Mr. HIGGINS. -

I admitted that it would necessitate a modification of clause 54, but I cannot deal with that clause now.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I quite see that this involves the question whether it will be proper to pass some kind of amendment of clause 54. It would not be right to pass that amendment, for the reason that clause 54 is inte

Mr. Kingston. I ask Mr. Higgins whether it would really not be better to withdraw his amendment in favour of some general declaration as to the validity or invalidity of the Bill, such as Mr. Reid is about to propose?

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I cannot understand where we are getting. We say distinctly a thing shall not be done, and the next moment we say that the thing may be done with impunity.

Mr. REID. -

You know that our books are full of standing orders which are not subject to legal tribunals.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I regard what is now proposed as a most absurd and direct contradiction, and all I can say is that the proceedings pass my comprehension.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not think the amendment is a direct contradiction, or I would not put it. A "proposed law" is a Bill, and it is proposed that a Bill which deals with revenue shall deal only with appropriation; but that when such a Bill becomes an Act it shall not be invalid because of non-compliance with the procedure under this measure. As to whether the amendment is or is not a good one, I, of course, cannot pass an opinion.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

My friend (Dr. Cockburn) is a Member of Parliament of many years standing, and I am astonished at the remarks he has just made. There are all sorts of standing orders passed by the Colonial Legislature providing that certain things shall not be done, but if they are done the is no pretence of a court of law coming in because they are not done. Nothing is more familiar to the student of parliamentary law or business, and yet Dr. Cockburn seems to think it is something new. It would be a calamity beyond the power of expression of the deliberate legislation of Parliament were to become the sport of every man who has a pecuniary interest or an idle interest in endeavouring to upset it. I hope Mr. Higgins will withdraw his amendment, because I intend to move a general proposition applying to the whole of the clause. I do not know that I should propose it after the whole of the clause, if a part of it is negatived.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Is Mr. Higgins amendment necessary to this sub-section?

Mr. REID. -

No. I do not think my friend ought to propose it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Mr. Reid may propose to amend Mr. Higgins amendment by inserting some other words.

Mr. REID. -

I do not see that I could.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You could say "by the preceding section," or something like that.

Mr. REID. -

I could not say that as to the third sub-section, if Mr. Higgins' amendment were negatived.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Not if Mr. Higgins amendment were negatived.

Mr. REID. -

I am inclined to give the whole thing up as a regular muddle.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

Before we go to a division I want to say that I have not overlooked the point the President has referred to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

May I correct a misapprehension? I have just been told that my friend (Mr. Higgins) is under the impression that I would not endeavour to carry out the intention of the Convention by inserting the words proposed. My intimation was exactly the opposite, because I said I should do my utmost to carry out the intention of the committee. My honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) need not therefore trouble about the amendment. I will see, in considering the drafting amendments, whether it is necessary to add to the present words, which I think are effective in themselves, and such steps will be taken as will fall in with his view.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I shall distinctly oppose anything of the kind. If the intention of the committee in putting in the proposed words is, as was intended by Mr. Isaacs in moving them, to transfer to the Parliament the power which, I think, ought distinctly to lie in the High Court, I shall oppose every attempt to carry out such intention.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is the intention of the committee.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not know that it is the intention of the committee. I do not think it was clearly understood.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think it was the committee's wicked will.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I am not sure it was their wicked will. I think it was a misapprehension on the part of the committee.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Let us get on.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think we are getting on, and getting on very badly. We are destroying the whole fabric we have been creating. We are proposing to add to the amendment of the Attorney-General of Victoria something which I dare say he intended, but which he certainly did not say-

Mr. ISAACS. -

Oh, I said it distinctly, and I think it is included in what we have already done.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Parliament is to be the sole judge—that is the point—and we take away the whole foundation of the protection.

Mr. REID. -
What is this relevant to? There is no proposition before the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Mr. Higgins' proposition is before the Chair.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
There appears to be a disposition to swept Mr. Higgins amendment, but I do not accept it.

Mr. REID. -
Then is no necessity for that amendment, after Mr. Barton's explanation.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
With great respect, I do not accept Mr. Barton's explanation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I am, going to withdraw the amendment if I am allowed.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Then I will not say a word more at present.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
Having regard to the distinct intimation of the honorable leader of the Convention, I beg leave to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

The sub-section, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I beg to move—
That the following words be added at the end of the clause:—"The prohibitions contained in this section shall not extend to render invalid in a law any portion thereof which does not infringe any such prohibition."

That is to say, so far as a law is good it shall not be ruled to be bad; but any part of it that is bad may be adjudged by the court to be null and void.

A case was put to me as to a Bill that contained two subjects of taxation. Under this provision the court would rule the first to be good, and any subsequent part of it to be bad. The first subject of taxation would not infringe the rule, but any other subjects in the Bill amounting to two or three subjects would be ruled to be bad. Of course, this can be put in proper language by the Drafting Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Is this not a negation of what we have already done?

Mr. REID. -
Certainly not; I do not think it can bear that construction.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I think it is quite clear what is meant by this amendment. I do not want to speak on the merits of the matter just now, but the meaning of the amendment is that certain prohibitions are contained in the clause. There may be a law which infringes the clause in part, but the rest of it does not infringe the clause. It is intended that the part that does not infringe the clause shall not be rendered invalid by the portion which is invalid.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The clause says—Laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation." According to the amendment the law might be partly valid and partly invalid.

Mr. BARTON. -

That falls in with my view, because it embodies the objection I would urge to the clause in substance. The clause provides that a Bill dealing [P.2086] starts here with the imposition of taxation shall deal with taxation only, and that laws imposing taxation shall deal with one subject of taxation only. That is an express prohibition which would render invalid any law which controverted either of these propositions. The next amendment is that where a law by one or more provisions controverts this provision it should be valid in those portions which do not controvert the provision. I do not say at present that I am not opposed to this amendment, but the meaning is quite clear.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would point out that the clause, not having been passed, it is perfectly competent to qualify it without negating its contents. That is the ground on which I put the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -

There is a doubt, about it, but I do not wish to curtail the opportunity for arriving at a conclusion. I confess I cannot understand the amendment.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I venture to submit that, before this question is put to the Convention, we ought to have it in the shape in which the Drafting Committee think it ought to be passed.

Mr. BARTON. -

Is the honorable member prepared to wait until next week?

Mr. SYMON. -

Perhaps we could get it to-morrow morning.

Mr. BARTON. -

No.

Mr. SYMON. -

Very well. Of course, we have heard the intention of the amendment expressed, but I am not certain that some of us will not have a difficulty in voting upon it unless it is made a little more definite, so as to get rid of those troubles to which Mr. Barton has referred. I think Mr. Reid would get a better vote if he adopted the course I suggest.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Mr. Gordon and myself prepared a clause to accomplish what Mr. Reid wishes to do, but as Mr. Gordon is absent on business, I cannot move it now. I confess I cannot understand the amendment, but the effect of what we intended to propose would have been to render the part imposing taxation invalid; but the general matter joined with it would be valid. The portion imposing the taxation would be invalid, and that would be a check upon the House of Representatives, which would be the offending body. The general part joined with it, however, would not be invalid.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am rather doubtful about the policy of adding these words. The Right Hon. Mr. Reid proposes to add a proviso to Sub-sections (1), (2), and (3). His proviso is to the effect that where a law has been passed which would otherwise be invalid, because part of it offends against prohibitions contained in this clause, it shall be valid except as to that part which offends. If the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs), inserting, the word "proposed" in sub-section (3) had been rejected, I am inclined to think that this proviso could have been added to the third sub-section. But I do not see how it can apply to sub-sections (1) and (2). They provide that laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs or excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only. The difficulty about this proviso is this: Take a law dealing with some other matter in addition to the imposition of taxation. If you say in regard to such a law that, except so far as it infringes the prohibition of this clause it shall be good, that means that the part imposing taxation shall be good; but that the part which does not impose taxation shall be, or may be, bad. Then, dealing with the case as it is affected by sub-section (2), if there are two subjects of taxation dealt with in a law, as, for instance, land and income taxation, or customs and excise, or customs and land, its provisions with regard to one of these subjects shall be good, but with regard to the other subject shall be bad. To put it scripturally, the one shall be taken and the other left. But which one shall be taken, and which shall be left?

Mr. REID. -

The provisions in regard to the first subject would not infringe the prohibition, because, if left by itself, it would be the only subject dealt
Mr. BARTON. -

But my right honorable friend does not specify his preference; he does not tell us which we are to take, or which the High Court, or the Federal Parliament, or any one is to take. A difficulty arises here. In my opinion, there is no necessity for the proviso in regard to the first and second sub-sections.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Suppose provisions relating to a land tax were put into an Appropriation Bill, and the provisions relating to the land tax came first, which would be chosen?

Mr. REID. -

Are we dealing with a lunatic asylum?

Mr. BARTON. -

If my right honorable friend is right in saying that the first subject dealt with is to be taken, and the other left-

Mr. REID. -

Had we not better put in a special clause, providing that provisions relating to land, taxation shall not be put into a measure relating to appropriation or income tax, to prevent the lunatics in regard to whom we are legislating from making this confusion?

Mr. BARTON. -

We can never tell what a Government will or will not do.

Mr. REID. -

What about the Senate? They will not be a lot of old women. Would a Senate swallow such an attack upon their rights as is contemplated? I do not know what sort of Parliament we are about to create.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not know either. Sometimes I think that many of us are tending towards the creation of a Parliament which shall have every power if you hold up your right hand, but no power if you hold up your left hand. I do not think that this is the way to make a Constitution. What seems to me to be the real matter at issue is this: If the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs), inserting the word "proposed" in the third sub-section, had been carried, this proviso might have applied to that sub-section; but, in regard to sub-sections (I) and (2), it seems to me unnecessary. Perhaps, if my right honorable friend will consider the matter between this and to-morrow morning, we shall make progress more quickly, and, in order to give time for that consideration, I will, with his consent, move that progress be reported.

Progress was reported.
The Convention adjourned at nine minutes past ten o'clock p.m.
Wednesday, 9th March, 1898.

Petition - Appeals to the Privy Council - Leave of Absence: Mr. James - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-four minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITION.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria) presented a petition from the Hardware Association of Victoria, praying the Convention to preserve the existing right of the Queen's subjects to appeal to Her Majesty from decisions of the local courts.

The petition was received.

APPEALS TO THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I desire to lay on the table a Return of Appeals to the Privy Council against decisions of the Supreme Court of Tasmania, and I beg to move that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I beg to move-

That seven days' leave of absence be granted to the Hon. Mr. James, on account of private business.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on-

Clause 55. - (1) Laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation.

(2) Laws imposing taxation, except laws imposing duties of customs or of excise, shall deal with one subject of taxation only; but laws imposing duties of customs shall deal with duties of customs only, and laws imposing duties of excise shall deal with duties of excise only.

(3) The law which appropriates revenue or moneys for the ordinary annual services of the Government shall deal only with such appropriation; and on Mr. Reid's amendment to add the following words to the clause:-
The prohibitions contained in this section shall not extend to render invalid in a law any portion thereof which does not infringe any such prohibition.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I have just written out an amendment which I wish to substitute for the one I moved yesterday evening.

Mr. Reid's amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. REID. -

There was great force in the observation made last night, that my amendment scarcely provided for the case of a law which contained more than one subject of taxation, and that, therefore, the court would be left in doubt as to what to do in such a case. I have thought over this matter carefully, and I confess I feel more strongly than ever that this Convention cannot seriously mean that if some mere technical infringement has occurred the whole substantial basis of legislation shall be destroyed. Such principles of legislation are unknown, so far as I am aware, to any Constitution in the world, and certainly if they actually are in any other Constitution in the world they should not be in any Constitution carefully drawn, which studies the working of the Commonwealth. I propose to put my amendment in another form, but first I will explain that the term "proposed laws," which occurs in sub-section (3) of clause 56, and in several places in clause 54, is now covered by the kind promise of our leader to look into the matter, and use what words, if any, are necessary to make it clear that the intention of the Constitution as to such laws is that they shall be regarded as matters of internal procedure, and not for the review of the court. Now, the whole of clause 54 and the third sub-section of clause 55 are covered by that promise, so that we have simply left us staring in the face this position: That, while a matter of vital consequence, such as the Senate doubling a charge on the people, will be only, a matter of procedure, and an irregularity although a substantial wrong to the people, touching them in their pockets, it will be a matter which cannot be disturbed by appeal to the High Court. Now, I most heartily concur in that position. We must all take certain risks in a matter of this sort, hoping that the two Houses of the Federal Parliament will be sufficiently independent to do their duty to the Commonwealth; and if there is one point on which we may be assured that each House will do its duty honestly and loyally, if we study the history of such Houses all the world over, it is a matter of its own rights and privileges as defined by the statute law. A House of Parliament can be trusted to preserve its own rights if they-are expressed in plain words in the Constitution.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
How could a Senate double a tax on the people without the concurrence of the states?

Mr. REID. -

I did not refer to a tax; I referred to a charge—a burden on the people. Well, that is a thing that is not to be done. Still, if it is done by both Houses, regarding them from the very low level from which they were regarded all yesterday, as Houses that were not to be trusted to defend their own rights and the principles of the Constitution—if the two Houses were of the low pattern that seemed to be considered likely, according to the debate yesterday, and if they did infringe the Constitution in such a gross way that the Senate was allowed by the House of Representatives to double a charge—a burden on the people—

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Would that ever happen?

Mr. REID. -

I say that it would never happen. The House of Representatives would never allow such a thing to happen. And so I say the members of the Senate will be men of equal respectability. I cannot understand this doubt, when the Senate is made to play so vital a part in the history and destinies of this new nation. I cannot understand why the men who deliberately put the Senate into the Constitution to play such a part are the first to believe that it will violate and surrender its own privileges.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Who said that it would?

Mr. REID. -

Now, I do not wish to be brought into the dreary debate we had yesterday by means of any interjections. I hope that we shall not waste any time over this matter to-day. I feel it would be a calamity if we were to waste any more time over it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It will be a calamity if we do not make this matter right.

Mr. REID. -

I will say no more on the subject, but simply propose my amendment, and point out that I do not ask the Convention to prevent a law imposing taxation being brought into court; but, if it is brought into court and if it is found to contain some matter, perhaps mere surplusage, which is nevertheless a technical infringement of the Constitution, it shall not, under the provision that a law of taxation shall deal with the imposition of taxation only, be ruled out as invalid simply because it contains some surplus technical matter. That is one point I wish to prevent. The other point is this: If in some complex measure imposing, not simple taxation, but some complex taxation, there is an inadvertent evasion of this rule, and the court, looking through keen legal spectacles, see something in it that seems to belong to a different subject of taxation, that the whole scheme of finance of the Commonwealth shall not be at the mercy of a point of that kind. And if the Act is found to invade the provisions of the Constitution, to the extent that it does invade the provisions of the Constitution it should be rubbed out, but the vital matter should not be rubbed out. Therefore, I beg to propose the addition to the clause of the following words:-

The provisions of sub-sections (1) and (2) shall not invalidate any part of a law imposing taxation which does not infringe such provisions. If any such law contain more than some subject of taxation, the tax first in order of enactment shall be taken to be properly enacted.

Then, any other matter, amounting to a second subject of taxation, will be ruled out.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Does the leader of the Convention withdraw his proposal in favour of this amendment?

Mr. REID. -

This amendment has nothing to do with the leader's suggestion. It covers new ground. If the leader's promise had covered this ground also, I would not have proposed my amendment. But Mr. Barton does not approve of this amendment, and therefore very properly does not make any promise concerning it. This amendment covers a bit of ground which is left unprovided for, and if I did not move this proposal, some surplus, perhaps idle, harmless, matter would invalidate a Taxation Bill.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Might.

Mr. REID. -

It would, as a matter of law. There is no "might" about it, If it was a case of "might," we could trust to chance. That is one class of case in which a Bill might be ruled out. The other class is this: There is one subject-matter of taxation, but, unfortunately, there seems to be involved, according to the decision of the court, a different subject-matter of taxation, and then the whole tax goes with all the revenue, and all the labours of Parliament are wiped out. We do not want to place so grotesque a provision in the Constitution, and expose ourselves to such serious circumstances, when we can provide safeguards for the vital clauses of a Bill.
Mr. DEAKIN. -

If that is the reason, will the right honorable gentleman say why this proposition, which appears so fair and equitable, ought not to apply to all legislation, whether Tax Bills or any other matter?

Mr. REID. -

I think it ought to.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Ought there not to be an independent section?

Mr. REID. -

I think there ought, but we are now on this particular matter, and I wish to conclude the discussion. If my amendment is carried, the Drafting Committee will take this matter into consideration. If the amendment is not carried, I do not see how such a clause could be adopted.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I am sure we are all—I will not say all, but, at any rate, all on this side—strongly in sympathy with Mr. Reid in his endeavour to insert some such clause as that which he has proposed. I have no doubt Mr. Reid framed the amendment in the way he has in order to get the sense of the Convention, and leave it to the Drafting Committee to properly frame hereafter. As the amendment stands, I scarcely think it would carry the matter any further. It only provides that a law which does not infringe on the provision shall not be invalid.

Mr. REID. -

It deals with a law, part of which infringes on the provision, and part of which does not.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the whole difficulty. There is no portion of the clause which says that a part of the law which contravenes the provision is invalid. A law contravenes the Constitution if it does not comply with the section.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

What is a law?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Has there ever been such a proposal in any law?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not think there has ever been the same necessity for such a proposal. It is this particular clause which needs such a proposal.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

And you are going to make one more extraordinary law.

An HONORABLE: MEMBER. - It is an error.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If it be an error, it is a compensating error. It is to prevent the utter confusion we might and probably would get into unless we had some such proviso. I strongly support, in its spirit, the clause proposed by Mr. Reid. I agree with Mr. Reid that we should not spend much time over the question. We expressed our views at length yesterday, on the understanding that they would be put in shape by the Drafting Committee. There being no misunderstanding as to the intention of the Convention, I shall content myself with merely expressing my approval of the proposal.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I think the suggestion of Mr. Deakin is well worth thinking over, as to whether there should not be some general clause dealing altogether with the question of the validity of laws. That is a matter which the Drafting Committee might very well take into consideration, without any definite opinion being expressed about it. The objection to the amendment is that if it be inserted here, it must also apply to clause 54. If you have the proviso inserted in the present clause, and not in clause 54, any irregularity under clause 54 would make a law invalid. And what an absurd position it is putting the Constitution in to declare that a certain procedure is to be followed, and, as part of that very section, to further declare that whether the procedure be followed or not, the law will not be invalid.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Is the proviso not in clause 54?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, it is not.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Only procedure is dealt with in clause 54.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I do not think my friend (Mr. Holder) apprehends the argument I am putting. If the proviso be inserted in clause 55, it ought also to be inserted in clause 54.

Mr. HOLDER. -

One deals with proposed laws and the other with laws.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is the reason the proviso is not necessary under sub-clause (3). You pick out a particular clause, and state the procedure, and immediately afterwards say that whether the procedure is followed or not it does not matter. The result would be that the Commonwealth Parliament would be in a position to ignore procedure and take its chance as to whether a portion of the law passed was invalid. The proposal of Mr. Reid should not be adopted, but I think the suggestion of Mr. Deakin might be followed, and laws which might be rendered invalid should be provided for in some general way in the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The effect of Mr. Reid's amendment would be the same, and is intended to be the same, as if the word "proposed" moved by Mr. Isaacs yesterday had been inserted in sub-sections (1) and (2).

Mr. REID. -

That proposal of Mr. Isaacs was intended to take the matter out of the power of the court, but my proposal does not take it out of the power of the court.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the word "proposed" had been inserted it would have been a matter merely of procedure, so that no court could interfere. If the present amendment be made, then the part of the law which does not infringe the prohibition stands good, and the part which does infringe the prohibition is bad. That is just the same effect as if the matter were regulated by a procedure between the two Houses—as if one House had refused to deal with a law until an amendment was made, and that amendment was made. Then there would be a valid law. In the same way, if Mr. Reid's amendment be carried, the part of the law which is valid would remain, and the other part would be invalid. I do not want to take up a strong position on this matter. It may be there is room for a rule applying to the validity of all laws, providing that the part which is not subject to the ban laid on it by the Constitution shall remain good as a statute. Otherwise, we may find that statutes comprehending a large field of work may be rendered invalid, because of one infringement. Take a statute which, in some one small particular, infringes or usurps the legislative rights of the states, the whole statute might have to be declared invalid, unless there is some section applying to all statutes.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

There is no provision, other than as to Money Bills, that the whole law shall be invalid.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is no provision that the whole law shall be invalid, but the question is whether there is not some uncertainty which might as well be cleared up.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If a law goes outside the powers, it is invalid only to that extent.

Mr. BARTON. -

How is it clear that that is so with regard to the remainder of the Constitution?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Because this is the only part which deals with form of laws.

Mr. BARTON. -

If I were quite certain that my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) is right about that—I am not saying that he is not—there would be no necessity to think further over Mr. Deakin's suggestion. But I rose to point out that the practical result of this amendment would be much the same as if Mr. Isaacs' amendment had been carried yesterday. I do not wish to enter into a lengthy debate. We covered so much ground yesterday that it would be trifling with the Convention to make a long speech.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

The position of my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins) may be perfectly correct. It may be that without any special provision the practice of the High Court, when declaring an Act ultra vires, would be that such a declaration applied only to the part which trespassed beyond the limits of the Constitution. If that were so, it would be a general principle applicable to the interpretation of the whole of the Constitution. Has Mr. Higgins considered the effect on that principle of an express declaration in regard to this particular class of Bill? Is it not possible that, from the express declaration in regard to Tax Bills, the implication may be drawn that the method does not apply to other legislation?

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is no similar clause in regard to other Bills.

Mr. REID. -

Should the point be raised at this particular place?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

There is a distinction drawn by this clause between the measures to which it relates and the bulk of federal measures. That distinction turns upon the procedure with is to be followed in regard to these particular laws. That renders it necessary either to adopt the proposal of Mr. Reid in regard to this particular clause, or to take care when a general clause is drafted, if it be thought well to draft one, that, in addition to making provision in regard to laws in general, it should be perfectly clear that the clause applies particularly to laws imposing taxation under sub-sections (1) and (2) of the clause before the Convention. Under the circumstances it certainly appears desirable that the proposal of Mr. Reid should be adopted, and that the question as to whether a general clause in supplement should hereafter be passed maybe taken into consideration when it arises. If that general clause be so framed as to embrace not only the general body of law, but also the Tax and Appropriation Acts, then, of course, the special qualification proposed by Mr. Reid might be removed. But, until it is removed, the distinction is so clear between the operation of this clause on those measures and the general operation of the Constitution on all measures, that the proviso proposed by Mr. Reid had certainly better be preserved.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I would very much like to assist my honorable friend (Mr. Reid) in carrying out his view, if I saw any way of doing it. But, the more this matter is thought about and discussed, the more it seems to be impossible to do what Mr. Reid requires, and the more impossible it seems to alter the clause without making a mesa of the whole thing.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

We have made a mess of the clause as it is.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not think that. We may assume that the Legislature will know how to do its work and observe the law.

Mr. REID. -

Then why the High Court?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

And when it is provided that a Taxation Bill shall only include one subject, surely that is intelligible enough.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

You do not want the High Court to enforce the Constitution?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not want Parliament to have the right to capriciously override the Constitution.

Mr. REID. -

This amendment will prevent Parliament doing that.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I wish my right honorable friend to understand that if I could see any way of following him in the direction he suggests, I should be glad, so that it might be said a law is not altogether bad because it is bad in part. The difficulty is in working that out.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

You need not do it now.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Mr. Reid, with all his ingenuity, has been driven to the rough-and-ready expedient of saying that, if two or more subjects of taxation are included in a Bill, the first shall be held to be good and the rest bad.
Could not you leave that to the Drafting Committee?

Mr. REID. -

We must show our mind on the subject.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

If a tack were put in the Bill first, that is the part that would be held to be good. There is only one other thing that I desire to say to Mr. Deakin, and that is, that there never will be any declaration by the court that a statute is ultra vires. All the court can do under the Constitution is to refuse to enforce the statute.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I hope that this discussion will now be brought to a conclusion proposed to take Taxation Bills into procedure, and to say that they should not go before the High Court. The Bill, as it stands, will send them into the High Court if they are irregular. Our propositions are therefore not the same. As to the remarks made by Sir John Downer, I appeal to all the members of the Convention whether any Senate with these powers of rejection, put as they are so plainly and forcibly in this Bill, would ever allow a Lower House to tack anything on to a Bill? It is not Conceivable that any proceeding of that kind would be permitted by the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

It seems to me that the amendment is very objectionable from this point of view. In one of the sub-sections we distinctly say that no one law shall deal with two subjects of taxation, but here we are absolutely prophesying a breaking of the law. It is unreasonable under any one provision to indicate that a certain thing shall not be done which is as clear as daylight, and which is not a matter of extreme definition, and then to put in a provision that the same thing may be done, and, under certain circumstances, shall be done.

Mr. REID. -

Surely you do not want to say that on a mere technicality a law may be declared invalid.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I cannot understand how there could be such a technicality.

Mr. REID. -

Because you are not a lawyer.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

No; the lawyers have taken a very large part in this discussion, and I have followed them very closely, but my intelligence tells me that this is not a fair way of dealing with the subject. While I recognise the good motives with which the amendment has been introduced, I shall have to vote against it.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I desire to correct an impression which I wrongly conveyed yesterday evening, in answering an interjection by the Hon. Mr. McMillan. I think it will rather re-assure some honorable members if I can show that this amendment will not be the means of allowing intentional infringements of the rules laid down in clauses 54 and 55. Clause 57 says that the Governor-General is bound not to give his assent to a Bill if it infringes the provisions of the Constitution. It is only in the event of a Bill having accidentally escaped even the watchfulness of the Governor-General that this provision will come in.

Mr. HOLDER. -

And the mistake will be so immaterial that nobody will have noticed it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes. The Bill will have to pass through the ordeal of review-first, in the House of Representatives; secondly, in a jealous Senate; and thirdly, before an impartial Governor-General.

Mr. REID. -

Who would be advised by the Attorney-General.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes. The words used in the section are-"He shall declare, according to his discretion, but subject to the provisions of the Constitution, either that be assents to it in the Queen's name or that he withholds assent." The Governor-General must, therefore, only give his assent if the Bill complies with the Constitution.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

The amendment would offer a premium on slovenliness. If the House of Representatives know that they have to be careful they will be careful. If they know that they can correct mistakes afterwards they will have an inducement to carelessness. The Right Hon. Mr. Reid has said that we are speaking of the Senate as if it will be a weak and incompetent body, but the amendment would be a reflection on the House of Representatives. It is equivalent to saying that they are incapable of exercising the vigilance necessary to insure that the laws that they pass will be valid.

Mr. REID. -

The Income Tax Bill of the United States was passed by the two Houses.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

A hard-and-fast line causes no injustice when it is known that it cannot be violated without punishment. If you make a law that sometimes can and that sometimes cannot be infringed with impunity, it is always harsh and unjust in its operation.

Mr. REID. -

If the infringement can be wiped out no harm is done.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

We agreed to these clauses after careful consideration. I am with the honorable member so far as he seeks to minimize that feature of a written Constitution which exposes all laws to the charge of invalidity, but when the honorable member proposes to do so at the expense of the Senate only, I cannot support him.

Mr. REID. -

The expense of the Senate!

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Yes. The right honorable member is no doubt very consistent with regard to the Senate. As he was in the beginning, he is now, and ever will be. The whole trouble has arisen owing to our having departed from the true principles of federation in the first instance, and sought to diminish the powers of the Senate. Give the Senate its proper powers, and the difficulty will disappear.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

Attention has been called to clause 57 by Mr. Higgins, but there is a proviso to that clause which says that the Governor-General may return to the House in which it originated any proposed law presented to him, and may transmit therewith any amendments which he may recommend to be made in such law. We are asked to pass a rigid law saving that a certain thing shall be done, and then to pass another law saying that it shall not be done. We know that every Government is more or less corrupt, and that a Ministry will often ask the House of Representatives to pass a Bill without any regard whatever to the Senate, simply because they believe that that Bill will be satisfactory to their own party. We ought not, therefore, to give away such a safeguard as that which we have already provided. We have said that a Taxation Bill shall deal only with taxation, and Mr. Reid wants the House of Representatives to be enabled to send any Bill up to the Senate. If any irregularities take place the Bill is not to be held to be an infringement of the Constitution. I think that we should bring the discussion to a close as soon as possible.

Question so resolved in the negative.
The CHAIRMAN. -
The question now is-That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I should like to say, by way of explanation in reference to the vote which has just been given, that I was not able myself to vote for the amendment to make a structural alteration in the first and second paragraphs, because I did not see how it could be applied. But I would like to assure my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) that the matter will receive the attention of the Drafting Committee, and, notwithstanding the difficulty about a recommittal, if his substantial object can be secured, the provision shall be redrafted, and I will place the redraft in his hands, in order that the matter may be dealt with by means of a proposal which would carry out his object.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I accept the vote which has just been given as a distinct negative of the principle for which I have contended, and I do not think that any intelligent member of this Convention would have voted against it on any other ground. Because we know that, when the mind of the committee is made up on a matter of principle, the Drafting Committee will put the provision they agree to in proper legal shape. So that I am glad to think that my honorable friend does not distinctly oppose my proposal in principle, but owing to some defect in the way it is put.

Mr. BARTON. -
Because I could not see the way in which it could be applied.

Mr. REID. -
It is a thousand pities that it was not accepted as a mere opportunity of ascertaining the will of the committee on a matter of substance, leaving the expression of that substance to be framed by more trained intellects.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I hardly think it is right to discuss, after a vote has been taken, whether that vote is right or wrong.

Mr. REID. -
I feel that without some provision in regard to the matter the Constitution will be open to serious objection.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I wish to declare for myself that I did not vote against the amendment proposed by my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) with any desire to express an opinion upon the principle.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I do not think the honorable member is in order.

Mr. SYMON. -
I will ask the indulgence of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Will the honorable member take his seat?

Mr. SYMON. -
I wish to make an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. -
A certain amount of latitude is allowed to the leader of the Convention, but it is not in order for honorable members to make explanations as to why they gave their votes on a division. Otherwise we shall have a debate after every division.

Mr. SYMON. -
I will not say that in reference to the amendment at all; but I will say that as to this clause, which has not yet been put by you from the Chair, I quite agree as to the advisability, if it could be done, of some provision being inserted which would make only that part of the Bill in which the vice existed bad, and would preserve the remainder of it. The difficulty under this clause is that it is not a particular part of the law which has been passed which is bad, it is not because some other subject has been added to the imposition of taxation that either the one or the other is bad, it is a combination between the two; and how you are to assert that principle in any way under this provision, and how you are to have a proviso that on the Royal assent being given the law shall be good in any event, I cannot see.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Clause 56. - It shall not be lawful to pass any vote, resolution, or proposed law for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or moneys to any purpose which has not been first recommended to the House in which the proposal for appropriation originated by message of the Governor-General in the session in which the vote, resolution, or law is proposed.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

In clause 56 there is an alteration which I have to propose, and which I think my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) will agree is practically a necessary amendment—I scarcely think more than a drafting amendment. The clause might lead to misunderstanding if left in its present form. When the Bill was framed in Adelaide there was some power given to the Senate to originate appropriations in a minor degree. Clause 56, as then framed, distinctly referred to both the Senate and the House of Representatives in regard to a Governor's message in respect of those appropriations. But now, as I read the Bill, it is only the House of Representatives that has any right to initiate a law appropriating any part of the public revenue or any money. Therefore, to still use the phrase, "the House in which the proposal for appropriation originated," seems to me inartistic, and might possibly lead to misunderstanding hereafter. Consequently, I propose to alter that by moving the following amendment:-

That after the word "House" (line 5), the words "of Representatives" be inserted, and that the words "in which the proposal for appropriation originated" be struck out.

Mr. Reid. -

Before you move that, there is a prior amendment which I desire to move.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I have almost finished, and when I have explained my amendment I will withdraw in favour of the right honorable gentleman. I wish to point out that the clause as I desire to amend it will read-

It shall not be lawful to pass any vote, resolution, or proposed law for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or moneys to any purpose which has not been first recommended to the House of Representatives by message of the Governor-General in the session in which the vote, resolution, or law is proposed.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Why not strike out the word "first"?
Mr. ISAACS. -

Of course that is another question altogether. There has been an alteration made in clause 54, which I think will not affect my proposal at all, because, although the Senate is given power to insert provisions for "the imposition or appropriation of fines, or pecuniary penalties, or for the demand, or payment, or appropriation of fees for licenses or fees for services under the proposed law," it is expressly stated that that "shall not be taken to appropriate any part of the public revenue or moneys;" and inasmuch as the only appropriation that can be proposed, in a proper legal technical sense, would be by the House of Representatives, therefore, I intend to move this amendment. But, as my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) desires to move a prior amendment, I will postpone the formal moving of mine for the present until the right honorable gentleman has had an opportunity of proposing his.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

My amendment is one that I certainly would not propose if I were assured that a failure to comply with this clause strictly would not invalidate a piece of legislation; but I am afraid that the words at the beginning of the clause-"It shall not be lawful to pass any vote, resolution, or proposed law," might, under a Federal Constitution, beheld to invite or sanction an interference with the procedure of the Houses. Mr. Barton yesterday pointed out a distinction between clause 54 and clause 55. There is not the same friction in a provincial Legislature as there may possibly be under a Federal Constitution, especially with a High Court constituted to deal with questions arising under that Constitution. With a court having such jurisdiction all sorts of questions may be brought forward that would not be brought forward in the ordinary course of provincial legislation. I am afraid that these words amount to a prohibition. "It shall not be lawful," that is to say, any breach of this will be contrary to the law.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think them will be any more danger than there is under the colonial Constitution Acts.

Mr. REID. -

Those of us who are Ministers, in our practical experience, know that there is sometimes a danger that a preliminary vote on a Bill may be taken before a message is brought down.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

In our Parliament the message need not be brought down before the third reading.

Mr. REID. -

I know that on several occasions a point has been taken in our House, as a matter of procedure, that a message has not been sent down.

Mr. BARTON. -
In our House the word "first" has been taken to refer to the initiation instead of the passing.

Mr. REID. -
Sir Joseph Abbott will probably know, but I remember that I took a point of that kind against a Bill on one occasion when a subsequent stage had been arrived at.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
The Constitution Act says no resolution or Bill shall be introduced without a message.

Mr. REID. -
Yes, unless it is first recommended. I think we may safely leave out the word "first," and let it read which has not been recommended to the House." The House would mean the House of Representatives. The message would have to come before the Bill left the House and was sent to the Senate. So long as there is substantial compliance with the law, that is, a message brought down before the Bill goes to the Senate, it will avoid some inconvenience.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I think the spirit of Mr. Reid's amendment is perfectly just. The practice which has prevailed in some of the colonies goes a little further than in the House of Commons. In cases of recommendations as to grants of money in the House of Commons, the message may be brought down at any time before the passage of the measure. Of course there is a difference. These matters are not always merely a recommendation, but they mean the consent of the Crown. For instance, there are cases affecting the prerogative. In that case I believe the consent of the Crown must be first notified. I think the practice of the House of Commons might be found sufficient for the House of Representatives in the Federation. Therefore I think the proposal of Mr. Reid is one which we might well adopt. I do not think there is much difficulty about the words-"It shall not be lawful." They exist in the colonial Constitutions, and I think they have been construed to enable the court to inquire into the question as to whether a message has ever been brought down. These things are taken to be rightly done after a statute has been passed. It is pointed out to me that the words are-"vote, resolution, or proposed law." With reference to a vote or resolution, not the passage of law, there is no possibility, as a rule, of court of justice having to inquire into the matter. Apart from that doubt, I think that the suggestion that the recommendation may be brought down by message at any stage before the passage of vote, resolution, or proposed law is desirable, and I shall support it.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I would suggest that there will perhaps be a little trouble in the clause if my amendment is carried as I proposed it. I would prefer that Mr. Barton should look into the matter, because I am afraid that difficulty would still arise owing to the structure of the clause. I will not move my amendment, but will leave it to Mr. Barton to see if he cannot make it clear that so long as the message is sent down to the House before a certain stage the Bill shall not be liable to be questioned.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I wish to speak to the amendment of Mr. Isaacs. The Senate still retains

Mr. BARTON. -

I have thought over that matter. I think it will not do that, because the words in the 54th clause are that such a measure shall not be taken to be an appropriation.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

They ought not to do it without a Governor's message.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I quite agree with Mr. Kingston. Such Bill cannot pass without a message.

Mr. BARTON. -

It would not require a message under clause 54.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

This 56th clause says the appropriation of any part of the public money or revenues. Mr. Barton surely recognises that this is a very important point. It seems to be another exhibition of the enormous appetite which has been shown by some honorable members for devouring the Senate. The more they get the more they want.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is too tough.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I do not dare for a moment, even with bated breath, to question what the leader says on a point of this kind, but he has not given me an absolute assurance. Will he give me an absolute assurance that the danger which I have indicated does not exist!

The CHAIRMAN. -

Mr. Isaacs' amendment is now before the committee.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Now that my honorable friend (Dr. Cockburn) has mentioned this matter,
I would like to say that the clause has been left in its present form so far because of a doubt which the Drafting Committee entertained as to whether such vote, resolution, or proposed law referred to in the 55th section would not require a message if it were an expenditure within the acceptation of the proviso of the first part of the 54th clause. In other words, the doubt they entertained for a time was whether a proposed law containing provisions to impose or appropriate fines, or for other pecuniary penalties, or for the demand, or the payment or appropriation, of fees for licences or fees for services under the proposed law was not an appropriation as far as the appropriatory part was concerned, which would require a message. It is for that reason that the words as they stand have been left in so long. We have since considered the matter, and I think I can say, for my honorable friends and myself, that we entertain no doubt upon the subject, and that the words in the proviso to the first part of clause 54-"But a proposed law shall not be taken to appropriate any part of the public revenue or moneys," will be construed to mean that by the law of the Constitution such things are not to be an appropriation and will not require messages. To be perfectly frank with my honorable friend, we did entertain a doubt for some time, but that is now removed.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

May I ask whether clause 56 is not far more inclusive with regard to laws for appropriations than even the 54th clause, which only deals with proposed laws for appropriation? Clause 56 covers that and a good deal besides. Does not that indicate that this clause is more stringent than clause 54?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is an insidious attack upon the Senate, is it not?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is not insidious but open. I thought I saw through it in a moment. I would ask Mr. Barton if these words "vote or resolution" being added to "proposed law" will not amount to making this clause far more comprehensive in its object than clause 54?

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I understood that the proviso to clause 54 was meant to enable the Senate to originate laws which simply provided for fines and pecuniary penalties. I understood the proviso to clause 54 was intended to enable the Senate to originate measures which appropriated revenue only in a limited degree, but I never understood that it was intended to remove the safeguard which is contained in every Constitution, that there shall be no appropriation except by the Governor's message. In support of this, I would remind the leader of the Convention that clause 56 has been altered from its original shape. The shape in which it first appeared was that the law had been first recommended to the House of Representatives, but it has been altered. Now it has to be first recommended to the House in which the proposal for an appropriation originated.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think that was done in Adelaide.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

The only proposal for appropriation which can originate in the Senate will be in those cases which are covered by the first proviso to clause 54.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And they are declared not to be appropriations.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

The form of clause 56, particularly the alteration to which I call attention, shows that the intention of the framers of the Constitution was that a message should be addressed to the Senate in relation to these matters I ask the leader of the Convention, whilst it has been decided that these minor measures of appropriation may originate in the Senate, not to go further, and to throw away the safeguards generally imposed in connexion with the appropriation of public funds, and that wherever such a measure is originated, you must have the Governor's message to protect it.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

The Bill does that as it stands, because it declares that that is not an appropriation.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I listened with the greatest interest to Mr. Barton's remarks, and he put that as the position. I venture to suggest that that was not the intention of the Convention hitherto. That is shown by the fact that the clause, in good set terms, declares that you may send a message to the Senate in regard to appropriation, and the only message in connexion with appropriation is in connexion with minor matters.

Mr. BARTON. -

In connexion with what matters?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

As to matters of this sort-fees and fines. They are minor in their nature, but still they may be of very considerable importance.

Mr. BARTON. -

Does not the Constitution say in express terms, in the second part of the first sub-section of clause 54, that such a law shall not be taken to appropriate any part of the public revenue?
Mr. KINGSTON. -

That is what I am objecting to. That is introduced there as a qualification in reference to origination.

Mr. SYMON. -

That proviso in clause 51 merely means that you will not call these Appropriation Bills, but still they deal with money.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

My point is this: That whilst you may well let matters of that sort originate in the Senate, it is not desirable, either as regards the House of Representatives or the Senate, in connexion with these minor matters to throw away that control over the purse which is vested in the Executive; and which is evidenced by the giving or with-holding of a Governor's message. The leader of the Convention will see that, according to the terms in which clause 56 has been framed, it is evidently intended to apply to both Houses, and I hope it will be so continued, and that the Senate shall not be given, any more than the House of Representatives, the power of originating measures of this sort for the expenditure of public funds unless it is recommended by the Executive.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I think the contention of my right honorable friend (Mr. Kingston) is perfectly right. It was understood, when we passed this clause in Adelaide, that a message would be sent even to the Senate, and this clause shows clearly that that was the intention, because it says-

It shall not be lawful to pass any vote, resolution, or proposed law for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or moneys to any purpose-

That seems to me so large and expansive that it really takes in everything, even the service of an officer, but it was clearly understood that a Bill which, for convenience or any other reason, might be introduced in the Senate, even if it incidentally included a payment for the services of an officer, or for some purpose of that kind, or a Bill causing expense, should not be looked upon as a Money Bill. I do not know exactly what the full purpose of the amendment of Mr. Isaacs is, but I am as staunch as any honorable member to see that the power of the purse in respect to the origination of Bills shall be exclusively kept in the House of Representatives. But honorable members know that in the transaction of parliamentary business you often leave the Second Chamber with very little to do, and there are many measures which might just as well be introduced into the Upper House as into the Lower House. Therefore, it does seem to me that the clause as it stands is perfectly right, and carries out the intention which we had in Adelaide, and does not infringe on the right of the Lower House over the initiation of all money measures.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I think my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) will support me in this statement, that, in the case of an Australian Constitution with a clause similar to clause 56, it is usual to interpret the clause as requiring a message for any Bill which entails expense on the public exchequer.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
That is so; but I think in Adelaide it was purposely put in this way.

Mr. REID. -
In New South Wales I know that rule is maintained.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Yes.

Mr. REID. -
I know that I have often had to consult either my friend the Speaker or the Clerk of the Assembly as to whether the Bill would come within such a definition.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
You could not introduce into the Upper House a Health Bill, because it incidentally created an office.

Mr. REID. -
Exactly; we have cured that state of things in clause 54, but no one ever intended, I think, to take away the control of the public exchequer from, not the House of Representatives, but the Executive Government. The Governor means the Executive Council, and the Governor sends a message because the Executive Council originates or is prepared to sanction the origination of a Bill involving expenditure, and if that control were taken out of the hands of the Executive Government, no financial system would be possible. Private members might bring in Bills involving a large drain on the Treasury, perhaps very popular, but entirely out of season in view of the State of the public finances, and the Government would be thrown into a very undesirable position. The Government should have this control that no measure which will involve a drain on the Treasury and you cannot distinguish as to the amount of the drain-can come in or go into law without the sanction of the Executive Government, and that is what a message means. Without such a safeguard, I think we would be put into a very undesirable position.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
If I followed my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) correctly, this Bill does not carry out his wishes, because no message is necessary for the passage of a Bill
Mr. REID. -

It would require a message on a different ground—the ground that it involved the expense of administering the Act.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

This would involve the expense of administering the Act.

Mr. REID. -

Yes; but we get the same point in a different shape. Although not attempting to appropriate money, it would still be a Money Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

In clause 56 it is provided that it shall not be lawful to pass any vote, resolution, or proposed law for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, until a message has been sent to the House in which the appropriation originates. That assumes that a proposal to appropriate a part of the public revenue can originate in the Senate. I do not think it can do so under this Bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Subject to clause 54.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Not even under clause 54. My reading of the Bill is that nothing which is an appropriation of the public revenue within the meaning of the Constitution can originate in the Senate. Clause 54 provides that laws appropriating any part of the public revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; that is, all laws which in any shape or form appropriate public revenue must originate in the House of Representatives; but then, to get rid of the difficulty in regard to the small matters, we have declared that a proposed law which deals with certain fines and payments for services shall not be taken to appropriate revenue at all.

Mr. REID. -

It does not contain words to this effect—"and shall not be deemed to be a Money Bill because it entails expense on the public exchequer." No such words as those are in.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

We have not used the words "Money Bill" in any clause. A Money Bill is a wider expression than a Bill appropriating revenue.

Mr. REID. -

But the appropriation here is of fines, penalties, fees for licences, or fees for services under the proposed law. As regards expenditure under a proposed law out of the public exchequer, it is not made necessary to have a message in connexion with that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I admit my honorable friend's position, that this is very limited in its operation. It deals only with fines, or demand, or payment, or appropriation of fees for licences, or fees for services. It is very limited, but at the same time it does seem to me that you, cannot originate in the Senate any Appropriation Bill. Therefore, it is misleading to say, in clause 56, that the message is to be sent to the House in which the appropriation originated, because there is only one House in which the proposed expenditure can possibly be originated, and to have the section uniform, it does seem to be necessary to say—and in fairness also to point out exactly the position—that the message can be sent only to the House of Representatives. If I thought that the Senate could originate any expenditure of the nature described in clause 54 as appropriation, I would certainly insist that the message should be sent first, because so long as a message has to be sent, so long has the Government of the day the control that it ought to have over the expenditure, As it appears to me that that appropriation within the meaning of clause 54 can arise only in the House of Representatives, I think the message should be limited to that House only.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I hope I shall be understood as having answered my honorable friend (Dr. Cockburn) merely to the extent of the question he asked, which was whether a Bill, as I understood him, for one of the purposes indicated in the first sub-section of clause 54 would necessarily require a message. It seems to me that the words in the sub-section of clause 54 are so strong that such a Bill shall not be taken to appropriate, are so without limitation that, it is reasonably clear that such a Bill would not require a message under clause 56. But, as Dr. Cockburn points out, there still remain two other cases, and those are the cases of a vote or resolution, and there is nothing about the vote or resolution which he speaks of in the provision in the first part of clause 54, so they stand out unqualified, and it must be that they would require a message. Now, what are these votes or resolutions? The votes or resolutions that are meant here, according to practice, may be simply the votes or resolutions which afterwards find their concrete form in Bills, and the real question is whether we need trouble about the words "vote or resolution" at all whether they need ever have been in any of the Constitution Acts. Even if I am right in thinking that a Bill of the character indicated in the first part of clause 54 does not require a message, still I do not find anything in the Constitution to do away with the necessity of a message, even in the Senate, for a vote or resolution, if such a vote or resolution is taken in the Senate. But now let up, come to the practical side of the question. Under this Constitution, with the Ministry practically responsible to the House of Representatives, as they will be if this Constitution is carried, is it likely that a Minister responsible to that House, no matter which House he sits in, will ever bring down a message to the Senate? It seems to me to be most unlikely that be will, and therefore there is not any serious practical difficulty.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I would like to point out what we did in Adelaide. As the Bill stood in 1891, and as it stood before an alteration was made in Adelaide, clause 56 ran as follows:-

It shall not be lawful for the House of Representatives to pass any vote, resolution, or law for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or the produce of any tax or impost to any purpose which has not been first recommended to that House by message of the Governor-General in the session in which the vote, resolution, or law is proposed.

That was altered in Adelaide, as follows:-

It shall not be lawful for the Senate or the House of Representatives to pass any vote, resolution, or proposed law for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or moneys to any purpose which has not been first recommended to the House in which the proposal for appropriation originated by message of the Governor-General in the session in which the vote, resolution, or law is proposed.

Then the words which I seek to excise, viz., "in which the proposal for appropriation originated," were inserted in Adelaide, because the word "Senate" was inserted in the first line, as well as the words "the House of Representatives," which had stood there previously.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

You will remember that there was no difficulty then, because at that time the proviso to clause 54 had not been inserted.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The proviso was not the difficulty.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No; that is the difficulty now.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The difficulty is that in Adelaide we altered clause 54 so as to stand-

Proposed laws having for their main object the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or moneys, or the imposition of any tax or impost, shall originate in the House of Representatives.

When it was recognised by the insertion of those words that there would be Bills which were for the appropriation of moneys, but in respect of which Bills appropriation was not the main object, it became necessary that we should insert, in clause 56, a provision that a law for appropriation or vote or resolution for appropriation in the Senate also required a message. But when we altered that again in Sydney and added a proviso, it became perfectly clear that there could be no appropriation in the ordinary sense which could originate in the Senate. Consequently, it seems to me that we have to go back, in regard to clause 56, from the position we took in Adelaide. We have to strike out the reference to the Senate, which has been done by the Drafting Committee, and we have also to strike out the words "the House in which the proposal for appropriation originated."

Mr. BARTON. -

Could not a vote or resolution originate in the Senate? Technically it could.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is nothing to prevent the Senate from voting just as it pleases, but an improper vote would not have the slightest weight. It is necessary to put in these words, because if they are put in it will not be possible for the Senate to pass a vote or resolution for appropriation in the ordinary sense at all. Clause 56 covers votes, resolutions, and proposed laws, and, if the amendment I suggest be carried, it will not be lawful to pass a vote or resolution or proposed law till the message authorizing the appropriation has first come to the House of Representatives. It will be possible for the Senate to appropriate public revenue or moneys, or to impose taxation in the sense of fines, pecuniary penalties, or fees for licences or services, because that is expressly provided by clause 54 not to be an appropriation. In this connexion, I should like to point out that there is a passage in the tenth edition of May which seems to me somewhat at variance with the words of the rule of the House of Commons upon which the 273rd standing order of the Victorian Assembly is based. The passage to which I refer will be found on page 547. It is as follows:-

Relaxation of Commons' privileges. - The claim to exclusive legislation over charges imposed upon the people was formerly extended by the Commons to the imposition of fees and pecuniary penalties, and to provisions which touched the mode of suing for fees and penalties, and to their application when recovered; and they denied to the Lords the power of dealing with these matters. The rigid enforcement of this claim proved inconvenient, and, in 1849, the Commons adopṫ.6d a standing order, based on a resolution passed in 1831, which gave the Lords power to deal, by Bill or amendment, with pecuniary penalties, forfeitures, or fees, when the object of their legislation was to secure the execution of an Act; provided that the fees were not payable into the Exchequer, or in aid of the public revenue; and when the Bill shall be a private Bill for a local or personal Act.

I am rather inclined to think that that proviso is incorrect, and I would ask the leader of the Convention to consider it. I should like to add that it is important to include the words "vote and resolution" in this clause, because a vote may not be a harmless thing. When a Supply Bill is passed to be applied to the satisfaction of such votes as may be agreed to-by the Assembly in, say, "the present session of Parliament," each of these votes is all authorization under the terms of the Act of Parliament for the disbursement of money.

There is a difference in the Commons' resolution as to fees. Fees are not within the allowance in any case where they have to be paid into the Exchequer.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the honorable and learned member will look at page 830 of May he will see that the text of the proviso appears to be at variance with the standing order.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The practice of the House of Lords is to pass Bills containing provisions making appropriations, appointing officers, and so on, but the Commons take no notice of these provisions. In former times they used to print them in different type, but I believe in later times they do not even do that. The provisions are printed in the ordinary type, and they are passed by the House of Commons as though they were not there. They are supposed not to be in the Bill, though they really are in it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I believe that that is so, but I cannot find, in the standing order under which it is done, the proviso that in all cases the money must not go into the public revenue.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is provided in the second sub-section of the 44th standing order of the House of Commons.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Is not that sub-section entirely distinct from the first sub-section?

Mr BARTON. - The first sub-section deals with pecuniary penalties and forfeitures, the second sub-section refers only to fees.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the proviso does apply, I think we ought to reconsider the first part of clause 54.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.
Clause 56B (Dead-lock provisions).

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales).—
It is my intention to move the omission of the first paragraph of this clause, that being, the portion which was carried by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) in Sydney, but I find that notice has been given of several amendments. I therefore think it right that opportunity should be allowed for the moving of those amendments. Then
I shall satisfy my object by voting against the first paragraph if it is put separately.

The CHAIRMAN. -

In order to enable all amendments to be moved, I will put the paragraphs of this clause separately.

Paragraph (1). - If the House of Representatives passes any proposed law, and the Senate rejects the same, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree, and if the Governor-General thereupon dissolves the House of Representatives, and if, within six months after such dissolution, the House of Representatives, by an absolute majority, again passes the proposed law, with or without any amendments that may have been made or agreed to by the Senate, and if the Senate again rejects the proposed law, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree, the Governor-General may dissolve the Senate.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I do not propose to move the first amendment of which I have given notice. What I propose to do is to move my second amendment—

That, after the word "Representatives" (lines 6-7), the following words be inserted:-"which dissolution shall not take place within six months of the expiry of the House of Representatives by effluxion of time."

As honorable members will recollect, this clause includes two alternative methods by which at least the first stage in the proposed solution of the imaginary dead-lock difficulty is to be arrived at. The first method is that which was carried in Sydney upon my motion, and deals with what has been referred to shortly as the consecutive dissolution. There is to be a dissolution, first, of the House of Representatives, supposing upon a serious question of public importance there is a disagreement between the two Houses. After the return of the new House of Representatives, if they re-affirm the measure in regard to which the dissolution took place, and there is still a disagreement between the Houses, the Senate must go before its constituents. That was the first branch of a proposal, and following that there was the other suggestion about the joint meeting of the two Houses. The other proposal, which was embodied tentatively—in fact, both were embodied tentatively—was that in the event of disagreement there should be a simultaneous dissolution of the two Houses. And superadded to that came the ultimate mode of reaching what was hoped to be finality, by a joint meeting of the two Houses, who should arrive at a decision on the conditions specified. Now, the amendment I propose in clause 56B—that is, the first of the two alternative amendments—is intended to bring that first one into harmony with the second, so that we may then have the two on identically the same footing as to the periods which are to elapse before the position shall arise indicated by the amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is the second paragraph.

Mr. SYMON. -
No; it is the first paragraph.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You want an alternative system still.

Mr. SYMON. -
No, I do not want an alternative system. I propose to adhere as strongly as I can to the first alternative, that is that the Senate shall not be dissolved until after there has been a dissolution of the House of Representatives.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not think we are taking the right course of procedure, and I am afraid we shall get these things mixed up.

Mr. WISE. -
Would it not be more convenient to take a test vote on the question whether the first two words of clause 56B, "If the," shall stand?

Mr. BARTON. -
I thought of suggesting that.

Mr. SYMON. -
We cannot deal with this matter without re-opening the whole subject of the solution of dead-locks, and I think we should deal with it at once.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
But we must have something to vote on.

Mr. SYMON. -
I am quite aware of that.

Mr. BARTON. -
We might take a test vote on the question whether the first five words of the clause-"If the House of Representatives," shall stand part of the clause. If those words are struck out, I will move the omission of the rest of the first paragraph. If they are allowed to remain in, then the whole of the rest of the paragraph will be open to amendment.

Mr. SYMON. -
I see no objection to that. All I want is that we shall have the whole subject to deal with. I should like to assist in shortening the time we occupy over it in every way I possibly can, so that we may arrive at a decision of this question to which we have all devoted great attention, and which is the most troublesome, as it is the most important, matter that we have been concerned with for some time past. But I want to say to Sir John Forrest that my amendment does not affect the possibility of testing the alternative which he suggests, and which is intended to prevent the dissolution of the Senate.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then we ought to have joined forces.

Mr. SYMON. -

So we shall join forces. Down to the words "will not agree," in the second last line, Sir John Forrest's amendment and mine are identical. We are absolutely at one.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Then let us take that part.

Mr. SYMON. -

Of course, there ought to be no confusion as to the votes we give.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Our amendments are not in exactly the same word's down to the words "will not agree," but substantially they are the same.

Mr. SYMON. -

I think they are identical.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No, I assure you; I have compared them.

Mr. SYMON. -

If my right honorable friend will point out any word in my amendment that varies from his own amendment down to the point I have mentioned, I shall be very happy, to give way, but I think he will find that they are the same down to the second last line. Sir John Forrest proposes to strike out the words "the Governor-General may dissolve the Senate," and to insert the words "House of Representatives may present an address to the Governor-General reciting the facts, and praying that a full conference of the two Houses of Parliament may be convened," his object being to avoid a dissolution of the Senate altogether. Now, I believe in a dissolution of the Senate at some stage, and under certain circumstances, under this Constitution. I think it is a right and proper thing that a House elected on the broadest possible suffrage, and having a constituency, should go, when the proper occasion arises, to that constituency to get the mandate of that constituency. What the occasion is to be when that is to be brought about, it is for this Convention to determine. But I think that is the only difference between Sir John Forrest's amendment and mine, namely, that he does not like a dissolution of the Senate, and proposes to avoid it by substituting directly a joint sitting of the two Houses. I think that is the position. Therefore, adopting Mr. Barton's suggestion, if we take a division on any words to ascertain whether the provision shall stand at all, then we can go on to move the subsequent amendments, and Sir John Forrest, having voted against Mr. Barton's amendment, if it is put that way, will be able to insert his own words after the words "will not agree."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You had on the paper a notice of an amendment which you were going to move, and those are the words I copied in framing my amendment.

Mr. SYMON. -

I find that Sir John Forrest is quite right. I had the clause reprinted.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

A little bit altered

Mr. SYMON. -

Only the words "on that account."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

And also the words "substantially the same."

Mr. SYMON. -

At any rate, we will have an opportunity of comparing them. I do not think there was any alteration in substance.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No, I think not; but in the words there was an alteration. Down to the words "will not agree" we are substantially in accord.

Mr. SYMON. -

And I hope we shall be substantially in accord and absolutely successful in the end.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Your congratulations are rather early.

Mr. SYMON. -

Of course, they are subject to qualification.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

While I wish to eliminate the first paragraph of clause 56B, embodying the amendment carried by Mr. Symon in Sydney, I do not wish to submit my proposal in any such way as will prevent, if my proposal be lost, the amendment of the rest of this paragraph. If I move the omission of the whole of the paragraph, the question will then be-"That the words proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause;" and if the Convention resolve that question in the affirmative, and defeat my amendment in that way, the words of the paragraph would not be subject to further amendment. Therefore, if I moved the amendment in that way, and failed to carry my proposal, I should deprive honorable members of the opportunity of amending the paragraph. However, I do not propose to do that. I propose to move the omission of the first five words of the clause-"If the House of Representatives." If the Convention decide that these words shall stand part of the clause, the remainder of the paragraph will still be open to any other amendments honorable members wish to move. If those words are eliminated, I shall take it that honorable members will assent to the elimination of the whole paragraph the consecutive dissolution.

Mr. WISE. -
That will not interfere with Sir John Forrest's proposed amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Oh, yes, it will.

Mr. BARTON. -
I hope this explanation will make the matter clear. If my amendment is confined to the omission of the words-"If the House of Representatives," pro forma, and if the amendment is not carried, the remainder of the paragraph will be open to amendment; whilst if my amendment is carried, it will be taken as a test vote, and as an indication that we are to strike out the whole of the paragraph.

Mr. WISE. -
Then Sir John Forrest's amendment could come in.

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes, the way would be absolutely clear for Sir John Forrest to move an amendment in place of this paragraph. If the whole paragraph be omitted, it will still be open to Sir John Forrest to move an alternative paragraph to take its place.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What are you going to move in its place?

Mr. BARTON. -
What I am going to move in its place is "nothing." I wish to eliminate the paragraph altogether. If my amendment is carried, and the whole paragraph is omitted, room will be left, even then, for the substitution of another paragraph. I therefore beg to move-

That the words "If the House of Representatives" be omitted from the first paragraph of clause 56B."

If my amendment is carried it will be taken as an indication that the committee wish to get rid of the whole paragraph.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
And have no provision for dead-locks.
That amendment by Mr. Symon was carried in Sydney at a time when it was the opinion of the majority of the committee that there should be some provision for a dissolution of the Senate, and when a proposal for a simultaneous dissolution of the House of Representatives had not been brought forward. A number of members voted for Mr. Symon's amendment as some means of dealing with possible causes of dead-locks—I will not say probable, but possible dead-locks. Those members, after having voted for the amendment, were of opinion that the simultaneous dissolution was a better provision, and they, therefore, voted for the latter in the hope that the first paragraph might afterwards be eliminated. I have always felt that it is sufficient to provide for a simultaneous dissolution of the Senate and the House of Representatives so far as you provide for dissolutions arising under the circumstances laid down here. It must be recollected there is nothing in the paragraph, and it would perhaps not be easy to put anything in the paragraph, to specify what will happen when either House is in fault. We are bound to assume, under the circumstances such as are indicated here, that each House is acting from a sense of public duty. It would, therefore, be an injustice to the House of Representatives that in all cases of conflict the House of Representatives must be dissolved before the idea of dissolving the Senate is taken into consideration. The other paragraph gives leave to dissolve the two Houses simultaneously. But I wish to come back to the argument that if the Governor is to reserve the power to dissolve the two Houses simultaneously, he will still have the power of dissolving the House of Representatives without also dissolving the Senate, if there is any fault on either side—and it is as likely the fault will be on the part of one House as it is that it will be on the part of the other. So you provide for circumstances in which sometimes one House will be wrong in the result and sometimes the other House will be wrong in the result, and to all these circumstances you apply the one undeviating rule that, before the Senate is dissolved, the House of Representatives shall be dissolved. I do not think that is just.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It is the case now.

Where you have to ascertain the opinion of the people of the Commonwealth as to a question which has divided the two Houses, and which they have not succeeded in solving, the general plan is to take the sense of the people in the way that is proposed in the second paragraph—by a double dissolution. That I take to be a sufficient provision. I am one who thinks that under this Constitution dead-locks will be very infrequent. It would have been well if public opinion had stopped at the provisions which are made in clauses 54 and 55. But public opinion has not done that, and demands something more. While dead-locks are, in the opinion of most us here, unlikely, and while we think there will be very few, and that most of the causes of them have been provided against, the public are of opinion that some further provision is necessary in case dead-locks do occur. What should that provision be? It should not be embodied in the provision which gives liberty to do such an unjust thing as to dissolve the House of Representatives before the Senate, when the fault may not be the fault of the House of Representatives at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What is done now?

Mr. BARTON. -
In most of the colonies only one House is dissolved. I quite admit that, there may be something incongruous in that. At the same time, my friend will remember that in some of the colonies the Second Chamber is a nominee House, and it is not much use dissolving that.

Mr. SYMON. -
In our colony (South Australia) the Second Chamber is elective.

Mr. BARTON. -
And in other colonies the Second Chamber is elective, and no Ministry has yet dissolved the Second Chamber in case of a dispute.

Mr. SYMON. -
The mere existence of the power has provided the remedy.

Mr. BARTON. -
The mere existence of the power has provided the remedy, and so I say with reference to this proviso. If you provide for a simultaneous dissolution the mere existence of the power is likely to provide the remedy.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Is that not because the vote of the people, on a dissolution of the Lower House, governs the whole question?

That may be so, to a certain extent. I am not insensible to the fact that in the Federal Constitution the vote of the majority of the people, as distinguished from the majority of the votes in the separate states, would be the strong vote, and in the end the prevailing vote. I do not think you could make a Constitution in this form supporting the scheme of responsible government, unless you have confidence that that would be the result. I have myself no fear but that that would be the result. But it is an unjust thing to give such a power where circumstances only can demonstrate which House is in the right. It would be unjust to give the power to dissolve one of the Houses first, whether the House dissolved were in the right or in the wrong. The difference between this Constitution and those of the separate colonies is a very strong one. We have not in any of the colonies a Second Chamber which rests precisely as the First Chamber does, on the popular vote, and which is supported by precisely the same suffrage. In the Commonwealth, both Houses appeal to constituents possessing the same suffrage and voting in the same way. It is true that one House appeals to the whole Commonwealth, and the other appeals to the states separately. That is the difference in the position of the two Houses. But the body of electors are really the same body acting in two different capacities. That may be a subject of some complication, but it is perhaps the inevitable result of a Constitution such as this, when the utmost has been done to liberalize the composition of the Second Chamber. We have done our utmost to liberalize the composition of the Second Chamber, and we have put ourselves in the position that, if it is right to dissolve one of those Houses, it is right to dissolve both. If there is to be a right to dissolve the unoffending Chamber as well as the other, we shall be doing an injustice, which I certainly think ought not to be contemplated by a Constitution such as this, which in every other particular makes most strenuous efforts to be just. I do not wish to detain the committee at greater length at this stage. I believe the provision which Mr. Symon obtained the insertion of in Sydney was consented to at a time when it was not thought the provision for dead-locks would go further. When it was found that the arguments in favour of a double dissolution prevailed—we were getting on towards the end of a session truncated through various circumstances, particularly in reference to the colony of Queensland it was thought wise to go back at that stage and move the recommittal, so as to eliminate my honorable friend's provision. But the men who voted for the double dissolution did so in the full belief that, before the Constitution was finally adopted, the provision for the consecutive dissolution would be struck out. I think I have done a duty to the Convention in endeavouring to take the sense of honorable members on this subject.

I sincerely hope that we shall be able to come to some reasonable decision on this matter without any lengthy debate. I may say, in the beginning, that I have all along been opposed to a provision for dead-locks. In Sydney I voted in favour of omitting such a provision, feeling that the same forces which regulate public life at the present time will be in existence when we have a Federal Parliament and a Federal Government, and that disagreements will be much more unlikely under a federal form of government than under our local Parliament. I desire that the procedure to be followed in the future should be based on the procedure we have always followed, and are following now, and on the procedure which exists in the great mother country. If a difference occur at the present time between two Houses of Parliament in any of the colonies with elective Upper Houses—and several, including that which I represent, have elective Upper Houses—there is no provision for a dissolution of the Upper House. During the last quarter of a century, no great differences ha

You are not satisfied as to the money clauses.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Members want everything settled, and settled precisely in their own way.

Mr. ISAACS. -
You want to follow the practice of those Houses, and tell us that is federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have been able after a defeat-

Mr. REID. -
What?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
A defeat.

Mr. REID. -
What on? You cannot tell us.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Those who desire that no provision should be made for dead-locks—and they had a very respectable following, as to some of us, at any rate-finding themselves in a minority, were quite content to provide some means of dealing with dead-locks, should they occur. With that view, Mr. Symon moved the first paragraph, the first two or three words of which we are now dealing with. Mr. Symon's proposal was a sort of compromise. It was not at all in accordance with the wishes of myself and many others, but we accepted it, and we carried it, very much to the disappointment of those who wished for the referendum, and appeals to the whole mass of the people on every conceivable trifling occasion.

Mr. REID. -
Or to the High Court.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
However, the provision was inserted in the Bill. And then Mr. Carruthers—I hope he is present, because I have something to say about him—and my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) proposed the second part.
Mr. REID. -
I was the real culprit.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
And we were induced to support these two honorable gentlemen by a promise which was not carried out.

Mr. REID. -
Not a promise.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Yes, a promise which was clearly understood by me when I gave my support to those two honorable members, and if it had not been for my support and that of others the second paragraph would not have found a place in the Bill. We were promised that, in the event of that paragraph being carried, dissolution of the Senate would be avoided. I am willing to say for the honorable members to whom I have alluded that when they gave this assurance it was in good faith.

Mr. REID. -
I never gave any assurance.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Who gave the assurance?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The right honorable member (Mr. Reid) and the honorable member (Mr. Carruthers).

Mr. REID. -
Oh, no.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
At any rate, Mr. Carruthers gave the assurance to me, and I understood that Mr. Reid was behind the assurance.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
Where was the assurance given?

Sir. JOHN FORREST. - In Sydney. Mr. Carruthers said means would be taken to eliminate from the clause, as proposed by Mr. Symon, the provision as to the dissolution of the Senate. I do not know whether Mr. Symon's memory is the same as mine on that point.

Mr. SYMON. -
I remember that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It is clearly in my mind, and on that understanding I voted for dealing with dead-locks by means of a joint meeting of the two Houses with a three-fifths majority. My friends were unable, and I admit the difficulty, to do as they hoped they would be able to do. That their intention was to eliminate from this clause the provision as to the dissolution of the Senate, I am absolutely positive. However, it was not done, and therefore we find these two clauses somewhat in opposition to one another, and two or three alternatives given to the Government of dealing with the matter. That is an altogether unsatisfactory plan, because in my opinion we should have one method of settlement, and not two or three. I have, however, tried to explain the reason why these opposing elements find a place in the Bill, that is, so far as my vote influenced it. The proposal that I favour is that the Senate should not be dissolved at all.

Mr. WISE. -
Vote with Mr. Barton on the next division.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I shall do nothing of the kind. I distrust the honorable member when he comes to me with a gift. I should like to see some simple plan adopted. I do not want to see any dispute between the two Houses carried on for months and months simply in order to gratify adventurous and aspiring politicians.

Mr. REID. -
The referendum is short, sharp, and decisive.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The referendum is unwieldy, and would not be effective. My objection to the dissolution of the Senate, as proposed in the Bill, is that it would give the Executive Government too much power. It is an engine that could be used by the Executive Government to coerce the Senate. Payment of members has always been a potent influence in preventing a dissolution, and since its introduction dissolutions have been almost unheard of. There was an exception in the case of New South Wales, but as a rule Ministers are unwilling to ask for a dissolution, knowing, as they do, that their friends will be thrown out in the cold, and that their pay will be stopped. That is one reason why dissolutions will not be very frequent under this Constitution. With regard to the referendum, I can understand the people in a colony like Victoria, which is comparatively small in area, and which has a metropolitan press that circulates everywhere within its boundaries, taking a very keen interest in any dispute between the two Houses, but is it likely that the people of Tasmania, of Queensland, of Western Australia, or of South Australia would take any great interest in a matter of the kind? Look at the daily press. Even in the city of Melbourne the reports of our proceedings that are published by the newspapers are as meagre as possible. This shows that the people of Australia are not taking any very keen interest in what we are doing. The press know what the public want. If a subject is interesting to the public they will not neglect it. You need not look further than the sporting news to ascertain what interests the people of Victoria, and, in fact, the whole of Australia. The sporting news is very full, but even in the city of Melbourne only very short reports are published of the proceedings of this Convention. I say, therefore, that it is too much to expect the people of distant colonies to take any keen interest in any question in dispute between the two Houses, and it will be found that the referendum will only be taken advantage of by the people in the crowded centres of population. That is my opinion. If other honorable members agree with me, why cannot we devise some simple and more speedy method of meeting the difficulty? If the Houses cannot agree, even after a dissolution of the one House, then let them meet together, and let a three-fifths majority determine the matter. I mention a three-fifths majority, but that is a point on which every honorable member may have his opinion. That would be a much better plan than having either a simultaneous or consecutive dissolution, and trying to kick up a row in every part of Australia, when the people do not perhaps care two-pence about the particular question in dispute.

Mr. REID. - Would it not be simpler to have one Chamber, and to get rid of the House of Representatives?

Sir JOHN FORREST. - Do you want that?

Mr. REID. - With this Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - Then why do not you advocate it? By following the plan I am suggesting we shall be going along a well-beaten track and not along tracks that will lead, we do not know where. We should be following the precedent of the British Constitution, which provides that the Lower House may be dissolved. That is the plan that has been adopted in every British colony, and that is all that we want. By a dissolution of the Lower House we can most effectually ascertain what the opinion of the public is, because the people will take an interest in a general election, although they will not take an interest in a referendum when there is no one asking for their votes and trying to gain seats in Parliament. By a general election we get the votes of the people.

Mr. ISAACS. - Will you consent to be bound by the result?

Sir JOHN FORREST. - I say that if the two Houses cannot agree, they should meet together and settle the matter in dispute. The world has not been made for to-day or to-morrow, and we are no dependent for our existence or our well being upon the passing of any measure immediately. If there is a grave dispute, no one loses much by delay. Under this Constitution the Senate will be continually changing. Every three years one-half of the members will go out. If they are opposed to what is the popular view they will not be re-elected, and in six years it will be possible for the people to alter the whole personnel of the Senate.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

The Government may be dead in the meantime.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It does not matter about the Government being dead; we have to think about the country, and whether I am in the Government or the honorable member is in the Government the country will go on. This desire to coerce the one branch of the Legislature is wholly opposed to my ideas of constitutional government.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

You have not had any experience yet of an Upper House.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Because you have been unable to get particular measures passed you want to have only one House, and you had better say so.

Mr. REID. -

And that the Upper House.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No, to have one House; to have the control of that House, and to do as you like. I shall oppose Mr. Barton's amendment, as I am not in favour of the first part of the clause, at any rate, down to the word "agree," being struck out. I hope that those honorable members who voted with Mr. Symon for the insertion of the words will not change their opinions now. We were induced to support the second part of the clause on the understanding that the words providing for a dissolution of the Senate would be excised, and that understanding has not been carried out.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I hope that there will be no confusion as to what we are voting for. I would have risen to order when my right honorable friend was speaking, but that I did not want it to appear that I desired to stop him in the remarks he was making. I would now ask you, Mr. Chairman, whether the debate should not be confined to the discussion of

Sir JOHN FORREST.
Mr. WISE. -

If there is to be a dissolution of the Senate, the question is whether it is to be simultaneous or consecutive with the dissolution of the House of Representatives?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We have not got to that yet.

Mr. WISE. -

We want to get to that as soon as possible.

Mr. SYMON. -

Before there is a dissolution of the Senate, there must be a dissolution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. WISE. -

What we have first to decide is, whether sub-section (1) is to stand. If it is, then, of course, Sir John Forrest's proposal cannot be made.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, it can.

Mr. WISE. -

I can understand Mr. Symon desiring to get a vote in favour of his proposition from those who are really opposed to it.

Mr. SYMON. -

No.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What the Hon. Mr. Barton said was that if the words were struck out that would be an intimation that the first part of the clause was to go. If the words are retained, any honorable member can propose to amend the remainder of the clause in any way he may desire.

Mr. WISE. -

That is what I am pointing out. If the words "If the House of Representatives pass any proposed law" are struck out, that is to be a test vote as to the whole of the first sub-section. My right honorable friend desires to have the first sub-section struck out.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Not the whole of it.

Mr. WISE. -

He will get into technical difficulties if he does not. The first words of the right honorable member's amendment, as printed, are-"If the Senate reject or fail to pass." He can move the insertion of these words after the first sub-section has been struck out. He can make it a test question as to whether there shall be a simultaneous or consecutive dissolution. Mr. Symon, in asking that it shall be a consecutive dissolution, displays great adroitness in persuading Sir John Forrest to vote with him, but that will not be a straight vote. If the right honorable member will consider the matter, he will see that, by voting for Mr. Symon, he will be voting on a question which is to decide whether there is to be a consecutive dissolution.

Mr. SYMON. -

Nothing of the kind.

Mr. WISE. -

Then it will not be a test vote at all. If we desire to take a test vote upon this question, let it be a clear test vote. I understood Mr. Barton to say that the test vote was to be on the question of whether we are to have a consecutive or a simultaneous dissolution. When we have dealt with that it will be open to Sir John Forrest to submit his amendment.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I am sorry to refer again to the matter of procedure, but I am sure that my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Wise) was not serious when he said that I gave expression to the views I did in order to get opponents to my proposal to vote with me. I do not wish that. I do not wish any one who is an opponent of the whole of my provision to vote for it on any assumption that, at some time or other, he may be able to succeed in doing what he wishes himself. It is a customary form of military tactics, if you cannot succeed in defeating your opponents when they are united, that you must try to defeat them in detail. My honorable friend is quite right in that, but as it comes from one who is opposed to the views which Sir John Forrest and myself hold in substance, it loses, perhaps, some of its weight. Now, the proposal of my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) is to take a vote on the first words. I do not see how it can be a successful test vote on anything, because Mr. Barton says that if the words be retained, then it is competent for any one to move a subsequent amendment. If the words, therefore, are retained, Sir John Forrest, who agrees with me as to the dissolution of the House of Representatives in the first instance, will be able to move his amendment in substitution for what I wish at the end of the clause, and therefore the whole thing would be settled. If, on the other hand, the words are struck out, that means that the whole clause goes by the board, and it drives out of this clause the provision for the dissolution of the House of Representatives, upon which those who voted for it before are agreed.

Mr. WISE. -

I do not think that is the intention.
Mr. SYMON. -

But it is the effect. I do not wish that there should be any misapprehension on that score. The only difference between my honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) and myself is that which arises at the end of the paragraph after the word "agree," where, instead of having a dissolution of the Senate, which I propose, Sir John Forrest says-"I do not wish for a dissolution of the Senate, but for a joint sitting of the two Houses." That could be moved by way of amendment, and, if he were defeated on that, we could fall back upon what was done in Sydney—the dissolution of the Senate, and a joint sitting of the two Houses. So that the course is clear that way. On the other hand, if the whole were struck out, the course is not clear, because you defeat what my honorable friend has no intention of defeating, if his own proposal is not carried.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

The position, it seems to me, is this: If we keep in those words which the leader of the Convention has moved to excise, we must keep in a provision for an alternative dissolution.

Mr. WISE. -

That is the intention, at any rate.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That will be the necessary effect unless we strike out the whole of the second paragraph.

Mr. SYMON. -

Would you kindly put that point again?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I say that if the words which Mr. Barton has moved to excise be retained, then, unless the committee omit the second paragraph of clause 56B, it will necessarily retain the provision for an alternative dissolution.

Mr. SYMON. -

Oh, no.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That must be the effect.

Mr. SYMON. -

If the committee decide to retain the second portion.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, I say unless the second portion is excised.

Mr. SYMON. -

Certainly.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If the second portion is struck out it only strikes out the provision for an alternative dissolution. If that portion is struck out, he then comes with greater effect and greater facility to his proposal on the second sub-section, which is really to cut out from that second sub-section the provision for dissolution. Sir John Forrest does not agree at all with the first sub-section.

Mr. SYMON. -
Yes, with all of it except the dissolution of the Senate.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is all there is in it.

Mr. SYMON. -
No there is the dissolution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is provided for afterwards in the Bill. If you take out the dissolution of the Senate that is all there is in this first sub-section. To provide in this sub-section simply for a dissolution of the House of Representatives is nothing.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
There is no use trying to persuade Sir John Forrest about this; he will stick to his own opinion.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I simply wish to point out that if Sir John Forrest is desirous of an alternative dissolution of the two Houses, the House of Representatives first, and the Senate afterwards, he will vote for the first sub-section. The honorable gentleman knows that in another part of the Bill it is already provided that the Governor may dissolve the House of Representatives.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
But there is nothing about a consecutive dissolution.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The honorable member does not catch what I am saying. In another part of the Bill it is provided that the House of Representatives may be dissolved.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We know that; that has nothing to do with the Upper House.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Quite so. Let me go on to state further that the first sub-section of clause 56 provides nothing at all except this, that, in addition to dissolving the House of Representatives, you may dissolve the Senate afterwards, consecutively or alternatively. If Sir John Forrest supports Mr. Symon's sub-section, he supports the proposal to dissolve the Senate.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No, I propose to move an amendment in respect to that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
In the second sub-section it is provided that if the two Houses do not agree, there may be a simultaneous dissolution.

Mr. WISE. -
Sir John Forrest can move it in the second sub-section.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If the only particular in which Sir John Forrest differs from the second sub-section is with regard to simultaneous dissolution, all he has to do is to excise these words, and he carries his point. He may do as he pleases, but I warn him, and he will find that I am perfectly right, that when he votes for the first sub-section, if, unfortunately, he should carry it, he will be either stuck with the alternative dissolution, or else we shall have to cut out the whole of the second sub-section.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
So we will.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
I do not think you will.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Then we shall have the Bill in a state of confusion. I should like to say a word about the merits of the matter. I do earnestly hope that the committee will take this as a test vote as to whether there shall be an alternative dissolution at all. That is the point on which I am going to vote. That is the aspect in which the leader of the Convention has placed the matter before the committee, and we may thoroughly understand that we are not to be embarrassed by trivial matters of procedure such as those raised by Mr. Symon and Sir John Forrest. I take it there cannot be anything more unjust than that when a dispute arises between the two agents of the people - the two Houses of the Legislature - one must always and under all conceivable circumstances be assumed to be in the wrong. It does not matter what the nature of the objection of the Senate may be to a Bill presented to it by the House of Representatives. It does not matter whether it is a total or a partial rejection. It does not matter how public opinion has been manifested through the press or by public meetings or otherwise. It does not matter how large the majority is in the House of Representatives that carried the proposal; but, simply because the Senate chooses to deny the advisability of passing that measure into law as the House of Representatives wants it, the House of Representatives is assumed, forsooth, to be in the wrong. Then the position taken up by those who advocate the alternative dissolution is this: Let the House of Representatives go to the country; let the House of Representatives, and that House alone, accept the risks. If they come back with the verdict of the country in their favour we can gracefully yield; we take no risk - say the senators - none whatever. We do not brave public opinion, but in taking up this position of absolute refusal we drive the other House either to go to the country, or, under the penalizing influence of a dissolution, to yield against their better judgment practically the rights and requirements of the people. Why should that be? We have had quite enough of it in the colonies. When Sir John Forrest referred to what had taken place in this colony, he brought forward a set of circumstances that tell very heavily against his suggestion. He says-"Why will not a dissolution of the House of Representatives alone be enough?" For the simple reason that be will not take the next necessary step that is to allow that dissolution to determine the matter. He would say-"If the House of Representatives were dissolved, and they came back strengthened in their previous opinion, then the Senate will not yield; that dissolution was for the whole people, and it does not bind the Senate in any way. True it is, you have got a majority in the two large colonies, but the three colonies sending in a minority of representatives to that House have decided to upset the proposition, and, therefore, that dissolution is to go for nothing."
All the expense, all the trouble, all the risk, is to go for nothing. If Sir John Forrest is willing to accept the position as it would be in England or in this colony, that a dissolution of the Lower House is to govern the matter finally and decisively, I am willing to accede to that. But he will not take that position.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is not the rule here, even.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Of course, it is the rule.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It does not follow.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It must follow.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Oh, no.

Mr. ISAACS. -
What is a dissolution for?

Mr. SYMON. -
Then there would be no dead-lock.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That would get rid the dead-lock. The dead-lock would have been the cause of the dissolution, and the dissolution would have been resorted to to settle that dead-lock.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Does not a dead-lock generally lead to a compromise, not to an absolute settlement?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not know what it leads to, except that it shows that the other House was wrong, and the other House must give way partially or totally. My honorable friend knows that no less an authority than Sir Frederick Pollock has pointed out very recently that the reason why there are no dead-locks under the British Constitution is not because opposition is tolerated on the part of the Upper Chamber, but because by the working out of the Constitution it is found that in the last resort the voice of the people at large must govern; and when he gives his celebrated illustration of a mechanism whereby the hour hand is governed by one set of works, the minute hand by another set, and the striking part by a third set, with no means whatever of making them work in unison so as to tell the correct time, he points out that in England, under the British Constitution, that is solved by making the popular verdict the absolute decisive factor.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Because they are like the clock. The same machinery moves both Houses practically.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Very likely. I am pointing out, in answer to Sir John Forrest when he invited our attention to the British Constitution, that in the last resort it is not because the power is equally divided among the Houses, but because in the last resort there is only one power—the power of the people at large. When we are invited to make no provision for dead-locks, because we are told that dead-locks will not occur, because the good sense of the people, the good sense of the Houses, will avert them, I say that is not the experience under the British Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I think it is.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It was not until 60 years ago that that principle was formally engrafted on our Constitution—the Constitution was, in fact, changed to that extent that the House of Lords cannot withstand the voice of the people.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have had no dead-locks for twenty years in these colonies.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Why? Because the out come of the struggles we have had is that the people here by their decisive voice govern the whole matter as they do in England, and no Upper House will dare to stand against the voice of the people spoken at a general election.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What do you want the provision for at all?

Mr. BARTON. -

I would point out that I am not making my proposal on any ground that the Senate is an Upper House.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friend did not use the argument that Sir John Forrest used when he invited our attention to the British Constitution, and asked us to stand on what he called the beaten track of that Constitution. I am answering his argument, and I am saying that if we are to take that stand we should follow it out to its logical result.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I said the Constitutions of these colonies, too.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The Constitutions of these colonies are precisely the same, and when the appeal was made from the Queensland Parliament, in their celebrated dispute, to the Privy Council, they were told that the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly there should stand in these matters in the same, or as nearly as possible in the same, relative positions as the two Houses in England. Therefore, if we are to accept the British Constitution as the standard, the nearer we get to it in that respect the better. I repeat that we will accept the position that the voice of the people at large will determine these matters. Whether we take that road or the views which have been put diversely, and amongst them the view put by Mr. Barton, it brings us round to this position: In any aspect it is unjust, it is irrational, to penalize the House of Representatives first in all circumstances, and leave the Senate in a totally different position, a position where, to use the words of a celebrated comic opera, it can display its "heroism without risk."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

That is very stale.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I rise principally to point out the position in which I think we are placed at the present moment. That position, as I see it, is this: That if the Convention agree to the amendment to strike out certain words at the commencement of the paragraph, it means that the paragraph will be struck out, and that nothing which is contained in that paragraph can be introduced hereafter, whereas, if we disagreed with the amendment to strike out the paragraph, it will stand and be open to any amendments honorable members may think fit to propose. Perhaps the leader will tell me if I am right in so understanding the position?

Mr. BARTON. -

That is very near it.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I would like to say, by way of reply to the Attorney-General of Victoria, that he, to my mind, has advanced conclusive arguments why there should be no dissolution of the Senate. He says, and says very properly, that the popular voice heretofore in these colonies has, through a dissolution of the Assembly, brought the Council to reason and prevented dead-looks. If that be so as between a House of Assembly and a Legislative Council elected on a different franchise, or in some cases not elected at all but nominated, how much more so will it be the case when the appeal made to the country by the members of the House of Representatives will be an appeal made to exactly the same electorate as the Senate would have to appeal to? The whole people of the Commonwealth would be the people appealed to by members of the House of Representatives, and if there was a dissolution of the Senate the members of that House would have to appeal to precisely the same constituency, that is, to the whole electoral body of Australia.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I hope that we shall not drift into a long debate through a misunderstanding of the procedure. I rise, sir, to ask you a question which, I hope, will limit the discussion to a precise issue. The question I desire to ask is whether, supposing Mr. Barton's motion to excise these words be carried, he having intimated that he desires that vote to be taken as a test vote upon the question whether there should be a consecutive or a simultaneous dissolution, it will still be competent for Sir John Forrest to move the amendment in his name which is in print? I understand that the leader of the Convention desires that the question whether there should be a consecutive or a simultaneous dissolution, should be settled once and for all. I do not think it is necessary to discuss that question. Arguments upon each side have been heard ad nauseam, and all that is necessary now is to vote upon it. But it appears to be thought that if the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton) were carried, inasmuch as by implication it would excise that part of the clause which provides for the dissolution of the House of Representatives, the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) would not be able to move his amendment. I desire to know whether, if the proposal of the leader of the Convention is carried, it will still be competent to the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) to move the amendment of which he has given notice?
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

Before you, sir, answer that question, it is necessary to put another. If it is desired to take a test vote upon the question whether we shall have the simultaneous or the consecutive dissolution, and the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir John for the adoption of the consecutive dissolution?

Mr. WISE. -

Certainly not.

Mr. SYMON. -

If the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest is negatived, he wants to support the consecutive dissolution. But if you take a test vote now as to whether we should have the Consecutive or the simultaneous dissolution, the right honorable member will be shut out, and, to use a popular phrase, he will have only one "go" for his money.

Mr. WISE. -

Let him move his amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I take it that, inasmuch as paragraph (1) provides for the consecutive dissolution, if the committee strike it out that will be an indication that honorable members do not want the consecutive dissolution, and it will be impo

Mr. WISE. -

The question I asked was whether, supposing the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton) were carried, it would still be competent to the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest to move his amendment?

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

If the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise) would look after his own business, and let us look after ours, I think we should get on better. I would point out that the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon), and myself are both willing to allow the words of the first paragraph as far as the word "agree," in line 15, to stand. I, however, should like to see the words, "the Governor-General may dissolve the Senate," at the end of the paragraph, struck out. I think that the question might be put that all the words of the first paragraph as far as the word "agree" stand part of the clause, and then both the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) and myself, could vote with the Ayes. Of course, if that question were negatived the remaining words of the paragraph would have to be struck out, and we should be free to go on with the second paragraph.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Why not move your amendment first?

[P.2119] starts here
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I understand that the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) is before mine.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It seems to me that the course I originally indicated would have been the right one to pursue. I wish to leave out the first paragraph; but I indicated that it would suit my purpose to allow any amendments which honorable members wish to make in that paragraph to be moved. Then, if the paragraph, as amended, contains any principle with which I disagree, I can vote against it as a whole. I, however, do not wish to put any honorable member in a difficulty. It occurs to me that perhaps the best thing to do would be to withdraw my amendment, and to leave the field open for any amendments which the honorable member (Mr. Symon) and the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest may wish to propose. If, after these amendments have been dealt with, the paragraph is still objectionable to me, as retaining it principle or principles with which I disagree, I shall ask honorable members to vote against it.

Mr. Barton's amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I shall not press the second amendment of which I have given notice. It has been suggested that as far as the word "agree," in line 15, the first paragraph of the clause carries out the joint intention of the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest and myself. The words following the word "agree" the right honorable member desires to strike out, with a view to inserting other words. I think that we might take a direct vote upon the proposal of the right honorable member, and, if it is negatived, we can then deal with the remaining words of the paragraph providing for the consecutive dissolution of the Senate.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I beg to move-

That after the word "agree" (line 15), the following words be inserted:-
"then the House of Representatives may present an address to the Governor-General reciting the facts, and praying that a full conference of the two Houses of Parliament may be convened: And thereupon the Governor-General may convene such conference: And if the proposed law be affirmed by a majority of three-fifths of the members present, and voting thereon at such conference, it shall be deemed to have passed both Houses of Parliament, and shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to point out that the putting of this amendment will render it impossible for any one to move an amendment in the earlier part of the paragraph. A good many honorable members may be willing to support the proposal of the leader of the Convention that the first paragraph be struck out; but it does not follow that they will support the second paragraph, providing for the simultaneous dissolution, in the form in which it stands in the Bill. The first paragraph provides that the second passing of a measure by the House of Representatives must be by an absolute majority; but the second paragraph does not. That is a very material difference.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
If the honorable and learned member has any amendment to propose, I shall be willing to withdraw mine.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I was going to suggest, in view of the fact that the leader of the Convention desires to retain only the provisions of the second paragraph, that it might be desirable to amend the first paragraph to make it provide that if a Bill were passed by the House of Representatives in one session, and again in the next session, whether after an election or not, by an absolute majority before or an ordinary majority after an election, and were then rejected by the Senate, you might proceed by way of the simultaneous dissolution. Now, that would be a qualification of the second part of the clause as it stands, because the second part really provides for the joint dissolution on the rejection of the Bill, the measure having been passed by the House of Representatives by an ordinary majority.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I would suggest to honorable members that we had better deal with one thing at a time. We are dealing now with the first paragraph of 56B. When we have determined that, we can afterwards strike out the second paragraph, or amend it so far as is not inconsistent with what we have then done.

Mr. GLYNN. -
But it might be convenient to make a modification in the first paragraph that would affect the second paragraph.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I will be very willing to withdraw my amendment if the honorable member wishes to attempt to do that.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Oh, never mind; I will propose an amendment on the second paragraph.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
All right.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

Whatever may be arguable, we want business done. This proposal of Sir John Forrest's will not satisfy the populations of the larger states, is disagreeable to the inhabitants of the smaller states, and will not achieve the purpose of any particular party.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I hope no action will be taken to destroy the dead-lock provisions as settled in Sydney, at any rate, in so far as the double dissolution is concerned. I regard with a considerable amount of uneasiness the proposal which now proceeds from Sir John Forrest. I am apprehensive it is intended to break the settlement of the dead-lock provisions as determined in Sydney. I am willing to accept reasonable provisions as embodied in the Bill for the settlement of dead-locks. I am willing to loyally adhere to this compromise; but if any effort to disturb this settlement is successful, I venture to say it will be a disastrous sort of arrangement.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I do not quite agree with Dr. Quick. If there had been any settlement at Sydney we ought to be very chary about disturbing it, but there was no settlement at Sydney. What we did there, as Mr. Barton has pointed out, was that, near the close of our session in Sydney, after we had debated the matter with great exhaustiveness, and earnestness, and with a sincere desire to settle it, we were unable to arrive at an absolute settlement, and the alternative dissolution was inserted, in order that we should have both those things in the Bill for consideration in the interval. After discussions and divisions on the referendum, there was also inserted, at the instance of the representatives of New South Wales, a provision for the joint sitting of the two Houses, but there was no settlement. Therefore, we disturb nothing by what we are doing now, but we are about to arrive at a settlement, if we can, and those of us who are strongly in favour of the consecutive dissolution, and who do not want to see the Senate under the perpetual menace of the Executive Government of the day, wish to assure the House of Representatives that if it disagrees with the Senate, or if the Senate disagrees with the House of Representatives, it shall be on the ground that they do not represent the voice of the people. And we say they shall be asked to go before the people to ascertain whether they have, or have not, a mandate to support the particular measure about which the disagreement has arisen. If they come back from the appeal to the people with that mandate, the same result will follow as Mr. Isaacs pointed out. The Senate will give way in all probability. If it does not; if the issue is so momentous that the Senate feels that it is impossible it should give way-

Mr. PEACOCK. -
That is not the question we are on now.

Mr. SYMON. -
Pardon me, it is.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
That does not arise under the proposal of Sir John Forrest.

Mr. SYMON. -
Some of us desire to retain the consecutive dissolution. We may be right or we may be wrong; that is for the Convention to determine. Sir John Forrest says-"I prefer, instead of dissolving the Senate at all, that, immediately after the dissolution of the House of Representatives, and the disagreement continuing, there shall be a joint sitting of the two Houses to solve the difficulty." Very good. The honorable member says-"I want to move an amendment to have that decided." Now, if the Convention are against those of us who vote with him on that amendment, then comes the question of the consecutive dissolution of the Senate, on which the right honorable member falls back. Therefore, it seems to me that the true way is to take the issue on the amendment as to whether there shall be a joint sitting immediately there is disagreement subsequently to the dissolution of the House of Representatives and the disagreement continuing, or whether there shall be a dissolution of the Senate first. That seems to me to be the issue.

Dr. QUICK. -
Are you going against the dissolution of the Senate?

Mr. SYMON. -
Certainly not.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -
I do not quite agree with those who say, we did not come to a resolution at our last session in Sydney. I think that we did. It is true that the resolution we came to was not in the form in which this provision appears in the Bill. But honorable members who have the whole history clearly in their memories will recollect that my honorable and learned friend's amendment was carried first. Then, that being unsatisfactory to many members of the committee, the provision which is in the second paragraph of clause 56B was moved. And, although I opposed it-I am just speaking about my understanding of it-I venture to say that it represented the deliberate views of the majority of the committee, and that the first paragraph would have been struck out if the standing orders would have allowed that to be done. But that could not be done.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Hear, hear.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
    The object of our Sydney decision was to give time to consider the matter.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    I am against the whole thing.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
    What whole thing?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    I am against any provision for dead-looks.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
    The cat is out of the bag.

Mr. WISE. -
    You cannot carry this Bill without it.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    That is simply the honorable member's opinion. But I am merely stating fairly what

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
    It was not a final settlement.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    Each man has to answer for himself. We must reach finality about everything some day. I thought, and still think on reconsideration, that, rather than incur any serious risk to the cause of federation—although I disapprove wholly of this clause, and always have disapproved of it—I will accept this second paragraph rather than cause any danger to federation, because I think that danger to federation would be a greater evil than this incident of federation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
    What serious danger do you allude to?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    I look on all these provisions as being utterly useless.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
    A good tory principle.

Mr. WALKER. -
    Unnecessary.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
    I look upon anything of this kind as being unnecessary. I listened with pleasure to the speech of the Attorney-General of Victoria, who, dissolution of the House of Representatives must of necessity operate on the Senate. Mr. Isaacs was reasoning from a different experience altogether, but I accept his reasoning for a moment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will you concede that as a principle in the Constitution?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I always listen to my friend's arguments, and he will not complain if I follow them for a moment.

Mr. ISAACS. -

You will not follow them far enough, that is all.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

While Mr. Isaacs urged that the principles of internal government should apply to federal administration, he showed, or thought he showed, that the voice of the people had to rule in the end, and that, although the Legislative Council was not dissolved, still the dissolution of the Legislative Assembly resulted in returning members with an authority which operated as a mandate to the members of the Legislative Council. Either my honorable and learned friend thinks that argument will apply to federation or he admits the argument has nothing to do with the question. As I am certain my honorable friend would never use an argument which had nothing to do with the subject, I suppose he thought his argument was relevant to what we are discussing.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You are very logical.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Looking at the matter from this point of view, I say my friend has shown us there is no necessity for anything at all—that the power to dissolve the House of Representatives would be all-sufficient, and that the voice of the people, as given in the elections, would be so express that the Senate would be unable to resist it. I am dealing with this matter from my friend's point of view. If I be asked whether I agree with that point of view, I say I do not agree with it a bit. I do not think there is any possible relevancy between the internal constitution of the state and that which the Federal Constitution will be. All those amendments that are being attempted are intended to weaken the power of the states and increase the power of the numerical majority.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Why should they not?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Whatever form the amendments are put in, they all have the same object. They all intend that in the long run the states have to sacrifice their individuality and authority, and become subservient to the vote of the majority of the general people of the colony.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Do you say you will accept the settlement?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

At the present time I say that if I am convinced—because I have to be convinced—that it would be accepted as something which would be satisfactory to the majority of the members here, so that they may go to their constituents and recommend it to them, I would rather agree to what I call the Sydney settlement than see the cause of federation in danger. But I do not know. I suppose we shall have a proposition for a general referendum in a moment or two, and then we shall all be adrift again. We shall have no certainty, whether we stand by the resolution come to in Sydney or not, that we are any nearer the good understanding which should exist amongst us in order that our influence may be brought to bear on our constituents. So far as I am concerned, I mean to suspend my judgment at the present time in order to see a little further how this thing is going. My own view in the matter is not altered in the smallest degree. The more argument and discussion there is, the more I see that there is only one of two ways. One way is not to consider such a thing as dead-locks, but to banish the word, and leave the solution of the difficulties to the good feeling of the people and the good working of the Constitution. The other way is the proposal of Mr. Reid to subject the states to a popular referendum, and thereby destroy their individuality.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Why not discuss one thing at a time?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I think it would be much better if we were to discuss one thing at a time. The question is very much involved, seeing that the whole ground is covered in clause 59.

Mr. HOLDER. -

You will save time if you take each point separately.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

That is exactly what I do not mean to do. If we keep on striking out this and that we shall at last have to insert something we do not like at all. It is much wiser for us to deal with the whole thing at once, and understand what we are doing. Take a test vote if you like; that is what I would wish. But Sir Richard Baker cannot say that any vote is a test vote. It is quite impossible for us to prevent a question being put again afterwards. It is impossible by excising this and that paragraph to deal with the question at
Mr. HOLDER. -
Suppose now that we put something in?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
If the committee will strike out the whole of the paragraph and put nothing in I will go with them. But the Sydney settlement-

Mr. ISAACS. -
There was no Sydney settlement.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
In a sense there was not. It was voted for by members with wide differences of opinion; and in that sense there was no settlement. There was a distinct vote in Sydney, the result of which is represented in the second paragraph, and that I do not think was intended to be conclusive. I want to hear a little more of other proposals which may be made before I elect in which way I shall vote.

Question-That the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put.

Question so resolved in the negative.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would suggest that, as this matter has been considerably debated both in Sydney and here, we should take an early vote on the paragraph.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I shall be found supporting the retention of the provision for a consecutive as well as a double dissolution. It occurs to me that, whatever was the necessity for providing some means for the settlement of deadlocks in Sydney, it has been greatly increased since then by the introduction of debatable matters in connexion with which it is very possible that there may be a conflict of state interests and of the interests of the people as a whole. I allude particularly to the power which is given to the Federal Parliament to deal with questions of railway construction and extension in a state, and I allude, above all, to the fact that there is for ever confided to the Federal Parliament the duty of distributing amongst the states, in such proportions as they please, a sum which at the very outset will be between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000, and which as time goes on must increase. There is no subject on which there is more likely to be a conflict amongst the states—a scramble, a bitterness, a trouble—than this, and we should be altogether wanting in our duty if we did not do all we can for the purpose of securing harmony between the representatives of the states in the Senate, and the people of the states themselves, and harmony also between the House of Representatives and their constituents. When this provision was originally proposed by the Hon. Mr. Symon, in Sydney, I confess that I did not see the full force of it, but the more one examines it, the more it appears to be just and fair and right so far as the House of Representatives is concerned. If you have not a provision of this sort, what is the position? Although the House of Representatives may have had some dispute with the Senate in a Parliament which has ceased to exist, and although they may have gone to their constituents, and secured from them a fresh mandate, if they come back and renew the discussion, and the Senate hold fast to their original position, you cannot send the Senate to thei

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Again?
Mr. KINGSTON. -
Yes. Is that fair? The members of the popular House would be subjected to two dissolutions before the Senate were referred back to their constituencies for an expression of their views, and that seems to me to be a monstrous proposition. Why should we do anything of the kind?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Why should we do anything at all?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I have already dealt with that point. I say that by the introduction of fresh matter into the Bill, we have increased the probability of dead-locks and disputes to an alarming extent, and we should be wanting in our duty if we did not do whatever we could to provide a facile means of ascertaining whether the Senate, as well as the House of Representatives, were supported by their constituents.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is the second provision you are dealing with.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I am referring to the two.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Do you intend to support both?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I do intend to support both. I do not think there is any room for doubt as to the course I propose to take.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
A double dissolution after a single dissolution?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Yes, as an alternative, at the option of the Executive.

Mr. ISAACS. -
How will that test the Senate?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
In the first instance, there will be an election for the House of Representatives, and that will test the feeling of their constituencies. Then you will have the option, if the dispute is still continued, of sending the Senate to their constituencies.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Double expense.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
An expense not to be lightly undertaken. Look at it in this way. There has been a dispute on a live question—and we can only anticipate that powers of this sort will be put into force in connexion with live questions—and in the natural order of things there is a dissolution by expiration of time. The House of Representatives go to their constituencies, and are fortified by the expression of their views. The members come back fresh from the country and renew the contest. The Bill is carried by the necessary statutory majority, and sent up to the Senate; and are we to be told that the Senate can still say-"Although there is very good ground for believing that you have the mandate of the constituencies in favour of the proposal which you make, we will hold fast to our position, and make you go through the idle form of going to the people a second time before you can ask us to test our position by going to our constituents"?

Sir JOHN FORREST. - I did not propose that.

Mr. KINGSTON. - I am happy to say that my right honorable friend's proposal was negatived, and now we have the proposal of the original Bill before us. My position is this: As long as both Houses feel that they are liable to the same test and the same penalty as regards being sent to the constituencies, you will do away to a very great extent with the probabilities of disagreement.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Is not that answered by the second paragraph, if you have a simultaneous dissolution?

Mr. KINGSTON. - But this is the position I put to the honorable member: A House of Assembly, fresh from its constituents, renews its contest with the Senate, and is it fair to require that House to again go to its constituents by means of a double dissolution before you can require the Senate to be similarly tested? I think not. I do not think that a clause of this kind will often be required to be put into operation. I think the very moral effect of it would secure all that is required. And I would say in this connexion, as was stated by Mr. Symon when he originally introduced the proposal, that it is founded on South Australian legislation. The position there is that if in any Parliament a Bill is passed by the House of Assembly and rejected by the Council, and in the next successive Parliament it is similarly treated by the Legislative Council, either both Houses can be dissolved or writs can be issued for the election of a third of the members of the Legislative Council under circumstances in which no fresh writs will be subsequently issued till the numbers are reduced by vacancies or retirements to the number originally named in the Constitution. We have never had to have actual recourse to a provision of that sort, but the effect of it, I believe, has been to conduce to much greater harmony between the two Chambers of Legislature-harmony such as we are striving to secure in the Federal Parliament which is to be established.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Because you have only one constituency there—the people of South Australia.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
We have various districts.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes, but still—

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Furthermore, there is a greater difference in the character of the constituencies there than there will be under the Federation. Of course, there is a property qualification there, and there is no such difference in regard to the federal franchise; but so far as the Federal Parliament is concerned, although the difference in the grouping may be greater, I venture to assure my honorable and learned friend that there is a greater difference in the position of the two Chambers in the South Australian Parliament than there will be in the case of the Federal Parliament. The position, therefore, for which I contend in connexion with the retention of this clause, is that you do not require in all cases before you can send the Senate to its constituencies that the House of Assembly shall accompany it, but that there shall be power when, as it were, the House of Assembly is fresh from its constituents, to dispense with the useless form of sending it again.

Mr. ISAACS. -
But that is not the position under this clause.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
It appears to me that the first of these clauses is extremely unjust, and is likely to lead to an unfair use of the Constitution. It proposes in the event of a dispute between the two Houses to penalize, by a consecutive, or a prospective consecutive, dissolution, one House. Then we might have a dispute arising between the two Houses, in which, if there were any considerable pressure, the Second Chamber might say—"Well, we will wait a bit, and bide the result of the dissolution of the House of Assembly." Now, that seems to me to be altogether inequitable.

Mr. SYMON. -
Why should not they?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
For the reason that it will be very much in the nature of a gamble. The Second Chamber may say and act as if it believed that in this conflict "it is all to nothing with us; if the Assembly is sent to its constituents, and has a majority after it has been so sent in favour of the proposed law, we will give in"; whereas if there were a double or a joint dissolution, upon further disagreement of a character that became so acute that it could not be otherwise settled, the position would be entirely different, and there would be equal pressure upon both Houses to concede. With the prospect of a consecutive dissolution there is not equal pressure on both Houses. It seems to me that, as both Houses are part of the Constitution, both Houses ought, in obedience to their duty to the people, to do everything they can to concede whatever is reasonable to the opinions of each other. When they both have equal obligations in this connexion, they will both have the fear of equal pressure to induce them to concede, and in the event of a dispute becoming so acute that, in obedience to their view of what was right to their constituencies, neither House could concede any more, and there was still a difference between them not capable of being bridged over without a dissolution, surely the penalty should be on both Houses, and not on one only. It seems to me, therefore, that if the first clause were struck out, and we were left with the clause providing for a double dissolution in the event of dead-lock which could not be settled by any other means, we should be placing (as we ought to place) both branches of the Legislature on exactly the same footing, both liable to the same penalty. Because it is a penalty.

Mr. WALKER. -
It will be a greater penalty on one House than on the other; in the one case the term of election is six years, and in the other only three.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
If both Houses are dissolved the penalty is the same. The penalty is the turmoil, the trouble, and the expense of a general election. That is a penalty which honorable men, feeling that they are fighting fairly in the interests of the people they represent, will never shrink from incurring.

Mr. WALKER. -
The penalty involves the sacrifice of a seat tenable for six years in the one case and not in the other.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
The penalty is equal; there is no six years involved in the dissolution.

Mr. WALKER. -
The members of the Senate will, at any rate, stand to forfeit the second half of their term.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
There is no such question involved in the dissolution. The penalty is the possible loss of the seats the members hold, and the expense, labour, and trouble of an election. It seems to me, in this matter, what should be considered is the interests of the people; and it is in the interests of the people that they should be relieved, as far as practicable, from unnecessarily frequent elections, because, while a general election is an expense and a hardship upon representatives, if it is extraordinary or premature, it is also an expense and a hardship upon the people who take part in it, who must lose time in voting, and who must occupy time in making themselves acquainted with the views of the candidates in connexion with the election.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Then why extend the evil?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It seems to me that you minimize the evil by making a dissolution joint instead of consecutive, because otherwise one House can, in the most airy manner, submit the other House to dissolution without any fear of a penalty upon itself; but if both Houses are to be dissolved, in the event of their not being able to agree, you have a much greater inducement for them to come to an agreement, if that be at all possible.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

You admit that the Senate would yield to the popular vote in favour of the House of Representatives?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

That is not the point entirely. It would more frequently yield after a dissolution than before. My view is that if you have a Constitution which entails upon them the possibility of facing their constituencies, you will make both Houses more careful not to disagree unless they have very strong reasons for so doing. But if you have one House only to be sent to the country, you offer no inducement to the other House to be reasonable. They will say in an airy manner—"It means only that they will have to go to the country. If instead of that, we had to go to our constituents we would give in to the w

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Is an abomination.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I do not say that, but I feel that as the provisions are being passed in this Bill they will be an abomination. A large number of honorable members desire that the Senate should be the dominant House. I am confident that a large number feel that the Senate will be the dominant House.

Mr. SYMON. -
There is no chance of that under this Constitution. The Senate has been gradually reduced to impotence.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I am very much afraid that in this Constitution as we have it the Senate will be, to a prejudicial and baneful extent, dominant in resisting legislation that the people desire.

Mr. WISE. -

Why, under this Constitution, the Senate will be the democratic House.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It is easy to say that; but a declaration of that character proves nothing. The democratic House will be the House in which all the people are represented equally. The Senate will not be such a House; it will be a House in which the people in one constituency will have eight or nine times as much political power as the people in another constituency. How any one can declare that that will be a democratic House, I cannot understand!

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Because they are to be elected by the general public they are not democratic.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I have not said that; but I say that, because one section of the public is eight times more powerful than another section in the election of the Senate, it cannot be democratic. I hope there will be very few cases of disagreement between the Houses. I am inclined to think there will be very few, but, if disagreements arise, as undoubtedly they will, there ought, if this Constitution is to be equitable, to be penalties—if there are penalties for disagreement—inflicted on both Houses. I am not asking for any concession or favour for the House of Representatives any more than for the Senate, but I am urging that no consideration or favour should be given to the Senate which is not given to the House of Representatives.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You are not giving the Senate the same powers, but you want to inflict the same penalties.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

No, because to give them the same powers would render federation absolutely impossible.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It is not worth while discussing that question.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
I agree with that, and, if honorable members will pardon me, I will decline to take note of any further interjections. It seems to me that the point I have urged is worthy of consideration. We are framing a Constitution which must be accepted by the people. Whatever honorable members may think about the system, they must know that there is a very strong prejudice in the public mind, in, at any rate, two of the colonies, against the Second Chamber, or what they have been accustomed to call the Upper House. Rightly or wrongly, that prejudice exists, and the prospects of federation turn upon the prejudices of the people not being unduly roused. There is a very grave danger that their prejudices, as I will call them for argument's sake, will lead to the defeat of federation. I confess that there have been bitter reasons in this and some of the other colonies for those prejudices. At any rate, the prejudice is there, and if a proposition goes to the people for their sanction that obviously penalizes one House, there will be a strengthening and spreading of that prejudice which will be injurious to the carrying of this Bill. I earnestly hope that honorable members will decide to adopt this provision, which may not, and in many instances I believe will not, lead to a double dissolution very frequently. If we do not provide some remedy, there will be an inducement offered to one House to remain in its condition of obstinacy, knowing that it has nothing to lose—that it has first the power of penalizing the other Chamber and then it can back down.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

We discussed the rivers question for ten days, we spent five days discussing the railway rates, and a whole day and night in discussing one clause at our last sitting. Therefore, I think we may be pardoned if we devote a few hours to the discussion of one of the most important questions in relation to the Constitution. The subject is divided into three parts. First, there is the point expressed by Sir John Downer—that our Constitution is so admirably framed that the causes of dead-locks have been diminished almost out of existence, and the ordinary disagreements which will take place about social and industrial legislation do not want these drastic changes which honorable members are suggesting.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The Premier of South Australia has expressed exactly the opposite opinion.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I am aware of that. From the king of democrats, as the Premier of South Australia is, and from the first lieutenant of democrats (Mr. Trenwith), we could expect no other gospel; but it does not follow that that gospel will be one of prosperity for the people of Australia. I believe firmly that this is a bogy, and that we want no provision against dead-locks and disagreements. I am of opinion that there is no danger of dead-locks, but now we are going to have such a provision made, and I admit the feeling of the Convention is against me on that point. Are we to have a consecutive dissolution, or are we to have both Houses sent to the same people at the same time? The simultaneous dissolution for which Mr. Kingston has argued would be a very great blot on our Constitution, and I do not follow him in the arguments he has used. Both these Houses are elected by the same people under manhood suffrage, but they have not both the same privileges. When Mr. Kingston asked-"Why should one House be penalized more than another?" I would say for the simple reason that the House of Representatives has all the financial privileges. It dictates the financial policy of the country. It controls the public purse; it forms the Government, and it unmakes the Government; and with all these privileges, does it lie in the mouth of my honorable friend to say that both Houses should go to the country together? Why penalize one House more than the other? That is a false way of putting it, but even if it was true it is an unfair way to put it. The House which dictates the policy, the House which brings in some financial scheme, ought to have the courage of its opinions, and if it is satisfied that it is right, when the other House refuses to pass its measures, it ought to be proud to go to the country, face the music, and get a verdict from the people.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

This does not apply to financial measures only.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I am perfectly well aware of that, but my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) was arguing that both Houses should be penalized together. He was arguing that it would be most unfair to send the House which controls everything to the country without the other. I am arguing that it is the logical sequence of things—it is fair play, justice, common sense. The Senate has no power in connexion with finance and revenue compared to the House of Assembly, and therefore the House which brings in financial measures ought to go to the country first. I can hardly conceive that there can be any arguments on the other side in favour of a simultaneous dissolution as strong as those in favour of making the House of Representatives go to the country first.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It may have just come back from a general election with a policy indorsed.

Mr. DOBSON. -
If we provide by-and-by that it shall not be dissolved until after the expiration of six or twelve months, it will get rid of that objection. Surely my honorable friend's interjection does not do away with the arguments I have been using? I think that the Senate will have the common sense, and the intelligence, and the patriotism, in nineteen cases out of twenty, to follow the policy of the House of Representatives when it has recently come back indorsed with a verdict by the people. I join issue with Mr. Isaacs, and I regret to have to join issue with so very learned a member. He said that the argument as to the House of Lords, instead of being an argument in favour of Sir John Forrest, was an argument against him. I think Sir John Forrest was perfectly right in what he said. Mr. Isaacs pointed out that the British Constitution allows the will of the people to have its way. The British Constitution, as it is written, does nothing of the kind, because the House of Lords tomorrow can reject a financial measure if they like. But the House of Lords never refuse to carry out the will of the people, with some exceptions which I will point out; not because of the Constitution, but because of their common sense, because they are in touch with the people, because they know their duty, and because they help the House of Commons to work properly and intelligently the two-Chamber system.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Because it is part of the Constitution now that they shall not do so.

Mr. DOBSON. -
In order to demolish my honorable friend absolutely, let me give him one or two illustrations of what the House of Lords have done. When Sir William Harcourt brought in perhaps the most democratic tax which the English nation or the people of any colony have ever seen, the House of Lords passed it without a murmur. I believe the Duke of Devonshire did make a very few murmurs; he said he could not keep up Chatsworth, and the people of England would be deprived of the pleasure of seeing his beautiful country residence, but the House of Lords passed the Bill. What did they do when the Home Rule Bill came up? It came up to the House of Lords, backed, according to Mr. Isaacs and Mr. Higgins, by the verdict of the people-backed by the Gladstonian Government. Did the House of Lords then regard the verdict of the people? No; the House of Lords ventured to think that the verdict of the people was wrong, and six years ago they absolutely rejected the Bill. Now, you find that the House of Lords, looking into the far future, and weighing this momentous question, which involved the separation of the empire, were right, and the people were wrong. That is the benefit of your bi-cameral system.
Mr. GLYNN. -
You are dealing with large assumptions now.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Let me give my friend (Mr. Isaacs) another illustration.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
But that is a wrong one.

Mr. DOBSON. -
What did the House of Lords do when the Gladstonian Government sent up an Employers Liability Bill - a most democratic measure, in favour, I suppose, of the miners' and labour organizations throughout the United Kingdom. The House of Lords put the Bill into the waste-paper basket, and absolutely refused to carry out the will of the people, because of their common sense and their desire to do what they thought was fair. And what do you see now? Three or four years pass by, another Bill goes up to make the employer absolutely liable, with a limit as to amount, for injury to his employé, not making any part of the damage which is done fall on either the Government or the employe, but making it all fall on the employer. This Bill, introduced by Mr. Chamberlain, goes up to the House of Lords, and the House of Lords, being in touch with the people, desiring to work the bi-cameral system properly, and seeing that the Bill has elements of fairness in it, what did it do? The Bill was passed, because it was in accordance with common sense and reason, whereas the Bill sent up by Mr. Asquith was not in accordance with what they thought was fair play. Here is Mr. Isaacs using this argument against Sir John Forrest when then a property or conservative franchise, I could believe more than I do now in the argument that both Houses ought to go together. But, considering that they both come from the same people without their being any difference whatever, surely the House of Representatives should go first to the country, and then if it comes back indorsed with a verdict from the people, the Senate being elected by exactly the same electorate, ought to pass the measure, and if it does not it will be on account of some great step forward which means industrial or social revolution. In that case, what is the meaning of the bi-cameral system if it is not to give to our people the safeguard of having a Second Chamber in your Constitution, which cannot be frightened or coerced by being told that it has to go to the electors also?

I therefore hope, as we have rejected the amendment of Sir John Forrest in favour of the Senate never going to the people, but of both Houses voting together, that we will shrink from having a simultaneous dissolution, but will make the House of Representatives responsible for its policy, face the electors first, and then after that you may dissolve the Senate if you like. I do not approve of it, but I suppose we will have to consent.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I intend to vote for the excision of the first paragraph. I had some doubt as to what I would do until Mr. Dobson got up, but certainly the analogy he drew between the House of Lords and the Senate, endeavouring to support the action of the Senate by the history of the House of Lords, has determined me to oppose the first part of the clause. If the Senate is to be at all analogous to a House in which I believe three form a quorum, in which a good many members may vote by proxy, within which some members never go once in six years—if the Senate is to represent a House like that, I am not going to do anything to protect it.

Mr. DOBSON. -

You do not answer my arguments.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not know where your arguments came in; you were dealing largely with assumptions.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I was giving facts.

Mr. GLYNN. -

The honorable member said that the House of Lords were the saviours of the unification of the empire by the fact that they saved public opinion from having precipitated the empire into disintegration. The honorable member was really dealing with assumptions there.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member think that this is strictly relevant to the clause?

Mr. GLYNN. -

I am afraid that it is not relevant to the clause; but, unfortunately, the bad example of going off at a tangent was set to me by the last speaker. I rise principally to mention that, although I shall vote for the excision of the first paragraph, I shall endeavour to amend the second paragraph in the direction I previously indicated. I am desirous that it should provide that when the Senate has rejected a measure passed by the House of Representatives by an ordinary majority, if in the next session, without the intervention of a general election, that measure is again passed by the House of Representatives by an absolute majority, or after the intervention of an election by an ordinary majority, and is again rejected by the Senate, the Governor-General may dissolve both Houses. If you allow the dissolution of the two Houses directly a disagreement occurs, you prevent the Senate from exercising its functions as a check upon the Lower House in staying the hand of precipitate legislation, but the provision that I desire to see carried into effect will not penalize the Senate, and at the same time it will prevent any deadlock.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would point out to the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn) that if he votes against the first paragraph of the clause, and that paragraph is omitted, he cannot put into the second paragraph a provision of very much the same effect as the provision contained in the first paragraph.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I rise to point out to the honorable and learned member what you, sir, have just stated, that, if the first paragraph is omitted it will be impossible to mould the second paragraph in such a way as would accomplish his purpose. I agree with him that we must be careful that we do not give undue weight to the arguments of those who support the simultaneous dissolution, because that arrangement would have the effect of practically penalizing the Senate for doing the work which it was appointed to do. The Senate is to be constituted upon a twofold basis, and for two purposes. It is to be the States House, and that is the only circumstance which gives it dignity and lends it strength. We are also creating a bi-cameral system of legislation. No one has ever disputed that that is what we are doing. One of the essentials to the system is that the Senate shall be a revising and suspending Chamber. In so far as it will be the States House, it should not be subject to any dissolution at all. If it is there for the purpose of protecting the freedom of the people and the integrity of the states, you ought not to menace it in any shape or form. It is only in respect to its functions as a revising and suspending Chamber that you have any right whatever to subject it to dissolution or to any other form of coercion.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If you dissolve the Senate as a revising Chamber you must also dissolve it as a States House.

Mr. SYMON. -

I know that that follows. It is because we, who, in Adelaide, resisted any kind of concession, and resisted the proposals for settling dead-locks suggested by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Wise), feel the pressure of the cause of federation that we are willing to make this great stride for the advancement of the cause, and to submit to the Senate being dissolved. I would not support a proposal allowing the Senate to be dissolved if it were not that I believed that public opinion, certainly in some of the larger colonies, desires to have some control over the Senate by a provision which will allow it upon occasion to be sent to its constituents, of whom they form part. What I want to point out to honorable members is the danger of disregarding the constitutional rule that, when you are dealing with a revising and suspending Chamber, you are paralyzing its functions and reducing it to a condition of impotence if, the moment it disagrees with the other House of Legislature, it is threatened with dissolution. It is a perfect farce—a ridiculous monstrosity—to pass a provision of that kind.

Mr. FRASER. -

According to your theory, the Senate will not disagree with the House of Representatives at all.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not believe that there will be serious disagreement upon one subject of legislation in a thousand. Of course, we must not expect perfect immunity from the ordinary causes of difference between Houses of Legislature; we must submit to that. But we know perfectly well that dead-locks, bringing about a kind of temporary wreck of constitutional government, are next to impossible. They have never occurred in America, where the Senate is clothed with all kinds of executive and other powers, of which, if I may use the expression, the Senate created in this Constitution has been despoiled. Here you have a Senate which cannot possibly be a class Chamber. Whether it will or will not be the democratic House, as the honorable and learned member (Dr. Cockburn) and others of us think, it cannot possibly be a class Chamber, because it will be elected upon absolutely the same suffrage as the members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

They have dead-locks frequently in America, and they always end in favour of the Senate.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable and learned friend is mistaken.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, he is perfectly right.

Mr. SYMON. -

Not at all. There have been differences there, but there has never been a dead-lock resulting in the stoppage of civil government, which, of course, is what a dead-lock really means.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The people have had to give way.
My honorable and learned friend has solved the whole question in that remark. Common sense, the genius of the English-speaking people for government, always leads to the settlement of these matters.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

You have three divided powers of government, unable to work in harmony.

Mr. SYMON. -

They are unable to work in harmony for a moment, and a disagreement comes, but a settlement is arrived at and the machinery goes on again.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The machine politics go on.

Mr. SYMON. -

It has been proposed that where the two branches of the Legislature do not come to an agreement after an interval of three years, which would give ample time for the consideration of the subject-matter of the disagreement, they should meet together as one body and settle the question by the determination of the majority of members, the two Houses voting together. What is the good of our seeking to create a Senate at all if the moment it exercises its powers the Executive Government is able to say-"You shall be sent about your business"? A man would scorn to hold office as a Senator under such conditions. It would be a pusillanimous position to hold. However opposed the measure sent to the Senate might be to public feeling, or to the sentiment of the majority of the Senate, this body would not be able to set its face against it in order to secure time for further consideration. Because if it did, the majority of the other House, who would be represented of course by the Executive Government, would say-"Unless you withdraw your position or assent to some compromise, whether you like it or not, you must go to your constituents." I ask honorable members is that the position they are going to place the Senate in? It is a position to which I, for one, will never assent, and if the alternative of the consecutive dissolution is a double dissolution, that is, the moment a disagreement takes place there shall be a simultaneous or double dissolution, then the Senate will have to exercise its functions at the peril of having to go to its constituents, and that, I say, will be a serious blow to this Constitution. Those representatives who come from the larger colonies must remember this, that whilst it might not affect the smaller colonies so much as the larger colonies, it will have the most disastrous effect, because you will have six senators going to their constituents as against 25 or 26 going to their constituents from the House of Representatives at the same time; and the six men from the Senate would be practically overwhelmed by the power of the representatives from the Lower House who were going to their constituents.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

That is what they intend.

Mr. SYMON. -

Possibly. I do not say whether that is the intention, but I take leave to point out, in all seriousness, with every desire to have as perfect a Constitution as human brains can devise in this connexion, that we should take care that they do not emasculate the powers of the Senate as they will do, I emphatically believe, if they put it in the power of the Executive Government of the day, representing a majority of the House of Representatives, to send the Senate to its constituents for doing the very thing it was brought into being to do.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Or

Mr. SYMON. -

No, not for refusing to do it. The Senate is answerable to its own constituents. There is not a man in that Senate who will hold office for more than three years.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Six years.

Mr. SYMON. -

He has to go to his constituents every three years.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Every six years.

Mr. SYMON. -

Half of the senators have to go their constituents at the end of the first three years.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

But each senator is elected for six years.

Mr. SYMON. -

Half of the members of the legislative body have to go to their constituents every three years; and will not that keep them in touch with the manhood and womanhood suffrage of the colonies? Of course it will. To say that you are to be apprehensive of all sorts of evils to the Constitution when the interval between one election and another is so short as that is to do injustice to the ordinary courage of humanity.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That would be a good reason for not dissolving the House of Representatives at all.

Mr. SYMON.-

I say that that is the principle which underlies Mr. Dobson's argument, and that is the analogy with the House of Lords and every other Second Chamber which exercises the function of a revising and suspending Chamber. If it exercises that function, you are to give it credit for honesty and bona fides. If it is still out of harmony with the Lower House, let the Lower House go to their constituents, with whom the Upper House says the House of Representatives is not in harmony. If the members of the House of Representatives come back from their constituents with a mandate for that particular piece of legislation, this Senate, like every other Second Chamber, will be bound to give way. If the Senate do not give way, then I say, at once, and unhesitatingly, send it to its constituents. That is the proper course to be adopted. As to the House of Lords, it has no constituents. But that fact is all the stronger in favour of my view in regard to the Senate, because, if the House of Lords, having no constituents except the general expression of public opinion, yields to the views of the people expressed through the House of Commons, returned after a dissolution, how much more will the Senate, answerable to a constituency, yield, under similar circumstances, in the same way? If the matter in dispute is one of vital importance to the state the Senate may hold out for a time against the first mandate of the people, but, beyond that, it will not hold out for one moment. Therefore you will have a far better Constitution, and one not merely free, but also just, beyond all the experience of the past, if you leave this a consecutive, and do not make it a simultaneous dissolution.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question now is that paragraph (2) stand part of the clause.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

Without in any way commenting on the vote which has just been given, I trust I may take it as expressing the opinion of the committee that what I, at all events, term the Sydney compromise will not be interfered with. I should have preferred to see the alternative removed. But the committee have decided otherwise, and I, in very few words, desire to reiterate the opinion I expressed in Sydney, that it is desirable the second sub-section should remain as it is in the Bill, so that the Ministry of the day shall have the option of dissolving either one or both Houses. I have never disguised my opinion either here or elsewhere that this alarm about dead-locks was, to a very considerable extent, imagination. I have spoken as strongly as any one against the introduction of any of these mechanical and artificial devices for overcoming dead-locks. But I am not blind to the sentiment outside this chamber. I know the ghost of dead Victorian controversies is still alive and walking, and it has walked outside the limits of this colony into New South Wales. I do not hesitate to declare, as I did in Sydney, my deliberate opinion that unless we make this concession to the popular opinion, even though we may think it popular ignorance, on the question involved in the second sub-section, we will very seriously damage the prospects of the Bill, if we do not altogether destroy our ability to recommend it to the electors. I never made use of an expression of this kind at any period of the debates before. I have studiously refrained from saying anything of the kind. But I do believe that this is the most critical part of the Bill so far as the opinion of the New South Wales voter is concerned, and I trust the committee will do, as I believe they intended to do by their last vote, adhere strictly to the compromise arrived at in Sydney.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That in the second paragraph all the words from "If the House of Representatives" down to "by effluxion of time" be struck out.

This is to raise the issue which Mr. Wise has just pointed out, as to whether we are to retain an alternative method or process of dissolving the Senate and the House of Representatives. I venture to think that that would be a manifest absurdity. It would leave untouched the last part, which was introduced in Sydney, in order to secure absolute finality, at the instance of Mr. Reid and Mr. Carruthers. With that last part I wish to say I entirely agree. If after the dissolution-

Mr. PEACOCK. -

It is no good talking.

Mr. SYMON. -

As I have said, I agree with the last part, though no doubt I may be altogether wrong.

Mr. REID. -

Never mind, you are on the winning side.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is something.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

For the present.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am quite willing to still adhere to the method of reaching absolute finality by a meeting between the two Houses. What the majority should be is a matter open to discussion. Without repeating what has already been said, I move that the first part of the second paragraph be struck out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

Up to the present I have not been able to take an active part in the discussion, although I should very much have liked to do so. But I do feel that now we have arrived at such a critical moment in connexion with federation that, no matter what the cost may be to myself, I am bound to give expression to my views on the subject. I do entreat those who voted with the majority, if they desire to see all the colonies come in, not to press too far the advantage they have obtained by the last division. I had to appeal earnestly in Sydney to honorable members to give the larger colonies the concession which was given in the second part of the clause as an alternative. I felt then that to have a dissolution of the House of Representatives, and then a dissolution of the Senate, was something that it would be impossible to take to our people with any hope of success. I did trust that at our meeting here in Melbourne we would have left out the first provision, and would have rested entirely on the operation of the clause which made a double dissolution the mode of determining those difficulties. However, we have by a considerable majority decided we will not do that, and I earnestly hope that by as large a majority we will decide to have this alternative proposal. I feel the gravity of this present moment so greatly that I am bound to urge as strongly as I can on all those who are friends of the movement not to press too far what has been done. I believe that if they do-and I say this without any heat and not in any way as a threat-I believe that if they do take out this second portion of the clause as proposed by Mr. Symon, they are ruining any chance we in Victoria have of carrying this Federal Bill.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
May I ask my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Symon) to withdraw his proposed amendment for a moment? I want to insert some words which were in the clause as passed in Sydney but which have been omitted, no doubt, with a view on the part of the Drafting Committee of eliminating the first paragraph. Now that that paragraph has been restored, so to speak, it will be necessary, in order that the clause may read properly, that the words
I have referred to be restored.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Would you not put in Mr. Lyne's amendment first?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No; that comes lower down. I move-

That in the fourth line of the second paragraph, after the words
"Governor-General may," the words "instead of dissolving the House of Representatives alone" be inserted.

These words were taken out of the clause, as I believe from the internal appearance of the clause, by the Drafting Committee, merely because they anticipated the first paragraph would be struck out.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I ask leave to withdraw my amendment for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Before we go any further I have a suggestion to make. Now that we have attained consecutive dissolution, I should like to see some means by which those proceedings can be treated alternatively. I suggest that it would be better, in lieu of using the words "instead of dissolving the House of Representatives alone," to follow to a certain extent the wording of the first paragraph. It would be better, I think, if after the word "agree" the words were inserted, "and the House of Representatives in the next session again passes any proposed law, and the Senate rejects the same, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree." Then the two proceedings stand on the same footing, and it would be competent for the Governor-General to adopt either of them, and, in choosing one or the other, to see that the same processes were gone through before he applied the remedy of consecutive or simultaneous dissolution.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That ought to be so.

Mr. BARTON. -

That ought to be so. Mr. O'Connor reminds me that, as the matter stands now, if the words of Mr. Isaacs were inserted, and the House of Representatives passed a law which the Senate rejected, or failed to pass it with amendments to which the House of Representatives had agreed, there could instantly be a simultaneous dissolution. Instead of that, I think it wiser that the simultaneous dissolution should be on the same footing as the consecutive dissolution, and that the same process should precede it. That was the intention of the Convention in Sydney, and I think it is the intention now. I beg therefore to move-

That the following words be inserted after the word "agree": "and the House of Representatives in the next session again passes the proposed law, and the Senate rejects the same, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives do not agree."

The CHAIRMAN. -

The position is this: The Hon. Mr. Symon has moved to strike out all the words down to "effluxion of time." Inasmuch as prior amendments have been suggested, Mr. Symon is willing to withdraw his amendment for the present. Mr. Barton now wants to introduce certain words after the word "agree." If those words are inserted, Mr. Symon cannot then move to strike out the words down to agree. In order to enable every issue to be voted upon, it would be better for the honorable member to move, as a test question, the omission of all the words down to "agree."

[P. 2137] starts here

Mr. BARTON. -

In dealing with the first paragraph I withdrew my amendment in order that certain other amendments might be considered without let or hindrance. Then I asked for a vote upon the paragraph. I would ask the honorable member to consider the words on which he is now moving his amendment as paragraph (2). It is only as a matter of print that they are not so. If that were done, the honorable member's amendment could be dealt with, and then the other words could be put as a paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would point out that we have adopted a uniform procedure right through. We have never separated a paragraph. The words in the second paragraph really form only one paragraph, inasmuch as it all hangs together. The procedure we have adopted all through is the procedure I have suggested. If I put the question that all the words down to "agree" be struck out, and if that is not carried, Mr. Barton's amendment can be put. If it is carried the rest of the words can be struck out.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

Per-you, Mr. Chairman, will forgive me for pointing out that although the paragraph is not divided in print, and the two parts of it, are connected, I wish the second part, as to the joint meeting of the two Houses, to be attached to the first paragraph as the final method of settling the question of dead-locks.

The CHAIRMAN-I think we ought to adopt a uniform procedure.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then I shall move my amendment in the form you suggest—that all the words down to "agree" be struck out.

Mr. GORDON (South Australia). -

I have been one of the staunchest supporters of my honorable friend (Mr. Symon) in all his exertions-bold and brilliant as they have been—to maintain the power of the Senate, but in this proposition I think he is making a mistake. I would ask those honorable members who represent the smaller states to vote for the clause as it stands, especially if it is altered as suggested by Mr. Barton. That is as much as we can expect. The position is exceedingly grave, and I appeal to those who like myself have been loyal supporters of the powers of the Senate not to assist the honorable member in his amendment.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

When the Hon. Mr. Symon submitted his proposal in Sydney I was one of those who voted against it, and who took every possible step to defeat it. I regarded the matter then as being fairly and satisfactorily settled. I voted today for the retention of these words in the clause, for the reason that I thought that it was settled. I said in Adelaide and in Sydney that I had no great fear of dead-locks, because sooner or later the will of the people would prevail, although it might not prevail as rapidly as some politicians might desire. I intend to vote against Mr. Symon's proposition, and to support the amendment suggested by Mr. Barton.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

While I should be very glad indeed to do anything that would meet with the general approval of honorable members, and while I desire now, as I have always desired—perhaps more than some honorable members think, but I know my own feelings best—to assist honorable members who have great responsibilities and great obligations, I cannot believe that the insertion of these two provisions in the Bill will commend our work to those who come after us. What are we asked to do? We are asked first to give the Government of the day power to dissolve the Lower House. We are next asked to give the Government of the day power to dissolve the Senate, and then we are asked to give the Government of the day further power to dissolve both Houses. This is very cumbersome machinery, and the wisdom of honorable members should have enabled them to devise some more simple plan. The simple plan that I suggested has not been entertained. I have never seen in any Constitution alternatives given as to procedure. The Ministry of the day may say that they will go this way or that they will go that way; but surely to goodness we ought to lay down in the Constitution some one effective plan for meeting the difficulties that are likely to arise. My own amendment having been lost, I have no very strong feeling about either of these provisions, but I am not prepared to assent to the insertion of both of them in the Bill. We ought to adjourn the debate, with a view to some better plan being devised.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I thought you wanted to get home.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am not going home for a week now. If the discussion is proceeded with I must vote with my honorable friend (Mr. Symon) to strike out the alternative procedure. At the same time, I should be only too glad—and I recognise the responsibilities of honorable members who represent Victoria and New South Wales—to join in formulating some plan which would be looked upon with favour by them but I am not going to make myself a laughing-stock—for this is really what it comes to—by voting for these two systems. They were never inserted in Sydney with the view that they were to be permanently incorporated in this Bill, but with the view of one taking the place of the other; and the second paragraph was inserted, I point out again, by the representatives of New South Wales (Mr.
Carruthers and Mr. Reid) with a view to avoiding the dissolution of the Senate. That was the object they had in view, but that object has not now been carried out, and those who voted with them in Sydney are now asked not only to vote for the dissolution of the Senate consecutively, but also to give the Government of the day power to dissolve both the Senate and the House of Representatives simultaneously.

Mr. BARTON. -
   If a disagreement takes place twice in two consecutive sessions.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
   I do not think it is a reasonable settlement, and I shall not vote for it.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
   I think I ought almost to apologize to the Convention for speaking at this stage, because I really think we are rapidly approaching a position in which it becomes perfectly immaterial what amendments are passed and what are rejected.

Mr. ISAACS. -
   Hear, hear.

Mr. REID. -
   I feel extremely depressed by the shape in which this Bill is. I am profoundly impressed with the feeling that it may fail to command the support of the majority of the people of the colonies. I feel that to attempt to secure a supreme and final authority in this Commonwealth on the part of a small minority of Australians against a large majority of Australians must break down. When we view the source from which the revenue is to come to carry on this Commonwealth, and when we find that time after time those who represent a minority of the taxpayers gain their way and mould this instrument, which was to be designed to express the national will, in such a way that when the national will is expressed it can be indefinitely thwarted.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
   What are we here for?

Mr. REID. -
   Upon my word, only some heavenly intelligence can describe how the honorable member got here.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
   The right honorable gentleman need not be insulting in his remarks and behaviour
Mr. REID. -

The honorable member is so perpetually interrupting-

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Oh! Oh! what about you?

Mr. REID. -

I endeavour to interrupt so as to throw a little oil of lubrication over our proceedings, but my honorable friend's voice always seems to be leading me to the vicinity of a steam sawmill.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Are you lubricating the proceedings now?

Mr. REID. -

I regret to say, in reply to the representative of the smallest of the colonies, who has so steadfastly trampled upon the rights of the majority of the people of this country-

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Rubbish!

The CHAIRMAN. -

Order! Order!

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

I rise to a point of order. Has the right honorable member (Mr. Reid) a right to designate us in that way?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not think the right honorable gentleman's remarks were out of order. It was strong language that he used, but whether it was tasteful or not is not for me to decide.

Mr. REID. -

It is distasteful for me to have to sit here week after week and notice that the almost invariable result is to subordinate the wish of the majority of the people of Australia to an absolute minority; and I cannot sit here any longer without expressing-

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

I rise-

The CHAIRMAN. -

Order!

Mr. REID. -

Without expressing-

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

I rise-

The CHAIRMAN. -

I must ask the honorable member (Mr. Douglas) to keep order.
Mr. REID. -

Without expressing to this Convention my profound disappointment that proposals the most fair and equitable in character are rejected and overwhelmed by what is practically a solid phalanx of gentlemen absolutely determined to prevent this Constitution from expressing the will of the people whose taxes will maintain the Commonwealth. Now, sir, there is actually an opposition-now that these gentlemen have gained all their own way and have prevented a dissolution of the Senate-there is, I say, actually a serious attempt to prevent, as an alternative, the dissolution of that body.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

A simultaneous dissolution.

Mr. REID. -

The simultaneous dissolution of the Senate; I thank my right honorable friend for the correction. What presumption is there that the House of Representatives, when a difficulty arises between the two Houses, must be the House that fails to represent its constituents, and must be the House that is to be first sent to its constituents as a punishment for the difficulty which has arisen? Because, so far as the representatives in either House are concerned, it has a penal effect upon them to send them to their constituents. And this settlement which has been arrived at today amounts to this: That there is a presumption that the House of Representatives, by the part that it has played in the dead-lock which arises, should be punished and sent about its business, so that the electors will have an opportunity of electing it again. Now, what presumption can there be that the members of the other branch of the Legislature may not be to blame, and that the members in the Lower House do not really represent the people? Because it is no question about a referendum. It is a question of an appeal in both cases to the electors; and yet Sir John Forrest suggests that we ought not even to give the Executive the option of sending both Houses to the people at the same time, which contention I say without hesitancy can only be based upon the underground presumption that what is called the Upper House is sure to be right.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I did not say that.

Mr. REID. -

But you always act as if it were so. The right honorable gentleman's course of action all through this Convention has been based upon a solid attempt, designed to make the Senate master of the situation, and to make the representatives of the people-viewing the people as one nation-play a subordinate part. What is the meaning of the opposition to this proposal but that? When we have two elective Houses, does not the House of Representatives play a humiliating part when, if a difficulty arises between the two Houses, it must go first, without rhyme or reason, to the electors? Of course, the right honorable gentleman and those who support him are gentlemen for whom personally we have the highest respect and esteem, and they are, I admit, fighting a brilliant and successful battle for the colonies they represent.

Mr. DOBSON. -
For the people of Australia.

Mr. REID. -
The honorable member as a man to voice the wishes of the people of Australia! The honorable member to assume to speak in the name of the people of Australia!

Mr. DOBSON. -
I don't.

Mr. REID. -
It is a most unfortunate thing that so far the men who should have the most right, by their position, to speak for the people of Australia, have had to speak with very little weight in this assembly. But I make no complaint of that at all. We are here as equals, to do our best to bring about the formation of a sound and wise Constitution. My honorable friends may be absolutely just in all they are attempting to do, but as one who wishes to see this enterprise so concluded that those who will have to bear the heat and burden of great battles to make this the law of the land shall be put in such a position that they can go to the electors and conscientiously recommend this Bill, I feel bound to say that I see no prospect of doing that. I hoped that I would never raise my voice to prejudice any man's mind against this measure. However much I am bound to disapprove of it in its present state, I hoped I would, for the sake of union, abstain from saying a word or using my influence to divert a vote from this Bill, even though I personally could not adopt it. But I want to be put in a better position than that-I want to be put in such a position that I can go before the people of New South Wales, who have so large a share in this matter, whose consent to this Bill is absolutely necessary, so that we may be united-I want to be put in such a position that when the vote is to be taken, I can go from one end of the colony to the other and ask the people to accept this Bill. If this battle between the rights of the larger number of the electors and the taxpayers of Australia is always to be decided against the majority and in favour of the minority; if this is to be carried so far that in the parliamentary difficulties between the two Houses, on the very face of the Constitution there shall be planted an inequality, so that the members of the House which represents the nation shall be punished by a deprivation of their seats, while the other House, where the states are represented, and which is deserving of all respect, is saved an appeal to the electors, how can I be expected to do that? If a difficulty arises between the two Houses every fairminded man will say we must not in this Constitution raise any presumption against either one House or the other; that since the difficulty is a matter between the two Houses, and it has reached a phase at which a reference must be made to the constituents, that there is no rule of honesty or equality which should compel one set of representatives to go to their constituents, lose their seats, and fight a battle, while the others, who may be to blame, whose views may be absolutely opposed to the views of their own constituents, may sit quietly by and see the result of the battle; and if it is found that, though the senators are wrong, after the others come back from the heat and burden of this great political contest, they can quietly pass the Bill and retain their seats.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is the case now.

Mr. REID. - Where?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
In all these colonies.

Mr. REID. -
Well, I am not advocating that.

Mr. BARTON. -
There are no two Houses with the same suffrage in the colonies.

Mr. REID. -
I am not advocating that; and how different is the position in my own colony. Even taking the views of many of my respected opponents who champion the cause of the Upper House—even these gentlemen will admit that our Upper House would never attempt to claim many of the rights put in this Constitution. The whole spirit of the Constitution is being deformed and twisted in such a way that no man who has any sort of belief in democratic government could possibly support it; and this is the last straw.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Oh, oh!

Mr. REID. -
I speak as one having some knowledge and experience of Australia. My honorable friend happens to represent some very successful gold-fields at one extremity of the continent, but I am brought more in touch with the great bulk of the Australian people, and the honorable member may allow me, at any rate, to have some knowledge of their feelings.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
His opinion is as good as yours.

Mr. REID. -
Absolutely so. I did not want to bring the hornet out of his nest. I absolutely admit that. All that I ask my right honorable friend is that he will allow me to have the right to express my opinions without interruption. I am not under the iron rule of my honorable friend in any way. I am at liberty still to express my opinions free from his interference, or the interference of the President of another Legislative Council. We have had a little too much of this.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Is the honorable member in order in abusing members in this way? We have had quite enough of that.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I think the right honorable gentleman had better address himself to the question.

Mr. REID. -
I ask your protection, sir, from the interruptions of my venerable friend.
If he were any ordinary man I would not ask your protection, but he possesses so much vigour and agility.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
I again ask is the honorable member in order?

The CHAIRMAN. -
There is no point of order.

