deal of time in this discussion, if we would simply stand by the clause as it was drafted in Adelaide, with the exception of a few words indicating the moral rights, as my honorable friend says, of the different owners of land in the states along the river.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That would make them legal rights immediately.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

What would moral rights be worth?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Nothing in Tasmania.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Here I think is where the clause is wrong. The essential idea of this clause is to give to the Federal Parliament the right to keep open the navigability of the rivers, but, besides, it says "the use of the waters." To my mind, the use of the waters would allow the Federal Parliament to interfere entirely with irrigation and the conservation of water. It seems to me that, if there is any sense in these words at all, they give an absolute control over irrigation and conservation of water. I think the clause might be drafted so that the Federation should only have that control for purposes of navigation. If the clause is passed with that exception, I believe that it will be satisfactory. There will be something definite about it. I consider we have made a great concession, and that it
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I shall endeavour not to offend against the wish of my friend (Mr. McMillan) by saying anything further in the way of legal dissertation on this question-

Mr. WISE. -
Very judicious of you.

Mr. SYMON. -
The law being so completely on our side, and having been so exhaustively expounded by Mr. Isaacs this morning, that it would be quite needless to enter upon any such further inquiry. But I may be permitted to say that I think that all of us have, during the discussion of the question, been filled with very grave anxiety in respect to it. The subject is one of the very gravest complexity, and I am afraid that the renewed debate which has taken place has not relieved us from that sense of complexity with which the discussion originated. In fact, looking at the circumstance that Mr. McMillan has suggested that there should be some other amendment introduced of a moral character

Mr. WISE. -
That was the expression used by Mr. Kingston.

Mr. SYMON. -
The phrase was adopted by Mr. McMillan; but if it be objectionable to describe the amendment desired as one of a moral character, I do not want to say immoral, but will call it not legal; and I think that if we open up a matter of that kind we shall occupy the time of this Convention with matters that would land us in still further entanglements, when we might be occupied with more substantial things. Now, I think this matter has occasioned more anxiety than would otherwise have been the case, because it is one that is so liable to be surrounded with prejudice and feeling. It is a question which may so very easily be made to assume a rather fictitious magnitude and importance. If there is one conclusion to be drawn, so far as the facts are concerned-into which I do not propose to enter, because they have been so completely dealt with by Mr. Carruthers and other speakers-it is that the matter of irrigation has been, at all events, brought very fully before the Convention.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
The Victorian details are erroneous.

Mr. SYMON. -
I do not express any opinion one ways or the other as to the facts, but I do not think that an inquiry or an investigation into these details at great length is necessary; and as to putting the blame for the withdrawal of the waters on the right or the wrong shoulders, that would not advance us one atom upon the discussion of this matter as a practical question. I may say also that I feel we have now reached a stage in this business when it is our duty to come to some settlement. We must settle it; and we are going to settle it, I believe, with the good-will of everybody concerned.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
As a cannibal settles a corpse.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Which is the cannibal, and which is the corpse?

Mr. SYMON. -
I will express a feeling which I am sure is the feeling of every representative of South Australia—that we sympathize with the position of New South Wales, and we feel (the more so, perhaps, in consequence of the emphatic statements of Mr. McMillan, who does not generally yield to that tendency, but who now speaks of going back to New South Wales and being held up to opprobrium as having sacrificed the interests of that colony) that this is a subject which may give occasion to the foes of federation in New South Wales to glory. You look at the map and you see a number of streams flowing from one end of that colony to the other, and you may have some agitator, who is desirous of inflaming feeling against the Constitution we are framing, saying Why, these people are going to despoil us of these rivers which have been flowing through our territory ever since New South Wales was a state." It is very easy to do that, and therefore I sympathize with my honorable friends who are so apprehensive. I do not seek to under-estimate their apprehension on that score at all.

Mr. LYNE. -
You would not if you represented New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON. -
I wish my honorable friend to believe that I am as anxious to put myself in the position of New South Wales upon this question as I am anxious that he shall put himself in the position of a South Australian. I look upon the matter with a desire to see impartial justice done, and if a sense of justice induces me to fall in with the view of New South Wales no man in this Convention will more readily do it. We are all striving, I believe, not so much to have our own way upon any particular measure as to see on which side justice lies. But, on the other hand, I ask the representatives of New South Wales to consider the position in which South Australia is placed, and how the foes of federation there may just as readily point the finger against us when we go back. There will be many who will be credulous and ready enough to believe that the Murray is to be allowed to run dry, and that the whole of the valuable trade which passes through South Australia at this moment is to be withdrawn from us and utterly destroyed.

Mr. WISE. -

You can point to the fact that New South Wales has consented to the Murray being controlled by the Federation, although she has her rights under her Constitution.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

The Murray can never run dry.

Mr. SYMON. -

I have no apprehension on that score at all, but we know the difficulties which we have to face. There is no one more cognisant of the considerations that influence public feeling than my honorable friend (Sir William Zeal), and we know that these things may be said in New South Wales, or in South Australia. My honorable friend (Mr. Wise) points to the fact that New South Wales has surrendered the navigation of the River Murray. But we have also surrendered the control of the navigation of the Murray, and under the provision as it stands in the Bill, we have also surrendered the use of its waters. Now, if at some future time—and I invite my honorable friend's consideration to this—the trade of the Murray River for the sake of the producers of New South Wales should become to that colony of greater importance than they seem to consider it to be now, and we, for the purpose of our irrigation should prefer irrigation to navigation, what an outcry there would be on the New South Wales side. My honorable friends may say that is an unlikely contingency. But it is the unexpected that often happens; and when we are met on the one hand with objections from one set of people, as my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Wise) suggests we may be, I reply that we may also be met on the other hand with the statement that we have given up the control of the lower waters of the Murray as well as of navigation. But while these two positions have got to be considered, we shall not succeed in our effort unless we also remember that we must rise altogether, or to a large extent, above local claims and local interests—above partial claims rather, and partial interests; and it is from that point of view that I welcome, in many respects, the speech which my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Wise) made this morning, as I also welcome that made by Mr. Carruthers yesterday; because these two speeches, in common with the whole debate, have helped us to get a more precise grasp of the particular theme which is in issue between us, and, I hope, of the remedy which will solve all our difficulties. We are met for consultation and discussion, and not to snatch a victory against an isolated minority. We wish to accomplish this settlement, if we can, with, as far as possible, good-will; and although the amendment of Mr. Isaacs may not accomplish what we desire—judging from the objections already made to it—it may, in common with every amendment proposed when they are all taken into consideration, eventually lead to something being obtained from the combination of them all, especially if my honorable and learned friend does not consider himself wedded to the actual language of his amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I certainly do not.

Mr. SYMON. -

I felt rather uneasy when Mr. McMillan said that in regard to the claim to the absolute control of the River Darling, New South Wales would brook no interference. I am afraid that if my honorable friend adheres to that position, in which he is not supported by Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Barton, our chances of success in solving this matter are getting very slender indeed; and I do hope that my honorable friends from New South Wales, although they may adhere to the sentiment—in which to a large extent I agree—with regard to the control of irrigation within that colony, will not be led away by such an uncompromising declaration of absolute and (if my honorable friend will forgive me for using the word) unreasoning right as that proposal would involve. Now, let me state in one or two words what my position in this matter is. My position, as I have stated it originally, and repeat it now, is that we now have the Murray as a navigable stream, and we have also its great affluent, the Darling, not permanently, but intermittently navigable. My claim is, and always has been, that, so far as these streams are at present navigable and avenues of trade, they should be kept navigable. That is the extent to which I go, and it seems to me that that condition of things should be within the federal ambit. I also recognise—and I repeat this again—the paramount importance of the conservation of water for irrigation as compared with any question of navigation on this continent. Except for that paramount consideration of conservation of water, there would be no difficulty whatever about this matter. I have listened to all the speeches delivered with great vehemence on the part of the representatives of New South Wales, and it seems to me that they concede that their difficulty is this question of irrigation and the conservation of water. So far as I am concerned, I would like, if it were possible, to see the irrigation of the whole of Australia nationalized. But that of course is impossible, at least under a federal system which leaves the land entirely under the control of the states. If the Federation gives the states exclusive power of dealing with their land it is impossible that the control of the waters can be withdrawn from them. If that is the case, then the debate has brought the matter to this conclusion that it would be unjust to federalize the waters, or part of the waters, of any one colony, or part of a colony, to the exclusion of the rest and I am not going to support any proposal which would have the effect of federalizing the irrigation of any part of the colony of New South Wales. Of course, I have also come to this conclusion—that it would be inconvenient and disastrous to divide the control of the irrigation of any one colony. It must be all in all, or not at all.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It is a state matter.

Mr. SYMON. -
It is absolutely a state matter. I confess that I have had my views, which were in that direction before, considerably strengthened by what has taken place. We are all here with our minds open to conviction and change. I feel myself that the views of South Australia have been misrepresented in assuming that we desire to control or actively interfere with—subject to an exception that I shall mention—irrigation works or irrigation operations in New South Wales. All we are entitled to ask is, that the navigability, in which we are deeply interested, and which is essential to our trade, shall be without doubt or apprehension placed under federal control. Now, that, I think, is really what the representatives of New South Wales are wining to give us.

Mr. LYNE. -
Not if that will embrace the tributaries in our colony.

Mr. SYMON. -
What we want is simply the navigability maintained

Mr. LYNE. -
What is to be the definition of "navigability"?

Mr. SYMON. -
The honorable member can give us his definition.

Mr. REID. -
Nature is the only guide in the Darling.

Mr. SYMON. -
My right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) I think has hit it. Nature is the guide. The river is intermittently navigable, and when nature says it is not navigable, it would not come in the category of a navigable stream for that particular time. But we wish to provide in the Constitution, and

Mr. DOBSON. -
Do you go in for the improvement of navigation?

Mr. SYMON. -
Certainly. To us or at least to me, it is chiefly or solely a question of the Darling trade, because my belief is that, if we have the Darling and the Murray maintained in such a condition as will keep them in a state of navigability, we need never trouble ourselves about the necessities of irrigation so far as the lower stream is concerned. I think we shall always have enough water for reasonable use in that respect. But the main point is that New South Wales must not—and this is bringing the matter to a practical issue—so act in regard to the Darling and its waters as to divert trade, or to make trade impossible. Now, that is the position which I wish to see given effect to.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Under sub-section (1) we could not do that.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am coming to that. We listened yesterday to learned and convincing speeches on this subject, and the effect on my mind has been that I am disposed to think that that may be accomplished under sub-section (1) of clause 52. I think that probably that would be the case, and that would be so whether the term "navigable river" were construed in the English sense, or whether it was interpreted in the American sense. My own belief is, that the definition of "navigable river" would be given according to the American authorities in any court of justice dealing with Australian matters because the condition of things here is more nearly the condition of things in America than in England. That has been shown beyond the shadow of a doubt by the interesting information supplied to us this morning by my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Isaacs). But I doubt—and this is the difficulty which I wish to see removed by my amendment if possible—whether sub-section (1) would be sufficient to empower the Federal Parliament to improve the navigation to the fullest extent.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

What is an "improvement of the navigation"? Would dredging the Murray at its mouth be an improvement of the navigation?

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Then you would have the Murray dry.

Mr. SYMON. -

Of course, the honorable member speaks: as an engineer, and it would be unbecoming of me to controvert his view, but I do not want this Convention, to decide now what improvements should, be made in the Murray or the Darling. All I want to secure is that the federal authority shall have the power of improving the navigation either of the Murray or the Darling, and by "improving," I mean the word in its fullest sense by locking it, if necessary. The position might be this: Supposing New South Wales should be desirous of diverting the trade that ought to come, down the river to her ports by means of her railways, of course she never would improve the navigation of the Darling. It might be of great national importance that the navigation of the Darling should be improved, but New South Wales would remain perfectly passive-like the dog in the manger, if I may be allowed to use the simile-and her want of action, while doing her no good, would do, us a great deal of harm. Therefore, there should be some means of overcoming that possibility, and of leaving the entire question of navigability in such a position that difficulties of that kind might be obviated, and wrongs of that sort averted.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Should we not create the certainty of enterprise if possible?

Mr. SYMON. -

I agree that we should create that certainty, and it is because we have now the certainty of the Darling trade, subject to the limitations which are imposed by nature, that, platting aside every other aspect of the question, we should desire that certainty to be continued. On the other hand, we do not wish to interfere with irrigation, or the possibility of irrigation, in New South Wales, which should also be made certain. No one of course will expend capital in connexion with irrigation unless he is sure of some return.

Mr. LYNE. -

The whole thing is wrapped up in the meaning of the term "navigability." Does the term "navigability" involve the question of the control of the water in the tributaries? If the Darling was low, and a large volume of water was diverted or conserved in any of the tributaries, would not this give power to the Federal Parliament to compel the liberation of that water to assist navigation?

Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable member asks me whether, if there was a portion of the River Darling where there was a body of water which was backed up by the con formation of the stream-or, it might be, artificially-such a provision as I suggest would not enable the federal authority to interfere, and to require that water to be let go? In the first place, that body of water would not be likely to make the Darling navigable. I cannot conceive such a thing possible as that the letting go of a pool of water, to pass down a long channel, could possibly make it navigable, at any rate for any period of time. But, in the second place, I do not think the Federal Parliament would do anything of the kind. It would be so outrageous that I should not predicate it of the Federal Parliament, or of any body of men seeking to serve the national interest.

Mr. LYNE. - The question is not whether they would, but whether they could.

Mr. SYMON. - It is on that ground that I should prefer to see some specific provision inserted, without derogating, as my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) said he had no desire to derogate, from the effect and scope of sub-section (1).

Mr. ISAACS. - Something will have to be done, because sub-section (8) refers to navigation.

Mr. BARTON. - It is not quite certain that it was a good thing to put in that subsection. I think the clause would be safer if sub-section (8) were omitted.

Mr. ISAACS. - Then it would render it very doubtful if navigation is included in sub-section (1).

Mr. BARTON. - Sub-section (8) may raise a doubt, and, therefore, it should go out.

Mr. SYMON. - Now that this very interesting conversation has ended, I may proceed. Of course, sub-section (8) will have to be considered, and its effect upon sub-section (1). But the difficulty is to know what to substitute. We have all had a try at it, and with more or less success. I object to the present provision, because South Australia under it hands over the control of the Murray and our own use of its waters, without any corresponding concession whatever from New South Wales. They cut off our trader, or reserve the right to do so. The difficulty is to know what to substitute that shall make it clear that the navigability is to be maintained, and may be improved, without importing any undue interference with irrigation. That seems to me to be what we all ought to strive for. In other words, without making the navigation primary and irrigation secondary, without making navigation paramount, or irrigation paramount, leaving them both on the same level, to be treated as the exigencies and the justice of the case require.

Mr. ISAACS. - In order to carry that out, you would have to vest the waters absolutely in the federal authority.
Mr. SYMON. -
No, I think not. At any rate, it is in that view, and in that spirit, that I have framed the amendment which stands in my name:-
Navigable rivers flowing in, through, or between two or more states, so far as may be necessary to the maintenance and improvement of their navigability-

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We do not agree with you there.

Mr. GORDON. -
Would that include the Darling?

Mr. SYMON. -
I think so.

Mr. GORDON. -
It does not flow through more than one state.

Mr. SYMON. -
This covers the tributaries.

Mr. GORDON. -
The Darling has a geographical definition as a separate river.

Mr. SYMON. -
I think not; it is a tributary of the Murray. However, that would be a matter for amendment. My desire is to cover all I have indicated, and if my proposal does not achieve that object I am quite willing that there should be an alteration in that respect. Then I wish to put forward the recognition in the Constitution that the maintenance of the navigability is not to be subordinated to the claims of irrigation-in fact, to keep alive, to keep paramount if you will or if not paramount, at any rate on the same level, these two beneficial objects.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Do you not see the state of doubt that would exist if that were adopted? Who would embark any capital in works to conserve water when he was likely to have his work set aside on account of the injury to navigation?

Mr. SYMON. -
But is it likely that in such a country as my honorable friend (Mr. Carruthers) has described, and under such river conditions as he has referred to, there would be a possibility of the rights of the settlers being interfered with in that way, or of the rights of the states being interfered with? Of course, I am not complaining of the honorable member being apprehensive. He is apprehensive of his rights being infringed, just as we are apprehensive of our rights being interfered with, but I think there is no likelihood whatever of any difficulty of that sort arising.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

As long as a doubt exists that any works undertaken may afterwards be destroyed, the people will not be disposed to spend money upon them.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not think we can, in human affairs, prevent the possibility of some doubt. We have only to get as near absolute certainty as we can. We know that things are always changing in the management of property and of public and private affairs. It is impossible to reduce to a specific and certain rule anything that involves the rights of mankind. That never has been done yet, and we cannot do it in this Constitution. This amendment I should have had no hesitation in asking my honorable friends from New South Wales to agree to, and I shall support, subject to certain verbal alterations, Mr. Isaacs' amendment if it is put. I cannot say that I like it as well as my own, but that may be pardonable on my part. It embodies in substance my own amendment, with this difference that it substitutes for the control of the Federal Parliament the control of the interstate Commission in regard to irrigation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It provides for the apportionment of the water between the states.

Mr. SYMON. -

I suppose the last part of it is suggestive in that respect.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That was intended.

Mr. SYMON. -

But it seems to me that it would merely have the effect of preserving the claims of irrigation as compared with navigation. At any rate, on two grounds I support it. It makes clear what we are driving at, and it settles the doubt which exists in my mind as to the scope of sub-section (1). I think that under the am

[P.439] starts here

that it looks as if they were afraid of their own resources. This is only one part of the great resources of New South Wales. It is only, as I think, a comparatively small part. If you believe the reports that have been mentioned to me, the possibilities of this extensive system of irrigation are not in a very concrete shape just at present, and therefore, I say, it would be far better for our friends from New South Wales to look upon their rivers and their tributaries a little more as though they belonged, not to a fragment of the continent, but to the whole nation, that is, to a nation whose resources, as we all know, are boundless, and the energy of whose people to deal with these resources is unquenchable. Just as their energy is unquenchable, so, I believe, their sense of justice is not so dull that it will permit New South Wales or any other part of the continent to be wronged under the Constitution of this Commonwealth.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I certainly would not address the Convention again but for the very great importance of this matter, not only as it affects the colony which I represent, but as it bears upon the prospects of our success in framing a Constitution which will be accepted by the states represented here. Feeling that, I wish in the most fair way-commonly fair way-to appreciate the difficulty of our friends who come from South Australia. There is no doubt whatever that the people of South Australia have a very deep interest, a very large commercial interest, in this question, and in no sense do I complain of the endeavours which they are making to secure for themselves the freedom of navigation of the River Darling and the River Murrumbidgee. They have a distinct interest in the matter, but when we come to questions which affect the conflicting interests of any one or more colonies, then we have to begin upon the only solid basis, that of frankly recognising what their present rights are. There is a substantial difference, as we all know, between interests and rights. It is the interest of every man sitting round me here to-day to seek a fair and peaceful settlement of this matter. But there are a number of gentlemen present who practically have the decision of it in their hands, and who are not representatives of any rights in the sense in which we claim to represent rights. I am not going to put our rights on the basis of mere assertion. I wish, and it is the first time I have quoted an authority in the Convention, to read just a few words. The matter is so important, and there is so much confusion as to what the rights of the respective colonies are, that, while I apologize to the Convention, I feel it to be absolutely necessary to endeavour to show what is the legal basis of these rights. In Boyd's edition of Wheaton's International Law, page 256, the following statement is made:-

The territory of the state includes the lakes, seas, and rivers entirely enclosed within its limits.

Now, the Murrumbidgee and the Darling are rivers which come under that designation. It follows, therefore, that these two rivers are part of the territory of New South Wales. If part of the territory of New South Wales, honorable members do not need argument to convince them that their value is infinitely greater to the colony than any given area of land, looking at the natural conditions of the land and the water in that colony. Honorable members will, from that aspect, see how slow we of New South Wales naturally are to allow the federal arm to stretch through our colony in more than one direction to assert the right of absolute control in the manner which is wished for by our friends from South Australia. I will not read the whole of the passage from Wheaton, being deeply sensible of the value of the time of the Convention, but I will read the concluding sentences, which define the whole matter as affecting the River Murray and rivers in a similar position in a very simple way. They are as follows:-

The right of navigating,-

And that is the right that South Australia is concerned in in connexion with the River Darling, at any rate.

For commercial purposes, a river which flows through the territories of different states is common to all the nations inhabiting the different parts of its banks; but this right of innocent passage being what the text-writers call an imperfect right, its exercise is necessarily modified by the safety and convenience of the state affected by it, and can only be effectually secured by mutual convention regulating the mode of its exercise.