Mr. REID. -
If my honorable friend did not possess such extraordinary agility I would not ask you, sir, to protect me, but I am afraid every moment that the honorable member will fly at me. I hope my honorable and venerable friend will permit me to proceed with my remarks. I say we have come to the last straw. When this distinction is sought to be established, when the two Houses are in conflict, between the one House and the other, I say at once that I feel so keenly the difficulty of the task which is left to me that I am bound to speak in the plainest way. Honorable members of this Convention come to me time after time, and say to me:"Now, Mr. Reid, it all depends on you. If you only fight the battle of this Bill, all will be well.
We all look to you." But I am sorry to say, that when I endeavour to put this Bill in a shape which will enable me to go to the people and use all the weight of my energy in its favour, I receive very little consideration from those gentlemen who so lightly invite me to fight the battle of this Bill.

Mr. Howe. -
You get all your own way.

Sir John Forrest. -
We expect courtesy from you.

Mr. Reid. -
It may be that I get all my own way, although I am not aware of it; but I am anxious about another and a vastly more important matter, that is, that the people of these colonies shall have their rights fairly recognised, which is of infinitely far more importance to me than whether I or any other member of this Convention gets his own way. I feel deeply oppressed by a feeling that even in the best possible shape we may have the gravest difficulties in persuading a majority of the people to support the Bill.

Mr. Gordon. -
Cheer up.

Mr. Reid. -
I do not need to feel any personal emotion of sorrow in this matter, because if, unhappily, our desire to accomplish this bond of union fails it is not the people of New South Wales who will need to be most anxious. It is not the people of New South Wales who will need to be most concerned or alarmed. I do not speak in that sense at all, but I feel that this Bill is so rapidly losing its national character that our prospects of getting the national approval for this Bill will fail. Talk as we may about the referendum, talk as we may about the democracy, this Bill cannot possibly pass unless we gain the goodwill and support of the democracy of Australia. What earthly use is it for us to put this Bill before the people of Australia, unless it is in some sort of shape that, at any rate, convinces them that those who, in an especial manner will represent them, will have some sort of fairness and equality in the distribution of political power? Now, it is in these cases of dead-locks that the Constitution endures its greatest strain. We may hope - and it may well be that in the future all the fears about which we are exercising ourselves so anxiously will prove to have been absolutely groundless - that these two Houses will be composed of men who will be able to settle all their quarrels in a manner that will involve no risk of serious collision. That is a fate which we all hope to be in store for the Commonwealth. But when we have to meet the critics of the Bill, when we have to go before a more or less hostile audience and find all these difficulties harped upon, all these difficulties fully and painfully represented, we then, I fear, will find that people want something more than a pious trust in Providence that all will go well. They want to see on the face of this machine some sort of confidence that it will work well, that it is designed to work well; and one of the best contrivances for making the Constitution work well will be a contrivance to secure, when difficulties occur, that the two Houses of Parliament can go to the people upon some terms of equality and fairness. There is no sort of fairness in the consecutive dissolution of the two Houses of Parliament. It leaves the ease and the comfort of the situation entirely to the members of one House, who may happen absolutely to misrepresent their constituents. I do not ask for that in this matter. All we ask is that, at any rate, there shall be some power to send both Houses impartially-I do not say to receive the verdict of a majority of the people of Australia-to their respective constituents; and unless some arrangement of that sort is made, I think honorable members ought to see that it is impossible for us to take up this Bill with any sort of enthusiasm, with any sort of confidence, that any of our efforts will succeed in gaining for it the stamp of popular approval.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This will be a convenient time for me to say that I believe we shall deal more effectively and more calmly with this proposal if we are not impelled to our decision under any sense of heat that may have been caused by the very vigorous speech of my right honorable friend.

Mr. SYMON. -

Do you think that speech will advance conciliation?

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think I ought to be asked that question. I think there is every excuse for any member of the Convention who feels that, by any means, steps are being taken, or are likely to be taken, which may make his chance of carrying the Bill in his colony a weaker chance. Therefore, I think every consideration is to be given to any honorable member who, under these circumstances, talks with some warmth. I am not about to express any critical condemnation of the speech we have just heard. We all know that my right honorable friend feels and speaks strongly on many occasions, and we must, I think, always recollect that amongst the most successful and powerful members of such bodies as this are to be found men who, on occasions, will speak with the whole strength of the feeling which they entertain. But, sir, I do think there may be an influence caused sometimes by extreme warmth of speech which does not tend to the peaceful solution of a difficulty, and I think there may be a possibility that some of my honorable friends, who have fallen under the lash of the right honorable member's criticism, may be somewhat aggravated for the moment, although I believe they will see before very long that this is a mere ordinary case of warmth of debate.

Mr. GORDON. -

It is only a cracker, not a lash.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not share in my right honorable friend's extreme fears, for the reason that I do not yet see in the Convention a sign of the acceptance of the amendment of my learned friend (Mr. Symon). I believe that the majority of the Convention will reject the amendment, and retain the power of simultaneous dissolution, as an alternative to the second dissolution which has been carried. I believe that will be found to be the strength of the feeling of this debate, and therefore I am not going to express any want of confidence in the Convention in that regard, because I believe that they will act in that manner which will tend to secure the proper appreciation and support of this Bill when it comes before the electors of the various colonies. I do not share the opinion of my, right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) when he says that this Constitution is rapidly losing its national character. I have watched the formation of this Constitution ever since the first Convention in 1891, and so far as the constitutional side of the Bill is concerned, I can freely affirm that every amendment on that side of the measure that has been made has been made in the direction of that democratic feeling which has the sympathy of my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid). In making the suffrage of the Senate the same as that of the other House; in providing that under circumstances even the Senate can be dissolved; in making a dozen other amendments on the constitutional side, we have departed from the Bill of 1891 exactly in the direction in which popular feeling has moved. I think the Convention is to be congratulated for its appreciation of popular feeling, and I believe it will give that appreciation still greater scope in the remaining course of the Bill. Therefore, I am not now expressing any want of confidence in the Convention. I believe it will do not only what it considers right, but will consider, within just bounds, that which is wise to secure the popular support, without which this Bill is mere paper. We are very nearly arrived at the hour at which we generally adjourn in the afternoon, and I suggest to you, sir, that you should leave the chair a few minutes earlier than is usual, because I do not want the speech which has been made to be replied to in a speech of equal warmth at the present stage. I believe the consideration which will take-place in the meantime will tend to the greater success of our efforts.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

The reply will be cool enough.

[The Chairman left the chair at forty-eight minutes past four o'clock p.m.}
The committee resumed at half-past seven o'clock p.m.]

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I am sorry that the right honorable member (the Premier of New South Wales) is not in his place. It is just as well, perhaps, that, by the moderate tactics of the leader of the Convention, a pause was made after that very bombastic attempt of his to put reason and judgment aside, and to appeal to the passions of the audience.

Mr. WISE. -

It was a speech humiliating to New South Wales.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

There are only two reasons why an honorable member should rise to address himself to this Convention. The first is that he wishes to state his views, and to give a reason for his vote. The second is, and it is a very worthy one, that when he finds that many are waiving, he should get up and do what he can to influence their decision in his favour. This is not a House made up of belligerent parties, but a great National Convention, sitting in a calm and pure atmosphere to frame a Constitution for all Australia. It is natural that any honorable member in such a body should try, by the most persuasive language, to win votes to his side of the question. But the right honorable member has followed a third course. It seems to me that in this, and in many of the heated speeches which he has made at different times during the sittings of the Convention—speeches which have done an incalculable amount of harm—it has been his de-sire, instead of soothing and persuading honorable members, to irritate them, and to render them antagonistic. Why, in a Convention like this, should we have it reiterated, ad nauseam, that some of us are tories, and some democrats, that some of us do not represent the opinions of the people, whilst others do? Have not four-fifths of the members of this Convention been elected upon the broadest possible suffrage? And is not each one equally a representative of the colony from which he comes? The right honorable member, and, I think, all the official members of the Convention, if I may call them so, have received the utmost respect from what I may call the private members of the Convention. We have recognised the position of responsibility occupied by the Ministers of the Crown here, and I myself have often stifled my own feelings in deference to them and to save the time of the Convention. But I think it is a pity that some of those who have been insulted and maligned did not take a sterner course at an earlier period of our sittings. I feel that during the remainder of this session, whatever may be the views that any honorable member has arrived at calmly and deliberately as the result of the operations of his intellect and his conscience, they should be respected. We have no right to be flaunted and to have absolute insults hurled at us by certain honorable members, and attempts made to threaten us into subservience. There is no need for any of this braggadocio. It is only the small man, the man who feels weak, and who wants crutches to walk with, who indulges in that sort of thing. My right honorable friend (the Premier of New South Wales) is a man of great intellect, of large experience, of wonderful eloquence, and he has no right to resort to the mere dodges of the hustings in an assembly like this. Now, sir, as to the question that is before us, I have myself followed a principle throughout the whole of our proceedings as fairly and faithfully as I could, and that was this—that when, after the heat of controversy, any principle that was considered vital was embedded in this Constitution, I was determined not by any sideward or by any disingenuous dodge to take away the elements of strength from that broad and vital principle. Now, let us look at this matter, which is really historical in its effect. I never made a fetish of equal representation; but it is clear, and nobody has allowed it more clearly than the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales, that it is not possible to have representation of the states without equal representation.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
That was the mistake he made.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
But when that was agreed upon I desired to be faithful to that principle, and that principle involved a strong States Chamber, guarding the rights and principles of the states as laid down in this Constitution. And from the very beginning—and I say this with all respect—many of the men who reluctantly gave way to that equal states' representation, with the exception of a few who had the courage of their opinions, have been trying throughout the whole of our proceedings to fritter away the value of that great right. Now, how are we going to deal with this matter before us? I have always looked upon this Second Chamber, not merely in its position as a states' rights Chamber, but as carrying out the principles of bi-cameral government. And as time goes on, and our states increase, and our federal feeling grows, and the federal strength becomes greater, I believe that the bi-cameral character of this States House will be higher than even its States House principle.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
We all agree in that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Therefore, I ask-

"Do we believe honestly in the principle of bi-cameral government; do we believe that for many years, perhaps centuries to come, men will not be trained so effectively in politics, in public life, and the people will not be trained so effectively in this kind of government, as to make it possible and prudent to do away with some supreme check of this kind, imposed with the view of giving time for the people to think?"

Now, I do justice to honorable members opposite. I think that, although many would prefer to have only one Chamber, especially in local Legislatures, still, if we erect a Second Chamber, I am sure that my honorable friends do not want willingly to emasculate it. I am sure they will allow that that Chamber must be competent, and that it must have sufficient strength in it to carry out this mandate, and that any provision which would put a threat upon it would hang a sword over its life, would render it impotent, and would at the same time prevent honorable high-class men of intellect in the country from coming into it. Now, I want to see that position preserved in this House. And I do say that if you create any machinery which, under the guise of settling dead-locks, will really be used to create dead-locks, you will strike a blow absolutely at the power and dignity of that House. It is very curious to note the evolution of feeling, or of opinion, throughout the whole of this question. In the Bill of 1891 there was no provision for dead-locks. When we met in Adelaide, my honorable friend (Mr. Wise) and others, with fear and trembling, proposed some concrete views; but it is only very lately that the idea of having absolute finality has dawned upon us at all. I say distinctly that those who believe in the national referendum for finality are the only people who have the courage of their opinion. If you do not have the national referendum, by which you will get at the absolute majority of the people, then any other finality is absurd. But I do not believe there is any necessity for such finality.

You speak from the conservative reactionary point of view.

Mr. WISE. -

This has nothing to do with conservatives or liberalism.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think it has.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I must ask honorable members to allow Mr. McMillan to address the Chair without interruption.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

If the whole of the members of this Convention were photographed, and a stranger were asked to pick out the man who is the most typical tory of us all, he would pick out my friend (Mr. Higgins). There must be an absolute divorce in that gentleman between his political inclinations and his actual intelligence.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Do you not mean a difference between my appearance and my intelligence?

Me. MCMILLAN. - There is no doubt a difference between your appearance and something else. I will just refer to the proposal at the end of the second paragraph—the proposal that the two Houses shall meet together: Will anybody say there is real finality in that? It is no doubt a piece of machinery to create finality in the meantime, but is it a finality that gives confidence, or satisfies anybody? It is nothing of the kind. I hope that the proposal will be thrown out, and that some means may be found of reverting to what we did in regard to what I call this ridiculous proportion between the two Houses. I hope there may be some means of avoiding what I think is one of the greatest blunders that has been perpetrated in the Convention. I should have spoken my mind on this point only for my absence from Sydney at the time. If anybody had told us at the beginning of our meeting in Adelaide that such a radical proposal would have been made as the dissolution of the Senate, one-half of the members, so-called tories, would have almost had their hair turned. And now, forsooth, because certain conservatives—I forget the other part of the vocabulary of my honorable and learned friend—those reactionary conservatives—

Mr. SYMON. - Antiquated.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - I will not say antiquated. But because certain reactionary conservatives say they are willing to go so far as to dissolve the Senate, believing that that may bring about a settlement, and that that is sufficiently far to go on a stage of coercion, are they to be told they do not represent the great democracy of Australia? The thing is absolutely absurd. The way these words have been bandied about in this Convention is absolutely absurd. Whatever anybody can blame me for, they cannot convict me of inconsistency. I said in Sydney, as I said in Adelaide, that I was willing to agree to a reasonable mode of settling deadlocks if anybody could put in a concrete shape an arrangement that would not absolutely annihilate the principle of federation; that would not absolutely interfere with the strength of the Senate, which is the great safeguard of the people and of the country under this system of bi-cameral government. I voted against all these proposals in Adelaide and Sydney, except the proposal of Mr. Symon. I stopped at that, and I go no further. I am entirely opposed to the simultaneous dissolution of the two Houses. What is the position? Are not the whole of these provisions framed to deal with the settlement of questions initiated in the House of Representatives? The attacking House is naturally the House of Representatives, which frames the legislation, and surely it is enough to, say that after the House of Representatives has been to the country, in the way we have been accustomed to in carrying on our business under the British Constitution, if there is not a settlement of the dead-lock with the Senate, which we originally never intended to dissolve except in the ordinary-way, and which is supposed to represent the continuity of our national life, then, as a last resort, the Senate may be dissolved. That is as far as it is possible for concessions to go.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do you mean a simultaneous dissolution?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I mean a dissolution first of the House of Representatives, and then, if that fails to bring about a settlement, a dissolution of the Senate. Honorable members have said that this may never be put into force, and that is probable. They any that it will be, to a certain extent, a deterrent, but I do not want to turn a deterrent into a coercive threat.

Mr. HOLDER. -

What if that does not settle the dispute?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Then I say, leave it alone. We are dealing now with, a written Constitution, and with a Federal Government, in which the rights and, privileges of the states are preserved. If, after all these arrangements and all this circumlocution, a law is not passed it will be better to wait until the people have made themselves thoroughly acquainted with the subject. One of the great curses of modern politics is the desire to legislate on everything. Our Appropriation Bills will be in no danger, because the rejection of an Appropriation Bill would be equal to a revolution. There is no fear of the Senate attempting to veto any law that is necessary for the good government of the country, and the only laws that they would attempt to veto, as a rule, would be such as were experimental, and such as the people probably did not want. These are my feelings in the matter. I am sorry that the conversation has gone so far that I now find myself separated from honorable members who have voted side by side with me on this question, who did not believe in any solution for dead-locks, who thought that the principles of common sense, of common patriotism, and of mutual concession, which have distinguished English statesmen and English legislation would operate in the future in the Commonwealth of Australia, and who said, as our fathers did, so will we do.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

The thanks, not only of myself, but of many honorable members, are due to the Hon. Mr. McMillan for the very high-toned and generous speech that he has been good enough to deliver. My own inclination at the present time would be not to say anything, because I, with others, felt very much pained at the speech we had to listen to from the Right Hon. Mr. Reid. If I did not represent a great colony, and if I had not its interests to conserve, I certainly would not rise at the present moment to say anything. Because on an occasion of this sort many will think that the less we say the better. I recognise quite as fully—or, at any rate, I desire to recognise as fully—as does my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) the great responsibility that rests upon him in regard to this Constitution, and in regard to the work we are carrying on. No one, I think, will deny that a great responsibility—probably greater than that which rests upon most of us—rests upon him. I wish to acknowledge that most frankly. But we must not forget that we are here on his invitation. We have been elected by the various colonies to come here as their representatives, but we come especially, and the whole matter originated, on an invitation from New South Wales that we should assemble and confer with the representatives of that colony in order to try and form a Federal Constitution which would bind us more closely together than we are at the present time. Now, I am afraid that the right honorable gentleman in the eloquent—I think it was eloquent—speech he addressed to us forgot that he was addressing a representative gathering such as we have the honour to be, and he must have thought he was addressing some political gathering somewhere in his own colony. I do not know that I have the best right of any one in this Chamber to find fault with others, because I have the reputation of being somewhat brusque myself. But I wish to say this: That if ever here or elsewhere I have said anything that was not in good taste, or that was rude, I regret it, and should be the first to withdraw it whenever I had so far forgotten myself. Now, we have not come here to be lectured. We have not come here, I take it, to be treated with the greatest courtesy. We have not come here to hear our colonies, or the representatives of our colonies either, disparaged or in any way treated other than with the greatest courtesy. I have not come here to be told that I represent a colony far away to the west, and that I represent a few gold-diggers or a few gold-fields, I have not come here to be told that the tax payers of New South Wales are entitled to any more consideration than the tax payers I have the honour to represent. I am not here as a suppliant asking for anything from any one, or desiring charity from New South Wales. But I am here as the representative of a self-governing country, trying to do my duty, and in doing that duty not desiring to obtain anything from anybody. I take it that every individual in every one of these colonies—in Western Australia as well as in every other colony—is as much interested in this Constitution as any other individual in any other part of Australia. An individual in New South Wales or in Victoria (which are the two largest colonies) has no more interest in this Constitution than an individual in the country I have the honour to represent. We are as self-reliant and capable of managing our own affairs and interests in one part of Australia as they are in other parts. In fact, if I wished to use the boastful language of my right honorable friend, I might say that 160,000 people in Western Australia raise as much revenue as 500,000 in his colony. Therefore, every man, woman, and child in Western Australia is as self-reliant as three in the colony he comes from.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Not under this Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not know what will be the case in the future, but that is the case at the present time. Why do I say these things? I say them with this object: To show Mr. Reid that we, who come from Western Australia, and I am sure I can speak for the people in other colonies, care not for his threats, and will not be coerced. Now, as to the merits of this question. They have been shown very clearly by Mr. McMillan, so that very few words are required from me. As he said, the idea of dissolving the Senate never occurred to the Convention in 1891, and it occurred first, I believe, when it was suggested by Mr. Wise in Adelaide, and he received, no support.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I proposed it in 1891.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
But I think the honorable member got no support.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Very little.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
In Adelaide it received very little support. It received much greater support in Sydney than was ever anticipated, and now we are told by the right honorable gentleman that if he does not get the double dissolution—a simultaneous dissolution—the whole fabric of this Constitution will come to naught; that he will not be able to say to his people that it is a Constitution worthy of acceptance, because, forsooth, there is not embedded in it the simultaneous dissolution of the House of Representatives and the Senate. I regret to see that there is all over this colony, and in New South Wales, and, I think, in South Australia, a determined dislike to the Legislative Council—the Upper House, as it is called. I do not know why that should be, but the fact remains that honorable members, even in this Convention, cannot divest themselves of the idea that the Upper Houses, which they so much dislike in their own colonies, are to be represented in this Constitution in the Senate. Those honorable members, however, who do not like the Upper House in their own colonies, forget to tell us that this Upper House is to be elected by the same people, on the same franchise, as the House of Representatives, and that it will be more representative of the masses of Australia than the Lower House itself, which will only represent certain districts.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Only 30,000 or 40,000 electors in your colony.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Honorable members know very well that I have been opposed all along to any dissolution whatever of the Senate. I have been opposed all along to any provision to prevent dead-locks, believing, like my honorable friends (Mr. Barton and Sir John Downer) and many other members, that the good sense and patriotism of the people will be quite sufficient in the future, as it has been in the past, to meet any difficulties which may arise. I have given way, certainly unwillingly, to try and meet the wishes of those who desire that the Senate shall be dissolved. Now that we are going to have a dissolution of the Senate, I care very little whether it is a consecutive dissolution, or whether it is a simultaneous dissolution.

Mr. WISE. -

It makes a very great difference to New South Wales.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

The honorable member will make himself believe that anything will affect New South Wales. He did not say so in Adelaide. I suppose he is gathering up these ideas as he goes along, and he will tell us that the whole people of New South Wales think as he thinks, when, perhaps, he knows very little about it.

Mr. WISE. -

I do not agree with them.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am very glad to hear that.
Mr. WISE. -

But I recognise their beliefs.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I do not believe that they know much about these matters. I do not believe that many persons among the masses who have votes care two straws whether it is a simultaneous dissolution, or whether it is a consecutive dissolution. I make bold to say that, and I believe I am not very far off the mark. We have been told that this will wreck the Constitution, and that that will wreck the Constitution, that we cannot go back to our constituents with this or that. We have been told this often, but I want to point out to honorable members that, although I come from a far distant country, with not a very large population, it is just as difficult for me to convince the 160,000 persons over there as it is for the Premier of Victoria or the Premier of New South Wales to convince his 1,000,000 people. I think perhaps it is more difficult in my case. We know very well in the case of Victoria and in the case of New South Wales they will be able, when they get the Bill passed, to show their people that there is a great future before them, a great profit, and a great outlet for their industries and their produce. But we will not be able to show the 160,000 persons in Western Australia that that is the case. I shall not be able to do it. I make bold to say, and I know it to be true, too, that it will be more difficult for me to convince my 160,000 people, because I shall have to show them that they will put money into their pockets. That is what I will not be able to show. I have said, over and over again, that the desire for free markets and for an outlet for their produce is stronger in the minds of the people of these colonies than is their desire for nationhood. That is the lever which is urging them on, and that lever is absent in the case of Western Australia. Therefore, when people talk about the difficulty they will have when they go back to their colonies and their people they only think of themselves. They think that I and those who are like me, in Western Australia, Tasmania, and South Australia, will have no difficulty whatever; that the small number of people there are less intelligent than the people in their large towns; that they are not so careful of their own interests, and that therefore they will be easily bamboozled. I do not think that will be the case. My idea of the task before me is, that it is far more difficult than it is for any other Premier in this Convention. I agree with my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan). If after there has been a dissolution of the Lower House and, after a reasonable time, a dissolution of the Senate they cannot agree, I do not think they want the law. My idea is that we should better wait until they do agree. It will be a law which is a great invasion on the rights of a large number of people, some new-fangled idea put forward for some purpose or other. It seems to me that that kind of law can very well wait for a time. We know very well that people are careful of their own interests. We have never had a case yet in any of these colonies where the Upper House has ever interfered seriously with an Appropriation Bill unless there has been an attempt on the part of the Lower House to coerce the other. Every year we pass our Appropriation Bills through the Legislatures without a word. In the Constitution of Western Australia, as in this Bill, there is a provision allowing suggestions to be made by the Upper House, even with regard to the provisions of an Appropriation Bill. Attempts have been made there by members of the Council to have these suggestions put forward, but they have never succeeded. Therefore, the experience we have to guide us shows that all these difficulties which are imagined in the minds of imaginative people will not exist when we get to business. We have all gone far enough. Those who believe in no dissolution of the Senate at all have agreed that there shall be a dissolution. Further than that I am not prepared to go.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

It seems to me that an extremely undesirable tone has invaded our discussion. In my opinion, there was ample justification for the heat displayed by the right honorable gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I think it was a mistake upon the part of the Premier of New South Wales to adopt the tone which he did, though I entirely agree with the arguments which he used. The Premier of Western Australia has pointed out that in the Bill of 1891 there was no reference to a dissolution of the Senate. He has pointed out that in the successive meetings of the Convention the idea of a dissolution of the Senate has received greater and greater support. That is the truth, and it is a significant sign of the progress which is taking place in all the colonies. We ought not to shut our eyes to the fact that there is growing with immense rapidity in the minds of the people a feeling that there must be some means of quickly settling disputes arising between their agents.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That is at variance with history, and common sense.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

The honorable member will pardon me for not taking up time in dealing with the historical aspect of the question. I hear an honorable gentleman interject "The Trades Hall." You will pardon me for saying that I have never mentioned the Trades Hall in this Convention. I have never referred to that section of the community which I may be said most distinctly to represent. Yet this is a question which will have to be settled by that section of the community.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

No; we have to settle it.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The people have to settle it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It will have to be settled ultimately by the people of Australia, and in Australia 80 per cent. of the people work for wages, and belong to the labouring classes. I have never before referred nor do I intend to continue to refer now, to this section of the community, and I think that the interjection was a most ungraceful one.

Mr. PEACOCK. -

It was in very bad form, whoever made it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

It was certainly not warranted by any action of mine at any setting of the Convention. I was pointing out that a certain feeling is growing up. If we are in earnest about federation we cannot afford to disregard the opinions of the people. Like the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest), we may be of opinion that the people know very little about these matters; but we must not forget that, whether they know little or much about them, their vote is the final issue to which the Constitution is to be submitted, so far as Australia is concerned. I would therefore urge it upon honorable members most earnestly, and with all the force of which I am capable, that the Constitution has in it principles which are extremely distasteful to the bulk of the people. But federation itself is so alluring that the people may be induced to accept the Constitution with all its faults, because of its great material advantages, and, perhaps, because of advantages which appeal to them more indirectly—its sentimental advantages—the advantage, for instance, to be derived by wiping out the arbitrary geographical lines by which the colonies are separated, and creating a nation which shall secure respect among the councils of the nations of the earth. We should, therefore, if we can do it without sacrificing principle, be willing to put into the Constitution any bait that may be to the people an added reason for accepting what, on very many grounds, they see to be fraught with serious danger. Whatever may be the faults of the manner in which the Premier of New South Wales dealt with this question, he told an important truth when he said that we had arrived at the most critical point of the discussion. We ought to be prepared to concede everything that we can fairly and honestly concede, even though the propositions put forward are not exactly approved by our judgment, so long as we can see no serious danger in them. If it be true that there is no serious danger in providing for the dissolution of the Senate after a dissolution of the House of Representatives has taken place, there can be no serious danger in giving the alternative to the Executive of the day to either dissolve the one House as a test, with the intention, if need be, of dissolving the other later on, or to dissolve both Houses at once. As I pointed out when I spoke in regard to the first paragraph of the clause this morning, there is a feeling, be it right or be it wrong, that the Convention has aimed at making the Senate unduly strong, to the extent of making it the dominating Chamber. The opinion is held outside that the Convention, instead of making the Senate a House of revision and of reasonable delay, has aimed at making it the dominating power in the Commonwealth. I am not urging that this is the aim of honorable members. So far as I can, I am, and always have been, anxious to say nothing to hurt or offend the feelings of any honorable member.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Do you believe in reasonable delay?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I do.

Mr. DOBSON. -

You just said that the people want to have everything settled quickly.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I want to have things settled quickly, consistent with reasonable delay. To have things settled slowly may mean unreasonable vexing annoying delay, such as in some countries of the world has led to revolution. The honorable member spoke about history. Every one knows that in England in 1832 if there had been greater delay in conceding what was the wish of the people there would have been a bloody revolution among one of the most peaceful nations of the earth. Delay may extend until it becomes so unbearable as to lead to violence upon the part of people who hate violence. That is what I mean when I speak of reasonable delay. I do not mean the settlement of a question during the currency of a wave of passion, possibly of popular delusion. But surely there is nothing in the Bill, even with the provision for a double dissolution, which require the settlement of matters in such a hurry as to deny reasonable delay, careful consideration, exhaustive discussion, and the perfect understanding of the questions presented.

Mr. DOBSON. -

How long would your Parliament take to settle bi-metallism or the question of old-age pensions?
Mr. TRENWITH. -

I do not think I am called on to say how long I would give my Parliament to settle either or both of those questions, for two reasons. One is, I have not a Parliament all to myself, and perhaps that is a sufficient reason, so that I need not state the other. I ask my honorable friend (who I believe desires federation, as I believe almost all, if not absolutely all, the representatives in this Convention do) to believe me when I say that I am able to speak on this point with an authority that perhaps no other member of this Convention possesses. "Trades Hall" was interjected at me, and it does happen, from the position that I hold, that I am brought into contact with the masses of the people in all the colonies in a way that no other member of this Convention is. And possessing the knowledge that I do of the feelings of the great majority of the people who are to vote on this Bill when it is presented to them, I have no hesitation in saying that unless this clause is carried, they will leave me and others who earnestly desire federation, and who are willing to swallow a few provisions extremely repugnant, because important to the whole issue, without an argument that the carrying of this clause would give us. Honorable members know that there is a strong feeling, rightly or wrongly, that in this Constitution there should be a provision as to the ultimate settlement of the dispute for a reference to the people of any question at issue between the two Houses of Parliament, by means of the referendum. I see no hope of that being carried, and the fact of that being out of the Constitution will have an immense effect in turning many persons against this Bill. Given this double dissolution, I and others who think with me that there should be a referendum, feel that federation is so important, and the possibilities for these colonies under it are so great, that, desirable as it is, we may forego the referendum, hoping for the future to produce it. And we have thus placed in our hands an argument we may use, and that will enable us to say to the people-"It is true that this Constitution is not nearly so perfect as it ought to be from a democratic point of view; but, after all, it is more perfect than most of the Constitutions of the world, and although it does not contain the principle of the referendum, which we believe to be a just and proper principle, it has at least such a terror to the Upper House against uncertain, harassing, and wearying delay, that if they unreasonably resist a measure desired by the people, they may be dissolved and sent to their constituents the same as the other House of the Federal Parliament." Now, I do beg honorable members to try I do not want to bounce them, and I do not want to threaten that this Bill will not be carried, but in view of the importance of the issue-to weigh in their minds whether there is not sufficient danger in this proposal from their point of view even to justify them in doing something which they consider is not reasonable, in view of the responsibility of wrecking all the work we have been doing if they decline to do this. I, the

Although I have already spoken very briefly upon this clause, I, with much hesitation, desire to obtrude my opinions for a second time on the committee; because I am satisfied that we have reached a most critical point in our deliberations, and that the vote we are about to give is pregnant with the future of either federation or disunion. I am not going to repeat the regrets which have been expressed from all sides of this chamber at the speech delivered by the Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales. I share in those regrets for the reasons which have been expressed.

Mr. REID. -

And I accept them all.

Mr. WISE. -

But I do appeal to the committee to consider the position of those who, while they dissent from the views of the right honorable gentleman, are deeply in earnest in their desire to carry this Bill through, and successfully to meet the opposition which, unquestionably, we are going to meet in New South Wales. It has been my lot whilst this Convention has been sitting to pay two or three visits to New South Wales, and I have returned each time more startled perhaps than I can express by the strength of the wave of provincial feeling that is passing over our colony. I believe that we can explain the misapprehensions that at present have taken hold of our people, but we shall have infinitely more difficulty in explaining them if those who are opposed to us, who misunderstand what is going on here, and who invent arguments against us when they cannot find arguments from our proceedings—if those opponents can say with truth that the settlement which has been accepted for many months as a settlement which was arrived at in Sydney has been departed from here. If we were dealing with this matter now for the first time, and if the same strength of feeling were expressed as has been expressed to-day by Mr. Symon and Sir John Forrest, I believe I should be found voting with those gentlemen against this clause. But I have never disguised my conviction that this clause is a mere concession to popular ignorance. Still, as a practical politician, wishing to get this Bill through, I recognise that the public of Australia have accepted this clause as it stands, and the difference between altering a proposal of this kind and refusing to accept it in the first instance, is sufficiently marked for it to be unnecessary for me to emphasize it further. The difficulty is that if this clause is struck out those who are the enemies of federation will scrutinize the division list, and will find that it is struck out by the votes of the three smaller colonies.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The three smaller colonies do not vote solidly in anything.

Mr. BARTON. -

That will not be so.

Mr. WISE. -

I hope I am not misunderstood. I am only expressing my own particular opinion.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If the clause is struck out it will be by the votes of Victoria and New South Wales.

Mr. WISE. -

With the exception of two votes from Victoria and two votes from New South Wales, the votes will be representative of Western Australia, South Australia, and Tasmania. I am speaking of the majority of the voters.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

No, no.

Mr. WISE. -

I am only saying if it is struck out; I hope it will not be.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is too early for such a prediction as that.

Mr. WISE. -

I am not prophesying, and I am afraid I am misunderstood. I am only urging that if the same vote is given on this question as on the last, there will be a certain amount of justification for the statement that the majority of the representatives of the three smaller states have outweighed the vote of the other colonies. My hope and trust is that the vote will be altered, and my endeavour is to induce honorable members to alter it, but if the same votes are given to strike out this clause as were given for retaining the other clause, there will be a certain amount of justification for the statement to which I have referred. In saying this I am speaking of the enemies of federation in New South Wales, because I do not pretend to speak for any other colony. And what would the votes be given for? They would be given to alter an arrangement that has already been arrived at. If this were being raised for the first time, I would be ready to vote for the other side, if any strength of opinion was expressed. Why I do not go over to the other side I will show; and it was an expression in Sir John Forrest's speech that caused me to rise for the purpose of emphasizing my opinion. Sir John Forrest said there was very little difference between successive dissolution and simultaneous dissolution. I agree with him; but there is a difference which has possessed the opinions of the public, and which, if we ignore it, will prejudice the Bill certainly in New South Wales, and, I am assured by Mr. Trenwith, in Victoria also. Is it worth while to break a compromise which, after all, is a small matter, but which the public think of importance for historical reasons? I trust that it will in no way whatever be interfered with. I should be found strenuously opposing the referendum in any form whatever, or any arrangement to depart from a compromise which is thoroughly understood throughout Australia, and which has been reluctantly accepted by a great many, and, on the whole accepted, it may be, with great advantage.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It was mot accepted by the Convention in that way.

Mr. WISE. -

The honorable member may be right in saying that it was not accepted by the Convention in that way, but it has been accepted throughout the country in that way. And it has this greater advantage. The riddle of federation is how to reconcile responsible government with the Federal Constitution. There is only one way to solve the riddle, and that is to give the Executive of the day complete control over every part of the parliamentary machinery. You cannot get that complete control unless you place it in the power of the Executive to dissolve both Houses at the same time. Whether the Executive Movement will or will not work under these conditions only the future will inform us. But it gives a fair opportunity to responsible government to work on lines with which we are already familiar. If we leave matters as they stand, we shall close the mouths of those who say there has been a wave of tory feeling which justifies them in opposing the Bill they were previously prepared to support. I ought to apologize for using the word tory, although I am only using the word which we hear from our opponents. I do not like to sit down without entering the strongest possible protest against the suggestion, which I am sorry to say came from Mr. Higgins in an interjection, that there is anything in this proposal at all correlative between liberal and tory. There is no analogy, and there never will be, between the House of Representatives and the Senate and a Legislative Council and a Legislative Assembly. The suggestion is utterly misleading and dangerous to the cause of federation.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
It is important that some remarks should be made in respect to the suggestion thrown out by the last speaker. It has been suggested that if we take a certain course the electors in New South Wales will believe that that result was secured by the union of three colonies against two. I have seen statements in the press, said to have been made by a member of the Convention, which also went in the same direction. I take this opportunity of making the most definite declaration on this point—a declaration which can be supported by anybody who will take the trouble to look through the records—that on hardly any occasion have the representatives of the three colonies referred to voted solidly together against the solid representatives of the other colonies. On almost every important division there have been some representatives of Victoria against the rest, and some representatives of New South Wales against the rest, and the representatives of South Australia have almost always been equally divided. The representatives of Western Australia and Tasmania have frequently had some of their number on one side, while others with some of the representatives of South Australia have voted with the larger colonies.

Mr. Barton. -

The whole thing is a pure fabrication, which a glance at the minutes will disperse.

Mr. Holder. -

It is a pure fabrication, and, because I think that ought to be said in the most clear and outspoken way, I felt compelled to rise after Mr. Wise to make this statement, so that it might find an echo from one end of the proposed Commonwealth to the other. And now I should like to say a word or two on the point before the Convention. I wish to repeat what I said two or three weeks ago as to the difficulties of one colony being the difficulties of all. If it is hard to get 80,000 votes in New South Wales, or a sufficient number of votes in Victoria, that is a hardship which will be felt by all the colonies. It is our business, as a whole, to help New South Wales to overcome her difficulties, and it is for the other colonies to help us in South Australia to overcome our difficulties. We are here in one sense representing colonies, but we are here in a larger and better sense as the representatives of Australia, just as in a Parliament there are men representing given districts, but, taken altogether, they represent the whole country. And I feel that, apart from the honour of the position we hold as representing our own colonies, we are representatives a Australia. The difficulties of Australia are our difficulties. If we had had that in mind during the short time before dinner, and some time since—if we had thought more of the Federation we are building up than of little personal feelings—some unpleasantness might have been saved. What is the question we have to discuss? Really, when we see how small it is, we will be surprised at the time taken over it, and the heat evolved. We have already determined that under certain conditions there must first be a dissolution of the House of Representatives, and, if the dispute continues, a dissolution of the Senate. Is it desired that alternative power shall be given to the Ministry to have more dissolution? Nothing of the kind. If that were proposed we could understand the warmth. The proposal is to give to the Executive the power, if circumstances in their view demand it, and the conditions surrounding the case require it, to dissolves the Houses simultaneously, instead of having them dissolved with a period of some months between. Is the question worth all the feeling that has been exhibited?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Do you think it would be really used as an alternative, and not adopted as a practice?

Mr. HOLDER. -

That interjection leads to a number of considerations which strengthen my position very much, and weakens the position of my honorable friend (Mr. McMillan). I do not hesitate to say that these cases of dead-lock will be so managed by the Executive that they will come up as nearly as possible before a general election of the House of Representatives. That would be taken as the opportunity for making the appeal to the electors, and the simultaneous dissolution would be the exception, and not the rule. Seeing that that is so remote a contingency, and that it is only to be resorted to as an alternative, is it worth while to fight any longer about the matter? We have decided that the two Houses may be dissolved, and surely we may now decide that they may be dissolved together instead of apart. That is the issue, and am we going to risk the whole scheme of federation upon it? Surely, having done the major thing, we may do the minor thing, and so assist the two greatest colonies in the group in getting this Constitution accepted by the people.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

It is impossible to speak on this question without making some reference to the remarkable utterances of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid. I felt no temper about them at the time, and I feel no temper about them now, although he made a sweeping charge against the representatives of the smaller states—a charge which was in some senses ludicrous, and in every way inexcusable. For instance, he said that the representatives of the smaller states had no influence in the Convention. It is just because we have influence, and have been able to carry one or two proposals, that he has thought fit to make this attack upon us. My feeling was not one of anger, but of regret-regret that the leader of this movement, to whom we have been loyal from the time when he asked us to meet him in Hobart in 1895, should have struck a blow at federation more serious than any blow that can be delivered hereafter by anybody else. There was no occasion for it. The Convention, by a majority, has carried the point as to consecutive dissolutions, and has shown that it is in favour of this remedy for dead-locks. I, personally, have always been in favour of the dissolution of the Senate as a means of disposing of difficulties when the two Chambers cannot agree. It is simply childish to say that, because some of us hesitate to accept an alternative and simultaneous dissolution, ruin must fall upon the fabric of the Constitution. If these opinions are held by some persons in the larger states, very different opinions are entertained in the smaller states, not by those who are occasionally stigmatized as tories, but by the most liberal members of the community. I should like to quote a few words on the subject from a radical source. They are as follows:-

It is absurd that there should exist a distrust of the manhood suffrage on which the Senate, unlike any Legislative Council, will be based.

Under the Constitution as it now stands, with a little circumlocution, the majority vote of two states—though it may be the minority vote of the Commonwealth—will rule the five states.

If the Australian Senate is to be a useless and ridiculous cipher, it had better vanish from the Constitution altogether. The trick of offering the small states a Senate, and, at the same time, taking from that Chamber every vestige of effective authority and power can excite only the contempt of serious and honest politicians.

That is not a tory utterance. It is the radical sentiment of Adelaide.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Who is the author?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I do not know who is the author.

Mr. REID. -
It is a wonder that you do not put it down to me.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The right honorable member is capable of anything and he may have written the article from which these words are taken for the Adelaide Advertiser. During this short debate we have heard some extraordinary arguments in justification of the vote to be given for a double dissolution. Mr. Wise tells us that it is a concession of which he disapproves, but which is to be made to popular ignorance. Let us instruct the people so that this popular ignorance may be dissipated, and we shall then get a vote on a fair issue.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Very few will agree with Mr. Wise on that matter.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The honorable member also said that if we were now dealing with the subject for the first time he would vote against the double dissolution. One wonders what he would do if it came to a third vote, seeing that he voted against it on the first occasion, and in favour of it on the second.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

He would not vote at all.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I hope that in this matter we shall be guided by reason, and that we shall not be misled by any threat of the frightful consequences that will ensue if we do not pass the clause. We have conceded, and willingly conceded, so far as I am concerned, the form of dissolution proposed by the Hon. Mr.
Symon, and we might very well rest satisfied with that, knowing as we do that an occasion for the application of these dead-lock provisions will very seldom, and probably never, arise.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am not going to make a speech; I am only going to ask if I may not appeal to the consideration and patriotism of the Convention to come to a vote upon this matter? If arguments on the question can be answered more satisfactorily than they have been answered, of course I have no right to ask for a division to be taken now. But is there not a great deal of work ahead of us? Have we not been sitting here for seven weeks tomorrow? Is there anything new under the sun, or under the electric light, that can be said for or against this proposal?

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

In view of what the leader of the Convention has said, I refrain from making any observations on this particular branch of the subject.

Question—That the words down to the word "agree" proposed to be struck out stand part of the paragraph—put.

The committee divided—

AYES.
Berry, Sir G. Isaacs, I.A.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I now beg to move the amendment which I indicated before the debate closed-

That there be inserted after the word "agree" the following words:-"and if the House of Representatives again passes the proposed law, and the Senate rejects the same, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree."

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

May I be allowed to put one matter, to my honorable and learned friend-whether it will not make the amendment clearer if he inserts the words "in the next session," in the first portion of the amendment, so as to make it apply both to the House of Representatives and to the Senate?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I understand that the honorable and learned member desires the words to read:"and if in the next session"?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -

NOES.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
I have no objection to that, and I ask leave to amend my amendment accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The amendment is-

That the paragraph be further amended by inserting the following words after the word "agree": "and if in the next session the House of Representatives again passes the proposed law, and the Senate rejects the same, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree."

The question is that the words proposed to be inserted be so inserted.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I will call the attention of the leader of the Convention to the fact that in this proposed amendment it is not required that the second passage shall be by an absolute majority, but in the other case-in the first part of the clause-the second passing must be by an absolute majority. I understand that the leader of the Convention wishes to preserve perfect uniformity in this matter. Of course, if it is intended that there shall be a difference it is all right, but it struck me that the omission might be a slip.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I should like to ask whether the leader of the Convention has not overlooked a point with regard to the interval between the two sessional. As the proposal stands, the two sessions might be within a day or two only of each other. There is nothing to prevent the Government proroguing Parliament, and summoning it a few days afterwards. It seems to me that there should be some interval provided for. I call attention to the matter.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I will point out, Sir Richard Baker, that, there is a prompt remedy for that state of things. If the Government were to resort to the mere trick of proroguing for the simple purpose of getting a second vote on the same question in the way Sir John Forrest suggests, contrary to fair play, let alone the spirit of the Constitution, the unpopularity of such a step amongst their own supporters, to say nothing of the public outside, would be their punishment, and there would be a very heavy danger that they would have to pay for doing so. We will leave such a matter to the wisdom of the people who will have to deal with it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

In the first paragraph we have provided for an interval of six months between the two sessions.

Mr. BARTON. -

But that is a different thing. In the provision relating to the concurrent dissolution, the order of things is this: If the House of Representatives passes the law, and the Senate rejects it, or fails to pass it, or makes amendments which are not agreed to by the House of Representatives, and the Governor-General dissolves the House of Representatives, then, in six months after the dissolution, if the House of Representatives again passes the proposed law by an absolute majority, the Senate may be dissolved if the same difference occurs again between the two Houses. But that is a limitation to prevent delay. That is the object of the six months' interval in the first part of the clause—not for the purpose of bringing about undue haste, but for the purpose of preventing undue delay; and undue haste would be ill for the Government that proposed it. Now, there is no particularly undue delay, I take it, if the whole of the next session is allowed within which these steps are taken. With regard to the absolute majority, I am disinclined to make an exception of that sort. It is not like the case of a consecutive dissolution. It is a case where there are disagreements between the Houses, and I do not see that in that case an absolute majority is required. The mere action of the principle of responsible government, which is applied to both Houses at the same time, is sufficient security for the due execution of this provision.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

My honorable friend says, in reference to the possibility of this interval being a very short one, that no doubt Parliament or the Executive would take care to guard against that. I think that as we are dealing with very edged tools in this provision, and intrusting to the Executive a very drastic power, we ought to be careful that there is some minimum interval. Therefore, I beg to move—

That the amendment—

That is the consecutive dissolution, and you have a dissolution interfering before the Senate is interfered with. I do not want to make the interval too long, but I want to make it certain that there shall be an interval, and I think six months is the shortest that should elapse.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

The amendment of Mr. Symon is the exact reverse of the provisions in the former clause. The revisions of the former clause are for the purpose of necessitating speed. If this amendment were carried it would insist upon delay, and the question can only become so urgent as to make it necessary to apply these provisions, when it is of such a nature that it must be put through as early as possible. If you prevent that, by carrying the amendment, this remedy will, in many cases, be of very little avail.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then why say in the next session at all? If the object is to have it done any speedier, there is no necessity for my honorable friend's amendment.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

One day might make a new session.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

We do not want a new session at all. The whole object of the amendment is that some interval may elapse, and the honorable member says next session; that may be more than six months, and the honorable member wants it to be at least six months. If the next session is more than six months, what more is wanted?

Mr. SYMON. -

That is if the matter is urgent.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Then, if it is urgent, resist Mr. Isaacs' amendment.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I submit there is some justification for the suggestion that there should be some specified time. The object of requiring two sessions clearly is that there shall be an interval, but it is extremely desirable that the interval should be a reasonable one, because we may assume that before a dispute has arrived at an acute stage there has been some time and trouble taken over the proposed legislation. It would not be proposed unless in, the opinion of one or both Chambers it was necessary. Therefore we must be careful that we do not have undue delay in connexion with necessary legislation. If Mr. Symon would do what is frequently done in Victoria in connexion with measures in which it is proposed there should be an interval before they are submitted and voted on, fix six weeks instead of six months, you might be assured that there will be substantial delay. You would be secured against an unfair rush.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is all we want.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I understand that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Supposing a measure was sprung very suddenly upon the Parliament, and suddenly rejected, it would not come under the consideration of the public at all.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I respectfully submit that a measure passed very suddenly, and suddenly rejected, would not be likely to be a measure about which this part of the Constitution would be brought into execution. Measures of importance, such as will create disputes between the two Houses, are sure to be measures discussed at considerable length in both Houses, and, as Mr. Deakin points out, the Senate is not coerced into dealing with them. The Senate can take its time, even though the House of Representatives sends up a measure. It is not bound to deal with it the day it receives it. Therefore, I submit there is justification for the proposal, and we should concede it, even it it is distasteful to us.

Mr. SYMON. -
Will the honorable member allow me to point out the necessity for a longer interval than is given in Victoria? This is a Commonwealth matter, and you have the whole of Australasia to consider, and not one colony, if you we to get an expression of opinion.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Of course, I am very anxious that we should in this connexion carry a proposal, if possible, nearly unanimously.

Mr. SYMON. -
Make it three months.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Personally, I rose to point out that six months is too long; but perhaps three months would be a reasonable interval in view of the fact that such an extensive area has to be considered. I am reminded that in parts of Western Australia a letter takes three weeks for delivery. Therefore, we should require more time in Western Australia than in Victoria or New South Wales. However, if the honorable member will accept three months, I will support him.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -
I hope the amendment will be passed as proposed. For such a matter as three months, is it worth while to, make a provision in the Constitution? The necessary steps to be taken by the Government itself will at least insure that delay, and, on the other hand, it may be very important to put the thing through in the public interests with so much rapidity that it would be impossible to allow the exact time in the Constitution. After all, it is not worth troubling about.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
Mr. O'Connor overlooks the fact that the Senate may not put it through; there is a little safeguard there. But it seems to me that the words proposed by Mr. Barton, if they mean anything, mean another ordinary session. That is the intention of the honorable member moving it; but the way, in which it will be done will be to make a special session, as was done in South Australia, where I believe that was done in order to get over this very difficulty. A new session was summoned three days after the termination of the other session. If that is the object of the honorable member-to try and rush the thing through by summoning another session immediately-I am sure it cannot be the intention of Mr. Barton. I am sure that, in his mind, another session meant another ordinary session; but seeing that the object of the mover can be frustrated, surely some reasonable interval should be made. I think three months a reasonable time, and it is certainly little enough. The honorable member (Mr. O'Connor) seems to forget that although you can take a horse to the water you cannot make him drink. Therefore, the sending of a Bill up to the Senate does not make the Senate pass it.

Mr. O'Connor. -
That will give you all the more time.

Sir John Forrest. -
I know that it will, but, at the same time, I think some interval should elapse, because if it is proposed to have another session it does not mean a manufactured session for the purpose, but an ordinary session.

Mr. Kingston (South Australia). -
My right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) is a little in error as to what happened in South Australia. It was not any attempt to apply a provision of this sort. What happened was this: The Legislative Council threw out a Taxation Bill by carrying the motion that it be read this day six months. Under these circumstances it could not be re-offered for their consideration, and as it had been proved to the satisfaction of the majority of the members of that Chamber that they had made a mistake Parliament was prorogued, a new session was convened, the Bill was sent up again, the Council reversed their vote, and the Bill was carried. This has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. Deakin. -
It was done to oblige the Legislative Council.

Mr. Kingston. -
It was done to assist the Government and to oblige the Legislative Council; to enable them to correct their mistake at the earliest possible date. I am very glad to reflect that they took advantage of the opportunity which was offered. I would like to point out that if the proposal which is now suggested is adopted, we shall be whittling away this clause. As it left Sydney it provided that if the House of Representatives passed any proposed law, and the Senate rejected the same, or failed to pass it, or passed it with amendments to which the House of Representatives would not agree, the Governor-General could thereupon dissolve the House of Representatives. Nothing whatever was said there of a second session of Parliament. What is the proposal now? We have already agreed to alter the clause so as to require a second passing of the Bill in a second session; but, not content with that, it is suggested that a certain interval shall intervene. Where is this to end? I submit that the matter can be fairly left to the discretion of the Executive Council, and that there is not likely to be any abuse of power. As regards the instance cited by Sir John Forrest, if there had not been the opportunity to give the Legislative Council a chance to reconsider their vote and alter their determination the finances of the colony would have been thrown into the greatest disorder. So here, if you limit the clause in the way proposed, I think it will be a great inconvenience.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I very much regret that so fair and just a proposal as we are now dealing with, the double dissolution, in this case, should be granted with such difficulty and hesitation, and attempted by limitations to be rendered a most worthless.

Mr. BROWN. -

No.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is so, because if you introduce an artificial restriction which cannot be got rid of by the consent of both sides and all parties, you are putting into the Constitution something which may impede its working. Why cannot we trust the powers Ministerial and legislative to work this properly and fairly? I should like to put one consideration to Sir John Forrest and to Mr. Symon, who fear that the new session will be called on unduly quickly. What is the object of it? It is in order that the House of Representatives may again pass the Bill. Does either of my honorable friends think that the members of the House of Representatives are going to do anything unfair, anything improper, to hasten a matter which will end their own existence as a House—which will drive them to the country.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Neither House will ever go to the country.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That will be the result. They cannot send the Senate to the country without going there themselves, and with a Damocletian sword of that sort hanging over them, I think they will be in no hurry to cut the hair which suspends it.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

There is another point I would like to mention, and it is one which might happen at the very beginning of the Commonwealth. We have fixed in the Constitution the necessity to pass a Federal Tariff within two years after the establishment of the Commonwealth. The Parliament cannot very well begin work until, say, three months after the establishment of the Commonwealth. There may be a tremendous amount of trouble and difficulty, first in the Lower House to get the Bill carried through, and secondly in the Senate, and it might happen that at the close of all the difficulties connected with the Tariff it would be necessary to bring about a dissolution of both Houses in order to get a settlement at all. Now, this stipulation that there shall be an interval of six months between the sessions-

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Or three months.

Mr. REID. -
I understood it was six months.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Or a second session at all.

Mr. REID. -
I understand that Mr. Barton's amendment proposed that there should be a rejection in one session, and then that the Bill should have to go up again in a subsequent session. It might be that the question on which the two Houses were at difference might be one of the most vital consequence to the well-being of the Commonwealth, tending, perhaps, to a state of the utmost tension and confusion. Why should we make the Constitution so inflexible that in a time of supreme national interest, to get a matter settled, we should have to wait three months? I think we must trust the Parliament a little in matters of that sort. During the debates in both Houses the measure and its merits will come very prominently before the people of the Commonwealth, and there is not time stipulated in this provision which would compel the Upper House in the second session to dispose of the matter in a summary way. The Senate will have the matter, to a very large extent, in its own hands. There is no power which can prevent the Senate from fixing a reasonable time ahead, perhaps a month ahead, for the second reading of such a Bill, in order to secure itself against any danger of that sort, if it feels that there is any necessity for it. If the House of Representatives were to attempt to jockey the Senate, because it had not dealt with the Bill in six weeks or two months, such tactics could only recoil on the heads of those who used them; they could not benefit them in any way. I therefore, in view of the fact that if these troubles ever occur they may occur on a matter of supreme consequence to the people, feel that an unreasonable delay over it may produce incalculable injury to the public interest. It is better to leave this matter in the hands of the Parliament, especially for the reason I mention, that the Senate itself, on the second occasion, can give itself sufficient time before it allows the Bill to get into such a state that the Executive can exercise the power of dissolution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

It appears to me, on the argument of my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid), that there is not the slightest necessity for a second session at all.

Mr. REID. -

I will take that if you like.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

You might just as well provide that during the same session the matter can be reconsidered.

Mr. REID. -

Well, we will take it that way.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

No, you will not take it either way, because I object to both ways. My right honorable friend need not suppose that I was mentioning this for the purpose of agreeing with him. I was mentioning it for the purpose of showing what I consider an absolute danger.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You voted against this sub-section altogether. You wanted to make it nugatory.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Now, what has that to do with it? Will my honorable friend, who is an equity lawyer, and highly logical, leave me alone for a minute? If he will, I shall be much obliged to him.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Certainly, if you are afraid of being attacked by a logical man.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

There is no doubt that we are slowly frittering the thing away. We began frittering it away when my learned friend (Mr. Symon) proposed in New South Wales some way of curing dead-locks when there should not have been any way at all. "Dead-lock" is a word invented by the masses of the people to represent their determination to over-ride the legitimate exercise of the powers of the Constitution by those who are authorized to exercise them. We establish bodies with jurisdiction well defined, coordinate if you please, or not coordinate if you please; and we intend that both sides and the people shall agree before any measure can become law. When they do not agree, we say it is well that the measure should not become law, and because they do not agree somebody calls it a dead-lock. Who calls it a dead-lock?
Mr. TRENWITH. -
Only the people.
Mr. REID. -
The most dangerous element in society.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I agree with that, and probably no one knows better who they are than the right honorable gentleman who interjected.
Mr. REID. -
Quite right. I have found them here.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
And I, too, have found them here. I understood that they were found in considerable form during to-day, though I was not here at the time when the greatest development took place. A Constitution is intended to balance itself, and to be founded upon an agreement of the people and the states. Laws are not intended to be passed unless the people and the states agree. Agree by what means? By the throwing in of the clap-trap term "deadlock," and by the giving to one branch of the Legislature a distinct superiority over the other branch! That is what these dead-lock provisions mean in plain and simple English. However, we have said that we are going to make provision for dead-locks. I deeply regret that any proposal was ever made to tamper with this question.
Mr. TRENWITH. -
We have done with that now. Let us discuss what is before us.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I was very sorry for an interjection which was made when the honorable member was speaking, and perhaps if he will leave me alone I will discuss the question before us. I say that it will be a great pity if we make what is intended by the leader of the Convention to be a matter of substance—because we know that he would not propose anything which was not a matter of substance—merely a matter of form. From that point of view I hope that the amendment will be carried. If another session could be held next day, there would be no necessity for another session at all; the matter might just as well be considered again in the same session.
Mr. SYMON. -
The proposal is a perfect delusion.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
The thing is a perfect farce and a sham.
Mr. REID. -
The whole thing.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Yes, the whole thing.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
You are making it that.

Mr. REID. -
You made it so long ago.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I am afraid that we are frittering away the principle which should underlie the Constitution.

Mr. HOLDER. -
You are frittering away the value of this clause.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
In what way?

Mr. HOLDER. -
By supporting this amendment.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I do not understand the honorable member, and I should like to hear him explain himself. I have the greatest esteem for him, but I have the sincerest doubts as to his views upon certain aspects of the federal question. If you are going to put into the Constitution a provision to the effect that there shall be two sessions when one session may follow the other at an interval of a day, the provision is a delusion and a sham. What is it you want to do? What did we do in South Australia? That is where these ideas came from. I wish we had never had any provision of this kind there, because then we should never have heard of it in connexion with this Constitution. The idea was to afford an interval of time in which the popular mind, as expressed in the House of Assembly, would have an opportunity for reflection. There must be a certain interval between the two sessions, in which public clamour might cease, in which a more quieted condition of mind might ensue, and from which a calmer judgment might result.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
You were the Attorney-General in the Government that passed it in South Australia.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I am not complaining.

Mr. REID. -
You put them up to the dodge, probably.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Well, I am very sorry. I dare say my right honorable friend has many things in his career to regret.
Mr. REID. -
I have not to regret meeting you.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
And I have never regretted meeting my right honorable friend, but I have regretted many things that I have heard him say.

Mr. REID. -
I regret that I cannot return the compliment, because I have never heard you say anything.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Well, I am not going to be rude; I am going to be civil. As far as the precedent from which this is taken is concerned, the idea, good or bad, was, at all events, thoroughly intelligible—that you should interpose an interval during which public excitement might more or less cease, and a calmer judgment prevail.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
How did you provide for the interval in 1882?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Well, I am not going to be cross-examined by the Premier of South Australia just now.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
By your own colleague?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
I prefer dealing with the subject we are now discussing. We distinctly provided an interval, as the Premier of South Australia must admit.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Only a dissolution.

Mr. SYMON. -
That is better than an interval of three months.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
Yes; that is better than nothing. It may be insufficient, but at all events, it is something. But now it is provided that without dissolution, after both Houses have met—the House which represents the people and the House which represents the states—and have solemnly passed this constitutional decree, having performed the very functions for which they were created, which was to exercise independent judgments, although the results might end in disagreement, we are actually to destroy the authority of the Senate. How? By the very next day forcing them to meet again, and go through the same form, without any interval sufficient for the public excitement to be allayed. You pretend you are doing something when, of course, you know you are doing nothing. You call them together again next day to repeat their disagreement, without a single circumstance having intervened, either from lapse of time, the expression of public opinion, or anything else-to meet again, and straight off settle the question on which they disagreed the day before. And if they do not agree, you bring in what Mr. Holder wanted to bring about, which is the domination of Australia, and of the states of Australia, by a numerical majority.

Mr. REID. -

No, if they fix such a short interregnum, you can make up for it by taking longer to deal with the Bill a second time.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Yes, if you are treated that way, you have the power in your own hands.

Mr. REID. -

I do swear that the honorable member would take a long time.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I know that my right honorable friend, judging probably from the time I am taking now, thinks that in such a case I would take a long time, if I were in the Senate. I admit that his surmise is quite right in my case. I admit there are persons on whom this terrorism could not be practised, or on whom, if practised, it would probably not be effective. But I am thinking of persons of weaker minds and wills, and I say that, as far as this Constitution is concerned, it is absolutely necessary to put some provision in this Bill which will strengthen the Senate and prevent it being intimidated in the way indicated. We have been frittering away the first principles of the Federal Constitution long enough.

Mr. HOWE. -

There is nothing left.

Mr. REID. -

Nothing left? You are due for your old-age pension if you say that.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I must ask honorable members not to hold conversations across the table.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

There is something left.

Mr. HOWE. -

Very little.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

Oh, yes, there is a good deal left. I am not going to say there is very little left, even to please a friend whom I respect. At the same time, I do not want to see any more taken out. We have made a great cardinal departure from the first principles which ought to regulate federation. That is the principle of the co-ordinate power of the states and the people. We have established what we think a responsible Government, and we will have to wait to find out how it works out. A majority think they have made the Senate responsible entirely to the majority of the people. Now, not satisfied with having done what is a direct invasion of the principle on which federation can alone exist, they want to go still further, and to dwindle away the last remaining hope of the states—the hope of retaining some portion of their individuality. Frail as the amendment is to meet the necessities of the case, still it is something, and I shall vote for it.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I do not attach much importance to the insertion of the words "three months." The Senate may not be averse to the dissolution, but quite willing to accept the arbitrament of the people. In such case it would be a mutual convenience to join issue and consent to two sessions.

Mr. SYMON. -

Suppose they are not willing?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

I say it may be a mutual convenience to take two sessions with no very great interval between. On the other hand, if there be a wish for delay, there is all the necessary machinery to hand. The new session would have to be opened in due form, and, I suppose, there would be something in the way of an address in reply. We all know what that means if the members of the House wish for delay. The Bill would also have to go through all its stages.

Mr. SYMON. -

But see how unpopular such delay would make the members.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Not necessarily, if they were in the right. As I have said, I do not attach much importance to the insertion of the words, because I think the Senate, representing the people's rights, would not be unwilling to face their constituents, and would be likely to agree to the necessary steps. Later on I shall move to alter the six months to twelve months. In the meantime, I do not think this matter of the insertion of the words of importance, and I shall not vote for their inclusion.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I think there is a very simple way of looking at this question. Surely the Senate would not reject a Bill, unless there was an important reason for doing so. I can scarcely imagine the Senate rejecting a Bill which would put the finances into any difficulty—say, the usual Bill for the expenses of the country. But, if the Senate did reject a Bill in calm judgment, is it not a farce to think that under three months that judgment would be reversed? Surely it is only common sense that there should be a reasonable interval for consideration? After the large amount of rhetoric on this subject about delay, caution, and prudence, it seems ridiculous to talk about a delay of three months to give consideration to a great question.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

With great respect, I submit to those who are objecting to this provision that they are fighting a shadow. If they meant anything when they said there must be two sessions they meant that the House of Representatives should have some interval to reconsider its position. It is no use to say that the Senate can delay it. Delay is not what is required as the ultimate end of a dissolution, but agreement, if possible. It would be just as well to say that a measure should be twice considered in the same session, as that there should be two sessions without an interval. I think that one session should be sufficient, but if there is to be a second consideration it ought not to be possible for Parliament to be prorogued for a day, to meet again in a state of heat and temper, and to pass the Bill without discussion. That is not the object of providing two sessions, and I would submit to my honorable friends, who in the main agree with me, that this is not a point worth fighting about. It is admitted generally that the Executive will allow some reasonable time, probably not less than three months, but it is urged that there may be occasions when, if a Bill is not carried, thewhole of the finances of the Commonwealth will be thrown into confusion. That could only happen on the rejection of an Appropriation Bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Which would mean revolution?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Yes, and that is inconceivable. Delay in passing an important Taxation Bill might embarrass the Executive very materially, but it could not cause such embarrassment as would throw the whole of the finances of the country into confusion. If a Treasurer with a heavy deficit introduced a scheme of taxation, with a view to meeting that deficit, it might be extremely important to him that he should get the Bill passed, but if he did not he could go on for three months increasing the deficit. If the question of a second session were before us I should argue against it, but as provision has been made for it, it should be a second session such as we are accustomed to, with some reasonable interval. I would strongly urge on my honorable friends the desirability of conceding where we can concede. That is what I have always been urging on those who have been opposed to me, and I now make the appeal to those who agree with me. This is a point we can concede without any serious danger. There may sometimes be considerable inconvenience, but that will be all. I hope that the discussion of this matter will not occupy much more time, but that we shall say that we are prepared to make concessions wherever we can, in order that we may obtain reasonable concessions when we come to ask for them ourselves.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Do I understand that Mr. Symon wishes to amend his amendment by making the period specified three months instead of six?

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, sir.

The amendment was amended accordingly.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I do not think that the honorable member who spoke last has really appreciated the seriousness of this limitation. Now, we have dealt with two ways of settling these dead-locks. The first was the proposal of Mr. Symon himself; and the second is that which is now under consideration. I think it is very desirable that the method in both these proposals should be the same. Now, under Mr. Symon's proposal, there is no interval at all required; and if honorable members look at clause 56B they will find that Bill may be sent up, sent back, and, in the same session, sent up again, and upon that a dissolution of the House of Representatives may take place. Now, what is the reason why there should be a difference between the method of treating the measure under the second proposal and under the first proposal of Mr. Symon? If there is a good reason in the one case there is a good reason in the other, and it appears to me that it is very desirable that a uniform method of dealing with the matter should be adopted in both cases. There is also a second reason, and, I think, a strong one.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Is there not a delay between the two dissolutions?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

We are not discussing that point.

Mr. ISAACS. -

There is no specified delay.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The delay that would take place is not the delay of a dissolution, but the delay in the period of sending up the measure to the Senate the second time. Under Mr. Symon's first proposal there is no delay. The measure may be sent up a second time the same session. Why should there be a delay of three months in this case? What is the object of it? Surely the only object is that the country may be informed about the measure in all its details, and may learn the merits of the controversy on both sides.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

That is not the only object. It is that the House of Representatives may have time to consider all the arguments, and whether it will insist on sending back the Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Surely that is a very weak argument. If the House of Representatives, which has had a measure before it, and which must have known in a general way the nature of the measure as it passed through, surely when the measure comes before it a second time it will know its own mind with regard to it. What is more, it can take any time it likes in considering the measure.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Both Houses can.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Both Houses can take as much time as they like in dealing with it. A fair answer to Mr. Trenwith is, that both Houses have the matter in their own hands to take what time they consider fair.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And neither House will be unanimous.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Quite so. The Senate will have it in its own hands to deal with the matter within any time it thinks fit to take to deal with it.

Mr. SYMON. -

But it is for the House of Representatives to consider whether they will take the matter any further.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

They can take three months if they like, but you want to force them to take three months—that is the whole difference. Why force them to take three months with regard to a measure which, perhaps, as pointed out by Mr. Reid, may be a measure which it may be imperiously requisite for the good of the whole Commonwealth should be passed as soon as possible?

Mr. ISAACS. -

They would not unduly hasten the matter.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No doubt they would not. The only object of delay is that the country may be informed of the controversy and learn its true bearings; and surely that can be done in the interval which must take place before the Bill can be submitted to them. What are the steps which must take place? There is first of all the discussion in the House of Representatives, then the discussion in the Senate, then public interest must be occasioned through the matter being one of controversy between the two Houses; and the measure must be sent up again, and again discussed. What is the value of newspapers if during all that time the whole merits of the controversy from beginning to end are not placed fully before the public? But not only that.
The measure is rejected, and the G

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -
I fear I have not the courage to say all that I feel with regard to the blot which has just been put upon the Constitution.

Mr. REID. -
Is this in order?

The CHAIRMAN. -
The honorable member is not in order in reflecting on a decision of the committee.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I think I have a right to express an opinion that the clause before the committee will, if passed, be a blot upon the Constitution.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The honorable member is quite in order in doing that, because we have not yet passed the clause.

Mr. DOBSON. -
I am going to express my opinion upon the amendment of Mr. Barton. I wish to say that I do not approve of it, and that I intend to support the amendment of Mr. Symon. But I regret that Mr. Symon has consented to alter the term from six to three months, because I cannot understand a man who has had experience of legislation imagining that you can give due time for consideration in important matters in three months, and I am more than surprised to hear the arguments of Mr. O'Connor, who actually argues against three months.

Mr. HOLDER. -
You want to put a few more holes into the clause, so that it will not work.

Mr. DOBSON. -
There is not a single honorable member, except Sir John Downer, who has tried to point out how what we have done and what we are professing to do is going to work. Let me say how I think it will work out. In ordinary times legislation will go on, and members of both Houses will display patriotism, intelligence, and industry, and will appear to do what is right for the country. But in a time of excitement, when there is a battle, say, between capital and labour, or in connexion with some other social question, that will be the time when the Constitution will be tested. I submit that the committee by what it has done, and by what is before the Chair, are taking away the state rights for which we have been working for months. The committee has been depriving and robbing the states of equal representation in the Senate, and absolutely doing away with the safeguards of the bi-cameral system. Honorable members are putting into the hands of the Federal Executive such powers, such alternatives, and such engines for coercion as you will not find in any Constitution in the world. I think the language I have just uttered is not the language of exaggeration, but is the language of absolute fact. If it is not a fact, let any honorable member tell me of any Constitution in the world which gives to the Executive Government—to the Premier and his Ministers, who have the control of the public revenue and the financial policy of the country—the same power as we have given to them in this Constitution. Then, sir, when the time of popular clamour comes, and the members of the Federal Government want to retain their seats, by giving way to the popular clamour, which is simply history repeating itself, the way has been paved and made just as easy as it possibly can be. They have only to pass their Bill, it is then rejected by the Senate, the Parliament is prorogued, and another session is convened according to my friend's (Mr. Symon's) amendment within three months. It is little enough time I should think for all Australia to make up its mind. But "No," say my friend Mr. O'Connor and some other members—"Let the Government call a session the next day, let the session last but one hour, and enable them to pass their Bill, and then they have the states and the Senate at their mercy. The Bill comes back to the Senate, and if the Senate rejects it then there is this double dissolution."

Mr. Reid. -

But there will have been long debates in both Houses during the first session.

Mr. Dobson. -

Yes, and it has taken more than one long debate, as my right honorable friend knows to his advantage, to settle several questions in this Convention. The right honorable member knows that this Bill would have been utterly different if we had not had three or four long debates on different questions. I therefore say that the experience of this Convention—an experience under which the right honorable member has gained victory after victory—absolutely contradicts what we are engrafting in this Bill.

Mr. Reid. -

I should like to have them written down for me, so that I could brag about them.
Mr. DOBSON. -

Did not the right honorable member brag the other day when he got us to reverse our decision? Did he not say that he felt as if he had a crown of laurels on his brow?

Mr. REID. -

No; that is another kind.

Mr. DOBSON. -

If the right honorable member will only leave me alone, I will get on more quickly, and I have no desire to take up time.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

He cannot help it.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The second session may be called after a day's interval; it may only occupy a day; the Bill is sent to the Senate; and then the Senate is absolutely at the mercy of the Government of the day. I ask, then, what becomes of state rights? What becomes of the good of your two Chambers? Honorable members seem to forget the very foundation on which the two-Chamber system rests.

Mr. BARTON. -

Does not Mr. Symon's paragraph which was kept in contain the very evil you are now protesting against?

Mr. DOBSON. -

I do not think it does. The House of Representatives has to be dissolved, and after it has been dissolved and has come back with the mandate of the country, when the people have spoken out, when the question has been ventilated, and the people have been educated, as they must be at a general election, then the Senate, being elected by the same manhood suffrage, will, I presume, in 99 cases out of 100, bow to the will of the people. I pointed out this afternoon how I thought that the House of Representatives, which has all the privileges, which has the government in its hands, which has the control of all the finances in its hands, is the Chamber which ought to go to the people first, and it is quite time enough to talk of sending the Senate there when it has refused to pass the Bill which happens to be the mandate of the people. What I want to refer to is, if I may say so with all respect, the very simple argument of my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs). I can hardly understand how he can have attained to such simplicity when he has had an education of Victorian politics for almost a quarter of a century. He says, when it comes to the House of Representatives sending this Bill a second time on to the Senate, does anybody believe that they will be so foolish as to risk their seats or do anything which may send them back to their constituents? Why, sir, they will send the Bill on again to the Senate, knowing perfectly well that, as the senators have much more difficulty to get elected, have a much larger constituency to canvass, and have to go to twice as much expense to get elected as has a candidate for election to the Lower House, we shall never hear of a dissolution. I do not believe we shall ever hear of a dissolution, and that because no member of either House will care to risk his position, his comfortable seat, and charming club-house, and his £400 a year. You are appealing to the lower instincts of your future Australian politicians. You are absolutely depriving them of what would help them to be patriotic, and to consider the interests of their country, and you are inviting them to consider only their own interests. I do not believe that you will have the simultaneous dissolution once in twenty years. If we do not have the simultaneous dissolution, what will follow? The state rights will have gone; the two-Chamber system will have gone; we shall have deprived the people of the check of the Second Chamber. All that will be necessary will be to put certain machinery into motion, and after a delay of three months—according to the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor) the delay need not be as much as three minutes—a count of heads will settle the question. I protest most respectfully and humbly against the blot it is proposed to put upon the Constitution. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) showed me a Bill for the government of Ireland which he brought out with him from England. That Bill was framed under the direction of, and possibly by the hand of, the greatest liberal leader that the Anglo-Saxon world has ever seen—Mr. Gladstone—and it contains the provision that if the two Houses disagree an interval of three years must elapse, or the expiration of a quinquennial Parliament, whichever is the longer period, before there can be a dissolution of the two Houses. Mr. Gladstone thought that three years was not too long a time to allow for the education of the people and the politicians upon any important question.

Mr. REID. -

Perhaps three years were thought to be necessary for the education of the men of Kilkenny.

Mr. DOBSON. -

However honorable members may differ from me, I trust that I have advanced a few arguments to show that we are doing a dangerous thing, and I, on behalf of those who sent me here, offer my protests against the proposal.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

The amendment, as amended, was inserted in the clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

There is one formal amendment which I mentioned earlier in the day—the words which were in the clause originally. They were struck out because it was the intention of the Drafting Committee to propose the excision of the first paragraph. That paragraph is now restored, and it will, therefore, be necessary to restore the words I have mentioned in order to give clearness to the second paragraph. I beg to move—

That, after the word "Governor-General," the words "instead of dissolving the House of Representatives alone" be inserted.

In other words, this amendment will give the option, in clear language, of following either the first or the second paragraph.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Before these words are inserted, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the effect it will have in relation to the first paragraph as it now stands. If there is a successive dissolution of the two Houses there may be no cure of a deadlock, whereas if there is a simultaneous dissolution of the two Houses there can be a cure of a dead-lock.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But that does not affect this question. The honorable member is dealing with a later matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move that progress be reported.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

PROGRESS OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In reference to the course of business, I should like to say that, inasmuch as the discussion on the second recommittal has taken a longer time during the present week than was anticipated, I shall ask honorable members to sit up to at least eleven o'clock to-morrow night, and much later if necessary. I wish to see the business finished this week if practicable.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I should like, in the interest of public business, to implore honorable members who represent some of the smaller colonies not to make speeches which provoke sometimes more heated retorts than one, on cooler reflection, would indulge in.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I would ask the right honorable gentleman who has just spoken not to repeat the speech he made this afternoon.

The Convention adjourned at six minutes past ten o'clock p.m.
Thursday, 10th March, 1898.

Queensland and the Federation - Leave of Absence: Mr. Henry - Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at twenty-six minutes to eleven o'clock a.m.

QUEENSLAND AND THE FEDERATION.
The PRESIDENT. -
I deem it to be my duty to communicate to the Convention the fact that I yesterday received a telegram from representatives of various districts of Central Queensland, which I will lay on the table and ask the Clerk to read.

The CLERK read the telegram, as follows:-- Rockhampton, Queensland,
9th March, 1898.
To the Hon. the President of the Federal Convention.
We, the representatives of the people of Central Queensland in the Legislative Assembly, desire to place on record our conviction that the federation of the Australian colonies is absolutely essential for the safety and welfare of Australia. At the same time, we trust the Convention will make provision in the Constitution for the admission of Central and Northern Queensland as separate states of the Commonwealth immediately it is proclaimed, and irrespective altogether of whether or not Southern Queensland desires to join.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move that the document be printed.
The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
Honorable members will recollect that I stated some evenings ago, with reference to a proposed new clause relating to the Queen's prerogative regarding the division of Queensland, that I would communicate with the Premier of Queensland and ask him to favour me with the views of his Government on the clause. I sent such a telegram, setting out the clause at length, and asking for Sir Hugh Nelson's views upon it. I have now received the following reply:-
Home Secretary's Office,
Brisbane, 2nd March, 1898.
To the Hon. E. Barton, Federal Convention.

We are indebted to you for the feeling of consideration which prompted you to suggest withdrawal of Mr. Walker's proposed new clause in the Draft Federation Bill, until the views of this Government had been ascertained. We do not think the clause would tend to promote the cause of federation in this colony.

HUGH M. NELSON.

I beg to move that the document be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Mr. President, I had risen before you put the question.

The PRESIDENT. -

If the honorable member had risen before I put the question, he will be perfectly in order in speaking now, if he desires to do so.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

No, I will not say anything.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LEWIS (Tasmania) moved -

That seven days' leave of absence be granted to the Hon. J. Henry, on account of urgent private business.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Discussion (adjourned from the previous day) was resumed on paragraph (2) of clause 56B (Dead-lock provisions).

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I recognise from the debates which have taken place upon this clause that there is at last something like a recognition on the part of the Convention of the absolute necessity of providing some means of settling what are known as dead-locks. The question that we have now to determine seems to me to be what is the best and fairest way of achieving that object. We have adopted two modes—or rather one mode variously phrased, namely, the dissolution of the two Houses of Parliament—for effectuating our desire in that respect. There is also in the clause as carried at Sydney a provision for attaining finality, in the case of disputes between the two Houses, by what is called a joint sitting of both Houses. In the first place, the very fact that this provision for a joint sitting has been agreed to is a recognition of the truth of the position that the mere adoption of a dissolution, whether it be consecutive or simultaneous, is not sufficient. It will be easily demonstrated that the plan agreed to in Sydney, and that has now come up for consideration again—the joint sitting—is not only useless, but, if effective, is worse than useless as a means of deciding finally the affairs of this Commonwealth. During the elections for the Federal Convention in Victoria there was nothing that was more strongly insisted upon by my Ministerial colleagues and myself than this, that nothing in the shape of a joint meeting of the two Houses should be permitted. I may add that no objection was more cordially approved of than that. I think I shall be able to show to those who say that a dissolution in any shape will be an effectual remedy to prevent or to settle dead-locks that nothing can be further from the actual truth. When we come to consider what is to be the ultimate means of deciding the great affairs of the Commonwealth, we are led inevitably to the inquiry—What form shall the ultimate tribunal take?

Mr. DOBSON. -

There is only one form left—the referendum.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, in some shape. If I were to consult my own individual convenience and personal comfort I should not, in the face of the enormous opposition that has been manifested in the Convention, in some quarters especially, to the adoption of the referendum, address myself to the subject at all, or, if at all, at any length. I hope that in any event I shall not be accused when I have sat down of occupying too much time, but there is a duty that we owe not only to those who sent us here, but to the people of all Australia, and to the cause of federation itself: I am, therefore, impelled to ask the attention of the Convention while I state once more, as succinctly as I can, the reasons why the provisions in the Bill are not acceptable as a means of avoiding the disasters which would inevitably attend such dead-locks as would, not only probably, but almost certainly, arise in the working of this Constitution as at present framed, and why some other better mode should be adopted. I am not going to question the votes that have been already given, because that would not be in order. But what I am entitled to do, I apprehend, is, accepting the votes that have been given, to look at their consequences and consider their effects, and see how the Constitution will work with the clauses that we have already adopted. I cannot forget, sir, that on the floor of this chamber it was my duty, when in charge of the Adelaide Bill, to do all in my power to secure the acquiescence of the Legislative Assembly of Victoria in the principle of equal representation in the Senate. In that matter I was in a considerable amount of difficulty. After combating, much against my own personal convictions and my own personal desire that, if it could be avoided, federation should be obtained without equal representation, I was forced to ask the Legislative Assembly by a majority, though not a very great majority, to accept the position. In like manner, I asked the same body to assent to the dual referendum in preference to the national referendum, because I desired, while considering the principles of equal representation, not to do anything that could possibly be avoided to minimize that provision. I did that, as I say, although I felt that there might be strong, and there are strong, objections to the adoption as a final means of determination of the dual referendum. There are conceivable cases where it would not be final, but I was willing to accept that risk, because I believed the risk would be a minimum. I will give practical reasons and practical results that have been obtained in another country on this subject in support of that view. I was willing to accept the risk, and after considerable difficulty the Legislative Assembly agreed to my view. But I found that while I asked the Assembly, and through them the people of Victoria, to consider the principle of equal representation in the Senate, and not to insist on the national referendum, it was in the full belief, not shared by those who still oppose me, that we should succeed at last in obtaining some concession in return for the very great concession we had made in those two directions. I was warned that my hope was without foundation, but I clung to that hope. I clung to the hope in Sydney, and when Mr. Lyne first brought on his proposal for the national referendum, before the dual referendum was put to the vote, I and my colleagues voted against the national referendum, still in the hope that the smaller states would assist us in carrying the dual referendum. I found when the matter was examined that no one could say for an instant, or did say for an instant, that this would put the smaller states in a wrong position. It secured to them the full rights of equal representation from the beginning to the end of the Constitution. It gave into the hands of the people of the states full control of the power which had been accorded to them in the constitution of the Senate, and by no means allowed the larger populations of the other colonies to over-ride them at the hustings, any more than they did in the Houses of Parliament. But that was refused. That proposal was rejected, and then, when the national referendum proposal was brought on again, I was compelled to vote for it. While I am thoroughly satisfied that, if the dual referendum were adopted it would do all that is necessary, preserving the rights of the state beyond the possibility of question, it would allow the people to act by their own direct voice in the last resort, and say whether or not the acts or the refusal of their legislative agents to act should be sustained. I may be asked, and fairly asked, what I have, in point of fact, to sustain my opinion as to the practicability of the dual referendum. I have the fact that since 1874 the principle has existed in the Swiss Constitution. There, in case of difference on constitutional question, the matter is referred, or may be referred, to the people of the Federation and the people of the states, and the dispute decided by the dual referendum. In sections 18, 19, 20, and 21 of the Swiss Constitution can be found the provision to which I am referring. There is also a provision, which, of course, we do not seek to embody here, that if a certain number—50,000, I think—of the electors ask for a constitutional matter to be referred, it shall be referred to the people of the Federation and the people of the states.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Is there a dissolution of the Upper Chamber there?

Mr. ISAACS. -
No; I am now dealing with the question of whether allowing the vote to go to the people of the Commonwealth and the people of the states is effectual. I shall come to the question of dissolution in a moment. I now merely want to get rid of the argument that has been used, not by some of my honorable friends from the smaller states, but by some of my honorable friends who want the national referendum, and that alone, that the dual referendum is not sufficient.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
Have you considered the cost of the referendum as applied to Australia and as compared with the cost in

Mr. ISAACS. -
My honorable friend (Sir William Zeal) will see that that is utterly irrelevant to the point I am discussing.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
Oh, is it?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I shall come to an end much sooner if I am allowed to continue. In Switzerland, since 1874, there have been fifteen occasions on which constitutional questions have been referred to the people of the Federation and the people of the states. On every one of these occasions on some of which matters were rejected and on others were accepted—the people of the Federation were in accord with the states. There was not one single instance in which the majority of the states differed from the majority of the people.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The referendum was used to give expression to the jealousy of the federal body. All measures were rejected up to 1875.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

Of course that is irrelevant.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If measures were rejected, they were rejected by both the states, and the people. My friend (Mr. Glynn) is now talking of federal laws, whereas I am talking of constitutional questions. In relation to federal laws, the matter does not go to the people and to the states, but to the people only. That is because both Houses have agreed-and, both Houses having agreed, it is not a question of settling dead-locks, but a question of putting the matter to the sovereign people by way of veto, just its matters are now put to the Crown here by way of veto. There is no Crown in Switzerland, and therefore the negative referendum, to which my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) has referred, has no bearing on the question at all. I am now speaking only of constitutional matters, in which there is a dual referendum; and it cannot be too clearly borne in mind that in no instance since 1866 have the states and the population differed. I believe that the case in 1866 was on some question of weights and measures. Since then, for over 32 years, there has never been any difference between the states and the people. I take that to be the strongest evidence that, except in a minimum of instances, we shall have in the dual referendum a clear and absolute means of deciding disputes. As to the fairness of this dual referendum to the smaller states, I do not think anybody disputes that for an instant. But that has been rejected, and I am called upon to elect whether I am prepared to abandon the question of a referendum altogether, or whether I am prepared to ask for a national referendum. When the people of the small states, acknowledging the fairness of the proposal that was offered to them, still aid in rejecting it, they cannot blame me or any Victorian who says that the time has come when we must consider our own people. We have made a sacrifice in the nature of equal representation and in the nature of the dual referendum. These were offered time after time, like the Sibylline books, and the time has arrived when we must consider the mass of the people whom we represent—the amount of money they will contribute to the national exchequer, and their rights and liberties. Remember that while we have offered a scheme which does not allow the majority to over-ride the minority, we must be careful how we accept a scheme which, on the other hand, would allow the minority to override the majority. Holding the views I entertain, and considering the offers we have made, I do not find myself in a position, in loyalty to my opinions and my duty, to recede from the position of attempting to obtain some finality on those questions by means of the direct influence and interposition of the people themselves in cases of necessity. When I was asked to face this question as to the probability of dead-locks, what did I find? I am in absolute accord with my right honorable friend (Mr. Kingston) in what he said yesterday, that this Bill, and more especially the numerous alterations we have made, are replete with liability to controverted questions which are likely to lead to some form of dead-lock.

---

Mr. DOBSON. -

The leader does not think so.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is absolutely unnecessary to say that, in common with all the rest of the Convention, I entertain the most profound respect for the opinion of our honorable leader. And my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) knows that that is said with the most unfeigned sincerity. At the same time, this is a matter on which we are bound to act on our own opinion. We are bound not to yield on this overwhelming question to the opinion of any other man. Therefore, I am sure I shall be excused if, on this question, which I feel is near to the heart of those who will take an active part in determining this question finally in the colony of Victoria-I do not presume to speak for other colonies in dealing with this question here for the last time, I put before this Convention, with all the anxiety that I feel, the reasons why I urge them to accept the provisions for a referendum. They may disagree with me, but when they do, they will, I hope, see that I have not pressed this matter unduly upon them, and they will not think that I have pressed it upon them in a manner unworthy of its importance. Now, why do I think that the provision for dissolution is not sufficient? Let us consider what has already been done in the relations of the two Houses. First of all, it must be admitted that the resolutions of the Parliaments in some of the colonies-especially of New South Wales and Victoria-were that some provision for the referendum should be made, and in New South Wales an overwhelming vote was given that it should be by way of national referendum. If my memory serves me right, the dual referendum was agreed to in the Parliament of South Australia also. Here we have three popular bodies all asking for the double referendum.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That was before we had the simultaneous dissolution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think my honorable friend is right, but the question of a dissolution was before these Parliaments in every instance, and they considered that question. Having considered that question, they gave in their adhesion to the referendum.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I think it would be more correct to say that they gave in their adhesion to some provision for dead-locks.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; if the honorable member looks at the tabulated book of amendments on the table he will see that the referendum was the scheme proposed.

Mr. DOBSON. -

That is quite true, but it was for some one provision out of three.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Some final provision, and that is what we have to look to. I was proceeding to show what was done in these particulars; that, throughout the most populous colonies there has been a feeling that, if we followed the strict line of duty, both Houses would be national. In the other colonies it has been felt that the Constitution would be unacceptable in that form; and when the larger colonies yielded equal representation in the Senate I venture to say it was on the distinct understanding that, whilst one House was based on equal representation, the other House should be absolutely composed on the basis of national representation. Did the matter stop there? No. In the House of Representatives we went further. We went further than we did in 1891, and we conceded to the smaller states that they should not be overwhelmed even in that House—that Tasmania and Western Australia should not have even to put up with their fair share of representation in that House, but that they should have a minimum of five, and not four, as in the Bill of 1891. So that, instead of confining them to a proportionate share of representation in the House of Representatives, which would give them, roughly speaking, one-tenth of the voting power in that House, they were allowed to have approximately one-sixth of the voting power. So that they not only got equal representation in their own Chamber, but they got a larger proportion than was fair, according to the measure of the representation in the other Chamber. Surely that was thought to be enough. But no, another step was made; and now we have it in the Bill before us that the House of Representatives must never be constituted according to the needs of the population without increasing inordinately the members of the Senate. While the states as represented in the other House, while the states, regarded as units, remain states, the population, while eternally increasing, as we hope it will, is not to have the proper and reasonable number of representatives according to the needs of the population, except at the will of the Senate, that is, at the will of the smaller states, and except the Commonwealth joins in enlarging the Senate.
That was the other step taken. Now, in regard to the powers of the Houses, before I come to the result as shown in this clause. When we come to the powers of the Houses, we find that the Senate is protected in regard to all money matters in a way that no Upper Chamber in the world is protected.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is not an Upper Chamber.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not a House of Review?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is not an Upper Chamber.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is not a House of Revision—is that the argument? Is it not the House in which the sober second thought of the people is to receive consideration? Is it argued that it is simply for special interests? Of course, it is an Upper Chamber in many respects.

Mr. REID. -

I protest against these interruptions. They have often got me into trouble.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I call attention to the standing order, which is perhaps not sufficiently observed, that no honorable member shall interrupt any other honorable member while he is speaking. I will endeavour to see that that order is observed more strictly in future.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I recognise the desirability of adhering to that rule, but, as far as I am personally concerned, of course, I do not object to any interjection which may tend, as it often does, to elucidate the matter, and by drawing forth a reply, may save more than one speech afterwards. I was proceeding to show to the best of my ability the relations of these two Houses, and I am going to point out that the relations of these Houses are such that, while the Senate has conserved to it such powers of independence as no other Upper Chamber in the world possesses, the nature of the subjects which are to be dealt with by these two Houses are more likely to lead to questions of dispute, and to protract the dispute, than in any unitary state. Take the one question, for the sake of argument, of taxation of the Commonwealth and the division of the surplus. They are really two questions, although properly speaking they depend upon one consideration. When we come, in the House of Representatives, to put forward a proposal to raise a certain amount of money, shall we not have it urged that some of the states require, as it was termed by one of their representatives, financial aid? And when the surplus comes to be distributed, as it will, no doubt according to what the Federal Parliament thinks just and fair, shall we not have controversies of the most dangerous nature as to the amount that each state is to get? As the Constitution at present stands, there is no guarantee that any state shall get back a sufficient amount to pay its liabilities; and no one can help foreseeing that there will be struggles of a very bitter nature as to the division of the surplus. When we consider that these matters, which may be regarded as state rights, state claims you may call them-but they will be called state rights, because it will be said that the Commonwealth does not dare to allow any state to sink into insolvency—we shall have either the larger states compelled to wait for an improper and dangerous length of time to get the amount of money that is necessary for their state purposes, or they will be forced by the means of resistance confided to the powers of the Senate to yield to demands which they may think utterly unwarranted by justice. There are other matters which are patent upon the face of this Bill which will lead, without any difficulty of conjecture, to struggles of the same nature. And when we consider these things we are forced to ask ourselves of what effect will the dissolution be? Just imagine a case that may arise within the third year of the Federation, and perhaps earlier? After uniform duties have been established this contest, this scramble, for the surplus will commence. It will commence, in the first place, when the Tariff is proposed, and when the amount of money to be raised to carry on the Commonwealth and return money to the states is under consideration. It will also continue when the question of the surplus is introduced, and the question arises as to how it is to be distributed. Then we shall find in the Senate the members for each state standing up solidly, as a phalanx, for their state rights; and when the proposals are considered by the Parliament, and they have passed the House of Representatives and gone into the Senate, is it not a very probable state of things that we shall have three states together, or a majority at all events, refusing to accede to the provisions of the Bill as sent up by the House of Representatives? If it is urged by the senators of the smaller states that the safety of their colonies depends upon their sturdiness in maintaining their position, we shall have this deadlock, and then there is to be a dissolution. Now, let us see how the dissolution operates. The senators from the smaller states—we will say, for the sake of argument, from Tasmania, and I am not to be understood as making any reflection, because I am only putting it as a concrete case-go back to their colony, and the people there are asked - "Do you agree with our action in insisting upon this amount of money being given to Tasmania?" What will the people of Tasmania say? They will say, probably - "Oh, yes, we agree with you;" or they will say - "We are not quite sure whether we agree with you or not; we recognise that you have stood up for us, and we will not be so politically ungrateful as to reject you in favour of some other men who wish to accede to the desires of the larger colonies." Indeed, we know that personal considerations, apart from the particular matter in question, may come forward, even if the people think there is an element of injustice in the stand taken by their representatives in that regard, and, yielding to that feeling of justice, they will never charge themselves with such ingratitude as to reject the men who stood forward as their champions. So the members of the Senate will come back after its dissolution on these questions, which are most fruitful of prolonged and difficult controversy, not with their judgments open. The senators will not then be able to yield, as they might before have yielded. They will come back with an imperative mandate to stand to the last, and to resist the claims of the House of Representatives. And then where is the finality of the matter? We may be told—"Oh, but the fear of the senators going to the country will be enough to make them yield." Now, I say that is an improper argument, because it assumes that either the Senate have asked for something they thought unjust, or that they will yield to something they think unjust—that they will surrender the rights of their state, not for the sake of compromise, not for the sake of peace, but for the sake of preserving their own seats and their own pay. I therefore say that so far from the dissolution clearing away that ground it will harden the matter, it will make the struggle more obstinate; it will land us, so to speak, in a political cul de sac, unless we adopt some further means of terminating the dispute. And what are the means of terminating the dispute suggested in this clause? That the two Houses shall meet together? Now, I seriously invite the attention of my honorable friends to this proposal that the two Houses shall meet together, and I would seriously ask them how that can possibly be accepted? What does it mean? It means that while you have equal representation in the Senate, that while you have an undue proportion of representation for the smaller states in the House of Representatives, that while you have a ratio of one to two, as between the two Houses, so that population does not get its fair number of representatives in the National House, you are then to go one step further, and, while you have already refused to allow the National House to be based upon representation of population purely, and you have acceded to the position of equal representation in the other House, you are then to take this further step, and a fatal step it seems to me, of introducing the principle of equal representation within the four walls of the House of Representatives, when you have united the two Houses in that Chamber. Now, I would seriously ask this plain question of some of those honorable gentlemen who have suggested that we wish to be governed by one Chamber; that we wish to introduce the uni-cameral system. Who is it that favours that uni-cameral system? Those who want to maintain the two Houses separate, and allow the people, and the people only, to judge between them, or those who say that, in the last resort, there shall be only one House; that the two Houses shall be united, that there shall be no longer two Houses to decide the dispute, but, in the last resort, one House only, and one House which has to decide the question, not by a majority, but by a three-fifths majority? Let us see what that means in plain figures. It means that if there are five colonies in the Federation, Victoria will have 24 members in the House of Representatives and six in the Senate, making 30, or one member for every 40,000 inhabitants. Tasmania and Western Australia will have five members in the House of Representatives and six in the Senate, or eleven for a population of between 160,000 and 170,000 each, or one member for about 15,000 inhabitants. That is to say, in the final arbitrament of every legislative dispute between the two Houses of the Federal Parliament, including money matters, the question is to be decided in one Chamber, in which representation of the larger states is to be, even if you went by a vote of the majority, one member for every 40,000 inhabitants, while the smaller states are to be represented by one member for every 15,000 inhabitants.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Is that a fair way of looking at it?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am going to follow the ruling of the Chairman, and decline to depart from the path of my argument; but let us go a step further. The question in dispute between the two Houses of the Federal Parliament is not even to be decided by a majority of the members of the two Houses sitting together, but by a three-fifths majority, and that, roughly speaking, will mean that, in the final determination of the dispute, Tasmania and Western Australia will each have one member per 15,000 inhabitants, while Victoria will have one member for about 60,000 or 70,000 inhabitants. Well, is that a state of things that we can regard as tolerable? And not only that; it means also the over-riding of all our struggles, and the result of all our struggles, in regard to the money powers of the two Houses respectively. I know no more anxious moment in the whole history of this Convention than that at which we resolved that the Senate should not have the power of amendment in Money Bills, and that it should have the power of suggestion. What will be the result if these two Houses meet together?
We know there is a bitter feeling even against that power of suggestion—at any rate, there is in Victoria; and there was a strong vote against it. But what will be the result? The Senate will say—"We can disregard that power of suggestion; we can reject the Bill; we need not go into details upon it, we will simply reject it; we will not trouble to send down suggestions to the House of Representatives, which that House may regard or refuse to regard as it pleases; we will not trouble ourselves to offer reasons; we know perfectly well that we shall be supported in our states if we are sent to them, and when we come back we will meet the members of the House of Representatives in the one Chamber with our terrific undue power of representation, and we then can finally decide whether the Bill in dispute shall or shall not pass." It will not be the Senate that takes that responsibility. It is departing from the principle of giving them the power of suggestion instead of the power of amendment; because that alteration was made so that the Senate, while retaining the powers of delay and revision, could at last assume the responsibility of finally accepting or rejecting a Money Bill. But this clause does not carry out that intention. This provision throws the responsibility—where? Not on the House of Representatives solely; not on the Senate solely; but on this new one Chamber—this uni-cameral institution which has been created by this clause to decide finally, not only ordinary subjects of legislation, but money matters as well. And although we may be able to do that, there is no power of amendment—as the clause stands, there would be power of amendment; but I do not think that was the intention with regard to money matters. But even if there is no power of amendment in that uni-cameral body, still it provides that the senators come in, deliberate, and vote on exactly the same footing as the members of the House of Representatives. That is to say, in a final determination of questions affecting the public purse, the small states have an advantage which was never contemplated when we were discussing the Constitution. Therefore, it seems to me impossible to accede to that, and one is almost tempted to add to the reasons which present themselves, from a consideration of this proposal, the recollection of the Scriptural denunciation—"Woe unto them that join house to house."

Mr. WALKER. -

What about terraces?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

That is unification.

Mr. FRASER. -

We have never heard that quotation before.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Order. Honorable members must not interrupt the speaker.
Mr. FRASER. -
But we want to know where he got that quotation from?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I have no doubt that, any allusion to Scripture would be news to some of my honorable friends, but still that allusion seems to me to be applicable all the same, and I do earnestly urge upon my honorable friends that this proposal for the joint meeting of the two Houses, under any conditions, under any circumstances, is a matter that is beyond acceptance, in my humble opinion, by the people of the larger states—certainly by the people of Victoria. Now, sir, if the referendum is refused in this Bill we shall be met by the proposition I reverted to in passing a few minutes ago, by some of my honorable friends, that dead-locks are a matter of antiquarian [P.2180] research. I think that is the favorite position taken up by my honorable friend (Mr. Wise). He has used it in various forms. Yesterday he spoke of the ghost of departed Victorian controversy; but, sir, that Victorian controversy lives in the memories of the people of Victoria, and it is a fact that if there is no such controversy in later years it is because the people of Victoria have demonstrated that they will tolerate no obstruction to their way when effectively expressed at the ballot-box. And when my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) said yesterday that we should adhere to the British Constitution, and adhere to the working of the two Houses as we find them in Great Britain, I could not help asking whether he was willing to accept the result of the general election which is decisive in England, but which he would not concede would be decisive in this Federation. I have never asked that the dissolution of the House of Representatives should finally determine the question. Honorable members know that I have stood as long as I could to the proposals which gave to the states their full measure of protection right through, and that it is only when I have been driven by the combination of votes of those who think that a national referendum is the sole means acceptable of settling these matters, and those who fear the referendum in any shape or form, although they admit it is fair to the smaller states—it is only when I am driven from that position that I am forced to take up this stand. That is a not a matter to be lightly disposed of. We know that that great constitutional writer and statesman, Earl Grey, in his work on Colonial Policy, recognised the difficulty that we are seeking to bring so prominently under the notice of this Convention, and he states there most distinctly that the result of his consideration of the matter was that he was driven to almost admit that one Chamber was the proper means of dealing with the legislative concerns in countries where you could not construct the Second Chamber in such a manner as to make it yield to the express will of the people. No one here suggests one Chamber, and all my efforts have been to maintain the two Chambers in their integrity. What I am now fighting against is the destruction of the powers of the House of Representatives by means of the decisive veto of the Senate. We have been told yesterday also that we should be satisfied, because a great advance has been made on the Bill of 1891. The Bill of 1891 is not the test of the question at all. The Bill of 1891 was framed by men of great ability and experience, but who were not elected by the people directly, and with some notable exceptions, whom we find in this Chamber, I am proud to say, the gentlemen there were not in accord (may I say it with all deference and respect?) with the public opinion of the larger colonies, at all events, even in 1891.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The Bill of 1891 is a very good foundation, though.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Well, but I am saying that it must not be taken as a standard. Those who framed the Bill of 1891 were themselves appointed by the Legislaturess, and naturally they had a strong penchant for following the same principle in the construction of the Senate. And they took, in that respect, the American Constitution as their guide. Now, we know perfectly well that even in 1891 that would not have been tolerated in Victoria, and, I believe, not in New South Wales either. When the Bill was brought up in the Parliament of Victoria, reference to our debates will show that that would not have been tolerated even at that date. We are told that we should be satisfied, because we have made a great advance upon that time. Why, what was the basis of the Constitution in 1891? I say again, it slavishly followed, in that regard as in others, the American Constitution—a Constitution framed not on the an argument which, if it had any substance in it, would be an argument to destroy equal representation in the Senate altogether. I think it only right to bring under the notice of this Convention formally a view that is taken in England on this very Bill in this very respect. A most able article appeared in the Spectator of the 25th of September, 1897, at the very moment, I think, when our proceedings had come to an end in Sydney. There appeared then, on the authority, no doubt, of the telegraphic accounts of our proceedings, the most able article I allude to, that has been mentioned in the Age newspaper a very little time ago. From that article in the Spectator I will read half-a-dozen lines, because they bear so strongly on this question, and because they give us the view of an impartial writer, and one who is removed from our controversies as between larger and smaller states—a writer who cannot be suspected of having the slightest interest in the matter as between the various colonies. After dealing with the position of the relations of the Houses, the writer says—

Obviously, therefore, it is quite conceivable that if questions arose in which the interests, real or supposed, of the more and the less populous colonies diverge, the two Houses would come into direct conflict. Not less plainly it would be of great consequence to the Australian Commonwealth that such dead-locks should be determined as speedily as may be, and also in a sense which would commend itself, as far as may be, to the general approval of the great body of the colonists.

I omit a few lines, because they merely give credit to the Convention for endeavouring to meet this matter in a fair way, and they point out that we did not take the step that was taken in America, where the small states threatened to call in military aid, and where the large states threatened to use military force. Those were the circumstances under which the American Constitution was adopted. Then the writer proceeds—

We should have been glad if the representatives of the smaller states had seen their way to allow questions dividing the two Houses to be made the subject of a simple referendum. Such a sacrifice on their part might, we think, have accelerated the development of that sentiment of common Australian citizenship which is so desirable.

[3506]

Mr. WISE. - Who is the writer?

Mr. ISAACS. - It is a leading article. Now, there is an opinion written thousands of miles away, not under the influence of our discussions, the writer not weighed down by partiality one way or the other—a most masterly article, the main subject of which is the relations of the Houses; and when the writer, deals with that subject in that able fashion—which will be evident from the mere perusal of the article—he gives his opinion as to what is right and what is fair. Therefore it seems to me that the methods proposed so far are inadequate. Inadequate to do what? Inadequate to solve the one constitutional question which always presents itself in these troubles, and that is to make the national law accord with the national will. The dissolution of the Senate will never effectuate that. Then, when we come to the question of the referendum, I am told that the objections to it are mainly that it will destroy, first, representative government.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You speak of the national referendum now?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I am speaking of either kind of referendum.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
There is a great difference.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Of course there is a difference. The only difference is that the national referendum provides that the will of the majority of the whole people shall govern in the final result, and the dual referendum provides, that the majority of the people of the Commonwealth shall not be overridden by a majority of the states, but that it cannot override a majority of states.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
But your argument refers to the national referendum, I think.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The argument I am going to deal with refers to both, because it is said equally of both of them that the reference to the people directly destroys representative government, and, therefore, I think I am fair in saying that this objection, which I propose to deal with as shortly as possible, applies, if it applies at all, to both of them equally. Now let me clear away one or two little subjects, as it seems to me, of mystification. We have heard it clearly stated that the referendum will be destructive of representative government and of responsible government. Let me, once for all, distinguish between those two matters. Representative government is possible without responsible government. In America they have representative government, but they have no responsible government.
Therefore, we must distinguish very clearly between these two things. If we want to preserve representative government, as I think we must, we shall have to ask ourselves, first of all, what it is. Responsible government means, as I understand it, the responsibility of the leaders of political life, the Ministers of the Crown, to one House of Parliament. Representative government means that the people, in providing their legislation and supervising their administration, do so through their representatives. It is of the utmost importance that we should not confuse these two matters. If we ask ourselves are we to preserve responsible government, then I say we must not have the meeting of the two Houses, because a Ministry that brings forward a proposal, and has a majority in the House of Representatives, and yet has to face the possibility of defeat, not by its own House, but by the joint operation of the two Houses, or by this new creation in the world of politics—this uni-cameral combination—will find itself responsible to what?—not to the House of Representatives, not to the Senate, but to this joint sitting. And I can conceive no more fatal blow at what we understand to be responsible government than an application of this provision to the two Houses sitting together. Therefore, this newfangled notion directs a most serious blow at responsible government, as well as possessing the defects and disadvantages I have already pointed out. Let us see as to representative government. Is representative government the be-all and end-all of our Constitution? It is a matter of common knowledge—I have referred to it very often, and I have never heard it challenged—that representative government, as we have it now, is, comparatively speaking, a thing of yesterday, because until 1832 there was no representative government in the sense in which we possess it now in England. The House of Lords and the House of Commons, as Bagehot points out, with unanswerable truth, consisted of the same people. The gentry of England, titled and untitled, and a few governing families, returned an absolute majority of the House of Commons. They did not represent the people; and it was only after that memorable struggle when the House of Commons assumed its new character, when the Constitution of England underwent an undoubted revolution, not only a reform but a revolution, that we first had the introduction of real representative government. That has been made still more clear by the broadening of the franchise down to the present time, and it is only by the broadening of the franchise that you get this representative government, with one essential consideration, which I will point out directly. Therefore this representative government, which has brought in its train responsible government, and which has brought also as a necessary consequence with it, and a necessary attendant, the supremacy of the people in its present form is a matter not possessing even the sanctity of antiquity. And are we to assume that representative government in its present form is to continue for ever, and to continue unchanged? I am one of those who believe that we shall always have representative government, and I believe that we shall always have responsible government in British communities. I believe that they ought to be maintained to the last, and I wish to declare here, once for all, that I shall never be a party to changing the bi-cameral system to the uni-cameral system, or to destroy representative institutions or responsible government. But, sir, there is a strong and a growing feeling that representative government is becoming inadequate by itself to fulfil the duties that are imposed upon it, and when I suggest and support the proposal for a referendum, it is not with the design of supplanting representative government-far from it; but it is with this object: That while allowing representative government in the form of the two Houses to proceed unmolested, even by a direct vote of the people in any shape or form so long as they carry out the work of the people without hitch, without prolonged obstruction, then I say, when that prolonged obstruction takes place, that is to say, at the crucial point where representative government fails, where it breaks down, it is time that the people should be called in to manage their own affairs, which their agents admittedly are unable to manage for them. This is no new notion. It is not confined to Victoria. May I quote the words of a man whose name will be accepted as that of a master in political science? What does Goldwin Smith say?—

Parliaments are losing much of their importance, because the real deliberation is being transferred from them to the press and the general organs of discussion, by which the great questions are virtually decided, parliamentary speeches being little more than reproductions of arguments already used outside the House, and parliamentary divisions little more than registrations of public opinion. It is not easy to see how far, with the spread of public education, this process may go, or what value the parliamentary debate and division list will in the end retain. If monarchy, is primeval, Parliaments are the offspring of the Middle Ages, and for them, too, sand in the hour glass of history runs.

Is that a tendency to be resisted or encouraged?

Mr. Isaacs. -

Any tendency that the people have manifested in the direction of liberty and self-government ought to be encouraged. Parliaments are nothing but machinery, and I wholly dissent from the position taken up last night by some honorable gentlemen, who said that the dead-lock is only an invention by the masses of the people to prevent themselves from exercising their constitutional functions that were intrusted to them. Is not that putting the axe above its master? Is not that placing the created above the creator? Is not that saying that the people whose lives, whose liberties, whose moneys are being dealt with are not the judges themselves, but that they are to be eternally the governed, not the self-governed. Therefore, I say that while we, from the necessities of the case, must preserve, and ought to preserve, representative institutions and parliamentary government, yet we ought not to be blind to this: That with the growth of population, with the expansion of social and commercial and industrial necessities representative government does not always carry out the duties which it is called upon to fulfil. And that is just the juncture where we should provide some means of allowing the action of the State to proceed in a healthy fashion. I may be told that I am all wrong.

Mr. DOBSON. -
Certainly.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I am bound to be told that I am all wrong, and, therefore, if I err, I want to show that I err in most excellent company; and I will call from the camp of my adversaries a witness whose judgment they will not question, and whose veracity they will not deny—a conservative, but a conservative who is not blind to the inevitable tendencies and necessities of the time. I will read a very few lines which I have extracted from Mr. Lecky's work, volume 1, page 240.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
A liberal unionist.

Mr. ISAACS. -
The work was issued in 1896, and therefore embodies, I should may, the latest phase of thought on the subject. I think that this passage answers nearly every objection that has been raised, or, as I conceive, can be raised to the fairness of the referendum:

If the electorate is to judge policies, it is surely less likely to err if it judges them on a clear and distinct issue. In such a case it is most likely to act independently, and not at the dictation of wire-pullers. It is to be remembered, too, that the referendum is not intended as a substitute for representative government. All the advantages of parliamentary debate would still remain. Policies would not be thrown before the electorate in a crude undigested undeveloped state. All measures would still pass through Parliament, and the great majority would be finally decided by Parliament. It would only be in a few cases, after a measure had been thoroughly discussed in all its bearings, after the two Houses had given their judgment, that the nation would be called to adjudicate. The referendum would be an appeal from a party majority, probably made up of discordant groups, to the genuine opinion of the country. It would be an appeal on a question which had been thoroughly examined, and on which the nation had every means of arriving at a conclusion. It would be a clear and decisive verdict on a matter on which the two branches of the Legislature had differed.

Let me come to another writer in 1897. Professor Sidgwick, in the second issue of his work, at page 559, having already spoken about the inadvisability in his opinion of direct legislation in ordinary cases, with which I need hardly say I most thoroughly agree, says-

There are, however, special cases in which the direct intervention of the people in legislation appears to me on the whole advantageous. The first case arises when in a Legislature constructed on the two-Chamber system, it is important to avoid a dead-lock resulting in a disagreement between the two Houses, that is, when the urgency of the need of some legislation on a particular point is generally recognised, but the Chambers cannot agree on the form that the legislation is to take. Under these conditions, a reference to the citizens at large has many advantages as a method of terminating a disagreement. The dignity of the other Chamber is saved if it has to yield to the people and not to the rival Chamber, while by the reference of a particular measure to the judgment of the citizens a more clear expression of the people's will is obtained than a general election of representatives can give. Again, the process is more educating, since a single definite issue is placed before the country. It also avoids the danger involved in the representative system that an interested or a fanatical minority of citizens may, by concentrating the whole voting power at a general election on a particular question, obtain a fictitious majority of representatives pledged to support this demand.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Both these quotations refer to real dead-locks, not to disagreements.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Order.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I do not know the difference between real dead-locks and disagreements, and if the honorable member can give me a definition it will help us to consider the matter.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is a very serious difference.

Mr. REID. -

I would not like to put it to an Irishman.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member must not interrupt.
Mr. ISAACS. -

I shall make only one more quotation upon this subject, and it is from Cree's work upon direct legislation. The writer says, at page 16:-

Direct popular legislation, under proper modes and forms, is at once democratic and conservative. It accords with the tendencies and spirit of the time; it will, we think, prove to be a calming and conservative institution. It will remedy some serious imperfections of our present system of law-making, and some evils of our political life. It will abate the rigour of our party system, break the crushing and stifling power of our great party machines, and give freer play to the political ideas, aspirations, opinions, and feelings of the people. It will tend to relieve us from the dominance of partisan passions, and have an elevating and educative influence upon the voters, by inducing them to consider measures on their merits as schemes of public policy instead of as mere party proposals. Public spirit will thus be cultivated, and intellectual exertion stimulated among the masses.

Writing, as he does, in 1892 he points out that had there been some such means in the American Constitution of consulting the will of the people the American conflict would in all probability have been averted. He goes much further than we desire to go, and further than we would go. He thinks that provision ought to be made for direct legislation in most cases. I adhere to the opinion I previously expressed, that the British Constitution is the best, but it is whatever Parliament chooses to make it at any particular moment, and the action of Parliament is decided by the will of the people. But here we say, in a cast-iron fashion, that there never shall be this outlet for public opinion. We say that decisions shall be arrived at only in a certain fashion, and that, if they cannot be arrived at in that fashion, the matters in dispute shall be left undecided. I think that this is utterly wrong. It is a mistake to put a block in the path of political progress. If we are told that, by doing what I venture to advocate, we shall sink the dignity of Parliament and destroy responsible government, this is my answer: If we were to adopt the proposal that the matter should be referred, as in some of the American states, and as in Switzerland in the case of federal laws, to the veto of the people after the two Houses of Parliament are agreed, the objection might be made that we were, to a large extent, destroying parliamentary responsibility. Mr. Lawrence Lowell, in a recent work upon Government and parties in the states of Europe, says that that argument is not justifiable, even in the case of Switzerland, because what takes place there does not impair the efficiency of parliamentary action and responsibility. But we do not bring forward any such provisions as they have in Switzerland. We say that each House, and every member of each House, shall take the full share of responsibility for his action in supporting or repelling a measure, and that, when the two Houses agree, there is no need for the referendum. I would refuse to allow Members of Parliament to decline their responsibility by the adoption of the referendum in this way. Therefore, the objection which has been raised to the provisions in force in Switzerland in regard to federal laws do not apply to our proposal at all.

What I say is that, when both Houses have taken their full share of responsibility, when they have agreed that a matter is in dispute, and that it is the only thing that they have agreed upon—when one House maintains that the people earnestly and urgently desire the passing of a political measure, and the other House just as earnestly and as strenuously maintains that the people do not desire its passing; then I say, let the people decide. I think there is one argument, and one only—it is a short one—with which my opponents may be credited. It is that this is a most democratic Constitution because the suffrage provided for is manhood suffrage. That, as I intimated a little earlier, is in my opinion an essential provision, but it is by no means a sufficient provision. What is the use of manhood suffrage, if you so divide the constituencies that the minority may overpower the majority without recourse to the direct opinions of those who form the minority? When one of the Reform Bills—I think the Bill of 1867—was under consideration in England, Mr. John Bright, writing to one of his friends in Manchester, used words which, I think, ought to be borne in mind and written in the largest possible characters, in reply to the argument that this is a most democratic Constitution, because it provides manhood suffrage. Mr. Bright said, in effect, that disputes had arisen as to the extent of the suffrage, and as to whether it should be pure manhood suffrage or something short of that. But he continues—

I consider these differences of opinion upon the subject as of trifling importance when compared with the question of the distribution of seats and members. This is the vital point in the coming Bill, and unless it be well watched you may get any amount of suffrage, and yet find, after all, that you have lost the substance and are playing merely with the shadow of popular representation.

If his views are right, that is a complete answer to the argument that we ought to be satisfied that this is a democratic Constitution because it contains manhood suffrage. But, I say, if we so divide the representation as to give to Victoria in the final arbitration of disputes one member for every 60,000 or 70,000 of the population, and to Tasmania and Western Australia one member for every 15,000, we shall not have popular representation; we shall lose that measure of popular representation which we have bargained and fought for in regard to the House of Representatives. I entertained strong hopes that when this session began we should, at least, frame a Constitution that we could take back to our constituents, and not only honestly, but earnestly and vigorously, recommend for their acceptance. I clung to that opinion tenaciously for a long time, and I hope that in the end it will not be falsified, and that my hope will not be frustrated. I share the expressed opinion of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid in this regard, that we ought to have a Constitution that we can take to the people, and press upon them as a boon and a blessing. We know, as the right honorable member (Sir John Forrest) reminded us yesterday, that the material interests of the colonies guide them in a large measure.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No doubt about that in your case.

Mr. ISAACS. -
When we consider that Victoria will have to bear an enormous share of the burden of this federation-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
She will have all the profit, too.

Mr. ISAACS. -
When we consider that, we must make some allowance for the political views of the people who have to vote upon this Bill. I hope that that will be remembered at the last, but I fear that if the Constitution is maintained in its present form the people to whom we have to take the measure will turn to us and will say-"We have heard many protestations of your desire to trust the people. We have heard you say time after time that the will of the people must govern."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
We have heard of that.

[P.2187] starts here

The CHAIRMAN. -
I would call the attention of the honorable member to Standing Order 146, which says that-

No member shall interrupt another member whilst speaking, unless (1) to request that his words be taken down; (2) to call attention to a point of order; or (3) to call attention to the want of a quorum.

That standing order has not been observed during the course of the debate, but my attention has been particularly called to it by the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, who requests that all interruptions of debate should be prevented.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I would submit, sir, that we are entitled to proclaim our approval of, or admiration for, speakers remarks, by interjecting "Hear, hear."

Mr. ISAACS. -

I was ventilating the opinion that we shall be asked when the Bill is placed in the hands of the people, and they turn its pages-"Where is this trust in us that we have heard proclaimed so loudly and so long; where are the provisions putting confidence in our capacity, our honesty, our ability to judge for ourselves in regard to matters that concern us? Where do we find the embodiment of this great principle of political progress that the people, who have to sustain the whole burden of government, who must obey the laws which are made, should have control in the making of them?" I take it that it is not sufficient that we should say to them-"You are free to select your governors, you are free to select those who are to rule you, you are capable of judging of policies and questions, and to elect those who are to rule your destinies; but you are not to be allowed, when your business comes to a standstill, when the machine of government-which has been constructed with so much care, and which works with so match expense and so much elaboration-breaks down, to step in and put an end to any disagreement between the two Houses of the Legislature." We practically say to the people-"You are, to see these two Houses, which are your agents, the members of which you pay, checking and obstructing each other, but you are to, have no voice in saying which of them is right, and which of them is wrong at any particular juncture." If we want to be true to our professions, if we wish not to falsify the hopes formed of us, and the opinions that we have expressed ourselves, we shall not hesitate to adopt a provision for a direct appeal to the people in case of necessity at that point where representative government has failed to justify the expectations of the people, and to carry out the plain duty and purposes for which it has been created.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I do, not think that any one can find fault with the Hon. Mr. Isaacs for introducing this subject, or with the tone of the speech in which he has given expression to his views. Although my honorable friend recognised that he was really in this committee championing a cause foredoomed to failure, he stated with literal accuracy, that in dealing with this matter we owe a duty to the people of Australia. No part of our deliberations will be followed more closely than the discussion upon this subject. It will be followed with peculiar interest, because there is no deliberative assembly I know of in which this subject has been discussed. There are few, if any, writings upon it. The literary contributions to the subject have been usually by university professors, with an inclination towards the conservative party, and not by those who have had practical experience of political affairs. That is why I hope, not at undue length, to follow my honorable friend and to indicate to him and to those who may agree with him, that we are not, in resisting this demand for the referendum, contemptuous of the wishes of those who ask for it; but that we believe we have sound and well-grounded reasons for opposing the introduction into the Constitution in any form whatever of this pernicious principle. I intend to oppose in toto the novel and far-reaching proposal of my honorable friend

Whether he urges the dual referendum or the mass referendum, my objections are equally strong to both; and, indeed, I do not know that he seriously contends for the dual referendum. It is difficult to see how, if he advocates the referendum as a means of obtaining finality, there can be more finality in a dual referendum than in a dissolution of the Senate. If he advocates the mass referendum, there is the old objection that it is unjust, because it destroys the very basis on which federation rests. My answer to him will be directed against the referendum in any form. When I just now made use of the epithets "novel" and "far-reaching," I, almost inadvertently, summed up the arguments I am going to use. I admit that, because a political proposal is new, is not a ground for condemning it. I recognise, too, that the potency and the extent of the consequences of any proposal may be its strongest recommendation. But there is one test which, as practical men concerned with the affairs of State, we ought to apply to every proposal, and one only that I know of. 'Does it suit the people on whose behalf it is proposed? Is it in accord with the circumstances, the history, the traditions, and the requirements of the Australian people?' A good form of government is not the product of conscious effort; it cannot be suddenly constructed even by the planks of a labour caucus, but is the result of a national and healthy development. It should fit the people easily, as the bark of a tree fits its trunk and branches in every stage of growth. Now we, both by our British descent, and of our own deliberate choice, since we have had free institutions, have been trained in the theory and practice of parliamentary government, which rests upon a system of representation that is altogether incompatible with that power of direct legislation which is of the essence of the referendum. To make use of the referendum as we do in the Constitution, for the purpose of determining whether the Constitution shall be accepted or amended, is justifiable upon the simple ground of necessity. There is no other way of ascertaining what the people wish shall be the limits of the representative system. But when once a Constitution has been framed, based on parliamentary government, which is a combination of the systems of Representation and of Ministerial Responsibility, I hope to satisfy the committee that to introduce into this Constitution, in any form, the principle of the referendum, is to introduce a subtle poison, which before long will altogether destroy the vitality of Parliament. I will follow my honorable friend as closely as I can in the course of his argument, and I will take first the only historical illustration which he referred to—the instance of Switzerland. I could not help thinking that he destroyed the whole value of that illustration, as an argument that would appeal to us, by the example he gave of one case in which the referendum had been used. He mentioned that it had been used—whether successfully or not I did not quite catch—over a question of weights and measures. Imagine having a referendum all over Australia to determine the weight of grocers' scales! It is only in countries where such trivial matters can become matters of first moment that the referendum is possible or desirable.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does the honorable member say that was the only instance I gave?

Mr. WISE. -

No. After all, the value of any historic illustration depends upon the similarity between the circumstances of the country which is invoked as an example and our own circumstances. Is there any similarity between the history, or the circumstances of Switzerland, and the history and the circumstances of Australia? It is hardly possible in the first place to imagine a greater physical contrast than that between the wide and almost waterless expanses of this country, and the high mountains and deep valleys of Switzerland, which delay the growth of towns and separate the people by an immense variety of diverse local interests. Indeed, such is the isolation of the several parts of that most interesting little territory, that almost the only interest which they have in common is the love of independence. And as if the divisions set by nature were not wide enough, the people are separated further by differences of language, so that in a territory no larger than the western district of this colony, men in the French, German, or Italian districts cannot understand each others speech. Is it any marvel that, in a country so peopled and so situated, local government should flourish as local government has flourished nowhere else? In that country we find the police, the schools, the public charities, the asylums, and many other matters that are the concern in other countries of the Central Government administered by the people of the commune or the canton, meeting in their hereditary meadows, and deciding, as their numbers permit, by the vote of every citizen on the affairs of the year. No wonder that in such a country the idea of parliamentary or representative government has never taken root; and that is what makes the example of Switzerland useless to us. The Swiss look upon a Member of Parliament as a mere mouth-piece of a class, district, or estate; and have never risen to the higher conception of an independent representative, deliberating and deciding in the general interest on behalf of the country as a whole. Why, sir, if the referendum had not been familiarized to the Swiss by the practice of centuries, it would have been absolutely necessary for some ingenious philosopher like my honorable friend to have invented some system like it; because, without the referendum in such a country, with the people so separated, there would be no means of obtaining an expression of the joint opinion of the community, and no means whatever of joining its separate atoms for any common purpose. I am not going from mere pedantry to follow a subject of this sort further. I do not know that any one would seriously point to the example of Switzerland as one that should be followed in Australia—the example of a country with no Parliament in the sense in which we understand Parliament, with no responsible government in any sense at all, with no such community of interests as exists here, and with every inclination to separate, and very little interest to come together. I was astonished that my honorable friend did not refer on this occasion to another example which he has touched on before, that of the United States. He might have done as many of those who write on the subject outside the chamber have done, dwelt with great pride and very natural satisfaction upon the extent to which this doctrine has found popularity in that vast community.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I did refer to it.

Mr. WISE. -

The honorable member in his speech at Adelaide or Sydney gave us some examples of the widespread popularity and the general use into which this practice had come in the United States. Any one who takes that view might go further. I believe there is not a single state in the American Union, except Delaware, in which in one form or another the referendum is not put into practice. There is, however, this to be remembered, when we argue by analogy from a country like the United States, that one state differs as much from another politically as in climate; and that of all countries in the world, when discussing it politically or in other respects, the United States is the one in regard to which we ought to use one of those "large maps," which Lord Salisbury once recommended to students of the Eastern question. The only way in which the argument about the use of the referendum in the United States becomes of any value to us is by ascertaining, if we can, what the causes are which have promoted this general adoption of the doctrine.

No one has pointed out more clearly than the author whom my honorable friend cited-Mr. Cree-that the cause of the popularity of the referendum in the United States is the growing and wide-spread distrust in the honesty and the capacity of the legislative bodies. It is the most striking development of modern politics in the United States that no one believes in the power of Parliament to accomplish anything good. So strikingly is this spirit manifested that-without wearying the committee by giving many instances-in some states, as we know, Parliament is not allowed to assemble more than once in two years; and even then, in order to limit its capacity for mischief as much as possible, it is not allowed to remain in session for a longer period than six weeks. To show that I am not speaking at random when I say that it is this feeling of distrust and of dissatisfaction with Parliament that is at the root of the agitation for the referendum, I would like to quote a very short passage from a writer whose book is a storehouse of all modern knowledge on this subject-Professor Oberholtzer. The title of the book is, I think, On the Referendum.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, The Referendum in America.

Mr. WISE. -

That is it. Professor Oberholtzer says-

Side by side with this movement to make codes of laws of our Constitutions, and to restrict in many ways the powers of the state Legislatures, has grown up a movement tending directly towards the almost entire abolition of these bodies. In nearly all the states, by the development of the last few years, the conventions have substituted biennial for annual legislative sessions. These sessions, now being held only half as often, are further limited, so that they do not extend over more than a certain number of days. . . . . This tendency seems to have everything to encourage it and give it greater growth. Those states which still retain the system of annual sessions, as, for instance, New York and New Jersey, constantly find cause for dissatisfaction, and the feeling of distrust for these bodies is taking deeper hold of the people every year. The feeling, indeed, has reached a conviction nearly everywhere that the powers of the Legislatures should be still further curtailed, and in but one state-Georgia-has there been shown any inclination to retain the original principles.
That is not the only method of limiting the powers of Parliament. Alteration after alteration has been made in the Constitutions of the states curtailing the subjects with which a Legislature may deal. A catalogue of these limitations is positively startling. In some states the legislative body, whether of the county or of the state itself, cannot vote a penny for the erection of a bridge, a gaol, or an almshouse; they cannot pledge the credit of the state for a sum exceeding £100; they cannot increase the salaries of public officers, and they cannot put a tax on limited companies, deal with the electoral laws, or purchase real estate, or establish schools. In all these matters, and even in matters or less magnitude, there is compelled to be a direct legislative vote by the people. The explanation of this mistrust, and righteous mistrust, of legislative bodies in America is not far to seek. Everyone now knows what was not open to writers on the American Constitution a few years ago, but what has been made public in more recent memoirs, namely, that the fathers of the American Constitution were moved by a deep mistrust of democracy. They endeavoured to give expression to that sentiment by framing a Constitution, at every turn of which the expression of the popular will should be checked or delayed. In dealing with the Legislature, the particular device was to separate the Executive entirely from that body—that fatal severance, which, it is no exaggeration to say, has caused the chief part of the political evils from which the United States now suffer, and has made between politics and the pursuit of all that is good and helpful in the community that divorce which is at the present time a distinguishing and shameful mark. It is no rash assumption that if the chief executive officers had seats in the Legislatures of their several states, so that they could be responsible for the framing of the measures, which they have to administer, many of the greater evils of American politics would never have grown up. But is this our condition? Do the symptoms of that political disease for which the referendum is demanded as a remedy exist in Australasia? Are our Parliaments debased and venal? Are they corrupted by a moneyed lobby? Do our leaders seek only their own private ends, and have our people lost all control over the Legislature and the Executive? One has only to ask those questions in order to have them answered; and it is a matter of just pride that we can put those questions, confident what the answer will be. If then we are not suffering here from any of those diseases in the body politic, which require the desperate remedy that has been demanded in the United States, of what avail is it to catalogue to us a long series of cases in which the referendum has proved useful in that great community? There is, as in the case of Switzerland, no analogy whatever between the political condition of the United States, with their corrupt Legislature, their lack of responsible government, the absence of Ministers from the legislative body - and our Parliaments, which are the healthy representatives of public opinion, controlled by leaders whom the people trust, and who, being in the confidence of the people, are altogether subject to the direction of the people. If it were not that time pressed, I would like to illustrate still further the utter helplessness that an American feels in the face of the corruption that is everywhere about him.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And also partly the ineffectiveness of their political machinery.

Mr. WISE. -

My friend has anticipated me. That helplessness drives the American to the referendum because of the utter ineffectiveness of the political machinery. Again I will quote-and it is the only quotation I shall make-a passage from the work of Mr. Cree, which I recommend to the perusal of all interested in the subject. Although his book is written in the strongest terms in advocacy of the referendum, every argument he uses shows that his advocacy rests on a confessed mistrust of Parliament, which cannot, in any degree, be applied to a country where the people are proud of their Parliaments. Mr. Cree, after speaking of the corruption and tyranny of the party machinery, and the inability of the individual voter to make his will felt in consequence of the tyranny, proceeds:-

Party government means supremacy of party leaders. In those leaders is practically vested the power to subjugate all the official agencies of the State to their will, so that such will becomes that of the State, and government by the people is only a fiction instead of a fact. The leaders of parties frame all political issues, declare all party policies, name all candidates for office, and the electors but choose between the rival organizations. But that is no more than a power to say to which oligarchy of managers or "bosses" they will confide the control of the State.

Under such a system the party, leaders do not need to consider public opinion, further than its approval or consent may he necessary to secure the adoption of their avowed purposes, and the election of themselves to power. But great and important as is this power of ratification or rejection of party programmes and party leaders, on the part of the voters, it leaves them without any real positive political initiative, and limits them to a sort of negative action. A choice at the elections between corporate parties is all that they possess, and this not only does not involve, but actually excludes, all expression of opinion on the part of the voters unless the contending parties represent clearly-defined conflicting policies on specific questions, or really stand for permanent diverse views and tendencies. The contention of the parties for the favour of the electors assumes the fact of the existence of one or the other of these supposed cases. On no other assumption can the existence of party be for a single moment justified.

But so far as representing a clearly-defined line of action on specific measures of policy is concerned, we cannot recall a single case in the history of the United States where any great national party has done it.

I have dwelt at what may perhaps be considered excessive length on the example of the United States; because it seems to me that a great deal of undeserved credit is being given to this proposal by the imaginary support it is supposed to have received from the example of the United States. I might multiply quotations and fill the pages of Hansard, but I will only say that no one can read an American writer who advocates the referendum without seeing that his advocacy has one purpose, and one purpose only, namely, the substitution of the power of direct legislation for the incompetency and corruption of Parliaments. I am told there is very great feeling here that the referendum is necessary, because, although this fear of dead-locks has been admittedly exaggerated, there is still keen recollection of the old Victorian controversies. My honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) did me the honour to adopt a phrase of mine in which I said the ghost of those dead controversies still walked in Victoria. May I appeal to him and to those who influence public opinion here as to whether it is not their duty to try and lay that ghost? Is that not a more patriotic purpose than keeping the ghost alive, and stimulating the fear which a bogey-haunted memory creates, and doing all to exaggerate the possibilities of conflict, and as little as possible to show them in their true light. I take a view that my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) I know dissents from. I take no exception whatever to the terms in which he expressed his dissent. The view I take is that we must run the risk, and ought to run the risk, of dead-locks. It is a trite saying, but it is none the less true, and deserves to be repeated in this connexion, that there is only one form of government in which a dead-lock is impossible, and that form of government is where the ruler is a despot. Dead-locks are the price we pay for constitutional liberty. Although it is true that as the Bill now stands, there are possibilities of differences, and although an ingenious arithmetical calculator might be able to point out that under certain conceivable circumstances those differences may not be resolved-still all the arguments against the referendum proceed on precisely the opposite presumption to that on which the argument of my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) appears to proceed. We proceed first on the assumption that we are establishing a Federation. All my friend's arguments, logically pursued, went in favour of government by one Chamber. All my friend's argument, logically pursued, obliterated the distinction we have always kept before us, and which it is now too late to review. That distinction is, that this is a union of equal states, whose equality, or, at all events, whose individuality, is to be preserved so far as is compatible with the higher interests of the community. Then there is another assumption on which we proceed, but which, I think, my honorable friend ignored. That assumption is that federation is going to be worked by men who wish to keep the Federation together, and not by men who are going to use all their ingenuity to destroy it. When my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) quoted that memorable despatch of Lord Grey in favour of a single Chamber in these colonies he forgot, I think, the main reason that actuated Lord Grey, than whom, I suppose, a more sagacious statesman never controlled the destinies of Australia. According to my honorable friend, the only suggestion of Lord Grey was that there should be a single Chamber.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I did not say that. What Lord Grey said was be was almost driven to believe that was the only way out of the difficulty unless he could construct a Second Chamber which, while having co-ordinate powers in some respects, could be made amenable to the will of the people.

Mr. WISE. -

I am obliged for the correction. But I would remind my honorable friend that the reason for Lord Grey taking that course was that there was in the separate colonies no separate interest which could be represented in a Second Chamber—that there was no diversity of interest between those who hold seats in the Second Chamber, and those who hold seats in the Lower Chamber, which would justify a creation of two Chambers. But the essence of the Federal Constitution is that the Second Chamber is to represent interests which, although they combine in very many matters with the interests of those who sit in the House of Representatives, are nevertheless to some extent distinct. The Upper Chamber is a revising Chamber, but, what is more essential than a revising Chamber, it is to represent the states. Its separate existence is therefore justified; and we ought to be very careful before we take any step that would practically render its existence a mere sham. I find that the honorable member presented his view, as one might expect him to do, with the skill of an accomplished advocate, and refrained from putting the case for the referendum as high as it might be put. He may twit me with claiming too much, and with ignoring the fact that in this Constitution the referendum is only proposed for a certain specific purpose. Therefore, he may say the references I have already given to America and Switzerland have little or no application: that he and his friends are only asking for the referendum, to use a phrase familiarized since the Adelaide meeting, as the medicine and not the daily food of the Constitution. No one appreciates the force of this argument more than I do, because at Adelaide I was almost seduced by it from the straight constitutional path. It was only when I came to give, as I have since done, fuller attention and examination to the reasons by which the proposal was supported, and the precedents appealed to, that I have arrived at the opinion which I believe now to be almost unshakeable, that the referendum in any form, under whatever guise introduced, or for whatever purpose, strikes at the root of parliamentary government; because it makes it possible for a Ministry to remain in office without discredit—and I lay emphasis on these words "without discredit"—when it is unable to carry through Parliament the measures which it advocates. Let us see for a moment how this referendum will work in actual practice. I pass over the objections which are common to all artificial proposals to solve a deadlock—namely, that they are encouragements rather than discouragements to controversy—and deal with the objections as they present themselves to me to this definite proposal of the referendum, whether it is dual or mass. One question I would ask, and I am surprised that the matter was not touched upon: Suppose there is a controversy between the two Houses, and everything is ready for putting this heaven-born device into operation—what form is the Bill to be presented to the country? In the form that it left the Assembly, or in the form that it left the Senate? If you put it in the form in which it leaves the Senate, you will put it in the power of the Senate to dictate the particular question that will be asked. Equally, you will put it in the power of the House of Representatives to dictate the question if you put the Bill in the form in which it left the House of Representatives.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is just one of the defects in this joint sitting.

Mr. WISE. -

I am not speaking of the joint sitting now. I do not like it, but it has been agreed to, and I am not going to interfere with the Sydney compromise. Speaking of the referendum, I ask those who support it so glibly as being a solvent of all difficulties, to put themselves in the position of one who has to advise the Governor, and to consider the practical difficulty which will arise. If the Bill is to go to the people in the form in which it left the Assembly, what a temptation you put in the hands of a weak and possibly an unscrupulous Ministry to placate their supporters without incurring responsibility! If it is to go to the people in the form in which it left the Assembly, every man who wants to get credit with his constituents, or every section that the Ministry desire to please, for the time being, will, or may, propose some amendment in the Bill. The amendment may be ridiculous; it may be intended as nothing more than a mere placard for the purpose of showing the constituents how busy their representatives are. It may be such an amendment that, if it ever became law, would wholly defeat the operation of the Bill. What does it matter to the Ministry of the day if such amendments be included? What responsibility will they have when they know the Bill will go to the Senate, that the Senate will reject it, that it will go thence to the people to vote upon the amendments, and all exactly as they left the Lower Chamber? Then there is another consideration. Suppose a vote is taken, and that the people declare against the Bill, which was supported by the Ministry in the House of Representatives, what are the Ministry to do? Are they to resign? Are they to dissolve? If they resign, and if responsible government is to be continued, what will be the position of their successors, who will be left to face a hostile majority in the House of Representatives, and who will have no option, except to dissolve the Parliament to face, it maybe, a hostile constituency? How can it be said that under this Constitution responsible government, as we understand it, is not interfered with? I am going over these considerations very hurriedly, because I recognise that time presses. What, again, is to be the position of the individual member? Suppose he votes either for or against the Bill, and that the vote in the constituency that he represents is antagonistic to the vote he has given. Is he to resign his seat or to continue in Parliament open to the reproach of representing a minority? How can it be said that any such conditions as those do not interfere with the independence of the individual member? Indeed, I am only afraid of developing at too great length what must be apparent to any one. Or look at the matter in this way. Supposing the Senate insists upon an alteration in the Bill. The Senate, which this device is intended to humble, may thus have it then in its power to do one of two things-either to compel a dissolution or the resignation of the Ministry. That is to say, if the vote of the people is against the view of the Ministry, the result of the referendum has been to shift political power from the House of Representatives to the Senate. In any way one looks at it it seems impossible that parliamentary government can be continued as it is to-day, that Ministerial responsibility can continue as we know it to-day, if we transfer the final control of these matters from Parliament to a direct vote of the people. Then there is a consideration of a different character. What are the kind of issues that are likely to be submitted to the constituencies under this proposal? If deadlocks do occur, let us remember that they will be very different from them dead-locks with which we are familiar between the two Houses in our local Parliaments. All subjects affecting large social interests, all subjects affecting class interests, are practically, with the one exception of the Tariff, removed from the control and jurisdiction of the Federal Commonwealth. The matters about which disputes are likely to arise will be over the construction of the Constitution - such construction, I mean, as affects matters of procedure, not matters of law, which will come within the cognisance of the High Court. They will be rather matters of constitutional etiquette, matters in which the general public are not likely to take a very keen interest. My honourable and learned friend pointed out that the first disputes were likely to be brought about by the distribution of the surplus. I cannot imagine any kind of dispute more certain to solve itself than that; because so long as a dispute continues, not one of the contending parties will be able to receive any money.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the danger.

Mr. WISE. -

Such a difficulty is certain to settle itself if it occurs, and the dual referendum certainly will not alter that. It is difficult to see how the mass referendum can do so, except by overriding in every respect the interests and claims of the smaller states.

[The Chairman left the chair at five minutes to one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. WISE. -

Before the premature adjournment which was so kindly conceded to me by the courtesy of the committee, I was endeavouring to point out that the questions which would have to be submitted to the determination of the people under this proposal were of a very complex character, and very different from those with which we had been made familiar by previous parliamentary disputes; and I had just said that I thought that all matters giving rise to a demand on behalf of one class, that the privileges of another class should be taken away, or that its own burden should be lightened, would not come within the ken of the Federal Parliament, but were relegated to the jurisdiction of the Provincial Parliaments. Those fertile sources of disputes would therefore be absent under this Constitution, and it would be more matters affecting the personal honour of Ministers-matters which I venture to term constitutional etiquette-which would give rise to those disputes. Now, it cannot be overlooked that those whom we are asked to call in as umpires in matters of this kind are the uninstructed. The referendum is an appeal from the instructed to the ignorant. I am quite aware, sir, that the use of that phrase maybe misunderstood; but I know that in this Chamber we ought to speak our minds without fear that an opponent will seek, by using words out of their contexts to bring upon one either ridicule or odium. At the same time, in order to guard against misapprehension, so that my argument may not be weakened on that account, I desire to say that I in no way question the fundamental principles of democratic rule. I accept frankly and unreservedly, as the cardinal dogma of popular government, that a strength and depth of good judgment and discretion are developed in the massing and union of men, which is to the wisdom of the individual, however gifted, as the might of the waves of the sea to the pools which are left upon the sand by a retreating tide. But I altogether deny that the principles which justify a wide, or even a universal, suffrage have any application to this question of the referendum. The people are the best guides of what is good government, because the people are the first to suffer from, and suffer most from, bad government. But to admit that in the fullest terms as a justification for popular rule, does not involve the further admission that in all parliamentary disputes-which often depend upon matters of a highly technical character, and which frequently involve personal questions which those at a distance are not able to fully estimate-the great body of the people are the best judges. Quotations were made by my honorable and learned friend in support of the view he took, but there is one quotation of only two sentences so apt to the proposition I am now contending for, that I ask the pardon of the committee if I cite it. I am urging, remember, that to call in the electorate as a whole to determine that kind of dispute which is likely to arise between the two Houses is undesirable, from the particular nature of the questions to be submitted, and I will adopt the words of Bagehot, who says that to do so would be to submit to the government-

Of immoderate persons far from the scene of action, instead of to the government of moderate persons close to the scene of action.

It is to accept the judgment of-

Persons judging in the last resort, and without a penalty, in lieu of persons judging in fear of a dissolution, and fully conscious that they are subject to an appeal.

Those two sentences, put in words that I cannot hope to emulate, dispose of the argument which was put forward by my honorable and learned friend, that we ought not to count upon the fear of the Senate to avoid a dissolution as a means of getting out of the difficulties that he imagines will arise. My honorable and learned friend spoke somewhat contemptuously of the remedy provided by dissolution, and he may perhaps urge that the argument that I have been using goes too far, because it would preclude one who used it from advocating the settlement of disputes by means of a general election. But there is this wide difference between the determination of a question by general election and by direct vote of the people: That in the former case there is allowed an interval for reflection, an opportunity for repentance. In the case of a general election, as we all know, there may be a strong wave of party feeling carrying everything before it; but we know also that before effect can be given to the expression of the popular will, as there evidenced, the seven or eight men who are responsible for the execution of the measures they may enact have a further opportunity of shaping that popular opinion, and, if necessary, putting a check upon it. I am not going to run the risk of stirring up recollections of past controversies; but I appeal to any honorable member of this committee whether it is not within his own experience that public opinion, as expressed by newspapers as expressed upon the hustings, has been modified profoundly, but most usefully, by the Ministry that came into office, purporting to give this public opinion legislative form? It is that which makes a general election a real test of the true opinion of the public, and distinguishes it from that expression of public opinion which is furnished by a vote by means of the referendum, which may be merely the evidence of some passing gust of popular passion.
There is one case that was referred to in a leading newspaper here, and the reference was so pointed that I make no excuse for bringing it before the notice of honorable members again. The incident in question has occurred in a foreign country, so that I may cite it without danger of exciting passion here. Something might occur here of such a character, but in another form, as has occurred lately in France; and is there one advocate of the referendum who would be prepared to trust to the French people to-day a vote, aye or nay, upon the guilt of that unfortunate man, Captain Dreyfus?
But still, is there one of us who doubts that, in the long run, full justice will be done to that man-either if he be guilty his guilt will be determined, or if he be innocent his innocence will be proved. We do trust the people, but what we trust is the deliberate judgment of the people; and that deliberate judgment we obtain, not by chance votes on questions that are only imperfectly understood, and in which the people take but little interest, but by an expression of opinion obtained first in a general election, and then more definitely voiced by those in whom the people themselves have confidence. In fact, the advantage of a general election, to use a common phrase, is that it gives an opportunity of appealing from Philip drunk to Philip sober; but the referendum confines us to taking the opinion of Philip drunk or sober—and the probability is that he will be in his cups.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Why?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Is that your opinion of the people of Australia? What a shameful thing to say!

Mr. WISE. -

I am afraid that there must be some literal-minded Scotsmen present, but I think I have made my meaning sufficiently clear. What I designed to say was that there is a danger that if a single question is submitted to the people without the safeguard of a general election, if a single question is submitted to them in the way in which we know it can be submitted by a clever Minister, that question may be submitted to a vote which would not perhaps truly raise the real issue between the two Houses, but it would be a question that would have all the violence and vehemence of party feeling surrounding it. We ought not to rely upon that kind of opinion implicitly without the possibility of an appeal. Under the present system we have the possibility of appeal—an appeal which is frequently exercised; and, as I have already said, when, after a general election, the Ministry of the day attempt to give effect to the wishes of the people, these are often considerably modified to the contentment and advantage of the people themselves. It is to give that opportunity of reflection and appeal that we wish for a general election, and rely upon it rather than upon a sudden submission to popular passion, which, when once made, even though popular opinion may have failed to express itself accurately, is expressed irrevocably, and which, in place of having due regard to the questions likely to arise, would be expressed nine times out of ten without a full and complete knowledge of the questions with which the people were dealing—not from any defect in the people themselves, but from the very nature of the questions that are submitted, and from the fact that, as we must all recognise, the bulk of the people in this, as in every other country in the world, are quite apathetic about politics. But I come, now, to a more important matter—the argument to which my honorable and learned friend made allusion when he conceded that there was some strength in this particular objection that I am attempting to urge. It is that the referendum in this form, or in any other form, must undermine the influence of Parliament. If I am asked—"How?" I can only reply again by asking questions. How can we expect that Parliament will have the same position of importance that it has to-day, when its deliberations are almost without effect, when its debates are indecisive, and its decrees liable to reversal? If the authority of Parliament is to be maintained, we can only keep it at its present high position by making the authority of Parliament supreme, and its decrees final. If, on the other hand, the people are to act as legislators, then the authority of Parliament, and with it the importance of parliamentary discussion, must suffer diminution. I am quite aware that some of my honorable friends attach comparatively little importance to the dignity of Parliament, and I know, too, that our views on this question of the referendum must be determined on this, the central point of the argument, by the views we hold of the importance of parliamentary government. Now, I believe, without going into any lengthy disquisition, that Parliament does possess some very striking advantages which we have been apt to consider of real importance. As a seat of ultimate sovereignty, it commands a respect, and offers an opportunity of usefulness, which makes its membership attractive to men of public spirit. As an instrument of public opinion, it controls Ministers, by questioning them upon their policy, by censuring them for their misdeeds, and ultimately by dismissing them from office. As representative of every class in the community, it insures that every interest will be regarded, and gives to all citizens a just confidence that no grievance will go for a lengthened period unredressed. In short, Parliament combines, and combines them in the highest degree, the two special advantages of the system of representation in that while it trains up a succession of competent men to undertake the service of the State, it at the same time enables the people by interpellation, by censure, and by dismissal to exercise an effective and prompt control over every executive act. There is a fashion now to disparage the qualities requisite for successful parliamentary government, and, in that country which is often held up to us as a model—the United States—the popular belief is that any one man is as good as another as a representative in Parliament. I entirely dissent from that view. I believe that a country is not well served if a view of that sort is encouraged. But if Parliaments are to be degraded from their high position, if they are not to be supreme, if Ministers are no longer to be held responsible for the passing of measures which they advocate, or the consequences of those which they enact, how can we hope that men of character will any longer seek admission to its membership? It is certain that men will not enter Parliament, except for purposes of self-seeking, unless they are assured a reasonable opportunity of doing good. But by every step by which we diminish the importance of Parliament, by so much do we lessen its attractiveness to men of individuality and men of character. I believe there never was a period in our history when men of individuality and men of character were more needed in the councils of the state than they are to-day, when a noisy section of the community—not, I am glad to say, at present a very influential one—is preaching as a message of good tidings to the poor and suffering the reduction of every citizen in the community to one dead level of mediocrity and sloth. If we want to combat the pernicious doctrines of socialism, we can only do so successfully by encouraging in the councils of the State those men who are trained to govern, and who have the confidence of the people. I recognise, too, that in another way Parliament must be degraded by the use of the referendum. I have said before, that all through history, from the time of Julius Caesar to that of the Third Napoleon, the referendum has been an instrument of personal despotism; and, in the same way, there is no weapon which will enable a Ministry to free itself from the control of a hostile majority in Parliament so effectively as the referendum. How can we expect any Ministry, threatened by parliamentary complications, to avoid the obvious refuge which a measure of this kind offers: that it will not be buoyed up by, may be a fallacious hope, but a hope which none the less would influence an ordinary Cabinet that after some months, with the influence which a Government is able to exercise over elections, and possibly the manipulation of electioneering machinery, as we have seen in other countries, they may be able to get a favorable verdict from that great constituency, the people, which will enable them altogether to disregard the opinion of the majority inside Parliament, and thus to escape from salutary parliamentary control? It is in every way, however we may look at the question, incompatible with the responsibility of Ministers as we understand it today - I mean by that that Ministers should insist on carrying the measures they introduce, and when they have carried them through Parliament must accept the responsibility for their proper execution—it is inconsistent with that Ministerial responsibility as we know it to-day, and with parliamentary government as we know it to-day, to introduce in any form or shape into this Constitution the principle of direct legislation by the people. It is a system, too, which, for the reasons I have mentioned, ought to be denounced in the very phrases which are invoked in its support—"in the name of public liberty"—because, being a system which is destructive of the character of public men, in the long run it, too, destroys the right which the people now possess of exercising, as they only can exercise, by means of parliamentary control and parliamentary discussion, effective and prompt control over every act of the Executive Government.
Without that power resting in the people, in the first instance, to question, then to censure, and finally to dismiss the instruments of their authority—and only by means of parliamentary government can that right be fully exercised—any form of government must become one of two things—either a bureaucracy or a despotism. The only escape is a strict adherence to responsible government and to the parliamentary system as we know it to-day; and, to use the phraseology which has been used by those who insist on the acceptance of this principle, viz., to declare that those who resist it are antidemocratic, is to use words for the purpose of frightening the timid which have not any real bearing on the argument. I quite admit that in one form the proposal seems appropriate to democracy; but I cannot help re-collecting that there is no greater tyranny in the world than that which is exercised under the forms of democracy when the spirit of democracy is dead. The democrat whom I respect is not a man who is always shouting flatteries to a mob, and who is willing to become the instrument of any policy, however foolish, provided that he can get a sufficient number of people to vote that it is good. The democracy I favour is one which gives to every citizen in the community an equal opportunity of self-development, and which exacts, in an especial degree, from its chosen leaders, that they shall deserve the confidence which they receive and the obedience which they lawfully exact. To a democracy of that kind the system of representative government is most favorable, so that I, for one, decline to be frightened front opposing the referendum by being told that to do so is anti-democratic. I deny altogether that to oppose the referendum is to show mistrust in the people. I deny altogether that to oppose the referendum is to show disrespect to the sovereignty of the people, because I utterly decline to admit that trust in the people is best proved by a frequent summons to the ballot-box, or that you best vindicate the sovereignty of the people by a perpetual procession to the polling booth. I trust the people, I know the people should rule; but history and experience alike show that the people rule best when they are free to make their choice of their instruments, and that they rule most to their own advantage when those instruments have, through the institutions of the country, become competent to govern and have fitted themselves to satisfy the requirements of a free people. I am aware that the friends of the referendum brush aside considerations of this kind, by the comforting reflection that, after all, if a Parliament does not exercise so much influence, the press will exercise a greater influence; and I think my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) contemplated, with considerable satisfaction, what he terms the "transfer of power" to the press. I believe I took the expression down correctly. The honorable and learned member was quoting, I think, Goldwin Smith.
Mr. ISAACS. -

I read that passage to show the opinions entertained in places very far distant from this country.

Mr. WISE. -

I am not quite sure whether it was Goldwin Smith whom the honorable member was quoting.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes. He says that the real deliberation has been transferred to the press, and that that is the general organ of discussion by which great questions are being virtually decided.

Mr. WISE. -

For my part, I agree with the argument, and I am not at all surprised to find that writers on the press consistently advocate the referendum. I have the greatest sympathy with the man who tries to glorify his own profession, and if I were a newspaper writer I should advocate the referendum without stint of printer's ink, because I am satisfied that government by referendum means, in practice, government by newspapers. Much has been said, and with truth, of the excellence of the newspaper press, so that for me now to bring forward arguments to show that the press is entitled to this dominant position would be to revive recollections of a quite unnecessary amount of after-dinner speechification. I concede fully all that can be said in favour of the press; but does it follow that we are compelled to admit that government by the newspapers is better than government by Parliament? I do not want my honorable and learned friend to think that I am guilty of any rhetorical exaggeration in putting this antithesis. I know perfectly well that all the columns of the newspaper which represents his views the idea that there is inconsistency between parliamentary government and government by referendum is strenuously denied. And I will confess that when I read the very able leaders in the Age newspaper insisting that there is no incompatibility between government by Parliament and government by referendum, and urging that the referendum was rather a device for strengthening Parliament than for weakening it, I have at times felt misgivings which might have ripened to the point of conviction if I had not been lucky enough to come across a very able work dealing with the whole subject entitled Representative Government, by Mr. David Syme. In that work I find this passage:-

The press at once forms and expresses public opinion. It performs all the functions of a deliberative assembly. There is not a question of home or foreign policy that is not as fully and ably discussed in its columns as in the debates of either House of Parliament, and in these discussions every newspaper reader participates, becomes, as it were, a member of that vast assembly which may be said to embrace the whole nation, so widely are newspapers now read. Had we only the machinery for recording the votes of that assembly we might easily dispense with Parliament altogether.

Sir, whenever I am affected by the able arguments of the leader writers of the Age newspaper to a sort of belief in the possible compatibility of the referendum and Parliament, I turn to refresh my ancient faith to this passage from the work of Mr. Syme—"Had we only the machinery for recording the votes of that assembly, we might easily dispense with Parliament altogether" and I resolve that, so far as I am concerned, I will never give a vote for the construction of machinery for such a destructive purpose! To pass away from an argument of perhaps merely local application, and to look at the matter in its less restricted view, I ask what, after all, is a newspaper? At bottom, speak as highly of newspapers as we please, the truth is that they are merely commercial enterprises. To say that is no disparagement of newspapers. It is certainly no denial or oblivion of the high qualities of judgment, intelligence, capacity, and honour which must characterize the great journalist in every country. It is only an admission that newspaper writers, like other people, have to work under certain necessary material limitations. We are all, except perhaps artists or men of letters, hedged round in the exercise of our faculties, or the striving after our ideals, by the material necessities of life. Nevertheless, a newspaper has to be conducted in obedience to certain commercial necessities, which need not be particularized here, but which unfit it in a very special degree to be the ruler of a democratic country. The exigencies of the enterprise require that it shall be conducted by an almost absolute authority, whom the general public seldom know, whom they perhaps hardly ever see, whom they call never question, whom they can never hold responsible, and over whom they can exercise only a most remote and nebulous control. There may be, as Mr. David Syme suggests, no risk involved in the change of masters but for my part I would sooner trust the destinies of the country to the worst Parliament the people of Australia would elect, than to the best newspaper the mind of man has ever imagined. We have fortunately not yet reached the point when we are compelled to discuss what is to take the place of Parliament. Indeed, my complaint against the arguments of my honorable and learned friend, both to-day and upon previous occasions, is that he has not shown sufficient justification for the serious step which he proposes. He seems to overlook the gravity of the step which we are asked to take, and to treat it as a mere form of procedure. But it is something much greater than that. The proposal is one which strikes at the very root of our institutions as we now know them. But in Australia—and long may we so continue—we have not yet reached the stage when it becomes necessary to destroy Parliament in the interests of democracy, and to reduce that body which, by the universal consent of the British people and by long custom, has been the depository and the executor of the sovereign power, to a mere committee stripped of all authority, and permitted only to make recommendations for the acceptance or rejection of a less instructed public. In concluding this part of my argument, I would like to refer to a most admirable pamphlet by Professor Jethro Brown, of the University of Hobart, a passage from which I ask leave to read. It is as follows:

"Looking back for a moment, we have seen that precedent does not warrant the application of the referendum in Australian politics; that history and reason condemn the principle which underlies it, as opposed to some of the clearest lessons of experience; that, as industrial progress is only possible where full scope is given to the utilization of special ability and special information, so political progress, while requiring a popular control of the rulers in order that the interests of the many may be consulted, is subject to the same law; that the will of the people which has stood the test of time is therefore, in the long run, our safest standard of legislation; that the majority, like the individual, can only lose by having its momentary inclinations gratified with invariable promptitude. For the successful working of democracy under existing conditions we need great men to lead it, skilled men to carry out its decisions, and finally, effective means for securing that its deliberate judgment shall be the standard of legislation. To each of these three requisites, the principle of the referendum is directly and manifestly opposed. By attributing ultimate authority to the fluctuating majority, it must tend to drive strong and independent men from politics, to lower the standard of legislation, and to increase the sense of popular despotism. It is an undue sacrifice of the qualities which go to make efficiency of government to the considerations of a slightly increased sympathy and a slightly increased educational influence. As such, its principles must be condemned. It is a desperate remedy, which can only be justified by a desperate disease."

I am aware that in the argument I have endeavoured to put forward I am open to criticism upon the ground that my distinctions are lacking, to some extent, in logical precision. I am as conscious of that as any critic, either here or outside, may be; but I believe that it is inevitable. I do not believe that it is possible to make any contribution to a debate upon a question of this kind, which is intended to be of practical value and not a mere academical study, without exposing oneself to the charge of a certain degree of logical inconsistency. This is a matter where logical consistency inevitably leads to practical error. Certainly I am as sensible as any man can be of the grave difficulty of reconciling that power of direct legislation which seems an attribute of sovereignty with that independence and discretion of representatives, without which responsible government is a sham, and Parliaments are not Parliaments at all. I am as sensible as any man can be of the difficulty of reconciling the pertinacious claims of modern democracy, habituated to flattery, pampered by power, accustomed by a long series of successes to a blind confidence in its own judgment, with that free play of mental activity, that nice sense of personal honour, that high spirit, that lofty conscientiousness and sense of duty which are the distinctive marks of a representative of the real British type. I am deeply sensible—and no man who does not perceive the difficulty of the problem can have paid great attention to the development of politics—of the great difficulty of reconciling the claims of the people to direct rule, with the just, reasonable, and necessary independence of popular representatives. Of this, however, I am sure:—That it is not by giving a decision in favour of one side or the other, but by compromising the suit, that the balance will be kept and the right path shown. To press to an extreme either the theory of direct legislative control, or the theory of complete representative independence, would be to make government in any part of Australia impossible, in the one case by crippling its authority, and in the other by depriving it of popular support. I think that in Australia our danger lies in an excess; and that the balance leans too much in favour of direct control of representatives by their constituents and too little towards the encouragement of personal independence. In politics, as in everything else, it is in the long run not intellect but character that tells; and while no high degree of mental power or insight may be needed for three-fourths of the concerns of government, yet there is always a residue which demands the exercise of the highest faculties, and which it is the test of statesmanship to handle properly. There will always, too, come times of sudden difficulty, when in a moment qualities of wisdom, sagacity, self-sacrifice, and courage will be required to save the State. Depend upon it when these hours of danger come, whether they arise from commercial crises, industrial disputes, or foreign complications, the men to guide the ship with safety will not be those who have crept and crawled into the public offices by "sinking," as it is called, their convictions upon doubtful issues, but those who have had the courage to declare their convictions and the honesty to act upon them. The public can never be well served if it degrades its public men, and no democracy will long retain its own liberty unless its leaders are permitted to claim theirs. Men who violate their consciences to please a majority, who shrink from taking any action on their own responsibility, who practise servility to voters as a fine art of statesmanship, may flatter and gain credit for a time; but they will not prove the faithful guardians of the public interest in times of danger, or wise guides to a community along the paths of peace. As Burke has said most finely:

If we do not give confidence to the minds of our representatives and a liberal scope to their understanding; if we do not permit them to take a very enlarged view of things, we shall at length inevitably degrade our national representation into a confused and scuffling bustle of local agency.

It is this, sir, that I fear in the operation of the referendum:-That by diminishing the power of Parliament it will degrade members; that it will make Ministers narrow in their ideas and timid in their actions. To these considerations there is only one answer, namely-that parliamentary institutions in Australia have failed. It may be said that Parliament is an institution of British origin, which cannot bear transplanting from its native soil that its successful working requires the exercise of certain qualities of reticence and loyalty which members in this country have not acquired, and compels members to put certain restraints on their speeches and actions which are supposed to be incompatible with true democracy. I am far from denying that there is some strength in that consideration but I do ask with confidence-and to no audience could I appeal more successfully than this-whether there have not been times in the history of every colony when our representative bodies have proved themselves in spirit and capacity to be in no degree unworthy of their British origin? I am sure that my honorable friend, if he will permit me to call him so (Sir Graham Berry), whose services to this Convention, though unrecorded in Hansard, deserve our most grateful recognition, and form a worthy crown to a distinguished career of public service-would not readily admit that Parliaments are ineffective weapons of democracy! And I know that three-fourths of the foundations on which the liberties of New South Wales now rest were laid by the parliamentary genius of Sir Henry Parkes, a man who, it is my deliberate opinion, takes rank as a parliamentarian with Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Gladstone, and Sir John MacDonald. I am not going to revive old controversies, or to attempt to recall forgotten incidents. It would be extremely invidious to do so before an audience many of whom were actors in those great scenes! I admit, too, that there have been times when our Parliaments have not commanded or deserved respect; and, again, I will observe a discreet reticence as to when and where these periods have occurred! This much, however, will be universally conceded: that, whenever we have had a great leader, we have also had a good Parliament. I have no wish to stir the embers of dead controversies, and I recognise that we must differ as to the policy these Parliaments pursued, and that this difference must to some extent affect our judgment of their capacity; but I claim that if we judge them not by our individual estimate of the value of their work or aims, but by the accuracy with which they have reflected public opinion, and the skill with which they have given legislative expression to public opinion, we shall be driven to the conclusion that in all the colonies, and at various periods, Parliaments have proved themselves the worthy and effective instruments of democratic sovereignty. As it has been in the past, so it will be again. Whenever we have leaders who will lead, and a Government that will govern—then we shall have Parliaments that will adequately represent the feeling of the country, and in which the people of the country will not be afraid to place their confidence. Certainly I have heard nothing that leads me to give up my belief in Parliament. I admit that there are defects in parliamentary government, as there are defects in any system of government; but I have heard no argument that disturbs me in the belief that any scheme that it has been proposed to substitute for parliamentary government might not breed evils still greater than those which it is designed to remedy. The evils which we have we know; but to rush in blind confusion into others that we can neither know nor estimate, and to do this not with a Constitution with which by long experience we are familiar, but with a Federal Constitution, every part of which is new, complex, and uncertain in its working, is rather the rashness of the doctrinaire than the wisdom of the statesman. In a word, I oppose the referendum because I believe it to be inconsistent with democracy. I believe it to be destructive of the greatest safeguard the democracy has ever had—the parliamentary system, under which more than any other I have ever read or heard of, the ideal of democracy, which is the progress of all, through all, under the guidance of the best and the wisest, can be most completely realized. For these reasons, I shall give my vote against any such subversion of the representative system as is of necessity involved in any recognition in this Constitution of the doctrine of the referendum.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I think that the feeling of intellectual pleasure which we must have experienced in listening to two such able addresses—the first from our friend the Attorney-General of Victoria, and the next from our friend (Mr. Wise) will extend as widely as the circle of those who have the privilege of reading the reports of those splendid addresses. Now, after that, I wish to say I feel some regret that this most attractive subject has been discussed at a length which is scarcely in proportion with the present stage of our proceedings. We cannot forget that this subject was discussed at great length in Adelaide, and again in Sydney. It is now our duty to endeavour to add fresh light rather than to repeat admirable arguments which we have heard before. I think our learned and eloquent friend (Mr. Wise) might have abridged his speech by one-half. I do not say that it would not have been a positive loss not to have heard every word of the speech. I have no hesitation in saying it is rarely I have listened with so much pleasure to a speech in a deliberative assembly. My word will carry greater weight when I say I am totally at variance with the conclusions expressed by my honorable friend. No greater compliment could be paid to a man than to thoroughly admire the manner in which he has put an argument to which one is opposed. Mr. Wise has had the great advantage of speaking to an audience very much predisposed to the views he has expressed. I feel that in a matter of this kind a distinct service is rendered to the whole of Australia when the argument is put so fully and clearly on both sides. I wish to point out that a very large proportion of the speech delivered by Mr. Wise was entirely wide of the present point. We are not at present engaged in deliberating as to a choice of the referendum in its various phases. We are not now called on to discuss the respective merits of parliamentary government or government by referendum. We are now addressing ourselves to a clause which provides for a case in which our glorious system of parliamentary government has broken down. We are addressing ourselves now to a case in which the two most able, illustrious, and intellectual assemblies that ever met happen to be irreconcilably at variance upon some matter of practical legislation. The position which Mr. Wise has occupied to-day would suit a much older man. There is a charm in the view that we have reached the highest summits of perfection. It is very pleasing to be assured that the system of government which we enjoy is so perfect that it is impossible of improvement. If I could believe that, I should feel that all the dreams of the patriots of the past ages had been realized, and that humanity, so far as parliamentary government is concerned, had nothing to live for—that the only duty which future ages of human beings would have before them would be to guard against the slightest infringement of this inestimably perfect form of human government. But alas, sir, history talks with no uncertain voice! History tells us that parliamentary government, even so late as to be within the recollection of men now living, was one of the most degraded systems of bribery and corruption. We are told that those who were the representatives, so called, of the people, were placed in that position not by the voice of the people, but by the influence of corrupt and corrupting Government and great aristocratic families. We are within living recollection of a time when parliamentary government, instead of being a pure instrument of the public will, was utterly degraded. If parliamentary government so recently was in such a state, is it possible that we so soon have thought out all the problems that surround this question so thoroughly as to leave it impossible to improve parliamentary government? Mr. Wise speaks of an appeal by referendum to the people as a "confused scuffle of local agencies." I fear that language only too truly describes an appeal to the people by way of general election. One object, aimed at by those who favour the referendum as a method of referring measures to the people is that degrading local influences, and conflict of principles and prejudices, which sometimes assume the most bitter shape, should not be allowed to prevent the voice and intelligence of the people from being fully and freely exercised. To-day, sir, we have in Great Britain one of the strongest Governments Britain has ever known. How is it that that Government stands to-day in a position of such marvellous strength? We recollect that there was an appeal to the people upon the question of Home Rule. After years of ineffectual struggle by means of parliamentary machinery the question came to such a phase that it became necessary at last to appeal to the constituencies. Was the voice of the people heard on Home Rule? Was it the anti-Home Rule convictions of the present conservative party that put into the House of Commons the present enormous majority? No. It was a Union between the church and the British publican. It was "beer and the Bible" that won the great battle for the Salisbury Government. Could anything be more in the nature of things than that when a general election is brought about on any great question it is impossible under our present system to confine the issue to the settlement of that question? People assert their right to think other questions of greater importance, especially questions which involve the pecuniary interests of large classes of the community. I submit that all those eulogies of parliamentary government, and the arguments in reference to general elections, as they bear on questions actually referred to the people, are entirely wide of historic accuracy. But I say again, we have nothing to do with that on the present occasion. If the proposal of the referendum is novel, is not the proposal for the joint sitting of the two Houses novel? I think the latter is quite as novel as the referendum; in fact, it is infinitely more novel.

Mr. WALKER. -

They have it in Nor-way.
Mr. REID. -

Thank you.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

You are not opposing it?

Mr. REID. -

I am not going against it. I am not one who thinks you can damn a principle by calling it new. I am simply pointing out the fact that the argument against novelty is a waste of time. That is all. The fact that both these propositions are novel shows the difficulty in which we are. My honorable friend says dead-locks are the price we pay for constitutional liberty. Is there any reason why we should go on paying that price? Is there no method of enjoying constitutional liberty without throwing the parliamentary machine into dislocation? When the parliamentary machine fails to work—that is to say, when the great patriots who wield the parliamentary power have not sufficient wisdom to agree on a measure of legislation—are the people whose agents they are, whose business they fail to transact, to remain dumb and powerless? The people have a different way of looking at such things. The people say—"We sent you into these two Houses of Parliament to legislate. When we find you, instead of carrying on legislation, quarrelling and making legislation impossible, you do not command our respect at all. You are failing in your mission, and if you cannot agree after many painful struggles between yourselves, we, your principals, we who put you there to do our work, ask you to refer your difficulty to us and allow the principals to settle what the agents cannot accomplish." Beneath this argument against the referendum there is the old conservative dislike of the people's will—the conservative contrivance—

Mr. WISE. -

That is not true of me.

Mr. REID. -

I do not accuse my honorable friend at all.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The right honorable gentleman objects to interruptions, I believe.

Mr. REID. -

I object to them because I seem to rather injure the people who interrupt me, that is all. I can assure Mr. Wise that, in my mind, I have no unkind or ungenerous thought of his views on this matter. I am speaking generally, apart from any personal application.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Why should you not give other persons credit for the same views with regard to the people as you entertain yourself?

Mr. REID. -
I do.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But you do not.

Mr. REID. -

I do. I simply say there are conservatives in this world. I am not making any personal application to any gentleman who is listening to me.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We all recognise the sovereignty of the people, and their will.

Mr. REID. -

What I wish to say is that we cannot be blind to the fact, as men of experience, that in politics you find two large classes with opposite dispositions. That is to say, there is one large class you find always opposing change, and another large class you find advocating change. Both classes may be absolutely honest and conscientious. The conservative may be even more honest and conscientious, I will say, than some in the front rank of those who advocate change. What I wish to point out is, without any personal reference, but as dealing with large classes in the political life of all countries, that we must throw aside, that is, from my point of view, absolutely any opposition which leads us to condemn new departures, simply because they are new.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Hear, hear, we all agree with that.

Mr. REID. -

Well, we all do, and yet we do not. We all do in principle and desire, but we find that the strongest argument as a rule against a thing is that it is new, and the very principles which were looked upon 50 years ago as qualifying an Englishman to be sent to gaol as a seditious person are now, by the conservatives of to-day, looked upon as eminently respectable, and only because they now exist in the institutions of the country. As long as they were not in the institutions of the country they were fraught with the seeds of national disaster, but the moment they were put in the Constitution of the country, and those who opposed them found they could get into office just the same, their great objection to those principles disappeared.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Retrospective patriotism.

Mr. REID. -

There are no more generous democrats in England now than among the conservatives. We have our working men's conservative societies; and that points to this—that whatever your political changes, whatever the interests and views derived from political party may be, when you come down to the great body of the people of a country you strike the true sound level of political activity. Talk about a confused scuffle. Was that a confused scuffle, that proceeding which led to the election of this Convention? I have been too active in many of the electoral contests in my own colony—I have seen the thousand indirect influences which have poisoned the verdict of the people upon great questions of political principle too often—not to see the vast difference which prevailed at the polling booths on the day when the issue was the election of members to this Convention. Even there, I fear, such influences intruded to some extent; but, so far as the great body of the people were concerned, all appeals to passion were thrown aside, all the struggles of self-interest were thrown aside, and you saw in the way in which the electors registered their opinions free from the obstructions and cross purposes of a general election, that if Parliament does break down, and if the matter is of sufficient importance to be so settled, you will not go far wrong in sending it for settlement to the ayes or noes of the people of the country. But we are told that that compels the people to accept things in a Bill which they do not approve of. Is there a Bill which passes any deliberative assembly in the world of which that cannot be equally said?

Mr. HOLDER.

Will it be a scuffle when there is a referendum on this Bill?

Mr. REID.

I hope not. Many of us are Members of Parliament, and we know how true it is—and no one knows it better than Mr. McMillan—that many of us vote for the third reading of a Bill who do not approve of all the propositions in it. How many of us have the strongest objection to provisions in a Bill which, nevertheless, we vote for, because the good in it outweighs the evil.

Mr. MCMILLAN.

We bow to the majority.

Mr. REID.

Exactly; and why not bow to the majority of the people, when the people's representatives cannot do their work, and leave the job hanging up? If it is a trivial matter, do not waste time over it. Do not suppose that I favour the referendum except in cases of serious emergency and dangerous conflict between the two Houses. I am not enamoured of any novelty to that extent. I only advocate the novel proposal when a difficulty is a very old one, and has remained without a cure. And this difficulty of hitting upon some form of relieving the tension which arises between two deliberative assemblies when they are in conflict is becoming more and more felt by the peoples of the world. My honorable friend (Mr. Wise) spoke of the growth of this movement in America. Well, it is a simple fact that this movement is growing in America. Mr. Wise said that it was because of the incompetency of the American Legislature. Is not any Legislature proved to be incompetent when it cannot agree about a Bill?

Several HONORABLE MEMBERS. - No.

Mr. REID. -

Well, is not the presumption raised that, if a body which is constituted to legislate, and does not legislate owing to disputes between two independent Chambers, that is a case in which legislation at any rate is made impossible?

Mr. WISE. -

Only for a time.

Mr. REID. -

My honorable friend says only for a time, and means, perhaps, only for a hundred years; but the pressing affairs of a great nation would not wait until rival assemblies composed their differences. They are altogether too important. My honorable friend (Mr. Wise) referred to Sir Graham Berry. A more unfortunate allusion in this connexion was never made. No one knows the awful strain and suffering that was thrown upon Sir Graham Berry when he was the undisputed representative of the whole of the electors of Victoria, and certain persons in another place refused to give effect to his proposed legislation. It is very easy to pay compliments to the old veteran now when the days of his fighting are past, but many a bitter and heart-breaking episode that old veteran went through when his only crime was that he represented the convictions of the people of this great country.

Mr. GLYNN. -

And they have forgotten it.

Mr. REID. -

Forgotten it! Were you here at the time? I do not think any intelligent man who followed the events of that disastrous struggle will say that its effects are forgotten. It blighted the progress of Victoria in a manner which it is impossible now to appreciate.

Mr. HOWE. -

You would think they had forgotten it judging from the last debates of the Victorian Parliament.

Mr. REID. -

Well, I am very sorry that my honorable friend takes me down to that. I simply wish to point out that this reference to Sir Graham Berry was the most unfortunate reference in the world. If there had been a referendum in those days Victoria would have been an infinitely better and more prosperous country to-day.

Mr. WISE. -
If they could have dissolved the Legislative Council of those days.

Mr. REID. -
I don't know about that.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Sir Graham Berry brought in a Bill for a referendum.

Mr. REID. -
I believe my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Higgins) is perfectly right, that Sir Graham Berry, in this heart-breaking struggle, introduced a measure to settle the matters in dispute by some reference to the people. However, I will pass away from that. We are dealing now, not with the past. We are bringing into existence a new and powerful Legislature. The difficulties which exist in a nation or in a single colony, the dangers which may arise, are intensified a hundredfold by the very nature of this Constitution; because the gentlemen who sit in the Senate are there as the sentinels of state rights and state interests. Their basis of position in the Senate is that they are there to represent and safeguard the rights and interests of the states. Well, then, there is another House, and they are created to advance and safeguard the rights and interests of the people as a mass. So that the two Houses are on a different basis, and the possibilities-I hope not the probabilities-of disagreement become infinitely greater under this Constitution than the possibilities of a like kind in other countries. Now, I say that we ought to try-and I am sure we will honestly try-to put in this Constitution something which will save these two Houses of Parliament from a conflict which may give rise to the most unfederal feeling. We know that one of the greatest evils of a conflict between two Chambers is that it often engenders a feeling of dislike, a feeling of hatred, a feeling of opposition, which, perhaps, will colour the events of many following years, and, I think, we cannot do a better thing than endeavour to put some safety-valve in this machine. We may hope that that safety-valve will never be wanted. It will be a grand thing for Australia if it never is. But if difficulty and misfortune should come to this new Legislature, we should all be anxious to solve their difficulties and soften their oppositions before they deepen into permanent dislike. Well, we are doing it. This Convention has recognised the necessity for doing it. It is now only a choice between methods, after all, because the parliamentary system in Great Britain has not yet provided anything beyond the ordinary dissolution to solve these difficulties. We must not forget this, that the structure of this clause, as adopted by the Convention, recognises the great boon of the parliamentary appeal by a general election. The clause goes on to say that our ordinary and orthodox method of endeavouring to compose parliamentary disputes is exhausted, and even after your two Houses have been re-elected by the people, you then want something novel to bring the dispute to an end. So it is no argument against the referendum, therefore, to say that it is a novel proceeding. Indeed, it is not a novel proceeding, if you closely examine it. However, that is an immaterial question. What I myself wish to do is to establish a form of referendum to finally and quickly settle any such differences, if they should arise. A dual referendum I have already spoken of in the strongest terms. I utterly repudiate it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I quite agree with you.

Mr. REID. -
I also feel bound to admit that there are strong arguments against any referendum, because of the enormous size of the future Federation, because of the great expense that would attend it, and because of the difficulty that would also attend it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The general conditions.

Mr. REID. -
Yes. I recognise that it is a very strong argument; and the only thing which reconciles me to a provision which would cause so much expense and inconvenience, is the belief that this expense would itself prevent most of the insoluble difficulties between the two Houses, and that it would rarely, if ever, be used, and that, if it were used, it would only be used on some very great occasion. Now, I will name one. I believe that the most critical time in the history of this Commonwealth will arise in the first two years after its institution. We are thrown suddenly together, unused to working together, unhappily accustomed too long to working on opposite lines; and we are compelled within a short time, to perform one of the most difficult tasks that any Parliament in this world could be called upon to perform, difficult in every way, but especially difficult because of the tremendous struggle which must arise from the various interests, industrial and otherwise, existing on this continent. Now there comes the strain upon your constitution. A Tariff! Nothing is more likely, in my opinion, than a dead-lock upon that Tariff. Nothing more likely! A sort of dead-lock, too, which might throw the two Houses into great confusion. Because in no case could a state interest be more vitally at stake than in connection with matters of Tariff and trade. All the subjects in this federal charter sink into positive insignificance compared with that first great struggle as to the structure of the Federal Tariff, which will stamp and determine the industrial destinies of this Commonwealth for years to come.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Do you really think that would lead to a dead-locks matter of absolute compromise?

Mr. REID. -

If it would not, we need not trouble very much about dead-locks in this Constitution at all. If I could think that a Tariff would go through without, at any rate, a serious danger of a dead-lock occurring, I should not trouble very much about most other things.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

How would you construct the Tariff?

Mr. REID. -

I will tell my honorable friend. The Tariff must of course take the shape of a Bill. You can have a referendum on the Tariff Bill just as you can have a referendum on any other Bill, and the question will be put as to whether that Bill shall be agreed to or not. Although it is quite true that that would be a rough-and-ready method, and that many people would not like many items in the Bill, yet they would consider the Bill as a whole, and if they approved of it on the whole they would vote for it. But may I point out to my honorable friend that the same thing happens with regard to every Tariff Bill that is considered and agreed to in a legislative Chamber? There are in every such Bill many items that many members do not like, but a man does not vote against the Bill because he does not like those items. A referendum on a Tariff Bill may bring about the greatest benefit that Australia could possibly derive from the Federal Parliament. What has been the curse of these colonies but the incessant friction between opposing parties on the question of protection and free-trade?

Mr. WISE. -

Does the right honorable gentleman think that the two Houses would compromise if they thought there was some expedient behind to which they could appeal?

Mr. REID. -

I have found, so far as my short experience and insufficient study go, that the fact that there is some expedient behind has the effect of making both Houses more reasonable; and the fact that there is nothing behind tends, as a rule, to make quarrels more likely. A quarrel will always last longer if a policeman does not come along the street. And when the two Houses are quarrelling, all our admiration of parliamentary government, and all our conviction that it is the most perfect system that human ingenuity ever devised for legislating receive a shock; and when the perfect legislators are engaged in fighting instead of in legislating, the fact that the people are behind them, and that the issue may have to go to the people, will often destroy cabals and intrigues, and oppositions, which would grow rife but for that inevitable ordeal. So I say that if the fiscal policy of the Commonwealth went by way of referendum to the people, you might settle the fiscal question for Australia in a manner that could not be arrived at without such a method of ascertaining the real views of the public on that measure. But we are confined within a somewhat narrow position here, and I feel that the heart is taken out of my view of the subject, inasmuch as there is a majority here against the introduction of the referendum. I feel, therefore, crippled in any sort of effort to show that it would be a procedure worthy of adoption, because I realize on this subject that when the mind of the Convention is made up, it is not right that we should go further into such questions. Therefore, I think that I really ought to draw my remark's to a close, as an encouragement to others to follow my example, and I will sum up my observations on the point in this way: I believe it would infinitely recommend this Bill if some such provision were inserted in it.

That is my first position. My second is: Since we have to do something, I believe the best thing is to trust the people who are the source of all our parliamentary institutions, and whose representatives we are. The third point is: The institution of this method of solving dead-lock difficulties would be the most effectual way of preventing their recurrence. And my fourth point is: That if the committee will not favour the referendum, then I think the next best thing is the proposal of the Bill.

I want to say a few words. I feel myself in the position of the French general, at Balaclava, who said "This is magnificent, but it is not war." I think honorable members will recognise that I have taken up a strong attitude upon some questions that have come before this Convention, but I have not ventured to raise those questions again when they have been voted upon, because I feel that it would be utterly hopeless at the final stage to expect honorable members to alter their votes. But if this matter goes to a division, as I apprehend it will, I intend to vote with the Attorney-General of Victoria. For my own part, I shall not think of going into details upon the question, but I am bound to say that I think that there is no expedient which modern politics has devised so excellent for allowing a clear and crisp indication of public opinion to be given upon matters of public concern as the referendum. I think, also, that there are no means so good for the political education of the people as being able to vote upon a definite issue. I feel, also, that the argument about taking away the responsibility from Parliament is absurd, when you see that each measure has to go through the stage of a long second-reading discussion, then of consideration in committee, and then of the report stage in the House of Representatives, after which it has to be transmitted to the Senate for further consideration, and again has to go through the same ordeals; and at each stage members of Parliament have to express their opinions upon it; and then the measure has to go to the people, who will have all the benefit of the discussion which has taken place in Parliament and in the press in regard to it. I think it would be almost more than human if I did not allude with some satisfaction to the change of attitude that has taken place on the part of our Ministers upon this particular question—I mean our Victorian Ministers. I am glad that they have been converted since the last session of this Convention, because I find on pages 927 and 928 of the Sydney report that our three Ministers for Victoria on that occasion voted against the proposal for the national referendum. I find that there were ten who voted for it; and that in Sydney Sir George Turner, Mr. Isaacs, and Mr. Peacock all voted against their colleagues. May I use the-language which I think I ought to use? I am very glad that our Ministers are voting with their colleagues on this occasion, that our Ministers are determined that they will not always divorce themselves from the liberal sentiment of the liberal people of Victoria.
Mr. OCONNOR. -

Does the honorable member think that that has much to do with us?
Mr. HIGGINS. -

It has not much to do with the question; but I think my learned friend will recognise that at least I am justified, when I find that in Sydney, when there was a chance of carrying this proposal, before the double dissolution had been agreed to, when there was a speech from Mr. Holder and a speech from Mr. McMillan which showed that, notwithstanding an unwillingness, and certainly a misgiving, they were willing to give a national referendum in the final resort; but our Ministers then voted against it, and threw their whole weight in the scale against the national referendum. The national referendum, as now proposed, is not the national referendum which Mr.
Lyne

proposed. What Mr. Lyne proposed in Sydney was a national referendum as an alternative to a dissolution, so that the Ministry might have both weapons; but what is proposed now is, that after a measure has been sent up to the Senate in two sessions, and after there has been a dissolution of both Houses and they cannot agree, then a national referendum is to come in, a thing which will not occur once in twenty, or thirty, or perhaps fifty years.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Where will the states be?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
My right honorable friend knows thoroughly well that I have taken a consistent attitude throughout on that matter. The whole principle of a States House is based on a false, a shallow, and almost a fraudulent principle. I acknowledge that a national referendum is inconsistent with the idea of a States House, and it was for that reason that I voted for it honestly. The principle of a States House is a complete mistake. It is only one new device for the purpose of interfering between the will of the people and legislation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You want a unified Government then?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I shall not be led into that question. This proposal ought to have been made, and ought to have been voted upon, at a time when there was a chance of carrying it, for we all recognise that there is not the least chance of carrying it at this stage, and also that if it were carried at this stage it would simply come in after the double dissolution, when the referendum would not be used once perhaps in a century.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I omitted, it appears, to formally move the amendment I desired to move. I beg to move-

That after the word "amendment" the following words be omitted:-"The Governor-General may convene a joint sitting of the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and the members present at such joint sitting may deliberate and shall vote together upon the proposed law, and if it is affirmed by a majority of three-fifths."

I move to omit only the words of the clause down to the word "three-fifths," with a view of allowing my honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) to move the amendment standing in his name on the business paper. I cannot allow myself to resume my seat without expressing my great pleasure at the very eloquent address which my learned friend (Mr. Wise) favoured us with, in fact, I experienced a more than ordinary amount of pleasure at the vigorous and excellent way in which he presented all the possible arguments against the proposal. But I should like to say and it is only fair to that admirable speech, to point out one or two fallacies that seemed to me absolutely manifest. The first, which may, be disposed of in two or three words, is that the great distinguishing characteristic between this country and America is that in America they favour the referendum, because of the venality of their legislators and the corruption of their Legislatures, and that, therefore, they desire to counteract these deleterious influences by means of an appeal to the people. Had he reflected for a moment on the distinction between the two positions, I am sure his logical mind would not have suffered him to use that argument. In America, they say, we have such a miserable opinion of you as legislators, that though the two Houses agree and unite in expressing your will, your determination shall not pass into law until the people ratify it. Here we ask nothing of the sort. We say we have such an opinion of the character and competence of our Legislature that if you will only agree your will shall become law; but we also say, while not detracting from your character as men or your competency as legislators, if we find that you cannot agree in the great work you have been deputed to perform, then, should that failure attain such proportions, said stand in relation to matters of such urgency, that business of importance can no longer remain stationary, we only ask that the people may be called in to say for themselves which of their two differing agents is right and which is wrong. The next fallacy, which I think is as easily disposed of as the other, is that throughout, the thread of his speech there was a ring of nearly a century ago. I could almost fancy myself reading the magnificent utterances of the pre-reform days, when it was prophesied that should we get that reform "England's greatness was at an end; we should have mob rule. Once let in the democracy, once give votes to the labourers of England, then good-bye to all the magnificent traditions, and the still more magnificent future of the empire." It reminded one very much of the elder Earl Grey, who refused to be bound by any outside expression of opinion, and of Peel, who refused to go to the constituencies on the great question of free-trade, because he said it would prejudge the determination of Parliament. The whole spirit of my honorable friend's speech was - "Never mind the people; never mind their will; preserve the great fabric of constitutional architecture without regard to the people who are to occupy the edifice, and so long as we maintain the architecture, that is the only consideration." I think we have greater things to look at than that. He says, further, that a dead-lock is the price we pay for liberty. We may paraphrase that remark into language which brings home more clearly and nearly to our minds the true effect of the observation. Put into other language, it is "Fetters are the truest mark of freedom." If that is correct, my honorable friend's argument is correct. If it is incorrect, then his speech, magnificent as it was, falls to the ground. I believe, sir, when we carry this appeal to the constituencies the people who regard it will say to us - "We see none of the proofs of the asseverations of your trust in us; we hear from your lips protestations of fidelity in the future of the Commonwealth, and in the capacity of its people." But I fear we shall be reproached in the words of

The Scholar Gipsy -

Light half-believers of our casual creeds,
Who never deeply felt, nor strongly will'd,
Whose insight never has borne fruit in deeds,
Whose vague resolves never have been fulfill'd.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I indorse to the fullest extent what has been said as to the brilliancy of the speeches to which we have listened today; but I think every member of the committee will admit that not a single vote is likely to be affected by them. I do not consider, however, that the time has been wasted, because there is such a strong opinion among persons in all the colonies as to the efficacy of the remedy of the referendum that I think it was due to the importance of the question that it should receive, even at this stage of our deliberations, further discussion. But now that all has been done which could possibly be asked for in this direction, it appears to me that, in view of the length of time during which we have been sitting, and the large number of practical questions which have to be settled before we separate, it is time that we came to a division. The clause as it stands represents a compromise between many conflicting opinions. Many honorable members who have been entirely opposed to any provision being made for dead-locks have given way in deference to the strongly-expressed desires of other representatives. The result is that an attempt is made in the clause to arrive at some method of attaining finality in disputes between the two Houses. Those who thought that the mass referendum was the proper method to employ have already expressed their views, and have voted upon them. I was among those who were inclined to think that the best way of arriving at finality was to adopt the mass referendum; but I could not deny the strength of the argument that, in a Federation like this, the application of the mass referendum meant the extinction of the identity of the smaller states in regard to any question submitted to its operation. Many of us favoured the mass referendum, but strong practical considerations led us to sink our personal predilections, and we have arrived at a method by which, after every possible means of discussion and consideration have been given to a question, if it cannot be decided by the representatives sitting in their separate Houses, it may be decided by them sitting together. Although this may be a novel procedure, it is within the process of, and in accordance with, the spirit of parliamentary government, and I hope that, as this compromise is the result of our conflicting opinions, as it is the best compromise we can get as practical men who must come to a conclusion upon the matter, we should vote for the clause as it stands.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I think that the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs), in order to make the issue clear, should tell us what words he intends to substitute for the words he proposes to omit from the clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I am only too willing to meet the views of honorable members in any way that will be most convenient to them. When I first spoke I expressed myself in favour of the referendum, and I explained that I was quite willing to accept the dual referendum, but that I felt that the representatives of the smaller states would not vote for it in sufficient numbers to carry it. I also stated that as there appeared to be no chance of the acceptance of the dual referendum, and as I could not go back from the position I had taken in regard to the referendum, if I had to choose between no referendum and the national referendum, I should choose the national referendum.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You knew that we could not agree to that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In order to test the question whether the referendum, in some shape or form, should be substituted for the meeting of the two Houses, as provided for in the clause. I moved the striking out of certain words. I understand, however, that it is now the wish of honorable members that I should move the insertion of certain words in order to obtain a vote upon the kind of referendum which should be adopted.

Mr. HOLDER. -

No; leave it open.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I propose, therefore, after the words "and if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment," to insert the words "the proposed law shall be referred to the direct determination." The insertion of those words will enable us to determine whether the principle of the referendum shall be adopted at all, or whether the provision in the clause shall be allowed to stand. If my amendment is agreed to, we can afterwards decide as to the method of referendum to be adopted.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Then I understand that my honorable and learned friend withdraws the amendment striking out certain words?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes. I do so in deference to the wishes of honorable members, some of them my own colleagues, who think that it would be better to insert certain words.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Before the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) moves the amendment to which he has referred, I should like to intimate that I have an amendment to propose in an earlier part of the clause. My amendment deals with a matter which I mentioned to the committee yesterday. Unless the words "or a dissolution of the Senate," which occur in the first paragraph, are inserted after the word "dissolution" in the first line of the last sentence of the clause, we shall be in this position: We might have a successive dissolution of the two Houses, and the dead-lock might still continue, because there could not be a meeting of the two Houses. The Ministry of the day, in deciding between a dissolution (if the House of Representatives followed by a dissolution of the Senate, and the simultaneous dissolution of both Houses, would have to adopt what would be the most efficacious way of getting rid of the deadlock, and would, therefore, be forced to provide for a simultaneous dissolution. Honorable members who are desirous that the double dissolution may be exercised as an alternative to the simultaneous dissolution will see the necessity of inserting the words I have read. The method of settling dead-locks by a joint meeting of the two Houses cannot be adopted after the successive dissolution of the two Houses, but only after a simultaneous dissolution. That is the effect of the clause as it is drafted. Whether honorable members desire that or not is another matter. I am not going to deal with the question of the referendum; but I want to reply to a statement made by Mr. Isaacs as to the unfairness of allowing the matter to be settled by a three-fifths vote of the two Houses. The honorable member pointed out that the result would be to deprive the larger colonies of any influence in the settlement of the question. Now, what would be the proportion of votes, taking the six colonies, because the probability is that Queensland will come in? There will then be 112 members at the joint meeting of the two Houses, and a three-fifths majority would be 67. Victoria and New South Wales would have a total of 62 votes, or 50 in the House of Representatives, and 12 in the Senate. To get an absolute majority on a state issue, they would simply have to obtain an additional five votes.
Mr. TRENWITH. -
You are assuming that they would be all unanimous.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I am forced to that assumption by the predication of Mr. Isaacs, because he says that the reference would be one in which state prejudices would be dominant. I fail to see that there would be any danger to the larger states. In fact, the three-fifths, majority is an enormous concession to the prejudice or the timidity of the larger states. I do not myself think that the questions referred will be questions as between the larger and the smaller states at all. This principle was in force under the French Constitution of 1875, and in two divisions, in 1876 and 1884, the vote instead of being federal was a consolidated vote. The figures on the one occasion, on a matter in which state issues were involved, because it was a question of the right of the Senate to amend. Money Bills, were 526 against 249. In the other case, the question was that of the removal of the capital from Versailles to Paris, and the figures were 505 to 272.

The CHAIRMAN. -
It would be well to deal with one subject at a time, and we had better now settle the question of whether we are to have a referendum or a joint meeting of the two Houses.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I was simply replying to an argument used by Mr. Isaacs.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Does the honorable member intend to move an amendment?

Mr. GLYNN. -
No, I will not move an amendment, because I am not as much interested in the question as other honorable members are.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
Then I beg formally to move:-
That, after the word "amendment" in paragraph (2), the following words be inserted:-The proposed law shall be referred to the direct determination."

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -
I rise to explain the vote I shall give on the motion, and I only do so by reason of an interjection to the effect that every honorable member who is in favour of the referendum would have to vote for this amendment. I am in favour of the referendum in its proper place. I believe that for many purposes of domestic legislation the referendum is a very happy instrument. The decision of such questions as those of female suffrage and payment of members might be referred by the provincial Parliaments to the people with very great advantage, but I cannot possibly see how this instrument is to be used with effect in the case of any matter in dispute between the House of Representatives and the Senate, and particularly upon such a matter as a Customs Tariff. Such a question would be so involved and complicated that it would be impossible to make an appeal to the people in such a form that they could give an intelligent decision with regard to it.

Mr. DOBSON. -
There would he 300 issues instead of one.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Yes, and for that reason I shall record my vote against the amendment in favour of the referendum.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -
The question before us has been so exhaustively discussed, and we have reached so late a stage in the sittings of the Convention, that it would be altogether inexcusable for me to deal with it as fully as I should have liked, and as its merits under ordinary circumstances would deserve. There are one or two points that have been urged against the referendum that are such obvious fallacies that I may be allowed to refer to them. The first is that put by Sir Edward Braddon that the referendum is an excellent thing in its place, but that this is not its place, as it would involve the possibility of submitting to the people a measure containing a number of items.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Any complicated measure.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Yes. I would respectfully submit to the right honorable member that almost every measure passed by Parliament has some objectionable features in it. Our process of arriving at legislation is such that those who introduce a measure and are responsible for it being carried are very often hampered in the construction of the measure in the first instance not by considerations of what is in the ultimate the wisest, but of what is likely to get through the House. People who introduce a measure are not at any time completely satisfied with it. Then when a measure is introduced on the floor of the House, our system of perfect freedom to each member in the House to amend invariably leads, in connexion with important measures, to such amendments as to dissatisfy in some measure almost every member in the House. After a Bill has gone through its second reading, and through its committee stage, it is fair to say that every member, or nearly every member, in the perfectly informed Parliament, is in the position of having to decide whether he will reject a Bill of which he in the main approves, or whether he will accept the clause or clauses of which he disapproves. Is there any great hardship in submitting to the people a whole measure, generally containing some principle that is clear and perfectly defined, but surrounded, as it must necessarily be, by machinery, the incidents of which many persons must disapprove, although they approve of the principle? Assume the highly complicated case which the honorable member (Sir Edward Braddon) had in his mind, namely, a Tariff Bill. There would be exactly the same principle involved as in submitting to the people at a general election the question of whether there should be free-trade or protection. No person ever dreams on the hustings of arguing whether there shall be 25 per cent. on woollens, 15 per cent. on cutlery, or 27 per cent. on woodware. What is submitted is a principle that the electors can clearly grasp; and the details of which they can leave to be worked out by the competent men whom they elect to give effect to the principle. When a dispute arises between the two Houses upon so complicated a question as the Tariff, the dispute will not be over the 300 and odd items in that Tariff. The dispute will be over the principle of the Bill, which will either propose to introduce a protective system of taxation, or a Customs Bill for revenue purposes only. That will be the principle submitted to the people, even if there are three thousand items embodied. Surely, then, there would be no more difficulty in deciding on this question by means of the referendum, unclouded by a thousand and one other considerations. If the question be difficult or impossible of intelligent submission to the people, there can be no stronger condemnation of our parliamentary system of government. At every general election there is submitted, not one complicated issue with 300 items in it, but possibly 100 complicated issues, each of them different from the other, and many of them containing complications within themselves as great as that to which the honorable member (Sir Edward Braddon) has referred. If the electors cannot decide intelligently on one issue with some complication surrounding it—an issue that has been thrashed out in both Houses of Parliament, in the press, on the platform, and in personal conversation with friends—how can they be qualified to give an answer at a general election, where there are not only a number of complicated issues, but, in addition, the personal element is introduced? The electors have, first of all, to discriminate with regard to the calibre of the candidate, and decide whether A. or B. is the more intelligent, and the more likely to give effect to their wishes. Unfortunately, in our system of parliamentary canvass, there is often dragged in much that is nearest to the souls and minds of the people. Religious difficulties are often drawn in, and the question is put—"Will you vote for an Orangeman or a Catholic?" Then, in addition, there is the further question of personal character. There are all these issues, plus a complicate issue such as that to which Sir Edward Braddon has referred, and yet it has been declared, and truthfully and wisely declared, and the declaration is warranted by the history of parliamentary government that the general election is a splendid instrument. It is one of which we have every reason to be proud. But it is only an instrument, and an instrument in process of perfection. It is an instrument that is not by any means perfect yet, and one which in the not far distant past, instead of being an object of pride and veneration, was an object of condemnation and of shame. If we have been able to so improve it, is it not possible to improve it still further? My honorable friend (Mr. Wise), in his admirable speech—one that I listened to with probably more pleasure than any speech I have ever heard; a speech that was a marvel of graceful diction and research and erudition—pointed out that the introduction of the referendum was the introduction of a subtle poison that would undermine the representative system. I feel that the honorable member fell into the error of mistaking the means for the end. Parliamentary government is not an end. The crystallization in legislation of the people's will is the end, and Parliament is only a machine and means to that end. If it should happen, as I certainly do not think it will, in the evolution of economic science, that a very much better instrument than parliamentary government is discovered, I see no evil at all in parliamentary government being wiped out of existence.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Invent something better.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
That is it; and all I say is that up to the present nothing better has been invented. But up to the present parliamentary government has not completely fulfilled its object.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Has any human institution?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
No-

Mr. OCONNOR. -
This Constitution is not the place for trying experiments.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
But every other human institution has, in connexion with it, efforts to improve it. As in economic science, so in physical science.

Mr. FRASER. -
Very often they go back.
Mr. TRENWITH. -

True. Development after development and improvement on improvement take place, chiefly based on experiments that are often failures. Physical science does not stand still because experiments fail. It goes on until it succeeds, with the result that in physical science we have attained the power to stretch out our hand and seize the hurricane, and turn it into a steed to take us across the trackless ocean. We have been able to bottle up electricity, and make it take messages from pole to pole with the rapidity of lightning. All this has been achieved by experiment. The progress that we have obtained in economic science has also been achieved by experiment. When the franchise was extended in England it was an experiment. When the rotten boroughs were wiped out it was an experiment. When it was proposed to make the latter experiment, there was then said exactly what is to-day said of the experiment now proposed, namely, that it is subversive of wise government, because it lets into the functions of government the ignorant and ill-informed. That was exactly the argument urged against the Reform Bill in 1832, and, indeed, that was the only argument urged against that Bill. There were interests, there was bribery, there were personal considerations, but the only argument against the Reform Bill of 1832 was that the people were not fit to govern themselves, and that to let into the functions of government the masses of the people would be opening the halls of government to the uninformed and ignorant; and that it would lead to legislation by panic and popular delusion. But what is the fact? England never progressed in any portion of her history as she has since 1832. Although the franchise was extended then, it has been subsequently extended, and each extension of the franchise, each breaking-in of the ignorant uninformed people, so called, into the functions of government, has increased the stability, fixed and crystallized into the British Constitution and methods of government a certainty of peace, and an absence of violent revolutions, that other nations have no knowledge of.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That was under the present system of parliamentary government.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

Yes. When so much improvement has accrued from the experiments attempted on exactly the same grounds as these, and when it is admitted that, good as parliamentary government is, up to the present it is not perfect, surely that is an argument for trying an experiment which has recommended itself to our reason.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

What do you recommend?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
The proposal of the Attorney-General of Victoria.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
That has not commended itself to our reason.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
It has commended itself to our reason in one respect, because we have agreed that parliamentary government shall only be one factor in the change proposed to be made. And when parliamentary government has exercised all its ingenuity on a proposed alteration of the Constitution, then the masses of the people-the ill-informed ignorant people-are to be asked to say if they will agree to the proposal under our present system of parliamentary government. Therefore the honorable member (Sir Edward Braddon) is not right in saying that this does not commend itself to our reason. The only question is how far this method, which is admitted to be wise, shall be extended.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It is only a question of practical utility.

Mr. TRENWITH. -
I am endeavouring to deal with it on the ground of practical utility. I am showing that it has been decided by all the Parliaments represented here that when we have done our best by means of the stores of knowledge in this Convention—and they are great and when we have done our best and presented a Constitution which is the result of our combined wisdom and careful thought, the referendum shall be applied to it, and it shall not be made law even though we have agreed unanimously to it. There is no question of disagreement here. Even if we have agreed, and said unanimously, that it is the best Constitution the world ever saw, still it is not to be law until the people say aye or no.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Surely the honorable member can draw a distinction between the Constitution and ordinary legislation?

Mr. TRENWITH. -
Yes, there is a very great distinction. But if there is any argument at all in that remark, if the people are not competent to deal with it, the argument is that if a Bill such as we are preparing—which requires for its proper compilation immense research and knowledge of the history of all time, immense constitutional knowledge—may be referred to the people, how much more may be the comparatively trivial matters of ordinary legislation? There is just one other point in Mr. Wise's speech that I wish to refer to, which I think is worthy of consideration. I think it war, a rhetorical flight rather than a serious expression of his opinion when he spoke of the vague and immaterial mass known as the people. Vague and immaterial! Why are there Parliaments at all? We do not want Parliaments for areas, we do not want Parliaments for unpopulated country; we want Parliaments for people. And how much driven into a corner must so capable a man be, when he felt it necessary to depreciate the people, and describe them as vague and immaterial? I respectfully submit to honorable members that no person desires to interfere with parliamentary government; least of all, myself. I have a profound veneration for parliamentary government; and when I see it flipantly said sometimes in the press, and hear it flipantly said sometimes on the platform, that parliamentary government is on its trial, I cannot help saying that if it is upon its trial it is bound to come out triumphant. Not necessarily that it is bound to triumph ultimately in its present form. Probably we shall graft many improvements upon it, but still retain it as parliamentary government. I say this proposed referendum is no subversion of parliamentary government, but that it is really an accession to its power and importance. It will be rather a means of relieving it in the few instances when it does fail to accomplish the end that it was designed for. As Mr. Reid put it, Parliament is a machine to do work. If a carpenter has a bandsaw which will not saw, he either sends it to somebody to improve it, or he sharpens it himself. If any workman has an instrument which will not do the work it is specially designed for, he will cast it aside and he will get some other tool which will accomplish the end be has in view. The end of Parliament is to achieve legislation. If it works smoothly, if it does its work, every one looks upon it with admiration and approval. We have decided, in the interests of the people, that there shall be two branches in our Parliament which we are about to create, and which in the main will work for the common good; but judging by past experience it will, perhaps very infrequently, and perhaps not once in a century, but unmistakably it will, some time come into conflict. Then these two portions of the legislative machine will fail to work. What is their work? It is to give expression in legislative form to the people's will. When they fail to do that they are standing still, and the people's desire is not accomplished. Can anything be more reasonable in such a contingency, and under such circumstances, than that the agents who have failed to agree should be called upon by their principals to stand aside and refer that matter to the principals themselves? There will be no derogation from the dignity of Parliament in that any more than there would be any derogation from the dignity of two agents of a commercial house who went out to do business for that house, but who failed to agree as to the terms of a contract to be entered into.
Would it be any derogation from their dignity to come back and say—"We disagree as to what is best in the interests of the firm in connexion with this contract. We shall be glad if you, sir, as the head of the firm, will instruct us"? That would be a rational common-sense business-like course to adopt in politics, which is the, business of the people. The Parliament is the executive committee of the people, not its master. It is not an institution to be reverenced and held up simply because of itself; it can only be reverenced and trusted by the people while it performs the work which the people designed it for. And that is the mistake my honorable friend (Mr. Wise) fell into when he confounded the end with the means. The end is the will of the people, and the means at present are parliamentary government, of which we are all proud. But I say it is better that the present means should go rather than that the end should be frustrated. I will not detain the committee longer. I urge on honorable members that this is an experiment that is not new, and one that will not work any injury, because it is only proposed here, not as in Switzerland, or as in America, as a continually acting part of the Constitution, but, to use the language of the honorable member (Mr. Wise), simply as a medicine when the Constitution has become sick, or rather when not the Constitution but the machine that works under the Constitution has become laid up, has become incapable of performing the functions for which it was designed. One expression Mr. Wise used seemed to me to cut entirely the other way. He spoke of the Republic of Switzerland; of its limited area; its diverse population; and the natural difficulties which it has to endure; the mountainous broken character of the country; the difficulty of getting from point to point; the three languages that the people have to speak; and yet with all those natural difficulties-difficulties that would throw any but a well governed country into the greatest confusion, Switzerland is one of the most prosperous countries of which we know one of the best-governed countries. Surely if there is no difficulty in submitting matters to the mass referendum of a diverse population, divided into three sections by language, having the greatest difficulty in understanding each other's views-surely, if in such a country as that, the referendum in its application to the forms of government can work such results as it does in Switzerland, clearly there is no danger of its working evil here, where we all speak one language, where, in the main, we have sprung from one stock, and where, generally, our aspirations and desires are very much akin. We should surely understand the measures submitted to us very much better than the people of Switzerland understand the measures submitted to them, and, if the referendum has done no harm there, I think we have a right to assume that here it will work good. Moreover, in Switzerland, the referendum has proved not a revolutionary, but a conservative instrument. It has rather had the effect of delaying legislative changes than of contributing to too rapid legislative changes. Under these circumstances, I hope that all who wish for the referendum in any form, will vote for Mr. Isaacs' amendment, as I believe it will conduce to public confidence in this Bill, and if it is adopted in the Constitution I am certain that it will lead to the smooth, amicable, and pleasant working of the two Houses of Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia.) -

I should be very sorry to prolong this debate. I think that those honorable members who have addressed the Convention to-day have had what we may call a field day. Two or three honorable members have had the whole day to themselves, and I cannot think that the speeches which they have delivered, at any rate at such great length, were necessary at all. In fact, I have come to the conclusion some time ago that this Convention is being discredited by the length of time we devote to the consideration of particular questions. The people in all these colonies are getting tired of us, and I am sure that, speaking for my own colony, the chances of federation are not being improved by the length of time we are taking over the business.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Then let us get to a division.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Now, I would like to ask if those honorable members who have spoken to-day-especially I would like to ask my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs), if he thinks for a moment, or ever had it in his mind, that he was going to influence any one to his way of thinking at this stage of the proceedings? I have an idea that he never thought for a moment that the lengthy, and, I have no doubt, able speech he delivered would change a single vote of any person here. If that is the case, is it business to speak at any great length?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Then let us get to the vote.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

My objection to the proposed referendum, especially to a mass referendum, is very simple. I say that the referendum would annihilate altogether the influence of the states. How can any small state agree to the mass referendum when it would have no control in any dispute between the two Houses, seeing that its small population would be overwhelmed by the population of the larger states? I do not think that, in this Convention, we are expected to explore all our imaginations, or even to explore all the Constitutions of every part of the world in order to try experiments in the way of altering the system of responsible government under which we are working, and under which we hope to continue to live. It seems to me that that should not be our object; rather, surely, we should desire to go along the well-beaten road of which we have knowledge and experience, and which has certainly worked well in the past, and, as Mr. Reid said in Adelaide, has raised our country to the highest pinnacle of greatness. It seems to me that those who desire that there should be this referendum, and especially this mass referendum, must be in favour of one House of Parliament only. I feel certain that they are, because it means only one House of Parliament. It is no use having two Houses of Parliament if one is to be subordinated to the other, and it means amalgamation or unification. Well, we are not prepared for unification or amalgamation, and therefore if this mass referendum is to find a place in this Constitution, and the difficulties between the two Houses of Parliament are to be settled by a reference to the whole of the people of the Commonwealth, it is impossible for me to advocate its acceptance in the colony I represent.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I simply rise for the purpose of defining the position I intend to take up with regard to this question. I shall vote for the amendment, which simply seeks to establish the principle that under some circumstances the people shall be consulted with reference to federal legislation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Whenever there is a difference between the two Houses.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Certainly not whenever there is a difference, but the honorable member will see that, as the amendment is proposed, a great deal of time has necessarily to elapse. Consultation will take place, and the two Houses will have to be sent to a dissolution; and I think it is highly improbable that the necessity will ever arise for the referendum being resorted to.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Do not put it in the Bill, then.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

But I say at the same time that it is an important provision that the will of the people shall prevail in national questions, and therefore I think that this provision should be in. I would remind honorable members that under the circumstances under which we are met here they should pay particular respect to the principle of the referendum. To suggest that the people are unable to express their views on this or any other question seems to me to imply a forgetfulness of the fact that not one line or letter of this Constitution can become law until it has been referred to a referendum of the people of Australia, in which they will be called upon to express their opinion upon the whole of this Bill. I wish it to be perfectly understood that, whilst I, conceive that in national questions the people generally should be consulted by a mass referendum, I am not prepared to vote for a mass referendum in all cases, particularly in those cases where state interests are involved, and where there are conflicting interests in the different colonies. As has been put by Sir Edward Braddon, a question like adult suffrage would undoubtedly be a national question, in which the interests of the states are identical, and might well be determined by a national referendum. But, on the other hand, as regards a question which is one of the most important which it is proposed to leave to the decision of the Federal Parliament-as to the conditions under which the surplus is to be distributed amongst the different colonies, a matter involving £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 a year-I contend that it is essentially a state question, in which the interests of the states must, in the natural order of things, be absolutely conflicting; and to permit it to be decided on the basis of population, without taking into account the position of the different states, would be to place in the hands of the larger colonies an instrument of possible oppression which I, for one, would not be prepared to give to them.

Sir JOHN FORREST. - How could the two cases be divided?

Mr. KINGSTON. - I took some trouble in Sydney to introduce to the Convention a scheme for the division of cases for submission to the people. In the great majority of instances, when there is a necessity for a referendum, the national referendum should prevail, but when there is even a minority in the House of Representatives who desire, and, in the way I suggested, express their wish, for a referendum, not only to the people of Australia generally, but to the people of the states as well, let the dual referendum be resorted to. Under those circumstances, sir, and while I shall vote for the proposal, I could not vote for its general application in all cases. If it is subsequently desired that the dual referendum shall be resorted to in all cases I see no objection to that. It will seldom be resorted to; but it will aid in fully determining the question as to whether the action of the two Houses is consistent with the wishes of the people of the states. But to permit the mass referendum in all cases I could not agree to. I thought it was fair to make these few remarks to prevent any misunderstanding as to any subsequent action I might take.

Question-That the words "The proposed law shall be referred to the direct determination" proposed to be inserted be so inserted-put.

Question so resolved in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The question now is that the paragraph stand part of the clause.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I have given notice of a motion to strike out the words "of three-fifths" in this paragraph, as to the voting together. The position at present is, that after there has been a double dissolution, and the Houses cannot agree, there shall be a joint sitting, and then if it is affirmed by, a majority of three-fifths of the members present and voting thereat.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I wish to draw attention to some words before the words "three-fifths" in this paragraph, so that there shall be no misunderstanding on the very important subject of procedure when the two Houses have assembled. Although several honorable members disagree from me and say that it is not so, I gather from these words that after the dissolution on the Bill the only question for that joint sitting will be the question that the Bill do now pass.

Mr. BARTON. -

Or be now affirmed.

Mr. REID. -

Or that it be now affirmed. If that is understood I have nothing further to say. I only feel that the words are slightly open to ultimate disagreement perhaps, and it would be a great calamity if, when the two Houses did assemble, there was any quibble over procedure. If my honorable friends are perfectly satisfied that these words will allow of no other construction-

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Won't they permit or amendment?

Mr. REID. -

That is the point. If these words are such that they will not allow of any amendment or of going into details I am perfectly satisfied; but I am afraid that they are too open and vague; and after the turmoil of a general election over the Bill as it stood, and the disagreement as it stood, it would be a thousand pities if any difference arose in the joint sitting on such questions, because it would nullify the whole Constitution, and there would be no guide. One honorable member in the heat of a political conflict, aiming perhaps at, securing one point he had been identified with, might assert his right, when the Houses met to deliberate on the Bill and vote on the Bill, to test the joint sitting on a particular point, and what authority would determine the question whether he could or could not? I think it would be the general wish—certainly I feel rather anxious about it, because, if such points arise, there would be no authority to determine them, so far as I can see—that the Drafting Committee should take the matter into their consideration, and see that it is put, if necessary, beyond any doubt.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I shall have great pleasure in seeing that this matter is thoroughly considered. At present the position of it seems to me to be tolerably clear. The Bill provides that if, after the dissolution, the proposed law again fails to pass, the Governor may convene this joint sitting, which is the subject of the last part of the clause, and that then the members present at the joint sitting may deliberate and shall vote together. The words "may deliberate" mean that they can debate the subject, and the words "shall vote" mean that when they vote under this clause they shall vote as one body; they have to vote together on the proposed law. So far it is clear. Then if it is affirmed by a majority of three-fifths of the members present and voting thereon, it shall be deemed to have been duly passed. It is either affirmed or not affirmed. If it is affirmed—that is to say, if a motion that the proposed law be now affirmed is carried, it is taken to have been duly passed. I take it that if there is any possibility of making an amendment, which I doubt very much, that would not be an affirmation of the law; but if there is a majority of three-fifths, they will take care that there is no amendment.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Can they not vote separately on each question in dispute?

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think so. My belief, and it is a strong belief, of this as it stands is that if the law is affirmed, which seems to be the only question, it is taken to have been duly passed. The proposed law is only spoken of as a whole. The vote, it seems to me, must clearly be taken on the Bill. I will take care that the matter is reconsidered, and if after reconsideration any doubt remains we will clear up the doubt.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

There appears to me to be another part of this paragraph which may possibly be liable to misconstruction. I fail to see that there is any necessity to put the word "a majority of" in the clause. These words may give rise to a difficulty in the future. Why should we not say "three-fifths"? If the clause is affirmed by three-fifths of the members present there can be no mistake about it. The word "three-fifths" is plain English and is simple, but if you retain the words "a majority of three-fifths," what does it mean?

Mr. HOWE. -

Move to omit the words.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

I beg to move-

That the words "a majority of" be omitted.

Will the leader of the Convention, as representing the Drafting Committee, tell me what the words "a majority of three-fifths" may be construed to mean?

Mr. BARTON. -

It seems to me that to be affirmed by a majority of three-fifths means the same thing as if it was stated that the law is affirmed by three-fifths.
Mr. SOLOMON. -
I would ask honorable members to omit the words "a majority of," because they are utterly unnecessary, and may lead to some difficulty.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
It would make it clearer.

Mr. BARTON. -
We may as well leave it to the Drafting Committee.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
If the words "a majority of" are struck out, it will prevent me from moving an effective alteration of the word "three-fifths." If I had known that this suggestion was seriously entertained, I should certainly have spoken on it.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Perhaps the honorable member had better speak now to the two questions—one is a drafting question, and the other is a question of substance. The division on the former may be taken as a test vote on the latter.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I am absolutely in your hands, sir. I have a very short speech to make with regard to the word "three-fifths." I wish to omit this word, so that the phrase will read that if the proposed law is affirmed by a majority of the members present and voting thereon it shall be taken to have passed.

Mr. HOWE. -
Oh, this was a compromise made in Sydney.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
May I correct the honorable member, for whose opinion I have the utmost respect? I, certainly, for one—merely one of 50—disclaim anything of a compromise an this clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -
There was no compromise.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I hope it will be understood, as distinctly as anything can be understood, that I made no compromise on the clause. I want to omit the word "three-fifths."

The CHAIRMAN. -
I understand that the honorable member is willing to take the division on the amendment to omit the words "a majority of" as a test division on his own proposal to omit the word "three-fifths." It will come to the same thing.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Yes; I understand that if Mr. Solomon's amendment be carried it will be a defeat of my amendment. What I want to do is to retain the words "a majority of " and to omit the word "three-fifths." My idea is to secure finality. After all this tremendous machinery has been brought into play we want at least to have some finality, in order that the business of the Queen in Australia may proceed. I appeal to practical politicians here who have had far more experience in practical politics than ever I have, if there is not, after all, one fundamental thing to be attained, that is, to get the business carried on somehow? Let the Queen's Government be carried on is the essential first condition to be achieved. Suppose you have an Appropriation Bill carried in two sessions, and rejected by the Senate.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Is that possible?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

You will have to wait for a double dissolution to get your Appropriation Bill.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Keep an Appropriation Bill in your mind, because I am putting the most awkward case which can arise, and it is quite possible that it may arise. The Senate has full power to reject an ordinary Appropriation Bill if its suggestions are not accepted. Suppose that after an Appropriation Bill has been passed in two sessions the Senate persists in saying-"We will not have it," the next step is to be a double dissolution, an appeal to the people, and an appeal to the states. If after the elections the two Houses are still irreconcilable, they are to meet together as one body and to decide the matter in dispute by a majority of three-fifths. There might be 90 members in the joint body, 60 of them being members of the House of Representatives, and 30 members of the Senate, and, under this provision, unless 54 members voted for the Appropriation Bill it could not be passed. I as honorable members-I do not care whether they are liberals or conservatives, whigs or tories, members of the labour party or socialists-is this a state of things which, as practical men, we should allow to exist? If 53 members voted for the Appropriation Bill and 27 members voted against it, are we to allow the Bill to be thrown out and the whole of the civil service to be disorganized? All I want is that, to attain some kind of finality, we should let the majority rule.

Mr. SYMON. -

Suppose, when the two Houses met together, you could not get a majority for the Appropriation Bill, what then?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Then the Bill would be thrown out, and a new Bill could be brought in.
Mr. SYMON. -

The same thing could take place under the clause as it stands.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, but it must be remembered that behind the 53 members who voted for the Appropriation Bill you would have disappointed, baffled, and angry constituents, and the result of the arrangement would be that the minority, or rather a fraction of the minority, would rule. Although mistakes are often made under majority rule, I have no hesitation in saying that things are much better under majority rule than they would be under minority rule. I would much rather give effect to the wishes of the people represented by the 53 members than to the wishes of those represented by the 37 members. The result of the provision in the clause would be to put a tremendous strain upon the Constitution. After all is said and done, the principle of majority rule is not a fetish, it is not a theory; it is merely the most practical of common sense. It means that, instead of people fighting and putting a strain upon their physical powers they shall meet together and count heads. The provision in the Bill would prevent that section of the people whose opinions were represented by the 53 members from having their wishes carried out, while a fraction of the people who were represented by the 37 members would have their wishes carried into effect. This question has nothing to do with the question of representation of the large and small states. It will be found that in both the Senate and the House of Representatives you will have very much the same proportion upon the one side as you have upon the other, and it will hardly ever happen that the question of dividing the small and the large states will arise. The question we have to consider now is whether the majority or the minority should rule? My experience is that among minorities you find as great divergencies of opinion as exist between the majority and the minority. All the malcontents flock to join those who say no, but the reasons actuating those who vote in the negative will be very different and very conflicting. The result of this provision is that the affairs of the country will be governed by a mere fraction of a minority, helped by the remaining members of the minority. In the wisdom of the Convention the instincts of right government possessed by the great bulk of the population have been trampled upon.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is not a very proper remark to make.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I shall repeat it, because I feel that it is an absolutely proper remark. Rightly or wrongly, we have trampled upon these instincts in the respect that we are going against the principle of the rule of the majority. I need not refer to the recent debates in which the question has been mooted; but I say if you want the Constitution carried you must give way to what certain honorable members will call a shibboleth—a fad—and you must allow the majority to rule in the final result. I appeal to honorable members to reject the amendment of the honorable member (Mr. Solomon). If the honorable member's amendment is negatived, I shall move to strike out the words "of three-fifths."

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -
Perhaps it would save the time of the Convention if, temporarily at any rate, I withdrew the amendment I have proposed, to enable the honorable and learned member (Mr. Higgins) to move his amendment. My amendment really relates to what is merely a question of drafting.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I beg to move—
That the words "of three-fifths" be struck out.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
The honorable and learned member (Mr. Higgins) seems to have forgotten that the joint meeting provided for in the clause is to be a meeting of the two Houses—the Senate and the House of Representatives—and that if a bare majority were allowed to carry the vote, the Senate would be out-voted every time.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
You assume that the members of the Senate will vote together.

Mr. WALKER. -
We have, I think, in the provision in the clause, very happily hit upon the correct proportion. The honorable member (Mr. Isaacs) gave us in Sydney a very interesting description of the Constitution of the Storthing of Norway, which, he told us, was elected upon a common basis. Twenty-five per cent. of the members of that body are elected from amongst the whole House to form the Lagthing, while the remaining members constitute the Odelstthing. If these two bodies do not agree, the combined House deliberates, and the measure before it must be passed by a two-thirds majority. Here we provide that there must be a majority of three-fifths, which is, I think, a fraction equivalent to the two-thirds majority required in Norway. I will use percentages to explain exactly what I mean. In the Storthing, one-fourth of course means 25 per cent.

Mr. ISAACS. -
One-fourth generally means 25 per cent. anywhere.

Mr. WALKER. -
It is provided in the Norwegian Constitution that a measure cannot be passed by the Storthing without a majority of two-thirds voting in its favour. A majority of two-thirds is equivalent to 67 per cent. of the members of the joint Houses. In our own case, the Upper House or Senate will be half as numerous as the Lower House, and the three-fifths majority will be equivalent to 60.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Three-fifths equivalent to 60?

Mr. WALKER. -

Yes, out of 100. The 67 per cent. in the case of the Norwegian House only represents 89\frac{1}{3} per cent. of the Lower House. In our own case the 60 per cent. of the joint meeting represents 89.55 per cent. of the Lower House. If the Odelsting vote unanimously and the House of Representatives vote unanimously, they can practically have their own way, and this is, therefore, a very democratic proposal, and I trust that it will be carried.

[The Chairman left the chair at two minutes past five o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at thirty-five minutes past seven o'clock p.m.]

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question now is that paragraph (2), as amended, stand part of the clause.

Mr. SOLOMON (South Australia). -

There is another amendment which I desire to move, and which, I think, will have the consideration of the Convention. In the paragraph we find these words-

If it is affirmed by a majority of three-fifths of the members present and voting thereon, it shall be taken to have been duly passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives, and shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

According to these words it does not seem to make any difference whether or not there happens to be present only one-half of the representatives of each House. It is laid down that a three-fifths majority would be sufficient to carry a Bill. I take it that the general desire is there should be a vote of three-fifths of the members of both Houses, and it is on that point I wish to take the feeling of the Convention. I do not wish to delay the proceedings any longer than can possibly be helped, and I shall make my remarks as few as possible. We do not want, in the joint action of the two Houses, a question of paramount importance, perhaps, to some of the states, to be decided by anything but three-fifths of the members. We do not want to decide such questions by three-fifths of those who happen to be present in the House, when, perhaps, only one-half the representatives of the Senate and half the representatives of the Lower House are in their seats. If there is to be an appeal to the two Houses, all of us who ask a reasonable solution of the difficulty desire there should be the voice of three-fifths of both Houses.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If members do not trouble to attend, it cannot be a very burning question.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That, of course, may be a way of getting over the difficulty; still, we do not desire to have an important question trusted to the chance of members thinking that it is of sufficient importance to attend in their places.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Will not each House take care that all its members attend? They can make a call of the House.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is another probability or possibility, but I think it is desirable that if we are to put a provision in the Constitution affecting decisions of vital moment we ought not to trust the matter to the chance of the members taking a sufficient interest in it to insure their attendance. This has been put forward by those who fathered the whole of the provisions for dead-locks as a reasonable solution that there should be three-fifths of the members of both Houses sitting jointly to decide the question and to exercise the fullest possible powers, probably to veto the action of one House.

Mr. HOLDER. -

The clause says those present and voting; we do not leave it to chance.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is precisely where we do leave it to chance. The whole of the debate has pointed to the advisability of three-fifths of the members of the two Houses, sitting jointly, having the final power to decide, yet we are leaving the whole thing open to chance as to whether there will be a full and representative gathering of members of both Houses. I ask honorable members, and especially those who desire to protect, as far as they can, the state rights which we have striven to protect all through, to say that, in a case like this, where a vital question is to be left to the decision of the two Houses sitting together, there shall be a representative gathering, that there shall, at any rate, be the bulk of the members of both Houses present, and that the majority shall be something like the majority which we insist upon in some of our provincial Constitutions—that is, an absolute majority of the two Houses. I ask any honorable member who has taken part in implanting these provisions in the Constitution whether that is not honestly what the whole Convention means; whether the Convention does not mean that in a case like this, where we leave the question to the arbitrament of the two Houses, we shall not leave it to chance work?

Mr. HOLDER. -

We do say distinctly that it shall be a majority of those present and voting.

Mr. SOLOMON. -

That is not what is meant by a great many members. What we mean is that if we are going to leave the question, Not to amass referendum of the people, but to a referendum of the two Houses, because that is really what it will be, we should surround it with sufficient safeguards to provide that the two Houses are properly represented. Therefore, beg to move the following amendment:—

That the words "present and voting thereon" be struck out, and that after the words "members" the following words be inserted:— "of the Senate and House of Representatives."

What have we meant all through? Have we not meant that there shall be an absolute majority of the two Houses? Have we meant to give away the whole of our powers, not to a mass referendum or a dual referendum, but to the two Houses sitting together, without some control as to the number of members who shall vote upon the question? Surely we do not intend that a question of vital interest to the states should be decided by three-fifths of the members present in perhaps a thin House. I admit that Mr. Holder's interjection as to the interest taken in it, providing that the House will be a full one, has a certain amount of reason; but, still, I would ask: Can we in a matter of this kind leave anything to chance? Is it not better, as we are making some hard-and-fast rule as to the mode of deciding the difficulty between the two Houses, that we should also say exactly what we mean—that it should be a three-fifths majority of the Houses voting together, and not perhaps three-fifths of 50 per cent. of the members of the two Houses. I am sure there are members of this Convention who will recognise that this is a matter of importance, and that they do not wish to leave to the chance of what possibly may happen a question which may be of vital importance to some of the larger states.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales).—

I hope that Mr. Solomon's amendment will not be carried.

Mr. DEAKIN.—

It will render the whole thing absurd.

Mr. BARTON.—

Under this Constitution, each House will have the power to make standing orders for the conduct of its business, and there is also power to make standing orders for the business of the Houses collectively. If honorable members will refer to clause 51—I think the last sub-section—they will see that there is ample power to pass standing orders for the business of the Houses severally and collectively. Mr. Solomon wishes to tie the matter up in this way: That unless three-fifths of the members of the Federal Parliament choose to combine and vote in the affirmative, unless so many members as out of the whole number of members of the two Houses will give a majority of three-fifths in all cases, the measure in dispute cannot be carried. Is it not enough to provide that there shall be a majority of three-fifths of the votes of those present?

Mr. SOLOMON. -

Will the standing orders override this provision?

Mr. BARTON. -

No; but standing orders can be passed within a day providing for a call of the two Houses on such an occasion, and as each House has the privileges of the House of Commons, it can formulate such provisions as it likes to make a call of the House.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Under clause 51?

Mr. BARTON. -

Under clause 51, standing orders can be passed to meet any such case; and while the Houses have the same privileges and powers as the House of Commons, they have ample authority to make the reports of all such cases, and deal, by way of contempt, with persons who disobey the call of the Houses. It may be that they will never have occasion to go to that length, but they have the power to enforce the attendance of honorable members. If, however, Mr. Solomon's amendment is carried, it will be left in the power of a certain number of honorable members of the Federal Parliament to absent themselves for the purpose of defeating a certain proposal for which there was a sufficient majority, and I do not think that that would be right.

The amendment was negatived.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question now is that the paragraph, as amended, stand part of the clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I wish to draw the attention of my honorable and learned friend (the leader of the Convention) to one matter which I should like him to consider. It is this: The proposal is that the proposed law shall be submitted at a joint sitting of the two Houses. As the clause stands, must it not be the law as originally proposed by the House of Representatives that is submitted for consideration?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the House of Representatives pass any law it seems to me that it is the proposed law which they pass concerning which the expression is used.

Mr. ISAACS. -

According to the wording of the provision as it stands—of which the Drafting Committee is not responsible; they have had nothing whatever to do with it—it seems to me that if the House of Representatives passes a proposed law, and the Senate does not pass it, or passes it only with such amendments as the House of Representatives will not accept, even though the House of Representatives may pass the proposed law again, not in its original state, and a joint sitting of the two Houses is held to consider the matter, the general question arises—what is to become of it?

Mr. BARTON. -
Would it not be the proposed law with any such amendment as have been agreed upon?

Mr. ISAACS. -
It seems an important point.

Mr. BARTON. -
It is a matter of substance, not of drafting.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It is. But it is one for serious consideration. The honorable member said that he would consider whether these words "may deliberate and shall vote together upon the proposed law" involve making any amendment. I would suggest also for my honorable friend's consideration that the words would probably involve the power of making amendments, seeing that it is a legislative body that has to deliberate upon the proposed law.

Mr. BARTON. -
They must vote upon the proposed law if it is the same proposed law as before.

Mr. ISAACS. -
They are to vote upon it, but that does not necessarily mean amending. What does it mean? However, the honorable member will consider that. There is another consideration in connexion with, the matter. Passing a proposed law after the Senate has dealt with it may have one set of considerations applicable to it; but if, on the other hand, the House of Representatives passes a law that the Senate has not power to amend, another set of considerations may apply to it. There are many respects in which it seems to me that the clause will be difficult indeed to work, if it be not wholly impracticable, but these are matters of supreme importance to my mind.

Mr. SYMON. -
What would you like to do?

Mr. ISAACS. -
I do not suggest anything.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
As I understand this provision, it surely means that the matter in dispute between the two Houses will be clearly defined, and I take it will be subject to the decision of the two Houses when they come and sit together. That, I think, is what the words are intended to convey. Whether they actually convey that meaning, I am not quite sure, and I am much obliged to my learned friend (Mr. Isaacs) for calling attention to it. Surely it does not mean that the only matter the two Houses have to consider is whether the Bill agreed to by the House of Representatives is or is not to become law. It seems to me that it would be a one-sided arrangement that when they have met together the members of the Senate would only have to say whether they agreed to the Bill as passed by the House of Representatives, and that they would have no opportunity to place before that House the provision they desire to insert. Surely that is not what we mean. Surely what we mean is that the matter in dispute is to be considered by the two Houses sitting together, and, having considered the matter, then it is to be either inserted or left out, according to the vote of the two Houses sitting together under this clause. If it does not mean that I have been altogether under a misapprehension, and I appeal to my learned friend (Mr. Symon), who has taken a leading part in this matter, to let us know exactly what his view is. I have been under, the impression all along that the two Houses would sit together, that they would deliberate on the matter in dispute, and that the words would be either inserted or left out according to the voting prescribed by this clause.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That would enable them to amend.

Mr. BARTON. -
Why should not the joint sitting be allowed by the clause to pass amendments by three-fifths majorities?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Not new amendments, only as to the matters in dispute between the Houses. As to the objection mentioned by Mr. Isaacs that they might amend a Money Bill, I take it that this clause is beyond the provisions as to Money Bills, that if such a thing, were to occur the two Houses would be able to amend even a Money Bill, if they came together, and so decided under this clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -
You don't want that.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do want that. I want the two Houses, when they come together under this clause, to be absolutely supreme in regard to the matter in dispute, and to be able to settle that dispute. I had no idea whatever, and it never occurred to me before, that when they met together it would only be for the purpose of assenting to the Bill desired by the Lower House, and that the provisions which the Senate desired to have inserted would not be within their power to insert. If that is the case, I think that this provision is absolutely worthless, and I should like to see it excised. In fact, I was very much inclined to move that it be excised, as I see no necessity for it at all. But if it is to be limited in the way now proposed, it is worse than useless from the stand-point from which I view it. Yesterday I moved to have these very words inserted in addition to the proposal of Mr. Symon, and they were rejected by a large majority. I wonder whether, if I were to propose to excise these words from this part of the clause, those members who voted against their insertion on my motion would vote against their excision now. If I had any encouragement at all I should very much like to move that this provision for the meeting together of the two Houses should be excised. Surely the simultaneous dissolution should be sufficient to satisfy any one. And if that does not conclude the matter—if after an appeal to the country, the states and the people having an opportunity to vote on the question, they have not come to an agreement, then I think we might fairly let the matter go: We do not want any further means of deciding the question. If the simultaneous dissolution does not prove effective, it will show that the people do not want the proposed law. Why should we then make provision for the two Houses sitting together in case of further disagreement, and, when they sit together, why should we allow them merely to indorse the views of the House of Representatives, without having any opportunity to consider the views of the Senate? I hope that some one will move the excision of the last paragraph. I should have much pleasure in supporting such an amendment. Even if the two Houses, when sitting together, had full power to consider the matters in dispute, I would still prefer that there should be no appeal from the decision of the people.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I cordially agree with what the right honorable member has said as to there being no, necessity for the joint meeting of the two, Houses. I have always believed that the dissolution of the Senate, either following upon or concurrent with the dissolution of the House of Representatives, would effectually prevent dead-locks from happening, or would solve them if they occurred. The provision in the clause indicates a weakness which requires very great consideration. But if my right honorable friend desires to test the question whether the two Houses should sit together in the event of a disagreement continuing after a double dissolution, he should move to strike out the last three lines of the clause.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Can he not attain the same object by voting aga

Mr. SYMON. -

I think it would be better to take a test vote upon the question of omitting the last three lines. My right honorable friend may not want to disturb—I will not say the settlement—but the decision arrived at in the first half of the paragraph with regard to the concurrent dissolution of the two Houses. It appears to me that there are some matters requiring consideration so far as the proposal for the joint sitting of the two Houses is concerned. As the provision is, framed, it would appear that the only matter that could be referred to the joint body would be the law originally proposed, and any amendment agreed to by both Houses.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Are you sure that amendments agreed to by both Houses could be dealt with? How would they become part of the measure?

Mr. SYMON. -

It seems to me that they would be treated as part of the proposed law. They ought to be so treated.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I agree with that.

Mr. SYMON. -

The proposed law submitted to the House of Representatives would not be the law which that House desired to have passed if the consideration of amendments agreed to by both Houses were excluded. It would otherwise amount to this that you would be submitting to a joint sitting of the two Houses not the laws approved by Parliament up to that time, but the laws introduced by the Government of the day in their original shape.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

As passed in the House of Representatives.

Mr. SYMON. -

You would be driven back to the Bill as originally introduced to Parliament by the Government, or the Bill adopted by the House of Representatives with the amendments of the Senate agreed to by the House of Representatives. It is only if the House of Representatives disagrees with the Senate that a difficulty arises. That is the view that occurs to me in regard to this paragraph.

Mr. ISAACS. -

What is really to be submitted to the joint sitting is what is proposed by the House of Representatives and refused by the Senate.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is my honorable friend's way of putting it. It is probably a better way than I adopted, but it comes to the same thing. What is submitted to the joint sitting is what has been agreed to by the two Houses, that is, the law proposed in the House of Representatives, passed with amendments, and amended in the Senate so far as the Senate's amendments are agreed to by the House of Representatives. That, at any rate, should be the proposed law on which the joint sitting should express its opinion. It is not so important to consider that as to consider the difficulty to which my honorable friend has directed attention, and that is whether the joint sitting should not also have before it the amendments of the Senate upon which the disagreement arises. That is a very serious point. It does seem to me that the amendments of the Senate upon which the disagreement arises ought also to be submitted to the joint sitting.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
That is the object of the meeting.

Mr. SYMON. -
Of course the object of the meeting is to arrive at an agreement. If you do not take the course suggested, you put upon the Senate really the obligation of declaring that they will not have the law at any price unless their amendments are considered. If you wish to secure some result from the joint sitting, the Senate's amendments on which the difference has arisen should be considered. If you do not do that, then you carry to the joint sitting the one question, of whether or not the Bill—which does not embody what the one branch of the Legislature desire—should become law without giving the joint sitting an opportunity of determining whether the alterations suggested in the proposed law ought to have effect or not. That is not a question of drafting, but a very important matter of policy.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Surely that is taken for granted.

Mr. SYMON. -
No; until the Hon. Mr. Isaacs pointed it out, we had not got to the length of considering it. The Right Hon. Mr. Reid indicated to-day a doubt as to what a deliberate vote on a proposed law might imply. The position is ambiguous, and we ought to determine now what the scope of this joint sitting is to be, and not leave on the very threshold, perhaps, of this part of the Constitution a question of procedure which might give rise to very grave difficulty. We ought to settle it either by using language to exclude or to include the Senate's amendments, and to make clear what "proposed law" means—whether it embraces the amendments of the House of Representatives only plus the proposed law, or whether it also covers the amendments of the Senate agreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

What would be the sense of deliberating if they did not deliberate on all the amendments?

Mr. SYMON. -

The expression "deliberate" might be satisfied by a deliberation simply on the motion that the Bill do pass.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

They can discuss what they like, but that would be the question on which the vote would be taken.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes. But when you go on to say "may deliberate and shall vote on the proposed law," then you leave us in doubt as to what "proposed law" means. This is not a question affecting the smaller states, but it is a question of how far the joint sitting is to deal with the proposed law and the amendments in respect to which the difference has arisen. Do you simply want to cast the law under the table if the disagreement continues, or are you to have a modus vivendi in respect of some or all of the Senate's amendments so as to get the law put on the statute-book, and to avoid the necessity of beginning de novo with the whole piece of legislation?

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

The obvious intention of the Convention in assenting to this and to one or two other clauses was to provide a method by which disagreements between the two Houses could be disposed of. I would ask honorable members to consider whether it is any part of our duty in framing this Constitution, to do more than point out a way in which a settlement of these disputes can be arrived at. I would call attention first to clause 8, which says that the powers, privileges, and immunities of the Senate and of the House of Representatives and of the members and the committees of each House shall be such as are from time to time declared by the Parliament, and until declared shall be those of the Commons House of Parliament. Then, in clause 51, ample power is given to the Senate and the House of Representatives to provide, by standing orders, for the method of procedure which shall be adopted. If it was ever necessary to have a joint meeting of the two Houses, ample power is given there to the Senate and the House of Representatives as to a variety of matters. I need not read the first two sub-sections. But the third and fourth sub-sections read:-

III. The manner in which notices of proposed laws, resolutions, and other business intended to be submitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives respectively may be published for general information:

IV. The manner in which proposed laws are to be introduced, passed, numbered and intituled:
Then we come to sub-section (6) which provides-
VI. The conduct of all business and proceedings of the Senate and the House of Representatives severally and collectively.
Now, I ask honorable members why we should attempt here to lay down rules of procedure for the Parliament we are trying to create? Surely there is ample provision made in the clause as to standing orders, to which both Houses can agree. This, I think, disposes of the difficulties which have been mentioned by honorable members.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
Do you mean joint standing orders?
Mr. BROWN. -
Certainly; in the same way as we have joint standing orders in our local Parliaments. There may be conferences between the Houses which are a matter of mutual arrangement. I take leave to say, with all respect, in this, as in other matters, that it seems to me, that many of us are attempting to provide for contingencies which could be best regulated and provided for by leaving the matter to the Commonwealth Parliament when it is constituted.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
The two Houses would never agree.
Mr. BROWN. -
I beg leave to differ from Sir John Forrest. It is exceedingly likely that no difficulty whatever would be found in agreeing as to a mode of procedure in regard to the meeting of the two Houses.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You could easily make it clear in the section.
Mr. BROWN. -
I think we might spend hours over it-
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Not at all.
Mr. BROWN. -
I think we might spend hours over it before we could get the legal members in the Convention to come to an agreement as to the proper mode of expressing what we mean.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What do you intend? That is the question.
The CHAIRMAN. -
Order. I must ask honorable members not to interrupt.
Mr. BROWN. -
What we intend is to provide means of settling differences between the two Houses. Those means are provided amply; and I regret that the means are provided, because I agree with Sir John Forrest that the joint meeting of the two Houses is a wholly unnecessary provision. But we must bow to the will of the majority; and if the majority say that the provision must be engrafted on the Constitution, we must accept it. But as to the details to be observed in carrying out the intention we have in view, I think we may safely leave it to be disposed of and settled satisfactorily by the adoption of standing orders, with the concurrence of both Houses.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I brought this matter up some hours ago, and pointed out that I believed the intention was that the only question should be whether the Bill should now pass or not. There was a general consensus all round the chamber that that was the meaning of the clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Not at all.

Mr. REID. -

By silence.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We did not hear you.

Mr. REID. -

My learned friend the leader said that, if the intention I had expressed was not sufficient, he would, if necessary, put it in clearer language in order to show the intention, and the members of the Convention, listening as they were, raised no doubt on the point.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We were under a misapprehension.

Mr. REID. -

Now that the question has been raised, it is a matter of very serious consequence. I entirely disagree with my friend (Mr. Brown) in the position he has taken up. I quite admit that any one who does not believe in the joint meeting ought to do all they

Mr. BROWN. -

That is not my intention.

Mr. REID. -

I do not say that it is, but if there was any one who had a strong disinclination to allow the joint meeting to come about, the simple thing would be not to agree to that mode of procedure. Some of us, however, regard this as one of the most useful points of the Bill, and one of the points that will go more to reconcile the public to the Bill than anything else. If it is taken away we are left in an unsatisfactory position. Let us consider the history of a dispute which would lead to such a sitting. In the first place, a Bill goes to the Senate. If it be an Appropriation Bill or a Tax Bill, the Senate may suggest amendments and send it back. If it be an ordinary Bill, the Senate may amend it and send it back. The House of Representatives has then to consider whether it can do what is wanted by the Senate. The House of Representatives may be able to agree to some of the things, and then send the Bill back to the Senate, who then may say that they cannot accept it. So the exchange of communications goes on, and there may even be a conference, until at last they reach a point at which it is impossible to agree. Under ordinary circumstances nothing more is heard of the Bill that session, and there is a prorogation. Then the Ministry and the House of Representatives have time for further reflection, and they bring in the Bill next session, no doubt in the shape nearest to that which will commend it to the Senate. That Bill goes up to the Senate, who then either accept it or again amend it. Fresh efforts are made to come to an agreement by various means, including, perhaps, a conference, and still it is found that it is impossible to agree.
Then there is a dissolution on the Bill, and the whole of the electors are appealed to as to whether the Senate was right in refusing to pass the Bill in the shape in which it was sent to them the second time. There is a verdict by the electors. What is the issue? The issue clearly is: Who was right?
Was the House of Representatives right, after all these conferences and deliberations, in insisting on the proposed law being passed in the shape in which they presented it, or was the Senate right in rejecting it? If at the joint sitting on this simple question the requisite majority is not for the Bill, the situation develops itself. Under the circumstances the House of Representatives may choose to send the Bill up with the amendments which the Senate contended for, and no further trouble could happen. Or the House of Representatives could drop the Bill and say-"Well, if that is the decision of the joint sitting, we would rather not have the Bill than have it with the amendments in it." If the Senate succeeds on the Bill, the proper course would be for the House of Representatives to decide whether it would proceed by putting in all the Senate contended for. Let us look at the opposite course. If the whole of the Bill is to be brought up at the joint sitting the proceedings would be interminable.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Matters in dispute, and nothing more, would be dealt with.

Mr. REID. -

There might be 50 matters in dispute in the one Bill. Does my friend really propose that if the dispute is over an Appropriation Bill, which might contain 2,000 items, the whole of that Appropriation Bill is to be gone into at a joint meeting? Certainly not. Supposing there are twenty points in dispute, would we then give the Senate the power of amending Money Bills, and sitting on them in detail? What I certainly will strongly protest against is that by this roundabout way the Senate shall deal with Money Bills in detail. That would practically be the case, because, if that was the procedure, to go, into committee on all the points of disagreement, it would be a direct encouragement to the Senate to raise as many points of disagreement as possible in order to, deliberate upon them at the joint sitting.

Mr. SYMON. -

Such a thing cannot arise in relation to Money Bills, because the Senate can only suggest, and it must veto the whole Bill. Then your point would necessarily be that the Bill do now pass.

Mr. REID. -

I suppose that would be so in the case of such Bills as the Senate can only suggest amendments of. But if there are not words showing that the only question is to be that the Bill do now pass, what is to prevent in that joint sitting the members of the Senate, saying-"This is not our ordinary procedure. We admit that when we sit in our Senate we cannot do this. But this is a very different House; we are no longer senators, we are members at a joint sitting in which both Houses are one." It is true that there are provisions in the Bill that the Senate cannot amend Money Bills, but when the senators are sitting along with the House of Representatives, how can you debar them from voting on such proposals? So that my honorable friend's point is not so good as it looks. I have still as a good point, that if suggestions were made by the Senate, and if on those suggestions there were prolonged conflict and impossibility of settlement, the whole thing by this roundabout process would come back to a shape in which members of the Senate could propose amendments in Money Bills and could vote for such amendments, and could therefore sit to mould Taxation and Appropriation Bills. That would be a direct encouragement to the Senate to bring matters to such a pass that they would be able to exercise such a power. Then this boon, which was to settle once and for all the battle, and decide in whom the victory should rest, would simply re-open the strife. The object of the joint sitting is not to re-open strife.

Mr. SYMON. -

There ought to be no new matter.

Mr. REID. -
No; but that is what would really be the case. After the conferences have been fruitless, and after a fight has taken place before the electors of both Houses, which will be dissolved simultaneously-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
And both victorious.

Mr. REID. -
That would depend upon circumstances which could only be determined by a joint sitting.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
No.

Mr. REID. -
Whether one side was victorious or not could not be ascertained practically until the warriors had assembled together.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
If the Upper House found that the people were against them they would pass the Bill without any conference when they came back.

Mr. REID. -
Exactly. In that case there would be no trouble and no joint sitting. But we have to consider the position that after they return from the battle each occupy the positions they occupied before, and then the joint sitting is necessary. The only issue then is the issue on which the election was waged; that is, that the Bill should pass as the House of Representatives sent it up the second time, or the issue that the Bill should not pass, because the Senate would not pass it in that shape. I understand what Sir John Forrest said when he made his speech, and I know he would prefer that even at this joint sitting the members should be free to endeavour to arrive at a new settlement. I say that is not the place to do so. That sitting is to decide on the issue which went to the country. If the Senate is upheld, the Bill will not pass. If the House of Representatives is upheld by the requisite majority, the Bill will pass. Then, I would point out that if the Bill does not pass, the matter is not left in a hopeless state, because when the Houses separate it would be for the House of Representatives to say-"We are beaten on the issue we raised. Now we give way to the Senate, and send the Bill up again in the form the Senate wishes it." That is the way in which the House of Representatives would come round to the position of the Senate. But if you, after this dislocation of business, begin to fight the battle over again, especially when there were a number of points of difference, instead of this joint sitting being a sitting to bring about peace and a permanent settlement, it would re-open all the sores and fights which members went to the country about. Therefore, I strongly suggest that, after all the fighting and attempts at conferences and conciliation which must take place, the simple issue that we make shall be the issue whether the Bill is to pass or not, because that will not leave a hopeless situation.
The Bill can be sent up afterwards if the House of Representatives is beaten. But do not let us begin the fight again.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Would not the procedure be settled by sub-section (1) of clause 71?
Mr. REID. -
This would not be so much a matter of procedure; it is a very vital point.
When you speak of procedure you speak of the ordinary history of two Houses meeting together in conference, and that is a procedure pretty well thought out, but this joint sitting is entirely new business.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It is better to settle it now that it has been brought forward.
Mr. REID. -
Certainly. I quite agree with the honorable member, because this very difficulty might arise at the joint sitting, and might prevent any usefulness, but I strongly hope that the view will not be taken, especially as to Money and Appropriation Bills, that they are to be all ripped up and discussed and voted on by the Senate, because that is contrary to what we have done. Mr.
O'Connor mentioned to me another matter that ought to be settled—that is,
we do not want the whole thing to break down on the point as to whether the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the Assembly should take the chair.
Mr. SYMON. -
You want this to act almost automatically. It is too burning a question.
Mr. REID. -
Yes; I think we should settle this matter now, and not leave it to be settled by the two Houses, when they are holding a joint sitting.
Mr. ISAACS. -
It might afterwards affect the legality of what was done.
Mr. REID. -
I suppose such points might arise too, but I do hope the matter will not be raised in the form my right honorable friend has put it, because it will almost deliberately unsettle all that has been done.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It is better than losing the clause altogether.
Mr. REID. -
That would not necessarily follow, because the option would be left with the House of Representatives who were defeated as to their Bill in the shape they put it in. It would be quite open to them to consent to the Bill being put in the shape the Senate wished it, and then there would be no difficulty in passing it. I would like to point out to my honorable friend that the matter was not left in the dark at all. It was really considered before, because I see in the official report of our proceedings on the 21st of September last, in Sydney, this took place:-

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) says that he is going to knock out the power of amendment.

The Hon. E. BARTON. - The honorable member (Mr. Carruthers) will confine the functions of the combined assembly to the mere determination of the question shall a measure pass.

He announced that to the Convention in Sydney, and those words in the Bill are intended to carry out that determination. But a doubt has arisen as to whether the words do really carry out that intention, and it would be very unfortunate if by clashing with that we were to reverse everything that was then understood. I see that on the 20th of September I spoke on this question, and said-

It would never do for the Houses sitting together to rip up each item. The question in such a case would be that the Bill do now pass.

So that really the Drafting Committee carried out the understanding of our previous meeting, but I quite admit that the Convention is at liberty to re-open this question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

That is the way in which the Bill finally left the House of Representatives?

Mr. REID. -

Yes. <

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I confess that I have not any admiration for the joint sitting of the two Houses, but at the same time that secured the approval of the Convention, and I think we should be making a mistake if we did not arm the joint body with power to divide what are really the issues between the Senate and the House of Representatives. At the same time, we should restrain them from breaking any new ground, or otherwise they will be practically usurping the functions of the Houses of Parliament in regard to a matter which has not previously Engaged their attention, and on which the two Houses are not at issue. I do not think that this is a matter of procedure. I consider that it is a question of grave constitutional enactment. I think also it is doubtful whether clause 51, relating to the making of standing orders, and giving to the Senate and the House of Representatives certain powers, would confer on either House the right to make standing orders which would regulate the proceedings of the two Houses to sit together.

Mr. BROWN. -
That is provided for in sub-section (6) of clause 51.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I see that, but to some extent it is qualified. Clause 51 provides that-
The Senate and the House of Representatives may each of them from time to time adopt rules and orders.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That can easily be altered.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Yes, but if standing orders are required to be made in a matter of that sort, I think that a proper provision would be to arm the two Houses with the necessary power.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
We could put in the words "when sitting together."

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Yes; we could provide that the two Houses might jointly or severally make certain rules. I do not think there would be much difficulty in making this clause read as I am inclined to think a majority of the Convention would desire it to read, as to forms. In rejecting the suggestion which has been made by the Premier of New South Wales, that if you conveyed to this joint sitting the power of dealing with amendments suggested by the Senate, there is a possibility of interference by the joint sitting in Money Bills giving a voice to the Senate which they should not possess, as has been pointed out before, seeing that the Senate has no power to make amendments in a Money Bill under this Constitution. If you confine the attention of the joint sitting to the consideration of the proposed law and the amendments, the Senate can have no voice whatever in the alteration of a Money Bill.

Mr. REID. -
But would it be a Senate when sitting with the House of Representatives— that is the question? If it would, I have no doubt about the matter.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I propose that we should confine the duty of the joint sitting to two things; first, the Bill as finally agreed to by the House of Representatives; secondly, the amendments made by the Senate, and not agreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. REID. -
I would not object to that, because that would leave Money Bills out.
Mr. KINGSTON. -

That would, of course, include suggestions, and strictly limit the jurisdiction of the joint sitting to the matters really at issue. However, I am merely throwing out a suggestion for the consideration of the Drafting Committee. Possibly what we desire might be accomplished by making the last sentence of the clause read as follows:-

And if after such dissolution the proposed law fails to pass with or without amendment, the Governor-General may convene a joint sitting of the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and the members present at such joint sitting may deliberate and vote together upon the proposed law, as finally agreed to by the House of Representatives, and also upon any amendments therein made by the Senate, and not agreed to by the House of Representatives, and if the proposed law is affirmed by a majority of three-fifths of the members present and voting thereon, it shall be taken to have been duly passed by the Senate and the House of Representatives with any of the said amendments summarily affirmed, and shall be presented to the Governor-General for the Queen's assent.

The result will be that this joint sitting will consider the Bill.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

But you will not let it alter the original Bill.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

No. The joint sitting will consider simply the Bill, and the amendments on which the two Houses are at issue. There may be an occasion on which it is not a question of amendment—an occasion on which the Senate has thrown out a Bill altogether on the second reading. In that case the question of amendments will not arise; but in cases where the character of amendments is the real point in dispute—and we can imagine many such cases—there are the two things to be dealt with—the original Bill and the amendments. If the Bill is not affirmed by a three-fifths majority, it may be cast aside but, if so, then the further question arises, shall, or shall not, the amendments made by the Senate and rejected by the House of Representatives be affirmed? That will be submitted to a similar test. If the necessary majority is obtained in their favour, they will be embodied in the Bill if not, they also will be cast aside.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

It is not necessary to take a vote on what has already been agreed to.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

As I put it to the Convention, the only points which the joint meeting is required to decide will be in regard to matters on which the two Houses are at issue. Those are the only points, and they being decided effect will be given to what is the joint wish, both as regards the original Bill, and any amendment which has given rise to the differences. I am inclined to think that an amendment of that sort would give satisfactory effect to the wishes of this Convention, and I trust that some such amendment may be made.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

As I understand this matter it is merely this: That the Executive can submit the proposed law, together with the amendments that have been agreed to, to the joint sitting of the two Houses, which would then either have to agree or disagree. I think the proposal of the President of this Convention is a very great improvement, namely, that if the amendments proposed are agreed with or disagreed with, they shall either become law or be rejected. I think the suggestion which he has just made, although the language of an amendment based upon it would have to be the language of the Drafting Committee, would have a very beneficial effect. As I read it, the "proposed law " means not only the proposed law as it came up from the House of Representatives, but the law as amended and agreed to by the Senate. But as regards Money Bills, the Senate has nothing whatever to do with amending them in any shape or way. Such Bills must be either passed by the Senate or entirely rejected.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I think the solution of the difficulty is somewhat in the direction suggested by Mr. Kingston. It was not the intention, I think, of this committee when they passed this clause that additional powers of amendment should be given, either to the Senate or to the joint sitting of the two Houses. The words "or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree" must be read distributively—that is to say, in cases where the Senate can amend, the amendments can be considered, but when the Senate cannot amend no amendments can be considered. What we want to get at is some solution of the dispute. In cases where the Senate cannot amend there can be no question of amendment at all, because the dispute then is as to whether the Bill in the form which it left the House of Representatives is to pass or not pass.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Suppose it is a Bill as to which there is a dispute as to the power of the Senate to amend? Suppose there is a constitutional discussion as to whether they can amend or not?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

You cannot form any set of words by which you can deal with such a case at all. I am assuming that we can only really put the thing into two classes—that is to say, Bills which the Senate may amend, and those they may not amend. We cannot settle here whether a particular Bill comes under one class or the other. Now, the only dispute between the Houses will be as to whether a Bill as it leaves the House of Representatives is to pass or not to pass as it left the House of Representatives. The only cases that create any difficulties are cases in which the Senate may amend Bills. It seems to me that unless we give the joint sitting power to consider amendments we may miss the whole subject of dispute, because the whole subject of dispute very often is not the main principles of the measure, but the amendments made in the measure by the Senate or the House of Representatives. Therefore, it appears to me that in regard to those measures which the Senate may amend, our procedure must provide in some way for dealing with the amendments made. I quite agree with what has been said already, that it would never do to say that the whole Bill cannot be amended in any way. The dispute will, by the time the joint sitting takes place, be reduced to very narrow limits. Because, remember, the Bill goes up once to the Senate, and comes back to the House of Representatives with certain amendments in it which are not agreed to; then it goes up a second time in the next session, and it is agreed to or not agreed to; and then there is a dissolution. In the meantime the House of Representatives and the Senate have had abundant opportunities of knowing what the feeling is in both Houses. After the dissolution, the Bill is sent up again to the Senate, and in sending it up a third time the House of Representatives may embody all or some of the amendments made by the Senate, if they think fit. It is only then that a joint sitting of the two Houses is to be held; and it seems to me that the dispute would be at this stage reduced to very small limits. When amendments are made, the dispute will turn on those amendments. In cases where no amendments can be made by the Senate, it is simply a question whether the Bill shall pass or not. But where amendments can be made by the Senate, the amendments made should be considered.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
The House of Representatives' amendments will be embodied in the Bill.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It may be so or it may not.

Mr. REID. -
Only when the Bill goes up twice.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Suppose when the Bill goes back on the third occasion the Senate has made some amendments which may not be agreed to, it would then be only the amendments of the Senate which the joint sitting would have before it.
Consequently I do not think there need be any difficulty in drafting an amendment, putting the matter somewhat in that shape.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The joint sitting will have to say "Yes" or "No" to a Bill which the Senate cannot amend.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It will have to say "Yes" or "No" in regard to a Bill which the Senate cannot amend.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And the joint sitting cannot alter an amendment which has been made in other Bills.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

An amendment cannot be altered, but there may be half-a-dozen amendments, some of which may be agreed to and some not agreed to; and I think there should be a power to deal with amendments in that way.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The provision should be elastic in some way. It should not be fixed and rigid.

Mr. O'CONNOR. - There may be a modus vivendi by amalgamating two amendments together.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then you may have the who

Mr. OCONNOR. -

No, because the point at issue may be a very small one at that time. It seems to me that some amendment way be made by the Drafting Committee which would put the matter clearly, and the amendment may then be submitted to the committee. Mr. Kingston, I understand, has not prepared an amendment.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I only want to say that I think we are indulging in a little hyper-refinement in this matter. I do not think it is of the slightest consequence how we put it. Any way, the joint sitting is to consider the amendments made in a Bill, and they will consider the substance of their dispute, whatever form you prescribe, without considering these refinements. It seems to me that we are indulging in lawyers' technicalities which the joint sitting will set at defiance at once; they will deal with the substance about which they are in disagreement. I do not care whether Mr. Kingston's suggestion is accepted or not. It makes no difference. But I prefer the clause exactly as it stands. I think it is open to no possible misunderstanding. I care not whether it is a Bill which the Senate can amend, or whether it is a Bill which it cannot amend. It can reject every Bill; it can amend some Bills. And you want to have this conference and compromise and finality as well with Bills which it cannot amend, as with Bills which it can amend. The law is equally to apply to either. When the Senate has the power of absolute rejection, and in order to avoid the inconvenience caused by the exercise of this power you make the two Houses meet together, and so make a certain majority rule, what is the good of bothering, at that stage, as to the power of amendment? It will not make the smallest earthly difference. You will simply overload your Constitution with principles which will be of no substance at all, and which will have no practical effect on the mind of a single soul in creation, when they are expressed most clearly in the Act. You have a difference between the Houses, and you have not got a Bill passed. The measure is then to be sent up to the two Houses to consider, and, whether it is a Bill which the Senate can amend, or whether it is a Bill which it cannot amend, your results will be absolutely identical. To try to tie the Senate or anybody else down and say "The only points you are to consider are the points in difference"-to tell them that the only thing they are to discuss is the thing they are quarrelling about, as though they would discuss anything else, is an insult, in my opinion, to their common sense. From my point of view, I care very little whether the amendment is or is not put in. I think it will be absolutely ineffective anyhow. I think it is much better to leave the clause as it stands.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I would like to say a few words on the question of suggestion. Suppose that the cause of the joint meeting and of all the trouble has been a Taxation Bill, and the Senate, with a fuller light thrown on the matter, is able to convince the majority of this joint meeting that the suggestion it made was a proper one to be adopted, what is to be done?

Mr. REID. -

It will not pass the Bill.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

They will have to throw out the whole Bill.

Mr. REID. -

A new Bill will be immediately sent up with the suggestion in it and passed, so that there will be no trouble.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

This meeting must arrive at something; it must either throw out the Bill or accept it.

Mr. REID. -

The Bill will be rejected, and a new Bill containing the suggestion brought in the next day.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
You think there will be another session?

Mr. REID. -
No; the new Bill could be introduced at once.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
And passed in a night.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Adjourn the conference, and bring in the new Bill while the adjournment is still on.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
It seems to me that it would be far more convenient to have this meeting not only a court of arbitration but also a court of conciliation, and to give power to the joint body to adjust all differences. I do not see any reason why the suggestions made should not be considered as well as the amendments. We have been told, when we have claimed the power of amendment, that the power of suggestion comes to practically the same thing. Now, to make this difference between the power of suggestion and the power of amendment is for ever to dispose of that argument, which has been used as a sort of sop to those who wish to see the power of making amendments in detail given to the House which protects the people of the states. Once and for ever, you certainly brand a suggestion as an inferior thing to an amendment.

Mr. REID. -
So it is intended to be.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
I have always had my view on the subject, but I have been often told by those who want to secure a vote for the power of suggestion as against the power of amendment that it is precisely the same thing. If suggestions are now excluded, they are undoubtedly branded with the stamp of inferiority.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
What is your view—that it is not the same thing?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
My view is that it is a very different thing, that the House protecting the people's rights as a States House has been degraded by being refused the power of amendment in detail. Why not give this joint meeting the power to conciliate on all points of difference? Let it arrive at a decision on the suggestions as well as on the amendments. I do not see that any harm can ensue. Let us take a concrete case. Suppose a small state has an industry of great importance to it, but of very little consequence to the rest of the Federation—say the salt industry—which ought to be protected by the Tariff, and that in the Senate the proportion of one-fifth of the members, which the small state has, has been able to convince their colleagues that this is a proper subject for a protective duty, but that, on the other hand, in the House of Representatives, where the small state has practically no voice at all, its representation has been powerless, and salt is placed on the free list; if, when the seven representatives the state has in the House of Representatives and the ten representatives it has in the Senate come into the joint meeting they are able, having right on their side, to convince the joint meeting that the point of view which the House protecting the people's right took was the correct one, why should not the question be settled there and then why should not the meeting have, power to consider suggestions as well as amendments, to act as a court of conciliation as well as a court of arbitration, and finally to resolve the whole matter?

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

Although I disagree with this provision altogether, I am inclined to think that this meeting of the two Houses ought to be looked upon as a final conference. While the Houses debate separately they are governed by certain rules and regulations, and in an ordinary conference between two Houses there are certain arrangements. Now we propose a final conference between the two Houses on a fixed principle, that a three-fifths majority must rule, and it seems to me that it would be a pity not to allow a full range of common sense and conciliation to prevail in that final conference. It seems to me that if it were possible, it would be almost better for that conference to make rules for itself. Of course I quite see that you cannot open up the part of the Bill which has been agreed to by both Houses, but I think every matter in dispute ought to be before that conference for final settlement, so that an adjustment can be arrived at.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

One consideration with reference to this paragraph may perhaps affect the views of some honorable members upon it. There was an amendment made yesterday which makes a very considerable alteration in the whole paragraph. As the paragraph stood, upon the Senate rejecting a Bill, or failing to pass it with amendments agreed to, the Governor-General might at once dissolve the two Houses. As the clause was amended yesterday there is a further stage imposed. After an interval of three months, or in the next session, whichever is the longer interval, if the House of Representatives again passes the proposed law, and the Senate rejects it, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendment to which the House of Representatives will not agree, there is to, be the double dissolution. The Bill will then have received four separate considerations. It may be worthy of attention whether it is intended that the Bill should go once more through each House, or six times through the mill altogether. It might happen, if the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) were carried into effect, that the Bill would have to go through the mill ten times. But is it intended that the Bill should have to go as often as three times through each House?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

There might not be the same matter in dispute all through.

Mr. BARTON. -

I admit that. But we know what these disputes are in substance. The dissolution will be sought upon the substantial matter in dispute, and the Bill be brought forward again with the substantial matter in dispute still in it. When the sense of the electorates and of the states is obtained, is it intended that the Bill should have to be again dealt with by both Houses? If so, I would ask what substantial good can be obtained from such a provision? The Bill will have been considered twice by each House before the double dissolution takes place, that is, leaving altogether out of account anything that may be done under the proposal of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon). Do any of think, whatever the side to which we belong in this matter, that the Bill should be sent through each House again after a double dissolution? The sense of the constituencies will be taken upon the condition of the measure at the time of the double dissolution, and surely it is intended that what should be then voted upon is the then condition of the measure.

Mr. ISAACS. -

When the House of Representatives and the Senate see the result of the elections, they may agree in regard to the measure without a joint sitting.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. It may be seen that the temper of both Houses is such that the Bill will be passed by them both if it is submitted to them. On the other hand, it may be seen that it would be useless and idle to go through the form of again submitting the Bill to the two Houses.

Mr. REID. -

There is the further difficulty that the Bill might be altered in the House of Representatives, and then there would be a terrible dispute as to whether this was not evading the issue.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That shows the value of the whole proposal.

Mr. BARTON. -
Is it not only common sense that there should be an alternative course, so that where it can be seen by the Executive that the Bill will pass if again presented to the two Houses, it can be so, presented. But if it is seen that the Bill is not likely to be passed, why should not the joint sitting take place at once? There is a difference between the double dissolution and the ordinary dissolution of the House of Representatives. When there is a double dissolution of Parliament, you take the sense of two constituencies—the constituency of the House of Representatives, which is the whole country divided into electorates, and the constituency of the Senate, which is the whole country divided into states. The results of the dissolution may be so clear cut that any one with half an eye will be able to see that it would be of no use to submit the Bill again to both Houses.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It would be better to submit it if there had been a dissolution about it.

Mr. BARTON. -

If it were seen that, both Houses would accept the Bill it could be at once submitted to them, but if a different verdict were obtained from the two constituencies the question arises, is it necessary to submit the B

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

HOW can you get at the opinions of the people in regard to the measure unless you submit it again to both Houses?

Mr. BARTON. -

If the constituency of the House of Representatives gave a different verdict from that of the constituency of the Senate, it would seem to be idle to submit the Bill again to both Houses.

Mr. HOLDER. -

How can you ascertain the verdict of the constituencies in regard to a measure until you submit that measure to the two Houses?

Mr. REID. -

You could tell pretty well.

I think so. However, I do not wish to make the consideration of the matter more complex. I thought I was making a suggestion which would simplify things. Now, as to the last paragraph of the clause. It has always appeared to me that it was not intended to have amendments proposed and discussed at the joint sitting of the two Houses, or that there should be the ordinary powers of legislation confided to the general body. In my opinion, the intention is that there should be a vote taken upon the Bill at its then stage, the Bill as amended by both Houses, if it has been amended at all. I think it would be advisable to make the paragraph read in this way:-
And if after such dissolution the House of Representatives passes a proposed law, the provisions of which, in the opinion of the Governor-General in Council, are substantially to the same effect as those of the former proposed law, and the Senate rejects the newly proposed law, or fails to pass it, or passes it with amendments to which the House of Representatives will not agree, the Governor-General may convene a joint meeting of the members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and the members present at such joint meeting may deliberate and shall vote together upon the then proposed law, as amended, if at all, by concurrence of both Houses up to the time of such joint sitting being convened; and if the question that the then proposed law be affirmed is passed by a majority-and so on. That would secure three things. It would secure that after the dissolution, if the Bill were brought forward again, it would be incumbent upon the House of Representatives to pass the measure in entirely the same form. It might pass it in a form which would admit of its being dealt with under the paragraph if it were substantially the same Bill. Then it might be dealt with and amended by the Senate, so far as it had power to make amendments, and it would be submitted to the joint meeting in the form in which it had been agreed to by the two Houses. The difficulty is this, that you have the proverbial three courses. If you do not deal with the Bill at the joint meeting, so far as it is amended by agreement, you are reduced either to putting the Bill before the joint meeting in the form in which the House of Representatives passes it without any interference by the Senate, or you may allow amendments to be made by the joint meeting. I take it that it is not desired that the third course should be adopted. I have had a great hankering after that third course, but it would be accompanied by inconvenience which would render this provision futile. If you abandon that idea, you have the other two courses left. It may be that what I am saying now only accentuates the difficulty of the proceeding. It is a difficult proceeding, and I would ask honorable members to consider it from these points of view-the possible injustice of submitting to, the joint meeting the proposed law as it has passed one House only, and the possible futility and inconvenience of turning the joint meeting into a legislative body with power to make amendments. Then there is only left the third of these proposals, the dealing with the Bill at the stage to which it, has been brought by the concurrence of the two Houses.

Mr. HOLDER. -

There is another possibility. The joint sitting could consider the amendments about which the two Houses had disputed.

Mr. BARTON. -
If you did that you might be, on the one hand, limiting the power of the joint meeting so that it could not go beyond those amendments, and substitute for all or any of them alternative propositions, or, on the other hand, you might get the thing into a worse form altogether, because you might be bringing the matter into a legislative sitting of the joint committee. If they discuss the questions in dispute and decide upon them they will really make amendments in the Bill, and it is not intended that the joint committee should do that. I think that the fourth course leads one into greater difficulties than the others. The only possible plan is to take the Bill so far as it has been amended. The parts of it not yet amended by agreement and the parts of it amended by agreement will still be parts of the Bill, and together they will constitute the whole Bill. Would it not be better to take a vote upon that, than to run the risk of the injustice and the inconvenience the other courses might involve?

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

What would be the use of the joint meeting?

Mr. BARTON. -

I never was in love with the plan of a joint meeting. I voted for it as a means of arriving at finality, instead of resorting to another proceeding which, as it appears to me, would be the very poison of constitutional government, that is, the referendum. I have always been alive to the difficulties that surround this question of the joint meeting, and I have pointed out a few of them. My own view was that these proceedings might have terminated at the joint dissolution, but I recognise that I cannot stop short at my own opinion in a matter of this sort, because we have to submit the measure to the ultimate vote of the people. I am satisfied that they will demand something more than a joint dissolution. We have then to choose between a joint meeting of the two Houses and the referendum, and I accept the former as the lesser of two evils. I felt bound to point out the many inconveniences which surround the whole process.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

With the first point referred to by the leader of the Convention I shall deal briefly, because it is not new to us, and we should not go back to it even if it were not as important as he suggests. That is the point as to the reference of a measure back to Parliament after a dissolution, or the reference of it right away to the joint meeting without requiring that it should go back to the Parliament. I hope we shall not adopt that alternative, because it would be impossible to say after a dissolution whether the will of the one House or the other would prevail until you presented the question to them for reconsideration.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You may have new men.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes, or old men with new opinions. We should not adopt any extraordinary methods until ordinary methods have failed. After a dissolution the right course is to refer the measure back to both Houses of Parliament, and not until they have considered it should we have recourse to this extraordinary plan of a joint meeting. I do not like the idea of a joint meeting, but at the same time I am going to be loyal to this provision, because I recognise that it is part of a compromise. We have taken these clauses, and, setting aside some little dislike we have to them, we have stood by the agreement we arrived at in Sydney. I believe that the majority of us are prepared to stand by it to the end. I now come to the question of the way in which the joint meeting is to dispose of any measure. I hope that our leader will yet see his way clear to adopt the principle suggested by our President, that the joint meeting should have power to consider the Bill and any amendments on it. That would exclude suggestions on Money Bills. We know that a Bill may be passed by one House, and sent on to the other. The other House may make amendments in the Bill, and return it, when the amendments or some of them may be agreed to, perhaps with further amendment. The real question in dispute might, after all, be the acceptance of an amendment on an amendment. Surely we should allow the joint meeting to consider such an amendment, and say that their decision should be final. The Drafting Committee have ability enough to deal with this matter, and if they would undertake to consider it after the Convention has declared its views we could at the next recommittal stage come to an agreement upon it. We certainly ought, in fairness to the Drafting Committee, to inform them what our will is. I think a large majority of honorable members desire that the power of the joint meeting of the two Houses should be large enough to include all matters that are the subject of dispute. If we accept the words which the President has suggested, or some other words which will give the necessary instruction, the committee could, by the morning, or at an early date, dispose of the whole question. If the President hesitates to submit his motion because of his official position, I should be quite prepared, on his behalf, to submit it. Not that the insertion of the words would be final, but they would simply convey to the committee an intimation of what the wish of the majority of the Convention may be.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-
That after the word "thereon" the following words be inserted:-"with or without the amendments, if any, agreed to by the House of Representatives, or made by the Senate and not agreed to by the House of Representatives.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That would enable them to go into the whole question of the amendments.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
No; it would enable them to go into the amendments which had been made by the Senate or House of Representatives and not agreed to. It would bring in only those matters which are in dispute.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
We do not want to recommit any clauses, but a doubt has been raised by legal members as to whether by this vote the law would be passed.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I understand, Sir Richard Baker, that you are putting the amendment of the right honorable member (Mr. Kingston)?

The CHAIRMAN. -
No; it is the amendment of the Hon. Mr. O'Connor, but it is the same in effect as that of the President.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I would like to test the feeling of the committee as to whether suggestions should not be sent on as well as amendments.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -
No, no.

Mr. GLYNN. -
It is all very well for members to say "No, no." The House of Representatives is protected against blocking by the Senate, but there is no protection against the blocking of legislation initiated by the Senate.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Is not that all the better?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I do not think that it is.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Would it not be better to deal with the question of suggestions at the end of the clause?

Mr. GLYNN. -
So long as the question is dealt with before the final drafting I do not mind where it is dealt with. Honorable members may talk about referring general matters to the joint meeting, but after all what would be referred would be Money Bills. That is the reason there is no provision made for stopping a deadlock in legislation initiated by the Senate. I think there ought to be an opportunity of testing the feeling of the Convention as to whether suggestions, which might be the cause of a Bill being rejected by the Senate and result in a dead-lock, ought not to be included.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You had better give the Senate power to amend Money Bills at once and end the matter.

Mr. GLYNN. -
That is a different thing altogether. As Dr. Cockburn has said, this is a sort of joint meeting for the purpose of conciliation. In order to test the feeling of the committee, I beg to move as an amendment on the

That, after the word "amendments," the words "or suggestions" be inserted.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -
Before the honorable member tests the feeling of the Convention, I would like to ask legal members whether what the honorable member desires is not covered by the words "fails to pass" in the early part of the clause? Of course, a Bill "fails to pass" if it is sent back to the House of Representatives with suggestions or amendments.

Mr. BARTON. -
If the House of Representatives does not accept the suggestions, and the Senate thinks fit to shelve the Bill, that is failing to pass it.

Mr. BROWN. -
Yes, that is what I think Mr. Glynn desires, and what I think is covered by the words I have mentioned.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
Like Mr. Barton, I have never been in favour of this joint sitting, and I felt very strongly that a wiser course would have been to strike out the provision altogether. But, still, as we have determined that we are to have a double dissolution, and as I believe a minority of the Convention are anxious to have something following the double dissolution, and as they would not agree either to a national or a dual referendum, I think we now are practically bound to carry the clause as we passed it in Sydney. If we are to have a joint sitting, let us endeavour, whether we like it or not, to make that joint sitting effective. With that object in view, although at first I was inclined to think that the joint sitting should either affirm or reject the Bill, I am quite willing to fall in with the proposal that has been made that the joint sitting should have power to deal with the amendments which were before discussed by the two Houses. I think, however, that when we have gone that length, we have gone the full length we ought to go, and that those who are anxious to conserve and preserve the rights of the Senate should not attempt to force us a step further. What are we asked to do by the amendment suggested by Mr. Glynn? We have given to the Senate, not the power to amend Money Bills, but simply the power to make suggestions. Mr. Glynn now desires that when the joint sitting takes place, those suggestions shall be taken into consideration, voted upon, and decided by the joint meeting. That means that if there is a sufficient majority made up of members of the Senate combining with a small majority in the House of Representatives, the Senate will have its own way, and be practically able to make amendments in Money Bills.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

There must be a three-fifths majority.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

They would vote pretty solidly on this matter in order to gain their point, and in order to obtain an advantage. Experience shows that the House which has not the power to amend Money Bills will always try to do so. A large number of senators, combining with a comparatively small number of members of the House of Representatives, would be able to make amendments in Money Bills. We know what the feeling of the senators will be. They will say "We have been deprived of the power of amending Money Bills which we think we ought to have." They will want to have a finger in the financial pie, and their leaning will be to make amendments directly or indirectly. If it is the object of Mr. Glynn to get this power of making amendments in Money Bills in favour of the Senate, let us do it openly, and honestly say at once that we will do away with the compromise arrived at—that with regard to Money Bills the Senate shall only have power to make suggestions. Let us give them the power at once to make amendments in Money Bills. Mr. Glynn is going too far. While I am glad to be able to meet those who desire to give the fullest possible power to the two Houses sitting jointly, I am not prepared to go to the length, by the means which the honorable member has suggested, of giving the Senate power to amend Money Bills. I hope he will not propose his amendment, because if it is carried it may result in the loss of what others are anxious to get.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

Every one knows that I have always been an advocate of equal powers for the Senate, but in Adelaide and Sydney a majority of the House were adverse to my desires. It seems to me that we have accepted the position with regard to the powers of the Senate in dealing with Money and Taxation Bills, and I do not think we are justified in attempting to get, by a side-wind, a power which this House has refused to give in the Money Bills clause. I have not consulted any one, but I think we are not justified in asking this House to confirm the principle that the joint sitting of the Houses should have power to deal with suggestions in Money Bills. I hope Mr. Glynn will not press his amendment, and, if he does, I shall have to vote against it, although I believe in both Houses having the same power with regard to all measures. But I am not going, by a side-wind, to attempt to get what was denied to us when we were dealing with the money clauses.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I voted in Adelaide to take away the power of amending Money Bills from the Senate, although that course was very unpopular at the time in my colony. In Sydney I spoke against it, but I look upon the proposal which I now make as quite a different matter. If there are six colonies there will be 36 senators, and the Senate, sitting by itself, could, by the votes of nineteen members, carry amendments in Money Bills, but the whole 36 when sitting with 112 members of the House of Representatives could not carry them. If the Senate voted in one block they could not carry one of their suggestions at the joint sitting of the two Houses, However, I do not want to do more than test the feeling of those who have stronger prejudices than I have with regard to the Senate. My object is that the matter should be considered to-night. Of course, if such a lion in defence of the Senate as Sir John Forrest will not support the amendment, I shall not press it. Compared with Sir John Forrest, I have a leaning in favour of the House of Representatives. I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. O'Connor's amendment to insert words after "thereon" was agreed to.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I would like to ask if there is anything in the fact that no time is mentioned after the dissolution? If after the dissolution a proposed law fails to pass, it may be brought up twenty years after the dissolution. I think that a time should be fixed-say, six months or one year.

The paragraph was agreed to.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
We have now arrived at a conclusion with regard to this matter of the solution of dead-locks. The provision which is now about to be embodied in the Bill contains an alternative method of dealing with any anticipated dead-lock. Of course, the provision which I have struggled for, and which I believed, and still believe, to be that which would carry out the intention, not only most effectually but most justly, with regard to the solution of dead-locks is that known as the consecutive dissolution, embodied in the first paragraph of the clause. That has been inserted, but with it has also been inserted, by a larger majority of this Convention, the provision which is known as the concurrent or simultaneous dissolution, and attached to that there is a further provision for a joint sitting of the two Houses in the event of the simultaneous dissolution not leading to a solution of the difficulty between the two Houses. It appears to me that to retain these alternative provisions in this Constitution would be a disfigurement of this Bill. I have, as honorable members know, fought this question in Sydney, and I fought it again here, for a consecutive dissolution. I have resisted to the very utmost of my power the concurrent dissolution, but I acknowledge, frankly, that with regard to the consecutive dissolution I have been beaten. I certainly have no desire—simply in order to see it in this Constitution—to retain a provision for which I have all along fought if, by retaining it, we have an alternative provided which, it seems to me, would be a blot upon the Constitution which we are engaged in creating. I do not think this Convention desires, and I do not think it ever did desire, that there should be an alternative embodied in the Constitution. It might, as our leader has pointed out, lead to the Bill passing through what he has called "the mill" ten times. Such a possibility is not likely to arise, but it is a possibility which might arise; and while I am as tenacious as anybody of what looks like a victory, I do not wish to retain something which, though in form and in words, is a victory, may result in confusion, and would, on the face of it, I think, be an instrument in the hands of adverse critics to discount or hold up to ridicule the efforts of this Convention in solving this question. Therefore, if the course contemplated in Sydney was that the matter should be left as a tentative proposal in order that it might be considered in the interval, I think the best course would be to strike out the first paragraph, which was inserted on my own motion, and I shall be prepared to assist the honorable member, speaking for myself personally, to strike it out. I really think it would be a rank absurdity to leave it in the clause. I cannot say more than that of a proposal to which I would be firmly wedded if I could only have seen it there alone. While we are here as a full Convention, I think probably the better plan would be that we should not insert the whole of this clause, but eliminate the paragraph in question

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

Having taken a prominent part with Mr. Symon in advocating the simultaneous dissolution of the two Houses of the Federal Parliament, and having been defeated, I desire that the Bill should not be disfigured by alternative methods inserted in it. Therefore, I am very glad to say that I shall be pleased to assist him as far as I can in expunging from the Bill paragraph (1) of this clause, if our leader finds a way of doing it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There is a way of doing it which has been adopted during the currency of the Convention here. I do not want to add to the debate, except that I think it would be a disfigurement of the Bill to have both these provisions for a consecutive and simultaneous dissolution in the clause; and, although both have been carried, it probably was the desire of the committee that, in the end, only one of them should be adopted, together with the joint vote of the two Houses of the Federal Parliament; and that that provision which had the largest majority in its favour should be the one finally decided on. I do not want to ask honorable members to recommit the Bill again for the sake of anything that we can decide as we go along, because there will have to be a recommittal, which I hope will be mainly formal, for considering drafting amendments, and we do not want to do anything beyond that. I think the most judicious thing will be to deal with the matter at once, and if honorable members agree to that course, I beg to move, Mr. Chairman, that you report progress, and ask leave to sit again when you have obtained an instruction to the committee on this subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the standing orders be suspended in order to enable me to move, without notice, an instruction to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -

I now beg to move-

That it be an instruction to the committee that they have leave to consider clause 56B, with a view to omitting the first paragraph thereof.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention then resolved itself into a committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Instruction has been given to the committee that they have leave to reconsider clause 56B, with a view to striking out the first paragraph.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I had very great pleasure yesterday in following my learned friend (Mr. Symon) in supporting the inclusion of the first paragraph, and I should be pleased to see both paragraphs retained, for I think that each affords an excellent opportunity for reducing both Houses of the Federal Legislature into obedience as regards the wishes of their constituents. However, it seems to me that a majority of the Convention think that the one power would be sufficient, and it does seem rather unlikely that when the power to dissolve each of the Houses is vested in the Executive, it would be exercised by the Executive to the extent only of dissolving the House of Representatives, which h

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That paragraph (1) be struck out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 68-The command in chief of the naval and military forces of the Commonwealth is hereby vested in the Governor-General as the Queen's representative.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

In the absence of the Hon. Mr. Deakin, I beg to move the amendment of which he has given notice:-

That the words "as the Queen's representative" be omitted, and the words "acting under the advice of the Executive Council" inserted in lieu thereof.

This is a very important amendment. I raised this question before, I think, in the Constitutional Committee in Adelaide, but I was unable to get a majority then. However, the question has now come forward with a greater degree of importance than ever, because it appears from certain correspondence which has been laid on the table of the Parliament of New South Wales that it has been claimed by the military authorities of one of the colonies that the Governor should be the actual administrative head of the permanent military forces; that the Minister of War should practically be a nonentity; and that the commanding officer should refer all matters direct to the Governor. I observe that Mr. Deakin has entered the chamber, and perhaps he will speak to his amendment.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I beg to thank the honorable member for submitting my amendment on clause 68 during my momentary absence from the chamber. That amendment expresses, not perhaps in the best way, but in a sufficiently clear fashion, a proviso which it seems necessary to embody in some form. As the clause stands, it refers to the Governor-General alone as Commander-in-Chief of the Naval and Military Forces of the Commonwealth. It is in contrast with other clauses, such as clause 63, where it is provided that the Governor-General may appoint officers to administer such departments of State of the Commonwealth as "the Governor-General in Council" may from time to time establish—a clear distinction being drawn in that clause between a power vested in the Governor-General himself and the power vested in the Governor-General in Council. In the same way, in clause 66, honorable members will notice that until the Parliament otherwise provides, the appointment and removal of all officers of the Executive Government of the Commonwealth is vested in the Governor-General in Council. And again, in clause 83, it is provided that no money is to be drawn from the Treasury of the Commonwealth except under appropriation made by law; but until the expiration of one month after the first meeting of the Parliament "the Governor-General in Council" may draw upon the Treasury, and expend such moneys as may be necessary for the maintenance of any department transferred to the Commonwealth under this Constitution, and for the holding of the first elections for the Parliament. In clause 85B, which relates to the "Transfer of land, buildings, vessels, &c.," to the Commonwealth, the Commonwealth is to take over property "for such time only as the Governor-General in Council may declare to be necessary." So that here we have a series of clauses in which, for the most part," the Governor-General in Council" is the phrase used when it is intended that this high officer shall act with the advice of the Executive Council; and the distinction in this clause, where the words "in Council" are omitted, appears to point directly to some additional personal power to be vested in the Governor-General in regard to the control of the naval and military forces of the Commonwealth. If that be the case—and it does appear to me to be the case—it is distinctly a retrograde step. In his Parliamentary Government in the British Colonies, Mr. Todd, at the very outset of his work (page 17), says-

The prerogatives of the Crown in relation to the army and navy, and in the direction of the foreign policy of the empire, were at first, and for a time, practically excluded from Ministerial control; but these monarchical functions gradually became subject to the supervision of Ministers, and it is now obvious that any attempt on the part of the Sovereign to retain in his own hands power, in respect to military administration or diplomacy, would be as inconsistent with constitutional usage as would be the personal and direct interference by the Sovereign in domestic affairs. In all acts of government the Ministers of the Crown are required to assume, on behalf of, and with the consent of, the Sovereign the burden of personal power, and thereby relieve the Crown of all personal responsibility.

The whole subject is considered more elaborately by Mr. Todd in the 12th chapter of the same book, headed "Imperial Dominion exercisable over Self-governing Colonies in Military and Naval Matters" (page 370), which deals with matters down to the year 1894. Without wearying honorable members with unnecessary references, inasmuch as there is likely to be some opposition to this proposal, I feel bound to point out some facts. Mr. Todd notices, in the case of Victoria, that the Governor exercises no more authority in military matters than he exercises in regard to the other departments of the State. In Canada, from the time of the initiation of the Confederation, so far as the Governor-General is concerned, a similar practice has prevailed. The Governor-General acts by the advice of his Executive Council. In New South Wales a difficulty has arisen in connexion with this question, and a compromise was arrived at during the Premiership of Sir George Dibbs, by which there was left to the Military Commandant of that country the right to primarily consult the Governor in respect to questions of discipline; and, as a matter of fact, that removed to a large extent the control of the naval and military forces from Parliament, and from the Ministry of the day.

Mr. HIGGINS. - Does the correspondence which we have had placed in our hands relate to that dispute?