Now, that applies to rivers like the River Murray, and has no application whatever to the other rivers—the Murrumbidgee and the Darling. It applies to the Murray as a river which runs between two different states, and even in such a case the right is an imperfect one, and one that is to be modified by the safety and convenience of the state. It only becomes a right in a legal sense when it is the subject of a legal agreement. Now, in reference to the Murray, so far as it does flow along the frontage of New South Wales, this state of things exists. The water course is expressly given to New South Wales by the Imperial statute, emanating from that Imperial authority which Mr. Holder has in reserve. The Imperial statute 18 and 19 Victoria, cap. 54, section 5, legislates in this way with reference to the Murray:-

And whereas doubts have been entertained as to the true meaning of the said description of the boundary of the said colony, it is hereby ordered and enacted that the whole water-course of the said River Murray from its source therein described to the eastern boundary of the colony of South Australia is and shall be within the territory of New South Wales.

On elementary authority the water-course includes the water as well as the bed of the stream.

Mr. SYMON. -

No.

Mr. REID. -

Then I will quote an elementary authority. Angell, on water-courses, says, at page 5 of his work:-

Where the lines given in a grant of land include a stream of water, the soil covered by the water and consequently the water itself will pass. Surely the words of the Imperial statute include the water-course.

Mr. SYMON. -

They do not give away a navigable river.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Riparian rights are quite independent of property in the water of a stream.

Mr. REID. -

I will give honorable members a further proof, and I confess that in this matter I am indebted to what I conceive to be a very able statement of the case which was published in the Sydney Morning Herald a few days ago. I happen to know the author of that statement, who is a man of immense authority upon this subject. He goes very fully into it, and touches upon this very point:-

An American text writer of very great authority, and frequently quoted by English Judges, Mr. Angell, in his work on watercourses, defines a water-course as a "body of water issuing ex jure nature from the earth, and, by the same law, pursuing a certain direction in a defined channel till it forms a confluence with the sea." And the same writer lays it down that "every water-course consists of-(1) the bed (alveus); (2) the bank or shore (ripa); and (3) the water (flumen)."

Is there any possible ingenuity which will dispute that a water-course consists of the bed, the bank, and the water?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Two banks.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, and in this case, according to the definition, New South Wales possesses them both:-

The bed is covered by the water, and is the space subjacent to the water through which it flows, and is that which contains the water at its fullest, when it does not overflow its banks. It is, generally speaking, all the soil below the high-water mark of the ordinary daily tides or of the ordinary floods. The "bank" is the uttermost part of the bed in which the river naturally flows. The bed and the water (flumen) may be said to be correlative terms, as one cannot be owned without touching the other.

It is not at all important to enter into the question of how much we got in getting the water-course, because, as a matter of fact, we, in New South Wales, have never by any act endeavoured to treat the Murray as though it belonged to us. By no single act have we touched a gallon of the water upon the faith of the definition in the Imperial statute of our right to the water-course. As a matter of fact, all the water taken from that part of the Murray which flows between Victoria and New South Wales has, with some trivial exceptions, been taken by Victoria, and, so far as our Government is concerned, I think without complaint. We have even carried our complacency so far as to allow our enterprising friends to take possession of several small islands in the river which belong to us, but for which they have claimed the rent.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We do not admit that they belong to you.

Mr. REID. -

No, and therefore you took them. We contend that they belong to us, but we allow you to use them. That is the difference between us.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The question was thoroughly discussed.

Mr. REID. -

I am sure that my honorable and learned friend would see to that, but our time is too valuable to permit one to go into it now. To show the effect of the law upon the subject, as laid down in the most modern text-book I can get, in Hall's International Law, edition 1895, I find it stated at page 142:-

But neither at the Congress of Vienna, nor in the Treaty of Paris, was the right of co-riparian or of foreign States to navigate territorial water asserted as an existing principle, and effect was given to the intention of the Powers in a series of conventions made between the States concerned. The Congress of Vienna, therefore, though it intended to establish the principle of free navigation with regard to European rivers, respected the right of property in its mode of action, and it stopped short of applying the principle to rivers lying wholly within one State.

There are the clearest possible words from all the authorities that can begot to show that, even as to waters flowing between States, there is no absolute law. There is an imperfect right, which must be modified by the safety and convenience of the States concerned. But, as to rivers lying wholly within one State, the absolute right of property exists in that State untrammelled by any obligation of any kind whatever towards any other State.

Mr. DOBSON. -

But is this right untrammelled?

Mr. REID. -

Upon what ground is the complaint of a settler upon a stream against a settler higher up the stream based? It is based upon the ground that the water of the stream does not belong to the settler above, but that it simply passes
Mr. HOLDER. -
This water neither begins nor ends in New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -
My honorable friend has nothing to do with the beginning of the water.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It is a federal question.

Mr. REID. -
Queensland is not in the Federation, and only Queensland can be heard with regard to the rights in water above New South Wales.

Mr. HOLDER. -
We hope that Queensland will come into the Federation.

Mr. REID. -
No doubt, and so do we. The water we get from Queensland comes in times of flood, when we do not want it; in wet seasons, when the tributaries of the Murray give us and our friends as much as we can possibly want. I want honorable members to look this matter clearly in the face. The Darling and the Murrumbidgee are absolutely within our territory, and belong to us. They are the most precious possessions we have over three-fourths of New South Wales. Without these possessions the country must continue to be a mere sheep-walk, carrying a sheep to, perhaps, 20 or 50 acres. This is not because of the barrenness of the soil. The soil is capable of the utmost fertility. It is capable of untold development, but a supply of water is the one condition upon which that development depends. An improvement has been taking place throughout Australia which has been noticed by the older colonists, but which, I think, has not been mentioned. It is a fact that the pastoral industry is gradually changing for the better the character of the continent. An old settler has marked that change so near Sydney as Bathurst. When he went over the Blue Mountains in the early days he found the Bathurst Plains so loose in formation that his horse's hoofs sank in at every stride. To-day the Bathurst Plains give as firm a turf as you will get in England. It is an absolute fact that the character of the whole surface of the continent will, by the treading of animals and other incidents of the pastoral industry, become infinitely better and more valuable than it is at the present time. But without water the finest soil in the world is comparatively useless. Owning these streams, which are vitally necessary for the development of our country, I think honorable members will understand that we have not come here in any narrow selfish spirit, and that we are charged with a great responsibility. As the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) says, as to our conduct with regard to South Australia, we are in this happy position, that we have never by any act of ours shown anything but the most friendly and generous disposition to that colony—except in correspondence, which is dear to the soul of my right honorable friend at the foot of the table. I have always objected to the establishment of a jurisdiction over New South Wales which has such far-reaching consequences as what is proposed. I object to place in any federal authority the control in a physical active sense, implying possession, of the Rivers Darling and Murrumbidgee. I am quite agreeable to allow the first sub-section to stand, because it gives a federal power expressed in general terms to secure a federal purpose.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
And you think it quite harmless.

Mr. REID. -
I am not asking my honorable friend to interpret my thoughts am endeavouring to express them in my own way. Whatever the consequences of giving a federal power for a federal purpose—the purpose of trade and commerce—I am willing to risk legal decisions in regard to what I am giving, but I would prefer to see a more definite expression in the Constitution, always so long as the absolute possession of these waters by New South Wales is made clear.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
Hear, hear; that is quite right.

Mr. REID. -
Honorable gentlemen may laugh, but they are in the position of outsiders to whom these waters do not belong. I would respectfully ask them to recollect, however, that those who represent the people of New South Wales have a very serious trust to respect. If the Federal Parliament took over the power of irrigation, the people of New South Wales would be in a better position upon some of the proposals than if the power were taken over merely in general words, because then the Commonwealth would owe a duty in respect to irrigation to the people of New South Wales. But if the provision is left in such a state that the Commonwealth may acquire the control of our rivers in an active physical sense, and owe no duty in respect of irrigation, our position will be worse than ever.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is not proposed.

Mr. REID. -
Well, it was proposed, but I do not think it is now. I think we have got away from the extreme proposals with which this discussion was commenced. Now, I would like to come to the proposal of my friend (Mr.
Isaacs). No one will deny that Mr. Isaacs has made an earnest effort to settle this matter in a way as fair as he could possibly manage it, and I feel myself personally indebted to him for the attitude he has taken on this question throughout the Convention, although I do, with great respect, think that he has not quite apprehended the serious position of our rights in connexion with some of these rivers. But the very first words in Mr. Isaacs' proposal, raises the old difficulty—"The navigability of rivers." Now, if we were dealing with the ordinary sort of river to which the decisions refer there would be no question as to "navigability."

Mr. ISAACS. -

The subsequent words of my proposal provide for that.

Mr. REID. -

I am coming to that point presently. But the navigability of a stream which is not navigable except for irregular periods is a vague expression. The control and duty of preserving the navigability of a stream in such a case becomes a very serious one, and the old difficulty, which Mr. Isaacs has made an honest endeavour to get rid of, remains. Seeing that difficulty, Mr. Isaacs has added to his amendment this provision:

But so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation to such extent as, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission

And "Inter-State Commission" introduces an element of uncertainty at once as to whether such a commission will exist.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Substitute Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID. -

I think that would be better. We will regard that as an open question. Mr. Isaacs' amendment goes on to state—as, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, is not unjust or unreasonable, having regard—

Having regard to what?

the needs and requirements of any other state for such purposes.

There the fairness of Mr. Isaacs' proposal unintentionally breaks down, because the needs and requirements of New South Wales are boundless. It is not the just rights, the fair rights, the riparian rights; it is "the needs and requirements of any other state." Even if I were in the position of being a representative of South Australia, I should consider the rights of my colony were put in a very vague position by that proposal.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is controlled by the words "not unjust or unreasonable."

Mr. REID. -
The honorable member's proposal says-"having regard to the needs and requirements," not, as I would suggest, "having regard to the riparian rights possessed by other states."

Mr. ISAACS. -

That would mean nothing at all.

Mr. REID. -

That is exactly the point. I am so glad I have got my friend to admit that. The latter part of the honorable member's proposal is a most ingenious cloud of words, intended to deprive people in New South Wales of the use of water for irrigation and conservation on the only basis they possess it at present-their just rights-and to make their just rights subsidiary, not to the just needs and rights of any other state, but "to the needs and requirements of any other state for such purposes."

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would the insertion of the word "just" meet the difficulty?

Mr. REID. -

No, it would not.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is the best test you could have.

Mr. REID. -

The difficulty would be met if you put in the words "the just rights," or "the riparian rights," of any other state for such purposes.

Mr. WISE. -

Or "conserving the just rights of New South Wales."

Mr. REID. -

I do not mind which. With great respect, I was trying to get from Mr. Isaacs what he is really driving at, and with his customary candor, he has at once informed me that everybody dealing with a state which has absolute right, and possession too, is asking that state to subordinate its water conservation, or irrigation to the just rights or just means and requirements of another state, which has no bearing at all on the Murrumbidgee and the Darling. I admit that they have on the Murray.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The Murrumbidgee and the Lachlan are not included in this.

If the honorable member will exclude the Darling and the Murrumbidgee from this proposal, there is not the slightest difficulty, because our friends from South Australia have rights in the Murray. We are the first to admit that they have the fullest riparian rights in connexion with the Murray. We admit that. Let it be understood, once for all, that New South Wales engages in no controversy on that point—that we absolutely admit the rights of South Australia, so far as the River Murray is concerned. And, more than that, we are willing to agree to any proposal which comes from my friend Mr. Isaacs, or from any other representative in this Convention, to make the just rights of South Australia in the River Murray as clear and indefeasible as possible. Therefore, let us at once narrow down the discussion to the crucial point—the Darling and the Murrumbidgee. We, as to those rivers, take up the ground that the law gives us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Is the Murrumbidgee included? Is it not the Darling that is in question?

Mr. WISE. -
The Murrumbidgee is more navigable than the Darling.

Mr. REID. -
We rest our case as to the Darling and the Murrumbidgee on the simple ground which the law gives us, and therefore we thank no one for it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
No, but because there is no law. That is what you rest on.

Mr. REID. -
Surely the honorable member will admit that a state has a right to its own territory.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Yes.

Mr. REID. -
Very well; the Darling and the Murrumbidgee are part of the territory of

Mr. HIGGINS. -
There is no law which gives you the flowing water of any of those rivers.

Mr. WISE. -
Absolutely.

Mr. REID. -
There is only the law of right and, possession.

Mr. WISE. -
There is more than that.

Mr. BARTON. -
Where is the law that diminishes our right?

Mr. REID. -
I should like Mr. Higgins to recollect that we are just now not in some dreamy court of equity, where we prosect about rights that are never found anywhere except by equity authorities; we are dealing with solid legal rights, absolute rights, state rights, recognised by every authority in the world.
Mr. HIGGINS. - That begs the whole question.

Mr. REID. - Well, if the honorable member can quote a single authority which shows the contrary, I will listen to him.

Mr. HIGGINS. - I thought that you scorned authorities.

Mr. REID. - I did not say I scorned authorities; I scorn the interjections of the honorable member, that is all.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Because there is no law between South Australia and New South Wales, you claim to grab all the water.

Mr. REID. - No, because there is a law which gives us an absolute right to the Murrumbidgee and the Darling. In the interests of the people to whom we have sold the land in fee simple, if for no other purpose, we must vindicate our right to the water of those rivers. One of the aspects of this matter is entirely lost sight of. New South Wales has sold enormous quantities of land, based on the rights which the people possess in this water under the New South Wales law and Government. Millions of money have been received by the New South Wales Government for land sold within the water-shed of the Murrumbidgee, and the owners of that land have all the right of that Government in those waters as defined at present under the law. It is not a light question for us to nullify the things we have sold-frontages to the rivers. Supposing we were willing to hand over those rivers tomorrow to the Federal Parliament as far as the power of irrigation and water conservation went, we would change the position of our land-owners in many parts of New South Wales very seriously. We are bound to respect their rights as well as our own State rights in this matter. But what I wish honorable members to make up their minds about is this: I can quite understand, when they have a reasonable chance of appropriating something that does not belong to them, some people would try to get it, but when the person from whom it is to be got is not asleep, and knows his rights, it must be remembered that the chance, of getting it is very slight; so any attempt on the part of this Convention, or any other body under Heaven, to get New South Wales to give up her absolute ownership in the River Darling and the River Murrumbidgee must fail. That being so, I am prepared to consent to all the incidents which federal powers will bring. I admit that on those general words, as put so ably and forcibly by the leader of the Convention, about navigation and shipping, and the regulation of commerce among the states, we may have given up powers to the Federal Parliament far beyond those which we may wish to give up, but we are giving them up, on equal terms; we are giving them up for legitimate, for vital, for necessary federal purposes. We only give them up as every one else gives up something; but this attempt to single out, in this Convention, the state rights of New South Wales for special adjudication must fail, because the tribunal is not complete. Now, I certainly do not go all the way with Mr Barton in his view, which of course, he only bases on these decisions because it happens that no decision touches the immediate point which we are on, but I think the solution of such a question on the general words of sub-section (1) would go necessarily to the highest tribunal of the empire, where all our local interests or feelings, whatever they may be would not have any voice in the decision. The matter would be decided, simply on a dry question of law, by a tribunal thousands of miles away from the conflicting interests. To-day, I am perfectly satisfied, in the interests of federation, to give up to the federal power the right to go along the Murrumbidgee and the Darling-to do what? Not to take possession of them; but, as the policeman goes along the street, in order to see that in our management of our own property we act according to law; in order to see, for instance, that in the management of those rivers we do not so manage them as to place the enterprise of South Australia or Victoria upon a different footing from that of our own enterprise. With all respect to the views which may be held, my views of these general words in sub-section (1) just amount to this—that those words do not give the physical control of the waters of the rivers concerned, that they simply give the power to look on, and if anything is done upon those rivers derogating from freedom and equality of commerce, the right to come forward and say that that thing shall not be done.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That, very possibly, will be the decision of the court.

Mr. REID. -

Well, I do not wish to gain any vote on this question by disguising my own views on the matter. My own opinion is that those general words would only have that effect.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Which effect?

Mr. REID. -

The effect of giving the Federal Parliament, if it chose, to legislate on the subject, power to prevent our use of those rivers of New South Wales in the interests of New South Wales traders, as opposed to the interests of all other Australian traders. In other words, that they would secure equality of commerce on those rivers. For that federal purpose, I heartily hand over every pint of the waters of the Murrumbidgee and the Darling to the Federation, to see that all the colonists of all the Australias, and indeed the citizens of the world at large, shall be absolutely equal and free upon those waters. That is where I propose to stop.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

But not to give them any power to maintain the navigability of those rivers?

Mr. REID. -

The honorable member must see that in the case of rivers which are not always navigable

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I only wish to find out what you want.

Mr. REID. -

That is the whole trouble. Here we have the River Darling, which runs for 1,300 miles, and then becomes, not dry exactly, but certainly unnavigable. If we were to give to any tribunal on earth the power of maintaining the navigability of the River Darling we would absolutely put every irrigation scheme along the banks of that river in such a position that it would be worthless-

Mr. HIGGINS. -

How do you show that?

Mr. REID. -

I find that my honorable friend's interjections do not generally tend to enlighten what I am saying, so I disregard them.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

May I ask the right honorable gentleman this question?

Mr. REID. -

Not at present. I wish to make this perfectly clear, that we must look the natural facts in the face, that it is of no use to talk about maintaining the navigability of the river, which nature has decreed shall, or may, at certain times, and often, be unnavigable. That being the case, if any power is charged with the duty of maintaining the navigability, we practically hand over every pint of water in these rivers to navigation, where navigation conflicts with the use of the waters for other purposes. That is the dilemma we are in, and we will not, for the sake of ease and comfort, shirk that dilemma. We will not allow any form of words to go into this Constitution which will place our colony in that position, and until-if the proposition of the leader of the Convention, which I think absolutely fair, is not adopted—we hit on some solution which will make it perfectly clear that the rights of New South Wales over the waters of the Murrumbidgee and the Darling, for the purposes I have mentioned, are preserved to New South Wales, all our labour here will be in vain. The amendment of the learned member (Mr. Isaacs) is therefore objectionable to me on this point—that if we make the navigability of the rivers one of the powers of the Commonwealth, we, for such purpose, hand over, subject, of course, to what follows—I quite understand that—the whole length of the Darling and the Murrumbidgee, to the actual physical control of the Commonwealth. Now, the line we draw, as I said before, to sum up our position in a few words, is this: We will not hand over the actual physical control of the River Darling or the River Murrumbidgee, because they both absolutely belong to us.

Mr. BARTON. -
We have no authority to do it.

Mr. REID. -
Of course, we have no authority to do anything of the kind. But we are quite willing, under general words, to give the Federal Parliament the same power over these rivers as it has over every other river in the Commonwealth, the power of stepping in when we, in the navigation of these rivers, establish unfair distinctions, to the prejudice of other Australians and to the advantage of our own colonists. That defines, I hope, clearly the position we take up. It is a position which, I think I may say, is a final one. We are prepared to take all the risks of the decision on the words which are in sub-section (1). We will take all our risks, because those are federal powers of a general character. But I again earnestly wish to make it perfectly clear to this committee that what I have said really defines the final attitude of New South Wales on this matter.

[The Chairman left the chair at five minutes past one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at ten minutes past two p.m.]

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
This question has been discussed with such great ability on both sides that I feel somewhat reluctant to take up the time of the committee in adding to the discussion. But it is a question of such momentous importance, this discussion some days ago, at its initiation, by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Kingston). I was pleased at the expression of the hope in which he indulged, that the subject would be thoroughly discussed and thrashed out from every point of view, and would be eventually settled satisfactorily, and that without a division. I hope, sir, that that expression of hope will be realized—that, as the result of all the debate which is being indulged in, such a consummation will be realized. I must admit that the case made out by the representatives of South Australia in supporting their demands appears to be a very strong and reasonable one, and had I the responsibility of representing that colony in this Convention I would feel, not only justified, but bound, to take the attitude which they have assumed. They are claiming on behalf of their colony recognition of a right which would, no doubt, be of immense value and importance to that colony, not only in the immediate future, but for all time, and I, speaking as a disinterested listener to this debate, should be very glad indeed if the representatives of New South Wales could see their way clear to agree to some reasonable compromise in the direction suggested by the representatives of South Australia. On the other hand, I also feel this difficulty, that if I were a representative of New South Wales I could not possibly avoid feeling the strength of the convictions they have given expression to in this debate—convictions which have been fairly and temperately expressed by Mr. Lyne, yesterday, and by Mr. McMillan and the Premier of that colony to-day. I do not feel that this is a question upon which the representatives of disinterested colonies ought to be called upon to assume the position of arbiters. I, for my part, decline to assume the position and the responsibility of an arbiter in a contest of this kind. There are certain branches of the Constitution as to which every member of the Convention must assume the responsibility of voting according to his deliberate convictions. The structure of the Federal Parliament, of course, does not involve the consideration of any state or provincial right, but it involves a question of vital principle. On such questions as those we must assume the responsibility of our convictions, but as regards a class of powers such as the power which we are now discussing, I feel that the class of powers to be inserted in this sub-section affecting the territorial rights of states cannot be decided upon by a majority in division. I would venture to draw attention to the fundamental resolution on which we are endeavouring to frame this Constitution, a resolution which was adopted at Adelaide without the slightest dissent, and which seems to suggest and formulate the principles according to which we should go in selecting the surrendered powers to be inserted in this Constitution. It is this, that the "powers, privileges, and territories" of the several existing colonies shall remain intact, except in respect of such surrenders as may be agreed upon, to secure uniformity of law and administration in matters of common concern. That affirms the principle to which we all agree. It says that "the powers, privileges, and territories of the several existing colonies shall remain intact, except as regards such surrenders as may be agreed upon."