Mr. DEAKIN. - That is the correspondence. Then there is the famous South African case, where the whole matter became of such importance that it led to the actual dismissal of a Government—that of Mr. Molteno—and to a full discussion of the whole subject in the Cape Parliament, when the first resolution carried was that in all matters relating to the control of the colonial forces, the Governor should act with the advice of his Executive Council—a settlement which was entirely approved by the Imperial authorities in England. So far as this colony is concerned, I could, if it were desirable, having the materials at hand, trace the history of the struggle which went on from 1862 to 1870, when, in an indirect manner, we obtained a satisfactory settlement, which is in fact the present practice. The Parliament of Victoria passed an Act dealing with the military and naval forces, which provided in one section that while the Governor was referred to as the Commander-in-Chief he should act under the advice of his Executive Council. As a matter of fact, that Act did not receive Her Majesty's assent because of another section, having no relation to this, which did not meet with the approval of the Imperial authorities. In the despatch relating to the question which I hold in my hand, the Imperial authorities directly and specifically assented to the section in which we had made it perfectly clear that in matters relating to the control of the colonial forces, just as in every other branch of our colonial service, the Governor was to act with the advice of his Executive Council, and that the control of the military and naval forces was to be managed through the Minister of Defence.

Mr. BARTON. -

As it is now, the Governor cannot act without the advice of the Minister any more than the Queen, can, even if not specified to, be "in Council."

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Quite so, that is clearly the case in Victoria, in South Australia, and in South Africa, but I think it is not quite the case in New South Wales. But this clause casts grave doubts upon the position as to whether it would be the case under the Commonwealth. At all events, the matter is of sufficient importance to be placed beyond doubt. These forces will be raised and paid for by the Commonwealth, and should be under the control of the Commonwealth Parliament and Executive, just as much as any other department of the State.

Mr. LEWIS. -

In time of war?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

With regard to time of war there are Imperial regulations which direct the procedure to be followed; but even then the money and forces required would be raised by the Parliament and expended through the Minister of Defence. Whether in time of war or in time of peace no important step should be taken in connexion with the naval or military forces of the Commonwealth except through the Minister of Defence.

Mr. BARTON. -

As a member of the Executive Council?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The Minister of Defence advises the Governor-General through the Executive Council, or with the knowledge of his colleagues. The Governor-General is to be in the position in which the Queen is in regard to accepting advice. What is necessary is to make it clear that the claim several Governors have advanced in these colonies, and which has been rejected in all the colonies except, perhaps, one, is not to be recognised under the Commonwealth. The claim that has been made by some Governors amounts to this: That they are endowed with some personal power and personal control of the military and naval forces independently of their Executive Council, and independently of the Parliament of the country. I have been supplied by an ex-Minister of Defence in this colony with a great quantity of correspondence, some of it of an exasperating and exasperated character, with regard to this question in Victoria. We found the position intolerable until we settled it that the ordinary constitutional rule should apply in connexion with naval and military departments as with regard to others; and that, while the Governor is to remain as Her Majesty's representative in supreme control of all functions of government, he will be required to act in this, as in other matters, on the advice of his Executive. In no case is he to be endowed with the personal power to act over the heads of Parliament and the Ministry, by whom these forces are called into existence and by whose contributions they are maintained.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Suppose any man refused to obey orders on parade—what then?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
If a man refused to obey orders on parade, that, as a question of discipline, might in some colonies go direct to the Governor, past the Minister of the department altogether.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
But not here in Victoria.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Not here in Victoria. I have some correspondence in which Sir Henry Parkes points out that an offer of a battery of artillery for service in South Africa had been made over his head and without his knowledge. The Premier of New South Wales found that a portion of his military force had actually been offered for service outside the colony without so much as an intimation of the intention to make such an offer being sent to him.

Mr. BARTON. -
He laid down an indisputable principle in that minute, which has ever since been followed under a Constitution which does not require these words.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Sir Henry Parkes laid down that principle, but the difficulty afterwards arose again, and a memorandum was made by Sir George Dibbs on the matter. There is still in New South Wales the practice of sending through the Minister of Defence sealed envelopes containing statements with regard to the management of the defence force and its discipline, which he does not open, and is not allowed to open, but which go direct to the Governor. That is an intolerable position. It is a position which we have fought against here, and successfully contested. I trust we will place it beyond all question in the Commonwealth we propose to establish that ordinary constitutional usage shall prevail.

Mr. SYMON. -

Under an Act of Parliament, or how?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

We passed a Bill which, for another cause altogether, was laid aside, but in informing us that the proposed Bill was not assented to by Her Majesty the Imperial Government conveyed to us their entire approbation of this particular clause in which we

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Divide!

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It is rather a new feature in the proceedings of this Convention that any body should call for a division without bearing both sides of the question. After we have spent seven weeks in our deliberations such a novelty comes with the refreshment of a cool sea breeze. I am certainly not going to waste any of the time of the Convention. I have very few words to say about this matter. I wish only to speak to the point. It is perfectly competent for any Minister under responsible government, such as we have it, to secure for the people through their Executive Council every control that my learned friend wishes to obtain, that is to say, every control of the entire management and administration of the department for which the Minister is responsible. In the Imperial Constitution, much of which is unwritten, there is no necessity for a provision of this kind in order to insure that the prerogative shall be administered in trust for the people, and it is laid down by every constitutional writer whose word is worth having that every prerogative of the Crown is now administered in trust for the people, which means, and is stated to mean, that it is administered by the advice of a responsible Minister. It is quite true that in a most exceptional way the Commandant in New South Wales once offered to the Governor a battery of troops to serve out of the colony. I believe that the Commandant would not at all have been impressed by the particularity of adding the words "in Council" to the word "Governor" in any Act dealing with the subject. The person who made that offer would have made it under any circumstances. The question is, is there sufficient power, as matters stand, to prevent such things from being done, and to insure punishment, if necessary, for their being done? In the minute to which my learned friend has referred, Sir Henry Parkes recognised that power by saying this-

The military forces have been called into existence by the Parliament, and are paid out of the revenue of the colony, and they are as much subject to the control of the responsible Government existing in this colony as any other branch of the public service.

That is clear enough, I think.

I lay this down as an indisputable principle, and in future I must treat any violation of this principle by the Commandant as I should treat any similar violation of the principle by any other servant of the Government.

Why? Although the Governor is, under the prerogative, the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces, although he is so styled in the Governor's instructions, even under a Constitution like that of New South Wales, which does not mention the powers and functions of the Governor, who only derives his powers and functions from his commission and instructions, how can a Military Commandant be appointed except by the Governor in Council? It is by the Governor in Council that he is appointed, without any words of this kind in the Constitution to necessitate it at all. Appointments to that, as to other positions, are made by the Governor in Council, which means the Executive, and the determination of the Executive means the determination of the Cabinet, into which no Governor can intrude any more under the law of New South Wales than he could under the law of this Constitution. But the man who is appointed by the Governor in Council—that is to say, by the Executive; that is again to say, by the Cabinet—may be removed for misconduct by the authority which appointed him. It simply comes to this: On the advice of a Minister, if the matter is sufficient to lay before the Cabinet, the Cabinet decides that the official shall be removed, and it could be done in that ease. What happens then? An Executive minute is prepared, in which the Minister recommends the removal of the officer; that minute is adopted in the Executive Council, over which the Governor presides, and the Governor in Council has then removed the man. That you can do under a Constitution which does not contain the words "in Council" at all, simply because the power which appoints can remove. The officer may be under an engagement, but if he is under an engagement, who makes the engagement with him except the Executive, which is the Governor in Council? He cannot be removed so as to break an engagement, except at the risk of giving him some compensation. If you put in the words "in Council," you would not alter the legal position by so much as a hair's breadth. The matter really comes to this: There are certain prerogative rights which have been long demitted or got rid of by statute or by other practice—generally by statute—and in any statute drafted the words "in Council" are inserted. There are certain other prerogative rights which, not having been the subject of such demission, as it is sometimes called, I believe, not having been given up in any way, apparently, are not so described in a statute. There are certain prerogative rights—this was all gone into at Adelaide, and decided by the Convention according to the contention I am advocating—which are not described in a statute as rights of the Governor in Council, simply because no statute has ever dealt with them, and because they belong to that part of the prerogative which has never been nominally given up by the Crown. Of such is the power to summon and dissolve Parliament, to which no one who understood these matters would dream of adding the words "in Council." But yet these rights can never be exercised without the advice of a responsible Minister, and if that advice is wrongly given it is the Minister who suffers. Then, again, there is the prerogative right to declare war and peace, an adjunct of which it is that the Queen herself, or her representative, where Her Majesty is not present, holds that prerogative. No one would ever dream of saying that the Queen would declare war or peace without the advice of a responsible Minister. Wherefore, we all came to the conclusion, as constitutional writers have long come to the conclusion, that the prerogative is given in trust for the people, and is, therefore, only exercised at the instance of a responsible Minister. I should like to know whether there would not be a revolution in England if the Queen chose to declare war or to make peace without the sanction or advice of a responsible Minister? That would be as absolutely gross an infraction of the Constitution as an attempt to abolish the House of Commons, as the advent of a second Protector, not only taking away the bauble, but taking all those who surrounded it. Do we not then come to this conclusion, that the Constitution is absolutely safe in this form as we understand it, that you can not have a prerogative of the Crown in these modern days which can be exercised without the advice of a responsible Minister if a responsible Minister chooses to advise? Why, then, are we to alter all the settled forms, which are those we understand and know, and which are constantly acted upon in the administrative government of England and of our own colonies, because occasionally there has been a Minister so unread as not to understand these matters, or so weak as not to enforce his powers? If Ministers were like the late Sir Henry Parkes, a stand such as he took would be sufficient, and is sufficient in New South Wales. I understand that upon occasions a power which I certainly would not like to see exercised is exercised by the Commandant of the forces in New South Wales. I am not attacking that gentleman, who is an exceedingly able and gallant officer. If any man wishes to make an inroad into the Constitution, or does not fully understand his position in a self-governing colony, he will make a mistake, whether you do or do not put into the Constitution words of this kind. If you send your Draft Bill home with these words in it, I shall not be answerable for the opinions passed upon our drafting. We shall be told that we ought to understand that the matter is sufficiently regulated by constitutional usage already, and that the prerogative which is nominally vested in the Queen, is actually wielded by the Cabinet.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

It is not wielded by the Cabinet in the honorable and learned member's own colony.

Mr. BARTON. -

I know that there are cases in which it has not been so wielded, but if you ever find a Minister who, under the present form of Constitution, does not wield these powers, he is a man who would not be stronger in asserting them if you inserted in the Constitution the words "in Council." He would leave the Commandant greater power than he ought to leave him, even if the words were inserted. A responsible Minister only requires to see the constitutional position which usage and custom have set up throughout the empire to know, as I am sure every responsible Minister in New South Wales will know, what is an improper action upon the part of the Commandant, and an action which ought to be put a stop to. There may be a discretion in matters of mere discipline, such as the holding of a court-martial, the report of which goes to the Governor in Council, and is afterwards remitted to the Attorney-General to be recorded. But that is only an exception which deals with such matters as disobedience upon parade, assaults upon parade, and unsoldierly conduct of one kind and another. These are not matters about which any Minister would concern himself. What a Minister is concerned with are matters for which he is responsible. A court-martial is a judicial tribunal, and a Minister cannot affect its decision in any way. He could not dismiss an officer conducting a court-martial, because that man would be acting in a purely judicial capacity. Of course, neither in England nor here would an interference with the prerogative in that respect be tolerated. But the Minister is responsible for the administration of the department as the person under whose control it is, within the Executive arrangement, and he is responsible for all expenditure upon it. Having this responsibility, he is entitled to tender the advice which will enable him to exercise his responsibility fearlessly. That is the constitutional position of the matter, and it will not be strengthened by the putting in of these words, because it is as strong now as it ever can be. The result of the amendment will be that when the Bill comes before the Imperial Parliament the words will probably, if not certainly, be struck out, and we shall be told that we have already sufficient power to deal with our own affairs. I believe entirely in the constitutional position taken by the late Sir Henry Parkes. That constitutional position arises under a statutory Constitution in which the Governor is not even mentioned by way of defining his powers and functions. They rest simply upon the letters and instructions issued to him. That is the position of affairs where the Governor is described merely in the ordinary way. It indicates the power to exercise the prerogative. The constitutional doctrine that the prerogative is exercised in trust for the people, and therefore by a responsible Minister, is now child's knowledge to all of us, and it regulates the whole case.

Mr. ISAACS. -

One unfortunate thing is that the Governor-General is mentioned in many of the clauses, and the Governor-General in Council in others.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is so. An endeavour has been made in drafting the Bill to use the words "in Council" where by statute law in pari materia the Governor-General in Council has been the authority to exercise the power. Where there has been no omission of the prerogative the ordinary words of description importing the prerogative-the Governor or Governor-General-are used with the perfect knowledge that the powers of the prerogative are really now the people's powers.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is just the same as the command of the army being vested in the Queen.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. The Queen is the Commander-in-Chief of the British Army. She has the sole power of making peace and war. According to constitutional assumption it is her army. But who exercises the control of the Imperial Army? Is it not the adviser of the Queen? Would there not, as I said before, be a revolution if the Queen exercised her powers without consulting her Ministers? The honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) has handed me a passage from Anson's Law and Custom of the Constitution, at volume 2, page 392. I quoted several passages upon the subject at Adelaide, and I then understood that the Convention was perfectly satisfied as to the position. It was then proposed by the Right Hon. Mr. Reid to import the principle which the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) now seeks to import, but the proposal was negatived. The passage which I wish to read is as follows:-

Especially is the Secretary of State bound to maintain the discretionary prerogative of the Crown in the appointment and dismissal of officers, their promotion or reward, or the acceptance of their resignations. This prerogative is exercised through the Commander-in-Chief, on the responsibility of the Secretary of State; and it is the more important that power of this sort should be in the hands of a non-political officer, such as the Commander-in-Chief, because our army, unlike the armies of other European countries, is not divorced from the political rights of citizenship. The soldier, if duly qualified, may exercise the franchise; the officer may sit in the House of Commons. Plainly then, the King or a Minister of the Crown might use, or be pressed to use, the powers of appointment, promotion, or dismissal, for political and party ends. The history of the last century attests the reality of this danger. The office of Commander-in-Chief, as constituted in 1793, was intended to meet it.

We find that, as time has gone on, all these powers have come to be exercised by the advice of the Minister, if not by the advice of the Executive Council. The constitutional usage in this case seems to me so clear that it would be of no use to attempt to disturb it, and, whether these words are or are not inserted, this power will be really in the hands of the people.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I think that the honorable and learned member who moved the amendment has overlooked the fact that the position of the Defence Minister and the Governor in all the colonies is distinctly laid down by the various Discipline Acts, Volunteer Acts, and so forth, in force in the several colonies. By the Tasmanian Act the Minister for Defence deals with all matters connected with the Defence forces. He, to great extent, fills the position of the Secretary for War in England, with the power of the Commander-in-Chief combined. The papers to which the honorable member refers show that the Colonial Secretary merely recommended that all communications relating purely to discipline should be addressed to His Excellency the Governor, and should be sent under sealed cover through the Colonial Secretary's department. That was only a recommendation addressed to New South Wales, and I do not know that it has been followed by that colony. I can say that in the administration of the Defence Act and the control of the defence force, it is not generally followed, and everything dealt with by the Governor as Commander-in-Chief first passes through the hands of the Minister of Defence. As to the constitutional aspect of the question, my honorable friend's amendment raises no issue. He admits that the representative of the Queen occupies the position in connexion with the defence force that the Queen herself occupies, and that, as her representative, he is the Commander-In-Chief. I think that he will find that no difficulty will be experienced in the wording of the clause, even if it be not absolutely necessary constitutionally that the clause should be so worded.

Mr. BRUNKER (New South Wales). -

Whatever the constitutional aspect of the question may be, there is no doubt that considerable inconvenience and delay have arisen, in New South Wales at any rate, in dealing with military matters.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

We had a ten years' controversy about it.

Mr. BRUNKER. -

I do not know what the law in the other colonies is, but we in New South Wales are governed by the Volunteer Act passed in 1867, which, I think, appoints the Governor Commander-in-Chief of the forces. I know that a conflict of opinion has arisen in very many cases as to whether the Governor in this Act means the Governor with the advice of the Executive Council, or whether the authority is placed in the hands of the Governor alone. Honorable members have no doubt been placed in possession of the data which has been printed and laid before them in anticipation of the consideration of this question. I am very pleased to say that in New South Wales, now, we have not the trouble and inconvenience that was experienced in the past. It is certainly true that in connexion with all matters submitted to the Minister of Defence by the Commandant or the Major-General, the papers, although they come openly so that the Minister may know exactly what are the propositions made, are forwarded to His Excellency in compliance with the terms of the Act. The Act is very explicit, because although it says in the interpretation section that "Governor" shall mean the Governor with the advice of the Executive Council, it also says that in the construction and for the purposes of this Act, if not inconsistent with the context or subject-matter, certain terms shall have the respective meanings assigned to them. And then Part I. of the Act embodies the view which has been maintained, not only by our present Governor, but also by those who preceded him, that the Governor is Commander-in-Chief of the forces. Section 4 of Part I. says-"The Governor, as the Queen's representative, shall be the Commander-in-Chief of all the forces raised in the colony." We are governed by this Act in New South Wales, and, as I said at the outset, although differences have arisen, and considerable delays have occurred in dealing with matters in the past, we are now free from those inconveniences, and things run smoothly, simply in consequence of complying with the conditions of the law by which we are supposed to be governed.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
I do not propose to detain the Convention with any reply, except to point out that the contention of Mr. Barton in no respect applies to the matter submitted to the Convention. I agree with him entirely in his constitutional construction of the prerogative, and, indeed, went so far out of my way as to quote Todd to put it beyond all doubt. But what are the facts? It took ten years' fight in Victoria to get the question settled, and we have it on the testimony of Mr. Brunker that a struggle has been waged in New South Wales. Todd furnishes an instance in which a Ministry lost its life in South Africa in this struggle, after a prolonged political conflict. Under the circumstances, it seems desirable there should be no ambiguity. We are not dealing with common law, but with a statutory power, and desire to place these powers beyond all dispute. What I would prefer is not the introduction of the words suggested, but such a definition of the term "Governor-General" as would remove the ambiguity which it appears to me exists. The leader of the Convention has told us that the words "Governor-General" or "Governor-General in Council" have been used by the Drafting Committee according as the prerogative has, or has not, been practically surrendered to Parliament. That is not to be found on the face of the measure, and it is always in these cases open to question whether in any particular instance the prerogative has or has not been abandoned. These doubts might be set at rest if there were a definition clause setting forth the sense in which the term "Governor-General" is used in the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

The term "Governor-General in Council" when used means the Governor-General in Council with the advice of the Executive.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And what does "Governor-General" mean?

Mr. BARTON. -

That means the ordinary powers intrusted to the Governor-General by the Queen.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

And these are to be exercised by him only on the advice of his Ministers?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

When you only find the term "Governor-General," that means the prerogative.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

On that prerogative Governors have made claims, which have received some recognition, to exercise more power than they claim when the term "Governor-General in Council" is used. Under clause 70, any distinction which exists between different exercises of prerogative powers by our Governors are to be preserved in the Commonwealth, and govern the relations of the Governor-General to each particular state according to the differing practices which may have existed. The difficulty I have mentioned might be settled by some general provision or definition. On account of the strong feeling which exists in some of the colonies, I propose to press this matter. I do not at all insist on the form of the amendment, but call the attention of the Drafting Committee to the necessity of putting beyond all question the sense in which the term "Governor-General" must be accepted. This prerogative power should be exercised, as practically all other powers now are, on the advice of the Executive, or of one of its members.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

It appears to me, with all respect, that Mr. Deakin has not quite appreciated the meaning of the section. We do not wish to put the Governor-General here in the position of being any less the Queen's representative than the Governors of the various colonies are at the present time. What is the position of the Governor of each of the colonies at present? By virtue of his office the Governor of each of the colonies is Commander-in-Chief of the Forces. The letters patent appointing the Governor constitute him Commander-in-Chief of the Forces, and in England it is pointed out the Queen is Commander-in-Chief of the Forces.
The only meaning of that is that the prerogative power of commanding the army is vested in the Queen, or in the representative of the Queen.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Has the Queen of England ever claimed the right to settle a question of discipline as a Governor has done here?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I will deal with that question later on. The Governor is Commander-in-Chief of the Forces by virtue of his position. But the Governor cannot move a step he cannot obtain possession of a rifle or a cartridge without the consent of his Executive. It is a merely nominal appointment, and the power which he gets nominally he cannot exercise without the means which are supplied by his Executive-by the Governor with the advice of his Executive. That is recognised, not only in the Governor's instructions, but in all the Acts dealing with the regulation of the volunteer forces. For instance, in the very Act in New South Wales which Mr. Brunker referred to, and under which a dispute occurred, the Governor is described as Commander-in-Chief of the Forces as the Queen's representative.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Just as he is here.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
The dispute occurred, not because of any difficulty in recognising that position, but because, in carrying out some executive acts, a question arose in the construction of the Act as to whether the Governor meant the Governor with the advice of his Executive Council. It did not turn on this point at all. I hope I have therefore made it clear that there is a recognition from beginning to end of the fact that the Governors are nominally Commanders of the Forces. I would point out where I think Mr. Deakin has made an error. The power of the Commander-in-Chief under this Constitution cannot be exercised until an Act has been passed by the Commonwealth, because until that is done the Commonwealth cannot engage a soldier, acquire a rifle, or a cartridge, or a uniform, or anything whatever. The Governor is simply Commander-in-Chief, without an army, without weapons. How are they to be obtained? By passing an Act of Parliament, and, in passing that Act, no doubt the Parliament will take very good care that the measure makes it perfectly clear that all the executive acts which are to be carried out with regard to the forces are to be carried out by the Governor with the advice of his Executive Council. So that Parliament will have the matter in its own hands. I think Mr. Deakin has jumped before he came to the stile. It appears to me that no amendment which you can put in this Constitution which simply recognises the position of the Governor as Commander-in-Chief, as the Queen's representative, will have any effect. If Mr. Deakin wants to move an amendment, let him make it in the Act of Parliament which will authorize the Commonwealth to raise an army, to arm it, and to give it all the material forces of the Commonwealth without which it cannot act. In that Act the Commonwealth would take care to provide that the Governor could not take a step without the advice of the Executive Council.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If it were contrary to the Constitution that provision would not be of much avail.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I quite agree, with the honorable member, but it would not be contrary to this Constitution.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is the whole question.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I think it is perfectly plain that it would not be contrary to the Constitution, because in the Constitution the Governor-General is described, as all the Governors in the different colonies are described, simply as Commander-in-Chief; and taking power to raise, clothe, and equip an army by the act of the Governor with the advice of the Executive Council, could not interfere with the position of a Governor as Commander-in-Chief. As Mr. Douglas reminds me, in all the colonies the position of Governor carries with it ex officio the position of Commander-in-Chief. Now, I am anxious that this matter should remain as it is in the Bill, because I think it would be a reflection on this Convention if the words of the amendment were inserted in this clause, because it would mean that we did not really appreciate the distinction between the position of Commander-in-Chief and the position of head of the Executive who had afterwards to deal with the material matters in regard to which the Commander-in-Chief could not take a single step.

Mr. SYMON. -
Why the Executive Council would have to ride out with the Governor-General as his staff.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
Of course, they would have to take all the risks of the position. If the Governor-General is Commander-in-Chief, and he has to go out as actual head of the army, I should hope that every member of the Executive would take the position of danger when the hour of danger arrived. I ask honorable members who support this amendment what danger they anticipate?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
The danger that the Governor might seek to decide all questions of discipline.

Mr. SYMON. -
Refer them to the men.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
You must have some one Commander-in-Chief, and, according to all notions of military discipline that we are aware of, the Commander-in-Chief must have control of questions of discipline, or remit them to properly-constituted military courts. Dr. Cockburn has referred to the trial of breaches of military discipline. Well, I should think that one of the most material parts of any Act constituting the forces of the Commonwealth would be to provide for the mode in which these court-martial would be conducted and the Parliament would have abundant power to decide how these matters were to be conducted, and what the particular form of the court was to be. It comes back to the same position as before. The Commander-in-Chief can take any actual step, whether in regard to carrying on the business of war, or deciding questions of discipline. But he has no machinery to act on until Parliament brings all this machinery into force, and the Commonwealth Parliament can do what they like in deciding what powers are to be exercised by the Governor-General with the advice of the Executive Council, and what powers are to be exercised by the Governor-General himself. I hope that Mr. Deakin will recognise that the movements of the army must be controlled by the Executive. This is not a matter of that kind, but simply a provision that the Governor-General of the Commonwealth shall have, ex officio, the same rights, and nothing more than the rights, that the Governors of all the colonies have in this regard. I hope the clause will be allowed to remain as it is.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I trust the clause will be altered. It appears to me that if we retain the clause as we find it the result will be, as regards the command of the naval and military forces of the Commonwealth, that they will be vested in the Governor-General without the advice of his Executive Council; and that is not a state of things which is likely to be supported by this Convention on a further appreciation of the position. It has been put by those who are in charge of the Bill that in England it is unnecessary to mention a matter of this sort, and that it would be impossible for the Crown to exercise its authority without the advice of the Executive. I listened to the passage which was read by the leader of the Convention, and which emphasizes the position in England; but I take the liberty of reading it again a little more slowly than it was read by my honorable and learned friend, and I will ask whether that is the position that we wish to obtain here?-

Especially is the Secretary of State bound to maintain the discretionary prerogative of the Crown in the appointment and dismissal of officers, their promotion or reward, or the acceptance of resignation.

Do we intend that, as regards the forces of the Commonwealth, the Crown shall exercise in its discretion this prerogative in the "appointment and dismissal of officers, their promotion or reward, or the acceptance of their resignation"? I trust not. And the position is emphasized by a sentence which appears at the end of the preceding paragraph:-

No one would desire to see the army the servant of a majority of the House of Commons, nor is it possible to conceive that the management of any Minister, however incompetent, would be so bad as the management of an indeterminate number of irresponsible politicians.

It seems, sir, that the suggestion is, at least in England, that the Crown, in the exercise of its prerogative, can deal with these matters as it pleases. Do we wish that to be the case under the Commonwealth? It occurs to me that it is not possible to make it clearer than it has been made, in this clause 68, that as regards the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval and Military Forces of the Commonwealth, the Executive Council has nothing to do. I will call the attention of honorable members to clause 62:-

The provisions of this Constitution referring to the Governor-General in Council shall be construed as referring to the Governor-General acting with the advice of the Federal Executive Council.

That means that where you refer to him as the "Governor-General in Council" you mean by the advice of his Executive, but where you do not refer to him as the Governor-General in Council it means the reverse.

Mr. HOWE. -

It means a military despotism.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

There is no doubt about it. It occurs to me also that the only power that the Governor has a right to exercise under a colonial Constitution, speaking broadly, is the power to dismiss Ministers. There are various clauses in this Bill in which the distinction is drawn between the Governor-General in Council and the Governor-General. I pass to clause 63, for instance. There it is used without any limitation:--

The Governor-General may from time to time appoint officers to administer such departments of State of the Commonwealth as the Governor-General in Council may from time to time establish.

That means that you establish the various departments of State and the various Ministerial officers, and that the appointments may be made by the Governor-General, and properly made, without any advice or consent on the part of the Executive. So you have for the purpose of guiding you as to what clause 68 means, first the declaration in clause 62 that you use the term "Governor-General in Council" for the Governor-General acting under the advice of his Executive, and you do not use that term unless you mean the Governor-General acting without the advice of his Executive. Then you get the further illustration of the use of the words. They are used without any limitation in the appointment of Ministers, when the Governor acts on his own motion and exercises a prerogative. They are used with a limitation when it is necessary for him to consult his Council for the purpose of establishing a department of State. Again, the command of the forces is vested in him in his individual capacity without the advice or consent of the Executive and I venture to put it that that is not the intention of the Convention in framing this Constitution, and is not the practice, so far as I have the honour of knowing it, in the colony from which I come. In constituting this Commonwealth I do think we ought to take pains to make it abundantly clear that in the control of one of the chief instruments of the State-the army and the navy-whilst the Governor may be the nominal head as the Queen's representative, he is not to exercise his functions as such Commander-in-Chief, except on the advice and subject to the control of his Executive Council.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I apologize to the committee for saying anything on this subject at this late hour, but really there seems to me to be a very great misapprehension of the position in connexion with this matter. I hope that the provision will be retained exactly as it is. I think if we alter it in the way which is proposed, we shall simply put a proclamation in the Constitution of our want of knowledge of constitutional law and the position of the Queen and her representatives in self-governing colonies in relation to any military force. Now, the passage which has just been read from Anson refers to the Secretary of State, who has a discretion which he has to exercise as a Queen's Minister in relation to the prerogative affecting the control of the army; but, as everybody knows, the Secretary of State for War is a member of the Government of the day. He holds a seat in either the House of Commons or the House of Lords—if he is in the House of Lords, there is the Under-Secretary for War in the House of Commons—and he is responsible to Parliament for everything he does that is of evil effect, or that is in excess of his duty, or that is in excess of the Royal prerogative. But to suggest that every appointment in the military force should be submitted, we will say, to the Executive Government for confirmation or otherwise would be to introduce an element which might be—would be, in my humble opinion—subversive of all discipline, and would ruin the best military force that ever existed.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is the practice of every colony in Australia at the present time.

Mr. SYMON. -

I hope it is not the practice.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is the practice.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Under an Act.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes; under an Act in which all kinds of provisions are made, so that it is regulated by Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The Commonwealth Parliament will pass an Act giving it all these powers.

Mr. SYMON. -
Of course they will. These Acts limit the officers, but there are officers and officers. Are the appointments of the non-commissioned officers, the corporals, the lance-corporals, and all the others submitted to the Executive Council?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

The non-commissioned officers and warrant officers are not appointed by the Governor at all.

Mr. SYMON. -

I never said they were; they are probably appointed by the colonel or captain of the company. I am not versed, as my right honorable friend is, in military affairs. He is an accomplished military officer.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

On the retired list.

Mr. SYMON. -

I have no experience; I look at the matter simply from the point of view of constitutional law. It seems to me utter rank absurdity to enact in a solemn Constitution that the Commander-in-Chiefship, which, of course, is supposed to be vested in somebody, call him a despot or anything you like, is put in some person with the aid of a Governor in Council. I do not know whether it would be expected that the commanding officer, when he went out on parade, would order them to right-about face by order of the authority of the Executive Council. The whole thing is ludicrous.

Mr. BARTON. -

This might happen: A court-martial might say-"Corporal John Smith, you are guilty of insubordination, by and with the advice of the Executive Council."

Mr. HOWE. -

That is a travesty.

Mr. BARTON. -

The whole thing is a travesty.

Mr. SYMON. -

To introduce these words into the clause is to make a travesty of the whole provision. The honorable member (Mr. Howe) is anxious to prevent, as we are all anxious to prevent, the establishment of a military despotism; but that is provided by constitutional usage. The Governor has the command of the forces vested in him as Her Majesty's representative.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

How will usage affect a written Constitution?

Mr. SYMON. -
A written Constitution is not exhaustive. We have implanted responsible government in this Constitution, but we have not said so in so many words. We must have some regard to the instrument we are framing, and we ought to look upon it as a Constitution with plenty of elasticity, under which all the constitutional usages will apply and be interpreted. If the Commandant was a kind of Jack-in-office, and wanted to run his army where he ought not to, you could dismiss him. If the Governor-General interfered unduly you would have to say respectfully-"You must not interfere in these matters; if you do, we shall repeal the Act, and there will be no army; you will be Commander-in-Chief merely nominally." I hope the words will not be inserted.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
  I have expressed myself

Mr. BARTON. -
  I can assure my right honorable friend that extreme care has been taken in all these cases.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
  I cannot agree with the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) that it is desirable to put in the words "in Council." The command of the naval and military forces of the Commonwealth must, it seems to me, be vested in some person-the Governor-General, not in the Governor-General in Council. The object of the amendment is a good one, and I entirely sympathize with it, but this is not the place to insert such an amendment. The procedure that will be followed will, I take it, be this: The Constitution will be proclaimed, and, under it, the Governor-General will be the Commander-in-Chief of the forces. The Parliament will have full power and authority to make laws for the naval and military defence of the Commonwealth, and under these laws, the powers of the Governor-General and of his Ministers, and everything else connected with the administration of the military forces, will be defined. In Western Australia we have an Act in which the term "Governor" is defined as the Governor acting with the advice of the Executive Council; but there is also a clause which provides that the Governor, as Her Majesty's representative, shall be the Commander-in-Chief of the forces.

Mr. BARTON. -
  The Constitution is one thing, and the legislation under it is another.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
  The Governor, as Her Majesty's representative, is Commander-in-Chief, but all the powers the Defence Act the Commonwealth will pass.

Mr. LEWIS (Tasmania). -

I am loath to delay the committee at this late hour of the evening, but there is one point to which the attention of the committee has not been directed. That is, that under most of our Discipline Acts power is vested in the Governor as Commander-in-Chief to review the decisions of courts-martial. In our case this is a power of confirmation. Under Mr. Deakin's amendment it would be vested in the Ministry of the day, and I can imagine nothing that would be more subversive to discipline than that.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is a strong argument in favour of the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. -

I do not think so. The amendment would permit of the exercise of political influence in defence matters. One can imagine a case in which a mutinous sergeant or non-commissioned officer; who was a member of the Trades Hall, was justly sentenced by a court-martial for a breach of discipline. If the amendment were passed the whole Trades Hall Council would come to the Minister of Defence and insist that the sentence should be disallowed.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Supposing that he was a member of the Melbourne Club, and the Governor refused to sanction his punishment, what would happen?

Mr. LEWIS. -

One man should be responsible, and he should be the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces, and not a Minister of the Crown.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Does the Governor in Tasmania exercise the prerogative of mercy without advice?

Mr. LEWIS. -

He used to, but he does not now. But that has nothing to do with this question. A Governor is appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Forces, and the Forces look to him as the ultimate Court of Appeal.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

I hold in my hand the Colonial Official List for 1897, and it appears from it that all the Governors of the Australian colonies have the title, by virtue of their commission, of Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

Mr. HOWE. -

That was when we had Imperial troops out here.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is so now.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
Yes. The honorable member does not understand the question. The Governors are instructed not to interfere with Her Majesty's troops, which are under the command of a special officer. In the Colonial Official List it is stated that the officer appointed by the Crown to administer the government of a colony is usually styled Governor and Commander-in-Chief, or Captain-General. In all these colonies the Governor is Commander-in-Chief. How can you get rid of that fact, inasmuch as the office is part of his appointment under the Queen? Is it likely that the Governor-General of the Commonwealth will hold a less office than the ordinary Governor of a mere colony? The thing is absurd. The discussion only shows that some honorable members are trying to get all the power. Why do they not go at once for a republic? We are aiming at that, and the Convention in 1891 did the same.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The George Washington of Tasmania.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

There is no doubt that at that time we were trying as hard as we could for a republic. But if the Queen gives the title of Commander-in-Chief, how can we get rid of it? When an honorable member speaks of the Governor having the power to pardon, it should be remembered that it is only recently that instructions have been given to Governors not to take the whole power on themselves in this matter but to consult with their Council. At the present time the Queen designates these Governors as Commanders-in-Chief of the several colonies, and we cannot get rid of the fact.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

The Bill provides that the command is vested in the "Governor-General," and not in the "Governor-General in Council." It has been said that the Federal Parliament will be able to pass a military law which will alter this, but I say there can be no alteration in defiance of the Constitution.

Mr. BARTON. -

One improvement we want in this Constitution is the establishment of a Commonwealth kindergarten.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

There is no doubt we want a lot of common sense as well as a lot of lawyers.

Mr. BRUNKER (New South Wales). -

I think Mr. Symon is wholly mistaken ill regard to the action of the Governor in New South Wales. In that colony the Governor controls no appointments, and takes no action in regard to the purchase of armour or ammunition. Everything is done by the Executive Council.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I regard the decision on the last question as really taken on the main question, so that I do not think it is necessary to proceed any further.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I would ask the leader of the Convention if he thinks this clause is necessary at all? I do not think it is in our ordinary colonial Constitutions. I would ask Mr. Barton to consider whether it is necessary.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I shall certainly consider that question. The only reason why it stands here is that it is simply declaratory, and it was thought it might be necessary to make a declaration in a Constitution so different in structure from the ordinary ones?

Clause 70 was agreed to.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I would like to ask the leader of the Convention to adjourn now, because there are a few of us who have been sitting continuously since half-past ten with only two intermissions.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

We have not made the progress this week on the second recommittal that was expected by all of us. There are left seventeen or eighteen clauses to be dealt with under the recommittal. We have been sitting seven weeks, and I ask honorable members whether they do not think a resolute effort should be made to put this Bill through? I do not ask anybody to forfeit his rights; I only ask that prolonged speeches be not made duping the rest of the time left to us. I only accede to this request on the understanding that honorable members will assist me, if possible, to get this Bill through to-morrow night. I have what I look upon as an undertaking to keep a quorum here, because if a division is called for at any stage, and a quorum is not present, there will be a count-out, with the consequences already known. That will not do at the end of our proceedings. I assume, therefore, that I now have an undertaking by honorable members to form a quorum to-morrow so long as I ask them to sit. They can trust to my being reasonable, and I will trust to their loyalty.

Progress was then reported.

The Convention adjourned at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock p.m.
Friday, 11th March, 1898.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

PETITIONS.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I have the honour to present two further petitions in favour of retaining the right of appeal to the Privy Council. One is from the Royal Agricultural Society of Victoria, and the other from the Ballarat Agricultural Society. I beg to move -

That the petitions be received.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move -

That five days' leave of absence be granted to Mr. William John Lyne, on account of urgent private business.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

If the formal business is over, I desire to say that I must leave Melbourne this evening, and I take it that no matter of vital importance, of which notice has not been given, will be re-opened at this stage. We have been invited to give notice of any amendments we might desire to move, and honorable members I think have fairly acted upon that suggestion. But it will give rise to great dissatisfaction if, after any representative has been compelled to leave, matters of which notice might have been given during the past week are suddenly to be brought up. I, therefore, rely on the notice-paper as showing what remaining business will be brought on, although, of course, I recognise that matters of substance even may require re-adjustment.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is an important notice to omit clause 95A.

Mr. REID. -

No one call complain where notice has been given, because it is for us to watch the notice-paper. I am referring to what I think should not happen-that is, that after the time which we have had in which to give notice some vital matter may be suddenly brought up. We know it can be done very easily. I merely make these observations, feeling sure that if any honorable member has something of importance to bring up of which he has not given notice, he will now give notice.

The PRESIDENT. -

Of course, as a matter of order, it will be perfectly competent for any honorable member to bring up a fresh matter without notice.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would like to repeat a statement I made last night immediately before the adjournment. I was speaking then in rather a thin House, and there may be some honorable members present who were not here then. I wish to say that it is of very great importance that we should endeavour to conclude our work upon this Bill in its present stage to-day. Honorable members will recollect that there is to be some adjournment for the purpose of seeing that the amendments made in the Bill read consistently, and that the Bill is brought into a proper drafting form. There will be a great deal of time necessary for that-a time co-extensive with the importance of the stage; and, inasmuch as honorable members do not expect the Drafting Committee to work next Sunday, I suppose-

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I do not see why they should make that day an exception.

Mr. BARTON. -

After having made every Sunday an exception, perhaps my right honorable friend thinks that Sunday labour should be the rule. Well, I do not.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

You will come under our Factories Act if you work on Sundays.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, some of the Premier of Victoria's watch-dogs may be set on us. We shall be working all day on Saturday, as we have done before, while other members have been free. If the Convention finish the Bill to-night, and the Drafting Committee work on Saturday and Monday and Tuesday, we may be able to bring up the Bill on Wednesday morning; but if we have to work to-morrow in Convention, I do not see how we can finish the drafting before Thursday morning. That will be an unfortunate thing. I will take the case of the Premier of Western Australia. It is important to him, as he is leaving on Wednesday, that the Bill shall be up from the Drafting Committee by Wednesday morning. So I will appeal to honorable members to co-operate with me in order to finish the Bill to-night. There is another thing which I will ask honorable members, if they will excuse me: It is of vital importance that we should have a quorum when the Bill is brought up again on Wednesday. I say of vital importance, because the provisions of the Federal Enabling Act render that an absolute necessity; and I trust that on Wednesday, if we finish the Bill to-night, such steps will be taken by all honorable members as will secure a quorum on Wednesday. Otherwise, I do not know what will happen to this Convention.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Is it proposed to ask honorable members to sign the complete Bill?

Mr. BARTON. -

That is a matter the Convention may take into consideration for itself at its final sitting. But I would like to say that the Bill has to be printed and supplied to honorable members before it is finally dealt with, and that involves a stage that may create some difficulty. My own idea is that, if an honorable member happens to be absent, the Bill can be supplied to him by being posted to him at the same time as it is supplied to honorable members present. The enormous inconvenience of any other course must have been apparent to those who framed the Act. But it is important that there should be a quorum before the Bill is finally adopted, because otherwise I do not know how it may be adopted. It is suggested to me across the table by my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Deakin)-and this may recommend what I say to those honorable members who contemplated going away-that the Wednesday sitting will not be a mere formal sitting, became it is important to this Convention to see that the Bill is carried in its final stage in a manner of which they can approve.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to ask the leader of the Convention to say whether he can give us a day, after the final revise of the Bill has been completed, to consider the amendments before actually putting them before the Convention? I think we should have seven or eight hours to look through the amendments made. Otherwise, we should be acting in the dark.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not see how the Bill can be in its final form before Wednesday morning; and does Mr. Glynn seriously mean that it should be put in the hands of honorable members then, and that on Thursday, when the Western Australian representatives have gone away, we should begin to consider it? Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Will you issue the final amendments in a form so that they can be seen at once?

Mr. BARTON. -
If the printer can do it I will be happy to comply with the suggestion. I should also like to say that the printer has done his work with very great diligence, and that it has been finely done but if we had imposed upon him the printing of the last draft of the Bill in erased type it would have been delayed 24 hours, and so time would have been lost to the Convention. I will see what can be done, however, to oblige honorable members with regard to the final draft of the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I am sure we all join with the leader of the Convention in desiring to finish this stage at the earliest possible moment consistently with doing our work in a proper fashion; and one expression that my honorable friend used last night I am sure commends itself to every one of us. He said that he would only ask us to sit here until a reasonable time, and that he would rely upon our loyalty. We all agree to that, I am sure.

Mr. BARTON. -

I said that you must rely upon my reasonableness.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Quite so; and I am sure we are all prepared to meet him in that spirit. But I hope that, having regard to the most important matters that are upon the notice-paper, my honorable friend will not ask us to do anything unreasonable-will not ask us at a late hour, when our minds are exhausted, to deal with matters of great importance to the various states. There should be no opportunity for saying that the closing hours of this Convention were spent in hurrying over any important points.

Mr. BARTON. -

Many armies have won their greatest victories after forced marches.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But there is a march of a larger army when we have done our work, an army from which there is no appeal; and, therefore, while I am prepared personally to render all assistance to my honorable and learned friend as long as my physical powers will allow me, I hope, in preservation of the very object we are assembled here to consummate, if possible, that we shall not allow any impression to go abroad that we have in any way unduly hurried the closing labours of this Convention.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think we have done enough to dispel that impression already. It will be impossible to say that we have hurried our work. But I will say, in answer to the observations of my honorable and learned friend, that if the Convention will rely upon my reasonableness I will rely upon their loyalty. It may be the most reasonable thing to finish the Bill tonight. That is a matter to be determined by circumstances, especially in view of the fact that, if we do not finish to-night, the Bill could only be brought up in anything like a final form after our Western Australian friends had left.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I want to ask the leader whether he could not meet the difficulty raised by Mr. Glynn by submitting to us on Tuesday morning so much of the Bill as may then be printed, with the latest amendments of the Drafting Committee?

Mr. BARTON. -

That might be possible, except that there is constant revision going on.

Mr. HOLDER. -

If we can have on Tuesday, or early during Tuesday, so much of the Bill as is complete, the latter part would not take so long to look at on Wednesday.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

What I will endeavour to do is this, and it may meet with honorable members' views: If it is possible to manage it, and if the Bill can be got into print by Wednesday morning, I will endeavour to have the Bill in the hands of honorable members on Wednesday morning, and then I will ask the Convention to sit at two o'clock on that day. That would give a few hours to read through the Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I should like to say that it is

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

May I ask the leader whether it would not be possible to-morrow evening, or tomorrow afternoon, for us to have a clean print of the Bill as we leave it to-night? Then all that will be done by the Drafting Committee will be to suggest drafting amendments. We shall then have our work complete as far as it has gone, and we shall have until Wednesday to look over it. All that we shall have to consider is whether in relation to the drafting amendments the intention of the Convention has been carried out.

[Page 2268] starts here

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In answer to Dr. Cockburn, I would point out that it is not for me to manage these things about the printing. That is part of the work of the Clerk at the table. But I am informed by Mr. Blackmore that if we get through the Bill to-night it will be possible to place a copy of the Bill as amended up to date in the hands of honorable members.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

The Convention resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Clause 73-The judicial power of the Commonwealth shall extend to all matters-
   I. Arising under this Constitution, or involving its interpretation;
   II. Arising under any laws made by the Parliament;
   III. Arising under any treaty;
   IV. Of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;
   V. Affecting the consuls, or other representatives of other countries;
   VI. In which the Commonwealth, or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth, is a party;
   VII. Between states;
   IX. Relating to the same subject-matter claimed under the laws of different states.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I think questions are bound to arise between the Commonwealth and the states, and I observe that, whatever provision is made for cases in which differences may arise between the states, and in which differences may arise between the Commonwealth and the private individual, no provision is made in the case to which I wish to draw attention to in the amendment of which I have given notice; that is, to insert after paragraph (8) "Between the Commonwealth and a state."

Mr. OCONNOR. -
That is provided for in sub-section (6).

Mr. REID. -
Yes. I think that will cover it, and therefore I will not propose that amendment. I have another amendment, however, to move in this clause, and it is an important one. I beg to move-

That the following be added as a new sub-section:-" Arising under section 101 of this Constitution."

I shall be prepared to bow to the view of the Convention upon this matter, but I think it is right to consider it. If honorable members will turn to clause 101, they will find a general provision that when a law of a state is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid. That is absolutely necessary with reference to those subjects on which the power of legislation is left in the Bill. Of course, with the ultimate intention of the Commonwealth legislation superseding all the state legislation upon the common subjects, the clause is absolutely necessary. But the other question I wish to bring before the Convention is this: Outside of the subjects over which the Commonwealth has power to legislate, there are a vast number of subjects in respect of which the states are left sovereign and independent, and the case I have in view is a case in which the execution of the Commonwealth law comes into conflict with the execution of a law in respect of which a state is sovereign. As the Bill now stands, even in that case the state law would go down just the same as in the case of a subject which we have handed over to the Commonwealth, and it raises an important question.

Mr. BARTON. -

But would that arise except in a case where a state law went into the domain in which the Commonwealth is given power?

Mr. REID. -

There might often arise a case in which the subject-matter is legitimately under the Commonwealth for one purpose, and legitimately under the states for another purpose. It is there that a conflict would arise.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Then the state purpose must give way to the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -

That is the intention of the Bill, and I am inviting the attention of the Convention to it so that it will not be overlooked, because it is vital.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Must not that involve the interpretation of the Constitution, which is under sub-section (1)?

Mr. REID. -

I saw that and considered it; but it strikes me that this is a matter of so much importance that it should be specially mentioned if it is to be provided for at all. I admit that, technically, in the clause we have already got words large enough. I refer to clause 73, because any question I am referring to would arise under the Constitution. There is no doubt of that.
But when a case of that sort arises, would not a case of Executive action be held to be equally under these general words? I think it would.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would you explain what you mean by Executive action?

Mr. REID. -

Supposing that under the Commonwealth law something is done by an officer of the Commonwealth, in respect of which a state might deem its rights were injured, and the state would wish a remedy, could it be Said that an action of that sort would be a case arising under the Constitution? I think the matter should be made clear. It would not involve the interpretation of the Constitution, because the act might be wrongful in itself, although the law under which it is done might be constitutional.
Then there is the sub-section—

Arising under any laws made by the Parliament.

I think there might be cases even which would be right under the law but which would be a matter for Executive action, not opposed to the law at all, but perhaps only matters of administration.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Could you give us a concrete instance? I find it hard to follow the argument.

Mr. REID. -

I do not like to refer to a certain burning question, although it has ceased to be so burning now. But take the case of the rivers. Irrigation is within the sovereign powers of a state. As to navigation, the same subject is within the sovereign powers of the Commonwealth. In administering the respective laws, things may be done which on one side or the other may be considered to be wrong. As the Bill at present stands, if the law of the state with reference to irrigation conflicts, and is inconsistent with the law of the Commonwealth with reference to navigation, it is simply sufficient to point out to the court that the state law is inconsistent, and down goes the state law, apart from any element of equity or fairness. And, although there might be an opportunity to so adjust the respective claims as to do justice between them without injuring either, none of these considerations would come in. It would only be necessary to point to the Commonwealth law, and to show that the state law was inconsistent with it.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It must be a valid Commonwealth law.

Mr. REID. -

Yes, but a valid Commonwealth law may in the interests of navigation prevent irrigation. It may absolutely prevent any water conservation. I do not suppose such a thing would ever happen, but I only refer to it by way of illustration. If it did happen the aggrieved state, on which a terrible injury would be inflicted, has to appear before the High Court to complain of this. It would be told, it is true this is an abominable wrong, and we only wish we had power to redress it; but this Act deliberately states that when the federal law comes into collision with a state law, passed in the exercise of the state's sovereign powers, still that law must go down, just as if it was an interference with a subject handed over to the Commonwealth. There is no distinction between the two cases. That is a very dangerous position of supremacy in which to put the Commonwealth. It practically has this effect, in that very wide and nebulous area where the sovereign, Commonwealth come into collision, without any sort of consideration to the rights or the wrongs, the law of the states as to its sovereign powers must go down. If we intend that, well and good. But if it is inserted in the Constitution I can conceive a very great handle being made of it by those who would say that we have to leave independence to the states in connexion with every subject not handed over to the Commonwealth, and that, while affecting to do that, we practically put the states in great danger, because their laws made within their sovereign powers may happen to come into collision with the Commonwealth law.

Mr. OCONNOR. - Would not that contention be involved in the interpretation of clause 99?

Mr. REID. - That is where it seems to me the difficulty would come in. In a clause before 101, which in my copy of the Bill appears as clause 103, it saves the Constitution of the states in respect of all matters not handed over to the Commonwealth. But when we turn over the page, and come to clause 101, we find that it practically overrides this provision, and says-"True, we leave to you all those rights which are not taken away from you in this Constitution as matters of legislation; but as to all those rights we have left to you you must hold them subject to the risks of a federal law coming into collision with them." I am speaking of a federal law on a federal subject coming into collision with a state law. In case of that collision the sovereignty of the state goes without any hearing on behalf of the state. The court would simply have to decide that the state law came into collision with the federal law, or was inconsistent with it, and then the state law is out of court without any chance of redress. Do we propose to leave the Constitution in that state? If so, section 101 overrides the previous section, and makes all those rights reserved to the state subject to collision with Commonwealth legislation on other matters, and in such case the Commonwealth law shall prevail. Let us take the addition to clause 52, which was made at my instance, about the waters. That is, a case where there are two jurisdictions over the same thing for different purposes. I am afraid that those words added at the end of section 52 would be absolutely in conflict with section 101. If the Commonwealth legislate so as to prevent, in the interests of navigation, water conservation-a thing we do not conceive of, but which may be used as an illustration-then the state would go to the High Court and complain of the action of the law of the Commonwealth. The state would contend that that Commonwealth law abridged the rights of states in regard to water conservation, as section 52 expressly provides that the rights of the state to a reasonable use of the water shall not be abridged. The state would come into court complaining that the law of the Commonwealth had destroyed the special provision made in section 52; and the court would then have to look at the Commonwealth law, and then at the state law. There might be a state law sanctioning a work of water conservation, and there might be a Commonwealth law proposal is that at the end of the clause the words be added-"Laws made by a state concerning matters over which the Commonwealth has no power to legislate excepted." With this amendment the High Court would find that a law on water conservation, being on a subject on which the Commonwealth has no right to legislate, would not be subject to the terms of this section. There is no doubt that by this amendment the respective laws would be put in a difficult position, and the question would arise, what is to be done? As the Bill stands, no such question could arise in that respect, and it would be infinitely more convenient to leave the Bill as it is, when the whole matter could be decided on definite simple legal grounds. But I must point out that, although the present form of the Bill is far more convenient, and I would gladly leave it as it is, it involves very serious consequences-most serious consequences to the states, especially in the particular matter to which I have referred. I feel that the amendment which was put in, and which has done so much to remove strong feeling on the important question of water conservation, would be valueless. When any dispute arose, and a state law came into conflict with a Commonwealth law under the navigation provision, I feel that section 101 as it stands is really worth nothing, and could not prevail against the Commonwealth law.

Mr. SYMON. -

What do you propose to put in?

Mr. REID. -

I admit that this is a very, difficult matter, and I have thought over it a good deal. I propose to give the High Court a special jurisdiction when such difficulties as that arise, so that in point of fact the High Court shall have power to adjudicate or act as arbitrator so as to give the utmost reasonable force to both laws.

Mr DOBSON. - Would not that be achieved without the amendment?

Mr. REID. -

No.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Do you fear a Commonwealth law beyond its jurisdiction will be given some validity by section 101?

Mr. REID. -

That is not the point. I am awfully sorry I have failed to be understood after speaking so long. I am talking of a Commonwealth law, perfectly legal, on a subject on which the Commonwealth is competent to legislate-an absolutely good law standing by itself. I am talking of another law, passed by a state-a perfectly good state law-on a subject on which the state is sovereign by this Constitution. In reading the two it is found that effect cannot be given to the provisions of both, and that if the Commonwealth law is to prevail, the state law must go down. The language of section 101 is unmistakable. It does not define what, law, but means any law, and any good law of the Commonwealth. It means that a good state law on a sovereign subject of the state goes down without any inquiry.

Mr. SYMON. -
Do you think the law would go down?

Mr. REID. -
There is no jurisdiction to go into any question, except as to whether the laws are inconsistent. I am sorry to have to put an illustration which revives feeling, but I hope it will not be received in that spirit on this occasion. Suppose a state pass a law that a large measure of water conservation shall be carried out on the banks of the Darling, and there is a Commonwealth law that on that very part of the Darling nothing shall be done to interfere with navigation-that nothing shall be done to draw water out of the river, on the ground that such a course will make the river unnavigable. That would be a perfectly good law of the Commonwealth, passed in the exercise of its legitimate powers, to secure a result which it was authorized to secure. That being so, what becomes of the state law? It is a good state law, passed to effect a state work which is a lawful work according to the powers of the state.

Mr. BARTON. -
Would not such a Commonwealth law, if it abridged the rights of the states to a reasonable use of the water, be an infringement of the Constitution under the proviso of sub-section (8)?

Mr. REID. -
No, not unless those words are added to section 101. The laws passed under clause 52, and which come into conflict, are both legally good.

Mr. SYMON. -
They cannot be.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Not to the extent of the conflict.

Mr. REID. -
May I ask what the honorable member means?
Mr. KINGSTON. -
A law made by the state would be bad to the extent to which it conflicted with the law of the Commonwealth.

Mr. REID. -
Would that not be so under section 101?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I say it would be.

Mr. REID. -
That is exactly the thing I am saying, and exactly the consequence I am pointing out. The High Court would be compelled to declare the state law on irrigation works to be bad, because it was inconsistent with the Commonwealth law as to the navigation of the river at that particular place. Where, then, is the protection to the state?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
You cannot avoid that unless you give the High Court power to repeal the Commonwealth law.

Mr. REID. -
Not to repeal the Commonwealth law, but to respect one of the provisos in that very law. What a mockery it is to say that state rights as to the reasonable use of water are being preserved if, when a Bill authorizing such works comes into conflict with the Commonwealth law, the state cannot be heard! If a state law is inconsistent with the Commonwealth law, the former is ordered out of court. If I were appearing for the state, the court would say:"This fool of an Act says in section 101 that when your law comes into conflict with the Commonwealth law the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid. It is very unfortunate, and we think you have a great grievance. It is very sad, but really these are the words of section 101." I say to the court:"Under section 52 there is a provision that nothing shall abridge the rights of the state." The court replies:"That is quite true, but the provisions of this statute"-which I shall not refer to any further in the way I did."deal with cases in which the laws conflict, and on this very point says that the state law must be ruled out as invalid."

Mr. BARTON. -
You are bound to read the two provisions together, and avoid a repugnance, if possible, and I think you could avoid a repugnance.

Mr. REID. -
Then I think there can be no objection to putting words in to make the provision clear. As the provision is at present, it might be made a very serious handle of.

Mr. BARTON. -
What about the words you wanted the other day?

Mr. REID. -
So long as those words are put in at the end of section 101 I shall be satisfied.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I am afraid those words will not do.

Mr. REID. -
I do not care which words effect the purpose.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -
What do you propose?

Mr. REID. -
I intend to move-
That at the end of clause 101 the words be added-"Laws made by a state concerning matters over which the Commonwealth has no power to legislate excepted."

I tell the Convention frankly that unless Something is put into the Bill in the direction I suggest I should look on all state laws as the creatures of Commonwealth legislation, to the extent to which in future they came into conflict with Commonwealth legislation.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is clear.

Mr. REID. -
Yes. The sovereignty of the states is preserved in one clause and is taken away in the next. The states retain their sovereignty over subjects that are left to them only so long as they do not come into conflict with the Commonwealth law. The moment they do that the state sovereignty goes down.

Mr. WISE. -
That is a necessity of any Federation.

Mr. REID. -
Then all the battles we have had to secure a settlement of the water question have been idle unless we are prepared to shut our eyes and accept what the future has in store for us. I am prepared to do that to a very large extent. But this is one of those burning points which will be used very strongly in a sense hostile to the Bill. I am very anxious to have answers ready to those who advance the sound contention-and the Hon. Mr. Isaacs admits that it is a sound contention-that where a state law on a state subject is inconsistent with the Commonwealth law on a Commonwealth subject the state law, whatever the rights or wrongs are, must go down, and the merits cannot be gone into at all. I recognise that it may be well to leave it at that, because the provision is one that commends itself to us as offering a means of avoiding perhaps painful conflict. But I am overborne by the feeling that if the water question is left there I shall not be in as strong a position as I should like to occupy in answering the criticisms that I know will be raised. If I am right as to the legal effect of leaving things as they are there does seem to be a serious necessity for some amendment.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Taking matters consecutively, the position is this: Under clause 101, if a law of a state is inconsistent with the law of the Commonwealth the latter is to prevail, and the former, to the extent of the inconsistency, is to be invalid. It is clear, as indicated by the Right Hon. Mr. Kingston, that a law of the Commonwealth there spoken of is a law made by the Commonwealth within its legislative powers. That is to say, it must be a good and constitutional law of the Commonwealth to have any effect in conflict with a law of a state.

Mr. REID. -

We admit that.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then I take it there would be scarcely any necessity for the addition the right honorable member desires to make to clause 101-"Laws made by a state concerning matters over which the Commonwealth has no power to legislate excepted." That would be equivalent to inserting after the word "Commonwealth," as I proposed the other day, the words "on a subject within the legislative powers of the Commonwealth." If you restrict the validity of Commonwealth laws to laws within the legislative powers of the Commonwealth, that is the same thing as excepting those laws over which it has no power to legislate, so that this amendment and the amendment my right honorable friend originally proposed, and which was to be inserted in the middle of the clause, would be identical in effect.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

He means more than that.

I think he does. The amendment he proposes to add to clause 101 is really, in legal intendment, the same as the amendment to add after the word "Commonwealth" the words "on a subject within the legislative powers of the Commonwealth." Then we have, on the motion of the right honorable gentleman himself, added, at the end of sub-section (8) of clause 52, this proviso-

The powers contained in this sub-section, and those relating to trade and commerce under this Constitution, shall not abridge the rights of a state or its citizens to the reasonable use of the waters of rivers for conservation and irrigation.

I take it that the effect of the word "reasonable" need only be considered in its application to states. The difficulty is in its application to the conservation of the rights of the states.

Mr ISAACS. - As against what?

Mr. BARTON. -

When put in correlation with the right of the Commonwealth to legislate for trade and commerce. The powers given in the sub-section are not to abridge the right of a state to the reasonable use of the waters of the rivers, and that means its right of legislation. The effect of it, then, is that nothing in these two sub-sections contained is to lessen the right of the state to make laws for the reasonable use of the rivers, that is, to conserve for its own reasonable use the waters of the rivers. We have the starting point in clause 101, and it is clear that a law made by the Commonwealth is not to cut down the state right of legislation for the reasonable use of the waters of the rivers. Then all we are confronted with is the meaning of the word "reasonable." If there is anything to justify my right honorable friend's contention it is to be found here. What is the meaning of the word? It means a reasonable use of the waters by the state under its laws. The whole application of the sub-section is to prevent the exercise of the trade and commerce and navigation powers from inflicting certain injuries. It is a simple consequence that a law made by the state, if tested in the courts, is to be considered in the light of whether the use it makes of the waters is a reasonable use in relation to the power in respect to navigation and trade and commerce.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It is attached only to navigation.

Mr. BARTON. -

The cases which most readily suggest themselves are those that relate to navigation, and it was because we all considered that navigation within that sub-section would come under the trade and commerce laws that my honorable friend's proviso mentioned them. Clause 101 being clear, if a law of the Commonwealth abridges the right of a state to make laws for the reasonable use of the waters of the rivers, then that law will not be within the Constitution. If then the High Court is of opinion that a law of a state when it is tested is a law for the reasonable use by the state of the waters of the rivers, having regard to the rights of navigation and trade and commerce, then any law of the Commonwealth by which it is sought to cut that law down would come within the meaning of the proviso to sub-section (8) of clause 52, and would be bad. If that is so, the difficulty is to a large extent cleared away, because if you go back to clause 101 a law of the Commonwealth which would come under that ban could not invalidate a law of the state.
Mr. ISAACS. -
If you can draw the line.
Mr. BARTON. -
I recognise that difficulty, but it will be for the High Court to decide what by statute is a reasonable use of the water. Then there is only one question remaining, and that is the question of jurisdiction. All these will be either matters arising under the Constitution or involving its interpretation, or arising under any laws made by the Parliament. These are provided for in subsections (1) and (2) of clause 73, and sub-section (6) of the same clause extends the judicial power to matters in which the Commonwealth or a person suing or being sued on behalf of the Commonwealth is a party. If the matter arises between citizens it will come under sub-sections (1) or (2). If an officer of the Commonwealth is the plaintiff or defendant it will come under sub-section (6) as well as sub-sections (1) and (2).
Mr. REID. -
I am quite satisfied with that explanation, but I would like the honorable member to deal with the other matter I mentioned. I want my honorable and learned friend's opinion upon a case not provided for by special words in the Constitution, but in which a good state law on a good state subject, outside the powers of the Commonwealth, comes into conflict with a good Commonwealth law.
Mr. BARTON. -
I will suppose that the Commonwealth is legislating for the regulation of trade and commerce on a railway, and that the state has made by-laws applicable to that railway. There could only be a conflict where the regulation or law for internal trade made by the state usurped in its operation the domain of the Commonwealth in legislating for trade and commerce. That would be a conflict such as is indicated by clause 101, and we are all agreed that, to that extent, the state law should go down, and for this reason, that a conflict could only arise by the state law applying as much to inter-state traffic as to internal traffic.
Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I am very glad that I have elicited this clear statement from our leader, because I feel sure that without some such statement on our records a great deal of mischief would have been made on the subject. The explanation does not cover all the ground, but it covers it as nearly as is perhaps possible. Personally, I am entirely satisfied with it, and I now see that there would be no utility in pressing my amendment. I would, therefore, ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

Before the amendment is withdrawn, I should like to observe in this matter, that the position comes just down to what Mr. Barton has said, that the jurisdiction of the Commonwealth in regard to navigation stops short at the point, wherever that point may be, where the state would be unreasonable in its use of water for conservation or irrigation. Now, I am not quite clear in my own mind as to whether that is a matter for the High Court. I can understand why it should not be, because the question of reasonableness of the use of water as to locality, or as to extent, or as to duration, depends on questions not of law, but of such enormous political and far-reaching effect, that it is almost impossible to conceive that the decision of such questions could be remitted to the judgment of the High Court. And when you consider that we have to regard the extent of territory to the needs of the people, the condition of productivity of their land, their future requirements, and their requirements from day to day, and from year to year-what is reasonable for one day would not be reasonable for the next-it is almost impossible to imagine that the High Court can give a final binding judgment as to the validity of a state law which can bind the matter for all time. Now, it seems to me that it is putting a strain on the High Court that it ought not to bear, and I am not quite clear, certainly not as clear as Mr. Barton is, in thinking that the High Court will have to decide what is reasonable or not, because reasonableness in political matters is a question that is generally left to the Legislature. And if it is within clause 73, then I come back to the point to which I directed the attention of the Convention a few days ago in regard to the meaning of the word "matters." It is put that it is a "matter." Now, if that is a matter, I do not know what is not a matter; and if the High Court is to be asked to decide any matter between states, or between the Commonwealth and states, it is putting a construction on the word "matter" that we ought to stop short of putting on that word. I understand the word "matter" means a question of ordinary judicial interpretation in a controversy that is known as an action or a suit, and I think that we may well hesitate to put such a large construction on the word "matter," because if we do we are asking the High Court to accept a responsibility and a jurisdiction that is not found elsewhere. Of course, with regard to such questions, I think the answer given by Mr. Barton was absolutely unanswerable, that if a state passes a law which is entirely within its domain-perfectly within its jurisdiction-and is therefore valid, and the Commonwealth afterwards passes a law which is within its powers but the Commonwealth law is inconsistent with the provisions of the existing state law, the state law must cease to have effect to the extent of the inconsistency. I think that is inevitable. You cannot frame your Constitution with any other basis. But with regard to the word "reasonable." I feel great misgiving that we are intrusting such a question to the decision of the High Court.

3650

Mr. Reid's amendment was withdrawn.

Clause 74. - The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe, to hear and determine appeals from all judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences:

I. Of any other federal court, or court exercising federal jurisdiction: or of the Supreme Court of any state, or of any other court of any state from which an appeal now lies to the Queen in Council, whether any such court is a court of appeal or of original jurisdiction:

II. Of the Inter-State Commission:

and the judgment of the High Court in all such cases shall be final and conclusive.

Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the conditions and restrictions on appeals to the Queen in Council from the Supreme Courts of the several states shall be applicable to appeals from them to the High Court.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

In clause 74 a provision has been inserted by the Drafting Committee which would allow an appeal to the High Court from the decision of the Inter-State Commission. Now, sir, we had a very good dispute here in regard to railway matters, as to whether the decision of those matters should be left in the hands of the Federal Parliament or should be left in the hands of the High Court. And ultimately the Convention decided that while they would not leave the matter entirely in the hands of the Parliament to decide, they certainly would not place it in the control of the Federal High Court. And we then, in one clause which has been passed, provided that an Inter-State Commission should deal with these matters. But, sir, if this clause is to stand as it is now placed before us, the result will be that in all these cases the Federal High Court will really be the tribunal which will decide the matter. It is true there is an intervening body—the Inter-State Commission—which will hear and deal with the matter, but as in all cases there will be an appeal from the decision of that commission to the High Court we might just as well have allowed the proposal in the first instance to go—that all these matters should be decided directly by the High Court.
We were clear that the High Court was not the body to properly decide all these questions; that the members of the High Court could not gain the information necessary to enable them to come to a proper decision on the subject; and, therefore, I am somewhat surprised that these words have been inserted in the clause, as I believe it is not the desire of the Convention that the High Court should deal with these matters, which to a very great extent are political matters, and that the Inter-State Commission shall have power to decide them. I think it would be be very unwise indeed to give this general power of appeal, which would apply to all subjects. I therefore beg to move-

That the words "Of the Inter-State Commission" be omitted from the clause.

The effect of that amendment will be to leave no appeal to the High Court in these matters.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I am not able to accept the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner, and I think that if he will consider how the Supreme Courts of the states deal with appeals which come before them in cases where the verdicts of juries are in question, he will not have any of the fears he has expressed in regard to appeals to the Supreme Court from decisions of the Inter-State Commission. When the Inter-State Commission, which will be composed of experts on railways, navigation, and trade and commerce, have come to a decision, and that decision is appealed against, does the right honorable member think that the High Court will ever dream of setting aside that decision unless it is contrary to justice or on some question of law which the commission had not been able to grasp? The right honorable gentleman has alluded to the political, industrial, and other questions which may revolve round this matter, but does he not remember that we have federalized the waters of our rivers for navigation and irrigation? That being the case, surely no question ought to be more subject to appeals to the High Court than the question of rights to the use of those waters. I quite agree with the Right Hon. Sir George Turner that in simple matte

Mr. ISAACS. -

What questions of law could the Inter-State Commission decide apart from questions of fact?

Mr. DOBSON. -

The Inter-State Commission could decide questions of law arising out of the fact that you have, in spite of our friends from New South Wales, federalized your waters for navigation and irrigation, and I do not believe that the High Court will ever hold that the waters of a river flowing between the boundaries of two colonies belong to one state or the other. The court will say:"You have federalized your waters," and will deal with them accordingly. For these reasons I shall feel bound to oppose the amendment.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I hope that the Right Hon. Sir George Turner will not press this amendment. I quite assent to the position that this Inter-State Commission should have the power of final decision on questions of fact, and that there should be no appeal to the High Court on questions of fact. Therefore what the honorable member fears could not possibly happen. The High Court ought not to have, and could not have, any power to deal with questions of policy.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Why?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Because there ought to be no power in the court to review decisions of the commission on any question whatever except a question of law.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But what is to prevent the High Court reviewing other decisions under this clause?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I am speaking of the clause as it ought to be. I am quite willing to accept the amendment Mr. Holder suggests that the decisions of the Inter-State Commission shall not be reviewable except as to matters of law. But I would point out to Sir George Turner that if some power is not given over the Inter-State Commission you will make that commission an absolutely irresponsible body.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That power ought to be in the Parliament, and not in the High Court.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

That is going back to the old controversy. I leave aside for a moment the question whether you are to give powers to the Inter-State Commission to decide as to rights. That question will be raised by-and-by; but even taking the Inter-State Commission as now constituted under clause 96, it is necessary there should be some power in the High Court to review the decisions of the Inter-State Commission, where those decisions have gone beyond the powers which the Constitution has given to the commission.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Would not that come under sub-section (1) of clause 73?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
I think it would, because you want to deal with the decision of the commission. I ask honorable members to look at clause 96, constituting the Inter-State Commission. That clause reads as follows:-

There shall be an Inter-State Commission, with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament from time to time deems necessary, but so that the commission shall be charged with the execution and maintenance, within the Commonwealth, of the provisions of this Constitution, and of all laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce.

Now, that is a very necessary limitation of the powers of the Inter-State Commission. If that limitation was not placed in this clause as it is, the Inter-State Commission would be constituted a body having powers without limitations and you do not want to do that. How will this body exercise its powers? It may exercise them by judicial acts, by decisions in regard to rights, and a number of other matters. If in those decisions it goes beyond the limits of the Constitution as assigned to it, surely there must be power in the High Court to review those decisions. It must be so, otherwise you place the Inter-State Commission in an irresponsible position; and all we claim here is, that if this Inter-State Commission does go beyond the law and decides something that is illegal, there shall be a power of the High Court to review that decision.

Mr. VENN (Western Australia). -

Prohibition will do that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. -

No, prohibition will not do it. Prohibition will do that where the Inter-State Commission goes entirely outside its jurisdiction in reference to a subject-matter, but where the commission deals with a matter which is within its jurisdiction, and may have exceeded its powers or decided contrary to the Constitution in its decision on that subject, that is a matter which cannot be reached by prohibition. I find myself at a loss to understand why honorable members who have created the Inter-State Commission, and have limited its powers, should be afraid to submit the decision of that commission, not on questions of fact and policy, but on questions of law, to the tribunal which we have set up to deal with these matters.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is not a court; it is a jury of experts, like our Railways Commissioners.

Mr O'CONNOR. - The honorable member says it is not a court. It may or it may not be a court in the technical sense of the word; but if it has power to give decisions, surely that is the first essential of a court; and if it gives decisions which are not in accordance with the Constitution there should be some power of reviewing them. I do put it to the committee that, if you place the Inter-State Commission in a position which is absolutely irresponsible, there is no use whatever in placing limitations on its powers; and if you place limitations on its powers, and give it certain duties to perform, there must be some way of providing that it is kept within its powers, otherwise the rights which you give are simply illusory.

Mr. FRASER. -

It has only the rights given to it by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Exactly; it has the rights given to it by the Parliament, and those rights must be given to it under the Constitution.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It gets rights under this Bill.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Independent rights.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It gets rights under this Bill, but those rights can be of no value at all, unless the limitations of the rights are fixed by the Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You said that it got rights under the Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Of course it gets, as all these institutions do, its rights primarily from the Constitution, but it gets the limitations of those rights from the Parliament, by clause 96. Of course, it altogether depends on what view the committee take of the powers which they are going to place in the hands of this body. Considering the powers of adjudication which you give to the Inter-State Commission, unless you provide that the decisions which you give it the power to make are to be altogether irresponsible there must be a power of appeal from such decisions. My honorable friend (Mr. Higgins) interjected that it is not a court. You are in this difficulty: If it is not a court, if is not a body which has power to decide, you cannot have a prohibition against it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Can't you?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You can get an injunction against the commission for going outside its powers.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

What is the use of leaving it to a doubtful question of that kind?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is not doubtful.
Mr. OCONNOR. -

What is the use of leaving the matter to some learned arguments between lawyers as to whether an injunction will or will not apply, when you can simply provide for the whole thing by enacting in the Constitution that from its decisions, where the decisions go beyond its powers or it decides something which it has no right to decide, there should be an appeal?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Would you allow an appeal from directors of a company?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I hope the honorable member will ask something relevant and analogous. What has that to do with the matter we are now dealing with? I do not want to take up any more time about it. I submit that the matter is perfectly clear, and that under the Inter-State Commission constitution, which is provided for in clause 96, if you give the power of decision and adjudication there must be this power of review in questions of law only.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I understand that my learned friend (Mr. O'Connor) puts it in this way practically: That under clause 96 the Inter-State Commission is to have powers of adjudication as well as powers of administration, and amongst those powers to have such powers of adjudication as the Parliament may from time to time deem necessary; but, that whatever the Parliament does or does not do the Inter-State Commission is to be charged with the execution and maintenance of the provisions of the Constitution as well as all laws made hereafter in regard to trade and commerce. Then my honorable friend says, as regards matters of fact, he does not wish to give an appeal to the High Court, but as to matters of law, so far as relates to adjudication, there is to be an appeal to the High Court. It seems to me that if we maintained clause 96 in its integrity and other clauses, then a portion of the objection to putting this in would be taken away; but I cannot see why you are to put in clause 74 the Inter-State Commission, when you have given the judicial power of the Commonwealth the extension to all cases arising under this Constitution or involving its interpretation. Why will not that include any decision of the Inter-State Commission which is contrary to this Constitution Or, if it does not come under that, it would come under the next sub-section-"Arising under any laws made by the Parliament."

Mr. OCONNOR. -

For this reason, that in clause 74 you give special powers to the High Court to entertain certain appeals; it will have no powers beyond that. You have given power to the High Court to entertain appeals from federal courts and courts invested with federal jurisdiction, and if you want to include the Inter-State Commission, which is not a federal court, and is not invested with federal jurisdiction, you must mention it specially.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I find other clauses, for instance, clause 77, which provides that in certain cases the High Court shall have original as well as appellate jurisdiction. That goes beyond clause 74. Clause 74 is binding so far as it goes, but it is not exclusive. It does not say that that appellate jurisdiction shall not be extended if the Parliament chooses to extend it, but it is all subject to the provisions of that clause, so far as they extend. I base my objection to this provision not only on the ground which has been urged by my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner), but also on this ground, that I want to eliminate the constitutional creation of the Inter-State Commission. I think it is a great mistake that we should erect this body-a fourth branch of the Constitution-when it ought to be a matter for consideration by the people of the Commonwealth hereafter, through the Federal Parliament, to say what they will or will not have.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Surely that was decided in clause 96. The proper place to reconsider that question is when we come to that clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I was going to say that, when we come to clause 95A onward, I will take the opportunity to urge the elimination of the Inter-State Commission in its present form, and to place before the committee the reasons which guide my mind in the direction of leaving this matter to the

---

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

I see no necessity at all for the High Court to have control over a departmental matter. It is not a lawsuit. It does not infringe upon rights between parties.

Mr. REID. -

There are parties with very large interests involved.

Mr. FRASER. -

That may be said now in respect to rates charged on the various railways. There may be a sort of right which we do not quite conceive in our present condition of government; but if the Parliament will create this commission and, at the same time, prescribe its scope, beyond which it cannot go, surely it is not necessary to give special powers. You might as well say that the railway managers in the various states should be subject to the Federal Parliament; that the commissioners in the various colonies and the stationmasters should be subject to the Federal Parliament. You might run out the thing to an absurd degree.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is only their adjudications where they decide between parties, not their administrations.

Mr. FRASER. -

Their decisions are not decisions such as a court gives; they simply fix rates. You can hardly look upon a decision of that sort as a decision in the ordinary meaning of the word.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They do not fix rates, but they decide as to disputes.

Mr. FRASER. -

They decide as to disputes about rates.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

May I be permitted, sir, to suggest to Mr. O'Connor that this sub-section should be postponed until the Attorney-General of Victoria has had an opportunity to go into the other clause? If it is postponed, as I suggest, we will avoid a good deal of discussion, because if it remains there it is very evident that the High Court must have power to decide as to the legality of the decisions of this board.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I would be very glad to accept the suggestion if I could, but I cannot do that, because we must really have this thing decided now one way or the other, and if it is decided not to have an Inter-State Commission, we can strike out the clause afterwards.

Mr. FRASER. -

If the other clause is struck out, this clause can be struck out, as one hinges on the other; but whether it is struck out or retained, I think there is a possibility of the view being taken that it is a dangerous provision.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

In America the Inter-State Commission is not a judicial body. It gives decisions which are not enforceable by itself that certain rates are good or bad under the Constitution, but it is not armed with any power to carry out its own decisions. It has to leave it to the various courts to carry them out. If it decides that a rate is bad, any person who is aggrieved by its decision may take action, and the decision of the first court appealed to is subject to review by the High Court. What we seem to do here—I do not know whether it is actually done by the wording of clause 95—is to set up an independent federal tribunal, a thing which ought not to be tolerated. We set up a tribunal armed with all powers to carry out its decisions, and which can encroach in its original jurisdiction within a sphere which really belongs to the Judiciary. For instance, the whole of the clauses relating to trade and commerce can extend its power to give decisions to carry them out by the ordinary methods of courts of justice within the whole of the scope of subsection (1) of clause 52. Surely it was never intended to set up an auxiliary federal tribunal like that. I think the proper thing to do is to strike out this provision from clause 74, and to amend clause 95, so as to make more clear our intention, and to confine the work of the Inter-State Commission simply to administrative work, and if it declares a rate to be bad, then leave the party aggrieved, whether it be a state or an individual, to the same redress as exists in America. If a person refuses to pay the rate let the state take action. In America moneys cannot be recovered which are claimed under a rate which is held to be bad.

Mr. HOLDER. -
In America the Inter-State Commission is impotent.

Mr. GLYNN. -
The Inter-State Commission in America is not impotent except so far as in certain directions Congress has not gone far enough to arm it with sufficient powers. The power exists in the Constitution of America to give the Inter-State Commission the most complete powers of administration, to the extent which has been demanded by the commission itself; but I fail to see that the Constitution empowers Congress to set up the Inter-State Commission as a judicial tribunal, because by doing so it would have been establishing outside the Constitution another federal tribunal.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Does the honorable member think it is relevant to this clause to discuss what the United States has done?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I am pointing out that under this clause an appeal is given to the High Court from the Inter-State Commission as a judicial body, and I say that it ought not to be a judicial body. It was never intended to be a judicial body, and if it is not a judicial body, of course this clause cannot be retained, because there would be no appeal from it.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I can quite understand this amendment as coming from those who subsequently proposed to emit the Inter-State Commission. But if the Inter-State Commission is to be maintained, it does seem strange that just as we are about to give the right of appeal to the Privy-Council, it appears, in all sorts of cases we propose to erect, if this amendment is carried, a tribunal which shall be above the Constitution and shall be able to make decisions absolutely, in point of law, breaches of the Constitution, without any person having any redress. I can understand those who want to destroy the Inter-State Commission taking such a course, but those who do not, I think, will not take that course.

Mr. FRASER. -

Has not the Parliament the right to prescribe its powers?

Mr. REID. -

Yes, but, unfortunately, when you speak of prescribing powers, and set people to discharge powers, you should have some safeguard that if they do not properly discharge their powers, especially if they act illegally, there shall be some power over them to prevent them doing illegal things to either individuals or states. It really hangs upon that. If we are to have an Inter-State Commission, if the commission goes wrong in points of law, there should be some power in the Constitution to set it right. I do not for a moment suppose that they would go wrong intentionally, but it is, all the same, well to be on the safe side.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I think that we ought to remember that the term "Inter-State Commission" was inserted in clause 95A in lieu of the term "Federal Parliament" by a very narrow majority-I think only a majority of one-on the motion of Mr. Grant, who allowed his amendment to be altered in this particular, and against his own wish.

Mr. HOLDER. -

But as a compromise to settle a very great dispute.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

He desired to see these matters referred to the Federal Parliament.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would suggest that the proper time to discuss clause 96 is when we arrive at it. Assuming that clause 96 is retained in the Bill, the question is: Ought there to be an appeal?

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

I think the Premier of New South Wales has hardly caught the point which my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) put just now. The Inter-State Commission is not a body that acts. It is a body that simply decides upon facts-"Is a rate good?" "Is a charge an infringement of the Constitution?"

Supposing the decision is outside the Constitution, it is pro tanto invalid, and is not to be acted upon; and if the officers of a state or of the commonwealth act upon such a decision when it is outside the Constitution they are doing an illegal act. That is all the Inter-State Commission has to decide, and I understood Mr. Symon to say that it is a court, and that there should be an appeal.

Mr. SYMON. -

Oh no. I understood you to say that if the commission did not act; and I say that if the commission has to decide, there has to be an appeal.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

They have to decide, but not as a court.

Mr. REID. -

The commission is to be charged with the execution and maintenance within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution, and of all laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It is clumsily expressed, but at the same time I should take that with the other clauses about adjudication, and I should take the intention to be that they are to see by their decisions about rates and the rest that the laws are executed but they will not execute the laws.

Mr. REID. -

It is an idle tribunal if it simply meets and expresses an opinion and cannot enforce its decisions.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

In America-

Mr. REID. -

I do not mind that; the American conditions are not parallel.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I would ask the honorable member to confine his remarks to the question whether there should be an appeal from the Inter-State Commission as the Inter-State Commission is now constituted.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That is just what I was dealing with, and you will understand the drift of my observations when I say that the whole basis of my argument is that this Inter-State Commission is not a court, and it is absurd to talk of an appeal from a body that is not a court. That is the essence of my remarks. But in saying that the Inter-State Commission is not a court, I have to look at what it has to do. It is not an executive body in the sense that it has to do a thing, but it simply has to follow the analogy of the United States of America, where the commission gives decisions about rates. Its decisions are taken as final as long as they are within the limits of the Constitution, and the Commonwealth can enact laws for the purpose of giving effect to the rules of the commission. The decisions of the commission are simply the decisions of experts. I interjected, and I think relevantly, when Mr. O'Connor was speaking, that it is not usual to allow an appeal from directors of a company if they are acting within the purview of their bylaws; but whenever they act outside the limits of their by-laws there is an appeal from them to the court.

Mr. REID. -

If Your understanding of the commission is right I quite see the force of what you say; but we differ as to what the commission is to be.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I am not at all surprised, having regard to the form of words used in the clause, that a misapprehension has arisen, and I assure my right honorable friend I am trusting the Drafting Committee to put this language right.

Mr. HOLDER. -

It is right now; it will be wrong if it is altered.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I do not think it is the intention of this committee to put the Inter-State Commission in Australia in a d

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It has been done already in clause 96.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I understand that Mr. Holder is a stronger advocate of the Inter-State Commission and its powers than I am. I am not in favour of rendering the Inter-State Commission absolutely necessary, but I want to give a power to create it.

Mr. HOLDER. -

We want it permanently.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

You are giving an appeal to the High Court from all the courts of the Federation, and I am in favour of that; but, I say, do not give an appeal from a business body that merely decides on business principles what is a fair matter of business. You might as well say that we should give an appeal from the Railways Commissioner of New South Wales to the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The thing is not within the purview of the work of the courts. But if the commission should go outside the ambit of its powers, then without any express provision the decision will be treated pro tanto as void, and things will go on as before.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I want to point out some facts that bear strongly on the question of appeal. I would direct attention to clause 96, where the statement is made that the Inter-State Commission shall be charged "with the execution and maintenance" of two things: First, "of the provisions of this Constitution." That is much more than the Parliament may give it to do. Next, besides "the provisions of this Constitution," it is to be charged with the execution and maintenance "of all laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce." So that the Inter-State Commission is intended both to execute and maintain the provisions of this Constitution, and, incidentally thereto, the provisions of any Act of Parliament relating to trade and commerce. I think that such large powers as these might lead to the Inter-State Commission giving decisions in respect of which there should be a right of appeal on the mere question of law involved; and I hope the committee will give that right of appeal on questions of law, while it refuses the right of appeal on questions of fact within the knowledge of the experts we appoint.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

If you appoint the Inter-State Commission in the way described in the Bill, it will discharge no more than the functions of arbitrators. Now, if an arbitrator exceeds his functions, it would be possible to set aside his award. A decision of the Inter-State Commission is tantamount to an award. The provisions of clause 96 are so wide that surely, if the commission makes a mistake and goes beyond its powers, there must be a power of appeal somewhere. There ought not to be a doubt about that. I cannot understand the argument against it. I can understand the position of Mr. Isaacs, who wants to knock out the provision for the Inter-State Commission altogether; but if this body is to be established, the power of appeal, it seems to me, must be made clear and distinct.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I wish to make a suggestion. The only doubt which seems to me to exist is whether under clause 74, if some provision of this kind is not inserted, there would be jurisdiction in the High Court as an appellate court to entertain an appeal, supposing the Parliament in establishing the Inter-State Commission decided that in some matters the adjudication of the commission should be subject to appeal.

Mr. REID. -

Notice the words "with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe." Would not that cover it?

Mr. SYMON. -

I doubt whether that would be sufficient. It might not be. I quite agree with honorable members that it is not likely that there would be, or that we could contemplate, appeals in ordinary matters from the decision of experts to the High Court. I should be sorry to see anything of that kind. It would introduce political questions and matters of policy that would tend to derogate from the position which the High Court should occupy under this Constitution. But, at the same time, Parliament might think fit, and probably would, under the exhaustive powers of clause 96, to say that there were certain matters on which they would allow an appeal on points of law; and I suggest that we should put in after the words "Inter-State Commission" the words: "If Parliament allows such appeal." This would give jurisdiction to the High Court to entertain an appeal, and it would leave it to the Parliament in constituting the Inter-State Commission to say whether, in any particular matter, there should be an appeal on a point of law. The danger is that whilst the Parliament would give a jurisdiction to the High Court to entertain an appeal it might not have power to give an appeal from the Inter-State Commission. That is what should be guarded against. Leave the Parliament to say, when constituting the Inter-State Commission, upon what there shall be appeals. That would save any question whether or not this might not involve an appeal at all hazards from the Inter-State Commission. It would leave the matter to Parliament.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I would like to say, with reference to the suggestion of Mr. Symon, that by clause 96 we have already given Parliament power to confer powers of adjudication upon this Inter-State Commission. I call the attention of Mr. Glynn and Mr. Fraser to this matter. You have given power to the Parliament to give power to the Inter-State Commission to adjudicate for the purpose of the maintenance and execution of the provisions of the Constitution. That enables the Parliament to constitute the commission in such a way as to get rid of the difficulty that has occurred in America and it may give power, not only to decide that a rate is illegal, but to enforce that decision, and also to award damages or compensation to persons who have been injured by the rate. These questions of rates may involve immense sums of money, and immense considerations regarding damages to the states, to the persons dealing with the railways of the states, and to the Federal Commonwealth. If powers of adjudication of that kind are given, surely you will have a court with a power of adjudication which will deal with matters of infinitely larger concern than your ordinary courts will have to deal with. If you constitute a body of that kind, surely you are not going to put such a body in an absolutely irresponsible position. With reference to Mr. Symon's suggestion that it should be left in the power of the Federal Parliament to declare whether there shall be an appeal or not, if it is right to do that, it would be equally right to give Parliament power to say whether there should be an appeal from any of the federal courts, but you do not say that. I do not think you should give Parliament power to say that there shall be no appeal. They should make such exceptions and limitations as they think fit, but they should not take the power of appeal away. Therefore, I do not think Mr. Symon's suggestion should be followed. If so, Parliament would create an Inter-State Commission with immense powers, and make them absolute and irresponsible. I am sure that was never intended. If we carry out this proposal of an Inter-State Commission, as I hope we shall, considering the powers that they will be endowed with, it certainly ought to be subject to the same review as any other federal court.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I am disposed to agree with Mr. Fraser that it is not desirable to provide for a general appeal from the Inter-State Commission, which, it seems to me, would be a body exercising similar jurisdiction to the Railways Commissioners.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is only proposed to give an appeal when they adjudicate, and then they will not be exercising the same powers as Railways Commissioners.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I shall support the amendment of Sir George Turner.

Mr. WISE. -

Is not the safeguard provided in clause 96?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I think the safeguard is in the first part of clause 74. I think it might be desirable to confer a right of appeal from the decision of the Inter-State Commission, but I hope, sir, that we will insert the provision suggested by Mr. Holder, that there shall be no appeal except on matters of law. I also think we are sufficiently protected by the first part of clause 74, which, it seems to me, will give full power to Parliament to declare exceptions from this right of appeal, which will prevent the Inter-State Commission from being unnecessarily harassed. Under these circumstances, I think it is hardly necessary to vote for the striking out of the clause.

The amendment to strike out the words "Inter-State Commission" was negatived.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

At the suggestion of the Chairman, I intend to alter the amendment which I am about to move for what appears to me to be a very sufficient reason. A desire has been expressed that the debate on appeals to the Privy Council should not be interfered with, and that would take place if I followed the amendment as it is in print. I therefore desire to test the feeling of the Convention by moving-

That sub-section (2) be amended by adding the following words:-"on questions of law only."
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have no objection to accept the amendment of Mr. Holder, but he will understand that such questions as to whether there is evidence in favour of a particular contention are questions of law. I take it that the rules which generally apply now in considering questions of evidence in England, for instance, in deciding matters affecting new trial motions, on questions of fact, would apply here. In that case the weight of evidence is not to be considered if a verdict is demonstrably wrong and such as no reasonable man would give. I only point this out so that there may be no mistake. I think my honorable friend will understand that the amendment which he proposes will not allow mere questions of fact to be considered, except within the limits I have referred to.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Will the honorable member state what would be the effect of this addition upon the previous sub-section?

Mr. BARTON. -

I am very glad my honorable friend has pointed that out. The addition of these words might possibly be taken as affecting the construction of the prior part of the clause, in which case it might be inferred that while appeals from the Inter-State Commission were to be limited to questions of laws, other appeals were not to be confined to questions of law, but might be applied to questions of fact. I think a good deal of argument could be used in favour of such a construction. That will be a matter for Mr. Holder to consider. The ordinary construction of the prior part of the clause would be that these appeals were on questions of law. If my honorable friend introduces into his amendment words which restrict appeals from the Inter-State Commission to mere questions of law, then an implication may arise that in the prior part of the clause, the appeals are not so restricted, and that may raise ugly and difficult questions. Apart from the difficulty of construction, I am quite willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I simply propose to move the amendment in the way I suggest to enable the debate presently to proceed uninterruptedly. I can see the difficulty which has been suggested by Mr. Barton, and I am prepared to give an indication of the desire of the Convention, and leave it to the Drafting Committee to carry out our intention.

Mr. WISE (New South Wales). -

I would ask Mr. Holder not to press his amendment. If he looks at clause 96 he will see that it provides a perfectly efficient safeguard by leaving the matter in the hands of the Parliament to prescribe exactly what shall be the functions of the Inter-State Commission. They can provide that any decision shall be final or is subject to appeal. The insertion of the words of the amendment will, by implication, require that the appeals in the first sub-section shall be on questions of fact, which may be very undesirable.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

The Drafting Committee will put the matter right. We only want a direction from the Convention.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I beg to move -

That at the end of the clause the following words be inserted:-"saving any right that Her Majesty may be pleased to exercise by virtue of her Royal prerogative."

I may say that this is not what I regard as carrying out my own views, because if I had my own way I would undoubtedly have the Privy Council as the final Court of Appeal in all matters. But I recognise that there is a very strong difference of opinion on this question. I hope that honorable members will be able to see their way to agree to this proposal, which is only in harmony with the law of Canada. There are two questions very pertinently put by a gentleman writing in the press, asking what the opinions of the people are in reference to this question. He says-

Do they side with Mr. Carruthers or Mr. Symon?

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member is not in order in reading any comments on the debates in this Convention.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I am not doing that. I am referring to a letter which was written before this Convention began to sit.

Mr. SYMON. -

No; it was published after the last debate on the subject.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Very well; I will get over the difficulty.

Mr. SYMON. -

I want to hear it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I can quote from the Hansard debates. I do not speak so very often that I should be invariably met with interruptions. The Chairman, of course, has a perfect right to call my attention to any irregularities, and I am not above learning, but I object to these continual interruptions by honorable members who have occupied a very large amount of time in this Convention, and who are always exhorting other honorable members not to waste time. The contention of Mr. Carruthers was that-

The resolutions we have passed, the Bill which we are now framing, and the union which we hope to consummate, declare that this is to be a union under the Crown.

Mr. Symon, on the other hand, understands-

We are creating a nation which is to be self-contained, self-sufficing in every possible respect.

I deny that; I believe that, whatever we are doing, we desire to remain an integral part of the British Empire. Although one may believe, as I have no doubt Mr. Symon does conscientiously believe, that this proposal will not interfere with our desire in that respect, I am one of those who believe that it will interfere greatly in regard to it. We have the opinion of a great constitutional writer, Dr. Bourinot, who is accepted as an authority on most matters relating to parliamentary law, and who is continually quoted as a constitutional authority throughout the British Empire. What does he say with regard to these proposals? He read a paper, which has been reprinted from the Transactions of the Royal Society of Canada, and is entitled-"The Canadian Dominion and proposed Australian Commonwealth"—a Study in Comparative Politics. It contains a valuable discussion on the importance of retaining the appeal to Her Majesty in Council. At page 27 he cites a passage by Sir Henry Wrixon, which crystallizes the whole controversy. That passage reads:-

At present it is one of the noblest characteristics of our empire that over the whole of its vast area every subject, whether he be black or white, has a right of appeal to his Sovereign. That is a grand right, and a grand link for the whole of the British Empire. But it is more than that. It is not, as might be considered, a mere question of sentiment, although I may say that sentiment goes far to make up the life of nations. It is not merely that, but the unity of final decision preserves a unity of law over the whole empire.

No one seems to have pointed out during these debates that Mr. Gladstone, in his first Home Rule Bill, preserved the right of appeal from the law courts to be established in Ireland to the House of Lords. Afterwards, there was an amendment of the provisions relating to appeals to the Privy Council, and in Mr. Gladstone's next Home Rule Bill the proposal was not to allow these appeals to the House of Lords, but to allow them to go to the Privy Council. In that respect I have no hesitation in saying that, revolutionary as those Bills of Mr. Gladstone's were regarded, they are not half as revolutionary as the Bill now under consideration in regard to the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council. We were told the other morning that this Bill did not propose to take away from the subject the right of appeal to the Privy Council. Technically it did not, because subjects are represented by the states. But really no individual in the community, if we pass the Bill as it is now, will have the right of appeal to what has been regarded with pride by the British nation as the final tribunal for the administration of its law. What has been the experience in the past?
We have heard that appeals to the Privy Council were costly. We have heard that they were dilatory; and we have heard that the poor man has no opportunity of entering an appeal. During an experience of some five and thirty years I have obtained as great and intimate a knowledge in regard to those appeals as any man in the community. I have been concerned in at least ten or twelve appeals to the Privy Council. One of the biggest appeals we ever had from New South Wales was the one referred to by the Hon.
Mr. Carruthers. That appeal was the result of an action brought in our own Supreme Court against a conditional purchaser by Mr. Edols, one of the wealthiest squatters in the Western District. The Supreme Court, after hearing arguments, finally delivered judgment. Before that was done, however, the Chief Justice, Sir James Martin, died, and his judgment was read by one of his colleagues. The other two Judges disagreed with Sir James Martin, and in any case their judgment was the final judgment of the court. I mention this case to show what opportunities a poor man may have, even in this country, in regard to appeals to the Privy Council. This man had taken up a conditional purchase on Mr. Edols' lease. The question arose whether the land was open to conditional purchase or not, and the Supreme Court, by a majority, held that the land was not open to conditional purchase. Sir James Martin's judgment was the other way about. The result of that appeal was very small, if confined to the individual alone; but the question was as to the settlement and occupation, not of 1,000 acres, but of close on 1,000,000 acres of land, which would be thrown open if the judgment of the Supreme Court were wrong. An appeal was made to the Privy Council, although the appellant was a selector without means. Owing to the magnitude of the importance of the case, however, the appellant was able to get others to help him, and he finally went to the Privy Council. This was a case in which, looking at the dates, there would appear to be great delay. No doubt there was necessary delay, on account of the want of means of this man. But the final decision of the Privy Council was in favour of the appellant, and the result was that thousands and tens of thousands of acres were thrown open for occupation in New South Wales which otherwise would have been locked up for a period of at least ten years under lease. I mention this case to show that even the poor man has an opportunity of going to the Privy Council as a final tribunal. If honorable members will take the trouble to read the returns of appeals to the Privy Council they will see that the delays are not so numerous. They will see that the delays are not greater, at all events, than exist in our own courts in reference to matters of very great importance. It is no uncommon thing in the Supreme Court of New South Wales to have matters referred by the Land Appeal Court, which remain undecided for a considerable time, extending, to my knowledge, over twelve or fifteen months. If honorable members will look at the returns of the Privy Council appeals, they will see that the average delay does not exceed that period, or, at any rate, is very little more. To laymen, possibly, the procedure in regard to appeals to the Privy Council is unknown. First, the judgment of the Supreme Court is delivered, and, within a certain time, any one who desires to go to the Privy Council applies for leave to appeal. That leave is given, and, until lately, it was a matter that was entirely within the power of the appellant when be would have the transcript made up by the Prothonotary of the Supreme Court, and remitted to the Privy Council in London. It was only within the last few years that compulsion was put on the appellant to make up his transcript, which is a copy of all the proceedings, a copy of the judgment, and a copy of the documents which influenced the court in coming to the decision which was about to be appealed against. Necessarily there was great delay in getting that transcript to the Privy Council, but under comparatively recent orders all that has been abolished, and the transcript must be remitted to the Privy Council within a certain time. Then, when the transcript reaches London, the solicitors there have to enter the case for hearing. There again is delay, and always in these great cases there must be delay, because both parties are unwilling to go to the Privy Council, and are trying their very best to secure a settlement of the case. Dr. Bourinot again comments on the Privy Council in the proceedings of the Canadian Royal Society for 1897, which has not yet been generally distributed in Australia. As I said before, people will acknowledge Dr. Bourinot as an authority on Constitutional Government. He says-in Canada during the Victorian Era, page 28:-

Here, also, the wisdom and learning Of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England and of the Canadian Judiciary are, to a large extent, nullifying the contentions of politicians, and bringing about a solution of difficulties, which, in a country divided between distinct nationalities, might cause serious complications if not settled on sound principles of law which all can accept.
Mr. Symon, in Adelaide, styled appeals to the Privy Council as iniquitous, and in Melbourne, on the 31st of January, he quoted the London Times, of 22nd June, 1870. That date is very material, because I am quite sure Mr. Symon would not intentionally mislead the Convention with regard to a quotation of that kind. But when Mr. Symon made that quotation he ought to have known, and he ought to have told the Convention, that the quotation was not applicable to the present circumstances of the Privy Council.

Mr. SYMON. -
I did so.

Mr. BARTON. -
In Adelaide?

Mr. SYMON. -
Here.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Well, then, what was the necessity for quoting the Times at all if it had ceased to be an authority? Undoubtedly, the honorable member knew it had ceased to be an authority at the time when he quoted it. I am glad to hear him say that he told the Convention the quotation was not applicable. At all events, the honorable member quoted the Times of 1870 as an authority in favour of his argument, when, as a matter of fact, at that time it was not an authority in favour of his argument, because of the altered constitution of the Privy Council. The Times says-

We have no hesitation in saying the condition of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is simply disgraceful.

That was on the 22nd of June, 1870. Mr. Symon also quoted Lord Westbury and Lord Cairns much to the same effect. But he appears to have overlooked the fact that an Act was passed in 1871, the following year, to remedy the existing state of things, and to strengthen the tribunal. Under that Act four additional members were appointed, at a salary of £5,000 a year each. I do not think the honorable member told the Convention that.

Mr. SYMON. -
I told them the whole thing had been reformed.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Then what was the use of the quotation? By the joint operation of Acts 39 & 40 Vict. c. 59 (1876) and 50 & 51 Vict. c. 70 (1887) there was a reform, and there are now four Lords of Appeal, who sit in turn. I would ask honorable members to listen to this, because we heard the other day that the constitution of the House of Lords and of the Privy Council were very different, and that, whilst the House of Lords was the final Court of Appeal in England, the Privy Council was the final Court of Appeal with regard to questions arising in the colonies. It was said that practically we had two courts which were in a position to give two different decisions—that we had a House of Lords giving a decision binding throughout the empire, and that we had the Privy Council giving a decision which would be binding also. On the Judicial Committee of the House of Lords there are four Lords of Appeal, who sit in turn, two of them in the House of Lords and two in the Privy Council. Since the amendments in 1876 and 1887, the two courts are composed of the same class of Judges. In fact, the House of Lords and the Privy Council are, as to their personnel, substantially the same tribunal sitting in two divisions, one taking English and Irish and the other colonial and Indian appeals. The only difference in the personnel of the two tribunals is that in the Privy Council there are three colonial Chief Justices. That is of very great importance to the colonies. As I said, there are three colonial Chief Justices and one retired Indian Judge who are not peers. Occasionally, also, Judges and retired Judges who are Privy Councillors and experts in the branch of the law under discussion are also summoned. Can it be suggested, however high the Federal High Court may be in regard to attainments, that under any circumstances the Judges of the court would have the experience, the training, and the knowledge of the men composing the Court of the Privy Council? Would it be possible to separate the members of the Federal High Court from local influences? Unintentionally, men are influenced by their surrounding conditions. It does not follow because a man is to-day in public life as Attorney-General, and to-morrow is sitting on the bench wearing the ermine, that he can dissociate himself or separate himself from local surroundings and be unbiased or uninfluenced by those considerations. Take a case of importance arising here. I admit that our Judges have great learning and extensive knowledge, and I admit the great power and the great strength of our Supreme Courts throughout the various colonies, but I say that they can have no experience equal to the men who occupy positions on the bench of the Privy Council. We are told, however, that the members of the Privy Council do not understand our law, that they do not know our conditions, and that they are unacquainted with local influences. Well, I have always considered that a very trifling matter in fact, I have thought it was a very desirable thing that they did not understand our local conditions, because our laws are not to be interpreted in regard to local conditions, but according to the intent contained within every word in them, apart from local conditions. I have heard men express their astonishment that the Judges of our own Supreme Court have not taken into consideration the Hansard debates when they were giving judgment. I feel quite sure that when an appeal goes to the Privy Council all these considerations are completely wiped out. The members of the Board of the Privy Council do not consider our local conditions, but interpret our Acts in the words in which they are printed. I have already referred to the two chief objections to appeals to the Privy Council; first, the expense, and, secondly, the delay. I have endeavoured to show that the expense is not so enormous as it is represented to be. If honorable members will look at the return in relation to appeals to the Privy Council from decisions of the Supreme Court in Queensland every layman, at all events, will be struck by the fact that the expenses of one appeal were only £29 in Queensland, and £219 in the Privy Council—that means the taxed costs of the appeal. It has nothing to do with the local costs; it means the preparation of the transcript and the final cost in London. The difference between the cost of appeals to the proposed High Court and the cost of appeals to the Privy Council is well but rather under stated, by Sir Lambert Dobson, in a document which is quoted at page 969 of the report of the debates of this Convention at Adelaide; and I think that we are very much indebted to Sir Edward Braddon for quoting that information in the speech which he delivered on that occasion. In many cases counsel's fees at the present time are higher here than I have ever known them before, and I say this with a knowledge extending over 30 years of practical experience.

Mr. BARTON. -

Counsel's fees are a great deal lower with us than they were a few years ago.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I can remember the time when Sir James Martin accepted a brief to go to a court at the Hunter River for fifteen guineas. I would not like to be the attorney to offer a fee of fifteen guineas in such a case to my most intimate friend at the bar, because I know what would happen.

Mr. SYMON. -

What would happen?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

He would probably kick me out of his chambers. So far as I can ascertain, counsel's fees in these colonies are relatively higher than they are in England, and I estimate that, taking into account travelling expenses and other things, the costs of an appeal to the Federal High Court would be four or five times greater than the cost of an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Let me ask the Western Australian representatives what advantage it would be to the people of their colony to have appeals to the High Court sitting in Sydney or at Wentworth, which, I am told, is to be the capital of Federated Australia? What advantage would it be to them to go there and fee counsel to appear on their behalf before the High Court? I ask those who contend that local knowledge is a great advantage, what benefit would local knowledge be if they had to retain counsel in Sydney to advocate their interests in an appeal to the High Court, if the court happened to be sitting there! What advantage would local knowledge and circumstances be if the same set of circumstances arose in this colony, and Western Australians had to come to Victoria to appeal to the High Court? Where is the saving of expense? Then I turn to Tasmania. Fortunately, Tasmania is a law-abiding country and has had Only one appeal to the Privy Council since it had responsible government. But what advantage would it be to Tasmania to abolish appeals to the Privy Council if Tasmanians had to fee counsel here or in Sydney, because I do not suppose that any of us imagine the capital of Federated Australasia is to be in Tasmania. But, wherever the capital is, what advantage is it to the people of the other states who have to go to that High Court, and take it as the final Court of Appeal, when they might go to the Privy Council, when, in the latter case, the cost would be less, or at any rate not greater? I will tell honorable members what advantage is to be gained by going to the Privy Council. I have already pointed out that the members of the Privy Council are men of great learning and great experience, and that the parties interested in appeals will have the advantage of being able to command the services of members of a bar which is unquestionably the greatest the world has ever seen. I have already mentioned that counsel's fees in these colonies are greater than counsel's fees in England, and you have to add to that additional cost the amount of travelling expenses and loss of time, which would make the cost of an appeal to the High Court of Australia still heavier. Now, take the case of South Australia place where there have been many appeals. Fortunately for the people of South Australia, they seem to have had a very good and a very strong bench, because out of the number of appeals to the Privy Council from the decisions of the Supreme Court of South Australia, only two have been allowed.

Mr. SYMON. -

And yet you deny the competence of our Judges to deal out justice.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I would remind honorable members that there would be larger cases under the federal form of government than have hitherto arisen. But I say, take South Australia, and place its records side by side with those of the Victorian courts, where they have had more appeals than probably all the other courts put together within the same period of time, and where there have been more scandalous delays than in any of the courts throughout the Australian colonies. There was one case here in Victoria—and it is cases like that which perfectly scandalize a great court like the Privy Council. The public is told that there is an appeal to the Privy Council from the Supreme Court of Victoria. The public were told that a judgment was delivered here in Victoria in the case of Dougharty v. The Bank of Australasia, in 1891, and that the case was not dealt with by the Privy Council till 1896.

Mr. SYMON. -
Which side was the appellant in that case?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Dougharty. These bald facts go forth to the public, that a judgment was delivered in the Supreme Court of Victoria in 1891, and that the case was not heard of again until the appeal to the Privy Council, in 1896. That, without explanation, is scandalous, and I think, even with the explanation that was given, it is equally scandalous. The delay was not with the Privy Council, but the public think it was. They heard of the judgment being delivered in Victoria on the 30th September, 1891, and they did not hear of the judgment of the Privy Council until five years afterwards. Now, as a matter of fact, leave to appeal was given in that case on the 2nd September, 1892, exactly twelve months after judgment was delivered. How that length of time elapsed I do not know, but the papers were not sent to England until the 30th March, 1896.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It was by reason of the right of appeal to the Privy Council that all that delay took place.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
My learned friend knows nothing about a case except the fees he gets in court. He is not a solicitor. The facts which I have mentioned in connexion with that case going forth to the public would make the public believe that the delay was on the part of the Privy Council. Now, the Board of the Privy Council called for an explanation of that delay, and the explanation which was given was that the delay occurred owing, first, to the illness of the lawyers; and, secondly, to changes of their managing clerks. This is one of the appeal cases to which Mr. Symon, no doubt, referred. I believe that if you could take all of these cases and go through them, you would find that the delays in all instances arose here, and not in London.

Mr. SYMON. -
But those delays are all incidental to appeals.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Yes; but I have seen the whole administration of the Lands department of New South Wales blocked for twelve or eighteen months for want of a decision by our own Supreme Court. I have seen things of that kind not once, but many times. We have land boards to administer our Land Acts, and there is an appeal from the decisions of that board to a specially-established court. That court, on questions of law, has to state a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court, and I have known land board cases hung up for twelve or fifteen months in the Supreme Court before there was a final decision given. The honorable member will tell me that that is the result of the system of appeals. I admit it, but I think it is partly owing to the lawyers. If those appeals were abolished, each case would have been ended by the decision of the local land board. Every appeal brings about delay. But delay is a small consideration, providing you get good law and justice ultimately. Now, of course, a decision of the High Court of Australia will bind the whole of the federated states, but it has no effect outside Australia. On the other hand, a decision of the Privy Council, on whatever matter is involved, has effect throughout the whole British Empire. I could go on enumerating these cases, to show that the delays are not with the Privy Council, but rather with the parties to the appeals themselves and with the lawyers.

Mr. HOVE. -
That is right.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
But I am not going to say anything against lawyers. If it were not for men like Mr. Howe there would be no necessity for lawyers.

Mr. SYMON. -
He is not a very lucrative client, I can tell you.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I am quite sure that Mr. Symon knows, in respect of South Australia, who are and who are not lucrative clients.

Mr. SYMON. -
He is a very good fellow and therefore keeps out of the law courts.

Mr. HOWE. -
I keep the oyster to my self; the lawyers can have the shells if they like.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
In South Australia, the costs of appeals to the Privy Council have ranged between £674, the highest, to £184, the lowest.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Is that the taxed costs of one side only, or of both?

Mr. SYMON. -
The taxed costs of one side only.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The only solid objection to appeals to the Privy Council is, that there is no local distribution of the money—that the money is sent out of your own country. Now, in the case in which the highest amount of costs (£674) was incurred, the property at stake was valued at £40,000; and in the appeal in the Moonta case (Regina v. Hughes and another), which stands at the head of the list— for in that case property worth half-a-million sterling was at stake - the successful appellant's costs amounted to £434. Now, there is one case in South Australia in which if the parties concerned had been bound by the decision of the South Australian Supreme Court, able as it is, one of the parties to the suit would have been done out of their rights to the tune of half-a-million pounds' worth of property. In that case Sir Roundell Palmer, Sir Hugh Cairns, Sir John Rolt, Mr. Mellish, and other distinguished counsel were engaged, and it took three days to argue the case. As to the time taken by appeals to the Privy Council, Mr. Symon made a statement on the 31st of January, as reported in Hansard. His figures as to South Australia, I am told, are not quite correct, as they include the whole of the time between the granting of leave to appeal and the decision of the Privy Council being given. As I said before, months and sometimes years are wasted between those times.

[The Chairman left the chair at one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

When we adjourned for lunch I was about to point out that during the last summer sitting of the Judicial Committee the whole of the work of the committee was cleared off, with the exception of a few reserved judgments. It has been pointed out in the press and elsewhere that if a High Court of Appeal were established in Australia it would be found that the cases would come before it only when it was convenient for counsel to attend, and that probably counsel would prefer to attend the sittings of the state courts if there was any clashing between those sittings and the sittings of the High Court of Appeal. Under these circumstances, it is hardly likely that suitors would be able to procure the very best counsel to appear for them in the High Court of Appeal, and to give up their business in the state courts, except upon the payment of enormous fees. As honorable members know, in the North American Constitution power was reserved to the Dominion to establish a High Court. The Parliament there introduced a Bill to establish a High Court, and, in reference to this matter, Todd, at page 184, says—
Furthermore, upon the introduction into the Canadian Parliament, in 1875, of a Bill to create a Supreme Court for the Dominion, it was the expressed intention of Ministers to have prohibited any further appeals to Her Majesty's Privy Council. They were notified, however, that the Bill could not be sanctioned, unless it preserved to the Crown its right to hear the appeals of all British subjects who might desire to appeal, in the ultimate resort, to the Queen in Council. Accordingly, a saving clause to that effect was inserted in the Bill, and it received the Royal assent.

The same author, speaking with regard to this appellate jurisdiction, says—and I would ask honorable members to pay particular attention to this passage:-

The appellate jurisdiction of the Queen in Council is retained for the benefit of the colonies, not for that of the mother country. It secures to every British subject a right to claim redress of grievances from the Throne.

He continues:-

It is true that in a colony which possesses an efficient court of appeal it may be seldom necessary to have recourse to this supreme tribunal.

No doubt if a High Court of Appeal is established here, and it is what those who propose to found it anticipate that it will be, there will be very few appeals to the Privy Council. Still, I think that the right of ultimate appeal to the Privy Council should continue to exist. Todd goes on to say:-

Nevertheless, its controlling power, though dormant, and rarely invoked, is felt by every judge in the empire, because he knows his decisions are liable to be submitted to it. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that British colonists have uniformly exhibited a strong desire not to part with the right of appeal from colonial courts to the Queen in Council.

I submit, with great confidence, that it is for those who propose to take away this right to show that there is no need for it. There has not been a single petition presented to the Convention in favour of the clause as it stands. I suppose that those who so earnestly desire the retention of the clause as it stands would, if they could get petitions in favour of their proposal, inundate us with them. Since we have been sitting in Melbourne, no less than 26 petitions have been presented to us, praying that the right of appeal to the Privy Council may be retained; but not one petition has been presented in favour of doing away with this right.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The people do not care twopence about the matter.

Mr. SYMON. -

They do not know anything about it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
It is very easy for my learned and disorderly friend (Mr. Higgins) to make an assertion of that kind, but I tell him that the people care a great deal more about what is going on here than he appears to think.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

They do not think that we ought to be interfered with by petitions.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The honorable and learned member's turn to speak will come by-and-by, and it would be more mannerly for him to allow me to proceed without interruption. Honorable members cannot suppose that, when they retire from this Convention next week, their work will be done. They must recognise that the Bill, before coming into law, must get the approval of the Imperial Government. As I have already pointed out, the Imperial Government in 1875 intimated that they would not sanction a Bill which contained provisions to the same effect as the clause now before the committee, abolishing the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. SYMON. -

What Bill was that?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The North American Bill. I have quoted Todd but perhaps he is not a good enough authority, and I will now quote Lord Norton, who, writing in 1879, said-

The late Canadian Government brought in a Bill creating a Supreme Court, and prohibiting appeal to the Privy Council here. They were told that the Bill could not be sanctioned unless it preserved to the Crown its rights to hear the appeals of all British subjects if they should desire to appeal in the ultimate resort to Her Majesty in Council; and the Dominion Government gave way and amended the Bill accordingly.

This was in 1875, but I need not go back to any remote date to ascertain what the feeling is. In the months of June and July of 1897, a conference was held at the Colonial-office, London, between the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Premiers of the self-governing colonies. I have in my hand a report of the proceedings of the conference. I have spoken to one or two honorable members, and they tell me that they have not seen this document. It is rather long, and I did not read it myself until I came here. I have been asked, who is Mr. Chamberlain? I say that he is a very potent influence in the British Empire today, and that he is likely to be a still more potent influence in a few years hence. At this conference Mr. Chamberlain said-

Now, gentlemen, in connexion with this subject, we have already made a small advance, upon which I congratulate myself, since it was accomplished during my term of office, though it was prepared by my predecessors; and it may have in the future important results. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is the great judicial Court of Appeal of the empire. It is the nearest approach, the closest analogy, to the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a body of almost universal and world-wide reputation and authority.

I do not think that Mr. Chamberlain had at that time met the Hon. Mr. Symon, or he would not have made that statement.

Mr. SYMON. -

There are two or three other statements I think he would not have made.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Mr. Chamberlain said-

It is a body of almost universal and worldwide reputation and authority, and it is our desire, naturally, in pursuit of the ideas which I am venturing to put before you, to increase its authority, if that be possible, and to give it a more representative character, and with that view we have most gladly secured the appointment, as Privy Councillors, of distinguished Judges from the courts of Canada, of Australia, and of South Africa, and they now will take their seats on equal terms with the other members of the Judicial Committee.

I will read another quotation from Mr. Chamberlain's speech, and I think honorable members will see how probable it is that if this Bill goes home in its present form it will meet with the treatment that it was intimated would be given to the Canadian Bill mentioned by Lord Norton. Mr. Chamberlain said-

May I note, in passing, a matter of some importance in regard to the proposed Australian Federation Bill? It appears, in that Bill, to be suggested that if it is passed appeals should only go to the Privy Council upon constitutional questions. I venture, most respectfully, to urge the reconsideration of that suggestion. Nothing is more desirable, in the interests of the colonies, in the interests of the United Kingdom and of the British Empire, than an uniformity of law, and that uniformity can only be obtained by occasional appeals to the highest tribunal, settling once for all the law for all parts of the empire; and I confess I think it would be a great loss to the colonies if they surrendered the opportunity of getting this judicial decision upon difficult and complicated points of law which from time to time may arise in the local courts.

We have before us the experience of 1875, when Canada was told that a provision similar to that in this Bill would not be sanctioned and we have this gentle admonition from Mr. Chamberlain. In the sitting of the Convention at Adelaide I quoted—and it cannot be too often quoted—a letter written by the late Mr. Justice Richmond to Sir Henry Parkes. We have our own experience, and we have the experience of men in other parts of the country with regard to the value of this right of appeal to the Privy Council. I should like to go further than is proposed in my amendment; but I do earnestly hope that the right of appeal to the Privy Council will be retained to the Australian colonies. The method proposed by me is one which will throw difficulties in the way of getting that ultimate appeal. I do not think that there should be even those difficulties. At the present time, any person engaged in a lawsuit in which the sum of £500 is involved can appeal to the Privy Council, on certain conditions with regard to finding security for costs. Although the Supreme Courts in these colonies have no power to grant leave to appeal, the Privy Council has power to grant leave to appeal under any circumstances, no matter what is the consideration involved. Under the proposal which I have submitted, if a subject of the Queen desires to appeal to the Privy Council, there will be no power in the High Court to grant that appeal as a matter of course. The subject will, however, have a right to go to the Privy Council, and present a petition asking leave to appeal. If an order is made it will be filed in the courts out here, and a transcript will be remitted to England. I do not think it is too much to ask that that link with the highest, and, I think, the most valuable, court in the British Empire should be retained.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I intend, at the proper time, to move an amendment on this amendment, but I ask the indulgence of the Convention whilst, as briefly as possible, I restate the ease for what I consider, and what has been considered hitherto by the Convention, an essential feature of the Constitution we are framing, and against the continuance of superfluous and unnecessary Courts of Appeal. It is due to my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott), and to those estimable and well-meaning, though, as I think, mistaken, gentlemen who have been getting up quite a small agitation outside against the resolution that this Convention has agreed to—

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The honorable member says that I got up an agitation outside. I did nothing of the kind.

Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable member is correcting a mistake I did not make. He is uncommonly touchy and sensitive. He was a little more moderate before lunch, but something at lunch must have been unpalatable to him.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
That is a very impertinent remark.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do think the honorable member ought to keep calm. He is developing a disorderly habit, which is exceedingly inconvenient. I was not referring to my honorable friend, but to those whom I described specifically as a few well-meaning, though, as I think, misguided gentlemen outside, who have been getting up quite a small agitation on this matter. It seems to me to be a most extraordinary thing that there should be this curious struggle for an extra law court. That i

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

No.

Mr. SYMON. -

I hope that I shall not be interrupted; and I take this opportunity of expressing my regret that Sir Joseph Abbott misapprehended an interjection of mine made at an early stage of his speech. It was not intended as an interjection, but as a correction as to a date. If it interfered with the thread of his remarks, I am exceedingly sorry for it, and I tender him my apology. Now, I say that the whole of this struggle is for an extra law court. One more river for the unhappy litigant to cross. The object of these gentlemen, for whom I have the very highest respect, so far as I know them, is to heap upon the Appellate Court which we are going, to establish another Appellate Court 12,000 miles away. That, is the issue, and that is what the Convention is invited to support. All I say is that this is unique in the history of the civilized world. It is the first time I ever heard of an agitation in any civilized community for multiplying the courts of appeal. Of course, every additional appeal is in the hands of the wealthy and unscrupulous litigant-

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

The honorable member has no right to say that.

Mr. SYMON. -

Why not!

Mr. BARTON. -

Very often a scrupulous litigant.

Mr. SYMON. -

I will say then that every additional court of appeal may be an additional instrument of oppression in the hands of a wealthy and highly scrupulous litigant.

Mr. FRASER. -

Leave everything to the first court.
Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable member must not interrupt me with irrelevancies like that. We are obliged to create one great Court of Appeal under the Constitution. That court must be here. It will be the Queen's Court. Sir Joseph Abbott does not suggest that we should do away with that court in any way. No one suggests it. All we do is to ask the Queen to say that that court is enough; that there is no need to keep up another Court of Appeal at the other end of the earth. That is the whole question, and I confess I am amazed beyond measure at the want of knowledge exhibited by those estimable but not very well-instructed gentlemen outside.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Oh!

Mr. SYMON. -

I am going to show that it is so. I say estimable and not very well-instructed gentlemen outside, who are responsible for this agitation.

Mr. BARTON. -

How do you know they are not well instructed?

Mr. SYMON. -

From their petition. Honorable members who have taken a different view from myself are perfectly entitled to hold that view. I do not for one moment reproach them, but I must call attention to what has been taking place with a view of exciting prejudice and feeling in relation to a matter about which prejudice and feeling ought not to exist at all. I do complain of the veiled hints that have been given and they were reiterated to-day by Sir Joseph Abbott—as to what the consequences will be to federation if these people do not get this extra, distant, and expensive appeal court. All I can say is that if the enthusiasm of these gentlemen for federation is of so Laodicean a character that it requires to be galvanized into vitality by the establishment of an additional law court, it is not of much value to the cause.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

It is not the establishment of an additional law court. That court exists.

Mr. SYMON. -

But we are establishing a High Court of Australia; he does not propose to do away with that.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

But the other court is established.

Mr. SYMON. -

It is a pity these interjections should be made, but I cannot help noticing that one. My honorable friend said a few minutes ago that the lawyers were the cause of the trouble.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
   And I honestly believe it.
Mr. SYMON. -
   I am quite sure that my honorable friend would not say it if he did not believe it, but does he not know that the High Court will exist just the same? The lawyers of Australia will have exactly the same position in relation to the High Court, and the same business, as if the appeal to the Privy Council were abolished. Therefore, you are simply superadding to everything the Australian lawyers will have, a further distribution of the litigants' funds in England. My honorable friend is not taking anything away from the lawyers by this amendment.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
   Well, we ought to get your vote then.
Mr. SYMON. -
   Oh, my honorable friend is now imputing an unworthy motive-I really will take no more notice of his objections if he imputes so dishonorable a motive to me as that.
The CHAIRMAN. -
   I must ask the honorable member not to interrupt the speaker who is addressing the Chair.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL (Victoria). -
   The honorable member should not have made the statement he did.
The CHAIRMAN. -
   Order. The honorable member must resume his seat.
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
   I am sure I may crave the indulgence of the committee, because I have not interposed very much throughout its deliberations. The honorable member spoke of the "unscrupulous position" of those who take a contrary view to himself.
Mr. SYMON. -
   I did not. Neither did I use the words " unscrupulous position."
Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
   The honorable member did use that expression, and I call him to order for doing so.
The CHAIRMAN. -
   Order. Will Sir William Zeal kindly take his seat? No honorable member has any right to interrupt the speaker who is addressing the Chair, except for the purposes specified in Standing Order No. 146, which is as follows:-
   No member shall interrupt another member speaking unless-
(1) To request that his words be taken down.
(2) To call attention to a point of order.
(3) To call attention to the want of a quorum.

Mr. REID. -
Has that been enforced all through?

The CHAIRMAN. -
I am very sorry to say that some honorable members have rendered it very difficult for me to enforce that standing order.

Mr. SYMON. -
Well, I hope we shall get on a little more smoothly. I wish to point out that really my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) has needed a good deal of the generosity of the Convention, considering that this subject has been already exhaustively dealt with.

Mr. FRASER. -
Oh, no.

Mr. SYMON. -
The question has been decided at two sittings of the Convention following upon the Federal Convention of 1891. As honorable members will recollect, a Convention was held in 1891, the members of which were chosen by the Parliaments of the different colonies, and the proposal to retain this appeal to the Privy Council was rejected by a majority of two. This Convention, which comes direct from the people, and is founded upon the suffrages of the people, has thoroughly considered the subject, and at Adelaide, in 1897, clause 75, which took away this right of appeal to the Privy Council was affirmed by a majority of ten. Again, only a few weeks ago, during the session upon which we are now engaged, this right of appeal to the Privy Council was taken away, and the decision at Adelaide was adhered to by a majority of eight. And, therefore, I say that it is a little too much to expect those who constituted that majority to swallow the opinions they have already expressed and given effect to, unless there is some very good ground shown. And in that respect I venture to think my honorable friend is mistaken in saying that the onus is upon those who seek to maintain what was decided at Adelaide, and again in Melbourne; and it is for them to show that something has taken place in the meantime, that there has been some strong expression, not of the wish of a few banks or other money lending institutions, but in some way, or other of the great body of the people who have sent us here. What is it my honorable friend relies on in order to justify this somersault on the part of the Convention? Twenty-six petitions! But, sir, if honorable members look at these petitions they will see that they are all tarred with the same brush.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
With the same printer's ink.
Mr. SYMON. -
They all emanate from the same source; they are all couched in the same terms; and they were all, no doubt, printed by the same printing press, sent round to these different institutions, and signed in such a fashion as to altogether negative the application of any intelligent consideration or even elementary knowledge to the real subject which is involved in them. Mr. Wise pointed out, the other day, some error of statement to which he referred in the petitions. He might have gone further and said the whole thing is a series of misstatements. All the petitions are alike. If honorable members will take any of them, they will see that they all begin with:-

3. That the right of appeal to the Sovereign, by her subjects individually, is the most practical tie, as well as the most impressive symbol of unity.

Why, what outrageous error that contains! Then again the petition says-

7. That the possibility of an appeal secures the advantages which your petitioners desire, though, in fact, it would be, as now, only occasionally resorted to, while the increasing closeness and readiness of communication with England will yearly diminish the cost and delay which, to some extent, are inseparable from any Court of Appeal, whether it be held in one of the cities of Australia or London.

The petition admits that there is cost and delay. It also states-

That the political effect of depriving Australians of this right of approach to the Sovereign, which all her other subjects possess, would be gradually, but surely, to weaken the tie that now binds them to the empire.

What ridiculous nonsense that is!

Mr. FRASER. -
The petitioners use a good many adjectives.

Mr. SYMON. -
Could any one after that go on to say, as the petitioners do in the 10th paragraph:-

That your petitioners, believing that their feelings are shared by a large number of their fellow subjects, both in Australia, in the home country, and in other parts of the empire.

What possible evidence is there of that?

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
They only say they believe it.

Mr. SYMON. -
If they believe that they will believe anything. Where is there a particle of testimony to support such a statement as that in this petition? Then, sir, we have the most singular thing of all. One petition comes from Tasmania, signed by four managers. They are no doubt excellent and eminent bank managers, who seem to be moved at this menace to the integrity of the empire. The petition comes from a colony from which, as Sir Joseph Abbott has just pointed out, during the whole course of its political existence, there has been only one appeal. What possible knowledge can they have on the subject?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Two of these bank managers are managers of Australian banks.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend must not think that I am disparaging them in the slightest degree. I have said that they are no doubt estimable and eminent men.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

They are men with wide Australian experience.

Mr. SYMON. -

I dare say they are like the hen with one chick; the hen learns to love the chick so much that she thinks it is a whole multitude of chicks. It makes no difference to me personally whether this qualified appeal which Sir Joseph Abbott wishes to secure is or is not given, because, if we were influenced by sordid motives, every other provision is retained in regard to the High Court. But I do wish the Convention to understand the material upon which they are asked to reverse their decision, and to continue this extra Court of Appeal. The first statement in this petition, as to it being an appeal to the personal Sovereign, as Sir Edward Braddon by his interjection indicates that he believes, is, I say, with the greatest possible respect, the sheerest fudge. It is no more a Court of Appeal to the personal Sovereign in any respect than the appeal to the Supreme Court of Victoria may happen to be. The Privy Council is simply a court, neither more nor less, like any other in this country, and the statement could not have been put better than it was by Mr. Playford at the Convention of 1891, when, in the course of the speech of Mr. Wrixon in moving that the appeal to the Privy Council should be retained, he said-

Our own Court of Appeal will be a Court of Appeal to the Queen; it will be the Queen's court.

I am not complaining of honorable members taking a different view, but it shocks one to hear this matter spoken of as though you were approaching the personal Sovereign.

Mr. DOBSON. -

No, no.

Mr. SYMON. -
It does shock me, because it is disseminating error throughout this country. It is time that all this superstition should be for ever done away with.

Mr. BARTON. -
Surely our Judges are British Judges, the same as Judges in England are.

Mr. SYMON. -
Exactly so. The Queen is the fountain of all justice. The justice is not administered by the Queen, it is administered in her courts. One of these courts is the Privy Council. You are going to create another court—the High Court of the Commonwealth—and whilst formerly the unsuccessful suitor might go to the Privy Council, all we do is to ask the Queen, by this Constitution, to say that that unsuccessful suitor shall go to the High Court instead.

Mr. BARTON. -
To another of her courts.

Mr. SYMON. -
To another of her courts.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
And no one proposes to abolish it.

Mr. SYMON. -
Exactly so.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
He need not go to another hemisphere.

Mr. SYMON. -
Let right be done in the High Court of the Commonwealth instead of in the Privy Council. My right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) knows that when a petition is presented in a matter of public concern, in which a citizen has been, or thinks he has been, wronged, and that is sent on to the Queen, it is answered under the guidance of her advisers—"Let right be done in, the Supreme Court of the colony where the wrong is alleged to have occurred." Why should not that right be done in the Privy Council, I would like to know? It is simply because the court in Western Australia, for example, is the court of Her Majesty, and is on the spot. And if the High Court of the Commonwealth is established, then right will be done as between the subjects of Her Majesty in that court upon appeal, as well and as effectually as in the Privy Council. Sir, this pretended sacredness which is sought to be associated with the Privy Council is astounding. The Legislature has taken away from the Privy Council, even now, in a great variety of matters, things which had been done under its jurisdiction previously. The Judicial Committee, as it now exists, was only established in 1833. Honorable members who advocate the retention of the appeal seem to think that it has some particular sanctity because of age-long establishment—but it has only existed since 1833.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

There were no free Parliaments then; they were all Crown Colonies.

Mr. SYMON. -

Will my honorable friend believe that the Imperial Parliament actually withdrew from the Privy Council all probate and matrimonial appeals in 1857, and all Admiralty appeals in 1876? To suggest, as my honorable friend does, that the Imperial Government would not sanction the withdrawal of Australian appeals on the establishment of the High Court is to assume that it will not do what it has been doing all along. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council being simply a court like any other court, is liable to be swept away at any moment. Then we are told, with the view of retaining this appeal—"You are taking some inalienable right of the people." What right? There is not one man in 10,000 in Australia who knows or has ever heard of the existence of an appeal to the Privy Council. Of what value is the appeal to the Privy Council to the man in the Street? What is the good of the appeal to the multitude, who never go to law, or who, if they do go to law, have not the means of indulging in the expensive luxury, if they are defeated, of an appeal to the Privy Council?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

What is the good of gaols to men who never go into them?

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend says he has been concerned in twelve or fifteen appeals to the Privy Council. He knows perfectly well that before an appeal can take place a large deposit has to be made by way of Security for costs.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

That is not the case.

Mr. SYMON. -

You have to give security.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

That is a very different thing.

Mr. SYMON. -

How many of these banks who are anxious to retain this instrument under their control would be willing to give the security for a poor man unless they got a very excellent security put into their coffers or their vaults?

Mr. REID. -

They are constantly doing it!

Mr. SYMON. -
How many of them would assist in that process?

Mr. FRASER. -
They lose money by the poor man just as they do by the other.

Mr. REID. -
Just look at the Queensland National Bank.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Order. I must ask honorable members not to interrupt the speaker.

Mr. SYMON. -
Now, sir, my honorable friend spoke as though any of us were disposed to disparage in any way whatever this Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I have never in this chamber, or elsewhere, disparaged the Judges of that court. I have the highest esteem for their capacity and for their integrity, and for the dignity with which their proceedings are conducted. But I do say that the Privy Council never was a Court of Appeal for the English people. The English people would not have the Privy Council as a Court of Appeal. They swept away every possible jurisdiction it had over citizens in the British Isles, and they decline to allow it to deal with any suit brought in any of the courts dealing with the highest interests of some 40,000,000 of people, as there are now. But it was considered good enough for the colonies it was so considered even at a time when its delays and abuses were a scandal; and it was for that reason I referred the other day to the proceedings of the commission which sat in this colony, when the quotations from The Times were made use of. The Privy Council was reserved for the colonies and dependencies; and that arose, as my honorable friend will find, from the old Crown colony days. It owes its origin to the old Crown colony times. And it was owing to the incongruity of that position that I used the expression in Adelaide that the appeal to the Privy Council was an anachronism, and, as to its procedure, an iniquity. The judgments of that court are not now to be characterized as not rising to the full height to which they should rise, as the judgments of every British court do; but because the Privy Council is the offspring of the Crown colony times, and no colony since the era of responsible government owes any of its allegiance to this particular court. There is another error which is being circulated broadcast throughout this community; and it is because I do not wish these errors to be so circulated that I take the liberty of alluding to them. This court is not the highest court in the empire, as stated in the petitions that have been presented to the Convention. The highest court in the empire is the House of Lords, and the citizens of the British Empire elsewhere than in England are deprived of the right of appealing to the House of Lords. The House of Lords is the only court in the empire that does not reverse its own judgments. It is the only court in the empire that calls to its aid the Judges of the English Bench in order to advise it, to the end that final and perfect justice may be secured. But the Privy Council, on the other hand, does reverse its own judgments, and the decisions of the Privy Council are not the governing decisions throughout English-speaking countries. Therefore, when it is stated in these-I do not wish to use any hard expression at all in respect of them; but when it is said in these stereotyped petitions that this is the highest court, the highest appeal to-the Sovereign, the statement is misleading and mischievous, and that idea ought to be dissipated in the eyes of all the people of Australia. And when my honorable friend tells us that the Imperial authorities would not give their assent to this Constitution because of this portion of it-because of this withdrawal of the power of appeal in certain cases so contained in it-I say that is an assumption for which there is no warrant whatever.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I did not say so.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend warned this Convention that if this Bill be sent home the probability is that it will be treated as the Judicature Act in Canada was treated. Why, in that case the Constitution provided for these appeals; and therefore the Judicature Act would have been ultra vires of the Constitution if this proposal, unless by the express assent of Her Majesty, had been contained in it. All we ask under this Constitution now is that the Queen's court to determine Australian appeals shall sit here, and not in England; shall sit amongst the people to whom justice is to be administered. Surely no one will say that the air of England is more favorable to justice than the air of Australia, or that if the court sits in this country justice, in some way or other, cannot breathe our air and live. The position simply is that in the one case you will have a court sitting in Australia, and in the other a court sitting in England. Now, sir, I pass by ve

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What is the average for the last five years?

Mr. SYMON. -
My right honorable friend can calculate that for himself. I am only taking Sir Joseph Abbott's return. During the last seventeen years the average has been four months longer than it was taking the whole period of 33 years.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Take the average for Queensland.

Mr. SYMON. -
I point out that the Queensland return is only for the last three or four years.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Ten years.

Mr. SYMON. -
No, my honorable friend is mistaken. The printed return which I have here is from 1892-six years.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
They are improving.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend must understand-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
They are quicker now than they used to be.

Mr. SYMON. -
My honorable friend must take the figures I have got. I am not going to take time in analyzing these figures. I take those which Sir Joseph Abbott has brought before this committee, and I say that according to that return, in my own colony, the delay has been increasing during the last seventeen years and when my honorable friend says-and I am quite sure he is speaking from experience of his own-that local proceedings sometimes take as long, I must tell him that in our colony, where there is an insolvency appeal to the Supreme Court, the average time has been something like 35 to 42 days during the last ten or twelve years. But I do not say there may not be delay in colonial courts. Surely that is no justification for delays in other courts; and I do say that the delay which takes place in connexion with the transcript is just as much part of the appeal and incidental to the appeal as any other part of it. We are not talking of the delay being attributable to the Judges. We presume that they, will do their work. We are speaking of the delay occasioned by appeal to the Privy Council; and on the point of delay it is impossible to believe that there will not be a great saving, of time by leaving these appeals finally with the High Court instead of taking them to the Privy Council. But, again, I point out to my honorable friend that he is superadding the appeal to the Privy Council to the appeal to the High Court. We are to have an appeal to the High Court first of all, and if there be delay there you are to have a greater delay superadded to that by an appeal to the Privy Council. But this amendment is going to do even more than that. Honorable members cannot surely realize what they are asked to assent to. They are asked to assent to a provision which will render it necessary for every litigant to go to the Privy Council in England to ask for leave to appeal. This will have the effect of adding an additional stage of torture to the litigant.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

That is the same as in Canada.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then I say that the Canadian system is a monstrous oppression upon the people.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

They do not think so.

Mr. SYMON. -

Indeed they do; and, as my honorable friend knows, the Privy Council has declined, except in cases of the highest consequence, to grant leave to appeal at all.

Mr. REID. -

So they will under this.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The other party will be in suspense the whole time.

Mr. SYMON. -

Not only in suspense, but he is carried to the Privy Council against his will, where he has to resist a petition for leave to appeal. Therefore this amendment, which my honorable friend actually proposes with a view to saving expense, will duplicate the expense of Privy Council appeals, and add them on to the cost of appeals to the High Court of the Commonwealth as well. That is the economy which my honorable friend is going to procure. Then my honorable friend points triumphantly to the cheapness of these appeals. He says a return, placed before us shows that the cost is under £260 or £250 a case, and one appeal cost £600. The average of our own colony has been £262.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

That would be the honorable member's fee in one case.

Mr. SYMON. -

That, as my honorable friend knows quite well, represents only the costs of the successful party before the Privy Council. Those represent the taxed costs. The cost of an appeal to the litigants is anything you like over £1,000. What is the use of the public of this country being gulled by a return of that kind? The costs of the other side have to be paid also, and the costs of solicitor and client have to be paid in addition. So that you have an amount of anything you like from £1,000 to £2,000 as the expense of this little performance. One is astonished at their moderation! I pass by these matters of expense and delay. I do not rest my claims as to the High Court appeal on these grounds. I base them upon far higher grounds. We have altogether misconceived our mission here, if our task is not that of bringing these colonies together in federal union, and of welding them into a great country, self-contained and self-sufficing in every possible way. These are the words I used before, and I emphatically adhere to them. Thirty years ago a great statesman and orator in England said—

England is the living mother of great nations on the American and on the Australian Continents, which promise to endow the world with all her knowledge and all her civilization, and with even something more than the freedom she herself enjoys.

That is an aspiration which we are trying to work out here. And yet, although we are to endow the world with all this knowledge and civilization, and even with more than England's freedom, we are not fit to endow our own people with justice. That is the confession involved in the honorable member's amendment. We are not fit for the first duty of a nation, the duty of dispensing final justice among our own citizens.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We are not a nation, we are only a part of it.

Mr. SYMON. -

We are surely trying to constitute ourselves a nation under the British Crown.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

No.

Mr. SYMON. -

Then what is the good of this talk about nationhood and all this eloquence we heard from my honorable friend himself as to establishing a nation in Australia? Some men seem to me not to be able to rise to the full height of the great theme, or of the task on which we are engaged—that we are establishing, if we can, a nation within the empire.

Mr. FRASER. -

Part of the empire.

Mr. SYMON. -

A nation under the Crown of England—a federal monarchy. I would scorn to have a seat in this Convention if that is not the goal which is supposed to lie in front of us. We are not going to part from the empire, but we are engaged in the task of consolidating these colonies into a nation under the English Crown, and we are to have a National Court. But some members wish to have it a National Court only in name, and to affix to it a badge of inferiority. That is not the spirit of patriotism that I like to see. I call that a sort of Little Australian policy, and my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott), is in this matter, really the leader of the Little Australians. A much larger question is involved than my honorable friend seems to grasp. I protest against the suggestions that have been uttered about this decision which is embodied in the Bill being revolutionary.

Mr. FRASER. -
They believe it to be so.

Mr. SYMON. -
Who believes it to be so?

Mr. FRASER. -
Those who signed the petitions.

Mr. SYMON. -
I can hardly credit them with that belief. I do not reproach them; but to say that this is the most practical tie as well as the most expressive symbol of unity throughout the empire is, I think, a statement which has not been weighed as it ought to have been. The tie which unites us to the mother country is the silken bond of kinship-it is the indissoluble tie of interest and affection, and the flag is the symbol and the visible link, not a court of law to which we can appeal.

Mr. FRASER. -
This is very sentimental language.

Mr. SYMON. -
So far as I am concerned, I have no wish to sever any link, however slight it may appear to be. I am not Australian born myself, but this is my country; it is my home. For all that, I do not wish for one moment to loosen any tie which connects us with the mother country. I am proud to belong to the race-the race which is first among the strong ones of the earth, the race whose footfall is heard in every clime, and I declare that I shall never willingly lift nor hand nor voice to aid in what I should consider a stupendous act of folly in attempting, in any degree, to weaken the ties which unite Australia to the mother country. I do resent the imputations which are made, in order to further this amendment of my honorable friend, that those of us who adopt the view I take are actuated by such a desire as that.

Mr. FRASER. -
We never said so.

Mr. SYMON. -
It is misrepresentation the most gross, and calumny the most wicked, to suggest that those of us who seek to bring about this reform desire to loosen the bonds that unite us with the mother country.

Mr. FRASER. -
That is an assumption which we have never hinted at.
Mr. SYMON. -

Those who talk in so foolish a way about separation and emblems and links are either deceived themselves.

or they are seeking to deceive other people. I am glad to think that Mr. Justice Holroyd, the president of the Imperial Federation League of Victoria, is reported to have said, in a letter written with regard to the suggestion that that body should join in the agitation against that portion of the Federal Constitution Bill which creates an Australian Court of Appeal and discontinues the right of appeal to the Privy Council, that in addition to the delay and expense which the Privy Council jurisdiction engenders, the existence of that power is rather a stumbling-block than otherwise to the larger cause of British unity, and that he supports the proposal, if not in detail, in regard to an Australian Appellate Court.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The Privy Council has been a blessing to Victorian appellants.

Mr. SYMON. -

My friend ought not to say that. At any rate, I am content to rest on the authority of so distinguished a Judge and so loyal a subject as Mr. Justice Holroyd, president of the Imperial Federation League of Victoria. But there are one or two other grounds that my honorable friend has stated which are perhaps more intelligible, although they are not firmer than those to which I have already referred. The English capitalist and investor is trotted out.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I rise to order. I never referred to the English investor or the English capitalist.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member (Mr. Symon) did not say that Sir Joseph Abbott did refer to the English capitalist and investor. Mr. Symon said the English capitalist and investor was "trotted out," but he did not say by whom.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

He said by me.

Mr. SYMON. -

I said nothing of the kind. My honorable friend is getting rude as well as disorderly.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I think honorable members had better not make personal remarks.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I will take a ruling as to whether the honorable member (Mr. Symon) is in order. The honorable member commenced any rudeness there may be.
It would be far better if no personal allusion were made by Mr. Symon or anybody else. I will ask the honorable member (Mr. Symon) to address the Chair.