Not such surrenders as may be wrested from a colony by the force of a majority division, but a free and voluntary surrender of powers. I ask, therefore, does this right which is now in dispute come within what was contemplated by this fundamental resolution, "powers, privileges, and territories"? That is the question I put to myself in determining my vote in this division. If not generally admitted, the weight of the argument is in favour of the contention that what is now endeavoured to be secured for the benefit of South Australia at the expense of New South Wales does come within that class of powers, privileges, and territorial rights now asked to be surrendered. It is suggested that if the representatives of this great colony will not agree voluntarily to surrender, it is to be wrested from them by the force of a majority division. That is a position which the Convention ought not to assume. I think that is a position which the Right Hon. the Premier of the, important colony of South Australia would not like the Convention to assume.

Mr. KINGSTON. - We prefer an agreement, of course.

Dr. QUICK. - Undoubtedly we would prefer an agreement, and I am not without hope that some agreement will be arrived at. But we are asked to force the situation when the representatives of New South Wales, after a full consideration of all the circumstances, have solemnly assured this Convention, unanimously, and not by a majority of its representatives, that this is a state right, a provincial right, which they cannot surrender. We are told in certain quarters-notwithstanding that assurance—we ought not to accept the statements of the representatives of New South Wales, but that we ought to accept some evidence of the opinion of the people of New South Wales outside.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. - Is South Australia to give up everything?

Dr. QUICK. - I admit the arguments on the side of South Australia are very strong; but I am placed in this position, that I have to decide how I am to give my vote.
Whilst I join with every member of the Convention in urging the representatives of New South Wales to make such concessions as they possibly can for the sake of securing a convention, or treaty, or agreement, which might be embodied in this Constitution, at the same time I fail to see how we can assume an attitude that would probably prevent the representatives of New South Wales from taking any further interest in the proceedings of this Convention. I was glad to notice the stand taken up yesterday by the honorable members (Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Barton) with reference to this question. I think their speeches pointed out the direction in which an agreement might be come to, and to remove all doubts, it might be reduced to black and white in the shape of a clause to be embodied in this Constitution. I believe that if that were done, and if those learned members will not merely give their verbal assurance as to the construction that might possibly be placed on the first sub-section, relating to the control of commerce and trade, but will place it in this Constitution, probably the first paragraph in the amendment proposed by the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) might meet the case.

Mr. WISE. -

The first paragraph only.

Dr. QUICK. -

Yes.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Would it not be better to define navigability?

Dr. QUICK. -

That involves a technical question of definition which it might be unwise to place in the Constitution. It would be a very narrow definition. This is not an instrument for defining, the meaning of words in the English language; it is an instrument to define certain legal principles which can afterwards be dealt with by any federal tribunal to be intrusted with this great and important duty.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would you prefer the first part?

Dr. QUICK. -

I think the first part would greatly assist the position of South Australia. I feel some doubt as to the real demands of that colony. This morning, as stated by the honorable member (Mr. Symon), in the earlier part of his observations he seemed to restrict his demands purely to the question of control of navigation. Of course, if that

[P.449] starts here

comprises the limits of his demands, these are much simpler than are represented by the motion which he asks the Convention to accept, because that motion goes further than the earlier portion of his remarks. In his motion he proposes to confer upon the Federal Parliament, or some federal tribunal, the control of the waters, not only for the purpose of navigation, but of irrigation.

Mr. SYMON. -

No.

Dr. QUICK. -

It seems to me, therefore, that his own motion goes further than what his observations have led the Convention to believe he actually wants. If a clause similar in nature to the first paragraph of the honorable member's (Mr. Isaacs') amendment were embodied in the Constitution, it would place beyond all doubt the application of the principles of those cases cited by the honorable member (Mr Barton) yesterday, and it would secure for South Australia that right of navigation which undoubtedly she, as well as all the other colonies, ought to have. If that principle be embodied in the Constitution, I hope that the representatives of South Australia will be able to see their way clear to accept it, and that, on the other hand, the representatives of New South Wales will also be able to see their way to agree to it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I listened with great pleasure to the very able and fair speech made by the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), in which he dealt with the matter more thoroughly than I think anybody else has dealt with it. He was good enough to inform honorable members in detail of the legal position with which some of us but not all were acquainted, and generally to suggest a point of view for the settlement of this dispute which was both broad and statesmanlike. I say at once that I am going to support the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), and failing his amendment being carried, I mean to support the striking out of the clause altogether. I am going to support the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs), not because it is an extension of the powers of the Commonwealth which would be created by the mere fact of striking out this clause, and allowing the general provision as to trade and commerce to remain. I am going to support it on the distinct ground that it is a limitation, and a limitation which, I think, is a wise one. I shall also support it on the further ground that I do not think it is well in the initiation of this Constitution that we should use words which have a clear and distinct meaning only by reason of a judicial decision in another state, which may or may not be followed as the outcome of this Constitution. If my honorable friends (Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Barton) mean what they have said, if they mean that these words bear precisely the meaning that we want, then surely no misunderstanding can happen from saying so. The words can never be words of extension, they must be words of limitation, so that if they want to limit us in the insertion of the words we shall be giving away something, and by no means gaining anything. To frame a Constitution with respect to which the honorable member (Mr. McMillan), one of the clearest-headed men here-no matter what differences of opinion we may have with him in respect to the speech he delivered to-day will understand one thing, and we will understand another, is to begin with a misunderstanding, and not to found a Constitution on the substantial basis on which we wish to establish it. My position has always been the same in this Convention. When the words were inserted in Adelaide which stand now, and when other words were rejected, I said then that I considered those words were words of limitation, and in no way words of extension, and I opposed them. My position has never changed. I have from the first only asked for the control-and I do not stand to the particular phraseology I am using, because honorable members will know what I mean-and the regulation of the navigable streams. When my honorable friend (Mr. Gordon) came forward in Adelaide and suggested that, I understood there was a general feeling on the part of a great many of the committee to accept it. That is all that I require. I wish to ask New South Wales to give up nothing. I wish her only to give up what by international comity is understood to be given up by rival or hostile nations to each other.

Mr. WISE. -

Would you like it to be inserted in the Constitution that the watercourse of the Murray is not in the territory of New South Wales?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I would not object to anything so long as we had the proper regulation of it. Our position, so far as that matter is concerned, is clear and definite. We ask New South Wales to give up nothing which she would not have to give up if she formed one state in America and we formed another, or if she formed one of the old states of Germany and we formed another, or if she formed a continental kingdom and we formed another. We ask her to give up nothing, but simply to recognise that railways and rivers have no relation to each other Jure naturae railways belong to those who construct them. The whole position is entirely different so far as a river is concerned, and the law which regulates all civilized communities in their internal relations should regulate hostile states, and of course to a much larger extent friendly states. I have protested throughout that we want to take nothing from New South Wales; we do not want to prevent them from irrigating their vast interior, although I do not believe that they will carry out that work. We do not wish to prevent them from exercising any rights which they reasonably can exercise at the present time. New South Wales must remember that, although they protest they have done nothing un-neighbourly (and they have not), they said they would; but they have not kept their word. But supposing New South Wales as a matter of fact were to say, as the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) says they are entitled to do, that they would take away every drop of water from the Darling so as to materially interfere with the enjoyment of the proprietors below on the river banks-

Mr. WISE. -

I do not think it would appreciably affect the navigability of the Murray if every drop of water were taken from the River Darling.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Does my honorable friend think that the Imperial Government would allow them to do it? I admit the Imperial Government are difficult to get at in questions, between the colonies; they are easy of access, but very difficult to get into motion; but, at the same time, if there were any serious proposals that had a probability of being carried out on the part of New South Wales to materially interfere with the ordinary flow of those rivers, I have not the slightest doubt that the Imperial Government would interfere, and by legislation would exercise the only control there is over the colonies in this matter, and limit their authority. We do not want that. We ask for nothing but what hostile nations would allow to each other, and we say: Treat those who are brothers at least no worse than you would treat your enemies. Recognising these fair and reasonable principles, we want to put down none of the rights of New South Wales, except in the event of that colony trying to invade ours, and then, instead of being forced to appeal to an Imperial tribunal, we wish the matter to be decided amongst ourselves according to the principles of justice and right. What fears have the representatives of New South Wales? From my point of view, I do not claim that any part of this water should ultimately go to South Australia at all, but that the water should be made the best use of for Australia. If, as years go by, it is found that irrigation in New South Wales is the best thing for Australia, though it destroyed the River Murray, I would say-"This is a matter for the Commonwealth, I trust the Commonwealth." We are studying the greatest happiness of the greatest number, and if the greatest number happen to be in New South Wales, let them have the benefits nature intended them to have. I want the Commonwealth to have power to do that, so that we may have an assertion from
Mr. MCMILLAN. -

What does sub-section (1) mean?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not know, after the speech of the honorable member who interjects, that I should be too profuse in my explanation of what it means. It may mean what Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Barton have said. And not that alone: The effect not merely of that sub-section, but the whole ambit of the Bill, is to secure absolute freedom in the Commonwealth, so that every man can go from state to state and be charged no duty. Probably this sub-section will be wide and strong enough to do all which we want to do. Very likely it might even do more than I would do. I say this frankly, and that is why I so much appreciate the wise and thoughtful speech Mr. Isaacs gave us this morning. Because Mr. Isaacs' suggestion is not an extension of the implied powers but a limitation. It is founded on this principle—irrigation may very likely become first and not second in importance, and navigation in all probability will become quite subordinate to irrigation. Now, if either under an express provision for preserving navigability, or under an implied provision as trade and commerce, you put it in the hands of anybody—because anybody could do it who was affected—to get an injunction to preserve the navigability of the rivers where it was to the interests of the state that their navigability should not be preserved, you would not be doing what was best for the Commonwealth; but the primary right being navigability—that being the initial condition to be preserved—you are not to destroy that navigability without the consent of, somebody representing all the states, and that will be the jurisdiction which will properly be placed in the Commonwealth. So that, as far as my position is concerned, I mean to support Mr. Isaacs' amendment, distinctly on the ground that it is broad, statesmanlike, and just, not an extension but a limitation, and might be highly necessary.

Mr. SYMON. -

But you object to it being added to the amendment that it is not to be a limitation.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not know about that.

Mr. SYMON. -

Some of us want it to be an extension.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think the amendment is distinctly a limitation. But I should like the position to be this: Suppose any citizen—because that is what it comes to—goes to the Supreme Court of the Commonwealth, and insists on the navigability of the stream being preserved, although it might be to the direct interests of not merely one state but of all the states that it should not be preserved. We could only remedy that defect by an alteration in the Constitution; and what Mr. Isaacs' amendment says is:"Let us consider both of these things—let us consider that irrigation might become much more important than navigation—and whilst preserving the initial state right of the stream being kept navigable, still give a power to the Commonwealth to use the water for other purposes, it in the opinion of the Commonwealth—not of any particular state—that inter-state right should be infringed." As to what navigability is, I do not think that depends altogether on the time when the river is navigable. If in its natural condition a river is at times navigable, that is navigability, and in my opinion we are entitled to have it preserved. My view is that striking out this clause will leave the matter broader than if you put it in; but I go for putting it in because it is a just and righteous limitation, and gives the Commonwealth a power which it ought to have. We have had a lot of legal quotations from various sources about this matter. We had one from the Premier of New South Wales to the effect that in no case did any decision ever question the right of a state to deal with the rivers within its own borders. Of course that applies when the river rises within the borders of the state, and also discharges itself within the borders. But the moment the river rises within the borders of another state, or discharges within the borders of another state, a different aspect is given to the whole question, and we have to consider the rights of other people. Although we have not Queensland here at the present time—and more's the pity—I can well imagine the point of view that would be taken by the representatives of New South Wales if this River Darling, that our friends are treasuring so much, were interfered with, as it could be, by the action of Queensland. We cannot really deal with any of these questions without dealing with the whole. The matter is essentially federal in certain aspects, distinctly local in certain other aspects; and, while I agree with Dr. Quick as to preserving to every state the full power that is properly exclusively applicable to that state, still, above all is the Australian principle that, wherever rights may become conflicting, or even under some circumstances might cause conflict, it is well to leave within the Constitution a means of settling them, and not found this agreement, which is intended to give satisfaction to all, on a distinctly varying interpretation by different persons—taking different views of what is meant. The South Australian representatives have been accused of taking a provincial view of this question. Now, I do not think that the view I take is in the slightest degree provincial. I say I have asked for and would be satisfied to get a provision preserving the navigability of the navigable streams within the Commonwealth; and what I want to get is only what, in the case of adverse states adjacent to each other, is allowed by the comity of nations. Of course, when one comes to talk of right, there is no right at all. Every nation has a right to do with its own property just as it likes, as long as another nation lets it do so. That is the limitation of right. But, superadded to that comes another consideration—so long as other nations let them do it; and out of that comes responsibility, and out of that the comity of nations, and friendly agreements, which are as real as if they were the civil law of a particular nation. I intend, sir, to vote in the first instance for Mr. Isaacs' amendment, and, failing that, I shall vote with Mr. Barton.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria).—

Before the question is put, there are one or two observations which I should like to address to the committee, not in repetition but in continuation of those which I made on a previous occasion in connexion with the debate on this question. And, in the first instance, although I do not propose to enter in any way into the consideration of the side issues raised by honorable members, there have been certain statements made with reference to the Victorian policy in regard to the water question which call for, at all events, a sentence or two of brief explanation. The record of these debates may fairly be expected to be widely read, and the observations to which I allude might otherwise lead to a certain amount of misconception. My honorable and learned friend (Mr. Carruthers), the New South Wales Minister of Lands, had evidently been furnished by one of the officers of his department with a statement as to the quantity of water being diverted by Victorian irrigation works at the present time from the tributaries of the Murray, and from the Murray itself; but I regret to say that the officer who furnished that information has confused the present and future tenses, and has included schemes which have not yet been attempted to be constructed with other projects partially executed, and with schemes which are working, but are not yet fully developed. The statement which Mr. Carruthers has made on the faith of his officers, and which he has based upon official publications which he has been good enough to show to me, is, owing to that confusion of present and future tenses, altogether a misapprehension. For instance, the statement is made that we are taking 124,000 cubic feet of water per minute from the Goulburn. But, as a matter of fact, we are not diverting 10 per cent. of that quantity—indeed not 5 per cent. I am not able at the present moment to show exactly how much is being diverted per minute, but according to information given in the last annual return issued by the Water Supply Department of Victoria, the total quantity diverted is shown to be not 5 per cent. of the annual quantity which would be taken if it were as set down in the return upon which my honorable friend founded his remarks.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Your head-works are not capable of doing it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No, not capable even of diverting more than from three to four fifths of the amount the honorable gentler man mentioned, and the subsidiary works are not capable of doing half that amount.

MY. CARRUTHERS. - The authority upon which my information was based are the statements of your own engineer.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

But that is only in regard to the capacity of certain headworks, and is no indication of the quantity actually being diverted. If the honorable gentleman alludes to works other than the head-works, then there are no subsidiary works capable of carrying that quantity. The next river referred to by the honorable gentleman was the Campaspe, which it is alleged we are wholly appropriating; but, in regard to that, as a matter of fact, we are diverting no water whatever. The next river referred to was the Loddon, in regard to which the same allegation has been made. But this statement necessitates for the full understanding of it the further explanation, that whatever diversion we make on these rivers is made, so far as it is made at all, in connexion with storage reservoirs, in which we preserve the flood waters and utilize them. The other rivers named are those from which we are not now diverting, either because separate reservoirs have not yet been constructed, or the works are not fully used. In order, therefore, that the statements made by a gentleman of position like Mr. Carruthers may not be taken without this qualification, I briefly call attention to the fact that, in regard to the estimate which he has given, the actual diversion of the waters made by Victoria from the Murray and its tributaries is a very small fraction of the sum total alleged. Then my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) was good enough to inform us that he had formed the opinion, and that others in his colony had formed the opinion, that irrigation works in Victoria were a failure. Of course the use of the word "failure" is open to any critic, but it should be used, I take it, with the qualifications and illustrations which irrigation experts themselves employ. Now, one of the highest irrigation authorities in the British Empire is Colonel Home, who recently presented a very valuable report to the New South Wales Government upon certain schemes in Riverina, and in a special paragraph of that report he takes care to point out that they call irrigation works successful in India if they pay the cost of working expenses and the main part of the interest in ten years, and if they will what we call "pay" in twenty years. There is not an irrigation scheme in Victoria which has been in operation for even ten years, and there is not an irrigation law passed for much more than that time. Therefore, only one-half of the period has passed which the best Indian judges, speaking of a densely-populated country and of the highest class of irrigation systems, say is required on which to pronounce a judgment. Consequently, we may fairly say that any criticism of any Victorian scheme is at present entirely premature. There is not the slightest doubt that the honorable gentleman was justified in repeating what he himself had heard in Victoria, because up to three years ago, we had a succession of seasons of excellent rainfall, during which the irrigation works, as then constructed, were disparaged on every hand, and even in the districts where they were constructed were often condemned. Since then we have had three years of drought, and an entirely different verdict is now given in those districts, and in the colony as a whole. I will only give one instance of this. A body of men, who were capable of giving a very fair judgment, picked out one particular trust as representing a part of Victoria which they said ought never, under any circumstances, to have had an irrigation trust established within it, and in connexion with which the existing irrigation works were absolutely worthless, and could never return a single penny of value either to the State or to the persons within the trust. Now, we have been favoured within the last few months with an official report from officers of the Water Supply Department on that very trust, the Swan Hill Trust—a small trust embracing only 14,000 acres; and their report shows, by absolute figures, that at that time without the trust the people in the district would have been driven off the land, whereas, with the condemned works in that most unsuitable spot, the farmers in that season had put £30,000 in their pockets more than the farmers in the same district who were not within the trust. The whole of the inhabitants within the trust, the report said, were not only enthusiastic with regard to the benefits it had conferred, but were reaping a rich harvest from the works, instead of being driven off the land, as they would have been if it had not existed. I have taken that case, because it was picked out as the worst instance of a Victorian irrigation trust. I do not say that mistakes have not been made in this colony. I will not discuss that. I do not say that we were not somewhat premature in the extent of works we constructed, and their character and disposition—we have not completed many of them. But if we believe the representatives of New South Wales in their statement, that the transfer of rights over these rivers to the Federal Government would mean a certain hostility of the whole of the population of the Western district of their colony, I venture to say, without the fear of successful contradiction, that any proposal in this Constitution for the transfer of the Victorian irrigation works to the Federal Government would mean the absolute hostility to federation of every farmer in the irrigable areas north of the Dividing range. That is the test of how the Victorian farmer and agriculturist regards our irrigation works.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

How are you going to vote?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

In a matter of this kind, I thought it was only reasonable to give the brief explanation I have made, so that it might be placed on record by the side of statements regarding Victoria so serious as those with which we have been favoured by representatives from New South Wales. As to my vote, I am in the painful position of not being able to vote on this question as the abstract merits of the question demand. I should have elaborated my position more fully, but that Dr. Quick, who preceded me, has anticipated my remarks. Our business and duty as a Convention is to frame a Constitution suitable for acceptance over the whole of Australia, and likely to be accepted by the whole of Australia. We are not here to draft an ideal system, but to embody in this Constitution propositions which shall embody a settlement made to the best of our ability of the rights and liabilities of all the colonies concerned. We are called upon to do that, so far as we can do so consistent with the conviction that we are not thereby defeating the very object we have in view. We are here, it is true, to settle all federal questions from a federal point of view-to bring within the scope of this Constitution all questions properly federal-and this is one-if by so doing we are not imperilling the very object for which we are here. Now, what is the position in which we find ourselves? We are asked to take,-as I think we ought to take, if we were perfectly free and unfettered, a federal stand-point on this question. Regarding it from a federal point of view, I fully indorse the claim which has been made by some, at all events, of the representatives of South Australia for the reasonable federalization of the whole of the waters of this great arterial system. It appears to me a reasonable claim, and if this were a judicial tribunal I think we should be conscientiously compelled to give a verdict in their favour. But, sir, I leave that aspect of the question for this reason, that such a settlement involves, as I put it-on a former occasion, practically all the sacrifice on the one part and practically all gain on the other part. I find that the representatives of
Mr. ISAACS. -

Some of them will vote for it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Some of them may, but so far as I have followed their voices they are unanimous in saying that they have no authority on this question to be governed even by their own sense of justice of the case—that they do not come here authorized to give away any of the rights which their colony undoubtedly possesses with regard to these great tributaries of the Murray—that however sound may be the arguments of the South Australian representatives, however forcibly they may have put forward their views, the representatives of New South Wales are not in a position to concede them. On the contrary, several of them have intimated that if this proposal were embodied in the Constitution, they not only believe that the electors of New South Wales would not indorse it, but that they themselves might probably have, in some degree at all events, to oppose it. Under these circumstances—although I differ from the New South Wales representatives as to the extent to which this arterial system should be federalized (I myself believe in its complete federalization)—I have to put to myself the practical question: Would I risk the loss of New South Wales rather than postpone, the settlement of this question?

Mr. HOLDER. -

Would not the South Australian electors feel just as strongly on the other side?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I recognise the force of that interjection, but it appeals to me with much less force for this reason: That the South Australian electors are losing nothing they at present have.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They will lose something, because they will be prevented from doing what they can do now—use the Murray for irrigation as they please.

Mr. LYNE. -

They get justice.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

They get something less than what I think justice, if we were dealing with this question, as I put it on a former occasion, as with unsettled country, but not much less than justice if you take into account the vested interests in New South Wales of landowners who bought their properties, and staked their fortunes by taking up residence in its interior, on the faith that the rivers were under the control of New South Wales. These interests have to be taken into account, and they are an important item. However, I do not wish to enter into details on this question, for reasons already given. On the whole, I believe that the federal view must be with South Australia, but fail to see that its exclusion from this Federal Constitution can be any detriment to South Australia, beyond the inevitable detriment of the postponement of the realization of her wishes. In point of fact, South Australia does not lose anything by the baulking of her reasonable ambition. If the representatives of South Australia will look at this matter through my spectacles for a moment; if they, see, as I see, no loss to South Australia, and if they see, as I see, a serious loss threatened to New South Wales, they will realize the reasons—the practical reasons—for which a final settlement of this question may well be postponed.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
What do you mean by loss?'

Mr. DEAKIN. -
There will be no loss to South Australia of any privilege which she at present enjoys, unless it be of that extremely indefinable inchoate privilege of appeal to the Imperial Government, which, personally, I do not value at anything at all. If this right of appeal to the Imperial Government on a question of inter-colonial concern is, as I conceive, intangible and practically worthless, I can see no loss to South Australia, and no reason why the electors of South Australia should reproach their representatives for having failed to gain what they could only gain at peril to the cause of federation in other colonies. Let me go a step further, and point out once more, though very briefly, the opportunities which, it appears to me, will be afforded for a settlement of this question upon better lines and on a sounder basis after federation is effected. Let the representatives of South Australia look at this question once more in a purely physical aspect; remember how entirely the future of this river system depends not upon political considerations, but upon physical conditions. It is possible—as has been shown in a leaflet by Mr. Lyon, who has had great experience of irrigation in the Ballan district—it is perfectly possible, in some cases, to render the interests of navigation and the interests of irrigation harmonious instead of antagonistic. Whether that is absolutely possible and practically feasible on the Darling I do not venture to say—it is a question for expert opinion; but there is a reasonable prospect that it may so prove, and that those whose chief concern is navigation, and that those whose chief concern is irrigation, may yet find their aspirations harmonious. We all know that whatever irrigation there is from the Darling must be extremely limited. The best systems of irrigation are those in which a regular quantity of water can be relied on, at regular seasons, to grow classes of crops which it is expensive to put in, but which yield the largest return. Such irrigation is possible anywhere in the interior of Australia to a very limited extent indeed. The class of irrigation which is possible in the interior of Australia is the least profitable class of irrigation, because it depends on the most precarious conditions. It is an irrigation, practically, so to speak, from flood waters-an irrigation from the unpredictable flow-which can be utilized, and for which some preparation can be made by the agriculturist, but for which he cannot afford to make any extensive preparation, and in connexion with which he cannot sow expensive crops, there being so many chances of failure. The consequence is, that irrigation in the interior of Australia, beyond a very small margin, must be somewhat the same as we see in the north-west of India, and in certain parts of the western states of America, where inexpensive crops are put in on the chalice of there being irrigation in any particular year. Irrigation in the interior of Australia must always be limited by the very irregular and uncertain discharge from its rivers, and, therefore, instead of navigation being altogether overwhelmed by the irrigation interest, as it might be under other conditions, navigation is likely to continue to be an important interest in the interior of Australia.
Because it is perfectly possible, by the canalization of the rivers and the avoidance of existing losses, to maintain navigation in the river at a very small

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Where are you going to conserve the water?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

There are suitable places scattered throughout New South Wales. It is ture, as Mr. Glynn pointed out, that the question of evaporation is more important in that colony than anywhere else, excepting perhaps, on the Indian plains. That is on account of the severe heat, but still the stories can be artificially improved. They can be deepened, and the loss relatively lessened. It is clear that it is not an unlimited, but a narrowly limited, power of irrigation which can be looked for on the Darling and the tributaries of the Murray. The physical conditions surrounding the river point to the maintenance of a cheap system of navigation at a comparatively small loss of water; but that is to be gained most effectively, only by treating the river as a whole, from its mouth to its furthest navigable point. The only way in which that can be done is by federal works, under federal control. If that be the case, it should be made competent under this measure, not only for the Federal Government, with the consent of the states concerned, to take over the executive administration of the River Murray and such of its tributaries as may be necessary, but also for the Federal Government to prepare and place before the colony plans for treating the Murray and its tributaries as a whole. Colonel Home has shown, in his report, how it is possible to make a connexion between the Murrumbidgee and the Darling, or the Lachlan—one or the other. It is probable that if the system were taken as a whole, and dealt with by a sufficiently capable engineering expert, the Federal Government would be able to lay before the several colonies so strong a case for its improvement that New South Wales would find it to its advantage to hand over the Darling to federal control, and that South Australia and Victoria would then reap, under such an arrangement, all the benefits they can hope to reap under the provision our neighbours are desirous of inserting in this Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You cannot divorce the water from the land.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No; the utmost the Federal Government can do is to make the water available at certain points, which will be chosen for their physical suitability. The state Government takes that water, and distributes it where and to whom it pleases, and at whatever cost it chooses to incur. I do not contemplate the Federal Government having any control of irrigation in any part of Australia, but if it had control of this river it could deal with it in the interests of irrigation by making the surplus water available at the most suitable points, when it would hand over that water to the local Governments. To put a clause in the Constitution is to make something like that certain. To omit it, and to leave action optional, is to make it of course uncertain. It is because of the want of a precise knowledge of detail in connexion with the possibilities of the utilization of these rivers that so much antagonism exists in New South Wales to any dealings with them. The most exaggerated anticipations have been entertained. The report of Colonel Home has come as a wet blanket upon hundreds of settlers who cherished the most sanguine hopes as to the advantages to be derived from irrigation. But that report is not final. It is not intended to be final; Colonel Home only deals with the most and part of New South Wales, but so far as that part of the country is concerned, he has discouraged many by his able and valuable report. It will only be when further information of the same character has shown the people of New South Wales what the possibilities of irrigation and navigation practically are that you can hope to put to them the question that you are seeking prematurely to put to them here, of surrendering in a large measure the control of the rivers. Of course an immense amount of information has been accumulated by New South Wales as to its rivers, and a number of proposals for their use have been made.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Supposing we have a drought, how will you provide for it?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

We have studied the Murray, but all this information needs to be brought to a focus. As Sir William Zeal interjects, you have the possibility of a drought always before you. You would need to have diagrams such as that which is included in our published papers, and which is now before me. This is certainly the longest diagram we have yet seen. It shows the gaugings of the Murray and its rise and fall at particular times of the year for a number of years. The information given in this most valuable map requires to be supplemented by similar information as to the Darling and the other tributaries. The whole of the reports would then have to be focussed and compared, and the river dealt with as a whole. It is only in this way that you can get the greatest value out of Australia's great arterial river. When you take into account all the ordinary federal influences and all the practical facts of the case, they certainly strengthen what may be termed the reasonable expectation that when full information has been acquired with regard to the Darling, and has been dealt with by an expert authority, the people of New South Wales will be in a better position to consider this question than they can be to-day, when they are speaking of uncertain possibilities and unknown resources. It does not appear to me to be a fair or reasonable request to ask ten representatives, returned for the purposes of federation, to consent to the introduction of a general provision in this measure, which might have the effect of handing over the control of the enormous river system which supplies the whole of their colony with the exception of the coastal districts. They do not understand what sacrifices they are being asked to make, and to persevere in such a demand as that is to raise a serious obstacle in the path of federation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You had better ask New South Wales what they want, and give it to them.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

When the matter relates solely to one state, and its representatives are unanimous, that is not at all an unwise method of procedure. I do not think the representatives of any colony should be called upon to vote away an existing right.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Are you justified in saying that New South Wales alone is concerned in this? If you can prove that the case goes.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I do not attempt to prove it. I have not the time. But if, as I contend, the control of the Imperial Government is of no value, then practically these waters do belong to New South Wales in the sense in which the Premier of New South Wales has asserted.

Mr. HOLDER. -

These waters rise in Queensland, flow through New South Wales, and reach the sea through South Australia. How can you say that they are purely New South Wales waters?

Mr. LYNE. -

Only a small portion of the water comes from Queensland.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

If Mr. Holder will recall what I have already admitted, he will see that I am not putting it that these waters ought to belong to New South Wales in the sense in which he applies my statement. They are federal waters, but they can only be dealt with as such with the consent of those who have the present legal title, so to speak. It is a narrow and unjust title if you like, but certainly it is a legal title, whereas nobody else has any kind of legal title which can be enforced. New South Wales is asked to give up the present legal title, in order that justice may be done. That is a reasonable demand, but it is not necessarily a demand that can be reasonably and fairly insisted upon in this Convention by the representatives of other colonies. I safeguard myself by saying that the vested interests of land-holders in New South Wales create a formidable obstacle to the entire federalization of the rivers until the scheme of inquiry which I propose, and by which these land-holders will see that they are, on the whole, the gainers, is carried out. The interests of these men, and the hundreds of thousands, and perhaps millions, of pounds they have expended in improvements are a very important factor in the consideration of the position of New South Wales. I have been favoured with letters from several engineers who have called my attention to facts, more or less encouraging, in this connexion. One of these letters to which I should like to refer, because it comes from Mr. Culcheth, an Indian engineer of large experience, states that the writer has seen in India large irrigation works carried out which diverted the whole course of a stream. Within a few miles, however, the water began to percolate back again into the empty channel, and 10 or 15 miles down it seemed to assume its original volume. Of course, we have yet to prove that this will be the experience upon the Darling and the Murrumbidgee, but examples of the principle of which this is an extreme case are not altogether uncommon. There is every reason to believe that a considerable portion of the water used in irrigation finds its way back to the stream from which it is taken. By way of illustration, let me mention what is occurring in connexion with the Goulburn. The country through which that river flows slopes from the Dividing Range to the Murray and the streams there run roughly north and south. Our object is to divert the water from them; but we only carry it back from the river for a distance of a few miles, and it naturally flows either above or below ground in the direction of the slope of the country. It is my opinion, though I cannot base it upon a sufficiency of fact to be absolutely confident of its correctness, that in this way the greater proportion of the water taken finds its way back into the Murray, or into the streams which feed the Murray.

Mr. GLYNN. -
What about the navigation of the intermediate portion?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That point does not arise with us, because upon the Victorian rivers navigation does not pay. The whole of the tributaries being within the colony we naturally keep the river well supplied with water all the way down. In conclusion, I would say we have received a solemn assurance, which I for my part accept, that any interference at the present time with the control of the rivers of New South Wales which is possessed by the Government of that colony would probably be fatal to the prospects of federation in that state. Under these circumstances, and recalling in how much obscurity the practical facts of the case still lie, and how much the question can be illuminated by the further accumulation and combination of these facts—a knowledge of which will point to the wisdom of the creation of a federal control, and induce New South Wales to grant in the light what she is now being asked to grant in the dark—the South Australian representatives need have no cause for regret when they face their constituents. They have made a gallant attack, and if they do not succeed it will not be for their want of ability, energy, fertility of resource, or ingenuity in making suggestions and proposing compromises to gain the end which they have in view. Nothing could improve upon the tactics they have adopted or the manner in which they have conducted the fight. They have done everything that deserves success. They can go back to their constituents saving—"If we have not gained anything, we have not put you in any worse position than you occupied before." I am sorry to have to vote against men who are fighting in a good cause, and only the paramount interests of federation would justify me in doing so. We are not called upon to decide a question the settlement of which involves a sacrifice on the part of one state, and one state alone. We, the representatives of other states, who are not called upon to make this sacrifice, are not justified in voting to impose it upon New South Wales. Such an action would be equivalent to being generous by deputy, and would not give the assurance of even-handed justice.
Therefore, I shall be found voting not upon the merits of the case, but with a practical eye to the success of federation in the great colony of New South Wales, in the confidence that when federal government is in existence, and the people of New South Wales have become accustomed to the federal relationship and jurisdiction, the plea which is now urged unsuccessfully will be successful, and South Australia will obtain what I think she ought to obtain, and what we all desire—a federal control for the Murray and its tributaries.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I rise to make a few remarks because, when I wanted to ask the Premier of New South Wales a question, I understood from the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) that he was rather disinclined to answer questions. Possibly the right honorable gentleman will do me the favour now to answer a question upon an important phase of the argument.

Mr. REID. -

My experience of the honorable member (Mr. Higgins) is that his questions sometimes have a latent meaning.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Well, all I desire is to get at the facts, and to understand the law upon the subject, in order that I may vote for what I believe to be just. The right honorable member quoted to us part of a section of an Act amending the Constitution, whereby the water-course of the Murray, which he undertook to say meant the soil, the banks, and the water, is vested solely in the colony of New South Wales. But he omitted to read the last part of the section, which says that the control of this water-course for the purpose of navigation, and the making of laws and the framing of regulations controlling navigation, is to be vested, not in New South Wales, but in the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria.

Mr. REID. -

Therefore New South Wales is mistress of the situation?

Mr. DOBSON. -

I take it that this part of the section absolutely negatives the right honorable gentleman's argument, and shows clearly and conclusively that the Imperial authorities had no more idea of granting the right to the water to New South Wales than I have of granting Tasmania to my right honorable friend. The section goes on to say that although the watercourse, meaning I suppose the bed and the banks, is vested in the parent colony, the control of the water flowing through it is to be given to another colony.
Mr. REID. -
No.
Mr. DOBSON. -
The writer of that interesting article, which has been referred to in this debate, contends that because the colonies of New South Wales and Victoria have not made joint laws and regulations for the control of the navigation of the Murray, the whole of the Act amending the Constitution is void, and the water, banks, and bed of the stream vest in the parent colony. I read the article with great pleasure, but how can the writer say that, because certain powers given by an Act have not been exercised, that Act can be put upon one side, and you can fall back upon rights conferred by a Constitution which it was passed to amend? I never heard an argument so wanting in common sense, and in justice.
Mr. LYNE. -
The amending Act does not give any power over the water.
Mr. DOBSON. -
The amending Act speaks for itself. It vests the joint control of navigation in two colonies, and therefore I take it that the Constitution Act, upon which my honorable friends rely, contains about all that some of us are asking to be embodied in this Constitution.

Mr. REID. -
Is it not fair to recollect that I distinctly stated that I raised no question of the rights of New South Wales over the Murray?
Mr. DOBSON. -
Yes, but if the honorable member is going to dissever the tributaries from the Murray, what kind of a river would he give to the Commonwealth, seeing that it has about half-a-dozen tributaries in New South Wales, and not a single tributary flowing into it after it leaves the New South Wales border? Does the honorable member think that arguments of that sort will carry conviction to the mind of anybody? I have no interest to serve but to help my fellow members of the Convention to frame a right and just Constitution, and arguments of that sort will hardly influence my mind. I prefer to fall back on the arguments of Mr. Isaacs and others, to which I am now going to allude. Mr. Isaacs pointed out—and we all ought to be most grateful to him for his contribution to this debate—that in the western states of America, where water is of the greatest benefit and value to the and districts, just as it is in New South Wales, the man who came first—the first robber,—somebody suggested—got the right to the water, but Mr. Isaacs went on to show how the Supreme Court of that country, seizing hold of the principles of law and of the comity of states, whittled down that right, and declared that where the water was necessary for two or more states, the state or states first served must so use the water, no matter if it or they were the first robbers, as to leave a certain amount for the other states. That was definitely held by the highest court in America, and Mr. Isaacs’ proposal seeks to embody the same principle in this Constitution. If a reasonable share of the water cannot be obtained by agreement, it must be given by the Inter-State Commission, or, as I prefer, the Federal Court.

Mr. REID. -

Don’t you see a wide distinction between the rights of riparian occupiers in the same state and the rights of individuals in another state to the water of a river which begins and ends a long way from those individuals in that other state?

Mr. DOBSON. -

The honorable member puts before me the very crux of the whole matter, which he declined to deal with when on his legs. The whole question is—Are the members of this Convention willing to state in the Constitution, as I think they ought, whether we will have states with riparian rights or not? Are we going to allow the humblest individual in a state to have his riparian rights, and yet declare that the whole of the individuals in a state which happens to be below the water-shed of this river in New South Wales are to have no such rights whatever? I have always been, and must always continue to be, against the colony of New South Wales on that point. But I desire to help them, and I see and am ready to consider their difficulties, but when I asked Mr. Deakin to speak, as I did before lunch—because I know no member of the Convention who takes the same broad federal view of matters as Mr. Deakin—I did not expect that I should be, as I am, quite unable to follow him into the region where his last speech landed him. He distinctly tells us that he is not prepared to vote on this question on its merits, and that he is going to vote against his interests, his convictions, and his judgment, because he is sure, as if anybody could assure him on the point, or because he is told, as if anybody could tell him, that if we go in that direction, the people of New South Wales will not accept federation.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
And because this is not the tribunal to determine the question.

Mr. DOBSON. -

We have heard too much of what the electors will and will not accept. I do not think it is my duty to help to frame a Constitution that people will accept. I desire to frame a Constitution that they ought to accept—a Constitution which is just, which takes account of the experiences of mankind, and does not go in for any new-fangled experiments. I shall be satisfied if I know that it is a Constitution that the people ought to accept, and I am not going to bother myself about whether they will or will not accept it. Because, if we frame a Constitution in which we have confidence, and which we believe the people ought to accept, every member of the Convention ought to be loyal to the body of which he is proud to belong, go forth to his people, and ask them to accept it.

Mr. LYNE. -

What if we do not believe in what is put in the Bill?

Mr. DOBSON. -

On this question nothing would satisfy my honorable friend, and if any honorable member has half an eye on the Convention, and an eye and a half on the people of his colony, we cannot satisfy them, and should not attempt to satisfy them. But if the majority believe that a certain provision in this Bill is right and just, every one of us, the honorable member included, ought to go throughout the length and breadth of his country and advise his people to accept the Bill. If we do not do that we shall never get federation. If we are going to be disloyal to ourselves, to our work, and to the judgment of the majority of this Convention, we shall never get federation at all. One word in reference to the exact tenor of Mr. Isaacs' amendment. Although the leader of the Convention put his points very clearly, and gave us very good arguments why sub-section (1) will do, I am inclined to think that we ought, at all events, to put the first part of Mr. Isaacs' amendment in the Bill. If we stop at the word states, perhaps that might be a fair compromise. We ought to have it engrafted in this Constitution that not only the navigation of rivers which are permanently navigable, but also the navigation of rivers which are intermittently navigable, shall be under the control of the Federal Parliament. Otherwise it will be of very little use, and will land us in endless disputes. If we are to leave the question of irrigation to the Commonwealth hereafter, let that be done, if it be the will of honorable members; but may I point out that this is not really wise Constitution building? Every honorable member who has spoken has put irrigation before navigation, and yet in the Constitution we are going wilfully and deliberately to put the cart before the horse-to leave out what every honorable member has declared to be the most important, and to legislate about the least, important of the two questions.