Mr. SYMON. -

I have been addressing the Chair throughout, Sir Richard. I made no reference to the honorable member (Sir Joseph Abbott), and I do complain of a point of so-called order being raised of this kind, when I made no statement in regard to the honorable member. I was referring to petitions which are before the House, and I was saying that the bogey of the English capitalist is trotted out. It is said in a petition that the abolition of the Privy Council would "injure business and discourage the investment of British capital in Australia." Another writer says-"Will the English merchant and capitalist be satisfied with a system which compels him to accept the law of an Australian court in dispute about contracts and other issues, which he may be obliged to litigate?"

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I wish to call attention to the state of the House. It is not fair that a speech like this should be listened to by so small a number of members. It would seem as though some honorable members had made up their minds to ignore the speech.

The bells were rung, and a quorum having been formed,

Mr. SYMON resumed. -

Sir Richard, I am sure I, perhaps, may be pardoned for saying I am obliged to my honorable friend (Mr. Howe), but I have no desire that any honorable member should sit in the chamber if he has no wish to listen to the views I am endeavouring to put forward on behalf of the resolution which the Convention has already arrived at. I was referring to points that have been taken in support of the continuation of this appeal, and to the fact that stress is laid upon the statement that the English capitalist and investor will be discouraged, and will not invest his money in Australia or Australian securities, if this extra Appellate Court is not available. A contention of that kind simply amounts to saying that the justice which is good enough for the people of Australia is not good enough for those who dwell in another hemisphere. I can hardly believe that any one can seriously suggest that such a result would happen. I can hardly understand how such rubbish, if I may be forgiven for so describing it, can be put in solemn black and white.

Mr. FRASER. -

May there not be very serious conflicting interests?

Mr. SYMON. -
Not a bit. There is a petition here, I am exceedingly sorry to see on the records of this Convention. It is the petition of the Metropolitan Board of Works of this great city of Melbourne. It is because, I suppose, of its solemnity that the petition is committed to parchment, which bears a huge red seal of the most conspicuous kind. The petition actually contains a statement that the abolition of the Court of Appeal would seriously derogate from the existing rights of creditors and contractors with the petitioner, and would materially weaken the credit and put difficulties in the way of the petitioner when floating loans in the United Kingdom, as it may be necessary for the petitioner to do hereafter.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

How about the American States?

Mr. SYMON. -

Without referring to the American states, this petition from the metropolitan city of Victoria, with a population of half-a-million, actually puts on permanent record that the taking away of the right of appealing to a court sitting in England will weaken the credit of that immense concern, which already owes to the Government of this colony two and a half millions of money, and also owes to the bond-holders of England, I think, something like one or two millions of money. Is that, the foundation upon which the public credit of the metropolitan city of this colony rests? Is there any sane man who will really vindicate a statement of that kind? Is there a Premier in this Convention who will get up, and, on his responsibility, say that public stocks will fall if the Imperial Parliament substitutes one Queen's court for another, or because it is simply provided that the High Court of Appeal shall no longer sit in a poky room at Whitehall, but shall sit in Australia? We are in the habit of telling children when they say anything that is naughty, that they ought to rinse their mouths. The records of this Convention should be rinsed of such a petition, reflecting, as it does, on the credit of one of the greatest cities under the sun, and declaring that it is an element in the, security for its loans that some particular court should exist. English capitalists look for tangible security and high interest. What do they care whether there is a court in one country or a court in another? Is it expected that they will make it a condition of all their loans that there should be a right of appeal to the Privy Council?

Mr. FRASER. -

They are very careful of the integrity of the country.

Mr. SYMON. -

Of course they are, but what has one court of appeal more than another to do with the integrity and security of the country? What they look at is the law, order, and good government of the country. It is a grave reflection upon the credit of these colonies that such statements should be made. In addition to our own security, it is the British flag and the British fleet that these money lenders look to, over and above the value which they have in the ordinary taxpaying power of the citizens of the country. I should like to ask any honorable member to tell me of any appeal to the Privy Council made by the holder of Australian security? I do not know of any.

Mr. REID. -
There never would be one.

Mr. SYMON. -

No. Yet this is put forward to throw dust into the eyes of the people, and to suggest that the credit of this great country is dependent upon the existence of two appellate courts instead of one. Then, it is said that the English trader will lose confidence. Could there be anything more preposterous? He will not lose confidence unless he loses his case. Every unsuccessful litigant loses confidence in the tribunal which decides against him.

Mr. REID. -

Hear, hear. I have heard some hard things said against the Privy Council.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, and so have I. Even that august tribunal does not escape denunciation by unsuccessful suitors. It is not justice that those who call out for every possible court of appeal want, it is victory. They are like the man in the American court who looked very timid and nervous. The Judge, thinking that he was uneasy, said:"Do not be afraid, prisoner, justice will be done.""Great heavens, Judge," said the prisoner, "that is just what I am afraid of." That is exactly the condition of things which affects those banks and other money-lending institutions which are struggling for this extra and distant Court of Appeal. They want-and no blame to them-victory in their litigation, and if they can get it upon any ground, either of law or of fact, they are willing and ready to secure it by all the means at their disposal. But what about the American, and the German, and the other foreign merchants who do business with us? How about their confidence? Are they to have a special court of appeal for their own particular disputes?

Mr. FRASER. -

They come here at their peril.

Mr. SYMON. -

They come here for exactly the same reason as every English merchant-to make money.
Mr. FRASER. -
They have not the same rights.

Mr. SYMON. -
They have the right as every British merchant to have justice done to them in the highest courts of appeal available. But, is it proposed that they shall have the right to appeal to the courts of their own country? What about our own fellow citizens who go to England? What becomes of this birthright of theirs if they bring an action in England against the English merchant with whom they have had dealings? They cannot appeal to the Privy Council. They must surrender this birthright of theirs, and if they want a court of ultimate: appeal they must go to the House of Lords. They must go to the courts of appeal available to them in England, and be content with such justice as is meted out to them there. What English capitalist knows anything about this right of appeal to the Privy Council? Which of them has presented any petitions on the subject to the Convention which of them has dared to say to us or to any one else that he cannot trust the justice of the High Court of Federated Australia? The whole thing is a grave indictment of the administration of justice in the Commonwealth we are seeking to form. It is left to some—may I say foolish?—people amongst ourselves to place this stain, and stain it is, upon the name and credit of Australia. We are not making a Constitution for the merchants and people of England; we are making a Constitution for the people of Australia, and we ought to bear that in mind. My honorable friend said that there was local influence, this colonial bias, as it has been described. If that means that there is an improper influence felt here, or something in the nature of corruption, no one has dared to say so. It would be a scandal if any one said it. But if it means a knowledge of colonial ideas, conditions, and surroundings, no lawyer in his senses would deny that that is absolutely essential. How are you to decide these questions of the rivers?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Unless you go up to the Darling, I suppose?

Mr. SYMON. -
You have conflicting decisions in England as to what is a navigable river; you have decisions upon the subject in America; and unless you have a court conversant with the conditions of things here you cannot get that Judicial appreciation of the real matter to be determined which is essential.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Cannot you get those conditions in in evidence?
Mr SYMON. - You cannot get them in in evidence.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Of course you can.

Mr. SYMON. -

If you got them in in evidence-some of them-you could not get them appreciated as they would be appreciated by those conversant with the country.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Then the court would be deciding the case upon matters that were not evidence.

Mr. SYMON. -

My honorable friend knows that every contract is determined by the surrounding circumstances of the business to which it is applicable.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

That is in ev

Mr. SYMON. -

One of the most influential newspapers in this colony, the Age, with a view to getting over this difficulty, said that the presence of a representative in the Privy Council of the colonies is a guarantee that Australian ideas will always have an exponent there. But then I thought we did not want Australian ideas. What have we sent an Australian Judge to the Privy Council for, I should like to know, if not for the purpose of communicating to the Privy Council Australian ideas?

Mr. REID. -

The desire came from the other side that there should be an Australian Judge.

Mr. SYMON. -

I was not aware of that; but that very greatly strengthens what I have been putting.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

It was carried in the Federal Council first.

Mr. SYMON. -

The same desire is indicated or approved in the passage that was read by Sir Joseph Abbott from Mr. Chamberlain's address. It was sought to permeate the Privy Council with Australian ideas, so that it might do justice according to Australian standards.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Colonial standards.

Mr. SYMON. -

An Australian Judge was sent there for Australian appeals.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
One Judge.

Mr. SYMON. -

That was the purpose for which he was sent. The Chief Justice of South Australia was chosen, not with a view of instructing the Privy Council upon the common law of England, or with regard to the cations of interpretation of statute law, but for the purpose of instructing the Privy Council in relation to Australian ideas, so that they might be better able to enter into the condition of things in reference to which the questions for decision arose. Then my honorable friend referred to what he called local influence. Now, I would ask him how does that argument apply to the thousands of cases under £500? If local influence is bad, how are you going to free the multitudes of people of the country whose cases never go beyond £500 from the baneful effect upon our Judges of that local influence?

Mr. ISAACS. -

They are British subjects.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, but they are only poor people, and therefore they are to be subject to the consequences of all this improper local influence, to this bias, without any hope of redress. Was there ever a proposal that was so utterly unjust as this? Then my honorable friend said that the Judges of the High Court would have less experience. Surely the Judges of the Federal High Court will have as much experience as the Judge we have sent to the Privy Council? Why should we reflect on his qualifications, or on the qualifications of any Judge who is sent to take part in the work of the Privy Council? I wish to tell honorable members this-now, when we come to speak of the question of experience-that Lord Watson, probably the strongest Judge on the Bench of the Judicial Committee, was a Scotch Judge, who passed the whole of his earlier career at the Scotch Bar, and on the Scotch Bench, and who learned and administered a system of law totally opposed to the system of English law. He was nevertheless put on the Privy Council Bench to decide appeals from the colonies affecting and depending upon a law of which he could have had no possible experience before, and yet so powerful is the education which every one undergoes with responsibility, and the necessity of exercising responsibility, that he has become a conspicuous success on that Privy Council Bench. So it will be with the Judges of our High Court. Their strength, their knowledge, their judicial experience, will grow with the opportunities that come to them. Uniformity, it is said, will not be preserved. Well, the law, of course, is always proverbially uncertain. We are guided by the House of Lords, not by the Privy Council. We are bound by the decisions of the House of Lords as long as we are part of the empire. The High Court of Justice here—the Federal High Court will be bound to give effect to English law as expounded in the highest court available to English-speaking people, and the uniformity will be maintained just as effectually without the intervention of the Privy Council upon a discretionary appeal, such as is proposed, as if the right of appeal were retained in its full force. The whole thing really resolves itself into the last objection which my honorable friend took. Twist and turn it as we may, it all comes back to this—that we are to declare in this Constitution that we cannot constitute a competent court. Surely that is not what the Convention is going to do. We have shown superiority in minor matters. We have shown, at any rate, equality in fields of physical development—in cricket, in oarsmanship, and in various other pursuits. We shall be just as able to show intellectual equality when the necessity for it arises. So far as my knowledge goes, the history of the courts in these colonies and of the bar of these colonies has been a history of learning, of integrity, of firmness and of a love of justice. I believe that in any of the colonies, certainly in all of them combined, you will be able to obtain men as competent to administer justice in our High Court as preside or occupy seats in the Privy Council, which is at present the final Court of Appeal. I have now dealt with the chief grounds which have been taken in respect of this motion in which the Convention is asked to reverse its decision. I ask pardon of the Convention for having occupied so much time. I am deeply grateful to honorable members for the attention which has been given to me. I know that our time is precious. We are nearing the end—I hope the auspicious end—of our labours. I shall have no further opportunity of laying before honorable members the reasons which lead me to regard everything which may strengthen and lend dignity to the High Court as essential to the national life upon which we are now entering. That is the high ground that I take, and I shall always rejoice, whatever the outcome of this matter may be, that I have had this opportunity of putting my views on their true footing, and of doing something to dissipate the erroneous assumptions which have been circulated—which, I may say, have been created—and which I venture to think have been detrimental to a right understanding of this question on the part of the community. I now take leave of the subject, because I have submitted these reasons once and for all, and for the last time, but in taking leave of the subject I wish to add this, that we are engaged here with the elements, not only of nation-making, but of empire. I hope that we shall seek to mould these elements into the highest and noblest form, perfect in symmetry, perfect in majesty; but, sir, there is no majesty to my mind like the majesty of a great tribunal. It is there that earthly power shows likest God's. Yet this Convention, composed of men, many of them distinguished for public service, for wisdom, and for public spirit, engaged in this splendid enterprise of knitting together the scattered peoples of this continent into one nation, a nation one and indivisible-with one lot, one hope, one life, one glory-is called upon to acknowledge that the nation it aspires to create cannot give justice. We can make laws; but we are to embody in this Constitution a declaration that we cannot interpret them. Is that, I ask, to be our last confession? I, for one, cannot believe it. I refuse, myself, to be held in bondage to any court of law. We shall answer ill to those who have sent us here if, whilst we pass on to them the constitutional trappings of nationhood, we deny them the right-we deny them the competency-to deal out final justice amongst themselves; and if, following the statements in these petitions which have flooded the Convention, we proclaim the reason to be that the kind of justice which we shall have may be good enough for us, but is not good enough for the dwellers on another continent. To enthrone Australia and her people in the senate hall of nations is a magnificent, a noble, achievement; but the glory of it will be dimmed if we do not consecrate beneath the same roof a temple within which the blind Goddess may hold her scales in even equipoise, and to which we may bid the poor and the rich alike to repair for justice, which shall satisfy all the needs of their individual and national life.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

Knowing how important the subject is, knowing the enormous length to which it has been debated in past Conventions, seeing the enormous length which the question is again assuming, I will waive my right to make any remarks. I admit that there are several honorable members who have been as identified with this matter as the honorable member who moved the amendment and my learned friend (Mr. Symon), whose name has been very unfairly used outside, I think, in connexion with this matter, and I scarcely can complain of the speeches which have been made; but I hope that, with the exception of men like my friend (Mr. Carruthers) and one or two others who have taken a prominent part in this matter, we will try to give up so far as we can our right of speaking. I have been looking over the notice-paper, and we really have work here for several sittings, and we shall find ourselves sitting all night and then unfinished in our work unless we exercise, some of us, as I am prepared to do, self-denial in this matter.

Mr. BARTON. -

There will be a lot of self-restraint after eleven o'clock.

Mr. REID. -
Yes; I admit that it would be unfair to attempt to close the debate at present, but I feel sure that some of us will give up our right of speaking and that those who do speak will consider that the time for lengthy speeches is over and it is only necessary now to make a few remarks.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I certainly do not intend to detain the committee at any length, but I think it is necessary, after the speech we have just listened to—a very admirable speech—to bring back honorable members to the real matter they have to decide. One would suppose from Mr. Symon's arguments and his appeals that we were dealing here with the question of whether or not the appeal to the Privy Council, by way of petition to Her Majesty for leave to appeal, should be abolished altogether. The honorable member, I think, would have saved a great deal of time if he had referred to clause 75, which we have passed. In that clause he would see that in a class of cases, which I venture to say will embrace a large number, we have allowed this right of appeal to the Queen in Council. All that can be accomplished by the amendment of Sir Joseph Abbott is to extend the right which we have already given here to such other cases as the Queen in Council may be pleased to allow.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Is this a proposal in addition or in substitution?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

It is simply an extension.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It is a totally different question.

Mr. WISE. -

It is almost identical.

---

My learned friend (Mr. Deakin) can prove that it is a totally different question if he can; it is only an extension of a principle which has been laid down in clause 75. I will call the attention of the committee to the provisions of the clause. It says—

No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state, or from the High Court or any other federal court—

except that the Queen may, in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any state, or of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions are concerned, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.
All that Sir Joseph Abbott is asking for is to extend that leave to such other cases as the Queen in Council may think fit to extend them to. Let us see for a moment what this right which is given in clause 75 means. The words "in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth or of any state are concerned" clearly will include every case which involves the interpretation of the Constitution, because one cannot imagine the public interests of the Commonwealth to be affected or concerned more directly than by anything which involves the interpretation of the Constitution. For exactly the same reason, any case which affects the interests of a state by the interpretation of this Constitution, or by raising any question of conflict of law between a state and the Commonwealth, also comes under this provision. So that you have at once a very large class of cases to which you have already given this right to appeal to the Queen in Council. We have heard a great deal from a number of honorable members at various times, as to the misfortune which persons without money are under in being taken to the Privy Council. But can you guarantee that the poorest persons in the land may not be involved in these cases which are concerned with the interpretation of the Constitution, or which are concerned with the interpretation of the Constitution of a state? These cases arise under all kinds of circumstances. These cases arise between persons of every kind and of every class, and whenever any one of these cases arises, the right is given to petition to the Queen for leave to appeal to the Privy Council. Then how can you say that you are protecting the man who is so poor that he cannot afford to go to the Privy Council, when you are leaving in the Constitution a power which enables a case to be taken to the Privy Council at any time? If one looks at this matter not from the view of an appeal to passion, or by using epithets, or by the introduction of any other irrelevant matter at all, then the only question which arises is - Should we extend this power of appeal to the class of cases to which it has been decided by the Privy Council that the right applies? It has been laid down in many cases that it is not in every instance that Her Majesty in Council will allow this right of appeal. And may I remind honorable members for a moment of the way this right is exercised? The petitioner appeals to the Queen. The petition is referred to the Privy Council. If it be a proper case for appeal the Privy Council gives leave, and then the appeal has to be made to the Privy Council. This is a roundabout elaborate method, but it is the method that has to be adopted. It is not in every case that the appeal is allowed. It has been laid down in the case of Prince v. Canyon and in many other cases that this appeal will not be allowed where the case involves only disputed matters of fact in which no question of magnitude is involved, and no question of public interest.
and importance. Consequently, it in only in cases where it is either some particular question, as affecting great interests - as affecting the interests of many persons-as affecting some question of the conflict of laws or of decisions which have already been come to; it is only in those cases in regard to which the rule has been laid down as to Canada that appeals will he permitted. Now, surely the experience of Canada may he of some guide to us; and, in regard to Canada, I find that, taking the records for six years (which is the period which has been included in some of the records quoted by Mr. Symon) the number of appeals from the Supreme Court of Canada that have been allowed under an exactly similar provision has been ten. In Canada appeals are preserved to the courts of the states-that is to say, the appeal by petition to the Queen in Council. The number of appeals in the six years has been-from Ontario 5, from Quebec 11, front Nova Scotia 5, from British Columbia 1, and from Manitoba 1. So that, taking Canada itself alone, they amount to only ten in six years, and, in all, the appeals amount to 33-that is, a little over five a year. That may he a fair measure of the extent of the right that is now asked for. Now, I agree with a great deal of what my honorable friend said as to preserving the interpretation of this Constitution in our own hands, and if this proposal were to maintain in our own hands the interpretation of this Constitution in all questions relating to conflicts between the laws of the states and the laws of the Commonwealth, I should he willing to deprive absolutely every inhabitant of the Commonwealth of any right of appeal to the Queen in Council. Because I can see that the disadvantage-the only disadvantage-which may come from allowing this appeal to the Privy Council, is that which may arise from the interpretation of the Constitution being in other than Australian hands. But that is not asked for. If you allow in those very cases which Should remain in our hands an appeal to the Queen in Council, I say, on the ground of reason or justice or common sense, how can you shut out the other few cases which the Queen in Council may think of sufficient importance to allow of an appeal to the Privy Council?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Would you support a striking out of the restriction?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I would, undoubtedly. If the whole appeal in these cases-that is, cases involved in the interpretation of the Constitution-were proposed to he taken away from the Privy Council, I would support that proposal; but as it stands I cannot see either logic or consistency in the proposal, and I shall vote with Sir Joseph Abbott.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -
I am very anxious that this debate should close and a division he arrived at, and I am quite willing, therefore, if other honorable members will waive their right to speak, to give way, so that we may divide at once. But if other honorable members desire to speak, I wish to do so.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

Divide! divide!

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is not the way to do the business of this Convention.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

If other honorable members will give way I will, but, if not, I may have to indulge in a two or three hours' speech in reply to arguments that have been adduced.

Mr. Carruthers having resumed his seat,

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This is not the way, sir, to do the business of a great Convention.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Mr. Carruthers.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

Under these circumstances I feel it my duty to address myself to the question before the Chair, especially with the view of disabusing the public mind with regard to some views which have been enunciated this afternoon by Mr. Symon. I think he has altogether mistaken the functions of a legislative body such as this. Before we create any change at all in the existing order of affairs there should be evidence of some demand for a change. Now, I have challenged Mr. Symon and others before to show one solitary resolution or petition from anybody in Australia in favour of the change which this Convention up to the present time has resolved upon. On the other hand, the petitions that have been presented to this Convention, and which it has been sought to discount by very questionable arguments, are an evidence that public opinion is strongly roused against the taking away of a right which has been cherished by the people themselves ever since the foundation of constitutional government in these colonies. Now, it is strongly urged as an argument in favour of this change-it is said, for instance, by Sir John Downer and others-that surely if we are competent to make laws we are competent to interpret them. I have always combated that notion. This Constitution does not give the people of Australia power to make laws at all. Can any honorable member deny that? This Constitution, I repeat, does not give the people of Australia power to make laws. No law is worth a snap of the fingers until the Queen has given her assent to it.

Mr. SYMON. -

Oh, oh!

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

It is all very well to brush aside my contention in that way, but, as a matter of fact, you have to obtain the Royal assent to a proposed law before it can become law. Having acknowledged the right of the Crown in regard to the power of making laws, the argument of the honorable member falls to the ground in regard to claiming the right of making the laws.

Mr. SYMON. -

And the Queen's court interprets them.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

All we ask is that the Queen's court, as we know it, should be the court under this Constitution to interpret the laws-rather the court we know than the court we don't know. My honorable and learned friend speaks of the creation of a nation independent, self-reliant, and self-contained.

Mr. SYMON. -

I never said independent.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

Self-reliant! Why the first time we were in trouble we called on the Queen's Navy to defend us; whereas if we were self-reliant we should be providing in this Constitution for the establishment of some means of defence, without calling on the mother country for the navy of the empire to defend us. That we are not self-reliant is shown by the fact that the public works of Australasia have to be carried on by money borrowed from other portions of the empire. We shall be self-reliant when we do without borrowing from home-when we borrow within our own borders.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That will be a very long time.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

It is very easy to put aside these ideas, but they are facts and circumstances surrounding our present conditions. We all wish to be self-reliant, but we are not; we all wish to be able to run, but we cannot walk yet; we all wish to be able to provide for our public requirements, and to be able to protect our lives and our property, but we have to borrow from the mother country, and we have to rely for protection on the defence forces of the empire. And I say that the very time when we are doing these very things which show the absence of our self-reliance is not the proper time to say to the people on whose aid for protection and money we depend for the safety and development of these colonies-"We will take your money; we will accept your protection; but when it comes to a question of law relating to the money we borrow from you, or relating to the mercantile marine who trade with us, we tell you we are going to have the law administered here; that we are going to be a law to ourselves, that we are going to make our own laws and interpret them." That is self-reliance with a vengeance, but it is self-reliance all on one side. It is a case of getting as much as you can, and, having got it, being the arbiters as to how long you are to retain it, and as to the terms on which you are to keep it. The idea is one which does no credit to the nation-building process in which we are engaged, and it is one which will do injury to Australasia in the eyes of those with whom we transact business. My honorable friend urges a very common argument against the continuance of this right of appeal to the Privy Council—an argument which only needs to be examined to be thoroughly demolished, namely, that we want to have, in the final Court of Appeal, a body of Judges who have colonial experience, who have colonial ideas, and who have colonial knowledge. Now, any man, especially an able member of the bar like—my honorable friend, ought to know that the worst tribunal you could have would be a tribunal that would decide, not on the sworn testimony submitted to the court, but on knowledge of the case, and in regard to the case and its surroundings, in the minds of the Judges—evidence of a character which cannot be shaken by cross-examination—evidence which is not known to the parties interested in the case at all. I venture to say that more mischief is done by cases being decided by some twist or turn in the minds of Judges than by any judicial interpretation of the evidence submitted to the court. Now, my great objection to establishing the final Court of Appeal in Australasia is because there is existing in the minds of the Judges that unconscious bias. I do not impute corruption; I would be very sorry to do or say anything which would tend to diminish the weight of the authority of our colonial benches; but without laying myself open to the charge of saying anything improper, I venture to repeat that that unconscious bias does exist, and will always exist, in small communities, especially where they are inhabiting large territories.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I beg to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that there is not a quorum present. Mr. Howe is not in the chamber, and probably would like to hear this.

A quorum having been formed,

Mr. CARRUTHERS (continuing) said. -

I was saying that this unconscious bias does exist, and always will exist, where there are small communities inhabiting large territories, because the circumstances of life in those communities must be totally dissimilar to the circumstances of life in populous centres such as exist in the United Kingdom; and there must grow up in connexion with such centres influences which will permeate the minds of all people in those places. I gave an instance, which has been cited over and over again, showing the value of the right of appeal to the Privy Council. The case in question was an important one decided in New South Wales, and the decision affected millions and millions of pounds worth in value. It affected the tenure of the whole of our Crown lands—the case of Burke and Allison, which was decided in one direction by the colonial Judges, largely because they knew all about colonial affairs and colonial life, and because they had had colonial experience. The Privy Council decided that case in a totally different way. They decided it on the evidence, not on their knowledge of the circumstances, and the result of their decision has been to give a better security to the class of persons affected; and the Parliament which made the law which the Judges interpreted admitted, by a subsequent enactment, that the decision of the Privy Council was the truer interpreter of its intentions. In all such cases it is a greater security to litigants to have on the bench men who are not swayed by any knowledge outside of the actual sworn testimony adduced before them. Now, my

if we were denying to them the rights which they now have. But we are not doing anything of the kind. Therefore, that argument absolutely falls to the ground. I am well aware that the opponents of this proposal object to it, to a large extent, simply because it will present another obstacle to the ultimate determination of litigation. I feel that Sir Joseph Abbott's proposal is open to that serious objection, and, therefore, I hesitate very much to vote for it, because it is creating a new Court of Appeal, or allowing a new Court of Appeal to be created, as well as keeping up the existing court of appeal. In all my addresses to this Convention I have never been in favour of that. I have always been in favour of retaining the one Court of Appeal that now exists, allowing people if they choose to exercise the option to have their cases decided locally. But I am not very strongly in favour of this grave additional obstacle to the final determination of litigation, which places in the hands of rich men means to thwart poor men in their efforts to obtain justice, because, without, dragging in the poor man unnecessarily, I must say that, where we create them additional courts of appeal, it is the litigant who lacks means who will suffer most. But Mr. Symon altogether forgets the facts of the case, when be charges Sir Joseph Abbott and the petitioners with making, to use his own words, a furious attempt to establish another Court of Appeal. The furious attempt has been on the part of those who, in season and out of season, since 1891, against public opinion, without a mandate from any, public body or any petitions, have up to the present successfully made a furious attempt to establish this High Court of the Commonwealth as another Court of Appeal. Unfortunately, up to the present they have succeeded in doing that. I throw out this direct challenge to my honorable friend to prove that we have in Australia at the present time sufficient legally-trained minds of eminence and capacity to fill these positions in the High Court. We must have regard to the fact that 138 members have to be elected to the House of Representatives and the Senate, and the men who offer themselves for those positions will include the leading legal minds of Australia.

Mr. SYMON. -

If you ask me I say yes, certainly.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I will ask the honorable member to say, on his conscience, whether he believes that when you take from the ranks of our Australian Bar the ablest men at the Bar in South Australia—I need not name there, they are self-evident of Victoria, New South Wales, and Tasmania, these men who will be candidates, and who will be elected to the Senate and the House of Representatives, there will be sufficient legal talent available for these positions in the High Court? One or two may be selected from the ranks of Parliament, but that is not very likely. When you take these men away, whom have you to choose from to fill these high positions? We are not so rich in legal talent that we can create a House of Representatives and a Senate, with Law officers for the Federal Government, and then appoint Judges to the High Court of the Commonwealth, and say that we have something more experienced and efficient than we are now brushing aside. I make bold to say that, both on the grounds of efficiency and economy, we shall be making a departure which will cause Australia to suffer. I hope Sir Joseph Abbott's proposal will be carried, if only to reverse to, some extent the decision we have arrived at. I should like to see it go further, and give the option to litigants to go direct to the Privy Council rather than be compelled to go to the Federal Court and then to this court hereafter. I quite agree with Mr. O'Connor, and, for my part, I would vote that we should take away the right of appeal where the interpretation of the Constitution is concerned. But I do object to take away from individuals a right which they have possessed for years past, whether it is good or whether it is exaggerated in its value, when they have shown no desire to give it up. We are thereby creating impediments in the way of the acceptance of the Constitution by doing more than we are asked to do. It was said properly by Mr. Holder that this High Court of the Commonwealth is hanging like a nightmare over the Constitution. It is overshadowing it in all respects. It is the strongest body in the Commonwealth, and, as far as the British Empire is concerned, no honorable member can point to another part of it where a High Court is established with such powers. If the Bill passes as it now stands, we shall be the only part of the British Empire which has denied to itself, in regard to individual cases, the right of appeal to the Sovereign to have justice dispensed by her own especial court. We shall have the danger before us of weakening our own influence in relation to other members of the empire, and of not having a law of uniformity, a law which should be one of the safeguards of our interests here and elsewhere.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

If I thought for an instant that the proposal of Sir Joseph Abbott would strengthen the bonds of union between the Commonwealth and the great body of the empire, I would give it my unhesitating support; but I do not entertain that opinion. I believe that the bonds which unite us are far stronger and more enduring. We are bound to the empire by personal and corporate loyalty—loyalty to the traditions, loyalty to the future, of the empire of which we are proud to form a part. But I cannot bring myself to believe that the links which bind us to the empire are in any way formed of lawyers' bills of costs. What is the proposal that Sir Joseph Abbott makes? That, whereas, at the present time, a man may be subjected to vexatious litigation to obtain his rights, or to defend them within the colonies, he may yet be taken away thousands of miles to have the matter finally determined. Now, by the proposals in this Bill already adopted, there is another and a higher tribunal than the one originally existing here which has been interposed, which will necessitate very great expense, and then, on the top of that, "piling Ossa upon Pelion," we find he is still to be dragged to the Privy Council. It is almost unbearable. Mr. Carruthers says by analogy we ought to allow this appeal to the Privy Council—because why I Because the two Houses of Parliament in the coming Commonwealth cannot make a law until it has the Queen's assent. I never heard that before by way of analogy, nor can I recognise its validity now. We are making a Federation under the Crown. The Governor-General will be the representative of the Crown, and, according to all the theories of British law, it is the Crown that enacts the law, by the advice of the two Houses of Parliament. We do not need to be told to-day that the two Houses of Parliament without the assent of the Crown cannot legislate, but what analogy has that to the interpretation of the laws when once made? The Imperial Legislature will confer upon us the power of making our own laws. It is true the Governor-General may withhold his assent, and the Imperial Legislature may pass an Act reversing our legislation here if it chooses, but that will only be in matters which concern the interests of the empire as a whole. It will only be in matters in which if our own legislation were carried out it would imperil the integrity of the empire; but once the laws are made, once we get the enactment on our statute-book, what is there that imperils the integrity of the empire in interpreting that for ourselves? The analogy altogether fails. We are asked again to say that, because we have to look to the empire for defence, and because we have to go abroad to borrow, we ought to go abroad also to get our litigation finally determined. Do we borrow without the expectation of paying back?

Mr. BARTON. -

There was no appeal to the Privy Council from the Argentine Republic when the bond-holders wasted their money there.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Certainly not. If Russia gets a loan of £14,000,000, are we to be told by analogy that there ought to be an appeal from the Russian courts to the Privy Council?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Our bond-holders never contemplate having to sue for the money.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Certainly not. And our credit would drop to a low point indeed if it were to be measured by Privy Council decisions. My honorable friend also referred to the matter of defence. Naturally we are part of the empire, and while we are prepared to defend not only ourselves, but to assist in maintaining the integrity of the empire throughout its bounds and limits if need unfortunately were, the empire in its turn will guard itself all over the world. But are we not by this very Bill doing much to strengthen our ability to defend ourselves. Are we not uniting certain powers and forces to assist the empire to the greatest extent possible? When Mr. Carruthers adduces such arguments as those we have heard from him to justify this piece of oppression on the inhabitants of the Commonwealth, and the imposition upon them of an appeal to the Privy Council in addition to the appeal to the High Court of the Federation, I think he must be gravelled for lack of matter. He must find his case very weak indeed before he descends to such arguments as those. It has been said that the British capitalist would have more confidence. I entirely dissent from that. The British capitalist, when he considers whether he will invest his money here, will ask, not what is likely to be the decision of a court of law in a contest, but what is our legislation. He will ask what are the laws which govern the subject-matter on which he is asked to invest his money. If he is proposing to invest in mining, he will ask what the mining laws are. If it be a matter of investing in landed property, he will ask what form the land laws take. He is never looking to the courts of law for an ultimate decision. He is not apprehending the question of litigation. He relies on the honour and integrity of those with whom he is dealing, and all he asks and likes to see is what is the legislation on the subject.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
That is not the experience of financial men.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Can the honorable member point to any single investment because of the appeal to the Privy Council? If he says that what I have described is not the experience of financial men, I would be glad if he would give me an instance which would perhaps materially shake my belief.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Nobody maintains that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Side by side with that argument is another that is put forward frequently, but with utter fallacy. The argument is that if we have the Privy Council to superintend the administration of the laws we shall have uniformity over the empire. What an utter fallacy. How can you have uniformity of decision unless you have uniformity of law? Litigation in Victoria in respect to a mining property on almost the same facts would end, perhaps, in a totally different fashion if a similar question were at issue in Western Australia. And why; Because the mining laws are not the same. A question arising in respect to riparian rights in one colony of Australia would be differently decided if it were in Canada or in India.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
It can only be a question of impartiality.
possible unless you insure uniformity of legislation; and that is not attainable by the very nature of the case. We find in India decisions are given by the Privy Council on the Mitakshara, and the Laws of Menu. What have they to do with the interpretation of our land laws or the Western Australian mining laws? And yet the Privy Council is the source of all those decisions.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOON. -
An Indian Judge directs the Indian decisions.

Mr. ISAACS. -
And then there is an appeal to the Privy Council. My honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) said we were only going a little further than clause 75, and I interposed to say it is a totally different principle. And it is a totally different principle. In clause 75, we have yielded and given an appeal to the Privy Council in certain cases; and it is most significant when we see what those cases are. They are cases in which the public interest of the Commonwealth or the public interest of the states is concerned. And why have we given that appeal? Because the Judges are appointed by the Commonwealth, and some of the Judges come from certain states. There was some floating idea, in which I certainly did not share, that there might be suspicion that Judges were swayed on the one hand because they were the Judges of the Commonwealth, or because on the other hand they had certain state proclivities. That is the main reason appeals were given in those cases. There may be another reason, namely, that the interests involved are of so gigantic and so manifestly public a nature that some further consideration might be necessary. But when we come to the region of individual controversy - when we come to a question of pounds, shillings, and pence, as between an individual and a corporation, and the individual is dragged from court to court, and then to the higher court of the state, then to the Federal Court, and then to the Privy Council - well, it is victory by exhaustion. It is the long purse that wins. A man may die, and a generation almost may pass, in a manner of speaking, between the outburst of litigation and its final determination. We heard from my right honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) that there was delay not attributable to the Privy Council itself. No one accuses the Privy Council of that. I believe the average time is about one year and ten months, so far as Victoria is concerned, between the time the transcript reaches England and the time judgment is given. I am speaking only from recollection, but I believe the average time is about what I have stated. Not only is there expense, but there is delay which the unfortunate litigant cannot help, and from whatever cause it arises he has to bear it all. His business is locked up, and his affairs are rendered uncertain, except that he knows whatever happens, he will lose a lot of money in costs. The whole matter is rendered so terrible to him that he is ready to yield his rights, as they have been declared by the colonial courts, and surrender what has been pronounced to be justice rather than run the risk of being in the grave before the matter is finally determined. I want to point out one other fact. When the matter was debated in the Victorian Legislative Assembly there was an enormous vote taken in favour of the clause as it stands, 46 voting for it, and 18 against it. That was a tremendous majority, and in my judgment it represented the feeling of the colony. No new arguments have been adduced why we should alter our determination, except that some petitions, in very similar language, have been presented to us by certain wealthy corporations. We are legislating for the bulk of the people of the colonies, and I ask that we should have confidence in ourselves and in that High Court which we hope to establish-confidence not only in its impartiality, but also in its ability. If we have not confidence we are building, not upon a rock, but upon sand. In my opinion there is no substance for the apprehensions of certain honorable members who have argued that we should reverse our previous decisions.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I shall be found recording my vote against the amendment. I rise chiefly for the purpose of saying that I was particularly interested in the remarks of the honorable and learned member (Mr. O'Connor), who indicated that his chief reason for contemplating the possibility of supporting the amendment was that the right of appeal had not been taken wholly away, that it was allowed in cases in which the public interests of the Commonwealth or of a state were concerned. He argued strongly that if an appeal were allowed at all it should be allowed equally in the case of a private individual who might deem himself aggrieved by the decision of the High Court, and might desire to appeal to the Queen in Council, as in the case where public interests were involved. But be added that if the right of appeal from the High Court was sought to be abolished, he would record his vote in favour of its abolition. That is the course I intend to take, and I trust that the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) will, at the proper time, move to strike out clause 75, giving the right of appeal from the High Court in cases where the public interests of the Commonwealth or of a state are concerned, so that Australia may be self-contained, both as regards the powers of her Parliament to legislate, and of her courts to interpret the laws made by the Parliament. I was very sorry indeed to hear the suggestions which have been made in regard to Australian Judges. I think that our various benches have no reason to fear comparison with courts in any other part of the empire. We might, with advantage, utilize the services of some of these Judges in connexion with the new courts that we propose to establish. In any case, I am satisfied that there will be found within the Commonwealth men amply qualified to discharge the high responsibilities falling to these positions. To my mind, the suggestion of bias ought not to have been made. It means either corruption or incapacity. Of course we resent the very suggestion of corruption at the expense of an Australian Judge, and it would be in capacity to fail to realize the responsibilities of the judicial office, to fail to cast aside the consideration of those matters which a Judge ought to disregard. It seems to me that the Judges of Australia are just as likely to bring to bear the highest judicial qualities in the discharge of their high duties as Judges elsewhere. It seems to me, too, that they will be able to bring to bear what English Judges, from the very nature of things, could not bring to bear upon Australian laws—a deep sense and lively knowledge of the circumstances under which the legislation is passed, an acquaintance with its spirit, a sympathy with its genius, and all the faculties which render it probable that due effect will be given to the laws which have to be administered; and that they will regard that which ought chiefly to be regarded—the intentions of the Parliament. I am very sanguine that in these respects Australian Judges will possess a real advantage which will more than compensate for any suggested disadvantages of the character to which reference has been made. I hold, and I have always held, that the power of interpreting our laws is only second in importance to the power of making them. You may put what you like upon the statute-book, but unless you call into existence courts which by their decisions are likely to give effect to that which was intended by the Parliament when it passed them, you fall short of accomplishing that which you ought to accomplish. I know no better means for accomplishing all that we ought to desire

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania).—

I have taken a very great interest in this matter, and from the time when in the Judicial Committee I heard the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) suggest that the appeal to the Privy Council should to some extent be taken away I have opposed the proposal. As I have not spoken upon the subject during the last two sittings of the Convention, I think I may be permitted to take up a few minutes of the time of the Convention in expressing my views at the present time. The first point I wish to put before honorable members is that we are here to enlarge the powers of the people-to give them larger powers of government.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Larger powers of self-government.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Yes, larger powers of self-government, to enable them to advance as a nation. But I deny that we are here to take from our people the privilege which every colonist in the empire possesses. I am borne out in that statement, which is by no means a new one, because-I have heard it expressed before, by the flood of petitions which have been laid upon the table of the Convention. I do not think that the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) treated this matter in the calm judicial manner which is usual to him when he attempted to pour ridicule upon the way in which these petitions were got up. The honorable and learned member must know that when a sentiment is expressed in a petition signed by responsible men like the bankers, the members of Chambers of Commerce and Chambers of Mines, and men connected with financial institutions who have signed these petitions, such petitions cannot be regarded in the same light as petitions got up to further some popular wish, and left at every hotel and bank for men who hardly know anything about the Subject-matter to sign them.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not blame them for trying to keep this power of appeal.

Mr. DOBSON. -

I am objecting to the way in which my honorable and learned friend tried to pour contempt upon these petitions. The petition which came from Tasmania was signed by two or three of the ablest men in that colony; men who would as soon think of putting their names to a petition advocating something in which they did not honestly believe, and which they did not think a matter of great importance, as they would of flying. Upon only two subjects has the Convention been addressed by the outside public-upon the recognition of the Creator, and upon this question of abolishing the appeal to the Privy Council. We have reversed our decisions upon four or five most important questions, because we have been told by the Premiers and the representatives of the colonies which they chiefly affected that the people of those colonies would not accept the Bill unless we did so. But in regard to this matter, we have no honorable members getting up to speak far the bankers and the commercial men whom the provision in the Bill will affect. They speak to us by their petitions and say-"Do not rob us of what we have. Take away from us everything which is necessary to the framing of this Constitution, but do not take from us a privilege which we prize dearly." If my honorable and learned friend votes in opposition to the wishes expressed in these petitions, I do not say that he will shock me, but I think he will be taking a step which circumstances do not justify. I have heard my honorable and learned friend rather sneer at the suggestion that the taking away of the right of appeal to the Privy Council may, to a certain extent, influence the trend of capital in this direction. It is very hard to name cases in which it would absolutely prevent capital from coming here, but my honorable and learned friend knows how sensitive capital is, and who will dare to assert that in time to come the provision in the Bill will not influence depositors at home, and will not affect the sending of money out here? Are we not all looking forward to the time when the House of Commons will pass a law saying that trust funds may be invested in our Australian consols? You may say that if any question arose between a debenture-holder and the Commonwealth, provision is made for settling it, but does not my honorable and learned friend think that the financial companies and bankers at home will try to prevent money from coming out here?

Mr. SYMON. -

Why? They send it to the Argentine.

Mr. DOBSON. -

Many a director may say-"What, send your money out to that radical place?"

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Not while you are here.

Mr. DOBSON. -

"Send money to a place where they have taken away the right of appeal to the Privy Council!" I can understand that the men whose business it is to influence capital may in time to come advise their clients not to send money here. It has been argued in favour of the abolition of this right of appeal that appeals to the Privy Council are very costly and involve much delay. I am emphatically of opinion, however, from what I have seen of the charges of professional men in England-though it is not much-that you could brief a leading counsel in an appeal case at home for half the amount that my honorable and learned friend would charge to go from Adelaide to Wentworth, or wherever the High Court of Appeal was being held. I could get as good a man at home for half the fee that any barrister would charge to go from here to Adelaide or to Sydney. It is idle to say that an appeal to the Privy Council would be more costly, and Sir Joseph Abbott has pointed out that a great deal of the delay that takes place occurs in the conduct of the suits in the colonies.

Mr. SYMON. -

The delay of the appeal.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The honorable member urged the delay as a distinct argument why it was unwise to go to the Judicial Committee. That argument has been well answered by Sir Joseph Abbott, who has shown that a great part of the delay takes place here, and is caused by solicitors and clients endeavouring to, compromise and settle the case. Does any honorable member suppose that if there was any unreasonable delay, additional Judges would not be appointed, not only from England, but from the colonies? Additional Judges were appointed in 1871, and if there was work to be accomplished, a representation of the mildest character would lead the Home authorities to make the Judicial Committee so strong that it would be able to dispose of all appeals in an average time of six or eight months. I think I have shown how fallacious that argument is. Mr. Symon made rather an unintentional mistake when he said that we were simply creating another court for the anxious litigant to struggle through. I have not heard a single honorable member say that he desires first the right of appeal to the High Court, and then the right of appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council.

Mr. SYMON. -

That is the amendment.

Mr. DOBSON. -

The amendment would allow the Queen to grant permission for such appeals. I hope that the Bill will be put into such a form that it will allow private litigants, in cases involving questions of great magnitude and complicated points of law, to appeal either to the Privy Council or to the High Court. I have no desire to drag litigants to the High Court, and then to give the rich man a right of appeal to the Privy Council. There is every reason for saying that we shall act wisely in reversing the decision which we have given on this subject.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I do not know that I have erred by talking too often, or at too great length. On this occasion I should not have thought it proper to speak at all, but for the fact that the people of Tasmania who sent me here have requested me to urge the retention of the right of appeal to the Privy Council as much as I possibly can. I take a great interest in the subject myself, but that would not be a sufficient reason for speaking now. I speak in obedience to the wish of my own constituents. I hold in my hand copies of resolutions passed by the Hobart and Launceston Chambers of Commerce and by the banks of Tasmania. I would inform the Hon. Mr. Symon that, to the best of my belief, no representative of Tasmania has had anything whatever to do with the passing of any of these resolutions. They come from the people, and they are perfectly spontaneous.

Mr. SYMON. -

Other people have got them up. They emanated from here.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I do not for a moment believe that they emanated from here, and, if they did, the representatives of Tasmania were kept in curious ignorance of it. The resolution passed by the Chambers of Commerce of Launceston and Hobart is as follows:-

"That in the opinion of this chamber it is a matter of vital importance that in any federation of the Australian colonies there should be no relinquishment or diminution of the existing rights of all Her Majesty's colonial subjects to appeal to the highest court of the empire. That such an abridgment of these rights as is at present proposed by the Federal Convention would, if adopted, prove highly injurious and prejudicial to the interests of these colonies. That the Right Honorable the Premier and his colleagues on the Convention be respectfully urged to use their best exertions in order to prevent any such alteration as is now proposed in the relations of Her Majesty's colonies to the Throne, and to retain the existing right to appeal to the Privy Council."

The Chambers of Commerce represent the leading business men of the colony, who are more vitally and directly interested in a question of this kind than are those who are opposing this amendment. I am happy to say that, although a large part of the opposition comes from the lawyers, we have on our side also a very substantial measure of support from lawyers of eminence, lawyers of position, and lawyers whose words ought to have some influence here, and whose votes, I hope, will help us to carry this matter. But if it were a question between the commercial people, who have to pay, and the lawyers, who have to receive, to which body is it fair that we should give our best consideration? The resolutions of the banks, which include two of the banks of Australia—the Union Bank, and the Bank of Australasia—are as follow:-

1. That, in the opinion the managers of the banks in Tasmania—an opinion based on experience (acquired in the Australian colonies)—the right of appeal to the highest court in the empire should not be abolished or restricted as is proposed.
2. That, having regard to the extensive and increasing business relations between Australia and the other parts of the empire, and to the necessity for securing and retaining the confidence of investors in Australian securities, it is of the utmost importance that the final Court of Appeal should be the Privy Council, so as to obtain certainty and uniformity in the decision of all mercantile and other questions depending on principles of law common to the empire.

A copy of these resolutions was sent to the Premier and other Tasmanian delegates in the hope that the provision in the Bill objected to may be omitted. I am not competent to argue on the legal side of this question, but I think I am competent to say that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is a body worthy of our respect, and competent to justly adjudge our cases when they come before them on appeal. I would urge on the committee the importance of retaining, so far as we possibly can, every tie that unites us with the mother country. We are constituting a Federation under the Crown, and if, in the course of building up this fabric, we weaken one of the strongest links that connect us with the British nation, I think we shall have made a lamentable mistake. The bonds that unite us are very few, and are they irksome? Have we not almost complete liberty-liberty to deal with our own financial affairs as we please, liberty to deal with Customs Tariffs, with the effect that we put heavy duties on all Great Britain exports to us, and allow them to receive all ours free of duty? We enjoy under the Crown the greatest possible amount of liberty and support. I will not say anything about our being dependent on them, but we know very well that events may arise at any moment when our dependence on them will be thrust very prominently before us.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I have an amendment to move after the word "right," but if the words "saving any right" are put, and a division taken on that question, it will determine whether or not the clause is to stand as it is or whether there is to be a saving of any right.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
Let us go to a division on this amendment.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Let us divide on the question we have been discussing.

Mr. SYMON. -
If we divide on the words "saving any right," it will settle the question whether the clause is to stand as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I must put the amendment, unless an amendment is moved on it.

Mr. SYMON. -
I thought it might save another division or two, if the question were put as I suggest.

The CHAIRMAN. -
An amendment has been moved by Sir Joseph Abbott, and any one may move an amendment on that amendment, but it cannot be altered without the consent of the mover.

Mr. SYMON. -
The amendments I intended to move were after "right" to, insert the words "of granting special leave to appeal," and then after "each," to insert the words ",until the Parliament otherwise provides.", But I do not want to complicate the thing in any way. I want to have a direct issue. The reason why I intended to move the second amendment was this: Under the Canadian Act, you can alter the Act at any time, but if you put this right of appeal in our Constitution absolutely it remains there until you alter it. I will not move the amendments now.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
A great deal of stress has been laid on the fact that these petitions have been laid on the table, as if that evidenced any change of the solid public opinion of Australasia, on this point. There are hundreds of thousands of our most enlightened citizens who are remaining supine in this matter, because it never entered into their minds, that there was the possibility of a chance of the Convention reversing the decision which was arrived at eight years ago, which has been canvassed and approved by public men ever since that year, and which has been re affirmed on three different occasions. There is no change in public opinion whatever. The public opinion of Australia is fixed in this matter, and the mere laying on the table of this Convention of a few petitions, signed by a handful of individuals, however wealthy and backed up by powerful financial institutions, is no indication of any change of opinion whatever. I do hope that the Convention will not lower itself in the esteem of Australia and in the esteem of the world by going back on its settled conviction.

Question - That the words proposed by Sir Joseph Abbott be added to the clause-put.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I beg to move-
That the following words be added to clause 74:-"Provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the High Court from hearing and determining appeals allowed by the law of a state from the Supreme Court of the state."

In clause 74, as it stands, we have put it in the power of the Federal Parliament to cut down the jurisdiction of the High Court not only in relation to appeals from matters of federal legislation but also in purely state matters. Clause 74 provides that-
The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe, to hear and determine appeals from all judgments, decrees, orders, and
1. Of any other federal court, or court exercising federal jurisdiction, or of the Supreme Court of any state:

and so on. The position is this: We have authorized the Federal Parliament to interfere with the right of appeal from purely state legislation. Now, I say that this is an uncalled-for interference with the autonomy of the states. I resisted this provision before, both in regard to federal legislation and state legislation, urging on the Convention that what ought to be done was to leave the jurisdiction of the High Court perfectly and fully comprehensive of everything, but to let the question of whether appeals should lie or not to rest in the one case with the Federal Parliament, and in the other case with the state Parliaments. That is the ordinary law of the land at the present time. If you wish to take away the right of appeal in a particular matter at present you do not provide that the court is not to hear it to the Privy Council, and we have put it in the power of the Federal Parliament to say that there may not be an indirect appeal to the Privy Council in state matters, because, if the Federal Parliament passes an Act to say there shall be no appeal to the High Court in regard to a purely state matter, then there may not be an appeal to the Privy Council in a state matter, so that we have placed the right of appeal in the hands of the Federal Parliament, taking away the existing right of appeal to the Privy Council, and putting it into the hands of the Federal Parliament to say, if it so pleases, that there shall be no appeal. As it is not essential to the Federation that this right of appeal to the High Court should be denied, I ask the Convention to adopt the proviso I have moved.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In the form in which this proviso is moved I would like to ask my honorable friend, does it mean that a state may, at any time, pass a law allowing an appeal from the courts of that state to the High Court?

Mr. GLYNN. -

No, it is the other way about—that the Federal Parliament cannot cut down that right of appeal.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is the intention of the honorable member; but what I am a little troubled about is that his amendment reads as a proviso which would secure that the High Court shall not be prevented from hearing and determining any appeals the state may allow to be brought before the Supreme Court of that state. In this form it might carry out an intention which the honorable member himself has not. I do not think he wishes to give a continuing power to the states themselves at all to determine the classes of appeals which the High Court shall entertain from the Supreme Court of that state; otherwise that would be giving the state jurisdiction over the High Court, and the High Court is intended to be subject to the jurisdiction, as far as legislation is concerned, which is given to the Commonwealth in this chapter, and not to any jurisdiction a state may attempt to exercise by passing laws on the subject. I only want my honorable friend's assurance that he does not mean that.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I do not mean that.

Mr. BARTON. -
If we are quite clear what Mr. Glynn means, then, if this proviso is carried, the Drafting Committee can look after the matter. What my honorable friend wants, I take it, is this: That the words "with such exceptions and subject to such restrictions as the Parliament prescribe," shall not extend to giving the Parliament power to cut down the appeal from the Supreme Court of the state to the Federal High Court.

Mr. GLYNN. -
That is it.

Mr. BARTON. -
Then I can follow that very well. There is perhaps yet another difficulty. If the honorable member wishes to carry out entirely the meaning of this amendment it might be wise to make it read-Nothing in this sub-section "or in any law passed thereunder" shall be construed to prevent the High Court, &c.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -
What my honorable friend wants to prevent is the effect of any law cutting down this appeal to the High Court from the Supreme Court of the state.

Mr. GLYNN. -
That is so.

Mr. BARTON. -
Then the Drafting Committee will perfectly understand what my honorable friend means.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I understand that Mr. Symon wishes to insert something before my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. -
We had better proceed with one question at a time.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

My honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) has mentioned to me this matter: Mr. Glynn has said that he does not mean to confer power upon a state to make laws to provide for appeals from its own court to the High Court, but what he does want is to put it out of the power of the Commonwealth Parliament to regulate appeals so as to prevent any existing right of appeal from a local court to the High Court. Does he mean that to include the right of appeal as conferred by the Constitution or as existing at the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth?

Mr. GLYNN. -

As existing at the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then I understand that perfectly.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I have an amendment to move which will come prior to the one which Mr. Glynn has moved, and which is one that directly affects the amendment which has been carried. I propose to add, so as to define that the right is in harmony with the next clause, the words "and until the Parliament otherwise provides." As this amendment arises out of Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment I would ask Mr. Glynn to temporarily withdraw his amendment, in order that I may move mine; or, failing that, I shall have to move mine as an intermediate proviso, which would complicate the clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

We could make that a matter of drafting.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Why not limit it to granting a right of appeal in cases prescribed by Parliament?

Mr. SYMON. -

I should be agreeable to that.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg to ask leave to withdraw my amendment temporarily.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I object, and if a member objects an amendment cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I would like to say that the words of my amendment have been settled by reference to others concerned, and I invariably find that proposals become more cloudy when I ask others to help me.

Mr. Glynn's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I now beg to move-
That the following proviso be added to the clause:-
"Provided also that the right saved is that of granting leave to appeal, and shall continue only until Parliament otherwise provides."

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
It is hardly fair to press an amendment of this kind when the usual hour for adjournment has passed, and many members have left the chamber. No notice has been given of the amendment. At the same time, I confess that I can see no objection to it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
It only puts us in the same position as Canada.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Exactly in the same position as Canada.

Mr. Symon's amendment was agreed to.
The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 75. - No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state, or from the High Court, or any other federal court, except that the Queen may, in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any state, or of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions are concerned, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
I have given notice of an amendment in this clause, which amendment I think is consequential upon the amendment which has just been carried. The same arguments apply to it, and I am not going to waste any time in going over them again. I beg to move-
That the following words be omitted (line 4-7):-
"in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or of any state, or of any other part of her dominions are concerned."

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I also have an amendment of which I gave contingent notice.

The CHAIRMAN. -
I will point out to Mr. Symon that if he carries the amendment of which he has given notice, and the clause is amended in the manner he wishes, I shall have to refuse to put it, because it would be a direct negative of the clause as carried.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
That is not what I want. I do not wish in any way, as the committee have arrived at a conclusion, by any side-wind to override what has been done in the least degree. It is suggested to me that I should attain my object by proposing to amend the clause by striking out all the words after the word
"matter" down to the word "concerned," with a view of inserting the words "not involving the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state."

The CHAIRMAN. -
It seems to me that that also would involve a negative.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
No; it is preserving absolutely what Sir Joseph Abbott has carried, and is carrying out somewhat Mr. O'Connor's contention, with which I entirely agree, that certain matters should not be the subject of appeal to the Privy Council.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment, which comes first, is the amendment before the Chair.
Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I beg to move-
That the following words be inserted in the place of those struck out:-
"not involving the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state."

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -
This proposal largely cuts down the effect of the motion which has just been carried, because it excepts from the operation of the clause all cases arising under the Constitution. The honorable member said he did not want to take any action by a side-wind which would have the effect of reversing the decision just arrived at.

Mr. BARTON. -
It cuts it down, but does not reverse it.

Dr. QUICK. -
It derogates from the amendment which we have carried. Mr. Symon wants to put an exception in the clause, which will then read that the Queen's prerogative is to remain, as in Canada, except in all cases arising under the Constitution and the interpretation of the Constitution. That will very seriously cut down the amendment.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
I rise to order, and submit that the motion of Mr. Symon is out of order, because it is curtailing what the committee have already decided should be in the Bill, and the

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I submit it is quite in accord with parliamentary practice to propose such an amendment, because where a committee has carried a certain proposition, anything within that proposition which tends to make an exception to it or a proviso to it, or which is equivalent to anything of that kind, is perfectly admissible. If Mr. Symon had proposed an amendment which virtually negatived that which was carried by Sir Joseph Abbott, I would be one of the first to point that out and say that we ought not, at this late stage, to reverse a decision just come to. But what is now proposed is nothing of that kind. It is proposed simply, while leaving the right to obtain leave to appeal to the Queen in Council in all other cases, and to that extent abiding by Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment, to except from the operation of that amendment cases in which the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state is to be interpreted. That is to say, it confines to the High Court the interpretation and meaning of this Constitution, and those cases arising under the Constitutions of the states which come under the judicial power of the Commonwealth. That is the object of the amendment. It seems to me to be an exception to Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment that can be well considered. If it amounted to a negative of that amendment, I would be one of the first to point it out, and I am sure that you, sir, would at once rule it out of order. This is merely an exception or proviso, and if it were not allowed to be moved it would be to decide that the committee had not ordinary legislative powers.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I submit, with great confidence, that the rule is that no amendment can be proposed which is inconsistent with anything already passed by the committee.

I submit that you are called upon to decide whether this amendment would be inconsistent with the proposal carried by the committee. If you think it is not, it will be in order.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I submit that the governing rule is that, if the House has expressed its opinion in the shape of a general proposition, it may proceed to qualify that proposition while it falls short of a negative.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not think I can rule this proposed amendment out of order. Every clause, or nearly every clause, in a Bill in some way qualifies the preceding clauses. They extend the operation of those clauses, and, in some instances they limit the operation of the clauses. This is not a distinct negative, and I think it would be unduly curtailing the power of the committee to arrive at such a conclusion as they may think fit if I ruled this out of order.

Dr. QUICK. -
I venture to point out that if this exception be engrafted on the exception of Sir Joseph Abbott, it will absolutely emasculate clause 75, the predominant feature of which is that, in all of these constitutional matters, the right of appeal to the Privy Council is to be preserved. I would ask the Drafting Committee and the members of the Judicial Committee whether this is not a complete somersault, a complete reversal of the policy which they agreed to in Adelaide, and which is incorporated in this Bill? In this Bill a full right of appeal is preserved to the Privy Council in respect of great constitutional questions. Now, Mr. Symon is absolutely reversing that policy. Instead of leaving it, within the exception of Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment, that the Queen in Council may grant the right of appeal, be now proposes to absolutely take away the right of appeal on all these great constitutional questions which may arise under the Constitution itself, and Acts passed under the Constitution. This is certainly a most serious infraction of the principle of clause 75. It springs upon the Convention a proposal of a most serious and alarming character, and it ought not to be passed. No notice has been given of this proposal. Sir Joseph Abbott did not propose to take away the right of appeal in constitutional or political questions involving probably our relations with the empire itself. Mr. Symon, in the Judiciary Committee's report, proposed to reserve that right. If I had to elect between Sir Joseph Abbott's proposal of reserving the prerogative and Mr. Symon's amendment, I confess I would sooner have the clause as it stands. So long as there is a right of appeal on all great political questions to the Privy Council there will be a bond of connexion and some guarantee for the retention of harmonious legal constitutional relations. But what will be reserved now in this proposed amendment is the right of appeal by private citizens on disputes not involving constitutional questions, whereas it is proposed to take away all constitutional questions from the determination of the highest tribunal in the empire. I object to that most strongly.

[The Chairman left the chair at half-past five o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at thirty-five minutes past seven o'clock p.m.]

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I am sure no one will accuse me of any desire to exaggerate the importance of any proposal, or the dangerous nature of any proposal. I have not done so hitherto in this Convention, but I feel strongly convinced that the movement on the part of Mr. Symon is a dangerous movement, and, at the same time, a most unfair movement. I appeal to the leader of the Convention not to give sanction to any such movement, but to interpose to prevent dangerous results which may follow therefrom. I would remind the leader of the Convention that Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment was discussed on notice. There was no notice of any amendment on that amendment. We came here to deal with Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment, and Mr. Symon gave no notice of any intention to move a further amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -
Unfortunately, I can scarcely act upon that, because amendments on amendments have been moved without any notice being given.

Dr. QUICK. -
No doubt; but not at the final stage of the history of the Convention. I need only remind the Convention of the request of Mr. Reid this morning, that no new matter should be introduced at the present stage of which no notice has been given. This matter has been fairly disposed of on a division. I took no active part in that amendment. I voted for it, not with any degree of profound anxiety on the subject. Had that amendment of Sir Joseph Abbotts been lost I would not have quarrelled with the decision of the Convention. I would have been prepared to take the Bill as it stood, believing that clause 57, which provides for appeals to the Privy Council on all great public and constitutional questions in which the interests of the Commonwealth or of the state are concerned, would probably, under the circumstances, meet the requirements of the case. But what do we find now? By this proposal the right of appeal is to be allowed to private individuals for testing and litigating in regard to private rights, probably as to contracts or torts, or matters of that kind; but on matters of supreme importance, affecting the interpretation of this new Constitution, there is absolutely no appeal whatever. I have taken down the words from the Clerk, which read-

excepting that the Queen may, in a matter not involving the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state, grant leave to appeal.

That means the Queen may grant leave to appeal in all cases except cases arising as to the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state. Mr. Symon proposes to take away not only the right, of appeal to the Privy Council on questions arising under the Commonwealth Constitution, but on questions arising under the existing Constitution of the state.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
That is not intended.

Dr. QUICK. -
But there are the words. If Mr. Symon does not intend that, I should be happy to stop speaking further. I am assured it is only necessary to call attention to the serious and almost revolutionary character of the proposal to induce the Convention to pause before adopting it. I would sooner have the Bill as it stood originally.

Mr. DOBSON. -

As we all would.

Dr. QUICK. -

I would sooner have the Bill as it stood, denying the right of appeal to the private person, so long as we preserve the right of appeal on constitutional questions, which are far more important. This is a new constitutional instrument of which we have had no experience before. It is to be launched on its career, and the Federal High Court is to have absolute and exclusive jurisdiction in interpreting that Constitution.

Mr. SYMON. -

What are you creating the Federal High Court for?

Dr. QUICK. -

I may point out that we have a new constitutional instrument, involving the political relation of the most important kind, and involving the rights of the state as well as the rights of the Commonwealth.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Are you not prepared to trust the High Court?

Dr. QUICK. -

We are prepared to trust the High Court so far as it is constituted. But, as a matter of precaution, as a matter of safety, what objection can there be to giving a right of final and ultimate appeal to Her Majesty in Council?

Mr. SYMON. -

A lot of Judges who do not understand anything about our conditions.

Dr. QUICK. -

It is not suggested that the Judges of the High Court will not be worthy of trust, but this right of appeal should be given as a security that the novel provisions of the Constitution will, especially in the early stage of the history of their interpretation, receive careful consideration. If a mistake should unfortunately be made by the High Court—and it is no reflection upon that body to say that mistakes might be made by it, because Judges differ, and we have had instances in the Supreme Courts here, and instances have occurred in the United States, where most important decisions have been arrived at upon the opinions of the majority of the Judges—if a mistake is made it can be rectified.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We want to be in exactly the same position as we were in before we federated.
Dr. QUICK. -

Certainly, with regard to constitutional questions. I am prepared, if necessary, to give up the subject's right of appeal; but I emphatically assert that there should be a right of appeal from the decision of the High Court in regard to this Constitution, a Constitution embodying novel provisions and giving important powers, including the power of the Federal Court to review the procedure of Parliament. The Federal High Court is empowered to declare a law passed by both Houses and assented to by the Crown ultra vires, not because the Legislature has exceeded its jurisdiction, but because of some fault of procedure. Appeals would be made only when there was a reasonable doubt in the minds of the responsible advisers of the Commonwealth that the decisions of the High Court were open to question. The knowledge of this right of appeal would be an incentive to the High Court to be most careful in its decisions, and especially in its early decisions. I need not enumerate the cases in which, if the amendment is carried, there will be no right of appeal. There will be no right of appeal in regard to the letter of the Constitution itself. There will be no opportunity to review a decision, for instance, in regard to legislation under clause 52, sub-section (1)-"The regulation of trade and commerce." Then, again, it is provided that all taxation is to be uniform, and all legislation under this provision will be taken out of the purview of the Privy Council. The exercise of the power under clause 55 would also be withdrawn from review. But perhaps the most important of all is the clause which was amended the other day on the motion of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid with reference to rivers. That clause would probably be fruitful of litigation, and any state beaten upon a first decision would be bound to have that decision reviewed. It would be an advantage to have it reviewed, whatever was the result. Then there are the powers for the creation of the Inter-State Commission. All disputes between states arising under these novel powers would be absolutely and irrevocably within the jurisdiction of the High Court of the Commonwealth, if Mr. Symon's amendment were carried. I would therefore strongly urge the Convention not to entertain the amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Could not everything come under the review of the Privy Council according to Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment.

Dr. QUICK. -

That would be so if it were allowed to remain as it stands. For my part, I should be quite willing to have the whole of clause 75 struck out. The leader of the Convention admits that the effect of Mr. Symon's amendment would be to largely destroy the value of Sir Joseph Abbott's proposal, as it would remove from the control of the Privy Council all constitutional questions, and give the Privy Council jurisdiction only in trumpery suits between subjects - suits important perhaps to the individuals themselves, but absolutely trumpery in comparison with these other great and important constitutional questions.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not foresee the portentous and manifold difficulties in the government of the Commonwealth, and in its future, which, it is said, will result if something approaching to the amendment of my honorable friend (Mr. Symon) is carried. I have for some time had a doubt as to whether if it were conceded that appeals to the Privy Council should be restricted to a certain extent, whether appeals should still be permitted upon that part of our work which is most particularly within the function of a self-governed community. We are the makers of our own Constitution. We sit here as the makers of our own Constitution. We propose to frame that Constitution so as to secure the assent of the Imperial Parliament; but our first charge is to prepare such a Constitution as will receive the approval of our own people. When we have the approval of our own people to the Constitution, we hope that it will be passed into law as nearly as possible in the form in which we submit it. If the results of our labours are indorsed by the various peoples of the colonies, Australia will be the maker of its own Constitution, and I am very much inclined to coincide with the opinion of my honorable friend (Mr. Symon) that if Australia is to be the maker of its own Constitution, it is fairly competent to be the interpreter of its own Constitution. I see no reason to anticipate that the difficulties that are foreshadowed will arise from the adoption of the principle that those who are fit to make the Constitution are fit to say what the language of it means.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We cannot do that now.

Mr. BARTON. -

We cannot do it under our present Constitutions, but my right honorable friend forgets that we are taking a very large step in advance in making a Federal Constitution.

Mr. SYMON. -

There can be no conflict now between states and Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, because the Commonwealth as a federal body is nonexistent. It is proposed to unite the states in a Commonwealth, and the question is whether upon the matters that will arise as regards the interpretation of the several Constitutions there is any need for them to appeal to any distant authority. In the first place, let me disclaim utterly that reproach which has been so consistently flung at those who do not wish to leave the whole thing unrestricted, the right of appeal to the Privy Council; a reproach that they wish to break ties with the empire; a reproach which, if it means anything, is intended to convey to people outside that we are in some illicit and covert way hankering after independence. I venture to say that there is no more loyal subject of the Queen in the Australian Dominion than I am, and yet I am strongly of opinion that it is not in every case that is to be decided under our Constitution, or in every class of case, we are to say to ourselves that, having constituted a High Court, we are to superadd to that another Court of Appeal. I do not agree with that contention. I bow loyally to the decision which has been arrived at, with this sole qualification, that I think we have a right to modify that decision by making an exception to it in matters that pertain to the essence of a Federal Constitution.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
You always want to modify when you are defeated.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not quite follow my right honorable friend. He does not find me, I think, peculiarly anxious to disturb the decisions of this Convention, nor have I engaged in any particular agitation in any way whatever to undo the work of the Convention. I do not think any one has been more loyal to the decisions of the Convention than I have.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
There has been some one always ready to do it.

Mr. BARTON. -
My right honorable friend possesses a very strong bow, but he sometimes drives his shafts at the wrong enemy.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not think so; there is always somebody ready to do it.

Mr. SYMON. -
He drives them at an imaginary enemy.

As he sometimes lets drive at me, I do not consider myself an imaginary enemy—there are physical reasons why I should not. I believe if there is one thing on which we should retain the supreme power of decision by any court which we constitute it is the power of deciding finally what our own Constitution means, because as the Australian people are the makers of this Constitution it is only fit that authorities who represent the Australian people should decide what it means if there is any doubt about what it means. I am not quarrelling, therefore, with the remainder of the decision which has taken place at the hands of the committee. I am not quarrelling with the provision that the prerogative shall be retained, and that the Queen in Council may grant leave to appeal with respect to other matters. I voted against the amendment which conveyed that decision, but I am perfectly prepared to bow to the will of the majority. I am not going to question that; but I think we may make an exception from it, based on purely federal grounds. I think it is an exception, based on federal grounds, that we should attain this measure of self-government by our own machinery; that not only by our own demand, but by the framing of our own Constitution, should we be entitled by our own authorities to say what we mean when we frame that Constitution. That is the whole extent to which I am prepared to go by way of exception to the amendment which was carried on the motion of Sir Joseph Abbott. That honorable gentleman has said that, so far as at present advised, he does not think that this amendment will do much harm. I do not know quite how far that commits him, and I do not want it to be taken as committing him until he has another opportunity to express himself. But there is a further qualification which I should like to engraft on this amendment. We have had a very long discussion on this subject, and I think we may settle the matter now speedily. The amendment is to insert words which will make the clause read as follows:-

No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state, or from the High Court, or any other federal court, except that the Queen may, in any matter not involving the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, or of a state, or in any matter involving the interests of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.

It will be obvious that there may be matters involving the construction of the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state, or of Acts of Parliament passed under the Constitution, which, nevertheless, will involve also the interests of other parts of Her Majesty's dominions. We did originally intend—we put it into this clause—that there should be a right to grant leave to appeal where the interests of other parts of Her Majesty's dominions were affected. Now, I wish to retain that right, because I think it would be a strange thing if, by simply excepting from the operation of leave to appeal cases in which the Constitution of the Commonwealth or the Constitution of a state was to be interpreted, we gave that wide power which would enable our High Court to give that interpretation, notwithstanding that the interests of parts of Her Majesty's dominions outside the Commonwealth were concerned. I do not think we can affect to claim that. I do not think we have a right to claim that our High Court can give final judgment where the interests of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions outside of the Commonwealth are concerned. Therefore, I beg to propose—

That the amendment be amended by adding to it the words "or in any matter involving the interests of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions."

The effect of that amendment will be that even in a case for appeal in which is involved the interpretation of the Commonwealth Constitution or the Constitution of a state, the High Court cannot give judgment so as to preclude any appeal to the Privy Council, if the interests of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions are concerned; it is in that respect that Mr. Symon's amendment goes too far, and if we guard in that respect the finality of the judgment of the High Court, and extend it only to those matters in which the Constitution of the Commonwealth or the Constitution of a state are exclusively concerned the amendment would be acceptable in the federal aspect. It would then be a right amendment, because it would not interfere with appeals in any other direction. With this qualification, I think that I should be prepared to support the amendment, and if it is carried in that way we might very well adopt it without discussion.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). —

I would again respectfully call the attention of the committee to the fact that four or five of the most difficult questions in this Constitution are to be re-opened, and that we propose to conclude our sittings to-night.

Sir JOHN FORREST. —

Why re-open them then? That is what I have to complain of.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). —

I would like to call attention to a matter of drafting. Under this provision there is to be no appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council, saving the prerogative of the Crown to grant leave to appeal in certain cases. I am not referring to an appeal from the state court. Were it not for the fact that under the previous clause the retention of the prerogative right is to last so long as Parliament wishes, it would be the same in effect as this, which fixes the continuity of the right in the Constitution, without giving Parliament power to alter it. It seems to me that there is a conflict between the two provisions. This fixes it beyond the control of Parliament.

Mr. SYMON. —

But we will add some words to this.
Mr. GLYNN. -

Well, it is a matter of substance, and I thought it desirable to call attention to it, because it is a matter which might be overlooked, and which we cannot subsequently cure.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I am sure I sympathize with Mr. Reid in desiring that we should get on with our business as quickly as possible; but I cannot help rising at this stage to say that so soon as a decision is arrived at which is distasteful to a large number, or, at any rate, to some portion of this Convention, honorable members begin again to try and undo that decision. We have had lots of evidence of that during the seven or eight weeks we have been here, and I think it is too bad, and not quite just to the Convention. Here we are just about closing our business, but the moment an important decision is arrived at honorable members rise in their places to submit new proposals which none of us have had an opportunity of fully considering, and which we are asked to vote on at a moment's notice. Surely this is new matter of which no notice has been given. I don't think we have been treated as fairly as we have a right to expect in this regard. The whole thing goes back to distrust of the Privy Council of Great Britain. Mr. Symon just now interjected a remark which shows that at the bottom of his proposal is a certain amount of distrust of the Privy Council, because he interjected, in regard to the questions referred to them, that they were matters they know nothing about. That show's that at the bottom of this proposal is distrust of the Privy Council's wisdom, knowledge, and capability to do justice to the questions submitted to them. At any rate, I shall soon begin to feel very indifferent as to the decisions we arrive at, if important matters are to be introduced at the eleventh hour, and if we are to be called on at a moment's notice, without seeing the proposals in print, to decide questions of such great importance. I again say that I do not think those who voted in favour of the motion which was carried this afternoon are being treated fairly in being again asked to re-open the question by considering an amendment which I suppose they have not even seen in print.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I venture to think that it would be, I will not say more seemly, but more in keeping with our proceedings, if my right honorable friend had paid more regard to the proceedings of the committee some time ago, before he assisted at the eleventh hour in reversing the decision of this Convention arrived at twelve months ago, and re-affirmed at our meeting this session.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Long notice was given.

Mr. SYMON. -

Why should he talk of the eleventh hour? He is responsible as much as any one for the re-opening of the question, and it is high time that we should be saved from these constant lectures from him as to the proceedings of this Convention. I protest against them. I also take exception to his statement that I am endeavouring, or that any one who takes the same view as I do is endeavouring, to undo the decision of the committee. His explosion is founded altogether on an unfounded hypothesis. We are not trying, nor is any one trying-

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You are trying to restrict it.

Mr. SYMON. -

We are not trying to restrict it. My honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) moved an amendment in order purposely to secure the interest of private litigants, bond-holders, investors, capitalists, and so forth. We have passed the amendment he moved with that object, and I loyally bow to the decision of this Convention; whether it was agreed to at the eleventh hour or not, I am not going to ask for the question to be revived. But we are now dealing with another clause, and with totally different subject matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We are dealing with something of which no notice has been given.

Mr. SYMON. -

My right honorable friend surely knows something of the Bill he has been digesting for the last eight weeks. It is clause 75 with which we are dealing, and it is a limitation on the finality of the decision of the High Court. My honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) has attached a saving right to that. We are now dealing with the necessity or otherwise of submitting every Act of the Commonwealth, or every Act of Parliament passed by the states which is supposed to conflict with the Commonwealth law, to the Privy Council-a body not conversant with the basis of our litigation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No.

Mr. SYMON. -

Well, I say so, and every constitutional writer has said so in regard to Canada. I do not wish to question their justice, or anything of the sort.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

You have said it now, at last.

Mr. SYMON. -

If it offends my right honorable friend, I withdraw it. But I do say that all we are seeking to do by this amendment is to say that as to our Acts of Parliament, the High Court established under the Constitution is established for the very purpose of deciding them, and is the tribunal that should decide them, and there is no necessity to go to the Privy Council at all.

Mr. Barton's amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The whole amendment now reads: "not involving the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, or of a state, nor in any matter involving the interests of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions."

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I rise to ask Mr. Symon to withdraw his amendment. I do not say it is unfair, and I do not think my honorable friend is capable of doing anything unfair. But, at the same time, I express my firm belief that no such amendment ought to be moved. I wish to point out to Mr. Symon the position in which he is placing me, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, and other members. It is an absolute fact that this clause giving the right of appeal to the Privy Council in matters affecting the Commonwealth and the states was adopted by the committee without a dissentient voice. It was passed after a long debate in Adelaide, and also the other day. Why should we alter this clause now, simply because it has been carried a little further?

Dr. COCKBURN. -

Has not the Convention turned somersaults in other directions?

Mr. DOBSON. -

Yes; but we know there was a difference of opinion on every other matter where we reversed our decision. In every such case we were told that it would affect the passage of the Bill when it went before the people, and there was an active and intelligent minority. In this instance there has not been the shadow of a doubt cast upon the wisdom of retaining this clause until an hour before the adjournment. Therefore, the amendment should not have been brought forward, and I should like to see Mr. Symon withdraw it. The leader of the Convention would have been quite justified in asking Mr. Symon to withdraw his amendment, and in pointing out that if any matter has been definitely settled this has been. It is all very well to urge us to go on with our work, but we cannot do so if a thing like this is sprung upon us at the last moment. We are asked to go back on a very vital question. We are told now that a private citizen shall have the right to appeal to the Queen in Council, but in any matter affecting thousands of our future citizens and taxpayers you shall not have this appeal. It is contrary to common sense not to give the right of appeal in such a case.
Mr. Symon forgets that if the High Court will be all that he thinks it will be all the great mass of appeals will go to the local courts. Let it win its spurs and gain the confidence of Australia. But do not take away from the people the privilege they now have, and do not deprive the Commonwealth and the states of the same privilege which every private citizen has.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I think there must be a mistake in the wording of the amendment as it, has been read by you, sir. Does it so read that a British colony or a foreign state should not have the right to appeal to the Privy Council?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Certainly not. The object of my addition is this: Mr. Symon proposes to provide that the High Court shall be final where there is a question of the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state. My amendment is to, nevertheless, say that the right of appeal is preserved if leave is given, where the interests of any other part of the Queen's dominions are concerned. So that, although the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state may be involved in the interpretation, still, if there is a question arising at the same time about the interests of any other part of the Queen's dominions, there shall be the right to ask for leave to appeal.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I understand that is so, but is it so expressed?

Mr. BARTON. -

I made the amendment express that.

Mr. HOLDER. -

It is expressed the other way.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

I should like to understand what the leader of the Convention means by this addition to the amendment of Mr. Symon.

Mr. BARTON. -

I took ten minutes to say why.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

You give power to prevent the Privy Council interfering where any other portion of Her Majesty's dominions are concerned. Mr. Barton says that the provisions shall not apply to. any case where other portions of Her Majesty's dominions are concerned. That is an absurdity. It is a perfect piece of nonsense to put those words in. How can you bind the rest of Her Majesty's dominions? This Constitution only applies to Australia, and you cannot interfere with anything outside. If the amendment of the honorable member means otherwise, it is perfect nonsense. What is the real object of Mr. Symon's amendment?
Is it not to do away with the power of the Privy Council to interfere with those matters! After wasting nearly a day on this subject, when a division ought to have been taken at once, we have decided by a majority that the Privy Council shall have a right. Directly that is decided, there comes an amendment in order to do something else. What is the use of passing a vote and spending time, and then immediately afterwards deciding that what we did is not what we intended to do? I object to the amendment of the leader of the Convention, and I am sure that, on reflection, Mr. Barton will not attempt to put the words in. Mr. Symon's only object seems to be to prevent the effect of the vote we passed this afternoon.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I take it that the object of the amendment is-

Mr. ISAACS. -

What amendment?

Mr. KINGSTON. -

The amendment now proposed. I take it that the object of the amendment is that in a constitutional question affecting the Commonwealth or state there shall be no appeal unless the interests of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions are concerned. That is what is intended, although possibly the amendment does not say so. But whilst the amendment does not say so, we know what is intended, and we know the capacity of the Drafting Committee to put it right.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I think there is some misapprehension in regard to my views. It has been said I am in favour of the amendment. I am not in favour of the amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

If my honorable friend is alluding to what I said, I may tell him I understood him to say at the time he took the point of order, that he did not see much harm in the amendment, and I further said my honorable friend would probably speak in the debate and tell us what he meant.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I was not here when the House resumed, but it appears to me that the greatest questions that are likely to arise will be in reference to the construction of the Constitution. If that be so, we ought to have the determination of the very best court which is available. For that reason I cannot support the amendment.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

As I understood, the largest and most important questions that can possibly arise under this Constitution are not to be remitted to the Privy Council. If these questions concern the whole of the colonists in any state they are not to be remitted. But if a trifling question of £501 arises, an individual maybe dragged from court to court, and to the Privy Council, under the decision we have arrived at. I am going to be consistent, and vote against the remission of those cases to the Privy Council. I cannot see the justification for this amendment.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

There are two consequential amendments which I think we should make; to insert the word "special" before the word "leave," and to add at the end of the clause "until the Parliament otherwise provides." These are the suggestions of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Glynn).

Mr. BARTON. -
I think it would be better to leave the matter to the Drafting Committee.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -
I have not had an opportunity to understand exactly what the clause means. I ask the leader of the Convention whether, now that the amendment has been carried, it does not mean that a matter concerning the Constitution of a state or of the Commonwealth shall not be the subject of appeal, and that a matter concerning any other part of Her Majesty's dominions shall not be the subject of appeal. This hurried way of doing business, which is altogether contrary to the understanding we came to, and a grave breach of faith, results in our not knowing what we are doing.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I wish the right honorable member would not so constantly repeat the refrain of the popular song "'E dunno w'ere 'e are."

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I do not know where we are now.

Mr. BARTON. -
I have explained this matter more than once, and it is only in deference to my right honorable friend that I explain it again. We have passed a great many amendments in language which is only of a general character, and in a form which it is intended that the Drafting Committee shall recast; but I think that this is the first time that I have offended by moving such an amendment. What the two amendments mean is this: The honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon) has provided that, where the interpretation of this Constitution or of the Constitution of a state is involved, in that case, and in that case only, the High Court of the Commonwealth shall be the final arbiter.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I understand that.

Mr. BARTON. -
My amendment, which will have to be recast to a certain extent, provides that in any matter in which the interests of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions are involved, notwithstanding that the dispute may affect the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state, it shall be competent to grant special leave to appeal. My amendment is a modification of that of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Symon), and is intended to prevent the too wide application of it.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I think the honorable and learned member will admit that the words put into the clause were confusing.
Mr. BARTON. -
Owing to the urgency of the occasion the amendment was put in the way in which other amendments have been put, with the intention that it should be redrafted.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I have an amendment which I think will elucidate matters. I do not think any one desires that the proposed appeal shall be cumulative, and that there shall be an appeal to the High Court, and then a further appeal to the Privy Council. I therefore beg to move-

That the following words be added to the clause:-"Provided that no appeal shall be had to the Privy Council from the High Court in any matter which might have been taken direct to the Privy Council by way of appeal in the first instance."

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
If the proviso is accepted, we shall be in this difficulty, that, if the plaintiff appeals against a decision and succeeds before the High Court, the defendant, who may be anxious to obtain the judgment of the highest tribunal in the empire, will be shut out from doing so; whereas, were the defendant beaten in the lower court, he would have the option of appealing either to the High Court or to the Privy Council. Surely my honorable and learned friend cannot see the effect of his amendment. I shall not feel justified in voting for such a proposal.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
It is not often that I disagree with the Premier of Victoria; but I do not think that the Convention seriously intended to impose another obstacle in the way of an ultimate decision. If a litigant in the Supreme Court of one of the states is dissatisfied with the decision of the court, and has the right to appeal to the Privy Council, surely it is not intended that he should temporarily abandon that right, appeal to the High Court, and, if not satisfied with the decision of the High Court, go on to the Privy Council.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That is not my objection.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
That is what the amendment is intended to cure.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
No; it goes further. It shuts out both parties. I do not object to the shutting out of the appellant, who can choose his Court of Appeal, but I object to the shutting out of the other party.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
I say, let the right of appeal be exercised in the alternative. To permit a litigant to be haled first to one court and then to the other, instead of accomplishing speedy justice, seems likely to have precisely the reverse effect.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The proviso means that there shall be no appeal to the Privy Council at all.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

I should like Mr. Chairman, to take your ruling as to whether the amendment is not out of order as being inconsistent with what we have already done?

The CHAIRMAN. -

I am unable to say at present what the amendment is.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

The whole object of the amendment appears to be to destroy the provision which we have already inserted in the Bill, and to make a farce of the two clauses relating to appeals to the Privy Council. I would like to point out to honorable members what may happen. Take a case in which I am a successful litigant in a court below. The other party appeals to the High Court, and the High Court gives a decision in his favour. I should then be absolutely excluded from appealing to any other court. The one party would have an appeal to the High Court, and the other party, who in the first instance had won the case, would not be allowed to carry the matter further. I am not one of those who have evinced any desire to encourage this sort of litigation. I have endeavoured, having regard to the feelings of honorable members, to make it somewhat difficult to go to the Privy Council at all. The whole object of this amendment is, I repeat, to destroy what has been done. I thought that perhaps the Chairman had got an inspiration, and that he would now be prepared to rule the amendment out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I have not got the amendment yet. It is being recast.

Mr. FRASER. -

I think it will be well to read the whole clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I will read the amendment in the form in which it is now submitted. It is as follows:-

Provided that no appeals shall be had to the Privy Council from the High Court in any matter which might have been originally taken direct to the Privy Council in the first instance by way of appeal from a federal court or a court of a state.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I would like to take your ruling, Mr. Chairman, as to whether the amendment is in order at all? We have already declared, in clause 74, that any right Her Majesty may be pleased to exercise, by virtue of her Royal prerogative, shall not be impaired. If an amendment is submitted by which it is sought to curtail or impair Her Majesty's prerogative, is it not undoing what we have already done? For that reason I submit that the amendment is not consistent with the provisions that have been inserted in the Bill.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

The object of the amendment is simply to prevent litigants from being harassed by being taken to two courts.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is not possible under clause 74 and first part of 75.

Mr. SYMON. -

Certainly it is. The appeal there will involve both the High Court and the Privy Council. All we say is, that if there is to be an appeal from the Supreme Court of a state to the Privy Council, and the parties elect-

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

What do you mean? It will be one party who will elect.

Mr. SYMON. -

The appellant. Let my right honorable friend move that the appellant be excluded. Anything will be better than nothing.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

We are all agreed that there should not be a double right of appeal, and I would suggest to the honorable member that if he will leave it to the Drafting Committee they will see that that is provided for.

Mr. SYMON. -

I shall be perfectly content with that intimation.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

There can be no objection to a provision being inserted to prevent one litigant from harassing another. If a litigant is successful, and the unsuccessful litigant appeals to the High Court, the former would under the amendment be debarred from appealing to the Privy Council. What I say is that, if a party elects to appeal to the High Court, he should have no right to afterwards appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. SYMON. -

I will accept that suggestion.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

Then I would suggest as an amendment-and the Drafting Committee can be left to put it into legal phraseology-that the following words be inserted:-
"That the party invoking the decision of the High Court shall have no right to appeal to the decision of the Privy Council."

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I am greatly indebted to the honorable member for his suggestion, and I think that these words would serve the purpose:-

"Provided that no appellant to the High Court shall afterwards appeal to the Privy Council in the matter of the same appeal."

The CHAIRMAN. -

The Hon. Mr. Symon has already proposed an amendment which has not been withdrawn.

Mr. SYMON. -

With the leave of the committee, I will withdraw the first amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn accordingly.

Mr. SYMON. -

I now beg to move formally-

That the following words be added to the clause:"Provided that no appellant to the High Court shall afterwards appeal to the Privy Council in the matter of the same appeal."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Is this necessary? Under the first line of the clause no appeal is to be allowed to the Queen in Council from the court of any state. That will prevent any appeal being taken direct to the Privy Council. It must filter through the High Court. But then we preserve Her Majesty's prerogative to grant appeals from the High Court, and I do not see how there can be any clashing of jurisdiction.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I have been troubled as to what the position is, and the Attorney-General of Victoria is not clear on the point. I should be glad if the Drafting Committee would take this question into their earnest consideration. Would it be competent for a litigant in a court below to elect to appeal either to the High Court or to the Privy Council, or would he have to go to the High Court? If we say that he would have to go to the High Court., I think that we should be making a great mistake. I am quite willing to leave it to a litigant to elect either to go to the High Court or to the Privy Council. If he elects to go to the High Court, let him be bound by its decision. As I understand the clause, it does not carry out what we desire.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I do not pretend to possess any great legal knowledge, but so far as I have been able to follow this Constitution, I have been of opinion that all appeals from the Supreme Court of a state would have to go to the High Court of the Commonwealth, and that then, under certain conditions, subject to Her Majesty's approval, there would be an appeal to the Privy Council. I can understand the High Court being the bond of union between the various states; but if we are going to allow an appeal from the Supreme Court of a state direct to the Privy Council without any reference to the High Court, my opinion is that the High Court will have very little to do, and it will not occupy that high position in the estimation of the people of this continent which we all desire it should occupy. If you want to destroy the High Court altogether, and its importance in the minds of the people of of the Commonwealth, let it be passed by, and let the appeal go direct to the Privy Council. We know where the people will go, at any rate for some time to come. They will go direct to the Privy Council. They will not, as a rule, go to the High Court, because they will find it just as quick and cheaper to go to the Privy Council. My own idea is that if we are to have this High Court in the Constitution, all appeals should go through it, and the only appeal to the Privy Council should be from it on certain conditions, subject to Her Majesty's approval. However, I find now that Mr. Symon has gone away from that, and he is going to allow appeals direct from the Supreme Courts of the states. Speaking for my own colony, I know where the appeals will go. They will not come over to the High Court here; they will go straight to the Privy Council, in which, at any rate in the early days, the people will have more confidence. I think we shall be destroying this court, which it has been our desire to erect, if we allow any appeals to the Privy Council except through the High Court. If we do not do that, I am quite sure that it will be many a long day in Australia before the High Court will occupy that position in the estimation of the people which Mr. Symon and all others, I believe, desire that it should occupy.

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -

I hope that my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) will not be misled into supporting this amendment. Either the principle of an appeal to the Privy Council is good or it is bad. If it is a good principle, why should one man be deprived of it simply because he has been forced first of all to appeal to the High Court of the Commonwealth? Why deprive him of the right of going to the Privy Council when being forced to get there he first of all has to appeal to the High Court?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -

He can appeal direct to the Privy Council.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

I am sure that is not proposed, and as I read it it is not part of the clause. If the honorable member is being misled into a vote with that view then it only shows how fast the proceedings of the Convention are landing us in confusion. The honorable member (Mr. Symon) will excuse me for saying that we must take any proposal coming from him now with suspicion.

Mr. SYMON. -
Why?

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
Because the honorable member is the most determined opponent of what Sir Joseph Abbott and myself have been contending for right throughout.

Mr. SYMON. -
Not at all.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -
The honorable member is the most determined opponent of allowing any litigant to get to the Privy Council at all. He believes in letting the litigation commence and end in Federated Australia. His proposal, shorn of all verbiage, or all attempts to confuse the issue, amounts to this—that no man can appeal to the Privy Council until he, first of all, has appealed to the High Court, and then, because you make an appeal to the High Court as a matter of procedure, you will not, if he is unsuccessful there, allow him to go to the Privy Council. Although you maintain that the principle is good, you are prepared to deny a man the exercise of that right principle, because there is a stumbling block placed in the way by this amendment. What does it amount to if the amendment is carried? The Judges sitting in the High Court know that if they give their decision against the appellant it cannot be reviewed, because he then cannot appeal to the Privy Council, and that, if they give their decision for the appellant, it may be reviewed. There is a temptation to put in the way of the Judges or the court, which would always be glad to escape review. If the decision goes one way it is final, if it goes another way it is not final. Where is the soundness of that principle? There is nothing consistent in the proposal. I would strongly urge, considering the state into which the matter has got, that the simplest way out of the difficulty will be to negative the clause, and let us then stand on the simple proposal, which will add to the symmetry of this Bill, carried at the instance of Sir Joseph Abbott, saving the exercise of Her Majesty's prerogative, by which the right of appeal can be granted in any proper case on petition to the Crown. We will get exactly to that position if we negative the clause, no matter how it may be amended. I shall therefore vote to negative the clause. I quite agree with Sir George Turner. He takes up the position I have taken up from the onset, that this should not be a cumulative right of appeal, but he would never vote with me when I made that proposal. He never voted with me once when I moved the amendment suggested from New South Wales, which would have had that effect. It is too late now to get it. We had better take the best we can get, and the best we can get is to have this general right of appeal, rather than be landed in a position where we shall have ridicule heaped on our efforts, and have everything left in a state of confusion.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

We have all agreed to the alternative appeal.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

We have not got the alternative proposal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I went further than the honorable member; I said that there should be no appeal except with the consent of the High Court or the Privy Council.

Mr. CARRUTHERS. -

We are past the stage when we can have the alternative proposal, and, either good or bad, now we must vote either to have an appeal to the Privy Council or to have none at all, and resist all these attempts to fritter away the decision which has been arrived at.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I understood, when the honorable member (Mr. Symon) moved this amendment, that the purport he intended it to bear was that, after a case had been appealed to the Supreme Court of a state, it was optional that that appeal should be carried from there to the Privy Council, and in that event there should be no further appeal to the High Court. That is certainly what I understand, and what seemed to me to recommend the amendment so much to us. But what I find here, and I have read it with some considerable difficulty and a good deal of study, is that no appellant to the High Court shall afterwards appeal to the Privy Council in the same matter. That does not in the least hear out the words as I understand them of Mr. Symon. I hope we shall vote against the amendment.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I think the clear intention of the Convention was to provide that the appellant from the Supreme Court of any colony should have a free choice whether he would appeal to the High Court or to the Privy Council, but that when once a free choice had been exercised, then the litigant who made the choice should be bound to abide by the decision of the court he elected to go to. But I am afraid we have departed altogether from that—that we have provided that the person appealing from the Supreme Court of a state must, whether he likes it or not, go to the High Court, and that then, without having any freedom of choice when he has gone to the High Court, which is the only court open to him, be is to be penalized by not being able to go any further, while the other party to the suit can go, if he pleases, to the Privy Council. I am quite sure that is not what the Convention desires, and I hope that Mr. Symon will withdraw his amendment, (which has got his into a somewhat unexpected difficulty), so that the Drafting Committee may be able to place us on a firmer footing.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
An appeal is absolutely forbidden to the Privy Council in certain classes of cases, and in those cases only. That is enough. The amendment means no more than the clause already provides.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
After the discussion, I think the best thing I can do is to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Are there any other amendments?

Mr. PEACOCK. -
For Heaven's sake, no.

Clause 80. - No person holding any judicial office shall be appointed to or hold the office of Governor-General, Lieutenant-Governor, Chief Executive Officer, or Administrator of the Government, or any other executive office of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -
I shall be very brief in moving my amendment, because this subject is very familiar to honorable members, and I recognise that at this stage of our proceedings it is not necessary to make long speeches.

Mr. PEACOCK. -
All honorable members say that, but they do not always follow it out.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I have followed it out, and I will follow it out in this case. The idea of this clause is that no person holding any judicial office is to be Acting Governor.

Mr. HOLDER. -
Strike the clause out altogether.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I should prefer to strike it out altogether, but as I know there are some honorable members who have a strong feeling against striking out the clause, what I propose to do is to amend it, first, by making it provide that no person holding any judicial or political office is to be appointed as Governor-General-

Mr. KINGSTON. -
What is "political office"?

Mr. BARTON. -
Where do you propose to get your man, then?
Mr. HIGGINS. -
What I want to do is to provide that no person holding any political office is to act as governor, and, if I am beaten on that, I shall ask the committee to strike the clause out altogether, because I think that the restriction it provides is not a proper restriction. This clause is put under the head of the Federal Judicature, but it has got nothing whatever to do with judicature.

Mr. REID. -
That is why it is put there.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
It ought to come under the head of Executive. Here is an attempt to interfere with Her Majesty's discretion in appointing her own agent. For my part, the more I have thought of it the more I can concur with the opinion of Sir Samuel Griffith, that we have no right to dictate to Her Majesty who shall be her agents.

Mr. REID. -
Hear, hear. That is the right view to take.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
I, therefore, say that, if we have this clause at all that we are to restrict Her Majesty's hand in appointing her own agent, we ought to limit it in the direction of her appointing any person holding a political office. Because, supposing a person holding a political office is appointed, and supposing that person is asked to grant a dissolution or to act as a sort of arbiter between the two Houses of Parliament, he cannot but bring into his functions as arbiter his predilections as a political officer. Supposing he happened to be a Minister of the Crown, he is not a fit person to be an impartial arbiter between political parties. If he happens to be the President of the Senate, he is not a fit person to be an arbiter between the Senate and the House of Representatives. If he happen to be the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is he a fit person to be an arbiter either. Therefore, what I say, is simply this: I there is any restriction to be imposed upon Her Majesty's discretion, it should be a restriction upon the appointment of a political officer.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
So the President of the Senate would be a political officer?

Mr. HIGGINS. -
If the honorable member doubts whether the word "political" would include the President of the Senate, it should be made clearer; but I cannot conceive of any officer who comes more distinctly within the definition than the President. However, if there is the least doubt about it, I should be willing to alter the wording of my amendment. I hope that honorable members understand that my idea is, at all events, that I am against any restriction upon Her Majesty's choice of her agent; but if you do put in any restriction on Her Majesty's right it should be a restriction upon her appointment of a political officer as acting Governor-General or as Governor-General, inasmuch as that officer has to act as umpire between the two Houses. Under these circumstances, I beg to move-

That, after the word "judicial," the words "or parliamentary" be inserted.

The word "parliamentary" suits the purpose better than the word "political."

Mr. BARTON. -

Would you mind putting in the words "or private person"?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If I were disposed to turn the clause into as absolute nonsense as the last clause was put into, I should certainly move to insert something of that sort; but the honorable member will. I think, recognise that there is some reason in the demand that has been made that if any restriction is to be made upon Her Majesty's choice in the appointment of her agent, it should be such a restriction as I have proposed. I should infinitely prefer to drop the whole clause out, and, if my amendment is negatived, when the question comes to be put that the clause stand part of the Bill, I shall vote against the whole clause.

Mr. Higgins' amendment was negatived without a division.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the consideration of sub-section (2) of clause 52 be postponed till after the consideration of Chapter IV. (Finance and Trade).

The motion was agreed to.

Clause 86B. - After uniform duties of customs have been imposed, the Parliament shall have exclusive power, subject to the provisions of this Constitution, to impose duties of customs and of excise, and to grant bounties upon the production or export of goods.

Upon the imposition of uniform duties of customs all laws of the several states imposing duties of customs or of excise, or offering bounties upon the production or export of goods, shall cease to have effect, and any grant of or agreement for any such bounty lawfully made by or under the authority of the Government of any state shall be taken to be good if made before the 30th day of January, 1898, but not otherwise.

Neither this nor the preceding section shall apply to bounties or aids to mining for gold, silver, or other metals.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I beg to move-

That after the second paragraph there be inserted the words-"This section shall not apply to any bounty or aid granted by any state with the consent of the Governor-General in Council or of the Parliament of the Commonwealth."

I pointed out when this clause was being discussed before, that its operation is very limited indeed. It only allows some three months in which bargains can be made in regard to bounties, and we all know that it is impossible to conduct the necessary negotiations with regard to any important matter of the kind within that time. I feel, sir, that if there is one state right that ought to be conserved to the state it is the right of the development of their own territory, and to develop their own territory by producing things for the purpose of being exported. That has been done in this colony and in other colonies very successfully by the granting of bonuses in connexion with various matters. If we are to allow this clause to pass as at present that right hereafter will cease, and no matter how undeveloped a portion of our territory may be we will lose the right to do what we otherwise would undoubtedly do. In our small colony we have large areas and many natural products which could be well developed if this power were reserved to us without in any way interfering with the union or with freedom of trade between the colonies. Take other colonies, such as South Australia, and more especially Western Australia, with its very large undeveloped territory. If you take away from the state the right of granting these bounties, you will prevent, to a very great extent, the opening up and development of these large colonies. It is a very serious step, which we ought not to take without very strong justification. The only objection I have heard to the granting of bounties is simply that by so doing you would prevent the operation of what we all desire—intercolonial free-trade. I have no desire to prevent that, but I have a very strong desire, without interfering with intercolonial free-trade, to have the right, where we think proper in our colony, to develop our resources. I cannot

You must leave out the Governor-General.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Then I would prefer to leave out the amendment altogether.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
That is how you lost it before.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
We lost it owing to an unfortunate combination of circumstances, as it was called.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -
Do you not fear that will occur again?

Mr. BARTON. -
Did not this, as proposed before, contain some provision that it should apply to bounties which Parliament declared to be consistent with free-trade between the states?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
No. I have taken this exactly as we had it before. I ask that a state may be at liberty to grant these bounties after having obtained the consent of the governing body or of the Parliament. If we are limited to the Parliament, we know very well that it will be simply a farce. It will be a farce to tell our people that they will have to wait month after month, and probably year after year, until some private member has an opportunity of passing through the Federal Parliament a measure to enable a state to give these bonuses. That would be misleading our producers and making them believe that they had got something, whereas, as a matter of fact, they would have got; nothing at all. On the other hand, if we leave it in the hands of the Federal Executive, they can always decide within a few weeks or months. If we have to wait for the consent of the Federal Parliament, it means that the people who are prepared to spend their money on the strength of getting a bonus to help them, will get tired and will enter into some other speculation or means of investing their money. If we have it in the form I have suggested, the Federal Executive will be always able to deal with it expeditiously. Surely we can be confident that the Federal Executive will not take the responsibility of giving their consent to a state granting a bonus unless they are very well satisfied that it will be beneficial to that state and not injurious to the Commonwealth.

Mr. HOLDER. -

And that the Federal Parliament will approve.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

They will know very well that it is one of their executive acts, and that all executive acts are under the control of the Federal Parliament. If we have to wait for the consent of the Federal Parliament the provision will be worthless. My amendment simply says that a bounty can be given by the Government of a state after they have obtained the consent of the Federal Executive, and they will have to prove to the satisfaction of the Executive—which will know the risk it will have to run—and they will take very good care that good reason shall be shown before they give their consent. I think if we do that, we shall be placing sufficient safeguards in this Constitution to prevent any infringement of the fundamental principle upon which we base it. Under these circumstances, I hope the Convention will grant this right. It is a matter of serious importance to a very large number of the producers of this colony. It cannot possibly do any injury to any of the other states, because their interests will be fully guarded by the consent that is required. This will be beneficial to our colony, and it will facilitate the federation movement amongst us. As it cannot, in my judgment, do any possible harm, and, on the other hand, as I believe it will confer a great benefit now and in the future, I hope the Convention will allow the amendment to pass as I have proposed it.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -
I think this is a proposal which ought not to be entertained at this stage of our proceedings.

Mr. ISAACS. -
Then at what stage should it be proposed?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I think this matter has been fully discussed and settled. Now, take the question with regard to the Executive Government. Would any Executive Government attempt to do a thing of this kind without, at any rate, a resolution of the House?

Mr. HOLDER. -
Not unless it was clearly the proper thing to do.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The only argument is this: That the Executive Government may do a thing which it is perfectly certain that the Parliament will approve. Under what conditions does the Executive Government do a thing which Parliament will approve? It is in a case of unforeseen exigency, and the Executive Government takes upon itself the onus of doing something which Parliament will approve afterwards. This is not a matter of exigency; it is a matter of policy. Will anybody tell me that a matter of policy of such far-reaching importance will be entertained by any Government without going to Parliament for its sanction? This matter has been debated over and over again, and we have asserted that any such matter of this kind is an absolute contravention of the principles of intercolonial free-trade.

Mr. HIGGINS. -
Will you take a proviso that it shall not derogate from freedom of trade between the colonies?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
There are many matters in this Constitution which involve some sacrifice. And in matters in which New South Wales is concerned she has had to sacrifice a great many things, and she will probably sacrifice more than any other colony of the group. But this is one of these matters which essentially enters into the principles of intercolonial free-trade. I say most distinctly that if you place this principle of bounties, or any other matter of that character, in the hands of the local Governments, you give them an opportunity of absolutely emasculating the principles of intercolonial free-trade.

Mr. HOLDER. -
In that case the Federal Government would not agree to it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
I am quite willing to acknowledge the fact that a certain policy has been set up by the different colonies of Australia, but that is part and parcel of their protective system. In going into this Federation they must give up the protective system as far as intercolonial free-trade is concerned. There is no bounty which you can place upon any article or product that will not have the effect of being equal to an import duty, and in which, as a matter of fairness to the other colonies, you must not give an advantage to the people of that colony over the people of the other colonies. There is one grand principle involved in the whole of our federation, and that is the principle of equality of trade. A system of bounties left to the different states, no matter upon what principle you base it, must interfere with that great principle of equality of trade. Unless you are to render it a nullity, and you are to enter into a system of competition between the different colonies in this matter of bounties which would absolutely neutralize intercolonial free-trade, you must give up the system of bounties. I quite feel the difficulty of the different colonies which have made this one of the great planks in their policy. At the same time, it is one of those matters which must be abandoned if we are to have intercolonial free-trade and I trust the committee will not so stultify itself as to reverse the decision which they have adopted.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

Every word Mr. McMillan has said would apply with immense force if the suggestion now made were to allow the states to give bounties without reference to the federal authority. But when there is the express provision that bounties shall only be given with the consent, first obtained, of either the Federal Executive, which represents the Federal Parliament, or the Federal Parliament itself, then the suggestions just offered in opposition to the motion seem to me to lose all their weight.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

My argument has been against leaving this to the Federal Executive. If you like to leave it to the Federal Parliament I shall not object.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I shall argue that the Federal Executive and the Federal Parliament are practically one and the same thing.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

No, no.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am prepared to argue that, whether honorable members agree or not. Mr. McMillan says that if the matter were left to the Parliament alone, he would raise no further opposition. That is a large concession, and in itself takes back most of the speech we have heard. I have only to argue now that the consent of the Federal Executive is practically the consent of the Federal Parliament. The advantage of taking the Executive consent, instead of that of Parliament, is that in the latter case we would have to wait until Parliament was in session, and, being in session, until it had time to consider this particular matter. If it were left to the Executive alone the consent could be given rapidly, and the state, desiring to do so, might proceed under that consent. I ask honorable members who have any experience of political life whether it is conceivable a Federal Executive would consent to the granting of a certain bonus by a certain state unless the Federal Executive knew its action would presently be indorsed by Parliament?
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
But that has been done.
Mr. HOLDER. -
I have known a similar thing to be done, and have seen what followed. I have seen an Executive give a promise not likely to be indorsed by Parliament, and as soon as Parliament met that Executive was sent about its business.
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
But it has been done.
Mr. HOLDER. -
The honorable member is too old a parliamentarian not to know that, with this probability staring them in the face, an Executive would not do a thing which presently Parliament would disavow, and which would necessitate the Executive walking out of office.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
An Executive has no right to frame a policy.
Mr. HOLDER. -
My answer to Mr. McMillan's interjection is that I can quite conceive a request coming from a state for permission to grant a certain bounty, and if that request tends at all in the direction of derogating from the freedom of trade, the Executive would think so long before permitting it that the matter would be remitted to Parliament, and consent would not be given until Parliament had had its pulse felt. But if the request was of such a simple nature, and so clearly apart from any derogation of the principles of freedom of trade that the Federal Parliament would be sure to consent if asked, then, and only then, would the Executive grant a request without waiting for Parliament. This is a very important matter. We have

[P.2347] starts here
been meeting each other on various questions, and there has been give and take all round for two or three weeks past; and I think we may give and take on this question. I am anxious to see the principles of free-trade maintained in their entirety in the Constitution. But this matter, which is subject to consent, is one in which I think we may fairly meet each other.
The colony of Victoria represents that this is an important proposal which, while it could do no harm to anybody, would largely assist that colony to get the majority to pass the measure which we are now framing. I do hope we shall be a little yielding in our concessions to Victoria in this matter, when it is so fully safeguarded as, by the amendment, it is. I regret that Sir
Mr. BARTON. -
It is no notice of mine; that is a misprint.
Mr. HOLDER. -
I cannot help the misprint.
Mr. BARTON. -
I think my honorable friend must know from my expressions of opinion that I should be qualified for another place before I gave such a notice.
Mr. HOLDER. -
I could not understand the notice, but as it has been on the notice-paper for about a week past, and has not been altered or disavowed, I thought I was justified in saying what I did. I will alter what I was saying, and say that I wish the amendment, instead of being moved in its present form, had been moved in the form of the amendment standing next to it. It would then provide there should be no derogation from the freedom of trade and commerce.
Mr. BARTON. -
The notice is now in the name of Mr. Higgins, in whose name it was always intended to be.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
It was my notice. moved it a fortnight ago, but it has been wrongly printed. I am responsible for it.
Mr. HOLDER. -
I do not want to make anybody responsible who does not want to accept the responsibility.
Mr. HIGGINS. -
I do.
Mr. HOLDER. -
I am willing to give Mr. Higgins the responsibility if he likes, and not put it on the leader's shoulders. I wish the motion had been in the form I have suggested, because it would then have been clear that it was in no sense derogating from the freedom of trade and commerce, and we would be doing what we might fairly do without incurring the risks and disadvantages which Mr. McMillan has called attention to.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

As there has been a reference just made to an amendment standing in my name, and attributed unfairly to the honorable leader, I must claim that amendment, rightly or wrongly, as my own. I have been informed by some members who are not prepared to vote for Sir George Turner's amendment in the exact terms in which it stands that they are prepared to vote for the amendment if there is the proviso to which Mr. Holder has just alluded put on to it. Unfortunately, Sir George Turner is not here; but, so far as I know, it is not the desire of any of the Victorian delegates in the slightest degree to interfere with the freedom of trade and intercourse between the colonies. I am willing to have any words put in which will make that clear beyond doubt. Without saying any more, I shall move an addition to Sir George Turner's amendment. I am sorry Sir George Turner is not here, or I should have asked for his concurrence in the proviso before I move that.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You cannot move it as an addition, can you?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

I think I am in order in moving an amendment on the amendment before it is put from the Chair The words are the same as I previously moved, and which appear on page 987 of Hansard, and they read-

Provided that the bounty or aid has not the effect of derogating from the freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. -

Do you wish that to be determined by the High Court or by Parliament?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

That all depends. If there is an Inter-State Commission, that commission, having to carry out the provisions for freedom of trade and intercourse, would have to decide. I want it to be clearly illegal that there shall be any derogation from the freedom of trade or intercourse between the colonies.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Do you add that to Sir George Turner's amendment?

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Yes, I now move-

That the words-"Provided that the bounty or aid has not the effect of derogating from the freedom of trade or commerce between the different parts of the Commonwealth" be added to the amendment.

Mr. BROWN. -

What about the Governor-General in Council?
Mr. HIGGINS. -

So far as I am personally concerned, I think it is proper to give it to the Governor-General in Council, because the machinery necessary to get the whole Parliament to agree is too immense to move. Under our system of responsible government the Governor-General in Council means the Ministry, and the Ministry are responsible to the Parliament. If they dare to give a bounty or aid, or allow a bounty or aid to be given by a state which in any way savours of an interference with freedom of trade and commerce, they will be hauled over the coals in the Parliament, and quite right, too. I take it, therefore, that we have the practical benefit of parliamentary control when we leave it to the Governor-General in Council and add a proviso that there shall not be any interference with freedom of trade and commerce between the colonies, though that to some honorable members may hardly seem necessary. Of course it will be asked-"To what particular bounties do you refer?" Well, there are industries in Victoria which may be aided by bounties. For instance, it might be considered expedient to try to develop industries connected with oil and scent plants in Victoria or Tasmania, and no other colony might wish to try to develop those industries. All I want to do is to leave each state free to give a bounty from its own revenue to any industry, provided that in the giving of that bounty there is no interference with the cardinal principle of the Constitution, absolute freedom of trade between the colonies. The amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner reads as follows:-

This section shall not apply to any bounty or aid granted by any state with the consent of the Governor-General in Council or of the Parliament of the Commonwealth.

To that I propose to add this proviso-

Provided that the bounty or aid has not the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the several states.

I think that the Inter-State Commission, whose function it will be to see to the carrying into effect of the provisions relating to trade and commerce, would be the proper tribunal to determine questions arising under this provision. They would be better able than any court to decide whether there was any interference by a state bounty with freedom of trade and commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I have a previous amendment. I beg to move-

That, after the word "consent," the words "of the Governor-General in Council or" be omitted.

That will leave the matter entirely to the Parliament of the Commonwealth. I hold that this is a matter which should come under the consideration of the Parliament, and that Do Executive should be allowed to carry into effect a policy in regard to bounties without the consent of the Parliament.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
Perhaps it might suit the view of both the honorable member (Mr. McMillan) and the honorable and learned member (Mr. Higgins) if the amendment of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner were made to read in this way:

This section shall not apply to any bounty or aid granted by any state with the consent of the Governor-General in Council.

Then omit the word "or." What would be requisite then would be that there should be an antecedent declaration by the Parliament, and then the bounty might be granted upon an Executive minute.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I think that the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) is entitled to take the sense of the Convention upon this matter again, even at this late stage, in view of the circumstances to which he referred. I cannot sufficiently admire the brief and condensed way in which he put a matter upon which he has such strong opinions, and I hope to be equally brief. I believe that even if this provision were put into the Constitution no Cabinet would exercise it without taking the opinion of the Parliament. Therefore the right honorable member would get nothing by the words he lays so much stress upon.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Then there is no harm in putting them in.

Mr. REID. -
My right honorable friend must recollect that we in New South Wales, who may have to give up our policy, only intend to run that risk if every other colony agrees to do the same. There is no long argument requisite to show that these bounties can be made a substitute for duties. The right honorable member unconsciously let the object out when he spoke of the anxiety felt in Victoria to develop the production of things for which the country is suited. Is not that exactly what all these protective duties are for? On this very important question of bounties, a very influential paper here, which has very strong views upon the wrong side, spoke so warmly that it alleged that the people of Victoria were determined to maintain the policy of developing their resources in Spite of 50 free-trade Premiers rolled into one. That would be rather a serious matter if the present free-trade Premier is referred to. However, it shows how Strong the feeling in regard to the matter is here. I think that we should not deceive our friends from Victoria in any sense. They must understand that all this encouragement to trade and enterprise, if the Parliament of the Commonwealth adopts a protective policy, must be given by that Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You can give a bounty upon iron, but we cannot give a bounty upon coal.

Mr. REID. -

Well, that is our luck. I am prepared to accept my right honorable friend's proposition if it is made subject to the approval of Parliament. It would not be necessary to pass an Act of Parliament. If I were in a position to put the matter into definite shape, the first thing that would be done would be to submit a resolution to both Houses, or certainly to one. I think that any Federal Executive, if the word "Executive" were put in, would do the same. There is nothing in the Bill inconsistent with a course of that sort. There is nothing in the structure of the Bill inconsistent with the Federal Parliament granting an application made by any state, but what we do stipulate is that the policy shall be under the control of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We are willing to take it, subject to the disapproval of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. REID. -

What is the use of that? That must mean that before the thing is done Parliament is to have an opportunity of expressing its opinion. It would be a very Hibernian proceeding to do the thing and then submit it for the approval of Parliament. Such practices are not unknown in parliamentary history, but they often give rise to a lively dissatisfaction. We had better be straightforward. We will all agree to my right honorable friend having his way, not by an Act, but by a simple resolution, because then we preserve the main principles of the Bill consistently, whilst we give a certain degree of elasticity. There might be in one part of a colony an industry which cannot be pursued throughout the Commonwealth generally, and in that case the bounty would come perhaps more legitimately within the range of the local Government than of the Federal Government. But at the same time, in order to insure that it is not an industry which ought to be the subject of a federal bounty, we want the safeguard that the matter shall be submitted in some simple form to the Federal Parliament. I shall offer no objection whatever to the proposal if it is put in that form.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

If we go to a division on this question I shall vote with the Hon. Mr. McMillan. I wish to point out that if these words are omitted the clause will be utterly useless, because we have already in clause 86B provided that, after uniform duties of customs have been imposed, the Parliament shall have exclusive power to grant bounties for the production or export of goods.

Mr. WALKER. -
That is the Federal Parliament this is the state Parliament.

Mr. BROWN. -
That, of course, makes a difference. But what I desire to point out is this: Supposing that in Victoria there is an industry, the development of which can be promoted by a bounty? Does the Right Hon. Sir George Turner say, for a moment, that with the enormous power Victoria would have in the House of Representatives, and with the assistance which it would obtain in any reasonable proposition, there would be any difficulty whatever in getting the bounty agreed to?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
The Federal Parliament will only sit for about three months in the year, and it will have other and more important work to do.

Mr. BROWN. -
In this, as in other matters, there is too great a disposition to distrust the Federal Parliament, as though it was to be a foreign body that would tyrannize over the colonies, instead of a body charged with the duty of acting reasonably and honorably to the whole of the colonies. It seems to me that the fear with regard to the injury that may be done to incipient industries from the want of assistance is a mere bogey hope, therefore, that Sir George Turner will not persist in the attitude that he has taken up. Certainly I shall not be a party to any bounty being granted merely, on the assent of the Governor-General in Council. That would be a dangerous provision, and it might be a cause of mischief in the direction of undermining one of the fundamental principles of the Constitution.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -
It is my intention to support the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's proposal if he can see his way to adopt the addition suggested by Mr. Higgins. It seems to me that as these bonuses are to be paid out of state funds, if they are only granted with the assent of the Governor-General in Council, or of the Parliament, subject to the condition that they do not derogate from the freedom of trade and commerce, they can do no harm. I have considerable sympathy with the right honorable member. I understand that there is a large number of producers in Victoria whose feeling of animosity to the acceptance of this Constitution will probably be negatived if we agree to the right honorable gentleman's proposal.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
There is a general feeling amongst honorable members that we should concede the principle of the Right Hon. Sir George Turner's proposal. The only question is as to the manner of doing it. If we are going to do a gracious thing let us do it in an effective way. The Federal Parliament will have an abundance of work, and will not be in session all the year round. In the local Parliaments that sit for a longer period, questions are often asked as to why certain matters are not being dealt with, and the reply from the Treasury benches is that the state of the business paper does not permit of it.

Mr. REID. -
Victoria will have 24 members to look after her interests.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
This applies not only to Victoria, but to all the colonies. The concession is, however, asked for chiefly by Victoria, and she is entitled to it, because she has shown the magnificent use that can be made of such a power as this.

Mr. REID. -
Yes, she has taxed us splendidly for a long time.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
In connexion with these matters Victoria has not taxed New South Wales.

Mr. REID. -
That is the way we look at it.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
This is the free-trade mode of encouraging production, and this proposal should have the support of the free-traders. The Convention has conceded the point, and let it be carried out in a way in which it will be effectual. It is only in the clearest possible case that the Executive Council will undertake the responsibility of assenting to any bonus, but still this will enable them to do what the Federal Parliament may not be in a position to do. The Government of the day might intend to bring the matter before the Federal Parliament, but they might not have the opportunity of getting either a resolution or a Bill passed. It is not such a very light thing to get a resolution through two Houses.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If you can get a resolution you can get an Act of Parliament.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Very often you can, because you can get the standing orders suspended, and the Bill put through all its stages in one day. I do hope that the matter will not be further delayed, but that justice will be done in such a way as to give free scope to the development of the industries of Australia generally, especially in those directions of production which our country constituencies are looking forward to with so much hope.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I would suggest that if all the words after the word "consent" are struck out, we might insert the following words:-

"of both Houses of the Parliament, expressed by resolution, declare the bounty or aid not to derogate from free-trade amongst the several states?"

That prevents the necessity of getting an Act of Parliament. A resolution is, I think, much more easily obtained than an Act of Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

I am quite willing to accept your suggestion.

Mr. REID. -

I think it would be much better, if it is left to a resolution, not to raise any points as to what would or would not derogate from freedom of trade, because the sense of the House will be expressed on the resolution.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

With the consent of the committee, I will move that amendment.

Mr. REID. -

Stop at the word "Parliament." The two Houses will decide whether the bounty does or does not derogate from free-trade.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I do not understand how.

Mr. REID. -

If that amendment is put in I do not know whether it may not be subject to review by some person professing to be aggrieved, and he might take the point before the High Court that it did derogate from freedom of commerce. We do not want any points raised on a resolution of the two Houses.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

You want to leave it absolutely to the Parliament?

Mr. REID. -

Yes.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I care very little about that. I thought it would be well if the Parliament had thrown on it the obligation of recognising that even it was not to do it unless it was prepared to take the responsibility of saying that the bounty did not derogate from free-trade. I think it would be better in the form I propose.

Mr. REID. -

We will take the risk.
Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I will move it in that form now, and my right honorable friend can move to strike out the words to which he objects.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member cannot move an amendment until the other amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I am quite willing to take what Sir John Downer proposes in substitution of my amendment as a better process, but I think he should leave out the latter part, because it is better to leave the whole thing to the Parliament, not for us to dictate. We are getting on very dangerous ground in making these conditions.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

All right, I will not move that.

Mr. McMillan's amendment was withdrawn.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I beg to move-

That all the words after the word "consent" be omitted, with the view to the insertion in their place of the words "of both Houses of Parliament, expressed by resolution."

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

This is only, to put it in very polite language, an Act of Parliament.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

No.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Does any honorable member mean to tell me that there is any substantial difference between separate resolutions of both Houses and an Act of Parliament?

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

A lot of difference.

Mr. HOWE. -

They would get it through both Houses in one day.

Mr. ISAACS. -

My honorable friends who question that statement know perfectly well that if the Houses are willing to pass a resolution to that effect, they are willing to read a Bill three times at once.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

There is no practical difference.
There is no practical difference, so that I hope no honorable member will be misled by what appears to be a concession, but which is really none. It really means that whether the Parliament is or is not sitting the state cannot proceed by the mere consent of the Governor in Council, that is, the Executive authority of the Commonwealth, but that it must wait not only until Parliament does assemble, but until it has time to deal with the question. When it was under discussion before we had it very plainly put to us by some honorable members, that the Parliament for some years would probably not have time to deal with such a question. When we declared that we were willing to take this provision, subject to the Parliament annulling any bounty granted by the state, we were told-I think also by Mr. Reid-that that would be of no use, because the Parliament would be so engaged with Tariff questions and other questions necessarily to be dealt with at the initiation of the Federation that it could not pay any attention to such a question, and now, when we ask for this proposal to be carried as we put it, we are told-"Wait until you get the Federal Parliament to attend to it." That is simply illusory, and it means nothing more than that we cannot do it without the prior consent of the Federal Parliament. That means that we must give up the bounties for years, just at a particular time when, if they are required at all, we shall need them most.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Would the local Executive grant a bounty without appealing to the Parliament on it?

Mr. ISAACS. -
If the clause were worded as we desire to frame it, it would get the consent of the Governor-General in Council.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Mr. ISAACS. -
We could not, and that just emphasizes the difficulty I am speaking of. In granting this bounty as it is proposed by my honorable friends, we are to have all the trouble of first asking the state Parliament to do it, and then asking the Federal Parliament to consent to it, or, to reverse the process, getting the Federal Parliament to consent first, and asking the state Parliament to pass it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The principle is, is this a matter for Parliament, not for the Executive?

Mr. ISAACS. -
Yes; but I only want the trouble of going to one Parliament to start with, and if the Federal Parliament thinks it is wrong, or any derogation from freedom of trade and commerce, it is to have, of course, paramount power and jurisdiction to over ride it. It is perfectly idle to tell us that there is anything satisfactory to be done without leaving in the words "consent of the Governor-General in Council." I am not dealing with the provision to be submitted, by Mr. Higgins, because we have not reached that yet. I confine my observations to the proposal of Sir John Downer. It is no different from simply striking out the words "of the Governor-General in Council or," and we understand that if this amendment is carried it is absolutely worthless to us, because it means that we have to get two distinct Parliaments to consent to the bounty, and to wait for a very considerable time, as we have been told before, for years in all probability, before the Federal Parliament can deal with the question.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -
I think the delegation from Victoria should be very much obliged to the Premier of New South Wales for the offer of this concession. Coming from a smaller state, I look upon it with much fear, because we know what Executives are, and what Parliaments are. Victoria will be represented in the Federal Parliament by 24 members.

Mr. ISAACS. -
New South Wales by 26.

Mr. HOWE. -
And South Australia will have only seven representatives. Now 24 members can bring such pressure to bear on any Executive authority, or even a Parliament, as to obtain a concession which they would not listen to if asked for by seven men from South Australia. What we are giving now is a wonderful power to the large states as against the small states, but still, in the interests of peace and federation, if the Premier chooses to accept the offer of Mr. Reid I will submit.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -
I understand that the Premier of New South Wales has offered to accept this clause provided that the reference to the Governor-General in Council be struck out.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That is the whole clause really.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I hope that my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) will remember that it was upon this rock we split, and split very terribly, when this matter was before the Convention on a previous occasion. If we had then taken a straight-out vote on the elimination of these words, I am confident that the Convention would have carried the proposal, but, unfortunately, when this objectionable phrase came to be put to the vote, some four or five members in a moment of incaution, led away by their juvenile spirit and inexperience, assisted by their votes to keep in this particular portion of the clause, by which subsequently the clause came to be rejected. So that we had no straight vote upon the real issue, and I can only hope, now that the Premier of New South Wales has agreed to make this compromise, that Sir George Turner will accept it, and that we shall put an end to this matter.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I had not an opportunity of speaking on this clause when it was before the Convention at an earlier stage; but I now desire to express a hope that the Convention will favorably consider the proposals submitted by my right honorable friend and leader (Sir George Turner). I think that his demands on behalf of the colony of Victoria have been remarkably moderate.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Hear, hear.

Dr. QUICK. -

And if honorable members would reflect on the attitude which he has assumed throughout the history of this Convention, I am sure they will agree with me that they ought to give special weight and attention to the request he has now made on behalf of this colony. Probably no colony in the Australasian group will suffer more through the surrender of the control of its fiscal policy to the Federal Parliament; and that is saying a great deal. And this small residuum of power to grant aids and bounties to small local industries which probably would not in any way come in conflict with the principle of freedom of trade among the states is all the concession he asks. There is hardly any necessity for inserting in this clause the amendment suggested by Mr. Higgins, that it should be subject to the condition that there shall be no derogation from freedom of trade and commerce, because the Governor-General in Council would not grant the power to allow bounties if it would have the effect of derogating from freedom of trade and commerce. That would be the guiding principle.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The matter in dispute is the question whether we should put into this Constitution that the Executive Government ought to have the right to decide on a policy.

Dr. QUICK. -

Just so. Well, I do not believe, in the first place, that the Executive Government would grant this concession unless it was absolutely certain that it would meet with the approval of the Federal Parliament. Unless it was sure of parliamentary approval of the scheme the Executive would not interfere. Consequently, I see no harm in putting in that power. At the same time, I will express the hope that Sir George Turner will not jeopardize this clause by any false movement—that he will be prepared to accept any reasonable proposal which the majority of the Convention see fit to accede to, because I believe this: That in the end the sanction of the Governor-General in Council would depend upon the question as to whether its action would be approved by a majority in the Federal Parliament. I think Sir George Turner is entitled to go to a division on the question as to whether the consent of the Governor-General in Council should not be sufficient; but if he is beaten on that fairly in a division—a fair division; not a tactical division such as took place on a former occasion, when there was a collusion of opponents both of the Governor-General’s and the Parliament’s sanction—I hope he will consider whether it would not be advisable to accept the suggestion of Mr. Reid, namely, to insert "with the consent of the two Houses."

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I would urge on my right honorable friend (Sir George Turner) to accept the suggestion of Mr. Reid. I do so for two reasons. One is that it appears to be offered in a spirit of compromise, which we ought to be glad to see at this late stage of the Convention, and another is, that I think it is the better proposal. I believe it will lead to the more rapid treatment of the question. My view is that it will be easier to get a resolution of the two Houses of Parliament than to get the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, because it will be no part of the work of the Commonwealth. The Government will be under no obligation to give this sanction, and consequently few Governments will take the responsibility of doing so, seeing that it may perhaps involve them in an adverse vote in Parliament. Therefore, after thinking the matter carefully out, I should prefer the resolution of the two Houses to the power of getting it from the Governor-General in Council. I think we may and will get it if there is no reasonable objection to it, and get it quickly, from both Houses of Parliament. But I think we will scarcely ever get it from the Governor-General in Council, because there is no spur to the Governor-General in Council to take this obligation upon themselves. It is no part of their Executive function, and the probability is that timid Governments will say—"Yes; possibly you make out a very strong case,

[P.2355] starts here

but there is probably another side to the question; and if we grant you this permission there will be a discussion in Parliament where the other side will be heard, and we may find we are wrong." Therefore, I think, it is highly improbable that any Governor General in Council will undertake the responsibility of sanctioning bonuses, while it is exceeding probable that both Houses-of Parliament would grant bonuses to which there is no reasonable objection with the utmost possible expedition.

Mr. BRUNKER (New South Wales). -

I have not risen to make a speech on this subject, but simply to my that I have continuously laboured under the impression that federation was to mean free-trade between the whole of the colonies. That being in accordance with my principles, I intend to adhere strictly to them, and it is not my intention to vote for bounties in any shape or form whatever.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should not like this matter to be voted on without reiterating my objection to any bounty being offered by a state. I take it that it is very hard for any bounty on production to be classed as a bounty which is not a derogation from freedom of trade. The effect of a bounty is practically the same as the effect of a moderate duty for protective purposes. I think that is demonstrable, and that it has been demonstrated. Those two things being equivalent, I object to any bounty being offered by a state on the production or export of goods under any circumstances whatsoever. Protectionist as I am, as regards the external importations of the Commonwealth, I believe that when you establish free-trade within the Commonwealth you should make that free-trade actual and real. I do not hold with the man who says-"Intercolonial free-trade, sir? Yes, if I can nullify the power of regulating trade and commerce by navigation. Intercolonial free-trade, sir? Yes, if I can nullify it by bounties. Intercolonial free-trade, sir? Yes, if I can nullify it by preferential railway rates." Now, if we are to have intercolonial free-trade in this Commonwealth, we should not attempt to open the door to its being interfered with by any manipulation of any sort whatever. That, I believe, is a strong objection. I shall adhere to it, and I am against this proposal in any shape or form whatever. I am against it for another reason. I do not think that it is a wise or a reasonable thing as between the states. Let us suppose that, upon a certain class of products, a particular state obtains the consent of the Parliament of the Commonwealth to the granting of a bounty. The Parliament may or may not agree. According to the form which this amendment takes, it is clearly in derogation of freedom of trade and commerce. But we can easily understand the Parliament giving the same favour (it may be with regard to that same class of products, or another) to another colony. And so the game goes on-the old game of better terms-and the door is at once ajar to corruption. The states that can afford the money may attain their object, and their production may be stimulated by a regulation assented to by the Governor-General in Council and by the Parliament of the Commonwealth. So long as a state can go on giving bounties, it can play the game. But others which cannot afford the game will have to do without this stimulation, which is an inequality revolting to the principle of intercolonial free-trade.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

There is strength in the argument as put by my honorable friend (Mr. Barton), but the reason why I have deflected from my strong opinion in regard to this matter (which our friends from Victoria lay so much stress upon) is that, in the first place, if the resolution is carried as I suggest, the power of regulating a state bounty will rest in the Parliament; and, therefore, the power resting in the Parliament, and this Constitution delegating to the Parliament the power of offering bounties, there is nothing inconsistent with the main principle of the measure that the Federal Parliament, instead of finding the money itself, should in particular cases allow the state to offer a bounty. Now, sir, I do not at all suppose that the Federal Parliament will enter into such arrangements in any case which is a proper subject for federal application. That is to say, I do not at all apprehend that in any case the Parliament would consent to a bounty to encourage an industry which was being carried on in another state, or an industry which could be carried on in other states. In such a case, the Parliament would demand that the bounty should be uniform and co-extensive throughout the whole Commonwealth. But a care may arise—and it is on this ground that I assent—where the object is a local one, and in which there is no prospect of a similar development in any other part of the Commonwealth; and therefore a case in which the Commonwealth might refuse or neglect to act. Now, in such a case, why should not the state, if it is willing to bear the burden itself, come to the Federal Parliament and say—"We admit that this is not a federal matter, because the industry is an entirely local one, but we ask you to apply your power of

Mr. ISAACS. -

A Bill of this class.

Mr. REID. -

That is scarcely a logical remark, because this is a difficult matter. It will be more difficult to get a Bill passed through eight or ten stages in the two Houses than a simple resolution. If there is an active minority in a busy Parliament they can block the whole procedure when a Bill is put before them, because the opportunities are so numerous for obstruction; but in regard to a simple resolution the Government can compel it to be settled at one sitting or at two, and when it is passed on that one vote it is finally dealt with. Surely we all know that that is an easier process than getting a Bill through its first, second, and third readings. The thing has only to be stated to commend itself. We are not offering our friends an unsubstantial concession. It is one that will have the benefit of certainty.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

I should like to ask the leader of this Convention what would be the effect of carrying the amendment of Sir George Turner? If these words:-

This section shall not apply to any bounty or aid granted by any state with the consent of the Governor-General in Council or of the Parliament of the Commonwealth-

are inserted, it appears to me that they would form part and parcel of the Constitution of the Commonwealth. If that is the case, you could not alter them in any shape or way, except by altering the Constitution.

Quite right.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

But if Mr. Higgins' addendum is placed in the clause also, it would take away the difficulty with regard to that point, because it would be a proviso that the provision should not derogate from freedom of trade and commerce. If you do not add those words of Mr. Higgins', you nullify altogether clause 86A. You have now passed that clause, and given the Executive power to impose duties of customs and so on. But now it is proposed to dissolve all that and do away with it by Sir George Turner's amendment. Consequently you interfere altogether with the customs laws and with freedom of trade throughout the Commonwealth. I think I am right in the interpretation I put on the matter. I should like to know whether the leader is of the same opinion as myself upon the subject, because if so I shall vote against Sir George Turner's amendment? If it does not have that effect I am inclined to vote for it. If, however, it is to become part and parcel of the Constitution how are you to alter it I Parliament will have no control over it, and you cannot tell the effect of a bounty until it is put into operation. We will we take the case of Tasmania, where are interested in the sugar-beet industry. If you give a bounty for the production of sugar beet it may be good for one colony, but at the same time bad for another. And, therefore, it should require, in my opinion, the consent of the Parliament. It appears tome that these words "or of the Parliament of the Commonwealth" are only a draw.

Mr. REID. -

It will have to be by a resolution of the Houses.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -
There can be no objection if it is to come before Parliament for its sanction, but if the sanction is to be simply given by the Executive without the consent of the Parliament, I would strongly object to it. I hope the committee will not agree to such a thing, but I am quite in accord with what I understand the leader of Convention to say that this is an interference with commerce and trade.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I understand the honorable gentleman wishes to know this: The power to deal with bounties after uniform duties are imposed being exclusive on the part of the Commonwealth Parliament, and this being a proviso upon that power, he wishes to know if this being carried will remain a part of the Constitution, so that it cannot be altered except by a referendum? That is a very clear question, and the answer is clear, that it cannot be altered without a referendum, as far as I can see. Then the position would be this: If this amendment is carried, a bounty can be granted with the consent of the Governor-General in Council, or with the consent of the Commonwealth. I do not see any power at all for the termination of that state of things that would arise under the bounty, so that, so far as the consent extends, the bounty will extend, and I do not see any power of determination.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

Oh, oh!

Mr. BARTON. -

Let me say, in further extension of the answer I gave, that there matters may be subject to conditions between the state and the Executive Government of the Commonwealth or the Parliament of the Commonwealth. If they are to be made the subject of conditions it is better to clear up doubts, instead of asking us to pass an amendment in these bald terms.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

The fact that there was such a spontaneous outburst of disapprobation from all the honorable members on this bench is sufficient proof that every member felt that the statement made by Mr. Barton was not made in a judicial capacity or as leader of the House. If the words had been added which have since fallen from him there would have been no such outburst. It is surely enough to remind this House, which has been so often asked to trust the Federal Parliament, how preposterous is the suggestion that any state would ask the Parliament or Executive to consent to any proposal for the granting of an interminable bounty. That would be too preposterous. Every bounty, however proposed, must be on terms, and for a certain time. Its granting will be subject to the wisdom and discretion of the Commonwealth Legislature or Executive.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is no answer to what I said.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The complementary sentences the honorable member felt it necessary to add were sufficient justification for the expression of disapprobation. Without any intentional hostility that evidently conveyed to him that what was necessary was a complete statement, not an incomplete one. The honorable member had, unfortunately, preceded that by making a speech which displayed strong hostility to this proposal, and if this had been a party debate it would have demanded an equally strong reply. The honorable member spoke of corruption in Parliament as if this was the only proposal involving such a possibility, although the bookkeeping system affords far greater and far more frequent bargainings.

Mr. BARTON. -

I did not mean that it was the only one. I said it was unnecessary to multiply opportunities for corruption.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

If that was his intention it was perfectly right.

Mr. BARTON. -

That was the plain effect of my statement.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It did not so appear to me. The proposal now submitted bears no antagonism to the principles of federation. It may be unpalatable to the honorable member, and he may be right in opposing it with warmth, but, at least, it is not anti-federal. As he is aware, it is one of those provisions which would recommend federation to many of the people of this colony, and of other colonies, and we are entitled to claim that the same courteous consideration which has been shown in every other matter should be shown in this. With reference to our expressions of dissent, there was no intentional discourtesy.

Mr. BARTON. -

I thought there was.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It was not discourteous, although it might be taken as a reflection upon the attitude of the honorable member. We are indebted to him for so much, and he is obliged to submit to so much in this committee, that great consideration is due to him. I intend to pass away from that subject, trusting the Convention will regard this proposal, not in any heated fashion, but as one of those concessions in the nature of a state right which may be granted, and which the Parliament of the Commonwealth may be trusted to see granted, without derogation from the principles on which the Constitution is founded. It could only be employed to a very moderate extent by any state. It ought not to be urged that this concession should not be granted to those states which can afford to take advantage of it, because there may be some other states which cannot afford to do so. No stronger argument could be levelled against the entrance of wealthy states into this Federation than to say that the more fortunate members of the group shall be crippled in the development of their industries because some states cannot keep pace with them. Such statements only raise unnecessary obstacles to federation. I have pleasure in acknowledging the spirit with which the Premier of New South Wales has dealt with this question, more especially as it means on his part a real and significant concession to views with which he does, not personally agree. The suggestion which he has made might possibly be unanimously accepted by this Chamber. We all feel strongly on this subject, and those who think with me may desire to register our votes in favour of the proposal of Sir George Turner. But having done that, if we be not successful, we should recognise the spirit in which the Right Hon. Mr. Reid has made the suggestion, and be pleased to adopt it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

If Mr. Deakin is of that opinion, why not at once accept the proposal of Mr. Reid instead of saying if so-and-so is done so-and-so shall be done? If it is the true principle, why not acknowledge it at once and put it before the House? I would suggest to Mr. Reid that he should put his amendment in writing, so that we may at once see the meaning of it and what is intended by it. Mr. Deakin has surrounded the question with a lot of matter, but there is nothing whatever in it. It simply means that you are to interfere with what you have already done with regard to trade and commerce, and to set it aside because a bounty has been, given by a state for carrying on some particular trade or commerce which may be injurious, and which can only be known to be injurious after it has been brought into operation for some time. Let us have the amendment of Mr. Reid, and then we shall know what we are about. If it is determined that Sir George Turner will not alter his amendment, we shall have an opportunity of falling back upon Mr.
Reid's amendment.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I think my honorable friends are quite entitled to test the feeling of the Convention on this proposition in the form to which they attach so much importance. It might well be that many thousands of their electors would consider they were neglecting their duty if they did not test the feeling of the Convention on this matter. So far as I am concerned, it will not make the slightest difference to my vote. If my friends are defeated, I will cordially support the proposition in the form which it will then take.

Question-That the words "of the Governor-General in Council or of the Parliament of the Commonwealth" proposed to be omitted, stand part of the amendment-put.

That after the second paragraph the following words be inserted:-"This section shall not apply to any bounty or aid granted by any state with the consent of the Governor-General in Council or of the Parliament of the Commonwealth."

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does Mr. Higgins now wish to move his amendment?

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

May I explain that I understood the Hon. Mr. Walker only voted for the last proposition on the condition that I moved my amendment, and I should feel it a breach of faith to him if I did not move it. At the same time, if my honorable friend can release me from that condition, I shall be very glad. I must say I think the words as they stand now will leave the matter absolutely with Parliament, and Parliament is perfectly certain not to allow a bounty which would interfere with trade. I think, Mr. Chairman, you Will understand the position I am in. I, in fact, thought the effect of the last vote would be against us. So far as I am concerned, I feel bound in honour to move my amendment, unless Mr. Walker sees fit to release me.

Mr. WALKER. -

I must ask you to keep your promise, sir.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Then, sir, I move-

That the following proviso be added to the amendment:-"Provided that the bounty or aid has not the effect of derogating from the freedom of trade or commerce among the several states.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I should like to point out that if we add the words proposed the clause will be rendered nugatory. When people, who are going to enter into some new industry, and are getting assistance from a bonus, feel that after they have spent their money, by the time the bonus is payable, any individual may apply to the High Court, and have it declared that, although the Government of the day, or even the Parliament of the Commonwealth, gave consent, yet that the bonus was in derogation of freedom of trade and commerce, no man will be idiotic enough to spend his money in endeavouring to develop any industry. If these words are added, I say unhesitatingly the benefit the Convention has just given us will be absolutely worthless.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I must say I feel bitterly disappointed that the matter has assumed its present complexion, I would have been glad if the question had gone in the form I suggested. At the same time, my friends were perfectly right in taking the vote they did. I only express my profound disappointment that we are now brought face to face with a matter which we must treat as vital. I must treat as a vital matter a proposal that, after we have all gone into this Commonwealth on equal terms, risking our fiscal policies, a power should be centered in the Federal Executive which the Commonwealth itself has not got. The Commonwealth Parliament is bound down not to pass any law that derogates from freedom of trade and equality of production. If Parliament is bound down to that principle, how can we with our eyes open give the Executive Council power to violate the vital principles of the Constitution? That is asking us to go too far. I deeply regret, in the interests of my right honorable friend's own views, that the matter has assumed a complexion under which it cannot be allowed to pass without notice. The right honorable member very frankly and straightforwardly, as is his custom, tells us "This is no good to us unless it violates the equality of Australian production and Australian free-trade. It is no good to us unless it puts our people at an advantage compared with the position of the producers of the other parts of Australia."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. REID. -

Then why not put in the words?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Because no one will spend his money if he has a fear of this sort.

Mr. REID. -

It is an extraordinary thing that the Constitution should be able to bear the strain of these rules, but that the Executive Government and the honorable gentlemen who support the amendment cannot do so. This will not do. It is not our fault that the matter has got into this position. I was anxious to abstain from any antagonism to my right honorable friend, because I see cases in which the provision would operate harmlessly; but I want the protection of Parliament behind it to guarantee that what is done shall be done in the light of day, and with the approval of the representatives of Australia. But if what is to be done is to be done in the Minister's room, without the knowledge of the representatives of the people, and this condition—that the bounty is to be fair and equal to all Australia—is not to be added, the proposal is too dangerous. The right honorable member asked—What is the use of my 24 votes, and the influence they have, over a Government if your 26 votes can block them? "That is to say, our 26 votes are to be kept in the dark while the right honorable member's 24 votes are to get their way with the Executive Government. That sort of thing will not do in this Constitution. I shall have to vote against the proposal in any case. I utterly repudiate the suggestion that the Executive authority should be allowed to do these things behind the back of Parliament as an unwholesome suggestion, and one that is contrary to the spirit of the Constitution. But if the proposed safeguard is not put in, the proposal will be deeply objectionable. Honorable members opposite are honestly and frankly endeavouring to secure a concession from us which they feel will be of service in recommending the Bill to the people of Victoria. For that reason I do not complain of their action. But I must point out that the susceptibilities of the other colonies must be considered when the position is so unequal.