Mr. BARTON. -

For the simplest of reasons-one is a provincial arrangement, and the other a federal power.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The leader of the Convention would have disposed of the whole question in a single sentence if that were a fact; but it is not a fact. He tells us that this is not the place to deal with the question. Well, he has entered this Convention in the federal spirit—we are bound to credit him with the federal spirit—and I say that the rainfall which finds its way into the Murray, and the water-way of the Murray, which the Crown did not give to New South Wales, ought to be federally dealt with. The honorable member is not in a position to say that it is a provincial—a local-matter. He might just as well ask, when you talk about preferential and differential rates as a local matter—"Why should not Victoria carry goods for nothing within her own community, if she is the first or the last, robber, or anything else?" No, that is contrary to the spirit of federation; it is contrary to the business we have in hand, and if we are going to, do away with differential and preferential rates, if we are going to have a federal spirit pervading our railways, so we ought to have the federal spirit prevailing when we deal with the great waterways of this continent. Therefore, if, as a compromise, Mr. Isaacs' amendment is to stop at the word "states," I shall be only too pleased to vote for it, and I think that the representatives of South Australia will then get pretty well all they want, because we shall have engrafted in the Constitution a provision setting forth that the navigability of these rivers is to be maintained; and does not that at once limit and restrict the use by New South Wales of the water for irrigation? Certainly it does. And yet I understand the representatives of New South Wales are one and all content with that limitation. It is a considerable limitation, and in twenty or thirty years' time, when the question arises for determination: Is it wise to consider giving up federation for irrigation? I am quite sure the federal spirit will prevail then more than it does now. We shall not have the same mistrust of one another and of the Federal Parliament as some honorable members have now. In twenty or thirty years' time I believe the question of irrigation could be settled with justice to everybody, but on more federal lines, and in a more generous spirit, than that of the arguments adduced to us by the representatives of New South Wales.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I think the responsibility that rests on the representatives of Western Australia and Tasmania is possibly much weightier than that which rests on any other representatives, inasmuch as we are wholly unconcerned with this matter. We have no personal interest to serve; and therefore we have been recognised to some extent as the arbiters of this question. We are certainly not in the enviable position of my learned friend (Mr. Deakin), who is able to vote against his conscience, to vote against that which he believes in, because he fears that if that were carried it would prevent New South Wales from entering the Federation. If we all adopted that strain as to every question, we should have first one state, then another, and next a third severed from the federal body by some particular question being carried against it. I cannot see why the representatives of New South Wales, for whose earnestness and integrity we have the greatest possible respect, should not be ready to accept the very moderate compromise offered by the Attorney-General of Victoria in this amendment. It is not disputed by New South Wales that South Australia should have the right of navigation on the Murray. It is not contended by South Australia that New South Wales should not have the right of irrigating from her waters, and what is the difficulty?

Mr. REID. -

Ha!

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

What we have to recognise is that there has been something like a threat on the part of a New South Wales representative to drain the waters of the tributaries of the Darling and other rivers to the obvious depreciation and impairment of the Murray.

Mr. REID. -

No such threat.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

No, it was distinctly stated as an extreme reductio ad absurdum of the whole-argument. I simply said that we have that right, but the statement of a fact does not imply a threat.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The honorable member who interrupts me claimed the right to drain the Darling to its last drop.

Mr. REID. -

That is either right or wrong; but it is not a threat, if it is ours.

Mr. BARTON. -

He was asked what limits he put on his legal right, and he stated the limits in that way.
Mr. REID. -
He never acted in that spirit.

Mr. WISE. -
Just in the same way South Australia has a right to drain the Murray.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The honorable member did not qualify his remark by saying that it was far from the thoughts of New South Wales to carry out her views to that extreme.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I said-"Reducing it, to an absurdity," and that is strong enough language.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) provides simply for interference with the action of New South Wales in regard to her waters when that action will have a detrimental effect on the Murray-that they shall not be allowed to carry on their irrigation to such an extent as to injure South Australia in her main water-way. I hope that moderation in our counsels will prevail, and that we shall see some settlement arrived at on this amendment. I have no fear that New South Wales for many years to come, if ever, will be required to do anything like draining the Darling, let alone the other rivers.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
For months in the year it is quite dry. At times there has been as much as two years' wool stored at the stations, because they were not able to get the barges up the river.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Then they were not required to drain the river; it was done for them. I do not think that irrigation will be proceeded with to the extent that some of us here imagine. Irrigation is not always the great success which some honorable members think it is. In India, after constructing tremendous canals for the purpose of irrigating large tracts of country, it has been found by experience that thousands and thousands of acres have been rendered absolutely sterile by the irrigation. The effect of the water flowing upon these lands has been to extract from below salts which have rendered the land absolutely barren. The representatives of New South Wales, who know the nature of their country, must realize that it is only in very limited areas that they will be able to irrigate with any effect, by reason of the tremendous cost of any system of irrigation. Channels which will cover the whole of the wide expanse of that country requiring irrigation-

Mr. BARTON. -
How much damage will it do to South Australia?
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Therein lies, may I say in a strictly parliamentary sense, the folly-
Mr. BARTON. -
Fallacy we will say.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Therein lies the folly of New South Wales contending against the amendment, which only provides against something of which they see no possibility.
Mr. LYNE. -
What we have all contended for is that we require more water for conservation than for irrigation.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I do not see why t
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
At the cost of herself and to the benefit of her neighbour.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I shall support the amendment.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
There has been, I understand, this morning a contention raised which I thought never would have been raised, namely, that as between private owners, if they were private owners, South Australians would have no right to stop the taking of this water for irrigation if it interfered with navigation. I thought that thing was perfectly clear and perfectly beyond dispute. I am told that the Premier of New South Wales to-day referred to authorities which, to his mind, satisfied him that there was no such legal right. With all respect, I challenge his authorities. His authorities merely refer to the case where the source of a stream and the end of a stream are within the boundaries of the same owner, and, lest there should be the least doubt about it, I have looked up the case of Duddon against the guardians of Clutton Union in 26 Law Journal Exchequer, in which, beyond all doubt, it was laid down, at page 146, that where there was a spring-
Mr. REID. -
What year was that?
Mr. HIGGINS. -
The right honorable gentleman has refused to reply to my interjections, no matter how pointed they were, and I think I am entitled at present to hold the Chair.
Mr. REID. -
Quite right.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Under these circumstances I will proceed. The position is this: That there was a spring from which there was a flow of water in a small channel into a brook, and this brook worked a mill. The man who owned the ground where the spring was, built some tanks and took all the water from that spring into his tanks. It interfered with the water lower down, and it was held there and without any doubt that there was no right possessed by the owner of the spring so to divert the water. If there is the least doubt about it the thing can be easily settled. I am rather amazed that at this time of day there should be any dispute on the point that as between private owners the lower private owner would have the right to stop the diversion of water which would diminish the flow of the water for his purposes lower down the stream. In the case of the battle of the "billy and the spuds," which is now historical, the advice of the honorable member (Mr. Dobson) was quite right, and in that case the 6s. 8d. was well earned. He was quite entitled to tell his client that he had no right to take the waters of the spring which interfered with the flow of the waters in the creek.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I purposely refrained from speaking, in the hope that some arrangement might be made on this subject agreeable to all parties to the difference. But it seems the time is now approaching when we shall be compelled to have recourse, at least for a time, to the solution afforded by a division. Under the circumstances, I desire to shortly explain the reasons which will induce me to record my vote in a certain way. I shall be found giving my unqualified adhesion to the amendment proposed by the honorable member (Mr. Isaacs). I think that the Convention is not only indebted to him, as an impartial witness of the difference which chiefly concerns South Australia and New South Wales, for the preparation of that amendment, which seems to deal with matters of principle in a manner just to all, but at the same time for the remarks which he delivered in introducing the subject to the notice of the Convention. What is the position in which we find ourselves? We are told by some that the right course will be not only to strike out the sub-section which we carried in Adelaide, but to put nothing in its place. What will be the effect of that? It will be that we shall not be able to tell those, to whom it will be our duty in due course to return, what we have done; for it is abundantly clear that there will be ample room for the gravest doubt and difficulty, as to the effect. Is that a fair thing? Ought we, who were sent here for the purpose of framing a Constitution for the acceptance of the electors, to go back under circumstances which will warrant us, at least, in telling them that, as regards the effect of the position in connexion with the waters of the federal rivers, we do not know what we have done? Ought not we at least to try to put the matter clearly before the electors! Ought not we resolve what is really the difference between us, and ask the Convention to vote upon it? The reason why I emphasize this is because of the doubt which exists as to what will be the effect if we strike out the sub-section now under consideration, and put nothing in its place. It is bad enough in a matter of this sort when the opinion of representatives from different colonies vary; but when we find such high authorities as the representatives of New South Wales at variance on the subject, the position to my mind appears to be altogether lamentable. We are told by the leader of the Convention that if we strike out the subsection, and put nothing in its place, there will be ample power in the Federation to restrain interference with navigable streams.

I say that again.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
On the other hand, I think our leader will agree that his view is not altogether concurred in by the Premier of New South Wales, who put it that so long as no preference was given to the people of New South Wales, or some particular state, the people of New South Wales would have an unlimited right to interfere with the navigability of rivers within their boundaries. Which is right? I do not want, when such high authorities differ, to express any definite opinion upon the subject.

Mr. BARTON. -
Which do you think is right?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I will not even endeavour to overcome my natural diffidence upon the subject, but I will ask this Convention to say; and I think there will be practically unanimity upon the subject. We ought to make it perfectly clear. To return to our several colonies, and to tell them that, whilst the leader of the Convention has declared that the Bill is in such a shape that the navigability of navigable streams cannot be interfered with, yet the Premier of New South Wales holds an altogether different opinion would be to return under conditions which would be discreditable, and I use the word advisedly, to every member of the Convention. We ought to agree. There are various modes of making an agreement. There is the agreement of absolute unanimity; there is the agreement of the majority in a certain view; but there is one position which I think that we ought to avoid. It is that of returning to our colonies under such conditions that we shall have to tell those who sent us here to make arrangements that we have not been able to make any satisfactory arrangement; that the only agreement we have come to is differ; and that we have come to look upon the subject in this light: That we shall have to get some authority to pronounce a decision on the subject, but that there are very grave doubts whether that authority has any very considerable power of dealing with the question. It has been put with some degree of force by the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) that he is embarrassed by the position in which he finds himself; that he is struggling between considerations of right and justice, and what he thinks may induce the acceptance of this Constitution by a particular state. He told us—and I confess I was disappointed to hear it from him—that he has concluded that the better course will be to sacrifice his conscientious scruples as to what is right and fair between the several states and to vote—

Mr. DEAKIN. -
To decline to give a verdict at present.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
And to vote in a manner which might induce a greater desire on the part of New South Wales to accept this Constitution than otherwise might be the case. I would put it to the honorable member that we are here for the purpose of framing a Constitution for Australasia fair and just to the several states. In what we have done we have done our duty, and so long as we have discharged this duty we can be in no way to blame. Upon the electors of the various provinces will rest the responsibility of saying whether or not they will accept this Constitution when it is presented to them for their consideration; and I ask the honorable member (Mr. Deakin) whether he thinks it would not be better for him to record his vote in accordance with his conscientious conclusion as to what is fair and right, than to defer to that oft-repeated—I will not say threat, but that oft-repeated expression of the probability that a contrary vote to that he intends to give might injuriously affect the cause of federation in New South Wales? There may be in a matter of this sort a natural desire on the part of those who represent the various states to put the matter more strongly, for the purpose of securing the approval of their own particular people, but I am very sanguine that, so long as we do only what is right and proper to each and all, no state will require, as a term of its assent to federation, anything like an injustice such as the Bill, in the condition in which Mr. Deakin proposes to leave it, would effect, so far as South Australia is concerned.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Your claims would be postponed, they would not be impaired.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It seems to me that this is the time when we should, so far as we possibly can, bring within the ambit of the federal jurisdiction all matters that properly belong to it. This is the time for removing constant sources of conflict, which should be determined by the federal authority. What is the position of South Australia? I make no complaint with regard to the attitude of New South Wales, but representations that have been addressed to her upon this subject in the past have not been as fruitful in result as we could have desired. We have postponed any further action in the matter, in the hope that at a gathering of this sort, attention might at least be given to our fair claims; we are here to-day to ask for that attention to be given to them, and also that those who recognise our claims as fair and right may be found recording their vote according to their consciences. Why should the representation be postponed? Honorable members see the action of the representatives of New South Wales to-day, when it is proposed that a reference of this difficulty should be made a term of the great partnership into which it is proposed that we shall enter, when we are able to offer some inducement to her for the relegation to the federal authority of matters of this sort, to which authority we are equally disposed to refer similar matters. What additional hope is there that we shall be able to secure what is denied to us to-day, if the matter be now deferred? As regards our customs barriers, we agree to remove them most freely; as regards the question of rival competing railway rates, they are to be referred to the jurisdiction of the federal authority; and as regards this matter, I venture to remind honorable members of this Convention, having in the natural order of things some knowledge of how it affects South Australia, that our trade with New South Wales is dependent to a very great extent on the navigability of the River Darling, notwithstanding which the position that is put by some of the representatives of New South Wales to-day is that they have a right, if they so desire, to cut off that trade from us altogether, draining every drop of water out of the Darling.

Mr. LYNE. -
Do you not contemplate extending your railways some day?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
We know what are the rival advantages of water as compared with land carriage. I think it is generally recognised as exceedingly difficult for land carriage to compete with water carriage. We desire to have the benefit of the fair advantage arising from our geographical conditions, and from the bounties of Providence in connexion with the use of river waters. We want nothing more.

Mr. REID. -
Providence meant that there should be some communication, I think.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Yes. In regard to this amendment of Mr. Isaacs, the necessities of irrigation are recognised, and the fairest provision is made for the use of the water for this purpose.

Mr. LYNE. -
And some one else is to tell us how much we may use.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Some one else is to act in the interests of all the parties concerned. If it were a question of fear, we in South Australia might fear to the requisites of navigation. I do trust that the vote which it seems to me must be shortly taken—though even now I should welcome anything in the shape of an amicable arrangement—will have the effect of securing a recognition of the claims of South Australia, which I think it will be admitted have been most moderately urged, to that attention to which I venture to suggest they are entitled.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -
I do not desire to trespass to any great length upon the time of the Convention, having in view the fact that I have twice already expressed my views upon this subject. My purpose, however, in rising is in order to make a proposal which may be assented to by a majority of the committee, and which, if agreed to, will, I believe, be satisfactory to the colony of New South Wales. In the first place, the proposal made by Mr. Isaacs is not one which the representatives of New South Wales could fairly vote for. It leaves the question in a state of doubt and uncertainty which would absolutely prevent enterprise and capital being expended in New South Wales in any works of water conservation, where the waters of navigable streams could be affected, until such time as the Inter-State Commission had given some authoritative decision. I allude to the latter portion of the amendment proposed by Mr. Isaacs, which states—

But so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation to such an extent as, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, is not unjust or unreasonable, having regard to the needs and requirements of any other state for such purposes.

The proposal is in the amendment stated in negative language, but putting it in affirmative language it means that the state may be and shall be prevented from using or conserving water unless such conservation or use is consented to by the Inter-State Commission. That provision is unreasonable and unjust, having regard to the rights of every state. While there is an unknown quantity being imported into this great question of water conservation, who is going to risk the expenditure of £25,000—which is the least sum you can speak of for purposes of water conservation on a large scale—in connexion with these rivers, when you can have no decision as to whether the expenditure is allowable or not till the works are in operation, and the Inter-State Commission is brought into the matter as an arbitrator? If a clause of this character were inserted in the Constitution, it would paralyze all energy and enterprise in New South Wales with regard to the use of the water, and the representatives of Victoria must see that. A proposal is now before the colony of New South Wales for the diversion of a large proportion of the waters of the Murrumbidgee by long channels, which will ultimately restore that water to the Murray River. There will be no actual use of the water except for the stock along the course of the channels, and there will be no loss of water so far as South Australia is concerned. It will, however, be diverted from a stream that would come within the definition of navigable river in this amendment. It may be that a work of that character would never be objected to, but still the promoters of it would not dare to run the risk, knowing that possibly after they had expended £100,000 or £200,000 the federal authority would declare the scheme to be unlawful. The importation into this Constitution of an element of uncertainty in relation to what we consider to be essential to the development of our resources ought not to be tolerated, and I say that the latter part of the amendment, which gives the Inter-State Commission the right to declare any works to be unlawful because they are unreasonable or unjust, would jeopardize the construction in future of any works for water conservation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, it would not affect the works, only the quantity of water you may take at any particular time.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I will put a case to the honorable member, and I think he will see that his interjection is not an answer to my argument. I will take one work, which is the subject at the present time of extensive litigation in New South Wales, without passing any opinion on the litigation itself. The same question arises in this case as would arise under the provision we are now considering. Some enterprising Victorians—I think Sir Samuel Wilson and some others—spent £25,000 in diverting water from the Murrumbidgee River into the Yanko Creek. That water has been diverted for some considerable time past. The persons who have diverted it—the run-holders along the channel—are now applying under our Water Rights Act for certain rights. Certain other persons lower down make a claim for obstruction. A work of that character must interfere to some extent with the navigability of an intermittently navigable stream like the Murrumbidgee. The cutting into the Yanko diverts a large quantity of water from the Murrumbidgee. That water is never restored to the Murrumbidgee, but it enters the Edwards River, which flows into the Murray River. The question of the quantity of water taken from the Murrumbidgee hardly enters into consideration, because the moment the cutting is made to a certain depth, the river is robbed of some of its water. If the cutting is to be of any value at all, it must take away a large body of the water. The question is whether such a cutting as that would be permissible at all; but I venture to say that no person would be so blind to his own interests as to undertake a work of that character without knowing what view the Inter-State Commission would take of it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

May I say that in many of the western states of America they have boards variously constituted to decide precisely similar questions with regard to gigantic works?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I dare say they have, and I dare say the difficulties I am endeavouring to indicate have occurred. As a matter of common sense, they must occur. I put it to honorable members whether men with capital would risk its expenditure in works when they did not know whether those works would be considered to be reasonable or not.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They do it in America.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

They could not do it under this proposal. There is no proposal before the committee by which the Inter-State Commission could give a right and a title to the works before they were constructed. Under all legislation in Australia at the present time, the parties do get a title before the work is constructed. You can apply under the Water Rights Act of New South Wales for a title. In Queensland a similar law has just been passed, and I dare say it is the same in Victoria. The contemplated work is placed before a board. The board examines it, and it grants a licence for the work. Here the proposition is that after the work has been constructed and has been in operation it may be declared illegal, on the ground that it is contrary to some provision in the Constitution Act. That imports an element of doubt and uncertainty, which would be fatal to the exercise of energy and to the expenditure of capital, in regard to what we consider to be a very great necessity in the colony of New South Wales—water conservation, I listened to the remarks of my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) with a great deal of interest, and I hope he will forgive me for again saying that, as far as New South Wales and its representatives are concerned, we do not place much importance upon irrigation. Water conservation, as distinct from irrigation, which will meet the present requirements of the large number of stock that are carried in our country is what we attach most importance to.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The greater includes the less. We use the larger term because it includes with us water conservation and distribution.

[Page 470] starts here

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

There could be no irrigation without conservation. Just as pastoral occupation must largely precede agricultural occupation, so water conservation must precede irrigation. We have arrived at a stage at which water conservation becomes an absolute necessity unless we are prepared to go on as we have been doing during the last three years, losing 10,000,000 sheep each year. This loss is caused not so much by the want of food as by the want of water. The stock have to be crowded together near the tanks and the river frontages. There may be grass in the back blocks, but there is no water. We find it necessary to take the water to where the food is, in order that we may profitably continue the pastoral occupation of the country. Mr. Deakin glanced cursorily at Colonel Home's report, and he will forgive me for saying that that report goes to show that the time has not yet arrived in New South Wales, or practically in Australia, for any irrigation schemes to be put in operation. This is not because the land is unsuitable, or because the water is not there, but simply because we have not a sufficiently large population to make a market for our products. When we have 100,000,000 of people we can go in for irrigation schemes such as have been carried out on the Ganges and on the Nile. Colonel Home's report practically shows, not that irrigation is impossible, but that we must postpone our irrigation until we have got consumers to use up the products obtained by irrigation. So far as water conservation is concerned, Colonel Home proposes or sanctions two schemes, both of which would be jeopardized if Mr. Isaacs' amendment were carried. One of these schemes is to divert a large body of water from the upper portion of the Murrumbidgee, and not to use it for irrigation, but to ran it along through channels in Riverina which have been dry for many years, and return it to the Murray, to replenish and increase the volume of that river for the purposes of navigation. My chief object in rising was to propose a new sub-section in place of subsection (31). I quite concur with the major portion of the speech of the Premier of South Australia. I do not believe in the excision of sub-section (31), because that would leave this question to be decided by the Federal Judicature, and would import the same element of doubt and uncertainty as would be imported by the adoption of the proposal of the Attorney-General of Victoria. It would be fatal, not only to our reputation as framers of the Constitution, but to the interests of those who must engage in these water schemes, to leave this element of uncertainty as to the legal rights of the states, and of the Commonwealth. I am of the opinion that a provision should be embodied in the Constitution putting this question beyond all doubt and uncertainty. In regard to navigation, I agree with my, honorable friends from South Australia and Victoria that there should be very little difficulty, and, therefore, I propose that the maintenance of the navigability of the Murray and its tributaries shall be a matter of federal concern, subject to a condition to which I shall afterwards refer. The improvement of navigation is a proper thing for the Commonwealth to, undertake, with the concurrence of the riparian states; but both the maintenance and improvement of the navigation should be subject to what we have practically agreed is the paramount right—the state powers. I am indebted to the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) for that expression, and I was very much taken with his use of the words "state powers" in place of the words "state rights." The maintenance and improvement of navigation should be a matter of state concern.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In other words, New South Wales should be able to do as she likes.

Mr. REID. -

If she has the state powers. You are always grabbing at something that does not belong to you.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Have we done as we liked with these waters in the past?

We have never done anything with regard to them to injure the rights or powers of our neighbours. And are we to be mistrusted to such an extent that our colony must enter the Union tied hand and foot, and bound every way by regulations of this character? This is not the federal spirit, and if the belief in this feeling gets abroad it will give the death-blow to federation in New South Wales. If it is thought there that these clauses have been put into the Constitution because New South Wales is dreaded and distrusted in the exercise of her undoubted powers, you are not likely to get her people to accept the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

She will not accept a just Constitution; is that what you mean?
Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

She will not accept a Constitution importing an element of doubt and uncertainty, which will be fatal to the use of these rivers for irrigation. It would be cheaper for New South Wales to buy out the trade of South Australia than to permit this interference with her rights. It will be cheaper for us to pay South Australia so many million pounds for her trade on the Darling than to sacrifice what we consider to be an element of vitality. We have no intention to use the waters of these rivers so unreasonably as to prejudice navigation. What we dread is that rival interests may spring up - not state interests, but mercantile interests - which will bring cases into court in which it will be asserted - and the assertions may be hard to answer - that New South Wales is responsible for the low state of the rivers because of her water conservation and irrigation works, whereas this low state of the rivers may be solely attributable to droughts. We may be made responsible for the changes and vicissitudes of the season, if merchants are empowered to raise these questions in regard to matters affecting their pockets. Upon what does the maintenance of the navigability of the Murray and its tributaries depend? Largely upon the snagging of the rivers. My honorable friends from South Australia know that. The Darling could be made navigable for at least three months longer in each year if the bed of the river were properly snagged. Of course there is occasional laxity on the part of the New South Wales Government in carrying out this work to keep open a river for the benefit of South Australia; but we are quite willing that the Federal Government should have the power to come in and render the water-way navigable by removing the obstructions which are brought down by every flood. With regard to the improvement of the navigability by the construction of locks and in other ways, we believe that to be a matter of state concern, and one in which the states that are interested should concur. I have no doubt that it would be found to the interest of New South Wales to agree to any reasonable proposal for the improvement of the navigability of either the Murray, the Murrumbidgee, or the Darling. I have pointed out, in common with my colleagues, that we have a provision relating to the occupation of our Crown lands, under which, upon the assessment of the rents of such lands in the western division, regard is had to the cost of carriage to the nearest regular market. If the Federal Parliament could so improve the navigation of the Darling as to cheapen the carriage of wool from our stations upon the Darling we should benefit, because we should get more rent for our land; but I say that the concurrence of the riparian states should be obtained when these improvements are suggested. It would be a very serious thing for Victoria and New South Wales if a federal project were put on foot having for its object the expenditure of some millions of pounds to make a permanently good entrance for shipping at the mouth of the Murray, because we should then have the waters that ought to be conserved in that river quickly flowing out to sea; and as you gave a better outflow at the mouth, so you would have a lower level of water in the river, which would, of course, be detrimental to navigation. With regard to the latter portion of my amendment—that making the maintenance and improvement of the navigability of the Murray and its tributaries subject to the state powers over the waters thereof for local conservation and use—it does not import any unreasonable use of the waters, it only imports that the state powers now possessed and exercised shall continue to be possessed and may be exercised by the states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Would not there be the very element of uncertainty with regard to those words which you object to in Mr. Isaacs' amendment?
Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
No, because I do not use any such words as "unjust or unreasonable."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
But what are the state powers?
Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
The powers now possessed by the states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We are not agreed on them. What are they in your opinion?
Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
They have been put by Mr. McMillan, who said that South Australia has the power to drain the Murray dry if she likes to exercise it, that New South Wales has the power to drain the Darling dry if she likes to exercise it, and that Victoria has the power to drain the Goulburn dry if she likes to exercise it. But who, about to embark into federation, would accuse any colony of daring to do any such thing? Surely we never came here with such doubt and suspicion as to believe that we should have a provision against those things in the Constitution? If we were obliged to provide against every contingency of that character we should have to frame a Constitution which would be a monument of disgrace to the colonies concerned, a Constitution teeming right throughout with provisions of all kinds against things which no colony would dare to do. Therefore it is quite unnecessary to make any provision for things which it has never been proposed to do, and which no honest man believes ever would be done. I hope my amendment will be carried, because it is a fair compromise on all the matters that are exercising our minds, and because I believe that it offers the only practical and agreeable solution of the case, as far as New South Wales is concerned.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

The atmosphere outside the House is rather foggy, and the debate has resolved itself into a somewhat similar condition. After listening to the Premier of New South Wales and other learned lawyers, I shall not even quote the celebrated case of the spring and the brook, or imitate those honorable members, some of whom, like Tennyson's brook, would, I believe, be able to go on for ever. I intend to put my remarks in as few words as possible. Mr. Carruthers has proposed what he considers a fair compromise, but that compromise, boiled down, really means that New South Wales is to retain not only all the rights she has, but also all the rights that she says she has.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

South Australia will got the same, and a great deal more.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

The honorable member's amendment says that the rights of the riparian states, which are not interpreted, shall be preserved, and that the navigability of the Murray and its tributaries shall be preserved. The last two lines of his innocent amendment adds-

But subject to the state powers over the waters thereof for local conservation and use.

Those latter words seem to me to put the whole thing back to the position at which it started. What are state powers? Have we all come here as representatives of the various colonies to adhere strictly not only to the letter of the law as to assumed or imaginary rights, but to stick to those state powers that we think have been given to us by our original charter? Or have we come here with some idea of federation? Is there any sentiment of federation whatever in the representatives of New South Wales in reference to this question? We have heard from them over and over again the idea of trusting to some extent the Federal Parliament, but here, in this particular case, we have heard all through, from the commencement to the finish of this debate, but one thing from New South Wales—that they will not budge a single inch; and not only do they suggest that they will not agree to a fair and reasonable compromise such as is proposed by the Attorney-General of Victoria, but also that subsection (31) of clause 52 as it now stands should be eliminated from the Bill, because subsection (1) of the same clause covers the whole ground.

Mr. BARTON. -
It covers a lot more.

Mr. SOLOMON.

I am really surprised at the leader of the Convention and other legal members, and, with some temerity, I venture to question their genuineness in the interpretation they are giving to the Convention of the meaning of subsection (1). It seems to me exceedingly strange that, after fighting about this sub-section (31), which, at least, preserves the navigation of the Murray from where the river first bounds Victoria and New South Wales, we should be told it is all covered by sub-section (1). But if subsection (1) means all that these learned gentlemen of the law have told us, why is it that we have heard so little about it until the last moment, when they are cornered?

Mr. BARTON.

That is not the fact. I have all along said that the proper course was to abolish this sub-section, and stick to sub-section (1).

Mr. SOLOMON.

Will the leader of the Convention or the Premier of New South Wales say that sub-section (1) means as much, or anything like as much, as sub-section (31)?

Mr. BARTON.

It means more, because it gives you everything that sub-section (31) gives you, except the use of the waters, and it secures you a great deal more in the way of navigation, because it takes the navigatory power over the whole of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SOLOMON.

A very wide meaning may be given to sub section (1), but almost all the legal gentlemen of the Convention-perhaps I was wrong in saying all-have argued right through that subsection (1), which in very broad language gives power to the Federal Parliament for the regulation of trade and commerce with other countries and among the other states, covers the ground in reference to rivers. Very few of those honorable members have taken that ground until the last few days. It has been their refuge after every other argument has failed. Take this particular sub-section, which may be interpreted in the future by the Federal Judiciary, which, we hope, will have to interpret the Constitution we are now framing, as covering everything and giving full rights between the states, in such a way as to equitably deal with all the states in regard to their commerce and the navigation of their rivers-there is hardly a member of the Convention who will not admit that there is a very strong element of doubt as to whether sub-section (1) will ever be interpreted by the Federal Judiciary in such a way as to conserve the interests of South Australia. There are some honorable members, I am sorry to say, who are willing to accept this interpretation, who are willing to give away the little bit of consideration that the representatives of South Australia have fought for right through-that consideration in sub-section (31) which gives to the federal authority, without any doubt, without any fear of misconstruction, the control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea. They would give away that one right-that one little bit of substance-for a mere shadow, which has been presented to them by some eloquent, earnest, and undoubtedly clever legal gentlemen who occupy seats in this Convention. Whether the amendment of Mr. Isaacs will or will not be accepted I do not know. I shall certainly give my vote for his amendment—with some slight alterations perhaps—but I do earnestly appeal, not only to honorable members representing South Australia, but also to other honorable members, not to let slip sub-section (31) until we are absolutely assured that we have something equally as definite, equally as clear in its interpretation, to place before the people who sent us here. If the representatives of South Australia were to go back to that colony with this particular sub-section eliminated, especially after this Bill has been before the Parliament of that colony, without any suggestion that that sub-section covers the whole ground, and to say then to the people-"We have given away sub-section (31), which certainly gave you-and we have accepted in its place subsection (1), which gives an indefinite and a very questionable control of the commerce, and we take that as a full interpretation," I fear very much that South Australians would hesitate before they accepted a Constitution so framed. The honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) has told us, in a style peculiarly his own, that it would be better for New South Wales to buy out the whole of the trade of South Australia than to give way one inch in reference to the navigation of the waters of the rivers. Of course we know that New South Wales could buy out the whole of the trade of South Australia. Probably she could purchase South Australia in fee simple, and then Victoria, and the balance of her unused funds this wealthy colony could invest in consols, and reduce the taxation on her people. All this might be done by New South Wales. We do not want them to purchase the trade of South Australia, we do not want them to give anything but what is just and federal and right; and the representatives of South Australia have not asked for anything but what is just and fair, and have shown their idea of justice and their federal spirit by proposing from start to finish that the whole of this question as to the rights of the colony having the river passing through its territory lower down than the Darling should be distinctly and clearly placed under the control of the Federal Parliament. We might very well contrast this attitude of South Australia and her representatives, in regard to a question of this kind, with the attitude of the representatives of New South Wales all through in this particular debate. It has been one continuous cry-"We have the rivers, they pass through our territory; we hold them, and we will stick to them." It has not been a question of whether this particular sub-section which is submitted or that sub-section will suit New South Wales. It has been a question with the representatives of New South Wales that they have their claws on the rivers, and intend to stick to them as far as they possibly can. But in this one important point - and undoubtedly it is a very important point to South Australia - New South Wales will not consent even to grant the small concession demanded as to the keeping open of the navigation of the rivers to South Australia. Now, what are the arguments used by the Minister of Lands for New South Wales, in reference to this particular question of irrigation? At first we heard from that honorable gentleman and others that the question of irrigation in New South Wales was one of paramount importance, that they had thousands, if not hundreds of thousands, of acres of land which might be rendered fertile by using the waters of the Darling and of the Murrumbidgee for the purpose of irrigation.

The control and regulation of the navigation of the River Murray, and the use of the waters thereof from where it first forms the boundary between Victoria and New South Wales to the sea;

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Not by me. You are quoting somebody else.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
By other members of the delegation from New South Wales. Undoubtedly the first argument placed before this Convention, and reiterated by member after member representing New South Wales, was that irrigation was of immense importance to that colony. I think honorable members will hear me out that that was the first ground taken. But the Minister of Lands for New South Wales, who should be the one to know to what uses the lands of that colony can best be put, tells us to-day that the question of irrigation is not of so much importance, because there have been arguments over and over again from other members of the Convention that irrigation by pumping has not been a success throughout Australia, but that it is in order to supply the millions or hundreds of thousands of starving sheep and cattle in New South Wales with water in dry seasons that they desire to retain the control of these waters absolutely.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Without which you would have no trade at all down the Murray.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Then again, the honorable member told us that these waters will be absolutely returned to the Murray, or almost all of them, in another direction. I do not understand this shifting of ground. First we have the question of irrigation works with a view to agricultural settlement, with a view to adding to the fertility of the country, but it is well known, as has been pretty well shown by previous speakers, that irrigation by pumping has so far throughout Australia proved to be a bitter failure, to the cost of Victoria and South Australia, with their experimental settlements at Mildura and Renmark. So far from enabling the settlers to profitably occupy the land, and to compete with California and other places in the growth of fruits and so forth, irrigation has been an absolute failure. The distance of the settlers on the Murray from the markets, and the cost of from 25s. to 30s. an acre for irrigation by pumping, have precluded the possibility of their competing with California in these matters. We know that not only these two settlements but that other settlements on the Murray which have been established by the South Australian Government have been absolute and utter failures. The representatives of New South Wales have retreated from that particular ground altogether. They do not require the waters of these rivers for the purpose of irrigation, for the purpose of agricultural settlement, but for, the support of the pastoral industry in the pastoral country. Will any honorable member with colonial experience tell me that he knows of pastoral country being profitably occupied, of sheep or cattle being profitably grown, in irrigated country, except in some of the northern and north-western parts of Queensland, where the irrigation has been by gravitation from artesian bores? With that exception, I think, I may safely challenge any honorable member to show me where the occupation of pastoral country, especially in the present state of the market for pastoral produce, has been rendered profitable by irrigation by pumping. What are the conditions of the country on the borders of the Murray which they are going to irrigate? Are the levels such as to permit of irrigation by gravitation except at a tremendous cost?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
I never referred to irrigation at all. I referred to water conservation and the supply of water in the creeks for the stock to drink.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Precisely; water conservation for the supply of stock over a vast area.
This water has to be conserved in natural lakes, which are dry in most seasons. The water is to be carried from these lakes over miles of country. I have seen sketches of what is proposed by the New South Wales Government. They propose to carry the water over stretches of dry country for miles and miles. Will the honorable member say seriously that he believes pastoral occupation can be profitably conducted under such circumstances?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
I did not relate such ridiculous circumstances.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
Unfortunately, those are the circumstances. Having retreated from the position that the water was necessary for irrigation for agricultural settlers, honorable members say they must have this water for the benefit of the pastoral country.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
What does the trade of South Australia consist of except the carrying of the wool from this pastoral country, and the wool cannot be grown on the sheep's back unless there is a water supply.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
At the present prices it would not pay to grow wool under such circumstances, and such an experiment would be disastrous to the people of New South Wales. If this Convention prevents the possibility of such an experiment being made it will confer a benefit upon the people of New South Wales. It has been tried elsewhere, and never without failure. The honorable member said that this would not decrease the flow of water in the Murray; that the water will be afterwards returned to the Murray with little loss.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
I referred to a particular place.

Mr. SOLOMON. -
I thank the honorable member for his interjection, because it reminds me that while he and his colleagues are fighting so strenuously against the reference of this important question to the arbitration of the Federal Parliament, he told us of an instance in his own country where some private persons had obtained water rights, and had spent £25,000 in diverting the waters; but they now have to face litigation in the colony, because they are interfering with the rights of those below. If any honorable member of this Convention could possibly give us an instance to show how necessary it is to provide something in this Constitution to deal with water rights between states, it is the very instance which the honorable member has quoted, where even in their-own colony the diversion of the water has been fruitful in litigation. The Premier of New South Wales expressed the opinion that the first sub-section of clause 52 would do all that the smaller colonies or South Australia really demanded. If that is the case, what objection in reason can that honorable gentleman or his colleagues have to place this matter, which they say is fully covered, in a very clear and convincing manner? What reasonable objection can they have to place it absolutely beyond doubt, as it is placed by the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria? Either they do not believe that the clause does cover the ground or they think there is an element of doubt which may be construed for the benefit of New South Wales if there is any controversy on the subject. I do not think that the demands of South Australia can be termed unreasonable. We have made no demand whatever to interfere with any possible irrigation or water conservation works to be constructed in future by New South Wales. All that has been claimed by the representatives of South Australia all through is that whatever works may be constructed, whatever may be necessary for the benefit of New South Wales and the development of her natural resources, shall receive fair and due consideration. They say this Convention is not the place where we can state what that consideration shall be in absolute words. No Constitution that we can frame could provide for contingencies which may arise in reference to this serious question. But, as pointed out by Mr. Holder in an interjection, we, an absolute minority in the House of Representatives under the proposed Constitution, are content to trust to the justice and equity, and the spirit of fair play, which will, we hope, be the prominent characteristics of Members of the Federal Parliament with respect to our rights, whereas the great colony of New South Wales, which will be represented in the House of Representatives under the Constitution by three times as many members, fears to trust the Federal Parliament to construe anything of this kind. The Premier of New South Wales said, to my mind with questionable taste, that the honorable members who represented certain colonies in this Convention which had no interest in this particular question should stand aside; that they should leave the arena clear, and should be extremely careful how they interfered in a question of such great moment between New South Wales and the other colonies. Is that the attitude that that honorable member and his colleagues intend to take in the Federal Parliament where these small colonies are also to take part? Is that the attitude to be taken up in this Convention by those colonies which are not expressly and vitally interested in a question of this magnitude? Is that the attitude which the smaller colonies are expected to take in the great Federation we are now trying to bring about? Is it that the smaller colonies, unless they are vitally interested, are to be glibly talked over by the eloquence of gentlemen representing the larger colonies? And are they to stay their hands from doing what they have plainly told us is in their opinion simple justice? I say that the small states, who are not interested in a question of this kind, are best able to judge its merits, and to stand between the colonies most deeply interested, and which have most to fight for. The Hon. the Attorney-General of Victoria has submitted an amendment, or, rather, a sub-section to take the place of sub-section (31), which I think might with some modifications meet the wishes of the whole of the members of this Convention, even of those representing New South Wales, who express themselves as fully prepared to give way on the question of the navigability of the rivers. There is, however, one point which might, perhaps, be pointed out, and which ought to receive consideration. That is, that in regard to the proposal of the amendment to leave it for the opinion of the Inter-State Commission as to whether the use of waters for irrigation is not unjust or unreasonable. Now, as yet we have not decided upon the functions of this Inter-State Commission, and it appears to me that a question of such magnitude as the one we are now discussing—the question of the conservation of water for the purposes of irrigation—should either be left to the Federal Parliament or to the Federal Judicature to be decided. I would prefer it to be left to the Federal Parliament so far as I am concerned, because the Federal Parliament would have the opportunity of examining into the claims of each individual colony, and if they failed to come to a reasonable agreement, undoubtedly it would be a question which might be submitted to the Federal Judicature. The amendment of Mr. Isaacs seems to me to be a fair compromise—a compromise brought forward by a gentleman who has no individual interest in the question, and who represents a colony which has no real interest in the matter before us. It is a compromise which, I think, should recommend itself to this Convention. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be agreed to, subject to the alteration which I have suggested. Before I sit down, Sir Richard Baker, I should like to ask you, in putting this question, to put it in such a way that if the amendment suggested by Mr. Isaacs be not agreed to, we shall have an opportunity of taking a fair vote upon the question as to whether sub-section (31) as it stands should remain in the Bill or be excised.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The first question I shall put to the committee is, that sub-section (31) stand part of the clause. If this sub-section be struck out, I shall put the suggested new sub-sections in the order in which they have been suggested.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I would point out that that will make the position of some of the representatives somewhat difficult.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is because it is the order of Parliament, I suppose.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

No; I have as much respect for the due order of Parliament and for parliamentary procedure as the leader of the Convention has, but the position is that, without knowing how the vote may go upon the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria, I do not wish to vote for the excision of subsection (31), which I have already stated gives South Australia something. With great respect to the legal gentlemen who have expressed a contrary view, I think that the people whom I represent will think sub-section (31) better than nothing at all, and therefore I do not wish to see that sub-section excised without an amendment, unless the amendment which I think covers the whole ground better is negati

The CHAIRMAN. -

Sub-section (31) is now under consideration. We have treated all the sub-sections of clause 52 as clauses, and the rules of Parliament in reference to clauses are the rules which we have adopted in reference to these sub-sections. The question I shall put is that sub-section (31) stand part of the clause. Any honorable member can move an amendment to that. No honorable member, however, has yet moved an amendment.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Is not the proposal of Mr. Isaacs an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. -

No; it is not an amendment, but a proposal in substitution of sub-section (31). It is, however, competent for any honorable member to move an amendment to sub-section (31).