Mr GORDON (South Australia). - Although I voted with the right honorable member (Sir George Turner) and the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) just now, it was with a view to supporting the amendment of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Higgins). That amendment leaves it open, as I think it ought to be left open, for bounties for export to be allowed, but it prohibits bounties which would interfere with the freedom of trade between the colonies. Such bounties would be anomalous, and under a Constitution of this kind could only be described as monstrosities.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I do not think there is anything at all in the statements of honorable members that the Executive Government is likely to do anything that will not be approved by the Parliament. In my opinion, it is just as safe to leave an important matter of this kind in the hands of the Executive Government as in the hands of the Parliament, because every one who knows anything about parliamentary government must know that if a Ministry does anything against the wishes of Parliament it will be sent out of office.

Mr. GORDON. -

Suppose you had a dying Government, or the Parliament was just about to expire.

Mr. LYNE. -

If the Ministry did something which the Parliament did not approve, Parliament would reverse it.

Mr. GORDON. -

Not after the money had been expended.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the Governor-General in Council granted a bounty for any industry and made it binding, it would not matter whether the Parliament tried to reverse their action or not, the money would have to be paid.

Mr. LYNE. -

It is possible to insert a provision enabling the action of the Ministry to be reversed. I am not a very strong advocate of bounties; I prefer to foster industries by a system of protection. But I should like to put this case to the leader of the Convention. As honorable members know, there are in New South Wales large deposits of iron ore. There are also large deposits of iron ore in Tasmania, but I do not know that there is any iron ore in Victoria. The other day it was proposed by the Government of New South Wales to give a bonus for the development of the iron industry of the colony. Now, suppose that, under the Commonwealth, the states of New South Wales and Tasmania both desired to give a bonus for the development of the iron industry, and some one took exception to their proposal upon the ground that it would interfere with freedom of trade—could it not be held by the High Court that it would in some way derogate from freedom of trade? The effect of a bonus of this kind might be that, in Victoria, a large quantity of the iron imported, instead of coming from outside the Commonwealth and having to pay duty, might come across the border from New South Wales, or might come from Tasmania. Would it not therefore be held that the New South Wales and Tasmanian bounties were infringing the clause relating to freedom of trade?

Mr. BARTON. - If granted by the Commonwealth?

Mr. LYNE. - No, if granted by the states I have named, with the consent of the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. - With the consent of the Governor-General in Council?

Mr. LYNE. - That means the consent of the Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. - The honorable member's question is a bit of a conundrum. He must give me three guesses.

Mr. LYNE. - I do not think the honorable and learned member should answer me in that way.

Mr. BARTON. - Well, I tell you honestly that it is a difficult question to answer.

Mr. LYNE. - I want to know if, under these circumstances, an appeal to the High Court would be likely to be sustained? A case such as I refer to is bound to crop up if bounties are given.
Mr. HIGGINS. -

There is already in the Bill power to give bounties for iron.

< Mr. LYNE. - I know that-Commonwealth bounties.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No, state bounties. Any state may give a bounty for the production of iron.

Mr. LYNE. -

I am putting a case in which the Commonwealth does not give a bounty, but where the state asks the Executive Government and the Parliament to allow it, to give a bounty. In that case, if these words be added could not the granting of the bonus be prevented by some one applying to the High Court, and saying that it was in derogation of the freedom of trade on the ground that it would interfere with the importations and with the revenues of those colonies which had no iron ore. I am not very anxious about the granting of bonuses, because I would rather see protection given in another way, but I like to look at a question in its practical aspects.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I would like to point out what I think would be the effect of this proposal. If I thought that any injustice would be done to New South Wales, I would not press so strongly the absolutely just claims of Victoria.

Mr. HOWE. -

You do not consider the other colonies.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I leave the delegates from the other colonies to speak for themselves. This, is one of the first instances in which Victoria has had justice meted out to it. I hope that the words proposed by Mr. Higgins will not be inserted. As I understand the question, if the clause stands, a state may grant a bounty, provided it gets the consent of either the Governor-General in Council or of the Parliament, and that means that clause 86B, which gives exclusive power to the Commonwealth, after the imposition of uniform duties of customs, to grant bounties, shall not apply in this particular case. We do not even by the insertion of the clause too which we have agreed take away the paramount authority of the Federal Parliament under clause 52 to pass a law overriding the state bounties. It is the exclusive jurisdiction that has been limited, and I cannot understand how the Right Hon. Mr. Reid can see any danger whatever in granting this power to any colony to develop its resources, when he knows, or ought to know, that the Federal Parliament, if it is shown that any injustice is done by the act of the Governor-General in Council, can, as Mr. Lyne has said, reverse the whole proceeding. The state that takes a bounty on the assent of the Governor-General in Council takes it with the full knowledge of the risk that attaches to that operation. I cannot understand how the thousands of people in this colony could be induced to overlook the absence of such a provision as we have just inserted in the Bill. I do think that the time has not only come, but has far advanced, when we should make a strong stand in support of the industries of the colony. If this provision stood irrevocably in the way of the freedom of trade between the colonies if it stood in the way of the Federal Parliament doing what it thought to be just-then I should feel bound to yield in the interests of the larger cause of federation. But that is not the case. In the interests of federation we should not alienate thousands of votes in this colony. Not only Victoria, but every colony that desires to grant a bounty, is protected by this provision. If the Federal Parliament can be induced to give its assent to such a proposal as we are asked to accept as a full solution of this difficulty, then the Federal Parliament can equally be asked, where it sees that there is no injustice in the proposal, to reverse it. I submit, therefore, that we should adhere to the amendment. The words suggested by Mr. Higgins would completely annul all we have done. They say, in effect, that if a bounty assented to by the Federal Parliament or the Governor General in Council derogates from the freedom of trade, it is to be null and void. That means that any bounty given to the coal industry or to the sugar-beet industry, however assented to, would, in that case, be null and void. I hope, therefore, that Mr. Walker will consent to the amendment being withdrawn. If not, I shall feel compelled to vote against it. I would ask those honorable members who voted with us to support us in preventing the insertion of these words, which would be disastrous to the whole clause.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

All that I desire to say is that if we had not had the proviso referred to we should have been on the other side, and the motion would have been defeated.

Question-That the words of Mr. Higgins' proviso, viz.:-'Provided that the bounty or aid has not the effect of derogating from freedom of trade or commerce between the several states," proposed to be added be so added-put.

The committee divided-

Ayes ... ... ... 29

Majority for Mr. Higgins' amendment. ... ... 17

AYES.
Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I desire to place the somewhat difficult position in which I find myself before the committee for further consideration. The clause as it stands is one, as I pointed out a few minutes ago, which I think worse that useless. The difficulty I pointed out before was that no person would invest his money in any industry where he was to get a bonus and would rely on the bonus, if at any time any individual could go to the High Court, and have a declaration that, in the opinion of that court, no matter what the Parliament might think, it was in derogation from freedom of trade and commerce.

Mr. WISE. -

It will allow you to give bounties for exports, which is what you want.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Bounties on exports, we are always told, are bounties on production.

Mr. WISE. -

They do not derogate from freedom of trade.
Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

My right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) made an offer that, instead of having the consent of the Governor in Council or the Parliament of the Commonwealth, the latter requiring an Act to be passed, it would be sufficient to have a resolution of the two Houses. I quite agree with him that a resolution is much more easily obtained than an Act. Experience must teach all of us that that is so, no matter how simple the Act may be. Under all these circumstances, I have to choose the less of two evils. I believe that a bonus, with a resolution of two Houses, is not of very much use. But I believe it is of some use, and far more use than anything which the colony of Victoria can get under the clause as it stands.

Mr. REID. -

There is no doubt about that.

Mr. LYNE. -

Could not some one take exception before the High Court to a resolution in the same way as he could to an Act of Parliament?

Mr. WISE. -

Not if it is within the Constitution.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

In the one instance we have the matter staring us in the face as a direct instruction, in the other it may not be free from doubt. However, so far as I am concerned, if the committee will assist me out of the difficulty I feel I have got into, by doing what has been done in other cases—by allowing this matter to be reconsidered—I shall be glad, as I wish to accept the less of what I regard now as practically two evils, the offer which has been so freely made by the Premier of New South Wales. I felt somewhat inclined myself to have accepted, it but there were differences of opinion, and I think it will be admitted that, in our own interest, we were bound to show the people of Victoria the feeling of the Convention. The feeling of the Convention has been shown, and I do not think there is any desire now to give us less than it was prepared to give us a few minutes ago. If the Convention will be good enough to retrace the step it has taken, and to allow the suggestion made by Sir John Downer to be inserted, I shall be very glad to accept it, and consider that the Convention has treated us as fairly as it was possible to do under the circumstances.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

With the view of accepting the suggestion of the honorable members which I think will commend itself to the feeling of the Convention, I beg to move—

That the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again when he has obtained an instruction to the committee on this subject.
The motion was agreed to.

Progress was then reported.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I beg to move-

That the standing orders be suspended in order that an instruction may be given to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I beg to move-

That it be an instruction to the committee that they have leave to reconsider immediately clause 86B.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the further consideration of the Bill.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I have to report that an instruction has been given to the committee granting it leave to reconsider the question as to the insertion of new sub-section (2) in clause 86B.

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

I beg to move-

That the clause, as amended, be amended by the omission of all the words after the word "consent," with the view to the insertion in their place of the words "of both Houses of the Parliament, expressed by resolutions."

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

As I was the author of the proviso, I will give every help to the settlement of the difficulty which Sir George Turner has referred to. I felt that he could not have carried his original proposal without the assistance of five honorable members who were in favour of the proviso, but inasmuch as he thinks-and he knows better than I do-that he will get more help in what he wants by accepting the suggestion of Mr. Reid, I will give him every help I can.

The amendment was agreed to.

Sir George Turner's amendment, as amended, was then agreed to, as follows:-

This section shall not apply to any bounty or aid granted by any state with the consent of both Houses of the Parliament, expressed by resolutions.

Clause 89. - So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed, trade and intercourse among the states, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

But notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, goods imported before the imposition of uniform duties of customs into any state, or into any colony or province which, whilst the goods remain therein, becomes a state, shall, on thence entering another state within two years after the imposition of such duties be liable to the duty (if any) chargeable on the importation of such goods into the Commonwealth less the duty (if any) which was paid in respect of the goods on their importation.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I move-

That the clause be amended by the addition, after "free" (line 5), of the words "from taxation or restriction."

This is a matter of the greatest importance; it is one of the most important clauses in the Bill, because it materially affects the trade and commerce clauses. Honorable members will recollect that as it stood originally, it ran-

So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed, trade and intercourse throughout the Commonwealth, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

That has been altered now to "among the states," instead of "throughout the Commonwealth." But, at present, it is open to the very serious objection that, while it says "absolutely free," it does not say free of what. Now, this is a clause respecting which Sir Samuel Griffith made some very important suggestions and observations. I had occasion to refer to them before, and I will now refer to them again, with the consent of the committee. At page 354 of the Victorian Blue-book, Sir Samuel Griffith writes-

I venture before passing from this subject to suggest a doubt whether the words of section 89, which are the same as in the Draft Bill of 1891, are in their modern sense quite apt to express the meaning intended to be conveyed. It is clearly not proposed to interfere with the internal regulation of trade by means of licences, nor to prevent the imposition of reasonable rates on state railways. I apprehend that the real meaning is that free course of trade and commerce between different parts of the Commonwealth is not to be restricted or interfered with by any taxes, charges, or imposts. Would it not be better to use these or similar words?

Now, I feel we ought to adopt Sir Samuel Griffith's suggestion, and I think that such an amendment as I have circulated, namely, "from taxation or restriction," ought to be added to the clause. I do not suppose there will be any objection to the principle I am advocating, but it is certainly dangerous to leave the clause as it now stands, because it is not only free from taxation or restriction, which it is our intention to confine it to, I take leave to say, but it operates in various ways-free from licences of all sorts, and free from various considerations. I do not think I need enlarge on the matter. I apprehend there will be no objection to putting in these words, unless other and better words can be found.

Mr. SYMON. -

Will not "restrictions" cover your amendment?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I meant, to say licences for carriers, and so on, undoubtedly should be included, but I think that there ought to be no restrictions whatever, intercolonially.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

What do you mean by restrictions"?

Mr. ISAACS. -

Any restrictions on entry into a colony of persons or goods.

Mr. LYNE. -

Would not that include preferential rates?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Would that interfere with the power of the police to prevent diseased goods and diseased animals entering a state?

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, because clause 106, which gives the power the honorable member speaks of, provides-

After uniform duties of customs have been imposed, a state may levy such charges on imports or exports, whether between states or otherwise, as may be necessary for executing the inspection laws of the state, and so on. So there is sufficient power there to meet the case the honorable member refers to, and I think my amendment is absolutely necessary to prevent any misunderstanding hereafter. I spent some considerable time in Adelaide in placing these views before the Convention, and I am very glad to find my views supported by so eminent an authority as Sir Samuel Griffith. I am very pleased to adopt his suggestion by proposing the insertion of words which, I think, carry out his ideas.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

Would not Mr. Isaacs' amendment cover charges on the railways-that is, railway rates?

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, they are charges for services.

Mr. LYNE. -

Well, if you impose a rate which may be a restriction rate in any way it seems to me that it would come under this provision.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Oh, yes, a restriction rate.

Mr. LYNE. -

Sir Samuel Griffith said that it was intended to include taxes, charges, or imposts.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In that sense I should say "Yes," to the honorable member's question.

Mr. LYNE. -

Would not that interfere with the whole question which we discussed at such length regarding what we termed our long-distance rates? I certainly think it would. I think that the legal minds of the Convention should look into this matter, because I am very much afraid it is another way of getting over what was fought, and successfully fought, before on this question of differential rates. I should like the leader of the Convention to give his attention to this matter. It seems to me that the proposal made by Mr. Isaacs in this clause would interfere with the railway rates, which we discussed for such a considerable time. I thought so from hearing what Sir Samuel Griffith wrote in reference to it. Now, if it is only to include a duty that might have to be paid, or a licence or anything of that kind, I do not object to the words being inserted; but if it is to interfere at all in any way with, or give a direction as to, rates to be charged on railways, in order to overcome what has already been decided, we have no right to pass the amendment. I ask the leader of the Convention to see that it will not have that far-reaching effect. If a competent lawyer tells me it will not, I must rely on his opinion.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If you put on a rate which is higher for New South Wales produce than the rate for Victorian produce it would interfere with that.

Mr. LYNE. -

Supposing a differential rate is charged oil to Albury or Hay, and the same rate is not charged from Melbourne right through, but may be charged from Albury, the question to my mind is whether this proposal does not cover that differential rate, it being a low rate where you get a great distance from the metropolis. I should like the matter to be examined, and some opinion given.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

Before Mr. Barton answers the question that has been put to him-I am not going to address myself to that-I wish to point out how dangerous are such words as Mr.
Isaacs proposes to insert. This clause touches the vital point for which we are federating, and although the words of the clause are certainly not the words that you meet with in Acts of Parliaments as a general rule, they have this recommendation, that they strike exactly the notes which we want to strike in this Constitution. And they have also the further recommendation that no legal technicalities can be built up upon them in order to restrict their operation. It is a little bit of laymen's language which comes in here very well.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is the language of three lawyers.

Mr. ISAACS. -

And one of the lawyers who helped to frame the clause now finds fault with it.

Mr. REID. -

The learned gentlemen who drafted this Bill have put in this clause words which we do not often read in Acts of Parliament, but they are absolutely the best words which could be used here. And the moment we begin to define we have to define what the definition means, and then we involve everything in the necessary amount of confusion. The thing in view in this clause is not so much the goods that will pass one way or the other, but that the relationship between those who deal in commodities, and send them from port to port within the Commonwealth, shall not be hampered by laws or officers of the Commonwealth in the sense of interfering with absolute equality of intercourse. Words of this type exactly hit this requirement, and I do not think any one can mistake their meaning.

Mr. ISAACS. -

They are very plain, I should say.

Mr. REID. -

I prefer this keynote to the attempt to establish what I think is a wrong keynote in its place.

[The Chairman left the chair at twenty five minutes past eleven o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at ten minutes to midnight.]

Question so resolved in the negative.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The question is-That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I take the opportunity of explaining how very important this matter is. I mentioned before that I was here when there were only six members in the House, and a division came on very suddenly. I should like to point out the effect of the clause as it now stands. Sir Samuel Griffith has argued that there ought to be inserted words to make the matter distinct.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

I rise to order. The clause has been settled.

The CHAIRMAN. -

No; the question is that the clause stand part of the Bill, the amendment having been negatived.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I was proceeding to show what the effect would be if the clause were adopted as it now stands. There is no similar clause in the American Constitution. Congress has power if it chooses to put on duties as between states. Congress would, of course, never do that, but Congress may grant bounties or anything of the kind, because there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent it. But this clause, as it now stands, has been shown by Sir Samuel Griffith to be faulty.

Mr. WISE. -

That was before the amendment.
Mr. ISAACS. -

But the effort to amend it was unsuccessful. Probably, and possibly, the result is that it may be held the Victorian railway rates, being less for Riverina produce than for Victorian produce, do not leave trade among the states free. It may be held that these rates attract the trade from the Riverina, while the New South Wales rates do not interfere with the freedom of trade and intercourse between the states, because they are confined to their own colony. That puts Victoria in a grossly unfair position. Instead of leaving the operation of the railway rates to the Inter-State Commission or the Federal Parliament, before any step is taken by the commission-if a step is ever taken-the Victorian railway rates would be held to be in conflict with the trade and commerce clause, while the New South Wales railway rates would not. Clause 89 provides that trade and intercourse between the states, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free. Now, the carriage of goods by a state might be such, if the rates for New South Wales produce were higher than for Victorian produce, that there would be a derogation of freedom of trade. If the Victorian Government put on higher rates for New South Wales produce than for Victorian produce, those rates would instantly be put down as being in derogation of freedom of trade, on the ground that New South Wales trade was restricted.

Mr. BARTON. -

Mr. Grant's clause seems to meet all this.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No.

Mr. BARTON. -

It makes the rates apply equally to the goods of the other states.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But my honorable friend will see that clause 95A provides "That nothing in this Constitution shall prevent the imposition of such railway rates by any state as may, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, be necessary for the development of its territory, if such rates apply equally to goods from other states." It is plain the Victorian rates do not apply equally to goods from other states, because a lower charge is made for New South Wales produce than for Victorian produce. Before anything is done by the Inter-State Commission the 89th clause steps in and favours New South Wales at the expense of Victoria by prohibiting Victorian rates. Immediately the uniform customs are imposed New South Wales is left with a free hand. In fact, Sir John Downer urged that in effect some time ago. He urged that we could not carry on the contest between New South Wales and Victoria, because of the language of clause 89, which imposes this disability against Victoria and leaves New South Wales free. That is a one-sided position, and I therefore think the clause is utterly wrong.

Mr. REID. -

I do not think the clause would have that effect.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I feel little doubt but that it would so be held. In fact, Sir John Downer urged that, and I believe he was right. It might be held, and probably would, that the Victorian rates, inasmuch as they attracted trade from Riverina, as a magnet attracts iron, do not leave trade from Riverina free. Sir John Downer is now present, and he will remember urging clause 89 as having that effect. I am glad to see he now assents to my view. The clause is, therefore, a prohibition on Victoria from continuing the contest, while it leaves New South Wales absolutely free. That is not a position we should be placed in.

Mr. WISE. -

Is it not taking the line of the least resistance?

Mr. ISAACS. -

That might be if the line were the natural line of least resistance. But we can be prohibited by the clause from doing it. I do not care what words are inserted so long as we are fairly treated and free from restriction.

Mr. REID. -

Suppose you decided to carry produce free, would you not be carrying out in the noblest possible way the provision that trade should be absolutely free?

Mr. ISAACS. -

If that is so, I would like some one to point out any reason why we should not have these words in. The leader of the Convention appears to think that the words which I read before the supper adjournment tell against my argument, but I do not think that is so.

Mr. WISE. -

How can you restrict trade by offering advantages for trade?

Mr. ISAACS. -

When we were debating the railway question we were told time after time that trade would not be left free if we persisted in our preferential rates.

Mr. BARTON. -

Are not preferential rates fairly described, not as a derogation from freedom of trade, but as a derogation from equality of trade?
I urged that for a considerable time, but the honorable member (Sir John Downer) pointed out very distinctly that, in his opinion, clause 89 would have the effect of preventing Victoria from charging preferential rates. The danger which I see is a real one, and I have not heard a single good reason given for the latest vote which Victoria has had to suffer.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -

I think that this discussion is taking place at an inconvenient stage. It would be more convenient if we discussed the question of railway rates on clause 95A. There can be no doubt that the intention of the Bill as framed is to do away with preferential rates. The only difficulty that appears to trouble the Attorney-General of Victoria is that there may be an interregnum before the powers of the Inter-State Commission can be called into question. There is a difficulty upon that point. It was a difficulty I foresaw, and I was opposed to the appointment of an Inter-State Commission. Directly the Constitution comes into force all its powers should apply. From the provisions of clause 95A, it would appear that the Inter-State Commission may have to be invoked to prevent the imposition of preferential rates, though there can be no doubt that the intention of the Bill is that preferential rates should be entirely done away. The Attorney-General of Victoria seems to advocate preferential rates.

Mr. ISAACS. - No. What I want is to put both colonies upon the same footing.

Mr. GRANT. -

Well, it seems to me that a technical question like this would be better argued upon the clause to which I have referred. Victoria must take the risk of having her preferential rates disallowed. We must all take the consequences of the Bill, because ultimately we shall gain great advantages from it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We are willing to take the same risks as are taken by the other colonies.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I cannot see any particular difficulty about this matter, except so far as intercolonial free-trade may be an irritating thing. I cannot apprehend the difficulty that my honorable and learned friend seems to be suffering under. The clause provides that-

So soon as uniform duties of customs have been imposed, trade and intercourse among the states, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

Do we mean that, or do we not? Do we mean that trade and intercourse is to be absolutely free, or is it to be free only sub modo? Each state is left to deal with the internal regulation of its own traffic. A state is not interfered with except when it usurps the Commonwealth power of regulating trade and commerce between the states. What advantage does any state seek to gain beyond this? I cannot understand why, at every stage, we should be told that intercolonial free-trade is a good thing so long as you let us do this, or that, or the other. Is intercolonial free-trade a good, or is it a bad thing? Is it a bad thing unless you have as many obstacles in its way as you have toes and fingers? I have said before in this Convention that I am a protectionist, but I admit that unless you have free-trade throughout the Commonwealth the Federation will not be worth a snap of the fingers.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No one objects to that.

Mr. BARTON. -

No one objects to my statement of that principle, but when it is laid down in so many words in the Constitution, it seems to cause a shrinking of the sensitive plant within honorable members. I do not know why intercolonial free-trade, if it is essential to federation, should be objected to when it is provided for in the Constitution in so many words. Why should we have all these qualifications?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I only ask for the words from taxation or restriction."

Mr. BARTON. -

No one imagines that intercolonial free-trade means such a thing as a freeing of traffic from payment for services rendered for the conveyance of goods and passengers. Yet it is out of this difficulty that all these arguments seem to arise. There is nothing in this clause to prevent anything done by way of service from being paid for, whether it is by a state or by a common carrier. What then is the trouble? I do not find any way out of the difficulty in the words of Sir Samuel Griffith. He says that the real meaning is that the course of commerce shall not be restricted by taxation charges or imposts, and that it would be a good thing to use these or similar words. Then he points out that the intention is to prevent interference with preferential or differential rates, and he suggests that certain words might be added. We have chosen our own words, and I hope the Convention will not consent to re-open the discussion at this stage. We have made it clear that the power of the Parliament extends to the making of laws with regard to trade and commerce. We have made it clear that the Commonwealth may prohibit any discrimination or preference such as would be unfair or unreasonable to any state. We have added that fair consideration shall be given to any financial outlay, and at the instance of the Hon. Mr. Grant we have provided that where the traffic rates apply equally to goods from one colony and another, the fact that they are imposed for the purposes of internal development shall not make them bad. All these things apply equally to Victoria and New South Wales. It may be a cause of difficulty to Victoria that she has only to travel a distance by land or sea, shall be free. If these provisions have been inserted in the Constitution for the benefit of certain gentlemen, or, at any rate, at their instance, and if they say that they want otherwise to derogate from free-trade, are we not entitled to press the argument that this would not be a Federal Constitution if we acceded to their request? I am unable to see why principles of this kind, which have been inserted in the Constitution, should be waived or whittled away, or why they should be made subject to any qualification or restriction. The words which it is proposed to insert would be no good unless they qualified the doctrine that intercolonial free-trade shall be free, and that is why I cannot understand the honorable member who proposes them.

Mr. Reid (New South Wales). -

These particular words have nothing whatever to do with the question my honorable friend is concerned about. Let us suppose that immediately this law is passed, Victoria, having put up all these obstacles, removes them and facilitates the means of transit across the border, with the result of making trade flow from New South Wales into Victoria more readily, could New South Wales then complain that Victoria was infringing this doctrine? Then, again, ocean navigation is to be free. Let us suppose that there is a line of Melbourne owned steamers trading between Melbourne and Sydney, and that there is a line of Sydney-owned steamers trading between Sydney and Melbourne. They are competing with one another, and they gradually reduce their charges until at last the Victorian company carry goods free, while the Sydney company carry them at a ruinously low rate of, say, 1s. a ton. Could the complaint of the Sydney company that the Melbourne company was violating the spirit of free-trade by carrying these goods free be heard in the courts? The thing is ridiculous. Those words cannot cover limitations of that sort. The ordinary energies of human competition are left free, and the object of that is to make competition still freer than it has been. Anything that tended to make it freer would be within the spirit of the clause. If my honorable friend wants to interfere with the spirit of the clause so far as it relates to railways, he must do it under the provisions having reference to the railways. Now, I will suppose that the Victorian Railway department, after the Commonwealth is established, intimate that they will carry wool, and especially New South Wales wool, from Wodonga, free. If there was no clause specially dealing with the subject, and giving the Commonwealth power to look into the matter, how could New South Wales go into court, and complain that her trade and intercourse was being conducted for nothing down to Melbourne? Why, sir, the answer is obvious. It may be very hard on you, but certainly we cannot call it foreign to the spirit of a clause which was designed to make trade and intercourse as easy, as expeditious, and as cheap as possible. When the ordinary rules of human competition are being interfered with, they cannot be interfered with under a clause which is designed to make them as free and as untrammelled as possible.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I do not think I said a single word which justified the assertion that I quarrelled with the doctrine of intercolonial free-trade. Anything I said on that subject I think must have assured the Convention, at least those who listened to me, that my opinion was directly the opposite. If it was not for the belief that we should get intercolonial free-trade we should not be here to-day trying to form a Constitution. I do not think there is any one more loyal to that principle than I am. You were clearly warned by Sir John Downer-I think on the construction of the words, and by a good many observations that fell from my honorable friends, including, I think, the leader and Mr. Reid, when we were talking on the question of preferential rates—that it was an interference with the true freedom of trade by having preferential rates. It was said just now that Victoria felt the pressure of it. Victoria does not. She will gain more by intercolonial free-trade than she will gain by anything else under this Constitution, and she desires to have it, and to preserve it to its fullest extent.

Mr. BARTON. -

Why don't you take it without qualification, then?

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am willing to accept intercolonial free-trade without qualification, but what I desire to say—and the leader has not in the smallest degree addressed one observation to the point I made before—is that the smaller rates charged by Victoria for produce, and having the effect of attracting that produce to the Victorian railways under a Victorian state law, would have the effect of interfering with the freedom of that trade amongst the states.

Mr. REID. -

Not in the sense of that clause at all.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Because it draws it from New South Wales to Victoria, whereas New South Wales, in giving any rates she chooses for the Riverina produce, only draws it from Riverina to Sydney, and therefore not from one state to another.

Mr. BARTON. -
How can you be accused of derogating from freedom of trade by giving lower rates on your railways than somebody else does?

Mr. ISAACS. -
My honorable friend is now taking a slightly different view of this matter from that which be pressed on the Convention when the question of preferential rates was under consideration.

Mr. BARTON. -
No; I have spoken of these preferential rates as offending against the provisions against preferences. If you had not those provisions against preferences it would be debatable whether they interfered with intercolonial free-trade.

Mr. ISAACS. -
That surely gives the whole case away. We have provisions as to preferences, but that does not alter the provisions of this section. If you once admit that the absence of any statement as to preferences would make it possible to say that this was an interference with freedom of trade under this clause, this clause is not altered in the slightest degree by a reference to preferences in a clause somewhere else.

Mr. BARTON. -
I beg my honorable friend's pardon, that is not what I said. I dealt with these matters of prohibition against preferences in my speeches, and I said it was quite debatable whether a lower rate was an infringement of intercolonial free-trade.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I accept the honorable member's position, and taking his own view of that matter just expressed, and taking the decided view of Sir John Downer, and coupling with it in the last degree my own distinct view about it, I say we are doing wrong in not making it clear that Victoria is to be placed in no worse position than any other colony. If my learned friend wishes to put in any words in any part of that section, or in any part of the Constitution, which shall assure us on this point and make clear the doubt he has just expressed, I shall be amply satisfied.

Mr. BARTON. -
I only entertained this to the extent that I respected your opinion. I should not have entertained any doubt on the subject but for that.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I am much obliged to my learned friend for that remark, but his words led me to think that be entertained that doubt; and certainly it appears to me we maybe told in future, when this comes into operation, you do not leave that trade free to go to Sydney, because you, by giving lower rates to Victoria, practically put a business pressure upon the persons in Riverina, who would otherwise send their trade to Sydney, to send that trade to Melbourne.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
Let us get to the vote.

Mr. ISAACS. -
It is a most serious question. We have heard the Premier of New South Wales get up and talk about vital questions, and we have found the Convention in every instance yielding to him. If the Convention has not done so at once it has turned its back on its vote to do it immediately after. This is a question which concerns us so very closely that we ought in a clause where it is admitted there is a doubt to make it clear. It is the smallest thing we can claim when there is no difference between us as to the principle. We should have some words which, while conserving intercolonial free-trade to the full, will preserve equality of rights as between Victoria and New South Wales. We have given way to New South Wales with regard to not abridging her right as to the rivers, and surely we are entitled to some consideration in regard to our railways, and to leave the Federal Parliament or such other tribunal as we choose to appoint to say that there is no unjust intercourse between two states.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
The considerations which my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) has offered resolve themselves into two, and these I venture, with all deference, to press on the leader of the Convention. In the first place, I take it that if this clause had been the product of the present Drafting Committee we should never have seen the words "absolutely free." From the Bill of 1891 we adopted a number of phrases which we have since seen the necessity of considerably qualifying in order to express more directly and distinctly the exact meaning we desire to convey. Our purpose is to convey our meaning, and not to accomplish more than is necessary to fulfil the purpose we have in view. These words are not known to the American Constitution, and, so far as I am aware, are unknown in any other Constitution. Consequently, their operation is largely a matter for legal speculation and inquiry. So far as they imply the removal of everything in the nature of an obstruction placed in the way of intercolonial trade by any state they have our hearty approval. The only question is whether the words in their present connexion and novel combination do not go further than the removal of obstructions, and imply the power to interfere in regard to matters which may be considered to affect absolute freedom of trade and intercourse.

Mr. BARTON. -

No; because they are specifically restricted to trade and intercourse between states or among states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is a very important limitation. Without that the danger I have just expressed would be unmitigated; with that it raises the question of state right. I do not wish to allude now to the railway clauses, but understand that the sum and substance of these clauses-the bulk of which were not adopted on the request of Victoria, but which were adopted against the votes of Victorian representatives-was settled on the basis of the preservation of the statu quo, or its modification equally all round. No colony was to be exceptionally injured, none was to be specially benefited. Trade and commercial intercourse were to be absolutely free; but so far as these colonies were at present competitors, they were to be left free to compete one with another by any commercial means they chose to employ which did not interfere with trade and commerce. The Right Hon. the Premier of New South Wales has put a series of illustrations within the last few minutes, which clearly illustrate and elucidate that principle. But the question I want to suggest to the leader of the Convention is whether, when limited by the words "among the states," the application of the clause would not go further than Mr. Reid has assumed; whether they do not forbid only one kind of state competition? If those words be taken to require absolute freedom of trade between the states, and only between them, they may, by implication, injure us for the benefit of New South Wales. I have no hesitation in asking the consideration of the leader of the Convention and of the members of the Drafting Committee to that particular issue before they meet us again on Wednesday next. We labour under this difficulty, that Victoria is the only colony interested in this question.

Mr. BARTON.

My difficulty is that I can't really understand what difficulty exists.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The general intent of the railway clauses is to establish the statu quo as between states competing for traffic, or to modify it equally to all concerned. If that be so-if the railway clauses leave the states free to compete for traffic, which is open to more than one state-then when we come to this clause, we ask whether it does not limit its operation to trade and commerce passing between the states; whether it does not operate so as to prevent Victoria from competing by offering concession rates for goods obtained beyond its own boundaries; while it leaves the rival colony of New South Wales free to make any reductions she pleases, because those goods are produced in its own territory?

Mr. BARTON. -
That does not arise under this clause; it may arise under the preference clause. I really cannot understand your difficulty.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If Victoria charged a higher rate for New South Wales produce than she charged for Victorian produce, would it not be a violation of this clause?

Mr. BARTON. -
I very much doubt whether it would. I do not see very easily how that can be. It might be a preference; it is simply a charge for services rendered.

Mr. REID. -
Trade is perfectly free all the same.

Mr. BARTON. -
I think somebody has got hold of a bogey here to-night.

Mr. REID. -
Does not Mr. Deakin think that on some other clause he can get what he wants? He will not do it on this clause, because the amendment has been defeated.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
I rose for the purpose of emphasizing the appeal which the Attorney-General of Victoria has made, and which I repeat. I shall be satisfied, although not fortunate enough to make myself understood by the leader, if he reconsidered the effect of this clause upon the clauses relating to railway rates. I do not say that I share the alarm to the same extent as the Attorney-General of Victoria, but it appears to me to be a matter which is not as clear as the leader of the Convention thinks it is.

Mr. BARTON. -
If I find it is not clear I shall be the first to confess it.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
That is why I make this appeal with perfect confidence, and shall be satisfied with the result.

Mr. BARTON. -
Do you wish me to carefully read the Hansard report of to-night's debate?

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Yes; if the honorable member has not been able to catch the point now as to the general effect of this clause on the particular provisions of the railway clauses. I ventured to rise because Victoria is the only colony interested. Victoria is not represented on the Drafting Committee, whose members, with the best will in the world and every possible effort to do justice to the circumstances of the case, cannot be as familiar with the circumstances of Victoria as we are, and cannot see the difficulty from our point of view, unless they look through our spectacles. If they do that, they will possibly see the ground of this alarm, which, of course, may be quite insufficient but it was because I felt that otherwise this peculiar position would not be readily realized by the Drafting Committee that I rose to make this statement.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think my friends will agree with me that any further discussion of this subject to-night will be futile. Mr. Isaacs and Mr. Deakin have put their position fully. I have not been able to follow them, but I will read the Hansard report of to-night's debate, and I will do everything I can to master the position which they have set out; and although I cannot promise to look at the matter through their spectacles, I will look at it with my own eyes, in the light that their speeches furnish me. If I then become not merely convinced that they are right, but even if I feel a very serious doubt whether this clause will not do some injustice, I will do what I can to get the Drafting Committee to make the matter acceptable to honorable members, always reserving to myself, if I think the clause is clear, the right to make no alteration whatever.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -

It seems to me that the arguments of the Hon. the Attorney-General of Victoria and of the Hon. Mr. Deakin are founded on the fallacy that, under this Bill as we are likely to pass it, Victoria will be allowed to maintain her preferential rates to the border; but under these clauses they will be entirely done away with. The preferential rates will be merged in a rate which is uniform. Therefore, we may just as well proceed to pass this clause as it is.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 90. - Until the imposition of uniform duties of customs-

I. The Commonwealth shall credit to each state the revenues collected therein from the duties of customs and of excise, and in the performance of services and the exercise of powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth under this Constitution.

II. The Commonwealth shall debit to each state-

(a) the expenditure therein of the Commonwealth in the collection of duties of customs and of excise, and in the performance of the services and the exercise of the powers transferred from the state to the Commonwealth under this Constitution.

(b) the proportion of the state, according to the number of its people, in the expenditure of the Commonwealth incurred by reason of the original powers given to it by this Constitution.

But any expenditure of the Commonwealth originated by the requirements of the Commonwealth in respect of services or powers transferred, and not incurred solely for the maintenance or continuance in any state of the services existing at the time of the transfer, shall be taken to be incurred by reason of the original powers given to the Commonwealth by this Constitution.

III. The Commonwealth shall pay to each state month by month the balance (if any) in favour of the state.

Sir PHILIP FYSH (Tasmania). -

I beg to move-

That the following new sub-section be added to the clause, to follow sub-section (1):

The Commonwealth shall credit each state with the full amount of the uniform duty chargeable on the importation of goods imported into a colony, province, or state, but which, under conditions of section 89, have passed for home consumption into another state.

Provision has been made by the Finance Committee, as embodied in clause 92 as it now stands, in sub-section (1), that during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties of customs the duties which arise from the home consumption of goods in the various states shall be credited to the states wherein that consumption takes place; and, although the duties may have been collected elsewhere, yet when the goods have entered another state for consumption the duties "shall be taken to have been collected, not in the former, but in the latter state." Now, subsequently, an addition has been made to a former clause (clause 89) which reads thus:-

But notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, goods imported before the imposition of uniform duties of customs into any state, or into any colony or province which, whilst the goods remain therein, becomes a state, shall, on thence entering another state within two years after the imposition of such duties be liable to the duty (if any) chargeable on the importation of such goods into the Commonwealth, less the duty (if any) which was paid in respect of the goods on their importation.

That was inserted for the purpose of protecting the consuming states with respect to their duties in connexion with goods which had been imported prior to the imposition of uniform duties into such a state as Victoria or.
New South Wales. It would follow from this subsection that, when the goods are consumed in a state into which they were not originally imported, the duty arising therefrom would attach to the state wherein they were consumed. Goods may have been imported into Victoria under a 10 per cent. Tariff, and might ultimately pass for consumption into Tasmania under the uniform Tariff, which might be 20 per cent. But Tasmania would only be able to collect 10 per cent., although she should be entitled to the full 20 per cent. thereon. This is a more important matter than some honorable members may think. I have taken, for example, figures concerning importations from Victoria to Tasmania in the year 1896. They amounted to £427,000; £283,000 worth of these were British or foreign products which paid duty in Victoria, but were not consumed in Victoria. Again, exports from Victoria to Western Australia in the same year amounted to £2,000,000, but £450,000 worth of those were not intercolonial goods at all, but British and foreign products. Again, in the same year, goods to the value of £846,000 were imported from Victoria to South Australia, of which £283,000 worth were British and foreign products. Victoria, therefore, was the larger exporter to these other three states, and judging from my experience will continue to be so. In regard to Tasmania, it will be seen £283,000 worth of British and foreign goods were, first of all, imported into Victoria and paid duty there—for example, 10 per cent—but were consumed in Tasmania, where, say, they would pay 10 per cent. more, making the 20 per cent. which we may assume would be the Federal Tariff. Thus Tasmania will only collect 10 per cent., whilst Victoria has collected 10 per cent.; whereas Tasmania should have collected the full 20 per cent. of the uniform Tariff. Consequently, when we were considering the paragraph I have quoted from clause 89, I called attention to this matter, and Mr. Holder suggested that it would be better for an amendment to be made in clause 90. I therefore postponed the proposal which I then made to the Convention to add another paragraph to clause 89, with a view of meeting what I think was a very proper suggestion of Mr. Holder, with which the Treasurer of Victoria (Sir George Turner) agreed. My intention is that every state should receive the full benefit of the duty on the goods consumed in that state.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
You are only repeating what is already in the clause.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -
If the honorable member can show me that, it is in the clause already, I shall be content to withdraw my amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
It seems to me you want the duty on goods not consumed in your state.
Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

No, I only propose to take the full amount of duty on goods consumed in a state.

Mr. GLYNN. -

But you are crediting it to the wrong state—not the one that consumes, but the one that despatches goods.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

The goods, in the instance I mentioned, are consumed in Tasmania. The Commonwealth duty is 20 per cent., but Tasmania can only collect 10 per cent., inasmuch as the goods have already paid 10 per cent. in Victoria.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is right as far as it goes, but the clause does not say that the 10 per cent. is to be taken by Victoria.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

If the honorable member will look at the amendment which I have framed, he will understand my position. I am sorry that I have not had the advantage of consulting the Drafting Committee with regard to it, but I hope that they will take care that the purpose I have in view is carried out. If the principle be adopted by the Convention the phraseology may be left to the Drafting Committee.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

This would not be for long, but only at the beginning.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

Only for two years prior to the imposition of the uniform Tariff, in which two years a large quantity of goods may be stocked up in Victoria, at a low rate of duty, say 5, 10, or 15 per cent. ad valorem, which in a certain year after the uniform Tariff is imposed shall be re-exported to Tasmania, Western Australia, or South Australia. I have pointed out that the amount, so far as Tasmania is concerned, is £283,000, with regard to South Australia £283,000, and Western Australia £450,000 a year. That is the amount of the import. I am asked by Mr. McMillan what amount I estimate as the loss to each of these three states. That is impossible to say.

Mr. REID. -

It is too small at this hour of the morning.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. -

It may be, so far as the right honorable member is concerned, but I am sorry he does not consider the needs of the smaller states. It is my duty to see that, if it is only £10,000, it would be a considerable percentage on £283,000; or, if it is only £5,000, I do not see why the smaller states should not enjoy the benefit of even £5,000. It is not so much a question of amount as a question of accuracy. The purpose of the Finance Committee was, as shown in clause 92, to give to each state the full amount of the duty upon goods consumed in that state. When the subsection of clause 89 was proposed it became obvious to those who had thought over the matter that an omission had taken place. Therefore, I called attention to the consequential amendment necessary, and I ask the Convention to consider the matter in order that the Drafting Committee may include it in the Bill. I want the principle to be affirmed by the Convention that the Commonwealth shall credit each state with the full amount of the uniform duty chargeable on goods imported into the state. Clause 89 points out the conditions which are to be observed. If goods are imported into Victoria or New South Wales prior to the imposition of a uniform Tariff, and if those goods were exported at a higher rate under the uniform Tariff to Tasmania, South Australia, or Western Australia, those three states which consumed the goods should have the full amount credited to them of the duty paid upon the goods.

Mr. MCMILLAN. - Will it make much difference?

Sir PHILIP FYSH. - I am referring to the Victorian Tariff. So far as New South Wales is concerned, being almost a free-trade colony, goods coming to that state when re-exported to Tasmania would make very little difference. But when I found that goods of the value of £1,000,000, are exported from Victoria to the three smaller states, and that under the Victorian Tariff these goods pay a duty of 10 per cent., I saw that the item was worth consideration, and I would not be discharging my duty to Tasmania, at any rate, if I did not call attention to this matter. Whether it be a matter of £5,000 or £10,000-

Mr. MCMILLAN. - It may be only £1,000 year.

Sir PHILIP FYSH. - The honorable member cannot say that, because I have investigated the Tariff, and whatever the amount is, it is to be credited under one clause of the Bill, and it should be under another.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). - The honorable member in one sense is perfectly right, but his proposal would not be fair to a free-trade colony like New South Wales. If goods are sent from New South Wales to Tasmania on which duty has to be calculated under the Federal Tariff, although that colony would not be credited with the duties on the goods. That would be absolutely unfair to New South Wales, and I think the honorable member had better leave things as they are.

Sir Philip Fysh's amendment was negatived without a division.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I hope some members of the Drafting Committee will consider this matter. Sir Philip Fysh has made out a very good case, which, I think, is absolutely unanswerable. Unfortunately, the subsection, as drafted, does just the opposite to what is intended.

The clause was agreed to.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -
I beg to move-
That the following new clause be inserted, to follow clause 90: -

The net revenue from Customs and Excise shall be applied as follows: -
(a) Not more than one-twentieth of such net revenue shall be applied towards the expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of its original powers.
(b) Not more than four-twentieths of such net revenue shall be applied towards the expenditure of the Commonwealth in making good the net loss on the services taken over.
(c) The balance of such net revenue remaining after the application of the sums actually applied, pursuant to the last preceding paragraphs (a) and (b), shall be distributed amongst the states.

At this hour of the morning, and in the condition of sleepiness I am at the present moment, I am afraid I shall not do justice to the motion. I do not think it requires many words to explain what this clause is, and, I hope, to induce honorable members to support me. Still I could have wished to propose it at an earlier hour of the sitting, and so have done more justice to it. What I am asking for in the first place is to provide for the expenditure of the Federal Government; in the second place, that the Federal Government shall raise sufficient money to carry on the affairs of the Commonwealth and the affairs of the states; and in the third place, that there be granted a certain fixed portion of the revenue collected to the contributing states.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -
That cannot be done.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I would remind my honorable friend that he does not express the opinion of everybody. I think it can be done very simply. The expenditure under the first head of the proposed new clause has been estimated at something like £300,000, and under the second head at £1,200,000, making a total of £1,500,000, or a million and a half to be supplied for the purposes of the Commonwealth. Taking the total net revenue from Customs and Excise at £6,000,000, that will leave four and a half millions to be distributed among the various states. We have heard many appeals made in this Convention that if the Bill is framed in a certain way delegates cannot go back and recommend it to their people. I do not know how it is with other states, but I may say, with the most perfect truthfulness, that unless this provision be made I see no hope whatever of recommending the Bill to the people of Tasmania. What the people will ask their representatives on their return to the colony will be-"What guarantee can you give us of the position we shall occupy financially when we enter this Federation?" Without this clause we should be absolutely hopeless and helpless, and should be able to give no answer whatever as to the position in which the people will stand when we are united. All this absence of ability to give a satisfactory reply, accompanied by a series of leaflets from Mr. Coghlan, telling Tasmania-because I suppose the people will see those leaflets-that their entrance into federation means for them a hopeless state of their financial affairs-
Mr. BARTON. -
Tasmania does not seem to believe Mr. Coghlan.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

But there is the fact confronting us that these matters have been made public through the press, and will necessarily reach the people. The first question put by the people to their representatives on their return will, as I said before, be-"Well, how shall we stand as to revenue? How much revenue shall we have secured to us out of Customs and Excise, to which we look at the present moment for the payment of interest on our debt, and to which we always look as the main part of our revenue?" The Tasmanian representatives have to return to their colony and say that they can with confidence ask the people to vote for the Bill, because the representatives know the country will be left in a sound financial position.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

Although I do not agree altogether with the statement of Sir Edward Braddon in regard to the position of Tasmania, I quite agree with the motion. Tasmania is not only able to meet her engagements, but also to have a large surplus at the end. At the present time Victoria is paying all our debts, and is contributing daily to the release of our capital. With the assistance of Victoria there is no doubt we shall meet all our engagements, whether at the present or any other time. But the motion is a good one. It states that the Federal Parliament shall only be able to take out of our revenue a certain sum. We know the amount we can raise, and we know that the amount taken should only be a certain quota of the amount so raised. There can, therefore, be no danger to Tasmania from coming into the arrangement under existing circumstances. I take a more hopeful view than Sir Edward Braddon of our position and of the way from day to day that position is being improved. We have already gone through a time of difficulty, and we had no doubt to go into taxation to a considerable extent.
Those days have gone by, and we are now reaping the benefit of our curtailment of expenditure. We have already decided to increase payment to our civil servants in all directions, and we are going on prosperously. At the same time, I agree with Sir Edward Braddon that it is desirable to come to some decision as to the mode of dividing our revenue, and I think the proposal is a good means of carrying such a decision into effect. I therefore hope the committee will decide to give to the colony from which I come the benefits sought by the proposal of the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Clause 92 (Payment to each state for five years after uniform Tariff),

The CHAIRMAN. -

I presume that, after the division just taken, the honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) does not wish to have clause 92 reconsidered.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

When the Drafting Committee come to look at the clause that has just been inserted, I would suggest that they may see in the amendment of which I have given notice the principle underlying this proposal. This principle may not appear upon the face of the clause itself, but I think that my amendment would give the members of the committee an indication of it.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 93-After five years from the imposition of uniform duties of customs, the Parliament may provide for the monthly distribution among the several states, on such basis as it deems fair, of all surplus revenue over the expenditure of the Commonwealth.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Honorable members will see that I have given notice of an amendment to provide for a per capita distribution of the surplus after the expiration of ten years. Therefore, I beg to move-

That after the word "customs" the following words be added, "and thereafter for a further period of five years."

The reason why I make this proposal again is that upon the last occasion it was not considered at any great length, and when the general financial clauses were under discussion several honorable members expressed themselves as being opposed to allowing the method of distribution to be left to the determination, front time to time, of the Parliament. Following the example of the politicians of Laputa, however, they voted in direct opposition to their declarations. After the expiration of ten years we may expect to find that the contributions from the various states through the Customs and Excise will be practically equal. There may, of course, be differences. From year to year there are differences of contribution within the states themselves. In a consolidation of 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 people, there are differences in the contributions from one part and another, but that does not make a difference in the way in which the various parts of the consolidation are treated. No subsidies are granted to the particular part of the consolidation from which the contribution in any one year is greater than the contribution from another part. It will be the same in this Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Are you not prepared to trust the Federal Parliament?

Mr. GLYNN. -
No; and for this reason. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) pointed out to-day what would be the position of the various states in the scramble for a portion of the surplus. Every year you will have the question of the adjustment of the surplus turning up. The states will be continually begging for more, and there will be continual quarrels about the distribution. We have a very good object-lesson in regard to this matter in Canada in relation to subsidies. Although there may be differences of contribution, if you take the average of ten years you will find that the contributions will be approximately the same. If that is so, on what ground should we allow the Federal Parliament to distribute the surplus from time to time as they think fit? Some honorable members may say on the ground that the needs of the states will differ. But we are not federating on the principle of giving subsidies to states to cover local deficits. Surely we are not to say that if a state has made a bungle of the local finances, and there is a deficit, that deficit is to be covered out of the federal surplus. The Federal Parliament will have no control over the policy of the states, and they cannot be asked to grant votes in aid to cover deficits in the local revenue. We may fairly expect that after ten years the per capita contribution from Customs will be the same, and we ought to put some limit to the time within which the Parliament can apportion the surplus otherwise than on a per capita basis. I would ask the members of the Convention to follow the policy that has been adopted in almost every Federation. There is not a Federation in the world in which this principle of allowing the Parliament to periodically change the apportionment of the surplus has been adopted. It has not been adopted in Germany, America, or Switzerland, and what is there to justify the application of this principle in the Australian Federation? I would ask honorable members to reconsider the hasty vote they gave on a former occasion, and to agree to this amendment.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

We must be careful at this late hour not to stultify by our vote what we have done hitherto. We have laid it down as a principle that there shall be five years' breathing time in this Commonwealth, in which those who have to deal with public affairs shall have an opportunity afforded to them of considering what is best to be done. It is arrogating too much to ourselves to say that, at the end of ten years, we shall adopt any particular basis for the distribution of the surplus. We have here a country of a very peculiar character. States may be subdivided and again subdivided within the next twenty or thirty years, and we have no knowledge of the conditions which may exist then. It would be far better for us to leave it to those who will know the conditions of the future to deal with the question. We must ultimately come to a per capita distribution. That is the only fair and scientific mode of distributing the surplus, but we should leave to the Federal Parliament a free hand to deal with the matter as circumstances arise. No man can possibly foresee the circumstances of the future. If we are going to trust the whole of our interests to the Federal Parliament, we can surely trust them with the distribution of this surplus. It would be a calamity to put into the Constitution any provision of a drastic character which might not be applicable when the time has arrived. What is the good of talking about ten years hence? How do we know what will be the conditions ten years hence? I think, therefore, that at this late hour of our deliberations we ought not to disturb the principles which we have laid down as the basis of this Constitution. My honorable friend would act wisely if he withdrew the amendment.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This matter was discussed before, and the opinion of the leading financial authorities in the Convention was expressed upon it. There were then fifteen votes in favour of the amendment and 31 against. Unless there is some sound reason for supposing that out of a majority of fifteen seven or eight gentlemen have changed their opinions, we should come to a vote upon the subject at once.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Does the honorable member wish to move the other amendments standing in his name on the paper?

Mr. GLYNN. -
I do not wish to move the others.
The clause was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -
The next clause will be a new clause to be proposed by Mr. Higgins, to follow clause 93.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I do not think the honorable member wishes to go on with that clause. Before he went away, he asked me to look after another clause standing in his name, but he did not mention this clause.

The CHAIRMAN. -
Then I will go on to the next amendment, which is a new clause-93B-to be proposed by Mr. Glynn.

Mr. GLYNN. -
I do not propose to move that.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I have a short amendment which I propose to move in place of that one, not to accomplish the same purpose, but for quite a different object. It has been pointed out in the public press, and also by some merchants trading with Western Australia, that it is just possible that the clause we adopted the other day may work in a very unfair manner. It may be possible that, under that clause, duties will be charged at a certain rate on goods arriving... in Western Australia which are the produce or manufacture of the federated colonies, while similar goods arriving from places outside the Commonwealth will be introduced to Western Australia at a lower or possibly no rate of duty at all. That is clearly not intended by the Convention, and so I have framed some words, with the assistance of Mr. Barton, which will prevent such a possibility, and which, at the same time, will do no injury to Western Australia, and will in no sense destroy the effect to her of the clause we adopted. I beg to move-

That clause 93c be amended by the addition of the following words:-

"And at no time shall a lower duty be charged on goods originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth than is charged on similar goods not originally so imported."

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia).-

So far as the colony I represent is concerned, I see no objection to the amendment unless my learned friend (Mr. Barton) does. When the Federal Tariff is being constructed, the Parliament will have before them the Tariff existing in Western Australia, and therefore probably they will recollect it so as to avoid what my friend (Mr. Holder) desires to avoid. I am afraid that Mr. Barton will not think that this is a very scientific way of dealing with this matter. It looks a little bit clumsy to me, but if he has no objection to it, I have none. The only difference so far as Western Australia is concerned would be that perhaps a little more revenue will be received. I do not desire the insertion of the amendment. I have no objection to it, but I fear it will not improve our work so as to make it read better. It is a little bit clumsy to me, and I think the Federal Parliament will take care of the matter that is referred to in the clause. Western Australia can have no objection to it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales).-

It might be better-what I am suggesting has really arisen from the remarks of Sir John Forrest-if this amendment were altered to read in this way:-

And at no time shall a higher duty be charged on goods not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth than is charged on similar goods originally so imported.

I am not financier or arithmetician enough to notice what the particular difference is. But the difficulty I see is that this amendment would compel the Commonwealth to make a Tariff up to a certain height, and that height would be dictated by the Tariff of Western Australia on intercolonial goods.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

No.
Mr. BARTON. -

Now, the clause says, saving anything in the Constitution, that the Parliament of Western Australia may, during these five years, impose duties of customs on goods entering that state and not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I think it is the Tariff existing at the time.

Mr. BARTON. -

The Parliament of Western Australia may, during these five years, impose duties of customs on goods not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth. That is to say, it may impose duties on intercolonial products, to use the short term, and those duties are to be collected by the Commonwealth.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We cannot impose them during five years, any way.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes, that is what the clause is for.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I think, speaking from memory, it is not.

Mr. BARTON. -

My right honorable friend's memory is not so good as the cold type of the clause. Lest he thinks that I have misquoted the clause, I will read the very words.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am right, I am sure. The Tariff must exist at the time the uniform Tariff is imposed.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is a second part of the clause. The clause reads:

Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, the Parliament of the state of Western Australia may, during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties, impose duties of customs on goods entering that state and not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth; and such duties (if any) shall be collected by the Commonwealth.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is the first part of the clause, which empowers the Parliament of Western Australia to impose duties on intercolonial products during that term; but there is this qualification:--

But any duty so imposed on any article shall not exceed during the first of such years the duty chargeable on the article under the law of Western Australia in force at the imposition of uniform duties and shall not exceed during the second, third, fourth, and fifth of such years respectively, four-fifths, three-fifths, two-fifths, and one-fifth respectively of such latter duty, and all such duties shall cease at the expiration of the fifth year after the imposition of uniform duties.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I am right, and you are right, too.

Mr. BARTON. -

As "The Mikado" says, I am right, and you are right, and everybody else is right. Now we are asked to insert this proviso:-

And at no time shall a lower duty be charged on goods originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth than is charged on similar goods not originally so imported.

The point I request attention to, and it is not one to be treated lightly, I think, is that, inasmuch as the power of the Parliament of Western Australia during those five years is confined to the imposition of intercolonial duties, and the power as to external duties is in the Parliament of the Commonwealth, then it follows, if you provide that at no time shall a lower duty be charged on goods from abroad than is charged on intercolonial goods, the Commonwealth Tariff is affected to this extent, that the Commonwealth is not entitled to charge a lower duty than Western Australia charges intercolonially if the goods are the same. Now, the difficulty about that is this: That as the power of legislation for five years after the imposition of the uniform Tariff rests with Western Australia, the action of Western Australia during those five years, although applied to intercolonial goods, regulates the power of the Commonwealth to levy duties on similar goods from abroad. That is an effect of the amendment which I did not see at first. I can quite understand the perfectly just object of the proposal, but the trouble that arises under it as it stands-and when Mr. Holder consulted me I altered its phraseology, but simply to carry out his own view-is that if you prohibit the Commonwealth from charging a lower duty during those five years than Western Australia charges on her imports, you allow the legislative power of Western Australia to regulate the Tariff imposed by the Commonwealth on external goods. I do not think I can make it more clear than that. I am quite sure my right honorable friend does not mean it to have that effect, and I do not think Mr. Holder meant it to have that effect; but I must point out that that may be its effect if the amendment is carried in its present form. I am quite sure that the object of the amendment is a perfectly just one, but if it is agreed to without alteration it would limit the power of the Commonwealth in a certain degree by preventing the Commonwealth from charging any lower duty on foreign goods imported into Australia than Western Australia charges on intercolonial goods of the same kind imported into that colony.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I will take a concrete object in discussing the point at issue. I will use for the sake of illustration, the article of chaff. At the present time, and we may assume at the establishment of the Commonwealth, the duty on imported chaff is 30s per ton. Assuming that the uniform Tariff places no duty at all on chaff during the first of the five years, if any chaff comes to Western Australia from the other colonies that chaff has to pay 30s per ton, while the same article going from New Zealand or any place outside of the Commonwealth will enter Western Australia duty free, so that there is a distinct advantage given to produce imported from outside the Commonwealth. Now, I am sure that nobody intended that. What we desired was that Western Australia should have the right to keep on her present duties, but not so as to make it against the interests of Western Australia to trade with the rest of the states of the Commonwealth. The leader of the Convention suggested just now that I should deal with the matter by proposing that the duty charged on colonial goods should not be higher than the duty charged on foreign goods. If I were to take that course, however, this would be the result. For instance, take chaff. The duty on imported foreign chaff is nothing. Therefore on intercolonial chaff we do away with all the effect that this clause was intended to achieve, and prevent Western Australia charging the duty which that colony charges on chaff to-day.

Mr. BARTON. -

It looks as if that would be the result.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That would be the case.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I think we shall have to adopt the policy which is well expressed in these words. I think it cannot be put in better words than the leader of the Convention has suggested, even though it may put on the intercolonial manufactures which Western Australia imports, the first year of the uniform Tariff, the duty Western Australia now charges, and 20 per cent. lower duties in the second year, 40 per cent. less the third year, and so on down to the sum which the Federal Treasurer determines shall be the permanent uniform Tariff for any class of goods. That is a far less hardship, a much less difficulty, to impose than the difficulty of thus handicapping intercolonial goods, which would be the case if the clause were passed as it stands in the Bill. Therefore, I still adhere to the clause as I have improved it, which will do no harm to Western Australia, while it will be very good for the colonies which trade with her.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I quite agree with Mr. Holder, that a clause similar to what he has proposed ought to be adopted. If we reverse it, as suggested by the leader of the Convention, no doubt we shall inflict an injury on Western Australia by adopting these words. Although it might appear that we are fixing the Tariff, we are really doing no more than if these words were left out. Those who fix the Tariff will be representatives of the colonies then engaged in this trade; and it is not likely that they would allow foreign goods to be imported into Western Australia at a lower rate than colonial goods. And as Western Australia fixes the particular rate for the first year, I think it is almost certain that the Federal Parliament will be compelled to frame a Tariff at least equal to the Tariff of Western Australia. That is all this clause is intended to do. Whether we put the clause in or leave it out, it seems to me that the result will be the same.

Mr. BARTON. -

There is the difficulty I mentioned—you regulate the Tariff of the Commonwealth by the Tariff of Western Australia.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I think you do that whether this clause is passed or not, because representatives of other colonies having transactions with Western Australia will not frame a Federal Tariff which will allow foreign goods to be imported into Western Australia at a cheaper rate than our own goods can be imported into that colony; and they must necessarily fix a uniform Tariff at a rate at least equal to that of the Tariff of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

It seems to me that these words will have no effect whatever unless the Federal Parliament frame their Tariff so as to conform to the Tariff of Western Australia. My honorable friend, I think, was in error. He seemed to assume by the clause we passed that the Government of Western Australia would have power to alter the Tariff during the five years. As I understand it, the Tariff of Western Australia in existence at the time the uniform Tariff comes into force must remain for the first year, and be reduced 20 per cent. every year, so that we have no power reserved to us to alter our Tariff.

Mr. BARTON. -

Oh, yes; you can reduce it from time to time.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I know we can reduce it; but we cannot increase it.

Mr. BARTON. -

No; you are quite right there. The duties in the first of the five years cannot exceed the duties of your own Tariff, and your Tariff cannot exceed 80 per cent. of that the second year, 60 per cent. the third year, and so on.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Of course, we thoroughly understand that we can reduce our duties and abolish them altogether, but I see no objection in these words, because unless the Federal Parliament frames a Tariff in accord with the Tariff of Western Australia, this clause will have no effect.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I think there is a difficulty in having these words in. Not that I think the legislation will be any different if they are not in, but there are a large number of persons who hope to continue their trade with Western Australia, and if these words are not in, these people will assume that it is possible that the uniform Tariff will be made in some particulars much lower than the Tariff of Western Australia, and that the Tariff of Western Australia, for the first year, at any rate, will remain as high as it is now. I took the liberty to point out, when this question was before the Convention previously, that this would be protection of the most extraordinary character—protection of foreign goods as against goods produced in the Commonwealth. I do not think that is at all possible. The representatives of the respective colonies would not consent to a Tariff that would place them at a disadvantage as compared with people outside the Commonwealth. But what we want is to give people an assurance, and these words proposed by Mr. Holder will give that assurance, whilst they will not affect the legislation that is sure to follow in the Commonwealth Parliament.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 95A. - Nothing in this Constitution shall prevent the imposition of such railway rates by any state as may, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, be necessary for the development of its territory, if such rates apply equally to goods from other states.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have given notice of motion with regard to these clauses dealing with "Equality of Trade." I think honorable memb the sense of the committee, gathering that sense from the entire debate. All I would like to do with reference to this is to make the necessary blank by striking out clause 95A as it stands in the Bill, so that the new clause may be proposed, and then I would also move to omit the clause numbered 95c in the Bill, which is the one aimed at by the committee in the new amendment. Virtually the Drafting Committee have reversed the order in which the clauses were carried. I wish to create a blank by omitting clauses 95A, 95B, and 95c, with a view of the new provision being inserted, and then we can take the amendments of Sir George Turner and Mr. Isaacs. I think this will be the most convenient way of proceeding. I beg to move—

That the clause be struck out.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I think my honorable friend has, in the new clauses, put into better form what was the desire of the Convention when we last discussed this matter. There is only one point that I really desire to raise, and that is the question as to whether it is to be the Inter-State Commission or the Parliament that is to decide whether rates are "undue, unreasonable, or unjust to any state," or whether the rates are "for the development of the territory of the state." If my honorable friend raises no objection, I will test the matter at the proper stage, by moving to strike but the words "Inter-State Commission" in clause 95B, with a view of substituting the word "Parliament." It was well understood until the completion of the debate that it was the desire of the Convention that Parliament should settle these questions. There is a desire on the part of some honorable members that the whole question should be under the purview of the High Court, and my honorable friend (Mr. Grant) moved an amendment with regard to the development of the territory, and inserted the words "Inter-State Commission." If I recollect aright, his explanation of that was that he did not intend that the Inter State Commission should have the decision of these matters. His view was the same as ours, that the whole of these questions, being strictly political, should be decided by the Parliament. Now, the sole difference between us at the present time is, whether the decision should rest with the Parliament or the Inter-State Commission. I do not think we need discuss it at any greater length, but I feel strongly that the Parliament should retain these powers in its hands.

Clause 95A was struck out.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move—

That the following clause be inserted in place of clause 95A:—

The power of the Parliament to make laws with respect to the regulation of trade and commerce shall be taken to extend to railways the property of any state.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

This provision states that the power of the Parliament to make laws with respect to the regulation of trade and commerce shall be taken to extend to railways. That is to take the place of the clause which provided that the Parliament should make laws to provide for the execution and maintenance upon railways of the provisions relating to trade and commerce. I suppose my honorable friend is satisfied that the language of the new clause will fairly carry out the intention of the clause inserted at my instance?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have simply proposed this as being equivalent to my right honorable friend's clause, which, in an enabling form, enabled laws to be made. The only difference is that, inasmuch as these laws may have been made under the trade and commerce clause, we have proposed this new clause in a declaratory form, instead of in an enabling form. That prevents the trade and commerce clause being weakened in other respects.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I should like to thoroughly understand this new clause. I understand that clause 96 is to be left in the Bill?

Mr. BARTON. -

I am not proposing to touch it.

Mr. ISAACS. -

In clause 95B, passed at the instance of Sir George Turner, it is provided that-

The Parliament may make laws to provide for the execution and maintenance upon railways within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution relating to trade and commerce.

It uses distinctly the words "the execution and maintenance." That is to say, it may make what provision it likes; it could commit the execution and maintenance to any body it likes, to create in any way. These words are left out, and then clause 96 will be left, which will commit under the Constitution itself, independently of the Parliament., the execution and maintenance of these provisions to the Inter-State Commission. Therefore, to that extent, it is a departure under clause 95A, from 95B, in the Bill. It seems you would have to read 95A as limited by clause 96.

Mr. BARTON. -

95A is really larger than 95B was. That is the new clause 95A.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It may be larger in one respect, but it is more limited in this respect, that if Parliament were to attempt to pass a law providing that the maintenance and execution upon railways of the provisions of the Constitution relating to trade and commerce should be maintained by a board—for example, a Board of Trade—that would be unlawful, because clause 96 says that the Inter-State Commission shall be charged, under the Constitution, with the execution and maintenance of these very same provisions. Would not those clash?

Mr. BARTON. -

It is a drafting amendment open to revision here.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But if these two clauses stand would not they be in conflict?

Mr. BARTON. -

I should not like to answer the member off-hand, but my reasons for inserting these drafting amendments were that the drafting amendments were only passed pro forma.

Mr. ISAACS. -

This is a material question. The clause of Sir George Turner distinctly commits to Parliament the right to make all the laws it pleases with regard to the execution and maintenance of the trade and commerce provisions, but its power to make laws with regard to trade and commerce may merely mean that it may make substantive laws—may make a code, only to create rights and forbid wrongs, for instance. But the maintenance and execution of the provisions of the Constitution with regard to trade and commerce have been handed over, if we adhere to clause 56, to the Inter-State Commission, which will carry this out. Therefore there may be a very great difference. I should like to say that in this respect the Drafting Committee have followed exactly the provisions of the other clauses. I think it is worth while considering whether the expression in 95A that it will extend to railways the property of a state should not go further. Supposing a state allowed a company to construct a railway?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think it will be perfectly clear that that extends to railways unless the railways are the property of the state.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Do you think these words would not limit them?

Mr. BARTON. -

That is how it appears to me. It has the same power with regard to traffic internally.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I submit that it should be considered whether it would be limited in regard to railways.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Instead of being put in the enabling form, as Sir George Turner put it, this clause has been put into a declaratory form. It was thought that to put the clause into the enabling form might by the ordinary rule of construction cut down the power to regulate trade and commerce by implying that an enablement to make laws to execute those provisions with regard to railways, denied the enablement to make them in certain other matters. That would create a difficulty, and we did not want to cut down the trade and commerce clause. Therefore we put this in a declaratory form. With regard to the last part of Mr. Isaacs' objection, that they should be taken to extend to railways the property of any state, I think there can be no doubt whatever that the trade and commerce clause enables the Commonwealth to deal with all classes of trade and commerce, trade and commerce by rail as well as by river, or trade and commerce with foreign states by sea. So there can be no doubt on the question of railways, except a doubt that might be raised by reason of railways belonging to a state that they would not be subject to the trade and commerce clause. We therefore thought it better to put it in this form. We entertained no doubt that trade and commerce on a railway which is the property of private persons or a company is within the clause, and we put this so as to remove any doubt that might exist as to railways the property of any state. By adopting this clause we make no inroad upon the trade and commerce clause. As to the other point mentioned by Mr. Isaacs, I think he will see that the regulation of trade and commerce, using the wide words in the first sub-section and this clause, include the execution and maintenance of the provisions as to trade and commerce. If we had cut this down saying the execution and maintenance of the provisions relating to trade and commerce, we might have raised another implication which would have been inconvenient. But I do not think we have done that. The idea of doing so was the very furthest from my thoughts. I do not think we are doing anything to weaken the 96th clause, or this clause, by using the words "trade and commerce" here, because it is plain that the powers given to the Commonwealth to regulate trade and commerce include any law for the execution and maintenance of the provisions of the trade and commerce clause. It may mean a little more than it means here. The honorable member seems to think there is not a parity of words there.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No; is there not a distinct instrument mentioned in clause 96, which could not be changed by Parliament, an instrument for the maintenance and execution of these provisions?
Mr. Barton. -

Yes; there is a great deal to be said for that contention, except that we must read the powers together. It may be that a little more drafting is necessary in that respect. We must read the powers conferred by the first sub-section of clause 52, by which Parliament has the right to make regulations for trade and commerce generally. By this we provide that the power shall be construed to extend to railways. Then we have the 96th clause, which says the Parliament may regulate the powers, adjudication, and administration of the Inter-State Commission so that they shall be charged with the execution of these laws. You must read these two things together, and we must not forget that at the suggestion of Sir George Turner, we inserted the words "of all laws made thereunder." I think that by the insertion of those words Sir George Turner has succeeded in removing what might have been a source of doubt there. If you look at the beginning of the clause you will see that the Commonwealth Parliament can give such powers for adjudication and administration as it deems necessary, subject to the proviso, but the proviso relates to laws made under the Constitution, as well as the law of the Constitution. The powers of adjudication and administration which the Parliament may limit as it pleases, subject to the proviso, are simply co-extensive with the grant of the power. They can be cut down and increased, so that the commission may be charged with the trade and commerce clause. So long as they make a law within the Constitution in which the Inter-State Commission is subject to this charge the powers of adjudication and administration within the law may be limited as the Commonwealth deems necessary. That seems to get rid of the difficulty, because in clause 95A the interpretation of the regulation of trade and commerce is inclusive.

Mr. Glynn (South Australia). -

We want to be a little careful not to limit the power of Parliament to railways the property of any state. In the original Bill the

Mr. Barton. -

This is not the clause by which we did that in the former Bill. That was clause 96.

The Chairman. - We have not got to clause 96.

Mr. Glynn. -

I quite understand that, Sir Richard Baker, but in not one of the other clauses, so far as I can tell from a hurried look, does the word "rivers" occur.

The Chairman. -
I must ask the honorable member to deal with one clause at a time.

Mr. BARTON. -

May I explain the reason why railways and rivers were struck out? The word occurred in clause 96, which relates to the constitution of the Inter-State Commission; and the reason rivers and railways were struck out was because it was intended to make the powers of the Inter-State Commission general.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I understand that; but if you do not specify railways at all under the trade and commerce clause the powers of Parliament will, if we may judge by what has occurred in America, extend to commerce on rivers. But the moment you begin to specify what is included in the trade and commerce clause, you, by implication, cut down its operation in other directions. The effect of specifying that it extends to railways may be to imply that it does not extend to rivers. It might very well be argued that if the framers of the Constitution intended it should extend to rivers, they would have so specified. That is a perfectly fair interpretation of the clause. I ask those who are interested in seeing that the trade and commerce clause shall extend to rivers, to see that rivers are mentioned as well as railways. With a view of testing the question, I move-

That the words and rivers" be added to clause 95.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I cannot consent to this amendment. I have already explained what the object of this additional provision is. The regulation of trade and commerce obviously, without any doubt, extends to rivers and navigation. In fact, there is a question whether the eighth subsection, dealing with navigation, was ever necessary; I do not think it was. The object of my present proposal is to remove a doubt as to whether the Commonwealth would have power to regulate trade and commerce on state owned railways. Rivers have nothing to do with the matter in this connexion. Rivers are entirely under the trade and commerce clause, and so are private railways. There is no such thing as a state-owned railway in the legal sense, because the navigation of a river is simply as a highway, and the proprietary rights, apart from the navigation of the river, depend on the ownership of the land itself. There does not seem to be any reason why we should include rivers here. I am not talking about this in any sense as a politician, but simply as a draftsman, and, as a matter of drafting, there is no reason to include the words proposed by Mr. Glynn.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I would ask the leader of the Convention whether he would have any objection to words providing that this section is not to be held to limit the effect of the trade and commerce clause?

Mr. BARTON. -

I do object, because those words would spoil the whole drafting of the clause.

Mr. GLYNN. -

My objection remains, because you are, by implication, providing that the clause does not apply to something which is not specified.

Mr. BARTON. -

This clause is simply for the purpose of removing a doubt as to whether the powers of the Parliament extend to state-owned railways. It is no use saying that in other respects this clause cuts down the operation of the trade and commerce clause, because it cannot do that.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member (Mr. Glynn) press his amendment?

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

According to the feeling of the committee it would be of no use to press the amendment, and I beg leave to withdraw it under the circumstances.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

The new clause was agreed to.

Clause 95B was struck out.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move that the following new clause be inserted:-

Clause 95F. - The Parliament may by any such law forbid, in respect of railways, any preference or discrimination by any state, or by any authority constituted under a state, which the Inter-State Commission may deem undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any state.

But due consideration shall be given to the financial responsibilities incurred by any state in connexion with the construction and maintenance of its railways.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I now propose to test the feeling of the Convention as to whether we are to allow these great powers to be in the hands of this Inter-State Commission, or whether we will reserve them for Parliament.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Will the right honorable gentleman allow me for one moment? There is an amendment, given notice of by Mr Higgins, which must come before that to which Sir George Turner is about to direct attention. Mr. Higgins, who is not well, and has gone home, asked me to move on his behalf-

That after the word "discrimination" the words "or differential rates" be added.
Mr. Higgins contends that "discrimination" refers to persons or things, and that under the power to prevent unjust discriminations you could not put an end to differential rates which operate unjustly to another state. A differential rate, such as the long-distance rates in New South Wales, does operate detrimentally to Victoria, but it is not a discrimination against a person or thing. It would be quite possible for people outside the colony to take advantage of such a rate as for the, people inside the colony. It is not a personal discrimination, nor is it a discrimination against things. Therefore, a differential rate not coming under the category either of a personal discrimination or of a discrimination against things, would not be within the scope of the clause. This being so, the honorable and learned member considered that the position of Victoria would be an unfair one. While the Victorian preferential rates would be abolished, if the Inter-State Commission thought them unreasonable, the New South Wales differential rates would not be abolished. As a matter of policy, I do not think there can be any objection to the amendment. Unless the differential rate is, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, undue or unreasonable, or unjust to a state, it will hold good, and before the Inter-State Commission can decide in regard to it they must take into account under the concluding words of the clause the financial responsibilities incurred by the state in the construction and maintenance of its railways. Therefore, although a differential rate may be unjust, if it is necessary to give a fair return to the railways, it can be kept on. Clause 95c puts an additional limitation upon the discretion of the Inter-State Commission, and enables the commission to declare a rate unjust, because it is there stated that, notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, a rate imposed upon any railway the property of a state shall be taken to be lawful if it applies equally to the goods of other states, and the Inter-State Commission deem it to be necessary for the development of the territory of the state.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

You want to guard against preference being shown in connexion with the fixing of rates in such a way as to attract traffic from another colony. Discrimination is the proper word to apply to differences in locality, in persons, and in goods. Surely that covers everything.

The amendment was negatived.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

The clause before us originally provided that the Parliament should determine whether a rate, or a preference, or a discrimination was undue, unreasonable, or unjust to any state, but now Parliament cannot act until the Inter-State Commission has certified that a rate is unreasonable. I fail to see why we cannot intrust to the Parliament the power to deal with these matters, which appear to me to be purely political.

Mr. Reid. -
I should call them judicial.

Sir George Turner. -
Then they ought to go before the High Court. That is practically the decision which my right honorable friend has brought about. He wanted these questions to go to the High Court straight away, while we wanted them to go to the Parliament.

Mr. Reid. -
We met you half-way by establishing the Inter-State Commission.

Sir George Turner. -
No, because full power of appeal from the Inter-State Commission to the High Court has been given. So that the High Court will decide everything.

Mr. Reid. -
No; only questions of law.

Sir George Turner. -
However, I do not intend to argue the question at greater length at this hour of the morning. If we intrust this power to the proper body we shall intrust it to the Parliament, and not to an Inter-State Commission. Therefore I move-
That the words "Inter-State Commission" be struck out, with a view to the insertion of the word "Parliament."

Mr. O'Connor (New South Wales). -
I do not think anything more need be said about this matter than that we have already objected to Parliament being made the tribunal to decide whether a rate is or is not objectionable, on the ground that Parliament, through its representatives, would be an interested body. We agreed that the only fair way of dealing with the question was to hand it over to the Inter-State Commission? Surely there cannot be any objection to an arrangement of that kind if you want to have a decision by an independent body.

Mr. Isaacs (Victoria). -
There are a little over a dozen members present to decide a matter of the utmost importance-the creation of a new organ, the fourth organ-in this Constitution.

Mr. O'Connor. -
The question has been pretty well thrashed out already.

Mr. Isaacs. -
We have the Parliament, the Executive, and the High Court and now a fourth organ is created independent of all the rest-the Inter-State Commission.
Mr. REID. -
One you cannot get at-one that is thoroughly independent.

Mr. ISAACS. -
According to the right honorable member, we can get at the High Court, at the Parliament, and at the Executive, but he says that the Inter-State Commission is the only thing we cannot get at. Because we cannot get at it, he is going to give the right of appeal to the High Court, which he says we cannot get at. This is in accordance with the principle of trusting the Federal Parliament. The Federal Parliament may by law forbid any preference or discrimination which the Inter-State Commission chooses to say is wrong. What a provision to put into a Constitution! The Inter-State Commission is to decide that a preference or discrimination is unjust, and that will enable the Parliament to pass a law forbidding this discrimination or preference. What a position to which to reduce an august legislative tribunal. I think that it is degrading the Parliament, as

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -
I confess I do not quite understand the meaning of this clause. It is not by any means clear. If it read-"The Parliament shall deem unjust or unreasonable" I could understand it, but if the Parliament is to do as they please on the advice of the Inter-State Commission, that would not be enough, and I think it would be better to state that the Parliament "shall" deal with the matter. No doubt the Parliament would then be guided by the advice of the Inter-State Commission.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -
I am astounded at the remarks just made by Mr. Grant. I faithfully and loyally followed him like a pet lamb all through the discussion of this matter, and now at the first seductive whisper from the two honorable members whose names appear in connexion with the amendment, Mr. Grant, who was singularly clear before, has become particularly mixed.

Mr. GRANT. -
The clause has been altered.

Mr. REID. -
The word "may" is the word that is always used in connexion with Parliament and the making of laws. You cannot compel Parliament to pass a Bill. It has the power to throw any Bill out, and that is why the word "shall" is not used. But "may" means "shall" in the sense that Parliament having this duty imposed upon it will carry it out.

Question-That the words "Inter-State Commission" proposed to be omitted stand part of the clause-put.

Clause 95c was struck out.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move the following new clause:-

Clause 95G. - Notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, a rate imposed upon any railway the property of a state shall be taken to be lawful if the rate applies equally to goods from other states, and if the Inter-State Commission deem it to be necessary for the development of the territory of the state.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -
The condition imposed here that a rate shall be taken to be lawful if it applies equally to goods from other states is, of course, meaningless.

Mr. BARTON. -
That is one of the suggestions Sir Samuel Griffith made.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
Yes. The only provision that would be effective would be to require that any differential rates charged on any line of railway should apply measured from either terminus of the railway. In that case, it would be obvious that the differential rates were used for the development of the colony, and not for the injury of any other colony. As it stands, this particular provision appears to be meaningless, and we are left entirely to the opinion of the Inter-State Commission as to what is necessary for the development of a state. The words could not be wider and more indefinite, and what decision will be given under them no one can predict.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

By the clause we have just passed, it is provided that no preference or discrimination can be forbidden by Parliament unless the Inter-State Commission deems it undue, or unreasonable, or unjust to any State. Well, we understand that, but then it goes on in clause 95c to say that, notwithstanding that, the rate shall be lawful if it applies to goods from other states, and is, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, deemed necessary for the development of its territory.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That overrides everything.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Although it is undue, unreasonable, and unjust to any state, still it is to be lawful if it applies equally to goods from other states, and is, in the opinion of the Inter-State Commission, necessary for the development of its territory. I want it to be clearly understood, because it is important in connexion with clause 89, that Victoria can be prohibited from having her rates preferential into Riverina, but if the Inter-State Commission thinks that, however unjust, however undue, however unreasonable the New South Wales rates are to Victoria, those rates are necessary for the development of New South Wales, and that they apply equally to goods from other states, New South Wales can never be prevented from altering her rates, but Victoria has to alter her rates. I want to emphasize that question once more.

Question-That clause 95G be inserted in the Bill-put.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

New South Wales never gets anything! Clause 96—There shall be an Inter-State Commission, with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament from time to time deems necessary, but so that the commission shall be charged with the execution and maintenance, within the Commonwealth, of the provisions of this Constitution, and of all laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

This clause embodies in the Constitution an Inter-State Commission, to which I strongly object. I am perfectly willing that the Parliament may constitute an Inter-State Commission, with such powers of adjudication and administration as it from time to time deems necessary. Therefore I propose to omit the words "There shall be," which embody the Inter-State Commission in the Constitution, with the view to give power to the Parliament to constitute that body. I wish to draw distinct attention to the latter part of the clause, so that honorable members hereafter, when difficulties arise, may know that they acted with their eyes open. I feel perfectly certain that they did not know the meaning or the extent of the latter words of the clause, or they would never have passed it. It goes on to provide—

That the commission shall be charged with the execution and maintenance, within the Commonwealth, of the provisions of this Constitution, and of all laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce.

Now we are told that these words "relating to trade and commerce" are so wide in their operation that not one of us, when we came here, ever dreamt that they would cover the number of subjects they do cover. They cover navigation—they cover almost everything.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

They are the creatures of Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

They are not the creatures of Parliament. I would not object if the Inter-State Commission were to be appointed by the Parliament, and the Parliament from time to time were to delegate to that body such of the powers as it could itself exercise under the Constitution. I go with the honorable member the full length there; but this is a very different position.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

We create an Inter-State Commission absolutely by the Constitution, but we give the Parliament fall power to declare what the duties of the commission are, and all the rules and regulations connected with it. What else is there you want?

Mr. BARTON. -

Will you be satisfied—I do not say that I agree to it—to leave out the words "but so that the commission shall be charged with," and to use the simple word "for"?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That, I think, is a distinction without, a difference. . - No; it will then read—

Such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament, from time to time, deems necessary for the execution and maintenance of the provisions of the Constitution, and of all laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce.

It leaves it to the Parliament to say what it will give. I think I can meet my right honorable friend half-way about that, but I could not go any further.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I think this clause should be so constructed that Parliament can constitute an Inter-State Commission, and from time to time give to that Inter-State Commission such powers as it deems fit for various purposes—dealing with railways and similar matters.
Mr. MCMILLAN. -
The clause provides for that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
No. The leader of the Convention will admit that it goes very much further, because the clause says this body is to be constituted by the Bill itself. There is no option in the Parliament to constitute it, and it is to be charged with the execution and maintenance within the Commonwealth, (as wide words as you can use of the provisions of this Constitution), and of all laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce. If the Convention is prepared to adopt those words, it is useless for me to attempt to argue and convince honorable members that they should not adopt them. I will test this matter on a division. I beg to move-

That the words "There shall be" be omitted, with the view to the insertion of the words "Parliament may constitute."

Mr. BARTON. -
I would suggest that you should make it "Parliament shall make laws constituting."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Parliament will have to constitute the Inter-State Commission by some law.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -
Will the honorable members amendment meet the case that he desires? I do not think that it will.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Of course, I shall have to move the second amendment later on. I can only move one at a time.

I desire to enable Parliament to constitute the body, and to delegate to it such powers as Parliament thinks fit from time to time.

Mr. BARTON. -
Two or three clauses will be rendered inoperative if Sir George Turner's amendment is carried. The result of adopting the amendment will be to make the Inter-State Commission totally inoperative until the Parliament legislates.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
And to make the clauses worthless until the Parliament has legislated.

Mr. LYNE. -
I agree with Sir George Turner that Parliament should constitute the commission, and give that commission its powers. I do not know whether the proposed amendment will effect that, but I shall be prepared to vote for any amendment which will effect that result, because I am altogether opposed to placing the Inter-State Commission above the Parliament. If we were going to have a Federal Parliament it should have great power, and not the Inter-State Commission. I think it is child's play to create an Inter-State Commission, and delegate powers to that commission which should be exercised by the Parliament. I am altogether opposed in principle to the Inter-State Commission, and I think it would work a great deal of harm in many respects; but to work that commission in the way proposed, and to give it the power this clause seems to give it, is absurd. We might as well do away with the Parliament altogether.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I voted with Sir George Turner on this question on a former occasion, for the purpose of enabling the Federal Parliament to deal with various matters connected with the Inter-State Commission, but we were beaten. This clause relative to railway rates will be utterly inoperative if the present amendment is carried; therefore, I have no other option than to vote for the principle affirmed in the clause itself, putting within the four corners of the Constitution the express determination that there shall be an Inter-State Commission.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

There is one small matter which I feel bound to call attention to as an act of fairness. It was the subject of an interjection I made when Sir George Turner was speaking. We have provided in this Constitution in clause 95B that the Inter-State Commission is to have the power of deciding what are such preferences or discriminations as it may deem to be undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any state; and also, in clause 95c, that the Inter-State Commission shall have power to decide what is necessary for the development of the territory of a state by way of a railway rate, so long as it is an equal rate. Now, I take it that, having said at the beginning of this clause that there shall be an Inter-State Commission, we have made it compulsory that there shall be an Inter-State Commission, which shall have at least the power included in those two clauses. It will be necessary for the commission to have more powers, but whether they should traverse the whole field of trade and commerce may be a question for honorable members to consider. Perhaps the words inserted as a matter of drafting in the third line of clause 96 are too strong - "but so that the commission shall be charged;" and having secured as an integral part of the Constitution that there shall be an Inter-State Commission, and that those questions which are involved in clause 95B and clause 95c must be considered by the commission, I think it might be quite fair enough to say with regard to the rest of the matter that Parliament shall decide what further is necessary for the purposes of adjudication and administration for that commission in the way of power over the trade and commerce provisions. Therefore, I feel impelled to move-

That the words "but so that the commission shall be charged with" be omitted, and that the word "for" be substituted.

The clause would then read as follows:-

There shall be an Inter-State Commission with such powers of adjudication and administration as the Parliament from time to time deems necessary, but for the execution and maintenance within the Commonwealth of the provisions of this Constitution, and of all laws made thereunder relating to trade and commerce.
Then Parliament would prescribe what it deemed necessary for the execution of these powers. While it would be a matter of certainty that having so provided there shall be an Inter-State Commission, they would be authorized to deal with these questions in clauses 95B and 95c. It seems to me that that is a fair proposal. I think I am moving what is a concession, but I think it mitigates what otherwise might be an undue requirement in this clause.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

There is a difference between the clause as it stands and as it would be if the proposal of Mr. Barton were adopted. The clause as it stands provides that the commission shall be "charged with the execution and maintenance" of the provisions of the Constitution, and of all laws relating to trade and commerce. That charges the commission with a duty which must be carried out by some means. The clause as it stands says that Parliament may give the commission "such powers of adjudication and administration" as it may deem necessary, but still the duty is there. As it is proposed to alter the clause, the Inter-State Commission would only have such powers as the Parliament may from time to time deem necessary "for the execution and maintenance." So that until the Parliament gave them the power they could not move in that direction.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. Parliament is under a constitutional obligation to create the commission.

Mr. ISAACS. -

But it is also under this negative obligation: Until it gives the necessary powers for the Inter-State Commission these provisions of the Constitution cannot be maintained and executed.

Mr. BARTON. -

But the commission could do nothing until Parliament legislated if you left the clause in its present form.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am not so sure of that, because the Executive could create the commission, and then it would stand charged with these duties.

Mr. BARTON. -

Oh, no; the words "but so that" are a charge upon the Parliament.

Mr. ISAACS. -

It may be so; but then there is no difference between what the clause says and what the leader of the Convention proposes to make it say.

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 98 (Taking over public debts of states),
Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

I have given notice of an amendment in this clause, in order to again test the feeling of the Convention as to whether we should hand over the debts at once to the Federal Parliament. But seeing the results of other votes, I think it would be useless to detain the Convention in moving such an amendment.

The clause was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. -

We now have to go back to clause 52 (Legislative powers of the Parliament).

Clause 52, sub-section (2). - Taxation; but so that all taxation shall be uniform throughout the Commonwealth, and that no tax or duty shall be imposed on any goods passing from one state to another.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have prepared an amendment with regard to this sub-section, which puts the matter into a form which would express the intention of the Convention, whilst avoiding a difficulty. Honorable members will recollect the difficulty that arose over the construction of words equivalent to "uniform throughout the Commonwealth" in the United States of America. Although no actual decision has been given, a doubt has been raised as to the meaning of the word "uniform." The celebrated income tax case went off as to the direct apportionment of taxation amongst the people according to numbers, and this point was not decided, but a great deal of doubt has been thrown on the meaning of the word in the judgment of Mr. Justice Field. I think that although the word "uniform" has the meaning it was intended to have-"one in form" throughout the Commonwealth-still there might be a difficulty, and litigation might arise about it, and prolonged trouble might be occasioned with regard to the provision in case, for instance, an income tax or a land tax was imposed. What is really wanted is to prevent a discrimination between citizens of the Commonwealth in the same circumstances. I beg to move-

That all the words after the word "taxation" where it is first used be struck out, and that the following words be substituted:-"but not so as to discriminate between states or parts of states, or between goods passing from one state to another."

I conceive it to be quite unnecessary to retain these words in view of clause 89, prescribing free-trade among the several states, under which any duty or tax on goods passing from one state to another would be clearly invalid, and could not possibly be allowed by the operation of the preference clauses. I propose not to say anything about goods in this connexion passing from one state to another, as that is sufficiently provided for, and I put in this provision, which prevents discrimination or any form of tax which would make a difference between the citizen of one state and the citizen of another state, and to prevent anything which would place a tax upon a person going from one state to another. I beg to move—

That all the words after the first word "taxation" in the second sub-section be omitted, with a view to inserting the following words—"but not so as to discriminate between states or parts of states, or between persons or things passing from one state to another."

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 110B. - No subject of the Queen, resident in any state, shall be subject in any other state to any disability or discrimination not equally applicable to the subjects of the Queen in such other state.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

This is a matter in which Sir John Forrest will probably take some interest. We have been told that Chinese cannot hold leases in Western Australia; but I take it that in this clause, if a Chinese was a subject of the Queen resident in another colony, and went to Western Australia, it would be absolutely compulsory to allow him to have a lease or any other right he might have possessed in the colony he left.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Is that what you want?

Mr. DEAKIN. -

No; and I do not think it is intended. The clause is intended to preserve to states the power to deal with...
Committee I will undertake to put the meaning of the Convention in plain terms.

The amendment was agreed to.
The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

I wish to propose a new clause, to follow clause 117. I am sorry that I should have to move this at so late an hour, but I postponed the motion on a former occasion. I beg to move-

That the following be a clause of the Bill, to follow clause 117:-

If the colony of Queensland adopts this Constitution, or is admitted as a state of the Commonwealth, nothing in this Constitution shall be taken to impair any right which the Queen may be graciously pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Majesty's Royal prerogative or under any statute in respect of the division of Queensland into two or more colonies; but so that the Commonwealth shall retain the powers conferred on it by this Constitution to impose terms and conditions in respect of the establishment of any such colony as a state.

It is in the knowledge of honorable members that the Premier of Queensland telegraphed to our respected leader to the effect that he feared this clause, if passed, would rather injure the cause of federation in Queensland than otherwise. As an old Queenslander, I can say that the clause at present in the Constitution suits South Queensland very well, but it certainly does not suit the whole colony. The desire I have is to have a clause that will leave Queensland, so far as federation and possible separation are concerned, in the same position as she is now. I do not at all sympathize with the extraordinary request we have heard from members of Central Queensland, asking that Queensland may be admitted into the Federation as separate states. I want Queensland to come in as one colony, but reserving to Her Majesty the prerogative which many believe she now has to allow separation on petition. I have previously referred to this matter, and shall not repeat myself. I may take this opportunity to read a telegram from the president of the Central Queensland Separation League. The telegram is very brief, and I should have liked to amplify it, but at this hour I will simply read the words of the message. The message is as follows:-

Both Lord Knutsford and Lord Ripon intimated Bill would be introduced divide colony into three; unlikely Central and North ever consent incorporate Queensland one state unless fully protected.

I telegraphed a few days ago to Townsville to see whether the people there were in touch with my proposal, and here is the reply of the president of the Separation League in that city:-
If Townsville were polled to-morrow, I feel confident that every vote would be in favour of the inclusion of that clause, for the desire for separation is as strong now as ever, and the movement is quiescent only bemuse there is no prospect of success by appeals to local Parliaments. All here warmly wish you may succeed in having clause inserted.

There was recently a division, in the Queensland Parliament in regard to the Federal Enabling Bill. The analysis of the votes was as follows:- Federation was supported by 27, including pairs, and 29 opposed. Of those who supported, 21 were representative of Southern Queensland, 5 of Northern Queensland, and 1 of Central Queensland. Of those who opposed, 13 represented Southern Queensland; 8 Northern Queensland; and 8 Central. That accounts altogether for 56 out of 72 members. Of the remaining 16 members 5 Southern members are anti-federationists, and 6 are federationists, while 3 northern and 2 Central members are federationists. I want to show the feeling in favour of federation is really pretty strong in Queensland, but that, owing to a combination of circumstances, the motion was negatived. Taking a broad view of the question of federation in Queensland, the House might be classified thus: There are 27 of the Southern members, 16 of the Northern members, and 11 of the Central members who are federationists, so that we have 54 federationists and only 18 anti-federationists, and all the latter reside in Southern Queensland. Yet we are told that the cause of federation will be injured if we bring in a clause by which Queensland will be in exactly the same position in regard to separation as she is at the present day. At a later stage, if any one has any remark to make on the other side, I may reply, but in the meantime I will show, from quotations from the Hon. George Thorn, an ex-Premier, the spirit in which the Southern members view federation. Mr. Thorn says-

Another reason is that, in my opinion, the Central and Northern division will accept federation at any price, and they will be consummate asses if they do not agree to it. I am opposed to federation altogether. The colony is not ripe for federation, and I have not heard anybody out of-doors clamouring or asking for federation with the exception of two newspapers, one in Mackay and one in Brisbane.

Mr. BARTON. -

Mr. George Thorn is the most bitter opponent of federation in Queensland. I read his speech on the subject, and he does not know anything about it. He is as ignorant on the subject as any man could possibly be.

Mr. WALKER. -
I want to show that the anti-federationist party are really the Southern Queensland party.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Tasmania). -

I rise to a point of order. The honorable member (Mr. Walker) is introducing a subject on which we have no power to legislate.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member (Mr. Walker) is introducing a clause it is quite competent for us to pass, and I do not think he is out of order.

Mr. WALKER. -

I am sorry to trouble my honorable friend (Mr. Douglas) at this time in the morning, but I have waited patiently for a long time, and I cannot help it. Here is what the Hon. George Thorn says about federation:-

Under intercolonial free-trade we (Queensland) shall lose between £120,000 and £130,000 in Customs revenue, and our share of the cost of the Federal Government will be £70,000, making a total of £200,000 per annum. Then look at the loss there will be on our railways, and so on. I will not go on with that. Mr. Thorn goes on to say-

It is only within about the last eight years that they have started growing maize in Victoria, and yet Coghlan-

The wonderful Coghlan turns up even there. Mr Thorn continues- and yet Coghlan tells us that the crop of maize in Victoria is double the crop in Queensland.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Does the honorable member think that is relevant to the question of Her Majesty's prerogative?

Mr. REID. -

It is calculated to provoke a riot.

Mr. WALKER. -

Here is what Mr. Thorn says about Mr. Barton's Bill-

We must have the whole or nearly the whole of Mr. Barton's Bill, and it is a waste of time and money for us to go to this Convention on the lines suggested by Mr. Barton and Sir Samuel Griffith, for I see very little difference between their schemes. They are both lawyers, and so long as lawyers swim they do not care who sinks.

I want to show the absolute nonsense of those who oppose federation.

Mr. BARTON. -

What has that to do with the division of Queensland?

Mr. WALKER. -

I want to show that it is Southern and not Northern Queensland which is opposing federation. It would be very unwise, from my point of view, if we did not admit Queensland as a whole colony, and let the people of that colony have the right, as they believe they have, to separation on petition to Her Majesty. The Queensland people are afraid that, if they come in as they are, that right of separation will be removed from them, and hence they are keeping.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think the discussion which took place before raises a doubt whether there is any such right as my honorable friend wishes to preserve by this clause. The Acts on the subject are not very explicit, when one considers them in their chronological order, and in connexion with the action of the prerogative which has since taken place. It is a question whether any power to subdivide Queensland under Orders in Council or by letters patent has not been exhausted, so that it is not quite certain if it could have any effect. In addition, honorable members have heard the individual opinions which have been read by the honorable member (Mr. Walker), and the opinion of the Premier of Queensland, delivered apparently after a consultation with his colleagues. We must take it that the opinion of the Ministry has been expressed by Sir Hugh Nelson, and, so far as the Convention is concerned-Queensland not being represented here-we can have no knowledge of the public opinion of the colony unless we derive it from their parliamentary proceedings, or from the statements of their Executive Government. Their parliamentary proceedings, I must say, are absolutely bewildering; but the statement of their Executive Government is explicit. They say that a clause of this kind would not help the cause of federation in Queensland. When we know that the majority of the electors of Queensland live in the Southern part of that colony, it seems to me that we should beware of passing a clause which, while it might conciliate the Central and Northern parts of the colony, will alienate those living in the Southern parts of the colony. The question is whether it is not better to leave the Bill to its ordinary operation, and Queensland to its own devices, inasmuch as we know that if that colony remains in its senses it will hereafter join the Federation.

Mr. WALKER (New South Wales). -

There is one point which I have reserved for the end. These are the terms of a motion which was carried in the Queensland Parliament on the 4th of November last:-

That, in the opinion of this House, the time has now arrived when the Central and Northern divisions of this colony should be constituted separate colonies in compliance with the petitions of the inhabitants thereof.
Twenty honorable members voted upon each side, and the Speaker gave his casting vote in favour of separation. It is just as well to let honorable members know that the separation party have friends in the Queensland Parliament. I do not believe, after what has been said by the leader of the Convention, that I can carry this clause, but I have tried to do my duty in bringing it forward. I have presented a petition from the league of Central Queensland upon a former occasion, and I now abide by the decision of the committee.

The clause was negatived.

Clause 121 (Mode of amending the Constitution),
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

No one is more fully persuaded of the importance of this clause than I am. At the same time, no one can have a greater belief in the utter futility of asking the Convention to deal with it or to reverse its vote at this hour of the morning. Therefore, in view of all that has been done to-night, I shall not take up the time of the Convention by moving, any amendment.

The clause was agreed to.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I should like to ask the leader of the Convention whether, in view of the importance of clause 75, he will allow us an opportunity to reconsider it? I think that all the words after the word "state" in the second line should be struck out.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not think the honorable member can discuss the clause, although he is at liberty to ask a question.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I hope that the leader of the Convention will give us this opportunity, so that we may provide for appeals going only through the High Court to the Privy Council. That can be done, as I have pointed out, by striking out the words "after state." At the same time, by doing that, you will abolish the direct appeal from the state courts. Clause 75 provides-

The CHAIRMAN. -

The honorable member is not in order in debating the clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

What point do you want considered?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Clause 75 allows an appeal under the reservation of the prerogative from the High Court to the Crown. Provision is also made that Parliament may abolish the right of appeal from the High Court. Clause 75 states the same thing again as regards appeals to the Privy Council from the state courts, but it does not preserve the right of Parliament to abolish them. I pointed that out during the discussion upon the clause, and I would again ask for its reconsideration.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This clause practically prevents two classes of appeals from going to the Privy Council—appeals as to the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth, and appeals as to the interpretation of the Constitution of a state. It also states that there is to be no appeal from any federal court save in certain cases where Her Majesty may retain the Royal prerogative. That is a repetition of clause 74, but in clause 74 there is power—

The CHAIRMAN. -

I think this discussion ought to take place upon the question of the adoption of the report.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have already stated that I propose to reconsider the clause, and have redrafted it to read something like this:—

Notwithstanding anything in the last section, in any case in which the interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state is involved, an appeal shall not be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state, or from the High Court, or from any other federal court, unless in any such case the public interests of any part of Her Majesty's dominions other than the Commonwealth or a state are involved.

That confines the matter to the two classes of cases in which it is proposed to retain the final appeal in the High Court, with the reservation of the cases which deal with public interests of other parts of the dominion.

The Bill was reported with amendments.

The PRESIDENT. -

The question is that the consideration of the report be an order of the day for the next day of sitting.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I understand from the Premier of New South Wales that he would like me to fulfil a promise which I made to him with reference to clause 55. Honorable members will recollect that a vote was taken upon that clause yesterday, which was to some extent complicated by the fact that some honorable members could not see that the amendment which he wanted to make could reasonably be fitted into clause 55. I told him that I would prepare a draft which would, perhaps, carry out his intention, at any rate as to part of the clause, and that if be then wished to recommit the clause I would consent to the recommittal. It was necessary, under the circumstances, to do that, inasmuch as some honorable members voted against the amendment, because they could not see any reasonable method of applying it to the structure of the clause. There is a method in which it can be applied to the structure of the first subsection and not to the second sub-section. I understand that the right honorable member is willing to move it as applying to the first sub-section only.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

He ought to give notice.

Mr. BARTON. -

Notice was given yesterday by me. I said I would prepare for my right honorable friend a draft showing what could be done, and that I would not oppose a recommittal under the circumstances. It is a very simple matter, and I do not think it should take up any time at all.

The PRESIDENT. -

I would like to point out to the leader of the Convention that it would be impossible to put the motion for the recommittal of the clause now. The question before the Chair is simply that the report be taken into consideration on a certain day.

Mr. BARTON. -

There are two matters on which I have a duty to perform. I have to redeem the promise that I made to the Right Hon. Mr. Reid, and I shall feel it incumbent, inasmuch as some honorable members did not appreciate the question when they voted for it, to ask for the recommittal of the clause carried on the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I shall feel it incumbent upon me to object to that, because some honorable members may have gone away.

Mr. BARTON. -

I shall have to ask the President to protect me from the undue haste of some honorable members sitting opposite. I was going to say that I did not intend to ask for the recommittal to night. Are we going to finish to-night this morning? I am equally prepared for either. If the right honorable member had allowed me to conclude the sentence there would have been no necessity for his interruption. I propose, if the Convention does not wish to conclude now, to hold a short sitting in the morning to deal with these matters.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

What was the use of keeping us here at all?

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not know what the honorable member means, but the honorable member understands that when I make a promise I ought to fulfil it, and I ought also to give notice of anything else that I intend to do. I propose to do these two things. If it suits the convenience of the Convention, I shall ask honorable members to meet at half-past ten or eleven o'clock to-day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. -

What is to be proposed?

Mr. BARTON. -

I have already stated what the two proposals are, but I will do so again.
One of the proposals is to recommit the first sub-section of clause 55, to enable the Right Hon. Mr. Reid to submit a motion to prevent a law being declared bad as dealing with other matters besides the imposition of taxation where the matter not dealing with the imposition of taxation is separately under the law, and so that the law may be held good so far as it deals with taxation. That is all. The other is to deal with the clause inserted on the motion of the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon, which I would not seek to disturb if I had not had an intimation that there are a considerable number of honorable members who desire that the clause should be reconsidered.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Honorable members who voted against it.

Mr. BARTON. -

I shall finish as soon as I am allowed. That is all I propose to do in regard to the Bill, unless any honorable member can convince me that we should retrace our steps in any particular. I shall be very willing even then to do so.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

The leader of the Convention proposes that we should meet again at eleven o'clock a.m. There is this difficulty that those honorable members who have not been here during the night will have no intimation whatever that this step is to be taken. If we are to reverse the vote we gave tonight we ought to reverse it in as full a Convention as we can get. Some intimation should be given to the honorable members who are not present of the proposed meeting, so that they may have an opportunity of attending.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg to give notice that at the first opportunity I shall propose the recommittal of clauses 74 and 75.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

As fas as I call see, I shall have to oppose that proposal.

DAY AND HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-
That the standing orders be suspended to enable me to submit a motion, without notice, with reference to the day and hour of meeting.
The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -
I beg to move-
That the House, at its rising, adjourn until this morning, at eleven o'clock a.m.
The motion was agreed to.
The Convention adjourned at three minutes to four o'clock a.m. (Saturday).
Saturday, 12th March, 1898.

Days of Sitting - Commonwealth of Australia Bill: Consideration of Bill as reported a Third Time.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at two minutes past eleven o'clock a.m.

DAYS OF SITTING.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In order to facilitate our future movements, I beg to move-
That the Convention, at its rising at the close of each sitting do adjourn to such time as shall then be ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

On the order of the day for the consideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill as reported a third time,

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales) said -

I beg to move-
That the Bill be recommitted for the consideration of clause 55, sub-section (1), and clause 91A.

These are the two clauses that I mentioned last night. One of them I promised Mr. Reid, at the time the vote was taken, that I would have recommitted, and the recommittal of the other I propose because I was informed that a good many honorable members did not quite appreciate the question at the time they gave their votes. I have no desire to re-open anything on my own account.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Perhaps it might expedite business if you give us some idea what the object of the recommittal of these two clauses is.

Mr. BARTON. -

The object of proposing the recommittal of clause 55, sub-section (1), is to enable Mr. Reid to move an amendment in that sub-section which would enable a law imposing taxation to be good to the extent it imposes it, although there might be provisions in the Bill which deal with matters other than taxation, and that such latter matters only should be bad-that the Bill should be bad only in that respect. The object of moving the recommittal of clause 91A is to omit or modify-in fact, to reconsider-the clause proposed by Sir Edward Braddon.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Would it not be necessary to recommit clause 90 as well as clause 91A, because there might be some alteration to be made in the clause to make the two clauses agree the one with the other?

Mr. BARTON. -

I think not, as far as I can see.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It would be a consequential amendment, of course, if any amendment was required.

Mr. BARTON. -

It will depend on the discussion.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -

There was one matter which we dealt with before adjourning this morning, namely, clauses 95F and 95G, with regard to the Inter-State Commission. I have been again earnestly considering our position with regard to these clauses, and I feel so over-weighted with the result of the divisions last night that I am bound to ask, if I possibly can, to get a vote in the full Convention in respect to this matter, which I regard as of vital interest to the colony of Victoria. Under these circumstances, I ask the leader of the Convention to allow clauses 95F and 95G to be recommitted. As far as I am personally concerned, I can assure him that any remarks I have to make in connexion with these clauses will be curtailed as much as possible. I will only speak a minute or two in regard to the matter.

The PRESIDENT. -

Am I to understand that Sir George Turner moves for the recommittal of clauses 95F and 96G?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think my right honorable friend asks me to consent to the recommittal.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If you would kindly consent.

Mr. BARTON. -

My right honorable friend places me in rather a difficulty about this, because the action of last night upon these clauses, 95F and 95G, was taken after printed notice of intention to deal with those provisions was duly given. Previously these clauses were the subject of long debate, and the Convention came to a certain decision. Afterwards my right honorable friend sought to re-open these clauses, and gave printed notice of his intention to do so, and therefore the Convention understood all about the matter. When I asked the Convention to sit last night for the purpose of getting as far through the Bill as possible, the printed notices were in the hands of honorable members, who generously promised to help me in getting the Bill through. These matters were then considered and definitely decided, and I see no reason for recommitting these clauses.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

There is the same reason for recommitting this clause as for recommitting the clause in which Sir Edward Braddon desires to move an amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

Oh, no. A very different reason exists in regard to that clause. Sir Edward Braddon's amendment in that clause seems to me to be inconsistent with another clause already passed—clause 90 in the Bill as now reported.

Mr. HOLDER. -

No, it is not inconsistent.

Mr. BARTON. -

It seems to me to be so. Of course it is a matter of opinion, and my honorable friend may convince me to another effect. I have twice explained the reason for my opinion, but I have been informed that a number of honorable members voted on the question without properly understanding what was the question. I am told so, and of course I cannot disbelieve the information I get. Therefore I thought it better to let this clause be re-opened to the consideration of the Convention. However, this matter is entirely in the hands of the Convention. If the Convention vote that the matter should be re-opened I shall not feel any chagrin.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I hope that these motions for recommital will be put separately, because I shall feel it my duty to oppose the recommital of the clause mentioned by Sir George Turner.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have no objection to them being put separately.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I beg to move—

That clauses 74 and 75 be recommitted.

I do not know whether the leader of the Convention objects to this proposal. If so, I will have to state my reasons for submitting it.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have stated the reasons for the recommittal of the clauses I asked to be recommitted.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Well, my reason for desiring the recommittal of clauses 74 and 75 is that they are to a great extent inconsistent with each other, for clause 74 provides that the appeal to the Queen in Council still holds good. The judgment of the High Court is not final until Parliament abolishes the prerogative rights retained by the, saving provisions of this clause. Clause 75 states that no appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from the court of any state, or from the High Court, or any other federal court; but it also provides that Her Majesty may grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court except in certain specified cases involving the interpretation of the Constitution. Practically that is the only exception, cases involving matters of constitutional rights. Now, the position in clause 75 is that whilst in clause 74 the right of appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council may be abolished by Act of Parliament, clause 75 states that the direct appeal cannot. Therefore the two clauses are inconsistent.

Mr. SYMON. -

Mr. Barton said yesterday that this was purely a drafting amendment.

Mr. GLYNN. -

So far, good. Besides that, as stated by Dr. Quick, the right of appeal, until Parliament decides to the contrary, has been retained in small matters of private interest, but in the large matters-constitutional matters-the prerogative right has been abolished. At any rate, it is only preserved as regards matters involving the interests of other parts of Her Majesty's dominions. But all questions as to the determination of the Constitution itself are to be finally decided by the High Court. What I propose to do on the recommittal of the clause, is to ask the committee to strike out of clause 75 all the words after the word "state." The clause will then read:-

No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state.

The effect of that amendment will be that the right of appeal direct from the state court to the Privy Council will be abolished. There is no saving of the prerogative right in respect to that matter, but in all other matters, whether of private interest or constitutional interpretation, the right of appeal will be retained until Parliament prescribes to the contrary. Now, I think that that is a very fair position to take-that the right of appeal in all matters, except direct from the state courts to the Privy Council, will be declared, but the Parliament may at any time abolish that right of appeal.
That is consistent, and if any matter requires the determination of the Judiciary in the earlier stages of the Federation-and I lay particular emphasis on the earlier stages-it is a matter as to the interpretation of the Constitution itself. We ought to continue in this, if in any, the safeguard of the Privy Council, which for the first ten or fifteen years after the federation will be free from all local influences or state influences or prejudices acquired during the adoption of the Federal Act itself. You will have a judicial tribunal there which cannot possibly have any local colouring, be affected by any local influences, or have acquired any preconceptions.

Mr. GORDON. -

On the same reasoning you might move for the recommittal of every clause in the Bill. The Convention deliberately came to this decision.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not think that the Convention came to this decision so deliberately as it did in regard to other matters. Owing to attempts to change the provisions of clause 75, the Convention seemed to be in a regular muddle as to what it was doing.

Mr. REID. -

No, it was not.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Honorable members know that amendments were moved in clause 75 which were inconsistent with the provisions of clause 74 as already agreed to, and those amendments had, consequently, to be withdrawn.

Mr. BARTON. -

They were withdrawn, so that they did no harm.

But how can the Convention say that it had its eyes perfectly open in adopting the clause as it now stands? I ask that this matter be reconsidered, and I hope that the policy I have suggested will be adopted.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I rise for the purpose of supporting the proposal of my honorable friend (Mr. Glynn) for the recommittal of clauses 74 and 75. I cannot avoid the impression that the Convention yesterday was surprised into the adoption of the proposal of Mr. Symon—a proposal submitted without notice, and one involving an absolute reversal of the policy of appeal recommended by the Judiciary Committee of this Convention. I cannot really reconcile myself to this amendment which has been incorporated in the Bill at the instance of Mr. Symon. I cannot understand his position in the matter at all. It is absolutely contradictory. Throughout the whole of the previous sessions of this Convention Mr. Symon, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has supported the right of appeal to the Privy Council in all public and constitutional matters.

Mr. SYMON. -

I was under a grave mistake.

Dr. QUICK. -

Under a grave mistake? Well, it shows the value of the honorable and learned member's leadership! We should distrust his leadership when during two sessions he has supported the right of appeal in public and constitutional matters, and now, at the last moment, because the right of appeal has been granted to subjects in private cases, he proposes an absolute reversal of an important principle of the report of the Judiciary Committee, and the recommendations of it. I really feel that this clause, if it is to stand, apart from its ambiguity (which I seriously recommend to the Drafting Committee), would be a blot on this Constitution—an absolute blot on this Constitution. I should like to know what will be thought of this Bill in Europe when it goes there, if it is found that whilst the right of appeal to the Privy Council is granted in private matters—in disputes between individuals—this Constitution shows a distrust of submitting the question of the interpretation of its terms to the highest tribunal of judicial appeal in the empire!

Mr. REID. -
On Australian questions; such questions are only Australian.

Dr. QUICK. -
True; but I was not aware that there was any reason why we should be afraid of submitting the interpretation of this instrument to the final Court of Appeal in this empire.

Mr. REID. -
We are not afraid, but we say that the Privy Council is an improper tribunal with regard to such points.

Dr. QUICK. -
Surely we cannot be afraid that this instrument will not receive a liberal and judicious interpretation in the highest court of the empire. What reason have we for believing that it will not be interpreted in the spirit usually shown by British jurists-men educated in the same school and upon the same principles of common law as we are here? Why should we be afraid of submitting the interpretation of this instrument to them?

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Because they do not live under the same conditions, and do not understand them.

Dr. QUICK. -
Surely we do not expect that the men who are going to interpret this Constitution are going to exercise legislative functions? Will they not have to interpret the Constitution according to the English language, in which it is expressed?

Mr. BARTON. -
Will it not be a more convenient time to argue upon the main question when the clauses are recommitted?
Dr. QUICK. -

I must apologize if I have trespassed beyond the bounds of moderation. But this is a question on which I entertain a strong opinion. I have not taken many opportunities of trespassing upon the time of the Convention. There are many questions which I am willing to sink, but I have thought of this carefully, and the more I think of it the more I am convinced that it will be a serious blot on the work of this Convention, and will show a distrust of that great and august tribunal to which the right of appeal has hitherto been, if we allow such a provision to remain. I see no reason for thinking that if the right of interpretation is allowed to the Privy Council in the final resort, Australia will have any reason whatever to fear that we shall have anything but a liberal and true interpretation at the hands of the Privy Council.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

During the proceedings of this Convention, I have presided in committee with a great feeling of satisfaction to myself, because although from time to time provisions were being inserted in this Bill of which I could not approve—in fact, which I strongly objected to—still I could see that the Bill was being made into a coherent whole. But, sir, I must say that this morning, or last night—I am not quite sure which—I was grievously disappointed at the conclusion at which the committee arrived in reference to clauses 74 and 75. Because it seems me that, whatever view we take of this question, it is impossible to argue in favour of the conclusion at which we have arrived. We either ought to have an appeal to the Privy Council or we ought not to have it. I am aware that an argument was used which seemed to have great weight, that surely the persons who made the Constitution were the proper persons to interpret the Constitution—perhaps not the same persons individually, but the same people. I do not pretend for one moment to deny that we can constitute in Australia a perfectly competent and capable court; but if that court is perfectly competent and capable, and fit to interpret finally questions involving the meaning of this Commonwealth Bill, surely that court is equally fit and competent to inquire into matters of personal dispute between citizens. What I wish to impress upon the Convention is this: We should either arrive at one conclusion or the other, and not at two conclusions, which, as it seems to me, are inconsistent. What an absurdity it is to say that there shall be an appeal in a case in which two private citizens have a dispute concerning, we will say, a bill of exchange for £550, but that there shall be no appeal in a matter of enormous importance, involving hundreds of thousands of pounds, and affecting the future of tens of thousands of people, arising out of the interpretation of the Constitution! Surely that is not the condition in which we are content to leave this matter. I am not one of those who feel strongly as to whether there should be an appeal to the Privy Council or not. I have, since 1891, spoken both ways and voted both ways, because the arguments which have been advanced from time to time have seemed to me so forcible, either from the one side or the other, that I felt compelled to arrive at different conclusions at different times. Therefore, I cannot be taken to be one who is strongly biased in this matter. But I cannot help arriving at the conclusion during the last few months that there are a large number of people in this country of Australia who will strongly support this Commonwealth Bill if the right of appeal to the Privy Council be retained. It is all very well to say that this is a mere sentimental consideration. It may be. I think it is a little more. but it maybe a sentimental consideration. But are not nearly all the bonds which bind us to the mother country sentimental considerations?

Mr. SYMON. -

That is not a bond. Sir RICHARD BAKER. - I say it is a bond. It is one of the strongest bonds that bind us to the mother country that we recognise that we are part of the same empire, by having a final Court of Appeal to the same court for all the colonies of the British dominions. The argument was advanced yesterday that this jurisdiction of the Privy Council was a new matter, and the date 1833 was mentioned. Now, this is an utter and entire misconception of the position. The Privy Council has had jurisdiction-

Mr. SYMON. -

The Judicial Committee of it.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -

I do not say the Judicial Committee. If the honorable member will not interrupt me I shall be able to proceed with my argument. The Privy Council has been the final Court of Appeal for all Her Majesty's dominions except England, and latterly Great Britain and Ireland, for nearly as long as the House of Lords has been the final Court of Appeal. It is perfectly true that in 1833 the mode in which the appeal should be exercised was altered, and it was then that the Judicial Committee was appointed. But it is also true that in 1876 the mode in which the House of Lords could hear appeals was also altered. And it is just as true to say that the House of Lords exercises a new jurisdiction in appeal cases because the present jurisdiction was regulated and altered in 1876 as it is to say that the Privy Council exercises a new power of appeal because in 1833 the mode was regulated and made subject to certain conditions. Now, sir, the time has arrived when very short speeches should be made. I do not wish to say more than this; but I do ask the Convention to allow these two clauses to be recommitted so as to arrive at some conclusion which those who wish to advocate the Bill on the hustings will be able to maintain against the attacks of enemies of federation. For choice I would like to see the appeal to the Privy Council retained. But if the committee is of the contrary opinion, let them do away with it under all circumstances. That is all I have to say, and I hope that in this matter, being the only matter upon which I have addressed the Convention—a matter in which, as it seems to me, the Convention has come to an inconsistent and unworkable conclusion—they will retrace their steps.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should like to say that after the appeal which has been made by Sir Richard Baker, taking into consideration that he has not been able to participate in our deliberations, I feel that I can no longer resist the application to recommit these clauses.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

A generous statement.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I really feel that his is not the time for generosity.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

It cannot be expected of you.

Mr. REID. -

May I ask you Mr. President to protect me from the violence of the honorable member?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

We don not want any buffoonery here.

The PRESIDENT. -

I would ask honorable members, considering the stage at which we have arrived, to keep order.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

If I were in the chair I would make the right honorable member keep order.

Mr. REID. -

I believe I am in possession of the Chair.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

If I were in the chair I would stop you.

Mr. REID. -

May I be allowed to proceed?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

The right honorable member made a personal reference to me yesterday which was extremely offensive, and if I had heard it at the time I should certainly have stopped him.

The PRESIDENT. -

If Sir William Zeal complains of any offensive remark having been made by Mr. Reid in the course of this debate, no doubt the right honorable member will withdraw it.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

The right honorable member addressed me as reverend.

Mr. REID. -

That is days ago. I have changed my opinion since then.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

He has been extremely offensive.

The PRESIDENT. -

If my attention had been called to the remark at the time I should have asked the honorable member to withdraw it, but it is too late now for any notice to be taken of it.

Mr. REID. -

In common with other members, I have the most unfeigned respect for
Sir William Zeal.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

After you have insulted me?

Mr. REID. -

I did not intend to do that. . - Yes, you did. There is a second matter I could refer to. I will not stand it from you.

Mr. REID. -

Surely I should be listened to. One would think that the last thing in the world that would be regarded as an insult would be the application of the word "reverend" to any one.

The PRESIDENT. -

I would ask the right honorable member to address the Chair.

Mr. REID. -

That is what I wish to do. I said nothing on this question yesterday, whilst other honorable members talked for hours. It is most unendurable that when I rise to express my opinion there should be this clamour against me. I will not stand it even from this illustrious President of a Legislative Council.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

You will not insult me again.

Mr. REID. -
You are beneath insult.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
And so are you; you are a contemptible fellow.

The PRESIDENT. -
I must ask the honorable member to withdraw that expression.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
I do, most unreservedly, but I think I am entitled to say-

The PRESIDENT. -
I am sure that the honorable member's acquaintance with the rules of debate will satisfy him that we cannot now enter into matters that occurred some days ago. I would ask the honorable member to allow the debate to proceed?

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
The honorable member must not insult me, and then renew the insult again.

The PRESIDENT. -
Certainly not, and any effort in that direction will be checked.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I would ask you, Mr. President, whether the Right Hon. Mr. Reid should not also be called on to withdraw the last statement he made?

Mr. REID. -
I quite admit that. I was going to withdraw the statement without being called upon.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
After you have insulted people.

Mr. BARTON. -
Why cannot we get on with business?

Mr. REID. -
I am sorry that my effort to express some regret should have been met with resentment, and not with consideration.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -
After you have insulted people.

The PRESIDENT. -
I should like to say, in justice to myself, that I heard the observation of Sir William Zeal, but I did not hear the observation of the Right Hon. Mr. Reid. I am pleased that he is willing to withdraw it.

Mr. REID. -
Certainly. No doubt it was an unjustifiable expression. Some allowance should be made after our long sitting.

The PRESIDENT. -
Will the honorable member kindly address himself to the question?
Mr. REID. -

I will, Mr. President, and I hope that you will see that I am allowed to do so. I want to say that I did not address myself to this subject yesterday. I felt just as our worthy Chairman of Committees has felt, that this was a matter of very great difficulty, and I have come to the conclusion that the settlement which was arrived at yesterday, although it does not seem to us to be a very logical settlement, is, after all, the best we can obtain under the circumstances.

In the first place, Sir Joseph Abbott may be taken as representing-and fairly and properly representing-the large body of opinion outside the Convention which is in favour of some form of appeal to the Privy Council. That honorable member submitted to us the proposition that those whose opinions we wish to see represented in the Constitution should be satisfied with the Bill if we allowed the prerogative of Her Majesty to be retained. That is to say, if we allowed leave to appeal to the Queen to enable any case to be transferred to the Privy Council. I have always had this difficulty. If we are to have an Australian High Court of Appeal it seems to be an elementary proposition that it must be a court of final judgment, that otherwise instead of reforming the law we should be absolutely increasing the trouble and expense to suitors of obtaining a decision. That view appears to have been acted upon both by those who chew the Bill and by those who have agreed to this settlement. As the case stands now, if any decision in a suit between two private persons seems to be contrary to the law as laid down by that high tribunal in England, a petition for leave to appeal would probably, if the case were one which would affect a large number of individuals, be granted, not because of the importance of the case as between A. and B., but because of the importance of seeing that the law of the Commonwealth in matters affecting private rights was in harmony with the laws laid down by the Privy Council. In the enormous number of cases in which no such question arises, and in which there is no appearance of an infraction of the law of the empire, why should there be an appeal to the Privy Council? I look upon this settlement as quite consistent, because, although Sir Richard Baker puts it as a case between two private persons, the point involved may be one of such far reaching consequences, that it may affect elementary rules of law in adjusting the rights of all private individuals. I therefore come broadly to this conclusion, that it was well we adopted Sir Joseph Abbott's proposition, so that the right to invoke the judgment of the Judicial Committee should not be absolutely destroyed. This settlement preserves in every case of any importance a connexion with the Privy Council. Why should the other cases excite any anxiety in this Convention? We may feel perfectly satisfied that in the ordinary run of cases the judgment of the High Court will be satisfactory, or, at any rate, as satisfactory as any human judgment call be. I am sorry that the Bill is to be reconsidered on these clauses, because I fear that we may waste another day over them. I come now to the question raised by the Right Hon. Sir George Turner. I am sure he has taken the sense of the Convention often enough upon these matters. If I attempted to do as much in connexion with any question in which I was vitally interested, I do not know what would be said about me. I have looked at the division lists, and I find that on the subject the honorable member asks us to reconsider the voting was in one case 15 to 22, and in the other 13 to 22. These are substantial majorities. Where there was a majority of only one or two votes, I could not blame any one for endeavouring to get a reversal or review of the decision. But here there were majorities of seven and nine, and are we, at the eleventh hour, to be precipitated again into a discussion upon these burning questions? It is just as important to New South Wales that the present clause should stand as it is to Victoria that it should be disturbed, and, as the majority was a substantial one, I do not think that any good purpose would be served by re-opening the question. At the same time, rather than at our last meeting there should be any appearance of treating any particular colony with a want of consideration, I will not press my opposition to the proposal. But I would suggest that if we are to reconsider the matter at all, the whole of the three clauses should be recommitted. I am satisfied with the form in which Sir George Turner has put his proposition. With regard to Sir Edward Braddon's proposition, I got up to speak to it yesterday, but some honorable member—not Sir Edward Braddon—said to me—"What is the use of taking up time; it will be rejected?" I therefore sat down and said nothing. I was greatly surprised to find, although I had no right to be sure, that the majority was the other way. I had no opportunity of expressing my views on the matter, but I do not say that that is a reason for recommitting the clause. While we are in the humour to recommit these particular matters, we had better recommit them all.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have a suggestion to make to honorable members. It is proposed now to recommit subsection (1) of clause 55, clauses 74 and and 75, and the two clauses the Right Hon. Sir George Turner has mentioned.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Clause 96 hangs on those two.

Mr. BARTON. -

We can consider that afterwards. Then there is also clause 91A. At this late stage of our deliberations, I think we should agree not to speak on any subject for more than five or ten minutes. On that understanding I should not have the least objection to the whole of these clauses being recommitted.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I must strongly and emphatically protest against the proposed recommittal of clauses 74 and 75. I think that is a most monstrous proposition.

Mr. FRASER. -

Don't use such a strong adjective.

Mr. SYMON. -

I used it advisedly, and I repeat it.

Mr. FRASER. -

It is not warranted.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am not applying it to the honorable member but to the proposition, and I must say that the reasons given are of the very flimsiest possible description. My honorable friend (Dr. Quick) talks about my leadership, and suggests that it should not be followed, The honorable member has not followed my leadership-

Dr. QUICK. -

I have in many cases.

Mr. SYMON. -

If he had done so he, would not have been in the mess that seems to oppress him, although it is no mess in my estimation. This is a very proper provision. I have always been opposed to giving any appeal whatever from the High Court of the Commonwealth to the Privy Council upon matters affecting the Constitution, but I gave way as to that because of the opinion that was entertained by those whose views I wished to meet, that a provision of the kind should remain in the Constitution, and for no other earthly reason. I was willing, and it was a compromise, that the appeal should be taken away in all that multitude of cases which might be as effectually and efficiently dealt with by the High Court as by the Privy Council, and that it should be retained in other cases in regard to the Constitution. When my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) suggested yesterday in the course of his speech that he was against this provision, and that a modification of it might well be made, I at once fell in with that view before any decision was arrived at on Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment. Now we are asked by my honorable friend, the highly esteemed Chairman of Committees, to have this matter reconsidered, because he would like this power of appeal in regard to the Parliament of the Commonwealth or of the state to the High Court to be preserved. My honorable friend is quite mistaken, both as to what I said and as to the history of the Judicial Committee, with regard to the duration of the power of this court. My honorable friend is not well informed, on this point.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -
I said nothing about the Judicial Committee; I said the Privy Council.

Mr. SYMON. -
I spoke of the Judicial Committee, and my friend must not make statements of that kind based on statements which I never made. I utterly repudiate having suggested anything as to the early history of the Privy Council, which has no relation whatever to the court we were being called upon to deal with. My objection to the retention of this matter is that which has been put by Mr. Reid. After three deliberations and three decisions we arrived at the conclusion that we should abolish altogether the appeal to the Privy Council, except in constitutional cases. At the last moment, after a considerable debate, which I do not wish to see re-opened for a moment, I am willing loyally to submit to the decision of the committee. In a subsequent clause we made an alteration after debate that it should not be possible to refer to a t

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -
This is becoming intolerable to a number of us. We came here this morning to make a quorum and do some very important work. Much as we would like to have this clause reconsidered, we have no time to do it. The clause has been voted upon three times, and yet the honorable member (Mr. Symon), who has had possession of the Chair for an undue time, persists in wasting more time. I would rather take the clause, imperfect as it is to some extent, than re-open the discussion, and waste a lot of time over a matter that, after all, is not very important. I hope, Mr. President, you will use your influence to bring this matter to a speedy conclusion, as many of us will have to leave, and the Convention will be left without a quorum.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -
There is some misapprehension in the statement made yesterday, and now repeated, that I favour the amendment made in clause 75. I do not favour the limitation of the right of appeal at all, but I am quite prepared to accept what was decided yesterday. Much as I disagree with both clauses as they appear now, it would be unwise to recommit them and vote again on what we decided yesterday. Mr. Symon has, of course, threatened what he will do if the clauses be recommitted. There is no necessity for any threatening at all. No sooner was my amendment carried than Mr. Symon became so excited he could hardly write out the amendment be proposed to submit to the Convention with the idea of whittling away everything that had been conceded in the proposal carried. I am very glad to hear the explanation made by Mr. Symon this morning. It appears to me rather inconsistent with what he said yesterday, having regard to the words which were excised in section 75 at my instance in regard to matters not involving the interpretation of the Commonwealth or of the state law. Mr. Symon has today, for the first time, told the Convention even that should not be allowed to be the subject of appeal. In 1891, Mr. Symon held very strong views in favour of the Privy Council, and in favour of obtaining the right of appeal.

Mr. SYMON. -
I did.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
The honorable member held very strong views in favour of retaining the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Sir EDWARD BRADDO. -
Not in 1891?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
We have heard a great deal of the author of the Bill of 1891. Sir Samuel Griffith, when writing about that Bill, said-"I think the Canadian system as to appeals the most satisfactory." That is the most recent opinion of the author of the Bill. I do not think we should recommmit the Bill. There are, no doubt, deformities in it, but these the Drafting Committee can to some extent excise.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I would be perfectly satisfied if clause 75 were recommitted. The only reason I ask for the recommittal of clause 74 is that possibly some drafting changes may be necessary in that clause. In that matter, perhaps, the leader of the Convention can do all that is necessary, and, with your permission, sir, I will ask that my motion be confined to the recommittal of clause 75.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
Then, Mr. President, I am very sorry-

The PRESIDENT. -
Mr. Glynn will have to ask for leave to withdraw his motion for the recommittal of section 74, and it will be competent for any member to object.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
I ask for leave to withdraw my motion for the recommittal of clause 74.
Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK (Tasmania). -

I beg to withdraw my request that these motions for recommittal be made separately.

The PRESIDENT. -

Then I propose to put all the motions which have been made and not withdrawn collectively.

Mr. BARTON. -

In the order of the clauses in the Bill?

The PRESIDENT. -

I will put them in the order of the clauses or, if I put them as moved, they will come under the notice of the Chairman in the order of the clauses. The motion is, that clauses 55, sub-section (1), 75, 91A, 95F, 95G, and 96 be recommitted.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

I do not expect that any remarks I can make against the course of action which is proposed now will prevent the committee from recommitting these clauses. But I appeal to the leader of the Convention, and also to the Convention, as to whether they think it is wise to recommit those clauses after deciding upon them so deliberately. These clauses have been repeatedly discussed, and it is now proposed to recommit them, when a number of members who are not here were led to believe there would be nothing but formal business this morning. It is only by the greatest accident that I find myself here, because I did not think there was anything really requiring my presence. thought that the business was formal, and that there was to be an adjournment until Wednesday next.

Mr. BARTON. -

I caused a telegram to be sent to each member, with a special request for his attendance.

Mr. LYNE. -

I can assure Mr. Barton that I never received any telegram.

Mr. BARTON. -

I signed the telegrams last night, before I left the House.

Mr. LYNE. -

This is the first I have heard of it. After six weeks' discussion we wait until the last day to re-open questions of this kind, and lay ourselves open to be called on at a moment's notice to probably upset everything that has been done. What must the public think of a body which has been deliberating so long and was supposed to know its own mind two or three years ago, starting at the last moment to recommit clauses and upset in a small Convention what has been done in a full Convention! Such a proceeding would be the height of absurdity, and very injurious to the prestige of the Convention. There are many things in the Bill I do not agree with, but I should hesitate before accepting the catch vote of a minority to upset decisions made against my own opinion. If we are to deal with these matters again it would be very much better to adjourn until next week, and deal with them in a deliberative way in a full Convention. To recommit the clauses in the haphazard manner proposed would weaken the position of the Convention and of the Bill. I should not have risen, but I feel very strongly we are going to do something this morning which will injure us in the eyes of all the people of the colonies.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In reply, I should like to state that I consented to a recommittal of the clauses asked for, on the understanding that there were to be short speeches. I thought we should save more time by a few short speeches than by long and elaborate addresses such as that to which we had listened on the question whether there should be a recommittal or not. The Votes and Proceedings are in the hands of honorable members, having been sent round in the ordinary course. We did not meet until eleven o'clock, and, as far as possible, every member was notified by telegram. If some honorable members are away that is no reason why the Convention should not do its work, and if any harm result, that is the fault of the absent members. There is no reason why the members here should not be permitted to do the work, and I shall offer the most vigorous and strenuous opposition to any adjournment beyond to-day.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I will ask, Mr. President, that the clauses be put separately.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL (Victoria). -

I rise to a point of order. Is the Hon. Mr. Symon in order in speaking six or seven times?

Mr. SYMON. -

I was not speaking. Surely I can ask a question of the President. Upon my word, we shall have to ask the honorable member's permission to eat our breakfast directly. I ask that the clauses and sub-sections it is proposed to recommit be put separately.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I submit, sir, that as you have already put the motion in which they are all mentioned together, it is not competent now to put them separately.
do so.

The motion "That clause 5.5, paragraph (1), be recommitted" was agreed to.

The motion "That clause 75 be recommitted" was agreed to.

The motion "That clause 91A be recommitted" was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. -

I will put the remaining clauses collectively.

Dr. COCKBURN. -

As we have decided to recommit clause 75, I ask that clause 74 be recommitted.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

Too late.

The PRESIDENT. -

I do not think that it is too late. I will put the motion after we have disposed of the motion now before the Chair.

The motion "That clauses 95F, 95G, and 96 be recommitted" was agreed to.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I beg to move-

That clause 74 be recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the reconsideration of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill.

Clause 55. - (1) Laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the following words be added to the sub-section:-"and any provisions therein which do not deal with the imposition of taxation shall be of no effect."

There may be some words in a Taxation Bill which go beyond the dealing with the subject of taxation. I do not propose to touch sub-section (2), under the provisions of which a Taxation Bill can be ruled out of order because it contains more than one subject of taxation. The amendment is to meet the case in which there may be mere surplusage clauses which a court would decide went beyond dealing with the imposition of taxation. As it would be shown that these clauses went beyond the imposition of taxation, it would be easy to rule them out of the Bill. I reopen this matter because the Drafting Committee has come to the conclusion that the amendment should be accepted. If there were anything in the nature of a "tack" to a Taxation Bill, it would be the easiest thing in the world to have the "tack" ruled out, while the rest of the Bill would hold good. At the same time, I think that any attempt to make such a "tack" would be opposed by the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I should like to ask the leader of the Convention if he is clear, after the full consideration he has given to this clause, that the third subsection will have the effect that it is intended to have, and that a law which did not meet the requirements of that sub-section would still be valid should the combined Legislatures agree to pass it?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I see no reason why it should not be valid.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 74 (The appellate jurisdiction of the High Court),

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I have put clause 75 into a form which, I think, will carry out the intention of honorable members, and will make it unnecessary to amend clause 74. I ask that the consideration of clause 74 be postponed until we have dealt with clause 75.

Clause 74 was postponed.

Clause 75. - No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state, or from the High Court, or any other federal court, except that the Queen may, in any matter in which the public interests of the Commonwealth, or any state, or of any other part of her dominions, are concerned, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-

That clause 75 be struck out, with the view of substituting the following:-

Notwithstanding anything in the last section, an appeal to the Queen in Council, from a court of a state, or from the High Court, or from any other federal court, shall not be allowed in any matter in which the interpretation of this Constitution or of the Constitution of a state is involved, unless in any such matter the public interests of any part of Her Majesty's dominions other than the Common. wealth or a state are involved.

I think those provisions faithfully interpret the intention of the committee.

Clause 75 was struck out.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

Before the new clause is put, I would suggest that I should have an opportunity to bring forward my proposed amendment, because it was upon my suggestion that this clause was recommitted. If the amendment of the leader of the Convention is carried, it will render any attempt upon my part to change the wording of clause 75 nugatory.

Mr. BARTON. -

If the honorable member moved his amendment, I should have a difficulty in afterwards moving mine.

The CHAIRMAN. -

The best way would be for the honorable member to amend the provision which the leader of the Convention wishes to substitute for the clause.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not think I can accomplish what I desire by doing that. I desire that the right of appeal to the Privy Council direct from a state court or a federal court shall be abolished.

Mr. BARTON. -

You wish to abolish the appeal from a state court to the Privy Council?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes. I want appeals to go through the High Court.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

In all cases?

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes. That is in accordance with the provisions of clause 74. There will be an appeal, but it must be through the High Court. I wish also to retain the prerogative right of appeal in cases involving any other part of Her Majesty's dominions.

Mr. BARTON. -

I have done that.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes. I wish to retain this right of appeal in such a way that Parliament will not be able to abolish it.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is done.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I wish also to amend the clause so as to preserve, as the Committee have decided to keep up the right at all, the right of appeal in all matters-constitutional or other matters-from the High Court to the Privy Council.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not think the honorable member will have any difficulty in moving his amendment upon the provision which I have moved to substitute for the clause.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Could not the leader of the Convention, if my amendments upon the clause as it stands were carried, afterwards recast the clause in any shape he wished?

Mr. BARTON. -

If the Chairman says so.

Mr. GLYNN. -

This is how I wish the clause to read:-

No appeal shall be allowed to the Queen in Council from any court of any state, or from any federal court other than the High Court, except that the Queen may, in any matter involving the interest of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, grant leave to appeal to the Queen in Council from the High Court.

These words are very simple.

Mr. BARTON. -

It is very easy to make that amendment if you wish to move it. If my proposed clause is submitted the honorable member may select any words on which to move his amendment. Then if he will give me a copy of his amendment I will see that it is given effect to by the Drafting Committee.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Well, in order to bring the matter to a test I beg to move-

That the word "not," in the fourth line of the proposed clause, be struck out.

What I wish to be carried out, and what Mr. Barton will carry out if the word "not" is struck out, is this: There will then be retained the right of appeal to the Privy Council in all matters involving the interests of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, so that it cannot be touched by Parliament. The appeal from a federal court other than the High Court or from a state court direct to the Privy Council will be abolished, and that cannot be interfered with by Parliament. But the right of appeal in all matters, whether of a private character or involving interpretation of the Constitution, through the High Court to the Privy Council will be retained until the Parliament abolishes it. That is the effect of the words I wish to put in, and we have a statement of Mr. Barton that he will mould the clause so as to carry out these intentions.

An HONORABLE MEMBER. -

Will that allow Parliament to take away the appeal when they think fit?
Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes, excepting in matters involving any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, and that will be fixed in the Constitution. The direct appeal from all federal courts, except the High Court, or from state courts, will be abolished, but the appeal will be retained to the Privy Council in all matters, whether of a private character or involving interpretations of the Constitution, unless Parliament sees fit to abolish it.

Dr. QUICK (Victoria). -

I think the Convention now has the issue plainly stated on one side, and the proposition clearly drawn by the leader of the Convention. On the other side, we have the proposed amendment by Mr. Glynn. I will loyally accept the decision of the Convention whatever it is, but we may as well face this question seriously. Mr. Symon wants to take away the right of appeal to the Privy Council, not only on Commonwealth questions, but on state questions. That is an important matter. I ask honorable members are they prepared to go that length on all questions arising under the state Constitutions? For instance, take the case of Ah Toy. No appeal to the Privy Council on such an important question arising under the state Constitution would be allowed. Surely Mr. Symon must have hurriedly and rashly proposed that amendment yesterday. He could not have thought it out. His matured decision is to be found in the clause as it originally stood, preserving the right of appeal to the Privy Council on all great popular questions. The right of appeal on private questions in disputes between private citizens is not half so important as the right of appeal on public questions arising under the states Constitutions and the Commonwealth. I repeat that I would sooner see the right of appeal taken away from private citizens than see the right of appeal taken away on great and important public questions, which are of far greater importance. This will be a fearful blot on the Constitution if you take away the right of appeal on public constitutional questions, while you reserve the right of appeal on comparatively small insignificant issues between individuals. I hope the Convention will rise to the gravity and seriousness of this issue. If we are to have any alteration at all, I would sooner go back to the clause in the Bill as it originally stood, reserving the right of appeal on Commonwealth questions. I hope Mr. Glynn will persevere in his amendment with regard to the right of appeal on questions affecting the interests of persons outside the Commonwealth, so that that shall be embedded in the Constitution without the possibility of amendment. But, as a compromise, I think that my honorable friends (Mr. Symon and the leader of the Convention) might fairly agree to a provision placing this as a tentative matter in the Constitution, leaving the Federal Parliament hereafter to modify this right of appeal, trusting to the Federal Parliament. In that form I think a reasonable compromise may be arrived at, as long as we leave the matter in the hands of the Federal Parliament to regulate the rights of appeal hereafter. I feel that if the Bill went home in the shape in which it at present stands it would be the laughing stock of England, and a serious reflection upon the intelligence, patriotism, and loyalty of this Convention. Therefore I hope that, whatever happens, the right of appeal on public and constitutional questions will be reserved in this Constitution, and that we shall show no distrust in giving that right of appeal.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I am anxious in this matter to vote, as far as I can, so that the Federal High Court shall have the interpretation of the federal laws. I feel that it is important above all considerations that our High Court should be a strong and much respected court. In order to make it such you must make it a court competent to deal with the most important issues that can be presented, thus securing in the minds of the people a determination to see that it is strong in numbers and personnel. I am perplexed as to which of these amendments I am to vote for. In this matter I seek the guidance of Mr. Barton. If Mr. Glynn's amendment will give the right of appeal to the Privy Council in questions as to the interpretation of the Commonwealth laws, I desire to vote against that.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think that is what he desires.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Hear, hear; but the Parliament can abolish it.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I am opposed to there being any appeal from our own High Court. It should be as strong a court as possible, and should have as great responsibility as it is possible to throw on it, in order that it may be strong.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I agree entirely with Dr. Quick that if there was any justification for bringing this clause back into the committee that is a justification at least for saying something about it; so that we shall not hereafter be placed in the awkward position of perhaps having to get another recommittal.