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not know whether it will be more desirable that we should adjourn now, or whether some decision should be arrived at upon this question, which has taken up so much of the time of the Convention. For my own part, I think it desirable that we should take a vote-at any rate, we should arrive at some understanding upon a matter which has occupied such an amount of time. I am afraid that it may be thought, and rightly thought, that, as compared with other great matters which have to be dealt with by this Convention, too much time has been given to the consideration of this river question.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

If you do not take a division now, you will have another big debate tomorrow.

Mr. BARTON. -

I consider it an important question, especially as it is one which will affect the colony to which I belong; but I think that the time has arrived when something should be done. And now I would like to express my regret that, for the first time since this Convention met in Adelaide in April last year, there has been a member of this Convention who has ventured to question the genuineness and sincerity of the action of his colleagues. This,
I regret to say, has been done by the representative of South Australia (Mr.
Solomon). All I can say is that I think that every one of those who act with me will agree with me when I say that I resent—and resent very strongly—what I consider to be an imputation which has been made upon our genuineness and sincerity in connexion with this matter. Every member of the Convention to whom I have spoken knows very well the stand which I have taken in favour of the striking out of this sub-section, and the maintenance of sub-section (1) in its integrity. That is what I have always affirmed, and what I have spoken in support of since the beginning of this Convention. The stand which I have taken is no new stand. Many honorable members are aware that at the conference which took place on the day of the public holiday, a little while ago, I expressed my opinion upon the subject plainly. I think that Mr. Gordon, for instance, will bear me out in that. Therefore, I do not think it is right for any honorable member, on data which must be obviously insufficient, to prefer a charge of insincerity against his fellow representatives simply from the fact that he may not have been consulted upon a matter which

[P.479] starts here

has occupied the time of others. It is our bounden duty to credit our fellow representatives with perfect honesty; but beyond saying that I resent the imputation which has been made by Mr. Solomon, I have no more to say with regard to what he has stated.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

As a matter of personal explanation, I should like to say that I did not impute to the leader of the Convention any insincerity whatever.

Mr. BARTON. -

You imputed it to the delegates for New South Wales generally.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I made a statement which I do not intend to qualify one iota, but I desire to explain it in order that I may not be misunderstood. It has been asserted by some of the representatives of New South Wales that the sub-section as it stands covers the whole ground, and gives power to adjudicate upon this question of the navigation of the rivers. If those representatives who have so spoken are absolutely sincere they should show their sincerity by making the matter clear in the Constitution. That is what I desire to say with regard to them, and that has been said not only by myself but by other honorable members. If there is no difference in sub-section (1), why not make the matter perfectly clear?

Mr. BARTON. -

Does not the honorable member see that if we substitute Mr. Isaacs' amendment for sub-section (1) it at once raises the provincial question, about which New South Wales stands firm?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

At this time of day I do not intend to re-open the discussion. I merely state the logical conclusion I draw from the action of the honorable members who say that sub-section (1) gives all the necessary power to the Federal Parliament. If they decline to put that in plain English they show their insincerity.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think I can in a few words show the untenableness of the honorable member's position if he thinks that sub-section (1) and Mr. Isaacs' amendment are identical.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I did not say that.

Mr. BARTON. -

Or that they are the same in effect.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I did not say that either.

Mr. BARTON. -

The charge of insincerity comes to nothing unless the honorable member's statement amounts to that.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I say, put in other words to make it plain.

Mr. BARTON. -

Very well. The honorable member has argued for 45 minutes that those other words are to be Mr. Isaacs' amendment. Does he not see that if we adopt the amendment in place of the power to regulate trade and commerce, we raise the whole question of riparian rights between the states, which riparian rights we say, and have said from the beginning, are non-existent? How can the honorable member adhere to the accusation of insincerity when that is pointed out?
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I would ask the leader of the Convention not to do more to-night than take a vote on the question of the retention of sub-section.

Mr. BARTON. -
I think we will go as far as we can.

The CHAIRMAN. -
If the sub-section is retained no other sub-section inconsistent with it can be inserted in the clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I understand that it is the desire of honorable members to take a test vote on the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. SYMON. -
There are other amendments.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I only want to fall in with the views of the committee. I would suggest that a test vote be taken on the question of the omission of all the words after "The" in the sub-section, with the view to inserting my amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -
If the question is put as one of insertion, and it is carried, that will mean the adoption of the honorable member's amendment.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes. I should be perfectly willing to have the question put in that way, but I do not desire to anticipate other honorable members who think that another course would be preferable.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I hold strongly to the view that, as we have so many amendments before us, the proper course would be to first strike out the subsection. Then, when we have cleared the ground, any one of the amendments may be dealt with.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I am quite agreeable.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Do I understand that the honorable member does not wish to press his amendment?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No, I wish to fall in with the general desire of the committee.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
I do not purpose detaining the Convention, but so much time has been spent over this subject that we should not now rush to a decision. I would respectfully suggest that we should to-night simply take a test vote on the question of whether the subsection should be retained. I do not think it would be wise to proceed now to take a division upon all the amendments that have been submitted. It is unfortunate that we have had to take up so much time in discussing this question, but it is of so much importance that it could scarcely have been dealt with in less time. I think that honorable members would be in a better position to vote on the amendments after a night's reflection.

Sub-section (31) was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I understand that Mr. Glynn wishes me now to put his amendment. The sub-section he suggests is as follows:-

The maintenance and, with the concurrence of the riparian states, the improvement of the navigability of the Rivers Murray and Darling.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I would ask the leader of the Convention whether it would not be advisable now to report progress? My amendment has been partly accepted by New South Wales, but I do not wish to interfere with the other amendments by taking a vote on the question to-night. No good can be done by undue haste. There should not be any further general debate, but as the amendments are put they must be specifically examined, even in their wording. I would ask the leader of the Convention to consider whether under the circumstances it would not be in the interests of the proposed Commonwealth to adjourn the further discussion of the question.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

No one will accuse me of desiring to unduly lengthen the proceedings of the Convention, but I would join with Mr. Glynn in urging upon our leader that it would be wise in the interests of the Commonwealth to report progress. There are a large number of amendments, and very few of us understand the bearing of one as compared with another. I have seen a rough draft of a further amendment, which, if it could be agreed to, would probably settle the whole question. It might be possible to-morrow to formulate such an amendment as would be accepted with unanimity, and, under the circumstances, I would suggest to Mr. Barton that he should now consent to progress being reported.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Mr. Glynn has made, perhaps, an important suggestion, that is, as regards the substance of his amendment. I am not going to say at the present moment that I do not object to that amendment. My position has been from the first, and I think, notwithstanding anything that has passed, honorable members will say that I have maintained it with perfect honesty, that the subsection relating to trade and commerce is the most federal provision that we can adopt, and that we should strike out all other sub-sections which may seem to restrict or limit it. That is the true federal position. An important suggestion has now been made, and perhaps Mr. Glynn's amendment might be improved if some such words as these were added—"so as not to restrict the powers conferred by sub-section (1)." But, in any ease, I hold that there should be no subsection beyond sub-section (1), and that that would best conserve the interests of all of us. Still

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

WESTERN AUSTRALIAN STATISTICS.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia) laid on the table papers containing financial and statistical facts relating to the colony of Western Australia, and moved that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at eleven minutes past five o'clock.
Thursday, 3rd February, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.
COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.
Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on clause 52 (Powers of the Parliament), and on Mr. Glynn's amendment to substitute for sub-section (31) (omitted the previous day), the following sub-section-
The maintenance and, with the concurrence of the riparian states, the improvement of the navigability of the Rivers Murray and Darling.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
As I mentioned last night, the first part of Mr. Carruthers' amendment practically adopts this amendment, the only difference being that the word "tributaries" is substituted for the word "Darling," after the word "Murray." Of the other amendments suggested, I personally would prefer the one proposed by Mr. Isaacs. I think, it might facilitate matters if I move mine now, and see if something can be tacked on to the terms of my amendment which would practically carry the effect of Mr. Isaacs' amendment. At the same time, of course, it would facilitate the consideration of the amendment tabled by Mr. Carruthers, because the carrying of these words would be the carrying of half of Mr. Carruthers' amendment. Honorable members will see that in the alternative amendment which I am suggesting, I have put in a definition which, I think, covers the ground so clearly stated by Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor—that South Australia is getting, under subsection (1), everything that colony is reasonably entitled to, and practically everything which it demands. My fear is that the American decisions may not in their fulness be extended to the Australian rivers by the Federal Judicature, and there is some doubt whether the intermittency of the flow of the Darling would entitle it to be called a navigable stream within the meaning of those decisions. But I understood Mr. Barton to say that he would be willing to bring the Darling within the scope of those decisions, and that he believes those decisions do extend to the Darling. So I have suggested the adoption of a definition not going beyond the scope of those decisions. After my first amendment

I have suggested as an alternative the following:-
A river shall be deemed to be navigable if at times its waters, by themselves or their connexions with other waters, form and are used as a continuous channel for commerce with other nations or among states.

That definition, I believe, is the essence of the American decisions, but it will bring within the scope of those decisions the River Darling. The only point of doubt as regards the Darling would be the intermittency of its flow, but, as I understand that Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor are willing that the Darling should come within the scope of those decisions, I have put the matter clearly, by way of definition. I would suggest, however, to meet the views of others, an alteration of the wording of that amendment, so as to make it read as follows:-

For the purposes of sub-section (1) waters shall be deemed navigable for trade and commerce which are in fact navigated continually or at times for trade and commerce with other nations or among states either by themselves or by their connexions with other waters.

The effect is the same, only the wording is considered by some to be more concise and clear.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think that is an endeavour to catch the gist of the American decisions.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is exactly what my intention is. I am personally willing not to insert anything more than a definition which will explain, in the terms and to the extent to which Mr. Barton says he will go, the meaning of sub-section (1), as regards trade and commerce. I am willing to accept that, and I believe that that is the position which the representatives of New South Wales take up. They are willing to grant us the provisions of sub-section (1) to the extent of those decisions but I wish to relieve the matter from possible doubt. I merely make that suggestion at present, and in order to facilitate the consideration of other amendments-Mr. Carruthers' and Mr. Isaacs'-for which, in the event of mine not being adopted, I will vote, I now beg to submit my first amendment.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

We spent practically the whole of yesterday in considering the amendment suggested by the Attorney-General of Victoria, and I think my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) will see that it would be more convenient if he postponed his suggestion until we have dealt with the amendment of Mr. Isaacs. We are fresh from that amendment; we have had a long discussion on it, and if it is settled the whole thing will be settled. I am sure that the honorable member wishes to assist the Convention in every way he can, and I would suggest to him the expediency of practically going on with the discussion initiated yesterday, and dealing with Mr. Isaacs' amendment.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I am entirely in the hands of the committee. If Mr. Glynn is satisfied with that arrangement, I am perfectly willing to go on with my amendment, but if he is not, I am quite willing to postpone it.
The CHAIRMAN. -
Mr. Glynn must withdraw his amendment before Mr. Isaacs' amendment can be put.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I quite understand that, but I think it would facilitate matters if the committee would now deal with my amendment, which will virtually carry Mr. Isaacs' amendment.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We should get complicated if we took that course.
Mr. GLYNN. -
If Mr. Isaacs wishes me to do so, I will withdraw my amendment.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You had better withdraw it.
Mr. GLYNN. -
Very well; by leave of the committee, I beg to withdraw my amendment.
Mr. Glynn's amendment was withdrawn.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
The position I desire to take up is simply this—that I have no wish to press anything that the representatives of South Australia do not want, and that the representatives of New South Wales are unwilling to give. It seems to me that the amendment I have suggested is fair, not only to those two colonies, but also to the whole of Australia. The first objection that I see, from an Australian point of view, to the amendment Mr. Glynn has submitted, and which is practically the first part of Mr. Carruthers' amendment, is that it does not give any weight whatever to the truly Australian question, both present and future, of irrigation. None whatever. It leaves navigation the primary consideration of the federal authority.
Mr. REID. -
And, remember, it makes the Federal Parliament a harbor trust for every river in the Commonwealth, and it will have some nice bars to clear away in the rivers of our colony at the federal expense.
Mr. ISAACS. -
That might be so. At all events, it gives no weight whatever to the question of irrigation, which is all-important to New South Wales, and, it seems to me, to South Australia, and, in a large measure, to Victoria.

Mr. SYMON. -

But some of us do not agree with putting the irrigation of the colonies under the control of the Federation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That may be so. But that is one great difference between the two amendments. The next objection is that merely defining what is a navigable river will not make the application of the decisions certain at all. It will make one matter certain, and that is the meaning of what is a navigable river. But I would like Mr. Glynn to bear this in mind, that it is not merely the definition of "navigable" river that will be in doubt, but there is something more in doubt, and it is this: In sub-section (1) of clause 52 we have reference made to trade and commerce. Now, the United States courts, when they started 100 years ago to define that sub-section, decided it from the very large point of view-a startlingly large point of view, at first sight, at all events-that the regulation of trade and commerce included the improvement of navigable rivers. Now, that may be a very broad and proper view to take. It was the view taken by the United States courts, but it is by no means certain that the Privy Council will be prepared to go that length, especially in view of the considerably different wording of the provision in clause 52 as compared with the corresponding provision in the United States Constitution. We have no guarantee at all in this Constitution that the Privy Council-and remember the appeal lies to the Privy Council in disputes between States-will decide that trade and commerce has that enormously extended meaning given to it under the American Constitution. And suppose it should turn out that the court of last resort did not take that wide view, but the more narrow view that it has taken in many cases under the Canadian Constitution, as pointed out by Mr. Symon-suppose the Privy Council restricted itself to the more literal definition of the Constitution and said:"This is a British Act of Parliament, passed in the ordinary way by the British Legislature, and is now interpreted by the Privy Council in the ordinary way, granting, of course, that it is a Constitution, but still it is a British Act of Parliament"-and suppose the Privy Council decided that those words "trade and commerce," though including everything directly concerning trade and commerce, did not go so far as to enable the Federation to take water from rivers and enlarge the carrying capacity of rivers within the state, even though those rivers are the highways of commerce, what position would we be in?

Mr. REID. -

Then you do look forward to the Federal Government taking up the task of clearing all the rivers at the expense of the Commonwealth?
Mr. ISAACS. -
I did not say that.

Mr. REID. -
You want the power.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No, not even that; but I do admit that, so far as rivers which are navigable between states are concerned—not for purely state rivers.

Mr. REID. -
Is there no distinction in your amendment as to localities?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes; the navigability of rivers which by themselves or in connexion with other rivers are navigable permanently or intermittently for trade and commerce with other countries or among the several states. That will leave outside the sphere of the federal authority all the purely state rivers.

Mr. REID. -
That points the objection to your proposal as to two rivers, belonging to one colony. You take these powers ostensibly for navigation, but really to meet the difficulty of South Australia.

Mr. ISAACS. -
No; my right honorable friend is, I think, departing a little bit from his conceded position of yesterday, because he said we are willing that under the first

Mr. REID. -
I never made such a statement. I doubted the construction put upon that matter by the leader of the Convention. As this is a matter of some importance, I should like to be allowed to explain that what I said, and say still, and what I am willing to say in all places, is that in the Constitution, in order that there may be no lawyers dispute about it, we in New South Wales are prepared to say that, as to every inch of water we have got which is navigable, permanently or intermittently, we agree that there shall be unfettered and absolute equality of navigation as between ourselves and all the other colonies. We are prepared to concede perfect equality in the use of our rivers to the whole Commonwealth when they are navigable, whether permanently or intermittently. We are prepared to guarantee that in express words in the Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That I am sure is not sufficient. I would like to point out what that means. My right honorable friend says that during certain seasons of the year, when the Darling is not navigable, the federal authority shall not have the right to make it navigable, shall not have the right to improve it, and unless it is naturally navigable, or is only as navigable as New South Wales chooses to make it, nobody shall make it more navigable or improve it; and New South, Wales can take every ounce of water that South Australia gets now.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Does not "with other countries," include all our local rivers with bar harbors?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Certainly; that is the same as in America.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I thought you said a moment ago that it only referred to rivers running between the states, such as we have been discussing. The point is a very important one. Would the federal authority have the right to come in and improve rivers which, while they are purely local, have bar harbors? These surely are navigable rivers with other countries.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What I meant to exclude were purely state rivers, which did not affect inter-state or international commerce. In America there is no doubt about that. What I wanted to exclude were rivers-purely within a state in their flow, in their effect., in their operation.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

There are no such rivers.

Mr ISAACS-Then the question is pointless. The first part of my amendment puts beyond all doubt the right of the federal authority to deal with the rivers as in America. There is a diversity of opinion, and I do not wish to put any honorable member in a position of more difficulty than the nature of the case demands. It has been suggested to me by some honorable members, and I am willing to accept their views, that we should put my amendment portion by portion. The first portion down to the word "states" undoubtedly refers merely to the decisions as they stand in America, and it puts beyond doubt the question, which I think ought to be put beyond doubt, that the federal authorities should have the right to control the navigability, of, at all events, these inter-state and international rivers. Therefore, with permission, I will put the first part of the proposed amendment, so that we may have a really genuine vote, as to which there can be no misapprehension, as to whether New South Wales is willing that there should be inserted in express terms in this Constitution the same power that exists under the American Constitution.

Mr. LYNE. -
I say decidedly, no.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If New South Wales is not willing to do that-

Mr. BARTON. -
Willing to do what?

Mr. ISAACS. -
To put in express terms the power that undoubtedly exists by virtue of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the United States. That is the first part.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Put the amendment first down to the word "irrigation," and then test the other matter.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not think that would do; you cannot put the second part first. I have been asked to put the amendment in the shape I have suggested, although personally I do not care in which way it is done; but in order to have it properly tested, so that we may judge of the merits of the question more properly, and so that no person maybe unnecessarily embarrassed in his vote, I propose to put the first part of the amendment first, and afterwards the second part.

Mr. LYNE. -
I think that will embarrass a great many votes.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It may embarrass my honorable friend, but in a proper way.

Mr. LYNE. -
You will never embarrass me, I promise you, because I will go straight.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I therefore beg to move-

That the following words be inserted in lieu of sub-section (31), which has been struck out: The navigability of rivers which by themselves or in connexion with other rivers are in fact permanently or intermittently navigable for trade and commerce with other countries or among the several states."

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I propose to move a short amendment, which my honorable and learned friend himself indicated the other day, so as to make it quite clear that in introducing these words, with which I agree, we do not limit in any way the powers conferred by sub-section (1) of the clause. I beg to move-

That the following words be inserted at the beginning of the proposed amendment-"without limiting sub-section (1)."

We must all have been greatly impressed by the views expressed by the honorable members (Mr. Barton and Mr. O'Connor), and I have some doubt whether the amendment would have a limiting effect upon sub-section (1); but, after the very emphatic opinion expressed by the honorable member (Sir John Downer) yesterday, an opinion to which I attach great weight, it seems to me that the representatives of South Australia should take care there is no limitation of anything which may be given to us under sub-section (1), as well as what may be given to us under this amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There are other sub-sections which will limit also, if this does, and the better plan would be to put in a general clause.