Mr. FRASER. -

We do not want long speeches.

Mr. SYMON. -
I think the honorable member would be all the better for a long speech to instruct him in these matters, on which he does not seem to be very well informed. Mr. Glynn moves an amendment which will have the effect for all time, not until Parliament otherwise provides, of enacting a provision under which every law of the Commonwealth or law of a state which happened to be in conflict with a law of the Commonwealth, and about which a dead-lock may arise, or a difficult constitutional dispute may take place, is to be subject to the decision of the High Court, and then to the decision of the Privy Council. The result will be that that dispute will be hung up for one or two more years, which time it takes to have a decision of the Privy Council. That is a state of things that I personally do not contemplate with equanimity. I do not wish anybody else to entertain the same view, because it is largely a question of constitutional opinion. The reasons that Mr. Trenwith has just given are conclusive, to my mind, to show that the decisions of the High Court of Australia ought to be final on the interpretation of our own local laws. It will be more expeditious, and it will bring about a result with much greater promptness. But I agree with Dr. Quick. Although I have all along disapproved of reserving these constitutional appeals, I would rather see both these clauses restored to their original position. That was a compromise to which some of us who gave considerable attention to the matter had reached, and, for myself, I was willing to give way on one point, and other members, yielding to the majority, gave way upon others. But the true solution of it would have been to retrace our steps. If Mr. Glynn presses this to a division it seems to me that we shall be disrating the High Court. We shall be placing a serious difficulty in the way of the continuance of the Queen's government if disputes arise as to the construction of an Act of Parliament, and we shall be placing obstacles in the way of the easy working of this Constitution which I think none of us would like to bring about.

Question-That the word "not" stand part of the proposed clause-put.
The committee divided-
Ayes ... ... ... 21
Noes ... ... ... 18
Majority against Mr. Glynn's amendment... ... ... 3
AYES.
Barton, E. Kingston, C.C.
Brunker, J.N. Leake, G.
Cockburn, Dr. Lewis, N.E.
Deakin, A. Lyne, W.J.
Fysh, Sir P.O. O'Connor, R.E.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I should like to ask the leader of the Convention the meaning of the word "involved" in the clause? I know that the meaning itself must be involved; but would it extend to a case between individuals where the question of the validity of a state law was raised, and that depended upon the construction of the Constitution?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should rather think that it would include any such case. I take the word "involved" to be somewhat a strong one, and to mean what we understand in dealing with parliamentary Bills in which a question of expenditure is involved. The meaning of the term there is, I think, in which expenditure must necessarily be gone to. So here I think the term "involved" means in which it becomes a necessity for the determination of the case that the Constitution should be interpreted. I should think that whatever the main issue was which necessitated the interpretation of the Constitution it would come within the meaning of the word.

The new clause was agreed to.

Clause 74-The High Court shall have jurisdiction, with such exceptions and subject to such regulations as the Parliament may from time to time prescribe, to hear and determine appeals from all judgments, decrees, orders, and sentences:
I. Of any other federal court, or court exercising federal jurisdiction, or of the Supreme Court of any state, or of any other court of any state from which an appeal now lies to the Queen in Council, whether any such court is a court of appeal or of original jurisdiction:

II. Of the Inter-State Commission on questions of law only:

and the judgment of the High Court in all such cases shall be final and conclusive, saving any right which Her Majesty may be pleased to exercise by virtue of her Royal prerogative. Until the Parliament otherwise provides, the conditions and restrictions on appeals to the Queen in Council from the Supreme Courts of the several states shall be applicable to appeals from them to the High Court. Provided that nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the High Court from hearing and determining appeals allowed by the law of a state from the Supreme Court of the state. Provided also that the right saved is that of granting special leave to appeal, and shall continue only until Parliament otherwise provides.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I do not wish to make any more speeches about this subject; but I beg to move-

That the words "saving any right which Her Majesty may be pleased to exercise in virtue of Her Royal prerogative" he struck out.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT (New South Wales). -

I hope that these words will not be omitted, and I am very much surprised that the learned member (Mr. Symon), having occupied the position which he did in the, Judiciary Committee, should take an advantage of the recommittal of this clause for other purposes to move an amendment of this kind. I do not think it is fair that an amendment of this kind, which was arrived at after a great deal of consideration, should be proposed to be eliminated, if I may say so, without notice to anybody. I think it is absolutely unfair. The author of this Bill in 1891, Sir Samuel Griffith, was one of those who, unlike my learned friend, favoured the clause as it stood in the Bill of 1891, abolishing these appeals. Both these gentlemen since then have changed their opinions, until Sir Samuel Griffith now is of opinion that the best method of dealing with the Bill would be by retaining it in a shape similar to the Canadian appeal. Mr. Symon has changed his opinion since 1891, having believed very strongly then, as strongly as any man could, in retaining the right of appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. SYMON. -

Where did you get that?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
The honorable member has not denied it, and when he does I will tell him where I got it.

Mr. SYMON. -
Where did you get that?

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
The honorable member has not denied it.

Mr. LYNE. -
He was not in the Convention then.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I know that he was not in the Convention, but I know what I am talking about. My learned friend does not want to know where I got it.

Mr. SYMON. -
I do, indeed.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
The honorable member in 1891 was one of those who strongly believed in the right of appeal to the Privy Council. I have said that before, and the honorable member has not denied it. In 1891, Sir Samuel Griffith desired to abolish this right of appeal, but within the last few days he has written a letter in which he has expressed his entire approval of the Canadian principle. I am not going to reiterate all the arguments which were used yesterday. I did think yesterday, that having come to a conclusion on the matter, it would be allowed to rest at that. Although the clause was recommitted at, I think, the suggestion of the Chairman of Committees, because, no doubt, his words commended themselves to the Convention, it was never thought for one moment that an amendment of this kind would be sprung upon the Convention.

Mr. SYMON. -
I gave notice.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
Yes, the honorable member gave notice this morning.

Mr. SYMON. -
Before it was recommitted.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
The honorable member gave notice this morning, and be allowed Mr. Glynn to withdraw a proposal to recommit clause 74. If I had known what was going to happen, I should have objected to Mr. Glynn having leave to withdraw it.
He put somebody else up to withdraw it.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I will not say that the honorable member acted directly or indirectly, but somebody did exactly move what he desired himself to move.

Mr. SYMON. -
Because I had spoken.

Sir JOSEPH ABBOTT. -
I wish the honorable member would not interrupt me. This morning he was very rough on my honorable friend (Sir William Zeal), who offered a gentle word of advice in most conciliatory language. If we are going to undo what we did yesterday, after a great deal of trouble, when and where is this method to end? I will say no more about it. I regret very much that the same

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I will ask my learned friend (Mr. Symon) not to allow the twitting which he has just received from my honorable friend (Sir Joseph Abbott) to affect him so far as to cause him to call for a division. This matter has been amply discussed many times, and we had a straight-out vote on it, and if he calls for a division now and succeeds, the result will be to render probably nugatory and useless the clauses which we have just passed. Considering the time which has been given to it, and that the decision was come to after a great many discussions, I would like to influence my learned friend to let matters rest where they are, and not to call for another division.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I trust that this matter will be discussed without the slightest bitterness. I have invariably supported the abolition of the right of appeal to the Privy Council. In 1891 it was affirmed by a Federal Convention; in 1897, at Adelaide, it was similarly affirmed in 1897, at Sydney, it was similarly affirmed. in this very chamber the propriety of abolishing the right of appeal has been similarly affirmed.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Did we in Sydney?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
I did not think that we got that far.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
And it was not until yesterday that there was ever carried a proposition in favour of negativing the propriety of Australia retaining to itself the interpretation of the laws it makes. Now, sir, I put it to my friend, Sir Joseph Abbott, that there have been four decisions against him.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Oh, no; I do not think there was one in Sydney.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Very well; there have been three decisions against him, and only one in his favour. I therefore ask—is he not pushing his advantage a little bit too much when he says it is unfair to ask for a further division on the subject?

Mr. FRASER. -
We always look to the final decision as the real one.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Yes; and we will have a final one to day, I hope.

Mr. SYMON. -
Yesterday's division gave a snatch majority of one.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
There seems to have been some misunderstanding when the vote was taken yesterday. I was not connected with that division in the slightest degree; but I do put it that it is rather hard on the part of those who have a temporary advantage to point to only the last division, and to take no notice whatever of the variety of resolutions to the contrary effect which have been at different times affirmed by this federal gathering.

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It will be a great reflection on the work of the Convention if we upset yesterday's decision.

Mr. KINGSTON. -
There are a variety of matters on which the Convention has altered its opinion, and I hope we will go back to the position adopted about three weeks ago. Does Sir Joseph Abbott think that be ought to persist in objecting to our taking a division when the recommittal of the clause—a departure from the arrangement of yesterday; a fresh trial of strength in the matter—was carried in the interests of men and of a party against the opposition of Mr. Symon and his friends?

Mr. CARRUTHERS (New South Wales). -
I think in this matter we have done enough now, without carrying the honorable member's proposal, to cover ourselves with complete contempt, because the Bill, as it has now left us, with or without the honorable member's amendment—more especially with his amendment—will be of such a character that I venture to say not only will its passage here in Australia be jeopardized, but its passage through the Imperial Legislature will also be jeopardized. What have we done? We have decided, in point of fact, that whilst we ask that we shall have the right to interpret our own laws, to decree by this Draft Bill that the Imperial Court is not to have the power of interpreting an Imperial statute. And then the honorable member wishes to go further than that. He proposes to take away that which was part of the compact or bargain on which this stupid arrangement was made. Well, I do not think the honorable member wishes to provide that there shall be no appeal to the Privy Council in regard to individual suits, and then to super add to that what was practically an insult to the British Legislature, by a clause providing that there shall not be any appeal in matters involving the interpretation of the Constitution, which, mark you, is an Imperial statute. You are going to ask the Imperial Legislature to legislate that its own courts shall not interpret its own Act. We have gone too far already, and we shall simply cover ourselves with ridicule and contempt for what we have done, and add to it very materially, if, breaking away from the compact that these foolish provisions contain, we, by a breach of faith, take away the right already conferred by clause 74. I hope that the committee will negative the honorable member's proposal.

Mr. HASSELL (Western Australia). -

I purposely refrained from voting on this matter yesterday because I had not made up my mind on the question, but I have now made up my mind, and I shall vote for the retention of the words of the clause.

Mr. DOBSON (Tasmania). -

I hope that Mr. Symon will not only follow the advice of the leader of the Convention, and abstain from calling for a division on this point, but also that he will at once withdraw the amendment. If he will, I shall be most happy to resume my seat. If we cannot carry out the suggestion which has been made many times before that the wise thing for us to adopt is the Canadian system, I am quite sure Sir Joseph Abbott would give up the amendment passed yesterday if we simply add to the original clause, which we have already approved, words providing that the Queen in Council, in cases of great magnitude and public interest, may grant leave to appeal in private cases. Nobody desires that cases involving amounts of £2,000 or £3,000 shall go to the Privy Council, but where enormous sum, are involved between English contractors and colonial merchants, for example, we are told by such persons that to withhold leave to appeal to the Privy Council will not assist the acceptance of this Bill, but will cause great uneasiness. Therefore, why not give way to that sentiment? If the honorable member will not withdraw the amendment, I will try to point out to him how he is unintentionally misleading some members of the committee. I myself have been, to some extent, misled by the honorable member.
Mr. OCONNOR. -

Leave him to himself; do not press him to withdraw his amendment now.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I wish to be permitted to say that it is very amusing to me to find honorable members who are jealously wedded to their own particular alteration, and who have insisted on the recommittal of the clause to secure it, should, immediately another honorable member seeks to have effect given to his view, raise a great disturbance, and make all sorts of personal accusations and reflections because he ventures to do the same thing.

Sir WILLIAM ZEAL. -

You made plenty of accusations and reflections yesterday.

Mr. SYMON. -

I venture to say that such a course of procedure is not what I will call "playing fair." But I must say I yield to the very courteous and polite appeal made by Sir Joseph Abbott, and I beg to withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was, by leave, withdrawn.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 91A. - The net revenue from Customs and Excise shall be applied as follows:

(a) Not more than one-twentieth of such net revenue shall be applied towards the expenditure of the Commonwealth in the exercise of its original powers.

(b) Not more than four-twentieths of such net revenue shall be applied towards the expenditure of the Commonwealth in making good the net loss on the services taken over.

(c) The balance of such net revenue remaining after the application of the sums actually applied pursuant to, the last preceding paragraphs (a) and (b) shall be distributed amongst the states.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I have already stated the reasons why I asked for the recommittal of this clause, and I need not repeat them.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I was not in the chamber at the time, and I should be glad to hear them.

Mr. BARTON. -

Well, I was given to understand that some honorable members voted on the question one way or the other without perfectly appreciating what the question was. I am not one to unduly interfere with past decisions of the Convention, and I have not been in the habit of attempting to rip them up. And I think, subject to any explanation we may hear from Mr. Holder, there is some inconsistency in the working of this clause as compared with clause 90-clause 90 applying to the particular apportionment to each state.
on certain principles; while this one deals with the methods in which the aggregate shall be collected and retained by the Commonwealth. It seems to me there would be very great difficulty to avoid a clashing between the operations of the two things. But there is more than that in it. This clause amounts to a guarantee, and I have all along been, and I am still, opposed to implanting in this Constitution any financial guarantee to the states, for the plain reason that there could not be a stronger argument afforded to the enemies of federation than to ask for guarantees. Any one who leads to the implication that federation is going to bring about the financial ruin of any state unless it receives some dole or other to hold it up is playing into the hands of the enemies of federation.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Not a dole, but a return of its own.

Mr. BARTON. -
Any one who leads to the implication that federation is going to cause financial ruin to any state unless it receives some grant, whether it calls it its own or not, is, however unintentionally, doing a great deal of harm to the federal cause, because he supplies the enemies of federation with this argument: That federation will bring about financial ruin to the states.

Mr. HOLDER. -
The states cannot hold themselves up and pay £6,000,000 away.

Mr. BARTON. -
But when we say that, we are falling into a mistake which I thought we had all corrected long ago. It is all very well to frame a uniform Tariff producing a revenue of £6,000,000 a year; but a large amount of the intercolonial revenue is to be abolished, and the bulk of the uniform Tariff which is to supersede the half-dozen intercolonial Tariffs is to replace the intercolonial Customs revenue, which goes by the board. So that actually the increase of taxation on the people will only be a few hundred thousand pounds a year in a population of from three to three and a half millions. That is not an intolerable strain on the population of Australia. If it were, it would be a most significant commentary on what the world would be entitled to call the infamous and extravagant financing of Australia. If there is not a taxable margin which will cover the difference of revenue from the necessary new Tariff, which will suffice to replace the loss of the intercolonial duties, then, in the past, the population of Australia must have been screwed down pretty close to their taxable capacity. Now, I do not think that any of us hold that belief. Certainly I do not. I think the resources of our colonies and our fellow citizens are far beyond what is attributed to them by writers who have not sufficiently considered the enormous capacity for recuperation and the enormous elasticity of these colonies. Now, I have always objected, and I always shall object, to anything which

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

There is no defamation.

Mr. BARTON. -

What I am talking of is the effect of this sort of thing. Nobody respects the honorable member more and nobody believes more completely than I do that he is thoroughly favorable to federation, but the statements I allude to carry-to the outsider an implication that federation is such a bad, such a wasteful, such a crushing, such an extravagant thing, that unless means of this kind are taken to stop its effects, some colony or other will be made bankrupt. We do not believe it, but why should we allow others to use such an argument, apart from that, as an argument why this clause should be struck out, inasmuch as the Federal Parliament is to be free to deal with the finances and the distribution of the surplus as it pleases, after five years have elapsed from the imposition of the uniform Tariff? If there is to be any guarantee at all, it should not extend beyond that limit, and for this reason.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

If you stop there it might be reasonable.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg to move-

That the words "Until the imposition of uniform duties of customs and for five years thereafter" be inserted before the first word of the clause.

Mr. REID (New South Wales). -

I have spoken so often on numbers of attempts to put what is called a guarantee in this Bill that I do not intend to repeat what I have said.
Honorable members are very familiar with my views on this point, and I confess my disappointment that some honorable members still think it a vital matter that there should be a state guarantee. If they persist in it, I hope they will put it in the amendment Mr. Barton has proposed. Personally, I frankly admit that this is the least objectionable form of a guarantee, from my point of view, that I have seen. I have not quite so strong an objection to this as I have to some of the other proposals.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Will you accept that?

Mr. REID. -
I cannot possibly, I am so much opposed to it. But I frankly admit that it is the most reasonable way in which the position has been put, and I do not oppose this so strongly as I do the other proposals. But I point out that this will make a peculiarity in the position of the Treasurer of the Commonwealth which needs only to be stated to be seen at once. The Treasurer of the Commonwealth, when he is constructing his fabric of ways and means, will have the strongest possible temptation to look on Customs and Excise as an unsatisfactory method of raising revenue, because he only gets 5s. out of every £1 raised in that way, whereas from other forms of taxation he gets the full pound raised. Now, I must say, it is scarcely a scientific piece of legislation to put that temptation in the way of the Treasurer to make him discriminate as to methods of taxation.

Mr. BARTON. -
You may make him impose direct taxation.

Mr. REID. -
We may. If, for example, I had anything to do with the Commonwealth finances, and I found myself in a difficulty, should I go to a source of revenue which would only return to me 25 per cent. of the produce? No; I should go to a source which gave me the whole pound. I only put this view as one objection to this proposal, because it makes the position of the Commonwealth in a peculiar state, inasmuch as one form of taxation will give the Treasurer 100 per cent. of the taxes raised, and the other only 25 per cent. We know what may be the consequences of anything of that sort.

[The Chairman left the chair at five minutes past one o'clock p.m. The committee resumed at a quarter to two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I shall try and put the few remarks I have to make into the smallest possible space of time. I have said a good many times, in discussing the financial question, that I think the best security of the smaller states, or of the states as a whole, was that their needs require a certain return, and that therefore they would be able to secure at the hands of their representatives in the Federal Parliament that return. At the same time it is impossible to overlook the serious difficulties which present themselves in persuading the electors with whom we have to deal of the force of that argument. It is difficult to induce them to believe that if the Federal Treasurer has a surplus annually of £4,500,000, he would not be tempted to waste it. If he has not the statutory obligation upon him to make a certain return to the states, he may not make it. He may establish large defence organizations, or spend it in other ways; and then, it is said- "Where will the states be?" I do not agree with what the leader of the Convention has said as to the reflections upon the financial stability of the states sought to be cast by including this clause in the Bill. The states are well able to pay their way-not only to pay their way under present circumstances, but to meet any additional cost which the support of the Commonwealth establishment on a fair and reasonable basis will require. But they are not able to do that and at the same time sacrifice £6,000,000 of revenue. That is what makes the difficulty. If the states were not giving up £6,000,000 of revenue there would be no trouble. But as they are surrendering that amount it is not an unreasonable request they make to have some assurance as to what the return shall be. There is no reason why the Federal Treasurer should be endowed with £6,000,000 a year if he only wants £1,500,000; and to endow him with £6,000,000, of which he would have to pay back £4,500,000 to the states, seems to me to be a plan which requires the strength of some statute, or we shall find that the returns will get smaller and smaller as the years go by. I quite agree with what Mr. Reid has said, that of all the plans that have been suggested as to the guarantee this is the simplest, and involves the least difficulty to those states which have to accept it. There is no conflict between clause 90 and clause 91A, because clause 91 deals with the whole mass of the revenue, and chiefly limits the expenditure of that revenue under two heads. With a £2,000,000 Tariff the first thing clause 91A does is to determine the cost of the original powers of the Commonwealth shall not exceed £300,000 a year, and the effect of subsection (b) of clause 91A is to require that the net loss on works and services shall not exceed £1,300,000 a year. Both those amounts the Finance Committee arrived at in Adelaide as being the full cost of these two branches of expenditure. We have therefore provided in Clause 91A—which, in fact, has the same effect as the proposal of the Finance Committee in Adelaide—the limitation of these two forms of expenditure. That is the main purpose of clause 91A. As there is no reference to any limitation of expenditure in clause 90 there can be no conflict between the two. Clause 90 says that the balance, if any, shall be paid to the states, and provides that the returns shall be in proportion to contribution. Clause 91A determines what the sum total to be so subdivided between the states shall be. It does not touch the question of the principle on which the division shall take place, but simply says that there shall be an amount available for division. Therefore I do not think there can be the slightest conflict between clause 90 and clause 91A. I have only one other point to answer, and that is as to clause 91A, making it chiefly to the interests of the Federal Treasurer that he should levy direct instead of indirect taxation. My answer to that is that the needs of the states to have a certain definite return will require that that return shall be made. In the second place, the Federal Treasurer is not shut up with the single expedient of a customs duty only, from which he gets one-fourth of the proceeds only instead of the whole; because he will have a return of £1,750,000 per annum from works and services, and, by an addition of tonnage rates and so on, he can adapt himself to his requirements. I think there is a great deal to be said for the inclusion of the clause without the limitation suggested by the Drafting Committee.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

At this stage of the proceedings I do not intend to occupy many minutes, but I wish to emphasize this: That ever since we met in Adelaide, and since the time when the Finance Committee practically suggested this way of deciding the matter, I have on every occasion when I have referred to it advocated that there should be some definite return to the states provided for. I hailed with very great pleasure Sir Edward Braddon's amendment when he brought it in. It is simple and effective, and will coincide entirely with what I have advocated upon this question. I also think that as regards the small states, as well as possibly the larger ones also, this is one of those clauses which will help very materially to recommend the Bill. If we give up this £6,000,000 of revenue, and the states have no power of raising revenue through the Customs, and no guarantee from the Federal Treasurer that they will get a return, there is only one alternative, and that is imposing excessive direct taxation to fill up the gap and that would prevent a great many persons from voting for the Bill. I have very great pleasure in supporting this amendment. The Right Hon. Mr. Reid said that this was a provision which would induce the Commonwealth Treasurer to resort to some other modes of taxation, inasmuch as he would get only 5s. in the £1. I would ask him what position the states would be in if they got only 5s in the £1? Under this provision they would get 15s. The cost of the Federal Government will practically be limited to £300,000, and the cost of the services taken over will be £1,200,000, making a total of £1,500,000. This will leave £4,500,000 to be returned to the states, and the states will have a much better chance of getting the Money if this provision is retained.

Mr. VENN (Western Australia). -

If a limitation of five years is imposed we might add the words "or until Parliament otherwise determines." I do not like the idea of a guarantee, because it seems to cast a doubt on the solvency of the Federal Government. I voted against Sir Edward Braddon's clause last night, but with the proviso I have suggested I should be inclined now to support it.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I am very glad that some provision of this sort is to be inserted in the Bill. It has been stated by honorable members representing New South Wales and Victoria that without such a provision they would be unable to recommend the Constitution to the people, and in asking for it we are not making any unreasonable demand. All we desire to say is that three-fourths of the Customs revenue shall be returned to the states. Unless the states have some security of this kind, the people cannot be expected to accept the Bill. They all have large liabilities, and there is no power in the Bill to enable the Federal Parliament to assist any state that is in difficulties. It is like beating the air to tell us that we are to give up our great revenue producer—the Customs—and that we are to have no guarantee whatever that any part of that money will be returned to us, although we shall each have to provide for the payment of interest on our public debts. It has been stated by Mr. Reid and others that this might be an encouragement to the Federal Parliament to impose direct taxation. The Federal Parliament would have difficulty in passing any Taxation Bill, but there is very little to choose between the probability of the Commonwealth having to resort to other means of taxation and the almost certainty of the states having to raise money in that way. The states will have their public debts to provide for, and, unless they get this money back, they will have to adopt other modes of taxation in order to replenish their empty Treasuries.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Some of us are full up already.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Yes, in some of the colonies almost every avenue of taxation has been, or is being, exploited. I would appeal to our leader to try to meet us in this matter. He perhaps takes a greater interest in this question of federation than anybody else, and if he wishes to make the Bill acceptable to all the colonies he must help us to get a provision of this sort inserted.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In view of what has been said I shall refrain from voting against the clause but I should like to limit it to the term up to which the Federal Parliament will have to agree to a plan of distribution. That would be a fair compromise. If Sir Edward Braddon would accept this amendment I will undertake not to vote against the clause. It will give a guarantee for the time being, and I think the Federal Parliament may be trusted to deal with the question. What I want to do is to prevent this from being an absolute tie upon the whole Federation, by limiting it that it shall not continue beyond the five years unless the Federal Parliament chooses to continue it for a further period. That would be a fair compromise.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I trust that the clause will be re-affirmed in the condition in which we have it before us. I agree with what has been said by the Right Hon. Sir John Forrest, and I think we are indebted to the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon for having, even at this late stage of our proceedings, made a successful effort to carry a provision of this sort. I am inclined to think that some provision to prevent the absorption of the surplus revenue by the Commonwealth will not be so much needed in the early stages of the Federation as subsequently. The states in the Federal Parliament will be more closely in touch in the first few years of the Federation than they will be afterwards, and unless you lay down this hard-and-fast line I think you will find that there will be gradual invasions by the Commonwealth on the surplus which should be payable to the states. I trust that no alteration of the character suggested will be made. I have not troubled the Convention much during the course of its sittings, but, as regards this question of finance, I fell very strongly. We might possibly, in a wave of sentimental feeling, obtain the consent of the constituencies to the Bill, even without a clause of this description, but I would remind honorable members that in a great majority of the colonies the Bill will afterwards have to be submitted to both Houses of Parliament. I have no doubt that in the local Parliaments the financial clauses will be closely scrutinized. I should not like to have to undertake the task of recommending Parliament to assent to a Constitution under which we give £6,000,000 of the states' revenue to the Federal Parliament, knowing as we do that it will require, at the most, only £1,500,000.

Mr. ISAACS. -

£6,000,000 to begin with.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes, and the amount would gradually increase. The financial experts in the Convention have addressed themselves to this subject with the greatest care and intelligence, and I understand that this amendment was considered in the early stages. I am pleased that there is now a possibility of getting it embodied in the Constitution. I cannot believe that the local Parliaments would assent to the Bill without it. It is our duty, while endowing the Federation with funds sufficient for its purposes, not to trench unnecessarily on the financial resources of the states. Without this amendment we leave the states at the mercy of the Federation, and if we took the Bill to the local Parliaments we should be told-"Surely it was possible to devise some scheme by which we could meet the reasonable requirements of the Federation without depriving us of our chief source of revenue, and giving us no guarantee that the money will be returned to us." I am sorry we have not adopted the basis of a per capita distribution to come into force immediately, or at some future time, and if you omit this clause, I say unhesitatingly that the local Parliaments will not accept the Bill. It has been said that the Federation will be careful of the sovereignty of the states. Possibly it will. We might probably even trust the Federal Parliament not to allow the states to be involved in any great commercial disaster. But if you give them £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 more than they want, the states will be compelled to surrender extra powers in connexion with the expenditure of that money which could be more conveniently exercised by the states themselves. Under all these circumstances, I trust we will have the clause in the shape in which it was carried last night.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I do not wish to interrupt honorable members, but I am informed a large number of members leave by the afternoon train. It is quite possible that there will be no quorum unless honorable members curtail their speeches.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I will curtail my speech, but I ought to make a few remarks in regard to my amendment, which has been scrutinized and criticised. I admit to the fullest extent that Mr. Barton has federation at heart, and that we are indebted to him in the highest possible manner for what he has done in the cause. I claim also that I am as earnest, although, perhaps, I am not so efficient, in the cause. I desire federation, but I see no hope of it unless we pass this clause. I cannot help saying through you, Mr. Chairman, to my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) that it seems to me he made one objection to this clause yesterday which he has entirely dropped to-day. That objection was that the clause is inconsistent with other portions of the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -

I mentioned that this morning.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Yes, but the honorable member has withdrawn that objection, inasmuch as he now says that if the amendment be accepted then the clause will be accepted.

Mr. BARTON. -
That is so, because I offered to take what seemed to me the lesser of two evils.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Then as to this question of the conflict between this and other clauses, I cannot help saying that if this amendment had been one more acceptable to him he would have found a very ready means of putting the matters straight through the Drafting Committee.

Mr. BARTON. -
Nothing of the kind has suggested itself to me.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
What kind?

Mr. BARTON. -
Of the possibility of putting the matter straight through the Drafting Committee. Anything the committee would have to do with the clause would be a matter of substance, and with that they have nothing to do.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The matter for adjustment is one that could readily be effected by the committee by the trifling alteration of two or three clauses.

Mr. BARTON. -
Will my honorable friend permit me to say what will perhaps prevent my speaking at length I Has the honorable member considered the relation of this to clause 98A, and whether the Parliament could operate fairly in taking over the debts if they had this clause as an eternal provision in the Bill?

Mr. OCONNOR. -
It would operate whether they take over the debts or not.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I have thought of that.

Mr. BARTON. -
It might prevent their taking over the debts.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
I have thought of that, and I have spoken of it privately, but up to the present moment I have not heard anything about it publicly in the Convention. I see the difficulty.
If you provide "Until the Parliament otherwise provides," that might meet the case.

Mr. BARTON. -

If you made those fixed proportions returnable by the Commonwealth and repayable to the state, then if a large proportion of the debts were taken over, it would, with the increased expenditure of the Commonwealth, make the Commonwealth unable to get on, inasmuch as so much would have to go in the payment of the debts.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That could be charged against the state on whose behalf it was paid. That would get rid of the difficulty.

Mr. BARTON. - This clause would not, on the face of it. If you provide "Until the Parliament otherwise provides" I would be satisfied.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The objection to this proviso is that it is of a permanent character. The clause is so elastic, as I am sure my honorable friend will admit, that saving the possibility of some difficulty as to the question of debts—a difficulty which I think has been greatly disposed of by the interjection made just this minute—there is no reason why it should not be absolutely permanent. It will be seen there is no obligation on the Federal Parliament or the Federal Executive to increase the expenditure to an abnormal amount under this clause, inasmuch as in sub-sections (a) and (b) it is provided that no more than a certain proportion of the net Customs and Excise revenue shall be applied to the purposes of the Commonwealth, while the balance, which might be greater than three-fourths of the Customs revenue, would be available for distribution amongst the states in proportion to their contribution. The clause is one which would recommend itself certainly to four out of the five states, and which would, I think, induce four out of the five states to enter this Federation, where otherwise they might be disposed to stand out. I do trust we shall not find the decision of last night reversed without any reason that I have heard justifying such a reversal. I trust we shall pass the clause which my right honorable friend (Mr. Reid) has admitted is the least objectionable form of guarantee to the states that he has yet heard of.

Mr. BARTON. -

Before my friend sits down, may I say I am willing to modify my amendment to one of the two forms which will be the less objectionable to him? I am willing to leave it in its present form, or to insert the words "Until Parliament otherwise provides." I will take the form which is the less objectionable to my honorable friend.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Will the honorable member provide "Until a period of five years, and thereafter until Parliament otherwise provides"?

Mr. KINGSTON. -
Take the clause as it stands.

Mr. BARTON. -
I am rather exercised about this debt matter, and if my right honorable friend (Sir Edward Braddon) will tell which of the two amendments are the less objectionable to him, I will propose the clause in that form.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
Both clauses are objectionable.

Mr. BARTON. -
I do not ask the right honorable gentleman to accept either, but to say which is the less objectionable?

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -
The less objectionable is that which the honorable member at first proposed.

Mr. BARTON. -
Very well, then, I will leave it in that form.

Mr. VENN (Western Australia). -
It is a fortunate thing that by the standing orders of the Convention we have been able from the first not only to consider a subject once, but to consider it as often and as exhaustively as the Convention desires. We may not only come to a decision to-day after mature consideration, but after reconsideration may reverse that decision. It is a happy incident that we are able to do that, and at the conclusion of our labours feel that every question has been exhaustively dealt with in a way acceptable to the Convention as a whole. I feel gratified that this opportunity is afforded me of making a few remarks on this question. Last night, after full and due consideration of the subject, I was found in opposition. Having considered the subject since very maturely, I am led to the conclusion that I find myself on the wrong side of the House. I hope now that I shall have an opportunity, if a division occurs, of putting my vote in agreement with the resolution as it now stands before the House. I shall have much pleasure in giving my full support to the proposal as it originally stood. I do not think there will be any particular advantage in limiting the term to five years, or any particular time. Last night, one of the great factors in leading me to vote as I did was the fact that I reposed the greatest possible confidence in the Commonwealth Parliament. It struck me it would be an unwise thing for us to attempt to limit expenditure, but that we ought to trust to the policy of such men as ourselves who will be elected to that Legislature to do the best in the interests of the Commonwealth generally. But it has occurred to me since that if the Commonwealth were reduced to the necessity of having to levy a tax to recoup their Treasury for money they would not have otherwise, the state would have to do the same, if it is left to the states. Of the two bodies, I prefer to be taxed directly by the state rather than by the Commonwealth. Under the circumstances, I feel I was on the wrong side last night, and if an opportunity is afforded me to-day of-voting with those in favour of the clause I will be found supporting them.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

The suggestion of the leader of the Convention to accept the clause with a limitation to five years appears to come close to something approaching a settlement. Would it not be possible, as I have suggested to a few members, to read the clause in connexion with clause 98, and to provide that the system of redistribution shall obtain until clause 98 has been taken advantage of, and until the Commonwealth have on just terms taken over the state debts?

Mr. BARTON. -

It may not be taken full advantage of.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

I mean when taking full advantage as at the date of the establishment of the Commonwealth. That may imply so great a financial change in the relative position of the stater, and the Commonwealth that a reconsideration of the financial position of the Commonwealth and the states would have to be entered on, and there would be time to review the question. The amendment would be that the system is to last five years, and thereafter until the Commonwealth has arranged to take over the debts. This would probably mean that the debts would not be taken over until the federalization of the railways. When that gigantic and desirable financial operation had taken place would be the proper time for this financial arrangement to terminate.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -

It is so desirable to get a unanimous vote, that I think it only right to offer a suggestion which I hope will meet the views of both the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon and those who, like myself, have an objection to putting in a permanent document a provision of a temporary character, unless that state of affairs is indicated in the words of the clause. The views of both parties would probably be met if after the word "states" were added the words "or applied in payment of the interest on state debts taken over by the Commonwealth."

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
That is very vague.

Mr. BARTON. -

If it were made to provide, as applied in accordance with the Constitution, that would mean under section 98.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

That would be right, but the other would be very vague.

Mr. BROWN. -

That would carry out what Mr. Deakin suggested just now, and also the intention of Sir Edward Braddon and those who have supported him.

Mr. FRASER (Victoria). -

I heartily support the clause as passed last evening. But I would like to draw attention to what I conceive to be a danger in it. The clause contains a cast-iron provision, and it may lead to the Commonwealth being in dire necessity for money at some future time. Suppose an invasion took place, or the Commonwealth requires to enter upon a very large expenditure for some public purpose—an expenditure which the whole nation would unanimously say "Yea" to it will be hampered by the provisions of this clause, because the clause says that the Commonwealth shall only take a certain proportion of the Customs revenue.

Mr. REID. -

If they want £500,000 they must raise £2,000,000 through the customs.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Upon an occasion like that the Commonwealth could raise a loan.

Mr. FRASER. -

I conceive that the clause will create a great difficulty. The Commonwealth would have to resort to other taxation than is provided for in the clause, and I think some safety-valve should be provided. For that reason I should like to have it enacted, that after five years this arrangement might be subject to the alteration of the Federal Parliament.

Mr. SYMON. -

The honorable member does not object to revenue being raised by direct taxation.

Mr. FRASER. -

I do not object to the revenue being made up in any way the Parliament chooses.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

If my amendment is carried, clause 93 will will give ample power to the Parliament to distribute the revenue upon whatever basis it thinks fair after five years.
Mr. FRASER. -
I will support that.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
It seems to me that the question of direct taxation is again being drawn across the trail to catch votes. Under ordinary circumstances, a million or two million pounds could not be taken from the Customs revenue; but, suppose that an expenditure were undertaken, the Commonwealth would have to raise the money by direct-taxation. If the money were taken out of Customs revenue, and the clause were not in the Bill, there would be so much less surplus to return to the states, and the states would have to make up the deficiency themselves by direct taxation. These little words, "direct taxation," were used in the Finance Committee, and have been used since to try and frighten honorable members. If money cannot be raised by customs duties, it must be raised by direct taxation.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. BROWN (Tasmania). -
I beg to move-

That the following words be added to sub-section (c):-"or applied in accordance with this Constitution in the payment of the interest on state debts taken over by the Commonwealth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 95F. - The Parliament may by any such laws forbid, in respect of railways, any preference or discrimination by any state, or by any authority constituted under a state, which the Inter-State Commission may deem undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any state.

But due consideration shall be given to the financial responsibilities incurred by any state in connexion with the construction and maintenance of its railways.

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Victoria). -
Clause 95E empowers the Federal Parliament to make laws with regard to the railways relating to trade and commerce. I should be perfectly inclined to stop there and leave the whole matter to be dealt with by the Federal Parliament as it thought fit. However, we have determined to put limitations upon this provision. The first limitation we put upon it is that, although the Federal Parliament may make laws prohibiting any reference or discrimination, it may only prohibit such preferences and discriminations as the Inter State Commission deems undue or unreasonable. Without that provision the Federal Parliament would have power to prohibit all preferences and discriminations which they thought were improper. Another limitation which is provided is that if the rates are deemed to have been imposed for the development of the territory of the state, even although they are undue, unreasonable, and unjust, the Inter-State Commission will have no power to interfere with them, and, consequently, the Parliament will have no power to prohibit them, provided that they apply equally to the goods of all states. Victoria, in respect to these rates, is in a very peculiar position. Our area of territory is very small, while in New South Wales they have a very large territory. Therefore, across the border they may be able to impose rates applying equally to the goods of all colonies, and say that they are intended for the development of their territory, whereas, as a matter of fact, they are aimed at the ruin of the trade of Victoria.

Mr. REID. -

What rate does the right honorable member wish to prevent? Does he want Victoria to be allowed to charge a lower rate to the people of New South Wales than to the people of Victoria?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Well, my right honorable friend would be able to charge less to the people of Riverina than to the people of Bourke.

Mr. LYNE. -

At the present time the rates are the same.

I Sir GEORGE TURNER. - Well, they are not the same to all places within New South Wales. New South Wales, under the provisions of this clause, would be able to make rates to entirely suit the local conditions. Then we proceed to clause 96, which is intimately connected with the two clauses to which I have referred. Although the leader of the Convention has made an alteration in the verbiage of this clause that has made no alteration in its meaning. The clause means that no matter what the Parliament may desire to do, all matters relating to the execution and management of the provisions affecting trade and commerce, including that of free-trade between the states, and questions of navigation, must be left to the decision of the Inter-State Commission. The Parliament cannot make alterations or variations or appoint any other body to carry those provisions into effect. The only power that the Parliament will have will be to make machinery clauses to provide for their adjudication and administration. What I say is that all these questions should be left for the determination of the Federal Parliament. We ought to have perfect confidence that the Parliament would deal with them in an honest and just way. With a view to testing the feeling of the Convention, I move-

That the words "Inter-State Commission" be omitted, with a view to the insertion of the words "the Parliament."

If the amendment is carried, alterations will have to be made to provide for the carrying out of the provision relating to trade and commerce under the direct control of the Federal Parliament. This will allow the Federal Parliament to make what alterations are found to be necessary as time goes on. Otherwise, we shall have a hard-and-fast rule in the Constitution which, in years to come, the colonies will deeply regret.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

This matter has been the subject of consideration upon two occasions, and has twice been decided in the same way. Five of the New South Wales delegates have to leave the colony almost immediately, and, therefore, as a matter of fair play, I suggest that we should go to a division almost at once. I will give way if Mr. Reid wishes to speak, because I shall be here, but I do not want to speak at all. What I ask is that if one speech has been made on the other side, as one has been made on Sir George Turner's side, it will then be only reasonable to divide.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We waive our rights on this side.

Mr. REID. -

I will not take advantage of the position. I will simply speak for two or three minutes. I wish to express my profound concern at the course which has been taken after this matter has been thoroughly thrashed out in the whole Convention - the course taken at the last moment of this sitting, at a time when a number of members are away. However, we are here now to deal with it, and we will have to take the risk. We had to take the risk on a previous division, which I hope will have no bearing on this matter. I hope that the two matters have not got mixed up in any way in the minds of honorable members, and that the division which took place a short time ago will have no sort of bearing on the division which will take place now. I feel sure it will not be so. I feel sure that no honorable member has mixed up the two matters, but that every one will give his vote in an independent way, that they will deal with the two matters absolutely on their merits, because I know it is impossible here that there could be any sort of arrangement which would lead to support being given to one proposition, with a view to support being given of this kind. I feel sure that such things are impossible in this Convention, and that the division list will show that to be the case; but I wish to point out this plain proposition, which is the only one I will put. Sir George Turner says surely we can trust the Federal Parliament. No doubt, we can, but who can conceive of the wisest and best Federal Parliament in the world sitting as an Inter-State Commission to consider railway rates, and perpetually engaged in considering the different rates as they come out? Who can conceive of a parliamentary tribunal sitting to do that sort of business?

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

It will have absolute power to create that tribunal, and act upon the report of that tribunal as it thinks fit.

Mr. REID. -

Exactly. I quite agree with that. But then my honorable friends have just got a guarantee into the Constitution successfully, in spite of the repeated refusals of this Convention to put such a guarantee in—it was accepted at Adelaide, but it was absolutely refused here, reversing the decision at Adelaide, and acting upon the report of a committee specially appointed to deal with the question. Now, after that deliberate refusal, that has been reversed at the last moment of the Convention, when it is an imperfect body. Is that going to be the history of this matter? If that is to be so, it will be a very extraordinary conclusion to our deliberations. I have not, upon any of the matters which oppress my mind very much in this Bill, taken any such course, because I have felt that this is not the time to do so. But since we are on the question of guarantees, and the smaller states have joined with Victoria, and insisted on the guarantee of their revenue, I now ask, on behalf, not only of New South Wales, but of all the colonies, that this guarantee shall remain in the Constitution—that all these matters, whenever they arise, shall be dealt with by a competent independent body, and that Parliament shall be left free to create that competent independent body.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is not so here.

Mr. REID. -

If this Constitution is to be left in such a way that Parliament need not create this body, and that these matters may be dealt with by Parliament, even-

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That is not the proposal.

Mr. REID. -

It is really rather amusing to me, after all we have said about this thing, that my honorable friend should say that. I say the proposal of Sir George Turner certainly takes this guarantee out of the Constitution that there should be an Inter-State Commission; and that this Inter-State Commission shall have the power of deciding these matters, and it makes the whole thing subject to Parliament. As we are about unsettling all these things, it will be a thoroughly characteristic conclusion to our labours if we now end-after having put that guarantee in to please some elements of this Convention, after it had been refused by the whole Convention—it will be a perfectly consistent conclusion if we now, at the eleventh hour, take out that guarantee as the next act after putting another guarantee in. We refused before to do so, and I do hope, as a last appeal to this Convention, that what was put in deliberately after a most thorough debate-

Mr. BARTON. -

There were two decisions.

Mr. REID. -

There were practically two decisions, and now, in this imperfect body, at the last moment, the decision is to be upset.

Mr. BARTON. -

Sir George Turner accepted the proposal.

Mr. REID. -

I understood that Sir George Turner had practically accepted the proposal as it is in the Bill.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No.

Mr. BARTON. -

He accepted it on the first debate.

Mr. REID. -

I think so. Out of proper consideration—I will not say proper, I will say a weak consideration—we have allowed this matter to be re-opened after its settlement and after it was accepted.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

I was asked the spur of the moment by Mr. Holder whether, as a compromise, I would accept the Inter-State Commission. I then said yes, but on further consideration I found that it would not do justice to Victoria.

Mr. WISE. -

The honorable member refused my proposal to leave things as they are.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Yes, but-

Mr. REID. -

The honorable members will not leave things as they are between the states, as we are willing to do. They are not willing to do that, they will insist upon the question being re-opened in this way, and I am prepared to see what is the result.

Mr. LYNE (New South Wales). -

As I am going away, I wish to say a few words on this question. I have always been against an Inter-State Commission with the powers with which, it seemed to me, it was endowed. If the commission is under the direction of the Parliament, then I do not object to it, and I am informed that under clause 96 the commission is under the direction of the Parliament.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
Oh, no.

Mr. BARTON. -
It is.

Mr. LYNE. -
If so, I am prepared to vote for the Inter-State Commission, but I will never vote for the Inter-State Commission having powers practically superior to Parliament.

Question. - That the words "Inter-State Commission" proposed to be struck out stand part of the clause-put.

The clause was agreed to.

Clauses 95G and 96 were agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -
I beg to move-
That the Chairman report the Bill, with amendments, to the Convention.
The motion was agreed to.
The Bill was reported with amendments.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I propose to move-
That the consideration of the report be an order of the day for the next sitting of the Convention.
Perhaps it would be better to fix a later date than Wednesday, because the drafting amendments have to be considered now, and it may be that the Convention will like to have a formal sitting in case of any formal business coming before it on Monday, in which case I will ask that the consideration of the report be an order of the day for Wednesday.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -
Before that question is put, I would point out to the leader of the Convention one possible danger; it is that there might not be a quorum. If honorable members go away while the Drafting Committee is doing its work it will be awkward.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
So far as the Drafting Committee are concerned, we can be here at half-past ten each morning. We shall be working in an adjoining room.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -
I mean that there may not be a quorum of the Convention when it meets on Monday morning.

Mr. BARTON. -
Then it will stand adjourned until the next day.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -
That would be all right if we had not passed a resolution-just now that the Convention meet from day to day, as ordered.

Mr. BARTON. -
We can, before the rising of the Convention, fix a day for its next meeting. There being a sessional order unrescinded in existence, I take it that if we had no quorum on Monday that would operate to the extent of the Convention meeting on the next ordinary day, there being no counter order.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
Sit on Monday, and let the Convention stand adjourned until next day.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think it helps us in any way at all. If I may explain the position, subject, of course, sir, to your opinion, we have in existence a sessional order which we have not repealed, that is: That the Convention do meet on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday. We made an exception to that to enable us to order other times, but I take it that if we do not order those times the ordinary

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Do you want us here on Monday?

Mr. FRASER. -

Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -

To remove all doubts— and if it is necessary I will ask the Convention to suspend the standing orders, although I do not think we need do that—I beg to move—

That the Convention do meet at half-past ten o'clock on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday next.

That will remove the difficulty, and after that motion is carried I will move the other motion.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

Who is going to challenge us if we do not?

Mr. SYMON. -

On which of the three days, may I ask the leader, is the business to be transacted?

Mr. BARTON. -

So soon as we can complete our work we wish to meet the Convention and have the Bill distributed.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -

You may want to consult the Convention before it is completed.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not think that will be likely on Monday; I do not think it is very likely on Tuesday; but I do not wish any step to be taken which might preclude us, if we are fortunate enough to get our work done in time, from bringing up the Bill to the Convention. I think the probability is that it will be Wednesday, and I indicated a little while ago, yesterday I think, that it would be a convenient thing if we could place the Bill in the hands of honorable members at half past ten o'clock on Wednesday, and then have a sitting, which will be more or less formal, at two o'clock on Wednesday afternoon, so that honorable members who are going away will be in at the death.

Mr. SYMON. -
   You mean at the life?

The PRESIDENT. -
   I would call the attention of the leader of the Convention to the fact that we have not yet fixed a time for the consideration of the report of the committee.

   The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -
   I beg to move-
   That the consideration of the report be made an order of the day for Wednesday next.

   The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -
   I propose to move-
   That the Convention, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday next, at half-past ten o'clock.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
   In view of the observations of my honorable friend (Sir Richard Baker), I would like to ask the President what the real effect of that will be? Under the standing order, will it mean that if there is no meeting of the Convention, it stands adjourned as of course until Tuesday; and then, if there is no meeting of the Convention on Tuesday, it stands adjourned as of course until Wednesday?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
   I think so; I do not think there is anything in the Federal Enabling Act to prevent that state of things. There are provisions in the Act as to sittings, but I have no recollection of any provision to prevent that from being done, unless some one can remind me of one. I think it is all right and the Clerk at the table seems to be of the same opinion.

The PRESIDENT. -
   I am disposed to think that the resolution we carried to-day would necessitate the fixing of a time for the Convention to meet on each day.

Mr. GORDON. -
   Is a quorum necessary?

The PRESIDENT. -
   I think so.

Dr. COCKBURN. -
   Why cannot we say that, at its rising or Monday, the Convention shall then stand adjourned until Tuesday?

Mr. BARTON. -
I will add that. I beg, sir, to move the motion in this form—
That the Convention, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday next at half-past ten o'clock, and at its rising on Monday it stand adjourned until next sitting day.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. -
You may not meet on Tuesday, and that will be very awkward.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I may say, and honorable members may take this for granted, that the Drafting Committee will make no amendments which are substantial, unless, to this extent, that where it is the obvious intention that—a consequential amendment shall be made which appears to be one of substance, that amendment will be made as one of consequence.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I understand that we have already passed a motion to consider the report on Wednesday next, and we, therefore, I should think, may go away to-day assured that nothing can be done until Wednesday. I hope it is clearly understood that, as the consideration of the report is set down for Wednesday, we cannot do anything until that day. It is very awkward to have to wait about on Monday and Tuesday with the almost certainty that nothing will be done until Wednesday, whereas, if we know that it is not coming on until Wednesday, we are quite assured that there will be a quorum.

The PRESIDENT. -
Unless some other resolution is agreed to it will be impossible for the report to be taken into consideration before Wednesday.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
May I make another statement in order to facilitate our work? On the day on which the reconsideration of the report is to be taken it will be necessary to have a quorum, because there is work to be done on that day, and the Bill must be in such a position that copies of it can be supplied to honorable members, and until they are supplied with two copies apiece the proceedings cannot be declared closed so that it will be a necessity for honorable members to be present. In the case of those who, unfortunately, have had to leave for distant colonies, the only way in which we can fulfil our duty in that respect will be to post copies to them, and take that as supplying them with copies, but I ask all other honorable members to attend on Wednesday.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOX (Tasmania). -
I hope that copies of the Bill will be available for distribution some time or other on Tuesday.

Mr. BARTON. -

As soon as they are ready they will be distributed.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I am not urging that it should be done as a matter of course, but that it should be done if it be practicable to do it.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I will do everything I possibly can to get the Bill into the hands of honorable members at the earliest moment. On that condition, they must allow me to say that it will be impossible to get the Bill showing the amendments in relief type if they are to have the measure in their hands as soon as possible. However, they will have the existing print of the Bill on the left-hand page, and the Bill with the drafting amendments on the right-hand page. I think they might take that as sufficient. If so, they will get the Bill all the earlier.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at seven minutes past three o'clock p.m., until Monday, 14th March, at half-past ten o'clock a.m.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill: Drafting Committee's Amendments-Adjournment.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at thirty-five minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I should like to ask my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor), who, I suppose, represents the leader of the Convention, whether there is any prospect of our having a rough draft of the Bill, containing the Drafting Committee's amendments, laid before us to-morrow?

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I do not think there is any prospect of having a rough draft of the Bill in the hands of honorable members by to-morrow morning, but probably later on in the day it will be ready.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Some arrangement might be made for having it delivered to honorable members.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes, arrangements shall be made for having it delivered to honorable members as soon as it is ready, whatever time of the day it is.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

It may be to-morrow night?

Mr. OCONNOR. -

Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

If I may be permitted, I should like to call the attention of the Drafting Committee to the words that were inserted at the last sitting at the end of clause 93c. The words in question were inserted on the motion of my honorable friend (Mr. Holder), and although they are of no importance to me, as representing Western Australia, still it appears to me that a difficulty will arise in carrying them out, and therefore I should like to call the attention of my honorable friend (Mr. O'Connor) to them. The words I refer to are to the effect that foreign goods imported into Western Australia during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties should not have lower duties imposed on them than are imposed on the same classes of goods from the other states of the Commonwealth. Now, that, I think, will lead us into trouble. At any rate, it will form a difficulty for the Federal Parliament in framing a Tariff, because they will be bound to make the Federal Tariff equal, at any rate, to the Western Australian Tariff in regard to those articles.

Mr. TRENWITH. -

As far as Western Australia is concerned.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I do not think the Federal Parliament will have any power to make any variation in the Federal Tariff. It must be uniform throughout Australia. Therefore it will come to this. Supposing we take an instance. Take the case of flour. If there is a duty of £1 per ton levied on flour imported into Western Australia from the other colonies, there will have to be in the Federal Tariff a duty of £1 per ton against foreign flour.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I rise to a point of order. I ask you, Mr. President, if the right honorable member is in order in discussing the question?

The PRESIDENT. -

The objection is taken that the right honorable member is not in order in discussing the question, and that objection is well founded. I must, therefore, ask the right honorable member, under these c

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I was merely trying to point out a difficulty that has arisen.

The PRESIDENT. -

I will point out to the right honorable member that possibly all he desires might be served by calling the attention of the Drafting Committee to the matter privately and, if not, that he will have an opportunity of raising the question on Wednesday next.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

It will be too late to do anything then.

The PRESIDENT. -

I do not think so. The full Convention will then meet for the purpose of dealing with question and, of course, it is desirable that any discussion of this matter should be taken when there is a fuller attendance of honorable members.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. OCONNOR (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That this Convention do now adjourn.

I would like to state to my right honorable friend (Sir John Forrest) that the Drafting Committee will be only too happy to receive any intimation he likes to make, or to have their attention called to any difficulty he wishes to put before them now. Of course it is very undesirable that there should be any debate at the present sitting.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

I was only making a suggestion.

Mr. OCONNOR. -

I could see that.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at twenty minutes to eleven o'clock.
Tuesday, 15th March, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill: Drafting Committee's Amendments.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at twenty minutes to eleven o'clock a.m.
COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.
Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). - I should like to ask a question with regard to clause 75, as to whether it is intended to leave the right of appeal from a state or the Federal High Court itself direct to the Privy Council, as it stands in the Bill, or whether the matter can be subsequently opened by the Parliament?
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). - I am afraid that if I were to answer questions as to what is intended to be done, I should expose the Drafting Committee to a flood of interrogations. I can only say that what we intend to do is to carry out the decisions of the committee. Of course there are one or two cases in which the decisions which have been arrived at require a certain amount of interpretation in the light of the debates, and in those cases we shall take what was said, as well as what was put in the Bill, for the purpose of ascertaining what the movers of provisions desire. In the case of the proposal my honorable friend carried, and which was put as a proviso to clause 74, it is evident that the words as they appear are only in the nature of instructions to the committee, and they will have to be interpreted in the light of statements made by my honorable friend in answer to inquiries by me. That is the course that will be pursued. When an amendment, as carried, is intended only as a suggestion to the committee, it will be interpreted in that way.
Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). - I understand that several of the representatives are going to Bendigo this evening, and the return train will only arrive in Melbourne at ten o'clock to-morrow. Perhaps, therefore, it will be better that the meeting of the Convention to-morrow should take place at eleven o'clock, otherwise there may not be a quorum present.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). - I am very glad that my honorable friend told me that. I beg to move-
That the Convention, at its rising, do adjourn till to-morrow at eleven o'clock.
The motion was agreed to.
The Convention adjourned at sixteen minutes to eleven o'clock a.m.
Wednesday, 16th March, 1898.

Commonwealth of Australia Bill: Drafting Committee's Amendments.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at fourteen minutes past eleven o'clock a.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I desire to lay upon the table a copy of the Commonwealth of Australia Bill, as revised by the Drafting Committee, and to move that it be printed. I may say, Mr. President, that the print of the Bill, if this motion is carried, will be in a similar form to the print that was given on a former occasion, namely, it will contain on the left hand side the Bill as last reported, and on the right-hand side the Bill as proposed to be further amended by the Drafting Committee. I propose to take, in the usual formal way, the motion that this Bill, as revised by the Drafting Committee, be printed. After obtaining an instruction to the committee on the Bill that they may deal with a free hand with the Drafting Committee's amendments, I propose then to move that the Convention adjourn until two o'clock. My reason for this is to effect a saving of time. Honorable members will see that the Drafting Committee have bestowed a very great deal of labour upon the Bill in the limited time in which it has been permitted them to make such alterations in mere form as seemed to them to be advisable in this final stage. Honorable members will recollect that in Sydney the Drafting Committee had little or no time for any of the work of revision. From the beginning of our consideration of the Bill in Adelaide, until last Friday, there has been a very large number of suggestions as to drafting amendments, for which the committee have to express their utmost thanks to the honorable members who have assisted them. It has thus become necessary for the Drafting Committee to bestow an extraordinary amount of attention, in the few days that have elapsed since Saturday, to the form which it is considered the Bill should finally assume, so far as the technical work of the measure is concerned. Honorable members will know, when they have gone through this long schedule of amendments, that the sense of the Bill has been preserved,-upon which I cannot ask them to proceed at once-and when they compare these amendments with the Bill as printed last Friday. I think I am right in stating, exercising my memory at short notice, that there has been only one amendment in substance

[P.2440] starts here
made to which I desire, when the time comes, to call the attention of the committee, and that is an amendment with reference to one of the disqualification clauses. I need not dilate upon that amendment now, but it is the substitution of "one year" for "three years" in respect of that disqualification, which only lasts whilst the person is under sentence for some offence. That amendment is in clause 44. In everything else, while honorable members may sometimes think the Drafting Committee have freely interpreted the instructions given to them, they will nevertheless find that either the meaning of the amendment is plain upon a comparison of it with the Bill as it stood before, or they will find when there is any apparent difference that the questions asked and answered and the explanations given in debate have accounted for the difference, and that the Drafting Committee has, in all instances, endeavoured to faithfully interpret the wishes of honorable members. I now beg to move-

That the Bill, as revised by the Drafting Committee, be printed.

I shall follow that motion up in a minute or two by asking that the Convention do adjourn until two o'clock, so that honorable members may have time to look over this schedule of 15 pages of drafting amendments. As I previously said, I cannot expect honorable members to go through the Bill as amended by the Drafting Committee at once, without a great deal of discussion which otherwise would be avoided. If we undertake this labour at once, I think I can promise honorable members that before we have gone through this schedule of amendments, a great deal of debate will take place which would be saved if honorable members took two or three hours to compare the amendments with the Bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I now beg to move-

That the standing orders be suspended for the purpose of enabling instructions to the committee to be moved and dealt with.

If that is agreed to, I will then propose a motion to the effect that the committee of the whole have leave to adopt the Drafting Committee's amendments either in one resolution or in so many resolutions as it thinks fit. That will give the committee a perfectly free hand to deal with the Drafting Committee's amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That it be an instruction to the committee of the whole that they have leave to deal with the amendments proposed by the Drafting Committee either by one resolution or by such resolutions as the committee see fit.
The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
Without any formal motion, sir, I would suggest that you should now suspend the sitting of the Convention until two o'clock this afternoon.

[The President left the chair at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock a.m. The Convention resumed at two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move—
That the President do now leave the chair, and the Convention resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider the Bill as proposed to be amended by the Drafting Committee, together with a new clause, 101A.

The new clause is in print, and, I think, has been distributed. An important clause was carried at the instance of Sir Edward Braddon, which, I think, finds itself numbered in the present print as 87, on the right-hand page; it was 91A, I think, on the left-hand page. Sir Edward Braddon empowers me to say that he wishes a slight amendment to be made in the clause, and I would like to ask you, sir, whether, under the motion I am moving, it will be competent for the committee to deal with that clause, otherwise I might move an instruction to the committee to have power to deal with it?

The PRESIDENT. -
Is it proposed by the Drafting Committee to amend clause 91A?

Mr. BARTON. -
I should be very glad, sir, if the other members of the Drafting Committee do not object, to accept the amendment, but then I am afraid that it involves in some degree a question of policy. I do not think any honorable member wished to re-open any matter which has been decided. If it be the understanding of the Convention that there is no desire to re-open any other matter, I might move that they be empowered to reconsider this question at the same time.

The PRESIDENT. -
The motion will be that the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of considering the schedule of amendments of the Drafting Committee, and also new clause 101A and clause 91A.

Mr. GLYNN. -
Would that stop members from suggesting amendments to clauses as they are now redrafted!

Mr. BARTON. -
Oh, no. Perhaps I have not made myself clear. I intend to propose that the amendments in the schedule laid on the table be accepted, and then to suggest, if any honorable member wishes to take exception to any of the amendments, he might move to amend the resolutions seriatim, with the exception of so-and-so.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We will have to take a good deal on trust.

Mr. BARTON. -

I felt that the great difficulty was that there was a large number of drafting amendments. On the other hand, we are all very anxious not to delay the proceedings so as to impede the departure of Sir John Forrest and the other representatives of Western Australia. That is why, on the one hand, I ask the Convention not to go on at once, in order that honorable members may have time to consider the amendments. I am glad to see Sir Richard Baker rise, because I should like to have an expression of opinion from him as to whether the course I have suggested is not the more convenient one.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

I would point out that, inasmuch as the motion which has been moved might involve very serious responsibility on the Chairman of Committees, the motion ought to be put in a more definite form. I would suggest that Mr. Barton alter his motion to the effect that the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of considering the amendments which are in print, and consequent amendments thereon. If a wider scope be given-

Mr. HOWE. -

We would never get away.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -

We would never get away. If amendments can be moved on amendments which are not consequent thereon, we might re-open many questions we have already decided. I respectfully suggest that it would relieve the Chairman of Committees of much responsibility if the motion were altered in the manner I suggest. As to the two specific clauses mentioned, we might have a wider scope and could discuss questions of policy, but as to the drafting amendments we ought to be limited to these and to consequent amendments thereon.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -

I have great pleasure in supporting the position taken by the leader (Mr. Barton), and to expedite business I shall give every support I possibly can. There are some members of the Convention who, if they stayed till the Day of Judgment would still have amendments to propose. The proposition of the leader is one that should be supported by this Convention.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
If Sir Richard Baker's suggestion meets with approval it would be wise for me to modify my motion in the way he suggests, and move that the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of reconsidering the amendments in the printed schedule, together with amendments consequent thereon.

Mr. SYMON. -
Or incidental thereto.

Mr. BARTON. -
"Consequent thereon would be the same. Remembering that we have also to consider the new clause to take the place of 91A and the new clause 101A. The proposal of the latter is in fulfilment of a promise made on behalf of the Drafting Committee-a promise which was overlooked by the committee at the last moment.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
I think it would be better to insert the words "or incidental thereto." "Consequent thereon" means something naturally following upon the amendment; but so long as I understand that "consequent thereon" includes "or incidental thereto" I am satisfied. Suppose an amendment has been adopted, and the Convention thought some other word might be added with a view of giving further expression to the meaning, that would not be "consequent thereon" but an amendment incidental thereto.

Mr. BARTON. -
I feel sure the Chairman would interpret it as an amendment consequent thereon.

The PRESIDENT. -
I take it that the words "consequent thereon" have a strict parliamentary meaning. The words mean an amendment necessitated by the previous amendment, and do not mean the introduction of an alternative amendment. If it is desired that the Convention should have

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
do not think Mr. Symon wishes to go so far. Mr. Symon wishes to be able to move an amendment not only consequent in the strictest sense, but also an amendment which might be regarded as something incidental, and not in the strictest sense consequent. I take it that Mr. Symon might wish to move the omission of a word in a drafting amendment.

Mr. SYMON. -
Yes.

Mr. BARTON. -
I have no objection if that be the sense of the Convention. It is a question of time, and the question of time is important. I do not feel disposed myself to ask the Convention to open the door any wider. I know very well that under the statute we shall probably have to hold a meeting to-morrow, and for that sitting we shall require a quorum. It is almost certain that if we are kept here another day or two we shall lose the opportunity of having a quorum at all. I would, therefore, not like to extend the matter any further than meets the obvious necessities of the case.

Sir JOHN DOWNER (South Australia). -

I understood that the Convention had come to the conclusion simply to make the amendments necessary to put in more precise form the intentions of the committee, and that there was no intention on the part of anybody to re-open questions already carefully discussed. So far as the suggestions of the Drafting Committee are concerned, all that that committee has endeavoured to do is to put the wishes of the Convention in more concise and complete form; and if we are to have these amended and old questions reopened—if the discussions are not simply to be on matters of form, but if alternative propositions are to be made, then I shall have to oppose that idea. I hope that the Convention will support us in taking the course that will enable us to arrive at finality.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I think it was generally understood that the time for making important amendments in this Constitution had passed by. Of course, I am aware that under our ordinary parliamentary procedure the Bill can be amended at any stage, but we have had so many opportunities given to us for amendment that it was understood that all the amendments honorable members desired to make had been placed before the Convention. On this understanding many honorable members have already left the Convention, and I take it that in good faith all that we should now attempt to do is criticise the wording of the clause. I do not feel that it is competent, and, certainly, I myself should not feel that I was at liberty to propose amendments for altering this Bill in any way. For that reason I do not view with favour the proposal of my honorable friend, acting, as I understand, for the Premier of Tasmania, that opportunity should be given for altering the Bill, unless in a way that will not alter the sense at the same time. Indeed, I think that is all my right honorable friend-desires.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

To make it a little more condensed and more simple.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

And more elastic.
Sir JOHN FORREST. -

If that can be arranged no one can object, but I do appeal to honorable members to agree that we should not be acting properly if we tried to amend the Bill in any important respect. Our duty now lies in the direction of criticising the amendments of the Drafting Committee if there be room for criticism; and the opportunities I have had suggest to me that there is very little room for criticism of the work of the Drafting Committee in endeavouring to carry out the wishes of the Convention.

The PRESIDENT. -

I shall put the motion in the following form:-

That the Bill be recommitted for the purpose of considering the schedule of amendments prepared by the Drafting Committee and any consequent amendments thereon; also for the purpose of considering clause 91A and the new clause to be proposed-101A.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

Suppose an amendment by the Drafting Committee is rejected, will it be competent for us to substitute anything for it?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I should say that that will be so. Having had a conference with the Chairman of Committees, I take it that all difficulties will disappear, and that we need not trouble ourselves about this stage, because we shall have every proper opportunity of considering the matter. I take it that if any honorable member desires to challenge an amendment he can do so, and that the Chairman can put the remaining amendments.

The PRESIDENT. -

I am inclined to think that on the rejection of an amendment suggested by the Drafting Committee, the proposal of some new provision would not be a consequential amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole for the purpose of considering the schedule of amendments suggested by the Drafting Committee, and clause 91A, and new clause 101A.

The CHAIRMAN. -

I have to report to the committee that we have an instruction for leave to consider the Drafting Committee's suggested amendments, which are in print, and to adopt them either in globo or seriatim; to consider any consequential amendment made thereon; and also to reconsider clause 91A, and to insert a new clause, 101A. What I propose to do, if the leader of the Convention will move to that effect, is to put the question that the whole of the amendments in print be adopted, and then, if any honorable member wishes to debate any particular amendment, I shall put it that all the amendments of the Drafting Committee, down to the one which an honorable member wishes to discuss, be agreed to. We can then consider that particular amendment, and can continue the same course of procedure until we have finished the whole of the Drafting Committee's suggestions.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

Acting on your suggestion, sir, I now beg to move, pro forma-

That the amendments suggested by the Drafting Committee, and contained in the printed schedule, be now adopted.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I think that this course will turn out to be very inconvenient. We have a very extensive schedule of amendments, and since this Convention adjourned this morning at half-past eleven, the South Australian representatives have been sitting to consider them, but have only been able to reach as far as clause 55 or 60. Each one of us may wish to raise some particular point, and I think it will be better to go through the amendments as quickly as you please. It may be that every honorable member may wish to ask a question about some one amendment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

We can ask.

Mr. SYMON. -

When we get the opportunity, but it will be impossible if the clauses are taken in globo.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is subject to what I have explained—that is to say, if any honorable member challenges a particular amendment, the Chairman will only put the amendments down to that point.

Mr. SYMON. -

Quite so—but an honorable member may wish not to challenge an amendment, but to get some information regarding it.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then I shall suggest challenging the amendment until the information is given.

Mr. SYMON. -

It would be better to take the amendments seriatim.

Mr. BARTON. -

It will take us three weeks to do that.

Mr. SYMON. -

I am sure it will not. It will take much longer if we have to ask questions as to the meaning of each particular amendment, as we may have to do simply to be sure that nothing has been allowed to escape. Honorable members must realize that we have now reached a very serious stage in our proceedings. We are all anxious to get through our work as quickly as possible, but the Bill is now to pass from our hands for the last time. I think it would be more convenient to honorable members if the amendment were put seriatim.

Mr. BARTON. -

There are 400 amendments, and we do not want a separate motion about every "the" and every "but."

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I admit that if we had to consider the 400 amendments seriatim, that would be almost equal to recommencing our labours. We might meet the wishes of the Hon. Mr. Symon by taking, not the amendments, but the clauses, separately. In some instances there are as many as ten or twelve amendments in a clause. A heavy responsibility rests, not only on the Drafting Committee, but on every member of the Convention; and if any mistake is made now, it must remain for all time. The way in which the amendments have been made reflects great credit on the Drafting Committee, but some of them come very near to alterations in substance, and every opportunity should be afforded to honorable members of calling attention to them.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Western Australia). -

I understand that every honorable member will have the opportunity of calling attention to a particular amendment, and no injury can therefore be done by putting them in globo. If an honorable member says that be desires to speak to an amendment; in clause 3 or 4, the Chairman will put the amendments in the preceding clauses.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I can understand that there would be a difficulty in putting the amendments seriatim. At the same time, we must recognise that honorable members have not had the opportunity that they would desire of satisfying themselves as to the various amendments. If the Hon. Mr. Barton assures us that they are merely drafting amendments we may rely on what he says. If there are any that are not drafting amendments, and he would call our attention to them, we could consider them. That might meet the case.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think I shall have the support of my colleagues on the Drafting Committee in saying that we are not conscious of having altered the sense or the intention of the committee-always taking into account that we had to gather the intention from the debate-excepting with reference to a disqualification in clause 45, where we altered three years to one year, subject, of course, to the subsequent approval of the committee. We did so, because if some alteration of the kind were not made a person in gaol might be eligible to be elected to the Federal Parliament, and we thought that if the matter had been pointed out to the committee they would have made the alteration themselves. I feel very like the man who kept the ale-house in Belgium, and who put over his door the words-"Good beer sold here, but do not take my word for it." I do not want the committee to take my word for it, but, as I have said, my definite opinion is, and it is shared by other members of the Drafting Committee, that there are very serious alterations in drafting, as, for instance, in the Judiciary clauses. The whole scheme of those clauses is altered but the result is the same. Perhaps it would be better for me to move-

That the Drafting Committee's amendments from 1 to 50 be agreed to.

That will place before the committee one part of the Bill, and will give honorable members an opportunity of challenging any amendment in clauses 1

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I desire to call attention to clause 9.

The CHAIRMAN. -

Then I will put the question that the Drafting Committee's amendments in clauses 1 to 8 be agreed to.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clauses 1 to 8 were agreed to.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I wish to refer particularly to clause 10. Under that clause as it originally stood the Parliament of the Commonwealth would make laws prescribing the times, places, and uniform manner for electing senators. In the interval, unless these laws are made by the Parliament of the Commonwealth, the Parliament of the state determines these matters. Under the proposed amendment the Parliament of the Commonwealth may make laws prescribing the method of choosing the senators. This is only the alteration of a word, but the point I wish to direct attention to is, that the proposed amendment then withdraws from the Parliament of the Commonwealth the power, given by the existing clause 10, of making laws for determining the times and places of elections of senators by the state, and it gives that power exclusively to the state. That is an alteration of substance, and the question is, whether the Convention desires that. All I wish to observe upon it is that it will practically have the effect of giving additional legislation as to the method of choosing senators. The Parliament of the Commonwealth will prescribe the manner and everything incidental to the manner, whilst the Parliament of the state, in relation to the same work, will prescribe the times and places of elections. That is a matter of substance. This drafting amendment involves a very serious matter of substance, whether we agree with it or not. Of course I prefer the thing as it stood, that everything relating to the conduct of the elections for the Senate should be determinable exclusively, if they exercise the power, by the Federal Parliament.

Mr. BARTON. -

It was never so determinable.

Mr. SYMON. -

I think so, under clause 10.

Mr. BARTON. -

Not as it stood. It only said times, places, and manner, with the whole body of existing electoral laws untouched.

Mr. SYMON. -

No doubt. Perhaps my honorable friend will tell me whether the effect of the amendment is not to divide this power of prescribing with regard to the election of senators between the Parliament of the Commonwealth and the Parliament of the states, the Parliament of the Commonwealth having power to deal with the "method"-which I think is a great improvement on the word "manner"-and the Parliament of the state having power absolutely to determine the times and places of election?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I think my honorable friend's interpretation is about correct. What occurred with the Drafting Committee was this-they altered "manner" into "method," in order that not only what might ordinarily be described as the manner might be included, but that the Parliament of the Commonwealth might prescribe something which more nearly approached to a system. There is a difference between manner and method, because method more reasonably describes a system. It came, therefore, more nearly to the expressed wish of the committee that there should be no prevention of the Parliament of the Commonwealth legislating, if they so please, for some system of representation which might suit the progressive tendency of the Commonwealth.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Hare's system, for instance.

Mr. BARTON. -

It might be Hare's system or some other of the many systems which have been suggested. It was thought that, whatever the opinion of one or other member of the committee might be, the power, at any rate, should be in the hands of the Commonwealth. So, as to substance, we have somewhat extended the power by using "method" instead of manner," but to what degree would be a matter of opinion among honorable members.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

That was in response to a request by the committee.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. There was a general expression of opinion. Then, as to time and place, we say that, having amended clause 10, we have widened the area of the laws in force in each state, and that was done at a previous stage, making all the electoral laws apply with the exception of the time and place. With regard to the alteration from "manner" to "method," we thought that was a matter of detail, which might safely be left to the states, who will really know the most convenient way to arrange the times and places of elections. This will alter the times and places. This alteration crept in since 1891. In 1891 the power of the Parliament of the Commonwealth was simply to deal with a uniform manner of election. Since then there has been an alteration as to time and place; but that was at a time when the operations of the electoral law which were to apply in the election of the Senate were strictly defined and enumerated. We thought it wiser at the previous stage to open up new ground by making all the electoral laws applicable. As time and place were ordinary incidents of the election laws, and would not be within the knowledge of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, we thought it better that that power should be left to the states. I forgot to mention that the great difference between the Bill of 1891 and this Bill is that in the Bill of 1891 the election was to be by the Parliaments of the states. Even in the Bill of 1891 it was prescribed that the Commonwealth should fix the time and place as well as the manner, and there would be practically no inconvenience, but there would be inconvenience here, inasmuch as the whole thing is to be by popular election under the state electoral laws, unless it was practically under the management of those who have the local knowledge.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I should like to point out one matter which I think is deserving of attention. I agree with my honorable friend that the word "method" goes further than the word "manner," but I am not sure that the word "manner" is not the right one, if the word would have the extended application it might have. If it includes the power to prescribe that the Senate may be elected by the Parliament of the state, I think it is a mistake.

Mr. BARTON. -

Until the Commonwealth legislates.
Mr. ISAACS. -

Under new clause 9, would it not be competent for the Parliament of the Commonwealth to provide that the Senate might be elected by the Parliaments of the states?

Mr. BARTON. -

No. That would be in conflict with old clause 9.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I was going to call attention to the fact that if "method" goes beyond "manner," and provides something more than that, should not some such words be put in as were put in before to the effect "subject to the provisions of the Constitution."

Mr. BARTON. -

I quite see the point that my honorable friend wishes to urge, but a court would have to read these words so that there would be no repugnancy.

Mr. ISAACS. -

If my honorable friend is satisfied about that, it is all right. I was going to call attention to the fact that the previous clause provides for election by the people.

Mr. BARTON. -

The two will have to be read together, and I do not think any court would say there was any repugnancy, because the court would be bound to go the other way.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clauses 9 and 10 were agreed to.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I would ask the leader of the Convention whether the words "all persons of any race," which occur in new clause 25, do not go further than the words "people of any race"? The difficulty which presents itself to my mind is this: Suppose a state desires to make a law prohibiting the people of any race from exercising the franchise, and that at the present time there happens to be a member of that race naturalized, and in full possession of the franchise and voting, it would, of course, be impossible to disqualify that individual, and the question arises whether the words "all persons of any race" would not make the clause inoperative, for it would he impossible for the state to pass such a law as I speak of, because of the unfairness of disqualifying an individual. I ask the honorable and learned gentleman if the amendment is not a little more than a mere drafting amendment? I would also point out that clause 27 speaks of "the last preceding section." That was correct as the Bill previously stood, but since these further amendments have been made, it would be better to use the words "in section 24."

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I am not able to appreciate any real difference between the meaning of the phrase "the people of any race" and "all persons of any race." As a matter of drafting we have tried to use the word people where the people of the Commonwealth or the people of a state are referred to—the law-making people. Where other people are referred to we have used the phrase "the people of any race." The other matter to which my honorable and learned friend has called attention requires alteration. A slip has occurred, and the words "in section 24" should be used in place of the words "in the last preceding section."

The CHAIRMAN. -

That is a correction that can be made by the Chairman.

Mr. BARTON. -

Then I will ask you to make it, sir.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clauses 24 to 40 were agreed to.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I want to ask the leader of the Convention whether, under the wording of clause 44, which I think is an improvement, as redrafted, upon the former clause, any one who had the right of the franchise, and who could vote at elections for either House of the Parliament of the Commonwealth, could also maintain his right to vote upon a referendum for the alteration of the Constitution? Instead of the words—

Be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from voting at elections for either House of the Parliament of the Commonwealth,

I would like to see the clause read—

Be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from voting under this Constitution.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The phrase "voting under this Constitution" might be a little too wide, because under the Constitution other laws might be made under which a person would come, but from which he would be excepted for these special purposes. I propose to add the words "or in respect of a proposed law for the alteration of the Constitution."

Mr. HIGGINS. -

The case is covered by the last clause of the Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. That clause provides that any proposed law for the alteration of the Constitution-
Shall be submitted in each state to the electors qualified to vote for the election of members of the House of Representatives.

The clause originally read:-
No elector who has at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or who afterwards, being an adult, acquires the right to vote.

The Drafting Committee have made that to read-
No adult person who has or acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of a state and so on. Honorable members will find a similar alteration in other parts of the Bill.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clauses 44A and 45 were agreed to.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -
Under clause 46 the seat of a member of either House of the Parliament of the Commonwealth becomes vacant if any work is done or services rendered by him in Parliament for or on behalf of any person or corporation. The Drafting Committee's amendment, however, will make the clause read-

Services rendered in the Parliament to any person or state.

I want to know whether the singular word "person" includes the plural, and if the word would apply to corporations? If it does not apply to corporations, the omission of that word is an alteration in substance which cannot have been intended.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -
I should like to ask another question. There is nothing in the Bill empowering the Speaker or President to receive a salary for his work in either office. Yet, it is to be presumed, as the offices are created under the Constitution, such salary will be paid under the Constitution. Neither is there a reference to the position of the Chairman of Committees. I should like to know whether sub-section (3) will prevent the Chairman of Committees from receiving a salary?

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
No, there would be no prohibition in that respect. The offices of Speaker and Chairman of Committees are not offices of profit under the Crown. They are parliamentary offices, and Parliament has always retained a power over its own Estimates to the extent that really the Speaker and President of the local Chambers have always exercised a right to submit their own Estimates, and those Estimates, as a rule, as far as I know in practice in my own colony, are altogether untouched by the Government of the day. Now, these are political offices, but not offices of profit under the Crown. I think that that is the principle that Parliament has always asserted in England and elsewhere. As to the word "person," the British Interpretation Act of 1889, which will be largely applied to the construction of this statute by the Imperial authorities, provides that where the word "person" is used, unless the Act otherwise provides, the word "corporation" shall be included.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

If a man agrees to get paid for services done in Parliament, or for the Commonwealth, and if he does the work, and, having done the work, he resigns, is there no penalty? Is there no punishment in such a case for a man who guarantees that he will use his position in Parliament in order to make money, and, having made it, resigns!

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

No; and there is a reason for that. If I recollect correctly there was some provision in the Bill in Adelaide in that respect, but that provision was omitted in the sitting of the Convention at Sydney as a matter

Mr. O'Connor suggests that it is quite probable that in such a case an action would lie at common law. However that may be, the policy of inserting such a provision was reversed in Sydney, and therefore the Drafting Committee could not frame any proposal to that effect.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clauses 46 to 51 inclusive were agreed to.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I desire to ask the leader of the Convention whether he thinks it advisable to strike out of clause 52 the provision in regard to navigation and shipping?

Mr. BARTON. -

We have provided for it elsewhere.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes; I see that it is provided for in clause 97, which now reads as follows:-

The power of the Parliament to make laws with respect to trade and commerce extends to navigation and shipping, and to railways the property of any state.

The only point I have some doubt about is that I think navigation and shipping in the Canadian Act refers to something very different from trade and commerce. In the Canadian Act they use the words "trade and commerce," but there is a separate section dealing with navigation and shipping.

Mr. BARTON. -
That is quite correct.

Mr. GLYNN. -

And if I am not mistaken it refers to the relations that would crop up under the Merchant Shipping Act as to the load-line, the character of the ships in the trade and commerce as carried on, and so forth, and not to the mere matter of trade and commerce, which is the intention of the trade and commerce clause in this Bill.

Mr. BARTON. -

No, not mere trade and commerce, but legislation with regard to trade and commerce of all sorts.

Mr. GLYNN. -

Yes; general laws as to the class of vessels that usually carry goods and passengers between different places. For instance, as to whether they should be on the principle that the Plimsoll Act determines, namely, that there should be only a certain number of tons taken by certain vessels, and that there should be an indication of the load-line of all vessels, and as to questions of that sort. All these matters, it seems to me, come under "navigation and shipping," and it would be competent for the Parliament to deal with them in the same way as it now deals with merchant shipping. However, I may be mistaken on that point; but I think that that is the reason why there is a separate section in the Canadian Act about navigation and shipping. As the clause now stands, that power arises incidentally out of the power to regulate trade and commerce generally.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

What the Drafting Committee have done here is this: Legislation as to navigation and shipping may in ordinary be regarded as mere legislation in regard to trade and commerce. There may be some doubt about that. In the British North American Act a separate power of navigation and shipping is taken. Whether the matter would relate to the Plimsoll load-line or otherwise does not create a very serious doubt, but if it did the declaration as to the extent of the power given by the trade and commerce provisions effectually removes the doubt. So in clause 97, about the power of the Parliament in respect to trade and commerce, it was stated originally that this extends to railways the property of any state, but we now provide that the power of the Parliament to make laws with respect to trade and commerce "extends to navigation and shipping, and to railways the property of any state." Therefore, any doubt as to the trade and commerce clause regarding the navigation and shipping is removed by that declaration as well as any doubt as to whether the state railways were like other railways, in regard to the trade and commerce clause. So that that declaration relieves us of the necessity of inserting this proviso, and really leaves the trade and commerce clause in a far stronger and less limited position than it otherwise would be, because the mere declaration we have put in clause 97 instead of limiting makes clear the full extent of this power. There is no limit on the trade and commerce clause whatever, but anything said with reference to it makes not less clear its original extent. It makes it also clear that the provision goes to a certain extent at least.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clause 52 were agreed to.
The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clause 53 were agreed to.
Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
There are some words in clause 54 to which I desire to draw the attention of the leader. In sub-section (4) it is provided, in the last sentence, with regard to the Senate's power of suggestion, that-
The House of Representatives may, if it thinks fit, make such omissions or amendments or any of them with or without modifications.
The words "if it thinks fit" are eliminated by the Drafting Committee. I do not know that it makes any legal difference in the meaning of the provision, but still I think that the words were put in there with the object of showing more clearly the difference between the power of suggestion and the power of amendment. And I think it will be well to retain the words. I do not think that there would be any legal difference, so far as I can see at the moment, if they were omitted, but they were put in with a very distinct object, and I am sure the presence of the words had weight with some honorable members, as showing that to grant the power of suggestion was not as great as to grant the power of amendment. I think it will be better to leave in the words.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
On this clause I should like to point out two things. First, instead of saying at the beginning-Proposed laws appropriating any part of the public revenue or moneys, or imposing taxation shall originate in the House of Representatives, we have said-
Proposed laws appropriating revenue or moneys or imposing taxation shall not originate in the Senate.
The object of that amendment is to make it clear that the first three paragraphs in clause 53 are intended as limitations on the power of the Senate, while the fourth paragraph is the power of suggestion, which has been, to some extent, a compensatory power granted under the Constitution. As to my honorable friend's suggestion, there is no real difference in the meaning of the Bill whether the words "if it thinks fit" are or are not inserted. Both the old form and the new form make it clear that the House of Representatives may do what it likes with suggested omissions or suggested amendments—that it can take them or reject them, or modify them and take them. I have no objection to the insertion of the words I if it thinks fit " if my honorable friend thinks it really is an advisable thing to do.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I think it is.

Mr. BARTON. -
If my honorable friend thinks it is a politic thing to do, and he moves an amendment, I will accept it.

Mr. ISAACS. -
I beg to move—
That the words "if it thinks fit" be inserted after the word "may" last occurring in subsection (4) of clause 53.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clause 54, as amended, were agreed to.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -
I would like to ask my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) if he has considered whether the word Cc matter," in the first paragraph of clause 55, refers to taxation or to the imposition of taxation? The paragraph. reads:-

Laws imposing taxation shall deal only with the imposition of taxation, and any provision therein dealing with any other matter shall be of no effect.

If it refers to taxation, it leaves a sort of hiatus. If the word "matter" means the imposition of taxation, it is perfect; but, if it means other than taxation, it would leave untouched the question of taxation.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I quite appreciate what my honorable friend has suggested, but I think, on consideration, he will see that the words "any other matter" must refer to any other matter than the imposition of taxation. I have no doubt about it. I do not know whether my honorable friend retains any doubt about it, but I should think it is quite clear.

Mr. ISAACS. -
If my honorable friend is clear about it, I am satisfied.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clause 55 were agreed to.

Clause 56. - A vote, resolution, or proposed law for the appropriation of revenue or moneys shall not be passed unless the purpose of the appropriation has in the same session been recommended by message of the Governor-Gener
Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -
I would like to ask the leader of the Convention whether he thinks it would not be better, instead of using the words "to the House in which the proposal originated," to make the clause run-Recommended by message of the Governor-General to the House of Representatives?
Mr. BARTON. -
No, that is what the committee refused to accept.
Mr. ISAACS. -
We moved that, and it was not accepted.
The CHAIRMAN. -
That is not a drafting amendment.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
Is not there any possibility of moving it now?
The CHAIRMAN. -
No.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
It raises a doubt as to what we mean.
Mr. BARTON. -
I voted to confine it to the House of Representatives, but the committee of the whole thought otherwise, and we followed their decision.
Mr. KINGSTON. -
In its present shape it raises a very considerable doubt as to the intention of the Bill. We provide in clause 53, in the clearest possible terms—in fact, it is almost a consequential amendment—that proposed laws appropriating revenue or moneys "shall not originate in the Senate," whereas we had previously declared that they "shall originate in the House of Representatives." This clause, if continued in its present shape, would suggest that, as the Senate cannot originate laws for the appropriation of revenue or moneys, it may do something in that direction by votes or resolutions. Otherwise the form in which we find the provision is incapable of its fullest literal meaning, and I should be very glad to see an alteration made of the character which the leader desired.
The CHAIRMAN. -
I do not think any such amendment can be put. We have a mandate from the Convention to consider drafting amendments suggested by the Drafting Committee, and amendments consequent thereon of a drafting nature only, with the exception of two clauses; and the amendment which has been suggested by the committee seems to me to be identical in meaning with that arrived at by the Convention.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

I bow most cheerfully to your ruling, sir. I was only venturing to point out the position.

Mr. BARTON. -

I should have been glad if it had been the other way, but of course it has been decided.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clause 56 were agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I would like to ask you, sir, to omit three words from the amendment suggested by the Drafting Committee in the third paragraph of clause 57. It will not interfere with any one else's amendment, because it is a clerical one. In the last line but three of the clause it says-

If the proposed law with the amendments, if any, so carried, is affirmed by a majority of three-fifths of the members present and voting thereon.

I think the words "a majority of" were struck out in the committee. At any rate, they are unnecessary, and we have not used them in the prior part of the clause; and I would ask you, sir, to leave them out, so that it may read "If the proposed law is affirmed by three-fifths," which is quite sufficient, I think, for the purpose. It is just a clerical alteration, and we perhaps had no right to put it in.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

There is just one case I would like to put before Mr. Barton, and to ask him whether he has considered it. This clause is a little bit complicated altogether.

Mr. BARTON. -

We have tried to make the clause less complicated, but the complication is inherent in the nature of the clause.

Mr. ISAACS. -

The case I would like to put before Mr. Barton is this: Suppose a Bill, not a Money Bill, is passed by the House of Representatives, and amendments are proposed by the Senate and agreed to by the House of Representatives with amendments which are not agreed to by the Senate, are such circumstances met by this clause?

Mr. BARTON. -

What part of the clause are you referring to?

Mr. ISAACS. -

The last part, which reads-

The members present at the joint sitting may deliberate and shall vote together upon the proposed law as last proposed by the House of Representatives and upon the amendments, if any, which have been made therein by the Senate and not agreed to by the House of Representatives, and any such amendments, &c. That contemplates amendments by the Senate being rejected, but I am speaking of the other case, of amendments made by the Senate being accepted with amendments. This is an important matter, because it seems to narrow down the point of difficulty.

Mr. Barton (New South Wales). -

According to the order of Parliament in New South Wales, though I do not know whether the same order is observed in the other colonies, the Legislative Assembly can amend amendments by the Legislative Council, but cannot go outside and travel into other parts of the Bill. We take the words quoted by Mr. Isaacs to mean that if the House of Representatives amend amendments made by the Senate, the House of Representatives do not agree to the amendments made by the Senate.

Mr. Isaacs. -

The case I take is where the House of Representatives agree to amendments with amendments.

Mr. Barton. -

You can agree to a Council's amendments with amendments, but that is only the technical form. Under the circumstances it cannot be said that the House of Representatives, in the broad sense of the term, agree to the Council's amendment. The joint sitting could consider the whole of the amendments proposed by both Houses when amendments have not reached the state of being absolutely agreed to.

Mr. Isaacs. -

In that case the House of Representatives would not have power to deliberate on the amendments requested by the Senate.

Mr. Barton. -

Possibly that might be so. Where the Senate made an amendment, and the House of Representatives amended that amendment, the difficulty to that extent would be narrowed down, but I do not think that is a matter which need occasion serious difficulty. I have no objection to an amendment which makes the matter clearer, but I do not think it would be any practical importance under the clause. The case might be met by inserting after the words "with the amendments, if any," the words "and not agreed to by the other House."

Mr. Deakin (Victoria). -

If I might suggest, the difficulty would be met by simply altering the words "and not agreed to" to "so far as they have not been agreed to by the House of Representatives." That leaves before the joint sitting, first, the proposed Bill, and then the amendments of the Senate which have not been agreed to.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

I take it that what Mr. Deakin suggests is practically what Mr. Barton means.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The suggestion of Mr. Barton is quite good so far as it goes. It provides for amendments, but not for amendments on amendments, which are a frequent occurrence.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

On the suggestion made by Mr. Isaacs, I feel no difficulty in agreeing to the omission of the word "the" before "amendment," and the words "therein by the Senate."

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

I would like to ask the leader of the Convention whether if amendments are sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives, and amendments are made by the House of Representatives in a way the Senate will not agree to, will the original amendment, as it comes down, be put in the joint sitting as a substantive proposition, and the amendment on the amendment also put as a substantive proposition? If they are not put disjointly in that way it will be within the power of the House of Representatives, by amending an amendment sent by the Senate, to prevent the original amendment of the Senate ever being put in the state it originally stood to the joint committee.

The amendment of the Drafting Committee's amendment omitting the words "a majority of" was agreed to.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I would ask the leader of the Convention to consider whether it is sufficiently clear that what is provided for is: (1) The proposed law, (2) the amendments agreed to, and (3) the amendments decided upon by the joint sitting? It seems to me, looking at the clause hurriedly, that it only provides for (1) and (3)-the proposed law, with the amendments proposed at the conference; and not for the intermediate stage, the amendments which have been agreed to between the two Houses.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

Would they not be in the Bill?

Mr. BARTON. -

They are included in the words "as last proposed by the House of Representatives."
Mr. SYMON (South Australia). - Would it not be better to avoid any ambiguity by saying "as last agreed to by the House of Representatives"? That would cover it absolutely.

Mr. BARTON. - The House of Representatives may have disagreed with some of the amendments and adopted others, and thus the Bill is not the Bill "as last agreed to by the House of Representatives."

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clause 57, as amended, were agreed to.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clauses 58 to 61 were agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). - I wish to make a verbal amendment in clause 62. The words "from time to time," which I have been industriously facing in this Bill, have escaped me, and I wish to omit them from clause 62. I beg to move-

That the words "from time to time" be struck out.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Drafting Committee's amendments in clauses 63 to 73 were agreed to.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). - Upon clause 74 I should like to ask what is the position as regards appeals? Is it not that the High Court shall have jurisdiction to hear all appeals from state courts and courts of subordinate jurisdiction, but that the powers of courts with appellate jurisdiction, such as the High Court, may be cut down by the Parliament? There is a concurrent right of appeal from state courts directly to the Privy Council.

Mr. BARTON. - Yes, that is dealt with in the proviso to clause 73.

But the appeal from the High Court may be abrogated by the Parliament?

Mr. BARTON. - There may be exceptions. That is what the committee deliberately passed.

Mr. GLYNN. - But the appeal from a state court direct to the Privy Council cannot be abrogated by the Parliament.
But no exception or regulation prescribed by the Parliament shall prevent the High Court from hearing and determining any appeal from the Supreme Court of a state in any matter in which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lies from such Supreme Court to the Queen in Council.

I think that makes the meaning quite clear.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I do not think it does. What the leader has quoted was simply a proviso to prevent the abrogation of the appeal from a state court to the High Court.

Mr. BARTON. -

It leaves the state Parliament with jurisdiction, but would prevent the Commonwealth Parliament from taking away the right.

Mr. GLYNN. -

I want to point out that what appears to me to be the reading of the clause is that the Parliament has power to abolish appeals from the High Court to the Privy Council. Clause 74 provides that-

This Constitution shall not impair any right which the Queen may be pleased to exercise, by virtue of Her Royal prerogative, to grant special leave of appeal from the High Court to Her Majesty in Council. But the Parliament may make laws limiting the matters in which such leave may be asked.

That means that they may make laws limiting the cases in which appeals will be from the High Court to the Privy Council. Parliament has no power to make laws limiting the cases in which an appeal may be asked from a state court direct to the Privy Council. I do not know whether that is intended.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes; we have no power to interfere with that.

Mr. GLYNN. -

That is the point. A great many honorable members understood that the right of appeal from a state court or from the High Court direct to the Privy Council could be abrogated by Parliament, whereas under the clause as it now stands, it would be beyond the competence of Parliament to abolish appeals from a state court direct to the Privy Council.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The Drafting Committee could not interpret the intentions of the Convention, excepting in so far as they found them expressed in the Bill, in the amendments, or in the debates. We have endeavoured to give effect simply to what the Convention have said and done. This is the position—that the High Court has jurisdiction, but not exclusive jurisdiction, in cases in which the Judges exercise the original jurisdiction of the High Court, over appeals from any other federal court, or court exercising federal jurisdiction, from state courts, as laid down in sub-section (2), and from the Inter-State Commission, on matters of law. In these respects, excepting as qualified by the right of appeal to the Privy Council, the judgment of the High Court is to be final and conclusive. Parliament can take away from that power of the High Court, from time to time, by imposing exceptions and limitations. Then, in furtherance of an amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Glynn, we exclude the Parliament from making any exceptions or regulations such as would prevent the Supreme Court of a state from appealing to the High Court where before the establishment of the Commonwealth it had the right of appealing to the Privy Council. Then we limit that by saying-and these are all interpretations of the Drafting Committee—that the conditions as to appeals to the Queen in Council shall apply to appeals from the several courts to the High Court. We further provide that in matters which involve the interpretation of this Constitution, or the Constitution of a state, and which do not involve the interests of some other part of Her Majesty's dominions, the decision of the High Court shall not be appealed against. We have incorporated with the Hon. Mr. Symon's amendment Sir Joseph Abbott's amendment. We prevent the Queen's prerogative from being impaired excepting in so far as these express provisions may interfere with them, and that was the intention. The prerogative which we preserve is the Queen's right to grant special leave to appeal to the Privy Council, and that is really the right of the Privy Council itself. We cannot give the Parliament direct power to interfere with the prerogative—at least we do not think it would be right to do so, but we give the Parliament power to limit the matters in which a subject may petition for leave to appeal. In that respect we carry out Mr. Symon's amendment. The right to grant special leave to appeal is only to continue until Parliament otherwise provides. There is one matter of practice that I would refer to, and that I think may modify to some extent the views that Mr. Glynn has expressed. The Privy Council have always refused to grant leave to appeal in any instance where a case might have gone through a local court, but had not done so. In New South Wales, on the equity side, an appeal lies direct from the Supreme Court, even where the Judge is a Judge of first instance, but it is the practice of the Privy Council not to grant special leave to appeal where a case might have gone through a local Supreme Court. There is, therefore, that protection. At any rate, Mr. Glynn, in his speech, referred to matters of policy, in which the Drafting Committee could not interfere.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -
It appears to me that the point to which the Hon. Mr. Glynn has directed attention will not, in practice, arise at all. The intention certainly was, not to multiply appeals, or to give an alternative option to an appellant in a state court to appeal either direct to the Privy Council or to the High Court. We have dealt simply with appeals from the High Court to the Privy Council. Under clause 73, a general jurisdiction in regard to appeals is given to the High Court. The natural anxiety of the honorable member is that there should be a power in the Parliament to put an end to appeals direct from the Supreme Court of a state to the Privy Council without going, of course, through the High Court. It appears to me that under clause 73 the appeal direct to the Privy Council is practically abolished.

Mr. BARTON. -

Under the new clause 73.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, and for this reason, that the unvarying practice of the Privy Council is to refuse to grant leave of appeal from a court when there is already in existence a court in that state to which the appeal may be made.

Mr. BARTON. -

The only exception I know of is the equity jurisdiction exercised by a single Judge in New South Wales.

Mr. SYMON. -

Yes, that is the only exception. The point was raised in a case that went home from Victoria regarding the Garden Gully mine and something else.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

It was a case as to gold on private property.

Mr. SYMON. -

The invariable practice of the Privy Council would be followed, and they would refuse to grant leave to appeal until the appellate jurisdiction of the colony was exhausted. In practice, therefore, clause 73 would have exactly the effect that my honorable friend anticipates, and it is unnecessary to use any express words for the purpose of providing for the abolition of the appeal now existing from the court-of a state direct to the Privy Council, or to say that Parliament may abolish it. If it was intended to do that the proper course would be to insert after the word "conclusive," in clause 73, the words "and no appeal shall be direct to the Privy Council from any of the courts enumerated in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3)." The clause as it stands will probably give effect to what has been the intention of the committee throughout. I would suggest, however, to Mr. Barton that he should insert some words in clause 74 after the word "matters." If I may say so, I think this a more dexterous, and, to use an expression which we have already heard, more mannerly way of, putting the power of the Federal Parliament into the clause than before. I would suggest that after the word "matters" the following words be inserted: "if any," so as to make it clear that the amendment I moved gives this power to the Commonwealth Parliament if they choose to exercise it. They might so limit it as to limit it away altogether. A reader of the clause, who has interest in seeing that the Federal Parliament has this power, might not so readily understand it as it is.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

The honorable member means that if Parliament goes on limiting such matters until the end, and there is only one left, it might leave out that one.

Mr. SYMON. -

I do not say that a lawyer would say that.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think that would only occur to a lawyer. I think that there is a reasonable construction which a court will have to put upon these words, and that there will be no difficulty.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

This will have to be considered by lawyers.

Mr. BARTON. -

Of course. I think we had better leave it as it is. I have no doubt as to the construction.

The amendments in clause 74 were agreed to.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

I wish to direct attention to sub-section (4) in clause 75.

Mr. BARTON. -

That is merely a misprint.

Mr. HIGGINS (Victoria). -

Is it clear that "affecting consuls" means only affecting consuls as consuls. I do not suppose there would be one law as to consuls in a civil proceeding and another law for other persons?

Mr. BARTON. -

If my honorable friend reads on he will see that it is clear that this only refers to consuls in their representative capacity.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clauses 75 to 80 were agreed to.

Clause 91 A. - Of the net revenue of the Commonwealth from duties of customs and of excise not more than four-twentieths shall be applied towards the maintenance and continuance of departments transferred to the Commonwealth, and not more than one-twentieth shall be applied towards the other expenditure of the Commonwealth.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -
I beg to move—
That Clause 91A be amended by omitting from "four-twentieths" inclusive to end of paragraph, and inserting "one-fourth shall be applied annually by the Commonwealth towards its expenditure."

There is one trifling matter of substance in the amendment I proposed, and one which I am sure will commend itself to all honorable members. In clause 91A, as it was passed, it was provided that five-twentieths of the net revenue from Customs and Excise should be applied to the expenses of the Commonwealth; but I think, unfortunately, the five-twentieths were divided into two amounts of one-twentieth and four-twentieths, and inasmuch as we have passed this clause in perpetuity, or until the Constitution comes to be amended, I think there is in this an absence of elasticity that we ought to apply to the clause. It might happen as the clause now stands that if it were passed into law the purposes for which one-twentieth of the revenue is to be set aside would not be provided for by the one-twentieth, while the four-twentieths provided for the other expenses of the Commonwealth would be greatly in excess of the requirements of the Commonwealth. It would be preferable that, for the Commonwealth expenditure, there should be set aside a sum not exceeding one-fourth of the Customs net revenue, leaving the balance, whatever it might be-a balance certainly of three-fourths, and possibly at first of more than three-fourths-to be distributed amongst the Stat

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I was sincerely gratified when I heard that Sir Edward Braddon said he was prepared to move this amendment. It is the inelasticity of the clause as it stood which has provoked the most hostile criticism. There are, of course, a very large number of critics who agree that it would be wise to afford some sort of guarantee to the states. While I have been against the principle of a guarantee, I now accept that principle as carried by the Convention; but those who agree with the guarantee are not disposed to agree with the clause, for the reason that Sir Edward Braddon has clearly pointed out: That while you restrict one-twentieth to the original powers and four-twentieths to the maintenance and extension of departments, the four-twentieths may leave a large surplus, while, at the same time, the one-twentieth would be exceeded, and there would be no means to apply the surplus on the one hand to the deficiency on the other. That will create a serious embarrassment in the Commonwealth finances. It is simply to avoid that embarrassment, while preserving what is due to the states, that this amendment has been proposed. So far as the states are concerned, under the amendment they, will receive precisely what they would have received had the clause stood in its original form.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I do not object to the alteration. With a Tariff producing £6,000,000 it practically means that instead of the Commonwealth being able to spend £300,000 as a maximum upon new expenditure, and £1,200,000 upon works and services taken over, they will be able to spend on the whole £1,500,000. So that there will be the same amount returnable to the states in any case. There is, however, another matter in the next paragraph which is of importance, and to which I should like to refer. The clause as it stands provides that the balance unexpended by the Commonwealth shall be paid over to the states. That may fairly be taken to mean the balance after the one-fourth has been appropriated by the Commonwealth—that three-fourths shall be paid over to the states.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

No more.

Mr. HOLDER. -

Yes. What I want to provide is that the whole of the unexpended balance shall be paid over to the states. For that reason I should like the Drafting Committee to adhere to the original wording of the clause.

Mr. BARTON. -

What we intend the amendment to mean is that the whole of the unexpended balance of the Commonwealth shall be paid over to the states.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I understand it to mean the balance of the revenue collected, less one-fourth.

Mr. BARTON. -

If my honorable friend will refer back he will see that not more than one-fourth shall be appropriated by the Commonwealth. If less than one-fourth is appropriated, the unexpended balance, which may be more than three-fourths, will go back to the states.

The amendment of Sir Edward Braddon was agreed to.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clauses 92 to 96 were agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

In pursuance of a promise which I made to the committee when the Inter-State Commission was being discussed, I have a new clause to propose. It was then pointed out by the right honorable member (Mr. Kingston) that, inasmuch as such important powers had been given to the Inter-State Commission, we might well go back to some of the clauses providing for their tenure of office, which had been suggested by the Constitutional Committee in Adelaide, and rejected, because at the time the Inter-State Commission had not been given as much power as has since been given to it. It seemed to be thought that there should be some formal definition of the appointment, the tenure of office, the terms of removal, and the remuneration of the commission. I have, therefore, drafted a clause which is not so wide as that brought forward in Adelaide, which limits the term of appointment to, two years, makes the members of the commission removable within that time by the Governor-General in Council, upon an address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same session praying for their removal, upon the ground of misbehaviour or incapacity, and providing that they shall receive such remuneration as the Parliament may fix, which remuneration is not to be altered during their continuance in office.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
Can they be reappointed?

Mr. BARTON. -
Yes. There is no necessity to give power for re-appointment.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -
What does that word "proved" mean?

Mr. BARTON. -
Parliament shall deem the charge proved before it presents an address. The right honorable member will remember that when we were discussing the tenure of office of the Judges, we amended the clause then before the committee to make it read similarly to this clause, in order to carry out the view of the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs), that it ought not to be competent for a Judge to appeal to the Bench against his being dealt with by the Parliament; but that, on the other hand, there should be some security that the Parliament should take means to have the charge proved before it presented an address. I therefore beg to move-

That the following stand a clause of the Bill:-
The members of the Inter-State Commission-
I. Shall be appointed by the Governor-General in Council:
II. Shall hold office for seven years, but may be removed within that time by the Governor-General in Council, on an address from both Houses of the Parliament in the same session praying for such removal, on the ground of proved misbehaviour or incapacity:
III. Shall receive such remuneration as the Parliament may fix; but such remuneration shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

Mr. GRANT (Tasmania). -
It appears to me that it would be better to leave the clause as it stands.
The Inter-State Commission which we are creating is an entirely new body. I think it advisable to give the Parliament absolute discretion in regard to it. Besides, the amendment will fix in the Constitution for all time what it may not be either necessary or desirable to enact in this way. The words of the clause as they stand would be more judicious than the inelastic provisions of this extra clause as proposed by the leader of the Convention.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am proposing this amendment in performance of a promise.

Mr. KINGSTON (South Australia). -

I am pleased that the leader of the Convention has again brought forward this proposal. I do not see how it is possible to avoid making some permanent provision on the subject, which we have already embedded in the Constitution, that the Inter-State Commission shall have control of these matters.

Mr. BARTON. -

And that they shall have judicial powers.

Mr. KINGSTON. -

Yes, judicial powers in connexion with these matters. If the necessity for the creation of that commission is not embodied in the Constitution itself, this clause, to which we attach very great importance, and which we have debated at considerable length, will have no practical effect whatever. Another matter is, we are conferring on the Inter-State Commission judicial powers of the highest order. For instance, the declaration that certain railway rates which may be challenged in Parliament, but which are necessary for the development of the states, and which should not be interfered with, are to be left in their discretion. It is absolutely necessary that we should leave this commission free from all political control and interference, otherwise, in the execution of its important duties, it will be subject to influences which interfere most materially with the satisfactory discharge of its responsibility. All that is proposed here is to give the commission for a limited time, practical independence, and, unless you do that, I would infinitely sooner see all reference to the Inter-State Commission expunged from the Bill. You cannot expect a body such as the Inter-State Commission to, exercise the powers which are proposed to be conferred upon it in a satisfactory way unless you place the members of that commission beyond the influences both of the Executive and of Parliament; and you cannot do that without the adoption of provisions somewhat of the character now under consideration, which, within the limits of their jurisdiction, will give them all the independence of competent Judges.
Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania). -

I think it would be a mistake to insert a provision of this sort in the Constitution which must necessarily involve a very considerable expenditure on this Inter-State Commission.

Mr. ISAACS. -

More than we can see at present.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

Yes, but we know that it must be a very considerable expenditure. I say this, not because I am averse to the Inter State Commission altogether; not because, on that point, those of us who objected to the Inter-State Commission have been beaten; but for the reason that I think this is a thing that might very well be left to the Federal Parliament to decide from time to time as circumstances require, instead of fettering the Parliament with the conditions which might, as I said before, involve a very much larger expenditure than we anticipate, a very much larger expenditure than we could approve, and certainly a much larger expenditure than the people of the states would approve.

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

I do not understand that we propose to appoint an Inter-State Commission, the members of which shall give the whole of their time to this work, and for whom, therefore, very large salaries will be required. I contemplate a body composed something like this—of perhaps the three Railways Commissioners—

Mr. PEACOCK. -

Oh, no.

Mr. BARTON. -

They would be judges in their own cause.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

That is suggested by Mr. Reid.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I am suggesting what has occurred to my own mind. I am suggesting that the commission would be appointed of probably the three Railways Commissioners, and two men of commercial experience, well acquainted with the circumstances of business throughout one or more of the colonies, and that the members of such a body should be paid large fees, considering the time they would devote to their duties under the provisions of the Act which declared their authorities and powers—a body who would be summoned from time to time to deal with the questions coming before them; and it seems to me that such a body would meet all the needs of the case, and would not involve an enormous expense, and yet would supply all the expert experience and the particular class of knowledge required under the circumstances. They would be almost assessors, with the knowledge and experience necessary to perform the technical work required of them under the Constitution. As to the objection that we should not create this body in the Constitution, that has been done already in two or three clauses, and all that is necessary is to trust this body with actual independence, without which they could not do their work properly. Therefore, I am very pleased that the proposed amendment has been brought forward, because it, or something like it, was necessary to give the authority required to those responsible officers.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). -

If I had thought the Inter-State Commission was to be such a body as that which Mr. Holder has outlined, I should have been found very gravely objecting to the appointment of the commission, because I think it would be very undesirable. It would be a very serious thing to contemplate taking a number of men from their own business to carry on the work of the Inter-State Commission, because it might necessitate their being brought into conflict with the railway authorities. It will be the duty of the members of the commission to settle differences as to railway carriage and railway rates; and if you appoint on this commission men who are in private business this difficulty would be created, that they would be in a very difficult position, a position where they would be liable to imputations on their honesty and fairness, if it should so happen that some of their own affairs might be directly or indirectly affected by the conclusions at which the Inter-State Commission arrive. I believe in that commission, but on the footing that it shall be a body to which these provision sought to be introduced shall be applicable - a body whose members shall exclusively devote their attention to these particular matters, and to be, precisely within their own sphere, in the same position as Judges of the High Court. Unless that is done we shall do a most grievous thing in creating this Inter-State Commission; and whilst I am sure every one will commend Mr. Holder, as I do, for his desire to be economical, I venture to say that the constitution of the Inter-State Commission, as he would wish it, would be securing economy at the sacrifice of the importance and dignity of the commission. I hope this amendment will be introduced, but only on the footing that the Inter-State Commission is to be a body which is to exercise its functions unaffected by private influence or political intrigue. I think it should be free from the possibility of imputation on the ground that the members of the commission are carrying on their own business at the same time as they are members of a tribunal which has to settle differences between business men and the Railway department.
Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

There is a great deal of difficulty in this matter, and it is very hard to decide. No doubt the expenditure is a valid reason in the matter; at the same time, the whole of this question of railways has been so altered during the debates in Adelaide, and the whole position of the colony of New South Wales is so serious, that I think we must have, as members of the Inter-State Commission, trained persons who will be absolutely independent both of political forces, and of any possible corruption.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Why is the position in New South Wales serious?

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

The position in New South Wales is a very serious one in regard to the question of differential and preferential railway rates. Now this commission will have to decide with regard to the most momentous matters in our railway system, and there will be, probably, under any circumstances, a great deal of friction. I believe that the friction will be so great that it will bring about some different system of dealing with the railways-

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Hear, hear; federalization.

Mr. MCMILLAN. -

Because I am perfectly certain that no system short of vesting the railways will prevent friction and trouble. Although the commission may be expensive, it ought to be in the first place a body of experts, and you cannot get the services of highly-trained experts unless you pay them well, no matter whether their work is long or short. Therefore, if you are to get competent men, you must pay them well; and the members of this commission must be high class men, men of commercial knowledge and ability, and men who are not open to corruption; because, although there may be very little to do for some time to come, and although the employment of such a body looks like a waste of money, I fear that, after our previous action in dealing with this question, it is absolutely necessary to adopt the proposal of the leader of the Convention.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

If we are to have the Inter-State Commission which has been necessitated by the provisions we have passed, we must have one that is absolutely independent. To have a tribunal such as my honorable friend (Mr. Holder) suggests would indeed be to have a tainted tribunal. To have Railways Commissioners from the various colonies sitting to adjudicate as to whether the rates they themselves had made were unfair or unjust would scarcely be what is contemplated by the provisions which the majority have imposed upon the minority.

Mr. HOLDER. -

They would be made by one and sat upon by three.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I must say that I think there are insuperable objections to the course proposed. There is another provision in the Bill, which I remember Mr. Holder supported strongly, and that was to give to the High Court the right of appeal on matters arising from the Inter-State Commission. Now, it is to be a body to decide upon decisions by the Railways Commissioners. Some of the provisions of the Bill, indeed, seem to require that the members of the Inter-State Commission should be lawyers; another part of the Bill requires them to be commercial men; and another part requires that they should be railway experts. If we are to have these Admirable Crichtons, I do not know where they are to come from. I understand that in South Australia men with these qualifications are to be found, but not elsewhere, I think. I see that under clause 100 they are to have the execution and maintenance of the provisions relating to trade and commerce. I am beginning to ask myself—What is to become of the Supreme Court? The commission are to have the machinery relating to this control placed in their hands. If they are also to have the execution and maintenance of these powers, it seems to me that they must have an army of officers, and will have their ramifications all throughout the Commonwealth. Their powers do not relate only to railways or rivers, but also to the provisions relating to trade and commerce within the Commonwealth. What all this is going to eventuate in I cannot say for a moment. It looks to me like an enormous branch being set up which may seriously affect other portions of the Constitution. But whatever it may be, it seems to me that the commissioners should be persons not susceptible of political influence. This should be, if for no other reason, certainly for this: That the power of the Parliament is in one matter entirely subordinated to them. The power of the Parliament to declare any preference or discrimination invalid is limited to such preferences or discriminations as the Inter-State Commission in its discretion thinks undue or unreasonable, or unjust to any state. So that the Parliament is shorn of its ordinary powers. The Parliament is prevented from exercising any discretion whatever on any of these preferences and discriminations on which the Inter-State Commission has judgment—which judgment may or may not come to the High Court; and when the Inter-State Commission has pronounced judgment, and the Supreme Court has adjudicated upon it, then, and then only, if the decision be unjust to a state, or undue or unreasonable, does the power of the Parliament come in at all. Thus we can see at once what an enormous pressure may be brought to bear on the Inter-State Commission by a Parliament or Ministers acting with the confidence of Parliament, and it is, therefore, necessary that we should have these provisions with regard to the status of the commissioners. I do not agree with the provisions of the Bill as they stand, but to make it consistent and effective we must have some strong provision. Therefore, it seems to me that the provisions now suggested are absolutely necessary to make the Bill consistent.

Mr. HOWE (South Australia). -
I quite agree as to what has been said by Mr. Isaacs, and I wish to strengthen the hands of the Inter-State Commission. Therefore I beg to move-

That after the word "for," in the first line of sub-section (2), the words "not less than" be inserted.

Mr. BARTON. -
That would give power to appoint them for ten or twelve years.

Mr. HOWE. -
In my opinion, if they do their duty, they should remain in office for life, so long as they remain in a position to serve their country.

Mr. BARTON. -
Under the Interpretation Act the power to appoint for seven years involves the power to re-appoint.

Mr. HOWE. -
The leader of the Convention will see that this seven years terminates their appointment.

Mr. BARTON. -
They can be re-appointed.

Mr. HOWE. -
If we make it "not less than seven years" they may serve their country for the natural course of their lives.

Mr ISAACS. - The words you suggest would not do that.

Mr. BARTON. -
They imply a term of years.

Mr. HOWE. -
Of course they do. I have consulted several honorable members, and they quite agree with the amendment I have suggested. It implies a longer term. They may be re-appointed at the end of seven years so far as the clause is concerned, whereas there may be no re-appointment or readjustment of position or salaries or anything else, and they may go on as long as they serve the country faithfully and well.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

They may be removed at any time while they are in office. I suggest to Mr. Howe that it will be scarcely necessary to move this amendment. The power to appoint involves the power to re-appoint. I am strongly with Mr. Howe in giving a fairly secure tenure of office to these gentlemen, who, I hope, will be gentlemen of proved ability and knowledge. It is right to frame a clause of this kind in order that persons of that ability and knowledge may have some security in accepting the office. But a reasonable security is enough. If I may allude to my own colony, I will take, for instance, the case of the Railways Commissioners who were appointed under an Act which removes them largely from political control. I do not think there is any difficulty about the renewal of office of any of these gentlemen providing they are found competent. The term there is seven years. It has been found that that term is sufficient to secure the services of able men, while it is a term in which, if there was any cause for dissatisfaction not coining within the realm of proved incapacity or misbehaviour, there still would be power to the Governor in Council or the Executive responsible to Parliament to reconsider its decision. It is advisable in cases of this kind, where gentlemen, either by increasing age, illness, or any other circumstances are not so available for the services of the State as they were when originally appointed, there should be some opportunity for the Executive to appoint some other person if it be found the interests of the State would be better served thereby. That is a fair principle, and the appointment for seven years is a reasonably long one. The Premier of New South Wales (Mr. Reid) and myself are not perfectly agreed on this point. He wished the limit of tenure to be five years, and I ventured to propose it should be the same as that applying in another colony. Remembering the importance of the office, and the necessity of securing men who could be trusted to discharge their very delicate and onerous duties, I still think a fair limit will be found in the terms suggested by the clause.

Mr. HOWE. -

Under the circumstances I will not press my amendment. Mr. Howe's amendment was withdrawn. The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clause 101 were agreed to. The new clause proposed by Mr. Barton was agreed to. Clause 97 was omitted.
Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I move-

That clause 98 be omitted, and the following inserted in lieu thereof:-

The Parliament may take over from the states their public debts as existing at the establishment of the Commonwealth, or a proportion thereof according to the respective numbers of their people as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, and may convert, renew, or consolidate such debts, or any part thereof; and the states shall indemnify the Commonwealth in respect of the debts taken over, and thereafter the interest payable in respect of the debts shall be deducted and retained from the portions of the surplus revenue of the Commonwealth payable to the several states, or if such surplus is insufficient, or if there is no surplus, then the deficiency or the whole amount shall be paid by the several states.

The difference between clause 98 and this clause is that the language has been shortened without in any way losing the meaning. The words in respect of the rateable proportion which formerly found a place at the end of the clause have been got into a smaller compass in the early part of the clause.

The amendments of the Drafting Committee in clauses 103 to 120 inclusive were agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I move-

That in the heading of clause 121 the word "amendment" be omitted, and the word "alteration" inserted in lieu thereof.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -

The substitution of the word "alteration" for "amendment" seems to be a consequential amendment.

Mr. BARTON. -

The amendment is made simply because the word "alteration" is used right throughout instead of "amendment." I think the public understand the word "alteration" perhaps better than "amendment."

Mr. GLYNN. -

There was a feeling amongst some members that it was a pity the word "amendment" has not been stuck to.

Mr. BARTON. -

I don't care which word is used, so long as the same word is stuck to throughout.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I desire, with the consent of the committee, to revert to clause 121. By some inadvertence, an amendment suggested in that clause has not been given effect to. It is a mere matter of wording, and perhaps you, Mr. Chairman, could take authority to make the amendment. The words "the provisions of" are totally unnecessary, and have been omitted all through, and it is these words that we desire to have struck out. The clause will then read:"This Constitution shall not be altered except in the following manner."

The CHAIRMAN. -

If no honorable member objects, I will make that alteration.

The amendments suggested by the Drafting Committee in the preamble were agreed to.

The Bill was then reported to the House with further amendments.

Mr. BARTON moved -

That the standing orders be suspended to, enable a motion for the adoption of the report, and a motion consequent thereon, to be put.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -

I beg now to move-

That the report of the committee be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON. -

I should like now to make a short explanation to the Convention. The Federal Enabling Act says that on the reassembling of the Convention and it re-assembled in Melbourne after the session in Sydney-the Constitution framed prior to the adjournment shall be reconsidered, together with any suggested amendments forwarded by the Legislatures of the several colonies, and that the Constitution so framed shall be finally adopted with any amendments agreed to. Then there is another important section which sets out that as soon as the Convention has finally adopted a Constitution, as required by the preceding section, and has disposed of all incidental business-which term has a wide application-copies certified to by the President shall be supplied in duplicate to the members of the Convention, and the President shall declare the proceedings of the Convention closed. What I propose to do is this: It will be necessary to print the Bill as now amended and as finally adopted, and we shall, therefore, have to hold another sitting to-morrow. That is unfortunate, perhaps, as it will detain some honorable members, but there will have to be another sitting, because the Bill will have to be distributed. Copies certified to by the President will have to be supplied in duplicate to the members of the Convention. This provision is in one or more of the Enabling Acts. Copies are also to be supplied to others, as, for instance, to the Governors of the colonies. This will necessitate first the printing of the Bill, next the distribution of it to the members present, and then the posting of it to the members absent, and to the other persons who are entitled to receive it. Until this is done the President cannot declare the Convention closed, and that is why we must sit tomorrow, and why we must have a quorum. I hope honorable members will understand that the provisions of the Enabling Act cannot be complied with unless we have a quorum to-morrow. I do not wish to detain the Convention now, but I think it will be right for me to move that the Bill be finally adopted. I shall also take the opportunity to-morrow of submitting a motion that I am sure you, Mr. President, will not rule out of order, to the effect that the Governments of the various colonies be invited to supply copies of the Bill to the whole of their electors. On some motion of that sort I shall have a few words to say in recommendation of the Bill, and I shall invite other honorable members to follow my example so that there may be a separate copy of the report of the proceedings of to-morrow, not occupying too great a space, which may be read and studied, as I hope it will be, by many of the electors of the colony. As we must hold a sitting to-morrow, it will be just as convenient to take that course then and will be more convenient as regards the publication of Hansard-as to take it now. I beg now to move-

That this Convention, having reconsidered the Constitution as framed prior to the adjournment from Adelaide to Sydney, together with the suggested amendments forwarded by the several Legislatures, now finally adopts the said Constitution, with the amendments agreed to as shown by the report which has been this day finally adopted.

I am sure that the motion commends itself to honorable members. I will take the opportunity, to-morrow, of saying something in recommendation of the Bill. I am going to ask now that we adjourn until ten o'clock tomorrow, as I think that will best suit the convenience of honorable members.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

According to your reading of the Commonwealth Bill ought not the President to sit and declare the Bill adopted after each member has received his Bills?

Mr. BARTON. -

After the Convention has finally adopted the Bill, and has disposed of all incidental business, copies certified by the President shall be supplied in duplicate. I take it to be the clear reading of a statute, that where a thing is provided to be done by statute, the fact of its being done early is no bar to its efficacy.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

If the copies are sent by post, each member may not receive them.

Mr. BARTON. -

I think the clear meaning of the statute is that posting the Bills will be supplying them; otherwise, the Convention might have to be kept in session a week or a fortnight until there was a certainty that everybody, including the Governors, had received copies. I am sure that is not the intention of the Act.

Sir JOHN FORREST. -

There is to be a declaration at a meeting of the Convention.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. The President has no administrative or executive power under the Act, and therefore he cannot comply with the law by making a publication in the Gazette. Therefore, we must have a meeting of the Convention tomorrow, and a declaration then.

The PRESIDENT. -

I undoubtedly hold that the posting of the notices will be sufficient, all other incidental matters having been disposed of; and I will then declare the meeting closed.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

I quite agree with the view Mr. Barton has presented. It seems to me, following that view, that now we have gone through the Bill and dealt with the amendments, the Enabling Act provides what is really a statutory adoption of the Constitution. It does not seem to me more than a formal motion, because it distinctly provides that when the Constitution, as framed prior to the adjournment, has been reconsidered, together with any suggested amendments by the Legislatures, then the Constitution, so framed, shall be finally adopted with any amendments agreed to. In fact, the whole trend of the Federal Enabling Act is that we must frame a Constitution. It is not a matter of option with us whether we shall adopt the Constitution or not, but having gone through the Bill as now presented, and the various clauses having been agreed to by majorities, it seems to me, following the view brought forward by the leader, that it is now our statutory duty to finally adopt this Constitution.

The motion was agreed to.

The Convention adjourned at two minutes to five o'clock p.m.
Thursday, 17th March, 1898.

Western Australian Representatives: Letter from Sir John Forrest
- Suspension of Standing orders - Commonwealth of Australia Bill
- Votes of Thanks to the Officers of the Convention - Close of the Proceedings.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at ten minutes past ten o'clock a.m.

WESTERN AUSTRALIAN REPRESENTATIVES.

The PRESIDENT. -
I deem it my duty to acquaint the Convention with the fact that I have received a letter from the Right Hon. the Premier of Western Australia (Sir John Forrest), which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The letter was read by the CLERK, as follows:-
Menzies' Hotel, 16th March, 1898.

Dear Mr. President. - I regret I shall not be with you to-morrow, to join with the other delegates in my expression of thanks to you for the kindness and consideration you have shown me and the other delegates from Western Australia during the sittings of the Convention at Adelaide, Sydney, and Melbourne.

It is very gratifying that so much harmony and good-will on all sides have marked the proceedings of the Convention, and I feel sure this satisfactory state of things has been aided by the courtesy and assistance we have all received from you, and from Sir Richard Baker, whose untiring efforts deserve, and I am sure will receive, the fullest acknowledgment from every member of the Convention.

The conclusion of our labours makes me feel grateful to all who have assisted in our work. The hospitality of the Governments, the good work of the reporters, the willing services of the attendants, all deserve my best thanks, and I must not forget the good fellowship of all, which has given a charm to our gathering, which I shall always look back upon with pleasure.

Believe me, Dear Mr. President,

Yours most sincerely,

JOHN FORREST.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -
I beg to move-

That the letter be printed and entered upon the minutes.

The motion was agreed to.
SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the standing orders be suspended to enable the motions of this morning to be taken without notice.

The motion was agreed to.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA BILL.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That this Convention cordially invites the Prime Minister of each colony here represented to provide for the supply of copies of the Draft of the Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Bill, as now finally adopted by this Convention, to the electors of his colony.

This motion will, I hope, give the members of the Convention an opportunity to state from their places in this chamber to the electors who sent them here their opinion of the Draft Bill and its provisions. I think that on this, the last day of our meeting, it is only fit that some opportunity should be given to honorable members so to express their opinions that the statement of them in an authoritative form, as printed in the official report of the debates, may reach those whose verdict upon the Bill is so soon to be sought. It has been many times asserted that the Bill contains that which we know it does not contain, and many of its critics have carefully omitted to mention the manifestly advantageous provisions which it embodies. It is, therefore, well that an authoritative statement of the main provisions which it incorporates should go forth to the public, with the correction of the erroneous views circulated concerning it. This is the 41st day of the Melbourne session, and, as one who has been an eye-witness of the proceedings at almost every moment of their currency, I should like to hear my testimony to the zeal in a great cause, to the patriotic desire that no harm to that cause should be done by too great demands, to the sagacity in expression of opinion, and to the eminent talent in debate, which have characterized our proceedings since the Convention began its sittings in Adelaide last year. I suppose there is no one more anxious to see a plan of federation adopted than I am-so that it be just. I have conceived a very great admiration for the spirit of justice which has at all times animated the members of the Convention, and for the manner in which they have realized the gravity of the situation, whenever it has appeared that the claims made upon behalf of a colony, however patriotically they may have been urged, were likely to endanger the final success of our cause. We have been accused of a tendency to reverse our decisions; but I think very little of the man who, having once been convinced that his first opinion was a hasty one, is too obstinate which means too weak, to retrace his steps. The very readiness of the Convention to realize that its proceedings may at times have led it to overstep the mark in one direction or another, is to me the surest guarantee of the anxiety of its members that the Constitution shall be just. To be just, it cannot be marked by evidence of over-zeal or over-demand upon the part of any section of the community. The motion that I am moving is one that is calculated, if it is received by the Prime Ministers of the colonies in the sense in which I move it, to insure that the provisions of the Bill are understood by the electors, who will have to deal with the question of its adoption. One must recollect that many statements are circulated about measures of this kind, which nothing but a cool perusal of a clearly drawn Bill such as this is will enable the readers or the hearers of them to confute. If I may say it in all modesty, I believe that, so far as the expression in the language of an Act of Parliament or of a Bill in Parliament of the opinions of this Convention is concerned, the measure which will be put into the hands of the electors is so clearly drawn that every man of ordinary intelligence who receives it will be able to readily grasp its meaning. Next to such certainty in expression as will prevent the risk of too much conflict hereafter—a risk which is as far as possible to be prevented—is the great object that we should all have in view, when once our opinions are formulated and made known, that the electors, after they have perused the measure, may be able to discuss it with other electors in a spirit which will show that they have understood how far it conforms, first, to their views of perfect federation—perfect constitutionally—and, next, to their views of a reasonable settlement of the conflicting claims of the various colonies. Now, before I enter upon a fuller advocacy of the Bill, I should like to point out in what main respects this measure differs from the last Federal Constitution perfected by a Convention. The last one was the Bill of 1891. We have been told from one quarter that the Bill has been rapidly losing its national character. We have been told from another quarter that there is a great conservative preponderance in the Convention, and that the decisions on crucial points have invariably leaned in an anti-liberal direction. It does not take much examination, by way of comparison of the Bill of 1891 with the Bill of 1898, to enable one to confute both of these statements.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON. -

The Bill speaks for itself.

The Bill speaks for itself, sir, but it is as well to mention in what respects the differences arise; and I am about to mention differences not merely in the direction of a liberalizing tendency in the present Bill, but in the direction of improvements in other respects as compared with the Bill of 1891. The following are some instances:-Under the Bill of 1891 the senators were to be elected by the Legislatures, of the states. Under the Bill of 1898 they are to be elected by the people, on the same suffrage as the members of the House of Representatives. Equal representation, of which so much complaint has been made, and about which I think complaint has been carried altogether too far, was, under the Bill of 1891, absolute. But under the Bill of 1898 it is only the original states that are necessarily to be equally represented in the Senate, and the quantum of representation of states admitted after the adoption of the Constitution is to be determined by the Federal Parliament. In the Bill of 1891 the suffrage for the House of Representatives—which suffrage was not then the same as for the Senate—was left absolutely to the Parliaments of the several states. In the Bill of 1898 the suffrage for that House which has been called, perhaps with a good deal of reason, the National House, is, while it is to be the suffrage of the state for the time being, nevertheless, subject to be controlled by any uniform law made by the Parliament; and we who know how that Parliament will be based need not have the slightest fear that that suffrage will be framed in an illiberal way. The qualification of senators or candidates for the Senate was, under the Bill of 1891, the attainment of the age of 30 years, and a five years' residence in the Commonwealth. Under the Bill of 1898 the qualification of members is to be the same for both Houses of the Commonwealth, namely, the attainment of the age of 21 years, and a three years' residence. Under the Bill of 1891 the division of electorates for the House of Representatives was to be made by the state itself. Under the Bill of 1898 that power is subject to revision by the Parliament of the Federation, so that if any abuse should occur in its exercise, there will always be a controlling power in the direction of equality and justice. This Bill also contains a provision in favour of electors, which is altogether absent from the Bill of 1891; that is, a provision for the protection of the voting right, when the right has been granted, so that no adult person who, at the establishment of this Constitution, or at any time afterwards, acquires the right to vote for the Legislative Assembly in his own colony or state can be deprived of that right by any law passed by the Federal Parliament. This is a provision which was introduced at the instance of the Hon. Mr. Holder; and although the matter has been the subject of complaint from time to time, the instance I have cited may be appealed to as one evidence of the want of foundation of accusations against this Bill on account of its alleged illiberal character. Again, to the powers of the Federal Legislature, as they were defined in the Bill of 1891, there have been added some very important further powers. Amongst them is the power to legislate with reference to invalid and old-age pensions; another is the right to legislate for the appointment of courts of conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes which extend beyond the limits of one state; and I may add to those the power to legislate in regard to insurance, saving the rights of the states in regard to state insurance—a power which I am quite sure will be strongly appreciated by business men all over the colonies. Coming to one of the most important provisions in the whole of this measure, there is incorporated in this Bill, as there was not in the Bill of 1891, a provision for the termination of those disputes which, in common parlance, are called dead-locks. The 57th clause of this Bill provides that when it has been ascertained by two passages of a Bill through the House of Representatives that it is not to be passed by the Senate, there shall be a power in the Governor-General to dissolve the two Houses simultaneously, and confront them both with the public opinion of the electors and should the Bill, after that proceeding, not be the subject of agreement between the two Houses, then there is power to convene a joint Sitting of the House of Representatives and the Senate together, so that amendments made in the Bill may be considered by the two Houses sitting and voting together; and by a three-fifths majority the Bill may be adopted. Those who have accused the representatives of the smaller colonies of an unfair attitude towards the other colonies which are more populous, have, in my judgment, made a serious mistake in this respect. Whatever one's opinion is on the question whether the Second Chamber—the Senate—of the Federation should be elected in proportion to the numbers of people or otherwise, the strongest advocate of proportionate representation in that body cannot but admit that there is a great deal to be urged in favour of the claim for equal representation in the Senate; and he cannot also but admit that if he were a citizen of one of the less populous states, anxious to preserve its individuality, fearful lest that individuality might be at the mercy of the larger populations of the other states—not seeking to grasp anything, but only to defend—he might be unyielding in his desire to preserve that equal representation in the Senate. Is it not, then, a strong addition to the power of the majority of the electors, resident though they may be in states which have raised some demur about the granting of equal representation in the Senate— is it not, I say, a strong addition to the power which is embodied in the House of Representatives, that there should be this provision for the dissolution of both Houses? The entire dissolution of the Upper House is a thing which has not been practised, to our knowledge, in any English-speaking country. And is it not a strong additional power that, when the final vote for affirming the Bill comes to be taken, the majority which will suffice for carrying it is smaller than would be indicated by the relative proportion of the two Houses? I regard that as a considerable concession to the views of the larger states. Being myself a believer in the principle of equal state representation in one of the Chambers of the Legislature under a Federal Constitution, for reasons which it is not convenient, because time does not allow it, to discuss now, but which I conceive to be purely federal, I do think that those who hold that opinion, and who live in less populous states than that in which I live, have made a very large concession in agreeing to these provisions for dealing with dead-locks. It is a concession that must be regarded as all the greater when we consider the extreme care with which in this Bill, as drawn, and also in the Bill of 1891, the ordinary causes of dead-locks the causes which are generally to be anticipated-have been one and all provided for. Finding that the process ordinarily known as tacking, and other measures which have in times past been adopted, perhaps with a view of ending, but generally with the result of provoking, differences between the two Chambers, are provided against so carefully by the 53rd, 54th, and 55th clauses of the present Bill, we may, I think, regard it as a very considerable thing that in addition to this protection there should have been added the enactment which deals with the double dissolution and the joint vote. I am reminded that just now, in referring to the joint sitting of the two Houses, I spoke of the making of amendments. Of course, I meant that to be understood in the sense in which it is so clearly expressed in the Bill, that is to say, that the joint sitting will consider amendments which have been previously made, so far as one House can make them, by either branch of the Federal Parliament. Now, with regard to the double dissolution of the Senate, it is to be remembered that that provision was, until we commenced our sittings in Melbourne, tacked to another provision, which, to my mind, unduly enforced the idea of a penal dissolution of the House of Representatives. The Convention, having struck out that provision and left in the dead-lock clause merely the double dissolution and the joint sitting, has, I think it is fair to say, made again a large step in the direction of liberalism. Without discussing the amendment which was carried at the instance of the honorable member (Mr. Symon)—and I admit that in some instances it might have placed a very large power in the hands of the Executive-I may say that I am one of those who take the view that it is not wise to give the Executive power to penalize one of two Houses, when both spring from the same suffrage, and are elected by the same people. I think, therefore, that we may confidently appeal to the electors who sent us here whether this again is not an indication of the march of liberal opinion which has characterized the Convention. In the discussions which we sometimes hear and sometimes read of out-of-doors, very great care is often taken to prevent the electors from knowing that this Constitution is to be worked under a system of responsible government, a system which can only be applied where the power of the purse is in the Parliament, and where, therefore, a Ministry, which ceases to retain the confidence of Parliament can be deprived of Supplies unless it either resigns or appeals to the country. That is the cardinal provision on the constitutional side of this Bill. It needs no expression in writing. It is the inevitable outcome of the provisions of the Bill, and it assimilates the Constitution which we have framed to the Constitutions of the colonies in which we live and the Constitution of the great mother country from which we spring. If there could be alleged for a moment to be any truth in some of the criticisms levelled at the Bill that it may lead to corruption-and I must say that I cannot find any evidence of any such tendency in a line of it-these criticisms might, at any rate, be accompanied by, a statement of the fact that, if corruption is manifested, there is the ordinary British cure for it in the dismissal of the Minister or Ministry that is guilty. But there is more than this in the Bill to insure government by responsible Ministers. There is this in it, that, inasmuch as a responsible Ministry cannot exist without the power of the purse, so that power of the purse, given to the Parliament, is the guarantee of the retention by the people themselves of their sovereign right. It is the people who make these Houses; it is the people whose money is dealt with; it is the people who speak when a Ministry is turned out of office or compelled to appeal to the electors-it is their voice which brings about these things, and it is their voice also which says-"Unless you conform to the demands of the people, and either leave the office which you have disgraced, or give us an opportunity of pronouncing on your conduct at the polls, you shall not have any more of our money to spend on reckless government." We have had a great many suggestions from various quarters that the Constitution should be framed in a different way in this respect-that we should have an irresponsible Ministry, at any rate for a time, that is, a Ministry to be kept in office in some such manner as in the United States or Switzerland. Much as I value the argument that responsible government is, to a certain extent, incompatible with federation, and although I recognise that that argument can be supported by what look like very good reasons, still I am convinced that there are stronger reasons against that argument than for it, and that responsible government may well be made to co-exist with a reasonably federal Constitution. If we had adopted some of the arguments which have been urged in favour of an irresponsible governing body—and I mean irresponsible merely for a term—or a body of modified responsibility, we might have made our Constitution different in other respects. We might perhaps have made the two Houses of the Federal Legislature entirely co-ordinate, and that we could not do with responsible government. On the other hand, we might have made some provision for what is called the referendum. I admit that you could not work a Constitution like that of Switzerland or of America sufficiently in the interests of the people without some such remedy, for certain contingencies, as the referendum, but I have always considered that the Convention has acted rightly in rejecting the referendum as applied to a Constitution in which the principle of responsible government is recognised. Much more truly than it can be said that federation might kill responsible government, or that responsible government might kill federation, it can be said that the referendum might kill responsible government. There certainly would not have been much chance of responsible government killing the referendum. It could not do that anymore than a man who had swallowed poison could eliminate it by any contortion of his body. I am not going into this much-vexed question, but I think I may congratulate the Convention on having rejected the referendum. As applied to the principle of responsible government, the referendum would be an entirely experimental provision although it might have been tried, and tried with success, in other forms of government. I venture to say that by rejecting it, as applied to responsible government, we have not shown any anti-liberal tendency. We have simply said that the guarantee of the liberalism of this Constitution is responsible government, and that we decline to impair or to infect in any way that guarantee. That is the principle on which the referendum has been rejected, and I take this opportunity, as I did not take part in the discussion on the subject, of expressing my hearty concurrence in the decision of the Convention. It is a necessary consequence of the adoption of responsible government that Ministers, should be obliged to sit in Parliament. There is an express provision for that in this Bill. Without it responsible government would have-compelled Ministers to sit in Parliament; but lest there should be any danger of an assertion to the contrary, it has been thought wise to make this provision, which was not in the Bill of 1891.