Mr. SYMON. -

I think not.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There is the clause about navigation and shipping.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not wish to differ from the honorable member on that point, because I wish to make it clear that when I vote for this amendment I am not voting for something which will at all limit us. Therefore, I will move this as an expression of opinion on that point, leaving it to the Drafting Committee to insert it as they please.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I feel that I ought not to say very much on the present occasion, because I am one of those who think a great deal of time has been devoted to this subject. At the same time, I feel that I should not give a vote without expressing my view. I did hope that some settlement would be arrived at between the representatives of South Australia and New South Wales which would have been acceptable to every one. I regret very much that we should have to take a vote upon this matter, in which Western Australia and Tasmania, as has often been said, have no particular interest. We, however, are placed in the position of having to give a vote according to the best of our judgment on this very difficult question. I do not speak for any one but myself. I do not suppose for a moment that the representatives of Western Australia will vote as I shall vote on this matter; neither do I know how they will vote; but I have given the question a considerable amount of attention since we separated last evening, and I have come to a fixed conclusion with regard to it. I confess that I have been halting between two opinions for some time. I think we made a mistake last evening in altogether abolishing sub-section (31). That was a very important sub-section, which would have met the case perhaps with a little amendment, and would have been very valuable, especially in the interests of South Australia. However, the representatives of South Australia allowed it to be expunged, and I do not desire to say anything more about it. I cannot help trying to place myself, with regard to this matter, in the position of the representatives of New South Wales. I make bold to say that if I were a representative of New South Wales, or if any other honorable members representing the other colonies represented New South Wales, we would take up exactly the same attitude that they have taken. I cannot make myself believe that if I represented New South Wales I would be willing that there should be any control over that great river system, which, I think I may say, is the lifeblood of that country. There is an excellent map in one of the corridors, which shows that nearly the whole of New South Wales is dependent—and will be dependent in future, if this great country is to carry the population which we all expect it will carry—upon the great river system which fortunately it possesses. I have come to the conclusion that it will be far better for this continent that that river system should be used in order to fertilize the lands through which it passes than that it should be used for any other purpose whatever. It is far better for Australia that navigation should cease on the Murray itself, than that we should place restrictions upon the use of the water of that great river system for fertilizing the land through which it passes. I have also come to the conclusion that the Darling is not a navigable river, because it is only for a few months in the year, and sometimes not at all in the year, that it is capable of being used for navigation. I am of opinion that South Australia has no legal right whatever to the trade along the Darling. If the legislation in New South Wales had been so devised, they could have placed impassable barriers, not only by weirs, but also by means of a tariff and tolls, which would have altogether prevented the use of that river by any other country but itself.

Mr. REID. -

I wonder if they would question our right to impose tolls on the traffic of the river.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I hold that New South Wales has at the present time a perfect right to place barriers in the shape of customs duties and tolls, which would altogether destroy the use of that river to any other country than herself. I have come to the conclusion that New South Wales has a primary right to the waters of the Darling and the Murrumbidgee, and of all their tributaries, in order, if she so desires, to aid her progress and development. I am, of course, very unwilling to do anything in this Convention which would in any way militate against or injure the colony of South Australia. I cannot but remember that South Australia is one of the smaller states, that she will not have the great power and influence which New South Wales will have in the Federal Parliament, and that New South Wales, under any circumstances, will be able to look after herself to a far greater extent than the other can. At the same time, looking at this question as a matter of right, and, as far as I can judge, of justice, I cannot bring myself to believe that New South Wales should in any way be hampered in using these waters which belong to her, in order to develop and improve her own territory. I think that South Australia ought to be content, and I think it is reasonable that she should be content, with the protection, whatever it may be-and we have heard different opinions in regard to it-of subsection (1); and if it is not sufficient she must be content to rest on the fair play and fair dealing of the great colony of New South Wales. I do not take my stand on the ground taken up by my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) yesterday, and I think my honorable friend (Dr.

Quick)-the ground of expediency. I would not do that. I am here to try and give my vote in the way which I think is right without looking too much to the consequences. We must try to do justice as far as we can. The reason why I have come to the conclusions I have come to is because I think they are founded on right and justice, and therefore I will support with my vote the views of New South Wales in this matter. I believe they will be found to be not only what is just, but to the largest extent in the interests of Australia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria).—

Like my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) I have been halting between two opinions in connexion with this matter. My sympathies are undoubtedly with South Australia. At the same time, I cannot conceal from myself the fact that our friends from New South Wales have urged strong arguments in favour of their views, and my great desire all through has been to endeavour to reconcile the conflicting interests, so that we might, if possible, arrive at a conclusion which would be fair and equitable to all the states concerned. We are told that we may rest on subsection (1). That subsection appears to be somewhat on the lines of the provision in the American Constitution, but I do not think it is wise to ask any state entering into a partnership with other states to risk such a large question as this undoubtedly is on the interpretation which hereafter may be put on the words we use by any Federal Court or by the Privy Council; because, as distinctions and differences have been drawn in America so as to induce them to practically reverse the common law of England with regard to riparian rights, so here, taking the differences in our circumstances and the differences in regard to these rivers and their navigability and their use for various purposes, we cannot be certain—it is a matter of utter impossibility to be certain—that the court here would follow the decisions given in America. They might possibly say that they would prefer to follow the decisions given in England, and not to recognise those, given in America. As there is that great doubt about the matter, it is our duty, if we possibly can, to put in the Constitution words which will render our desire and our meaning fairly certain and intelligible. I also mentioned, when I spoke shortly on this matter some time ago, that in my opinion, in the interests of the colonies, irrigation should be the first consideration, and navigation the second. In speaking of irrigation, of course I include the conservation of water. We, in Victoria, require water for irrigation purposes perhaps more than they do at the present time in New South Wales; there they require water more for conservation. But as the years roll on, and our population increases, we must all recognise that eventually very large quantities of water will be required for conservation and for irrigation. If we put navigation in the forefront, what will be the result? Irrigation and conservation may hereafter perhaps be ruined. But if we put irrigation and conservation first, what will happen to navigation? At the worst, the carriage of goods may be delayed for a few days, or for a few weeks, or a few months. That is the worst, in my opinion, which possibly can happen to those who are urging so strongly that navigation should be our first consideration.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It means an absolute diversion of trade in many cases.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Not necessarily so.

Mr. HOLDER. -
It does.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Well, only to a very small extent, and for a very limited period. Even if it does mean an absolute diversion of trade either from South Australia or from Victoria—because we are equally interested in getting that trade, and have good opportunities to get it—still it does not alter the opinion I have formed, that we must suffer that diversion of trade which is for the benefit of the few for the sake of the greater benefit to the many who will derive advantages from irrigation. If we have an irrigation scheme, and at the very time that the water is wanted it is not there, those persons who desire to use the water are practically ruined.

Mr. LYNE. -
Would you take for the irrigation scheme power to divert the water from the state?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

No; as far as irrigation schemes are concerned, I say I would not for a moment give power to the Federation to enter upon any schemes of irrigation at all. I look upon these as entirely local matters. If we have the Federation spending immense sums on irrigation, and immense sums on improvement of the navigation, that money comes out of the pockets of the states; they have to find it by some means. The state Treasurer has to go so much short, and he has to make up his deficiency by taxation of some kind, which we all know is very difficult in any of our colonies, except perhaps in New South Wales, with its immense land revenue. I cannot go the length which my friend the Attorney-General of Victoria has gone, for this reason: He does leave an element of uncertainty by the words which have been used, and I desire to remove that element if it is possible. I cannot understand why my learned friend has broken up his amendment into two in the way he has done, because the first portion of it is something which, I think, none of us wants.

Mr. SYMON. -

None of us objects to.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The first portion of it is-

The navigability of rivers which by themselves or in connexion with other rivers are in fact permanently or intermittently navigable for trade and commerce with other countries or among the several states-

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Does not that extend the interpretation of sub-section (1)?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I am not prepared to say that it extends it or that it limits it.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Interprets it, I should say.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Our able friend from South Australia (Mr. Symon) appears to think that it limits subsection (1), because he desires to put in words to say that it shall not limit subsection (1). I suppose, if you ask other lawyers, they may possibly say that it extends it, but as these words stand that is a simple declaration that navigation is to be the first consideration.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No.

Mr. LYNE. -

And that word "navigability" would extend to all the tributaries.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That is how I read the amendment, but I may be wrong. The navigability of rivers is what we are told to give to the Federal Parliament. It may be that afterwards we shall have certain words for giving irrigation and conservation an equal right or a greater or a lesser right, as the case may be, but we may not have those words at all. Suppose that a majority of the Convention should say: "We have now provided that the maintenance of the navigability of the rivers is to be the duty of the Federal Parliament, and we are not going to alter that provision," we would then go a long way further than I think any of us desires to go. This amendment proceeds with these words:—

But so that no state shall be prevented from using any of the waters of such rivers for the purposes of conservation and irrigation—

So far I go with my honorable friend the Attorney General of Victoria.

Mr. SYMON. —

You are taking away everything from us.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. —

We are not taking away everything from you.

Mr. SYMON. —

You are giving an implied power to do what they like with the water.

Mr. BARTON. —

No state is to be prevented—neither you nor we.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. —

It says that no state shall be prevented from using any of the water, that is to say, that South Australia can use it.

Mr. GORDON. —

That is a rather lively prospect, considering that South Australia is the last state through which it flows.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. —

Does the honorable member mean to say that any schemes of irrigation in New South Wales will ever put the river in such a position that South Australia will not be able to use out of the Murray all the water which she is likely to require for irrigation purposes?

Mr. GORDON. —

Extremely probable.

Mr. WISE. —

It will not make an appreciable difference.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. —

I can understand my honorable friend saying that the water used for irrigation may possibly limit the navigation, but if he goes the length of saying that any water used for irrigation by New South Wales can ever prevent South Australia from having an ample supply of water for all the irrigation that that colony is likely to require, then I cannot go with him. While I admit that the taking of water for irrigation may possibly injure the navigation, I feel that, even if navigation is to be injured, navigation is a secondary consideration to irrigation.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
That does not prevent the committee from testing the latter part of the amendment if it likes.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
These are the words of the amendment to which I object:- to such an extent as, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission-Or the Parliament, or the Federal Court, as it may be.
is not unjust or unreasonable, having regard to the needs and requirements of any other state for such purposes.

I have placed myself in this position: Suppose that some persons who are anxious to spend a large sum in irrigation works on the Darling or the Murrumbidgee consult me as to the position they will be in, and I have to give them an honest and conscientious opinion, could I, with those words staring me in the face, ever advise those persons to spend £50,000 or £100,000 in irrigation works? I could not do it. I would tell them that I was perfectly certain in my own mind that no difficulties could ever arise, but still there is that element of uncertainty with regard to what might happen in the future that no man could conscientiously advise others to spend a considerable sum of money. By that means we would practically prevent any money from being expended for irrigation purposes by any others than the state.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Could they not obtain an Act from the Federal Parliament, as local bodies obtain an Act from the provincial Parliament, authorizing them to do it, and removing the uncertainty?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I doubt if they could under this Constitution. I do not think that any of us is prepared to go to the extreme length of handing over the whole of our irrigation in the future to the Federal Parliament, any more than we would be prepared to hand over to the Federal Parliament the extension of our railways for the development of our country in the future.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
But the Act would not be interpreted until something was done under it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Of course there is that difficulty. Although they might get an Act authorizing them to do it, still, when the question came before the court, the court might decide, "although the Federal Parliament has passed that Act, still it is a derogation from this particular exception, and therefore is unlawful, and does not protect you." I would suggest to my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) that the wiser course is to propose the whole amendment as he has drafted it. I know that he has had a lot of anxiety, and has taken a lot of trouble in the endeavour to frame a provision which would be fairly acceptable to all, and I think that he has succeeded to a very great extent. But if only the first paragraph of the am

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

The right honorable member would destroy the amendment altogether.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not think so. If I thought that, I would not attempt to oppose any portion of it, but in my opinion the exception renders the amendment absolutely useless. If the members of the Convention will go the length I am willing to go, the rights of South Australia to navigation will be fully and amply conserved, and the rights of all states to the use of water for irrigation and conservation will also be conserved. I am not afraid that in the future any one state will use the water in order to dry up a river. I do not believe that that could be done, and I am perfectly certain that no one would want to do it. I am convinced that we on both sides are fighting a shadow. Having given the matter anxious thought, the conclusion to which I have come is that I am not prepared to place the people of New South Wales in such a position that they would not dare to use the water for irrigation and conservation, but at the same time I am willing to give South Australia every fair right to navigation.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I confess that I have come to an altogether different conclusion from that which has been arrived at by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner. It seems to me, from the tone of the debate, that instead of fighting a shadow we are fighting a matter of the gravest substance. Various honorable members have spoken on this question at different times, and from different sides. Those who have resisted the claims of South Australia to have this matter of the use of the Darling and Murray Rivers referred to a federal tribunal which will be representative of all interests have, in some instances, clouded their meaning. It has, however, been left to the Right hon. Sir John Forrest with his accustomed candour, to tell us what their arguments really amount to. He has told us plainly that the view which he takes, and which no doubt is shared by others who have spoken to similar effect but with less plainness, is that the Darling is not navigable, and that South Australia has no right whatever to any of the Darling trade.
Mr. LYNE. -
   Hear, hear.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
   I am pleased that my quotation of the observations of the right honorable member has produced that cheer from a prominent representative of New South Wales. It is a pity that the matter was not stated with the same clearness by the representatives of New South Wales. All I can say is that we in South Australia hold a different opinion. We attach the greatest importance to the navigation of the Darling, and the Darling trade which we have hitherto been in the habit of enjoying is a matter of serious consequence to us.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
   You have been enjoying it on sufferance.
Dr. COCKBURN. -
   In the interests of the settlers there.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
   In the interests of the settlers, though no doubt to our interest, too. As the honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott), who represents in the New South Wales Parliament an electorate through which the Darling flows, has shown, it is of the greatest moment to the settlers there to obtain ease and economy of carriage to market. Are we to be told at a time like this, when we are striving to remove all obstructions to free intercourse between the states, to cut down commercial barriers, to abolish conflicting and rival rights, that the River Darling, the waters of which flow naturally into the Murray, and give us access to New South Wales, and the New South Wales settlers access to the markets of South Australia, is for New South Wales alone? Surely not. I urge upon honorable members that the spirit of fair play should be allowed to prevail. We should not be deterred by anything in the shape of threats as to the probable consequences of this, that, or the other. A quotation was indulged in by the honorable and learned member (Dr. Quick) as to the resolution carried in Adelaide. If my memory serves me aright, the resolutions upon which we originally entered into the consideration of this question in Sydney in 1891 laid it down as a fundamental principle that federation Should be based upon lines which were just and right to the several states. Are we to be told by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) that although our claim is just and right it is not to be allowed? Is this proof of the existence of that inter-colonial comity which must be the safeguard of the small states? At the very initial stage of our work is it to be asserted that what is the admitted right of South Australia should be sacrificed to the interests of another colony? I hope not. I rose chiefly for the purpose of emphasizing our wish that in this matter, in which we are so vitally interested, that which is fair may be done. I am content to trust the whole question to the Federal Parliament. Some honorable members give the supreme consideration to the question of navigation, others to the question of irrigation. I am careless which shall in the long run be considered to be supreme. I would give the Federal Parliament power to solve the question when its solution is necessary, and when its members have the materials before them upon which to arrive at a just conclusion.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

We cannot say what new conditions may arise.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I am inclined to think that the possibilities of successful irrigation are at the present moment under-estimated. I am very strongly of the opinion that, although great benefits may be expected from the carrying out of systems of irrigation, it will be difficult for those who have water rates to pay to compete successfully with those who have no such expense. Irrigation upon a large scale has not yet proved absolutely successful in Australia. It may prove successful, but, as regards the rival questions of irrigation and navigation, we in South Australia and all others who have given the subject the consideration which its importance deserves know that the navigation of the Darling and of the Murray is of the utmost importance for the purposes of trade. Just as we have laid it down as a fundamental principle that unnatural obstacles to trade should be removed at the initiation of federation, we should leave the Federal Parliament power to deal with this matter as in the light of subsequent events they may deem fair and proper in the interests of all concerned. I am prepared to support the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria. I think that he has introduced it as a fair and equitable solution of this difficulty. I also think that he had no intention of limiting the rights which the Federal Parliament may possess under the sub-section relating to trade and commerce. But whilst I am prepared to vote for the amendment as a whole, and even, as it is proposed, for the first part of it, I am not prepared to vote for it in a mutilated form so as to give each individual state the right to absorb as much water as it may think fit for the purposes of water conservation and irrigation, utterly regardless of whether that may or may not destroy the navigability of the river. To do that would, in my opinion, be to create a blot and a perpetual disfigurement in the Constitution. To adopt such a course would mean the stereotyping into the Constitution of a declaration such as has not yet been made by any competent legislative authority, to the effect that each state shall have the right to use the water of the rivers, even to the extent of destroying their navigability. Whatever the rights of Victoria and of New South Wales may be, they are subject to Imperial control, and, as has been put by my honorable colleague (Mr. Holder), we suggest that this control should be transferred from an authority upon the other side of the world, by which, because of other pressing engagements and the impropriety of Imperial interference in matters of colonial concern, it is not likely to be exercised, to the Federal Parliament, which will have the fullest power in the matter. I wait with the deepest interest and concern the result of the division which we are about to take. I hope that, in the interests of all of us, we shall be able to go back to our several states and say that nothing has been implanted in the Constitution which has taken from us the fair exercise of the riparian rights with which Providence intended to bless us, and that a majority of honorable members will properly resent the suggestion that, in the interests of a greater state and in the cause of expediency, the rights of a small state be sacrificed.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

This important question, occupying as it has done more time than any other single question that has come before this Convention, has been argued so continuously and so persistently from the legal point of view that it may seem temerity for a mere layman to discuss it at all. But it seems to me that there are some considerations in connexion with it, having in view that our aim is to federate the various colonies, superior even to present legal rights. We have in connexion with this federation movement, if we achieve anything, to give up a number of legal rights that we now possess in order to create other legal conditions that will entail privileges upon us. The question seems to me to be whether there can properly be said to be a federal interest in this question; and if we arrive at the conclusion that there is a federal interest, the federal power should be intrusted with control—not necessarily management, not even incidental management, but control. Now, the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales, in dealing with the question yesterday, laid down in the most emphatic and unmistakable way that in regard to the point of view of interests involved in the question New South Wales is prepared to stand upon her present legal rights. These rights appear to be, failing any international or inter-state law, that New South Wales has control over all the waters which are within her borders while they remain within her borders, and that she can, if she choose, cut off the flow of any river at the point where it is about to leaving the borders of New South Wales. But the right honorable gentleman said, when rivers run between two colonies there has been admitted or stated to be not a right, but a sort of half or incomplete right which, when it occurs, must be settled by convention or negotiation.

Mr. REID. -

That applies only to rivers which have two different communities on their banks—not to rivers of the Darling, and Murrumbidgee type.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Assuming, for argument's sake—and I think we may assume absolutely—that that is correct, we are now proposing to blend together in a Federation States that at present are separate so far as these particular interests are concerned, and in connexion with which conflicts may in the future arise. Surely it seems to be a logical position to take up, seeing in front of us the possibility of conflicts of this character, that we shall, at the inception, not settle or decide anything in detail, but provide a competent and fair tribunal that shall settle when such conflicts arise.

Mr. REID. -

That is exactly what we have done; there is a tribunal provided for.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What is that?

Mr. REID. -

A federal tribunal called the Supreme Court.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

But if the right honorable gentleman will pardon me—and I submit the point with great diffidence, because it is a legal point—I am led by his declaration to the conclusion that, if such a dispute comes to be settled by the Supreme Court, it must be settled not in accordance with the interests concerned, but in accordance with the present legal rights involved, if those legal rights are not to be altered by anything contained in this Constitution.

Mr. REID. -

The court deals with interests in the sense of rights; it cannot do wrong in order to meet the interests of any particular litigant.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I recognise the difficulty of discussing an intricate legal question of this character from a layman's point of view, and I am endeavouring, as far as I can, rather to avoid the legal intricacies of the question, and to present to the Convention my views of what are the facts of the case. And it does seem to me that whatever the exigencies of state or national rights may involve, whatever the lack of international, law entails upon us, there may be involved questions of equi
Mr. REID. -

It is a very old point. When the navigation of the Rhine was under discussion, an understanding was come to as to the navigation of that river by the countries on its banks, but the tributaries of the Rhine, which actually flow into the Rhine, but are entirely within certain countries, were not taken under joint control. The Rhine has 16,000 tributaries flowing into it. The agreement made was as to one river. The 16,000 tributaries were not affected.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Quite so. What I am endeavouring to show now is that the difficulties that arise here, as in the case of the Rhine, should be settled when they arise by a tribunal representing in proportion to their importance each of the states involved.

Mr. REID. -

There is no trouble about that. The Murray holds a corresponding position in Australia to the Rhine in Europe. It flows between two or more states. Therefore there is no trouble in regard to it. We raise no difficulty about the control of the waters of the Murray.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