Another guarantee of the preservation of the Constitution until the electors themselves choose to change it, is contained in the provision that the interpretation of the Constitution by the High Court is to be final. Of course it will be argued that this Constitution will have been made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. That will be true in one sense, but not true in effect, because the provisions of this Constitution, the principles which it embodies, and the details of enactment by which those principles are enforced, will all have been the work of Australians. I think it is right and fit that the highest court in Australia should be left as the guardian of the expressions of the people, and the sole body to determine finally what the people meant when they used those expressions. That is a provision which was only adopted after some divisions. I believe it to be a right one, and I am not going to quarrel in the slightest degree with the decision by which the Convention determined that, apart from the consideration of those questions of interpretation of the Constitution of the Commonwealth or of a state, there should be retained a power in Her Majesty to grant special leave to appeal, in all such cases as might be held under proper regulation to justify an appeal, to the Privy Council. We have certainly had a great deal of controversy upon this subject, and it is very hard to say—it is a matter very much of individual judgment—whether the provisions with respect to appeals to the Privy Council are more liberal or less liberal than those in the Bill of 1891. They have been adopted, at any rate, by the Convention on the showing that the right of the subject to appeal to the Queen in Council should not be taken away by the Constitution. If that argument has been conceded, it certainly does not lie as a charge at the door of the Convention that it has acted without regard to liberal principles. I might enumerate a great many other points of difference between these two Bills, but I shall confine myself to a few.
With regard to the rights of citizens to avail themselves of the judicial proceedings which will be introduced by the establishment of the High Court, there is one important difference between the Bill of 1891 and that which we have now finally adopted. It is that jurisdiction has been conferred upon the High Court with regard to disputes which lie between residents of different states. That is a right which was not sought to be conferred by the Bill of 1891, and it has been adopted as a reasonable corollary to that union of the states which we believe will do so much to promote interchange and community of interests between the citizens of the whole Commonwealth. I might mention that the rights of civil servants who may be transferred to the Commonwealth are much more carefully preserved under this Bill than under the Bill of 1891. The compensation to the states concerned for any property transferred to or vested in the Commonwealth for the purposes of the Commonwealth are also more fully secured under this Bill than under the Bill of 1891. I will pass on to a much more important provision very lately introduced into the Bill. That is a provision that a fourth only of the net revenue of the Commonwealth will be allowed to be expended by the Commonwealth. That is to say, three-fourths, or more, of the revenue must annually come back to the states whose citizens are taxed. That is the Customs and Excise. I am aware the provision would be different in regard to direct taxation, as to which Mr. Reid reminded us that the Treasurer of the Commonwealth would make it his business to secure £1 in order to provide the 5s. as required for federal expenses and the 15s. which has to be refunded to the states. We need have no fear on this head, because, inasmuch as the control of Customs and Excise is by the Constitution transferred to the Federation, there can be no doubt that the first means of revenue availed of by the Federation would be Customs and Excise. That is an important provision, and I congratulate my right honorable friend (Sir Edward Braddon) on the sagacity which dictated his moving the amendment yesterday. The provision is now much more elastic, but it affords the same guarantee to the various states, while it conserves to the Commonwealth the same share in the revenue from Customs and Excise. That share, as the population and the capacity of the inhabitants of the Commonwealth increase, will not be increasing in proportion, but always increasing in amount. That seems to me to afford a reasonable guarantee. I should have preferred some power, if this provision were found to work too stringently, to enable it to be modified. But it is a fair corollary to the provision for dealing with the revenue for the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties of customs, and further reflection has led me to the conclusion that, on the whole, it will be a useful and beneficial provision. There is an important provision, not embodied in the 1891 Bill, which deserves to be mentioned. This is, not a final denial of state bounties, as I saw it expressed in print somewhere, but a provision that a state may give bounties for production and export with the consent of the two Houses of the Federal Parliament expressed by resolution. That might be regarded as tending to derogate from the freedom of trade and commerce; and it may be that in its operation the provision might occasionally be found to do so. On the other hand, the power of the Commonwealth to impose duties of customs and of excise such as it may determine, which insures that these duties of customs and excise would represent something like the average opinion of the Commonwealth—that power, and the provision that bounties are to be uniform throughout the Commonwealth, might, I am willing to concede, be found to work with some hardship upon the states for some years, unless their own rights to give bounties were to some extent preserved. The restriction is a just one, that if the Parliament of the Commonwealth does consider that an industry is unworthy of treatment in that way by the state—that it does not promise reasonable results, that the industry is such that the grant might be regarded as derogating in either case from freedom of trade—Parliament may be relied on to refuse the bounty. And if it could not be relied on to refuse the bounty, it may be relied on not to sanction its continuance unduly or for an indefinite period. Under these conditions, it is conceivable that the state bounties granted in that way will do beneficial work for a certain time, while after that time, the provision that the Commonwealth should have the control of bounties, and that they shall be uniform, may be expected to work, where bounties are required at all, with beneficial results. On the whole, this being a compromise, it is impossible to understand the criticism that it is a final denial of state bounties, and I hope that those who read this Constitution will think that some of the condemnations which reached their eyes before the Constitution reached them, are much more surprising to them than even they have been accustomed to find such criticisms. We are told that utter confusion has been wrought in the state finances. There has been great difference certainly in the method in which the distribution of the federal surplus has been provided for; but that this should lead to the dislocation or the confusion of the finances is what I am unable to understand. There are two principles in the method of distribution adopted under this Bill which ought to commend themselves to the sense of the electors of the Commonwealth. The one is that until the time has come when experience will dictate the proper method of distribution, the just principle has been adopted that a state shall get back all that it contributes, less the fair and necessary proportion expended in collecting the revenue due, and in maintaining the Commonwealth. It seems to me, moreover, to be a provision that has on the face of it the essence of justice. We are told that it will be difficult to trace goods across the border. I don't agree with that criticism, because it will be as easy to trace goods across the border when duties are not to be paid as it has been when there are temptations to make a false declaration for the purpose of avoiding the payment of taxes. Sir, on the face of it, it must be clear that the difficulty after the abolition of intercolonial customs will be much less than ever it was while taxes existed. The other principle to which I adverted as supporting the system of finance adopted by this Bill, is that while every one trusts the Commonwealth Parliament to do its duty, steps are taken to see that it shall have before it the necessary data and evidence before it makes, I will not say final, but definite provision for distribution. The provision in this Bill that five years shall elapse during which the system which the Bill lays down shall operate is one on which the determination of the Federal Parliament can only be come to on the evidence which experience affords. How well must that compare with any attempt that we might ourselves have made to prophesy the working of a Federal Tariff of which none of us have any experience! I have said that these provisions are marked by the essence of justice. I repeat that phrase, because I believe that what I have said about them demonstrates that they are so characterized. How they can work utter confusion to the finances of the various states—how it can be asserted that with the guarantee which Sir Edward Braddon's amendment affords they can work confusion and dislocation to the finances of the states, is what I am unable to understand. And really, sir, I do believe that I am either so dense or so right on this subject that a conclave of all the statisticians in the colonies would be unable to convince me. Then, in order that the trade and commerce provisions, including the intercolonial free-trade provision, may be fairly carried out, we have provided for an impartial judicial body, with powers of administration as well as of adjudication, to maintain and execute the clauses. It is not the chance vote of a Legislature, but the deliberate determination of the court—from which there may be an appeal on matters of law. It is the determination of that tribunal which will regulate decisions as to whether any colony is doing an injustice to another by professedly internal regulation. I cannot help saying I approve strongly of the provision, because of the nature of the clauses which are to be committed to the Inter-State Commission. If I am not tiring the Convention, I should like to point out that, according to clause 99—"The Commonwealth shall not, by any law or regulation of trade or commerce, abridge the right of a state or of the residents therein to the reasonable use of the water of rivers for conservation or irrigation." Then, again, in clause 98 it is set forth that—"The Commonwealth shall not, by any law or regulation of trade, commerce, or revenue, give preference to one state or any part thereof over another state or any part thereof." Again, in clause 101 it is provided—"The Parliament may by any law with respect to trade or commerce forbid, as to railways, any preference or discrimination by any state, or by any authority constituted under a state, if such preference or discrimination is undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any state." But that provision is coupled with a proviso that due regard is to be had to the financial responsibilities of a state in connexion with the construction of and maintenance of its railways. How that could work ruin to the Victorian railways, or, as has been said, turn the New South Wales railways into old iron, is more than I can understand. With the proviso, I am satisfied with the clause, the proviso showing clearly what the intention of the clause is. The proviso reads-"But no preference or discrimination shall, within the meaning of this section, be taken to be undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any state, unless so adjudged by the Inter-State Commission." So that it appears on the face of the clause that where a preference or discrimination is not found to be undue or unreasonable, having regard to all the circumstances, then that preference or discrimination may be maintained, provided it is not unjust to any state. A tribunal is created for the purpose of determining this question of the dueness or reasonableness or justice, and really I think we ought to be satisfied with the creation of such a tribunal to interpret those clauses. I believe those provisions will work well on the whole. They are well adapted for the maintenance of that condition of things marked by the state ownership of railways, while we have in clause 51 provided that, with the consent of the state concerned, the Commonwealth may take over the whole or any part of the railways of a state, after which it will provide for railway construction and extension. I have always voted against handing over the railways by this Constitution to the Federation. But I am satisfied that if it be found a necessary accompaniment to federation-if it be found to be a wise thing, for the adjustment of the finances and in the interests of commerce, that the railways should be taken over by the Commonwealth, we should have sufficient confidence, in the Commonwealth to know that if that is done it will be the result of public opinion, spreading not only throughout the Commonwealth but throughout the states, for here, as elsewhere, the same party principles would operate in the Commonwealth as in the states. If it becomes a necessity for the Commonwealth to take over the railways, giving good value or compensation, we may rely on the permissive provision of the Constitution to work out that result, and then I admit there may not be so much necessity for an Inter-State Commission as at the present time exists. There, again, is a most important difference between this Bill and the Bill of 1891. Let me now draw attention to two very important points in the Bill. A large agitation was got up in all the colonies in favour of the recognition of the Supreme Being in the Constitution. As the result of that agitation, a phrase has been inserted in the preamble. I will not use the words themselves, but say that the preamble states, that the people, who have agreed on the Constitution, humbly rely on the blessing of the Supreme Being. It was feared that some interpretation such as has been taken up in one or two cases in America might lead to this phrase being regarded as an action taken against religious liberty. This Convention has agreed to a clause which prevents any possibility of that kind as regards the Commonwealth, and which does not interfere with the states in questions of their internal regulation, with which, of course, this Commonwealth will not have anything to do. Clause 115 says-

The Commonwealth shall not make any law for establishing any religion, or for imposing any religious observance, or for prohibiting the free exercise of any religion, and no religious. test shall be required as a qualification for any office or public trust under the Commonwealth.

While, therefore, a concession has been made to the popular opinion that some reverential expression should be embodied in the preamble, due care has been taken by the Convention that no reliance upon that provision, and no far-fetched arguments based upon it, shall lead to any infraction of religious liberty under the laws of the Commonwealth which we hope to create. As regards these differences, I would like to point out one other matter. It has been a constant subject of complaint against this Constitution that the powers which the people possess of amending it are not sufficiently great. The distinction between this Constitution and that of 1891 is in this respect most marked. That of 1891 provided that amendments of the Constitution, after an absolute majority had been secured in the two Houses, of Parliament, should be made by Conventions of the people. The present provision is a marked advance upon the provision of 1891, for after the requisite majority has been secured in the two Houses, this Bill provides that the alteration of the Constitution shall be carried by the people themselves. That, again, we may be told, is a taking away of the national character of the Bill, for our critics are not scrupulous; but how it can be said to be an evidence of anti-liberalism or a conservative feeling seems to me in the nature of a conundrum. This Convention has made a very great advance in these particulars on the work of 1891, and perhaps one of the greatest advances has been this, that the free people which is to be constituted shall under this provision be free to alter the Constitution themselves, care only being taken that it is done deliberately and faithfully; that work of that character, which may affect the destinies of unborn generations, shall be done only under circumstances which insure that thought and reason shall prevail, and that, in making amendments, we should take that much security for the protection of our children and their children after them. That, again, may be described by some as a "conservative" tendency. I, too, should consider it a conservative tendency if I were prepared to say that every step taken in the direction of safety and moderation was mere conservatism. But not holding that opinion, but holding that steps taken in this way are not only compatible with liberalism, but are the very conditions of a just liberalism, I must venture to differ from the opinion which has been expressed. It has been said again about this provision that one state can, by holding out against the proposed amendment, defeat the intentions of all the other states. That utterly incorrect. It is certainly provided that where an amendment of the Constitution aims at destroying the proportion the House of Representatives which the representatives of one state hear to the numbers of those of another state, such a drastic thing shall not be done without the consent of that state. But that is just. It is also insured that equal representation of any state in the Senate shall not be taken away without its consent. Is it not also just to provide that? If the Federal Parliament attempts to do one or other of these things, to single out one state for different treatment with regard to number of its people and their representatives in the House of Representatives, or to deprive it of the equality which other states possess in reference to their representation in the Senate; if, under any pressure, the Federal Parliament were to attempt to do a thing so utterly unjust and subversive of the entire Constitution and of right principles, is it not just that the consent of the state affected should be obtained? That is the only case in which one state can, by holding out, defeat the intention of the rest of the Commonwealth. It is just that such power should exist in that state, for provisions of the kind would absolutely mean the demolition at once or speedily of that state as an individual part of the Commonwealth. That could never be intended. This is a necessary corollary of the provision that the limits of a state or the territory of a state cannot be altered without its own consent. It would be the same thing to deprive that state of its proper share of representation in the Commonwealth as to take away part of its territory or alter its boundaries, and it would lead to its being unable, effectually, to resist action taken for such a purpose. In every other respect it is untrue that this provision for the amendment of the Constitution enables one state to triumph over the others, because it is an absolute necessity of the Constitution that if five states have federated, the Constitution can be altered at the polls if the amendment is carried by absolute majorities in Parliament, and by a majority of the people in three states out of five. I have now set forth some of the differences between the two Constitutions, and in that way I have answered some of the criticisms which have been made upon this Bill. It has taken me a longer time than I expected it would, but I thought I would have the indulgence of the Convention in defending this Bill, and in that way I think I have done useful work, because it is not by any resort to high-flown oratory or by any endeavour to rouse the sentiments of the people from within this council hall that we shall do our work, but rather by a calm statement of the nature of our labours, and by an appeal to the reason and not the passions of the body outside. I should have mentioned in dealing with the railway provisions that there is an important qualification conveyed by the 103rd clause, which reads-

Nothing in this Constitution shall render unlawful any rate for the carriage of goods upon a railway the property of a state, if the rate is deemed by the Inter-State Commission to be necessary for the development of the territory of the state, and if the rate applies equally to goods within the state and to goods passing into the state from other states.

We have been told that will work an injustice to some of the colonies. I cannot see that it will. I cannot see any state whether it be Victoria in developing its coal mines, or New South Wales in developing its wheat-fields - can do any harm by a developmental rate for any of these purposes, so long as that rate is consistent with intercolonial free-trade. Because it seems to me that the development of a state is a corollary to the act of this Constitution in leaving that territory in the hands of states. Therefore, I cannot see that either one of these colonies should be considered to be doing work which the Federation ought to prohibit, if, in regard to its internal traffic only, it makes such concessions as will develop the produce of the land, whether that produce be from a coal mine or a wheat-field, I believe that is an entirely just provision. It is one of the provisos I intended to mention as taking off, to some extent, what might be considered to be the rigour of Sir George Turner's clause 101. I believe it is an additional safeguard, which tends to preserve that power of internal regulation on the part of the state which ought to be allowed to it, so long as it does not conflict with the provisions of the Constitution in giving the federal authority the sole control of inter-state traffic. Now, where inter-state traffic is concerned, this clause cannot operate, because, unless the rate which is concerned applies equally to goods coming from other states, and to goods passing entirely within the territory of the state itself, the rate cannot apply, and the Inter-State Commission will have power to interdict it. That being so, where the rate interferes with inter-state free-trade it will be interdicted by the Inter-State Commission; and where it does not interfere with the other provisions of the Constitution in this respect the rate will be allowed to continue. That is a just solution of what might otherwise be a very grave difficulty. I do not intend to detain the Convention at much greater length. I have not spoken to-day for the purpose of making what is called a speech. My object has been to lay clearly before the country, through this Convention, what I believe are the wise and just provisions of this Constitution, and the respects in which it is an improvement upon, as being a more liberal Constitution than the work of 1891. Providing, as this Constitution does, for a free people to elect a free Parliament-giving that people through their Parliament the power of the purse-laying at their mercy from day to day the existence of any Ministry which dares by corruption, or drifts through ignorance into, the commission of any act which is unfavorable to the people having this security, it must in its very essence be a free Constitution. Whatever any one may say to the contrary that is secured in the very way in which the freedom of the British Constitution is secured. It is secured by vesting in the people, through their representatives, the power of the purse, and I venture to say there is no other way of securing absolute freedom to a people than that, unless you make a different kind of Executive than that which we contemplate, and then overload your Constitution with legislative provisions to protect the citizen from interference. Under this Constitution he is saved from every kind of interference. Under this Constitution he has his voice not only in the, daily government of the country, but in the daily determination of the question of whom is the Government to consist. There is the guarantee of freedom in this Constitution. There is the guarantee which none of us have sought to remove, but every one has sought to strengthen. How we or our work can be accused of not providing for the popular liberty is something which I hope the critics will now venture to explain, and I think I have made their work difficult for them. Having provided in that way for a free Constitution, we have provided for an Executive which is charged with the duty of maintaining the provisions of that Constitution; and, therefore, it can only act as the agents of the people. We have provided for a Judiciary, which will determine questions arising under this Constitution, and with all other questions which should be dealt with by a Federal Judiciary and it will also be a High Court of Appeal for all courts in the states that choose to resort to it. In doing these things, have we not provided, first, that our Constitution shall be free: next, that its government shall be by the will of the people, which is the just result of their freedom: thirdly, that the Constitution shall not, nor shall any of its provisions, be twisted or perverted, inasmuch as a court appointed by their own Executive, but acting independently, is to decide what is a perversion of its provisions? We can have every faith in the constitution of that tribunal. It is appointed as the arbiter of the Constitution. It is appointed not to be above the Constitution, for no citizen is above it, but under it; but it is appointed for the purpose of saying that those who are the instruments of the Constitution—the Government and the Parliament of the day—shall not become the masters of those whom, as to the Constitution, they are bound to serve. What I mean is this: That if you, after making a Constitution of this kind, enable any Government or any Parliament to twist or infringe its provisions, then by slow degrees you may have that Constitution—if not altered in terms—so whittled away in operation that the guarantees of freedom which it gives your people will not be maintained; and so, in the highest sense, the court you are creating here, which is to be the final interpreter of that Constitution, will be such a tribunal as will preserve the popular liberty in all these regards, and will prevent, under any pretext of constitutional action, the Commonwealth from dominating the states, or the states from usurping the sphere of the Commonwealth. Having provided for all these things, I think this Convention has done well. The question for us is this—the question for the electors is this: Is this a Constitution which will enable a free people to come together, and in community together to work out their own destiny? Who can deny it? Is it a Constitution which gives all reasonable and liberal guarantees of freedom? That can only be answered in one way. Is it a Constitution the action of which, until amended by the people, is preserved and safeguarded? There is only one answer to that. Is it a Constitution which the people themselves, by their will expressed by their Parliament and themselves, are able to alter to suit their needs under conditions of reasonable thought, without unreasonable difficulty? There can be no answer but one to that question. Then, if the Convention has done those four things, I take it that, it has done its work.
There is no voter of the electoral body, coming to the consideration of this Bill, and having an, average share of intelligence, who will say that because there is one provision or another in the Bill which he objects to, he, therefore, will not vote for the Bill. Because the elector will say this to himself—Do I believe in every syllable of the Constitution under which I live? There is not an elector who can say that. Should I like the Constitution of this country (whether it be Victoria, or New South Wales, or any other country) to be amended in certain particulars? Certainly I should. But do I need to go away and live in another country, because I cannot get the very alteration I want in my Constitution? No; I do not. Is not that a series of questions which the elector will put to himself and answer as I have answered them? Will he not say—While I may not agree with the Convention in every detail of its work, no Constitution probably can be framed against which nearly every elector in every country would not have some word to say. There are very few belonging to either of the great political parties in Great Britain who would not wish to alter the Constitution in one direction or the other. There are very few in these colonies, and I suppose there are very few in Canada and in the United States, who do not desire amendments in their Constitution. But the question they ask themselves is: Is this the right sort of country to live in under such a Constitution as this? If it is I am content, provided you give me freedom to participate in its alteration under every condition. That, sir, is what this Bill secures! I believe that in this great colony, in which we have been meeting for 41 sitting days, the work of the Convention will be reasonably appreciated, and that their labours will be rewarded with the only reward they ask, and that is the unity of their country. I also believe that similar reason and wisdom will prevail in the country in which I live, for notwithstanding the huge burden laid on the people of that colony by a breach of faith and I still stigmatize it as a breach of faith-I do believe in my inmost heart that, when this Constitution is explained in its truth and justice to the electors of that country, they will demand that union, that friendship, that connexion in all business matters between themselves and the other colonies, which it is manifest every citizen of this country was intended to have and maintain. I believe that such results will ensue that this Constitution will be adopted, even under the huge burdens laid on the electors of New South Wales as a condition of its adoption. I believe that in other countries—in yours, Mr. President, for example, where I am quite sure the electoral body is permeated by a very, very strong demand for and insistence on liberal principles—this Constitution will not be distasteful, but will instead be regarded as highly satisfactory. I sincerely believe that that will be the result in every one of these colonies. It is there that all of us seek our reward. Other reward we cannot expect—and I, for one, can say from my very heart, that other reward I do not desire. I am quite sure that is the feeling we all of us share, and I am quite sure, too, that the approval of our honest labour which we shall receive if this Constitution is, as it will be, adopted by the voice of the people, will be such a reward to us as will satisfy any ambition we may have entertained in the whole course of our lives.

Sir EDWARD BRADDON (Tasmania).—

I have to express my sincere thanks to Sir Richard Baker and the Attorney-General of Victoria for allowing me this opportunity of speaking to this motion, an opportunity which I could not get unless I spoke at this moment, inasmuch as I have to leave this chamber to catch the steamer in some twenty minutes or so. Mr. President, I entirely and heartily indorse the motion of the honorable the leader of the Convention. That motion calls upon the Premiers of the colonies represented here to engage to see that the principles of this Bill are made fully known to the constituents in their colonies, and already I have taken steps to secure that that shall be efficiently done. I do not think it would be possible by issuing copies of the Bill itself to every elector of every colony to make the principles of the Bill intelligible to him, and I have ordered a synopsis of the Bill to be prepared. That synopsis which will be intelligible to all, and which probably will be read by all who can read, where the Bill might not be read, will, I hope, effect the purpose that we have in view. I desire to adopt no Fabian policy whatever in regard to the Bill we have just completed. I wish to speak with no uncertain sound, and I declare for myself, and I believe that I am declaring it for the great majority of the representatives of Tasmania, that we are heartily in sympathy with this Bill, and will do everything in our power to get it accepted by our colony. I have heard from two visitors who have recently come here from Tasmania, that there is a feeling in the colony against this Bill. It is believed there that the Bill will not be approved by the people. Well, I believe that possibly when we come to explain matters to our people, especially when we show the effect of that clause which I was happy enough to pass the other day—when we show them that we have secured by that clause a guarantee of a certain minimum return of revenue from Customs and Excise, and a certain amount of economy in the administration of the Commonwealth's affairs; when we show them that, and explain the Bill in other respects to our constituents, I believe we shall be able to win their votes in spite of any feeling that may prevail there now. Of course, none of us can say that, according to our lights, according to our individual wishes, the Bill is perfection. It would be necessarily impossible that that should be so, when we, who are collected here together, however honest our views may be, are necessarily influenced in this Convention by the interests of our own particular states. That is as natural as it is excusable. We are here to see, as far as we can, that the Constitution Bill should be moulded so as to suit our particular interests; but at this stage, having adopted that Bill, we, supposing we become members of the Commonwealth, should entirely drop that parochial feeling; we should cease to feel that we belong to this state or to that, and only acknowledge that we belonged to the Commonwealth, and work together honestly and with strenuous energy to carry out the Bill to the greatest possible success. It was a disappointment to some of us representatives of the smaller states that the power of amending Money Bills was not given to the Senate, as we urged that it should be. Upon that point we were defeated and we have accepted our defeat with gracefulness, I hope, and with perfect satisfaction to ourselves, because if we met with some little failure there, well, it has been said somewhere that "Failure is God's road to success." And I hope now, when I have thoroughly accepted the Bill as it stands, even as to that clause, we shall find the Senate so powerful that it will realize very much by its strength what we sought to realize for it by Act of Parliament. Sir Samuel Griffith has said, and very well said, that if the Senate be a powerful body its suggestions will be accepted, but that if it be a weak body its amendments will be refused. I think we may therefore be perfectly satisfied in having retained for the smaller states the most liberal representation in the Senate, and indeed the most liberal representation in the whole Parliament for the smaller states. Having done that, I hope that not only we who are here in this Convention, but those whom we represent in every one of the smaller colonies, will be perfectly satisfied with what they have got. And without attempting to do that which time will not permit me to do, that is, to criticise or to analyze the Bill in any way, I should like to say that to my mind it is a Bill which appeals thoroughly to the people, the great masses of the people, for whom we have prepared it. Throughout all the stages, therefore, which we have had to pass in dealing with this Commonwealth Bill, from its initiation, and the election by the people of their representatives in this Convention, to the end, the people will dominate-dominate as they should do, reasonably and in a wholesome way—and nothing will be possible to be done except with the assent of the people. Before I sit down, Mr. President, I think I should fail in my duty if I did not, on behalf of us departing Tasmanians, say some of those valedictory words without which meetings of this sort never close. We, I am sure, unanimously, like other members of the Convention, have recognised the dignity, ability, and self-sacrifice with which you have adorned the President's chair. We must all have admired Mr. DOUGLAS. -

Do not forget the Parliamentary Committee.

Sir EDWARD BRADDOCK. -

I am not going to forget them. We have all seen with admiration the splendid way in which our leader, the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton), has conducted the proceedings of the Convention. We must all have admired the devotion to the work before us which has been shown by him and by the members of the Drafting Committee. Many honorable members are possibly unaware that they have given hours to the consideration of the Bill when we have been enjoying ourselves in bed. They have spent the midnight oil—perhaps I should say electric light—upon the measure without stint, and it is due to their efforts that we were able to pass the Bill as early as yesterday. As I shall have no other opportunity, I will now express, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, our gratitude for the great and unsparing hospitality shown to us by the Government and people, not of Melbourne only, but of all Victoria. We have been hospitably received in various parts of Victoria, and would no doubt have been equally well received in all parts of the colony if the people could have rendered it possible for us to be in two or three places at once. I should have liked to have said more, but steamers, like time, wait for no man, and it is necessary for me to get away.

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

I should, perhaps, not have felt called upon to take up some of the few remaining moments of the time of the Convention had it not been that, owing to my duties as Chairman of Committees, I have been the only member of the Convention who has not been able to express his opinions, and to explain through the press to his constituents who sent him here the position which he takes up. Before I proceed, let me express my meed of praise for the admirable and able speech of our esteemed leader, a speech which was a fitting climax to the able and courteous manner in which he has performed the arduous duties of his position. Not only the members of the Convention, but the people of Australia are under a debt of gratitude to the honorable and learned member—a debt which I hope they will repay in the manner which he himself has suggested, by crowning his efforts and those of all of us by the formation of the Australian nation I have heard many remarks concerning the time which our deliberations have taken up, and I have been told, and I have seen it stated in print, that the public are losing the thread of our deliberations, and are ceasing to take an interest in the federal movement. I do not believe the public of Australia are less interested in the great question of federation now than they have been at any time during the last six years. It is quite excusable for them not to have been able to follow our deliberations, because to those unacquainted with parliamentary procedure they have, no doubt, appeared of a complex nature, and it has been difficult, with the limited information conveyed to the outside public through the press, to follow our proceedings. But although they may not have taken such a great interest in our proceedings during the last few weeks, I do not believe it is true that they have lost interest in federation. I firmly believe that not a moment has been wasted during the whole of the time that we have been here. When we consider how vast the importance is that every word of the Constitution should be correct, that every clause should fit into every other clause; when we consider the great amount of time, trouble, and expense it would take to make any alteration, and that, if we have not made our intentions clear, we shall undoubtedly have laid the foundation of lawsuits of a most extensive nature, which will harass the people of United Australia and create dissatisfaction with our work, it must be evident that too much care has not been exercised. I place it before the public in most unmistakable words that it is my opinion, as Chairman of Committees, that in all our deliberations, and notwithstanding all the reversals of conclusions previously arrived at which have taken place, no time has been wasted. The result of our labours is a Bill which, for drafting, for clearness and conciseness of expression, it would be difficult to equal in any written document. My honorable and learned friend (Mr. Barton) has approached the subject of the Bill from the position of a speaker and an actor; I have been a listener and a thinker. I hope to be permitted, before I come to any of the details of the Bill, to analyze the principles upon which it is founded. There have been three types of government struggling for mastery all through our deliberations. There has been, first, the type of what I call true federation; there has been the type of a federation imagined by some of my honorable friends from Victoria; and there has been the British type of government. Those three types are to a very considerable extent inconsistent with each other. But in the work which we have completed traces will be found of every one of them. The remark has frequently been made that we want a federation of the British responsible government type. That has always seemed to me a contradiction in terms. You might just as well say-"I want a stamp battery of the roller-mill type." Both the stamp battery and the roller mill are machines designed for the crushing of matrix, but they are founded upon absolutely different principles. Both the federal type of government and the British type of government are framed for the same purpose-the government of the people-but they are founded upon absolutely inconsistent theories and principles. I do not want to reiterate arguments and statements that have been made over and over again in the Convention, but I may, perhaps, be permitted to refer very shortly to the principles upon which these different types are founded. We have in the British Constitution, and in all the copies of it which exist in these colonies, a centralized form of government, in which there is one predominant power-in which one of the branches of the Legislature has usurped the powers of the other by the aid of a committee of its members called the Executive. This we sometimes refer to as the responsible Ministry system. Is not such a type of government absolutely inconsistent with the fundamental principles of a Federation in which free people wish to unite for certain purposes, and in which, according to all sound theory, the two branches of the Legislature-that which represents the states, and that which represents the people, ought to be, if not co-equal in power, to a great extent co-equal? The third type, the type in which it is suggested that all states boundaries shall be completely swept away, and that, so far as the legislative powers transferred to the Federal Government are concerned, the people shall act as one people, and there shall be an Upper House and a Lower House only, is founded upon a want of consideration of the effect of any such form of government. If the people of the colonies are willing to act as one nation—to sweep away the boundaries of the different colonies in reference to the 38 powers given by clause 52 of the Bill to the Federal Government—surely they will submit to give to the Federal Government powers of legislation concerning all matters. This suggested half-way house between unification and Federation is no permanent abiding place. I invite the honorable and learned member (Mr. Higgins) to consider this point: If the people of the smaller states are willing to adopt the type of government suggested by our Victorian friends, we can save the expense of ten Houses of Legislature and five Governors, and we can become a truly united people. But we have been sent here to frame a scheme of federation, not of amalgamation. Now, what have we done? We have framed a scheme of government such as hitherto has been absolutely unknown. It does not follow that it is nor a good scheme, that it is not workable, or that it will not perform the objects at which we all aim.
I believe, sincerely and truly, that the Bill which we have framed is a machine which will work most smoothly. We have adopted, so far as we can, the forms of government to which we have been accustomed. That of itself is a great thing, and we have imported into it such an amount of federal principle as will make this form of government a federal form. I believe that when this system comes into existence, its smooth working will be immensely aided by the fact that those who take part in it will take part in a form of government to which they have been used, and that the people themselves will be reconciled, in even the smaller states, to some departure from the federal form, because they will see that all they have looked up to and cherished for a considerable time as a free government will still remain to them intact, so far as it is possible that it can remain intact under a federal form of government. In the first speech which I made in the Sydney Convention in 1891, I admitted that we were not assembled to make any theoretical or ideal type, but that, in the words of Solon, we must give to the people of Australia "not the best form of government, but the best that they can bear." Now, this system is, I think, the best the people of Australia can bear. It must be always recollected that, in building a house, the architect ought not to build to suit himself, but he ought to build the house to be convenient and commodious for those who will live in it. That is the principle which has influenced the minds of members of this Convention, and they have given effect to the idea in the Constitution which we have framed. There are many people in these colonies who look upon this Constitution from a conservative point of view. They think that it is far too democratic. They point out that in no Constitution which has yet existed in the world have there been two Houses of Legislature in which property has no representation at all. They point out that this is a Constitution in which one set of people-those who have little or no property because they are the majority, will have the power of dictating how the taxes shall be raised, and how the taxes shall be spent; and that another set of people-those who have property, and are the minority will pay the taxes; that representation and taxation will not go hand in hand, because taxation will be imposed by one class and paid by another. Now, that criticism undoubtedly has a great deal of force. But the answer seems to me to be that, at all events for a considerable time-perhaps for ever-the Federal Government will rely on taxes raised through the Customs; and you cannot impose customs duties so that they will fall on any particular class. I doubt very much whether you can impose any taxation which will fall on any particular class, because all taxation has a tendency to spread itself over the whole of the community. But that is specially true of taxation raised through the Custom house; and that is the answer to such criticism. There is one point in which I have taken a great interest—one point on which I have taken up what some have thought to be an extreme stand and that is as to the powers of the Senate under the Constitution. I look upon the Senate as the sheet-anchor of the smaller states, as the pivot on which the whole Federal Constitution revolves; and I have been compelled to analyze this Bill carefully before arriving at any conclusion as to what effect the various alterations made in clauses 53 to 56 will have on the powers and position of the Senate. Now, the following alterations have been made which will have the effect of decreasing those powers. The power, the dignity, and the importance of the Senate, so far as those Money Bills which must originate in the House of Representatives are concerned, has been very greatly decreased. In the Bill of 1891 the words used were "Bills for imposing taxation." Those words were altered in Adelaide, on my motion in the Constitutional Committee, to 11 Bills the main object of which is for imposing taxation." But that form of words has now been altered again, so that we find in the Bill, as drawn, that no Bills incidentally imposing taxation, except of the most trivial nature, can originate in the
That is one stamp of inferiority placed on the Senate since 1891. And, also since 1891, a proviso has been added to one of the clauses relating to the Executive, which makes it absolutely necessary that the members of the Executive shall be Members of Parliament. That provision also diminishes the power of the Senate. Sir Samuel Griffith purposely left the matter vague. He explained to us, in 1891, and has since explained in some of his pamphlets, that he is not at all sure that under a federal form of government we should continue to have responsible government, and that free institutions might work out under representative government without the Cabinet system of responsibility; and he left the matter open for that change which time and evolution might bring. But in this Bill we have insisted that members of the Executive must be Members of Parliament. In a former speech, which I do not intend to repeat, I have explained that this inherent power of the House which controls the purse, and of that committee of such House called the responsible Ministry, which will inevitably work with the House to which it owes its existence, and to which it is responsible, will have a powerful and constant tendency to reduce the Senate to a position of impotency; and these two alterations since 1891 will also work in that direction. On the other hand, however, there are provisions in this Bill which will act in a contrary direction. The question of the quota—the fixed proportion between the two Houses—which is rendered absolutely necessary by the fact that they will sometimes sit together, is a gain from my point of view. The franchise—the fact that the Senate is to be elected on universal suffrage, no matter how you may look at it from a conservative point of view, undoubtedly gives added power to the Senate. The fact that there is a power of dissolution will also tend to increase the power of the Senate, for elected bodies, like Antaeus when he touched mother earth, arise with renewed strength after an appeal to their constituents. And so it will be with the Federal Senate. What will be the effect of the two Houses sitting together in a joint session after dissolution has taken place, I am not prepared to say; but I think it is quite possible that that will not weaken the power of the Senate. There can be no doubt that, at all events for some time to come, we shall have party government, and that in the last resort, when the two Houses sit together, the Senate may have some slight say and some slight action on which had loomed so large to my mind during the time they were under discussion. And here let me appeal to some of those honorable members of this Convention who, as at present advised, are not prepared to adopt and to recommend the Bill. Let me appeal to them not to come to any final conclusion just now. Let me ask them to pause, to wait, to allow the disappointment which arises from defeat and the heat engendered by conflict to subside, so that they can look on all the questions which have been debated in this Convention in proportion to their relative importance, and view the scheme calmly and deliberately as a whole. I feel sure that if they will do that many of those mole-hills which now seem to them to be mountains will sink into the comparative insignificance which they really have. In this connexion I do not wish to follow Mr. Barton, but I want to mention one point which he omitted in his speech in reference to the Senate—and indeed to both Houses. He omitted to mention that under this Bill no plural voting is allowed.

Mr. BARTON. -

Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -

Whereas plural voting was allowed under the Bill of 1891. That, from a liberal point of view, is a great concession. The provision was strongly objected to by the people of South Australia in 1891, and I only want to supplement the speech of my honorable friend in this particular now, so that it may be known to the people of South Australia at all events that that bugbear to them has disappeared. Now, I have seen it stated, and I think it is a matter that ought to be contradicted, that there is some kind of tacit understanding in this Convention as to where the seat of government under the Commonwealth is to be. For my own part, I give that statement a most absolute denial.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD BAKER. -

I do not believe there is the slightest understanding of any sort. I know that, so far as I am concerned, I have not made up my mind at all; but I do think—and I say this advisedly—that it will be a good thing that the federal capital should be located in some place where there is at present no population at all, where all the land is in possession of the Government of some one colony or another, and that if some such place is chosen—probably somewhere near to the borders of New South Wales and Victoria—money can be raised from the sale or leasing of that land which would go a very long way to pay the expenses in connexion with the federal site and the erection of public buildings and offices. There is one matter which I think I am bound to explain to my constituents, and that is with regard to the river question. I had to give a casting vote on that point, and I gave that casting vote in a manner which has seemed to some people in South Australia to be against the interests of that colony. Now, sir, I deliberately departed from the ordinary rule, which, if it does not oblige, at all events intimates to the chairman the manner in which he should vote, namely, to uphold the former decision of the committee. But I felt that the position was one of great difficulty. I felt that if I gave that vote the other way, something would be put in the Bill which was most obnoxious to the delegates from one of the colonies. I also felt that the solution that was then advocated was not the best solution of the difficulty. I am very glad now that I voted in that manner, because we have solved the difficulty concerning this river question in the very best possible way. If we sat here for another month we could not arrive at a more equitable and fair conclusion. What is the solution? It is that the Commonwealth is not to prohibit any state from a reasonable use of the waters of the rivers of that state during the time it flows through their territory. Now, is not that a compromise which the representatives of the colonies can accept with honour and with satisfaction? For my part, I do not think that the representatives of the colony from which I come ever wished to get any more. They never wanted to be unreasonable, and they did not want other colonies to be unreasonable. The provision which has been inserted in the Bill will be found to work in a manner fair and equitable to all parties, and I am glad indeed that further time was given for the consideration of this subject, and that so just and so fair a solution was arrived at. There is one matter which my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) did not touch upon, and it is of great importance in the minds of the people who will have the final say concerning this Constitution. They want to know what it is going to cost them. I wish to refer more particularly to the people of South Australia. Under the financial clauses of this Bill the Federal Parliament will have to return to each state all the money raised from that state either from customs or other duties, or from the Post-office or the other services, the management of which is taken over by the Commonwealth, less a proper proportion of the added expenses of the Commonwealth, which I understand will, in South Australia, amount to some £30,000 per annum, the population of South Australia being one-tenth of that of the Commonwealth. But South Australia is not going to lose that £30,000. I followed with very great interest the figures given by the Hon. Mr. Holder in reference to the consolidation of the public debts, and I gathered from those figures, and I believe they will be found to come out pretty right, that South Australia will gain £35,000 per annum if the scheme of federalizing the public debts is adopted; so that instead of federation costing South Australia; anything, they will be the gainers. of £5,000, that is, if the powers given in the Constitution to the Federal Government to take over the public debts of the various colonies are exercised wisely, carefully, and with discretion. And not only is that so, but surely it must be admitted by all the colonies that when the Federal Government comes into existence, and takes over so many departments, we can in each state make a large number of consequent economies. We shall not require so many Ministers of the Crown; we shall not, perhaps, require so many Members of Parliament; and we shall not, owing to the decrease of our various establishments, require to spend money in many other directions. I hope, therefore, that I shall not only be able to state, but to prove, to the people who sent me here that this federation will not only cost them nothing, but that they will actually make a pecuniary gain by entering into the Union which we so strongly advocate. I might say a great deal more, but it would be unfair for me to unduly take up the time when there are so many other honorable members who would like to offer a few remarks in the limited time at our disposal before we part. Before I sit down I have to thank the Right Hon. Sir Edward Braddon, and those who cheered him, for the very flattering remarks which he made concerning myself as Chairman of Committees. It would be unbecoming of any one who addresses this meeting to-day to refrain from expressing our grateful thanks to the Government and people of Victoria for the splendid and lavish hospitality with which they have treated us. I have had perhaps more peculiarly than any other member of the Convention been brought into contact with the clerks who have so ably and efficiently done our work. To those who are outside, the work which is done after the Convention adjourns is unknown, but it is very real and very arduous for all that. It is only fair that we should give our acknowledgment to those who have sat up night after night, doing work for the Convention, so that it might commence its deliberations next day. In that I would include the Drafting Committee, who have so arduously and so ably fulfilled their duties. Before I conclude, I would suggest a mode of procedure which, if adopted, would, it appears to me, recommend this Bill more forcibly to the people of the various colonies than any other. It is this, that each group of delegates, or as many of them as are willing to join together, should issue one manifesto to the people who sent them here. That is a course which has been followed when other constitutional conventions have finished their labours. I dare say all of you have read the address of George Washington, in which he recommended the Bill as framed by the Philadelphia Convention to the people of America. I find that the same plan was adopted in Switzerland in 1874, when some amendments were made in the Constitution. A joint address, couched in most elegant language, was then issued by the members of the convention to the people of Switzerland. It was pointed out to them that the scheme, like every other scheme, was subject to human defects—that although some might think the federal action too circumscribed, others might take the view that it went quite far enough—but that a federal edifice had been constructed in which it was hoped that the people of the various cantons might live in amity together. It was also pointed out that the Constitution contained the germs of new developments of progress and liberty, and that if the people did not adopt it they might have to wait long for the chance of obtaining anything equal to it. And I say to the people of Australia that if they do not go to the poll and vote for the Constitution which we now recommend for their acceptance a fatal blow will be struck at the cause of federation. I do not say that we must have federation now or never, but its rejection now will mean the postponement of all chances of any federal union during the life-time of most of us here present. This is the second attempt that has been made. If this Convention has not been able to frame a Constitution which the people of Australia can accept, I should like to know how such a Constitution is to be framed? It is idle for persons to say "I will have this," and "I will have that." It is only by frank conciliation, by a spirit of compromise, by the sacrifice of our personal ideas and inclinations on the altar of our country, that we can hope to become a United Australia.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria).-

Mr. President, in rising to speak to the motion which has been so ably proposed by the honorable the leader of the Convention, I have first to express my regret that the Right Hon. the Premier of Victoria is not here to respond in person. I am sure that the Convention sympathizes with him in his present position, and will remember, with a considerable amount of gratitude and good feeling, the fair, kindly, and reasonable, as well as able and assiduous, part he has taken in its deliberations. Before I sit down I shall have the pleasure of communicating to the Convention what he has commissioned me to say. I desire at the outset to join with those honorable members who have preceded me in offering a tribute of praise—and a well-earned tribute—to those who have been charged with the conduct of the business of the Convention. In you, sir, we have had a President of ability and impartiality, who has lent dignity to the position which was conferred upon him. To our honorable friend (Sir Richard Baker) a large measure of praise is most assuredly due. On his shoulders, even more than on your own, has fallen a laborious task, and one which he has discharged with a success that could only be commanded by not only impartiality, but ability and attention in every direction. Of the Drafting Committee, I desire to say, in the most unqualified manner, that they have discharged the onerous duty which has fallen to them with conspicuous ability and enormous labour. Only those who have been intrusted with official positions, and more particularly those who have filled positions of a legal nature, know the extreme difficulty and hazard there is in performing such work as has been so remarkably well performed by the Drafting Committee. Whatever may be thought of the measure which we are about to place before the people of Australia, little fault can be found with the way in which the intentions and resolutions of the Convention have been expressed in actual words. Before passing to the motion itself, I should say that I entirely indorse what has been said by Sir Richard Baker with regard to the splendid and self-sacrificing work by the clerks of the House. And I must not forget to add to that the consideration we should extend in the direction of gratitude, not only to those gentlemen, but also to the various other gentlemen connected with the House who have given their attention. I allude to the Librarian and attendants, and all concerned in the administration of the affairs of the House. Now, sir, on the motion itself I desire to say that I entirely and absolutely concur in it. I think it is not only a reasonable and advisable course to adopt, but it is an absolutely necessary one. I may say for the Government of Victoria that it is a step which would be taken by us under any circumstances; but it is indicative, and properly indicative, of the feeling of the Convention that such a resolution should be passed in order to evince our desire that the people of the country, before arriving at a conclusion which must so greatly affect their future welfare and interest, should have before them, as far as can possibly be done, the proper material upon which to exercise their judgment. It is plain, from the whole tone of my honorable friend (Mr. Barton's) speech, and also from the speeches of my honorable friends (Sir Edward Braddon and Sir Richard Baker), there is a general concurrence in the view that this matter must be approached, in the manner in which it was dealt with by the Convention—that is to say, by argument, reason, and careful consideration—and that it must be so approached not only by the Convention but also by the people whose interests are more nearly and directly involved. And we shall, by furnishing them with the measure which has now reached its completion, and, as Sir Edward Braddon properly pointed out, with such other means of gathering the intention and, so far as possible, the purport of the measure, we shall enable the people to judge of the whole question without any fear that they are misunderstanding its provisions or its probable effect, and without any fear that they are not at lib statute itself. In doing so, it was quite right to indicate how marvellously the provisions of this Bill in many respects transcend the corresponding provisions in the Bill of 1891. I do not wonder that in 1891 the Bill as then framed was not accepted, or considered acceptable by the people of the various states. In the particulars pointed out by the Hon. Mr. Barton, or, at all events, in most of these particulars, there has been considerable advance; and therefore the attention of the people is very rightly directed to the particulars in which that advance has been made. On the other hand, there are certain other particulars to which attention ought, I think, with equal propriety, to be drawn for the consideration of the people. When my honorable friend (Sir Richard Baker) said that the Senate was the pivot on which the whole Federal Constitution revolves, that was an observation deserving of the most careful attention, and one he was, in view of the provisions of the Bill, thoroughly justified in making. When he pointed out clearly some of the particulars in which the Senate is strengthened as against the House of Representatives he was doing his simple duty in calling attention to the fact. Before I sit down, I desire to add one or two particulars in which the Bill of 1898 differs from the Bill of 1891. In many respects liberalism has been granted its share of recognition. In regard to the franchise, the powers of Parliament, the mode of election to the Senate, and other matters, tremendous, though necessary, advance has been made. But there are other matters which are engaging the attention of the delegates as well as of individuals and which have been indicated in the press. These are matters which must receive consideration in order to determine how, upon the whole matter, the ultimate decision shall be cast. Now, in respect to the relative positions of the Senate and the House of Representatives in the Bill of 1891, the number of members in the House of Representatives was uncontrolled by any consideration of the number of members in the Senate.

[P.2487] starts here

Mr. HIGGINS. -

Mr. ISAACS. -

Mr. ISAACS. -

Or by the number of states. The number of members in the House of Representatives was decided by one consideration alone, namely, the necessity of population with regard to representation. When we are forming a representative Government the question of the representation of the people is undoubtedly the central question for consideration. There is, therefore, this important departure, that the representation of the people in the National House is limited in the Bill of 1898, as contrasted with the Bill of 1891, by the number of senators—that is, by the number of states. Then, with regard to the House of Representatives itself, in which the proportionate representation of the people was concerned, there is another distinct departure, to the disadvantage of what I consider the liberal principle of the representation of people according to the needs of population. In the Bill of 1891 there was to be one member for every 30,000 of the population, and there was a minimum of four representatives.
In 1891, if the Constitution then framed had gone into operation, Victoria would have had 40 members, roughly speaking, and Tasmania four members. That is to say, according to the population, granting a minimum to Tasmania, her representation would have been one-tenth of that of Victoria. In the Bill of 1898, the representation of Victoria is 24, the representation of Tasmania being raised to a minimum of five, or more than one-fifth. In that respect also, it will be seen, a large concession has been made to the smaller states. It is also a very important consideration, as Sir Richard Baker has reminded us this morning, that responsible government may be most materially affected, if not altered, by the fact that the final determination of these matters will be left to the operation of a joint sitting. As Sir Richard Baker said, the Senate will receive in all probability a much larger share of the control over the Executive than has hitherto been afforded in any bi-cameral system. So we have to look at these considerations as well as the other considerations which have been presented to us. In another way we have to recollect that the Bill of 1891 seemed to recognise in a larger manner than the present Bill the effect of the British Constitution by allowing the ordinary provision for the dissolution of one House. The question might arise whether, as in England, where there is an immovable Upper Chamber and a Lower Chamber amenable to the will of the people by dissolution, that would not have had the effect, not only of keeping responsible government more in the British track, but also of compelling to a larger extent than is contemplated under this Bill the recognition in the last resort of the will of the majority. These are only some of the matters in which distinction is made. My honorable friend (Mr. Barton) has referred to railways and to bounties. In regard to bounties, my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) will forgive me if I say that I do not agree with him that the criticism that has appeared—I cannot say where—was unjust. I think my honorable friend will admit that by reason of the amendment made only yesterday the position in regard to bounties may be very materially altered.

Mr. BARTON. -

It makes clear what was the real meaning of the Bill before.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Well, I may be wrong, but, to my mind, the change of verbiage may make a most material difference in effect. I have not had time properly to consider it, but it may make all the difference.

Mr. HIGGINS. -

What is the change?

Mr. ISAACS. -

The change is, instead of saying that nothing in the section shall have a certain effect, it is provided that, "notwithstanding anything in this Constitution" a certain effect may follow in regard to bounties. These words have such an enormously-increased importance that they may take away very much of the objection, or, at all events, mitigate much of the objection, that I, in common with other delegates in Victoria, felt on the question. For myself, I think that the criticism referred to might be perfectly justified upon the words that previously stood, but that may now have been to a large extent met if not cured. I refer to this now, but reserve for future consideration, if need be, the full effect of the words inserted yesterday. In regard to the railways, I feel considerable hesitation. I should have preferred not to advert to the matter at all, but, as my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) has dealt with the subject, I will say that I consider the clause last mentioned by him, namely, clause 103, has, in my judgment, a much wider and more serious import than my honorable friend appears to consider. The 101st clause has been referred to as Sir George Turner's clause. Only the first portion of it, less than half, is Sir George Turner's. That portion gives to the Parliament the power, if it were not otherwise limited, of holding a fair and even though paramount hand over any cutting rates, over any preferences or discriminations, that might be made on the railways of one state as against another state. It provides, subject to the qualifications which follow, and which are not Sir George Turner's, that the Parliament in its wisdom may exercise this beneficial control by forbidding any preference or discrimination which is undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any state. That was the extent to which we desired to go. That was the extent to which we believed the Convention ought to go, while leaving the control of the railways and their management to each individual state. I should have infinitely preferred a provision to federalize the railways. It would leave the power in the Federal Parliament to say to any state that was doing anything undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any other state-

You shall not continue that course of conduct." Then, however, there are limitations inserted which cut down the power of Parliament, and the last sentence provides, in effect, that Parliament shall have no such power of interference, whatever it may think of the injustice or the unreasonableness of a rate, unless the Inter-State Commission shall first adjudge such rate to be undue, or unreasonable, or unjust to any state. That is a somewhat cumbersome form in which to deal with the question, but ultimate justice could be reached and probably would be reached by that method.

Mr. BARTON. -

As the matter stood, before the Drafting Committee gave expression to this clause, it was open to an interpretation which would have been, I think, very much more against the views the honorable member holds.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am not complaining of the drafting.

Mr. BARTON. -

I am not setting up the drafting, but I thought it was open to a dangerous interpretation.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am going to speak of the effect of clause 103, which, I think, places the matter in a very serious condition. I do not wish to say one word stronger than I am obliged to say, because it will be a matter for further consideration. This clause has been referred to as well as others, and I have tried to express my opinion as lightly as I could. Clause 103 again cuts down the power of the Parliament, and, what is more, the power of the Inter-State Commission. It provides, in effect, that certain rates, no matter how unjust to any other state, no matter how undue or unreasonable it may be, shall be out of the power of the Inter-State Commission, out of the power of the Parliament, out of the power of the High Court, to prohibit it. But, unfortunately, these rates that are so protected cannot be rates that can be created in Victoria, and they can be rates that can be created in New South Wales. That is where I feel such difficulty—that is where I feel the injustice—because these two conditions are, that if the trade is deemed by the Inter-State Commission to be necessary for the development of the territory of the state—that is, the state which makes the rate—and if the rate applies equally to goods within the state, and passing into the state from other states, then nothing in this Constitution shall render the rate unlawful. In other words, if two rates exist, one adopted by New South Wales from Riverina to Sydney, and one adopted by Victoria from, say, Wodonga to Melbourne, each undue and unreasonable, and unjust to the other state, the Victorian rate can be prohibited, because it cannot be said to be for the development of the territory of Victoria. It may be for the development of Riverina, but certainly it does not extend to Victoria, because the goods pass into Victoria from the other state. But, on the other hand, the corresponding cutting rate in New South Wales might comply with the conditions in the Bill, because they may say it is necessary for the development of their territory-Riverina-and applies to all goods wherever they come from, whether Victoria or New South Wales.

Mr. BARTON. -

The goods which come from other colonies would still be assisted in the direction of intercolonial free-trade by being charged under the larger rate.

Mr. ISAACS. -

No, it is not the larger rate, it is the smaller rate.

Mr. BARTON. -

I do not suppose the rate can be either larger or smaller.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I quite agree that if we charge the larger rate, or if New South Wales charges the larger rate, the trade and commerce clause would prevent that.

Mr. BARTON. -

We do charge a larger rate on goods coming from Victoria.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I think the larger rate could be prevented under the trade and commerce clause. I am speaking of the operation of these clauses, and that is where I feel the injustice. I would not have referred to any of these matters, but they have been referred to by other honorable members, and there might be a misunderstanding.

Mr. FRASER. -

The higher rate now charged from Junee, or the stations in that direction, to Wodonga can be prevented under these clauses.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Not under these clauses.

Mr. FRASER. -

Yes.

Mr. ISAACS. -

That is not correct.

Mr. FRASER. -

Yes, with regard to an unduly high rate.

Mr. ISAACS. -

I am sure Mr. Barton would not agree with that view.

Mr. BARTON. -

It would apply to any inequality on goods destined for Victoria and goods destined for New South Wales.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes, but it does not touch the particular point I am dealing with. I wish to say, in connexion with the railways, because they trouble me very much, that we shall get the very best and most impartial information we can. We will deal with this matter, as we intend to deal with every other matter which troubles us, in the fairest and most impartial manner, and I think it is due to the people whom we represent that that course should be adopted. Now that I have dealt with these subjects as lightly as I possibly could, I want to say a word in regard to other matters, such as the absence of certain provisions which we sought to insert, in regard, for instance, to the referendum. Believe me, sir, that no feeling whatever, no personal feeling, can ever prompt us to refuse assent or to colour advice because any proposal that we had suggested has not been adopted. This is too high and majestic a matter for any such feeling to enter into the question. It is beyond all personal feelings. It is even beyond local feelings so long as a fair measure of justice is preserved. Therefore, I am sure we shall be believed when we say, and I speak for more than myself, that no element, however slight, of personal consideration could for an instant be permitted to enter into the determination of this question. But with regard to the referendum, undoubtedly we regret extremely that some such provision has not been inserted. I regret that it should have been referred to to-day as a poison. I am not going to repeat arguments previously addressed to the Convention. I feel this is not a time to do so, but may I be permitted to read half-a-dozen lines which, I think, are worthy of attention, since my honorable friend not unfairly has given his opinion with regard to this great question? It is a matter which I hope, when we come to consider the whole Constitution, will be open for the consideration of the people of the future Commonwealth. The quotation I refer to is in the book to which my honorable friend (Sir Richard Baker) alluded. I do not think he named the book, but he gave a reference from it. It is by Charles Borgeaud, and is called Adoption and Amendment of Constitutions. It is a remarkably fine work. In dealing with the whole question of the referendum he says-

The Swiss peasant, journeying to the next village in his Sunday garb to deposit his "Yes" or "No" in the urn at the school-house, would shake his head incredulously if told that his act may have an interest for men outside of his own country, living far away beyond the mountains. Yet such is the case. The old historic nations are marching, one after the other, or are preparing to march, toward democracy, like the columns of an army, slowly advancing into an unknown country. This peasant is a scout of the advance guard of this army.

I believe those words are eloquently and absolutely true, but still, although I have fought to the best of my humble ability to secure the insertion of some provision that would be a step in that march, it has not met with the approval of the Convention. It is true, as was pointed out in the columns of a leading journal, that there is no cause for despair, because three colonies showed by the presence in the minority of their Premiers and two Ministers, besides other gentlemen of known ability, ex-Ministers amongst them, that they approved of the principle; and we must also recollect that amongst the majority on the other side there were ten of our honorable friends who have not been elected directly by the people to this Convention. But, however it may be, I do not desire for an instant to enter into the merits of the controversy. The time is past for that, but I think the observations of my honorable friend might not be unfairly added to by the words I have just uttered. The Bill is before us. I said I had a message from Sir George Turner, and, as the lawyers say, for greater certainty I will read a portion of his note to me of a few days ago, which embodies the words I desire to communicate. And I wish to say that they entirely accord with the views that I hold and have sought elsewhere to express. Sir George Turner writes-

I am not altogether satisfied with the Bill; but I intend, after the lapse of a fortnight, to carefully consider the whole question, and if I can possibly do so with justice to Victoria, I will recommend the people to accept the Constitution.

Now, sir, that is the attitude which, I think, is the right attitude-

Sir JOHN DOWNER. -

For everybody.

Mr. ISAACS. -

Yes; I think that is the right attitude for everybody to assume. We have now done our best, according to our respective lights, to obtain the insertion, or to prevent the insertion, in this Constitution of certain provisions. I am sure that the whole Convention have striven with the utmost friendliness, I am glad to say, right through the Convention, with the utmost harmony-for I disregard altogether some insignificant little passages which have no permanency in the minds of honorable members or in any other way-I say that with the utmost harmony and good feeling on the part of the representatives of every state to the representatives of every other state, we have sought, to the best of our ability, and without sparing ourselves in any shape or form, to frame a Constitution in accordance with the mandate that sent us here. Now, sir, it behoves us, therefore, in the manner plainly indicated by the motion to which I have the honour to address myself, and which I cordially support, that we shall take every means of enabling the people of our respective countries to familiarize themselves with the contents of this Bill and with its effect. And also, we should do this: We should endeavour, calmly and quietly ourselves, to obtain in our own minds as correct a picture of what the future of the Commonwealth will be under this Bill as we possibly can.

Mr. Barton. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. Isaacs. -

I am glad to hear that approving cheer of my honorable friend. I am sure we are as one on the subject, because no man-I venture to say it for myself, and I believe I may say it for others-no man, however he has laboured in this Convention, however he has given his mind to the great questions that have presented themselves from time to time, can be sure that he appreciates, in their relative importance, the effect of the various provisions of the measure that we have framed. There is no doubt that it is a serious responsibility each one of us has to take, and we must recollect that the responsibility is not for ourselves alone, nor even for those who surround us at the present moment. We are speaking, when we do speak here, not to this Chamber, not to the people who are outside merely, but we are also speaking for and to future generations, and, therefore, we should approach the matter, as it seems to me, with calmness, with consideration, with sobriety, and with solemnity, and we should make sure, as far as it is possible to make sure, that the resolve we ultimately form, and the advice we ultimately give, will be unattended, in any event, and under any consequences, with any degree of reproach. This Bill, if accepted, will lead us, to a large extent, upon an unknown track. Is it too much to ask that we shall endeavour to throw all possible light upon the yet untrodden path we are about to traverse? Is it too much to ask that the light that we seek to get in this great enterprise shall not be a mere momentary flashlight, gaudily coloured, it may be, but shall, so far as we can secure it, be the purer and clearer search-light of our intelligence and calmer judgment. We may do all this without any undue consumption of time. We may do it, and we shall do it with the highest satisfaction to our consciences, and to those whom we ultimately have to address; and I therefore think that, remembering the enormous burden that there is upon our shoulders, remembering the magnitude of the task that lies before us, no less great, no less important, than the task which we have just accomplished, we are compelled to move soberly and calmly if we are to do our duty as we are expected to do it. That is the least that can be expected from every member of the Convention, more particularly, it seems to me, from those members who happen to occupy positions of responsibility in their respective colonies; and feeling that, and being in absolute accord, I am proud to say, with the right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government of which I have the honour to be a member, it is our intention to carry out the spirit of this resolution now proposed by affording the people every means, so far as we can - every fair and legitimate and reasonable means - of coming to a just conclusion upon the merits of this great matter. I believe, sir, there is not a member of this Convention who is not urgently desirous of achieving federation. For myself, I say there is no dearer hope of my heart than to see a Federated Australia; and, in the ultimate result, while approaching this matter with an unshakable determination to do my duty to the people who sent me here, as well as to myself, I do earnestly trust we may find, after all the investigation and care we shall have given to the matter, that our duty is so irrevocably linked with our desire, that we may be able to offer our strongest advice to the people of Victoria to accept this Constitution.

[The President left the chair at fifty-one minutes after twelve o'clock p.m. The House resumed at five minutes past two o'clock p.m.]

Mr. HOLDER (South Australia). -

As while you, sir, are in the chair I am the senior representative of South Australia upon the floor of this chamber, it is to be expected that I should say a few words upon the present occasion. I do not want what I have to say to be taken as purely formal and official, because the words that I shall utter will express the earnest convictions to which I have come; and especially in regard to the matters about which I shall speak first, I desire that there shall be an utter absence of anything merely formal and official. I want, first of all, to express, on behalf of the South Australian representation, to the colony of Victoria, and to the Ministry of this great colony, our very sincere thanks for the boundless hospitality and kindness which has been shown to us ever since we came to Melbourne. We were most hospitably treated in Sydney; we have been equally welcomed here. In each city there appears to have been the desire to outdo the other in this respect. But that has been impossible.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We have only tried to reciprocate your kindness to us while we were in Adelaide.

Mr. HOLDER. -

I hope that the time which was spent in Adelaide was as pleasant to the visiting representatives as the time which we have spent under the care and hospitality of the Government of Victoria has been to us. I think that a word is due to those who have laboured, not merely to make our stay pleasant, but to assist us in accomplishing that which we have had in view. Speaking for myself, I consider that the reporting of our debates has been remarkably good. There has hardly been the need of even trifling verbal alterations, and the way in which the speeches have been reported, transcribed, and committed to print has left nothing to be desired. I am quite sure that in the permanent record of our proceedings we have a document entirely worthy of the purpose we have in view. By the other officers of the House—the attendants and others—nothing has been shown us but kindness, courtesy, and attention at every turn, and I am doing no less than ought to be done in bearing this testimony to the value of their services. From them I pass to the officers of the House who have been directly concerned with the business of the Convention. Both the Clerk and the Assistant Clerk unceasingly, both in the chamber and outside in their spare time, have devoted no small amount of attention, care, and skill to the performance of their work. Then I come to those who have guided our deliberations to a very large extent—the members of the Drafting Committee. To our leader, the honorable and learned member (Mr. Barton), we owe a debt that we can never repay. I am sure that it is hopeless to talk about any recompense to that gentleman short of that which he has set his heart upon—the recompense of seeing his work crowned by the ultimate acceptance of the Constitution by the people of Australia. I hope for his sake, as for the sake of all of us, that this result will accrue, and that he will be rewarded in this way for the time he has given to the Bill both during the sittings and upon other occasions. To him and to the other members of the Drafting Committee we owe a large debt of gratitude. Of the work of the Chairman of Committees I also wish to say a word or two. Though that gentleman is one of my colleagues in the representation of South Australia, I may perhaps be allowed to say that his work has been of the utmost assistance to us. In the chair he has never for a moment lost the thread of orderly debate. He has kept us to our work, has seen us through very many difficulties, has helped us over several stiles where we might otherwise have come to grief, and has earned the approval of every member of the Convention as being a most capable Chairman. I thoroughly agree with the view expressed by the honorable and learned member (Mr. Isaacs) and others as to the dignity and ability with which you, Mr. President, have discharged your duties. Now, a word or two upon the Bill itself. I want to make a remark upon a point which was overlooked by our leader in the able speech delivered by him this morning, and that is as to the more frequent insertion than ever of words in many of the clauses providing that the enactments therein contained shall be "until the Parliament otherwise provides." That is a very important matter. Had those words not appeared so often as they do, the Constitution would have been somewhat of a cast-iron, or, to use another expression which we have heard, of a hide-bound character. How frequently these words appear only those who have gone carefully through the Bill will understand; but where they appear it means that freedom has been left and scope allowed for the growth and development of the public feeling and sentiment of the people of these colonies. These words mean that our Constitution is not a hide-bound one, and is not incapable of expansion to meet the increasing demands likely to be made by the people from time to time. Alterations of the Constitution will, doubtless, become necessary as time goes on; but I think that the measure, as framed, is of such a character as to postpone to the furthest date the necessity for any considerable alteration. That is largely because of the frequent insertion of the words to which I have referred, giving power to the Federal Parliament to alter conditions from time to time, and to expand provisions which might otherwise have been found somewhat irksome. I do not propose to enter at very great length upon a discussion of the details of the Bill, but there are two or three matters to which I wish to refer very shortly. First, so far as its financial provisions are concerned, I do not think it would have been possible for us, without the gift of prophecy, which we do not pretend to possess, to have laid down much more definitely than we have the exact method in which a surplus, the dimensions of which we cannot measure, should be distributed between the various states. We have adopted a plan which I never liked very well, and from which I should at the present moment like to escape if I saw any escape, but a plan which is eminently just and fair. We provide for the ascertainment as regularly and definitely as possible of the contributions from each state, and then for the due return—under the amendment carried by the right honorable member (Sir Edward Braddon)—of a fixed proportion to the states concerned. I think that that is a provision against which no serious argument can be brought. During the five years through which this provision must prevail the Parliament of the Federation will gain experience, and in the light of that experience will be able to deal further with the matter as time goes on. We have also provided for elasticity in dealing with the finances. One of the most important questions which will have to be faced is that connected with the debts, and I associate with it a matter which must be associated with it—the control of the railways. These are subjects which have so much in common that one can hardly be considered without the other. I am very glad that a provision which would have had the effect of placing the federal guarantee behind the separate state loans without any adequate compensation has been left out of the Constitution. That that federal guarantee will be given in the early future I fully believe, but it ought not to be given in this Constitution. We have provided that the debts of the colonies may be taken over by the federal authorities at, I take it, the earliest possible moment, which means, so soon as agreements can be arrived at between the central authority and the states, and so soon as a fitting business arrangement can be come to with those who hold the bonds and stocks of the colonies today. To take over the debts of the colonies before would be mischievous, but when these arrangements have been come to, the principal and interest of the state debts will be made a federal charge, proper debits, of course, being made to the various, states concerned. I have been looking since I was speaking a few days since at the rates at which Canada has been able to borrow money, and I find that the Dominion is able to obtain money in the London market on much more favorable terms than any colony of this group. I see no reason why that should be, except that the Dominion of Canada is a Federation, which is able to offer the security not of one state, but of all the states jointly and severally; and when we are in a similar position, standing before the financial world as a Federated Australia, and able to give such security, I have not the slightest doubt that we shall be able to obtain terms as favorable as those which are now obtained by the Canadian Dominion. Then again, there will be the possibility of inducing the investment of British trust funds in Australian stock; and I can conceive of no argument so strong for inducing the British Government to allow the holders of trust funds to invest them in Australian stock, as the argument which would be available to the Federal Treasurer having all the Federation securities at his back. I confidently believe that federation will be speedily followed by the adoption of the provision to which I refer. The railways we have provided for under the Constitution, and provided for, again, in the wisest possible manner. Had it been set out that the railways were to be taken over by virtue of the coming into being of the Commonwealth, we should have aroused fresh antagonism. There are enough antagonisms against this Bill already, and it would have been a misfortune to have aroused others.

Certainly others would have been added had we provided for the compulsory taking over of the railways by the Federation. We have, however, provided simply that the railways may be taken over by agreement between the Commonwealth and the states on terms to be agreed upon, and this provision will enable the complete federalization of the railways to be brought about. I have listened with attention and interest to the remarks of the Attorney-General of Victoria (Mr. Isaacs) upon the railway question, and my remark upon his observations is this: If the difficulty prove as serious as he imagines, it will be the strongest possible argument to commend the Bill to the Victorian people, seeing that the provisions of the Constitution relating to the railways provide for the possibility of their complete federalization. I think the answer to the objection raised is this—that we have provided in regard to railways that they may be dealt with in the best possible way and at the earliest possible moment, so as to prevent antagonisms and not create them, and so as to help on and not stand in the way of the realization of the federal idea. With regard to constitutional issues, there are a few remarks which I should like to make. Of course, the Bill is not perfect. No human work is perfect. But the question is not whether the measure is perfect. We could have answered that question in the beginning, because we knew in advance that we could never make a perfect Bill. We know that it could never have been perfect by any possible contingency. But we may claim that it is sufficiently perfect for a free and self-reliant people to live under its rule with their freedom undiminished; and my answer to those who ask whether the Bill is acceptable in this light is this: When we met in this Convention we entered upon a task in which we realized we should be untrue to the trust reposed in us if we had not dealt with the matters which came before us with the sense of responsibility resting upon every one of us that we were dealing with matters on behalf of independent and self-reliant states. And we have dealt with those matters on which the interests of the states clashed, we have harmonized the interests of the several states where they differed, and we have provided a Constitution sufficient to provide for the fullest and the most self-reliant government of a free people. We have created an instrument of partnership between us which, I believe, while it secures the independence of the several states, will provide for the joint control of certain matters, at the same time as it also leaves free and complete self-government on all matters not committed to the central authority. And this, it seems to me, is what we should have done—to provide that national questions should be federalized, and that local questions should be left to local self-government. And it is this, it seems to me, that we have done; and thus we have done what we ought to have done and what our constituents expected of us. We have framed a Constitution of such a character that I have no hesitation in asserting that under it class privileges have no place, and sectional representation disappears. The Senate, as we have provided for it, is not a Senate elected as the Upper Houses of our various states are elected now, but as "broad based upon the people's will" as is the House of Representatives itself. The suffrage, to begin with, will not be quite uniform. We shall, in South Australia, have the lead to some extent at the beginning, but I believe that the other colonies will speedily come into line with us. But at least this is sure, that manhood suffrage will be the basis of the franchise of the Constitution, and, with that as the foundation principle of the Commonwealth, I do not see how the Constitution can be described as being other than a popular Constitution. Then we have provided a method for dealing with any disputes that may arise between the two Houses. We provide that both Houses shall, in case they cannot agree, go back to their constituents and get fresh instructions. So that here also we still keep the same fundamental idea in view, that the people are those whose determination shall settle any question, great or small, that may come up for settlement. We have further provided for the referendum, concerning which my honorable and learned friend (the Attorney-General of Victoria) feels so strongly. We have engrafted the principle of the referendum upon this Constitution, by providing that no alteration of the Constitution—no expansion or limitation of its provisions—can be made unless the people are consulted and given the decision of the question. This being so, it seems to me that any description of this Constitution as being anything less than the most liberal, the most popular, of Constitutions would be a misdescription, and not a true description of its characteristics. I do not believe, either, that our efforts at reform will cease by the adoption for the Federation of an equal franchise for both Houses, as laid down in this Bill. It seems to me to be impossible to believe that, if we enact such provisions with regard to the Senate of the Commonwealth, the restrictive franchises for the Upper Houses in our various states can much longer continue. It seems to me that the influence of the federal franchise for both Houses must be in the direction of bringing about a reform in the constitution of the Upper Houses as we have hitherto known them in Australia; and thus, in the early future, I believe we shall possess, not only for federal purposes but for state purposes, Constitutions which, while abolishing all class privileges, will confer upon the citizens as a whole those equal rights in respect to the government of their country which we desire the people to enjoy, and which they demand at our hands. I do not propose to detain the Convention by pointing out at any length the advantages that will arise from the adoption of this Constitution. I believe that there will be advantages to the traders, advantages to the producers, advantages to the consumers of all classes of the community, advantages to those who work with their hands and to those who work with their brains; and without occupying time in detailing all the advantages that will arise, I will say that I can conceive of no class which will not benefit from the incoming of this federation which we are striving to bring about. I can conceive only that the mere partisan, the person who is more governed by his prejudices than by arguments and by calm judgment—these, and these only, can bring forward what they may conceive to be arguments against the adoption of this federation scheme. I know that there has been in reference to our proceedings today some sense of parting; there has been a feeling of having come to the end of our labours. But, sir, I shall express the hope that we are not viewing the setting of the sun and the end of day when we contemplate the conclusion of the laborers we have all participated in; but that we are looking at the oncoming dawn, in which these colonies shall witness the termination of their period of isolation, so that this great Australia may stand before the world as one whole, taking her true position amongst the nations of the world; and that after that dawn shall come the rising of the sun in all its brightness, upon that day of federation towards whose oncoming our labours have been devoted.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

May I be permitted, without repetition, to echo and indorse the acknowledgments that have been made to you, sir, for the distinction with which you have presided over this Convention; to Sir Richard Baker for the masterly manner in which he has controlled the very prolonged proceedings in committee, and for the marvellous skill with which he has been able to simplify our work; to the Drafting Committee for having produced a work which will be their best monument; especially to our leader, for the labours by which he has placed us all under a heavy debt of obligation to him, which labours have ended in his extremely concise and lucid exposition of this Bill; and, also, to the Clerk of this Convention and his assistants in all the colonies, to whom we owe so much that is not apparent upon the face of the printed reports of our debates. Then, sir, if I rise, it is not for the purpose of adding to the detailed criticism of this measure, but, so far as I can, to view it in its most practical aspect, especially in the light of recent criticism. Speaking today, one is taking advantage of the arrangements which have been made for the reporting of our proceedings in Hansard; and this is probably a suitable place, especially for one who imposes so great a task upon reporters, to speak in the warmest terms of the work, admirably performed under all difficulties, of those who have accomplished the transformation of our utterances into the Hansard reports.

HONORABLE MEMBERS. -

Hear, hear.

Mr. DEAKIN. -
The first criticism to which I desire to offer a word of reply is that which minimizes the issue about to be placed before the several colonies by the assertion that in any case its negation simply means postponing an achievement of whose ultimate accomplishment there can be no doubt, and that such a postponement need be but for a very short period. That is certainly an extremely optimistic view of the situation. The federal movement is almost as old as the colonies, and this particular form of it, which has now reached its climax, is five years old. It had its inception in the Corowa Conference of 1893, and was not officially adopted by the Premiers in January, 1895. It was considered at the Bathurst Conference in November, 1896, and its ultimate result was the creation of this Convention, which commenced its sittings in March of last year. These sittings had to be terminated at an incomplete stage, and quite unexpectedly, because of the demands made by other duties upon many of the representatives. We adjourned to Sydney, where we believed that our task would be finished; but again local demands made their urgency manifest, and a second unexpected adjournment took place. There have been proposals that even this last and most prolonged session of all should be adjourned for a still further period, in order to afford time for the accomplishment of our task. If we recall the five years which have been spent in getting the Convention together, and the difficulty that has been felt in keeping it together, even when it has been elected by the people solely for this purpose, we shall be better able to realize the task that will lie before us if, most unhappily, this effort after federation should fail. All this work will practically have to be done again, and although we may fairly claim that public opinion has been ripened and public judgment matured by the discipline and education through which we have passed during the last five years, it is certain that in the future local emergencies and political urgencies will be no less keen than they have been in the past. They kept us waiting for years before the Convention could assemble, they twice disturbed its onward progress, and they may easily be of such a nature as to postpone the success of any future effort for an even longer period. Consequently, those who would have us set aside our work at its present stage, as if it could be resumed at any time, are presuming beyond and in the face of our experience. Then it is perfectly true that, even if this effort should fail, the federal spirit is not likely to die. It never can pass away until it has accomplished the object we have in view. To judge by official statements, it may well be that if this great effort fails we shall have the work removed to a lower plane, and the solution sought in a weaker, a poorer, and a confessedly transient form of federation. We shall be asked, instead of achieving a true federal union, to be pacified for some years with a partial federation, which must break down sooner or later, to the great prejudice of all concerned, as did the preliminary and utterly unsatisfactory union of the American colonies before they entered on their full federal career. We hear, and have a right to hear and to attend to, the warnings with which we are favoured as to the dangers of union, but are entitled to reply by asking that the account should be balanced by some estimate of the dangers of disunion. Disunited we are, and, should this effort fail, for many years disunited we must remain. The perils which are thus involved, not only from without, but from the growth of warring forces within, should be taken into consideration at the same time as the risks of union are carefully measured. To the demand for the fullest and most careful criticism of this Bill, no honorable member can have an objection to urge, and I, for one, welcome the calm and studious examination of it from both sides by my honorable colleague the Attorney-General of Victoria this morning. Not one comment of his should be put aside until it has been answered by calm reason and a recollection of proved facts. The task of criticism has been rendered more easy to those outside the Convention by the necessities of the procedure to which we have recently been submitted. It has been our duty on the floor of this chamber to ignore the glowing colours in which we might have painted the merits of the scheme we are debating and the advantages that are to flow from it. These have been tacitly assumed, while voice has been given to every possible criticism and every possible forecast of danger which the keenest and most sensitive imagination could conjure up. The consequence is that the record of our proceedings is a record of the search for all possible faults which could be found, or, under any set of circumstances, thought likely to occur. For the purpose of perfecting the drafting, language has had to be strained to the breaking point, and beyond it, in order that every possible application of every phrase under the most exceptional and remarkable conditions might be made clear before it was finally adopted. We have been examining therefore the abnormal and not the normal developments of the Constitution. We have been seeking for and exposing its defects, and not its merits. The task that begins for all of us to-day is to exactly reverse our procedure. Now that the Bill has been finally adopted we must remit its defects to their true place, so that they may be seen in their true perspective, while bringing before public attention once more the overwhelming merits of the Constitution that we have at last succeeded in shaping. While we have been, and rightly, keeping before us at all times the ideal Constitution which we hoped to create, we have had to remember that even ideals differ, and are often in absolute conflict. Our task has not been to realize an ideal common to us all, but to realize ideals which embody, as Sir Richard Baker has shown, at all events, three distinct lines of thought, seeking to express themselves in three largely differing forms.
We have had conflicting ideals, and not a little of our difficulty has been in grafting one upon another so as to produce a whole which, without being too complex, should sufficiently embrace the general ideal of the whole Convention and its differing sections. We recognise at the outset, and it cannot be too often repeated, trite as the phrase is, that perfection of any kind is impossible to us. We do well to aim at it, but we surely act unwisely if we demand absolute faultlessness in our Constitution, and refuse to accept anything that comes short of it.

It has been said that we may marry in haste and repent at leisure, but we may also refuse in haste and repent at leisure, none the less bitterly. If either sex insisted upon absolute perfection, there would be no marriages either in haste or leisure. Moreover, it is not the acceptance of a new obligation that alone involves risk. There is the risk of accepting a low ideal. The minor and the smaller success that belongs to a shrunken and narrow federation can never be contrasted with the effort after a greater and nobler union, even if that be attended by some measure of failure.
Perfection is unattainable in any sphere. Even our national emblem—the Southern Cross—is not perfect, nor perfectly proportioned, nor equal in all its members, and yet it shines supreme in queenly brilliancy above all its sister constellations of the southern skies. Though we remember the ideal, we shall surely not ignore the possible nor forget the actual. It is from the stand-point of the actual that we must regard the Constitution which is placed before Australia to-day, and I think we need not fear the result. Is the actual condition of Australia's politics and policies ideal? Do we run no risks as separate communities? Are we faced by no dangers, financial or otherwise? Why are we here, if not in obedience to a demand, widespread and born of a universal recognition of the fact that the condition of the colonies to-day is not one with which the people of the colonies are or ought to be satisfied? When our critics urge that we should show the merits and advantages of this Constitution, we must begin by deducting the demerits and the disadvantages under which we now labour, and from which this Constitution offers us an escape. If our present Constitutions were ideally satisfactory we should not be seeking a Federation. Of necessity in framing a Constitution, we must, taking the largest view of the situation, allow for what we are avoiding as well as reckon what we are hoping to gain. I do not propose to say much in regard to what may be termed the purely political aspects of this measure, except to question the applicability of Sir Richard Baker's metaphor that the Federal Senate is to be the pivot of the Constitution. It appears to me that the responsible government which we are inaugurating will be the pivot of the Constitution, and the support of that pivot will necessarily lie in the National House. This is not urged in depreciation of the force of the argument, which Sir Richard Baker employed. The great growth in dignity, importance, and power of the Federal Senate as compared with our own Upper Chambers is indisputable. In that respect, I heartily indorse his reading of the Constitution. It is the fact that the Federal Senate is to be brought into closer touch with the manhood, in some colonies with the manhood and womanhood, that is, with the citizens of the whole of Australia, that will give it power, strength, and prestige. The provisions which some of us supported, though they appeared to the advocates of Senate control to be fatal to their aspirations, were not inserted in the Bill with the object of rendering one Federal Chamber subservient to the other. They were made with the simple and direct object of bringing both Chambers into touch with their constituents and allowing their constituents to determine their differences, instead of involving them in party and internecine warfare, prejudicial to the transaction of public business, and injurious to the common weal. Sir Richard Baker's view, indorsed though it has been by the Hon. Mr. Isaacs, appears to me to need great qualification. It needs the qualification that in this Constitution more than in any other Federal Constitution in the world, and as much as if not more than in any unitary Constitution in the world, both Chambers are brought into direct relation with their constituents and their constituencies, especially on matters of difference. It is from this close and intimate relation that those who think with me foresee the best prospects for harmony-foresee the best prospects for the working of the legislative machinery-foresee the best prospect of general agreement, both Chambers devoting themselves sincerely to the interpretation and execution of the mature and deliberate will of the public. It has been said that one respect in which we have relaxed from the Bill of 1891 is in the limitation upon the number of members of the representative Chamber. And so far I agree with that position. At the same time, it cannot be ignored, and might have been mentioned, that some limitation of the numbers is essential if the provision for the joint sitting is to have any meaning whatever. That sitting has considerable value. If the joint sitting is ever to allow fair consideration to those representatives of the people of the several states who sit in the Senate chamber, there must be some fixed proportion between them. If the old proviso of one member to 30,000 had remained, in the course of a few years we should have seen the Senate asked to unite in a joint sitting with a House three or four times its strength. Under these circumstances, what meaning would a joint sitting have had? What significance would have attached to it? What solution would it have afforded of any difficulty in which the states were concerned?

Mr. BARTON. -

The three-fifths condition would have been useless.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Any fractional condition would have been useless under the circumstances.

Mr. SYMON. -

The Senate would have been a perfect delusion.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

The result would be government by a single Chamber, and that, speaking for myself, is what appears to be an entirely unsuitable and inappropriate federal ideal. If we recognise that there must be some limit (although this limit is put in a hard-and-fast manner, which appears to me unnecessary) we must admit that by this three-fifths provision we have come as close to the acceptance of the referendum as is possible to go without altogether departing from the principles on which responsible government has been worked in the past, and on which responsible government is being worked in the present. The double dissolution means an appeal to the whole people in the same way as the referendum, except that instead of being governed by a count of the states and the people as a whole, the states return their senators and the people of the Commonwealth their representatives. The two acting together will, in nineteen cases out of twenty, decide as the referendum would have decided. The only difference is that there must be a majority of voters in its favour sufficient to obtain a three-fifths majority in the two Houses. That means not much more than the simple majority of voters which, under the ordinary referendum, would have attained the same end. Consequently, we may say that in nineteen cases out of twenty the joint sitting with the three-fifths principle would provide for the settlement of questions just as the referendum would have settled them, while preserving the representative character of our institutions. It appears to me that, as every Executive which challenges this double dissolution must take its life in its hands, and imperil the seats of all its followers, you may rarely see the provision brought into actual operation. From my experience of colonial Governments and their supporters, a burning ardour for dissolution scarcely arises once in three years. When the election does come it is welcomed by no one with satisfaction except those who think they see a chance of turning their minority into a majority. That being the case, those in a majority-the Executive, which has the choice—would take care they do not give the minority an opportunity if they can prevent it. It is a very gratifying thing to be able to dissolve an obstructive Senate, but to have to stake your seats on your success is very awkward. That is the security of the double dissolution. Under these circumstances it appears to be little more than the referendum, with a penalty attached to its misuse. One danger which even those who advocated the referendum for local affairs have recognised is that the referendum might be too readily, too frequently, and unnecessarily resorted to, and that, consequently, responsible government, with the authority and sense of duty of the representatives, might be impaired. Even if we think this danger is overbalanced by other considerations, we must all recognise that, at all events, there is such a risk. Under this Bill we have practically a referendum to the whole people, with the important qualification that before the Executive resort to it by means of the double dissolution they have to prove their belief in the importance of their cause, and their confidence that the country indorses their view, by staking all they politically possess on the hazard. That, I think, is a very important preliminary. Speaking of the political provisions of the Bill, it appears to me that they may be fairly said, not only to mark a great advance on the Constitution of 1891, but to be vastly more liberal than any of the Constitutions under which we at present live. Not one of the Constitutions under which we live provides a more liberal franchise, or applies it to both Chambers under the restriction of one man one vote. No Federal Constitution in the world provides the safeguard of a double dissolution and a joint sitting. Although the Norwegian Constitution approaches the Constitution we have framed in character, there is no Federal Constitution in the world so liberal. We must remember that this Federal Constitution is to be built up out of two quarries. The first quarry is the existing powers of the local Parliaments, which are called upon to make certain surrenders. By these surrenders, liberal electors will observe that we are taking powers in every case from a less liberal Constitution, and referring them to a more liberal Constitution. Every existing Constitution in Australia is less liberal from a political point of view in its framework and machinery than the Federal Constitution. Liberal electors will note, therefore, that whatever powers they sacrifice they are transferring to a more liberal Government, over which they have a readier control. As to the new powers with which the Federal Government is endowed—and that is the other quarry—liberal electors will note that not only in the future will they be endowed with powers which they have not at present, but that those powers will be exercised under a more liberal Government than they now enjoy. For my own part I have no hesitation and no fear in recommending the acceptance of this Constitution to the people of Victoria. I do not ignore, though proposing to deal very briefly with the question of material losses and gains, which remains to be reviewed apart from political principles. Here it may not be out of place, in view of the criticisms which we are at present receiving, to recall, to the critics themselves, the forecasts which they made of the material advantages to be obtained from federation before this Constitution was promulgated at every time when discussion arose. We are all agreed that the adoption of this Constitution must mean, first, the establishment of complete intercolonial free-trade, and we have heard much of its commercial and monetary advantages and of the increased production which it will secure. We have heard that magnified for many years. Now, it appears to be totally forgotten. We have not only that prospect, but, looking at the policy pursued in four out of the five colonies represented, we have it, according to the admission of so fair-minded and clear sighted a representative as Mr. McMillan, of New South Wales, that there will be no mere revenue Tariff. We are certain that it will not only be a protective Tariff in general principle, but, as it must raise considerable sums of money, and express the will of four colonies which practise protection, it follows that the protection afforded to our industries established under the policy will not be nominal or inconsiderable, but considerable and extensive, from the first Federal Tariff. Even the free-trade party, judging at all events from the utterances of some of their leaders, will not seek at the outset of the Commonwealth career to force their principles, when they know that their success, if it were possible, would imperil the position of four of those colonies, and that there are tens, and even hundreds, of thousands of citizens of the Commonwealth who would be prejudicially affected by such a policy. I believe, personally, that the enormous advantages that must follow from the sweeping away of the boundaries between the colonies will be obtained under a high Tariff, distinctly protectionist in all its details, and yielding a large revenue, without the sacrifice of a single industry in Australia. These large general incalculable gains require to be continually borne in mind at the time when individual losses of individual colonies are taken into account. It appears to be forgotten that all these losses have to be deducted from the great general gain which each individual colony will receive under the provisions of the Constitution. We enter on the calculation of individual losses with this knowledge, and are perfectly well prepared to meet a great many of them, and yet have a balance to our credit from our general gains. Subject to this, let us take a few concrete instances of anticipated losses. My reading of the six clauses dealing with the Inter-State Commission and the control of the railways, is not that of my friend the Attorney-General for Victoria, though I quite admit the cogency of his interpretation. These clauses, if put into plain and simple language, seem to say:"You shall create a body composed of responsible and able men in whom you will be able to place as much confidence as you place in the Judges of your Supreme Court. Having created that body, you are to lay before it a variety of guiding principles, some of which must necessarily come into conflict. You say that trade shall be perfectly free, and that each state when the border barriers are thrown down shall be forbidden to make any charges or reductions on its railways which will have the effect of diverting the trade from its natural geographical routes-from ports offering the greatest advantage not to the state receiving the traffic, but to the people sending it." The first consideration of this Inter-State Commission would be to enable people to send their traffic to the cheapest and nearest ports, and without loss of time, to get their produce to the place where it could be most profitably exported or sold. That is subject to certain other conditions. A state is to be allowed to develop its own territory, and make special reductions or special charges where the construction of railways has been costly, but no state is to act unjustly or in an unfair manner to its neighbours in framing its rates. Now, it is quite possible that these considerations will, in some respects and to some extent, come into conflict. But my reliance is that the Inter-State Commission will exercise the free mind which our own courts have exercised at times, and which notably the great Federal Court of the United States of America under Chief Justice Marshall boldly and consistently exercised throughout. They will feel that they are, by appointment and function, a truly Federal Court. They will give a federal interpretation to all these provisions, unless the context clearly forbids them so doing. Their guiding principle and object will be not to fetter trade, not to encourage differential rates, not to permit preferential rates, or any interference with freedom of commerce. Reading those clauses as a whole, they appear to apply in such a manner that, though none of us can precisely forecast their exact consequence in a particular case, the result which we are entitled to expect, if the members of that commission are worthy of their position, as no doubt they will be, must be fair to all. If they rise to the occasion, and feel their federal responsibility, they will deal with this vexed question in such a manner as to do injury to none. Victoria has undoubtedly something to apprehend in regard to the operation of the 103rd section taken by itself. But, reading the whole of the clauses together, looking at the question from a practical point of view—recognising that these clauses sweep away preferential rates at present existing in New South Wales as well as in Victoria; realizing that, after all, no Inter-State Commission can ignore geographical facts, that it cannot make 200 miles as long as 400 miles, and that they must recognise the well-being of the settlers of the interior as first to be considered—I am inclined to believe that in the ultimate result Victoria will receive no injury from the operations of these provisions. The sweeping away of the barriers which at present shut out some of the Riverina trade will lead to a greater business being done between that part of New South Wales and Victoria. The mere abolition of the stock tax, which is one of the necessities of the operation of a uniform Tariff, will bring tens of thousands of pounds of yearly income to the railways of Victoria, a great part of which we have lost for many years. So in a variety of ways these clauses will operate, not to the detriment, but to the advantage of Victoria. In striking a balance I am strongly inclined to believe no colony has anything to fear. Now, a few words as to the bounties. The Federal Parliament, representing the federal people, will be as sensitive to the appeals of the people for assistance as any local Parliament has been. The great federal industries of Australia—fruit-growing, dairying, agriculture, and horticulture—will be no less an object of concern to representatives in the Federal Parliament than they have been to representatives in the various local Parliaments indeed, the improved circumstances and more independent position of the Federal Government will allow them to deal with the development of these industries with a more liberal hand than the local Governments can deal with them. If our neighbours across the borders share in these bounties we cannot regret it and remain Australians; we cannot desire to escape that if we are federated. We must realize that where one great industry runs through several colonies, the interests of that industry are federal, and its encouragement must be undertaken by the Federal Government. While we lose in one direction we probably gain more in another. I see no reason why the future federal bounties should not be larger than those given by special states in the past. In addition to that, if there be an industry peculiar to one state, or of so small a character that the Federal Parliament does not feel disposed to take action in its favour, we have the means of assisting it from state funds on obtaining a resolution from both Houses of the Federal Parliament. We shall have 24 members in one House and six in the other, making 30 in all, to urge the claims of Victoria. New South Wales will have slightly more representation, and the other states will be as strong in the Senate, although not so strong in the House of Representatives. The claims of all the colonies must meet with ready consideration from the Federal Parliament. The gain of one is not the loss of another. The development of an industry in any one state will be welcomed by representatives of other colonies in the Federal Parliament, because appeals will come for similar consideration from all. Looking at the practice of the past in the local Legislatures, and their sensitiveness to popular appeals of this kind, I have little apprehension in remitting to the Federal Parliament the granting of federal bounties, and retaining to the states, subject to its approval, the fostering of those peculiar to each colony. The complement of my argument with regard to the railways and bounties is that we must recall the actual position. It is said that under this measure we may have great losses on the Victorian railways, because we may lose traffic that now comes from New South Wales. Well, if we do not federate, the traffic which comes from New South Wales remains under the control of New South Wales. If New South Wales is prepared to cut rates far enough, and to impose dues high enough, she can inflict all the losses feared from the Commonwealth Bill. We have no power to prevent them. We have no means of urging a plea for equitable treatment. If we insist upon remaining independent we must take the consequences, and face the possibility of equal railway losses. We are not relieved from the possibility or prospect of railway losses by remaining outside the Federation. By remaining outside the Federation we leave the whole and sole control of such a question, not in the hands of an independent body of Federal Inter-State Commissioners, to whom we can appeal, before whom we have statutory rights, and from whom we can well claim consideration, but we leave the matter solely in the hands of the Government of New South Wales. If that Government is prepared to make the necessary financial sacrifices, and to take the necessary legislative steps, they are in a position to deprive us more effectually of the railway traffic than any Inter-State Commission can. Although one hesitates, even by way of illustration or argument, to represent as possible so hostile and unfriendly an act as that of the part of a neighbour, yet when we are looking at the Federal Commonwealth Bill in the light of the worst that can possibly happen under union, we are justified in looking at what is the worst possible that can happen under disunion. There is no greater railway danger under union than under disunion—there is infinitely less. On the one hand, we have a federal claim, a Federal Court, a federal appeal; in the other case, we must remain helpless and silent, unable to retaliate, and bound to submit. The same argument applies in regard to bounties. The present position is not one whit more to our advantage as promising benefits for the future than it would be under union. At present the finances of the various colonies are heavily drawn upon. It is with difficulty that Ministries can be persuaded to vote bounties.

We require a Government in a better financial position than the Governments of the states now are if we wish the system extended and generally employed. I now come to the important question of the finances.
A fear has been expressed that the Federal Tariff may be so framed, and the federal finances so managed, that the Treasurers of the several colonies may find themselves left with large deficits. Well, unfortunately, deficits are well known to all the states already; they have been frequent before federation, and hence afford no novel terror peculiar to union. Still, with four colonies out of the five joining this Federation, it is an absolute financial necessity that at least £6,000,000 should be raised through the Customs in order that they may receive back a sufficient sum to fill up the deficiency left in their accounts by the transfer of their great revenue-producing department. Under these circumstances, although the representation in Parliament outside the Senate will not be quite four-fifths, those colonies will have an overwhelming majority. An overwhelming majority of the future Federal Parliament will be returned by constituencies which will be compelled by the inevitable necessities of their situation to insist upon at least £6,000,000 being obtained from the Tariff, so as to place their Treasurers beyond embarrassment. There is no possibility of loss to the taxpayers of the several colonies. It is a question of loss to the states Treasuries, in consequence of the remission of a great body of taxation at present levied upon people in the form of intercolonial duties.
The effect of clause 87 is to put the states Treasurers in such a position that they will not need to come upon their constituents

[P.2506] starts here to make up this deficiency in their Treasuries, although the money has remained in the pockets of those constituents. The federal financial position need not be prejudiced by the fifth colony (New South Wales), for after this Federation has been established there are certain concessions very dear to the heart and nearest the mind of our neighbours. When the time comes in the Federal Parliament for federal representatives to undertake the government of their common country, there will be mutual adjustments and concessions on every hand. The representatives of New South Wales will be penetrated with the federal spirit. As I have more than hinted, there are ambitions of New South Wales which are not satisfied in this Constitution, and which require to be determined. The site of the federal capital is one, and by no means the least important. It is perfectly possible, therefore, to foresee that it will not be the rto the mother country, never so critical or so serious to her, or to us, for 100 years as they are to-day. With the burden of a far vaster empire than she bore at Waterloo, we find Great Britain, as an empire, threatened in every part. of the globe, and at the same time, by great powers and great influences, often apparently leagued in their hostility. At a time like this, when the question of the control of alien races and the influx of alien populations has become, and threatens to become, a still more burning question in all these colonies, it is surely not idle to remind our critics that without union we must remain exposed to that and many similar dangers. Dangers without, and difficulties within, track the steps of disunion, and threaten far graver losses to every corner of the Commonwealth than the worst interpretation of union can possibly threaten. The federal future intrusted to a Federal Parliament of this type will mean the natural development of this great country in security and without disruptions. Mr. Holder has pointed to the permissive powers of this Constitution. It allows a drawing closer of the bonds and an increase of benefits; federalization of the railways; federalization of the debts in truth, it provides for the realization of the promise one people one prosperity, as well as one people one destiny. That will be the inevitable result. In this Constitution, although much is written much remains unwritten, and has to be supplied out of our experience of our own people, and our working methods in political affairs. Can we have any doubt as to how and whence the forces of union will be supplied? Is there any doubt but that when we enter the Commonwealth Parliament, federal spirit will increase federal spirit, until in the whole of our dealings, in our material losses and gains, and in the whole of our political aims and aspirations, there will be that hearty union which will enable us to confront and solve many of the problems which this Convention most unwillingly has been compelled to pass by. After all, and much as it accomplishes, this Constitution is but the framework and ground plan of the nation that is to be. It is perhaps, by a wise discretion, that we have insufficiently and inadequately dealt with the difficulties with which we are at present perplexed. It is enough that we have provided the means of enabling those to deal with them who will be far better qualified for that task than we are. One word more. It appears to me that in each state the citizens of that state must submit to themselves this question-What will be our position if the other four states unite without us? We in Victoria have to face the possibility of the federation of four states, with a common Federal Tariff, federated railways, federated debts, and federated policy, and Victoria standing outside the hedge. New South Wales has to face the same prospect. So has South Australia, Tasmania, and Western Australia. Is there any colony of the group, no matter how wealthy or powerful, that can afford to face that calamity—the prospect of a United Australia existing at its doors of which it is not a member? This is a grave and serious consideration which must be submitted to the electors of each colony. After that comes encouragement in the reflection upon the giant stride towards prosperity, power, and prestige which this union will enable us to accomplish. What a charter of liberty is embraced within this Bill—of political liberty and religious liberty—the liberty and the means to achieve all to which men in these days can reasonably aspire. A charter of liberty is enshrined in this Constitution, which is also a charter of peace—of peace, order, and good government for the whole of the peoples whom it will embrace and unite.

Mr. SYMON (South Australia). —

I wish to say one word or two before we part. I do not intend to enter into any detailed examination of, or any elaborate apology for, the Constitution which we have been engaged in framing. But, sir, no man can remain unmoved upon this momentous occasion. We who are assembled in this Convention are about to commit to the people of Australia a new charter of union and liberty; we are about to commit this new Magna Charta for their acceptance and confirmation, and I can conceive of nothing of greater magnitude in the whole history of the peoples of the world than this question upon which we are about to invite the peoples of Australia to vote. The Great Charter was wrung by the barons of England from a reluctant king. This new charter is to be given by the people of Australia to themselves. Upon the consideration of this question at the stage to which it has come, I think we may all join in the felicitations which were addressed to us by my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) this morning, that there should have been so much harmony, and so much dignity, and so much earnestness in the proceedings of this great Convention, owing its existence and owing its authority to the manhood and—in our colony—to the womanhood also, of the peoples of this country. Sir, the differences to which my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) referred were as mere ripples on the surface of the water. They are the natural incidents of that earnestness in debate which is attributable and becoming to serious men. Even I myself have been told that my natural sweetness of temper has shown slight signs of wear. But I hope, sir, if any word of mine or any departure from my natural equanimity has even seemed to wound any honorable member of this Convention it will be forgiven me, and that it will be understood that there was no sting in anything that I said that was intended to hurt anybody in the slightest degree. I may be permitted further to say this, that, however slight and inefficient my own contributions to the great work of this Convention may have been, there is one part which brings to me the very greatest satisfaction, and that is that it was upon my own proposal, with the unanimous assent of this Convention at its first sitting in Adelaide, that my honorable and learned friend (Mr. Barton) was chosen to lead our deliberations and the proceedings of this assembly. I am proud of that, at any rate. We owe much to my honorable friend. It is very hard to say how much, but this I will say, that although I myself, in common with every honorable member, knew him to be a man of unusual capacity, unusual in any deliberative assembly, a patriot imbued with the glowing spirit of union, I do declare here that he has outstripped his reputation, and, through his efforts in this cause, he has become a cause of pride not only to every member of this Convention, but, I honestly believe, to every man in Australia-aye, every man, woman, and child in Australia who loves his or her country, and appreciates the advantages of union. I feel I must say that before leaving this chamber this afternoon. As to the Convention itself, I consider that it has fulfilled its mission. It has done its duty, nobly it has done its duty, and I believe that, before the people of this country, when the work comes to be weighed in the balance it will not be found or pronounced wanting. I feel I may say this; in fact, I should not have risen at all but for the fact that my position here is somewhat different from that of most honorable members. I am not a Minister of State. I am not even a member of any Parliament in Australia. I am not even in the usual sense a public man. I am simply a private citizen, a remark which is also applicable, I think, to three other members of this Convention, sent here to represent a colony which holds the respect, and in some regards, is entitled to the gratitude of her sister colonies-sent here to represent that colony, with others, on this occasion, and for the purpose of this work. And, sir, when we disperse after you make your declaration that this Convention is closed, and when I pass beyond the portals of this palace of legislation, I shall return again into the ranks of the private citizens of this country, and it is amongst them, and in the position of a private citizen, that I shall have to express my views, and give effect to my own wishes for the good of this country in the near future that lies before us. And, sir, I feel, looking at the position which I hold, I may be pardoned for taking one moment longer to declare that whilst this Constitution is not perfect-to say that it is the work of human minds and human hands is to say that it is imperfect-while it has blemishes, which I should like to have seen removed, and contains provisions which I confess I struggled against, and should like to have seen changed, still, with all its faults, with all its defects, whatever they may be, I am now going to accept this Constitution without reservations and without misgivings. I entertain none. I believe in the governing capacity of the race to which I belong. I believe in the elasticity of this Constitution. Its details have been pointed out by other honorable members who have spoken; but, sir, it is an elastic Constitution; it is a Constitution which, besides the letter of it, will be found to be saturated with those principles of free government which are inherent in the British race, and it is upon that I place my trust. It is that which affords me a solution of any difficulties and any doubts which I had previously entertained. I say, further, that you will get no Convention in this world which will frame a better Constitution. I believe that this Constitution is the finest instrument of government that ever was framed. I know of none to compare with it. Nothing has struck me more in this Convention than the way in which, as the debates have gone on, light has broken in upon questions which were admitted by everyone to be dark—which separatists and adverse critics declared to be insoluble—and just as that light has broken in upon these questions during the progress of our deliberations, so I believe in the time to come, when it has been, as I firmly believe it will be, accepted by the people of Australia, the same principles will come into play upon its interpretation and upon its working. And even in those provisions as to dead-locks—those hobgoblins that have been made so much of—we shall find little or no occasion to call them into play. They will simply remain in the Constitution as a standing memorial of the anxiety of those of us who have been here to see that every possible safeguard against injustice was provided. One word more, and it is this. We have still much to do. We must not, when we part this afternoon, ungird—if I may use the expression—our loins, and consider that we may take our ease. That is not the course, it seems to me, that lies before us. We have a great task still to perform, and that is not only to do what I commend my honorable friend (Mr. Isaacs) for seeking to do—not only to take care that those who have got the vote—the people who have to make this Constitution, to give it its vitality—shall thoroughly appreciate the work which they will have to do; but we shall also have to see that not only do they understand the Constitution, but that they are prepared to go to the poll and record their votes. I do not fear the anti-federal vote. It is the stay-at-home vote that I dread—those who do not vote. The greatest task which lies before us, who are earnest for union, is to see that there shall be an understanding of the Bill by our constituents and the people at large, and that they shall be prepared to zealously and earnestly give effect to it by their votes at the ballot-box, and thus secure freedom to themselves, and justice to all, under the Constitution we have provided. I fear no failure. The honorable and learned member (Mr. Deakin) said that if there was failure it would mean failure for a generation or more to come. That I believe. If we do not have federal union now we shall, probably, not have federal union within the life-time of many of us who have met in this Convention. But I fear no failure. I seem to feel round me, and about me, and everywhere a desire for union. know the criticisms to which our scheme is subject. I know the doubts expressed about it, but upon the great central fact of union I feel that there need be no doubt. I appeal to those who are anxious in criticism, and to those who are distrustful, to lend a ready ear to the injunction of the honorable and learned member, not to magnify their doubts and not to see too many of their difficulties; but to consider the work as a whole, and to declare for union, even though they may have apprehensions upon one or two details of major consequence, believing that the sun is none the less the sun because there may be considerable spots upon it. I remember reading, in the history of the early years of the American Union, that Count Aranda, who was the Spanish plenipotentiary in the negotiations with regard to the Mississippi Valley, wrote to his king something to this effect:-

This federal state is born a pygmy, but it will soon become a giant, even a Colossus, great and powerful in these countries.

May not that be said of the union which we are seeking to create? No man can say that, even burdened with disunion, Australia will not have great prosperity. No man can say that every state upon the continent will not share it. But, in my opinion, all that prosperity will be as nothing to the prosperity which will come from union. It will be a union with strong foundations set deep in justice, a union which will endure from age to age, a bulwark against aggression and a perpetual security for the peace, freedom, and progress of the people of Australia, giving to them and to their children and to their children's children through all generations the priceless heritage of a happy and united land.

Mr. MCMILLAN (New South Wales). -

I do not intend to make a speech. Time is going on, and I think that any attempt to any further analyze the Bill would be, at the very least, injudicious. But I have been connected with the federal movement ever since its inception in the Conference of 1890. I have watched the propagandists of this great movement, and by explanation, by exhortation and organization, it must be brought to its final consummation. We have enemies to oppose, and there have been matters connected with our proceedings which will be used, especially in my own colony, by the anti-federalists. One of the chief objections they have to union now is that the debates in this assembly will be an object-lesson for the future. But we all came into this controversy with the natural pugnacity of British people. We have each fought for what we thought were the rights of our own colonies, and like British people we have accepted reasonable compromises. I deny that the Federal Parliament will be in any way analogous to the Convention. Its members will not be in any antagonistic position. They will not meet for the purpose for which we met. We met to frame a Constitution—they will meet to legislate under it. A great many people have said that the Constitution is too liberal, and some honorable members have tried to-day, by argument and by rhetoric, to show that it is, if anything, ultra-liberal. I do not hold that it is ultra-liberal in any bad sense. I hold that a Constitution must have two things; it must have a conservative foundation and liberal possibilities of legislation. I believe that this Constitution is sufficiently well founded and sufficiently conservative to last practically for all time. But there is a difficulty which we shall have to face when we go back to our own colonies. It is often said that what is everybody's business is nobody's business. We shall want the organization of general elections, the magnetic influence created by local people canvassing for themselves in a personal character—and I think that, instead of the hesitation about which we have heard in the last few days, every Government and every representation should organize itself and pledge itself to the consummation of this great work. I believe that what has seemed an anti-federal spirit in New South Wales—I am only speaking of what has been alleged—will pass away when the Constitution is understood. I cannot believe that, after the popular vote which elected in each colony presumably ten of the foremost public men, the people will not be true to the Constitution which has been framed. Circumstances are now combining, both in our relations to the British Empire and to ourselves, to bring about this consummation. I believe, myself, that the national spirit is rising throughout Australia. I believe that the necessity is upon us to become a nation, and I am not at all sure that it will not be this national spirit which, rising above every material consideration, will not ultimately win the battle for us. The population of these colonies by the end of the century will be almost entirely native-born, and these native-born men, as we see in this colony particularly, will not be satisfied with the parochial life. They will feel that Australia must be home to them. The bulk of them can never expect a career outside this island continent. They will feel that if they have to take a part in the responsibilities of the British Empire, and to share its dangers, they must have a proud identity of their own. I believe that the more you encourage the Australian nationality the better factor you create for the British Empire. It will be by the element of Australian nationality rising in our midst, and by its being pressed upon the people by the representatives that have met here-using not too much the material argument, as the argument of a national life—that our work will be ultimately consummated. We shall have a tremendous fight in New South Wales. As the leader of the Convention has pointed out, there have been traitors to the cause. We had a stab made at us by an alteration of the fundamental Act connected with the movement. But, in spite of that, if the ten representatives of New South Wales are determined to become propagandists of a movement in their own colony, portioning it into sections, and if the Government gives the movement hearty and generous support, New South Wales will come into the Federation. Without meaning to be egotistical or presumptuous, I say that there is no doubt that the formation of the Commonwealth lies with New South Wales. I have no fear for Victoria. The advantages given to Victoria are so great—she gets back to a large extent her natural geographical area—that she would be utterly mad if she did not accept the Constitution or even a far worse one. Therefore, I believe that with New South Wales thoroughly in earnest—and I pledge myself between this and the taking of the vote to use every personal effort to secure this end—if at an early period of the canvass she shows herself in earnest and throws away the unreasonable prejudices we have heard of in the last month, her example will have such a moral effect upon the people of Australia that we need not fear their verdict upon the Bill.

Mr. TRENWITH (Victoria). -

I have not made any preparation for a speech upon this important occasion, but I feel that, owing to the peculiar position which I occupy, the responsibility is entailed upon me of saying something, and of expressing in general terms my conclusions as to the merits of the Bill, and as to the desirability or otherwise of its acceptance by the people. I set out, as I believe most of us did, with the opinion that, starting at the end of the nineteenth century with all the history of the past at our disposal, with the Constitutions of the world before our eyes, we should make in Australia a governmental machine superior to any of those of which the world previously had knowledge. This, I am prepared to admit, was a very large expectation; but after carefully considering the result of our labours I think that we have accomplished it. I do not mean by that statement that I am satisfied with every detail of the Bill, or that I do not think that there are not a number of its provisions which I should like to see altered if possible. But when we remember that this Constitution is not for the government of one individual or one country, but for a number of countries that for many years have been existing as separate independent communities, and have during that period been developing, through their want of unity, conflicting interests, not to say strong prejudices and jealousies, which would have been impossible if we had had a Constitution such as this from the start, it would have been surprising if we had arrived at a Constitution which was satisfactory in all its details to all the representatives. But while I did, as I think most of us did, point out as vigorously as I could the objections which I saw to some of the propositions that were presented to us, with a view, if possible, of preventing their adoption, I feel now that many of the objections were undoubtedly magnified by some of us. I have felt, I think, as strongly as any one here that a government, to be completely government of the people by the people, must let the people more frequently into its counsels than it has done in the past, and that that could only be completely and effectively done by means of what is known as the referendum. Therefore, a Constitution to meet my wishes ought to have within it the opportunity of readily applying that principle. I have felt, as most people in these colonies have felt, that our bi-cameral system, while containing the elements of safety and of security from ill-considered rushes of legislation, also contains within it an element of sometimes vexatious delay, and not infrequently absolute legislative stag-nation. And I have felt that where the two branches of the legislative machine have failed to perform the work for which they were designed, there ought to be a reference from the agents to the principals. But I recognise that there is great force in the argument that has been urged against this proposal, that it is subversive of the principle of government that we as British people are accustomed to-the principle of government known as responsible government. While I recognise that there is great force in these arguments, and, therefore, those who urge them may be fairly and properly excused for voting against the referendum in consequence of their weight, still I do not think that the arguments are conclusive. It may perhaps be considered by some honorable members to be useless at this stage to discuss the referendum, and I, for one, should not do it, even in the slightest degree, were it not for the fact that our respected leader, in that most admirable speech which he delivered this morning, gave some attention to this particular aspect of this question that the referendum is subversive of responsible government; and Mr. Wise, in discussing the question the other day, also gave a great deal of attention to that aspect of it. As I hope that the referendum for the settlement of disputes between the two branches of the Federal Legislature will ultimately be embodied in this Constitution after it is adopted in its present form, and that it will also be adopted in connexion with our state Legislatures independently of this Constitution, I feel it desirable to give some attention to it. It is pointed out that a Minister or a Ministry responsible to Parliament, and only holding office because it has the sanction of the people's representatives, might find itself in a minority, and might submit to the people for their arbitrament a question which the people, in exercising that power, might decide against the Ministry, and therefore we should have the anomaly of a Government holding office out of accord with the policy of the representatives of the people. But I would respectfully submit in answer to that objection that the anomaly is only apparent, not real, because the Ministry will be out of accord with the people whom they represent, not upon a question that they had to deal with, but upon a question that was settled, and consequently was not a matter for legislation at all. However, I feel with my honorable friend (Mr. Deakin) that, although we have not the referendum in this Constitution, we have the principle of the referendum in it. As I at a previous sitting of this Convention pointed out, there is the principle of the referendum in the British Constitution. But we have it in this Constitution in a more complete and definite form than it is to be found in any other Constitution in the world, so far as I know, except that of Switzerland. Because we have here not merely the referendum to the people by means of a general election involving one branch of the Legislature, but we have a reference to the people, not by the method ordinarily described as a general election, but by means of a special election to settle a distinct issue about which the two branches of the Legislature have come into conflict. Thus, although we have the slight disadvantage that persons and some side-issues will undoubtedly be involved, still, as the electors will only have one distinct issue presented to their minds, the point at issue will be virtually settled upon the principle of the referendum, because it will be referred to the people in order that they may elect representatives who hold their views not on general questions only, but more particularly on that single issue. But it seems to me we have something more in the referendum, or one form of it which has been suggested; that is, the referendum of the states and the referendum of the people. We may have a complete solution by that means. Because I can conceive of a large majority of the people holding a view that was not held by the people of the majority of the states; and if such a contingency as that arises, and the dual referendum were applied, the great majority of the people would necessarily and certainly be subjected, as far as that single issue was concerned, to the minority in the majority of the states. But by means of the double dissolution, and the subsequent sitting of the two Houses, it may, and I think sometimes will, be possible for a majority of the people—the taxpayers—to obtain a solution of the question favorable to the majority, even though in that special connexion there were not a majority of the states.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

Would not a double dissolution tend to bring a greater number of people to the poll than an ordinary general election?

Mr. TRENWITH. -

I think that is obviously so. The double dissolution must create a degree of interest and enthusiasm that would not centre round a simple issue which is unassociated with persons. However, there is another extremely important aspect that, it seems to me, has been dealt with at very great length and adversely criticised, and that is the question of whether, when we adopt this Federal Constitution, we should be able to develop our local industries as we can and do now. It seems to me that we have to consider whether our present condition is satisfactory—whether our ability to develop our own resources now is sufficiently great. It seems to me that it must be self-evident that it is not, or we should not be seeking to change that condition. And if we are expecting—as I think we are rightly expecting—immense advantages from the breaking down of barriers that are at present put up between the colonies, we must be prepared to forego some of the advantages that isolation gives to us. I feel confident that the Federal Parliament, elected as it will be from the colonies that have the necessities of local development pressing closely upon their representatives, will be the more inclined to create conditions that permit of development than the state Parliaments possibly can be. Therefore, I think we shall have Commonwealth bounties which will offer almost all the possibilities of development that can occur. But if there should, and I believe there possibly may, occur some special necessities for bounties to assist a small portion of the Commonwealth, all experience in these colonies teaches us that we shall have no difficulty in getting from the Federal Parliament its consent to pay those bounties. We find, within the area of our state Legislatures, that we have local interests continually presented to Parliament from various parts of the respective states. In Victoria we have a most complete system of local government, under which particular localities legislate for their local requirements, and manage very largely their local concerns in regard to roads and bridges, and so forth. They are continually coming to Parliament asking for some special concessions. Very often these special concessions involve the expenditure of large sums from the general revenue, but yet we find that whenever these requests are made they are almost invariably passed with the greatest possible rapidity. Parliament is always inclined to act generously to sections of the community over which it has to govern, and we have a right to assume that when we have created a Federal Par question, after considering with regret necessarily many objectionable features in this Bill, I recognise that there are many advantages in it. On the merits, the advantages more than outweigh the disadvantages. But, then, going outside of the Bill to the larger and greater question of the advantage of unity to these colonies, it seems to me to make the consideration overwhelmingly in favour of adopting the Bill. I shall regard it as my duty, as I hope the delegates of all the other colonies will, to take every possible opportunity of making clear to the people who must vote upon this Bill its provisions, not attempting to conceal some of the manifest objections, but endeavouring to prevent their having undue weight in the public mind, and presenting as fully and clearly as I can the obvious advantages of the Bill. I would like to suggest, because I take it that what is said here to-day will probably be more carefully considered than what has been said on any single day's or perhaps month's sitting of this Convention, that there ought to be an effort made, not merely on the part of the delegates, but of all persons in responsible positions, to do whatever is possible to make the people acquainted with the measure. I hope that the mayors of the municipal councils, the presidents of the shire councils, and the persons in charge of public buildings in the various parts of Australia, will feel it to be their duty to place any suitable buildings at the disposal of persons who are competent and willing to give instruction in connexion with this important question. If the people are to be educated-and when I say educated I mean made acquainted with the intricate provisions of this Bill-it will be necessary for the delegates and other persons competent to go from point to point of the respective colonies, and to take the people directly into their counsel, submitting to them the details of the measure, and being prepared to afford any information that the people may desire in connexion with it. That can only be done by all persons capable of rendering assistance uniting to give the greatest possible facilities to educational efforts in connexion with the Bill.

Mr. GLYNN (South Australia). -
At this late stage of the proceedings I do not think I should be justified in entering into any details, but I desire to say a few words in explanation of my intention to recommend the Bill heartily to the people of South Australia. During a connexion of about ten years, and a connexion of which I was exceedingly proud, with the press of South Australia, and a direct connexion of several years also with the political life of that colony, I have held it to be an ideal to seek after the full realization of the principle of popular government-popular not in the sense of the dominance of one particular class, but in the reconciliation of the interests of all classes, of the community. I think I can honestly say that the measure we have now before us is the nearest approach to the perfection of representative as distinguished from pure democracy that you will find in any federal or unitary Constitution. Again, and although this is a small matter, as it has been overlooked, I may be justified in mentioning it, we have started with the recognition of the principle which is the great equalizer of the opportunities of the rich and the poor-the principle of the payment of members. Then, following out the idea that this Constitution takes its origin from the people, when we are seeking the element's of its renovation and repair we throw it back upon its source, and appeal to the popular voice for a justification of any improvement or alteration which time may necessitate. May I also say this, that though it is an objection, and a necessary one, to all federal, in comparison with unitary, Constitutions that they are rigid, we have, to a very large extent, in connexion with our Constitution, that principle of elasticity which is a peculiarity, if not one of the glories of the British Constitution. As this, by happy augury, happens to be the festival day of my native land, a land which, I may say, is bound to me by ties of affection no more close than those living links which attach me to the country of my adoption, whose Constitution I have been privileged in helping to frame, and whose destinies I am proud to share, I may be permitted, in the words of a fellow countryman, to express what that principle of growth is:-

Our political system is based upon a just correspondence and symmetry with the order of nature, and with the mode of existence decreed to a permanent body composed of transitory parts, wherein the dispensation of a stupendous wisdom, moulding together the great mysterious incorporation of the human race, the whole at one time is never old, nor middle-aged, nor young, but in a condition of unchangeable constancy moves on through the varied tenor of decay, fall, renovation, and progression."

I say that the rigidity of this Constitution is only in the recognition of those fundamental interests which are the prime conditions of our partnership. But in Executive relations and otherwise its capacity of automatic adjustment to the growing needs of society as time goes on is as great as that of the British Constitution itself. We have had objections taken to the Constitution from the point of view of some of its imperfections. I will only say that the man who seeks perfection in the sphere of politics—a science which deals, not with the known quantities of mathematics, but with those uncertain elements, the passions, prejudices, and interests of man—will have to wait for the recognition of his ideal until the crack of doom. It is beyond the power of any man to embody in any Constitution a seeming recognition of all national rights, or to give such a clear and adequate expression to ideas that they will be beyond the possibility of verbal criticism. Now, as to the necessity of federation, I will only say this, that we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the theatre of the world's struggle is being shifted from the West to the East; that a young power—Japan—has within the last ten years sprung into a vigorous and militant life; and that China, after a sleep of 2,000 years, is now awakening up to industrial activity. Surely these colonies, with their small piping individual voices, cannot expect to have the slightest influence in the counsels or upon the destinies of the East, unless they unite. I desire now to say a few words of gratitude to those who have been so largely instrumental in the framing of this Constitution. I would not like to sit down without recognising the loyal devotion to the task imposed upon them of the Drafting Committee. The duty of giving clear and concise expression to the recommendations of the various committees and the decisions of the Convention called for the exercise of a capacity, zeal, and sacrifice of personal leisure of which, throughout the course of our proceedings, the Drafting Committee have given ample evidence. Time after time our difficulties of exposition were settled by referring them to the Drafting Committee, with the confidence that in their hands the obscure would become clear, and with a perfect faith in their ability to find ample time when practically none existed. On a few occasions, the Hon. Mr. Barton and his associates were relied on to find out for some of us what we intended, and if they now and then failed in divining what position we did, it was only to demonstrate beyond question the position we ought, to assume. They preserved under all troubles of policy and language a composure worthy of you, Mr. President, in the chair, and of Sir Richard Baker when under that cross fire of amendments of which he was expected and found to be the reconciling genius. Of our worthy leader I will only say this, that I think he has proved himself to be one of those rare men, found, as if by a providential dispensation, to fit the hour. It was said, I think by Adams, of the leaders of the movement in which the American Constitution originated, that-

There seems to arise in great emergencies a force unfelt at other times, which may be called the attraction of public necessity, which brings to the surface a race of men who would otherwise have remained unseen, children of the gods, who, in human affairs, work so rarely and so well.

As to Mr. Barton himself, I hope that the reward of his labours will be in their fruition, and that in the fiat of the Australian people to the Constitution which he has helped so much to shape will be found the lasting expression of their gratitude.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I do not rise to reply on the extremely able and interesting debate which we have heard to-day, the participants in which have fully expressed the federal feeling which animates those who sent them here. I wish merely to make a quotation from a letter from one of our members. It is a very interesting communication, written apparently in the train last night. That honorable member desires me to make some reference to his opinion on the Federal Constitution. I refer to Mr. Venn, of Western Australia, in whose letter occurs the following passage:-

In regard to the Federal Constitution, I have no hesitation in saying that it is such as I can in my individual capacity as a member of the Convention, and a member of the Western Australian Legislature, heartily and strongly recommend to the people of Western Australia. No stone will be left unturned by me among those to whom I am known, in placing the Bill before them with all the force of character I may possess. I can only hope that Western Australia, as a whole, will accept the Bill heartily and with confidence. I would ask you to express these views for me when you meet to-morrow, as I would assuredly have done had I been present.

I thought that, as this motion could only be brought forward after our friends of Western Australia had left the Convention, it was only just I should afford Mr. Venn the opportunity of having his voice heard here, although he was unable to express himself in person.

The PRESIDENT. -

Before I put this motion, I should like to say a word or two. I congratulate this Convention on the conclusion of their honorable task. It seems to me that this is not the time when one should stand trembling on the brink of a distinct declaration as to future policy in connexion with this great movement. I can but speak for myself alone; but in regard to this Constitution, I say unhesitatingly that I accept it gladly. More, I welcome it as the most magnificent Constitution into which the chosen representatives of a free and enlightened people have ever breathed the life of popular sentiment and national hope. Mine will be no Laodicean advocacy; but with such ability as I may possess, and with the fullest enthusiasm and warmth of which my nature may be capable—with my whole heart and strength—I pledge myself to recommend the adoption of this Constitution, daring any danger and delighting in any sacrifice which may be necessitated by unswerving devotion to the interests of the Commonwealth of Australia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It is now my duty to move—

That the thanks of this Convention be given to the Right Hon. Charles Cameron Kingston, P.C., President; and to the Hon. Sir Richard Chaffey Baker, K.C.M.G., Chairman of Committees, for the services rendered by them to this Convention.

I have not made these separate motions, sir. I have simply adopted the precedent which the proceedings of the Convention of 1891 afforded. I thought it was, perhaps, right in a motion of this kind that services rendered so much in a like capacity should be dealt with by honorable members in the same motion. We, sir, all of us admire your conduct of business from the chair. We have been perfectly confident in your knowledge of parliamentary procedure and in your sense of justice. We know that, as to your opinion and feelings in respect to federation, we have had in the chair of this Convention one who is devoted to the cause, and who will be no niggard in advocating it in his own country. I am happy to think, sir, that the cause of federation will have as its chief advocate in your country a man so able to express his views with power and enthusiasm, and a man who has given so strong a pledge that nothing will be wanting on his part to see Australia accomplish the end to which she was destined. I should like to add my own meed of praise of the conduct of business in committee by our very able Chairman. Sir Richard Baker had no ordinary task. He had to deal with a very large number of amendments suggested by the Parliaments of the various colonies. In many cases, indeed generally, these amendments were not made with the concurrence of both Chambers, and the list had to be arranged in a way that no tabulated statement, such as that which was prepared, would have arranged them. On the part of Sir Richard Baker was required not merely a knowledge of the place these amendments occupied in the Bill, but a knowledge of parliamentary procedure such as few men possess. He had to decide when and how these amendments should be put, so that each of them could be brought before the Convention in its relative value and importance, and none of them, except where their principle had already been submitted for decision, should fail to come before honorable members. That work Sir Richard Baker has accomplished with marked ability. In addition to all that ability, Sir Richard Baker has shown a very strong and ardent attachment to the federal cause, which I hope will be joined with your labours, sir, and those of your colleagues for the accomplishment of Australian union so far as South Australia is concerned. The tact and judgment which have been exhibited by the Chairman often saved the committee from entanglements amongst those numerous amendments which any one, however skilled, but with less skill and judgment than Sir Richard Baker, might have allowed the

Mr. President, I have the very greatest pleasure possible in seconding this motion. I have already expressed myself this morning in terms which I find it difficult to add to regarding yourself and Sir Richard Baker. There is no doubt, Mr. President, that the eminent services of yourself and the Chairman of Committees have been of the very utmost value to us in arriving at the conclusion that has now been reached. I am sure that everything my honorable friend (Mr. Barton) has said regarding the great abilities and the impartiality, tact, judgment, unfailing industry, and courtesy of both yourself and Sir Richard Baker to every member of the Convention is perfectly correct and well warranted. I have very great pleasure in supporting the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. -

I should like to say, in acknowledgment of the vote just passed, that I am well pleased to be associated in that vote with the Hon. the Chairman of Committees. I would also like to add that I indorse most heartily every word that has been said in connexion with the mode in which the Chairman of Committees has discharged his duties. It has been an undoubted pleasure to co-operate with Sir Richard Baker in the discharge of the business of this Convention. As for myself, I think the observations which have been made are all too generous. I am deeply indebted to the Convention for the support they have given me in the discharge of my duty. It has been my constant effort to facilitate business as far as was consistent with parliamentary usage, to maintain the dignity of the Chair, and to discharge its responsibilities without fear or favour. At the same time, I am conscious of many shortcomings, and under these circumstances I am all the more deeply sensible of the kindness of the remarks made by the leader of the Convention, and of the vote which has just been passed.

[P.2518] starts here

Sir RICHARD BAKER (South Australia). -

May I say a word? I should like to express my deep gratification at the fact that my labours, as Chairman of Committees, have met with such appreciative remarks from members of this Convention. It is not always, in fact it is very seldom, that a person filling the position of Chairman of Committees has any other reward than a sense of having done his duty. It must be remembered that it is impossible for a president or a chairman to satisfactorily perform the duties pertaining to his office unless he has the cordial co-operation and assistance of the members over whom he presides. You, sir, have had that co-operation and assistance, and so have I; and I beg to tender to the members of this Convention my sincere thanks for the honour which they have done me in passing a vote of thanks, and for the courtesy and kind assistance which they gave me in the performance of what was sometimes a some-what difficult duty. Before I sit down I may say I believe-and I think I may say this without egotism-I have succeeded in the task imposed on me of seeing that every amendment suggested by every legislative body was put to the vote; so that it does not lie in the mouth of any member of any House of Parliament to say that a solemn vote passed in any Parliament did not receive the consideration of the Convention. It is true that on some occasions amendments were not debated, but that was because the principle which they involved had been debated on previous occasions. Although perhaps the identical point had not been actually decided, still the main principle had already been agreed to or disagreed to by the committee, and therefore there was no necessity for debate. Words fail me in attempting to convey the sense of gratification which I feel. I can only say that I have laboured arduously and strenuously in the cause of federation from 1891 to the present moment, and that it will be one of the proudest moments of my life if I see the great work on which we have been engaged become an actual and realized fact.

Mr. ISAACS (Victoria). -

By the permission of my honorable friend (Mr. Barton), the leader of the Convention, I desire to interpose with a motion which, I think, ought not to take a lower place than that which I desire to give it. The motion is-

That the thanks of the Convention be given to the Hon. Edmund Barton, the Hon. Sir John Downer, and the Hon. R.E. O'Connor, the members of the Drafting Committee, for the services rendered by them to the Convention.

It affords me extreme pleasure to submit this motion to the Convention, because I think it will be universally admitted that those honorable gentlemen have performed with unswerving industry, with the utmost fidelity, with extreme ability, and with eminent success, the responsible and arduous duties which have devolved on them as members of the Drafting Committee. In a smaller sphere, sir, I personally know the difficulties surrounding the discharge of such a task. When I look back, even with some degree of expert knowledge, and recollect the various phases which this Bill has assumed, the many amendments, the divergent views intended to express the ideas of those who moved and those who supported various propositions, it seems to me that the work of the Drafting Committee is worthy of the very highest praise. I do not suppose these honorable gentlemen would claim that the measure is absolutely free from defects, but, so far as can be discovered, it is one that can be regarded as practically free from them. I do not personally know at the present moment of anything whatever that can be changed for the better. I think that the contemplation of the weight and magnitude of the task that they so willingly accepted, and so generously performed, must lead us to offer them our sincere gratitude and unstinted acknowledgment of the work, and we may hope, in the result, for the permanence of the labours which they have just concluded. I think further observations from me are unnecessary. No length of expression could increase the admiration that we all must feel for the labours of the Drafting Committee, and I, therefore, have the very utmost pleasure in moving the motion I have just submitted.

Mr. DEAKIN (Victoria). -

I have much pleasure in seconding the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

It is very gratifying to Mr. O'Connor and myself, as I know it would be to Sir John Downer if he were here, to know the kindly as well as complimentary terms in which the Attorney-General of Victoria has proposed this motion. It is not for us, who constitute the committee, to dilate upon the nature and performance of our work; all we can tell the Convention is, as I think they will believe, that it was very hard work. The Bill, as presented to us for final drafting, contained the result of a great many amendments and motions which were clear enough in themselves, but which required to be converted into other terms for the purpose of insertion in the Constitution, and there were other motions and amendments which were inserted in the Bill up to that time which, although one could clearly gather the intentions of the movers from the debate, were not in their words such as we could have left without such alterations as in some cases we feared might almost have provoked the resentment of the honorable members who had moved them. But it is a happy thing for us to say, and I say it with gratitude, that a long schedule of amendments of a drafting character, numbering something like 400, were yesterday passed by this Chamber, not with a rush, not inconsiderately, but after fair consideration, and that in no case did we find that any honorable member had treated our dealing with his work, as expressed in the amendments, with any want of appreciation. There seemed to be a confidence on the part of honorable members that we were dealing fairly with them, for which we cannot express too grateful thanks. It is to me and my colleagues a matter of pride that we should have so gained the confidence of those we have been working with. I should like to speak in high terms of the officers who have given us such great help in our labours, and in respect of whom I shall presently move a motion and in regard to the Government Printer, whose expeditious, accurate, and neat work betokens the ability of himself and the staff working under him. Now, I wish to mention a gentleman who has not been prominent, apparently, among members of the Convention, but to whom we are under a serious debt of gratitude. I refer to my friend—he is so much taller than myself that I can scarcely call him my young friend—Mr. Garran, who is a member of the bar, and who came here as secretary to the New South Wales Premier, and in an understood, though not in an official way, to the New South Wales representatives. The Drafting Committee had the benefit of that gentleman's assistance, and I think I should be very unfair indeed if I took all the gratitude to the Drafting Committee which is implied in the kind motion passed without acknowledging that a great deal of that credit is due to the assistance of Mr. Garran, whose technical knowledge, strong and varied research on this subject, and literary taste and judgment in the expression of his views, when the work was urgent, and the drafts had to be prepared and revised in a very short space of time, were of the very highest assistance to myself and my colleagues.

Mr. DEAKIN. -

As they were in his handbook to all of us.

Mr. BARTON. -

Yes. I believe his handbook was of great assistance to all of us. I am pleased to be able to take this opportunity of expressing my own feeling of thankfulness to that gentleman, who has been untiring in his labour, and who has worked in so unobtrusive a way that he might have escaped attention, notwithstanding his great services, if I had not mentioned them. I am very grateful to honorable members for passing this Motion.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE OFFICERS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. BARTON (New South Wales). -

I beg to move-

That the thanks of this Convention be given to the Clerk of the Convention, Edwin Gordon Blackmore, Esq., and to his assistants at the sittings of this Convention held in Adelaide, Sydney, and Melbourne; and also to the reporting staffs at those several sittings.

Mr. Blackmore's rich knowledge of parliamentary law and practice needs no description from me, because he is a standard authority among all Australian parliamentarians. His work is always given ungrudgingly. He is always working for the Convention early and late; and he has devoted to his duties in connexion with our labours, more hours and more hard work than perhaps any of us are aware who are not thrown into immediate contact with him. He was ably assisted at Adelaide by Mr. Halcombe, and in Sydney by Mr. Webb, and here by Mr. Duffy. The ability, discrimination, industry, and generous services of all those officers ought to command the great thankfulness of the Convention. In addition, I should like to say that the reports which have been furnished by the official staffs have been most accurate and painstaking. We all know how very exacting and wearing is the labour which shorthand reporters often have to undergo at times when other people are resting. They have shown a very great deal of intelligence and discrimination in their reports, and I think we may include the reporters at every one of the capitals at which this Convention has been held in this need of praise. Having spoken of these matters, it rests with me to mention, on behalf of the whole of this Convention, our feeling of appreciation of the kind and considerate treatment which we have received from the Ministers of this colony, and from the Reception Committee who were told off to see that we were made comfortable.

Mr. ISAACS. -

We only hope that you were comfortable.

Mr. BARTON. -

We were indeed made free of care as regards many minor troubles, and we were received with hospitality, which, although generous, had this great recommendation besides, that it was considerate and thoughtful. I am sure I speak for a great many members of the Convention, who would have been present to-day if they had not been forced to go away, when I say that this visit will live in our memories, not only because of the great occasion and the very fine and interesting struggles which have accompanied it, but also because those who had the care of the Convention as their hosts, performed their duties with so much tact and with so little interference with the necessary labours of the Convention. I think it would never have done to have finished the labours of the Convention without expressing the feeling we all entertain towards the Ministry of Victoria and the committee whom they appointed.

Dr. COCKBURN (South Australia). -

I beg to second the motion. Although Mr. Blackmore is a South Australian, I, as a South Australian, feel that I can speak to the motion, because his reputation is not only South Australian and intercolonial, but as a parliamentary authority it extends wherever English representative institutions exist. With regard to the Government of Victoria and the Rec

The motion was agreed to.

CLOSE OF THE PROCEEDINGS.

The PRESIDENT. -

The statutory requirements having now been complied with, it will be my duty in a moment to declare the proceedings of this Convention closed. However, before doing so I think it would be becoming that cheers should be given for the Queen, and afterwards cheers should be given for Australia. All present will be permitted to join.

Cheers were given for the Queen and Australia.

The PRESIDENT. -

I now declare the proceedings of this Convention closed.

The Convention terminated at a quarter to five o'clock p.m.

Copy of Federal Constitution under the Crown, as finally adopted by the Australasian Federal Convention, at Melbourne, in the Colony of Victoria, on the 16th March, 1898.

Commonwealth shall take effect, on and after the day so appointed. But the Parliaments of the several Colonies may at any time after the passing of this Act make any such laws, to come into operation on the day so appointed, as they might have made if the Constitution had taken effect at the passing of this Act.

Operation of the Constitution and laws.

V. This Act, and all laws made by The Parliament of the Commonwealth under the Constitution, shall be binding on the Courts, Judges, and people of every State, and of every part of the Commonwealth, notwithstanding anything in the laws of any State; and the laws of the Commonwealth shall be in force on all British ships, the Queen's ships of war excepted, whose first port of clearance and whose port of destination are in the Commonwealth.

"Original States" shall mean such States as are parts of the Commonwealth at its establishment.

VII. The Federal Council of Australasia Act 1885 is hereby repealed, but so as not to affect any laws passed by the Federal Council of Australasia and in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Any such law may be repealed as to any State by The Parliament of the Commonwealth, or as to any colony not being a State by the Parliament thereof.

Governor-General.

2. A Governor General appointed by the Queen shall be Her Majesty's representative in the Commonwealth, and shall have and may exercise in the Commonwealth during the Queen's pleasure, but subject to this Constitution, such powers and functions of the Queen as Her Majesty may be pleased to assign to him.

5. The Governor-General may appoint such times for holding the sessions of The Parliament as he thinks fit, and may also from time to time, by Proclamation or otherwise, prorogue The Parliament, and may in like manner dissolve the House of Representatives.

After any general election The Parliament shall be summoned to meet not later than thirty days after the day appointed for the return of the writs.

The Parliament shall be summoned to meet not later than six months after the establishment of the Commonwealth.

Yearly Session of Parliament.

6. There shall be a session of The Parliament once at least in every year, so that twelve months shall not intervene between the last sitting of The Parliament in one session and its first sitting in the next session.

Part II. - The Senate.

7. The Senate shall be composed of senators for each State, directly chosen by the people of the State, voting, until The Parliament otherwise provides, as one electorate.

Until The Parliament otherwise provides there shall be six senators for each Original State. The Parliament may make laws increasing or diminishing the number of senators for each State, but so that equal representation of the several Original States shall be maintained and that no Original State shall have less than six senators.

The Parliament of a State may make laws for determining the times and places of elections of senators for the State.

As soon as may be after the Senate first meets and after each first meeting of the Senate following a dissolution thereof, the Senate shall divide the senators chosen for each State into two classes, as nearly equal in number as practicable: and the places of the senators of the first class shall become vacant at the expiration of the third year, and the places of those of the second class at the expiration of the sixth year, from the beginning of their term of service; and afterwards the places of senators shall become vacant at the expiration of six years from the beginning of their term of service.

The election to fill vacant places shall be made in the year at the expiration of which the places are to become vacant.

For the purposes of this section the term of service of a senator shall be taken to begin on the first day of January following the day of his election, except in the cases of the first election and of the election next after any dissolution of the Senate, when it shall be taken to begin on the first day of January preceding the day of his election.

Further provision for rotation.

14. Whenever the number of senators for a State is increased or diminished, The Parliament of the Commonwealth may make such provision for the vacating of the places of senators for the State as it deems necessary to maintain regularity in the rotation.

Casual vacancies.

15. If the place of a senator becomes vacant before the expiration of his term of service, the Houses of Parliament of the State for which he was chosen shall, sitting and voting together, choose a person to hold the place until the expiration of the term, or until the election of a successor as hereinafter provided, whichever first happens. But if the Houses of Parliament of the State are not in session at the time when the vacancy is notified, the Governor of the State, with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, may appoint a person to hold the place until the expiration of fourteen days after the beginning of the next session of the Parliament of the State, or until the election of a successor, whichever first happens.

At the next general election of members of the House of Representatives, or at the next election of senators for the State, whichever first happens, a successor shall, if the term has not then expired, be chosen to hold the place from the date of his election until the expiration of the term.

The name of any senator so chosen or appointed shall be certified by the Governor of the State to the Governor-General.

Qualifications of senator.
16. The qualifications of a senator shall be the same as those of a member of the House of Representatives.

Election of President.
17. The Senate shall, before proceeding to the despatch of any other business, choose a senator to be the President of the Senate; and as often as the office of President becomes vacant the Senate shall again choose a senator to be the President.

The President shall cease to hold his office if he ceases to be a senator. He may be removed from office by a vote of the Senate, or he may resign his office or his seat by writing addressed to the Governor-General.

Absence of President.
18. Before or during any absence of the President, the Senate may choose a senator to perform his duties in his absence.

Resignation of senator.
19. A senator may, by writing addressed to the President, or to the Governor-General if there is no President or if the President is absent from the Commonwealth, resign his place, which thereupon shall become vacant.

22. Until The Parliament otherwise provides, the presence of at least one-third of the whole number of the senators shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Senate for the exercise of its powers.

Voting by Senate.

23. Questions arising in the Senate shall be determined by a majority of votes, and each senator shall have one vote. The President shall in all cases be entitled to a vote; and when the votes are equal the question shall pass in the negative.

Part III. - The House Of Representatives.

Constitution of House of Representatives.

24. The House of Representatives shall be composed of members directly chosen by the people of the Commonwealth, and the number of such members shall be, as nearly as practicable, twice the number of the senators.

The number of members chosen in the several States shall be in proportion to the respective numbers of their people, and shall, until The Parliament otherwise provides, be determined, whenever necessary, in the following manner:-

I. A quota shall be ascertained by dividing the number of the people of the Commonwealth, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by twice the number of the senators.

II. The number of members to be chosen in each State shall be determined by dividing the number of the people of the State, as shown by the latest statistics of the Commonwealth, by the quota; and if on such division there is a remainder greater than one-half of the quota, one more member shall be chosen in the State.

But notwithstanding anything in this section, five members at least shall be chosen in each Original State.

[For the purposes of the last section, if by the law of any State all persons of any race are disqualified from voting at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State, then, in reckoning the number of the people of the State or of the Commonwealth, persons of that race resident in that State shall not be counted.

Representatives in first Parliament.

25. Notwithstanding anything in section twenty-four the number of members to be chosen in each State at the first election shall be as follows: [To be determined according to latest statistical returns at the date of the passing of the Act, and in relation to the quota referred to in previous sections.]

Duration of House of Representatives.
28. Every House of Representatives shall continue for three years from the first meeting of the House, and no longer, but may be sooner dissolved by the Governor-General.

Until The Parliament of the Commonwealth otherwise provides, the Parliament of any State may make laws for determining the divisions in each State for which members of the House of Representatives may be chosen, and the number of members to be chosen for each division. A division shall not be formed out of parts of different States.

In the absence of other provision, each State shall be one electorate.

Qualifications of electors.
30. Until The Parliament otherwise provides, the qualification of electors of members of the House of Representatives shall be in each State that which is prescribed by the law of the State as the qualification of electors of the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State; but in the choosing of members each elector shall vote only once.

Application of State laws.
31. Until The Parliament otherwise provides, but subject to this Constitution, the laws in force in each State for the time being relating to elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of the State shall, as nearly as practicable, apply to elections in the State of members of the House of Representatives.

Writs for general election.
32. The Governor-General in Council may cause writs to be issued for general elections of members of the House of Representatives.

After the first general election, the writs shall be issued within ten days from the expiry of a House of Representatives, or from the proclamation of a dissolution thereof.

Writs for vacancies.
33. Whenever a vacancy happens in the House of Representatives, the Speaker shall issue his writ for the election of a new member, or if there is no Speaker, or if he is absent from the Commonwealth, the Governor-General in Council may issue the writ.

Qualifications of members.
34. Until The Parliament otherwise provides, the qualifications of a member of the House of Representatives shall be as follows:-

I. He must be of the full age of twenty-one years, and must be an elector entitled to vote at the election of members of the House of Representatives, or a person qualified to become such elector, and must have been for three years at the least a resident within the limits of the Commonwealth as existing at the time when he is chosen:

II. He must be a subject of the Queen, either natural-born or for at least five years naturalized under a law of the United Kingdom, or of a Colony which has become or becomes a State, or of the Commonwealth, or of a State.

Part IV. - Both Houses Of The Parliament.
Rights of electors of States.

But no exception or regulation prescribed by The Parliament shall prevent the High Court from hearing and determining any appeal from the Supreme Court of a State in any matter in which at the establishment of the Commonwealth an appeal lies from such Supreme Court to the Queen in Council.

Until The Parliament otherwise provides, the conditions of and restrictions on appeals to the Queen in Council from the Supreme Courts of the several States shall be applicable to appeals from them to the High Court.

Appeals to Queen in Council.

74. No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council in any matter involving the interpretation of this Constitution or of the Constitution of a State, unless the public interests of some part of Her Majesty's Dominions, other than the Commonwealth or a State, are involved.
Except as provided in this section, this Constitution shall not impair any right which the Queen may be pleased to exercise, by virtue of Her Royal Prerogative, to grant special leave of appeal from the High Court to Her Majesty in Council. Any such officer who is not retained in the service of the Commonwealth shall, unless he is appointed to some other office of equal emolument in the public service of the State, be entitled to receive from the State any pension, gratuity, or other compensation payable under the law of the State on the abolition of his office.

Any such officer who is retained in the service of the Commonwealth shall preserve all his existing and accruing rights, and shall be entitled to retire from office at the time, and on the pension or retiring allowance, which would be permitted by the law of the State if his service with the Commonwealth were a continuation of his service with the State. Such pension or retiring allowance shall be paid to him by the Commonwealth; but the State shall pay to the Commonwealth a part thereof, to be calculated on the proportion which his term of service with the State bears to his whole term of service, and for the purpose of the calculation his salary shall be taken to be that paid to him by the State at the time of the transfer.

Any officer who is, at the establishment of the Commonwealth, in the public service of a State, and who is, by consent of the Governor of the State with the advice of the Executive Council thereof, transferred to the public service of the Commonwealth, shall have the same rights as if he had been an officer of a department transferred to the Commonwealth and were retained in the service of the Commonwealth.

II. The Commonwealth may acquire any property of the State, of any kind, used, but not exclusively used, in connexion with the department; the value thereof shall, if no agreement can be made, be ascertained in, as nearly as may be, the manner in which the value of land, or of an interest in land, taken by the State for public purposes is ascertained Under the law of the State in force at the establishment of the Commonwealth.

III. The Commonwealth shall compensate the State for the value of any property passing to the Commonwealth under this section; if no agreement can be made as to the mode of compensation, it shall be determined under laws to be made by The Parliament.

Trade within the Commonwealth to be free.

92. On the imposition of uniform duties of customs, trade, commerce, and intercourse among the States, whether by means of internal carriage or ocean navigation, shall be absolutely free.

But notwithstanding anything in this Constitution, goods imported before the imposition of uniform duties of customs into any State, or into any colony which, whilst the goods remain therein, becomes a State, shall, on thence passing into another State within two years after the imposition of such duties, be liable to any duty chargeable on the importation of such goods into the Commonwealth, less any duty paid in respect of the goods on their importation.

State of Western Australia may, during the first five years after the imposition of uniform duties of customs, impose duties of customs on goods passing into that State and not originally imported from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth; and such duties shall be collected by the Commonwealth.

But any duty so imposed on any goods shall not exceed during the first of such years the duty chargeable on the goods under the law of Western Australia in force at the imposition of uniform duties, and shall not exceed during the second, third, fourth, and fifth of such years respectively, four-fifths, three-fifths, two-fifths, and one-fifth of such latter duty, and all duties imposed under this section shall cease at the expiration of the fifth year after the imposition of uniform duties.

If at any time during the five years the duty on any goods under this section is higher than the duty imposed by the Commonwealth on the importation of the like goods, then such higher duty shall be collected on the goods when imported into Western Australia from beyond the limits of the Commonwealth.

Parliament may forbid preferences by States.

101. The Parliament may by any law with respect to trade or commerce forbid, as to railways, any preference or discrimination by any State, or by any authority constituted under a State, if such preference or discrimination is undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any State: due regard being had to the financial responsibilities incurred by any State in connexion with the construction and maintenance of its railways. But no preference or discrimination shall, within the meaning of this section, be taken to be undue and unreasonable, or unjust to any State, unless so adjudged by the Inter-State Commission.

111. After uniform duties of customs have been imposed, a State may levy on imports or exports, or on goods passing into or out of the State, such charges as may be necessary for executing the inspection laws of the State; but the net produce of all charges so levied shall be for the use of the Commonwealth; and any such inspection laws may be annulled by The Parliament of the Commonwealth.
